On the 21st November, a brig and merchant packet, part of the prizes captured at Tabasco, were wrecked near Alvarado, and of nine American on board five were drowned and four were saved. [RLK]

The United States sloop of war Cyane, was blockading the port of Guaymas. Mazatlan is said to be so loosely blockaded that vessels entered or departed with impunity. [AKS, RLK]

The United States ships Colombia, and Vincennes had not arrived at Monterey, as late as the 20th of September. [AKS]

Accounts from Chihuahua to the 20th of October, confirm the arrest of the American Traders, six in all, whose property was confiscated. James McGriffin, Henry Connelly and Mr. Francisco were the principle victims, and lose large fortunes. Mr. Connelly had been an old resident. Several caravans of Mexican traders came down about the same time from New Mexico, who reported General Kearny's departure for California, and Colonel Doniphan's movement upon Chihuahua. Five hundred men were equipped to resist the latter at El Passo del Norte, where there is a fort which they were to occupy.

LATER. By the steamer McKim, which reached New Orleans on the 20th, we have dates two days later from Monterey. Gen. Hamer, of Ohio, died there on the 3rd inst. , of inflammation on the bowels. Gen. Taylor had imprisoned the Alcalde of Monterey, for furnishing deserters with horses. Colonel Harney reached Monterey on the 24th ult. [AKS]

Gen. Wool was at Paris, 100 miles north of Chihuahua, with 1,000 men. Gen. Worth was at Saltillo, and will shortly have under his command 2,000. Col. Riley was at Monte Morales with about 1,000 men. Gen. Pillow was to move to Victoria on the 14th. [AKS]
Santa Anna had sent out a detachment of 2,000 men to destroy the water tanks between Saltillo and San Luis Potosi.

Gen. Taylor was to move, in column, on the 8th, 9th, and 10th inst., for Victoria, with about 1,500 men. Victoria is equidistant from Monterey and Tampico, and it was supposed that General Taylor would make that place his headquarters. No further demonstration would be made towards San Luis Potosi until further orders from our government.

The steamship Virginia left the Brazos for Tampico on Tuesday, 15th inst., with Lieut. Col. Clarke and six companies of the Alabama regiment, numbering nearly 400 men, rank and file. The steamer Cincinnati and U. S. propeller James Cage, left on the 16th with Gen. Sheilds and staff. Mr. Lumsden of the Picayune, and Capt. Shelly's company of Alabama volunteers-all bound for Tampico.

Gen. Scott, accompanied by Major Smith, Capt. Monroe, and Lieuts. Scott and Williams, arrived at New Orleans on the 19th inst. In the ship Union, from New York, all in fine health and spirits, and would leave in a few days for the seat of war.

Hugh O'Donnell, of Ohio, to be assistant quartermaster, with the rank of captain, Oct. 7, 1846, to fill a vacancy.

Ralph G. Norvell, of Indiana, to be assistant quartermaster, with the rank of captain, December 2, 1846, to fill a vacancy.

Geo. M. Lanman, of Penn., to be assistant quartermaster, with the rank of captain.

Frederick A. Churchill, of Ohio, to be commissary, with the rank of major, Nov. 24, 1846, to fill a vacancy.

McDonough J. Bunch, of Tenn., to be assistant commissary, with the rank of captain, Aug. 18, 1846, to fill a vacancy.

Francis M. Diamond, of Rhode Island, to be assistant commissary, with the rank of captain, Oct. 26, 1846, to fill a vacancy.

Isaac R. Diller, of Penn., to be assistant commissary, with the rank of captain.

Alexander Perry, of N. York, to be surgeon, Aug. 21, 1846.

David McKnight, of Tenn., to be surgeon, Sept. 10, 1846.

Wm. R. Washington, of Tenn., to be surgeon, Oct. 29, 1846, to fill a vacancy.

John C. Reynolds, of Penn., to be surgeon.

Geo. B. Sanderson, of Mo., to be assistant surgeon, Aug. 20, 1846.

Wm. C. Parker, of N. York, to be assistant surgeon, Sept. 2, 1846, to fill a vacancy.

Enoch P. Hale, of Tenn., to be assistant surgeon, Sept. 10, 1846.

Thomas C. Bunting, of Penn., to be assistant surgeon.

Lambert Reardon, to be deputy postmaster at Little Rock, in the State of Arkansas, in the place of Wm. E. Woodruff, resigned.
The Cincinnati Atlas says: - Col. F.A. Churchill, of Cincinnati, has been appointed commissary in the U.S. Army, in place of Maj. Wm. F. Johnson, resigned. The appointment entitles him to the rank and pay of major. He has orders to report himself to Gen. Taylor, at Monterey. [RLK]

NRR 71.272 December 26, 1846, Mexicans at El Paso del Norte

Accounts from Chihuahua to the 20th of October, confirm the arrest of the American traders, six in all, whose property was confiscated. James McGeffin, Henry Connelly, and Mr. Francisco were the principal victims, and lose large fortunes. Mr. Connelly had been an old resident. Several caravans of Mexican traders came down about the same time from New Mexico, who reported General Kearny’s departure for California, and Colonel Doniphan’s movement upon Chihuahua. Five hundred men were equipped to resist the latter at El Passo del Norte, where there is a fort which they were to occupy. [RLK]

NRR 71.272 December 26, 1846, Mexican levy on the church and clergy to finance the war, shipments of specie to Europe

The Church and Clergy of “both sexes,” have been levied upon to support the war to the amount of two millions of dollars, of which the Archbishop contributes one million, the bishop of Oajaca $100,000, Guadalaxara $200,000 &c. This measure was very popular with the army.

Specie is being shipped for Europe in large amounts. The British Steamer Clyde alone, took $1,600,000 from Vera Cruz for England, on the 2d Nov. [RLK]

NRR 71.272 12/26/1846 steamer Gopher breaks her chains and is lost in heavy winds, other ships sunk in gale

The U. S. steamer Gopher broke her hog chains, and steam connections in crossing the bar on Sunday, the 13th. She was, however, enabled to get outside and come to anchor in five fathoms of water, but the wind blowing strong from the southeast and a heavy sea running, she was literally smashed to pieces, and sunk at her anchors. The U. S. steamers De Rossett and John R. Thompson were despatched to her assistance, and but barely succeeded in saving some fifty lives before she went down. The pilot boat Ariel was lost the same day, a large sea splitting open her wood ends. Cargo and crew saved-several vessels were blown to sea in a gale on the 7th losing anchors and cables. The barque Wm. Ivy, returned on the 13th with a loss of 50 mules. The McKim was nine days outside the bar before communication could be had to discharge her. [AKS]

January 2, 1847, Withdrawal of the British offer of mediation because of American indisposition to accept

Accounts from Mexico state, that the British government have withdrawn their offer to mediate for peace between that government and the government of the United States, in consequence of the government of the latter expressing an indisposition to such interference. [RLK]

January 2, 1847, Rumors about Gen. Zachary Taylor’s movement from Monterey to Victoria

From the army of occupation our latest dates are to the 2d Dec. Gen. Taylor is represented in some of the letters as preparing to march from Monterey with his division, in the direction of Victoria, and the opinion expressed that he would quit Monterey by the 10th or 12th of Dec. Other letters say that he will wait for more explicit orders or authority from Washington before undertaking to move. [RLK]

January 2, 1847, Arrest of the son of the Alcalde of Monterey for inducing American soldiers to desert

Desertions from the American Army. A correspondent of the New Orleans Tropic, writing from Monterey on the 27th ultimo, says: "This morning three Mexicans were arrested on a charge of trying to induce some of our men to desert. One of them is the son of the Alcalde, and I think it will go hard with them. Gen. Taylor was in town, and told them that unless some three or four men, who had been seduced off, were brought back in a given time, he would hang them in the Plaza. This business induced me to make inquiry as to the number of men who had deserted from our ranks, and was told that not less than fifty had gone over to the enemy since the capitulation of Monterey; but I am proud to state that none of them were native born Americans." [RLK] Guerrilla war commenced. A correspondent of the N. Orleans Delta, writes from Monterey, Dec 1, 1846. “The war between the Kentuckeyians and Mexicans, as it is fairly termed, has created no little excitement both in town and in camp. It is thought that not less than forty Mexicans have been killed within the last five days, fifteen of whom, it is said, were killed in one day, and within the scope of one mile. From this you will see that the boys are determined to have and to take revenge for the assassination of their comrades.” [WWF, RLK]

The trial of the Alcalde’s son and the others accused of tampering with the soldiers to desert was to commence on the 2nd. It is stated that a thousand including many of the first families in Monterey had precipitately left the city since his arrest. Accounts from Mexico represented Santa Anna as having 20 to 25,000 men, of which 10,000 are cavalry, and 52 pieces of field artillery, at San Luis Potosi. Since then we have accounts of his having been joined by General Valencia, at the head of 800 men, raised principally from among the hardy miners of the district of Guanajuato. Valencia is considered one of the best Generals in Mexico and has been appointed second in command by Santa Anna.

[Private letters have been received from Santa Anna, and from Almonte, in New York, - so says the French Journal published in that city, which state that these officers express great confidence in being able to defend the country and determination to do so. From our Guilt squadron, we have another and yet the most disastrous incident of the war of which an account will be found under the naval head. Since placing that account in type, the official account of the loss of the Somers has reached us and will be inserted in our next. This affair illustrates at once the daring intrepidity of our officers and men, and the dangers of the coast upon which they are serving. [WFF]
January 2, 1847, correspondence between Gen. Zachary Taylor and Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, the latter asserts that Congress nor any Mexican will ever listen to overtures of peace until hostile forces are withdrawn.

Another correspondent has taken place between General Taylor and Santa Anna, - in the course of which the latter holds the following language:

"I believe that I do not deceive myself in assuring you, that neither congress, nor any Mexican, will ever be able to listen to overtures of peace unless the national territory be first evacuated by the forces of the United States, and the hostile attitude of their vessels of war be withdrawn. This must be without doubt the preliminary of whatever negotiation may be opened; and it may be permitted to me to declare to you, that the nation, moved by a sentiment of patriotism, and determined to defend at every hazard and inch by inch its territory, will never cease to qualify as it deserves, and as the world has already qualified it the conduct of the United States; and it will do whatever it can and ought honorably to deserve the title which it bears, of an independent and free nation." [RLK]

SERGENT KELLY

No one in the long procession that followed the remains of the lamented Ringgold to the quiet Cemetery where they now repose, was more deeply affected on the occasion, or was as object of more general interest and sympathy, than the wounded teamster, who led the representative for the occasion, of the gallant major's war horse. Alas! The remains of the real steed lay moldering on the battle field. Pierced by the same ball that felled his rider. He breathed no more - and never again responded to the trumpet charge.

Poor Kelly! He is now a cripple for life. Upon the field of Palo Alto he left his good right arm. For twenty years he had been in the United States service, no man more faithful to his trust. On the day before the battle of Palo Alto, the term of his last enlistment expired. He received an honorable discharge and was about to return to the U. States. For eight years he had been sergeant in Major Ringgold’s Flying Artillery, and having charge of the teams, was invaluable to him. If a man ever loved his officer, Kelly was that man. He had watched every stage of the major’s promotion with all the enthusiasm of a generous heart, and was ever at his side when danger threatened. There was at the moment a prospect of an approaching conflict. The morning of the 8th of May had but dawned, when, beside the tent of Major Ringgold stood Sergeant Kelly.

The major made his appearance. The sergeant touched his cap in military style, and said - “You'll have a fight today, Major.”

"I think we shall, Kelly, and I don't see how I am to do without my old teamster in such an occasion."

"Can Sergeant Kelly be of any service? If he can you shall not be without him."

"You are familiar with duties that may be important. I can depend on you Kelly."

"Can Sergeant Kelly volunteer?"

"You can, and shall have your accustomed station."

Kelly was in his saddle in a moment, and again touching his cap for orders, with a heart glowing with renewed affection for his commander.

The tents were struck. The lines advances. They encounter the foe. As they opened their fire from the chaparral, Kelly, in the act of stooping down with the right hand extended forward, received a ball which shattered the arm to pieces. Slowly raising his body, and grasping his right arm with his left, e quietly went off in search of the surgeon general of the army. His arm was amputated. Whilst lying in the rude temporary hospital he learned that his commander was soon after far more dangerously wounded than himself. After being removed to Point Isabel, Kelly was compelled to submit to a second amputation. He there learned the death of the major.

When the Baltimore committee reached Point Isabel, Kelly applied for permission to accompany the remains of his deceased friend and beloved commander to their last resting place. The request was granted, although he had scarcely sufficiently recovered to endure such a movement. On reaching New Orleans, where the facts were familiarly known, as well as that having been discharged from the service, Kelly would not be entitled by law to a pension, a handsome subscription was immediately raised for him. On reaching Mobile, Ala., the sum of $250 were tendered him. At Charleston, S. C., $307 were raised and sent to Baltimore for him.

At every stage, Sergeant Kelly, the rough and stern soldier, the volunteer of the day, with his war cloak close around him, was the chief mourner nearest the coffin that concealed the relics. No smile has been seen to brighten his countenance. His countrymen have promptly pensioned him for life. He asks not where is his own right arm, but, where is his beloved

The army in campaign.

The army in Mexico has been augmented during the year by recruits and detachments of regular troops drawn from various points, and by numerous regiments of twelve month volunteers.

The land forces employed in prosecuting the war may be estimated as follows:

REGULARS
In the field, officers and men, including general staff 6,613
Troops at sea, and under orders to join the army 1,098
Recruits en route for the seat of war 762
Aggregate regulars in campaign 8,473

VOLUNTEERS
In the field 15,745
At sea, for California 766
Aggregate volunteers in campaign 16,511

The regular force on active field service is composed of the following regiments:

1st dragoons, 8 companies 560
2d dragoons, 10 companies 723
Aggregate 1,283
1st artillery, 8 companies 609
2d artillery, 9 companies 787
3d artillery, 8 companies 660
4th artillery, 8 companies 650
Aggregate 2,706
1st infantry, 4 companies 188
2d infantry, 9 companies 687
3d infantry, 6 companies 319
4th infantry, 6 companies 332
The volunteers employed in the war consist of twenty-seven regiments and two companies, of which five regiments are cavalry or mounted men and twenty-two infantry, except a part of one battalion, of which two of the companies are field artillery.

On the 21st of September, it appears by the statement then submitted by the secretary of war that the volunteer force in the field (twelve months men) amounted to 23,161 officers and men, exclusive of the general officers and staff provided for the irregular troops. This force, it is seen, does not now exceed 16,500, if the data upon which the strength of the army is based be tolerably correct.

Distribution of the army in campaign

Army under command or order of Major General Taylor –

Regular troops 5,663
- En route to Mexico 981
- Recruits en route 762
- Regulars 7,406
- Volunteers 10,926

Regular troops 621
- Volunteers 2,039

Aggregate 2,660

Under Brig. General Kearney, charged with the conduct of a separate division in New Mexico and California –

Regular troops 446
- Volunteers 3,546
- Aggregate 3,992

Aggregate force employed in the field 24,984

Of this force (24,984) 8,473 are of the regular army and 16,511 volunteers.

The achievements of every division and battalion in the field have nobly sustained the character of the regular army. In the day of battle the efficiency and skill displayed only equaled the expectations of those best acquainted with its high state of discipline, &c. The victories won and the graves of the fallen attest the ability and valor of the veterans of other wars, as well as of younger officers – élèves of the National Academy, and others.

The volunteer troops won unfading laurels in the sanguinary battle of Monterey. Their gallantry was conspicuous wherever duty called. Many fell in the action.

The destination of a part of the troops reported “en route to Mexico” for the army under Major General Taylor has been suddenly changed; and it is also probably that detachments have been drawn from the lower Grande for Tampico, which reduces the force reported under the immediate order that general. But the additional volunteer force recently called into the service will soon be pushed forward in the direction of the Rio Grande.

Of the force reported as under the orders of Brigadier General Kearney, one company of the third regiment of artillery embarked at New York for Monterey, California, July 14th, and the New York regiment of volunteers for the same destination embarked 25th September. The brigadier reported, October 16th, that he was en route for that country from Santa Fe, with two companies of the first regiment of dragoons, deeming that force (with the several officers of the staff who accompany him) adequate for the service in view.

Distribution of troops in the eastern and western divisions.

The forts on the sea coast and the posts on the western frontiers have nearly all been evacuated, and the garrisons of the few now occupied been greatly diminished since the war with Mexico.

The recruiting service.

The recruiting service has been pushed with vigor. Several companies, much reduced, have been temporarily broken up, rendering available more officers for this essential service than otherwise could have been withdrawn from active duty in the field.

The whole number of men enlisted from the 1st of October, 1845, to the 30th September, 1846, is 5,945, being an excess of 2,388 over the previous year. The number enlisted in December, may be put down at 1,500.

The raising of numerous regiments of volunteers and the greater inducements to enter for short periods, satisfactorily accounts for the want of better success in recruiting for the regular army. High wages for labor is another cause reported as having a decided influence upon the recruiting service; but more than all, perhaps, the distinction seen in the pension laws between the private soldier of the regular army and the volunteer, and which operates so unfavorable to the former. The widows and orphans of the volunteers who may be killed in battle, or die of wounds received in the service, are pensioned; while the widows and orphans of the regular soldiers who die under the same circumstances are entirely unprovided for by law.

The rank and file of the army, (enlisted men of artillery, infantry, dragoons, and riflemen) including detachments, recruits, and recruiting parties, may be computed to be about ten thousand men by the 31st December.

The objections heretofore urged to the bounty-in-hand system deemed to be valid in time of peace, are not applicable to a state of war. I recommend, therefore, that the provisions of the 12th section of the act entitled "An act fixing the military peace establishment,” &c. approved March 16, 1802 (repealed in 1833*) be now re-enacted and continued during the war, and no longer. The impulse given to the recruiting service would be prompt and decisive of better success.
I respectfully request the attention of the department to the special report I had the honor to submit to the secretary of war July 30, 1846, on the subject of providing an addition major for each of the regiments of the line. I then stated that "a view of the actual service as it has been, and more especially as it now is, must convince you that the complement of the field officers for the several regiments of artillery, infantry, and cavalry is inadequate; and that the service at this time greatly needs the addition of one major to each for duty in the field. The regiments in Mexico do not average one field officer and when the operations are pushed into the interior of the enemy’s country, there may be several battalions, as is the case now with the 7th infantry, which will be commanded by captains.

"To ensure as many as two field officers with the regiments under Gen. Taylor, an additional major should be allowed to be selected from the active captains of their respective arms. The second major was found indispensably necessary in former organizations of the army, especially during the war with England. The staff corps are well provided with this very useful grade of field officers; in three of which (engineers, topographical engineers, and ordnance) the same complement is allowed (four each) as the law provides for the whole twelve regiments of infantry and artillery. The complement of field officers of the marching regiments, officers who recruit, instruct and discipline the troops, and who must lead them into battle, is utterly insufficient, and this the present state of the actual service in the field too clearly demonstrates. The return and reports from Gen. Taylor show the great deficiency in this, the junior grade of field officers with the army under his command, which it is not possible to supply with our present means; for the disabled and invalid list is not likely to be diminished, but rather increased."

I also beg leave respectfully to recall the attention of the department to the recommendation, more than once repeated in the annual reports of the major general commanding-in-chief, in reference to the importance of having the several regiment effective in officers as well as in men. The plan proposed by the late Major General Macomb was to provide by law for a retired list, which, according to the details submitted, would not cost the government one cent more than the present rates allowed. "The only difference would be that the places of the non-effective officers would be supplied by the effective officer doing their duty, and the brevet officers at the foot of the list would be sooner advanced; and thus, by the increased efficiency of the several regiments and corps, there would actually a benefit result to the public," &c. It is believed that a plan could be devised which would improve the condition of the service, and at the same time do justice to the invalid office whose life had been spent in the faithful performance of public duty. In his annual report of November 22, 1841, Major General Scott brought up the subject to the consideration of the secretary of war, and at the same time recommended that some provision of law might be adopted "in favor of widows and orphans of regular officers who have died or may die in consequence of wounds received or disease contracted in the service; there being such provision already made in behalf of the widows and orphans of navy, volunteer, and militia officers dying under the same circumstances."

Respectfully submitted,

R. JONES,
Adjutant General U.S. Army.

The Hon. WM. L. MARCY, Secretary of War.

NRR47January v71.288 1/2/1847 Somers, brig of war, wrecked in storm

The writer gives an interesting account of the heroic devotion of the foreign vessels at Sacrificios, two miles distant, to save the crew of the Somers. Two hundred of the crew of the British ship Endymion volunteered for the service, and among the French and Spanish vessels equal heroism was exhibited. The gale, however, was so violent that her boats had to be recalled. When it abated they again put out, and succeeded in saving fourteen lives. We regret that we have not space for these interesting details.

The strange vessel which tempted the Somers from shelter was the Abrasia, bound for the squadron.

Sixteen of those on board the Somers, reached the shore on hen-coops, and are now prisoners in Vera Cruz.

On the 13th inst., the same writer says:- As sailing of the Morgan Dix has been delayed by a head wind, I have an opportunity to add the good news that eight more of the men of the Somers have been picked up by the Mexicans on the beach near Anton Lizardo, whither they were driven by the gale on a hen coop. One of them has since died. They are held as prisoners in Vera Cruz. This makes forty-four all told, who have been saved from the wreck. The Somers had nearly eighty souls on board, all told.

Passed midshipman Hynson, one of the officers lost by the disaster to the Somers, was one of those who participated in the burning of the Creole moored to the walls of San Juan de Ulloa. It is said that he could have saved his life, but for his generosity in giving up his spar to a sailor whom he considered weaker than himself. In seeking another support he went down. [AKS]

Reconnoitering party captured by the Mexicans. - On the 5th Dec., Midshipman R. Clay Rogers, Dr. J. W. Wright, and John G. Fox, a seaman of the Somers, went ashore for the purpose of reconnoitering one of the enemies' magazines, and ascertaining the practicability of destroying it. The party had gone some distance from the boat, when they were surrounded by seven Mexican soldiers. Dr. Wright made his escape. Mr. Rogers and the seaman were made prisoners, and sent to Perote to be confined there. [AKS]

Editorial review of the campaign

THE CAMPAIGN OF 1846, has terminated. Without delaying to learn from all direction the exact attitude of affairs everywhere, at the expiration of the year, this number of the Register details the latest intelligence we have from each point, and summing up the whole, it is worth while to review what has been done, and estimate as well as we have means, what is yet to be accomplished.

It is our duty to look at what is before us, fully in the face, and to take precaution accordingly.

When the war with Mexico was commenced, the impression prevailed, that it would be but a brief affair. The Executive, without doubt expected to have it brought to a favorable close by the end of the year, which has expired. They asked congress for such an appropriation of money as was deemed by them adequate for the occasion, which was granted with great unanimity. They applied for a law authorising 50,000 volunteers, which was also granted; for an increase of the Army, and that was granted – and larger appropriations for the Navy also. No measure was proposed to congress by the Administration for prosecuting the war with vigor, that was not readily granted. The call for volunteers was not even waited for in many of the States; Louisiana, Kentucky, Maryland, and other States hurried more than their quotas to the frontier, before the requisitions reach them. The party in opposition to the Administration not only voted for the supplies of men and money. The only whig representative in congress from the state of Illinois left his seat and joined the Army in Mexico. The older members of the party did not themselves follow this example, but Mr. Crittenden and Daniel Webster, leading whigs of the United States Senate, have each a son commanding volunteers in the war. Mr. Calhoun’s son is aid to Gen. Gaines – Mr. Van Buren’s son is also with the army. Cassius M. Clay was one of the foremost to lead the Kentucky volunteers to the field. Henry Clay has a son amongst the foremost, and it would seem from a toast and speech which the statesman himself uttered at a dinner to which he was invited a few days since at New Orleans, that he has half a notion to start off himself to join his countrymen in arms. Even the "old man eloquent" John Quincy Adams himself, led off at the head of his party, in the House of Representatives, against any movement to obstruct war measures.

The Administration at Washington planned and directed the campaign. Six months have elapsed since war was "recognized". The frontiers of Mexico are in possession of our armies. Santa Fe, situated on the east side of the Rio Grande has been taken by Gen. Kearny. Monclova is in possession of General Wool. The lower valley of the Rio Grande, after a severe conflict, fell into the hands of General Taylor. Another conflict not less severe, won Monterey. The enemy evacuated Saltillo, and the pass at the Sierra Madre is in our possession. Tampico has just been captured without opposition. The ports of California are in the possession of our Pacific squadron.

Mexico has lost, of course, just what we have won.

They have lost some of their ports of the Pacific, they have lost the valley of the Rio Grande, from the mouth to Santa Fe – they have lost Monterey, Saltillo, and Monclova – and they have lost Tampico.

They have lost Gen. Arista, Gen. Ampudia, and President Paredes, - as commanders and conductors of the war. But in their places, unfortunately for us, and partly from our indiscretion too, they have Gen. Santa Anna.

[Word unreadable] of San Jacinto?

Aye, - and the same who at Tampico captured the [word unreadable] of Spain that was sent to endeavor to recover or win Mexico – the same too, that so bravely defended Vera Cruz from the attack of the French army that had won the Castle of San Juan d’Ulloa, -and was attempting to begin a march on the City of Mexico.
Second in command, they have Valencia, one of the best Mexican General – the same that with 1200 men and a battery of artillery, defeated the Generals Urrea and Mejia, commanders of the federal forces, at [word unreadable], 15 leagues from Puebla, capturing the latter; Mejia was subsequently shot by Santa Anna. Urrea, by fleetness of his horse, escaped. A year afterwards, 1840, Valencia was again called to command, and in hours, obliged Urrea to capitulate and surrender the national palace, where he had posted himself. – In 1841 he become the pet of the government, and when Santa Anna raised the standard of revolt, Valencia, was ordered to oppose him. He deceived the government, took sides with Santa Anna, and seconded his success. Always lucky, he avoided being banished with Santa Anna, but joins him with 8000 immediately upon his return to Mexico, and is now second in command.

URREA is now also with Santa Anna – with probably the best corps d'arme in the Mexican service. He is about 50 years of age, of polished manners, and is esteemed an able officer. We know him to be unscrupulous, by his having obeyed Santa Anna’s ordered to perpetrate the horrible murders at Golial. – He became a federalist in 1835, and for four years resisted the central government. Santa Anna has gone over to his party.

ALMONTE, unquestionably one of the ablest of the Mexican statesmen, as well as most inveterate opponent to the dismemberment of Mexico, is managing the departments at the Mexican capital.

General WOLL, a Frenchman, and former Mexican commander on the Texan frontiers, has also lately returned from Europe. Besides this, many experienced and tired officers of ability, are stated to have been in company with Santa Anna himself at his return from Havana, Spanish as well as Mexican.

Such is the array of officers that have now to be combated.

The amount of force which our army encountered at Palo Alto, and Resaca, was below 10,000, and they but that moment concentrated and fatigued with a long and hurried march. It was there ascertained that we had no child’s play in hand. Mexicans, it was found, could fight, and would fight.

The force concentrated at Monterey, numbered about 10,000. General Taylor was entirely uncertain whether he would meet any opposition, until within sight of the city. It happened to be commanded by a General, who during the three days fight, instead of exhibiting personal courage, kept himself safely ensconced, - and so exasperated were the Mexicans at his having capitulated whilst the citidel and the plaza, their strongest fortresses, were yet unassailed, that an American escort was required for his safety on leaving the city, and his is now under arrest for cowardice.

It is admitted on all hands, that Santa Anna had, within the period between his leaving the coast upon which he was permitted to land, or rather from his leaving his hacienda without even an escort, and the latest dates from San Luis, say in less than three months, concentrated an army of 30,000 men, 10,000 of which are cavalry, and that he was just receiving a formidable train of artillery, in addition to the light pieces he had in the field.

He has it in his power to precipitate a large force from the centre he occupies, in which ever direction he may select. Monclova, Saltillo, Monterey, Matamoros, Victoria, Tampico, - any of them are to him within striking distance.

No indication of a disposition to submit to the terms which our government is understood to demand, is perceived on the part of those in power, - and still less is such a disposition found amongst the Mexican people. They have their factions and their cliques, but no one of them all, has yet breathed a word like submission to our demands.

The struggle assumes a more serious aspect. Our own executive perceive that it will require more time, more men, and more money to “conquer a peace,” than they had anticipated.

Immediately upon receiving intelligence of the capture of Monterey, without waiting for the reason which influenced the officers of the army to conclude the armistice, the President ordered the agreement to be annulled, and the army to advance towards the city of Mexico – General Taylor promptly obeyed the order, and occupied Saltillo, evacuated by the enemy.

After receiving the despatches, assigning their reasons, and stating the difficulties, the army would have to encounter by advancing in that direction, orders were sent from Washington to change the whole plan of invasion. The several divisions were directed to concentrate at a southern point on the gulf, and the formidable movement is to be made from thence.

The commander in chief of the United States army, Gen. Scott, is ordered on to take charge of the campaign and has no doubt by this time reached Tampico, which is already occupied. Vera Cruz, however is supposed to be the first object of a formidable attack. Some of our heaviest ships and most experienced officers have orders to join the blockading squadron. Ordnance of the largest calibre, bombs of immense size and in large quantities are being forwarded. Everything indicates that a bold attempt is contemplated by the squadron.

A land attack is probably relied upon with no less confidence. A squadron of flat bottomed transport vessels, suitable for moving troops in shoal waters, are being constructed with the unusual despatch at our eastern building yards. Some of them are nearly completed. The newly raised corps of sappers and miners, are en route for the army, and another corps forming under Captain Walbach, U.S.A., intended to manage mountain howitzers on an improved system, is rapidly organizing. The eleven additional regiments of volunteers, are being mustered into service, choosing officers, concentrating and disciplining preparatory to embarking for the coast of Mexico.

To take Vera Cruz – and the castle of San Juan d’Ulloa, - to penetrate the different passes which lead from thence to Mexico or San Luis Potosi, to encounter an army of over 30,000 Mexicans, now in the field for the defence of that post, commanded by the officers we have named, prompted on by a general impulse from the whole Mexican people – fighting, as it will be, for their country and their homes – is no child’s play.

The president and cabinet at Washington apprized of the nature of the case, have applied to congress to authorize the appointment of a "Commanding General," with a view, it is presumed, of superseding all the officers now in the field, or afloat, in authority and control of the campaign which is about to commence.

This proposition, as will be seen in our columns of congressional proceedings, met with a prompt veto by the house of representatives. The committee to which it was referred consisted of six administration and three whig members. Only one member of the committee – it is said objected to the report agreed upon – and although the vote of the house was next day reconsidered, its believed to have been only in respect of the feelings of the president.

How the proposition will far in the senate, is the question. The committee to whom the subject was referred, stood two for, and two against the appointment, the chairman of the committee, Col. Benton, not present, as he is understood to be probably interested in the issue. If such an appointment be authorised, he is no doubt to be "Commanding General."

Mr. Calhoun, is said to be opposed, and Gen. Cass, to be in favor of appointing such an officer.

Views in relation to the next Presidency, may perhaps influence some votes, or may decide the question in the Senate.

This failure of executive influence in the legislation – constituted as it is of the same members that last session so faithfully seconded his recommendations, looks rather ominous.

A still more important recommendation, urged by the secretary of the treasury, all important to his obtaining ways and means for sustaining the government and carrying on the way, was on Saturday last treated with, if possible, a still more emphatic negative. We allude to the decision, by an overwhelming vote, that it was "inexpedient to lay a duty upon tea and coffee," – which the secretary has so urgently pressed upon them to lay, and to lay promptly.

The first stage, an agreement between the secretary of the treasury and the committee on ways and means of the house, as to the features of a revenue bill, has not been arrived at. They differ in opinion – the vote in the house on the secretary’s proposition to tax tea and coffee, it is feared is but on feature of the difference. A resort to a direct tax upon certain personalities, is favored in committee. The secretary is opposed to direct taxation.

How difficult it will be to reconcile the vastly conflicting views entertained by members in the house on such a subject, may be readily conceived. Several of the last tariff bills have been carried only after a long struggle, by casting votes of the presiding officer.

The Washington correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer, writes on the 4th instant, “It is said great companies are made by capitalists who negotiated the late loan at the conduct of the secretary of the treasury. If I am informed rightly, he gave them positive assurances, that the war was about being terminated, and no more troops would be ordered out. On the faith of these pledges, offers were made which could not have been induced under other circumstances, and yet the negotiators had hardly turned their backs upon the capitol before every promise was violated. Transactions like these are pre-calculated to impair every sort of confidence in the administration, and this one will be the means of affecting the new loan should it be authorised by congress.”

This is incredible. If untrue, such a publication is exceedingly imprudent.

These indications of a failure of executive influence in the legislature, are the more portentous from the fact, that it is from the “house of his friends,” from the administration members, that the president has experienced this falling off.

The session of congress has nearly half elapsed, and no report has yet been made as to ways and means, so urgently demanded for sustaining the credit of the government. It is stated that the committee on finance is in favor of a resort to various internal taxes, which it would take a considerable time to make available if adopted.

But the gravest aspect of all, is the turn which it is feared the whole question is about to assume, in relation to the adding more territory to the Union, whether it is admitted under the Missouri compromise, or whether slavery is to be excluded from the new territory?

On this point, hang the destinies of the country.

In eight weeks, the session of congress must close.

In the house of representatives of the next congress, it is yet uncertain whether the now dominant party will have a majority. The northern administration men will number far less than in the present congress, and the president will find difficulty in exerting such an influence as he has in the congress that is about to expire. [RLK]
The wagons were in charge of Capt. D. S. Marne, who lost all his clothing, collected for a three years' expedition, together

The Colombia (Boone Co. ) Statesman announces the reception of a letter from Santa Fe, by the same arrival, dated on the St. Louis Rep

We learn from Liberty (Mo. Tribune, that a train of twenty four government wagons were attacked and robbed on the 28th Nov. , by a body of about 500 Indians, thirty miles below the crossings of the Arkansas.

The wagons were in charge of Capt. D. S. Marne, who lost all his clothing, collected for a three years' expedition, together with nearly all the mules attached to the train. One man, John Dougherty, was killed, and four others wounded.

A letter written at Santa Fe on the 19th of Nov., states that Col. Price's regiment is stationed at that place for the winter, and that great sickness prevailed amongst the troops. There had been as many as seven deaths a day.

There are reports, we sincerely hope unfounded reports, as many of those received through Mexico are, that a part of our forces about the gulf of California, have been overcome and killed by the Mexicans. That it is false, is the more probable from our no having any confirmation of the story by later dates received from Mexico. The impression in Texas was, that if true, it must be Col. Fremont's detachment that has suffered.

The posture of affairs in the division of our army at Santa Fe, as furnished by the latest intelligence from thence, is rather uncomfortable, not from dread of the enemy, but of suffering starvation.

The main object for which "The Army of the Centre," under General Wool was understood to have been destined, was, to occupy, Chihuahua and its provinces. This object seems to have been either abandoned by that division for the present, or left to a portion of the forces under Gen. Kearny. General Doniphan was to have left Santa Fe with a view to accomplish, what Gen. Wool was started to effect, immediately after our latest dates from thence. [AKS]

71.290 January 9, 1847, reports from the Army of the Center

"ARMY OF THE CENTRE."

Advices have been received at New Orleans from Galveston, Texas, to the 22d December. The Picayune says - "There is a story in the Galveston News, told be a teamster recently from Mexico, to the effect that Colonel Riley was recently surrounded, at Mroelos, by 500 Mexicans under Gen. Urrea, and that was no hope of Col. R's escape. We do not believe a word of it."

We hear, (says the St. Louis Republican) from a source entitled to confidence, that General Wool's army has been, or will soon be ordered to march to Monterey, where it, together with all the disposable forces under Gen. Taylor, is to march to Tampico, and constitute the advance of the twenty thousand men which, we have already said, are to march against the city of Mexico. If any demonstration is to be made again Chihuahua by Colonel Doniphan, he must, it is now certain, do it without the co-operation of Gen. Wool, and with a force, the efficiency of which is very much impaired by the want of almost every material for a successful campaign.

A letter dated Parras, Mexico, December 9, says:

"Col. Yell, Lieut. Col. Roane, and Major Borland, are under arrest, for positive disobedience of orders. The "old war horse" [Gen. Wool] has ordered a court martial. [RLK]

71.290 January 9, 1847, Gen. Zachary Taylor's visit to Saltillo, &c

"ARMY OF OCCUPATION"

SALITLLO

Dragoon camp, near Monterey, Mexico

November 25, 1846

I have just returned from Saltillo, where I have been with the dragoons as escort to General Taylor, who accompanied the command under Gen. Worth, which marched from here for that place on the 13th instant.

This force, in all numbering about one thousand men, marched into the city and took possession of the same on the 16th instant, and Gen. Worth, with his division of about eight hundred men, now remains in command of the same.

We found no troops in the city, nor met with any resistance in taking possession of it. It is situated about fifty miles southwest from here, and contains at present over twenty thousand inhabitants. As a city, it is far inferior to Monterey, the buildings being built of sun-dried tiles in place of stone, thus offering, as you see, a dirty appearance to the observer.

In the nicer parts of the city, however, and around the main plaza, the buildings are covered with a hard white cement which makes them appear quite well. It has a most magnificent cathedral built of stone, and as I surveyed the "thousand and one" statues, images, candlesticks, crosses, &c., with which its inner walls and domes were ornamented, I almost began to imagine that I was gazing upon the vast riches of the halls of the ancient Montezumas; but it was the house of worship.

The entire route from Monterey to Saltillo lie along a narrow valley, varying from a quarter to three miles in extent, while on either side bold and precipitous mountains rise almost to the very clouds. They are entirely destitute of timber of timber and vegetation of any kind, and the scene at times was particularly grand and sublime. On one occasion the sun was obscured from out sight at 10 A.M. by these towering heights. But I cannot dwell here. The whole distance was greatly ascending and the road rocky and broken. As our route for the most part lay along the stream we generally found plenty of water.

On one of these narrow defiles the Mexicans had thrown us some defences, which were evacuated after the fall of Monterey. At Saltillo we found no wood of any kind, and were under the necessity of purchasing brush enough from the Mexicans to boil our coffee. This they brought some ten miles or more upon their backs, or upon pack mules as is customary in this country. At Monterey the orange, lime, lemon, citron, &c. – prosper to perfection, while at Saltillo, (farther south,) they do not grow or do well. This is owing to the different altitudes of the two places.

But wheat and apples do well at Saltillo; at Monterey they are not raised. Corn grows well in both places, and the seasons are so long that two crops are raised from the same piece of ground yearly – Potatoes do not grow here. About Saltillo the fields are without fences, and are watched for safety against cattle, &c. daily and nightly by sentinels. As we are arrived at Saltillo we captured 125 pack mules, each loaded with 300 lbs., public flour destined for the Mexican army at San Luis Potosi. While there Gen. Taylor detached Capt. Graham and myself, with our companies and an engineer officer, to reconnoiter the country and passes lying south of that place, with a view of learning its mean of defence. We were out three days and examined the country around for about 30 miles. Found some strong passes, but none so formidable as those on the Monterey road and none which could not be turned by infantry. They had been represented as stronger. N.Y. Com. Adv. [RLK]

The war between the Kentuckeians and Mexicans, as it is fairly termed, has created no little excitement both in town and in camp. It is thought that not less than forty Mexicans have been killed within the last five days, fifteen of whom, it is said, were killed in one day, and within the scope of one mile. From this you will see that the boys are determined to have and to take revenge for the assassination of their comrades. When it is known that no Mexican, since the commencement of the war, has been punished for outrages committed on the persons and property of American soldiers and they have been numerous, many person will look at the course pursued by the Louisville Legion first in a light far from condemnation, and whilst regretting the circumstances which have lead to it, they will ask you the question, "Shall we rest quietly in our tents whilst the enemy is lying in ambush murdering our comrades as they pass the roads?" Ever since the occupation of Matamores by our troops the Mexicans have been cutting off our men, whenever they could be found in convenient places for the job, and the compliment has been invariably retuned generally two for one, and this too in many cases without regard to the Scriptures, giving out that it is "better to let ninety-nine guilty go than punish one innocent man." The first of these difficulties, in different places find their origin in the Mexican disposition to rob, to accomplish which they will murder an American if it be only to get possession of the clothes upon his body. Retaliation is sure to follow, and in many case the innocent is made to suffer for crimes committed by his guilty countrymen. This is a state of society deeply to be regretted, and no man in or out of Mexico would feel more pleasure in recording a termination of such proceedings; but I candidly believe that they will continue to exist as long as the difficulties between the two countries remain in the present unsettled state.

The trial of the Alcalde’s son and the others engaged in tampering with our men is set for tomorrow. I should not exactly say trial, for it will for it will be more in the shape of a court of inquiry at first. I saw this young Alcalde this morning in prison. He is a young and very interesting man, and was weighed down to the ground with irons, not that they fear his escape, but to deter others from following in his footsteps. At first it was thought that but few men were engaged in the business, but it is now clearly ascertained that many of the principal men the place have had a finger in the pie, and since the first arrest many of the first families of Monterey have left, and the population of the place has decreased in that time nearly one thousand. The 7th regiment has lost many men by desertion, and I have since ascertained that the number I spoke of before, (forty) as having deserted may be safely trebled, and all since the 25th September. The regulars have invariably gone to the enemy, but what of the volunteers who have left us "sans ceremonie" have made tracks for a Christmas dinner in the white settlements. The friends of those arrested, particularly of the Alcalde, fear the worst, and if they were hung in the Plaza, as Gen Taolor threatened, they would not be much surprised.

A train of wagons loaded with provisions started, yesterday for Saltillo, escorted by a company of infantry. Our dates from Gen. Worth are as late as the 27th. Every thing is reported quiet, and the command well satisfied with their location. Nothing from Gen. Wool since my last, and I am unable to say whether he has yet Monclova for Parras.-If he has not, he will certainly do it when he gets short of provisions and forage.

It was generally believed yesterday that a movement would be made in less than ten days, originating no doubt from an order for all the infantry to sell their horses, and the small number of men who were permitted to leave camp. But it is known generally that when Captain Rhine offered the service of his company of rangers to Gen. Taylor, they were declined on the ground that no movement would be made until ordered from Washington, which the gen. said might not reach him until after the sitting of congress; so you can judge what chance there is of an early move.
The weather is lovely at this time, and forcibly reminds one of the spring time of the year. It is a great climate, and blossoms, half blown, and ripe fruit can be found on the same tree.

[Correspondent New Orleans Delta.]

71.291 January 9, 1847, a Marylander, H.P. Lyons, from San Luis Potosi, his report of affairs there, letter from Monterey, position of several divisions and corps of the Army, Mexican government recruiting in the valley of the Rio Grande, Tampico startled, letter from Saltillo

A MARYLANDER AT SAN LUIS POTOSI. A correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune, at Monterey, has had a conversation with Henry P. Lyons, one of the American prisoners recently released by Santa Anna at San Luis Potosi. Mr. Lyons is a native of Maryland, and has been three times in the clutches of the Mexicans.

He says that a short time before the battle of Monterey, and whilst Hay’s Rangers were at or near China, he was shoeing some of the horses in that town, and after finishing his work, was ordered by Gen. Henderson to remain in town a short time and dispose of what iron he had not used. The regiment and his company, (McCown’s) had been gone about an hour when thirteen Mexicans rode up to where he was, and one of them threw a lasso over his shoulders, and immediately pinioned his arms. He was then dragged in the chaparral, and the same number of lashes laid upon his back as had been given to the Mexican thief near San Fernando, that is, thirty six. After this operation was gone through with, he was mounted on a mustang and taken to Monterey, where he arrived on Saturday about the same time the black fort opened upon Gen. Taylor. He was not suffered to remain here any length of time, and after being tied fourteen inches in the rear of Chas. W. Tufts, (I believe of the same place), two traders captured near China tied the same distance in his rear, and two more captured when Harey went to the Presidio Rio Grande in theirs, they were marched off to Saltillo, from which place, after the news of the battle reached it, they were sent to San Luis Potosi.

Mr. Lyons says that the first intimation they had of their release was from a Mexican Colonel, who handed each man $10 from Santa Anna, and told them they were at liberty to depart. Other than the lashing and forced marches the treatment was good. It was currently reported and believed in the Mexican camp, on the 10th ult. That Very Cruz had surrendered to the Americans. The Colonel was interrogated on that head by Mr. L. who answered that he believed it was so. When asked where Gen. Ampudia was, he stated that he was in the Castle of rote, where Mexico put all cowardly generals.

Mr. Lyons speaks Spanish, and had an opportunity of learning much of the doings of the enemy – He states that when Santa Anna was notified that the armistice had been terminated by our government he was greatly enraged, and accused us of making our engagement; and this, too, after he had ordered a part of his army back to Saltillo and the pass to Durango. It was thought that Gen. Kearny was marching down from New Mexico, and the force iguated for the Pass to Durango was to oppose him hat point, but when news of the whereabouts of Gen. Wool reached San Luis, this project was abandoned, for they knew he would be first on the ground. The forces at San Luis on the 9th ult. are stated by Mr. Lyons to have been opposed him hat point, but when news of the whereabouts of Gen. Wool reached San Luis, this project was abandoned, for

Mr. Lyons says that notwithstanding the scarcity of water on the road – one stretch of 52 miles without a drop – they look for our forces there, are ditching and throwing up embankments of earth all around the city. So terrible has the name of Gen. Taylor become, that the Mexican people believe he can travel 100 miles without water.

With Worth beyond Rinconado – Wool in command of the Pass to Durango, and a force which will shortly be at the lower Pass near Victoria, all the northern provinces will be cut off from the enemy.

The correspondent of the Delta states that Gen. Taylor is to march from the capital of Tamaulipas, and will take with him the Baltimore battalion, the Mississippi, Georgia and Tennessee volunteers, all the regulars, with the exception of one company of artillery, and one or two of the 7th infantry. The letter giving this information, is dated Monterey, December 8th, and adds!

From this, you will infer that the headquarters will be at or near Tampico. It may still be 8 or 10 days before this move is made, although some of the regiments are ordered to march next Thursday. As there is nothing apprehended from the enemy at this time the movement will be made by easy marches, stopping sometimes two and three days at a place. – The division will move down the valley, from the S.E. end of the town, passing through Cayderete, Monte Morales, Linares, Villa Grande and Hidalgo, a distance of nearly 200 miles to Victoria. After reaching the latter place, a halt will be made for some time, when a garrison will be left of 1,000 or 1,500 men, and the remainder will accompany Gen. Taylor towards Tampico. For aught I know, a junction may be formed at Victoria with the troops under Gen. Patterson, but I can not speak with with any certainty, on this head, not being advised of the movements below. This move, leaving Worth and Wool above us, argues very strongly, to my thinking, that offensive operations, for the present, have ceased.
The steamer Fashion arrived at N. Orleans on the 27th ult. from Brazos bringing Capt. Yeatman, aid-de camp to Gen. Wool, bearer of despatches for government, and 80 discharged volunteers. The remains of young Allison, of Nashville, Tennessee, who was shot at Monterey, was brought in the Fashion. John Chittick, one of the Indiana volunteers died on the passage, and was buried in the great deep. The steamer brought a large mail from the army.

GENERAL WOOL'S DIVISON. General Wool was encamped within two miles of the city of Parras, his force amounting, by the field reports, to 2,900 men. He is ordered there to establish a depot, and to levy upon all supplies belonging to the Mexican government. He has already taken large quantities of flour, wheat, and corn.

The 1st and 2d regiments of Indiana volunteers, were on their march from Camargo to join General Wool.

Gen. Worth was at Saltillo, in command of 1,500 men, and the command of Monterey has been assigned to Gen. Butler with 2,000 men to garrison it.

Gen. Twiggs and Gen. P.H. Smith, with their respective commands, were at Victoria, and Gen. Quitman, with his brigade, left Monterey for Victoria on the 14th inst.

Gen. Taylor, with a squadron of dragoons, also left for Victoria on the 15th inst.

Gen. Patterson was to have left on the 22d inst. accompanied by the Tennessee regiment of cavalry, for Tampico, via Victoria.

The Alabama regiment of volunteers, and the 2d regiment of United Stated artillery, had arrived there already. The city was in command of Gen. Shields.

Lieut. Col. Henry Clay, with six companies of the 2d regiment of Kentucky volunteers, was at Ceralvo. Capt. Willis was at Mier with two companies of the same regiment, and Captain, (General M.B. Lamar) with a company, is stationed at Laredo.

The U.S. steamer Major Brown, Captain Steerling, was at Laredo, the stage of the river being such that she could not navigate it. Lieut. Tilden is about to remove the obstructions in the river, which if successful, will enable the steamer to go up to Camargo.

Col. Marshall confined by injuries received in falling from his horse, was recovering. An express had reached Gen. Patterson to the effect that Santa Anna was advancing from San Luis Potosi upon Saltillo, for the purpose of cutting off Gen. Worth.

About 450 regulars were to have left Camargo on the 20th for Monterey; among them were Captains Kerr's and Hunter's command of the second regiment of dragoons.

The Mexican government recruiting in the Valley of the Rio Grande. The Mexicans are making great exertions to raise troops in all the small Mexican towns on the Rio Grande, and with some success. About the 15th instant, Captain Stone, with a detachment of 70 men, proceeded to a rancho up the Rio San Juan, a distance of thirty seven miles, where he found about 200 Mexicans collected, and among them Capt. Cantooa, who was the particular object of his search. Captain C. was captured, and the muster roll of his company, and the letters of instructions from Generals Ampudia and Paredes, with a quantity of blankets, 50 stand of arms, ammunition, etc. were secured. Captain Cantooa was carried to Camargo, and put in prison.

On the evening of the 16th inst. a Mexican was taken by guards at Camargo, having made an entry into the powder magazine with a design, it is supposed, of blowing it up.

TAMPICO ASSAILED. The New Orleans Times of the 28th says it learned from a passenger who came direct from Tampico, in the schooner R. M. Johnson, and left the schooner at the South West Pass, and took passage in the steamer Fashion, from New Orleans, that on the 16th instant Tampico had been attacked by an army of 7,000 Mexican cavalry, who thought they would carry the town by coup de main. Our troops, however, were on the alert, and on the Mexicans making their appearance, opened upon them a brisk fire of artillery, when the Mexicans broke and fled.

Saltillo 20th November, 1846.

On the day of our arrival, we were met, some miles from the town, by a whole bevvy of 'fair ones,' who appeared to be perfectly delighted - having seen no one from the 'States' for a long while. Our captain of the day was very much struck by being hailed by a buxom lass, and asked in good sound English, 'how do you do?' To which he replied, 'where did you come from?' 'Catauugus county, York state; I am glad to see you; I have seen but one white man for eight years, and he was a nigger!' The captain being from New York, would not believe her, but thinks she must be of Irish blood, as none other could perpetrate such a bull.

...there is a rumor current here that a party of two hundred Americans were massacred in Upper California lately. It is supposed to be Lieut. Col. Fremont's party, as none other was known to be in that region. We hope the rumor may prove unfounded.

...Santa Anna's army is cantoned on the road from Saltillo to San Luis de Potosi, advanced about fifty miles from the latter place. I do not believe he will advance upon us. Should he, however, we must abandon Saltillo and fall back upon the pass 'de los Muertos,' or as far as Monterey. Saltillo we can not retain with less than 5,000 men and plenty of artillery, as we should have to fortify several heights which overlook the town, and which, in possession of an enemy, we would be driven out of in an hour's firing. The place itself is not defensible, being commanded by eminences on all sides. The 'Muertos,' or Death's Passage, we could defend with out present force for a season against a host in arms; and Monterey with much less force than we could Saltillo, and much more effectively. This is no need of Saltillo: all we want is Monterey and the pass los Muertos, and we have the communication through the mountains sufficiently perfect. I am astonished that the Mexicans should have left the important pass of Los Muertos undefended. The fact is, they took the 'big scene' at Monterey, and rushed headlong through the mountain, casting scarce a glance behind.

...Upon our arrival at Saltillo we captured, some four miles beyond, on the San Luis de Potosi road, about 30,000 pounds of excellent flour, on the ay to feed our enemies, together with some 110 mules and packs. It was quite a strike, and will no doubt annoy Santa Anna no little. Some 600 mules left here the day before our arrival, with supplies for Santa Anna's army. It was supposed Gen. Taylor would send forward and capture them, but he did not, and I have no doubt had good reason for his want of action.

...The weather is very cold - about the same temperature in this season as at Baltimore. There is but little wood in the country, and in the Mexican houses no fire places are known. I have no doubt there is coal is abundance near here, and a more enterprising race would soon be comfortable before good fires. Our troops are shivering; and you would hardly believe the difference felt between this place, (Saltillo), and Monterey. A mountain range of about an hundred miles intervenes, and yet snow and ice are common to Saltillo, whilst Monterey enjoys a tropical climate, and grows all the fruits of the Indies. Whilst all is sunshine and summer in December, at Monterey, that month is the coldest and dearest in all the year at Saltillo, and plenty of snow falls, and frequently severe storms of almost Alpine wilderness, overtake the traveller in the mountain gorges near the town.

...Since writing the foregoing, I have more certain information of Santa Anna's position and numbers. He is in the vicinity of San Luis de Potosi, with an army of 22,000 men, certain, and a daily increasing augmentation of force. He has received twenty pieces of heavy ordnance lately, and was before well supplied with light field pieces. If he advance upon us we must fall back, even if reinforced by Gen. Wool, unless we get on some heavy guns, of which we are destitute here. Could we have some 18's and 24's, we might make a stand - I mean a fruitful one. With our present means, 'twould be the height of folly to remain in face of certain starvation, destruction, or capture.

...eneral Taylor has received from Santa Anna an acknowledgment of the despatches breaking the armistice brought out by Major Graham. We met the flag at the Rinconada. 'The Mexican chief informs the American General that a peace will never be conquered out of Mexico, and that the magnanimous Mexican nation cannot listen to them until every North American soldier is off the soil of a sister Republic, and returned to that of his own. But peace, adds the wily Santa Anna, 'is matter for the congress of both nations to determine. I am a soldier, and will crown with a glorious victory, the valor of my army, or die in the attempt!' Only hear the barking of the poodle pup.'

Saltillo is by far the best town I have seen yet in Mexico. It surpasses Monterey in all respects. The Cathedral is a fine building, of a sort of Moorish or Saracen order of architecture, but withal gloomy within and disgustingly filthy. There is a great deal of gilding upon rude carved work about the alters and chapels; but I have seen but little of the precious metals in the churches, of a solid shape.

Independence, Dec. 1, 1846.

I am able to communicate a little more news from Santa Fe and the adjoining province.  Dr. Vaughn; physician to Doniphan's regiment, accompanied by Messrs. Smith, Fielding, and others, have just this moment arrived from the plains.

They left Santa Fe on the 26th October.  Through the politeness of the doctor, I am permitted to make a few extracts from a letter to Col. S.C. Ownes, dated Valverde, October 20, 1846, which embodies almost all the news we have received.  The colonel says - "We have been here some two weeks, and in all probability, will be here some two weeks, or perhaps two months, longer.  James Magoffin was robbed by the Apache Indians on this side El Passo, and on his arrival at El Passo, he was taken prisoner.  Drs. Connelly, Doane, McManus, Valdez, who reached El Passo some few days after Magoffin, were also made prisoners, and the whole of them have been sent on to Chihuahua, under escort of some soldiers.  This news we have received from different Mexicans, who left El Passo in the last six or eight days.  We have no doubt of the truth of the report, for the entire business of Connelly & Co. was to give us intelligence relative to the situation of affairs in the El Passo.  In short, McManus, agreeably to our arrangement, was to have been here ten days ago - his not coming, or writing, convinces us that they are all prisoners.  We are here in no enviable situation, and do not know whether to go forwards, backwards, or remain.  We cannot get any news from Santa Fe, nor from the United States. - If Col. Doniphan marches his forces immediately to Chihuahua, he will win laurels enough to last him to eternity."

71.304 January 9, 1847, complaints about the usages of the sappers and miners

THE SAPPERS AND MINERS. - A correspondent of the New London "Advocate" furnishes the following information with to this new corps:

The corps consists of about 75 men - the finest in point of intellect and general appearance that the army can show - collected together by the above inducements.  Men that stood in high estimation, as citizens and mechanics - that, but for the above, would not have dreamed of the army - and men who now wish themselves anywhere but where they are.  But to facts: - They were taken to West Point, and set to work erecting and fitting up barracks that they were not destined to occupy; and then with an infantry drill in the morning, and an engineer drill of three hours in the afternoon, throwing up breastworks, digging trenches, &c., making in all about ten hours of hard labor per day - until we were ordered off to Mexico.  When out clothing came to us we were indeed surprised, for I am certain that our citizens would not bestow such upon the town's poor.  It is coarse and not half made, and such as it was, half of our pay was requisite to have it altered to fit us.  Several deserted us there; and well they might.  But let me pass on.  The order for Mexico was received with three hearty cheers, for none of us even dreamed of what we were to endure; and on the 24th of September we left West Point, and embarked on board the ship Clinton, which left New York on the 26th for Brazos St. Jago, with a sufficient quantity of provisions for the voyage.  But through the neglect of the proper officers our living was more like hogs than things human - our food was partly raw and not enough of that.

In short time we arrived at Brazos, and since that time (Oct. 11th) we have lived wholly on southern pork, or bacon, and hard bread, which was not only stale, but moldy, and full of bugs, worms, and even lice.  Until yesterday this has been our fare, and our work has been of the hardest kind, for we have to load and unload our pontons, sapping and mining tools, and a great deal more which the quartermaster's men perform for other troops.  In fact we are literal slave, and while we are in some respects the highest company in the regular army, we are in others, the lowest.  The infantry are classed as the lowest in general, and the engineers the highest, but allow me to compare our corps with the body of infantry encamped close to us.  We have to work hard at getting our train ready for Monterey, and have to mount guard every third day, besides our regular drill.  They have to mount guard once in nine days, and have nothing else to do.  We get nothing to eat but hard bread and meat, and not enough of that.  They have baker's bread, beans, peas, sour krount, molasses, and many things that we are not allowed; and in everything they have the advantage of us.

Our spirits are depressed; and that ambition which filled our breasts when we left home, is entirely gone. - We have been humbugged so much that our only thought now is to get out of the scrape.  Thus have the spirits of this noble corps been broken down; and though much is and ought to be anticipated of us, unless a great change is made in our management nothing can be accomplished, for we feel like anything but fighting. By inserting this you will oblige me, and confer a favor on THE ENGINEER CORPS. [RLK]

The number of enlistments made in the regular army during the months of October, November, and December, 1846, so far as returns have been received, is 1,673. This number will probably be increased, when all the returns are in, to 1,800.

Total number enlisted from Oct. 1, 1845, to Dec. 31, 1846. 7,645

The number of enlistments made during the year ending Sept. 30, 1846, exceed the number made the previous year by 2,388.

In the Adjutant General's letter to the secretary of war on the 5th inst., he states that "men enlisted for the term of 'during the war,' can be recruited for the regular service probably as fast as volunteers can be enrolled and sent to the seat of war. If the term of service for the regular and volunteer troops be the same, the probability is, there will be but little difference in the time of filling the ranks of either description of force."

And, in the official report of the secretary of war of the 5th Dec., the fact was stated that "the greater inducements to enter for short periods (in the volunteer regiments for the term of one year only) satisfactorily account for the want of better success in recruiting for the regular army;" and, "more than all, perhaps, the distinction seen in the pension laws between the private soldier of the regular army and the volunteer, which operates so unfavorably to the former. The widows and orphans of the volunteers who may be killed in battle, or die of wounds received in the service, are pensioned; while the widows and orphans of the regular soldiers who die under the same circumstances, are entirely unprovided for by law."

If authorized by law to enlist for the period of during the war, with the small bounty proposed, there is little doubt that the department will be able to fill the ranks of the regular army in a very short time - that is, the five or six thousand men now wanted could be recruited and sent to join their regiments in the field, in as short time as five or six regiments of volunteers could be raised, organized, and dispatched to the army in Mexico, after the date of any requisition from the war department.

The same remark applies with greater force, perhaps, to the raising of new regiments for the regular military establishment, if the term be during the way; for all the captains and lieutenants would be employed (under their field officers) in recruiting for their own companies, generally in their own neighborhoods where they are known, and it is believed, could fill their companies within forty or fifty days after receiving orders. I feel justified in expressing this belief, because several of the companies of the rifle regiment were recruited quickly last summer, some in less than fifty days, although the men were enlisted for five years. Lieut. Tipton enlisted fifty-six men in less than a month, and Lieut. Van Buren sixty. Respectfully submitted,

R. JONES,
Adj't Gen. U. S. A.

Hon. W. L. MARCY, secretary of war.

71.305 January 16, 1847, Texas indignation that Santa Fe and surrounding area are treated as conquered territory rather than part of Texas

STATE OF TEXAS, vers. GEN. KEARNEY, AND THE U. STATES. The press of Texas exhibits strong indignation at the course of the government in treating Santa Fe and the surrounding country as a conquered foreign territory, and establishing a separate territorial government over it. They claim the whole country east of the Rio Grande; and are consequently astounded at its seizure as a military conquest from Mexico. They denounce it as "a violation of the compact of annexation," - a lawless, unjust and forcible seizure of their public domain. They do not seem to understand how president Polk reconciles his military movements with his assumption of the Rio Grande as boundary. Santa Fe is equally a part of our annexed territory (on this assumption) as that portion opposite Matamoros. Gen. Taylor is sent to the one to occupy and defend as our own soil. Gen. Kearney is sent to conquer and take military possession of the other.

The Austin Democrat says: -"If Santa Fe is a province taken by force of arms from Mexico, so was the country between Nueces and the Rio Grande and the very moment Gen. Taylor set foot on the western bank of the former stream, he committed an aggression upon foreign soil, and hostily invaded a country with which his government was at peace. If Laredo was ours so was Santa Fe; if Santa Fe was not, neither was Laredo."

The whig journals are severe upon the administration in their comments upon this subject, and President Polk's message, in reply to the call of the senate for information relating thereto. As a specimen, the following is from the Baltimore American:

"We have not space in this paper to comment upon the President's explanation of the authority given to Gen. Kearney and Commodore Sloat and Stockton. We say, at once, however, that we regard it as unsatisfactory and insincere, and a most palpable afterthought. The instructions to Kearney direct him to promise the people a government, just like those in our territories; and when he gives them such a one, merely because he justly thinks that a government established in that manner must be intended to be permanent, the president now says that he disapproves of the gallant officer's words, of permanency, making no sort of objection to his acts. But again: the president excuses himself by alleging that the "form of government" was conveniently delivered, and then it was discovered that it contained some objectionable things. Now the proclamation of Kearney, Sloat and Stockton, which were just as explicit as this form of government, were all before the president long before he sent in his message. Why did he not find objections then? The truth is, since the meeting of congress, he has found it expedient to disapprove of proceedings to which when he wrote his message he fully assented. We can give no other interpretation to his own account of the matter." [RLK]

NNR47January v71.305-306 1/16/1847 contract for Samuel Colt's revolving pistols

Colt's Patent Revolving Pistols. --Capt. Walker left this city yesterday for Washington, having while in N. York, among other things, made a contract for 1,000 revolving pistols for the new mounted rifle regiment, which is to serve in Mexico. This regiment is to be armed with a pair of these weapons, besides rifles. It was found impossible to obtain any number of these pistols in this city, such has, of late, been the demand for them for soldiers and others going to Mexico. It is a fact worth noting that the German, who has been the principal mechanic or manufacturer of these revolvers, has recently left us, and suddenly, for Mexico, with his chest of tools and machinery. It pretty well ascertained that he has had most liberal and rich rewards from the government of Mexico, which have tempted him to leave N. York, in order to begin the manufacture of that deadly weapon in a foreign country. Capt. Walker is very anxious that the war department should order for the mounted riflemen Wesson's improved rifle, which will carry the ball with unerring precision 400 yards and over. The rifle is light, and well adapted for such service as it will find necessary. [PTH]

71.306 January 16, 1847, reports that Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna was about to attack Gen. William Jenkins Worth at Saltillo, instant concentration of the several divisions of our Army in that direction

THE CAMPAIGN
ARMY OF OCCUPATION.

REPORT THAT SANTA ANNA IS ADVANCING AGAINST SALTILLO.

Last Monday's mail brought us New Orleans papers of the 2d inst. teeming with accounts of Santa Anna's advancing upon Saltillo, and of the hastening of our troops towards that post to reinforce General Worth, who is in command at Saltillo with about 1,700 men.

The New Orleans Editor says:

"The steamer Virginia brought as passenger from Brazos, Col. Langdon, who was direct from Monterey, and with whom we have conversed. He states that an express from Gen. Worth, at Saltillo, arrived at Monterey on the 16th of December. It brought the news that Gen. Worth had learned through his spies that Santa Anna was within three days' march of Saltillo at the head of an army of twenty or thirty thousand men. The express bore a call upon Gen. Taylor for reinforcements. Gen. Taylor and his staff had left Monterey on the 15th ult. - the day before the express arrived - for Victoria, to join his command, which was two days' march in advance of him.

Gen'l Butler, in command at Monterey, immediately sent off despatches to Gen. Marshall, at Camargo, and to Gen'l Patterson, at Matamoros, to send forward without delay all the troops they could spare from their commands. Gen. Patterson had left Matamoros the day before the news reached that place. It was at once forwarded to him, and upon learning its purport he immediately started on his return with the view to proceed to Monterey.

The express reported at Matamoros that the road from Monterey to Camargo was lined with troops - regulars and volunteers - on their march to Monterey, having been previously ordered up. There were four regiments upon the road. The road from Monterey is infested by predatory bands of rancheros, by which the travelling is rendered insecure. One train had been attacked a few days before our informant passed over the road, as had also several small parties and some few men had been killed and wounded."

The journals were immediately filled with editorial speculations as to the truth of these reports, and with statements some contradictory other confirmatory.

A correspondent of the N. Orleans Bulletin, writing from Matamoros, Dec. 23d, says - "Several persons are going to your city, all of whom are from Monterey, as they say, they will carry alarming accounts as to the situation of Gen. Worth at Saltillo, and the advance of a large force under Santa Anna. I have endeavored to ascertain the particulars, and do not credit the rumors. They may be true, but the express spoken of, arrived here yesterday, and no such despatches as are said to have been sent, have been received. On thing is certain - General Patterson has not changed his route towards Victoria, with the force under his command, as he would probably do, if Santa Anna was advancing towards Saltillo, with the force represented. The rear of his column left to-day with the exception of a few wagons."

71.307 January 16, 1847, further intelligence, the valley of the Rio Grande in great ferment, anxiety for the safety of Gen. John Ellis Wool's as well as Gen. William Jenkin Worth's division, troops that were moving towards Victoria return to sustain Worth

CONFIRMATORY ACCOUNTS, reached us by Wednesday morning's mail from New Orleans. The steamer Edith arrived on the night of the 2d, with intelligence from Brazos to the 30th ult.
By this arrival we learn that when Gen. Worth's express reached Monterey, Gen. Taylor had only gone six or eight miles on his march to Victoria, and the troops under Generals Twiggs and Quitman were but twelve miles in advance. Orders were immediately issued to this division to retrace its steps and proceed at once to Saltillo.

Gen. Butler, who was left in command of Monterey, had already marched with all the troops he could collect to join Gen. Worth at Saltillo.

Before the express reached Camargo Gen. Lane had started for Saltillo with his command - this was on the 20th. Gen. Marshall set out the next morning, taking with him the remainder of the forces, with the exception of Captains Hunter and Swartout's commands, which were left to protect that point. The troops from Camargo were on a forced march to reach Saltillo in time for a battle, reports having prevailed for several days before positive advices were received of the movements of Santa Anna.

Gen. Wool was ninety miles from Saltillo at the best advices from him, and it was supposed he would join Gen. Worth in season to assist in repelling the enemy.

There was a rumor (not credited) that Santa Anna had thrown a body of 7,000 men between General Worth and General Taylor, to prevent a junction of the American forces. It does not seem probable that this is true, as the main road to Monterey passes through Saltillo. True, there is a circuitous mountain road which avoids Saltillo, but it is not favorable to the march of an army, and is impracticable for ordnance.

It was the impression of a gentlemen who came passenger in the Edith, that a battle was fought about the 25th ult. It was thought, however, that Gen. Taylor had reached Saltillo before that time, and also Gen. Twiggs', Gen. Quitman's, Gen. Butler's, and Gen. Wool's commands. It was likewise hoped that the troops from Camargo would also arrive at Saltillo in good season. If these expectations were realized, Gen. Taylor had about seven thousand men to oppose Santa Anna.

The whole valley of the Rio Grande was in a state of great ferment. Apprehensions of an attack were entertained at Camargo, Matamoros, and other points, from the rancheros under Canales. The withdrawal of so many troops from the river left the valley exposed to danger. At Matamoros, Colonel Clark had called upon the citizens to enrol themselves for service, and at the Brazos General Jesup had done the same thing. Both these points were sadly deficient in both men and arms. It was thought Canales had 2,000 men under him, and that the large supply of goods at Matamoros and the exposed condition of that city, might quicken his courage.

It was believed that an express had been sent to Gen. Patterson, countermanding his march in the direction of Victoria.

The amount of all intelligence before us is, that General Worth commanding at Saltillo had received information upon which he relied, that Santa Anna was approaching that post, and he had therefore despatched expresses for reinforcements, in consequence of which, the forces that were marching for Victoria were recalled, and, with those from Camargo, were hastening towards Saltillo. [RLK]

71.307 January 16, 1847, Gen. Winfield Scott reaches Brazos and proceeds to Camargo

Gen. Scott arrived at the Brazos on the 28th ultimo. The following day he proceeded to the mouth of the Rio Grande and was yet at that point when the Edith left, waiting the arrival of the horses belonging to the regiment of mounted riflemen, when it was understood he would proceed immediately up the river to Camargo. [RLK]

71.307 January 16, 1847, speculations as to Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna's operations

It remains doubtful whether Santa Anna was in fact approaching Saltillo with his main army, or whether it was but a detachment sent in that direction by Santa Anna with a view to divert General Taylor from advancing upon Victoria - or with a view to prevent Gen. Wool from joining Gen. Worth - or whether it may not be a demonstration against Gen. Wool's division while at the last accounts from them were 115 miles west of Saltillo.

Commercial letter received at New Orleans from San Luis Potosi dated as late as the 17th Dec., make no mention of any movement of the army under Santa Anna. They do not refer to political or military subjects however in any way - very probably on account of the danger of so doing. Strict martial law is maintained in San Luis.

Letters have been received in New Orleans from Mexico, to the 8th ult., and from Tampico, of the 26th, the former of which from a reliable and well informed source, state that Santa Anna writes, he will crush any force that may venture to attack him at San Luis, which is well prepared for defence, but does not allude to any intention of advancing from thence; these letters from him, however, must have been late in November or early in December.

Whatever be Santa Anna's object, one thing is certain - that the movement of our army towards Victoria, and the contemplated demonstration upon Vera Cruz, are for the present interrupted. The troops which were on their march in that direction are retracing their steps, and hurrying towards Saltillo.
Santa Anna will hardly venture to attack our army anywhere without having such an immense advantage in numbers or position, as to flatter him with a certainty of success. The probability is, that he would not date to attack General Worth in post, at Saltillo, even if he reached the vicinity before any of the reinforcements arrived. Santa Anna would appreciate 1700 of our men entrenched, as likely to be rather ugly customers to his Mexicans. His game would be to move as in this case, from his centre of operations a formidable detachment, in this direction, or in any other that would annoy and harass our army, and keep them from making any general effective movement.

By this process he has the advantage of detecting any point in our long line of "occupation" which may be left exposed, and by making a dash in that direction, cut off supplies, reinforcements, and communication. - This movement upon Saltillo may be altogether a feint, to attract our forces as far into the interior as possible and then to move his main body of troops so as to interrupt supplies from reaching them. Matamoros or Point Isabel, may be his real aim. [RLK]

From Tampico we have dates to the 26th December, Gen. Gates was in command there, with about 1000 men. The alarm of Mexican forces being in the vicinity, was all occasioned by a party of dashing marauders. [RLK]

71.307 January 16, 1847, another revolutionary movement in Campeche

From Campeachy, we have dates to the 22d December. A letter of that date states that Campeachy has positively despatched a force of 2500 men, joined by five hundred on the road, with 12 pieces of artillery, all well equipped, with a view to compel the government at Merida to succumb to the pronunciamento of Campeachy of the 8th December. The object of the pronunciamento and of this movement, is declared to be to maintain the neutrality of the peninsula as between the United States and Mexico, and put down the government, which they say has wed the country to Santa Anna.

The people of Campeachy have elected Domingo Barret Provisional governor. He addressed, on the 11th ult., a long communication to the government of Merida, setting forth the causes of the insurrection of Campeachy. We received this document at too late an hour to examine it to-day. [RLK]

71.307 January 16, 1847, Mexican Congress assembles, their proceedings, &c.

MEXICO. Congress assembled. Preparatory sessions were held as early as the 30th November. Congress was duly installed at 11o'clock on the 6th December. - The Committees were appointed on the 7th. The latest of their proceedings received are to the 11th.

A resolution was offered, declaring the constitution of 1824 to be in force, with such amendments as congress may see fit to make thereto.

Another resolution, that a committee be appointed to embody the principles entertained by congress, and which will be the foundation of its action in the present war. No other mention is made of the war in the proceedings, so far as we have them. They are however, incomplete. On the 8th the secretary of the treasury made his report, and a project for a conversion of the foreign debt.

Some of us have formed opinions favorable to peace, from the supposed sentiments of the persons named upon the committees, - from the fact that no other reference to the war is found in the proceedings of the body - and from the additional fact, that the usual quantity of tirade against "the audacious North Americans," is not found in the Mexican journals.

On the other hand, no mention or intimation is made of a disposition to settle the differences. [RLK]

71.307 January 16, 1847, letter from Veracruz

From Tampico, to the editor of the New Orleans Picayune, dated December 17, A.M., says:

"Advices via Vera Cruz were received last evening of the action of the Mexican congress. They declare that they will not think or treat of peace until every hostile foot has cleared from the Mexican soil, and every vessel that lines our coast is withdrawn. I consider the war as now commenced in real earnest and I prophecy that Tampico will become an American town." [RLK]
January 16, 1847, suspicion that Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna aspires to dictatorship

A letter from an officer of the navy, dated Anton Lizardo, Dec. 22:

"It is the prevalent opinion at Vera Cruz, as I learned from English officers yesterday, that Santa Anna had intended to march from his present quarters upon the capital and to strike for a dictatorship. In this case, it is supposed he will be sustained by the regulars and opposed by the militia, and that a battle with probably ensue between the two parties. If Santa Anna succeeds in becoming dominant, we have a guaranty of peace, as no administration in Mexico can support the burden of a war. He is much inclined to prefer diplomacy to fighting. I hope our government will not relax its strong arm, nor permit itself to be cajoled by this wary diplomatist." [RLK]

January 16, 1847, election of a mayor (or alcalde) at Monterey

CALIFORNIA - PROCESS OF REPUBLICANIZING MEXICO.

Next after a newspaper, comes in proper course, AN ELECTION. The Mayor, or ALCALDE of Monterey, was for the first time, to be elected by the people, and the arts of king caucus being as yet unknown in these parts, there were no less than three 'natives' and four 'foreign citizens' in the field as candidates - "Don Walter Colton (the chaplain of the congress) received 68 votes, Don Juan Malarin 37 votes, Don David Spence 65 votes, Don Manuel Dias 60 votes, Don Salvador Munras 40 votes, Milton Little, Esq. 36 votes, William E.P. Hartnell, Esq. 32 votes." Upon this return the chaplain was declared duly elected for one year. In case of his absence of illness, Don Milton Little was elected substitue; Messrs. Hartnell, Spence, Dias and others were chosen councillors, and Don Salvador Munras treasurer. [RLK]

Printers among the volunteers in Mexico, appearance of American newspaper

It is said that upwards of five hundred printers have volunteered during the war with Mexico. They undoubtedly far exceed in proportion, any other of the professions. There are thirty in one regiment. --many a fair as well as foul form will be knocked into pi, and be distributed among the chaparrals.

Matamoros was hardly occupied by our troops before an American press was in motion, ad in a few weeks, two, if not three, public papers were regularly issued in that city. "The Flag," is at this moment one of the most frequently quoted papers we know of, on this continent.

Monterey, in California, surrendered to the American squadron, under Commodore Sloat, on the 9th July. On the 29th August, the first number of "The Californian," edited by the Rev. Walter Colton, was published in that city, and has been issued weekly since. [PTH]

Ten additional regiments of volunteers nearly completed

The ten regiments of volunteers last called for by President to serve "for the war," are nearly all completed.

The first regiment to embark, was that of Pennsylvania. It rendezvoused at Pittsburg, and embarked from thence on the 23rd ult., and a part of them reached New Orleans on the 28th, consisting of Capts. Nagle's and Small's companies, and the second detachment, consisting of Capts. Scott's and Bennett's companies--the Philadelphia Light Guards and Cadwallader Greys. [PTH]

First Pennsylvania regiment embarked for New Orleans, second regiment assembling

Of the 2nd Pennsylvania regiment, the Pittsburg Inquirer, of the 3rd inst says:--The following companies are now at this place, viz: Westmoreland Guards, Greensburg; Cameron Guards, Harrisburg; Ranger, Philadelphia; Highlander, Cambria county; Columbia Guards, Danville; Maunch Chunk company. None of the Pittsburg companies have been mustered into service (for officers) yet. The Reading and Uniontown troops are expected here to-night. The Westmoreland Guards and Stockton artillerists have been mustered into the service.

The Harrisburg company will be here this evening, and also Capt. George's. At an election of officers fore the second regiment; there were three candidates for Colonel. Roberts of Fayete county wad elected by a majority of six votes over Capt. Hambright. Z. W. Geary, of Cambria was elected Lieut. Col. [PTH]
NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS. --The time now rapidly approaches (says the Brooklyn Eagle of Thursday the 7th,) for the final departure of this fine body of men. We were at Fort Hamilton yesterday, and learned from several of the officers that they expected the regiment to embark this day or to-morrow, in three vessels, which have been chartered for the purpose of transporting them to Tampico; and to finally depart some time during the beginning of next week. They will leave here under sealed orders, but it is thought that their first operations will be directed against Vera Cruz. There are ten companies of eighty men each in the regiment, the last one hundred and fifty having yesterday been mustered into the service. [PTH]

The Massachusetts Regiment. Six companies have been mustered into service and others are organizing. There is not so much of the war enthusiasm in this section of the Union. Captain Webster, son of the senator, was the first to have a full company. The Salem Register says it is rumored that Hon. Caleb Cushing is desirous to take the command of the Massachusetts regiment, should the complement be made up. [PTH]

There has been difficulty in obtaining a regiment from this leading administration state, and it is yet incomplete. We notice her officers have been recruiting in Baltimore city, and Washington county, Maryland,—and, if we mistake not, in Philadelphia also. It is also asserted by Whig journals of Virginia, that the first companies of the regiment to organize, were all from Whig districts of the state. This kind of rivalry may have its use. Two of the six companies that rendezvoused at Richmond have proceeded to Old Point Comfort, where Col. Walbach, U. S. A. is in command. [PTH]

Maine was called upon by the general government to raise one regiment of volunteers for the Mexican war. It was then expected this regiment would be called into the service at an early day. Such however has been the enthusiasm with which the citizens of states located nearer the theatre of conflict have rushed to the army, that the volunteers in this state have not yet been called to the field. From present appearances, it being now understood that a controlling force is about to be brought into the field by our government, this regiment may soon be wanted. There have been enlisted eight full companies, and the other two, necessary to complete the regiment, are, as we understand, nearly full. It is to be hoped that these companies will be immediately filled, and the regiments organized and held in readiness for immediate action.

"In this general encounter for justice and right, shall not Maine be represented? Shall the treacherous Mexicans be chastised for their perfidy and our patriotic citizens have no hand in administering the well merited castigation? Let this regiment be organized at once and its services tendered to the government." [PTH]

The Charleston Courier of the 8th says—"We understand that the right wing of the Palmetto regiment will leave the camp near Hamburg, this evening, on their route to Mobile, and that the left wing will follow them the succeeding evening. The troops are said to be in fine spirits and eager to move." [PTH]

NNR47 January 16, 1847 election of officers of the Louisiana volunteers

NNR47 January 16, 1847 desecration of the graves of Capt. Gillespie and Young Thomas

Capt. Gillespie and young Thomas. A Letter from Monterey says:

"In your paper of the 4th ult. I saw a biographical sketch of Capt. Gillespie, and on showing it to an acquaintance, he informed me that about four weeks after the battle, he went to the graves of Capt. Gillespie and young Thomas, and found that the bodies had been dug up by the Mexicans, and stripped of every vestige of clothing. The bones were reentered and the graves covered over with large flat rocks. --When it is generally known by these groveling wretches, that nothing but the bones of the heroes are left in the grave, their pilfering propensities will be left to sleep in their quiet but proud homes."

The gentlemen mentioned as having been recommended as Colonel of the Baltimore Battalion, vice Col. Watson, deceased, is not B. Buchanan, but Major Robert C. Buchanan, son of the late Andrew Buchanan, long a distinguished merchant of Baltimore. This officer was brevetted for his good conduct at Pal Alto and Resaca de la Palma, and served with some distinction in the Florida campaign. [PTH]

71.308 January 16, 1847, marriage of a Massachusetts volunteer, sermon to the troops

Marriage of a Volunteer. Yesterday afternoon, at east Boston, Henry Carney, one of Captain Webster's company, was married to Miss Almira Bent. Lieut. Kelley, office of the day, allowed an escort of thirteen men in uniform, with side arms, under sergeant Sterns, to accompany the bridegroom from the quarters in Pitts street to East Boston, and witness the wedding. A furlough of 48 hours was also allowed the bridegroom.

In the forenoon, twenty men of this company, in uniform, attended the Rev. Mr. Taylor's church. - The reverend gentlemen availed himself of the circumstance to discourse eloquently upon the duties of patriotism, and at the close of the services he prayed that the young defenders of their country present, and their brethren in arms might go forth to battle armed with the breast plate of righteousness, and be sustained in the hour of their utmost danger by a sure hope in Christ. - Boston Post. 71.308 January 16, 1847, departure of South Carolina Volunteers for Mexico, notice about an additional corps

South Carolina Volunteers. The right wing of the regiment, consisting of the Sumpter de Kalb, Fairfield, Charleston, and Lancaster volunteers departed en route for the seat of war on the 31st; and the left wing, consisting of the Abbeville, Edgefield, Richland, and Chester volunteers, on the day following, in good health and spirits. The line of march is stated to be as follows: - by Rail Road to Griffin, Georgia - thence march to Notasulga, in Alabama: a distance of 104 miles - next, by Rail Road to Montgomery, and thence, by steamboat, to Mobile; whence they are to embark.

Dear Sir: - You will please notice in your paper that I am raising a corps of 100 men, to be attached to the Palmetto regiment. Newbury court house will be the place of rendezvous. The company will leave the last of next week. Persons wishing to join, can do so by addressing a letter to me at Newbury court house. Your ob't ser'vt.

71.308-309 January 16, 1847, message of Gov. William Owsley of Kentucky on the raising of volunteers

VOLUNTEERS. Governor Owsley, in his annual message to the legislature of Kentucky, furnishes the rare and as some think commendable example of abstaining from any remarks upon national affairs, except what are immediately incident to the affairs of the state over which he presides: That part of his message is as follows:

"The United States had become involved in war with Mexico, a sister republic. The calamity was great, and deeply to be deplored; but the rubicon was passed, and it was too late to look back and wrangle as to the manner in which it was brought about. Our country needed assistance, and most willingly was assistance afforded. A call was made by the government at Washington, upon Kentucky, for three regiments of volunteers - one of mounted riflemen, and two of infantry - and each to be composed of ten companies. The requisition was received the 22d of May, but in anticipation of it I had previously, on the 10th of that month, issued a proclamation calling for the organization of volunteer companies, and before the 26th of May, companies for each regiment were organized, their services tendered and accepted by me, and one of the regiments, (the Louisville Legion,) actually embarked on steamers for the seat of war. There was a burst of patriotic feeling on the occasion, and a promptness in responding to the call of government worthy the sons of Kentucky, and for which they justly merit high commendation. Party strife gave way to the love of country, and the struggle to be first to tender their services, became common every where throughout the state. The dispatch was so great and unexpected that means were not provided by the government to pay the incidental and necessary expenses of the Legion. Unwillingly that the service should be impeded or the brave soldiers who had so promptly stepped forward at the call of their country, should suffer for lack of necessary supplies, I did not hesitate to accept the tender, made to me by an association of patriotic citizens of Louisville, of money adequate to pay the expenses and supply the wants of the Legion. But I am happy to inform you that the government at Washington has since reimbursed the entire amount expended, and the accounts with those who advanced the money have been finally adjusted and closed.

"I should do injustices to my feelings, were I not to express my high estimation of the services of quartermaster general Ambrose W. Dudley, and assistant quartermaster, Col. William Preston, in bringing the account to such speedy and satisfactory adjustment. The prudence, industry and skill of Gen. A.W. Dudley, in keeping with the account of the state's expenditure, and managing his difficult and embarrassing department, this result is chiefly owing. Other states, less fortunate in this respect, are still involved with the department at Washington, over unsettled accounts for precisely similar expenditures."

Jalapa, or Zalapa, the capital of the state of Vera Cruz, is a pleasant town situated 89 miles from the city of Vera Cruz, on a steep declivity of the table land, 4,340 feet above the level of the sea. It contains eight churches, a good school for drawing, and 13,000 inhabitants. The principal merchants of the city of Vera Cruz reside at Jalapa, and only visit the sickly city occasionally. An annual fair is held at Jalapa, and much frequented.

71.309 January 16, 1847, sketch of the Mexican cities on the route from Veracruz to the city of Mexico

ROUTE FROM VERA CRUZ TO THE CITY OF MEXICO.

The New York Commercial publishes the following sketch of the Mexican cities on the route from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico:

Vera Cruz - The city of Vera Cruz is walled around with a fort at each extremity of the water front; the walls on the land side are loopholed for musketry. Parapet guns have been recently mounted on the walls. The city walls are very thick, of coral rock; the walls of the houses are usually 2 1/2 feet thick, and the roofs are flat. Each house has a cistern or cisterns of rain water. The city is well paved.

From Vera Cruz to Mexico - About ten miles from Vera Cruz is a stream 200 yards wide, crossed at a ferry in scows, or by swimming horses over. The next stream, about 30 miles from Vera Cruz, is fordable, and is also spanned by a wooden bridge called Puente del Rey, (the King's bridge,) and also the national bridge. Near it on the right is an eminence of about 60 feet, on which is a fort completely commanding the approach and bridge.

Between these bridges and Jalapa the road passes near several heights, from which the natives can annoy invaders on the City of Jalapa - This city stands on a very elevated ground, yet for many miles the ascent is quite gradual. From the city, Vera Cruz is visible, as is also the sea, 90 miles distant. The city itself is upon a high hill - highest in the centre, so that the streets incline considerably; so much so that no wheeled vehicles can pass along any of them except the main street or road, which has a considerable rise and descent. The city is surrounded by a wall, and has a strongly built church near the western gate, which could be converted into a citadel. The streets are paved. The houses, as in other Mexican towns, are of stone, with flat roofs and iron barred windows. - Opposite the city, on the left of the road, is a hill from which the road might be annoyed, and shells thrown into the town. For the distance of six or seven miles before reaching the town the road is a handsome and substantial structure of chequered pavement, and must have been very costly.

Perote - At the base of a high mount, bearing the same name, some distance from the road on the left, is a cluster of houses, with a church, called Perote.

Castle of Perote - Opposite, on the right of the road and commanding it in every direction, stands the castle. It is upon a flat sandy plain, strongly built of stone and encircled by a deep dry fosse or ditch. The main entrance is by going over a chevaux de-frize by a stile, descending some twenty five or thirty stone steps to the bottom of the fosse and crossing it to the gates, which are on a level with the bottom.

City of Puebla - This city is walled and fortified. It is built of stone and the streets are well paved. - Contains about 100,000 inhabitants. Here water is abundant, but from the national bridge to this city no water can be obtained - the natives substituting pulque as a beverage.

From Jalapa to Puebla there are occasional heights near the road, which if fortified, might annoy invaders. In fact, from Vera Cruz to Puebla this is the case - the travel being alternately over broad unobstructed roads and narrow passes, commanded by heights. The road passes through Puebla. The Pueblanos have a peculiar character; they are cunning and courageous and the most expert robber and assassins throughout Mexico, where there is no lack of such. If an offender is brought before an alcalde, any where else, and is known or ascertained to be a Pueblano, his condemnation is sure.

Cordova - A small walled and garrisoned town, through which the road passes. Beyond Puebla the road is good till it reaches the mountain of Cordova, about midway between the former and the city of Mexico, where the ascent is very rugged and steep, though without defiles. Near the road, at the foot of this mountain, passes the Rio Frio or cold river, which has its rise in the neighboring mountain of Popocatepeti, 17,000 feet above the level of the seas. A work on some of the heights of Popocatepeti would command the road.

After leaving the mountain of Cordova the road is good and unobstructed, with plenty of waster, to the city of Mexico. For several miles before reaching that city the road is delightful, passing between parallel canals and rows of Lombardy poplars.

The lake of Tezcuco - This lake commences on the right of the road, near the city, into which its waters are carried by a canal, the latter serving also to drain the gutters, &c., into the lake. The so-called lake is a large, long and very irregularly shaped basin, shallow, and containing numerous small islands and covered by myriads of wild ducks. The depth of water varies with the season; in the rainy months the basin is filled, and then it assumes the appearance of a large lake. Being the receptacle of all the drainage from the city it is very filthy. The canal from the city passes through it, fed by its waters, five or six miles in a southeast direction to the small fort of Chalco, at the extreme margin of the basin in that direction. This canal is used for transporting produce into the city and for pleasure excursions in gondolas, &c.

City of Mexico - Like all other Mexican cities this has walls and houses of stone, with flat roofs &c. It is well paved; a gutter four feet wide passes through the centre of each street, covered by broad flag stones, removable at pleasure, all the gutters are drained into the canal or lake. The city has many large and strong churches and other great buildings, easily converted into fortresses. If its walls were repaired and mounted with cannon, and well garrisoned it could make a formidable resistance to besiegers.

During the festival days, which are very numerous, the haciendas for twenty or thirty miles around send into the city not less than 10,000 mounted peasantry of the better class, most expert horsemen. - They are courageous and skillful in the use of the lance, and machete, which is a large and heavy knife. Nothing more would be necessary than for the padres to go forth into the principal cities; particularly Puebla and Mexico, and elevate their crosses, and appeal to the bigotry of the population, to rally an immense force of blood, active and desperate men, who would make fierce resistance to an invasion and if invaders should force their way in, assassinations by the hands of so many expert murderers would soon make fearful inroads on their numbers. 71.320 January 16, 1847, letter from Gen. Winfield Scott on his plans

A letter from Major General Scott, now commanding all the land forces in Mexico, dated December 28th, from Brazos Santiago, states that he should leave the next day via Matamoros and Camargo, in search of official news, by which he should be governed accordingly. Referring to the reports of the movement of the enemy, he states that, in the meantime, events may take him to Monterey; and that, "if Santa Anna be on the offensive, he must be repulsed," &c. [RLK]
The reported advance of Santa Anna on Saltillo contradicted

We were hurrying much of the details given in the Union, as mentioned above, into type, when another mail, Friday morning's, brought us a sudden change of scenery.

The U.S. transport steamer Alabama left Brazos on the 3rd, and reached New Orleans on the 7th inst. Major Butler, U.S. Army, who left Parras, where Gen. Wool's division then lay in good health and spirits, on the 17th ult., and passed the whole line of present exciting operations, furnishes authentic and the latest intelligence.

General Worth on the 16th ultimo received information from the two scouts that the Mexican General-in-chief had left San Luis Potosi, at the head of a body of 15,000 cavalry, with the intention to fall on the American division at Saltillo, which he imagined he could easily crush. After this, he proposed attacking Gen'l Wool, and if similar success attended him, to repair to Monterey and capture or destroy the magazines and public stores which lay there. Gen. Worth, without attaching more importance to the report than it seemed to merit, forthwith despatched expresses to Generals Taylor, Wool and Butler, acquainting them with what he had heard, leaving it entirely to them to act in the premises.

An express overtook Gen. Taylor a short distance from Monterey, on the route to Victoria. He immediately returned to this encamping ground, near Monterey with the whole of his division, and then waited further advices. After remaining three days, during which he received information of the improbability of the report of Santa Anna's advance on Saltillo, he again took up the line of march, and proceeded onward to Victoria. Meanwhile, Gen'l Wool, who had been informed of the rumor current at Saltillo, called in all his detached commands, and at the head of his division, 3000 strong, quitted Parras on the 18th ultimo, and by arrangements previously made, was to enter Saltillo, on the 23rd at farthest, pushing forward with practicable speed.

Gen. Butler had previously reached Saltillo from Monterey. During this time the intelligence of the reported advance of Santa Anna had reached over more distant points of the line of occupation; and troops, already under orders to march towards Monterey, hastened their progress, onward.

It appears that Generals Taylor and Worth, on mature reflection, readily discovered the improbability of the report of Santa Anna's advance, or, near proximity to Saltillo, from the following facts:

1st. The distance between San Luis de Potosi and Saltillo was too great to admit of the possibility of the march of so large a body as 15,000 men, without timely notice being afforded to the American general to prepare for his reception. 2dly. The ground between the two cities is extremely bare of verdure, or other means of subsistence for man and beast - 90 miles of which, as is well known, being an arid desert, divested of fountains, running streams, or any other source of water, besides affording not the least chance of getting food or fodder, being almost uninhabited, throughout its wide extent.

The report of the Mexican scouts, however, is said to have been corroborated, by information received at Saltillo, in a letter from an English merchant at San Luis de Potosi, who stated that Santa Anna had positively left that city, at the head of a numerous body of cavalry. Even now, in these parts of Mexico occupied by our troops, it is admitted that Santa Anna is out with a considerable mounted force, but with objects far different from those attributed to him by the scouts.

It was stated in the letter above alluded to, that the Mexicans' intentions were to hurry forward, and occupy the only practicable pass in the mountains, lying between division of Generals Worth and Wool. thus intercepting their communications. After realizing his anticipated success against them, by cutting them up in detail, he was then to advance on Monterey, &c. &c. These announcements are now proved to be premature, and things are now proceeding in their former train; accelerated a little by the alarm which has just subsided.

Maj. Butler was in Monterey on the 23d ult. at the time Gen. Taylor was encamped there. Col. Harney was in that city, on his way to Saltillo. Everything seemed satisfactory, regarding the conduct of inhabitants, as to peace and tranquility. One regiment, it is presumed, will be sufficient to form its garrison. [RLK]

The reported California massacre, according to official accounts published in the Mexican papers, signed by Col. J. M. Segura, and addressed to the Gov. of Sonora, turns out to have been a small matter. It appears from this document, that,

On the 23rd September, the citizens of Los Angeles and its vicinity met, proclaimed liberty from the American rule, and placed Florez at their head. Strife ensued, and actions took place on the 26th and 27th in the vicinity, in which the Americans were routed, 27 of them made prisoners and 3 were wounded--none killed. The Mexicans had one killed.

The conquerors then laid siege to the city--and on the 30th it capitulated. The treaty of capitulation at Monterey was not half as formal and minute as this grand treaty.
Commissioners were appointed on both sides, the American commander, Don Archibald Gillespie, being represented by Senor Don Edward Gil Chitre--Surgeon; with the rank of Major--and Lieut. D. Miguel Prior. (The Doctor in this case we presume to be surgeon Edward Gilchrist, of the US sloop of war Portsmouth.) Capt. Gillespie bound himself to retire with all his force to the port of San Pedro, thence to embark for Monterey, (California), remaining in San Pedro no longer than might be necessary to make all needful preparations for departure. Art. 1, stipulates for their retiring with the honors of war, with their arms and private property. Art 2, gives them the mounted artillery then in Los Angeles to accompany them to San Pedro, but there to be restored to the Mexicans; exchange of prisoners, restoration of property, and &c. The terms of the capitulation would seem to have been religiously observed till the time for embarkation arrived. Then the complaints of the Mexicans begin. Col. Segura says that the guns which should have been restored were all spiked; that arms should have been surrendered; that the American vessel off the port sent her boats ashore with a force of three hundred men, besides the force which had capitulated, and maintained a permanent occupation of the town. Notwithstanding all this, Col. Segura goes on to say that the troops of Sonora continue to be animated with the same enthusiasm for the liberties of the country as heretofore. We give the Mexicans the benefit of their own version of these affairs. [PTH]

MARCH OF TROOPS, &c. On his way from Monterey to Camargo, Major Butler met the Kentucky mounted riflemen, with Gen. Marshall at their head, and one of the Ohio regiments - both corps on their way from the former place. [AKS]

CHIHUAHUA - A despatch is published from Gov. Angel Trias, dated the 20th of November, in which he announces that on the day previous a body of 480 troops, part infantry and part cavalry, with four light pieces of artillery, left Chihuahua for El Paso del Norte, under the command of Lieut. Col. Cuilty; with provisions, &c. for one month. Those forces were to join at El Paso 600 men, previously raised, and the whole were to proceed and make an attempt to surprise General Kearney, who was then with a small force at Cobre, near two hundred mile north of that point. All classes of the citizens took part in celebrating the departure of these troops. [RLK]

ARMY OF THE NORTH.

SANTA FE - Letters to the 15th of November, at St. Louis, detailing all the movements previous to that date. No allusion is made to the reported defeat of the sixty dragoons. [RLK]

"A letter from Moro, dated on the 21st of Nov, announces the arrival there of Mr. N. Colburn, in advance of the wagons belonging to the last company of the traders which left Independence. On the 17th they experienced a severe storm of snow, which killed many of the oxen, but they were able to supply themselves, at Moro, and would get safely into Santa Fe. The United States trains could not, it is said move a wagon on account of snow and the loss of animals, and they were then buying oxen to get the wagon along. A wealthy Mexican citizen, seeing the embarrassments of the government's agent for the want of money, had generously proffered to loan Major Walker, paymaster, one hundred thousand dollars, at an interest of only three per cent a month." [RLK]

The following general orders show the dispositions made at the date thereof:

[ORDERS NO. 156.]

Headquarters, Army of Occupation

Camp near Monterey, Mexico, Dec. 10, 1846.
I. The 4th infantry is detached from the 1st division and with company E., 1st artillery, will form the garrison of the citadel, which will be occupied as soon as practicable; the commanding officer making his reports to Major General Butler's headquarters, and receiving his orders therefrom. The Maryland and District of Columbia battalion is likewise detached from the 1st division and will report to Brig. Gen. Quitman.

II. The 7th infantry and 2 companies of mounted riflemen in Monterey are attached to the 1st division which will be recognized as follows: 3d brigade under Colonel Harney - light company C, 3d artillery; company B, C, D and E, 2d dragoons; the 2d infantry to join at Monte Morales; 3d infantry. 4th brigade under Col. Smith - company E, 3d artillery; mounted riflemen; 1st and 7th infantry; the remaining companies of the 2d dragoons will be assigned when they shall join.

III. The troops of the first division, as organized, will be held ready to march on Sunday, the 13th inst., in the direction of Victoria.

IV. The field division organised, in order No. 108, of August 28th, is broken up; the Ohio and Kentucky regiments will report to Major General Butler and the 1st Tennessee, Georgia, and Mississippi regiments, will be held ready to march as above under the orders Brig. Gen. Quitman.

V. The troops will carry 4 days rations in their haversacks and 200 rounds of ammunition, per man, of which 40 will be taken in their boxes - the regulation allowance of transport, one wagon for each company, and such allowance for ammunition as may be found necessary.

VI. The regular general hospitals in town will be consolidated into one, to be under charge of Surgeon Jarvis; the following assignments of medical officers are made and will go into immediate effect: Surgeon M'Claren to the 7th infantry; Ass't Surgeon Byrne, 4th infantry; Ass't Surgeon Wills, mounted riflemen; Ass't Surgeon Byrne will also perform the duty of medical purveyor in Monterey; Ass't Surgeon Madison will accompany the medical director as medical purveyor on the march.

By order of Major General TAYLOR:

[Signed.] W. W. S. BLISS

In pursuance of the above orders the army had marched from Monterey, and General Taylor was en route from Victoria.

[RLK]
Potosi, Gen. Taylor did not think it worth while to throw forward Gen. Twiggs's division to that place, and after resting it a day, designed putting that division again in march for Victoria, to which point he was to proceed himself.

Gen. Patterson was supposed to be then well on his march from Matamoras to Victoria, when his division, except the Alabama rangers (in garrison at Tampico,) will be brought together. With a force holding in observation the passes from Tula, the garrison at Tampico may be reduced with advantage to the service. [RLK]

71.321 January 23, 1847, rumors at Washington

RUMORS AT WASHINGTON - The Washington Fountain flows freely, occasionally overflows - Amongst the editorial on dits in Tuesday's paper, one was, that General Taylor was to be recalled. It goes so far as to predict that he will arrive at Washington, to which it adds that he is ordered to repair - by the middle of February.

The next item is stated to be "on the authority of Commodore Perry" - the Castle of D'ULLOA is not to be attacked, "government having determined to 'conquer a peace' without attacking this stronghold." It adds that Commodore Perry is not to return to the Gulf, - with the saving clause: "How true these rumors are, we do not pretend to say."

Their next rumor is the following:

"Ultimatum of Mexico - We learn that our government is in possession of the ultimate conditions on which Mexico will consent to make a peace with the United States, and that it has determined to accede to them, if Congress will enable the Executive to meet the views of Mexico. It will be seen by reference to our epitome of the congressional proceedings of yesterday, that the committees on foreign relations in both houses, having already moved the appropriation of large sums of money to be placed at the disposition of the President in treating for peace with the enemy."

The Union referring to the "rumors" inserted in the Washington Fountain, noticed in the above says "we do not believe there is any adequate authority or foundation for either of these 'rumors'." [RLK]

To GENERAL Z TAYLOR,

Commanding the U. States troops,

at Corpus Christi, Texas:

SIR, I have the honor to inform you that I have had several conference at Monterey with Gen. Mariano Arista, commander in chief of the Mexican forces on the frontier of the Rio Grande, in relation to the difference at present existing between the United States and Mexico, and I am pleased to state to you that from the opinions and views he made known to me, the 内阁 of Mexico is disposed to enter into an amicable arrangement with the United States, in relation to the boundary and all other momentous questions. Although I was not clothed with any official authority, I took upon myself as a citizen of the United States, desiring to see the two countries in harmony of friendship, to say, that it has ever been and is the policy and sincere wish of the government and people of the United States to cultivate the good will and friendship of the sister republics of the American continent, and most especially Mexico, and that I was confident the United States would make a liberal settlement with Mexico relative to the boundary question.

As General Arista was under the impression that I was a secret agent of the United States, though I declared to him quite contrary, and that I was only acting as a private individual, endeavoring to avoid a recourse to arms between the two countries, he nevertheless thought it advisable to send a minute of our conferences to his government, and assured me that there will be no declaration of war on the part of Mexico, until I can proceed on to Washington and lay before the president the views of Mexico, of which I am possessed.

General Arista pledged his honor to me that no large body of Mexican troops should cross the left bank of the Rio Grande; that only small parties not to exceed 200 men should be permitted to go as far as the Arroya Colorado (20 leagues from the Rio Grande) and that they would be strictly ordered only to prevent Indian depredations and illicit trade. I then had no hesitation in assuring him that you would not commit any aggressive act against Mexico, or her citizens, and that you would solely maintain the position you at present occupy at or near the Nueces river. I trust, in having made this assurance to him, though, I again repeat I did it as a private citizen of the United States, that it has ever been and is the policy and sincere wish of the government and people of the United States to prevent them as far as possible. General Arista spoke also of Indian incursion on the frontier of the Rio Grande, and is under the impression that the United States would be prevented by the troops under your command, as the Indians always come from the Nueces river. I expressed my profound regret at the frequent atrocious acts of the Indians, and said that you would no doubt in future use all endeavors to prevent them as the United States was bound by the treaty of April, 1831, to prevent them as far as possible. He suggested that if you would station a body of cavalry at the pass of San Salas (head waters of the Nueces) through which mountain pass they invariably proceed to the Rio Grande, it would effectually check them.
I shall leave this village to-morrow for Matamoros to which port I shall arrive in three days; from thence I will embark in the first vessel for the United States, proceeding immediately on to Washington, to lay before the president the information and views of Mexico, which I am possessed of; in the meantime, should you decree this note of sufficient importance, I trust that you will transmit a copy of it by express to the government, as by timely information much good may result therefrom.

I beg to congratulate you that the door is opened to an amicable adjustment of the vexatious questions between the United States and Mexico, and feel happy in having been instrumental in this great and good object.

I am, with great respect, sir, your ob't servant,

[Signed]
ISAAC D. MARKS.

71.322 January 23, 1847, letter of Isaac D. Marks to Secretary of State James Buchanan

New Orleans, Oct. 29th, 1845.

To the Hon. JAMES BUCHANAN, Secretary of State:

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, a "copy" of a letter I addressed to General Z. Taylor at Corpus Christi, from the village of China, (Mexico). - I despatched it by special courier to him, but was subsequently informed that the express was detained at the town of Camargo, (on the Rio Grande,) up to the 7th instant, by reason of the continual and heavy rains. I beg leave to add that I arrived in this city yesterday from Matamoros, and will leave to-morrow for Washington. I am, with great respect, &c.,

71.322 January 23, 1847, Mrs. Anna Chase’s letter from Tampico

MRS. CHASE, THE HEROINE OF TAMPOCO

All recollect that previous to that taking of Tampico, Mrs. CHASE, the wife of our consul at that place; sent to Com. Conner, an exact plan of the entire town, harbor, and forts of Tampico, with information of the exact strength of the place; and that, on receiving the documents of Mrs. Chase, the commodore immediately set sail for Tampico, and took the place without opposition, owing his success entirely to the information sent him by that accomplished and patriotic lady. We give below a letter for which we are indebted to the kindness of our friend, Mr. B.M. Norman, to whom it was addressed, written by Mrs. Chase herself, giving, somewhat in detail, the taking of Tampico, and the part she had in it. Much less praise, we think, has been bestowed on the noble conduct of this courageous and patriotic lady than she deserves, and we trust that our government, in consideration of the very distinguished services which she had rendered, at the peril of her life, will unhesitatingly reward her with enduring honors.

We doubt whether, there is a letter on record, written by a female hand, breathing a purer patriotism, a nobler ardor, a more courageous heart, than that of Mrs. Chase, which we give below. She is a noble example among our countrywomen, and her name will descend, on the pages of our history, winning the admiration of future ages. It will be seen that by her skilful management, that would have done honor to the most shrewd general, she succeeded, before sending information to Commodore Conner, in so terrifying the Mexican troops that they evacuated Tampico with precipitation, after throwing into the river six hundred stand of arms and one hundred quintals of powder. We give the letter entire, it being the most authentic account that can be furnished. She writes what she saw and did.

"MY ESTEEMED FRIEND: A great change has come o’er the spirit of my dream – at least within the last month – so that I almost doubt the evidence of my own senses, we having at this moment some twenty sail of vessels in the river Panuco – steamers passing and repassing, the sight of which pays me, in part, for my six months’ solitude and suffering. I am not a believer in purgatory, but I think I have passed through that ordeal by residing in an enemy’s country alone; not only hostile in feeling, but subtle and unprincipled.
"My dear friend, I scarcely know how to reply to your friendly solicitude towards me and mine especially. In beginning my imperfect narrative, one great misfortune seems to accompany me – my pen can never keep pace with my feelings. You will have been aware of Mr. Chase’s expulsion, agreeably to the decree of the 12th of May last, and in compliance with the act he had only twenty four hours’ notice to embark, or eight days to retire twenty leagues into the interior. He prudently chose the former, and embarked forthwith on board of the St. Mary’s the blockading vessel off the bar of Tampico, leaving some eighty thousand dollars in his store with no other protection than such as I could afford, and two clerks, one of whom was a Mexican; and he, in accordance with the true spirit of Mexican chivalry, commenced robbing me. In fact my annoyances were so numerous that I cannot give you them in detail, but merely sketch an outline, knowing the sympathy you feel for my perilous position in this new drama. In the next place, Inez de Primera Instancia, by order of the commanding general, passed me a notice that my privileges ceased as the wife of the American consul, and my store must be closed. I replied to him in the most decisive manner, that I was not only his wife, but also his constituted agent – in addition to this I was a British subject, and, as such, neither the judge nor the general could deprive me of my natural rights, as the English law admitted of no annexion – stating that any infraction on it prerogative would be hastily chastized by that government; and in confirmation of my assertion, referred the learned Inez to the law of nations.

Thus defeated and exasperated, I was not allowed to send an open note to my husband, then off the bar. But, thank God, who ‘tempers the wind to the shorn lamb,’ He directed me, and I concerted a plan which again defeated their hostile purpose, and sent by strategem nine letters in eight weeks, and through the same means received replies. But those things were daily making inroads upon my health and spirits, which I most carefully concealed from my good husband, knowing the intensity of his feelings for his government, and particularly for my welfare.

"I, in the meantime, drew a plan of the city and river, and had it sent to Com. Conner and Captain M’Cluney of the John Adams, with a correct description of all the forts, the number of guns, a list of the troops and how they were posted, and every political movement, so that through Mr. Chase and his agent, they knew every important movement in this section of the country.

"They abused and insulted the American name and nation to such an extent that it often caused me to retire and pray God for the day of retribution – With the exception of my faithful Amelia, I had but little human sympathy, as all the English influence was against our national cause.

"I am, perhaps, a little prosy, but I well know the sensitive heart to whom these lines are addressed, and so continue. I daily watched, not very christian-like, for the moment of retaliation, hoping to be able although alone in the combat, to “square accounts” with my fierce debtors, and, if possible, place myself and party on the credit side of the entangled account.

"Santa Anna recommended to the government of Mexico the confiscation of all American property in order to carry on the war, and that all Americans residing in this country should be made prisoners of war, as a fatal stroke of those usurping pirates – the gentle name generally applied to them – and that this garrison should be reinforced with some 3,000 more troops. When I read this article in one of the flaming periodicals, it was rather grating to me in my isolated condition. I determined, however, upon the old Roman motto –

'Who would be free, himself must strike the blow,' or in other words, my case was at best helpless, and now even desperate, and required a desperate remedy.

"Two spies came daily to my house, always under the guise of friendship; and on one occasion, one of the wretches believe that I was possessed of items concerning American movements, I represented him that 30,000 troops were to join Gen. Taylor at Matamoros, 30,000 more had been despatched to capture San Juan, &c., and closed with remarking that I would be compelled to close my house within a day or two as a force of 25 to 30,000 troops was coming against this place – which bit of romance so frightened my poor Amelia, that she thought the general here would call me to account for it.

"Next day I had a call from the captain of the port who wished to know the truth, and inquired if Mr. Chase had written to me to that effect; and soon after some other of the high functionaries discovered me to be an important character, in their daily rounds. In a conversation with the father in law of the general, I recommended to him an early retreat, as the wisest course to be taken; and that same night a private post was despatched to San Luis Potosi upon the strength of the information so received, through me; the town of Tampico was ordered to be vacated on the appearance of this large force off the bar; scouts were sent in every direction, to procure muleteers, for the conveyance of property to the interior; and two schooner loads were shipped to the city of Panuco; six hundred stand of arms were sunk, the cannons were removed from the fort, and the troops evacuated the place. I then despatched to Com. Connor an account of the state of things, and in triplicate to Havana, under different covers to my husband, urging his return forthwith. These were sent by an agent, who supposed them mere letter conveying a wish to my husband to meet me at Vera Cruz, to accompany me to Havana. I spent a restless night and morning, but it has certainly brought its reward. My letter to the commodore was dated October 23d; he received it October 27th, and immediately called a meeting of his senior officers and laid my despatch before them. It had due weight. Provisions were brought from Point Isabel and distributed among the squadron, and on the morning of the 13th have in sight, twelve sail off the bay of Tampico. I was so confident of the coming of the squadron, that in anticipation of their coming, I had a flag staff made one week previous, and had it erected upon the house-top, in order to raise the first American flag hoisted as a right over Tampico. On my first sight of the fleet, my pent up feelings gave way and I wept as a child for joy, seeing that God had brought deliverance to the captives, and in anticipation of soon seeing the object of my affection, and also in gratitude to Him who is mighty to save, and that my feeble efforts had wrought so strange in our national welfare.

Here I must pause, and say I cannot pretend to describe my feelings at that time. Fortitude seemed to give way, and in the
In thirty minutes the Ayuntamiento called upon me and ordered me to haul it down. I replied it was raised as a right of protection. They said I had no such right as I rejoined that that it was a matter of opinion in which we could not agree. They said it was a burlesque upon their nation – a lady taking the city – and what would the supreme government of Mexico say? I replied very laconically, 'Quien sabe!' and offered them wine under the new banner. They threatened the house. I ran to its top, and asked Mr. Uder if he would stand by me. He replied, "Yes." "Then," said I, "the flag must remain, or all of us sent over the house-top, as I shall never pull it down or suffer any Mexican to sully it by his touch." I had been robbed, - my store entered and pillaged of more than two thousand dollars, in the dead of the night; and when the regiment from Puebla entered this city, they entered my store and carried off my goods, and I had no redress and still less sympathy; and although alone, the God of the just was my captain general, and I had nothing to fear from all Mexico. And now the house of redemption was at hand. I expected they would either fire upon or storm the house. I rested with my right arm round the flag staff, the banner waving in majestic beauty, and the squadron nearing the city, where they saw the flat. It was like lightning to pilgrims to know from whence it came, but soon the officers saw two female forms standing by it, and gave three cheers in front of the city, and then came to my house, which had been now nearly six months as if proscribed by some crime or plague, and my fault was that o being the wife of an American. Commodore Perry and the municipal authorities came to my house on arrival, also Commodore Conner. My despatches have been sent to the state department, and I have letters of thanks from the officers commanding, who have changed the name of Fort Libertad to Fort Ann, in compliment to me. They arrived on the 16th. Forty eight hours after came Mr. Chase, crowning all my happiness.

"You will no doubt have heard part of my story previous to this reaching you, knowing the interest you feel; and this unlimited friendship evinced by you, I thus have taken the liberty to give as far as practicable in detail, and have extended my account far beyond my intention, and at the same time trusting that you will give at least a reading to this imperfect scroll, and may never feel the pangs of mental affliction, as felt by me.

"You very kindly inquire if the existing war has injured us in a pecuniary point? It has very materially, but that loss has not in the least allowed my spirits to flag. My trust is in Him, who can withhold and best. We have suffered in mind, in person and pocket, but with feelings of interest toward our beloved country and duty to the cause, and like the widow I was writing to contribute my might for the honor of the country he had so long represented, and as a dutiful wife to follow him in weal and woe, according to the pressure of misfortune, and in impending anger, the break blasts of adversity should not chill my ardor, in following his advice and his cause and trust to God.

"We will lose nearly one half of our stock goods. No doubt the U.S. government will indemnify Mr. Chase at a future day.

"Our house will be turned into a garrison, and three field pieces will be placed upon it. I am willing to stand by my husband at a gun until we both die or are victors.

"I have been trying to keep a journal of the beauties of the drama, in rather a rough form, and may place it in your hands at a future day. [RLK]

71.323 January 23, 1847, announcement of the "new plan of operations" for the campaign about to be commenced by Gen. Winfield Scott, M. Gomez suspected of abstracting it

THE WAR. – New Plan of Operations – Extraordinary Revelations – We read in the La Patria of the 31st ult., a Spanish paper published in New Orleans, by Aleman & Gomez, the following extraordinary revelation of the new plan of operations in the war with Mexico:

"The government appears to confide much in General Scott, who has just gone to the field of operations, and from whose diplomatic and military tactics, it hopes to gain great advantages. The plan of operations, we learn, is as follows:

Gen. Taylor, instead of moving upon San Luis Potosi, will repair to Saltillo, where he will remain for a short period. Gen. Scott, after having made some arrangements on the Rio Grande, will hasten to Tampico, where he will assume the command of the 7,000 volunteers recently called out and ordered to assemble at that point. From Tampico, General Scott will march towards Vera Cruz, and Gen. Taylor will make a simultaneous movement towards Tampico, with all the troops he can muster, after leaving sufficient force to garrison Saltillo, Monterey, Victoria, &c., and in union with Gen. Worth’s division, will join Gen. Scott, who will have at his command the new military arm of rocketeers and howitzers.

At the proper moment, fifteen or sixteen vessels of the American squadron, with a force of from 230 to 300 guns of all sizes and calibres, will appear off San Juan de Ulloa, and begin the attack upon the castle. According to the new plan of operations the land forces will rendezvous at the mouth of the river Antigua, which empties into the Gulf a short distance to the north of Vera Cruz, and ascend the same to where the main road to Jalapa crosses it. If this plan be speedily put into execution, there can be no doubt that Vera Cruz and the Castle will as speedily fall into the power of the American forces; but if any faith be put in Santa Anna’s declaration, it is plain he will be able to cut off the advance of Gen. Taylor from Saltillo."
Mr. Gomez, the editor of La Patria, and the author of the above, is the same person, who was appointed by Gen. Scott, while tarrying in N. Orleans, to be one of his staff, and whose commission was afterwards revoked by the General on the ground that he was not a friend to the American cause. Did Gomez obtain the above information while he was Gen. Scott’s aid? – Washington Fountain [RLK]

71.336 January 23, 1847, comments on aspirants to the presidency, the question of a lieutenant general, and the war with Mexico

PRESIDENTIAL, 1848 – The different aspirants and their partizans in congress it is said by letter writers at Washington, seriously influence the questions now before that body. Without room for many of those speculations, we insert the following from the correspondent of the Balt. Sun, (a decidedly administration writer) – as a specimen:

"Every measure which may now be brought forward, - every demand made by the president, - every bill introduced in either house by a member of congress, will lead to slavery and anti-slavery discussions, in which the moral and statesmanlike views of the question will be made to yield to the inordinate desire for power, for in all these discussion no other issue is made than this: Which shall predominate, "the South or the North?" "From which section of the country shall the next president be taken, from the slave or from the free states?" Shall Silas Wright be brought forward, or John C. Calhoun, General Cass, or Sam Houston? The Lieutenant Generalship is supposed by many to be very intimately connected with this question; for if Colonel Benton is to be Lieutenant General, he and senator Dix and Silas Wright will lead off the Northern and Northwestern wing of the party – and, for this very reason, the south will steadfastly oppose it. It is now pretty certain that a Calhoun man will be elected in the place of Mr. Pennybacker, in the same manner that Mr. Hunter was elected in the place of Mr. Archer; which will make the democratic vote against the Lieutenant General, should he again be galvanized, stand thus: Calhoun, Butler, Colquitt, Lewis, Yulee, besides the two senators from Virginia; making in all 7. These, with the 24 whigs, who will vote to a man against him, the friends of Col. Benton will never overcome, and thus the measure will be lost, unless skilfully brought forward in another form. This will be done before the next 4th of March, with what success remains to be seen. – I am even very creditably informed that Col. Benton will himself defend the creation of a Lieutenant General, and state his reasons for doing so at full length. They will, no doubt, be very interesting and command the attention of the country; especially if, as it is rumored, the charges brought by Mr. Ficklin, of Illinois, and Thompson, of Mississipi, against Scott and Taylor, should receive some new coloring, or be in some measure substantiated. But, gentlemen had better take care how they make those charges; as, if they cannot prove them, the accusation will, with unerring certainty, recoil upon the calumniators. But nous verrons.

While an attempt is thus made to force a new organization of the army on the country, Mr. Calhoun intends to wait for an opportunity of presenting his proposition for peace, amity and a treaty of commerce and navigation with Mexico. He deprecates the war and its consequences, but thinks that peace may yet be concluded on terms mutually honorable and without depriving us of our legitimate inheritance, California. If Mr. Calhoun’s plan succeeds in enlisting a majority of congress in its favor, he will be the candidate of the juste milieu party at the next presidential election, and, perhaps, be elected in the same manner that Hunter was returned senator from Virginia. His friends, I can assure you, intend to run him at all hazards; urging that it is better that “half a dozen first rate men should be brought forward, than a compromise be made in favor of a secondary one.”

If the spring elections turn out against the administration, the Calhoun men, in both houses, will hold the balance of power, and in that position, elect the policy which they deem proper. We shall then have a regularly organized juste milieu, and a consequent lopping off of the wings of parties.”

The Washington correspondent of the Evening Post, a leading administration paper of New York, writes on the 5th inst.:

"The proceedings of the House today will be looked to by the country with great interest. The remarks of Mr. King on the subject of the admission of more slave states into the Union, is denounced by the southern members as a concerted movement for the benefit of Mr. Wright, as the northern candidate for the presidency, and the exceedingly able and well written speech which he this morning read to the house, as an exposition of his motives in offering it, were both prepared at Albany by the special and particular desire of Mr. Wright. No one acquainted with Mr. King will question his capacity to conduct such a business as the management of the northern side of the impending controversy, with judgment and skill.”

REPORTED MOVEMENT IN FAVOR OF PEACE. – The Washington Union, makes the following allusions to a reported movement in congress for effecting a peace with Mexico:

“A rumor has gone forth that a resolution will be submitted to our own congress to recall our troops, and take our position on the Rio Grande. It is a mere rumor, and we trust, without the slightest foundation. We do not credit it. We cannot believe that any statesman would dare to rise in his place, and submit a proposition which is to cast such a slur on the institutions of his country – which tells Mexico, or the nations of Europe, that our internal feuds are so embarrassing, our government so cursed with imbecility, that the nation is too divided and too weak to avenge the wrong, and asset the rights of our country. Mr. Jefferson asserted in his inaugural address, that, “This is the strongest government on earth.” We are satisfied that no politician will hazard a proposition which would prove it to be one of the weakest. Away then with such a suggestion! The rumor must be like the thousand and one other gossips of Washington, unfounded and false. We do not believe it.”

The subject is alluded to in a Washington letter published in the N.Y. Herald, thus:

For some days past it has been whispered about that a distinguished senator from the south was resolved at an early day to propose to the senate to withdraw our armies from Mexico, for the following reasons:

1. We want peace.
2. We can acquire it by withdrawing our forces, military and naval, from the lands and waters of Mexico.
3. We can gain nothing by the continued prosecution of the war.
4. The question of slave or free territory puts a bar of acquisition of land south of the Rio Bravo.
5. And Mexico has no money, and the longer the war is continued the poorer she will become.
6. We have, therefore nothing to gain from the prosecution of the war but peace, which we may easily obtain at once by the withdrawal of our forces.

Such, we understand, is the proposition, but we rather suspect a majority of congress would prefer fighting it at a dead expense. But we shall see. [RLK]

NNR47January v71.339 January 30, 1847 General Gideon Johnson Pillow’s general order relative to suffers refusing treasury drafts (“hard money”)

Hard money—Treasury drafts are paid out to the troops in Mexico in thus wise;—Four volunteers have $100 due to them. The paymaster calls them up and gives them $100 treasury draft. The four owe the sutler $40, and hand him the draft—if he has the change he gets the money—if not, he goes without. This has produced much dissatisfaction among the men and sutlers, and the paper was reluctantly received, if at all. This brought out by Gen. Pillow, of the volunteer service, the following order, to compel the refractory to receive the papers. Nat. Intel.

1. Sutlers will receive treasury notes in payment for grade purchased by the soldiers, or any balances that shall or may be against them, at their par value, and any attempt to extort more than this value for them will be punished, when properly brought before the general commanding the brigade, by shutting up the store and sending the goods or the offender out of the country.

2. The general commanding the brigade can scarcely find words to express the astonishment he feels at the rapacity which is not constant with absorbing every copper of the soldier’s hard-earned pittance; but it must turn to shaving the money which he is bound to take when offered by the government, or none. He trusts that none of the sutlers of his brigades have been guilty of these outrages; but, if they have, he warns them against it. Its repetition in the future, so he is determined to carry out his measures to the very letter.

3. Commanding officers of regiments are held strictly responsible for the literal enforcement of the above order.

By order of Brigadier General Pillow

NNR47January v71.342 January 30, 1847 General Zachary Taylor’s confidential letter to a friend

*My Dear ******

Your very kind and acceptable letter of the 31st of August, reached me only a short time for which I beg leave to tender to you my sincere thoughts. {A few confidential remarks on certain transactions are here omitted.}

After considerable apparent delay on the part of the Quarter Master’s department, in getting steamboats late the Rio Grande adapted to its navigation, I succeeded, towards the latter part of August, in throwing forward to Camargo, (a town situated on the San Juan River, three miles from its junction with the Rio Grande, on the west side, nearly 500 miles from Bragos Island by water and 200 by land, and 140 from this place) a considerable depot of provisions, ordnance, ammunition, and forage, and them, having brought together an important portion of my command, I determined on moving this place.
Accordingly, after collecting 1,700 peak mules, with their attendants and conductors, in the enemy’s country, (the principal means of transportation for our provisions, baggage, &c.,) I left, on the 5th of September, to join my advance, which had preceded me a few days to Serraivo, a small village 75 miles on the route, which I did on the 9th, and, after waiting there a few days for some of the corps to get up, moved on and reached here on the 19th, with 6,250 men—2,700 regulars, the balance volunteers. For what took place afterwards, I must refer you to several reports,—particularly to my detailed one of the 9th unit. I do not believe the authorities at Washington are at all satisfied with my conduct in regard to the terms of capitulation entered into with the Mexican commander, which you no doubt have seen as they have been made public through the official organ, and copied into various other newspapers. I have this moment received an answer (to my dispatch announcing the surrender of Monterey, and the circumstances attending the same,) from the secretary of war, stating that "it was regretted by the president that it was not advisable to insist on the terms I had proposed in my communication to the Mexican commander, in regard to giving up the city,"—adding that, "the circumstances which dictated, no doubt, justified the changes." Although the terms of capitulation may be considered too liberal on our part by the president and his advisers, as well as by many others at a distance, particularly by those who do not understand the position which we occupied (otherwise they might come to a different conclusion in regard to the matters,) yet, on due reflection, I see nothing to induce me to regret the course I pursued.

The proposition on the part of General Ampudia, which had much to do in determining my course in the matter, was based on the ground that our government had proposed to his to settle existing difficulties by negotiation, (which I knew was the case, without knowing the result,) which was then under consideration by the proper authorities, and which he (Gen. Ampudia,) had no doubt would result favorably, as the whole of his people were in favor of peace. If so, I considered the further effusion of blood not only unnecessary, but improper. Their force was also considerably larger than ours; and from the size and position of the place, we could not completely invest it; so that the greater portion of their troops, if not the whole, had they been disposed to do so, could, any night, have abandoned the city, at once, entered the mountain passes, and effected their retreat,—do what we could! Had we been put to the alternative of taking the place by storm, (which there is no doubt we should have succeeded in doing,) we should have, in all probability, have lost fifty or one hundred men in killed, besides the wounded,—which I wished to avoid, as there appeared to be a prospect of peace, even if a distinct one. I also wished to avoid the destruction of women and children, which must have been very great, had the storming process been resorted to. Besides, they had a very large and strong fortification, a short distance from the city, which, if carried with the (?) , must have been taken at great sacrifice of life; and, which our limited train off heavy battering artillery, it would have required twenty or twenty-five days to take it by regular approaches.

That they should have been surrendered a place nearly as strong as Quebec well fortified under the direction of skilful engineers,—their works garnished with forty two pieces of artillery, abundantly supplied with ammunition, garrisoned by 7,000 regulars and 2,000 irregular troops, in addition to some thousand citizens capable of, (and no doubt actually,) bearing arms, and aiding in its defense,—to an opposing force of half of their number, scantily supplied with provisions, and with a light train of artillery,—in among the unaccountable occurrence of the times.

I am decidedly opposed to carrying on the war beyond Baitillo in this direction, which place has been entirely abandoned by the Mexican forces, all of whom have been concentrated at San Luis Potesi; and I shall lose no time in taking possession of the former as soon as the cessation of hostilities referred to expires,—which I have notified the Mexican authorities will be the close on the 13th instant, by direction of the President of the United States.

If we are (in the languages of Mr. Polk and General Scott) under the necessity of “conquering a peace,” and that by taking the capital of the country,—we must go to Vera Cruz, take that place, and then march on the city of Mexico. To do so in any other direction, I consider out of the question. But, admitting that we conquer a peace by doing so—say, at the end of the next twelve months—will the amount of blood and treasure, which must be expanded in doing so, be compensated by the same? I think not—especially, if the country we subdue in to be given up; and I imagine there are but few individuals in our country who think of annexing Mexico to the United States.

I do not intend to carry on my operations (as previously stated) beyond Saltillo,—deeming it next to impractical to do so. It then becomes a question as to what is best to be done. It seems to me, the most judicious course to be pursued on our part, would be to take possession at once, of the time we would accept by negotiations, extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific, and occupy the same or keep what we already have possession of, and that, with Tampico, (which I hope to take in the course of next month, or as soon as I can get the means of transportation,) will give us all on this side of the Sierra Madre, and as soon as I occupy Saltillo, will include six or seven states or provinces, thus holding Tampico, Victoria, Monterey, Saltillo, Monclova, Chihuahua, (which I presume General Wool has possession of at this time) Santa Fe, and the California, Sad sat to Mexico, "drive us from the country!"—throwing on her the responsibility and expense of carrying on an offensive war—at the same time closely blockading all of her ports on the Pacific and the Gulf. A course of this kind, if persevered on for a short time, would soon bring her to her proper senses, and compel her to sue for peace—provided there is a government in the country sufficiently stable for us to treat with, which I fear will hardly be the case for years to come. Without large reinforcements of volunteers from the U. States—say ten or fifteen thousand, (those previously sent out having already been greatly reduced by sickness and other casualties) I do not believe it would be advisable to search beyond Saltillo, which is more than 200 miles beyond our depots in the Rio Grande—a very long time on which to keep up the supplies (over a land route in a country like this) for a large force, and certain to be attended with as expense which it will be frightful to contemplate, when closely looked into.

From Saltillo to San Luis Potesi, the next place of importance on the road to the city of Mexico, is three hundred miles—one hundred and forty badly watered, where the supplies of any kind could be procured for men and horses. I have informed the war department that 20,000 efficient men would be necessary to insure success if we move on that place—(a city containing a population of 60,000 where the enemy could bring together and sustain, besides the citizens, an army of 50,000) a force which I apprehend will hardly be collected by us with the train necessary to feed it as well as to transport various other supplies, particularly ordnance and munitions of war.
In regard to the amenities, which would have expired by limitations in a few days, we lost nothing by it as we could not more even now, had the enemy continued to occupy Saltillo for, strange to say, the first wages which has reached me since the declaration of war was on the 2nd instant, the same day on which I received from Washington an acknowledgement of my dispatch announcing the taking of Monterey; and then I only received 125, as that I have been, since May last completely crippled and am still so, for the lack of transportation. After reaching and scraping the country for miles around Camargo, selecting every pack mule and other means of transportation, I could bring here only 80,000 rations (15 days supply,) with a moderate supply of ordnance, munitions, &c., to do which, all the corps had to leave behind a portion of their camp equipment necessary for their comfort, and, in some instances, among the volunteers, their personal baggage. I moved in such a way, and with such limited means, that, had I not succeeded, I should no doubt have been extremely reprimanded, if [2-3 illegible words] I did so to sustain the administration.

Of the two regiments of mounted men from Tennessee and Kentucky, who left the respective states to join me in June, the letter has just reached Camargo; the former had not gotten to Matamoros at the latest dates from there. Admitting that they will be as long in returning as in getting here, (to say nothing of the time necessary to recruit their horses) and were to be discharged in that time to reach their homes, they could serve in Mexico, but a very short time. The foregoing remarks are not made with the view of finding fault with any one, but to point out the difficulties with which I have had to contend.

Monterey, the capital of New Leon, is situated on the San Juan River, where it comes out of the mountains--the city (which contains a population of about 12,000) being in part surrounded by them, at the head of a large and beautiful valley. The houses are of stone in the Moorish style, with flat roofs, which, with their strongly enclosed yards and gardens, in high stone walls all looped for musketry, make them such a fortress within themselves. It is the most important place in Northern Mexico, (or on the east side of the Sierra Madre, commanding the only pass or road for carriages from this side, between it and the Gulf of Mexico is the table lands of the Sierra, by or through which, the city of Mexico can be reached.

I much fear I shall have exhausted your patience, before you get half through this long and uninterrupted letter. If so, you can only commit it to the flames, and think no more about it, as I write in great haste, besides being interrupted every five minutes; so that you must make great allowances for blots, interlineations, and blunders, as well as want of connection in many parts of the same.

Be so good as to present me most kindly to your excellent lady, and accept my sincere wished for your continued health, prosperity and fame.

I remain, truly and sincerely, your friend,

Z. TAYLOR

Extract of a letter to a member of Congress, dated Camargo, December 19, 1846

Dear Sir: I have just arrived here in haste from Monterey, the expedite the movement of troops that have been ordered forward. I left Monterey on the morning of the 17th, and arrived here this morning. The emergency was this: Gen. Worth on the 16th, despatched an express from Saltillo to Gen. Butler, at Monterey, to inform him that Santa Anna, with his whole army, would attack Saltillo in a few days, perhaps in three, and requesting all the aid that he could get, and stating that his whole force for duty did not exceed 900 men. The general belief is, that Santa Anna’s force is at least twenty or thirty thousand men. Upon the receipt of Worth’s letter, an express was sent by Butler to Gen. Taylor, who had left two days for Victoria, and was supposed to be about thirty miles from Monterey, with some regular force, and Gen. Quitman’s brigade. He also sent an express to Gen. Wool at Parras, (Worth having also sent an Express to Wool,) commanding him to proceed at once to Saltillo. Should Taylor and Wool reach Saltillo in time, there will be a force there of between six and seven thousand men, which will be all that can be got there in any reasonable time. I forgot to say that Ben. Butler left for Saltillo immediately with the Kentucky and Ohio regiments, that were at Monterey, numbering together, about eight hundred efficient men. The two regiments, at a moments warning in the dead of night, broke up their camp, and, in fine order, moved off for Monterey, to start from that place at daylight o the morning of the 17th. On my return from the city to the camp about an hour before day. I met them, marching in quick time, and in the finest possible spirits, the Kentucky regiment under command of Major shepherd, and the Ohio regiment under command of Major Giddings.

Orders had been issued at least six weeks ago To General Lane to move forward with two Indiana regiments, in order that Worth might be reinforced; but by some means, the orders, although they arrived in Matamoros, did not reach General Lane. This matter, I suppose, will be looked at into hereafter. I do not mean hear the result, though matters now look a little precarious. I foul that Gen. Lane in motion; and though he cannot reach Saltillo by the time the fighting is expected, he may possibly get to Monterey in time to reinforce our troops. If they should be compelled to fall back upon that place. I will leave here tomorrow or next day for headquarters, with General Marshall and the Kentucky cavalry. [AKS]
CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE VOLUNTEER ACT. Wilst thousands of volunteers are in arms invading Mexico, some of them fighting furiously, many falling in battle, and many others in hospitals, and whilst thousands more are hurrying on to other battle fields and greater dangers. The courts of our country, it seems, entertain doubts of the constitutionality of the law under which all these are serving. The Constitution makes no reference whatever to, nor recognizes any other military force than those of the regular army and militia. It is not easy to classify volunteers as organized for the invasion of Mexico, and especially those enlisted under the recent orders "to serve during the war," as militia. The Constitution limits the term for which militia may be called into service, and as militia, of course, they cannot be detained beyond that limit. The purpose for which militia may be called into service by the United States, are also expressly laid down, and amongst those, the invasion of a foreign country is not included. [AKS]

*The following is the paragraph of the general regulations for the army established on the 1st of March 1825, referred to the above. "650...Private letters or reports, relative to military marches and operations, are frequently mischievous in design, and always disgraceful to the army. They are, therefore, strictly forbidden and any officer found guilty of making such report for publication, without special permission, or of placing the writing beyond his control, so that it finds way to the press, within one month, after the termination of the campaign to which it relates, shall be dismissed from the service."

NNR47February v71.354 2/6/1847 judicial decision that a minor cannot be held under the volunteer act

A case of habeas corpus was argued at Boston for several days last week. Kimball, Murray, and Stone, three volunteer minors in the Massachusetts regiment, were brought before the supreme court, and their cases were elaborately argued, and excited much interest. The court decided that a minor cannot be held under the volunteer act of May 1846. The question of the Constitutionality of the act itself, the court declined to entertain in the present proceedings. JOURNAL

The Osages and the Sioux

_Massacre—Butchery of women and children_ —A letter from a gentleman at Council Bluffs, dated, on the 17th of December, to his correspondence in St. Louis states that, on the previous day, a band of the Omaha were met by a band of the Sioux, in the neighborhood of the Bluffs, that a battle ensued between them; and that the Sioux killed sixty of the Omaha before the conflict terminated.

It was a cold-blooded butchery of women and children, in the absence of all the warriors of the villagers. On the night of the 12th and 13th, the letter states, a war party of Yancton Sioux Indians defeated and destroyed fourteen tribes of the Omaha tribe of Indians, located at the time of Wood’s Bluff, situated about sixty miles from this place—Bellevue. The men and warriors of the Omaha had left the camp on a hunt, and the Sioux soon after they reached the camp discovered that they only had women and children to contend with. The slaughter was terrible—seventy-three were killed and nineteen mortally wounded. Two men made their escape—one of them, Joseph Lafteehe, a trader in the employ of Mr. Peter A. Sarpy, and at the time in charge of a stock of goods. He ran from the scene of blood bare-footed, and arrived at Bellevue with both feet frozen. Mr. Sarpy and Major Miller, the present agent, dispatched a party of men to ascertain the facts, and they confirmed, on their return, the report of Lafteehe. They also reported that five of the Sioux Indians had been killed, no doubt, stabbed by the Omaha squaws. Going twenty miles further than the ground of the massacre, they found the place where the goods of the trader had been divided among the robbers.

It seems, adds the letter, that fate is against the Omaha Indians. Four or five days before the event took place, one lodge, camping at Cabanne’s old trade log house, was attacked by a war party of Ayonas, commanded by the well-known chief White Cloud, and four of the men wounded, and one woman killed. NNR47February v71.359 February 6, 1847 March from Monterey to Victoria

MARCH FROM MONTEREY TO VICTORIA
THE COUNTRY. A letter from an officer of the army, dated Victoria, January 6th, obligingly handed for our perusal, gives us an account of the march commended the 13th of December from Monterey, to Mont Morales; a small town about 50 miles on the road to Victoria, there, being overtaken by the express from Gen. Worth, of the countermarch to Monterey, where it was ascertained to have been a false alarm for the safety of Saltillo—after resting for two days at Monterey, they started again for Victoria where they arrived on the 4th of January. Their route was along the range of the lofty mountains on the right—on their left an open country, part of it very beautiful, and in quite a high state of cultivation—some very large sugar plantations;—great abundance of fruit. Many of the little lawns were very pretty and clean, the churches are generally the quite prominent buildings in the place, and in some instances have an antiquated and picturesque in appearance. The letter says, "I enjoyed the march very much when all things went on smoothly and the wagons did not stall, sitting upon my horse, eating sugar cane, oranges, and thinking about all my old sweet hearts and love serapes."—"Christmas day was as hot as midsummer." Particulars of the loss of Capt. May’s rear guard—Arrest of the Lieut. in command.

Florida, January 1st, 1847—Between 7 and 8 o’clock, Capt. May got in with his dragoons.—He reports the loss of eleven men and their horses and seven pack mules. As far as I can gather the particulars, they come from Capt. May, they are these.

"Between Monte Morales and Lineres, Capt. May ascertained that there was a pass in the a gorge of the mountains, and determined to ascertain the nature of it. His command consisted of two companies of dragoons—some seventy or eighty men. On approaching the foot of the mountain every precaution was used to guard against surprise. A lieutenant with twelve men noted as the rear guard and guard of the pack mules of the command, who remained some few hundred yards in the rear, and in this way they progressed slowly and carefully until they found out the pass, which was so narrow that it was with much difficulty a single horse could go through it.—But May was determined to transverse it, and make what discoveries he could on to the other side. Dismounting himself and men, he led his horse on the way, and, after experiencing much difficulty in getting from rock to rock, the command ultimately succeeded in getting through. On the right hand side of this pass there is a perpendicular cliff of some six hundred feet. On the left hand, after ten or twelve of perpendicular, there was a gradual slope to the top, on which any enemy could run down, fire a place, and then return. It is represented as being the most dangerous pass to a daring enemy that is known, and one where a few determined men could stop the advance of thousands. After going as far on the other side as was thought necessary, they turned to come back, and the main body retraced their steps with the same caution observed in effecting the first passage. But the rear-guard were not so lucky in getting through this time; for it appears after the lieutenant and sergeant got through, a large body of men, who stationed themselves on the perpendicular side, showered down stones from the top so fast and so heavy that their advance was completely cut off, and that they were wither killed, taken prisoner, or made their escape to the other side.

"It seems that Capt. May was not taken by the surprise, for he was continually urging vigilance, and left his best bugler in the rear to sound the alarm in case of accident, as though he anticipated an attack. A rumbling sound in the pass caused him to halt for the rear guard, but they not coming up when he thought it was time to reach him, he wheeled about and went in the direction of the pass at full speed. He shortly met the lieutenant and a sergeant and immediately demanded of him to halt for the rear guard, but they not coming up when he thought it was time to reach him, he wheeled about and went in the direction of the pass at full speed. He shortly met the lieutenant and a sergeant and immediately demanded of the former, ‘Where’re your men?’ The answer of the lieutenant was, ‘close at hand’, at the same time turning his head around as if with the expectation of seeing them just behind him. But there were none there save the sergeant, and the truth immediately flashed upon the commander that something was wrong with them. As quick as thought, and the nature of the path would permit, they dashed off for the pass, and when they reached it found that a large number of stones had been thrown, and discovered traces of blood along the debris. They followed up as fast as possible, but it was to no avail; they could make no further discoveries, nor learn anything of the fate of their companions. So they sorrowfully retraced their steps, and arrived here as noticed.

"I have given the above as truly as it was related to me, without omission or addition, and it is the received and acknowledged amount of the unfortunate affair. It may seem strange, and wanting in detail; but, as it involves several delicate points, I do not feel warranted in surmising what may have made out a good story. Capt. May has Lieutenant under arrest, and many blame him for being in advance of the guard when his post was in the rear of it. His traveling on without discovering that his command was absent, will readily be credited by any who is familiar with travel in a chaparral country, or in any narrow pass where two abroad cannot proceed. In coming through the pass, the men were necessarily fifteen to twenty feet apart;--their safety demanded this, and with the noise on the stones made by his horse’s own feet, and those of the sergeant’s horse, and this in coming down a declivity, it is not strange (at least to me) that he did not miss them; and as to him looking back to see them, that may have been out of the question, as it is natural to suppose he needed to constant use of his eyes to guide his horse over the rugged path.—Military discipline, no doubt, demanded his arrest, but censure should be reserved until the whole statement of the mishap is made known by some one who witnessed it.

"It is not thought that any regular soldiers of the Mexican army had a hand in this business. Rancheros and banditti, actuated by plunder than anything else, are believed to have cut them off, thinking probably that there was more value than what they obtained. In the hands of such men the fate of the prisoners are doubtful, though they would be perfectly safe in falling into the hands of an officer of the army. * * * * *

NNR47 February v71.359 February 6, 1847 Mexican view of the war

MEXICAN VIEW OF THE WAR—Santa Anna’s campaign for the war. A letter dated at the city of Mexico, on the 29th December, and published in the New Orleans Delta, thus speculates on the warlike movements and intentions of the government of Mexico:

“The newly elected President still remains at the head of the army at San Luis Potesi; and, according to what I understand, he will remain there with it whilst there is a necessity for sustaining a hostile position. The troops, notwithstanding the want of resources and comforts, are kept united; and as good Mexican soldiers, are enthusiastic and contented, even in the midst of the poverty which prevails among them. Santa Anna is probably the only Mexican general who knows how to behave with his troops, and keep the men always pleased and already to the good cause. Gomes Farias is as much disposed and determined to prosecute the war, cost what it may, as Santa Anna himself is. On this subject, I believe every Mexican, at present connected with the government, holds a little resolve.

“The plan of the campaign, if we may so style it, which Santa Anna has adopted, is an admirable cause, and perhaps the only one which may serve to punish the North Americans as they deserve. I, who am well acquainted with their character, and have been able to study well their inclinations during my residence in the United States, think the plan a feasible and practical one, and entitles the commander-in-chief of the Mexican forces to high praise. Here it is a few words.

“Every means of precaution will be taken in order to fortify well one point of the republic, with all the necessary reinforcements within a radius not very extended, but well traced, distracting in every possible manner the enemy, and calling his attention to insignificant movements. By these means, it is hoped that much precious time will be lost by the troops of the United States, and thus at the beginning of the summer, they will be scattered all about the country at different points, so that, at no single place, they may have a force as large as the central division of the Mexican army. Thus the advances into the country will cost the Americans a large sum of dollars, which will be touching them is a tender point.

“Besides the loss of time and the exorbitant expenses of the North Americans, which are three times as great as those of the Mexican army, the summer season will fall upon them unexpectedly, with its numerous diseases and epidemics, as perilous to the unacclimated [?]; and thus, without a single shot from the Mexican ranks, they will perish daily by hundreds, both men and beasts, who will not have the strength to resist out climate, and in a short time their regiments will be decimated. In that season of the year, when the native Mexican is better fitted for the war, the Mexican army will be able, by one bold and concentrated movement, to suddenly fall upon and tear to pieces the remnant of Taylor’s army. And in case the North Americans should wish to retire, their retreat will prove as fatal to them as any death-bearing epidemic, for they would find no resources on the line of their retreat, and will be exposed to attack from roving bands of highway men and bandits, which the miseries of war are calculated to increase.

“This is, in brief, the please which, according to information gathered from several persons, whom I believe to be well acquainted with such affairs, I have been able to trace out. But I must remark that the whole complot is not divulged. It is said that Santa Anna will not leave San Luis Potesi, although some movements and apparent marches will be practiced, so that the enemy may believe that he is about to leave. Every necessary precaution has been taken, and all means are daily used, to collect at San Luis Potesi all possible provisions and munitions of war. It is believed that the North Americans are determined to leave Saltillo and Tampico. They will come towards San Luis, and there fight the great decisive battle, as Santa Anna will not leave that city, and will keep there constantly about 25,000 men.

“There are, at present, in a distance of about one hundred and 50 miles or less, nearly 45,000 men of all arms, and it is expected to raise, during the month of January, about 8,000 more of infantry and cavalry. A considerable amount of troops are stationed at proper points to cut off the North Americans as their retreat, in case they should come so far as San Luis where they will not be able to sustain the resistance of the Mexicans.” [M.L.]

NNR47 February v71.360 February 6, 1847 Rumor of Mexican offer for peace

MEXICAN PROPOSITION FOR PEACE— An American minister asked for—Letter from Santa Anna to General Worth.—We learn from Washington that the rumor prevailing at Tampico from the last dates, to the effect that the Mexican congress, has agreed to receive an American minister to treat for peace, and had sent a messenger to Gen. Taylor to that effect, is believed to be well founded in that city. The following letter from our correspondent at Saltillo, also shows that the same rumor, in a pretty strong form, has reached that place;--

Dear Sirs: Since I closed my letter to you yesterday, another batch of news has arrived here from San Lula de Potesi, which, if true, is certainly important. I believe it can be relied or correct, coming, as it does, very straight. The Mexican congress has agreed to accept a minister from the United States to treat for peace! Some say, however, they are only disposed to receive one, whilst again it is confidently asserted that they have agreed to make peace at all hazards.

General Worth received yesterday, through a courier, from Gen. Santa Anna, a letter which is said to be of a very pacific character. An individual in Saltillo who says he has seen the bill passed by the Mexican congress, authorizing the appointment of a commissioner, to meet one from us, to treat for peace; and that he saw it distributed in the form of a hand bill, and posted up in the city of Mexico and at San Lois de Potesi. Report says there is a copy in this place at this time. From the confidences with which some of my Mexican friends speak of the matter, I am myself disposed to believe it true—should it turn out so it will be a great cause for rejoicing, no doubt, throughout the United States as well as Mexico, and prove most acceptable in the army.
Santa Anna is still at San Lois de Potesi, and I believe now, without an intention of advancing. His army there is represented to be inactive—this is a good omen.

FROM THE ARMY. Late letters have just been received at Washington from the army, down to the 7th of January, from Victoria, in Mexico. They state that Brigadier Gen. Quitman had, on the 29th December, occupied the city of Victoria, the capital of the state Tamaulipas. The enemy had a body of some 1,500 cavalry in the town with its advanced picket at Santa Eugracie; but it fell back as General Quitman approached, and as understood to be now at Juanmare, in the direction of Tula. At Tula, there is a strong division of observation under the command of Gen. Valencia.

An examination of the mountain pass leading to Tula, shows that it is entire impracticable for artillery or wagons. Such is also believed to be the character of the Santa Barbara pass, which opens in the direction of Tampico.

General Taylor arrived with the division of Brig. Gen. Twiggs on the 4th of January, and was joined on the same day by the force which Gen. Patterson conducted at Metamoros. The force then collected at Victoria is more than 5,000 strong, in excellent health, and in capital condition for the service.

It was there unofficially know that Gen. Scott was there in the country under orders from the government. Gen. Taylor would probably remain at Victoria until he should hear from Gen. Scott, and determines what disposition to make of the troops.

The reconnaissance of the mountain passes leading to Labradores was completely successful, so far as to regret to learn that on the return of the party to Lennerve [?], the effort was attached to a difficult pass of the mountain, and the baggage and the men of the rear guard cut off. It is yet hoped that the rear guard has effected their escape and may yet regain the army. The officer and non-commissioned officer of the rear guard are in arrest, and the former under charges. No blame can possibly attach to Lieut. Colonel May who commanded the escort for this unfortunate occurrence.

Newspapers have been received from the city of Mexico to the 19th of December, at which state the congress had taken no action in regard to the war or the shooting of the president. The country seems to be (says one of the letters) in a very distracted condition, and the tone of the public press more desponding than heretofore.

A letter has also been received from Tampico, stating that the writer has just arrived from Tamaulipes, where he left General Taylor, General Patterson, General Pillow, and General Quitman, with the various commands, amounting to six thousand men. He had a very hazardous and fatiguing trip from Victoria to Tampico, and had to pass the line of the Mexican cavalry twice on the road. He reports a large force of the Mexicans at Tula (between which and Victoria there is an almost impossible range of mountains,) under the command of General Valencia, Urrea, Fernandez, Romero, Lorbarre, and Monta Negro amounting to eight thousand men.

JURY TRIAL IN CALIFORNIA.—The first jury ever summoned in California was empanelled in the Alcaldo’s court at Monterey on the 4th of September last. It was for the trial of a case in which Isaac Graham was the plaintiff and No Carlos Rouissillion defendant. The jury was composed of Mexican and Americans—about “half and half” we infer from the names—a Mexican being foreman. The defendant was indicted for fraudulently shipping of lumber, the property of the plaintiff. Mr. Colton presided and heard testimony for several hours. The jury acquitted the defendant of felonious intent, but found a balance due plaintiff of $65, but on the defendant had before offered to this without suit, the plaintiff was ordered to pay the costs. The verdict gave satisfaction, and the plaintiff published a card exonerating the defendant from suspicions of unfairness.

The New York Gazette, on inserting the above, adds, “if things continue to be thus conducted in California, the Stevensons adventurers will have to carry themselves pretty straight, when they arrive in that land of law and order.”

A letter from the Rev. Mr. Colton says, “that 3,000 emigrates from the United States, it is understood, have just arrived at San Francisco in two companies, one commanded by Capt. Hastings and the other is commanded by Capt. P. Russell and 10,000 are on their way.
were troops of Castro, marching to attack Captain Freemont, then encamped at the junction of the Feather river and the Sacramento. The foreign residents hastily assembled and marched to the relief of Freemont; a party overtook the Lieutenant and captured the horses, dismissing the officer and his party; and this was the first overt set of the revolution. It was followed by the capture of the Iowa of Sonoma without resistance, the captors being only thirty-three in number. At Sonoma a Mexican general and three other officers were made prisoners.

In the same number is a notice from Capt. Mervince, commander of the United States forces in Monterey, offering a reward of $50 for the apprehension of William Parker, a deserter. Also a notice from Mr. Alcaldo Colton, prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor, on penalty of fine and imprisonment, and forfeiture. Shopkeepers and keepers of public houses are forbidden to have liquors or wines in their possessions.

In the paper of September 5, the history of the revolt is continued, some details being given of the capture of the Sonomas. The conduct of the captors is described as generous in the extreme, not a dollar's worth of private property having been taken, or any set of violence committed.

This number contain the various proclamations of Commodore Stockton which have appeared in our columns.

The following ostraet [?] is given from a letter to the editors written by Lieut. W.A. Bartlett:

“There is regular express mail from the headquarters of the Northern military district at Yerba Buena in Sonoma and New Helvetia (Sutter's fort) leaving every Wednesday morning and returning from Sonoma as soon as the river mail arrives.”

Also constant communication from headquarters at Yerba Buena to Salsalito, San Rafael, San Peribo, Corito, and other posts on the opposite coast.
Mexican privateering. - The Mexican attempt to enlist adventurers in the West Indies, and particularly at Cuba, in privateering was as to the latter promptly met by the authorities of that island. New reports however are in circulation, and it is asserted that several "long low sharp built clippers" are actually fitting out, for some purposes. Instead of attempting to operate in the neighboring seas, it is intimated that they will proceed to remote places - the Pacific - the Chinese and Indian seas - even the . . . [missing] [AKS]

THE ARMY OF THE CENTRE

ARMY OF THE NORTH

Santa Fe, Nov. 29, 1846

About 400 of the Mormon troops left this place for California, under the command of Colonel Cook, on Sunday, the 18th. The residue amounting to about 100 men and 23 women, were sent back to Fort Pueblo, on the Arkansas, by order of Colonel Doniphan, as the inclemency of the season rendered it impractical for them all to complete their march to the Pacific this winter. The Mormon battalion is composed of 5 companies, and numbers 500 men, 25 women for laundresses, and some boys and girls.—They are well drilled troops, and were apparently in good condition when they arrived here, and also when they commenced their march for California.

This 1st regiment will march against the Navahos forthwith. The 1st battalion is already on the march. Captain Morin's company from Platte is ordered to proceed against the Apache Indians on the headwaters of the Rio Mora. They are said to have killed one of the men and driven off some stock. The Indians are much more troublesome than the Mexicans. They sally forth from the gorges of the mountains and commit murder, and so soon as an armed force is sent against them, they fly back to their inaccessible retreats and lurking places. [MLL]

The arrival of the steamship McKim, at New Orleans furnished Brazos dates to the 24th and Galveston to the 29th of January. The steamer Alabama subsequently brought Brazos to the 31st.

General Worth with his command, arrived at Brazos on the 23rd by way of Camargo. The Galveston News says that Gen. Scott and Gen. Worth are to have command of the main and regular army which is now concentrating at Tampico, or at some place in the neighborhood. The new recruits have their place of rendezvous at the new island of Lobos about 60 miles south of Tampico. The opinion is almost universal that a movement is now to be made against Vera Cruz. It is understood that that place is to be invested both by land and water.

Col. Harney with five companions of the 2nd dragoons, was expected in Metamoros, Col. Duncan arrives at Matamoros and Col. Harney to be court-martialed and

The Galveston News says: "Col. Harney is again in limbo. It appears he was ordered to proceed to Monterey with four companies, while Major Torrens of the regiment was ordered to take command of the remaining six companies and march for the south of the river to join Worth's division.

Col. Harney said he was not to be disgraced, though they might arrest him, and he accordingly marched with the largest portion of his regiment.

A court martial is ordered to convene for the trial of Col. Harney, on the 30th instant. It is generally believed that Col. Harney will plead guilty of the charge and leave it for the court to decide the offence.

Gen. Taylor has returned from Victoria to Monterey with a small escort. He is to remain at the latter place in command of the volunteers. His orders to this effect proceed from Gen. Scott, who now holds the chief command.
The vessels with the 1st regiment Pennsylvania volunteers on board have arrived off the Brazos—all well. [MLL]

NNR47February v71.369 February 13, 1847 Gen. John Ellis Wool encamped with 3,000 men south of Saltillo and Lt. Phillip Kearney at Matamoros, &c. and Mexican troops posted for defense of Chihuahua and the hospitality of Mexican ladies at Parras and Gen. Wool to abandon Parras, Saltillo, and Riconada Pass to the Mexicans and Gen. Taylor...taking command of the volunteers and Mexican force said to be posted at San Rosalia under late governor of Chihuahua

The Matamoros Flag of the 24th of January, announcing the arrival there of Gen. Worth’s division says:

"It is composed of the fourth infantry, under Col. Whistler; fifth infantry under Major Martin Scott; eighth infantry, Major Wright; second dragoons, Colonel Harney; Col. Child’s artillery battalion; Lieutenant P. Kearny’s company of dragoons, and Capt. Blanchard’s company of Louisiana volunteers, the latter setting with the fifth infantry.

The whole command appear to be in fine health and spirits, and the horses in excellent condition—in fact, a more hardy and efficient body of men than this command, cannot be produced in any country, and we look forward with much interest to their future operations, being satisfied they ‘go where glory waits them.’"

General Butler was at Saltillo, on the 17th, when Worth’s division left, but it was understood that he would fall back on Monterey with his troops. Gen. Wool was still at Parras, but it is said that he will also march for Monterey—thus abandoning Saltillo, Parras, and Riconada Pass to the possession of the enemy. This step is to be taken on account of the indefensible state of these places with their diminished forces. The severity of the climate and the scarcity of wool, forage, &c. combine to render them unpleasant quarters for this season of the year.

General Taylor has established his headquarters at Monterey and the place is being put in such a state of defense that all the troops of Mexico, with Santa Anna at their head, will not be able to disturb him.

We suppose that General Taylor will be left in command of all the forces above, while the invading army of General Scott, consisting now of almost all of the regulars now in Mexico, some seven thousand strong, and nearly twice that of the number of volunteers, will set in conjunction with the navy in attacking Vera Cruz.

There are two companies of dragoons with Gen’l. Taylor—Colonel May’s and Capt. Graham’s—Captains Washington and Webster batteries are at Saltillo, and one company of artillery at Camargo, which comprise nearly all the regulars above.—At Camargo, are the second Ohio volunteers, and a few others are stationed at Punta Aguda and Cerralvo, comprising nearly all the forces from between this and Monterey.

The Ohioans are under orders for Tampico, leaving the third Indiana regiment at this place, with a company of two regulars in Fort Brown.

The last previous accounts left Gen. Wool in command at Saltillo or in the neighborhood retaining his original force, 3,000 men. He was encamped on an elevated and commanding position 10 miles to the south of Saltillo on the road to San Luis Potosi called Buena Vista, and Gen. Wool, with a battery of twelve pieces of ordnance, commands the only possible route to and from San Luis. Col. Hardin and his regiment from Illinois—a part of Gen. Wool’s command—are spoken of in the highest terms. In fact, the whole of Gen. Wool’s army is represented as composed of excellent troops.

The country from Reynosa to Camargo and Mier, and through to Monterey, is filled with marauding Mexicans, robbing and murdering whenever they care to do so with impunity.

The kindness and hospitality of the Mexican ladies at Parras are highly eulogized. At the same time as Gen. Wool’s departure from that place where they were 13 invalid soldiers, too much worn by sickness to accompany the army. On this occasion some fifty or sixty Mexican ladies, favorably to the American cause, visited the hospital, everyone of whom sought it as a favor she might be permitted to take home one of those suffering soldiers, where she might be able to nurse and restore to health.

Another similar case is given of the two daughters of Don Lorenzo Yarto, a citizen of Parras, who took a sick soldier in their charge, and for several days in succession they kept a constant watch over him, the one sitting by his bedside by day and the other performing the same service at night.

A Mr. Daing, who has been engaged in the wine trade between Parras and Chihuahua, recently returned from the latter city, and reports that Gen. Cuitly, late governor of Chihuahua, was posted at San Rosalia as early as the 10th of December, with a force of 2,000 citizen soldiers or rancheros, with a view to intercept Gen. Wool, who was expected to march upon Chihuahua from Monclova. [MLL]

The Mexican congress on the 9th, after a stormy session, approved the first section of a bill authorizing the government of Mexico to raise $15,000,000 by the hypothecation or sale of certain goods of the Church. Santa Anna opposes this, and it is rumored that his opposition so exasperated his soldiers that they had shot him! Our correspondent says that this report requires confirmation, but there are still many circumstances which still render it not impossible such has been the fate of Santa Anna. The army was in great distress.

"The passage of the above law has certainly created the greatest excitement in Mexico. The churches are closed, and every indication of mourning and of resistance has been envied by those who support the religious establishments. The Mexican congress and the Mexican press everywhere, appear to be thoroughly aroused. The issue they make is "Ser o no ser"—to be or not to be:

Mr. Rogers was still in confinement in Vera Cruz, but was well treated.

On the day Loredo left, the U.S. steamer Princeton went into Vera Cruz, with Lieut. Raines on board of bearer of dispatches, and sixteen Mexican prisoners who had been taken at the mouth of the Rio Grande.

The frigate Raritan was lying at Anton Lizardo; the rest of the U.S. squadron were at Sacrificious."

The latter arrivals at New Orleans furnish no confirmation of the above report of Santa Anna being shot. [MLL]

Resolved. That the General Assembly of Maryland record with melancholy pleasure their profound sensibility of the loss which this state has sustained in the death of Col. Truman Cruise, of Major Samuel Reingold, of Col. William H. Walton, of Major William Lear, of Capt. Randolph Ridgley, of Passed Midshipman John Ringgold, his son, and her other brave sons who have fallen over in conflict with Mexico: and that while as Americans we cordially unite in national tribute of admiration so justly and enthusiastically paid to their memory; yet as Marylanders we feel entitled to cherish with particular pride the honor which from the ashes of the dead have been gathered to her name.
Resolved. That in thus expressing our profound respect for the memory of the dead, we should do violence to feeling and to justice, were we mindful of those whose swords, though entwined with cypress, have yet won for them a need of glory such as reflects the name of Maryland, and stands a proud trophy of intrepid valor, the cool discipline, and the uniting ardor of the gallant men—regulars and volunteers—who followed their bold leaders to desperate and brilliant victories.

Resolve. That this general assembly take great pride in commending the gallantry of the Maryland battalion, and in returning their thanks to them for the aid they have contributed to the brilliant victory of Monterey, exhorts them by the glamorous recollections which cloister around the name "the old Maryland line" to believe that the ancient renown of Maryland is committed to their keeping, and that their fellow citizens at home look to them with undoubting confidence to preserve that renown untarnished.

Further resolved. That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the commanding officer of the Maryland battalion, to be by him read to the officers and men as a slight token of that high respect and pride with which their fellow citizens of Maryland regard their indomitable gallantry and courage. THE REVENUE BILL

Mr. McKerr, from the committee of ways and means, on the 17th, reported a bill to modify the existing TARIFF,—and graduate the price of PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill proposes a duty of TWENTY PER CENT on tea and coffee.

TEN PER CENT on loaf and other refined sugars—on coal, bar iron, manufactured by rolling, or pig iron, round iron, as brazier rods of 3.16 to 10.16 of an inch in diameter, inclusive; nail and spike rods, slit, rolled or hammered sheet iron, hoop iron, branded scroll iron, easement rod, slit, rolled, or hammered, wood screws of iron, spikes, out or wrought, and white and red lead.

FIVE PER CENT on manufacturers of cotton if dyed, colored, printed, or stained, exceeding in value of 30 cents per square yard; and manufactures of cotton not dyed, colored, printed, or stained, exceeding in value of 20 cents per square yard.

These duties to close two years after the conclusion of a peace with Mexico. [MLL]

OFFICIAL PAPERS AND LETTERS

From the Washington Union of the 10th

Victoria, Tamoulipas, Mexico, Jan. 6, 1845

Dear Sirs,

After much speculation and no little misrepresentation about the capitulation of Monterey, I perceive by our recent newspapers, that a discussion has arisen as to who is responsible for that transaction. As one of the commissioners who were entrusted by Gen'l. Taylor with the arrangement of the terms upon which the city of Monterey and its fortifications should be delivered to our forces, I have had frequent reasons to recur to the course then adopted, and the considerations that led to it. My judgement after the fact has fully sustained my decisions at the date of the occurrence; and feeling myself responsible for the instrument as we prepared and presented it to our commanding general, I have the satisfaction, after all subsequent events, to believe that the terms we offered were expedient and honorable, and wise. A distinguished gentleman with whom I was seated with on that commission, Governor Henderson, says, in a recently published letters, "I did not at the same time, nor do I still like the terms, but acted as one of the commissioners, together with General Worth and Colonel Davis, to carry out General Taylor’s instructions. We ought to and could have made them surrender at discretion,” &c.&c.

From each position taken in the above paragraph I dissent. The instructions given by General Taylor only presented his object, and fixed a limit to the powers of his commissioners; hence, when points were raised which exceeded our discretion, they were referred to by the commander; but minor points were seated on, and finally submitted as a part of our negotiation. We fixed the time within which the Mexican forces should retire from Monterey. We agreed upon the time we would wait for the decision of the respective governments, which I recollect was less by thirty-four days the Mexican commissioners asked—the period adopted being that, which according to our estimate, was required to bring up the rear of our army with the ordnance and supplies necessary for further applications.
I did not then, nor do I now, believe we could have made the enemy surrender at discretion. Had I entertained the opinion it would have been given to the commissioners, and to the commanding general, and would have precluded me from signing an agreement that would have permitted the garrison to retire with the honors of war. It is demonstrable, from the position and known prowess of the two armies, that we could drive the enemy from the town; but the town was untenable whilst the main fort (called now the citadel) remained in the hands of the enemy. Being without siege artillery or entrenching tools, we could only hope to carry this fort by storm, after heavy loss from our army; which, isolated in a hostile country, now numbered less than half the forces of the enemy. When all this had been achieved, what more would we have gained than by the capitulation?

General Taylor's force was too small to invest the town. It was, therefore, always in the power of the enemy to retreat, bearing his light arms. Our army, poorly provided, and with very insufficient transportation—could not have overtaken, if they had pursued the flying enemy. Hence, the conclusion that, as it was not in our power to capture the main body of the Mexican army, it is unreasonable to suppose their general would have surrendered at discretion. The moral effect of retiring under the capitulation was certainly greater than if the enemy had retreated without our consent. By this course was secured the large supply of ammunition he had collected in Monterey—which, had the assault been continued, must have been exploded by our shells, as it was principally stored in "the Cathedral," which, being supposed to be filled with troops was the special sum of our pierces. The destruction, which this explosion would have produced, must have involved the advance of both divisions of our troops; and I commend this to the contemplation of those whose arguments have been drawn from facts learned since the commissioners closed their negotiations. With these introductory remarks, I send a copy of manuscript in my possession, which was prepared to meet such necessity as now exists for an explanation, to justify the commanding general, should misrepresentation and cautiously attempt to tarnish his well earned reputation, and, for all time to come, to fix the truth of the transaction. Please publish this in your paper, and believe me as your friend, &c.

NNR47February v71.400 Finances

FINANCES—Hardly any direct opposition was made to passing the bill for raising additional army. All the debate was upon the details of the bill.

And so also in regard to the financial resources which so promptly passed both houses a week before, as to the grant of authority to obtain the money, hardly an objection was made,—though much difference of opinion existed as to the most eligible means of obtaining it.

The money required my the government for immediate emergencies, has been procured by the secretary of the treasury, by selling treasury notes authorized under the net to the amount of four million dollars—most of it to New Orleans banks and operators. These notes are to bear an interest of six percent and sold at par. The N.Y. Journal of Commerce says:

"The Treasury note operation while it was a good one for the government, was a good one also for the contractors. They sold out a million in this market at two percent advance, and could get two or two and one half percent profit on the whole, making a net three thousand dollar profit without using a dollar of the capital."

This arrangement having been effected, the secretary of the treasury immediately advertised to receive proposals for a loan under the recent act. The advantageous position of our foreign exchangers, superinduced by the unprecedented quality and high prices of our provisions shipping to Europe, affords fortuitous opportunity to obtain the loan upon good terms, provided laws be passed to sustain the national revenue for the payment of the interest.

That additional sentiments to secure this object is indispensable is manifest from the official statement of receipts and expenditures of the quarter ending the 30th of December last, inserted in our last number. The receipts from customs, the same of public lands, all the regular revenue resources for the quarter amounted to an average of only sixteen million per annum, whilst the expenditure for the same period averaged a rate of over forty-eight million per annum.

The quarter may not be a fair one to average by, but the disparity between the receipts and the expenditures, is of too serious an amount.

Heavy complaints are made in the New York Courier and Enquirer and in some others of the journals, of the secretary of treasury having adopted means for obtaining the five millions loan a few months since, as well as effecting the sale of the treasury notes last week, which were not justifiable in a high officer of the government. We merely the complaints, without knowing whether they will be founded or not.

A FURTHER LOAN ANTICIPATED—Some of the last New York papers anticipate an application from the executive for authorities to raise still another loan, for carrying on the war with Mexico. They say that when the estimates were made upon the application for the loan and treasury note bill of twenty-eight millions which was passed last week, was sent to congress, the expenses incident to the additional army since authorized, and the additional bounty to the soldiers were not included, and that ten millions will be asked for, to cover the items of additional expenditure. They signify also that the line following the paragraph in the message sent by the president to congress on Saturday last (inserted in this number) has reference to such additional loss.

"The increased revenues which the measure now recommended would produce, would moreover enable the government to negotiate a loan for any additional sum which may be found to be needed, with more facility and at cheaper rates, than can be done without them." [MLL]

NNR47February v71.400 Contending proposals for the conduct of the war

THE THREE MILLION DOLLAR BILL

The house of representatives in the meantime have been discussing a bill of still more intricate and exceeding character, and which not only has reference to how the war is to be conducted or concluded, but what disposition is to be made of the acquired territory, if territory be acquired by the terms of a peace.

On this point hangs the delicate question, of adding additional territory to the Union, with or without allowing slavery to exist if the territory is acquired.

The administration party appeared to be divided upon the question beyond any present proposal of reconciliation. The "Wilmot Proviso" has been attached to the bill by majority in the House of Representatives, stipulating against the admission of any more territory, unless slavery be excluded therefrom. In this form the bill passed the house and is now before the senate.

Even if it were to pass the senate in that form, it is certain that the president would not sign the bill.

This part of the executive project for terminating the war, would appear therefore hopeless.

Indeed, to our apprehension, the probability of a termination of the war, under any circumstances, seems to be very remote. The country is at war—the constitution provides that congress "may declare war"—and it can be done by a majority of each house so deciding. We have seen sufficient to convince us that the Executive may so order the operations of the army and navy as at any time to make a war inevitable,—and that virtually, he has it in his power to place the country in a state of war. But to make peace under our constitution is rather a more difficult process. After the enemy, whoever they may be, shall consent to treat, the executive had the entire control of the initiative proposition to congress. The President must be satisfied in the first place, so far as least, as that he would finally approve of the conditions of the treaty. Having no doubt at this time, if he had not at the origin of the war, a definite object in view in relation to Mexican territory, it is not probable that he will originate any negotiation that does not correspond with that object.

But supposing Mexico to be, by some means,—the force of arms—or the influences of three millions of secret service money proposed in the bill to be placed at the disposition of the executive—suppose Mexico by either or both those influences to be brought to the terms which our executive may demand—and a treaty to be negotiated and submitted to the senate for ratification. Would two thirds of the senate be found to advise the ratification of such a treaty, without the stipulation that the territory acquired by the treaty would be excluded?

It is believed that two thirds of the Senate would not ratify the treaty without, not with, such a stipulation.

The slave states and the free states are at issue so radically on the subject, that the prospect of any adjustment of the difficulty appears very gloomy.

It may be said, perhaps, that we are anticipating a difficulty which may never be realized. True.—Before the difficulty can be realized, Mexico must consent to treat for a relinquishment of territory which to this time her government and her people appear determined not to entertain a thought of submitting to. Yet although a discussion of the origin of the war, has been but incidentally entertained in congress, the period seems now to have arrived when the objects intended to be obtained by the war, should distinctly ascertained and sanctioned by congress.

The people of the United States will hardly be satisfied to be carrying on a war, at heavy expense of both man and money, the objects of which war they are not fully approve of. It is the duty of their representatives in congress, as well of the executive, to let them understand the true position of the question.

Mr. Calhoun, yesterday, the 19th, submitted to the senate, resolutions counter to the "Wilmot Proviso" incorporated in the house "three million bill" which resolution he signed his intention to call up for consideration on Monday next. A keen pass between him and Colonel Benton took place on his introducing the resolution.

Suppose a treaty made—whether coerced or bought—which the Mexican people and the Mexican army disapprove, how long would those who conclude such a treaty remain in power in Mexico—how long would the treaty endure? [MLL]
The war is rapidly assuming a most horrible guerrilla aspect, at which humanity cannot but shudder. [AKS]

Brazos Santiago, dates t the 5th instant, received at New Orleans, acquaint us that General Scott was still there, about to embark for Tampico or the Island of Lobos, preparatory to the attack upon Vera Cruz. A letter of the 4th says: "Several vessels with troops and stores, munitions of war, &c. have sailed already. General Scott and staff, will go in a few days, and other troops in transports, with necessaries, will follow as soon as possible. The regular troops, under the command of General Worth, are still encamped on the Rio Grande, but will all be here in a short time. They will come in detachments, so that they can embark conveniently. It is now well understood that the expedition is to rendezvous at the Island of Lobos, a short distance north of Vera Cruz. Between the island and mainland there is an harbour or roadstead, where the vessels can lie in safety. The shore, it is said, is bold, and there is water enough to enable the armed vessels to get sufficiently near to protect the landing of the troops. The island is represented as nearly barren, but will be occupied as a depot and encampment. The troops will be landed in boats, some ten or twelve miles from town, and a combined attack by land and water made on it, and the castle of San Juan in the harbour.

"The preparations for the expedition are on a grand scale, and if the elements are favorable, it must succeed. But it is well known, this and--the next month are always boisterous on this coast; and men cannot control the winds and waves. Our land force will be about 15,000 strong and our squadron be able to bring about 300 guns to bear on the fortifications." [LA]

The court martial which tried Col. Harney on the charge of disobedience of orders, sentenced him to be reprimanded. Gen. Scott remitted the sentence, and ordered him to the discharge of the duties for the neglect of which he had been tried. [LA]

A few days ago, an officer of the Ohio regiment, Lieut. Miller is believed to be his name, was murdered, at Chichironi, and awfully mutilated. His heart was cut out and hung upon a shrub, to show us, I suppose, how deeply seated was their hatred towards us. [AKS]

Fate of Lieut. Ritchie U. S. A. Lieutenant R. Belonging to the 4th infantry, but acting with the 2nd dragoons, was started about the 11th ult., with important despatches from General Scott and other officers, to General Taylor then at or on his route to or from Victoria. The despatches were supposed to contain a plan of the campaign about to commence, as well as orders to General Taylor and other commanders. The Lieut. Had ten men to accompany him. They reached Monterey in safety, spent a night and next evening at La Grande, a small village 23 miles on the road, Lieut. R. Whilst occupied in procuring something for the party and their horses, to eat, in company with an English resident of the place; crossing the plaza, a Mexican on horseback, whirled past, threw his lasso over Lieut. Ritchie, and dashed off with a prize at full speed. A mile or two from the place the lieutenant's body was afterwards found, stripped and dreadfully lacerated. His despatches were in the hands of the Mexican. The men of the detachment reached Victoria in safety. If we mistake not, Lit. Ritchie, was of Ohio. [AKS]

Major Borland, of the Army cavalry with 40 men, and Major Gaines and Capt. Cassius M. Clay, with 30 men, surprised and made prisoners. The following letter from Captain Chapman of the army, reached General Worth last evening.

Saltillo, January 25, 1847

I have only time to write a word. Maj. Borland, of the Arkansas cavalry, with 50 men, and Major Gaines and Captain M. Clay, with 30 men, were surprised and captured at Encarnacion (about 45 miles beyond Saltillo) on the morning of the 23rd, by General Minion. He heard that Borland was there, and marched from Matchuala with 500 cavalry and taking them without firing a gun. This is no stampede.

Yours Truly,

W.W. Chapman

The above is all that has reached us on the subject, in fact, it is clear enough. Between 80 and 90 of our men have been taken prisoners, and undoubtedly at San Luis Potesi ere this. The hatred of the Mexicans is so inveterate, however, against our volunteers, that fears are entertained for the safety of the prisoners. [MLL]

NRR47February v71.401 February 27, 1847 Battle at El Paso

A BATTLE AT EL PASO—ANOTHER VICTORY—We have been exceedingly anxious to learn something from the detachments which left Santa Fe for Chihuahua. The only news received, is from papers from the city of Mexico, of the 26th, which we find thus condensed by the National Intelligence.

On the 25th of December Senior Cuylti was at El Paso at the head of 480 regulars, who added to the Pasenos, of troops retired near El Paso, exceeding 1,000 in number. The Americans were at Dona Ana, 300 strong. They advanced upon El Paso. Cuylti prepared to fight them, but the evening he was to set forth on his march he was seized with brain fever which rendered him helpless. The command devolved upon Vidal, who possessed little military skill, and expected to surround and destroy the Americans like so many rabbits. He pushed forward 500 cavalry under Captain Antonia Ponee, of which one half were Rancheros. The Americans demanded a parley, which was denied, and fight immediately commenced. Ponee charged at the head of the cavalry, but in vain, as he was wounded in the first onset. Just then the Pasenos ran; and threw such disorder into the whole, that all took to flight, leaving a howitzer (?) in the hands of the Americans, but carrying off three other pieces. Vidal returned with all speed to Carrizal, forty leagues from El Paso. The loss on each side was not known, nor was it stated. On the 27th the Americans took possession of El Paso with 600 cavalry and 400 infantry. The cavalry immediately started in pursuit of the runaways and although it was not known at Chihuahua, on the 21st of January that they had overtaken them; it was thought likely they would get possession of two wagons which were in the rear with the park, as well as of thirty men who escorted them. This seems probably to us, too; thought we much doubt if the Americans ever got up with the runaways. [MLL]

NRR47February v71.401 2/27/1847 loss of the transport ship Ondiaka and incidents connected therewith

LOSS OF THE TRANSPORT SHIP ONDIKA, WITH TROOPS ON BOARD. This fine ship got away from the Balize about the 20th ult., with four companies of the Louisiana regiments of volunteers, viz: Company E, Capt. Preg; company F, Capt. Hunt; company G, Capt. Pope; and company K, Capt. Lewis. They were under the immediate command of Col. DeRussy, and exceeded three hundred in number. The Ondiaka touched at the Brazos and sailed thence on the 25th ult. She was off the bar of Tampico on the 28th, and the next we hear of her is her total loss. It must have happened about the 1st inst. and near to the Island of Lobos. [AKS]

The first rumor was, that all troops on board and crew, got safely on shore, but were taken prisoners as they landed.

The next account was, that they succeeded in landing with their arms and a week’s provisions, erected a temporary defence, and dept the Mexicans at bay.

Rumor was now kept busy enough; we omit most of the sotries

Upon hearing of the disaster, at Tampico, the steamer Undine, was dispatched, with company H, of 3d artillery on board, to look after the wreck and the troops on shore.

Rumor reached Tampico by a pilot boat, that this company of artillery had been surprised and cut off by a body of 800 Mexicans.

Tampico, Feb. 6, 1847. Last night the town was rife with rumors of the caputure of the wrecked Louisianians, by la large Mexican force. The captain of a schooner had been sent to the wreck, and he returned yesterday, reported that he could not get to it, and that a Mexican force had surrounded and captured Col. De Russy and his command. At first little credit was attached to the report, but at a later hour in the night, there was a sort of change in the unbelievers. Lieut. Miller, who had been sent down to their assistance was looked for during the day, and his non-arrival, coupled with the report of the captain, caused much uneasiness, and at eleven o’clock, a command of men was hurried off for the wreck, who took with them two piece of artillery. - This evening and to-morrow morning we will probably know the truth. [LA]
ARMY JOURNAL

The Pensacola Gazette, of Feb. 7th, reports that the garrison at Fort Barancas, in that harbor, has been removed, having sailed under orders to Sacrificios. It was commanded by Capt. Winder, of the 1st artillery, with whom were two subalter officers, Lieutenants Grafton and Seymour, also of the 1st artillery. [MLL]

71.402 2/27/1847 particulars of the capture of Laguna

Gulf Squadron. - Arrival of General La Vega at Vera Cruz.- American Prisoners released. - In the account given of the arrival of the United States steam ship Mississippi, Com Perry, at Norfolk, it was stated that that vessel had captured a Campeachy schooner (Amalio) and sent her into New Orleans as a prize.

The captshipmen Barbour, of the Mississippi, and a prize crew.

The full particulars of the taking of Laguna are given. The place was yielded without resistance. Fifteen cannon were destroyed, some 800 lbs. Of powder taken, and fifty soldiers disarmed, although the latter affected to be favorably disposed to the cause of the Campechians , who had declared themselves entirely independent of Mexico, and had sent their commissioners on the schooner Sisalmo to Com. Conner, at Anton Lizardo, to request him to desist from any hostile measures against Yucatan , until commissioners could be sent to the government of the United States to obtain the recognition of the independence of the State. These commissioners left Anton Lizardo on the 20th, to return, but the result of their conference with Com. Conner is unknown.

We mentioned, a few days since, that a boat from the John Adams had made a thorough night examination of the castle of San Juan de Ulna. The officer who had charge of the boat, as we learn from N. Orleans Mercury, was passed midshipman Fitzgerald. He had eight men in his boat, with muted oars, and in the darkness of the night rowed around and around the castle, went under the drawbridge, entered the water battery, and made a thorough reconnaissance in every part. This gallant exploit has proved that men may be landed from the boats at night, and that the water batteries may easily be taken.

Com. Perry, on his return to Anton Lizardo from Laguna, looked in at Alvarado and Tobasco, and found that the fortifications of both places have been repaired and much strengthened since they were attacked by the squadron. At Tobasco there were about three thousand troops, and at Alvarado about four thousand. Notwithstanding, these formidable preparations, the general impression is that Com. Conner will soon attack these places.

On the arrival of Gen. La Vega at Vera Cruz on the 15th, all the prisoners from the squadron in the hands of the enemy were released. It is now ascertained that but eleven of the crew of the Somers had drifted to the main land when she had wrecked, and not sixteen as was first stated. Midshipman Rogers was at Vera Cruz. He had been tried by the civil and military tribunals as a spy, and had been acquitted by the former, but found guilty by the latter. It was believed, however, that the more favorable verdict would prevail, and that he would be liberated. [AKS]

MEXICO. A letter dated U.S. squadron off Anton Lizardo Feb. 2, 1847, represents the condition of affairs at the Mexican capital as in the last degree of disorder. The members of the cabinet one after another are compelled by difficulties to resign from their stations. Only one it is said was officiating—and his resignation is subsequently announced though appointed but the week before. Gomes Farias, the vice president, was exerting his authority manfully, but against odds which he cannot long maintain. The church party openly preaches rebellion, and has everywhere so stoutly resisted the act of congress levying upon their property, that the law is totally inoperative. All other means resorted in for raising money to carry on the war which has proved abortive. [MLL]

Intelligence has at length reached us from Santa Fe, from which all our readers are by this time anxious for information. We give them at full, as we find them in the St. Louis Republican, from their correspondents.

From these accounts, we infer that the battle which took place at El Paso, of which we gave a brief account in our last, derived from the city of Mexico, must have been fought by Capt. Cook, who is here reported to have been left in a council of his officers deliberating whether to make the attack. He was in advance of both Colonels Donaphan and Price. The former was left at Tome, on the Rio del Norte, encamped with the traders and waiting for reinforcements and quartermaster's supplies. Col. Price was still at Santa Fe. [AMA]

General Scott sailed on the 13th; General Worth was still diligently occupied whenever weather permitted, in shipping and forwarding troops, munitions, and supplies towards Lobos. The prevalence of Northers had retarded operation. For a number of days it was impossible for the transports to communicate with the shore.

A different account states, that General Scott was at Brazos on the 17th, employed in forwarding the embarkation for Lobos, and he sailed on the 18th.
The American forces in the vicinity of Vera Cruz at our last dates, numbered about 7000.

The transport ship American 650 tons which left New York, on the 17th of January, loaded partly with surf boats, reached Brazos, on the 6th of Feb. About 30 transport vessels were lying off Brazos bar on the 17th, and as many more within the bar, loading and embarking troops with all activity. [AMA]

NNR 72.016, March 6, 1847 THE CAPTURED AMERICANS

Minon's own report of the exploit, sets down the number of Americans taken at 82, besides one Mexican, Galeano, used as spy and guide by the American detachment, and who, notwithstanding the remonstrance of Major Gaines, was immediately put to the sword.

Another list of the captured, includes the names of Captain Albert Pike, of the Arkansas, and Capt. William Heady, of Kentucky. The latter, with seventeen men was taken two days after the capture of Major Borland's party, by a party of Rancheros. The parties captured consist of fifty Arkansas troops, and two parties of Kentuckians, one twenty five, the other eighteen. Their camp was surrounded at night, after a march of forty miles. Report says, that Cassius M. Clay, wished to break the ranks, but the others refused to join him. The Mexicans numbered from 1500 to 2000, according to the same accounts. Others say not over 500. DAN HENRIE, well known as a Mier prisoner, and who acted as interpreter to the Arkansas troops, having had some experience of a Mexican prison, concluded it about sale to try virtue of Major Gaines' horse dashing past the Mexican guard, escaped their fire, and--was off to parts unknown.

The rest of the prisoners arrived at San Luis on the 26th--and were received with ever demonstration of Mexican triumph. [AMA]

NNR 72.016 March 6, 1847 Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna moves from San Luis, speculations at to his object

A DEMONSTRATION BY SANTA ANNA--The Mexican army is in motion and from San Luis Potesi--Our officers are divided in opinion as the their real destination.

Santa Anna's address to his "companions in arms" dated San Luis Potesi, January 27th, says: "The operations of the enemy demand that we should move precipitately upon his principal line, and we go to execute it. The independence, the honor, and the destiny of the nation depend at this moment on your decisions. Soldiers! The entire world observes us, and will expect our acts to be as heroic as they as necessary. Privations of all kinds surround us in consequence of the neglect shown towards us, for more than a month, by those who should provide your pay and provisions. But when has misery debilitated your spirits or weakened your enthusiasm! The Mexican soldier is well known for his frugality and patience under suffering--never wanting magazines for marches across the deserts, and always counting upon the resources of the enemy to provide for his wants. To-day we shall undertake to march over a desert country without succor or provisions. But be assured that we will immediately provided from those of the enemy, and with them you will be sufficiently remembered. My friends we go to open the campaign. What days of glory await us! What flattering future for our country! How satisfactorily when we contemplate that we have saved its independence! How the world will admire us! And when in the bosoms of our families we shall relate the risks and fatigues which we have endured, the combats with and triumphs over a daring and presumptuous enemy, and hereafter, when telling our children that we have saved out country a second time, the jubilee will be complete, and the sacrifices will appear to us to be nothing. Soldiers! Harry forth in the defense of your country. The cause we sustain is a holy one; never have we struggled more for justice, because we fight for honor and religion of our wives and children! What sacrifice, then, can be too great for objects so dear? Let our motto be, "CONQUER OR DIE!" Let us answer before the great Eternal that we will not want an instant in purging our soil of the stranger who has dared to profess it with his presence. No treaty, nothing which may not be heroic and proud."

HEADQUARTERS, SAN LUIS POTESI, Jan. 27th, 1847

Some believe that Santa Anna has issued this as a feint, and that his real object is to move to the defense of Santa Cruz. Others think his design is on the dictatorship and settle affairs at the city of Mexico.

It is certain however, that on the 27th of January, there marched out of San Luis towards Fanque de in Vaea, (the place where the Minon captured the American detachment,) three bodies of infantry, a brigade of cavalry, and another of artillery, having with them 24 pounders, three 18 pounders, four 16 pounders, and four lighter pieces, and that two days after another division would march in the same direction.

These movements are corroborated by a letter from Tampico, dated the 9th of February, published in the La Patria, Spanish paper at New Orleans, which on authority of a letter from San Luis says, "16,000 of the most brilliant troops are marching for the road between Saltillo and Monterey."

A letter from Tula, Feb. 3 says, "On the 1st Feb. Gen. Parodi" with the 12th regiment of the line, styled the 'faithful soldiers of San Luis' 1,500 strong and the battalion of 'the national guards of Jalico' with three pieces of artillery, were marching in the direction of Monterey by the road of Maetherala. The sierre is fortified at every point by the battalions of Puebla, Guarda Costa de Tampico, the company of veterans, and three companies of cavalry. In the village, Col. Jose Antonio del Castillo is stationed with a respectable force to defend that point. Gen. Urrea, with 1,500 men of the 1st regiment of cavalry, 'Primero Republicano' must have already arrived at Victoria de Temaulipas."

The foregoing renders it highly probable that Gen. Taylor will once more be in the hottest of the fray, and have the war to manage. The last accounts stated that he was getting "ready" and Santa Anna will find him to be a "rough" customer.

Gen. Wool apprized Gen. Taylor, towards the end of January, that he anticipated an attack at Saltillo. In consequence, Gen. Taylor left Monterey on the 1st of February, with his staff for Saltillo. He took with him Bragg's battery and Thomas's battery, the 1st Mississippi rifles, and May's squadron of dragoons. Capt. Thomas F. Marshall was to leave Monterey for Saltillo with Gen. Taylor.--The American forces at Saltillo would be between 5,000-6,000 men. In addition to the two batteries named above, the batteries of Capt. Washington and Captain Webster were at Saltillo, and at last accounts the troops were throwing up formidable fortifications.

The number of troops left at Monterey does not exceed 500 men, but the citadel or "Black Fort" is field by them, and there is no route by which the Mexicans can approach the city with artillery, save by Saltillo. Without artillery any attempt upon Monterey would be futile. The troops at Monterey consist of principally Ohio and Indiana volunteers, all under the command of Col. Rogers. Captain Arnold, of the 2nd dragoon, has also been ordered to Monterey from the mouth of the Rio Grande.

Our own notion is that Santa Anna knows better than to attack our army in post. Our line of operations is so widely dispersed that he can annoy them exceedingly by interrupting communications and supplies, and cutting off detachments. The approach of Urrea towards Metamoros is rather startling. [MLL]

NRR 72.016, March 6, 1847 THE BATTLE AT EL PASO

The N.O. Picayune of the 25th ult. says: "We have conversed with an intelligent Spanish gentleman who left Durango on the 15th January--Senor Benito Velez, a nephew, we learn, of Peter Harmony, of New York. Senor Velez confirms all that we have said of the action near El Paso on the 25th of December. The loss of the Mexicans in that affair was about 180 men. No news had reached Durango of the fall of Chihuahua when our informant left there. On the 10th of January, General Heredia left Durango for Chihuahua at the head of 700 men, of whom 160 were cavalry. He took with him 1,500 muskets and two pieces of artillery. When he reached Cuencame, in the north part of the state of Durango, he heard the news of the action near El Paso; and, leaving there his infantry, he pushed on to Chihuahua with his cavalry, with the view to assume the command of the government forces there. The cavalry of Culitz, which was in the action of the 25th of December, and which protected, as far as possible, the retreat of the Mexicans upon El Paso, and afterwards Carizal, has dwindled down to a handful by desertions which took place at the different rancheros on the route.

The Mexican papers contain violent denunciations of their countrymen for permitting a handful of Missourians to capture El Paso, the key to Chihuahua. One paper speaking of the Mexicans, says--"they ran like the devil," and of the principal commander--"he ran forty leagues before he stopped."

COL. DE RUSSY AND THE LOUISIANA REGIMENT. Our last left this gallant officer and his command, wrecked upon Mexican coast, in the transport ship Ondiaka, in eminent peril. We rejoice to announce his arrival at Tampico, on the 4th Feb., with the whole corps except seven men, who, unable to make the forced march which was necessary, had to be left, as they could be carried no further on litters. One of the seven overtook the detachment before they reached Tampico.

Col. de Russy, the morning he landed from the wreck, was visited by the Mexicans who proffered assistance. In the afternoon a flag from Gen. Cos summoned to an immediate surrender to the 1,800 Mexicans he pretend to have under him. He had but 980 men. Col. de R. obtained until 9 o'clock next morning to deliberate. At night fall fires were lighted, everything that would encumber was left, the detachment started for Tampico, and made 35 miles the first 24 hours, without meeting with an armed Mexican. The whole of them were exceedingly exhausted when they reached Tampico. [AMA]

NNR 72.016 March 6, 1847 Three million dollar bill

THREE MILLION DOLLAR BILL

AS ACT appropriating three million dollars to enable the president to conclude a treaty of peace and limits with Mexico.

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled. That whereas a state of war now exists between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, which it is desirable should be speedily terminated upon the terms just and honorable to both nations; and whereas assurances have heretofore been given to the government of Mexico that it was the desire of their president to settle all questions between the two countries; and whereas the President may be able to conclude a treaty of peace with the Republic of Mexico prior to the next session of congress, it means for that object are at his disposal; and whereas, in the adjustment of so many complicated questions as now exist between the two countries, it may possibly happen that an expenditure or money will be called for by the stipulations of any treaty which may be entered on to; therefore the sum of three million dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the president to sign a treaty of peace, limits, and boundaries with the Republic of Mexico, to be used by him in the event that said treaty, when signed by the authorized agents of the two governments, and duty ratified by Mexico, shall call for the expenditure of the same, or any part thereof, full and accurate accounts for which expenditure shall be by him transmitted to congress at as early a day as practical.

NRR 72.019 March 13, 1847 General orders on the organization of the troops raised for service in Mexico

[GENERAL ORDER No. 8]

War Dept., Adjt. General office
Washington, March 4, 1847

1. The regiment authorized to be raised under the "approved February 11th, 1847" will be recruited, armed and equipped for active duty in the field without delay; and the several officers appointed in each will report for orders and recruiting instructions to their respective colonels, who will establish their recruiting headquarters at some central position and report to the adjutant general. Colonels are charged with superintending the recruiting of their respective regiments; and will assign the lieutenant colonel and majors to such sub-recruiting districts as may be found expedient. When two or more companies and raised and sent to any depots, or ordered to the seat of war, a field officer should be assigned to the command.

2. The established recruiting regulations will be strictly observed by all officers, and the required returns, muster, and descriptive rolls, reports, &c. will be regularly made and transmitted through the proper officer to the adjutant general and other chiefs of staff, in strict conformity with the rules of service and the blanks with which they have been furnished. The attention of recruiting officers is specially directed to the prompt rendition of the recruiting accounts, and the abstract of contingent expenses, required for the second auditor, and the colonel as superintendent, which must be forwarded within three days after the expiration of each month or semi-monthly when called for. See paragraphs 50, 51, and &c. revised recruiting regulations, 1847.

3. As soon as eighty men shall be enlisted by a captain and two subalterns, they will be inspected, mustered, armed, and equipped as a company, and be considered ready to take the field. The final assignment of the subalterns, and the permanent designation of companies by the letters of the alphabet, will be made by the colonel at the proper time. See paragraph 43 "General Regulations for the Army."

4. The attention of recruiting officers and commanders of posts is directed to paragraph 73 of General regulations. Recruits must be drilled in the school of the soldier, as far as practical, from the moment of enlistment, even when there may be no arms at the rendezvous, until sent to join their companies or regiments.

5. The officers of the new regiment (infantry and dragoons) will furnish themselves with the prescribed infantry tactics (See Scott's system). Cavalry tactics will not be furnished until the regiment is supplied with horses, until which time the dragoons officers and men will be well drilled as foot soldiers.
6. The officers appointed, and the ten companies to be recruited in the States of Maine, 4; New Hampshire, 2; Vermont, 1; Rhode Island; 1; and Connecticut, 2; will constitute the "ninth regiment of infantry" to be commanded by Colonel---; headquarters established for the present at Boston. Fort Constitution and Fort Adams, RI will be used as recruiting depots for the regiment and the concentration of companies, preparatory to their immediate embarkation for the rest of the war.

7. The officers appointed, and the ten companies of infantry to be recruited in New York, 7; and New Jersey, 3; will constitute "the tenth regiment of infantry," under Colonel Robert E. Temple; headquarters at New York. Fort Hamilton and Lafayette will be the receiving depots for this regiment.

8. The officers appointed, and the ten companies of infantry to be recruited in Pennsylvania, 6; Delaware, 1; and Virginia, 3; will constitute "the eleventh regiment of infantry" Under Col. Albert C. Ramsey; headquarters at Baltimore. The companies to be raised in the interior of Pennsylvania for the regiment will proceed to Point Isabel, under their respective captains, via the Ohio River, and embark at Pittsburgh or Wheeling, as may be most convenient; and those recruited in Philadelphia and Delaware will rendezvous at Fort Mill, preparatory to their immediate embarkation for the same point; the companies raised in eastern Virginia will be sent to New Orleans, and then to Point Isabel, with the least practicable delay, where the regiment will be concentrated.

9. The officers appointed, and the ten companies of infantry to be recruited in North Carolina, 2; S. Carolina, 2; Texas, 2; Arkansas, 2; and Missouri, 2; will constitute the "twelfth regiment of infantry" under Colonel Louis D. Wilson; headquarters at New Orleans. The companies will be raised in North and South Carolina will rendezvous at Fort Moultrie, SC, preparatory to their immediate departure for Point Isabel; and the companies to be recruited in Texas, Arkansas, and Missouri will proceed, as soon as organized, under their respective captains, via New Orleans, to Point Isabel.

10. The officers appointed, and the ten companies of infantry to be raised in Virginia, 1; Georgia, 4; Alabama, 4; and Florida, 1; will constitute the "thirteenth regiment of infantry" under Colonel Robert M. Echols; headquarters at New Orleans.

11. The officers appointed and the ten companies of infantry to be raised in Louisiana, 5; Tennessee, 4; and Illinois, 1; will constitute the "fourteenth regiment of infantry" under Colonel Wm. Trousdale; headquarters at New Orleans.

12. The officers appointed, and the ten companies of infantry to be raised in Ohio, 5; Michigan, 3; Iowa, 1; and Wisconsin, 1; will constitute the "fifteenth regiment of infantry" under Colonel George W. Morgan; headquarters at Cincinnati.

13. The officers appointed, and the ten companies of infantry to be raised in Kentucky, 4; Indiana, 4; and Illinois, 2; will constitute the "sixteenth regiment of infantry" under Colonel J.W. Tibbatis; headquarters at Newport, KY.

14. As soon as any company to be recruited for the 13th, 14th, 15th, or 16th regiments shall be raised and organized; it will proceed without further delay to Point Isabel, under the captain, by the most expedient route, unless otherwise ordered, where these regiments will be concentrated.

15. The officers appointed and the ten companies of infantry raised in Pennsylvania, 2; Maryland, 3; Virginia, 2; Miss., 1; Georgia, 1; and Kentucky 1; will constitute the "regiment of volunteers" under Colonel T.P. Andrews; headquarters for the present at Washington, D.C. The companies recruited in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia will be concentrated at Fort Monroe, preparatory to their immediate embarkation for the seat of war; and those to be raised in Mississippi, Georgia, and Kentucky will proceed direct to Mexico, under their respective captains, as soon as organized.

16. "The third regiment of dragoons" is to be raised in the following states: Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, Louisiana, Kentucky, and Indiana--in each company, Colonel Edward G. W. Butler; headquarters at New Orleans. As soon as raised and organized, the companies will proceed direct, under their respective captains, without loss of time to Point Isabel.

17. The foregoing arrangement of regiments and assignment of companies are made for the present with a view to expedite the recruiting service--subject hereafter to such revisions and modifications as the good of the service may require.

18. The president expects that the new regiments will be raised and brought into the field in the shortest practicable time. The public interest require that the recruiting service be pushed with the greatest vigor by every officer employed in it; and, at the same time, the strictest economy is enjoined in all expenditures and arrangements, &c. Efforts must not be limited to one rendezvous or neighborhood, but auxiliary stations, within a convenient range, should be temporarily established by the same officer, according to the facilities of intercourse and the chances of success, &c.

BY order,

R. Jones, Adjt. General

NNR 72.019 March 13, 1847 Notice of awards of brevets

Brevets--The Washington Union says--"We understand that many brevets were conferred by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, the last evening of the session, and that the official general order for publishing the name is n the course of preparation. We shall take pleasure in laying before our readers as soon as we can obtain a copy of it. We announced the other day that the brevet of Major General had been conferred on Brigadier General Worth for 'gallant and notorious conduct' at the Battle of Monterey; and in anticipation of the official inst. we now mention the names of Col. Percifer F. Smith, of the regiment of mounted riflemen, to be brigadier general by the brevet, and Lieut. Colonel Henry Wilson, of the first regiment of the infantry, to be colonel by brevet, for their gallant and meritorious conduct in the capture of Monterey. Lieut. Col. John Garland, of the 4th regiment of infantry, to be colonel by brevet, and Captain Thomas Childe, of the 3rd regiment of artillery, and lieut. col. by brevet, to be colonel by brevet, for their gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma," &c., &c. NNR 72.020 March 13, 1847 Movement of troops from Fort Snelling to Mexico

The company of the United State infantry, spoken of a few weeks ago as having been ordered from Fort Snelling to Mexico, arrived yesterday on the steamer Tioga, which took them on board at Bridgeport, they having performed the rest of the journey on foot. They left Fort Snelling fifty-five in number on the 19th of January. On the way down, four were discharged, and on of the privates, whose name was Richard Monohan, fell overboard from the steamer Tioga yesterday, and was drowned. The men suffered a great deal from the cold on the journey and several of them had their hands, feet, and ears frozen. The officers in command are Captain Plummer, and Lieut. Granger and Donham. [MLL]

NNR 72.020-72.021 March 13, 1847 General William Orlando Butler returns to New Orleans, his remarks on the war and report that General Santa Anna had ordered the evacuation of Vera Cruz

A letter dated at New Orleans, March 1, 1847, to the editors of National Intelligence say--General Butler arrived here yesterday. Among the leading items of the news is the reported evacuation of Vera Cruz, by order of Santa Anna. As regards the city, I should think this very probable, as the garrison could not defend it against Gen. Scott, and the troops of which that garrison is composed will be of more service with Santa Anna, particularly if he contemplates an attack on Gen. Scott, as it is probable he does.

Gentlemen who have conversed with Gen. Butler says he freely expresses his opinion as to the proper, indeed, the only mode of conducting the war, and which coincides with the views of Mr. Calhoun--to take and fortify by posting a line of territory, and wither capture of blockade their ports without any attempt to penetrate the interior. The line to be taken, he thinks should be the one, (whatever it may be), which the government intends to insist on as permanent boundaries between the two countries, and he says 15,000 men would be sufficient to hold and protect it from the Gulf to the Pacific.

Gen. Butler justly says that, admitting we advance into the country with every success that could be expected, and even captured the city of Mexico, it would not have any material effect on the enemy, nor place us any nearer to peace than we are now, and we should never command any more territory than what we actually covered with our bayonets, and would be constantly surrounded by a hostile population, and the Mexicans would have nothing to do but avoid fighting, and let out armies waste away, as it rapidly would do, by fatigue, sickness, and constant guerrilla war.

He seems to think it is probable that Santa Anna has removed with his whole force to Vera Cruz, and with a view of giving Gen. Scott a grand fight; though he says it would be impolite for him to do so under any circumstances, but that his plans should be to let our army advance into the interior without taking a general battle, but merely to harass them, and cut off stranglers or detachments. Any serious repulse to an advancing army would be fatal to them under the circumstances.

The administration have got themselves and the country into a most acquired predicament as to this war, so blindly and rashly undertaken; for, as recently observed in the senate, we have the wolf by the tail, and it is equally dangerous to hold on or let go. There is no doubt to the fact that, sooner or later, we will have to come to the point of holding on to what we have, and the prevailing opinion in the army is, that we should give up the idea of penetrating into the country. The views and intentions, however, of the administration are different; they are actually at this moment calculating on an advance of Gen. Taylor from Saltillo, and their measures will hastily result in some serious misfortune, that will rouse the indignation of the whole country.

All the officers from Mexico speak in high terms of the Mexican cavalry, and admit that they are fully equal to our mounted volunteers, man for man, and greatly out number forces of that description.

I do not believe we shall have any decisive intelligence from Vera Cruz till the close of this month; as the issue of Gen. Worth's troops will not leave the Brazos before the 6th or 8th of this month, and the whole force cannot be collected at Lobos and Tampico before the 15th, and if they were as said that they may, it would be at least the 10th before they reached Vera Cruz.

Those who pretend to know the best, say that the castle can only be taken by bombardment, and that if the garrison is properly supplied, it will be very difficult to take it at all, and at any rate will require a long time to do so.

It is difficult from the conflicting opinions to form any correct ideas on the subject, but I shall not be surprised if it should be an easy conquest. [MLL]

NNR 72.020 March 13, 1847 Trials for the loss of Boston and Truxton

COURT MARTIAL. Commander Pearson, tried at Norfolk for the loss of the sloop of war BOSTON, has been found guilty and sentenced to one year's suspension.

Past midshipman Rolando, acting as master of the Boston, was also tried and acquitted of any blame for the loss of the ship.

Commander Carpenter, tried by the same court for the loss of the brig of war Truxton, was found guilty, and cashiered, but recommended to the mercy of the president, who has modified the sentence to one year's suspension. [MLL]

NNR 72.021 March 13, 1847 General Taylor's headquarters advances to Agua Nueva and Gen. Wool to Buena Vista
FROM THE ARMY--Letters have just been received in this city from the camps of Generals Taylor and Wool. The headquarters of the latter were at Buena Vista on the 29th of January and of the former at Agua Nueva, eighteen miles south of Saltillo, on the 7th of February.

The letters from General Wool's camps state that since the 27th of January they had the usual nightly alarms of the approach of the enemy, and that there reports had all come from Saltillo. The enemy was said undoubtedly at Incarnacion, and perhaps small parties had been within twelve leagues of Saltillo. It was also reported that a considerable number of rancheros had embodied themselves and were not far off, lying in wait for any small reconnoitering parties that may come their way. The report had reached the camp (on the night of the 28th) that a party, consisting of Captain Heady and seventeen, Kentucky volunteers, were captured on the 27th by a party of rancheros, under the following circumstances: Capt. H. as sent out on a reconnoitering party by Lt. Col. Field. When about ten or fifteen miles away from their station they stopped at a rancho, and asked for liquor to drink. It was immediately furnished, and in abundance. The men became intoxicated, and in that condition left the rancho. They were afterwards captured, and, as reported, without resistance or a gun being fired.

There was no idea entertained at the date of writing this letter that the town of Saltillo, or the troops at Buena Vista were to be attacked. It was supposed that some decisive measures would be taken to check the reconnoitering parties of the enemy.

These letters give further accounts of the capture of Major Borland. It appears that an alarm of being given at the approach of the Mexicans upon Saltillo, Gen. Wool sent Major B. with fifty men to make a reconnaissance on the San Luis Potesi road, and, if practicable, to go as far as Incarnacion, about fifty-five miles from Saltillo, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the enemy had advanced to that place, and to report the result of that observations. He left on the 18th instant, and arrived at the Incarnacion the next morning but found no troops there; they having left the morning before. Instead of returning as ordered, the major took the liberty of halting and sent an express to Col. Yell for reinforcement. Col. Yell, on receiving the major's application sent a request to Gen. Wool for permission to go with his whole regiment to join the major and to go on as far as Salado. The application was sent by General Wool to Major General Butler, who refused it, but sent Gen. Wool word by the bearer that he would see the general in a few moments. Shortly after Gen. Wool sent the refusal to Col. Yell. An interview then took place between the two generals. Then Gen. Wool proposed an immediate recall of Major Borland. Gen. Butler said it was necessary to send the order, as he was immediately going to see Col. Yell, and, if necessary, he would give the order.

It appears that Major Borland was joined by Major Gaines and Capt. Clay's companies, about thirty to thirty-five strong, who were ordered by General Butler to make a reconnaissance in the same direction. They decided at once to continue their reconnaissance as far as Salado; the result of which was a surprise and capture of the whole party of about five hundred Mexican cavalry, commanded by General Minion. It was reported that they were surprised early in the morning, whilst asleep, with no pickets or sentinels, to guard against the surprise. Colonel Yell was afterwards sent with part of his regiment on the Potesi road, to ascertain the truth of the report, with instructions to be cautious; but, on preceding to the Incarnacion he found no troops; yet he received information of the approach of General Minion, with 3,000 cavalry, on which he retired to camp. Every precaution was subsequently taken to have an active reconnaissance on the roads by which the enemy could approach. As these unfortunate occurrences had been the result of vigilance and disobedience of orders, it is hoped that they may prove a lesson to our troops.

General Taylor had changed his headquarters from Monterey to Agua Nueva, eighteen miles south of Saltillo, where he arrived on the 5th instant, bringing forward in the first instance, Lieut. Col. May's squadron of dragoons, two batteries, (Sherman's and Bragg's) and the regiment of Mississippi riflemen. He was subsequently joined by the Kentucky and Indiana regiments, and other troops were expected from Saltillo. It seemed to be understood that Gen. Taylor was determined to hold both Saltillo and Agua Nueva in its front. It was supposed that the scarcity of water and supplies for a long distance in front would compel the enemy either to risk an engagement in the field or to hold himself aloof from our troops. No intelligence has been received from the interior more recent or authentic than has been hitherto communicated. But the impression is that three was no considerable force in front, nor was it supposed to be likely that any serious demonstration would be made in that direction. The population of Saltillo was fast returning to the city, and it was hoped that, under the judicious management of Major Warren, a discreet officer of the Illinois volunteers, who commands in the worn, the people may remain quietly in Lots have been received in Washington of the men belonging to the Kentucky mounted volunteers who had been captured at Incarnacion, amounting to thirty-five, and also those of the Arkansas regiment captured at the same place, amounting also to thirty-five. [MLL]

From Tampico, by way of New Orleans, we have dates to the 17th of February. Much anxiety was awakened there to have the truth or falsity of an account brought in by three Mexicans from Victoria, of a sanguinary battle having been fought at or near Monterey between Santa Anna and Gen. Taylor. They stated that General Taylor had fallen back from Saltillo, to Monterey, that Santa Anna had ventured to attack them, a long conflict ensued--loss of life on both sides exceeded any of the engagements--that Santa Anna finally gave way, having suffered so severely in killed and wounded--amongst the latter was Gen. Arista.

Our advice from Gen. Taylor is later than the period on which the battle was said to have been fought. They make no mention of the affair. It is quite possible the Mexicans were sent to Tampico with a view of creating a diversion.

Of real movements made Santa Anna and his army from San Luis de Potosi, we are as yet entirely without satisfactory accounts, and shall be very curious to know what was the object of his move. [MLL]

The Baltimore American of the 10th says--It is intimated by letters from Washington that president and other officials there entertain the confident expectation of a speedy peace with Mexico. This belief is an approaching pacification is said to be founded on the use that is to made of the three millions entrusted by special appropriation to the president. Having no confidence, for our own part, in the pacific disposition of the Mexican people; none in Santa Anna's power, if he has the will, to expect such overtures as we are prepared to make; and therefore none, not the slightest, in the speedy conclusion of the war, we mention these rumors from Washington as indicating, we fear, rather the wishes than the convictions of reasonable and well informed men.

It is only necessary to place ourselves for a moment in the position of the Mexicans, and then allow them what we claim for ourselves, the possession of the feelings, sympathies and sentiments of men, to understand the exasperated hostility with which they must be aroused and stimulated to resist to the death the powerful invaders of their country. We cannot expect people to smile upon us when we have just provoked them by blows. To conciliate and to fight the same party, at one and the same time, would be to render all efforts both at fighting and at conciliation abortive. Hence the inconclusive results of Mr. Polk's management of our difficulty with Mexico. And the infatuation which possessed him when he plunged into the war, and which has marked his course in the prosecution of it, seems to accompany him still. He is not full of the project of the three million bill money--a ridiculous scheme which must end in disgrace.

The administration, we believe, has never yet perceived the really serious nature of this Mexican war. In so far as it relates to political interests, in the way of placing vast patronage in the president's hands and furnishing profitable contracts for the reward of the meritorious or for the encouragement of the wavering, it has probably been appreciated to the full. But there are other points of view in which some, not partizans, may be disposed to regard it.

We find in the New York Journal of Commerce some extracts from a letter dated "City of Mexico, January 28, 1847," apparently written by a Mexican of intelligence.
"You will discover our sense of injury to be great by the prompt punishment received by those of our citizens who have by force attempted to resist the will of the Junta in the matter of the law relating to church property. There is, then, as before remarked, but small expectation that the two nations will be able to come to terms at present, notwithstanding the storm that appears to be gathering for the subjugation of the city of Vera Cruz. The force loan upon, or seizure as some call it, of the church party, in defense of the nation, you will understand, is not carried out to impair the usefulness of the church itself. The property in question is promulgated to be the gift of individuals of the nation: it is considered national property, under God in the custody of the church, for use in just such an emergency as, at this time, threatens the independence of the country. As the agent of heaven for good to us, to whom can we turn more properly in the hour of necessity than to our church?

These are but a few appeals uttered in defense of the law. The exigency of the case impels the carrying out of a measure, which, under different circumstances, there would be few among us disposed to sanction. Some call the law a sacrilege; others say, if it is, the United States are the actors of it, by forcing upon us the necessary of performing it. The fault, then, lies at the door of our sister republic. Does it or does it not? The many generous sentiments discovered in many of the presses and in the speeches of some of the members of congress of the United States, I will here take occasion to observe, engage our attention. They are a relief to us under the circumstances; but the relief of mere language in a few, has little of satisfaction in it, so long as the nation itself is opposed to us. We are not so blinded by our conviction that we are right, as to be incapable of comprehending the instrumentality that prevents its satisfactory acknowledgement on the part of the United States.

We believe it nevertheless the duty of an elevated patriotism: that we should enforce something like an admission of the wrong done us, not for the benefit of our own republic merely, but for the less selfish motive that the peace that must be eventually arrived at, may be founded upon durable basis. Should Vera Cruz be taken, our nation will not be conquered. If even a march be successfully forced to our capital city, we shall still not be conquered; our enemy will be in a state of siege in our very midst. What is to happen under these circumstances, it is impossible to know. We shall, however, do our best to protect the interests involved. A single reverse will place the army of our enemy in a critical position. That desirable object affected, it may then be necessary and proper to offer the alternative we hesitate to yield on compulsion. The honor of our nationality demands of us the tremendous sacrifices under which we suffer. If we err in prizing the dignity of that, it will be an error for which posterity will not condemn us." NRR 72.021 March 13, 1847 Description of Lobos Island

THE ISLAND OF LOBOS--The island of Lobos having become a place of some interest for many of our citizens as the place of rendezvous of that portion of our army which is detained for the attack on Vera Cruz, we extract the following brief account of it from the correspondence of the Philadelphia North American:

-February 7, 1847

"This letter is written upon the most delightful tropical island ever trodden by adventurers from any climb.

"The island of Lobos is a lovely little spot, formed entirely of coral, about two miles in circumference, twelve miles from the Mexican shore, about 60 miles from Tampico, and some 130 miles from Vera Cruz. It is covered (or was before we landed) with a variety of trees and shrubs, the highest of the former about twenty-five feet high, and there are so thickly covered with vines that one can hardly get through them. There is hardly a tree or shrub, or plant growing there that I have ever before seen. Banyan trees spreading over large spaces of gourds, their limbs forming props as they pierce into the earth and take root, while the tops thickly thatched with evergreen vines, form most beautiful arches. Lemon, lime, fig, palm, cane, and a hundred other species of wood are growing with all the freshness and beauty of the Indies. There is plenty of water to be had by digging four to six feet. It is brackish and sweet, but we are getting used to it, and like it nearly as well as ship water. Fish and sea fowl we have is profusion. With there we have delightful air, that fourteen hours of the twenty-four make the place delightfully pleasant."
"It will be difficult, I imagine, to convince you, who will read this scrawl besides great coal fires, that we are literally roasting during a portion of the day. The sun is so hot that our faces and arms are blistered if exposed but a few minutes. Tuesday, by Fahrenheit, in the shade, I scored 92 degrees. The universal remark among the volunteers is, 'if this is winter, what will summer be?'

"General Scott is daily expected here, and we shall soon be joined by seven thousand troops from Tampico, &c. There are six companies of Louisiana and South Carolina troops already here. They arrived on the 3rd instant. They were all in fine health, and are encamped besides us." [MLL]

NNR 72.022 March 13, 1847 Report of Colonel Alexander Doniphan's taking of El Paso

ARMY OF THE NORTH

The St. Louis Republican has accounts from Santa Fe to the 14th of January. At that time but little further was known of the movements of Colonel Doniphan. Some Mexicans, who were in the battle of Brazito, reported that Colonel Doniphan entered El Paso on the 28th of December, and took possession without resistance—the military force which he met on the 25th and defeated having scattered to the mountains.

The attempt to produce a revolution in Santa Fe was to have been made on Christmas night. It was a time when great numbers of Mexicans were expected to congregate in Santa Fe for the purpose of attending the ceremonies of the Catholic Church. A very large number were in attendance from all sections of the country; and no doubt by preconcert. A priest from El Paso, habited as greaser, was present and took an active part in all the preliminary arrangements. But the whole plot was disclosed to the Americans by Mexican women, and the authorities were able to secure a good many of the leaders. [MLL]

NNR 72.022, March 13, 1847 MEXICO--DEFERRED ARTICLE, Santa Anna, Vera Cruz

The British Steamer arrived at Havana from Vera Cruz furnish dates from thence to the 1st—and city of Mexico to the 29th of January. We give brief extracts:

The rumor of the assassination of Santa Anna turns out to be unfounded; so also of his active opposition to the seizure of church property. At last accounts he was still at San Luis Potosi. Vera Cruz papers of the 28th ult., announce that letters from San Luis speak of his immediate departure for Tula. Letters from the city of Mexico are to the same effect, and represent, that he would move at the head of the main body of his forces. His whole strength does not exceed 23,000 men of all arms—represented to be in a deplorable situation for want of means, destitute of clothing and provisions; one regiment had actually left for the city of Mexico.
Santa Anna employs his time in gambling and cock fighting and writing menacing and energetic representations to congress for money. He quite recently won $34,000 at monte from his own officers, very many of whom are very young men. The latest accounts we have seen from San Luis say that he would move upon Tula the morning of the 27th  ult. This is stated in a letter dated the 26th.

Gen. La Vega has been appointed commandant general of Vera Cruz.

Private accounts, from responsible sources, set down the number of troops in the city of Vera Cruz at 3400--some say 3000. The garrison of San Juan de Ulua does not exceed 100 troops. Some accounts represent that there are two months provisions in the castle, but we have a letter from a gentleman who has access to the most respectable sources of information, but whom we need not name, in which he assures us that there is not a barrel of salted provisions in the castle, are dependent upon the back country for their daily supplies of food. So far as the troops in the city are concerned, this has long been the case.

The congress of the state of Vera Cruz had issued a manifest calling on the people at all hazards to resist the invasion of the Americans. During the month of January the approaches to Vera Cruz on the road to the interior were strengthened by a battery of heavy guns.

The law authorising the seizure of fifteen millions of property belonging to the church promises to be a dead letter. The property consists almost wholly of real estate in different cities of the republic. Even if the law of congress be enforced, it is said that no one will advance money upon the property so seized much less purchase it. The whole body of the clergy had protested against the seizure as sacrilegious and they were supported by large portions of lower classes of the people. Santa Anna gave in his adhesion to the measure with great reluctance.

One of the clergy in the city of Mexico has been imprisoned for his factious opposition to the measure. At our last accounts the Mexican congress had before it a modification of the law, which would render it less burdensome, but without changing the principle.

Our letters say that all the late ministers have resigned. The ministers of foreign affairs and of finances have certainly done so. To add to the general disorganization, the Mexican congress is said to have determined to dissolve about the first of the present month.

A report was in circulation in Havana, derived from a letter of the very latest date from Vera Cruz that Gen. Minon had had an engagement with some American troops, near Victoria, and taken 800 of them prisoners. This transpired through the Mexican consul at Havana, and was totally discredited rumor was founded upon Minon's exploit near Saltillo. We find the prize seized by Minon noticed in the Indicator. That paper sets down the number of his prisoners at seventy, two of whom, it says, are field officers, and four company officers.

The Mexicans appear to be particularly well informed of the movements and positions of our troops. They give, from time to time, the forces at Tampico, Saltillo and Victoria and other places. Everywhere they see our arms advancing, and, to the consternation of all parties, sweeping all before them. This occasions much speculation in Mexico, as will be imagined, as to the final issue. Letters from Havana express the belief, founded upon information from high quarters in Mexico, that their government will very soon enter into negotiations for peace, from total inability to subsist and protract the struggle. Still we read that one regiment of the Auxiliaries of San Luis had made formal proclamations that they would allow no treaty to be negotiated with the Americans, until the latter had entirely evacuated the country.

Several vessels have succeeded in running the blockade of Vera Cruz, a Sardinian brig and Spanish schooner were among the number. Officers write that with their present class of force it is impossible to prevent this. The Princess Marie, of Bordeaux has been seized by the squadron for irregularity in her papers, and it was thought would be sent to this port. The bark Felix, likewise of Bordeaux, has also been seized and sent into Anton Lizardo. We believe the sloop of war Albany made these captures. Conner has returned from Laguna to the station of the squadron.

A project has been started in Mazatlan of declaring Santa Anna dictator. This drew from him an immediate declaration that as he did not aspire to the presidency, he would use all his force to put down any movement in Sonora or any other state which would threaten to kindle political commotion. The latest dates from San Luis Potosi are to the 26th ultimo. The army had not then moved, but the Vera Cruz Vindicator of the 21st ult: thinks that it had done so subsequently, being enabled to do so by the funds raised by the state of San Luis.

Gen. Valencia is said by the same paper to mediate a descent upon Tampico. [AMA]

NBR 72.032 March 13, 1847 Preparations for attacking Veracruz, delay, ships to be employed

The attack on Vera Cruz.—According to Gen. Scott's project it is stated, was to have commenced on the 20th of March, or at the earliest possible day thereafter. The New York Express states "that active preparations are making and nearly completed at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, in the fitting out of two vessels, to be used as bomb ketches in the contemplated attack. They have been strengthened in every possible way by strong oaken knees, secured by bolts and screws, massive oaken frake work, and iron braces running through the vessel, secured upon the outer sides by broad iron plates. Each of the vessels is to carry, besides guns of smaller caliber, an immense gun upon deck (and a smaller one below) weighing about eight tons, and which will throw shot or shells of ten inches diameter a distance of of three and a half miles. It is calculated they will be at Vera Cruz ready for service by the 1st of April."

The U. States bomb ketches Etna and Stromboli, commanded by Captains G. J. Van Brunt and W.S. Walker are to sail from Boston for the gulf in a few days.

From this it would appear that the period of attack had been somewhat delayed. Gen. Scott left Brazos for the point of action about the 18th February.

The new sloop of war Germantown, lately launched at Philadelphia and since fitted out at Gosport, on the 10th instant was towed by the steamer Engineer to the anchorage, and will sail in a few days.—Whether for the gulf or for the Pacific, we are not confident. Commander Franklin Buchanan, lat superintendent of the naval school at Annapolis, commands her.

NNR 72.032 March 13, 1847 "Irish Legion" of deserters from the United States to the Mexicans

DESERTERS FROM THE ARMY--As the bounty for enlisting is increased in amount, the number of attempts to obtain the bounty by abandoned characters, with a view awaiting the public, will increase in full proportion.

The adjunct general of the United States, has advertised rewards amounting in the aggregate to over $33,300 for arresting 1,011 deserters from the U.S. army.

The Irish Legion--El Republicano of Mexico has the following:

"We had the pleasure on Sunday last of seeing a company of Americans deserters, principally Irish, reviewed by his excellency the general in chief. They are perfectly armed and equipped, and are on the point of departure for Tula. This company have made a particular standard for themselves, on one side of which is seen the national cost of arms, with the motto, "Long live the republic of Mexico." On the other side is a figure of St. Patrick, their patron. There brave men who have abandoned one of the most unjust of causes for the purpose of defending the territory of their adopted country, will find in the Mexicans, a frank and loyal heart, open and hospitable; and besides, a just and ample recompense for their merited services. [MLL]"

NNR 72.033 March 20, 1847 Adventure of Capt. Dan D. Henrie

ADVENTURES OF CAPT. DAN HENRIE

When the two accounting parties under Majors Borland and Gaines were captured by the Mexican forces under General Minion, on the 23rd of January, about sixty miles from Saltillo, there were taken with them a Texan, Capt. Dan Henrie, and a Mexican guide who had been compelled to act as such. Before the Americans surrendered, Gen. Minion pledged his honor that Captain Henrie should be treated as a prisoner of war, and should not be hurt, and that the Mexican guide should have a fair trial. Soon afterwards the Mexican guide was shot down, by order of the Mexican general--a circumstance which indicated clearly to the captain what his fate was to be. The subsequent occurrences connected with his escape were narrated by himself:

The whole party remained at Incarnacion that day. The next morning, the 24th, the prisoners were stated under a guard of 200 men, for San Luis Potesi. Majors Gaines and Borland were permitted to retain their horses and arms; the rest of the prisoners were stript of both. Capts. Clay and Dainey among other commissioned officers, were furnished with mustang ponies; the remainder marched on foot.

The treatment of the Mexican guide induced Capt. Henrie to believe that he might share the same fate. He had no confidence whatever in the word of general Minon. During the day he remarked that officers talking to each other and looking at him. Manuel Sanchez that lives in Saltillo, and who also received from our officers many thousand dollars for corn, was with Gen. Minon. He recognized Henrie, and riding up to him said, "Well, sir, I suppose you will visit the city of Mexico a second time." "That is very doubtful," replied Henrie. In the afternoon the express came with a letter. Some acts of the officer who received it aroused Henrie's suspicions further, and turning short around where the officer was watching him. He believed they designed to murder him, and he determined to make his mistake if possible, and advised some of the prisoners of it.

By some accident, during the evening he found himself on Major Gaines' mare, one of the best blooded nags in Kentucky, and the Major's pistols still remaining in the holsters. The prisoners had become considerably scattered near sunset, and Capt. Henrie set himself busily to work to make them keep close together.

To do this he rode back, within ten miles of the rear of the line, when, discovering a small interval in the line of the Mexican guard, he suddenly put spurs into the mare and darted through the lines. The guard immediately wheeled in pursuit, but their ponies were no match for a Kentucky blood horse, and before a gun could be fairly leveled at him he had darted out of reach. He had three ranchos to pass. As he passed these he found that the Mexicans in pursuit gave the alarm to the rancheros, who followed him with fresh horses; still he outstripped them all. After passing the last rancho he had pulled up his mare, to rest her, when a single Mexican came up supposing him to be unharmed. He waited until he came within thirty steps, when cocking the pistol he fired the dueling pistol and the Mexican rolled off.

In a short time another came nearer; he likewise permitted him to approach still nearer, when he wheeled and shot him down. He loaded his pistol, and after going some distance another started up from behind some bushes near the road, and rode at him; he shot at him, with what success he could not tell, but was not pursued by that Mexican any farther. When he came to Incarnacion he had found that the camp had been alarmed, as he supposes by some one who had passed him when he left the road. Diverging from this strait course, he crossed several roads and evaded a number of parties who were in pursuit. At length he came to a plain where there was no place to hide. The moon was shining, and he could see a large number of men in pursuit. Putting spurs to his now jaded mare, he made for a mountain valley, and following it to the east, he at length eluded his pursuers. He traveled up into the valley forty miles, as he supposed, hoping to find water for himself or for his famished mare, and the next morning after his escape the noble animal expired, more from the want of water than from fatigue.

Capt. Henrie now had to make it on foot. He wandered about all day, trying to find a path across the mountain. In the evening he found some water to quench his thirst. He then determined to retrace his steps down the valley, and did so, marching without food or water, frequently seeing parties of Mexicans, whom he had to avoid. On the 28th he killed a rat with a club, part of which he ate and put the balance in his pocket for another meal.

On the night of the 28th he reached the road, and followed it until an hour after sunset, when he discovered a party of horsemen approaching. Not knowing whether they were friends or enemies, he concealed himself until they came near, when he discovered they were a picket guard of the Arkansas troops. He gave one shout and gave up---nature was exhausted. His nerves, which had been strung up to the highest degree of tension, became unstrung, and he was almost helpless. They put him on a horse and took him to Agua Nueva, where Capt. Pike commanded an outpost.

Capt. Pike informed me that when Henrie came in he was the most miserable looking being he ever saw. His shoes were worn out, his pantaloons cut in rags, his head was bare, and his hair and beard matted, his hands, feet, and legs were filled with thorns from the prickly pear, and his shin was parched and withered with privation, exposure, and exertion. He had tasted no water for four days, and seemed almost famished for want of it. The soldiers gathered round him, and all that was in their wallets was at his service as they had recently had a new outfit of clothing, Capt. H. was soon newly fitted out. After resting awhile, and getting some food he was able to ride to this place. He says that during the pursuit, there were more than one hundred shots fired at him, one of which passed through his hair. [MLL]
The regiment of Mounted Riflemen are thus described by a correspondent of the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, writing from Jefferson Barracks, Mo. 24th, Nov. 1846.

There are now at this point about five hundred men of the regiment who were enlisted in the short space of four months. Of these, all of nine-tenths are Americans, enlisted in the states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and Tennessee. Very few were enlisted in the northern and eastern states. Two companies of the regiment were organized in September, and one is already serving in Mexico. These are commanded by Capts. Mason and Walker.

I will venture to say that a finer body of men were never enlisted in this country. They are strong, athletic fellows, who appear capable of enduring and hardships. A good proportion of them are over six feet in height, and not a few will go six foot four "in their stockings." They have been well as cavalry tactics, and should occasion require they can act as trailleurs, or light infantry.

Owing principally to the low stage of water in the river the arms and clothing for the regiment did not arrive until a few days since. This has been a serious impediment to us, as the order for us to repair to Point Isabel was issued from the Adjunct General's office six weeks since. Our squadron, composed of two companies commanded by Capt. Sanderson and Crittenden, leave tomorrow, and the other companies will leave as soon as horses can be procured by the quartermaster at St. Louis.

We are to be armed with the short rifle, and we hope the requisition which has also been made for sabers and pistols will be favored. In the absence of Col. Smith and Lieut. Col. Fremont, already in Mexico, the regiment is to be commanded by Major Burridge. [MLL]

War With Mexico.

Major General Scott, and suite, embarked from the Rio Grande in the steamer Massachusetts, and reached Tampico on the evening of the 19th February. He met with "a thundering reception," of course. Landing next morning he proceeded to Gen. Patterson's head quarters, and received the attention due to a commanding officer and the welcome of his friends. He found about 9,000 men at Tampico, preparing to embark. Four brigades, under Genl's. Twiggs, Pillow, Shield. and Quitman, were to embark on the 20thand 21st.

The scene in and about Tampico, is stated to be stirring in the extreme. Reviews of troops, in regiments and brigades, were daily taking place; vessels were continually arriving with goods, merchandize, military stores, &c., the American population were all in intense excitement, regarding coming events. Every thing announced action, in its utmost intensity. All quiet, with regard to the enemy, in the interior.

On the 21st, Gen. Scott, and suite left Tampico, in the Mississippi for the island of Lobos, where about 2,500 men had already encamped on the 17th of February.

The squadron off Vera Cruz consisted of the Potomac, Raritan, John Adams, Albany, Princeton, and a fleet of small craft. Gen. Scott had been expected daily for some time. The ships and troops would rendezvous, it was said, at Anton de Lizardo, but the place of debarkation would not be finally settled on until the arrival of Gen. Scott-it would either be at Anton de Lizardo, 9 miles from Vera Cruz, or opposite Sacrificios-at either of which places it would be done under complete protection from the guns of the ships.
A letter from Mr. Lumsden, one of the editors of the Picayune, written at Tampico on the 20th of February, says:

Gen. Twiggs' division is first under marching orders, and leaves to-day. All is bustle, and very soon we shall not have more troops here than are barely sufficient to take care of the town. I think my mind is pretty well made up to go and see the Vera Cruz fandango. I was unlucky enough to miss the sport at Monterey, and do not feel willing to be absent when the "ball" opens at Vera Cruz.

To give you some idea of what is expected to be done, I will show you a portion of what is going down in the way of munitions: First, there are some 100,000 rounds of heavy ammunition; rockets, shells and an enormous supply of all sorts of combustibles, with 40 mortars and columbiads-some of them ten inches calibre; from 10 to 20 24-pounders; 3 field batteries, consisting of six and twelve-pounders, and twelve and twenty-four pound howitzers. With all these go the sappers and miners and the pontoon train.

The United States schooner Tampico, acting master M. C. Perry, Jr., sails this morning for Lobos Island and Anton Lizardo, with despatches from Gen. Scott.

A postscript to this letter, dated February 23d, says:-

I have not much to add—In fact it is almost impossible to gather any thing here in the way of what is called army news—so secret is everything kept. There is not a Mexican in this whole country who does not know that our troops are going to Vera Cruz, while in the United States, and even here, our own people are all in the dark. Santa Anna manages to keep himself well advised of our movements—I almost venture to say that he now knows as much of our plans and intentions, and of our strength and numbers in the field as any of those who are at headquarters, in Washington city. Despatches of the greatest moment are sent through the enemy's country, almost totally unguarded, and, like weak and straggling forages, and mules and wagons without good and strong escorts, they fall into the hands of our foes.

All the forces now here, except the Louisiana volunteers, the Baltimore battalion, and one company of artillery will be on the way to Vera Cruz in a short time. Those that I have named will be left here, under the command of Col. Gates, to garrison the city.

Every thing indicates a movement upon Vera Cruz, which place, so far from being abandoned by the Mexicans, appears to be making efforts for defence. Men, women and children are said to be labouring on the works for defence, making ditches, removing sand banks, &c. Additional troops have arrived, and it is stated that Santa Anna has advanced $75,000 of his personal estate for the immediate exigencies of the place.

Advices at New Orleans from the mouth of the Rio Grande are to the 27th February. General Worth's division was embarking with all possible speed. [ANP] and is now, we presume, on his way to Washington. It is not supposed he has accomplished much by his mission.-The Mexicans had personal objections to him, and his reception by the authorities of Vera Cruz, and the people and government of Mexico, was anything but cordial.

Passed Midshipman Rogers has been ordered to Ferote, and is now confined in that gloomy prison.

We learn that the blockade of Vera Cruz continues to be violated with almost perfect impunity.-This is attributed not more to the want of vessels of the proper description, than to the instructions by which the commodore enforces the law of blockade.

Two barques have arrived off Vera Cruz with volunteers from the north, and gone into Anton Lizardo. One of them is the St. Cloud from Hampton Roads, with a portion of the Virginia troops.

The news from Santa Anna is no later than we have already given, though it is more full. Although Santa Anna announces the capture of Capt. Heady and his small company of Kentuckians, we find no mention of the murder of Lieut. Ritchie, and the seizure of his despatches. The despatches have not formally been made public by him.

The latest advices we see from Chihuahua, are to the 16th of January, a fortnight later than our former accounts. The city had not then been taken by our troops, nor do we see anything said of their advance upon it.

The New Orleans Bulletin, referring to the news by the United States schoner Forward, says that the despatches brought by Mr. Atocha are said to be of high importance; but the content had not in any way transpired, though it was reported that there was a prospect of a favorable termination of the negotiations.

The Washington correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce writes-

"The Mississippi, which sailed on the 7th, carried out, as I now learn, full instructions from our government to the able and intelligent United States consul in the city of Mexico, Mr. Black, who is still employed there as a means of communication between the two governments. Mr. Black will enunciate the 'three million bill,' which conveys on its face, to the Mexican government the expression of a desire, on the part of the American congress, to obtain "a speedy and honorable peace" with Mexico.-The Mississippi may possibly arrive at Vera Cruz, if the equinoctial gales do not interrupt her, by the 20th March. It strikes me that, very possibly, preliminaries for a treaty of peace will be settled before the intended assault upon Vera Cruz and the castle. That was the opinion expressed by Mr. Soule before he left the city." [ANP] to Mexico; another asks how long Mexico will permit herself to be set at thought.
The odium in which Senor Atocha is held has apparently prejudiced the proposals, whatever they may be.

Santa Anna was, by the latest accounts, (coming down to the 14th instant from Guadalaxara,) still advancing towards Saltillo, and had reached Cedral. On the 12th an extraordinary snow storm occurred at San Luis. We may expect melancholy accounts from the denuded Mexican army.

The opposition to the law confiscating the church states is unabated, and is beginning to assume a more systematic character. The state of Jalisco had suspended the execution of the law until congress can consider the petitions of the several states for its repeal. Distrusting capitalists consider the investments as too insecure for speculation, even at enormous discounts. The amount of property held

Mr. Vaddy Thompson says that his residence in Mexico has thoroughly convinced him that no political moment can succeed to which the priesthood is opposed. The issue of this favorite financial scheme for young Farias is likely to illustrate the truth of the remark, as there is much reason to suppose that the law will eventually be repealed.

The people of Vera Cruz have turned out en masse to clear away the sand

72.037 March 20, 1847 March of the Mormon battalion toward California

THE MARCH OF THE MORMON BATALLION

Extracted from a letter, dated at Los Playna, Sonora, on the 24th of November, written by an officer in the command of Col. Cooke, who is at the head of the Mormon battalion on its way to California:

"We are now about three hundred and fifty miles from Santa Fe, on our way to California. So far, we have been successful in finding a good road, that may be considered a natural one, for we have had but little work to do. We find water scarce, and prospects will worse ahead, thought I am in hopes we shall not suffer.
The grass for our animals is very fine. We have crossed several high mountains, or rather passed through them, without difficulty, and have suffered but little from cold.
Our course has been further south than we wished to follow, but it was necessary on account of water. We are about fifty miles northwest of Yara, so by referring to the map, you can see our present position. From here we go to San Bernadino, and then to the Rio San Pedro, and down that river to the Gulf of California, and thence across to San Diego, and up the coast to Monterey. There are journey westward will be ended. We will retire at least seventy days yet to perform the trip, for our animals must necessarily fall if we attempt to push them. They are our only hope, and it behooves us to favor them in every possible way. This is a wild country, and too far from the home ever to be settled on by white men. The health of the command is good; in fact, the sir is too pure to have disease of any kind generated into it.” [MLL]

NRR 72.038 March 20, 1847 Account of the Santa Fe insurrection

NEW MEXICO--SANTA FE--IMPORTANT

Pittsburgh, March 16

By the river we have St. Louis papers four days in advance of the mall, with dates from Santa Fe covering important news. There has been an extensive Mexican insurrection at Taos. All the Spaniards who evinced any sympathy with the American cause had been compelled to escape.

Gov. Bent, Stephen Lee, acting sheriff, General Elliot Lee, Henry Seal and twenty Americans were killed and their families deported. The chief Alcalde was also killed. This all occurred on the 7th of January. The insurrection had made formidable head and the dissatisfaction was rapidly spreading. The insurgents were sending expresses out all over the country to raise assistance. The number engaged in the outbreak at Taos was about 600. They were using every argument to incite the Indians to hostilities and were making preparations to take possession of Santa Fe.

The Americans at Santa Fe had only about 500 effective men there; the rest were on the sick list or had left to join Col. Doniphan. Such being their situation they cannot send succor out, as they are hardly able to defend themselves. It is thought that Santa Fe must be captured, as neither the nor the block houses are completed.

It is announced as the intention of the insurgents who captured Taos, to take possession of the wagon trains, which are carrying forward our supplies, and thus cut off all communication.

The representations made to Col. Doniphan, that Chihuahua would be an easy conquest, were evidently intended as a lure to entrap him, beget a spirit of security, and lead him far off into the interior, where he might easily out off.

It is the universal opinion in Santa Fe that if Gen. Wool had gone direct to Chihuahua there would have been no trouble in New Mexico. Col. Doniphan had possession of El Paso del Norte on the 28th of December. Letters have been received from the governor of Chihuahua, stating that Gen. Wool was within three days march of the capital. This, too, was doubtless another rose to lure Col. Doniphan on in confidence, and cut him off from all chance of escape, or falling back upon Santa Fe, to relieve it in its emergency.

The Mexicans are in hold in their tone and confident of capturing Col. Doniphan and has command, which consists of about 600 men, 500 being of his own troops, the regiment of mounted Missouri volunteers, and a detachment of 100 men from Santa Fe, under the command of Lieutenant Col. Mitchell, of the 2nd regiment--consisting of 30 men from Clark's battalion of light artillery, under command of Capt. Hudson and Lieut. Kribben, and 70 from Colonel Price's regiment and Colonel Willock's battalion. They then assert that they will massacre every American in New Mexico and confiscate all their goods.

A letter from Lieutenant Albert, United States topographical engineer of later date, confirms all the above intelligence. The details of the battle of Bresto [?] are also confirmed. The massacre beyond doubt has been a horrible one, of which we have as yet heard from the beginning, and the insurrection had been kept so quiet until all was ready for the outbreak, that our handful of troops there must be demolished, before any effort can be made to relieve them from the most advanced of our western military posts.

Lieut. Albert's men suffered severely coming to Missouri. Th calls upon the government for prompt assistance and large reinforcements are strenuous; and the actuation of our gallant men, far away from succor, in the heart of an enemies country, shows the rashness which has characterized the whole advance in New Mexico.
Eight of the leading men engaged in the conspiracy have arrived (our dispatch does not say where) who have made a full confession of the whole thing.

Letters received also state that Col. Cook and the Mormon battalion were 350 miles beyond Santa Fe. They were in generally good health and progressing slowly.--Phila. North Amer. [MLL]

NNR 72.048 March 20, 1847 Gen. Carrabajal's cordon of posts round Matamoros, &c.

War with Mexico.

Latest from the Army.-The schr. John Howell reached New Orleans on the 12th, with Brazos St. Jago dates to the 28th ult.

General Worth left Brazos on the 25th, in the steamer Edith, one company of artillery, one of dragoons, and the light batteries had all embarked. Six companies of dragoons remained, waiting for transports.

Capt. Hughes, of the Illinois volunteers, left Gen. Taylor's camp, 20 miles below Saltillo, on the 13th and Monterey on the 15th, all quiet then. Gen. T. designed to remain at his camp till the 1st April.

There were many reports at Brazos Santiago, on the 28th ult. It was rumored that a large body of Mexicans were in the neighborhood of Saltillo, and that Gen. Taylor had fallen back on Monterey, and expected every day to have a battle, as the Mexicans were following him up.

The New Orleans Mercury, March 12, evening, says-

We learn from Captain Somers, of the schooner James & Samuel, which arrived to day from Brazos Santiago, that an express came into that place on the 4th instant, stating that a Mexican force had passed Matamoros on the opposite (Texas) side of the river on the morning of the 4th. Captain Somers could not learn the number of men, or who commanded them. This arrival brought no letters or papers for this city.

The New Orleans Delta of the 12th says-

The reports in circulation, as to the advance of the enemy, 15,000 strong, on Saltillo, are, beyond a doubt, true; and Gen. Taylor has by this time, either fought and whipped the Mexicans again, at Agua Nueva, or has fallen back on Monterey. The great fear entertained by General Taylor's friends is, that should he fall back on Monterey, and a force of 15,000 should advance upon that place, that being obliged to keep his whole force (5000) at Monterey, the enemy would be strong enough to detach a portion, (say 5000,) to act on his base of operations, and by uniting with the force known to be under Urrea, (some 3500 or 4000 men,) effectually break up in detail, Camargo, Matamoros and the Brazos St. Jago, thereby cutting off all supplies from General Taylor, and obliging him to subsist in a country even now drained by the demands of so large a force as we have maintained, in the country around Monterey. The black fort at Monterey may be made impregnable, and with even the small force under his command General Taylor could hold it against any force the Mexicans might bring against it, should be compelled to retire on that position. Camargo is tolerably well fortified, and Matamoros has recently been fortified under the direction and superintendence of Col. Lloyd Tilghman.

Besides the large force advancing under Santa Anna from San Luis Potosi, and that of Urrea by the way of Victoria, there is another force of the enemy under Canales, who has a force under his command well calculated to give great annoyance along the whole line of the Rio Grande. This is the force referred to by Colonel Morgan, as acting between Monterey and Camargo. A portion of it is under Carrabajal, engaged in levying a tax on all goods brought into, and carried out of Matamoros by traders.

Carrabajal, with his bandit rancheros, has established a cordon of posts for 39 miles around Matamoros, and in the absence of custom house buildings holds his revenue court under some convenient tree. Such is his audacity, that on the 15th ult. he slept with his command of 100 men, at Puerta Verdes only one league from...
Matamoros, awaiting a stock of goods supposed to be coming from the Boca del Rio, by way of Burrita. The commanding officer at Matamoros has no cavalry at his disposal, and this Carrabajal is perfectly aware of, and can levy his contributions, with impunity, even within a mile of the city. [ANP]

NNR 72.048 March 20, 1847  Gen. Stephen Watts Kearny's code of laws for New Mexico

LAWS OF THE TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO

We are indebted to a friend of Santa Fe, for a copy of the organic law for the government of the territory of New Mexico, and also for a code of laws, established by Gen. Kearny, to carry out the provision of the constitution. This work comprises 115 pages, and the text is in Spanish and English, placed in juxtaposition. We have already published a synopsis of the constitution. The laws are fashioned very much after our own, saving such changed as are demanded by the condition of the people of New Mexico—are arranged under regular heads, and embrace everything necessary to preserve the rights of the people.

NNR 72.049 March 27, 1847 Gen. Scott general order No. 20 respecting atrocities

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY
Tampico, February 19, 1847

1. It may well be apprehended that many grave offences nor provided for in the act of congress establishing rules and articles for the government to ...[large water stain has permanently damaged the rest of the first paragraph].

2. Assassination, murder, malicious wounding, maiming, rape, malicious assault and battery, robbery, theft; the wanton desecration of churches, cemeteries, or other religious edifices and fixtures, and the destruction, except by order of a superior officer, of public or private property, are such offences.

3. The good of the service, the honor of the United States, and the interests of humanity, imperiously demand that every crime committed above should be severely punished.

4. But the written code, as above, commonly called the "rules and articles of war" provides for the punishment of not one of their crimes, even when committed by the individuals of the army upon the persons or property of the same, except in the very restricted case in the ninth of those articles, not for like outrages, committed by the same individuals, upon the persons or property of a hostile country, except very partially, in the 51st, 52nd, and 55th articles; and the same code is absolutely silent as to all the injuries which may be inflicted upon the individuals of the army, or their property, against the laws of war, by individuals of a hostile country.

5. It is evident that the 99th article, independent of any reference to the restriction of the 87th is wholly nugatory in reaching any one of those high crimes.

6. For all the offences, therefore, enumerated in the second paragraph above, which may be committed abroad, in, by, or upon the army, a supplemental code is absolutely needed.

7. That unwritten code is martial law, as an addition to the military code, prescribed by congress in the rules and articles of war, and which unwritten code all armies, in hostile countries, are forced to adopt, not only for their own safety, but for the protection of unoffending inhabitants and their property, about the theatre of military operations, against the injuries contrary to the laws of war.

8. From the same supreme necessity, martial law is hereby declared, as a supplemental code in and all about all camps, posts, and hospitals which may be occupied by any part of the forces of the United States in Mexico, and in and about all columns, escorts, convoys, guards, and detachments of the said forces, while engaged in prosecuting the existing war in and against said republic.

9. Accordingly, every crime enumerated in paragraph 2 above, above, whether committed—By any inhabitant of Mexico, sojourner, or traveler therein upon the person or property of any individual of the United States forces, retainer, or follower of the same: By any individual of the said forces, retainer, or follower, of the same, upon the person or property of any inhabitant of Mexico, sojourner, traveler, therein; order any individual of the said forces, retainer, or follower, of the same, shall be duly tried and punished under the said supplemental code.

10. For the purpose it is ordered that all offenders in the matter aforesaid shall be promptly seized and confined, and reported for trial before military commissions, to be duly appointed as follows:

11. Every military commission under this order will be appointed, governed, and limited, as prescribed by the 65th, 66th, 67th, and 97th of the said rules and articles of war; and the proceedings of such commissions will be duly recorded, in writing, reviewed, revised, disapproved, or approved, and the sentences executed— all is in the cases of the proceedings and sentences of court-martials; provided that no military commission shall try any case clearly cognizable, by court-martial... (completely illegible from the same stain as before)

12. This order will be read at the head of every company of the United States' forces serving in Mexico or about to enter on that theater of war.

By Command of Major General Scott,

NRR 72.057-058, March 27, 1847 PROCLAMATION OF SANTA ANNA

COUNTRYMEN—Faithful to the solemn promises which I made on my return to this country in August last, and determined to respect the national will, whatever it should be, I have all my attention to the defence of the country, to the sustaining of her threatened liberties, to restore to our arms their old brilliancy, (which had been tarnished in the late conflicts,) and the rout the enemy who attempts to blot out Mexico from the catalogue of nations. Fully satisfied with the honor of exposing my life for the good of my country, (and perhaps, not without hopes of acquiring an immortal name, in securing her glory forever, by placing her in that prominent position which she ought to occupy amongst the civilized nations of this part of the globe,) I came to take command of the army. I knew very well how dangerous the Surrounded by difficulties and thousands of obstacles, which I had seen without being able to surmount, and to do all which, as a Mexican and as a general who loves his country and his honor, I might think expedient and necessary, I felt very much afflicted, considering myself as the great centre of all hopes, and I trembled contemplating how closely leagued are my destinies with those of this country, which is so beloved by me. A single fault on my part could have submerged her forever in abyss of ignomy; and that it was easy to do but difficult to mend.

The supreme government knew all my afflictions and fears, as I took care of advising it of all, placing constantly before it the doleful picture of the sufferings which the army was enduring. And I continually requested them to send resources to cover the great and urgent necessities with which I was surrounded; but I did not wish to publish my frequent and nearly daily communications, fearing that my letters might be badly interpreted, and also that the enemy would be made acquainted by them of our painful and difficult situation, and would have recovered more courage and probably have undertaken larger enterprises.

I thought of deserving, by such noble conduct, the esteem of all my fellow citizens, who, certainly, being aware of the facts, could not do less than appreciate in it all that should be considered noble and great. But, unfortunately, I see that I was mistaken, and that far from granting to me their sympathy, if not praise, they heap upon me their affronts and vituperation. I am accused of apathy and inaction. It is supposed that I see with cool indifference the ills of the country, and some of them have gone so far as to present me in the eyes of the world as a traitor.

Why then this detention in San Luis? says the hostile party of the press. Why, when the general of the enemy freely and with a small body of troops explores the States of Coahuila, Nueva Leon, and Tamaulipas, do they not go out and meet him? Why does not the commander in chief advance into the country? Fellow citizens, hear me, and believe that no one wishes more than myself that the day of glory for the country, the day of confusion and horror to the unjust enemy, should shine; but, unfortunately, holy as my wishes are, the difficulties are great with which I am beset.

On my arrival at the capitol, the army was not what it is today, as you will easily see by my narration. Since that time it has been increased three-fourths of its original force. I did not find here, nor was there any, in any other places, a deposit of men, horse, or equipments. I was compelled first to send for the men of all the states to fill up the regiments. A soldier cannot be made at once, and the whole world knows that the ordnance requires four months at least of instruction, for the purpose of being able to do duty in time of peace. Would it have been prudent, then, wishing to escape from the note of inaction to take the initiative, and to present myself to the field with an army of novices, composed of men taken up in the moment from their domestic occupation? Would the people not accuse me then, and with more reason, of having exposed to an evident danger, the honor of our arms and the liberty of our country, having committed the imprudence of operation with men and not with soldiers? Was it not my duty to prepare ammunition--to collect and improve the arms--to bring from all points the artillery, and at last to gather all the war materials? Think about this with impartiality, and afterwards judge if I deserve to be reprimanded. But it is not sufficient; if we desire to secure a victory to our arms, that the army which I have the honor to command should be numerous and disciplined; it is not sufficient if this army is possessed of the most eminent enthusiasm to avenge the outrages that have been done to the nation; this is a great deal, certainly, but it is by not means all that is required. Full of fire, and desirous of glory, the gallant republicans of the army of the Alps would not have been able to do what they did if instead of finding the beautiful and fertile fields of Italy, they had met with barren deserts and obliged to cross in the horrid nudity in which they were. No help could be given to them for the moment; but they young general, from the snowy top of the Alps, pointed out to them the relic cities which would become a prize to their army. They saw with wonder the magnificent palaces to which victory led them. Has the Mexican soldier the same perspective? He has to march through his own country, and he is obliged to respect the houses and the property of his countrymen, who expect from him protection. All nearly deserted, it does not offer a shelter against the elements, nor a sufficient quantity of water for the men and horses; if we advance, it is necessary to put from distance to distance deposits of provisions where the soldier will be able to find, after being worn down by fatigue and hunger, the necessary resources to live on. Without this it seems impossible for the army to make any movement. Has anything been done concerning this important matter, although I have made thousands of representations? It is very painful to tell it, Mexicans, but I cannot keep it secret any longer; nothing has been done, and what is worse, I don’t see that there is any prospect of doing it. They army is kept in a state of great nakedness, and in the most dreadful misery--so much so that for twenty-five days I have not been able to pay their rations, which have been therefore taken on credit.

The heroic defenders of Monterey, wounded by the balls of the enemy, are lying here, quite abandoned, without any other assistance than that which the charity and the patriotism of a few inhabitants give them.

There is not in this fellow citizens, any exaggeration. I appeal to the testimony of the authorities of San Luis; since the 25th of December it has been scarcely possible to assist the troops with two days’ pay, which has served more to pay off old debts than to attend to present necessities. Of the $400,000 appropriated for the expenses of the army, only $175,000 have come to hand which was received in December last, and nothing this present month; and in order to help the great wants I was compelled to engage my personal credit for the amount of $20,000 which were lent to me on pledge of my private property, and which were sent to the division in observation at Tula. Could the army under such miserable circumstances, make a movement? Far, very far, am I from insinuating that the Mexican soldier depends upon the promptness with which his country pays him, but there are difficulties which it is impossible for us to overcome. It is impossible to give rations to the troops when there are no rations, or to pay them when there is no money. This is, as described, the situation of the army, as courageous, and as full of patriotism as any other in the world, which it will sacrifice itself with its chiefs for the national honor; it is its wish, and if it asks for assistance, only to satisfy its wants, it does it so as to be able to approach the enemy, to sustain its good name, and the glory and liberty of the nation to which it belongs.

Useless have been, till today, all the endeavors I have used, all the steps that I have taken, having view of the receipts of the necessary funds. Notes over notes were almost daily repeated, showing the horrid state in which the troops were placed. The answers to all these were promises and remote hopes, which I fear will never be realized, or if so, they will come perhaps too late.

I think that I have fulfilled, by this, my duties because it is not for me to propose the way of providing the necessary funds, and I have only to say that if the nation wishes, as I think, to carry on the war, it must be known that those small sums that have been remitted are not of great help, because they will do only to cover the wants of a day; they are not sufficient to make permanent impression, nor to base further operations upon. If those who are able to do it are not willing to help the army, the only protection which the country has will be exposed, and they may lose all, with their independence, and they will be obliged to transmit to posterity a name full of ignominy.

Countrymen: I would have omitted to present to you such a picture as that given to you now, and which I know will fill your hearts with bitterness; but I find myself compelled to give you notice of all that occurs. It would be a crime were it not brought to your notice. I do not accuse any one, nor do I direct myself to any body; but I cannot consent that, the honor of they army, and mine also, should suffer when in no period of our history has the army deserved more credit and more esteem from the whole country.

Concerning myself, I shall repeat the last time, Mexicans, that I still recollect that the nation called me to defend her in the present contest, and to restore to her her liberty, honor, and glory, or perish with her. This is my only desire, and I do not want, nor do I pretend anything else. But if, unfortunately, credit should not be given to my words--if, against all hopes, somebody should think me not capable of keeping faith with them, I shall prove it with deeds. Tell me, if it is desired to deliver up to the command of the army, and I will do it, although I would lose by that the last opportunity to acquire an immortal name; because when it concerns my country, her feelings and glory, there is nothing, nothing in the world, difficult to me. I will retire if it is thought useful, not to take the power which was conferred upon me a few days ago, because I have already said more than once that I do not wish any more employment nor other honor than that of saving my country in the present war with the United States; and as soon as it has been done I shall retire to my domestic hearth, and no human power will be able to take me from thence to public life. And still if my self-denial is not judged sufficient--if my presence is thought dangerous on the soil on which I was born--I shall seek in a foreign country an asylum for my last days, in which I shall pray constantly for the prosperity and increase of my country. For, very far am I from having an ambition less noble and praiseworthy because, undeceived of the value of power and distinction, there only remains to me one true pleasure, which is to deserve and enjoy the applause and esteem of my fellow citizens.

NRR 72.058 March 27, 1847 Comments on the series of demonstrations toward peace undertaken by the executive

TREATING WITH MEXICO FOR PEACE

A series of demonstrations, have been made for our Executive, which, if judiciously conceived, have certainly been most unfortunate in their results.

The whole country was taken by surprise, when the president in his annual message of December 1845, announced to congress that a minister had already embarked and was probably by that time in Mexico, charged with the duty of proposing terms with a view of avoiding war. The most profound secrecy was said to be to steal a march upon the European governments. We took occasion, at the time, to express deep felt regret that an open, formal, respectful, and imposing mission, had not been preferred to a secret one--and that a purpose had not been publicly avoided, of proposing to Mexico to purchase, for a fair equivalent, the California, and to adjust the boundary lines between us, as well as all other subjects of the difference, in an amicable as well as equitable spirit. Twenty, or twenty-five millions of dollars would have been cheerfully paid by the country for the Mexican ports upon the Pacific and intervening territory. Such a sum, offered in a manner not wounding to the pride of the Mexican nation, would have been a relief to them, and one in their known financial difficulties, not to be disregarded. Mexico might and we think ought to have been approached for a purchase of California, as France was for the purchase of Louisiana, and Spain was for that for Florida. It would have been a plain "business transaction," and instead of being roused at once to the defense of their sovereignty, instead of having their self-respect and pride to rally and maintain, they would have come to the question as a matter of interest--is California, and the slender chance there is of Mexico retaining it much longer, worth more than the United States now offers us for it? Mexican statesmen as well as all other intelligent men, must, know, that it is beyond the power of any government to arrest the tide or turn the humor of emigration which is sweeping onward with resistance impetuously from east to west--and they must be aware too, that the Mexican government could not long pretend to control the new population which California is about to acquire in this process. Had they not better embrace the opportunity of getting a fair price for the territory, than by attempting to hold on, inevitably lose it?

Such, we have very little doubt, might have been made the question of the Mexicans--had they been approached by as every sovereign independent power has a right to require, and as a weak and touchy neighbor would be more likely to be scrupulous is requiring and which a republic, of all other governments, is bound to be scrupulous about.

Instead of being so approached, it unfortunately happened that when Mr. Sidell reached the republic of Mexico, he took the Mexican people as much by surprise as his appointment occasioned there. The executive of Mexico, tottering before, was overwhelmed by the suspicion which Mr. Sidell's approach is so secret, so questionable a manner, aroused against them. Herrara fell, under the weight of these implications. Paredes succeeded to power upon the very question of rejecting the overture which Mr. Sidell was suspected of making.

A second demonstration was made, it is supposed, by a mission to Cuba, whilst Santa Anna was resident upon that island, which was certainly not more fortunate in its results, even if more judicious in its inception.

A third approach, if we may credit the United States Gazette, and other prominent journals, has recently attempted, with no better success. The following extract will furnish our readers with a specimen of what is said upon the subject. We look for some official or semi-official notice of the affair, to place the Executive in its proper position.

From the United States Gazette

THE MISSION AND THE MISSIONARIES

"Meanwhile, we hear of a peace mission, kept secret till now, of Senor Atocha, a resident of the city, but a South American (and a Mexican, we believe) by birth."

The above is from the New York Express. We wish to notice a slight inaccuracy in the remarks of our contemporary, and then to note a flagrant wrong by the government. Atocha, we believe, is not a Mexican, by birth; if he is, he certainly cannot be a South American.

But let us look at the mission of this man, if indeed, he really has had any mission. Whom has the President of the United States sent on a deliberate errand to the Mexican government, to a people proverbially jealous of personal and national policy?

Atocha, we have heard, is a native of Old Spain. He went some years ago to Mexico, where he resided, but having rendered himself very odious to the government, he was dismissed from the country, and left it in disgrace. He then landed at New Orleans where, after some time, he was admitted as one of the police of the city. There he made out an account against the Mexican government, of the items of which, or the vouchers, we know nothing. Subsequently, he preceded north, and after various movements, it seems he was selected, of all men in the United States, to go on a delicate mission to Mexico, to be the bearer of the wishes and views of the republic of the United States, of which we do not know that he is even a citizen, to the republic of Mexico, from which he had been banished.

We speak from information: and if our information is correct, surely nothing could be considered more injudicious (to use no harder term), than the employment of such a man upon such a mission to such a people. It is not strange that the extraordinary minister of the United States should have found a great difficulty in landing, and it is less strange that the editors of the Mexican papers should express a belief that his mission would prove abortive; for successful and unsuccessful, as the obstinacy or miseries of the Mexican may triumph, it is evident that no ordinary circumstances could warrant the president of the United States to entrusting the affairs of government with this type of man. And no man with any respect for the government of an independent nation, would offend that nation by sending an important message, leading to a national negotiation, by a person situated as that man is with Mexico.

We hope, or rather we desire, that peace may be result from this, or some other proposition; but we cannot believe that the people will sustain such a step as has been taken, if any such mission has been made. There are gentlemen enough in the United States, who speak the Spanish language well, to do the errands of the government; and if nothing but a partisan will serve the president, we doubt not that some of his own side could be found. NNR 72.059 March 27, 1827 collection of troops and transports at Lobos Island for the demonstration on Veracruz

The Army of Invasion. Whilst General Taylor with his new command, consisting principally of volunteers, is contending near Saltillo with five times their number of Mexicans, commanded by the most distinguished officers in the Mexican army, General Scott with the main body of regulars, and a formidable portion of the volunteers, are engaged in a demonstration upon Vera Cruz.

After a very short delay at Tampico, General Scott embarked from thence on the 21st Feb. for the little island of Lobos, from which we have dates to the 1st March, at which time about eighty sail of transports, &c. were then laying, and on board of which had been embarked nearly everything that had been on the island, men munitions, provisions; &c. They expected to leave the island on the 2d for Anton Lizardo, and that the assault on Vera Cruz would be made on the 10th of March.

General Worth reached Lobos on the 1st.-Gen. Twiggs arrived a few days
Gen. Patterson was still at Tampico on the 3d of March, on which day the Louisiana volunteers that had been at Lobos arrived, and with their associates that had been wrecked in the Ondiaka, were to garrison Tampico. They had suffered severely by sickness.

The Mississippi volunteers that were at Lobos, part of the 2d regiment, had suffered terribly by sickness and look miserably. They were ordered to repair to Monterey and report to Gen. Taylor, and had embarked accordingly.

The three men that were under arrest as spies at Lobos were tried after General Scott's arrival, and acquitted.

The Alexandria Gazette says—We have seen a letter from the Island of Lobos, dated the 28th of February, which states that there has been a most unreasonable delay in the arrival of transports and munitions of war at that place. They are six weeks later than they out to have been, and up to the latest dates all the troops had not arrived, and several vessels containing ordnance stores, such as cannon and mortars, were wanting. The expedition to Vera Cruz will consist of about 12,000 troops and probably 100 sails of all kinds. Gen. Scott, it is said, expects to have boats enough to land 5,000 troops at once.

A letter in the New York Journal of Commerce states that forty howitzers, capable of discharging forty shells in a minute, have been sent to Vera Cruz, to be used half a mile in the rear of that city. The letter adds—"They can, from that point, destroy the town in five hours, if necessary. If the Mexican army should make a rally, gen. Scott will be ready to receive them. The position also commands the Castle—and, at a distance of three quarters of a mile, beyond the reach of any gun in the Castle. We have also the best engineer officers in the world."

The latest date from Gen. Scott's division of our forces was brought to New Orleans by the brig Ann Still, which left Tampico on the 3d inst. Captain Stafford, 8th regiment U. S. infantry, came passenger; having fallen into the hold of the vessel whilst disembarking his company, and broken two of his ribs, he returns to recruit.

A correspondent of the Picayune, writing from Tampico, February 28, says—"This morning the U. States steamer Edith, from Brazos Santiago, with Gen. Worth and staff and two companies of troops on board, touched off the bar at the mouth of our river, coming to anchor two miles outside, and sent despatches up to Gen. Patterson. I went down with a friend and saw Gen. Worth; found him in good health and fine spirits. The Edith being bound for Lobos Island, sailed on her course at half past 2 P.M. The U. S. steamer Alabama, now lying in the stream opposite the city, is to sail to-morrow with General Patterson, staff and troops. The steamer Virginia, with Gen. Pillow, do. do. do. If the transports on the way here from the Brazos arrive, it is probable that by the last of this week all the forces to leave will have sailed.

"Whether there be a battle any where else, it seems to be pretty certain that we shall have one at Vera Cruz, and before we get to Vera Cruz. It is known here that the enemy are preparing to give us a warm reception on landing. In the rear of Anton Lizardo they have built strong fortifications, too far for the guns of our squadron to bear upon them, but in reach of the point of landing.

"On these fortifications very heavy guns are mounted, and other arrangements are made and being made, to make a desperate stand against the landing of our troops. It is also to be expected that the city of Vera Cruz is in a condition to make bloody resistance. But a few days, I hope, will tell the tale, and make all speculation unnecessary. Who doubts the issue?"

"Tampico, March 2.

"I will give the last rumor. News reached here ye s terday that Gen. Minon, leading the advance of Santa Anna's forces against Gen. Taylor, with 500 men, had attempted to surprise Gen. T. by a night assault, but that he met with a total disappointment. The whole force was defeated—how many killed and made prisoners not stated precisely, but they were essentially whipped." [ANP]
Call for Volunteers--By the annexed letter from Col. Curtis, commanding at Camargo, it will be seen that a call has been made for a large number of volunteers, for the defense of the Rio Grande.

Headquarters, Camargo, March 2, 1847

SIR--I send an officer to headquarters, at Washington, making a requisition on the president of the U. States for fifty thousand six months volunteers. All communication has for several days been cut off between this place and the army above, and I see the adequate relief this side of New Orleans. I request you, therefore, to call out ten thousand men of the character of troops, and I anticipate they will be recognized under the call of the president.

As fast as any considerable force can be accumulated, let then be forwarded to Brazos Santiago. All troops as far as practicable, should be armed before leaving the United States, and the officers commanding companies should take in charge ammunition enough to distribute, in case of emergency, forty rounds at least.

Very respectfully, your obed't servant,

SAMUEL R. CURTIS, Col. Com'ing

To the governor of Louisiana.

The New Orleans Tropic says that the governor of Louisiana expresses his readiness, with his accustomed patriotic fervor, "to pull off his coat and go to work to raise volunteers, and he hopes all good citizens will aid him." This hope, (adds the Tropic) he will assuredly realize; for the citizens of Louisiana, of all parties, will stand by their chief magistrate in any responsibility he may assume in this emergency. [MLL]

The whole country has been kept during the week in a state of intense and daily increasing anxiety. The imminent peril and sufferings to which the several detachments constituting "the army of the north," were evidently exposed when our last accounts left them, and which it was our painful duty to publish in the last number of the Register, were scarcely known before intelligence arrived of the "Army of the Centre" under Gen. Wool and "the Army of Occupation,"--what was left of it, both unified under command of General Taylor, and comprising together about 2,000 men, were attacked by Santa Anna with a force so vastly superior, as to leave the issue very doubtful if not disastrous.

The first report, reached us on Saturday night, that a battle or battles had been fought, in which two thousand of our army, and four or five thousand of the Mexicans had been killed or wounded--and that General Taylor was falling back on Monterey--that in the mean time a formidable division of Mexicans under Urrea was advancing upon Camargo--that a number of wagons on their route from Camargo to Monterey had been taken by the Mexicans, their teamsters all murdered, and that all communication with Monterey was cut off.

The communications have but cut off, but the rumors of the battles are altogether derived from Mexican authority. When the last accounts left Gen. Taylor, a fight was expected immediately.

By the Palmetto steamship which reached New Orleans on the 15th, we have Galverston dates to the 6th, Brazos dates to the 7th, and Camargo to the (?) instant, but nothing later than the 23d ult. from Monterey.

The 2d Mississippi regiment reached Matamoros on the 5th instant. They relieve the Indiana regiment, which was to leave the 6th for Camargo. [AMA]
Our government have had considerable difficulty in understanding Santa Anna’s game. Many believed that in spite of all his pretenses, he was in reality disposed to take the two or three millions of dollars from the United States and to ask our aid to maintain him in supremacy at Mexico, in order to render the concessions he might make, available. The president may have continued to entertain this opinion.
Perhaps Gen. Benton shared this opinion with him.

Our generals in the field appear to have been no less puzzled to understand the arch Mexican’s movements. When he publicly announced in general orders and in his address to his companions in arms, his design to march to the north and fight the invaders of Mexico at all hazards--and at the same time published the remonstrance which is inserted in this number of the Register, exposing the utter destitution of his army, of requisite means for such a conflict, few appeared to believe in his sincerity, or to think it possible that he could attempt such a march. His sincerity was doubted.
All were curious to know his real purpose.

It appears by the issue, that for once at least Santa Anna was candid. He apprised friends and foes of the direction he was about to take, and the plight he was taking it in. Whether he has been successful or not, must soon be ascertained. One thing has been ascertained, and that is, that he is a skillful, bold, and intrepid commander.

By one of the most daring expedients we have ever read of, he succeeded in obtaining General Scott’s express, containing his entire plan for the ensuing campaign, which our readers will also find inserted amongst the documents inserted in this number. Of this knowledge he had availed himself, and took his own measures accordingly.

General Taylor has been not only a brae and sagacious, but also a most fortunate officer. He was the first, if we mistake not, to win the brevet in the war with Great Britain, in 1812--and the first to be brevetted for still greater distinction in the present war. It is to be hoped that his luck will not have failed him in the present emergency. What a good commander could do under the circumstances, we have full faith in his having done. He may again have full faith in his having done. He may again have been victorious in the unequal conflict to which he has been exposed. If he has been, his former laurels may possibly fade in comparison with those he has now won. If on the contrary, he shall have been overwhelmed, but we refrain from that theme.

Whilst on one hand we have it confidently assumed, and that too in articles evidently penned by men of superior military intelligence, that General Taylor would by no means have been justifiable in waiting Santa Anna’s attack either at Agua Nueva, or at Saltillo, but must have prudently fallen back upon Monterey in time to prevent disaster, we have it on the other hand asserted in the New York Sun, on authority of a letter from an individual in the army, dated at Monterey the 20th Feb. which says, that Gen. Taylor selected Agua Nueva for a field-fight with Santa Anna’s whole army and that Gen. Marshall, on the day named, left Monterey with four pieces of artillery, and all the disposed forces, to join Gen. Taylor, who was then hourly expecting an attack from Santa Anna. From the tenor of the letter, it would seem that Gen. Taylor had selected his ground for a fight. The tenor of all the letters from that direction, including the latest from Gen. Taylor himself, instead of retiring from their advanced positions.

By the latest arrival from Tampico we have city of Mexico dates to the 27 th February. A letter is published from Santa Anna, dated the 17 th Feb. from San Salvador, at 10 o’clock, a.m. In this he says Gen. Taylor was in force at Agua Nueva--twenty leagues distant--and preparing for a general action, with seven or eight thousand troops, and with more than twenty pieces of artillery. He announces his own intention to fight him on the 21 st, and adds: "By the time this letter reaches you, there will have been a great action fought, the result of which will be of incalculable consequence to the country." He represents his own troops to be full of enthusiasm.

The latest movement of Santa Anna’s force is indicated in a number of El Rupublicano of the 25 th ult. It is published as very important. It is a letter from San Luis Potosi dated February 20 th, which announces the receipt of information by a captain who had just arrived, that "the Yankees had abandoned Agua Nueva, at which point they had fortified, retreating upon Saltillo. Our active General Santa Anna has cut off their retreat upon Monterey, by interposing between Monterey, and Saltillo Gens. Minon and Torrejon."
But on the other hand again, the last line of Mr. Kendall's latest postscript from Tampico of the 7th of March says: "General Taylor has had no fight, but has fallen back on Saltillo and Monterey."

The Savannah Republican has information said to be derived from Lieut. F. of the regular army, on his way to Washington. Lieut. F. had seen, since, he left Monterey, a letter from General Taylor to his son-in-law, Dr. Wool, in which he says, that he was sixteen miles from Saltillo, with his own and Wool's command, amounting to 5,800 effective men, and was retiring quietly to Monterey.

There would seem to have been fault somewhere, that thus within the brief space of eight months, the whole country should twice be thrown into a state of alarm for the safety of General Taylor's command, and that requisitions should twice have to be made extra-officially upon the nearest state authorities for troops to fly to the rescue. In the first instances Gen. Taylor escaped as if by miracle; we say nothing of the miracles that required to be performed to insure success at Monterey, with an army without a battering train to assault such fortifications as were there won.

General Gaines was in command of the southern military division last May, when General Taylor was in imminent danger between Matamoros and Point Isabel. That officer immediately assumed the responsibility of making a requisition for volunteers upon Louisiana and the neighboring states, to rescue General Taylor. The requisition was promptly met, but the general had to suffer for exercising unauthorized power in the premises. Colonel Curtis, who is represented to be "a cool, judicious, and deliberate officer," seems not to have been admonished by General Gaines' fate in that instance. The general's requisition was for a few battalions at most. Colonel Curtis draws with a bolder pen; ten thousand men from the single state of Louisiana--and fifty thousand men--the total amount of volunteers authorised by the act of congress, forgetting we presume the portion of the fifty thousand that are already in the field under the act alluded to, the whole fifty thousand are embraced in the colonel's requisition upon the president!

Colonel Curtis no doubt feels the deep responsibility of his own position, in command at Camargo, where it is stated that government stores, munitions, clothing and supplies for the army are deposited to the value of five or six millions of dollars. This would be a prize in the present condition of the Mexican army worth fighting for. A formidable division of Mexicans under Urrea and several predatory corps, are undoubtedly in that direction. If General Taylor has not severely defeated Santa Anna--if, as is supposed, he has retired to Monterey, with a design of there defending himself, that place will be invested, and a large portion of Santa Anna's army may be detached towards the Rio Grande in pursuit of what they are so much in need of.

Meantime, General Scott, it will be seen, is actively occupied in approaching Vera Cruz. The probability is, that before this time he is in possession of that city, and with an army of 12 to 15,000 of our choicest troops, he is there, within 252 miles of the city of Mexico, and 240 miles from Tampico. From Tampico to San Luis Potosi, is 120 miles; from San Louis Potosi to Mexico is 380 miles, and to Saltillo 320 miles. Santa Anna left San Luis the 3d, and is said to have fought General Taylor on the 22d or 23d of February. By the 10th of March, the day assigned by report for General Scott to attack Vera Cruz, Santa Anna may have accomplished something of his errand to the north, and be able to retrace his steps in time to defend. San Luis before Gen. Scott could reach that place.

Vera Cruz has a population of not over six or seven thousand. Its importance to Mexico is as a commercial sea port, of which she has so few that are safe upon her eastern coast. In a time of war, when the commerce of Mexico is entirely suspended by blockade, Vera Cruz is comparatively valueless to them. To the United States it would be an important key, but not so important we apprehend, as that its possession would, as some assert, enable us to dictate a peace.

These are all speculations. True, but when intense interest is excited, it is impossible to restrain the mind from searching for probabilities. It is not only prudent, it is a duty to look out, and see, as well as we can, how the land lies. [AMA]

NNR 72.060, March 27, 1847 THE LATEST OFFICIAL ACCOUNTS FROM THE ARMY

The painful anxiety which now pervades the public mind in regard to the situation of General Taylor's army, has induced us to apply to the war department for the latest authentic information on the subject. We have been furnished with two following dispatches, the last received from General Taylor, and we now lay them before our readers--Wash. Union

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF OCCUPATION
Agua Nueva, 18 miles south of Saltillo, February 7, 1847.

Sir: I changed my headquarters to this place on the 5th inst., bringing forward, in the first instance, Lieut. Col. May's squadron of dragoons; two batteries, (Sherman's and Bragg's) and the regiment of Mississippi riflemen. Yesterday the second Kentucky and second and third Indiana regiments came up, and will be joined in a day or two by the other troops in and near Saltillo, except the small garrison of seven companies left in that town.

Although advised by Major General Scott to evacuate Saltillo, I am confirmed in my purpose of holding not only that point, but this position in front. Not to speak of the pernicious moral effect upon volunteer troops of falling back from points which we have gained, there are powerful military reasons for occupying this extremity of the pass rather than the other. The scarcity of water and supplies for a long distance in front compels the enemy either to risk an engagement in the field, or to hold himself aloof from us; while, if we fall back on Monterey, he could establish himself strongly at Saltillo, and be in a position to annoy more effectively our flanks and our communications.

I have no intelligence from the interior more recent or authentic than that heretofore communicated. There is understood to be no considerable force in our front, nor is it likely that any serious demonstration will be made in this direction. The frequent alarms since the middle of December, seem to have been without substantial foundation. I am happy to add that the population of Saltillo is fast returning to the city. Under the judicious management of Major Warren, a discreet officer of Illinois volunteers, who commands in the town, it is hoped that the people may remain quietly in their homes.

I respectfully inclose copies of statements, showing the names of the officers and men recently captured by the enemy, as reported in my despatch No. 11. I am sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Z. TAYLOR,
Major General U.S. army commanding.

The ADJUTANT GENERAL of the army,
Washington, D.C.

NRR 72.061 March 27, 1847 Memoranda of Dr. Jarvis, alarming rumors respecting Gen. Taylor's Army, and excitement in the Rio Grande

From the New Orleans Picayune, March 14

The United States schooner Agripa arrived yesterday afternoon, from the mouth of the Rio Grande, having sailed thence on the 6th instant. Dr. Jarvis, of the U. S. Army, came passenger on her. He is the bearer of the dispatches from Col. Curtis, commanded at Camargo, to the government at Washington.

Dr. Jarvis left on the 21st instant. There had been nothing received by Gen. Taylor for several days. The rumors which prevailed were brought through by Mexicans, and were of most contradictory character. To enable us to distinguish what is known to be true from what is merely rumored, and thus to correct as far as possible by the exaggerated reports in circulation, Dr. Jarvis has at our request furnished us with the following memoranda of events during the month of February of which he was personally cognizant.

[MEMORANDA OF DR. JARVIS]

Left Monterey on the morning of the 21st of February for Matamoros. At that time no apprehension of expectation of the approach of Santa Anna towards Saltillo was entertained, either by us or by the Mexicans, so far as we could learn by the latter. A large force of cavalry was known, however, to be in the front of Gen. Taylor, which of course was made known by their capture of the detachment of the Arkansas and Kentucky cavalry advanced beyond San Incarnacion. The force of cavalry on this side of the Sierra Madre under command of General Urrea, estimated from six to eight thousand, was said to be at Victoria, and part as far towards Monterey as Mont Morales, when I left the former place. They were, in fact, in Victoria at the time of our troops marched to that place in January last, and returned to Tula as an advance brigade under General Quitman entered the town. The were supposed to setting up a corps of observation, and a belief was entertained that they would seize the first favorable opportunity to strike on our line of communication between Camargo and Monterey, and capture such trains as should happen to be on the road at that time. Gen. Taylor must have apprehended some intentions of this kind, for on my arrival at Matamoros I found them fortifying the piazza of that place in consequence of orders just received from Gen. Taylor to guard against the sudden attack of the whole or part of this force.

I left Camargo on the morning of the 26th of February to return to Monterey, in company with a train of 70 wagons, laden with supplies, and escorted by a company of cavalry, under command of Capt. T.F. Marshall, and a detachment of 20 men belonging to the 23 dragoons. We had not preceded to five miles when an order for our return, in consequence of instruction just received by express, which passes us on the road, directed to the quartermaster at Monterey, which were received from Col. Whitting assistant quartermaster general at the headquarters of General Taylor, directing, for the future, that all trains be stopped, as certain information had been received that a large force of enemy's cavalry, say four or five thousand, was in or near China, and that Cadereits are already occupied them. These last particulars are contained in a hasty note from the quartermaster at Monterey, dated February 23rd, and terminating it with the remark, "look out." With Col. Whiting's instructions also came the order of Gen. Taylor, dated Agua Nueva, February 21, the last one received up to the time of my leaving Camargo, March 2. This order is doubtless the dispatch of Gen. Taylor calling for reinforcements--alluded to by Capt. Montgomery in his note, as mentioned to him by Col. Harding.

On the morning of the 27th another express arrived at Camargo from the from the quartermaster at Monterey, stating, in a note, that he had sent one off the day before, but apprehended that he may have been put off, and, as he understood from Col. Whiting that there were important dispatches from General Taylor calling for reinforcements, he had sent another to advise of this fact.

About 2 o'clock the same day another express arrived with a note from the same officer, dated Monterey, 11 o'clock A.M. February 23, saying an express had just arrived from Saltillo bringing information that Santa Anna sent a summon to Gen. Taylor demanding his surrender. The general told him to come and take him. Santa Anna stated that he had twenty thousand men and that if Taylor demanding his surrender he would eat up in pieces. The note concludes: "The express which left after dark last night says that Taylor was giving the Mexicans hell."

This may be considered the last official communication received, all the subsequent information being derived from the Mexicans. I might here remark, that a note was received from the post master at Monterey, at the same time with the last communication of Capt. Montgomery, which gives the additional particulars that Gen. Taylor had fallen back from Agua Nueva to Saltillo, which I should infer also from the notes of Capt. M., although he does not directly say so. The Mexicans say they lost six pieces of candy at the former place. He moreover states that the General Marshall had gone to the pass of Los Muertos with a view of fortifying it, and large quantities of ammunition had been dispatched from Monterey from Saltillo.

The detachments of the 34 Ohio regiment, under Colonel Morgan and Lieut. Col. Irving--the former having seven companies at Seraivo, and the latter three at Marin--it was greatly feared at Camargo had been cut off by a large force of three thousand men, who are said to have occupied the latter place on the afternoon of the 23rd. Lieut. Col. Irving, in obedience to general order No. 11, is said to have left Marin in the morning of the same day it was occupied by the enemy, marching towards Seraivo, with a view of forming a junction with Col. Morgan, and than preceding to Monterey. Col. Morgan left Seraivo on the 24th, having destroyed, in obedience to the endorsement on the same general order, all such provision and supplies as he could not carry with him. He must of consequence have encountered the enemy in his route, as they had already, as we have seen above, occupied in force Marin, lying between him and Monterey.

Moreover, a train of 120 wagons, which left the 16th or the 17th, laden with provisions, clothing, and &c. is said to have been attacked on the 24th, at or near Ramos, lying between Seraivo and Marin, and, with the escort, captured. The intelligence was brought in by an American or Mexican mule driver, who was with the train, and escaped at the time of the capture. He says that the Mexican s charged at the same time both the front and the rear of the train. After the bring (which was of short duration) ceased, he cautiously ventured from out of the chaparral, with a view of finding some of his comrades. He discovered the Mexican s busily engaged with unharnessing the mules from the wagons, and seeing none of his own party, made his way back, carefully avoiding the road to Camargo.

A hundred Mexican stories were in circulation at Camargo when I left in reference to the battle going on between Gen. Taylor and Santa Anna. They say it has already continued three days, with considerable loss on our side, but much greater on that of the Mexicans. Subsequent accounts represent Gen. Taylor as having fallen back on Monterey. The day I left Camargo a letter was received from the alcade of Vicer, saying that the Mexican troops had entered that town, twenty-four miles distant from the former place, and had made him prisoner of consequence of his endeavoring to secret stories left behind in his charge when Lieut. Col. McCook evacuated the place. Col. Curtis intended to march with his regiment to Monterey in the moment Col. Drake with the 34th Indiana regiment arrived from Matamoras to retrieve him. The latter officer was awaiting the arrival of the Mississippi regiment, which I met on the river a short distance below Matamoras, on its way up. The regiment and six companies of the Virginia regiment, under Lieut. Col. Randolph, which arrived at Camargo the day I left that place, are the only volunteer regiments that had arrived below to Lobos. From what source Gen. Taylor is to expect relief is impossible to say. --Every soldier, and, in fact, double or thrice the number that now constitute the garrisons at the different depots, are actually necessary for their defense, and not one can be spared. Information can hardly reach Gen. Scott in time for him to march a division to his relief.

In addition to the above, which reduces to some order and certainly our information from the Rio Grande, we learn further from Dr. Jarvis that a bearer of dispatches had left Camargo from Tampico, and sailed from the mouth of the Rio Grande on the 6th instant, on the McKim. Id the information we give in another column from Tampico be entirely authentic, the messenger would not reach his destination till the departure of all the troops which can be spared from that point. It would seem, however, that Tampico, by the way of Victoria, General Taylor, by the way of Victoria, General Taylor must look for his reinforcements.

The Mexican citizens in the valley of the Rio Grande are abandoning their homes in crowds. Matamoras and Camargo are stripped of their native inhabitants. They dread the approach of their own army more than the presence of ours.

No fears are expressed for the safety of Camargo, where we have a vast amount of stores. There are 1,500 fighting men in the place, including all classes. They are well armed, and the place so strongly fortified that it will not probably be attempted.

[MLL]
the taxes and customs of a nation can be seized and distributed ad libitum already, it is hard to conceive what further advantages are to be gained by the most amicable negotiations. What does President Polk want to buy with two millions of dollars, when he can get so much for nothing? Philip of Macedon's receipt for taking a fort was sensible enough; but who ever drove an ass laden with silver into an unprotected town? The Mexicans have clearly the vantage ground of their foes. Defeat and invasion may easily be put up with when they leave the conquerors beggars and the vanquished choosers. Santa Anna is flattered with compliments and beset with solicitation, and has the daily refusal of half a dozen overtures of the eternal amity of his enemies. He can hardly do better than strengthen himself by additional defeats and fresh repulses, and leave his adversaries to complete their humiliation and embarrassments by a protracted career of glory.” [AMA]

NNR 72.064 March 27, 1847 Posture of the fleet and armies and Anxiety to ascertain the results of the combat between Santa Anna and Taylor

LATEST FROM OUR ARMY

What a week of intense anxiety to this whole country. How many throbbing hearts, at the moment we put this paper to press, are aching with suspense and yet dreading to hear the intelligence that is expected every hour.

General SCOTT, with the main body of our choicest troops, as at the last dates, on shipboard, on the eve of moving to the assault at Ver Cruz. The next arrival may tell of triumph or defeat--but of blood, and of loss of many lives, beyond doubt.

General Taylor, when our last accounts left him, was on the very eve being attacked by Santa Anna, with the main body of the Mexican army. Numerous Mexican reports say that the battles took place, results variously stated. The most probable of them, that an attempt was made by Minon to surprise Taylor on the night of the 22nd February, at Agua Nueva, 18 miles beyond Saltillo, and that the Mexicans were severely repulsed, losing 400 men. The next morning Gen. Taylor it is believed to retire to Saltillo--where according some accounts another engagement took place--according to others Taylor fell back to Monterey without having any fight. All is uncertainty and anxiety.

This painful suspense in heightened by the fact, that communications from Monterey to Matamoros line been cut off. It is a striking circumstance, that at Matamoros on the 11th of March, they had no intelligence from Gen. Taylor later than the 21st February--and that our latest advises from him, reach us through the city of Mexico! Whatever may have been the result of the collision of the two hostile armies, Gen. Taylor's position must be painful and precarious. If in Monterey, he may be there invested by a portion of Santa Anna's army, whilst with the remainder of his Mexicans that dexterous commander may unite with the forces under Urrea and Canalea, that have already cut off communications in the rear of Gen. Taylor, and together make a dash for Camargo, Matamoros, and the vast military stores that are known to there in depot, accounting it is said to six or seven million in value. The commander at Camargo was evidently startled by the responsibility of his situation, when he dispatched an officer to Washington with a requisition on the president for fifty thousand men.

We have no further intelligence this week from Santa Fe, from which our last week's advices left in a state of great alarm, in consequence of the insurrection movement, and the murder of Governor Bent and his companion in that vicinity. Col. Doniphan's command was left in imminent peril--and fearful apprehensions are entertained for the late of every one of the detachments of the "army of the north".

The arrival of the schooner Hume, at N. Orleans, furnishes Tampico dates to the 7th instant. The substance of the news by her is, that--

General PATTERSON left Tampico on the 21st, the steamer Alabama, to take command of his division under General Scott--General Pillow sailed on the fifth--and General Quitman and Shields were to leave Tampico on the 8th, and 650 of their troops accompanied by General Jessup, and Surgeon Gen. Lawson. All the squadron from Lobos and Tampico were to rendezvous at Anton Lizardo, from which it is not likely that General Scott would proceed to land without being joined by the officers just named.
At Tampico, every hour some new Mexicans version of the affairs between Santa Anna and General Taylor seems to have been received from the Mexicans--no one could tell what to rely on. The last postscript received was from Mr. Kendall to the Picayune, dated the 7th, says: "General Taylor has had no fight, but has fallen back on Saltillo and Monterey." [MLL]

NNR 72.064 March 27, 1847 Jose Mariano de Salas commences revolution in the capital

REVOLUTION IN MEXICO

By the way of Tampico we learn that on the night of the 26th February, a portion of the National Guard in the city of Mexico made its first essay as a pronunciamento. The regiments known as the "Independence" and "Hidalgo", the battalion of "Victoria" and a part of the bodies of "Mima" of "Zapadores" and of "Chalchicomula" under the orders of Gen. D. Martias Pena y Barragan, proclaimed a "plan." The government had at its disposition to oppose this revolutionary attempt 800 troops in the citadel, the 6th permanent infantry, the squadron of Pajaca and those bodies of the National Guard not in favor of pronunciamento. Gen. Canalizo, as commander-in-chief, was preparing to attack the revolutionary forces with a column of 1,000 men.

The New Orleans paper says, "We know not the issue of this revolutionary attempt, but inline to the opinion that it will be successful. Mr. Kendall writes that it has succeeded and the Gen. Salas is in power. He founds his statements on reports at Tampico." Our papers are not late enough to verify them. The administration of Farias has long been tottering and has in all probability succumbed. [MLL]

NNR 72.065 April 3, 1847 Letter on the demoralization of forces under Santa Anna

LETTER FROM PAYMASTER J.B. BUTLER

Monterey, March 3, 1847

I have no doubt of the dissolution of Santa Anna's army, morally and physically, and there will be no more fighting in the region, if there be anywhere.

Gen. Santa Anna is really to be pitied. His men are a wretched set. He had twice, during the battle, to enterprise his lancers to prevent desertion, and they shot down some fifty at each time before he could prevent the flight of the infantry. This information comes from prisoners who deserted as soon as exchanged, and came into Gen. Taylor's camp. They report that Santa Anna is destitute of all kinds of provinces, and that he cannot keep them together.

Santa Anna expected an easy victory. His army was told that the Americans had an abundance of provisions and lots of money, and that they must enter Saltillo the day of the battle and take their supper at our expense. This is the report of persons taken, officers as well as privates. [MLL]

NNR 72.065 April 3, 1847 Gen. Kearny reaches California, attacks Los Angeles

GENERAL KEARNY'S ARRIVAL AT CALIFORNIA

Letters from Tampico, near San Blas, give accounts from California to the 18th of January. Gen. Kearny had arrived with 200 men near New Mexico. Uniting other forces with his own, he immediately attacked the town of Los Angeles, and retook it, after a stout resistance. Upper California is now is our undisputed possession. [MLL]

GENERAL ORDERS NO. 19
Headquarters of the Army
Tampico, February 18, 1847

The General-in-chief announces to the army the staff officers who are attached to general headquarters in the field.

Department of Orders

First Lieut. H.L. Scott, 4th infantry, aid-de-camp and acting assistant adjutant general.
First Lieut. T. Williams, 4th artillery, aid-de-camp.
First Lieut. E. P. Seammon, topographical engineer, acting aid-de-camp.
Second Lieut. G. W. Lay, 6th infantry, military secretary.

General Staff Officers

Capt. James Monroe, 6th infantry, acting assistant inspector general.
Col. J. G. Totten, chief of the corps of engineers.
Major W. Turnbull, acting chief of topographical engineers.
Capt. B. Huger, acting chief of ordinance.
Major S. McRee, acting chief of the quartermasters department.
Capt. J. B. Grayson, acting chief of subsistance department.
Major E. Kirby, acting chief of pay department.
Surgeon Gen. T. Lawson, chief of the medical department.

The senior field officer of artillery, Col. J. Bankhead, 2d artillery, will enter upon the duties of chief of artillery as soon as there shall be occasion for planting heavy batteries. All general staff officers will be mainly employed in their respective departments of duty, and any orders that any chief of department may give in relation to his peculiar duties in the name and by the authority of the general in-chief of the army, will be promptly obeyed.

By command of Major General Scott.

H.L. Scott, A.A.A.G.

WASHINGTON, MARCH 27, 1847.

Extracts from the act approved March 3, 1847, in reference to the acceptance of such of the volunteers now with the army in Mexico, as may, on the expiration of their present term, voluntarily engage to re-enter the service for the period of during the war.

Sec. 3. And it be further enacted, That the president be and he is hereby authorized to accept the services of such of the volunteers now in Mexico as, in his opinion, the state of the public service may require, and who may, at the termination of the present term, voluntarily engage to serve during the war with Mexico, and to organize the same into companies, battalions, and regiments, agreeably to existing laws, and to commission the officers for the same.

Sec 4. And it be further enacted, That in addition to pay and allowances provided for the volunteers now in the service of the United States, under existing laws, each volunteer who shall re-enter the service under the provisions of this act in Mexico, immediately after the close of his present term of service, shall be entitled to a bounty of twelve dollars, to be paid as soon as the company shall have been duly mustered and received by the mustering and inspecting officer.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the president be and he is hereby authorized to accept the service of individual volunteers to fill vacancies which may occur by death, discharge, or other causes in the volunteer regiments or corps now in the service of the United States, or which may be received during the existing war with Mexico.

2. In conformity with the law, the president directs that the volunteers in Mexico be received into the service of the United States for "during the war," should they so desire, and the officers commanding divisions, brigades, or a less number of the forces in Mexico, are authorized to accept their services, designate proper officers to remuster them on the expiration of their present terms, and are directed to take all proper measure within the scope of their powers to carry out the provisions of the law.

3. The volunteers who may so render their services for a second term will be received by companies, consisting of one captain, one first lieutenant, two second lieutenants, and not less than sixty-four privates and then be organized into battalions and regiments. Although preferable, it is not deemed indispensable and commands should be made up of officers and men from state.

4. Single companies, as well as independent battalions to consist of four companies, to be commanded by majors, each with an acting adjutant, may be accepted; and may, if deemed expedient, be associated for camp and field service with the regular troops. If organized into brigades and divisions, the requirements of the act approved June 18, 1846, must be observed.

5. The Captain and subalterns will be chosen by the men of the several companies, and will be commissioned by the president accordingly; but in the mean time the company officers will at once enter upon their duties on the authority of the officer who may forward the evidence of their election. It is made the duty of the several Brigadier Generals of volunteers, or such officers as they designate for that purpose, to superintend and hold the elections of the company officers.

6. The field officers will be appointed by the president; and as it is highly essential to the public interest that none but active, efficient officers of every grade should receive commissions, the president invites the recommendations of the several general officers of volunteers serving in the field; and also an expression of the preference of the officers and men who may compose each battalion or regiment, on satisfactory recommendations forwarded from the army.

7. The further instructions of the President, if any be necessary, will be communicated direct to the General commanding in chief and to Major General Taylor.

8. Proper arrangements will be made by the Paymaster General to pay the bounty of twelve dollars in hand to each volunteer as soon as the company to which he may belong shall have duly mustered and received by the mustering and inspecting officer.

9. In the execution of the provisions of this order the public interest will not admit of any delay; and all officers on whom this duty may develop are required to forward their reports without loss of time, to enable the president to make appointments and to complete the re-organization of the volunteer forces according to law. By order, R.
Glorious Example. We beg to direct the attention of our readers to an account of the loss of the American brig of war Somers, which abounds with traits of heroism—heroism, not in destroying, but in saving—which do honor to humanity. The brig was upset in a squall; before she foundered, one boat only could be got out; the men appointed to her implored others on board the sinking ship to take their places, and some actually returned on board to perish with their comrades. But this was not all. The officers and the crews of the French, Spanish, and English ships of war, who witnessed the disaster, exerted themselves with the most glorious bravery to save the lives of the poor fellow clinging to spars and wreckage. In this gallant endeavor, Frenchmen, Spaniards, and Englishmen were all on the sublime level of the highest courage and most exalted humanity. How poor are feats of arms compared with this display of the best virtues of the three nations in sight of each other—one good heart beating in common in all! To crown the glory, the saved were worthy of their preservers, as generous, as brae, as devoted.

The Somers, being employed in the blockade of Vera Cruz, was capsized in a sudden squall; and it was soon clear that she was a sinking state. The following account of what passed is by one of the American crew: "The small quarter boat was cleared away, and dropped carefully round to leeward and manned by her usual complement of five oarsmen. Midshipmen Clarke was ordered by Captain Semmes to take charge of the boat. Finding that there was no chance of saving the brig, and she was fast sinking, Capt. Semmes ordered Mr. Clarke to shove off with Dr. Wright and seventeen men, besides Purser Steele, to pull for Green Island, about half a mile distant, and immediately to return, if possible, and save more lives. This order was at once executed, but not until some of those in the boat had solicited, by name, each of the officers left the wreck to come with them. These officers resolutely declared that they would wait and take their chances with the brig. Passed Midshipmen Hynson, who had been partially disabled by a bad burn received in the firing of the Creole, was particularly implored to go into the boat. A lad of the Name of Nutley jumped out of the boat and offered his place to Mr. Hynson, and a man of the name of Powers did the same thing. Mr. Hynson refusing both offers, these men then declared that others might have their places, and then they would abide on the wreck with Mr. Hynson. Captian Semmes who was in impaired health, was also to go, but refused. Lieut. Parker answered similar solicitation by saying he would drown with the brig. Lieut. Claiborne and Act'g Master Clemson held the same language. It is a remarkable circumstance that three of the officers and all f the men who acted thus nobly saved. When the boat shoved off, the gale was blowing with great violence, and a heavy sea running, so that for some moments it was a matter of doubt whether the boat would live. The boat, however, reached the island in about twenty minutes. As soon as the men were landed, Mr. Clarke, disregarding the most strenuous entreaties, resolutely shoved off again with a volunteer crew, at the imminent hazard of their lives. In less then three minutes after the boat left the brig, Capt. Semmes and Lieut. Parker were picked up by Mr. Clarke from a grating, and Jacob Hazard, yeoman, was rescued swimming near them. Those who survived have told of many instances of heroic self-devotion. The acting master Henry A. Clemsen, was struggling on a small steering sail boom with five others, two of whom could not swim. He found that all could not be supported, and he left and struck out alone and unsupported. He was seen for the last time upon a skylight, and probably perished in the surf. The five men he left were saved, the two who could not swim being supported by their companions, Colson and Williamson. Those who were lying at Sacrificios, about two miles to the leeward of the wreck, her Britannic Majesty's ships Endymion and Alarm, and brig Daring, commanded respectively by Captains Lambert, Franklin, and Matson; the French brigs Pylade and Mercure, Captains Dubut and La Voyaire; and the Spanish corvette Luisa Fernanda, Capt. Puente. As soon as the accident was discovered, the boats of all these vessels were simultaneously called away. The crew of the Endymion, to the number of 200, came aft and volunteered. There was the most noble emulation as to which vessel should use the greatest expedition and persevere in the most strenuous exertions. The violence of the gale was such at that time none of the boats could pull against it, and it was with the greatest regret that Capt.
Lambert and others in authority felt it to be their duty to make signals recalling their boats. An hour or two afterwards, when there was a slight abatement of the gale, they again put forth at the peril of their lives, and succeeded by a miracle in reaching safety, but where his situation was most critical. The most gallant ad well-directed efforts were made by the officers and crew in the boat of the Mercure. She rescued ten men at se to leeward, on a spar. On hardly knows which to admire most, the forethought or the daring of this noble adventure. The risk was incalculable. Five boats representing each of the foreign vessels, reached the island, and took off twenty-three persons to their respective vessels, where they were received with a degree of kindness and delicate consideration which I cannot adequately describe, but which none of us will ever forget. They gave us refreshments and supplied us with clothes. I regret that I do not know the names of all the generous and brave officers who were in charge of the boats of the different vessels. I cannot however forbear mentioning such as I have learned, Lieut. Wood and the gunner of the Endymion, and Midshipman Saliz, of the Pylade.” [AMA, MSM]

NNR 72.067 April 3, 1847 OFFER OF PREMIUM FOR AN ESSAY ON THE WAR OF MEXICO

PIECE PREMIUM.

The American peace society hereby offer a premium of $500 for the best review of the present war with Mexico, the essays to be presented in four months after the close of the war, and the premium, if any essays is denied worthy of it, to be awarded by the Hon. Simon Greenleaf LL.D., the Rev. Francis Wayland, D.D, and the Rev. Wm. Jenks, D.D.

The review should be written without reference to political parties, and present such a view of the subject as will command itself when the hour of sober and candid reflection shall come, to the good sense of fair minded men in every party and in all sections of the country. The war, in its origin, its progress, and the whole sweep of its evils to all concerned, should be reviewed (the essay to be not less than one hundred and fifty, nor more that two hundred and fifty pages duodecimo,) on the principles of christianity, and an enlightened statesmanship, showing especially its waste of treasure and human life; its consistency with the genius of our republican institutions, as well as with the precepts of our religion, and the spirit of the age; its bearings, immediate and remote on free popular government here, and through the world; how its evils might have been avoided with better results to both parties;-- and what means may and should be adopted by nations to prevent similar evils in future. Our sole aim is to promote the cause of permanent peace by turning this war into effectual warning against resorts tot he sword hereafter.

The manuscripts may be fowarded to the subscriber, at 21 Cornhill, Boston, or to M.

NNR 72.068, April 3, 1847 OFFICIAL DESPATCHES OF GEN. TAYLOR

Headquarters Army of Occupation.
Camp on the field of battle, Buena Vista.
Meixico, February 24, 1847

SIR: I have the honor to report that, having become assured on the 20 th inst., that the enemy had assembled in very heavy force at Encarnacion, thirty miles in front of Agua Nueva, with the evident deign of attacking my position, I broke up my camp at the latter of Buena Vista seven miles south of Saltillo. A cavalry force left at Agua Nueva for the purpose of covering the removal of supplies was driven in during the night, and on the morning of the 22d the Mexican army appeared immediately in front of our position. At 11 o’clock, a.m., a flag was sent, bearing from General Santa Anna a summons of unconditional surrender. To which I immediately returned a negative reply. The summons and my reply are herewith enclosed. The action was commenced late in the afternoon between the light troops on the left flank, but was not seriously engaged until the morning of the 23d, when the enemy made an effort to force the left flank of our position. An obstinate and sanguinary conflict was maintained; with short intervals, throughout the day, the result being that the enemy was completely repulsed from our lines. An attack of cavalry upon the rancho of Buena Vista and a demonstration upon the city of Saltillo itself were likewise handsomely repelled. Early in the night the enemy withdrew from his camp and fell back upon Agua Nueva, a distance of twelve miles.

Our own force engaged at all points in this action fell somewhat short of 5,400 men, while that of the enemy, from the statement of General Santa Anna, may be estimated at 20,000. Our success against such odds is a sufficient encomium on the good conduct of our troops. In a more detailed official report, I shall have the satisfaction of bringing to the notice of the government the conspicuous gallantry of particular officers and corps. I may be permitted here, however to acknowledge my great obligation to Brig. Gen. Wool, the second in command, to whom I fell particularly indebted for his valuable services on this occasion.

Our loss has been severe, and will not probably fall short of 700 men. The Mexican loss has been immense. I shall take the earliest opportunity of forwarding a correct list of the casualties of the day.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Z. TAYLOR
Maj. General U.S.A. commanding

The adjutant General of the Army, Washington, D.C.

NNR 72.068, April 3, 1847 SUMMONS OF SANTA ANNA TO GEN. TAYLOR

You are summoned by twenty thousand men, and cannot, in any human probability, avoid suffering a rout, and being cut to pieces with your troops; but as you deserve consideration and particular esteem, I wish to save you from a catastrophe, and for that purpose give you this notice, in order that you may surrender at a discretion under the assurance that you will be treated with the consideration belonging to the Mexican character, to which end you will be granted an hour’s time to make up your mind, to commence from the moment when my flag of truce arrives in your camp.

With this view, I assure you of my particular consideration.

God and Liberty.
Camp at Enanetada, February 22d, 1847.

NNR 72.068 April 3, 1847 LOSSES OF THE KENTUCKY VOLUNTEER REGIMENT AT BUEAN VISTA

THE ADJUTANT GENERAL OF THE ARMY, WASHINGTON, D.C. General Taylor’s report of the killed, wounded, and missing, as far as ascertained on the 1st of March, accompanies the despatches. We shall publish it when it is completed. We could not have it in time for the present mail. The National Intelligencer of this morning says: “We are informed, on the authority of an officer who was present, and who left Saltillo in the beginning of last month, that the Kentucky cavalry lost in action sixtyone men, viz: 29 killed and 32 wounded—which would make our aggregate loss eight hundred and one, or nearly one-sixth of the whole force engaged."

NNR 72.068-72.069 dispatch from Com. David Conner on the investment of Veracruz Official Despatches From Com. Conner.

Investment of Vera Cruz -By the schooner Portia, Capt. Powrs, which reached New Orleans, on the 25th ult., the following important despatch was received:-

U.S Ship Raritan,

Of Sacrificios, March 10, 1847.

Sir:-In my last despatch, dated on the 7th instant, I informed the department of he arrival of Major General Scott at Anton Lizardo. Most of the transports, with the troops and the materiel of the army, having arrived, about the same time a speedy disembarkation was resolved upon, it being quite important that we should effect a landing before a norther should come on, as this would delay us two or three days. After a joint reconnaissance, made by the general and myself in the steamer Petrita, the beach due west from Sacrificios, one of the points spoken of in my previous letters, was selected as the most suitable for the purpose. The anchorage near this place being extremely contracted, it became necessary, I order to avoid crowding it with an undue number of vessels, to transfer most of he troops to the vessels of war for transportation to Sacrificios.-Accordingly, on the morning of the 9th, at day light, all necessary preparations—such as launching and numbering the boats, detailing officers, &c.—having been previously made, this transfer was commenced. The frigates received on board between twenty-five and twenty-eight hundred men each, with their arms and accoutrements, and the sloops and smaller vessels numbers in proportion.

This part of the movement was completed very successfully about 11 o'clock, a.m., and a few minutes thereafter the squadron under my command, accompanied by the commanding general, in the steamship Massachusetts, and such of the transports as had been selected for he purpose, got under way. The weather was very fine—indeed we could not have been more favored in this particular than we were. We had a fresh and yet gentle breeze from the southeast, and a perfectly smooth sea. The passage to Sacrificios occupied us between two and three hours. Each ship came in and anchored without the slightest disorder of confusion, in the small space allotted to her—the harbor being still very much crowded notwithstanding the number of transports we had left behind. The disembarkation commenced on the instant. Whilst we were transferring the troops fromt the ships to the serf-boats, (sixty five in number,) I directed the steamers Spitfire and Vixen, and the five gun boats, to form in a line parallel with and lose in to the beach, to cover the landing.

This order was promptly executed, and these small vessels, from the lightness of their draught, were enabled to take positions within good grape-range of the shore. As the boats severally received their complements of troops, they assembled, in a line abreast, between the fleet and the gun-boats; and when all were ready, they pulled in together, under the guidance of a number of the officers of the squadron, who had been detailed for this purpose.—General Worth commanded this, the first line of the army, and had the satisfaction of forming his command on the beach and neighboring heights just before sunset. Four thousand five hundred men were thus thrown on shore, almost simultaneously. No enemy appeared to offer us the slightest opposition. The first line being landed, the boats, in successive trips, relieved the men-of-war and transports of their remaining troops, by 10 o'clock, P. M. The whole army (save a few straggling companies) consisting of upwar is of ten thousand men, were thus safely deposited on shore, without the slightest accident of any kind. The officers and seamen under my command vied with each other on this occasion, in a zealous and energetic performance of their duty. I cannot but express to the department the great satisfaction I have derived from witnessing their efforts to contribute all in their own power to the success of their more fortunate brethren of the army.

The weather still continues fine to-day, we are engaged in landing the artillery, horses, provisions, and other material. The steamer N Orleans, with the Louisiana regiment of volunteers, 800 strong, arrived most opportunely, at

Anton Lizardo, just as we had put ourselves in motion. She joined us, and her troops were landed with the rest. Another transport arrived at this anchorage to-day. Her troops have also been landed. Gen. Scott has now with him upwards of eleven thousand men. At his request, I permitted the marines of the squadron, under Capt. Edson, to join him, as a part of the third regiment of artillery. The general in chief landed, this morning, and the army put itself in motion at an early hour, to form its line around the city. There has been some distant firing of shot and shells from the town and castle upon the troops, as they advanced, but without result. I am still of the opinion, expressed in my previous communications, as to the inability of the enemy to hold out for any length of time. The castle has, at most, but four or five weeks’ provisions, and the town about enough to last for the same time.-

I am very respectfully, &c.
D. CONNER
Commanding home squadron.

Hon. J. Y. Mason, Sec’y navy, Washington.

NRR 72.069 April 3, 1847 landing of the Army at Veracuz

The Picayune furnishes the following:

Memorandum furnished by Captain Powers, of he schooner Portia.

Schooner Portia, Captain Powers, 8 days from Tampico anchorage, but was detained to the south and east of Vera Cruz by a heavy north gale until the 17th inst. The United States squadron and all the transports left Point Lizardo for Sacrificios on the 9th inst., with 12,100 troops. On the morning of the 10th a landing of all the troops and marines was effected within three miles of Vera Cruz, without much opposition from the enemy, as the landing was well covered by a constant discharge of bomb shells and round shot from the U. S. steamers and gun boats anchored near the beach and in front of the landing. Immediately after and organization of the American forces on the beach, they took up a line of march over the sand hills to the attack of the enemy’s outposts and fortifications, situated from one to three miles from the castle and forts of the city. They carried everyone by storm, not, however without losing seventeen men.

On the 11th and 12th, the American forces were employed in throwing up breast works and digging entrenchments. Occasional skirmishing took place with the enemy, who were throwing showers of bomb shells and round shot from the castle and city, but without much effect. During this time the seamen were landing provisions and ammunitions from the transports.

On the 12th, a strong north gale set in, which cut off still further communication. We left during the norther, and as we were unable to make progress to the north, believe that it was impossible for our bombs and shells to have been landed until the 18th instant, so that the bombardment of the castle and Vera Cruz did not probably commence until the 20th.

There were some feats of bravery displayed on the 11th in which Col. Dickerson, of he Palmetto regiment, S. Carolina, was wounded in the breast by a musket ball from the enemy, and Captain Alburtis, of the 2nd infantry, had his head shot off by an 52 pound ball.-This same ball broke a drumer's arm and took of a private's leg.

But on the same day the American army had gained complete possession of all the fortifications of the enemy which were raised by them to stop our troops from approaching the city. All the water-pipes leading to the city were cut off, and all the communication effectually stopped. Gen. Scott landed in person on the 11th inst. A French bark ran the blockade and moored under the walls of the castle on the morning of the 13th, and many of our transports were ready to leave for the U. States as soon as the norther was over. The vessel brings despatches and letter bags from every vessel in the Gulf Squadron then at Sacrificios. [ANP]
Dr. Turner, of the U.S. army, who arrived at Matamoros on the 9th inst., from Monterey, brought the glorious intelligence of another brilliant victory over the Mexican army.

The scene of action was at Buena Vista, about six miles west of Saltillo. The fighting commenced on the 22d of February, and ended on the 23d.

Santa Anna retired to Agua Nueva, a distance of ten miles, leaving four thousand killed and wounded on the field. The loss on our part was but seven hundred killed and wounded.

Santa Anna's army amounted to about 15,000 men. That of Gen. Taylor amounted to about 5,000, nearly all volunteers. His army is composed of Washington's, Bragg's, and Thomas' batteries; one squadron of the 1st and 2d dragoons; the Arkansas and Kentucky cavalry; the first Mississippi, and second Kentucky regiments, and one company of Texas volunteers.

Dr. T. brought a list of sixty-three officers killed and wounded.

The official despatches of General Taylor have been cut off.

Col. Morgan's regiment of Ohio volunteers having been reinforced by a command from Monterey, had reached that place in safety.

Colonel Curtis, of Ohio, with one company, Capt. Hunter's of the U.S. dragoons, his own regiment, and one of Indiana volunteers; the Virginia regiment, and I think, some Texian rangers, in all about 2000 men, was about leave Camargo to attack General Urrea, who is said to be about thirty miles south of that place, with an army of from four thousand to five thousand men, principally rancheros.

He is believed to have with him only 1500 regular troops. A great many, if not all of these rancheros, as soon as they hear of the discomfiture of Santa Anna's army will disperse, and the gallant Colonel will no doubt obtain the victory.

Of the defences at the mouth of the river I know nothing, but have been told that they will make a strong resistance.

The fortifications at Brazos, with a force of artillery, and persons in the quarter master's employ, which can be raised as a garrison, are sufficient to drive back a command of at least 2,500 or 3,000 Mexicans.

The works erected may be technically termed a continued line, enclosed for the quartermaster's and commissaries store in depot. The parapet is built of barrel of damaged commissaries stores, with sand bags at the front, thrown up against the barrels, which form the exterior slope.

The armament of the fort consists of four pieces of artillery, two twelve and two six pounders in barbette, which sweeps the foot of and crosses fires on the level plane over which the enemy would be compelled to advance. They have also about 300 muskets to line the parapot. This was thrown up when an attack was daily expected.

We annex Santa Anna's account of the battle of Buena Vista, as transmitted for the Tampico Sentinel:

Camp near Buena Vista, Feb. 23d, 1847

Excellent Sir: After two days of battle, in which the enemy, with a force of from 8,000 to 9,000 men and 26 pieces of artillery, and two flags.

I have determined to go back to Agua Nueva, to provide myself with provision, not having a single biscuit or a grain of rice left. Thanks to the position occupied by the enemy he had not been completely beaten, but he left on the field about 2,000 dead.

Both armies have been cut to pieces, but the trophies of war will give you an idea on which side has been the advantage.

We have struggled with hunger and thirst during forty hours, and if we can provide ourselves with provisions we will go again to charge the enemy.

The soldiers under my command have done their duty, and crowned the honor of the Mexican nation with glory.

The enemy has seen that neither his advantageous position, nor the nature of the ground, or the state of the season, for it has been raining during the action, could prevent the terrific charge of the bayonet; which left him terrified.

NNR 72.070 April 3, 1847 details of the victory at Buena Vista

From the N. O. Delta March 23, 12 M.

Additional Particulars

On the 22d, Santa Anna began the battle by various manoeuvres, attempting to out-flank and terrify old "Rough and Ready." On that day the battle was confined to skirmishing and cannonading, without much effect on either side.

In the mean time Santa Anna had sent a large force to Taylor's rear, but our artillery opened upon them with great effect, and they were soon compelled to withdraw.

On the 23d the battle commenced in real earnest, and raged with great violence during the whole day. The Americans did not wait the attack, but with the most daring impetuosity, with loud huzzas, rushed into the battle, their officers leading them gallantly.

General Taylor was in the thickest of the fight and received a ball through his overcoat, but was not injured.

Adjutant Bliss was slightly wounded at the side of Gen. Taylor. Ddj. Lincoln also, of the medical staff and also of the General's staff, the intrepid young officer who so distinguished himself at Resaca de la Palma, was killed.

The battle of the 23d continued from early in the morning until about 4 P.M., when Santa Anna withdrew from the field, and retired to Agua Nueva for reinforcements.

It will be remembered that Santa Anna's reserve corps, commanded by Gen. Vasquez, had been delayed in its march, and has no doubt joined him a few days after the battle.
In the meantime his army is starving and many of his men are deserting.

Captain Hunter's strong artillery company was not in the action, but had left Monterey to join Gen. Taylor, with six cannon, two being 8 pounders.

On the 7th of March, one of he Ohio regiments also left Monterey to join General Taylor. If these and Capt. Prentiss's artillery arrive in time, the General's heavy loss will be fully repaired, and he will be ready to meet Santa Anna again.

General Taylor, at the last accounts, was still maintaining his position undisturbed by the enemy.

An exchange of prisoners had taken place, and old "Rough and Ready"'s promise to Col. Marshall, to get back Cassius M. Clay, and his party, by taking enough Mexican prisoners to exchange for them, has been redeemed.

General Wool greatly distinguished himself in the battle, and fought like a hero.

After the battle Gen. Taylor demanded of Santa Anna an unconditional surrender of his whole army, which the latter declined, but in return requested that Gen. Taylor should surrender immediately to him. Immortal be the reply of old "Rough and Ready," as delivered by the gallant Lieut. Crittendem:-"General Taylor never surrenders."

Santa Anna's adjutant general was captured by the Americans, but was afterwards exchanged.

Gen. Taylor occupied his ground on the 24th and 25th without opposition.

Col. Morgan, of the Ohio volunteers, with a small force, cut his way through large bodies of Mexicans and arrived at Marin.

A detachment of three companies under command of Captain Geddings, was sent to his relief, and the whole party are said to have arrived in safety at Monterey.

A train of 100 wagons, on their way to Monterey from Camargo, under an escort of thirty volunteers, was captured by a body of Mexican cavalry, a few miles beyond Marin. Three of the men made good their escape- the rest were taken prisoners.

A young lady, the daughter of an American citizen, living in Mexico, and returning home from New Orleans, where she has been going to school, was taken with this train, her father having been killed by the Mexicans. She, however, had escaped, and arrived at Monterey in safety, where her misfortunes had excited the most lively sympathy. The lady's name is Miss Burns.

Col. Curtis of the Ohio volunteers, had started on his explanation (indecipherable text) who was at Aldamas, a village on the Sad Juan river, about 40 miles from Camargo.

The Colonel has a fine body of men, composed of he Ohio regiment, the Virginia volunteers, and Capt. Hunter's company of U.S. dragoons.

The Mexicans have possession of Seralvo, China, Mier, and all the towns between Camargo and Monterey.

Major Coffee, paymaster, will carry Gen. Taylor's despatches for Monterey.

NNR 72.070, April 3, 1847 Col. George Washington Morgan attacked

February 26.--An express reached here this morning from Col. Morgan, of the 2d regiment Ohio volunteers, (who are in the neighborhood of Marin,) stating that his command had been attacked--a detachment of three companies under Major Geddings, of the 1st regiment Ohio volunteers, were sent from this place immediately, to reinforce Col. M., and no doubt we shall hear a good report of them. A young lady by the name of Miss Burns had just come in who was along with the train that had been captured. Her report is as follows: Says she was in the third wagon from the front; soon after they had left their encampment on the morning of the 22d, the attack was made. She remained in the wagon until she saw her father shot, when she ran to his assistance, but on reaching him found that he was dead. One of the attacking party fired at her, but to no purpose. Seeing that her parent was no more, and also seeing that the men were seeking shelter in the chaparral, she at their request, endeavored to make her escape. After running some few hundred yards the enemy captured her, and took her to a rancho, where every attention was paid to her by the women who were there. She was sent in today. Miss B. reports forty-two of our men killed. Her father, as I learn, is a resident of Saltillo, and a man of some considerable property. He was on his return from New Orleans, where he had been for the purpose of returning with his daughter, who was there at school. At this time Miss B. is in Monterey. [WFF, MSM]

Further From Tampico and the Brazos.

From the Picayune Extra, of March 23.

Through the courtesy of a gentleman who arrived on Monday evening from Tampico we were placed in possession of El Soldado de la Patria, dated 27th February at San Luis Potosi. The paper opens with a sounding editorial headed as follows: "Viva la Republica! Viva el Illustre General Santa Anna!" The article is devoted to the praise of Gen. Santa Anna, and forms the introduction to the official despatch from him, and to several letters from officers of his army: We have already given a translation of this despatch. It was addressed to Ramon Adame, governor of the State of San Luis Potosi.-The editor then remarks that other letters have been received by private citizens of San Luis, written from Agua Nueva on the 24th February. These letters say that two commissioners had arrived there from Gen. Taylor demanding their surrender; that Santa Anna exhibited to them the state of his army, showing them the enthusiasm and decision that prevailed among the troops, who had fallen back to that point only for the purpose of obtaining food; and, finally, gave them as his definite reply, that unless they surrendered at discretion he would renew the battle the following day and continue it until he had completed their destruction.

Then follows an address of the Governor of San Luis to his countrymen, dated the 27th, recapitulating Santa Anna's despatch, and congratulating the people upon the victory, of which, in the most emphatic language, all the glory is attributed to Santa Anna.

Next follows a private letter dated "the enemy's camp," 5 P.M., of the 23d, in which the writer claims that they have taken four positions, tow standards, and three pieces. The "positions" he says were obstinately defended. He thinks only four prisoners are in their possession; all the others taken are dead. This letter was written before Santa Anna fell back to Agua Nueva. It confesses that they (the Mexicans) have lost many officers, out of all proportion to the men.

The letter goes on to say that the Mexican troops are perishing of hunger and thirst; that they have eaten nothing since leaving Incarnation, save a slice of roasted meat at La Vaca. It expresses great fears lest the army should disband that night on account of their deprivations.

The same letter says that Santa Anna had a horse killed by a grape-shot.

A postscript to the letter says: "After closing my letter, the general-in-chief, convinced doubtless that the army would disband unless it obtained food and water, ordered it to move to Agua Nueva, where there are cattle and water-water before everything."

The postscript adds that they have lost about a thousand men, many general officers killed and wounded, and among the latter Gen. Lombardini.

A brief letter from Catorce is published, dated the 25th ultimo, in which it is said that an action was fought at Encantada on the 24th, in which General Minon, won a victory, taking six pieces of artillery, killing three hundred, and making some prisoners.

Among the Mexicans killed on the 22d and 23d were Colonel Francisco Berra, the lieutenant colonel of the first light infantry; Colonel Pena, of the light cavalry; the lieutenant colonel of the eleventh infantry, "and who knows how many more have met the same fate," says one letter. Another gives the following additional names of officers: Pepe Oronoz, Pepe Bonilla, the major of the regiment of Morelia, Asenos, and Luyando, major of hussars.

Besides General Lombardini, D. Angel Guzman and D. Miguel Gonzalez are named among the wounded. [ANP]

NNR 72.071, April 3, 1847 MONTEREY, LETTER FROM A COLUMBIA VOLUNTEER

Monterey, Mexico, Feb. 6, 1847.

My dear father: Sitting in the deserted halls of the vanquished Mexicans, with the tail-board of our wagon for table, I shall attempt to give you a few ideas of Monterey and its vicinity. On the 24th of January, myself and 24 others of our company left Camargo for Monterey via Pontaguida, Seralvo, and Marine, as an escort to train of pack mules, numbering over eight hundred, loaded with provisions for the army.

Our second day's march brought us to Mier, a beautiful little town about 25 or 30 miles northwest from Camargo. The next day brought us to Chiterona, or Canales' watering place, a rapid little stream, fresh from the mountains. There we were detained one day by the rain; and it is a day I shall never forget. While our Mexican mule drivers were out hunting up their mules, they discovered a dead body and came in and reported it as an American. Lieutenant Cully made a detail of eight men to bury the body. Guided by the Mexicans we started out, and after a little search we came to the place, and as we approached the body, a cloud of carrion birds arose from their unholy feast, filling the air with their discordant croaks and screams, in such a manner as to make my hair stand on end, and almost to chill my blood. But judge of my feelings when I discovered in the murdered man an acquaintance, Lieut. Miller, of the Mount Vernon company. He started out a few days previous, with one Winne, of the same company, (a brother of Winne who keeps, or did keep the Neil house). We immediately made search for Winne, but could not find him; we found where he had been murdered and dragged into the Chiterona, and there ended all trace of him. The wolves and vultures had eaten flesh from the body of Lieut. Miller; he had been shot in the right breast, and cut and beaten in the face, till he could hardly be recognized by those best acquainted with him. The robbers had stripped him of every article of clothing, except his shirt; and that was so torn and bloody in the affray it was not worth taking. With a hoe we delved his narrow grave.

"Slowly and sadly we laid him down
We spoke not a word of sorrow,
But steadfastly gazed on the face of the dead,
And bitterly thought of the morrow."

We heaped up the ground over him, then cut and dragged prickly pear, which grows 10 or 15 feet high, and covered his grave with an impenetrable barrier to wolves and the no less humane robber, for they would drag him from his humble grave for very spite. We marked the place and pursued our way sorrowing, little dreaming that a greater tragedy was soon to be enacted at the same place. But an express came up last night, bringing intelligence that eight more volunteers had been murdered there. Who they were I could not learn, but I fear they were a part of company F, of the Columbus Guards, for they were about leaving Pontaguida as we came through; but there is no certainty who they were. Captain Latham started for this place eight days before we did, on a new route, and has not arrived. He sent an express to Lieut. Colonel Irwin at Seralvo, a distance of some forty miles, for aid, stating that he was surrounded and asking for immediate succor. But there being not troops enough to send them relief and guard the place, no help was sent. But I have since heard that he made a safe escape. They had a part of their pack mules stolen, but he seized upon the justice of the peace, and made him fork over the requisite number of mules; and he is now on his "winding way" to this place.
February 7, 1847

"The sun rose clear and bright this morning over the towering heights of Saddle mountain--the eastern boundary of the beautiful city of Monterey. The air is loaded with perfume, most delicious, from the thousand orange and lemon trees that fill the gardens and groves that surround the city. Birds of every hue and song, fill the air with noes of harmony; among which are mocking birds, and others numerous and to me nameless.

South of the city there runs another chain of mountains, divided by a pass only, a broken chain on the west nearly surrounding the city. And such a city! Guarded at every point by fortifications, both of nature and art, rendering it almost impregnable to an enemy; and how it could be taken by a force fighting against four to one, I cannot tell; but so it is, and had not the carnage been stopped, full one thousand more of the Mexicans would have fallen.

I have rambled over the city, visiting places of note, among which is the cathedral, an immense pile of stone, towering up in relief against the blue mountain side, carved work from base to dome, give it an ancient and romantic appearance, its chimes ringing the time each quarter, each half, and each hour, both night and day.

The next is the Bishop's castle, magnificent building, strongly fortified, but now a heap of ruins. It is situated about half a mile west of town, on a hill of perhaps some two hundred feet in height, guarded on the west by a still higher hill; on the east by a strong bastion of stone, with four port holes--thus commanding the city on the north, south, and east. After climbing for half an hour up the step ascent, over pointed rocks, I came within a few rods of the castle, and stopped to breathe a moment. While standing there, the most melancholy strains of music met my ear that I ever heard--that they came from the castle I was sure, and determined I was, to discover the author. I therefore preceded very cautiously, till I came into the court of the castle, and there, sitting with his back towards me, playing upon his guitar, was a young Mexican. The air he was playing was "Days of Absence," and others followed in strains equally plaintive, so soft and melancholy it caused me almost to shed tears. Soon however he changed to the lively air of "Come buy a Broom"--and suiting the action to the tune, he jumped up and commenced a series of waltzing--which would have done credit to a teacher of art--and then, for the first time, he discovered my presence. He ceased his capering and music, and saluted me with a warm good day, and desired me to "pli tundi" (play a tune) which I of course declined. (Of course you now why.) He accompanied me over the castle, showing and explaining to the best of his knowledge, the castle and its history. After climbing to the top and viewing the city to my heart's content, I started for the camp--and what I saw afterward, shall be the subject for another letter. I am well--never better--fat as good living can make me.

My best love to dear mother, and compliments to all friends, and I am, as ever, yours affectionately.  J.W.

NNR 72.072, April 3, 1847 THE BATTLE OF BRACITO

The following account of the battle of Bracito, (heretofore known as the battle of El Paso,) is from the army correspondence of the St. Louis Union:

Yesterday (Christmas Day) when we had just arrived in camp here, with about 600 men, had unsaddled our animals, and most of our men had engaged in carrying wood and water, the news was brought into camp of the enemy being in sight and advancing. It was about 2 o'clock, P.M., and the day was very pleasant. Out horses were grazing some distance from the camp at the time we formed a single line and determined to meet the enemy as infantry. Their attack being designed on the left flank, near which was our wagon train, our detachment was ordered from the extreme right to the left, where we soon took up our position. One piece of artillery, 490 regular lancers and cavalry, and 100 regular infantry, besides some 500 militia troops from El Paso, composed the enemy's force, according to the best information I can obtain from reports of prisoners and from papers found among the baggage on the battle field. The enemy ranged themselves on the east within a half a mile of our line, the mountains in the rear. In our rear was the river, with a little brushwood on its banks.
Previous to the encounter, a lieutenant from their ranks came forward, waving a black flag in his hand but halted when within 100 steps of our line. Tho's Caldwell--our interpreter--rode out to meet him. The messenger with the black flag of defiance demanded that the commander should come into their camp and speak to their general. The reply was, "If your general wants to see our commander let him come here." "We shall break your ranks then, and take him there," was the retort of the Mexican. "Come and take him," said our interpreter, unwittingly using the phrase of the Spartan at Thermoploe. "A curse on you prepare for a charge," cried the Mexican, "we give no quarter, and ask none," and waving his black flag gracefully over his head, galloped back towards the enemy's line. Their charge was made by the dragoons from their right direct upon the left flank, bringing our detachment into the closest fire. Their infantry, with one howitzer with them, at the same time attacking our right flank.

Their charge was a handsome one, but was too well--too coolly met to break our line. After their fire had been spent, their front column being at about 100 steps from the front of our flank, out line poured a volley into them, which being a few times repeated, made such havoc in their columns, that their forces wheeled to the left, retreating from our fire, and in a flight made an attack on the provision train. Here they met a very warm reception, and were compelled to fly in all direction, and in the utmost confusion. Their infantry having been put to flight, the Howard company under the command of Lieut. Wright, taking advantage of the panic, charged upon them and took their cannon from them. This was soon manned by the artillery detachment, under Lieutenant Kribben, in Colonel Mitchell's escort. The enemy had by this time fled, leaving their arms, baggage, provisions, and other stores on the field of battle.

A small body of mounted men under the command of Capt. Reid, had by this time gathered together in a line and charged upon the enemy, pursuing them into the mountains where they sought refuge.

The number of the dead is said to be about 30; that of their wounded was slight as far as can be ascertained. Had we a single piece of cannon with us they would have lost more of their men; but having no artillery on our side, we had to act as infantry until we got possession of the howitzer so gallantly captured by the Howard company.

We lost not a single man, and had but seven slightly wounded. We took eight prisoners, six of whom died last night. Thus ended the battle of Bracito, the first battle of the army of the west, and as bravely fought by our men as ever men fought any engagement.

We have every reason to believe that there is more in store for us.

NRR 72.071-072 April 3, 1847 ARTICLE FROM "EL REPUBLICANO" ABOUT THE WAR WITH THE UNITED STATES

THE FOREIGN WAR- Having just published the communication in which General Santa Anna announces that he was upon the point of hazarding a general action between the forces under his command and those of Gen'l Taylor, is it not possible, even in the midst of the painful circumstances by which we are surrounded, (on the eve go the revolutionary outbreak in the city of Mexico,) it is not possible to think of aught save the immense consequences of the battle which has in all probability already been fought. The conflict which we are engaged with the United States of the North cannot be worthily maintained unless the whole nation is profoundly convinced that its interest imperatively require that it should be prosecuted with insuperable energy--not to be shaken by a reverse, nor satisfied with a partial victory. Such is the true point of view of the question at this moment.

In the civilized world war is not the result of savage impulses of hatred and revenge; it is only a measure of national defense- destructive, to be sure, but legitimate. Nations do not wage war save to preserve and secure their rights; and hence it follows that when they have justice on their side, they should never lay down their arms until they have obtained these important ends. In our case, Mexico is defending the interests of her nationality, her territory, and her race; resisting the invasions with which the people of the United States threaten to occupy our country, to incorporate us with the American Union, and to extend themselves across the continent. We therefore must regard, as our object in the war, the preservation of our territory and the establishment of relations which shall assure its future security.

Neither of the ends can be obtained without a prolonged war. To believe the contrary, to suppose that a single battle is to decide the great question, is to mistake the nature of it, and to cherish errors fatal to the republic. Among nations there are epochs in which their honor and their interest impose upon them great sacrifices, and it becomes a duty to submit to them, whatever they may be.

Even should we to-day obtain a victory, if we examine well the situation of affairs, we cannot deceive ourselves with hope of an honorable peace. The territory of Texas having been incorporated with the American Union, the Union will not consent to its dismemberment unless it is forced to it by great reverses; and, anxious to acquire all the land in the north of our republic, we have seen it pretending to extend the boundaries of Texas in a manner shamefully iniquitous. Thus it has claimed the line of the Rio Bravo del Norte as the rightful boundary of Texas; and in its last propositions, according to some of the papers, it proposes to occupy all the territory comprehended by a line running from the mouth of the Bravo, and following that parallel of latitude to the shores of the Pacific; whereby we should lose one half of the republic and have aided our dangerous neighbors in acquiring a more pernicious preponderance. And in truth it is not to be expected that they will abate from these ignominious proposals so long as they do not feel the full advantages which they have gained, being masters of a long line of coast, of towns, cities, and states now in their occupation. Under these circumstances a victory which should destroy one division of their army, or should restore to us some of our cities, would not suffice to change the aspect of affairs. But, on the other hand, by prolonging the war, the American Union will be made to feel all the weight of the expenses which it has encountered, it will be constrained with difficulties of climate and a war which will pervade every part of our republic. Thus, then, the continuation of the war is necessary for us, whether we obtain a victory or whether Providence present to us a new reverse.

View it in another light. It is when a people are struggling for their independence that they display the virtues which they possess, and by their courage vindicate a just position in the estimation of the world. In this manner the Spaniards at this day rest their glory and their respectability upon the spirit with which, in their war of independence, they hold forth our struggle from emancipation as our title to the [ ] pect of other nations, because in that struggle Mexicans were neither intimidated by dangers nor disheartened by reverses.

But in the present campaign there has been nothing glorious for us. The battle of Resaca was lost by the pusillanimity of some regiments, Matamoros was abandoned through fear, and the capitulation of Monterey covered us with ignommy. A battle gained would not compensate us for these losses; it would not reinstate in public estimation our wounded honor; it would not thrust forth the Americans from the territory which they occupy. Peace would ever be disadvantageous and the remote frontiers of our unfortunate country would not fail of being ultimately lost to us again, because the North Americans would be emboldened to attack them with the confidence of not encountering resistance. Finally, under such circumstances a foreign combination would become less difficult than ever for carrying out the project of a monarchy, masmuch as all the enemies of Mexico would take advantage of our weakness and discredit.

But, on the other hand, a protracted and vigorous war will be more grievous to our enemies than to ourselves, and when the day of peace shall at last arrive, Mexico will have re-established her honor and her frontier be made secure. If we adopt any other conclusion we can see nothing before us but disgrace and ruin, and therefore do we demand that whatever may be the issue of the battle, which probably had already been fought, all Mexicans should agree that the first of our necessities and the first of duties is war. NNR 72.072 April 3, 1847 further details about the victory at Buena Vista

From the N.O. Picayune of the 24th of March

Dr. Turner, bearer of despatches from Col. Curtis arrived here this morning at 3 o'clock. He embarked at the Brazos in the sch. St Paul, on the 14th inst. which vessel he left fifty miles below the city last evening, and took passage in the towboat De Soto. We learn from him verbally that it is understood at Camargo that Santa Anna has retired from Agua Neueva, in the direction of Parras, where it is supposed he would make a halt. General Taylor still maintained his position at Buena Vista.

Dr. Turner informs us that the news heretofore published of the battles of the 22nd and 23rd may be relied upon; that it was brought from General Taylor's camp to Monterey by Paymaster Coffee, who was the bearer of despatches from Gen. Taylor, but who could not get farther than that place with them.

The despatches were sent thence by a Mexican, who had not got through by the last accounts. The news received at Camargo was the substance of these despatches, and were brought by an express rider, who was nine days in making the trip through (indecipherable text) make a circuit of five hundred iles, to escape the Mexican forces and rancheros that swarmed in the valley.

Nothing has been heard of Col'l. Curtis since he left Camargo. It was thought that Gen'l. Urrea would fly before him as soon as he ascertained the overwhelming defeat of Santa Anna.

Private letters had been received at Saltillo as late as to the 5th of March, at which time Gen. Taylor was at Buena Vista. The following letter was received at Matamoros by a Mexican merchant of that place, from a Mexican of Saltillo. It was dated on the 6th March, and gives the only account of the manner in which the battle was fought that has yet been received.

"At 3 o'clock on the 22nd ult. the battle commenced at Buena Vista, five miles from Saltillo. The fight opened with artillery, and destructive cannonade was kept open until sunset. No decided advantage was obtained by either side-the loss on both being very great.

"On the 23rd at 10 o'clock, the battle was again renewed and kept up without intermission, until half past three in the afternoon. Both armies were closely engaged during the whole time. Gen. Wool advanced with a strong detachment against the Mexican army, but was driven back with immense loss. The Mexican cavalry charged upon him with immense loss. The Mexican cavalry charged upon him withdrawn swords and did great execution. As wool fell back Gen. Taylor advanced with fresh troops and repelled the Mexicans with great slaughter.

This charge decided the battle, which was not again renewed. The number killed and wounded was very great on both sides. I can only estimate the number by the cart loads of wounded that have entered this city from both battle fields.

"On the 24th both armies hung off without coming to a general engagement-each occupied in carrying off the wounded and burying their dead.

"After the 24th there was no more fighting-the Mexican troops famishing with hunger became convinced that they could not triumph or drive General Taylor from his position, and retired.

"As yet Santa Anna has only retired a short distance, but I do not entertain the belief that he will venture another engagement.

"Mexico has not the means to bear the burden of the war-it is opposing poverty of abundance-weakness to strength. In my opinion it would be best for the two governments to enter into negotiations. With the power the United States possess, it would be dishonorable in her to force us into treaties advantageous alone to herself, as it would be for us to make concessions from necessity.

"It is reported that a train carrying provisions to the American army was attacked and captured at marina, by Don Jose Urrea, and is yet in his possession, with a quantity of private merchandise, taken at the same time," &c.

Through the politeness of Mr. Arnold, who came with Dr. Turner, we have received the Matamoros Flag of the 13th, also letters from an esteemed correspondent. Our letters confirm the list of killed published in another column, and also the amount of loss on both sides heretofore reported. The Matamoros Flag publishes the letter from which the above extracts were made.
Under the head of "Latest Intelligence," the Flag states that Gen. Taylor was expected at Monterey on the 8th, with the Kentucky cavalry, for the purpose of opening the communication between that place and Camargo.

"So it seems" adds the Flag, "that old Rough and Ready" not only has to whip their big general in the mountains, but has to come down to scare their little ones away from the highways, so as to relieve the lower country from Lieut. Gen. Stampede." In case he undertook the chastisement of Urrea, he would leave the main body of his army at Buena Vista.

A Mexican physician residing in Camargo, says the Flag, has received a letter from a surgeon at Saltillo, dated two days after the battle, which states that Gen. Taylor permitted Santa Anna to have all his wounded conveyed into Saltillo and tendered him surgical aid from his own army.

It is reported in Matamoros that General Urrea has retreated toward the Tula Pass, as soon as he understood that Colonel Curtis was marching against him.

It was also said that Santa Anna was falling back upon San Luis Potosi; but as we before said, Dr. Turner thinks he has only retreated to Parras. [ANP]

NNR 72.072 April 3, 1847 Mexican preparations to oppose the American attack at Veracruz

A correspondent of the Mobile Herald and Tribune, gives the following interesting account of the adventures of Colonel Alphonse Dupera, of Louisiana:

Under the instructions from Gen'l. Scott, Colonel Dupera set out from New Orleans to visit Vera Cruz and the surrounding country, as a spy, and to cover his intentions, proceeded first to Havana, and obtained a passport to Vera Cruz as a Frenchman—he is of French descent, and speaks the tongue like a Parisian.) After arriving there, he penetrated as far as Jalapa, ascertained the probable number of men that could be thrown into the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa, the length of time for which it is provisioned, &c., and the general tout ensemble, the materiel, &c. that would oppose General Scott's contemplated attack. During his stay, he narrowly escaped detection, being suspected and subjected to several close examinations. Being informed that the authorities intended committing him to the Castle as a spy, he had barely time to escape on board a French merchant barque lying at Sacrificios, from which he was taken and brought down by the steamer Petrita. His escape was singularly providential. The men of the boat supposed him one of the passengers of the boat, and carried him off under mistake.-They were waiting for one of the passengers, and being ordered authoritatively in French "to shove off," obeyed unhesitatingly. Again, the arrival of the Petrita at Sacrificios was purely accidental, nor should I omit to state that the French barque had been brought into Anton Lizardo as a prize a few days before, and had just been let go."

An officer for service of this kind, deserves double credit, as an ignominious death surely awaits him in case of capture. [ANP]

NNR 72.072 April 3, 1847 Gen. Zachary Taylor expected to open communications from Monterey to Camargo

Mexico-The editors of the New Orleans Delta have received files of Mexican papers by way of Havana. All sorts of preparations to oppose the attack of the Americans were going on at Vera Cruz, where 2,000 men from Puebla were daily expected to arrive. General Morales, commander in-chief of the troops at Vera Cruz, is represented as very anxious that the Americans should commence their attack on the city, as he was confident that with the forces under his command and the reinforcements expected, he would be able to give them a hard fight.-The Mexicans were fearfully watching all the movements of the American squadron, and nothing indicated the approaching of the attack, but they had reliable information that the troops and several vessels intended to operate in it, were at Lobos Island, where they awaited the result of Don Alejandro Atocha's mission, in order to begin the attack if the proposals tendered by him on the part of the United States government were refused.
It was reported in Vera Cruz that a most fatal sickness had made its appearance among the crews of the American vessels, in which we believe there is no truth.

The papers from the capital seem to confirm the belief, that the mission of Senor Antocha was to propose an arrangement by which the line of the 26th parallel should be the boundary between Mexico and the United States, for which $200,000,000 would be paid to Mexico and moreover the United States would take upon themselves to satisfy the claims of their citizens amounting to about $11,000,000. The Monitor says that, however advantageous this offer may appear at first sight, it is not so in reality, for the line of the 26th degree would cut off the states of Chihuahua, Durango, Coahuila, New Mexico, New Leon, Tamaulipas, Texas, and both the Californias. NNR 72.072-073 April 3, 1847 DETAILS OF THE INSURRECTION IN NEW MEXICO

The NEW ERA of last evening contains a letter from fort Bent, dated on the 1st February, which corroborates, in all essential particulars, the news heretofore received of an insurrection in Taos and the murder of Governor Bent and many others.- This letter puts an end to the hope entertained here that the report might have been exaggerated or unfounded. We have already published an account of the suppression of an insurrection at Santa Fe; the sures made by the prisoners. But this-latter heads us to suppose that there was another popular out break, and that it extended all over New Mexico. The writer says that a "general insurrection," happening about a month after the discovery of the first abortive one, had taken place, and that all the Americans who could be found were massacred and their property plundered. These representations make us exceedingly anxious to hear from that quarter: We cannot believe that the Mexicans have been able to make much head against our troops in Santa Fe, but they may (id assisted, as this letter states, by the Pueblo Indians) have been able to destroy a vast amount of property and to sacrifice many lives in their assaults upon weaker points. An express from Santa Fe, which may soon be expected, we suppose, out to give us full particular in regard to this insurrection. [MSM]

NNR 72.080 April 3, 1847 editorial remarks on the victory of Buena Vista

Battle of Buena Vista.

To fully appreciate Gen. Taylor on the occasion of the battle just fought, it must be recollected that he took upon himself the delicate responsibility, contrary to the advice, which under the circumstances of the case, in fact amounted to an order of his commanding officer, Gen. Scott, probably in accordance with a plan of campaign arranged at Washington before the latter left that city-we allude to Gen. Taylor advancing beyond Saltillo to meet and fight the enemy, instead of evacuating that post to the enemy and retiring to Monterey, as he was advised, if not ordered to do, when withdrawing Gen. Worth's command and so many of the regulars. Gen. Taylor differed in opinion, distinguished what was the best course, staked every thing upon the issue, and marched up to it at every hazard. His volunteers were all AMERICAN SOLDIERS. The result is, a TRIUMPH!

The despatches from Gen. Taylor to the department of war were brought by Mr. CRITTENDEN, a volunteer aid-de-camp of Gen. Taylor during the battle. Mr Crittenden left Gen. Taylor, with his army, at Agua Nueva on the 2d March, and brought the despatches along the usual route from Monterey to Camargo, under the escort of about 250 troops, commanded by Major Geddings, having a long train of some 130 empty wagons. As they approached Cerralvo, a small party was sent in to provide forage, &c., when the enemy under Urrea were discovered, about 1,500 strong. Out troops were immediately placed on the defensive, and received the assault of the superior numbers with the resolution of men determined to cut their way through. They were repulsed with the loss of about 30 men, while we lost about half the number. A part of our baggage train was destroyed, (40 or 50 of the wagons,) when the gallant Urrea made his retreat in the direction of he Tula pass. The teamsters were unwilling to proceed without a stronger escort, and Mr. Crittenden was detained five or six days at Cerralvo, when Col. Curtis arrived from Camargo with a large body of troops. He was too late to overtake Urrea, who had probably commenced his retreat as soon as he heard of Santa Anna's discomfiture. Colonel Curtis proceeded to Monterey, the enemy having fled as rapidly as possible, and this may be the last that we shall hear of them on this side of Tula and San Luis for some time. [ANP]

NNR 72.080, April 3, 1847 SANTA ANNA'S REPORT OF THE BATTLE OF BUENA VISTA

Republican Liberating Army.

General in Chief--Excellent sir: During a moment of leisure--it being now 7 o'clock in the morning--I have to inform your excellency, in order that you may communicate the same to the sr. vice president of the Republic, that the army under my command, after a painful and long march over the desert between the Cedral and this place, has had to encounter a battle that lasted two days, with the United States Army under General Taylor, composed of 8 to 9000 men, with 26 pieces of artillery. Both armies have fought a bloody and desperate fight. This morning the action commenced at six o'clock, and continued until sunset. The field of battle is covered with the dead. Blood has flowed in torrents. Two standards, which I have the honor to send your excellency, were taken by us, together with three pieces of artillery, the calibre of 6 and 4 pounders, with their horses. Although the battle was not decisive I can assure you Excellency that the field, however stoutly disputed, finally remained in our possession, as is manifested by the trophies I have mentioned. Upwards of 2000 of the enemy's dead lie strewed upon the field of battle, and we have taken some prisoners, the exact number of whom has not been made known to me.

On our part I regret to say that with generals, officers and troops, we have lost in killed and wounded about 1000—readily accounted for by the obstinate encounter we have had—lasting through two successive days. During one of the charges today my horse was killed by a grape-shot. The strong position of the enemy was all that saved him from complete route.

A few hours before I reached this point the enemy, having notice of our advance, retired from his position at Agua Nueva, where he was first posted, and fell back to his defile, which may be even compared to the pass of Thermopyloae. But he must have been taught by the experience of these two days, that neither the rugged steep of the mountain nor his fortified position, nor any other of his advantages, could restrain the Mexican soldier from battling in defence of his country and her rights.

Our soldiers are indeed worthy of all commendation, and I glory in the consciousness of being at the head of an army of heroes, who not only know how to fight bravely but to suffer patiently both hunger and thirst for forty-eight hours, a sacrifice required of them by the nation, and of which I have myself been a witness.

The only painful reflection I have at this moment is that not a biscuit nor a particle of rice can be had here for our sick and wounded. We have subsisted, for many days on meat alone. Thus is verified the complaints I have heretofore made of the neglect this army has suffered, from having depend for supplies on its own resources during the last two months. I will now ad that it is not possible to carry on the campaign successfully unless the army is provided with all the supplies required in war. I therefore think of moving back my camp tomorrow morning to Agua Nueva, three leagues distant, to provide myself with some necessaries that must have arrived at the hacienda of Encarnacion; and if I succeed in obtaining those necessaries, and relieve myself of the incumbrance of the wound, I will return to the charge—in spite of my own wound, which was reopened in the consequence of being continually on horseback twelve hours a each day.

In the detailed account of the obstinate combat, which I shall soon present, due notice will be given of the generals, chiefs, officers and others who have bravely fought, and poured out their blood in defence of the country. I have not been willing to detain this report for such details, supposing the supreme government would wish to have the earliest account of these successes. Tomorrow or the day after I will cause to be transmitted to your Excellency the said detailed account, together with a notice of subsequent occurrences.

Accept, I pray your excellency, with this explanation, the consideration of my particular esteem, God and Liberty. Field of Angostura, near Buena Vista, February 23, 1847.

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.

His Excellency, the MINISTER OF WAR.

[AMA, ANP]
was triumphantly waiving over the city of Vera Cruz and the castle of San Juan D'Ulloa.

An officer of the Princeton furnishes the Gazette the following summary:

March 9th.-Disembarkation of troops commenced.

14th-Investment of the city complete.

18th-Trenches opened at night.

22nd-City summoned to surrender-on refusal, seven mortars opened a tire of bombs.

25th-Navy battery, three long 30 pounders and three 68 pounders-Paizhan guns-opened a fire in the morning, distance 70 yards.

25th-Another battery of four 24-pounders and 3 mortars opened. This day the navy battery opened on a breach in the wall of the city- the fire was very destructive to the town.

26th-Early in the morning the enemy proposed for a surrender. Commissioners on the American side-Generals Worth and Pillow and Col. Totten.

29th-Negotiations completed-city and castle surrendered-Mexican troops marched out and laid down their arms. The American troops occupied the city and batteries of the town and castle-at noon of that day the American ensign was hoisted over both, and saluted by our vessels.

The garrison of about 4,000 men, laying down their arms as prisoners of war, and being sent to their homes on parole. Five Generals, 60 superior officers, and 270 company officers amongst the prisoners.

The total loss of the American army, from the day of landing, (March 9,) is 65 persons killed and wounded.

Officers Killed -John R. Vinton, 2d artillery; Captain Albartis, 2nd infantry; Midshipman T. B. Shubrick, navy.

Officers wounded-Lieut. Colonel Dickenson, South Carolina volunteers, severely; Lieut. A.S.Baldwin, navy, slightly; Lieut. Delozier Davidson. 2ndinfantry, very slightly; Lieut. Lewis Neill, 2d dragoons, severely.-All the wounded are doing well.

Of the Mexicans, the slaughter is said to have been immense. The commanding general was stationed in the cry, while his second in command held the castle. Their regular force was 3,000, and they had about the same number of irregulars. Outside the city was Gen. La Veja with a force of from 6,000 to 10,000 cavalry. Col. Harney, with between 2 and 300 U.S. dragoons charged on and repulsed this immense force with terrible carnage, scattering them in all directions. They had barricaded a bridge to protect themselves, and our artillery soon knocked away this obstacle and gave Harney's command a chance at them.

In the attack on the town and castle only our smaller vessels, drawing not over nine feet were available.-But few shots and shells were thrown upon the castle-the attack being mainly upon the town. None of the enemy's missiles struck our vessels; and Midshipman Shubrick who was killed, was serving a battery on shore. With the city the hopes of the enemy fell, as they had not provisions in the castle to sustain a protracted siege.

The Princeton is commanded by Capt. Engle; as she sailed from Vera Cruz, Com. Conner's flag was saluted from the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa. The Commodore is a passenger on board, having been relieved by Com. Perry before the commencement of these operations. [ANP]
PASSO
NRR 72.081 April 10, 1847 NEW MEXICO INSURRECTIONS DEFEATED, SEVERLY PUNISHED BY COL. STERLING PRICE

SANTA FE-EL PASSO- An extra of the Independence (Mo.) Expositor, of the 25th March says-

"Thos. Caldwell, esq. Has just got in from the plains, and confirms the sad intelligence if the massacre at Taos. Gov. Charles Bent and twenty five Americans are the victims of a cold-blooded assassination. Among the deal is L.L Wuldo, a citizen of our county, and brother to Captain David Waldo, of Colonel Doniphan's regiment.

Mr. Caldwell left El Paso on the 12th January- and Santa Fe on the 3d of February.
He left Colonel Doniphan in possession of El Passo, waiting for the artillery to arrive, when he intended to move for Chihuahua. Nothing was known in New Mexico of the change on Gen. Wool's position.

The insurrectionists consisted of about 2,000 men and started for Santa Fe. Col.
Price sent out about 300 men to quell for them; they met about twenty five miles from Santa Fe, when an engagement took place. The Mexicans drew up 2,000 strong, but at the first fire from the Missouri boys thirty six men fell dead, and the balance fled. Capt. Morm of Platte who was in command, pursued them through the Moro valley, and burnt to ashes every house town, and rancho in his path. The inhabitants fled to the mountains, where they are bound to starve, as Morm leaves them nothing whatever to subsist on-a just retribution for their assassination of innocent people.

As Mr. Caldwell was passing out he heard at a distance the sound of artillery, and learned from rumor in the edge of the settlement's that the American army had whipped them worse than ever. Captain Hendley, of Ray county volunteers, was the only one killed on our side, and some seven slightly wounded."

A letter from Independence dated March 21, says "no doubt the city of Taos is now in ashes, as our Missouri boys had caused the smoke from their burning houses to ascend from a thousand hills: the inhabitants in the Moro valley, men, women, and children had fled to the mountains. Mr. Caldwell left Col. Doniphan at El Paso on the 12th of January waiting for artillery companies to arrive. When he intended to march for Chihuahua. He thinks that Doniphan, ere this has taken Chihuhua or has been taken himself. We may await with trembling anxiety a long time. I fear, for the result of this hazardous expedition. Capt. Sublette had not arrived at Santa Fe, when Mr.
Caldwell left- February 3d; fears are entertained that he may have fallen into the hands of the Mexicans on entering Taos Valley.

Mr. Caldwell learned from a reliable source, that McGoffin, Connelly, and other prisoners were at large in the streets of Chihuahua, but not allowed to leave the city." [MSN]

NRR 72.081 April 10, 1847 LT. TALBOT'S, DARING FEET AT SANTA BARBARA

CALIFORNIA-LIEUT. TALBOT-A letter published in the Boston Traveler, dated at San Francisco on the 15th of November, relates the following daring feat of one of our young officers who was severing in that distant country:

"At Santa Barbara, one hundred and fifty mounted and well armed Californians attacked Lieut. Talbot, one of Fremonts' young officers, who was left in charge there with ten men. They were quartered in Robins house; the house was surrounded, and they ordered to surrender unconditionally; Talbot refused to surrender on any conditions. Cooley packing up their provisions, &C., they marched out of the house to sell their lives at a dear rate; but, those surrounded by the immense odds, they were not attacked. Talbot drew his men off the hills just back of the mission, followed all the way by the cowardly miscreants, who were threatening to devour him is he did not lay down his arms, but none of them were willing to take the first taste. Halting on a hill, where the Americans had the advantage, the brave barbarians set fire to the grass in a circle round the little party. Perhaps preferring to devour them after being cooked, but they would not stay to be cooked and the brave little Talbot marched his men through the fire in crossing the mountains into the Tulares, lead them safely to Monterey where Mr. Larkin writes they arrived safe a
THE CASTLE OF SAN JUAN D'ULLOA, is unquestionably the most celebrated of all American Fortresses. Its construction was commenced in the year 1582, upon a bar or bank in front of the town of Vera Cruz, at the distance of 1,062 Castillian varas, or yards, and it is entirely surrounded by water. The centre of the area occupied by this fortress is a small island, upon which Juan de Grijalva landed a year previous to the arrival of Cortez upon our continent, and at that period it accidentally received the name which it retains to this present day. It seems that there was a shrine or temple erected upon it, in which human victims were sacrificed to the Indian gods; and as the Spaniards were informed, these offerings were made in accordance with the commands of the kings of Acholhua, (one of the provinces of the empire) they confounded or abbreviated this name in to the word Ulloa, which they affixed to that island.

Sixty-one years after the conquest the work was undertaken, and although it seems to have been designed not only to defend Vera Cruz, but to attack it in case of necessity, that city was, nevertheless, sacked by the pirates under the renowned freebooter, Lorencillo, in the year 1683.

The cost of the castle has been estimated by various writers to have amounted to the sum of forty millions of dollars, and it may not be regarded as an exaggeration, if we consider the difficulty of obtaining some of the materials of which it is composed, and the fact that a large portion of it is built on foundations laid in the sea, whose waves it has resisted for more than two centuries.

According to a report made on the 17th of January, 1775 it was the opinion of a council of war, composed of distinguished officers, that this fortress, after all of its defenses were completed, would require a garrison, for effective service, composed of 1700 infantry soldiers, 300 artillery do., 228 sailors, and 100 supernumeraries.

The exterior polygon, which faces Vera Cruz, extends 300 yards in length, while that which defends the north channel is at least 200 yards long. Besides this there is a low battery, situated in the bastion of Santiago, which doubles the fire on that channel. The southern channel is commanded, also, by the battery of San Miguel.

The whole fort is constructed of Madrepora astrea, a species of soft coral which abounds in the neighboring islands; and its walls are from four to five yards in thickness, their exterior being faced with a harder stone. It is well supplied with water, having seven eisterns within the castle, viz: one containing 24,948 cubic feet of water; one containing 17,884; one containing 19,000; one containing 6,000; one containing 16,685; one containing 4,500; and one containing 4,752. Total 93,767.

MILITARY MOVEMENTS—Our city is again becoming quite lively with soldiers belonging to the army arriving here for transportation to New Orleans on route to Mexico. The government having found this to be the best point in the Union to concentrate the new companies, and for furnishing the best facilities for accelerating their progress to the seat of war, has ordered a number of them (how many is not yet known,) to rendezvous here.

It is note worthy to remark, that now as formerly Pennsylvania is first in the field. Nine out of the ten companies composing the regiment are from this state, and one other from Maryland. A volunteer company from Virginia had enlisted, and been SICKNESS IN THE ARMY. Col. Roberts of Va., writing from Lobos, says:-“our men are, nearly all, in fine health and spirits, and we have lost but 3 men since we left home—2 from mania-potu, and one by an injury from a fall into the hold of a ship. But seven are on the sick list at present, and none of them dangerous, which is not many out of 840 men. There was a Mississippi regiment came to New Orleans at the same time we arrived there, which has lost 180 men and left 100 sick, they buried from 6 to 12 per day while we lay there, and sic out of each of the two ships which arrived, and four since arriving here which is something very strange, as it is their own climate—while the two regiments from Pennsylvania have lost but 6 men out of 1700; but there was one great cause—they dissipated more than out men, and were not so well clad, out men all wearing flannel while they mostly wore light cotton clothing.” [MSM]

Under this caption the Richmond Enquirer of the 30th of March, adduces the statement from the 'Union,' of forces under Gen. Taylor's command, [see p.90] as corroborating what had previously been asserted in the Enquirer,—that if Gen. Taylor had been overwhelmed by the Mexican army under Santa Anna, the responsibility for the disaster was all his own, The Enquirer in the same articles adduces as further proof on this point the following remarks of the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun.

"You will perceive from the last official despatches forwarded by Gen. Taylor to the Adjutant General here in Washington, that the position he assumed at Agua Nueva was entirely on his own responsibility and that Gen. Scott had advised him to fall back on Monterey, and act, for a while, on the defensive—And it will also be seen, from the correspondence between the war from pressing him forward, rather expresses a wish that he might confine himself to Monterey, and there await the enemy. If Gen. Talyor has acted against the advice given him from these quarters, he must have had good reason to do so, and I, therefore, trust that he will be able to give a good account of himself, notwithstanding the fatal rumors of disasters which have reached us from the Rio Grande.” [MSM]

General Taylor's General Orders—After the Battle of Buena Vista.

Orders No. 2.
Headquarters Army of Occupation,
Buena Vista, Feb. 26, 1847.

1. The commanding general has the grateful task of congratulating the troops upon the brilliant success which attended their arms in the conflicts of the 22d and 23d. Confident in the immense superiority of numbers, and stimulated by their presence of a distinguished leader, the Mexican troops were yet repulsed in every effort to force our lines, and finally withdrew with immense loss from the field.

2. The general would express his obligations to the officers and men engaged for the cordial support which they rendered throughout the action. It will be his highest pride to bring to the notice of the government the conspicuous gallantry of particular officers and corps, whose unwavering steadiness more than once saved the fortunes of the day. He would also express his high satisfaction with the conduct of the small command left to hold Saltillo. Though not so seriously engaged as their comrades, their services were very important and efficiently rendered. While bestowing this just tribute to the good conduct of the troops, the general deeply regrets to say that there were not a few exceptions. He trusts that those who fled ingloriously to Buena Vista, and even to Saltillo, will seek an opportunity to retrieve their reputation and to emulate the bravery of their comrades, who bore the brunt of the battle, and sustained against fearful odds the honor of the flag.
The exultation of success is checked by the heavy sacrifice of life which it has cost, embracing many officers of high rank and rare merit. While the sympathies of a grateful country will be given to the bereaved families and friends of those who nobly fell their illustrious example will remain for the benefit and admiration of the army.

By order of Major General Taylor;
W.W.S. BLISS, Ass't Adj't Gen.

NRR 72.083 April 10, 1847 compliment of the Washington "Union" to Gen. Zachary Taylor's general orders after Buena Vista

The Washington Union commenting on the above general orders, says:

"It is written in fine taste. It alludes in the most modest terms which he could employ, to the brilliant victory which our troops have won over the immense superiority of he Mexicans, headed by their most distinguished military leader. It pays due honors to the brave officers and troops who live to receive the gratitude of their country. It pays a brief but affecting tribute to those gallant spirits who have gloriously fallen in the battle, but whose "illustrious example will remain for the benefit and admiration of the army," and as a monument of the glory of our republic in the eyes of Europe. It treats as delicately as possible all those inexperienced soldiers who ingloriously fled, to whom he administers the warning lesson of seeking to retrieve their reputation by future exertions on another field. It is impossible to read the various descriptions of this remarkable battle, where the skill of the commanding general in seizing his ground and maneuvering his troops vied with the chivalry of his men, without the deepest emotions." NRR 72.083 April 10, 1847 coolness and bravery of the Mississippi and Illinois volunteers at Buena Vista, faltering of the Indiana regiment

The New Orleans Delta has the following items derived from a gentleman who was present at the battle of Buena Vista:

The coolness and bravery of the Mississippi and Illinois volunteers were, he says, beyond all praise. While firing in line, the front rank knelt on one knee, taking deliberate aim, and doing deadly execution.

Col. Bowles, of the 2d Indiana regiment, finding that his men faltered early in the action of the 23d, withdrew from them in disgust, and taking a rifle joined the Mississippi regiment in the thickest of the fight. It is due to the Indiana regiment, however, to say, that they subsequently rallied, appealed to as they were by Capt. Lincoln and others, and fought bravely.

Col. Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, is idolized by his regiment. Believing that on the 24th there would be a fight, and being unable to walk on account of the wound in his foot, he ordered that he be carried out to head in a wagon.

Col. Yell, as we have already told our readers, was lanced to death. His horse became restive, his bridle broke, and he carried him into the midst of the enemy, where a lance pierced him through the head.

Col. Hardin, before being killed, captured a flag from the enemy, which, with his horse, he requested should be sent home as a last memento to his wife.

Among the prisoners taken were two who were deserters from our own ranks. They were brought before Gen. Taylor who ordered the wretches to be drummed out beyond the lines. Such rascals, he said, might do for Santa Anna—they would not suit him—and it would be wasting powder and shot to shoot them. They were therefore drummed out to the tune of the Rogue's March.

After the battle of Buena Vista was won, General Wool, who was distinguished for his gallantry and skill, met General Taylor and threw his arms around his neck, and congratulated him on the brilliant victory, in warm terms. The old hero replied, "we can't be beaten General, when we all pull together." The whole country will attest the justice of the simple reply.

A Washington letter published in the New York Commercial, says-

There is a very interesting letter in the city from Gen. Wool. He speaks in the most exalted terms of General Taylor's conduct of the battle of Buena Vista. It was written, too, without the knowledge that General Taylor had so highly spoken of him. It is pleasing to see these officers so devoid of all jealousy toward each other.
Gen. Wool seems to harbor no envy at the fortune which has reversed the relations of rank between him and General Taylor.

General Wool, I learn, speaks freely in this letter of the cowardice displayed by some of the Indiana and Arkansas troops, and gives a graphic picture of the struggle and the brilliant movements that decided the victory in our favor. [ANP]

NNR 72.083 April 10, 1847 DESCRIPTION OF FORTIFICATIONS OF SAN JUAN D'ULUA.

-Extract of a letter from an officer on board the United States ship Albany:

As from the deck, with my glass, I swept over the city of Vera Cruz, its environs, and the stronghold which covers it, said to be impregnable to the combined fleets of the earth, it was with rather a serious feeling that my eyes rested upon this grim, grizly pile, barbed and bristling with its hundreds of cannon. The question at once arises, can it be taken? Shall we ever see our fleet moving up over the expanse before me to attack it? I doubt it very much. Certainly not with any force we have or have had here.
Let the people prate as much at home as they please about it. If it ever is done it will be by a tremendous array of cannon and a most awful loss of life. The castle of Vera Cruz is no more what it was when France carried it than you are now to what you were when a nursling in your mother's arm. Then there were no guns above the caliber of 24 pounds, and but a few of them, most miserably served. The magazines, unarched, were not bombproof. The powder was of such an inferior character that not a shot penetrated the side of a French ship, but at the close of the engagement were stuck about the sides of the shipping like so many balls of mud; and in addition to all this, the commanding officer having been instructed not to fire the first gun, permitted the French squadron to come up and take its position as quietly as though mooring to pass the winter season.

Now let us see what a change time and a severe lesson have effected in this same castle. There are at present mounted within its periphery nearly 300 cannon, and these all 32's, 42's, and 8 and 10 inch Paixhan, there being a very large number of the latter; and wherever it has been possible to train a gun upon the channel of approach, they are planted - en barbette, - ; so that a fleet moving up to the attack must be exposed to the concentrated fire of seventy cannon over a distance of two miles before it can get into position to return a single shot. The castle of San Juan is from the city at a distance of about three-eighths of a mile, and is supported by a water battery at the northwest angle of the town of fifty 32 and 42-pound guns, all of which would bear upon a squadron passing up, bows on, from the moment it arrived within the range of the shot until its anchors were down, with springs upon the cables, within the reach of musket shot. Judge, then, what a force would be required for any promise of success, and at what an immense sacrifice it would be accomplished, if at all. The garrison at this time is composed of 2,000 men. In the event of an attack they would, with the most perfect safety, retire within the casemates (which are as impervious to shot as the sides of Mount Orizaba) until the ammunition of the assailing force was expended, when they would return to their guns and sweep the waters before them with the most terrific, destructive effect. The officer commanding the castle lately sent the official word - that if the commodore would bring his fleet up, he might fire until there was not a shot left in the locker, and he would promise him not to return a gun until he was done.

NNR 72.083 April 10, 1847 MEXICAN ACCOUNT OF THE BATTLE OF BUENA VISTA.

-A number of letters and documents were written by the Mexicans during, and immediately after the battle, and deapatchee to the interior and there published with flourish of trumpets as for a great victory. We subjoin in addition to what was inserted in our last, the following:

The Enemy's Camp,
February 23, 1847.

DEAR FRIEND: The general-in-chief is upon the point of despatching a courier-now 5 o'clock, P.M. We have taken the fortifications of the enemy, and four of his positions, which he defended with obstinacy, and every height and every ravine of which they furiously disputed. We have lost many field and other officers, out of proportion to the number of soldiers, and we have taken from the enemy two flags and three pieces of artillery. There are very few prisoners-four, I believe the rest are dead.

Our troops are perishing from hunger and thirst.-They have not drank water in two days, and have eaten nothing since the day they were at Incarnation and a slice of roasted meat at La Vaca.

I am much afraid lest this cause should disperse us to-night, since the soldiers are already scattering, and we have seen bodies of them fighting and charging upon the enemy wherever they thought there was water, caring for nothing; and we have seen them disputing among themselves, totally indifferent to the fire of the enemy, for a piece of ham found upon the dead Yankees. This night is a fearful one for the republic, since I dread lest we should become disbanded. In conclusion, dear friend, there now remains but little to be done, because we have been pursuing the enemy all day long with the bayonet, and to morrow they will be finished. They killed the horse of the general-in-chief with a grape shot.

Addition, or Postscript, 24th -Since closing my letter, the general-in-chief, convinced without doubt, that the army, will disband unless it can obtain food, and procure water, has ordered its march to Agua Nueva where there are some cattle and water-water, which is before everything else.

It is very cruel, dear L., that which we have suffered. We have lost about a thousand men and many officers killed and wounded, and our Lombardini among the rest.

It is the first action which the republic has fought on a large scale and obstinately. It begun at five minutes past 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the 22nd. They attacked us on our right and were repulsed at 6 o'clock. On the 23rd they returned to the charge, at the same point, before 6 o'clock in the morning, and were driven back a league and a quarter to Buena Vista, the different conflicts which we had with them being concluded at 6 in the evening.

From a letter, dated Feb. 24th.-We have gained a bloody battle, and taken from the enemy standards and artillery. They have become to demand a peace, and they have been answered by the general-in-chief, that until the whole republic is evacuated by them he will not listen to them. (Here follow the names of some of the officers killed.)

General Juagni writes me, and says that the following officers have been killed. The brave Colonel Francisco Berra, the lieutenant colonel of the 1st regiment; Col. Pepe, of the 2d light cavalry; the lieutenant colonel of the 11th infantry, and who knows how many have met the same fate. The following are wounded; Gen. Lombardini, the Colonel of he 3d cavalry and the Lieut. Col. of he 5th cavalry.

Extract from a private letter, dated Feb. 23.-At the moment of writing (12 o'clock of the day) we are returning from Angostura, where we beat Taylor all day yesterday, taking from them many points among the heights almost inaccessible, and doing so repeatedly, until our troops remained at night established in the position from which we had driven them by main force. We took from them three guns, killed many of their troops. Our soldiers engaging them again and again.

I would not desire to speak to you of those killed of whom we have lost many and among them Pepe Oronoz, Pepe Bonilla, the Major of Morlia Berra, Asonos, Lugando, major of huzzars. There area wounded, Gen. Lombardini, D. Angel Guzman, D. Miguel Gonzales, and others.

Today a flag of truce has come in from Taylor, asking peace. D. Antonio commanded the eyes of the officer to be unbandedaged that they might see our camp, and that if we had countermarched it was for want of supplies and not for want of courage. [ANP]
General orders of the army-23d Feb'ry., 7 o'clock at night-on the positions of the enemy-camp of Angostura.

His excellency, the general in-chief of the army directs me to announce to the generals, field and company officers, and the soldiers which compose it that he has witnessed with satisfaction the gallant bearing of each one of them during the day of combat which we have had with the invading forces of North America. Such bearing is worthy of the soldiers of a people who desire to be free; and the ground which we now occupy, on which the enemy was just now posted, the places of artillery and the colors we have taken, and the thousand corpses of the enemy which are scattered around us, will always be evidence of his valor of the soldiers of Mexico.

His excellency also directs me to say, that in testimony of the brave deeds of his subordinates, he will present them to the nation and to the supreme government with his commendation; and taking into consideration the fatigues of these days, and the scarcity of provisions which the troops are suffering, that he will direct them to be so disposed that they may recover themselves so as to conclude with glory the enterprise so brilliantly commenced. He directs that this order shall be communicated to the army in a general order extraordinary. By command of his excellency; M. Micheltorena. [ANP]

A much more minute and satisfactory account of the incidents "incidents" of a battle is often derived from unofficial than from official reports. Fuller accounts-better written particulars of a war never were so generally, speedily, and accurately spread abroad since wars began, than have been of the existing one between Mexico and the United States.

The New Orleans Delta of the 27th ult., contains some particulars of the battle of Buena Vista, derived from Major Coffee, one of Gen. Taylor's aids. We annex a few of them:

"On the 21st the enemy were descried, approaching over the distant hills. At their appearance the volunteers raised a great shout, and gave three tremendous cheers. Their engineers and officers were seen flying over the field, and dragging their cannon about to get them into position; but the nature of the ground did not favor the undertaking, and it was late in the day before the big guns began to open.

The enemy had with them thirty two cannon, mostly of large calibre. Their fire though kept up very briskly, and apparently well manned, did so little execution in our ranks that it was not considered necessary to return their fire. Our cannon were therefore silent the whole of the 21st. Eight or ten killed and wounded were the extent of the casualties sustained by our army on the 21st. During the day an officer approached our lines with a flag of truce, and requested to be shown to General Taylor.

The brave old man was sitting quietly on his old white charger, with his leg over the pommel of the saddle, watching the movements of the enemy, when the Mexican officer was presented.

In a very courteous and graceful manner the officer stated that "he had been sent by his excellency Gen. Santa Anna, to his excellency Gen. Taylor, to inquire, in the most respectful manner, what he [Gen. Taylor] was waiting for." From the silence of Gen. Taylor's batteries, and the quiet manner in which he received Santa Anna's terrific cannonading, the Mexicans supposed he was asking a very pertinent question, to which, however, old Rough and Ready gave the very pertinent reply that "he was only waiting for General Santa Anna to surrender."

The Mexican returned hastily to his lines.
This message proved to be a ruse to ascertain which Gen. Taylor's position was, for after the return of the Mexican officer to his own ranks the whole Mexican battery seemed to open upon Gen. Taylor's position, and the balls flew over and about him like hail. Utterly indifferent to the perils of his situation, there sat the old chief, on his conspicuous white horse, peering through his spy glass at the long lines of Mexican troops that could be seen at a great distance on the march.

The Persuasion of his aids could not induce him to abandon his favorable point for observation, nor to give up his white horse. To the suggestion of his staff that old Whitey was rather too conspicuous a charge, for the commander, he replied that "the old fellow had missed the fun at Monterey, on account of a sore foot, and he was determined he should have his share this time."

Speaking of the engagement on the 22d, the Delta says-

The broken nature of he ground divided the forces, so that instead of one general engagement, the regiments were compelled in a great measure to fight on their own hook. Our officers were always in the advance, leading their troops, hence the great mortality among them. In this general melee, one of our small regiments, of 400 men, would be attacked by a whole Mexican brigade of several thousand.-Thus the Kentucky infantry was attacked at the foot of a hill, in a deep ravine, by an immense force of the enemy.

A large number of the officers were killed here-among them was Col. Mckee, who fell badly wounded, and was immediately despatched by the enemy, who pierced him with their bayonets as he lay on the ground. Lieut. Col. Clay was shot through the thigh, and being unable to walk, was taken up and carried some distance by some of his men, but owing to the steepness of the hill, the men finding it very difficult to carry him, and the enemy in great numbers pressing upon them, the gallant lieut. Colonel begged them to leave him on the field; the last that was seen of this noble officer he was lying on his back, fighting with his sword the enemy who were stabbing him with their bayonets.

The veteran Capt. William S. Willis of the same regiment, at the head of his company, with three stalwart sons who fought at his side, was badly wounded, but still continued the fight, until he was overcome with the loss of blood. In the meantime the Indiana brigade, who were drawn out and ordered to charge the enemy, were seized with a panic, and displaying some hesitation, Assistant Adj't Gen Lincoln rushed to their front, and whilst upbraiding them for their cowardice, was shot, several balls passing through his body. In justice to this brigade is should be stated, that they subsequently rallied, and fully redeemed their reputation by the most gallant and effective fighting.

Colonel Hardin led the Illinoians in very handsome style, and the sturdy "suckers" fought like lions.-Their intrepid colonel fell wounded, and experienced the fate of Colonels Mckee and Clay, and was killed by the enemy-not, however, before he had killed one of the cowardly miscreants with a pistol, which he fired whilst lying on the ground.

Col. Yell led, the foremost man, a charge of his mounted volunteers against a large body of lancers, and was killed by a lance, which entered his mouth and tore off one side of his face.

The Mississippians, the heroes of Monterey, after doing hard duty as skirmishers, were ordered into line to receive a charge of cavalry, which they did with their rifles delivering at the same time a most destructive fire among the crowded columns of cavalry. The enemy were completely repulsed. The distinguished commander of this gallant regiment, Colonel Jefferson Davis, was badly wounded, an escopette ball having entered his foot and passed out of his leg. He was, however, doing well when last heard from. The chivalrous Lieut. Col. M'Clung was prevented from doing his share of the brave deeds of this brilliant fight, by the grievous wound received at the battle of Monterey, which still confines him to his bed, and from which it is much feared by his best friends he will never recover.

Col. Humphrey Marshall's splendid regiment of Kentucky cavalry were impatient for an opportunity of showing their mettle, and avenging the capture of their brethren, then in the hands of the enemy.-They were soon favored with the desired opportunity, by the approach of a force of more than 2,000 lancers and hassars, who gallantly charged them.-The Kentuckyans stood their ground with immovable steadiness, and receiving the enemy with a fire from their carbines, charged in the most gallant style through the column on the right, and wheeling, fell on their left, dispersing and killing many of them.-A like charge was made by Col. May, at the head of a squadron of dragoons, and one of Arkansas cavalry, against a large body of the enemy's cavalry, with like results.

As to the flags Santa Anna boasts of having taken, they are, very probably, mere company markers, which were dropped on the field and picked up by the valiant Mexicans. His excellency, of the war department, to whom Santa Anna has sent these trophies, will no doubt be sorely disappointed in the size, texture, and beauty of these standards. Mexican pride is easily satisfied when such feeble mementos of their prowess and valor as these console them for so inglorious a defeat.

All the officers on our side, in this hard-fought battle distinguished themselves. The details of the battle were confided to Gen. Wool, who nobly justified the confidence of his commander and brother veteran, by the most active, zealous, efficient and gallant conduct. Throughout the whole action he was constantly engaged in the disposition of our forces, and in rallying them to the onset. It was a miracle that he escaped the thick flying balls which thinned the ranks he was marshalling. There was but one complaint made against him and that was, that he exposed himself too much. Brig. Gen. Lane, also, showed himself to be a brave and capable officer. Although wounded early in the action, he kept his horse until it closed, and never for a moment left his post.

The Washington Union of the 3d says:

"A note, addressed by Ass't Adjutant Bliss, from General Taylor's army, mentions the fact that the general received two balls during the battle; one passed through the cuff of his coat, the other through the front."

The following account of the battle is extracted from the New Orleans Tropic, of the 30th March. It partakes far too much of the figurative, for either a military report or a historical account, but gives a graphic description of the field of operation, and details more full the chain of incidents than any of the other accounts yet received. The Picayune states that it was written "by an accomplished gentleman who shared in the honors and perils of the fight." We should suspect from the general tenor of the article, that it was penned by one that is or has been in the regular army, attached probably to the artillery, and who full of the espirit du corps had difficulty in preserving a due impartiality to parcelling out the honors won, or consideration for errors committed in the field of action. His reference to the Indiana and Arkansas volunteer corps we hope may turn out to be chargeable to these prejudices.

Camp at Buena Vista, February 24, 1847.

On the morning of the 22d, intelligence reached Gen. Taylor at his camp, on the hill overlooking Saltillo from the south, that Santa Anna, whose presence in our vicinity had been reported for several days, was advancing upon our main body, stationed near Rancho San Juan de Buena Vista, about seven miles from Saltillo. The general immediately moved forward with May's squadron of Dragoons, Sherman's and Bragg's batteries of artillery, and the Mississippi regiment of rifleman under Col. Davis, and arrived at the position which he had selected for awaiting the attack of the enemy, about 11 o'clock. The time and the place, the hour and the man seemed to promise a glorious celebration of the day. It was the 22d of February, the anniversary of that day on which the God of battles gave to freedom its noblest champion, to patriotism its purest model, to America a preserver, and to the world the nearest realization of human perfection; for panegyric sinks before the name of WASHINGTON.

The morning was bright and beautiful. Not a cloud floated athwart the firmament or dimmed the azure of the sky, and the flood of golden radiance which gilded the mountain tops and poured over the valleys, wrought light and shade into a thousand fantastic forms. A soft breeze swept down from the mountains, rolling into graceful undulations the banner of the republic, which was proudly streaming from the flag staff of the fort and from the towers and battlements of Saltillo. The omens were all in our favor.

In the choice of his position Gen. Taylor exhibited the same comprehensive sagacity and masterly coup d'oeil which characterized his dispositions at Resaca de la Palma, and which crowned triumphantly all his operations amid the blazing lines of Monterey-The mountains rise on either side of an irregular and broken valley, about three miles in width, dotted over with hills and ridges, and scarred with broad and winding ravines. The main road lies along the course of an arroyo, the bed of which is now so deep as to form an almost impassable barrier, while the other side is bounded by precipitous elevations, stretching perpendicularly towards the mountains, and separated by broad gullies, until they mingle into one at the base of the principle range. One h't right of the narrowest point of the roadway a battalion of the first Illinois regiment, under Lieut. Col. Weatherford, was stationed in a small trench, extending to the natural ravine, while on the opposite height, the main body of the regiment under Col. Hardin was posted, with a single piece of artillery from Capt. Washington's battery. The post of honor on the extreme was assigned to Bragg's artillery, his supported by the second regiment of Kentucky foot under Col. McKee, the left flank of which rested upon the arroyo. Washington's battery occupied a position immediately in front of the narrow point of the roadway, in rear of which, and somewhat to the left, on another height, the second Illinois regiment, under Col. Bissell, was posted.—Next on the left, the Indiana brigade, under Gen. Lane deployed, while on the extreme left the Kentucky cavalry under Col. Marshall, occupied a position directly under the frowning summits of the mountains. The two squadrons of the first and second dragoons, and the Arkansas cavalry under Col. Yell, were posted in rear, ready for any service which the exigencies of the day might require.

These dispositions had been made for some time, when the enemy was seen advancing in the distance, and he clouds of dust which rolled up before him gave satisfactory evidence that his numbers were not unworthy the trial of strength upon which we were about to enter. He arrived upon his position in immense masses, and with forces sufficiently numerous to have commenced the attack at once, had he been as confident of success as it subsequently appeared he was solicitous for our safety. The first evidence directly afforded us of his presence of Santa Anna was a white flag, which was dimly seen fluttering in the breeze, and anon Surgeon Gen. Lindenberg, of the Mexican army, arrived, bearing a beautiful emblem of benevolent bravado and Christian charity. It was a missive from Santa Anna, suggested by considerations for our personal comfort, which has placed us under lasting obligations, proposing to Gen. Taylor terms of unconditional surrender; promising good treatment; assuring us that his force amounted to upwards of 20,000 men; that our defeat was inevitable, and that, to spare the effusion of blood, his proposition should be complied with. Strange to say, the American general showed the greatest ingratitude; evinced no appreciation whatever of Santa Anna's kindness, and informed him that whether his force amounted to 20,000 or 50,000, it was equally a matter of indifference: the terms of adjustment must be arranged by gunpowder.

The messenger returned to his employer, and we waited in silence to hear the war of his artillery.—Hours rolled by without any movement on his part, and it appeared that the Mexican commander, grieved at our stubbornness, was almost disposed to retrace his steps, as if determined to have no further intercourse with such ungrateful audacity. At length he mustered resolution of open a fire from a mortar, throwing several shells into our camp without execution. While this was going on Capt. Steen, of the first dragoons, with a single man, started towards a hill on which the Mexican general appeared to be stationed with his staff; but before he completed the ascent the party vanished and when he reached the top he discovered that two regiments had thrown themselves into squares to resist his charge. The captain's gravity was overcome by this opposition, and he returned.

Just before dark a number of Santa Anna's infantry had succeeded in getting a position high up the mountains on our left, from which they could make a noise without exposing themselves to much danger, and at a distance of three hundred yards opened a most tremendous fire upon Col. Marshall's regiment. This was returned by two of his companies, which were dismounted and detached for the purpose as soon as they could arrive within a neighborly range. The skirmishing continued until after dark, with no result to us save the wounding of three men very slightly.

During the night a Mexican prisoner was taken, who reported Santa Anna's force as consisting of fifteen pieces of artillery, including some 24 pounders, six thousand cavalry, and fifteen thousand infantry, thus confirming the statement of his superior.

The firing on our extreme left, which soon ceased after sunset on the 22d, was renewed on the morning of the 22d at an early hour. This was accompanied by quick discharges of artillery from the same quarter, the Mexicans having established during the night a 12 pounder on a point at the base of the mountain, which commanded any position which could be taken by us. To counteract the effect of this piece, Lieut. O'Brien, 4th artillery, was detached with three pieces of Washington's battery, having with him Lieutenant Bryan of the Topographical Engineers, who having planted a few shells in the midst of the enemy's gunners, for the time effectually silenced his fire.

From the movements soon perceptible along the left of our line, it became lancers, which they seemed not unwilling to appropriate. Fortunately, Lieut. Col. Lane, was ordered to join Col. Davis, supported by a considerable body of myriads of Mexican despotism, were arrayed against five thousand Americans, and the volleys of artillery reverberated through the mountains like the thunders of an Alpine storm.

In the meantime, the enemy's cavalry had been stealthily pursuing its way along the mountain, and though our artillery had wrought great havoc among its numbers, the leading squadrons had passed the extreme points of danger, and were almost in position to attack us in the rear. At this critical moment, the Indiana regiment turned upon its proper front, and commenced an inglorious flight. The efforts of Col. Bowles to bring it into position were vain, and over hills and ravines they pursued their shameful career to the great delight of the enemy, who rent the air with shouts of triumph. Several officers of General Taylor's staff, immediately dashed off, to arrest, if possible, the retreating regiment and restore it again to reputation and duty. Major Dix, of the pay department, formerly of the 7th infantry, was the first to reach the deserters, and seizing the colors of the regiment, appealed to the men, to know whether they had determined to desert them. He was answered by three cheers, showing that though the men had little disposition to become heroes themselves, they were not unmindful of an act of distinguished gallantry on the part of another. A portion of the regiments immediately rallied around him, and was reformed by the officers. Dix, in person, then led them towards the enemy until one of the men volunteered to take the flag. The party returned to the field, and though not in time to repair the disaster which their flight had created, to retrieve in a slight degree, the character of the state. While this day, however, by this disgraceful panic, was fast going against us, the artillery was advanced, its front extended, and different sections and pieces under Sherman, Bragg, O'Brien, Thomas Reynolds, Kilburn, French, and Bryan, were working such carnage in the ranks of the enemy, as to make his columns roll to and from, like ships upon the billows. His triumph, at the Indiana retreat, was but for a moment, and his shouts of joy, were soon followed by groans of anguish, and the shrieks of expiring hundreds.

Washington's battery on the right, had now opened its fire, and driven back a large party of lancers, advancing in that direction. Along the entire line, the battle raged with great fury. Twenty-one-thousand of the victims of Mexican oppression and the myrmidons of Mexican despotism, were arrayed against five thousand Americans, sent forth to conquer a peace. The discharges of the infantry followed each other more rapidly than the sounds of the Swiss bell ringers in the fierce fervor of a finale, and the volleys of artillery reverberated through the mountains like the thunders of an Alpine storm.

The myriads of Mexican cavalry still pressed forwards on our left, and threatened a charge upon the Mississippi rifles, under Col. Davis, who had been ordered to support the Indiana regiment, and had succeeded in preserving a fragment of it in position.—Col Davis, immediately threw his command into the form of a V, the opening towards the enemy, and awaited his advance. On he came dashing with all the speed of Mexican horses, but when he arrived at that point from which could be seen the whites of his eyes, both lines poured forth a sheet of lead that scattered him like chaff, felling many a gallant steed to the earth, and sending scores of riders to the sleep that knows no waking.

While the dispersed Mexican cavalry were rallying, the 3d Indiana regiment, under Col. Lane, was ordered to join Col. Davis, supported by a considerable body of horse. About this time, from some unknown reason, our wagon train displayed its length along the Saltillo road, and offered a conspicuous prize for the Mexican lancers, which they seemed not unwilling to appropriate. Fortunately, Lieut.
assailed him, squadrons and battalions fell like leaves in the blasts of autumn. The progress was arrested, and before the showers of iron hail which killed, and the enemy had advanced to within range of grape, sweeping all before them. Every horse with O'Brien's battery was eclipsed even the fame they won at Monterey, while Sherman, O'Brien and Brian proved themselves worthy of the alliance. Every horse with O'Brien's battery was killed, and the enemy had advanced to within range of grape, sweeping all before him. But here is progress was arrested, and before the showers of iron hail which assailed him, squadrons and battalions fell like leaves in the blasts of autumn. The pursuit was too hot, and, as it evinced too clearly our deficiency in numbers, the whole line was driven back, and the day seemed lost beyond redemption. Victory, which a moment before appeared within our grasp, was suddenly torn from our standard. There was but one hope, but that proved an anchor sure and steadfast.

While our men were driven through the ravines, at the extremities of which a body of Mexican lancers were stationed to pounce upon them like tigers, Brent and Whiting of Washington's battery, gave them such a torrent of grape as to put them to flight, and thus saved the remnants of those brave regiments which had long borne the hottest portion of the fight. The enemy seemed inevitable; but Bragg and Thomas rose with the crisis, and with a most deadly fire, mingled with shouts which rose above the roar of artillery. The craft of Santa Anna had restored his courage, and with his reinforcement of cavalry he determined to charge our line. Under cover of their artillery, horse and foot advanced upon our batteries. These, from the smallness of our infantry force, were but feebly supported, yet by the most brilliant and daring efforts nobly maintained their positions. Such was the rapidity of their transitions that officers and pieces were empowered by ubiquity, and upon cavalry and infantry alike, wherever they appeared, they poured so destructive a fire as to silence the enemy's artillery, compel his whole line to fall back, and soon to assume a sort of sauvage qui peut movement, indicating anything but victory. Again, our spirits rose. The Mexicans appeared thoroughly routed; and while their regiments and divisions were passing before us, nearly all our light troops were ordered forward, and followed them with a most deadly fire, mingled with shouts which rose above the roar of artillery. In this charge the first Illinois regiment and McKee's Kentuckians were foremost. The pursuit was too hot, and, as it evinced too clearly our deficiency in numbers, the Mexicans, with a suddenness which was almost magical, rallied and returned upon us. They came in myriads, and for a while the carnage was dreadful on both sides. We were but a handful to oppose the frightful masses which were hurled upon us, and could have as easily resisted an avalanche of thunderbolts. We were driven back, and the day seemed lost beyond redemption. Victory, which a moment before appeared within our grasp, was suddenly torn from our standard. There was but one hope, but that proved an anchor sure and steadfast.

Rucker, with a squadron of the 1st dragoons, Capt. Steen having been previously wounded and Capt. Eustis (confined to his bed by illness) was present, and by order of Gen. Taylor, dashed among them in a most brilliant style, dispersing them by his charge, as effectually as the previous fire of the Mississippi rifleman.

May's dragoons, with a squadron of Arkansas cavalry under Capt. Pike, and supported by a single piece of artillery, under Lieut. Reynolds, now claimed their share in the discussion and when the Mexicans had again assembled, they had to encounter another shock from the two squadrons, besides a fierce fire of grape from Reinos's 6 pounder. The lancers once more rallied and directing their course towards the Saltillo road, were met by the remainder of Col. Yell's regiment and Marshall's Kentuckians, who drove them towards the mountains on the opposite side of the valley, where, from their appearance when last visible, it may be presumed, they are still running. In this precipitate movement, they were compelled to pass through a rancho, in which many of our valiant comrades had previously taken refuge, who, from this secure retreat, opened quite an effective fire upon them.

It is reported, moreover, that hundreds of the Arkansas cavalry were so well satisfied with the result of this single effort, that they deemed it unnecessary to make another, and accordingly kept on their way to town, and there reported Gen. Taylor in full retreat.
Mexicans were once more driven back with great loss, though taking with them the three pieces of artillery which were without horses.

Thus thrice during the day, when all seemed lost but honor, did the artillery, but the ability with which it was maneuvered, roll back the tide of success from the enemy, and give such overwhelming destructiveness to its effect, that the army was saved, and the glory of the American arms maintained. At this moment, however, let it never be forgotten that while every effective man was wanted on the field, hundreds, some say thousands, of volunteers had collected in the rancho with the wagon train, whom no efforts or entreaties could induce to join their brethren, neighbors and friends, then in the last struggle for death or victory.

The battle had now raged with variable success for nearly ten hours, and, by a sort of mutual consent, after the last carnage wrought among the Mexicans by the artillery, both parties seemed willing to pause upon the result. Night fell, and the American General, with his troops, slept upon the battle ground, prepared, if necessary, to resume operations on the morrow. But here the sun rose again upon the scene the Mexicans had disappeared, leaving behind them only the hundreds of their dead and dying, whose bones are to whiten their native hills, and whose moans of anguish were to excite in their enemies that compassion which can have no existence in the bosoms of their friends.

Throughout the action, Gen’l. Taylor was where the shots fell hottest and thickest, two of which passed through his clothes. He constantly evinced the greatest quickness of conception, fertility of resource, and a cool unerring judgment not to be baffled. Gen. Wool was wherever his presence was required, stimulating the troops to activity and exertion. The operations of General Lane were confined to his own brigade, and his efforts were worthy of better material for their application. Major Bliss bore himself with his usual gallantry, having his horse, as at Palo Alto, shot in the head. Mr. Crittenden, a son of the Senator from Kentucky, as conspicuous in the field as volunteer aid to General Taylor; and the Medical Director’s assistant surgeon, Hitchcock, could sometimes seen where the balls fell fastest, binding up a wound or dressing a broken leg, with true professional zeal; and anon galloping with th ardor of an amateur knight, conveying orders to different commanders.

In this, as in every case of arbitrament by the sword, the laurel is closely entwined with the cypress, and the lustre of a brilliant victory is darkened by the blood at which it has been purchased. I am unable to state our loss, but it has been very severe, and proves the battle of Buena Vista to have been by far the most terrible conflict in which our troops have been engaged. Captain Lincoln, Assistant Adjutant General to Gen. Wool, fell early in the action, while proudly distinguished by his efforts of bring the flying regiment back to their position, and with his last breath bore testimony against Indiana cowardice. Col. Yell was pierced by a lance while gallantly leading his regiment against the Mexican cavalry. The noble Hardin met his death gloriously while conducting the last terrible charge. Colonel McKee, after having gallantly sustained the honor of Kentucky throughout the action, fell in the foremost rank, and Lieut. Col. Clay was cut down at almost the same moment with Hardin and McKee, while giving his men the most brilliant example of noble daring and lofty chivalry.

Others have fallen, but their names are not known to me, nor is it for me to pronounce the eulogy of those whose names I have recorded. Other and abler pens will do justice to the character and memory of the illustrious dead, whose devotion to the Republic they have written with their blood and sealed with their lives. Lincoln was a gallant officer and accomplished gentleman, of pure heart and generous impulses, and worthy of his revolutionary lineage. Yell was a warm friend and gallant man, quick to see the right and ready to pursue it. Hardin was one of natures noblest spirits, a soldier tried and true, a rare union of the best qualities of the head and heart.-McKee was wise in council and brave in the field, with a heart moved by the tenderest sympathies and most noble impulses. And what shall I say of Clay -the young, the brave, the chivalrous-foremost in the fight-the should of every lofty sentiment?-devoted to his friends and genius to his enemies? He fell (indecipherable text) and has left no worthier name behind him. If he was not the "noblest Roman them all," few will deny that in him-

"Were the elements so mixed, that nature might stand up and say to all the world-THIS WAS A MAN."

But I cannot go on.
Everyone will wish an opportunity of learning particulars relative to the regions at, and round about the spot made famous by the last victory of General Taylor over the Mexicans. We avail of the letters of the Correspondent of the Missouri Republican, as affording the best written and most graphic description. The letters which follow, it will be observed, are dated at he place, and but a few days before the battle. Would for our country's character, for the sake of humanity we could have been spared the task of recording the horrid massacre which is detailed in the last of the three letters. It is indeed a tale that an American must blush at the worse than savage enactment of. What a deplorable guerrilla war is this about to degenerate into?

Letters from a correspondent of the Missouri Republican [Written before the battle]

CAMP SAN JUAN DE BUENA VISTA.
Five miles south of Saltillo, Mexico Jan. 20.
Mexican Campaigning.

This thing of writing letters for publication, in camp, is neither so pleasant nor so easy as might be imagined. Draw the picture of a man of common size sitting crossed legged on a blanket spread on the ground, with his portfolio on his knee, and an old broken lantern holding a piece of candle, propped up on a well worn leather trunk, and an earthenware inkstand on the ground close by, covered, by the by, with a small tent, in which old boots, old clothes, old guns, swords, pistols, are strewed around in the back ground, all striving to withdraw themselves from notice— and you will have an accurate daguerreotype of the writer and his ranch. And then there is no such thing as withdrawing from the noise of the camp, the wont of book makers, whose business is to digest the thoughts of others; but all is written in the midst of the perplexing interruptions. He has commenced a letter, and is endeavoring to recollect an event, or perhaps to philosophize on some new facts presented to his notice, when in walks the quartermaster: "Colonel, one of my wagoners is sick, and I must have another man detailed to drive his wagon. Very sorry, sir, to have to make the request known—the captains are all mad about taking their men for wagoners—but think, sir, the ammunition will have to be left behind, if we don't get a driver."

The quartermaster is scarcely despatched, when in pops he head of an orderly sergeant: "Colonel, the butcher has sent up to our company a quarter of beef that is so blue it looks like it was dyed with indigo, and it is stringy enough to make halters.—Just come and see it." A board of seventy' has to be summoned to condemn the mean beef of the rascally butcher, who is getting seven cents a pound for beef, when he is only giving two or three cents for it.

Five minutes more, and another sentence is half finished, when in comes the sergeant major to inquire whether he shall make a detail to go for wood tomorrow. "Yes," shouts the angry writer, "detail half the regiment, and order the other half to let me alone until I finish this letter."

Ninety miles from the Presidio we encamped on the banks of the Almos. On the evening of our arrival I did not go down to the stream; and was told by a staff officer that it was about seventy feet wide, and we soon crossed it in the morning. By the way, these staff officers seem to consider it a part of their duty to shorten distances and diminish obstructions, whenever they are inquired of on these subjects.—At an early hour next morning, the whole command was on the banks of the Almos, ready to cross. But the first view of the river dissipated all hopes of crossing it easily. It was seventy yards wide, and four feet deep, and swept downward with amusing velocity, foaming, roaring, and tearing along as though it were determined to prohibit any invasion of its light and transparent waters. Men could not wade it—their feet were swept from under them in three feet water, before they had reached the centre of the current; neither mules nor horses could pull their wagons across. It became necessary to take the horses and mules from the wagons and attach long ropes to the wagons, which reached across the stream, and men on the opposite side pulled them across. By elevating the leading wagons, as had been done at the Rio Grande, they were safely taken over with their contents. The men crossed on the wagons or by holding to them.

The current of the river was as rapid as the Ohio at the falls near Louisville, or the Mississippi at the rapids. An examination of it for several miles showed no decrease in its velocity. The volunteers took hold of the ropes with alacrity, and fairly worked themselves into favor by their good conduct during the day.

Leaving a portion of the troops to assist the provision train across the stream, the principal part of the army, with the baggage and ammunition wagons, marched on to cross the Sabinas, five miles distant, before camping. This was found not to be so wide, but, if possible, more rapid than the Almos, with quicksands on either bank. The men were fatigued with the labor of the morning when they reached it; but here was an obstacle still to be overcome and with redoubled energy they set to work to master it. The same course had to be pursued in crossing the wagons as at the Almos. Men and ropes were found far more serviceable than horses and mules. There were not wagons sufficient to cross the men on, and a bridge of empty wagons was made across the main part of the stream by fastening the wagons together; still the men had to wade to their waists to get on and off the wagons.

This was bad enough, but the hardships of the day were aggravated by another circumstance. It took so much time to cross over the artillery and staff wagons, (who were given preference over the volunteers,) that more than half the company wagons of the regiment of volunteers had to be left on the opposite side of the river from the troops. The consequence was, that after tugging all day at the ropes, pulling wagons over, and going without any dinner, the majority of the men had to lie down at night in their wet clothes without tents, blankets or food.

Many were the accidents and narrow escapes of the day. Several men were washed away from the wagons, and were only saved by extraordinary exertions. One of the artillerists was washed off the gun carriage, and both wheels passed over his legs, yet they were not broken, as the swiftness of the current doubtless prevented the whole weight of the cannon from coming upon him. Several mules were drowned. A quartermaster's wagon was upset in the Sabinas, and his papers and stores floated down the in admirable confusion.

Neither was there any want of commanders; for both the generals, with all the colonels, the whole staff, and all the wagon masters, were giving orders at the top of their lungs, and with the most violent gesticulations.

In the midst of this babel of orders and counter orders, mingled as it was with the roaring of the mountain torrent, the shouting of officers, and the imprecations of the wagoners, Maj. Warren quietly slipped off to one side amongst the bushes to take the matter more easily. Under some brush by the side of the river, he discovered an Arkansas volunteer sitting down, from whose clothes the water was still dripping. His head was between his knees, and he was deeply soliloquizing.

"Well," said he, "if this is war, I ain't in no more."

"What is the matter?" inquired the major.

"Why," answered the Rackensacker, "I was standing on the bank up there with my hands in my pockets, thinking I might as well take it easy, as I didn't own any of them wagons, when along comes the general, and shouted out, 'what are you doing there on the bank, you lazy fellow? Why don't you jump in and help that wagoner?' Without taking time to take a chaw of tobacco, I pitched in like a frog and seized hold of the wagon and worked as hard as if I had been at a gander pulling. And was still at it, a giving of orders equal to the best of them, when here comes a general's aidercong and screaming out 'What the d--l are you doing in the way?' With that I leaped out of the river like a water dog. Now you see stranger, I came here to fight them Mexicans, and not to make a mule of myself to haul wagons, and I say again, if this is war I ain't in no more." [ANP] found ourselves beyond the confines of grass. Prickly-pear and thorn bushes covered hill and valley.

On the 30th October we encamped near Monclova. We continued encamped in its vicinity for several weeks, during which time we had an opportunity of seeing the town and studying the manners and habits of its people.

Monclova is situated at the foot of one of the mountains of the Bolson de Mapimis, and its houses border a beautiful, noisy rivulet, whose waters are distributed through the town. It contains about six thousand inhabitants, and is the centre of a considerable trade. There are thirty of forty stores in the place, some of which have good stock of goods. The merchants replenish their stock from different places. Most of their goods are brought from Matamoros—some from San Luis—others are brought across the continent, from Mazatlan. Silks and Canton crepes are not more costly that in the United States; but woolen and cotton goods usually sell for twice the price they will command in the villages in the United States. Broadcloths are an exception, and bring about the same price as in the United States.

The houses are built of adobes, one story high. The streets are narrow, and intersect each other at right angles. This town, like most others, has many deserted houses, which are going to destruction. The washings of a few rainy seasons make them a mass of rubbish, and often fill the adjacent street a foot or two in depth. A slight hill separates the town from Pueblo, in which there is a handsome alameda or promenade, three hundred yards in length, set around with fine cotton wood trees, and bordered with a rivulet of water; stone seats, neatly plastered, furnish opportunities for repose. This is the favorite resort of the inhabitants in the afternoons and evenings, during the warm months. In a country here trees are so rare, such a retreat is peculiarly pleasant.

There is another smaller alameda in the main town similarly ornamented. There also several plazas, which are to be found in all Mexican towns.

Every Mexican town, of many inhabitants, in addition to its Alcalde, has a perfect, or governor. Most of them have also a custom house officer. It matters little what the theory of the government may be; it is certain, practically, that heir power over the inhabitants of the town is wholly unlimited.

A day or two after leaving Santa Rosa, Genral Wool received a protest from the prefect of Monclova, in which he informed the general that his advance was a violation of the armistice then existing between the governments of their respective countries, requesting him not to proceed to Monclova; and further advising him, that if he persisted in doing so, his march would be resisted. All this was considered Mexican rhodomontade, and out march continued.

The evening we arrived in the vicinity of Monclova soon after our tents were pitched, a cavaleade, of a dozen richly caparisoned cavalleros approached our camp, and were conducted to head quarters. They were the pretect, and other officers of the town, win thinking “discretion the better part of valor,” wisely determined to welcome the arrival of the general and hi army as friends instead of shooting at them as enemies. They formally informed the general that no resistance would be made, invited him to march into town, and offered to furnish him with quarters.

Like many others, I was struck with the dress and equipage of the party, that with their message.

They were dressed, some in cloth, others in velvet, but most in buckskin pants, with seven dozen buttons on each pair of pants, studded on the outer seams of the legs. A sash tied tightly round the waist, upheld the pants. Calico or cambric shirts, with the bosoms of those worn by the dandies, richly worked, covered the upper man. Over this was a broadcloth roundabout, richly covered with silk braid. A sombrero of fur, covered with back shiling oil cloth, was stuck jauntily on the head, and only sufficient to cover a portion of it, as it is not fashionable to wear one large enough for the head. The bootees, and when mounted they were completely methered in their large wooden stirrups and leather blousings. A plaited whip of raw ox hide, with a handle eight inches long and fastened around the wrist with a fanciful string, was held in the hand. A huge pair of iron spurs with the burrs three inches across, and ornamented with little bells which tiniled as the horse moved, were fastened on his feet with leather straps, broidered with silk. To complete the cavallero’s costume—around his shoulders as thrown, with graceful negligence, the indispensable sarape, or blanket, of the finest work and gayest pattern. No Mexican ever leaves his home without this gar covering. It is as indispensable to then as a gun to the sportsman, a sabre to a dragoon or moustache to an aid-de-campe. In warm weather, it is worn around the waist like a sash, and a horse back rests on the saddle, with the ends falling gracefully down. When the weather is the least maid he envelops himself in its ample folds, growing one end tastefully over the left shoulder. When it rains, he inserts his head through a hole worked in the center, and with his oil cloth sombrero bids defiance to the weather. A night, it forms his bed and covering. It is not only an article of use, but of the greatest pride to the wearer. Every man purchases as fine a one as he is able—the price of fine ones usually worn by the Spaniards varying from thirty to eighty dollars, though some times ranging as high as four hundred dollars. Gay colors usually predominate in their formation—red, orange, green, blue, &c., being most in a vogue. Patterns are as various as the figures in a kaleidoscope, and most of the fine ones are very beautiful.

The trapping of the horse, however, took the crowd more than the raiders. The pommels of the saddles, the cantels, and holes in the cantels sufficient to admit the hand, and the different fastenings of the saddle, were plated with solid silver. A heavy housing of worsted work, or more frequently of horse hair, was fastened behind the saddle, and covered the lions of the horse. A large piece of stamped leather covered the stirrups, and protected the feet of the rider from the bushes, and hung down like an overgrown set of ears of fox hounds. The saddle tree was covered with leather stamped into various figures, and of infinite work. The bridle buckles were of silver; the ends of all the pieces of leather in the headstall, the brow- brand, and various ornaments in the headstall, conceal nearly all the leather of the headstall, were of solid silver. The reins were of different material; some of hair, some of worsted, some of plaited leather, and some of plated silver wire—but all perfectly round, and of the size of a bed cord. The bit which was of curiously worked iron, with an iron ring curb, hair lariats, with the strands of different colors, was fastened around the horse's neck, and hung in a coil from the pommel of the saddle.

These massive trappings were on their best Mexican ponies, for a well grown horse is not to be found in Mexico, fourteen bands being the measure of a tall Mexican pony. They showed the marks of good keeping and thorough breaking, and would curvet for half an hour under the shade of a tall cottonwood. This rolling, frolicking; cavorting gait, for a Mexican never rides in a trot, and rarely in a walk. The canter is his passion.

A fine Mexican saddle costs from fifty to five hundred dollars, the head stall of a bridle from twenty five to fifty dollars, and silver reins from thirty five to one hundred dollars. A Mexican pony costs from ten to thirty dollars. A few will bring more, but they are rare. When all this costly rigging is put upon a diminutive pony, which the owner would sell for twenty dollars, it does look very like "running the thing into the ground."

Those civil dignitaries were accompanied (as is the universal custom with those who can afford it) by pacons, to hold their horses. These were dressed differently, in some respects, from their masters. The sombrero was of coarser material, usually of wool, with a fancy hat band, worked like a fancy bead purses, others were of silk or leather, with large silver ornaments on them. The neither garments were of seer skin, fastened at the outer sides for six inches below the waist, and open from there down. White cotton drawers half a yard in width, projected their ample folds through the open sides of pants. [These open overalls are the peculiar distinction of the pavons. For, either by custom or law, they never wear their pants closed at the sides.]

A white cotton shirt covered the shoulders, and the better dressed wore a jacket of deer skin, adorned with stripes of stamped leather. Shoes of red leather, with large spurs, were on their feet; and a heavy blanket, of drivers colors, enveloped their waists.

Their horse furniture was much less costly than their masters, yet was in such abundance as to conceal the whole body of their ponies.

These pacons followed their masters like shadows, watched their movements without a word; and at the waving of a hand, darted off at full speed to execute an order. They are the express riders of the country, and will ride incredible distances in one or two days, to carry a despatch.

The Mexicans are most accomplished riders. Their stirrup leathers are fastened to the saddle much further back than is usual in the United States. The seats of the saddle are also smaller. When a person mounts one, and gets his feet inserted into their broad wooden stirrups, he finds himself standing right across the horse. To a person unaccustomed to it, this is a very uncomfortable position, yet it gives the rider better command of his horse, and whichever way he may dodge the rifle is still
Their bridle bits are very severe, giving the rider perfect control of the horse. One of their principal amusements is to put a horse at full speed, and suddenly bring him up standing on his haunches. Owing to the severity of the bit, and their position in their position in the saddle, they bear no weight on the bridle, and do not depend upon it to steady them in riding. With a well trained horse, their arms are consequently free, and this gives them the opportunity of throwing the lasso with so much freedom and certainty.

Notwithstanding the excellency of the horsemanship of the Mexicans, such is their inferiority in stature to the Americans, as well as that of their horses that their cavalry never can be formidable to disciplined American troops.

By the time the perfect and his associate dignitaries had gotten through surrendering the government of the town to the general, the outsiders had completed the inspection of the rigging of the party. Both parties were therefore ready for a mutual separation.

The Mexicans mounting their mettlesome horses, moved back to Monclova in the greatest possible canter. And the soldiers dispersed, after expressing a partly unanimous wish, that they might meet a lot of such fellows in battle, so that they could supply themselves with silver mounted saddles and fine. [MSM] artillery, well equipped, with eighteen guns, and four companies of dragoons; making in all about six hundred and fifty regulars, who, for prowess and skill in battle, we believe, would be unsurpassed in any service in the world.

"Should Col. Morgan have succeeded in making his way from Seralvo to Monterey, (which we sincerely trust may be the case), he would carry into Gen. Taylor's camp a reinforcement of from 400 to 500 volunteers. [MSM]

NNR 72.093-095 April 10, 1847 CORRESPONDENCE INVOLVED IN LEVYING A TARIFF ON MEXICAN PORTS

TO THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURER, SIR: The government of Mexico having repeatedly rejected the friendly overtures of the U. States to open negotiations with a view to the restoration of peace, sound policy and a just regard to the interests of our own country require that the enemy should be made as far as practicable, to bear the expenses of a war which they are the authors, and which they obstinately persist in protracting.

It is the right of the conqueror to levy contributions upon the enemy in their seaports, towns, or provinces, which may be in his military possession by conquest, and to apply the same to defray the expenses of the war. The conqueror possesses the right also to establish a temporary military government to prescribe the conditions and restrictions upon which commerce with such places may be permitted. He may, in his discretion, exclude all trade, or admit, without limitation of restriction; or impose terms the observance of which will be the condition of carrying it on. One of these conditions may be the payment of a prescribed rate of duties on tonnage and imports.

In the exercise of these unquestioned rights of war, I have, n full consideration, determined to order that all the ports or places in Mexico which now are, or hereafter may be, in the actual possession of our land and naval forces by conquest, shall be opened, while our military occupation may continue, to the commerce of all neutral nations, as well as our own, in articles not contraband of war, upon the payment of prescribed rates of duties, which will be made known and enforced by our military and naval commanders.

While the adoption of this policy will be to impose a burden on the enemy, and at the same time to deprive them of the revenue to be derived from trade at such ports or places, as well as to secure it to ourselves, whereby the expenses of the war may be diminished, a just regard to the general interests of commerce, and the obvious advantages of uniformity in the exercise of these belligerent rights, requires that well considered regulations and restrictions should be prepared for the guidance of those who may be charged with carrying it into effect.

You are therefore instructed to examine the existing Mexican tariff of duties and to report me a schedule of articles of trade, to be admitted at such ports or places as may at any time be in our military possession, with such rates of duties in them, and also on tonnage, as will be likely to produce the greatest amount of revenue. You will also communicate the considerations which may recommend the scale of duties which you may deem advisable, in order to enforce their collection.

As the levy of the contribution proposed is a military right derived from the laws of nations, the collection and disbursement of the duties will be made under the orders of the secretary of war and the secretary of the navy, by the military and naval commanders at the ports or places in Mexico which may be in possession of our arms. The report required is therefore necessary in order to enable me to give the proper directions to the war and navy departments.

SIR: Your instructions of the 23d instant have been received by this department, and in conformity thereto I present you herewith, for your considerations, a scale of duties proposed to be collected as a military contribution during the war, in the ports of Mexico, in possession of our army or navy by conquest, with regulations for the ascertainment and collection of such duties, together with the reasons which appear to me to recommend their adoption.

It is clear that we must either adopt our own tariff or that of Mexico, or establish a new system of duties. Our own tariff could not be adopted, because the Mexican exports and imports are so different rates of duties are indispensable in order to collect the largest revenue. Thus, upon many articles produced in great abundance here, duties must be imposed at the lowest rate in order to collect any revenue; whereas many of the same articles are not produced in Mexico, or to a very inconsiderable extent, and would therefore bear a much higher duty for revenue. A great change is also rendered unnecessary by the proposed exaction of duties on all imports to any Mexican port in our possession from any other Mexican port occupied by us in the same manner. This measure would largely increase the revenue which we might collect. It is recommended, however, for reasons of obvious safety, that this Mexican coastwise trade should be confined to our own vessels, as well as the interior trade above any port of entry in our possessions, but that in all other respects the ports of Mexico held by us should be freely opened at the rate of duties herein recommended to the vessels and commerce of all the world. The ad valorem system of duties adopted by us, although by far the most just and equitable, yet requires an appraisement to ascertain the actual value of every article. This demands great mercantile skill, knowledge, and experience, and therefore, for the want of skillful appraisement—a class of officers wholly unknown in Mexico—could not at once be put into successful operation there.

If, also, as proposed, these duties are to be ascertained and collected as a military contribution through the officers of our army and navy, those brave men could more easily perform almost any other duty that that of estimating the value of every description of goods, wares, and merchandise. The system of specific duties already prevails in Mexico, and may be put by us into immediate operation; and if, as is conceded, specific duties should be more burdensome upon the people of Mexico, the more onerous the operation of these duties upon them, the sooner it is likely that they will force their military rulers rulers to agree to a peace. It is certain that a mild and forebearing system of warfare, collecting no duties in their ports in our possession on the Gulf, and levying no contributions, whilst our armies purchase supplies from them at high prices, by rendering the war a benefit to the people of Mexico rather than an injury, has not hastened the conclusion of a peace. It may be, however, that specific duties, onerous as they are, and heavy contributions, accompanied by a vigorous prosecution of the war, may more speedily ensure that peace which we have failed to obtain from magnanimous forbearance, from brilliant victories, or from proffered negotiation. The duties, however, whilst they may be specific, and therefore more onerous than ad valorem duties, should not be so high as to defeat revenue. It is impossible to adopt as a basis the tariff of Mexico, because the duties are extravagantly high, defeating importation, commerce, and revenue, and producing innumerable frauds and smuggling. There are also sixty articles the importation of which into Mexico is strictly prohibited by their tariff, embracing most if the necessaries of life, and far the greater portion of our products and fabrics.

Among the sixty prohibited article are sugar, rice, cotton, boots and halt boot, coffee, nails of all kinds, leather of most kinds, flour cotton yarn and thread, soap of all kinds, common earthenware, lard, molasses, timber of all kinds, saddles of all kinds, coarse woollen cloth, cloths for cloaks, ready made clothing of all kinds, salt, tobacco of all kinds, cotton goods or textures, chiefly such as are made by ourselves, pork, fresh or salted, smoked or corned woollen or cotton blankets or counterpanes, shoes and slippers, wheat and grain of all kinds. Such is a list of but a part of the articles the importation of which is prohibited by the Mexican tariff. These prohibitions should not be permitted to continue, because they exclude most of our products and fabrics, and prevent the collection of revenue. We turn from the prohibitions to the actual duties imposed by Mexico. The duties are specific throughout, and almost universally by weight, irrespective of value, are generally protective or exorbitant, and without any discrimination for revenue. The duties proposed to be substituted are moderate when compared with those imposed by Mexico, behalf generally reduced to a standard more than one half below the Mexican duties.

The duties are also based upon a discrimination throughout, for revenue, and keeping in view the customs and habits of the people of Mexico, so different from our own, are fixed in each case at the rate which, it is believed, will produce in the Mexican ports the largest amount of revenue. In order to realize from this system the largest amount of revenue, it would be necessary that our army and navy should seize every important port and place upon the Gulf of Mexico, or California, or the Pacific, and open the way through the interior for the free transit of imports and exports, and especially that the interior passage through the Mexican isthmus should be secured from ocean to ocean for the benefit of our commerce and that of all the world. In the mean time the Mexican government monopoly in tobacco, from which a considerable revenue is realized by Mexico, together with the culture there which yields that revenue, should be abolished, so as to diminish the resources of that government, and augment our own, by collecting the duty upon all the imported tobacco. The Mexican interior transit duties should also be abolished, and their internal government on coin and bullion. The prohibition of exports and duties upon exports should be annulled, and especially the heavy export duty on coin and bullion, so as to cheapen and facilitate the purchase of imports, and permit the precious metals untaxed to flow out freely from Mexico onto general circulation.

Quicksilver and machinery for working the mines of precious metals in Mexico, for the same reasons, should also be admitted duty free; which, with the measures above indicated, would largely increase the production and circulation of the precious metals, improve our own commerce and industry and that of all neutral powers. In thus opening the ports of Mexico to the commerce of the world, you would present to all nations with who, we are at peace the best evidence of your desire to maintain with them our friendly relations, to render the war to them productive of as little injury as possible, and even to advance their interests so far as it safely can be done, by affording to them in common with ourselves the advantages of a liberal commerce with Mexico. To extend this commerce, you will have unsealed the ports of Mexico, repealed their interior transit duties which obstruct the passage of merchandise to and from the coast; you will have annulled the government duty on coin and bullion and abolished the heavy export duty on the precious metals, so as to permit them to flow out freely for the benefit of mankind; you will have expunged the long list of their prohibited articles, and reduced more than one half their duties on imports whilst the freest scope would be left for the mining of the precious metals.

These are great advantages which would be secured to friendly nations, especially when compared with the exclusion of their commerce by rigorous blockades. It is ture, the duties collected from these imports would be for the benefit of our own government; but it is equally true that the expense of its war which Mexico insists upon prosecuting are borne exclusively by ourselves, and not by foreign nations. It cannot be doubted but that all neutral nations will see in the adoption of such a course by you, a manifestation of your good will towards them, and a strong desire to advance those just and humane principles which make it the duty of belligerents, as we have always contended to render the war in which they are engaged as little injurious [ ] practicable to neutral powers. These duties would not be imposed upon any imports into our own country nut only upon imports into Mexico, and the tax would fall upon the people of Mexico in the enhancement to them of the prices of these imports. Nearly all out own products are excluded by the Mexican tariff, even in time of peace; they are excluded by the Mexican tariff, even in time if peace; they are excluded al o during the war, so far as we continue the system of blockading any of the ports of Mexico, and they are also excluded even from the ports not blockaded in possession of Mexico; whereas the new system would soon open to our commerce all the ports of Mexico, as they shall fall into out military possession. Neither our own nor foreign merchants are required to send any goods to Mexico, and, if they do so voluntarily, it will be because they can make a profit upon the importation there, and therefore they will have no right to complain of the duties levied in the ports of Mexico, upon the consumers of those goods the people if Mexico.

The whole money collected would inure to the benefit of our own government and people, to sustain the war, and to prevent to that extent, new loans and increased taxation. Indeed, in view of the fact that the government [ ] thrown upon the ordinary revenues for peace, with no other additional resources but loans to carry on the war, the income to be derived from the new system, which, it is believed will be large, if these suggestions are adopted, would be highly important to sustain the credit of the government, to prevent the embarrassment of the treasury, and to save the country from such ruinous sacrifices as occurred during the last year, including the inevitable legacy to posterity of a large debt and onerous taxation. The new system would not only arrest the expensive transfer and ruinous drain of specie to Mexico but would cause it in duties, and in return for our exports, to reflow into our own country try to an am un perhaps, soon exceeding the nine millions of [ ] which it had reached in 2835, even under the rest trictive laws of Mexico, thus relieving our own people from a grivous tax, and imposing it when it should fall, upon our enemies, the people of Mexico, as a contribution levied upon them to conquer peace, as well as to defray the expenses of the war whereas, by admitting our exports freely without entry in to the Mexican ports, which affording those goods, including the necessarios of life, at least less than one-half the prices which they had heretofore paid for them, the war might in time become a benefit, instead of a burden, to the people of Mexico, and they would therefore be unwilling to terminate the contest. I

It is hoped also that Mexico, after a peace, will never renew her present prohibitory and protective system, so nearly resembling that of ancient China or Japan, but that, liberalized, enlightened, and regenerated by the contact and intercourse with our people, and the far more moderate system of duties resembling that prescribed by these regulations. In the mean time, it is not just that Mexico, by her obstinate peristance in this contest, should compel us to overthrow our own financial policy, and arrest this great nation in her high and prosperous career.

To reimpose high duties would be alike injurious to ourselves and to all neutral powers, and. Unless demanded by a stern necessity, ungenerous to those enlightened nation which have adopted, contemporaneously with us, s more liberal commercial policy. The system you now purpose, of imposing the burden as far as practicable upon our enemies the people of Mexico, and not upon ourselves or upon friendly nations, appears to be most just in itself, and is further recommended as the only policy which is likely to hasten the conclusion of a just and honorable peace.

A tonnage duty on all vessels, whether our own or neutral powers, of one dollar per ton, which is greatly less than that imposed by Mexico, is recommended in lieu of all port duties and charges. Appended to these regulations are tables of the rates at which a certificate of value is required to be attached to the invoice. There is also annexed a table of foreign weights and measures reduced to the standard of the United States, together with blank forms, to facilitate the transaction of business. It is recommended that the duties herein suggested shall be collected exclusively in gold of silver coin. These duties can only be collected as a military contribution through the agency of our brave officers of the army and navy, who will, no doubt, cheerfully and faithfully collect and keep those moneys, and account for them, not to the treasury, but to the secretaries of war or of the navy respectively. It is recommended that these duties be performed by the commandant of the post, whether naval or military, aided by the paymaster or parser, or other officer the accounts of each being countersigned by the other as a check upon mistakes or error, in the same manner as is now the several principal ports, which had introduced so much order and accuracy into our systems.

It is suggested that, as in some cases the attention of the commandant of the post might be necessary for the performance of other duties, he be permitted to substitute some other officer, making known the fact to the secretaries of the war or of the navy, and subject to their direction. I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant, R.J. WALKER, Secretary of the Treasury. [MSM]

NNR 72.096 April 10, 1847 NAVAL OPERATIONS IN THE GULF, LOSS OF HORSES

Intelligence from the army and squadron near Vera Cruz to the 19th March, received at New Orleans by the ship Oswego, and the barque Montezuma, both of which left Anton, Lizardo on the 20th, we find in the New Orleans papers of the 31st.

The U.S. steamer Mississippi, was seen on the 20th, about six miles from Vera Cruz, bound in with Commodore Perry on board.

One the 17th Commodore Conner fired a salute in honor of general Taylor’s victory at Buena Vista.

There seems to have been a fatality attending the transport if horses for Gen. Scott’s army. The ship Yazoo, which brought Capt. Ker’s squadron of 122 horses, struck a reef near Anton Lizardo, and has been completely wrecked. Capt. K. had by hard work preserved all the horses but two or three, up to the moment the ship ran upon the reef, but the water filled the hold and drowned all the noble animals but eight or ten. He succeeded in saving his men, with their saddles and arms. Capt. K. feels deeply distressed about it, but it could not have been helped.

Capt. Thornton lost forty horses from his squadron on the long and boisterous trip from the Brazos. “Capt. Kearney has not yet landed and I have not yet heard what kind of luck he had with his horses.” Col. Duncan, lost a number of horses during the gale. These losses are deeply felt.

The ship Diadem, which sailed from New Orleans with 230 horses on board, lost all but 27 of them before reaching Vera Cruz. The ship Louisville, which sailed with over 100 horses, landed barely fifty of them at Vera Cruz. Other vessels with horses on board, lost more or less. Col. Duncan lost several of his horses during the gale.

Three men from the store ship Relief were drowned in endeavoring to rescue the dragons.

Col. Harney landed on the 17th. The correspondent of the Picayune says—“He will be able to mount 300 men-enough to drive off all the Mexican cavalry that are now prowling about out rear, ready to attack us there when the attack is made upon the city. I should not be surprised to learn that the gallant colonel had a beautiful fight, for it is said there are 1,000 collected a few [ ] back of us.
P.S.- The steamer New Orleans arrived from Tampico last evening, with some 200 horses, which will in some degree make up for the loss of dragoons and battery horses. Gen. Jesup is on board the New Orleans.

Gen. Scott had landed ten mortars, but had not opened his fire. The ship Charles with forty mortars on board, had not arrived on the 19th instant, but was very anxiously expected by Gen. Scott. [MSM]

OFFICIAL-The following dispatches were received at the war department on the 4th inst:

Headquarters of the army, Camp Washington, before Vera Cruz. March 12th, 1847.

SIR-The colors of the United States were triumphantly planted ashore, in full view of this city and its castle, and under the distant fire of both, in the afternoon of the 9th instant. Brevet Brigadier General Worth's brigade of regulars led the descent, quickly followed by the division of United States volunteers under Major General Patterson, and Brigadier General Twigg's reserve brigade of regulars. The three lines successively landed in sixty seven surf boats, each boat conducted by a naval officer, and rowed by sailors from Commodore Conner's squadron-whose lighter vessels flanked the boats so as to be ready to protect the operation by their cross fire. The whole army reached the shore in fine style, and without direct opposition, (on the beach) accident, or loss, driving the enemy from the ground to be occupied.

The line of investment, according to General Orders,

No. 47, was partially taken up the same night; but has only been completed today-owning to the most extraordinary difficulties. 1. The environs of the city, outside of the fire of its guns and those of the castle, are broken into innumerable hills of loose sand, from twenty to two hundred and fifty feet in height, with almost impassable forests of chaparral between; and 2. Of all our means of land transportation-wagons, carts, pack saddles, horses and mules, expected to join us from Tampico and the Brazos, weeks ago-but fifteen carts and about one hundred draught horses, have yet arrived. Three hundred pack-mules are greatly needed to relieve the troops in taking subsistence, alone, along the line of investment of more than five miles, as at present, our only depot is south of the city. On the cessation of the present raging norther, which almost stifles the troops with sand-sweeping away hills and creating new, I hope to establish a second depot north of the city, which will partially relieve the left wing of the army.

In extending the line of investment around the city, the troops, for three days, have performed the heaviest labors in getting over the hills and cutting through the intervening forests-all under the distant fire of the city and castle-and in the midst of many sharp skirmishes with the enemy. In these operations we have lost in killed and wounded several valuable officers and men. Among the killed, I have to report Brevet Capt. Alburtis, of the U.S. 2d infantry, much distinguished in the Florida war, and a most excellent officer. He fell on the 11th inst.; and Lieut. Col. Dickenson, of the South Carolina regiment, was badly wounded, in a skirmish the day before. Two privates have been killed in these operations, and four or five wounded. As yet, I have not been able to obtain their names.

As soon as the subsistence of the troops can be assured, and their positions are well established, I shall, by and organised movement, cause each brigade of regulars and volunteers to send detachments, with supports, to clear its front, including subbourgs, of the enemy's parties, so as to oblige them to confine themselves within the walls of the city.

I have heretofore reported that but two-sevenths of the siege train and ammunition had reached me. The remainder is yet unheard of. We shall commence landing the heavy metal as soon as the storm subsides, and hope that the five-sevenths may be up in time.

The city being invested, would, no doubt, early surrender, but for the tear that if occupied by us, it would immediately be fired upon by the castle. I am not altogether without hope of finding the means of coming to some compromise with the city on
So far, the principal skirmishing has fallen to the lot of Brigadier Generals Pillow's and Quitman's brigades. Both old and new volunteer regiments have conducted themselves admirably. Indeed the whole army is full of zeal and cannot fail to acquire distinction in the impending operations.

To commodore Conner, the officers and sailors of his squadron, the army is indebted for great and unceasing assistance, promptly and cheerfully rendered. Their co-operation is the constant theme of our gratitude and admiration. A handsome detachment of marines, under Captain Edson, of that corps, landed with the first line, and is doing duty with the army.

March 13-The enemy, at intervals, continues the fire of heavy ordnance, from the city and castle, upon our line of investment, both day and night, but with little or no effect.

The norther has ceased, which has renewed our communication with the storeships at anchor under Sacrificios. We shall immediately commence landing the few pieces of heavy ordnance, with ordnance stores, at hand, and hope soon to have the necessary draught mules to take them to their positions. Any further delay in the arrival of those means of transportation will be severely felt in our operations.

I have the honor to remain, sir, with high respect, your most obedient servant,
WINFIELD SCOTT.

Hon. Wm L. Marcy, secretary of war.

NNR 72.098 April 17, 1847 HISTORICAL ACCOUNT OF SAN JUAN ULLOA

CASTLE OF VERA CRUZ-A correspondent of the New Orleans Delta furnishes the following historical reminiscences respecting this fortress: In front the city of Vera Cruz, the Spaniards erected, at an expense of $40,000,000 the famous castle of San Juan d’Ulloa, as a ramparf against foreign invasion as well as foreign curiosity. It was captured for the first time by surprise on the 14th September, 1568, by he pirate Juan Aquinas Acle, who was, however, shortly expelled by Don Francisco de Lujan, with the aid of a fleet composed of twenty-three vessels. This happened when Don Martin Henriquez was vicerey of Mexico. The second captured, was also made by a pirate named Lorencillo. Occurred in the night between the 17th and 18th of May, 1693, and was far more disastrous in its consequences. Lorencillo, after he had mastered the citadel, sacked the city of Vera Cruz, and after having remained in peaceful possession of both for the space of nearly two weeks, departed with his plunder. The third capture was effected by admiral Baudin, and is too well known to require further mention. [MSM]

NNR 72.098-099 April 17, 1847 NOTICE OF TROOP MOVEMENTS

MOVEMENT OF TROOPS- A letter from an officer of the Massachusetts regiments, dated Biasos Santiago, March 17, says:- "We (companies A and D, under command of Captain Edward Webster) arrived here night before last, after a very pleasant and quick passage of nineteen days, and wee are lucky enough to have no sick men. We march this morning ofr the mouth of the river, and thence we take steamboats for Camargo, there to await orders from General Taylor. A part of the Carolina regiment left yesterday, and the last three companies of the Virginia regiment arrived last evening. We are all in good spirits, and hope to have something to do. The N. Orleans Picayune, March 17, says:- The U.S. steamboat Teiegraph, Capt. Auld-which has been thoroughly repaired at a cost of $17,000-got off last evening for Tampico, via Brazos Santiago-Thomas B. Eastland, quartermaster, and his son; Col. Hamtramek and Adjutant August, of the Virginia volunteers; Capt. Erkine, of the commissary department; Capt. Hill, of 1st regiment Pennsylvania volunteers; Dr. F. W. Miller, of the medical department, Lieut. Gowan, of 2d regiment Kentucky volunteers; Lieut. Wilt, of Baltimore battalion; Mesars. Jaohn F. Calanke and N. Ashbrooks, committee to the Alabama regiment; Mr. J. B. Cozzens, sutler at Malamorors, Mr. Reney, engineer in the quartermaster departments, Captain Fulton of the 1st Tennessee regiment; Lieut. moore, of 1st Pennsylvania regiments; Lieut.
BATTLE OF BUENA VISTA.

Through the kindness of a friend, we have been furnished with the following extracts from a private letter written by Lieutenant Colonel Mansfield, of the corps of engineers to a brother officer in this city, giving a brief and hastily written description of the 22d and 23d of February.

Eighteen miles south of Saltillo, at camp U.S. army, Agua Nueva, March 1, 1847.

Dear Captain-We are just recovering from the fatigues of a tremendous battle, fought by this little army on the 22d and 23d at Buena Vista, a place about eleven miles in our rear and seven miles this side of Saltillo.

We had previously been on this very ground from the 6th to the 20th February, reconnoitring the positions, roads, and &c. and ascertaining where the enemy was, and his numbers. We found Santa Anna was at Encarnacion, thirty miles in our advance, with twenty thousand troops of infantry and artillery, and that on our left was General Minon, at Ediorda, say twenty five miles off, with three thousand cavalry and lancers.

On the 21st, at noon, we broke up our camp, and fell back to a good position at Buena Vista, to await the enemy. On the 22d he came in sight-his advance a heavy body of lancers and cavalry, followed by large bodies of infantry, and about eighteen pieces of artillery. A skirmish took place in the afternoon and the enemy gained the mountain side on our left. On our right of the road commenced steep ascents to the tops of the spurs of the mountain, which united and formed a beautiful table land for a battle ground, say one mile east and west by half a mile north and south. There were other spurs on the same side, stretching along the road north and south of us, with deep gullies between, many of them impassable, but none of them forming a table land like this.

A ditch and parapet were immediately thrown across the road, and Washington's artillery placed there, supported by two companies of volunteers behind another parapet.

On the morning of the 23d the enemy made a rush with his infantry and lancers to possess the table land, the key to the whole position; and at the same time a column of infantry and cavalry advanced on the road towards Washington's battery. A terrible fight ensued. Our left was forced back off the table land, and rallied under the bank; but our centre charged with a tremendous fire of horses artillery, (eight pieces) and volunteers, and hurled them back against the mountain and broke their centre, so that large bodies of infantry saved themselves by moving into the ravines and on the spurs of the mountains to the rear of our left where we sent regiments and artillery to fight them and drive them back across the same ground on our extreme left over which they had been forced. If we had had but one single full regiment of regulars in reserve we could have charged their battery on our extreme left and taken four or five thousand prisoners. As it was, we could only hold our own against such odds.

At the close of the day, they made another charge and rush, in great force, to possess the table land and were again repulsed with great slaughter, and with much loss on our part. Night put an end to the scene, and under the cover of darkness the enemy retreated to this place, (Agua Nueva), where our light troops followed them the next morning.

It was a beautiful battle—not a mistake made the whole day; but every man perfectly exhausted at night. Our loss about 264 killed and 450 wounded. The enemy's loss about 2,500 killed and wounded, and 3,000 missing.

It is said that Santa Anna is in full retreat to Matahuila and Lan Luis, with his army dispirited and disorganized. He is said to have lost many officers of high rank. You will Nothing could exceed the gallant bearing of our horse artillery and dragoons, nor the bravery and good conduct of the volunteers as a body. Not a regular infantry soldier was in this fight.

We have lost most valuable officers. Capt. Lincoln was killed in the first charge. Col. McKee and Lieut. Colonel Clay, of the Kentucky regiment, and Col. Hardin were killed, besides others, in the second charge of his enemy. We lost three pieces of cannon, which we had not the men to recover. Our men actually sunk to the ground from excessive exhaustion.

It has ever been the misfortune of our brave old General to be obliged to fight the enemy with inferior numbers. This, his last battle, has done him more credit than any of his previous ones. His case was not so desperate at Palo Alto, for there he had the best of regular infantry.

I had almost forgotten to speak of our corps. We endeavored to do our duty. Lieut. Benham behaved well, and was slightly wounded. As for myself, I was more fortunate than at Monterey, and escaped unhurt. The old General, however, was made ragged by the balls passing through his clothes.

Yours &c.

JOS. K. F. MANSFIELD.

Of the siege of Vera Cruz.

A correspondent of the New Orleans Delta says: "The Mexicans variously estimate their loss at from 500 to 1,000 killed and wounded, but all agree that the loss among the soldiery is comparatively small and destruction among the women and children is very great. Among their killed is General Felix Valdez, an officer of some celebrity.

At the time of the surrender the Mexicans had but two days' ammunition and three days subsistence, which accounts for their generally withholding their fire during the night.

EL REPUBLICANO, of the 15th March announces that the American arms have triumphed in Chihuahua, that they city of Chihuahua, the capital of the state has fallen. The small forces which defend it, says the Republican, were routed. NNR 72.100 April 17, 1847  GEN. ZACHARY TAYLOR'S MOVEMENT TO RE-OPEN COMMUNICATION, PURSUES GEN. JOSE URREA

The northerner which commenced at sun down yesterday still continues, completely cutting off all communication with the vessels lying off or under Sacrificios. Shells are occasionally sent towards General Worth’s lines from the castle, but in the main they have fallen short. Captain Vinton continues at his position near the lime kiln. At this time, half past 3 o’clock, they are throwing 13 inch shells from the castle of San Juan de Ulus, and one of them was just bursted a short distance from where I am writing, yet without doing any harm.

P.S.—Captains Lee and Scott, who went out with the white flag with notes to the foreign consuls, have returned. As was supposed, they were not allowed to enter the city, but were detained some three or four hundred yards outside the walls. Three officers came afterwards brought a receipt that they had been delivered. Many of the inhabitants—ladies among them—were seen upon the walls and adjoining houses. The line of investment is now complete and all communication with the city landward cut off. Two French vessels have succeeded in eluding the blockade, favored by the wind, and have doubtless taken in “aid and comfort” to the enemy. The firing from the castle, and also from the batteries, continues. Another night has passed off quietly, no alarm of consequences disturbing the lines. The enemy is occasionally throwing round shot and shell, yet with little effect. One of the latter, and of the heaviest size, struck directly in the midst of the 8th infantry last nigh, but did not injure a man. There is a prospect of some little close fighting today, as out posts are to be thrown in nearer the city walls. Some of our riflemen and sharpshooters are already in motion, and if the Mexicans will allow them to come near enough hey will render a good account of themselves. [MSM]

NNR 72.100 April 17, 1847  MOVEMENTS AT CAMARGO

We started from this place this morning a train of about 60 wagons, for Camargo, with 120 extra mules, being two to each wagon, escorted by Major Stokes and two companies of North Carolinians, which has taken all the troops from this place. With the exception of two companies of the Massachusetts regiment, under Captain Webster, (David’s Company), one of which is stationed in the Plaze, and the other in Fort Paredes, with Captain Merchant's company of artillery at Fort Brown, is the whole of the force at this point. I understand the balance of those regiments, (North Carolinas and Massachusetts) are off the Brazos, but they have not bee able to land, quit a heavy northern which came up in the afternoon. NNR 72.100 April 17, 1847  FIGHTING BETWEEN FACTIONS IN MEXICO CITY

Our news from the city of Mexico, received in a roundabout way, would prove that a most sanguinat[ ] revolution—or rather a series of revolutions—is raging in that city, the different parties being all by the ears, and fighting each other with unwanted [ ]. It is said that the British monster, Mr. [Jankhead, at last dates, hardly dared venture into the streets, for fear of being shot by some on of the different contending factions. Gomez Farias has his last party, the priests have their party, those in favor of peace have a party, and then there are the war men, the Santa Anna men, the Alonte men, and what not. All was "confusion worse confounded," and I can make neither head or trait of the different rumors. The Mexicans have been fierce since noon today, [ ] from most of their batteries, and the roar of round shot and shells has been constantly dimming the ears of our men. Strange that they do not effect more. They must think they are destroying the "Yankees," as they now term us, by dozens, else they would not keep up such an incessant firing. The weather continues fine for landing and munitions and supplies are rapidly accumulating at the spots. The officers of the navy continue to use their best efforts. By the next day tomorrow, I am in hopes if being able to send you off an account of some of general Scott's doings. Your, &c. G. W. K. [MSM]

NNR 72.100-101 April 17, 1847 Gen. Winfield Scott's orders on occupying Vera Cruz

Among the orders issued by Gen. Scott, after the capitulation of Vera Cruz, was the following:

GENERAL ORDERS- No. 75.
Headquarters of the Army, Camp Washington, Before Vera Cruz, March 28th, 1847.

As soon as the city of Vera Cruz shall be garrisoned by his brigade, Brigadier Gen. Worth will become the temporary governor of the same.

Without disturbing the ordinary functions of the civil magistracy, as between Mexicans and Mexicans, he will establish strict police regulations for securing good order and good morals in the said city.

He will establish a temporary and moderate tariff of duties, subject to the approval of the general in chief and commodore Perry commanding United States home squadron, on all articles imported by sea from the countries other than the United States, the proceeds of said tariff to be applied to the benefit of the sick and wounded of the army, the squadron, and the indigent inhabitants of Vera Cruz.

The tariff so to be established will be continued until the instructions of he government at home shall be made known in the case.

By command of Major General Scott.

NNR 72.101-102 April 17, 1847 Col. Stephen Ormsby's official report of the Battle
In tendering my heartfelt congratulations on your brilliant success at Saltillo, I deem it proper for your information to apprise you of our position and the operations at this point. On the 20th instant in consequence of the departure of Brigadier General Marshall to join your forces, the command devolved on me. With the exception of a few officers of the General Staff of the army on duty here, and a few wounded and sick from the general hospital, the force as you are aware, is entirely volunteers. - My regiment, 1st Kentucky foot volunteers, was encamped at the Citadel and the 1st regiment Ohio volunteers, under command of Maj. Giddings, occupied the city.

The defences of the city, under the most energetic and skilful engineer, Capt. Fraser, were far from being in a state of completion, and his utmost exertions were called into requisition to place the works in condition to resist such force as was probable could be brought against it, as was momentarily expected. On the morning of the 24th instant, deeming it prudent to concentrate my forces, I ordered Major Giddings to join me with his command in the Citadel. All the government stores having been previously removed and stored here by the exertions of the officers in charge of them, and under the active and willing co-operation of my command, I soon found myself equal in all respects to sustain the honor of our flag if assailed.

Through my reconnoitring, and other sources of information, it was ascertained that large forces of the enemy were surrounding me, though none made their appearance here; and this was confirmed on the morning on the 24th instant by a despatch from Lieut. Col. Irwin, of the 2d Ohio regiment, that his command of 130 men was in Marin, surrounded by a large body of the enemy under command of Gen. Urrea. Subsequently I received such information as excited the apprehension that a train of the wagons, escorted by Lieut. W. F. Barbour, with 30 men from the 1st regiment of Kentucky volunteers, would be cut off below Marin.

I despatched Maj. J.B. Shepherd, 1st regiment Kentucky volunteers, with five companies of infantry, thirty mounted men, and two 4-pounders, to relieve Lieut. Col. Irwin, with discretionary orders to proceed beyond Marin, with a view to secure the train and escort, and I have the gratification to announce that Major Shepherd, who volunteered for the service, performed it in the most prompt and gallant manner possible, and without loss. He did not proceed beyond Marin, having ascertained there that the wagons, train and escort, had been captured near Ramos. About forty-five persons, nearly all teamsters, were killed, a number taken prisoners, and the wagons and probably most of the stores destroyed. A few of the teamsters and one of the escort escaped and have come into this place.

This morning it was ascertained that the enemy was in force at Aqua Frio, (12 miles distant,) and has surrounded and attacked Col. Morgan, commanding 21 Ohio volunteers, with about two hundred of his command, who was marching to this place. On the receipt of a despatch from Col. Morgan, Lieut. Col. Irwin, with is command and the troops which had been despatched to his relief, encamped at Walnut Springs, promptly proceeded to the point and arrived in time to render essential service in aiding Col. Morgan to disperse the enemy. I despatched Maj. Giddings, of the 1st Ohio regiment volunteers, with three companies of his command to unite the Lieut. Irwin in reaching Col. Morgan, but he did not reach the place of attack until the forces in advance had dispersed the enemy. Though it is due to Major Giddings to say that he displayed great promptness and activity in marching on the duty to which he was ordered.

I have the satisfaction to announce the return of the several detachments above referred to, but regret to state that one man of this command was killed in the affair at Aqua Frio. Col. Morgan has arrived here with the larger part of his command, and I have the honor to enclose his report.

In concluding this report, which I have endeavored to make as brief as possible, I deem it my duty as well as pleasure, to recommend to your especial notice, Capt. D. G. Ramsey, ordnance commander, whose promptness and efficiency in the discharge of the many duties of his department, are worthy of the highest commendation; and, in addition to these, he rendered me essential service in aiding, in arranging, and drilling a portion of my command in artillery tactics. It is my duty and pleasure also to commend the very prompt and faithful manner in which Captain A. Montgomery, assistant quartermaster, has discharged his duties, rendered unusually numerous by the necessary removal of all the stores, &c. from the city to the fort.

Lieut. Stewart, of the 3d. artillery, A.C.S. was assiduous in the discharge of his duties, and, in addition volunteered his valuable aid in drilling men at the guns.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.

STEPHEN ORMSBY,
Colonel commanding.

To Major General Taylor.

NNR 72.102 April 17, 1847 GEN ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA'S RETURN TO SAN LUIS

There followed from these letters which were published on the 13th or 14th, a suspension of hostilities, though each party accused the other of violating the truce. Santa Anna had not arrived on the 17th, but would encounter no difficulty in assuming power. All parties were waiting for him impatiently, and each claiming that he will side with them. Representations had been made to him in abundance, and large delegations of influential men had gone towards San Luis to meet and propitiate him. The report sent us by Mr. Kendall that he was in the capital by the 19th, and in full possession of power, we have no doubt was true. [MSM]

NNR 72.101 April 17, 1847 LETTER OF GEN. ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTANA ANNA TO VALENTIN GOMEZ FARIAS, ANNOUNCING THAT HE SHOULD MARCH TO THE CAPITAL TO QUIET CONTENDING FACTIONS

EXCELLENT SIR- unable to remain indifferent to the evils which the heroic capital is suffering-the victim of civil war and all the calamities consequent upon it- and to the transcendent evils which are thence extended to all the republic, I have determined, listening to the voice of my conscience and the exigencies for the nation, to submit to the sacrifice of proceeding to the capital to assume the reins of the government, with which I have been entrusted by my fellow citizens.

I communicate this for your intelligence, praying you that until I present myself in the capital, which will be very soon—for I shall proceed thither by forced journeys - you will give direction to suspend hostilities of every kind, in obedience to the voice of reason and humanity, which is impiously outraged by the shedding of Mexican blood, which ought only to flow on fields of battle in driving back our unjust invaders.

To Gen. Matias de la Pena y Barragan, Chief of the Pronunciados, I have made the same recommendation, and I trust that the chiefs of both the belligerent forces will observe the truce indicated, in consideration of the noble views which impel me to solicit it. I transmit this for your intelligence and that it may receive compliance from you out of respect to the patriotic enus I have proposed to myself. God and Liberty. [MSM]

NNR 72.102 April 17, 1847 Col. William Selby Harney's fight near Veracruz

Colonel Harney’s dragoon fight, near Vera Cruz.—Colonel Harney’s gallant exploits in his expedition against Medelin, have added another feather to the cap of the 2d dragoons, as well as to that of the other troops engaged in it. As I am able to give you a correct account of the affair I will do somewhat in detail.

Col. Harney started on the morning of the 25th, with Captain Thornton’s squadron, under the immediate command of major Sumner, and fifty dismounted dragoons under Capt. Ker, towards Medelin river, where it was reported that a strong force of Mexican cavalry had placed themselves. When he reached the stone bridge over the Morena, about six miles from here, he began to reconnoitre, as he had received information that the bridge was fortified and guarded by the two thousand men and two pieces of artillery. Shall parties of lancers were seen among the thickets as the dragoons approached and, when within about sixty yards of the bridge, Capt. Ker's command received a heavy fire from the breastworks, which killed one corporal and severely wounded two men. Seeing that the bridge was fortified and defended by a strong force, the Colonel fell back and sent a request for two pieces of artillery. Capt. Hardee, who was engaged on the beach getting his horses ashore, hearing of the fight, collected as many of his men as had reached the beach, and in passing through the camp took all he could find there, and marched them (between forty and fifty in number) on foot to the Colonel's assistance. Col. Haskell, of the 2d Tennessee regiment, with a part of four companies, and Capt. Cheatham, of the 1st Tennessee regiment, also joined the dragoons, and shortly after Lieut. Judd, of the 3d artillery, with his subaltern (Lieut. H. Brown) appeared with two pieces of cannon. Captain Ker was now placed upon the right of the road leading to the bridge, the Tennesseans on the left of it. Capt. Hardee and Lieut. Hill were ordered to support the guns and be ready to charge into the work; and Major Sumner, with the wounded men, was held in reserve. Lieutenant Judd now advanced cautiously towards the bridge, and as soon as he was seen he received the concentrated fire of the Mexicans, about fifty yards distant. The parties on the right and left were now ordered to extend and commence firing, to direct the enemy's attention from Judd's guns. Lieut. Judd fearlessly opened upon the bridge, and, after six or eight well directed rounds, drove the enemy under the cover. Haskell, and Cheatham, and Hardee with their men, now rushed intrepidly into the fortification, leaping over the barricade. The enemy fell back and formed beyond the bridge. Col. Harney ordered the obstacles to be cleared away, and Maj. Summer's mounted men galloped up and charged across the bridge. The Mexican foot fled into the chaparral, but the cavalry were met and routed. A party of thirty lancers turned off into a by-road, were pursued by Lieuts. Lowry and Oakes and three men, and all but five were either dismounted or sabred. Major Sumner and Capt. Subley had a number of personal encounters with the enemy, who were in every instance either killed or dismounted. The pursuit was continued to the village of Medelin, six miles beyond the bridge, wher another party of lancers were seen retreating, and Lieut. Neill, the adjutant of the 2d dragoons, pursued them with three men. A supporting party was sent after him, but his horse being fleeter than the others he first caught up with the pursued, two of whom closed upon him. He fought gallantly with them, but received two lance wounds in the arm and breast, and fell from his horse. He pursuit was continued two miles further, but night coming on the party returned to Medelin, rested three hours and returned to camp, which they reached at three o'clock in the morning. Major General Patterson, with Colonel Campbell's regiment, arrived at the bridge soon after Col. Harney had made his dispositions for the attack, but in a very gentlemanly manner declined taking command, but assisted in the attack and assault, behaving very gallantly, as did likewise Col. Campbell.

The cool judgment of Col. Harney in preparing for the attack, and his gallant conduct during the charge and pursuit, filled the command with admiration. Any person who has ever seen him can imagine what an imposing figure he must have presented darting through among the Mexican horsemen, and hurling them to the earth with his powerful arm and keen blade. In his turn he speaks in the most complimentary terms of the bravery and energy of the officers and men who acted under him—of Majors Sumner and Beall, of Capt. Hardee, (who mounted in the pursuit and joined the Colonel as one of his staff,) of Capt. Ker, Lieut. Judd, Lieut. Brown, Dr. Barnes, Lieuts. Lowry and Neill, (the wounds of Lieut. N. are doing well,) of Col. Hasell, Capt. Cheatham, and the other officers and men, both regulars and volunteers. Col. Haskell was the first to leap the parapet of the bridge. Col Harney lost two killed and nine wounded, one of the latter being Thomas Young, of Texas, who acted as guide and behaved bravely. The exact number of Mexicans killed is not known, but it is known that over fifty fell in the attack and pursuit, most of them falling under the sabre. I do not know how many men the volunteers Lieut. Judd lost. [ANP] labors for planting the remainder of our heavy metal being in progress, I addressed at two o'clock, P.M., a summons to the governor of Vera Cruz, and within the two hours limited by the bearer of the flag, received the governor's answer. Copies of the two papers, (marked respectively, A and B,) are herewith enclosed.

It will be perceived that the governor, who, it turns out, is the commander of both places, chose, against the plain terms of the summons, to suppose me to have demanded the surrender of the castle and of the city-when, in fact, from the non-arrival of our heavy metal-principally mortars-I was in no condition to threaten the former.

On the return of the flag, with that reply, I at once ordered the seven mortars, in battery, to open upon the city. In a short time the smaller vessels of Commodore Perry's squadron-two steamers and five schooners-according to previous arrangement with him, approached the city within about a mile and an eighth, whence being partially covered from the castle-an essential condition to their safety-they also opened a brisk fire upon the city. This has been continued uninterruptedly, by mortars, and only with a few intermissions, by the vessels, up to nine o'clock this morning, when the commodore very properly, called them off from a position too daringly assumed.

Our three remaining mortars are now (12 o'clock, M,) in battery; and the whole ten in activity. Tomorrow, early, if the city should continue obstinate, batteries Nos. 4 and 5 will be ready to add their fire; No. 4, consisting of four 24 pounders and two 8 inch Paixhan guns, and No. 5 (naval battery) of three 32 pounders, and three 8 inch Paixhans-the guns, officers, and sailors landed from the squadron-our friends of the navy being unremitting in their zealous co-operation, in every mode and form.

So far, we know that our fire upon the city has been highly effective-particularly from the batteries of 11 inch mortars, planted at about 800 yards from the city. Including the preparation and defence of the batteries, from the beginning-now many days-and notwithstanding the heavy fire of the enemy, from the enemy, from the city and castle-we have only had four or five men wounded, and one officer and one man killed, in or near the trenches. That officer was Captain John R.
Vinton, of the United States 3d artillery, one of the most talented, accomplished, and effective members of the army, and who was highly distinguished in the brilliant operations at Monterey. He fell, last evening, in the trenches, where he was on duty as field and commanding officer, universally regretted. I have just attended his honored remains to a soldier's grave-in full view of the enemy and within reach of his guns.

Thirteen of the long needed mortars-leaving 27, besides heavy guns, behind-have arrived and two of them landed. A heavy norther then set in (at meridian) that stopped that operation, and also the landing of shells. Hence the fire of our mortar batteries has been slackened, since 2'o'clock, to-day, and cannot be reinvigorated until we shall again have a smooth sea. In meantime I shall leave this report open for journalizing events that may occur up to the departure of the steam ship-of-war, the Princeton, with Com. Conner, who, I learn, expects to leave the anchorage at Sacrificios, for the United States, the 25th inst.

March 24.-The storm having subsided in the night we commenced this forenoon, as soon as the sea became a little smooth, to land shot, shells, and mortars.

The naval battery, No. 5, was opened with great activity, under Captain Aulick, the second in rank of the squadron, at about 10 A.M. His fire was continued to 2 o'clock P.M., a little before he was relieved by Capt. Mayo, who landed with a fresh supply of ammunition-Capt. A. having exhausted the supply he had brought with him. He lost four sailors dilled, and had one officer, Lieut. Baldwin, slightly hurt.

The mortar batteries Nos. 1,2, and 3, have fired but languidly during the day for want of shells, which are now going out from the beach.

The two reports from Col. Bankhead, chief of artillery, both of this date, copies of which I enclose, give the incidents of those three batteries.

Battery No. 4, which mounts four 24 pounders, and two 8 inch Paixhans' guns, has been much delayed in the hands of the indefatigable engineers by the norther that filled up the work with sand nearly as fast as it could be opened by the half blinded laborers. It will, however, doubtless be in full activity early to-morrow morning.

March 25-The Princeton being about to start for Philadelphia, I have but a moment to continue this report.

All the batteries, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, are in awful activity this morning. The effect is, no doubt, very great, and I think the city cannot hold out beyond to-day. To-morrow morning many of the new mortars will be in a position to add their fire, when, or after the delay of some twelve hours, if no proposition to surrender should be received, I shall organize parties for carrying the city by assault. So far the defence has been spirited and obstinate.

I enclose a copy of a memorial received last night, signed by the consuls of Great Britain, France, Spain, and Prussia, within Vera Cruz, asking me to grant a truce to enable the neutrals, together with Mexican women and children, to withdraw from the scene of havoc about them. I shall reply, the moment an opportunity may be taken, to say-1. That a truce can only be granted on the application of Governor Moralez, with a view to a surrender-2. That in sending safeguards to the different consuls, beginning as far back as the 13 inst., I distinctly admonished them—particularly the French and Spanish consuls—and of course, through the two, the other consul—of the dangers that have followed-3. That although at that date, I already refused to allow any person whatsoever to pass the line of investment either way, yet the blockade had been left open to the consuls and other neutrals, to pass out to their respective ships of war up to the 22d inst.; and 4th. I shall enclose to the memorialists a copy of my summons to the governor, to show that I had fully considered the impending hardships and distresses of the place, including those of women and children, before one gun had been fired in that direction. The intercourse between the neutral ships of war and the city was stopped at the last mentioned date by Com. Perry, with my concurrence, which I placed on the ground that that intercourse could not fail to give to the enemy moral aid and comfort.

It will be seen from the memorial, that our batteries have already had a terrible effect on the city, (also know through other sources,) and hence the inference that a surrender must soon be proposed.

In haste, I have the honor to remain, sir, with high respect, your most obedient servant,

Winfield Scott.

Hon. Wm. L. Marcy, Secretary of war.

Headquarters of the Army
Of the United States of America,
Camp Washington, before Vera Cruz March, 22, 1847.

The undersigned, Major General Scott, general-in-chief of the armies of the United States of America, in addition to the close of the blockade of the coast and port of Vera Cruz, previously established by the squadron under Commodore Conner, of the navy of the said states, having now fully invested the said city with an overwhelming army, so as to render it impossible that its garrison should receive from without succor or reinforcement of any kind; and having caused to be established batteries, competent to the speedy reduction of the said city, he, the undersigned, deems it due to the courtesies of war in like cases, as well as the rights of humanity, to summon his excellency, the governor and commander-in-chief of the city of Vera Cruz to surrender the same to the arms of the United States of America, present before the place.

The undersigned, anxious to spare the beautiful city of Vera Cruz from the imminent hazard of demolition—its gallant defenders from a useless effusion of blood, and its peaceful inhabitants—women and children, inclusive—from the inevitable horrors of triumphant assault, addresses this summons to the intelligence, the gallantry, and patriotism, no less than to the humanity of his excellency the governor and commander-in-chief of Vera Cruz.

The undersigned is not accurately informed whether both the city of Vera Cruz and the castle of San Juan d’Ulloa be under the command of his excellency, or whether each place has its own independent commander; but the undersigned, moved by the considerations or walls, upon the castle, unless the castle should previously fire upon the city.

The undersigned has the honor to tender to this distinguished opponent, his excellence the governor and commander-in-chief of Vera Cruz, the assurance of the high respect and consideration of the undersigned.

Winfield Scott.

B. [Translation]

The undersigned, commanding general of the free and sovereign state of Vera Cruz, has informed himself of the contents of the note which Major General Scott, general in-chief of the forces of the United States, has addressed to him under date of today, demanding the surrender of this place, and the castle of Ulloa; and, in answer, has to say, that the above named fortress, as well as this place depend on his authority; and it being his principal duty, in order to prove worthy of the confidence place in him by the government of the nation, to defend both points at all cost, to effect which he counts upon the necessary elements, and will make it good to the last; therefore his excellency can commence his operations of war in the manner which he may consider most advantageous.

The undersigned has the honor to return to the general in chief of the forces of the United States the demonstrations of esteem he may be pleased to honor him with. God and liberty!

Vera Cruz, March 22, 1847.
Juan Morales.

To Major General Scott, general in chief of the forces of the United States, situated in sight of this place.

Artillery Headquarters,
Camp Washington, March 24, 1847.

Sir: I have the honor to report for the information of the general in chief, that in the 22d instant and as soon as the chief engineers had reported that the batteries were sufficiently advanced to receive seven mortars, I place that number in battery. By 20'clock on that day I was prepared to open the fire on the city of Vera Cruz. At quarter past 4 I received the order of the general in chief to commence firing on the city, and the batteries Nos. 1, 2, and 3 were opened with great animation and apparent effect.

From the moment the batteries opened on the afternoon of the 22d instant, the fire has been incessant day and night.

On the 22d and during the night, battery No. 1 was under the command of Capt. Brooks, of the 2d artillery; battery No 2, under the charge of Lieut. Shackelford, of the 2d artillery, and battery No. 3, under the charge of Capt. Vinton, of the 3d artillery, and until the hour of his death, about 4 o'clock, P.M., when the command devolved upon Lieut. Vanvliet, 3d artillery.

The severe loss to the army by the death of Capt. Vinton, was the only loss we sustained on the first day. Several of the men were slightly wounded.

The fire from the city and from the castle on our batteries, with shot, shells, and rockets, has been intermittted, but with very brief periods, since we opened our batteries; and we must ascribe our safety, under such a heavy and constant fire, to the skill and conscience of the officers of engineers in the construction of our batteries.

From the morning of the 23d to this morning, the batteries have been under the charge of Captain McKinzie, of the 3d artillery.

Yesterday about 12 o'clock m., I was able to place three more mortars in battery, but owing to the highness of the wind, the shells could not be landed from the storeship, and our fire to this time has been very moderate, not exceeding one fore in every five minutes.

Last night I succeeded in moving three 24 pounder guns to battery No. 4, with the necessary ammunition and implements which have been placed in battery.

One more 24 pounder and two 8 inch howitzers will be moved out to-night, and to-morrow morning, (as we shall doubtless obtain a supply of shells today, the storm having abated sufficiently to land them) I shall be able to open the four batteries, with ten mortars, four 24 pounders, and two 8 inch howitzers, with increased effect and renewed vigor.

I can bear testimony, from personal observation, to the skill and gallantry of all the officers detailed on artillery service under my direction, and of the cheerfulness and steadiness of the men in the performance of their laborious duties.

I have the honor to be respectfully, your ob't serv't,

Jas Bankhead,
3d artillery, chief of artillery.

Lieut. Scott, acting Ad'j Gen, Army Headquarters.

Artillery Headquarters,
Camp Washington, March 24, 1847-5 P.M.

Sir: since my report this date of operations in the batteries up to 4 o'clock, A.M., the hour when the troops are relieved, I have to state for the information of the general in chief that the enemy opened a brisk fire on our batteries soon after sunrise this morning, without any effect; but about 10 o'clock, most of their batteries were again opened on us, and one man of company "B," 2d artillery, was killed at battery No. 1, and three men were severely wounded.

A shell fell into battery No. 3, where four men of company "F." 2d artillery, were wounded. The shell fell one of the mortars, breaking the mortar bed and throwing the mortar thirty feet from the platform—another mortar bed can be obtained from the ordnance depot, and the mortar will be remounted.

We have been restrained from the want of shells from throwing more than one every five minutes during the day. A full supply will be in place tonight, and as soon as it is dark enough to send them to the batteries without being observed by the enemy.

I am, very respectfully, your ob't serv't,

JAS. BANKHEAD,
Second Artillery, Chief of Artillery.

To Lieut. Scott, Acting Ad'j Gen., Army Headquarters.

Vera Cruz, March 24, 1847.

The undersigned, consuls of different foreign powers near the republic of Mexico, moved by the feeling of humanity excited in their hearts by the frightful results of the bombardment of the city of Vera Cruz during yesterday and the day before, have the honor of addressing, collectively, General Scott, commander in chief of the army of the United States of the North, to pray him to suspend his hostilities, and to grant a reasonable truce, sufficient to enable their respective compatriots to leave the place with their women and children, as well as the Mexican women and children.

The request of the undersigned appears to them to comfortable to the existing ideas of civilization, and they have too high an opinion of the principles and the sentiments of General Scott, not to be full of confidence in the success of this request. They pray him to have the goodness to send back his answer to the parlementaire, who is the bearer of this, an to accept the assurances of their respectful consideration.

(IIndecipherable Paragraph)

I promptly answer in the affirmative, considering that both places are now blockaded by our squadron under your command, and the city not only invested by the army, but actually under the fire of our land batteries.

The intercourse—the subject of your note cannot, it seems to me, however neutral in its intended character on the part of the foreign ships of war present, fail to give the places inquisition, under our fire, much moral aid and comfort.

With high respect, &c. &c.,

Winfield Scott.

Commodore M. C. Perry, US.N., commanding home squadron, &c.
United States Steamer Mississippi,
Off Sacrificios Island, March 22, 1847.

Sir: The city and castle of Vera Cruz being now closely besieged and blockaded by the military and naval forces of the United States, it has become necessary to prevent all communication from outside, unless under the sanction of a flag of truce.

I am, therefore, constrained to inform you that all intercourse between the vessels and boats under your command and that part of the American coast encompassed by the United States forces, must for the present cease.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your most ob't serv't,

M.C. Perry,L
Commanding home squadron.

Commander H. S. Matson, H. B. M. sloop Daring.
Capt. Manuel de la Puente, commanding H.C.M. Naval forces, Gulf of Mexico.
Capt. G. Dubut, commanding French naval forces, Gulf of Mexico.

Headquarters of the Army,
Vera Cruz, March 29, 1847.

Sir: The flag of the United States of America floats triumphantly over the walls of this city, and the castle of San Juan Ulloa.

Our troops have garrisoned both since 10 o'clock. It is now noon. Brigadier General Worth is in command of the two places.

Articles of capitulation were signed and exchanged, at a late hour, night before the last. I enclosed a copy of the document.

I have heretofore reported the principal incidents of the siege up to the 25th instant. Nothing of striking interest occurred till early in the morning of the next day, when I received overtures from General Landero, on whom General Morales had devolved the principal command. A terrible storm of wind made it difficult to communicate with the city, and impossible to refer to Commodore Perry. I was obliged to entertain the proposition alone, or to continue the fire upon a place that had thrown as disposition to surrender; for the loss of a day, perhaps several, could not be permitted. The accompanying papers will show the proceedings and results.
Yesterday, after the norther had abated, and the commissioners appointed by me early the morning before, had again met those appointed by General Landero, Commodore Perry sent ashore his second in command, Captain Aulick, as a commissioners in the part of the navy. Although not included in by specific arrangement made with the Mexican commander, I did not hesitate, with proper courtesy, to desire that Captain Aulick might be duly introduced and allowed to participate in the discussion and acts of the commissioners who had been reciprocally accredited. Hence the preamble to this signature. The original American commissioners were Brevet Brigadier General Worth, Brigadier General Pillow, and Colonel Totten. Four more able or judicious officers could not have been desired.

I have time to add but little more. The remaining details of the siege; the able co-operation of the United States squadron, successively under the command of Commodores Conner and Perry; the admirable conduct of the whole army-regulars and volunteers—I should be happy to dwell upon as they deserve; but the steamer Princeton, with Commodore Conner, on board, is under way, and I have commenced organizing an advance into the interior. This may be delayed a few days, waiting the arrival of additional means of transportation. In the meantime, a joint operation, by land and water, will be (indecipherable text) that has just terminated most successfully, and the importance of his presence, at Washington, as the head of the engineer bureau, I intrust this despatch to his personal care, and beg to commend him to the very favorable consideration of the department.

I have the honor to remain, sir, with high respect, your most obedient servant,

Winfield Scott

Hon. W.L. Marcy, Secretary of war.

Proposition for the appointment of commissioners.

I have the honor of transmitting to your excellency the exposition which has this moment been made to me by the Senores consuls of England, France, Spain, and Prussia, in which they solicit that hostilities may be suspended while the innocent families in this place who are suffering the ravages of war, be enabled to leave the city which solicitude claims my support; and considering it in accordance with the rights of afflicted humanity, I have not hesitated to invite your excellency to enter into an honorable accommodation with the garrison, in which cases you will please name three commissioners who may meet at some intermediate point, to treat with those of this place upon the terms of the accommodation.

With this motive I renew to your excellency my attentive consideration.

God guard your excellency, &c.

On account of the sickness of the commanding general.

Credentials of commissioners on the part of the United States.

In consideration of the proposition the undersigned has received from Senor General Landero, the actual commander of he city of Vera Cruz, and its dependencies, that three commissioners be appointed on the part of each belligerent to treat of the surrender of the said city, with its dependencies, to the besieging army before the same-the undersigned, Major General Scott, general in chief of the armies of the United States of America, has appointed; and does hereby appoint, Generals W. J. Worth and G.J. Pillow, with Colonel J. G. Totten, chief of engineers— all of the army of the said states, commissioners on the part of the undersigned to meet an equal number of commissioners who may be duly appointed on the part of Senor General Landero, to treat of the surrender of the city of Vera Cruz and its dependencies to the arms of the said states.
Done at camp Washington, the headquarters of the army of the United States of America, this 26th day of March, in the year of our lord, 1847.

Winfield Scott.

Gen. Landero's letter notifying the appointment of Mexican commissioners.

In virtue of your excellency's having accepted the proposition of accommodation which I proposed to you in my despatch of to-day, and in accordance with the reply I have just received, I have it honor to inform you that I have named, on my part, the Senores Colonels D. Jose Gutierrez Villanueva, D. Pedro Miguel Herrera, and Lieut. Col. of Engineers D. Manuel Robles, to whom I had entrusted the competent power to celebrate the accommodation, having the honor to enclose you a copy of the expressed power.

I reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my high consideration.

God and liberty.

Vera Cruz, March 26, 1847.

Headquarters of the Army, Camp Washington, before Vera Cruz, March 26, 1847.

Outlines of instructions to the commissioners appointed on the part of the United States, and commissioned by the undersigned to treat with such persons as may be duly authorized on the part of the city of Vera Cruz, and its dependencies, on the subject of the surrender of the same.

2. The garrisons to be permitted to march out with the honors of war, and to ground arms to such forces as may be appointed by the undersigned, and at a point to be agreed upon by the commissioners.

3. The surrendered places to be immediately garrisoned by American troops.

4. Mexican officers to preserve their side arms and private effects, including horses and horse furniture, and to be allowed, (regular and irregular officers) at the end of days, to retire to their respective homes on the usual parole with he exception of such officers as the two parties may deem necessary to accompany the rank and file to the Unite States.

5. The rank and file of regular regiments, corps or companies, to remain as prisoners of war, subject to be sent to the United States, (with such Mexican officers as may be needed with the men,) and to be clothed and subsisted by the United States, at the ultimate cost of the belligerent that may be agreed upon by a definite treaty of peace.

6. The rank and file of the irregular portion of the prisoners to be detained days, and subsisted (if necessary) for the time by the United States, when they may be permitted to retire to their respective homes, their officers giving the usual parole that the said rank and file shall not serve again until duly exchanged.

7. All the material of war and all public property of every description found in the city and its dependencies, to belong to the United states; but he armament of the same, not injured or destroyed in the further prosecution of the actual war, maybe considered as liable to the restored to Mexico by a definitive treaty of peace.

8. If the Mexican commissioners decline, from the want of power or authority, to treat of the surrender of the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa, the American commissioners will urge the former to ask for such powers, and grant any necessary delay to that end; but if such power be not asked for, or be not, on application obtained, the American commissioners may, hesitatingly, consent to refer the subject back to the undersigned for further instructions to meet that state of things.

Winfield Scott.

Note.-Article 8 was not, of course, given to the Mexican commissioners.

Six propositions from the Mexican Commissioners to the general in chief.

1st. The garrison will evacuate the place within a time to be agreed upon between the belligerent parties, retiring to the city of Orizaba or Jalpa, by regular day marches, according to the custom of armies on a march.

2nd. The aforesaid garrison shall march out with all the honors of war, colors displayed, drums beating, stores belonging to the corps of which it is composed, the allowance of field pieces corresponding to its force, baggage and munitions of war.

3rd. The Mexican flag will remain displayed on the bastion of Santiago until the retiring Mexican garrison shall be saluted with twenty one guns fired from the same bastion, until which time the forces of the United States shall not enter the place.

4th. The inhabitants of Vera Cruz shall continue in the free possession of their moveable and immovable property, in the enjoyment of which they shall never be disturbed, as well as in the exercise of their religious faith.

5th. The national guards of Vera Cruz, if they find it convenient to retire peaceably to their homes, not to be molested on account of their conduct in bearing arms in defence of the lace.

6th. The undersigned desire to know, in case the Senor General Scott should have to know, in case the Senor General Scott should have to continue hostilities on account of not admitting these propositions, if he will permit the neutrals to go out of the place, as well as the women and children belonging to the Mexican families.

Translated from the original paper for the Hon. Secretary of War.

Camp Washington, before Vera Cruz. March 27, 1847.

The undersigned, Major General Scott, general in chief of the armies of the United States of America, has received the report of the commissioners appointed by him yesterday, to meet the commissioners appointed by his excellency, General Landero, the commander in chief of Vera Cruz and the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa.

In making that report the undersigned received, informally, from his commissioners, the project of an arrangement presented to them by the Mexican commissioner, consisting of six articles. Without re-introducing those articles, in extense, the undersigned will simply refer to them by their respective numbers:

Article 1. is wholly inadmissible. The garrisons the places, in question, can only be allowed to march out or to evacuate them as prisoners of war; but the undersigned is willing that each garrison, without distinction between regular troops and national guards or militia, may retire, in the delay of many days, to their respective homes—the officers giving for themselves and their respective men, the usual parole of honor not again to serve against the United States of American in the present war, until duly exchanged.

Art. 2. The garrisons may be allowed all the honors of war usually granted to gallant troops; but to surrender their arms of every sort, save the side arms of the officers.

Art. 3. As far as practicable by the commissioners of the two armies, this may be arranged to satisfy the just pride of the gallant defenders of the places in question.

Art. 4. Is readily agreed to, and may be solemnly promised.
Art. 5. This is substantially the above remark under article 1.

Art. 6. Not admissible in any case.

Taking the foregoing remarks and the instructions of the undersigned to this commissioners—whic instructions were substantially communicated to the Mexican commissioners—as a basis of an honorable capitulation, the undersigned, to spare the effusion of blood, is willing to refer back the whole subject to the same commissioners met again today at 10 o'clock, a.m., at the same place as yesterday, and proceed without delay to definite conclusion of the whole subject.

The undersigned will wait the answer of his excellency, Gen. Landero, up to 9 o'clock, this day, and in the meantime, renew the assurances of his high respect and consideration.

Winfield Scott.

Articles of the capitulation of the city of Vera Cruz and the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa.

Puente De Hornos,
Without the walls of Vera Cruz
Saturday, March 27, 1847

Terms of capitulation agreed upon by the commissioners viz:

Generals W. J. Worth and G. J. Pillow, and Col. J. G. Totten, chief engineer, on the part of Major General Scott, general in chief of the armies of the nueva Lieutenant Colonel of Engineers Manuel Robles, and Colonel Pedro de Herrera, commissioners appointed by General of Brigade Don Jose Juan Landero, commanding in chief, Vera Cruz, the castle of San Juan de Ulloa and their dependencies—on the surrender to the arms of the United States of the said forts, with their armaments, munitions of war, garrisons, and arms.

1. The whole garrison, or garrisons to be surrendered to the arms of the United States, as prisoners of war, the 29th instant, at 10 o'clock, a.m., the garrisons to be permitted to march out with all the honors of war, and to lay down their arms to such officers as may be appointed by the general in chief of the United States armies, and at a point to be agreed upon by the commissioners.

2. Mexican officers shall preserve their arms and private effects, including horses and horse furniture, and to be allowed, regular and irregular officers, as also the rank and file, five days to retire to their respective homes, on parole, as hereinafter prescribed.

3. Coincident with the surrender, as stipulated in article 1, the Mexican flags of the various forts and stations shall be struck saluted by their own batteries; and immediately thereafter, Forts Santiago and Conception and the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa, occupied by the forces of the United States.

4. The rank and file of the regular portion of the prisoners to be disposed of, after surrender and parole, as their general in chief may desire, and the irregulars to be permitted to return to their homes. The officers, in respect to all arms and descriptions of force, giving the usual parole, that the said rank and file as well as themselves, shall not serve again until duly exchanged.

5. All of the materiel of war, and all public property of every description found in the city, the castle of San Juan de Ulloa, and their dependencies, to belong to the United States; but the armament of the same (not injured or destroyed in the further prosecution of the actual war,) maybe considered as liable to be restored to Mexico by a definitive treaty of peace.

6. The sick and wounded Mexicans to be allowed to remain in the city, with such medical officers and attendants and officers of the army as may be necessary to their care and treatment.

7. Absolute protection is solemnly guarantied to persons in the city, and property, and it is clearly understood that no private building or property is to be taken or used by the forces of the United States, without previous arrangement with the owners and for a fair equivalent.

8. Absolute freedom of religious worship and ceremonies is solemnly guarantied.

NNR 72.110-72.111 April 17, 1847 orders and correspondence relating to naval operations off Veracruz

From our Navy before Vera Cruz

U.S. Steamer Mississippi.
At Anchor near Vera Cruz, March 21, 1847.

Sir: I have the honor to inform the department of my arrival yesterday, at this anchorage, and of the transfer of the command of the home squadron to me by Commodore Conner, this mornig at 8 o'clock.

M. C. Perry
Commanding home squadron.
The Hon. John Y. Mason, Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

Flagship Mississippi.
Off Vera Cruz, March 25, 1847.

Sir: The sailing of the Princeton this day for the united States offers me opportunity of informing the department that Gen. Scott had, on the 22d inst. the day after I assumed command of the squadron, so far completed the erection of his batteries in the rear of Vera Cruz as to authorize the summoning of the city, and on the refusal of the governor to surrender, of opening his fire at three o'clock of that day.
In conformity with arrangements made in the morning with Gen. Scott, I directed the flotilla of small steamers and gun boats of the squadron, led by Commander J. Tatnall, in the spitfire, to take a position and commence a simultaneous fire upon the city. The order was promptly and gallantly executed, and the fire was kept up with great animation until late evening.

On visiting them at their position, I found that the two steamers had nearly exhausted their ammunition, but having received a fresh supply during the night from the ship, they at sunrise moved to a more favorable and advanced point, and resumed and continued their fire until recalled by signal.

At the earnest desire of myself and officers, Gen. Scott generously assigned a position in the trenches, to be mounted with guns from the squadron, and three long 32 pounders, (all that were required,) were consequently landed, and after immense labor in transporting them through the sand, in which parties from the divisions of General Patterson, Worth and Pillow, respectively detached by those officers, cheerfully participated, the pieces were place in position and opened upon the city about 10 o'clock yesterday, immediately drawing upon them a sharp fire from the enemy, which in a short time killed and wounded ten of the detachment from the squadron.

In order to give all a chance to serve in the trenches, for the honor of which there is a great though generous strife, I have arranged that detachments from each ship in charge respectively of lieutenants, and the whole commanded by a captain or commander shall be relieved every twenty four hours. Captain Aulick, assisted by Commander Mackenzie, and several lieutenants, had the direction of mounting the guns and opening the fire, and well and bravely was the duty performed. Captain Mayo is now in charge and will be relieved in turn.

The Ohio arrived on the 22d inst., but in consequence of a norther, did not reach her proper anchorage until yesterday afternoon. Detachments of boats from all the vessels are employed night and day I landing from the transports the stores and munitions of the army.

Enclosed is a list of the killed and wounded ascertained up to this hour, (12 meridian,) with the report of Captain Aulick; also a list of the small vessels comprising the flotilla of the squadron, all of which were engaged on the 22d inst.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,
M. C. Perry,
Commanding home squadron.

Hon. John Y. Mason, Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

Friday, March 26, 1847.

Sir: The detention of the Princeton enables me to inform the department of events up to this hour, (10 a.m.)

Captain Mayo and his party have returned, having been relieved in the batteries by a detachment under Capt. Breese. I hardly need to assure the department that the party under Capt. Mayo sustained with unabated courage and spirit, the admirable fire of the naval battery. The bombardment from the trenches was continued through the night. A heavy norther now blowing, (the third I five days,) has prevented communication with the shore since last evening. Several merchant vessels have been thrown, this morning, ashore by the gale.

The report of Capt. Mayo is enclosed, as also an additional list of killed and wounded. Among the names of the killed, will be found that of Midshipman T. B. Shubrick, a most amiable and promising young officer.

I have the honor to be, your very obedient servant,
M. C. Perry,
Commanding Home Squadron.

To the Hon. John Y. Mason, Secretary of the Navy, Washington city, D. C.

Sunday, March 28, 1847.
Sir: I am happy to inform you that the city and castle of Vera Cruz, surrendered yesterday to the combined force of the army and navy of the United States, on terms highly favorable to us.

With high respect, your obedient servant,
M. C. Perry,
Commanding Home Squadron

To the Hon. J. Y. Mason, Secretary of the Navy.

Enclosed is an informal copy of the terms of stipulation.

M. C. P.

List of killed and wounded of the detachments at the naval batteries on the 24th and 25th March, 1847.

Killed on the 24th—Wm. Marcus, seaman; Jno. Williams, quarter gunner; John Harrington, boatswain's mate; Daniel McGinnis, landsman; John Tookey, seaman.

Killed on the 25th—Thomas B. Shubrick, midshipman; John Williamson, seaman.

Wounded on the 25th—A. S. Baldwin, lieutenant, slightly; Edward Black, seaman, slightly; Mathias Nice, seaman, slightly; William Hamblin, seaman, slightly; Deforest Carey, seaman, slightly.

Wounded on the 25th—The seamen, slightly, names not ascertained.

Respectfully, your obedient servant.
M. C. Perry,
Commanding Home Squadron.

To Hon. John Y. Mason, Secretary of the Navy.

United States Ship Potomac, Off Sacrificios, March 25, 1847.

Sir—In compliance with your letter this moment received, calling for a report of my proceedings in command of the detachment on shore yesterday, I have the honor to state that the battery of three-8-inch Paixhan guns and three long 32-pounders landed from the squadron was turned over to me, at 10 a.m., by the accomplished engineer officer who constructed it, (Captain R. E. Lee,) who, as well as Lieuts. Smith, of the engineers, and Williams, aid of Gen. Scott, remained in the battery throughout the fire; the enemy having but a few minutes before discovered our position, commenced the attack upon us. I immediately ordered the guns to be unmasked, and the firing commenced on the enemies batteries, which was steadily and deliberately continued until about half-past two p.m., when our last charge of ammunition, of which we had only about fifty founds to each gun, was expended. By this time our sand bag breast works and traverses were much dilapidated by the shot of the enemy and the concussion of our own heavy pieces. I now directed the embrasures to be filled up with sand-bags, (for the suggestion of which I must thank Captain Lee,) and everybody to seek the best shelter from shot that the work afforded, until the ammunition we expected should arrive.

At 4 o'clock, Capt. Mayo, with a fresh supply of ammunition and a relief party of officers and men, arrived; I then relinquished the command to him agreeably to your order, and returned to my ship.—Our loss was four men killed, and one officer and five men wounded, one of the latter mortally (since dead) the others slightly. When it is considered that we had the concentrated and very active fire of five of the enemies batteries upon us at a distance of less than 800 yards, besides occasional shells from the castle of San Juan de Ulloa, it is a matter of surprise that our loss is so small.

It affords me great satisfaction to add that every officer and man in the battery behaved with the utmost coolness, activity and cheerfulness.

Commander A. S. Mackenzie, who had superintended the duty of placing the guns in battery, promptly tendered his services to me and took charge of one of my 32 pounders, which he managed with great skill, and, I doubt not, with great effect upon the enemy's works. In the course of the firing the flag on one of the enemy's forts was brought down by a gun fired by Lieut. Baldwin. It was, however, quickly displayed from the same flag staff. It is due to Midshipman Allen McLane that on a call for volunteers to cut away some brush wood which obstructed the view to a battery on which we wished to direct our fire, he sprung through an embrasure, followed by two men, Wm. Cavenaugh, seaman-the name of the other I have not been able to ascertain,) and amidst a showing of balls quickly removed the obstruction, for which gallantry I complimented them on the spot.-I am, however, sure that any officer present would have been happy of an opportunity to have done the same. As you desire to forward this report to the department by the Princeton, leaving at 12 m. to-day, it is necessarily a very hasty and brief one.

I annex a list of the killed and wounded, and also the officers of the detachment.

I am, respectfully your ob't servant,

J. H. Aulick. Captain.

Of Vera Cruz, march 26, 1847.

Sir: In obedience to your order, I proceeded on the afternoon of the 24th inst. to the naval battery opposite Vera Cruz, with detachments from his ship, Potomack Raritan, Albany, and St. Mary's, under officers named in the accompanying list, and rered Captain Aulick and the officers and men under Command.

The breastworks having been much broken down the cannonade of the day, the night was passed in miring them by Lieutenant Tower, United States ineers, and his party, from whom I received great assistance. Shortly before sunrise of he 25th , the enemy having opened his fire upon us from four of batteries, an active cannonade was returned by and continued without interruption until half past two, p.m., when they were silenced. Two batteries on their left subsequently turned their fire towards us; but on our briskly returning it, they also ceased firing, and about half-past three p.m., our ammunition being expended, the cannonade ceased on our part.
I cannot too highly commend the zeal, courage, and activity displayed by every officer and man under my command; and I regret that the efficient service which they rendered should have been attended with the loss of one officer, Midshipman T. B. Shubrick, and one seaman, J. Williamson, killed, and three slightly wounded. The admirable conduct of Midshipman Shubrick, down to the moment of his fall, whilst pointing a gun on the enemy, occasioned me the more to lament his loss. He was a young officer of great merit and promise, and had he lived, must have become an ornament to his profession and country.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. Mayo, Captain.

To Commodore M. C. Perry, commanding Home Squadron.

Off Sacrificios Island, March 23, 1847.

Sir: I regret to announce the loss of the steamer hunter, the particulars of which disaster are detailed in the accompanying report of Lieutenant McLaughlin.

I had arrived a few hours before, and fortunately, from the admirable qualities of this ship, was enabled to go to the assistance of the three vessels ashore, the moment at early dawn I discovered their distress, though it was blowing, at the time, a gale.

The boats of this vessel under the special charge of Captain Mayo, who volunteered his service, and commanded respectively by Lieuts. Decamp, Alden, and Blunt, and Passed Mid. Fauntleroy, happily rescued every one, more than sixty in number, from the wrecks.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,
M. C. Perry,
Commanding Home Squadron.

To the Hon. John Y. Mason,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington city, D. C.

United States Steamer Mississippi,
Anchorage near Vera Cruz, March 26, 1847.
Sir: I am writing in the midst of one of the heaviest northers I ever experienced. Twenty-three merchant vessels have already gone ashore since morning, many of them with army stores and munitions.

The vessels of the squadron have so far held on. The loss of life I fear will be great. This is the third norther we have had since I took command, five days since, and we have had thirty wrecks.

I write this in anticipation of the early sailing of the Princeton, fearing I should not have time in the morning. Both the Raritan and Potomac have had vessels across their hawsers. I am ignorant of the extent to damage done to these vessels, but notice that the Raritan has her fore and spiritsail yard carried away.

We have parted one of our chains, and have not yet recovered our anchor.

It would seem to me very necessary that we should have spare chain and anchor for each class of vessels. They can easily be put upon one of the islands. Several boats have been lost in the gale, one actually blown from the davits of the ship; not less than ten small boats are absolutely necessary to our wants; the common iron fastened whale boat, such as are made in New London or New Bedford, costing from $50 to $60, will answer very well, and they can always be purchased ready made.

Spars of assorted kinds are also wanted. It is hoped that the frame for the hospital, to be erected, and one or more sheds will soon arrive. We may soon anticipate much sickness, and the rainy season is fast approaching. The steamers are not in so much danger, as they all work their wheels and propellers.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. Perry,
Commanding Home Squadron.

P. S. We are already in want of Manilla hawsers; those received at Norfolk being tarred; four hawsers were in use to-day in this ship. One merchant vessel is partly riding by us.

Sir: It is with infinite satisfaction I announce to you that the city of Vera Cruz and the castle of San Juan de Ulloa were this day occupied by garrisons of United States troops. Detachments from the army and navy, with the flotilla, were in motion early in the morning, and the American colors were hoisted on the forts of the city and castle at 12 o'clock, under a simultaneous salute from all the large vessels of the squadron.

Enclosed is a copy of the articles of capitulation.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

Vessels Lost Near Vera Cruz.

We place by themselves the list of the vessels lost near Vera Cruz, by the two northers which wrought such destruction.

Editorial Correspondence of the Picayune.

Camp Before Vera Cruz, March 27, 1847.
I send you, enclosed, a list of the vessels ashore the most correct I can obtain at present. What number of vessels will be totally lost it is impossible to say, but many of them will doubtless be got off. The gale has entirely abated but the surf still runs high. Here is the list:

NNR 72.112 April 17, 1847 PROSPECTS OF PEACE

We have been permitted to peruse several privates letters, of a very late date, from the city of Mexico, written by persons of the highest respectability, and whose sources of information are ample. They state as a matter of positive certainty, that negotiations for peace between the United States and Mexico are under advisement, and that the return of Santa Anna, who was hourly expected, would be the signal for the commencement of overtures. These advices are similar to those received at the north, and to which several of the journals in that quarter have given publicity. The outgiving of the northern press on this subject were, however, little more than conjecture. Our opinions are based upon more reliable information. [MSM]

NNR 72.112 April 17, 1847 GEN, ZACHARY TAYLOR'S PURSUIT OF GEN. JOSE URREA UNAVAILING, HE RETURNS TO SALTILLO, IMPRESSION THAT HE WILL ADVANCE TO SAN LUIS
After an ineffectual pursuit of Gen. Urrea, with a force of about 1000 men of which 150 were cavalry, General Taylor returned to Saltillo. He was close upon Urrea at Marin, but he escaped.

The impression at the mouth of the Rio Grande was that Gen. Taylor would push on to San Luis. This is inferred from his ordering so much transportation to be sent forward. Col. Hamtramack was at Camargo at the last accounts. Every thing was quiet there, and on the river at the Brazos. [MSM]

NNR 72.112 April 17, 1847 LACK OF MEXICAN TROOPS ON ROUTE TO MEXICO CITY

"A Frenchman has just arrived from the city of Mexico who reports that there are not one thousand armed men, all told, on the road from this to the capital. He says there were nine guns in position at Puente Naciona, but only sixty men to serve them." [MSM]

NNR 72.112 April 17, 1847 GEN. JOHN ANTHONY QUITMAN'S BRIGADE MARCHES ON ALVARADO, NAVY VESSELS SAIL FOR ALVARADO

General Quitman's brigade left Vera Cruz on the 31st March, for Alverado. He has with him the S. Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama regiments. He also has an artillery force with him, Capt. Steptoe's battery, I am informed. One object of the expedition is to open a road from whence mules, horses and supplies for the army may be procured. [MSM]

NNR 72.112 April 17, 1847 ARMY MOVEMENTS TOWARD THE CAPITAL

General Twiggs, with his division was to march for Puente Nacional on the 31st March. General Worth, who was acting as governor of Vera Cruz, would follow with another division in four of five days. [MSM]

NNR 72.112 April 17, 1847 Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna arrives at Mexico City, assumes executive duties, his cabinet, orders troops to Veracruz Latest from the Army and From Mexico.

The ship and the steamer Alabama, both at New Orleans on the 9th bring Vera Cruz dates to the 1st.-Tampico to the 3d, Brazos tot he 4th inst., and files of city of Mexico papers to the 25th, except those from the 18th to the 23d-which are wanting.

Santa Anna arrived at the capital from San Luis Potosi, on the 22d, and was probably received with open arms by all parties. The particulars were published in the papers not received. Those of the 24th contain an account of his induction into the presidential chair, to which the congress had sometime since elected him, and his inaugural speech upon the occasion. On taking the oath of office, Santa Anna said-

"I am all for my country, and shall ever serve it, without thinking what it may cost me to do that which the nation desires I should do. I have entered upon the supreme magistracy because I have seen that it was the sole legal means of terminating the disturbances of this capital, and because I believe I shall thus be able to facilitate the prosecution of the war, and to save the independence and honor of Mexico, which I wish to present unsullied and brilliant to the world which is beholding us."

Gomez Farias of course retired from the executive chair to his station as vice president. General Pena y Barragan remains at the head of the military affairs at the capital. The report of Salas having been shot, it seems was got up by some of he Farias faction. They all appear to rally under Santa Anna. The church party is said to have joined him, the Archbishop agreeing to advance him, $5,000,000 to enable him to "drive the barbarians" out of his country.

Mr. Kendall writes to the Picayune on the 2d from Vera Cruz that "Santa Anna" is said to have allied himself with the party of Farias, and to be determined to support the war at the expense of the Church.

The cabinet of Santa Anna is composed of D. Mariano Otero, minister of foreign affairs; D. Juan Rondero, of the treasury, D. Francisco Suarray Triarty, of Justice, and D. Jose Ignacio Gutierrez, of war.

The latest dates received at the capital from Vera Cruz were to the evening of the 24th, at which time the Vera Cruzanos seemed to claim a victory over the Yankees, and were in hopes of being successful throughout the whole affair. Santa Anna had ordered several detachments of troops to march immediately to Vera Cruz, in order to assist the besieged. [ANP]

NNR 72.113 April 24, 1847 HAVE WE CONQUERED A PEACE

It will be seen by the details inserted in this number of the Register, that he whole circumference of the Mexican Republic is in possession of the United States forces. The "insurrections" near Santa Fe, and in the California, are suppressed. Chihuahua is occupied by the forces under Col. Doniphan. The army assembled by Santa Anna had been nearly demolished by Gen. Taylor. The valley of the Rio Grande is in quiet possession of the latter, and he is preparing to march upon San Louis Potosi. Vera Cruz is nearly demolished also, and the United States' flag waves over the battlements of San Juan de Ulloa. Alvarado, Tampico, nearly every Mexican port upon the Gulf and upon the Pacific, is in our possession, and a U. States tariff fixes the duties of Mexican trade. Gen. Scott with a selected army of from thirteen to twenty thousand men well provided is on the march for "the halls of Montezuma." Meantime, the center of that empire is the scene of one political volcanic eruption after another, which scarcely leaves any party or faction one day in power. Inevitable destruction seems to await the nation. [MSM]

NNR 72.113 April 24, 1847 COMMENTS ON THE ASSIGNMENT OF THE EIGHTEEN MILLION DOLLAR LOAN

And yet we have no distinct indications from thence, of a submission. The impression, however, has gained rapidly upon public opinion in this country within the last three weeks, that a peace cannot be far distant. The strongest proof we have of this, is the avidity with which the U. States loan of eighteen millions had been sought for by capitalists, a race of men who invariably contrive to ferret out the utmost that is to be known or depended upon, whenever they are about to adventure heavy speculations. They unquestionably believed, when they made proposals they did for the loan, that a peace was near at hand.

There are all kinds of opinion, and all kinds of rumors too afloat, in regard to questions at issue. On one hand, the loan is no sooner negotiated, than the announcement is made that government have called upon the states for six thousand volunteers, to proceed to Mexico. We see it mentioned in various directions that governors have received requisitions accordingly. [MSM]

NNR 72.114 April 24, 1847 ALVARADO SURRENDERS TO LT. CHARLES G. HUNTER,
Sir: I have the honor to inform the department that immediately after the surrender of Vera Cruz, Gen. Scott and myself concerted measures for taking possession of Alvarado.

Although it was not expected that any defense would be made, it was though advisable that strong detachments, both of the army and navy, should be employed, in view of making an imposing demonstration in that direction.

The southern brigade under Gen. Quitman, was detached of this duty, and the naval movements were directed personally by myself.

Gen. Quitman took up his line of march this morning, on his return to Vera Cruz, and I left for this anchorage to arrange an expedition to the north; Captain Mayo, with a small naval detachment, being placed in command of Alvarado and its dependencies, in which may be embraced the populous town of Tiacotalpam, situated about twenty miles up the river. In this expedition I have had the good fortune to become acquainted with Gen. Quitman and many of the officers of his command, and have gratified to observe a most cordial desire, as well with them as with the officers of the navy, to foster a courteous and efficient co-operation. The enemy, before evacuating the place, burnt all the public vessels, and spiked or buried most of the guns; but, those that were concealed have been discovered, and I have directed the whole number about sixty-eight to be destroyed or shipped, with the shot, on board the gun boats, as they may be found of sufficient value to be removed.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your most obedient servant, M.C Perry.

NRR 72.114-115 April 24, 1847 FORCES UNDER COM. ROBERT FIELD STOCKTON AND GEN, STEPHEN WATTS KEARNY ATTACK GEN. JOSE MARIA FLORES, TWO ENGAGEMENTS, FLORES RETREATS AND SURRENDERS TO COL. JOHN CHARLES FREMONT

Lieut. Gray, U.S. Navy, reached Baltimore on the 22nd from Jamaica, having come overland from the Pacific to Chagres, and from thence to Jamaica. He proceeded immediately to Washington, with despatches from Com. Stockton.

Lieut, Gray furnishes the following memorandum of occurrences: "On the 8th of January last Com. Stockton with 400 seamen and Marines, 60 dismounted dragoons, and the same number of riflemen, under Col. Kearny, (who volunteered to go with Com. S) met the enemy with 700 artillery and dragoons, on the banks of the "San Gabriel." The commodore pushed his force forward, and crossed the river in the face of a plunging fire from the Mexican battery. The seamen dragging six pieces of artillery through the water, (their pieces having been transported by the seamen 140 miles from the ships) under Lieut. Tilghman, of Baltimore, charged up the heights, dislodging and taking the Mexican battery.

"On the 9th, Gen. Flores again made a stand on the plains of "Mesa," and another severe action took place. The American arms were again triumphant. The Mexican cavalry charged repeatedly on the seamen, who met them in squads, armed with the ship's "boarding pikes"--the dismounted riflemen in the center-dealing out destruction with their underring weapons. The American loss was 16 killed and wounded. Lieut. S. C. Rowan was the only officer wounded, and that slightly. None killed. The Mexican loss is about 90 killed.

"It is believed that if Col. Fremont had been able to have joined Com. S. in season, with his mounted riflemen, Flores, with his whole force, would have been captured. Com. S. refused to negotiate with Flores, but sent him word that if he were taken he would be shot as a rebel. Flores soon after surrendered to Col. Fremont—who was..." not aware of Com. S. having declined to negotiate with him. Flores has promised to become a lawful subject of the U. States, and to assist in quelling the rebellion.”

NNR 72.115-117 April 24, 1847  GEN. ZACHARY TAYLOR’S OFFICIAL REPORT ON THE BATTLE OF BUENA VISTA

Sir: I had the honor to submit the detailed report of the operations of the forces under my command, which resulted in the engagement of Buena Vista, the repulse of the Mexican Army and the reoccupation of this position.

The information which reached me of the advance and concentration of a heavy Mexican force in my front, had assumed a probable form, as to induce a special examination far beyond the reach of our pickets to ascertain it's correctness. A small party of Texan spies, under Maj. McCullugh, detached to the hacienda of Encararcion, 30 miles from this, on the route to San. Luis Potosi, had reported a cavalry force of unknown strength at that place. On the 20th of February a strong reconnaissance under Lieut. Col. May was dispatched to the hacienda of Hacienda, while Maj. McCullough made another examination of Encararcion. The result of these expeditions left no doubt that the enemy was in large force at Encarnacion under the orders of Gen. Santa Anna, and that he meditated a forward movement and attack on our forward position.

As the camp of Aqua Nueva could be turned on the other flank, and as the enemy forces was greatly superior to our own, particularly in the arm of each cavalry, I determined, after much consideration, to take up a position about 11 miles in rear and await the attack. The army broke up its camp and marched at noon on the 21st, in camping at the new position a little in front of the Hacienda of Buena Vista. With a small force I proceeded to Saltillo to make some necessary arrangements for the defense of the town, leaving Brig. Gen. Wool in the immediate command of the troops.

Before those arrangements were completed on the morning of the 22nd I was advised that the enemy was in sight, advancing. Upon reaching the ground it was found that his cavalry advance was in our front, having marched from Encarnacion, as we have since learned, at 11 o’clock on the day previous, a driving amounting force left at Aqua Neuv to cover the removal of public stores. Our troops were in position, occupying a line of remarkable strength. The road at this point becomes a narrow defile, the valley on it’s right being rendered quite impracticable by artillery by a system of deep and impassible gullies, while on the left a succession of rugged ridges and precipitous ravines extends far back towards the mountain which bounds the valley. The features of the ground were such as nearly to paralyze the artillery and cavalry of the army, while his infantry could not derive all the advantage of its numerical superiority. In this position we prepared to receive him. Capt. Washington’s battery (4th artillery) was posted to command the road while the 1st and 2nd Illinois regiments under Hardin and Bissell, each 8 companies, (to the latter of which was attached Capt. Connors company of Texas volunteers,) and the second Kentucky under Col. Mckee, occupied the crest of the ridges on the left and rear. The Arkansas and Kentucky regiments of cavalry commanded by Col. Yell and H. Marshall, occupied the extreme left near the base of the mountain, while the Indian brigade, under Brig. Gen. Lane, (composed of the 2nd and 3rd regiments under Col.’s Bull and Lane,) the Mississippi riflemen under Col. Davis, the squadrons of the 1st and 2nd dragoons under Capt. Steem and Lieut. Col. May and the light batteries of Capt.’s Sherman and Bragg, 3rd artillery, were held in reserve. At 11 o’clock I received from Gen. Santa Anna a summons to surrender at discretion; which with a copy of my reply, I had already transmitted. The enemy still forbore his attack, evidently waiting for the arrival of his rear columns, which could be distinctly seen by our lookouts as they approached the field. A demonstration made on his left caused me to detach the 2nd Kentucky regiment and section of the artillery to the right in which position they bivouacked for the night.

In the mean time the Mexican light troops had engaged ours on the extreme left, (composed of parts of a Kentucky and Arkansas cavalry dismounted, and a rifle battalion from the Indian brigade under Maj. Goreman, the whole command by Col. Marshall,) and kept up a sharp fire, climbing the mountainside and endeavoring to gain our flank. Three pieces of Capt. Washington’s cavalry had been detached to the left and supported by the 2nd Indiana regiment. An occasional shell was thrown by the enemy into this part of our line, but without effect. The skirmishing of the light troops was kept up with trifling loss on our part till dark, when I became convinced that no serious attack would be made before the morning, and returned with the Mississippi regiment and squadron of 2nd dragoons Saltillo. The troops bivouacked without fires and laid upon their arms. A body of cavalry, some 1500 strong, had been visible all day in rear of the town, having entered the valley through a narrow pass east of the city. This cavalry, commanded by Gen. Minion, had evidently been thrown in our rear to break up and harass our retreat, and perhaps make some attempt against the town if practicable. The city was occupied by four excellent companies of Illinois volunteers under Maj. Warren of the first regiment. A field work, which command most of the approaches was garrisoned by Capt. Webster's company, 1st artillery, and armed with two 24 pound howitzers, while the train and headquarter camp was guarded by two companies Mississippi riflemen under Capt. Rogers, and a field piece command by Capt. Shover, 3rd artillery. Having made these dispositions for the protection of the rear, I could proceed on the morning of the 23rd to Buena Vista, ordering forward all the other available troops. The action had commenced before my arrival on the field.

During the evening of the 22nd the enemy had thrown a body of light troops on a mountainside with the purpose of out-flanking our left; and it was here that the action of the 23rd commenced at an early hour. Our rifleman under Col. Marshall, who had been reinforced by three companies under Maj. Trail, 2nd Illinois volunteers, maintained there ground handsomely against a greatly superior force, holding themselves under cover, and using their weapons with deadly effect. About 8 o'clock a strong demonstration was made against the center of our position, a heavy column moving along the road. This force was soon dispersed by a few rapid and well-directed shots from Capt. Washington's battery. In the mean time the enemy was concentrating a large force of infantry and cavalry under cover of the ridges with the obvious intention of forcing our left, which was posted on an extensive plateau.

The 2nd Indiana and 2nd Illinois regiments formed this part of our line, the former covering three pieces of light artillery under the orders of Capt. O'Brien- Brig. Gen. Lane being in the immediate command. In order to bring his men within effective range, Gen. Lane ordered the 2nd Indiana regiment forward. The artillery advanced within musket range of a heavy body of Mexican infantry, and was served against it with great effect, but without being able to check its advance. The infantry ordered to its support had fallen back in disorder, being exposed, as well as the battery, not only to a sever fire of small arms from the front, but also to a murderous cross fire of grape and canister from a Mexican battery on the left. Capt. O'Brien found it impossible to retain his position without support, but was only able to withdraw two of his pieces, all the horses and cannoniers of the third piece being killed or disabled. The 2nd Indiana regiment, which had fallen back as stated, could not be rallied, and took no further part in the action, except a handful of men, who, under its gallant Col. Bowles, joined the Mississippi regiment, and did good service, and those fugitives who, at a later period in the day, assisted in defending the train and depot at Buena Vista. This portion of our line having given way, and the enemy appearing in overwhelming force against our left flank, the light troops which had rendered such good service on the mountain, were compelled to withdraw, which they did, for the most part in good order. Many, however were not rallied until they reached the depot at Buena Vista, to the defense of which they afterwards contributed.

Col. Bissell's regiment, (2nd Illinois,) which had been joined by a section of Capt. Sherman's battery, had become completely outflanked, and was compelled to fall back, being entirely unsupported. The enemy was now pouring masses of infantry and cavalry along the base of the mountain on our left, and was gaining our rear in great force. At this moment, I arrived upon the field. The Mississippi regiment had been directed to the left before reaching the position, and immediately came into action against the Mexican infantry which had turned our flank. The 2nd Kentucky regiment and a section of artillery under Capt. Bragg, had previously been ordered from the right to reinforce our left, and arrived at a most opportune moment. That regiment, and a portion of the 1st Illinois, under Colonel Hardin, gallantly drove the enemy, and recovered a portion of the ground we had lost. The batteries of Capts. Sherman and Bragg were in position on the plateau and did much execution, not only in front, but particularly upon the masses which had gained our rear. Discovering that the enemy was heavily pressing upon the Mississippi regiment, the 3rd Indiana regiment, under Col. Lane, was dispatched to strengthen that part of our line, which formed a crotchet perpendicular to the first line of battle. At the same time Lieut. Kilburn, with a piece of Capt. Bragg's battery, was directed to support the infantry they're engaged. The action was for a long time warmly sustained at the point-the enemy making several efforts both with infantry and cavalry against our line, and being always repulsed with heavy loss. I had placed all the regular cavalry and Capt. Pike's squadron of Arkansas horse under the orders of Bt. Lieut. Col. May, with directions to hold in check the enemy's column, still advancing to the rear along the base of the mountain, which was done in conjunction with the Kentucky and Arkansas cavalry under Cols. Marshall and Yell. In the meantime our left which was still strongly threatened by a superior force, was further strengthened by the detachment of Capt. Bragg’s, and a portion of Capt. Sherman’s batteries, to that quarter. The concentration of artillery fire upon the masses of the enemy along the base of the mountain, and the determined resistance offered by the two regiments opposed to them, had created confusion in their rank, and some of the corps attempted to effect a retreat upon their main line of battle. The squadron of the 1st dragoons under Lieut. Rucker, was now ordered up the deep ravine which these retreating corps were endeavoring to cross in order to charge and disperse them.
The squadron proceeded to the point indicated, but could not accomplish the object, being exposed to a heavy fire from a battery established to cover the retreat of those corps. While the squadron was detached on this service, a large body of the enemy was observed to concentrate on our extreme left, apparently with the view of making a descent upon the hacienda of Buena Vista, which our train and baggage were deposited. Lieut. Col. May was ordered to the support of that point, with two pieces of Capt. Sherman’s battery under Lieut. Reynolds. In the meantime the scattered forces near the hacienda, composed in part of Majors Trail and Gorman’s command, had been to some extent organized under the advice of Major Munroe, chief of artillery, with the assistance of Major Morrison, volunteer staff, and were posted to defend the position. Before our cavalry had reached the hacienda, that of the enemy had made its attack, having been handsomely met by the Kentucky and Arkansas cavalry under Cols. Marshall and Yell. The Mexican column immediately divided one portion sweeping by the deposit, where it received a destructive fire from the force which had collected there, and then gaining the mountain opposite, under a fire from Lieut. Reynolds’s section, the remaining portion regaining the base of the mountain on our left. In the charge at Buena Vista, Col. Yell fell gallantly at the head of his regiment; we also lost Adj’t Vaughan, of the Kentucky cavalry—a young officer of much promise. Lieut. Col. May, who had been rejoined by the squadron of the 1st dragoons and by portions of the Arkansas and Indiana troops under Lieut.
Col. Roane and Maj. Gorman, now approached the base of the mountain, holding in check the right flank of the enemy, upon whose masses, crowded in the narrow gorges and ravines, our artillery was doing fearful execution.

The position of that portion of the Mexican army which had gained our rear was now very critical, and it seemed doubtful whether it could regain the main body. At this moment I received from Gen. Santa Anna a message by a staff officer, desiring to know what I wanted. I immediately dispatched Brig. Gen. Wool to the Mexican general in chief, and sent orders to cease firing. Upon reaching the Mexican lines, Gen. Wool could not cause the enemy to cease their fire, and accordingly returned without having an interview. The extreme right of the enemy continued its retreat along the base of the mountain, and finally, in spite of all our efforts, affected a union with the remainder of the army.

During the day the cavalry of Gen. Minion had ascended the elevated plain above Saltillo, and occupied the road from the city to the field of battle, where they intercepted several of our men. Approaching the tow, they were fired upon by Capt.
Webster from the redoubly occupied by his company, and then moved off towards the eastern side of the valley, and obliquely towards Buena Vista. At this time, Capt.
Shover moved rapidly forward with his piece, supported by a miscellaneous command of mounted volunteers, and fired several shots at the cavalry with great effect. They were driven into the ravines which lead to the lower valley, closely pursued by Capt. Shover, who was further supported by a piece of Captain Webster’s battery, under Lieut. Donaldson, which had advanced from the redoubt, supported by Captain Wheeler’s company of Illinois volunteers. The enemy made one or two efforts to charge the artillery, but was finally driven back in a confused mass, and did not again appear upon the plain.

In the meantime, the firing had partially ceased upon the principal field. The enemy seemed to confine his efforts to the protection of his artillery, and I had left the plateau for a moment, when he was recalled thither by a very heavy musketry fire.
On regaining that position, I discovered that our infantry (Illinois and 2nd Kentucky) had engaged a greatly superior force of the enemy—evidently his reserves—and that they had been overwhelmed by numbers. The moment was most critical. Capt.
O’Brien, with two pieces, had sustained this heavy charge to the last, and was finally obliged to leave his guns on the field—his infantry support being entirely routed—Capt.
Bragg, who had just arrived from the left, was ordered at once into battery. Without any infantry to support him, and at the imminent risk of losing his guns, this officer came rapidly into action, the Mexican line being but a few yards from the muzzle of his pieces. The first discharge of canister caused the enemy to hesitate, the second and third drove him back in disorder, and saved the day. The 2nd Kentucky regiment which had advanced beyond supporting distance in this affair, was driven back and closely pressed by the enemy’s cavalry. Taking a ravine which led in the direction of Capt. Washington’s battery, their pursuers become exposed to his fire, which soon checked and drove them back with loss. In the men time the rest of our artillery had taken position on the plateau, covered by the Mississippi and 3rd Indiana regiments, the former of which had reached the ground in time to pour a fire into the right flank of the enemy, and thus contribute to his repulse. In this last conflict we had the misfortune to sustain a very heavy loss. Colonel Hardin, 1st Illinois, and colonel Mckee, and lieut. Col. Clay, 2nd Kentucky regiments, fell at this time, while gallantly heading their commands.

No further attempt was made by the enemy to force our position, and the approach of night gave an opportunity to pay proper attention to the wounded, and also to refresh the soldiers, who had been exhausted by incessant watchfulness and combat. Compelled for the most part to bivouac without fires, expecting that morning would renew the conflict. During the night the wounded were removed to Saltillo, and every preparation made to receive the enemy should he again attack our position. Seven fresh companies were drawn from the town, and march from the Rinconada, with a reinforcement of Kentucky cavalry and four heavy guns, under Capt. Prentiss, 1st artillery, was near at hand, when it was discovered that the enemy had abandoned his position during the night. Our scouts soon ascertained that the disparity of numbers, and the exhaustion of our troops, rendered it inexpedient and hazardous to attempt pursuit. A staff officer was dispatched to General Santa Anna to negotiate an exchange of prisoners, which was satisfactorily completed on the following day. Our own dead were collected and buried, and the Mexican wounded, of which a large number had been left upon the field, were removed to Saltillo, and rendered as comfortable as circumstances would permit.

On the evening of the 26th, a close reconnaissance was made of the enemy’s position, which was found to be occupied only by a small body of cavalry, the infantry and artillery having retreated in the direction of San Luis Potosi. On the 27th, our troops resumed their former camp at Agua Nueva, the enemy’s rear guard evacuating the place as we approached, leaving a considerable number of wounded. It was my purpose to beat up his quarters in Encarnacion early the next morning, but upon examination, the week condition of the cavalry horses rendered it unavailing to attempt so long a march without water. A command was finally dispatched to Encarnacion, on the 1st of March, Under Colonel Belknap. Some two hundred wounded, and about sixty Mexican soldiers were found there, the army having passed on in the direction of Matehuala, with greatly reduced numbers, and suffering much from hunger. The dead and dying were strewn upon the road and crowded the buildings of the hacienda.

The American force engaged in the action of Buena Vista, is shown, by the accompanying field report, to have been 334 officers, and 4,425 men, exclusive of the small command left in and near Saltillo. Of this number, two squadrons of cavalry, and three batteries of light artillery, making nor more than 453 men, composed of the only force of regular troops. The strength of the Mexican army is stated by Gen. Santa Anna, in his summons, to be 20,000, and that estimate is confirmed by all the information since obtained. Our loss is 267 killed, 456 sounded, and 23 missing. Of the numerous wounded, may did not required removal to the hospital, and it is hoped that a comparatively small number will be permanently disabled. The Mexican loss in killed and wounded may be fairly estimated at 1,500, and will probably reach 2,000. At least 500 of their killed were left upon the field of battle. We have no means of ascertaining the number of deserters and dispersed men from the ranks, but it is known to be very great.

Our loss has been especially severe in officers, 28 having been killed upon the field. We have to lament the death of Captain George Lincoln, assistant adjutant general, serving on the staff of General Wool—a young officer of high bearing and approved gallantry, who fell early in the action. No loss falls more heavily upon the army in the field than that of Cols. Hardin and McKee and L. Col. Clay. Possessing in a remarkable degree the confidence of their commands, and the last two having enjoyed the advantage of a military education, I had looked particularly to them for support in case we met the enemy. I need not say that their zeal in engaging the enemy, and the cool and steadfast courage with which they maintained their positions during the day, fully realized my hopes, and caused me to feel yet more sensibly their untimely loss.

I perform a grateful duty in bringing to the notice of the government the general good conduct of the troops. Exposed for successive nights without fires, to the severity of the weather, they were ever prompt and cheerful in the discharge of every duty, and finally displayed conspicuous steadiness and gallantry in repulsing, at great odds, a disciplined foe. While the brilliant success achieved by their arms, releases me from the painful necessity of specifying many cases of bad conduct before the enemy, I feel an increased obligation to mention particular corps and officers, whose skills, coolness, and gallantry in trying situations, and under a continued and heavy fire, seem to merit particular notice.
To Brigadier General Wool my obligations are especially due. The high state of discipline and instruction of several of the volunteer regiments was attained under his command; and to his vigilance and arduous services before the action, and his gallantry and activity on the field, a large share of our success may justly be attributed. During most of the engagement, he was in immediate command of the troops thrown back on our left flank. I beg leave to recommend him to the favorable notice of the government. Brigadier General Lane (slightly wounded) was active and zealous throughout the day, and displayed great coolness and gallantry before the enemy.

The services of the light artillery, always conspicuous, were more than usually distinguished. Moving rapidly over the roughest ground, it was always in action at the right place and the right time, and its well directed fire dealt destruction in the masses of the enemy. While I recommend to particular favor the gallant conduct and valuable services of Maj. Munroe, chief of artillery, and Captains Washington, 4th artillery, and Sherman and Bragg, 3rd artillery, commanding batteries, I deem it no more than just to mention all subaltem officers. They were nearly all detached at different times, and in very situation exhibited conspicuous skill and gallantry. Captain O’Brien, Lieutenants Brent, Whiting and Couch, 4th artillery, and Bryan, topographical engineers, (slightly wounded,) were attached to Capt. Washington’s battery. Lieuts. Thomas, Reynolds, and French, 3rd artillery, (severely wounded,) to that of Captain Sherman; and Captain Shover and Lieutenant Kilburn, 3rd artillery, to that of Captain Bragg. Captain Shover, in conjunction with Lieut. Donaldson, 1st artillery, tendered gallant and important service in repulsing the cavalry of Gen. Minion. The regular cavalry, under Lieut. Col. May, with which was associated Captain Pike’s squadron of Arkansas horse, rendered useful service in holding several points. Captain Steen, 1st dragoons, was severely wounded early in the day while gallantly endeavoring, with my authority, to rally the troops, which were falling to the rear.

The Mississippi riflemen, under Col. Davis, were highly conspicuous for their gallantry and steadiness, and sustained throughout the engagement the reputation of veteran troops. Brought into action against an immense superior force, they maintained themselves for a long time unsupported and with heavy loss, and held an important part of the field until reinforced. Col. Davis, though severely wounded, remained in the saddle until the close of the action.-His distinguished coolness and gallantly at the head of his regiment on this day entitle him to the particular notice of the government. The 3d Indiana regiment, under Col. Lane, and a fragment of the 2nd, under Col. Bowles, were associated with the Mississippi regiment during the greater portion of the day, and acquitted themselves creditably in repulsing the attempts of the enemy to break that portion of our line. The Kentucky cavalry, under Col. Marshall, rendered good service dismounted, acting as light troops on our left, and afterwards, with a portion of Arkansas regiment, in meeting and dispersing the column of cavalry at Buena Vista. The 1st and 2nd Illinois, and the 2nd Kentucky regiments, served immediately under my eye, and I hear a willing testimony to their excellent conduct throughout the day. The spirit and gallantry with which the 1st Illinois and 2nd Kentucky engaged the enemy in the morning, restored confidence to that part of the field, while the list of casualties will show how much these three regiments suffered in sustaining the heavy charge of the enemy in the afternoon. Capt. Conner’s company of Texas volunteers, attached to the 2nd Illinois regiment, fought bravely, its captain being wounded and two subalterns killed. Col. Bissell, the only surviving colonel of these regiments, merits notice for his coolness and bravery on this occasion. After the fact of the field officers of the 1st Illinois and 2nd Kentucky regiments, the command of the former devolved upon Lieut. Col. Weatherford; that of the later upon Major Fry.

Regimental commanders and others who have rendered reports, speak in general terms of the good conduct of their officers and men, and have specified many names, but the limits of this report forbid a recapitulation of them here. I may, however, mention Lieuts. Rucker, and Campbell, of the dragoons, and Captain Pike, Arkansas cavalry, commanding [illegible]

Major Bradford, Captain Sharpe, (severely wounded), and Adjutant Griffith, Mississippi regiment; Lieut. Col. Robinson, A. D. C. to General Lane; Lieut. Colonel Weatherford, 1st Illinois regiment, Lieut. Colonel Morrison, Major Trail, and Adjutant Whiteside, (severely wounded), 2nd regiment and Major Fry, 2nd Kentucky regiment, as being favorably noticed for gallantry and good conduct. Major McCulloch, quartermaster in volunteer service, rendered. [MSM]
Gen. Kearney had scarcely left New Mexico for California, when rumors of a revolution began to be spoken among the Mexican inhabitants.

On the 14th of January, Governor Bent left this place to attend to private business at Taos. On the 20th, information was brought to Colonel Price, by an Indian, living six miles from town, that Governor Bent, and several other Americans, had been murdered at Taos—that an insurrection was in progress—that the people of Taos and the Pueblo Indians near, were coming in great numbers towards Santa Fe, compelling all on the road to join them, if they would not do so willingly, and that the object was to possess themselves of all the property, public and private, in Santa Fe, and destroy the Americans who had been represented as few in number.

As soon as Colonel Price received report of the murders at Taos, he issued an order for Major Edmonson, of the volunteers, and Captain Burgwin, of the United States dragoons, both stationed near Albuquerque, to repair with their respective commands to Santa Fe; he directed Captain Burgwin to follow him with one company of dragoons on the road to Taos, and at 11 A.M., on the 23d, the colonel, with three hundred volunteers and four 12 pound howitzers, with twenty men from Captain Fischer's company, under Lieutenant Dyer, (ordnance,) and Lieut. Hassendueble, marched in the direction of that place, with a view to meet the enemy as near the mountain as possible, to prevent the inhabitants in the valley of the Del Norte from forming a junction with them.

January 24—Started early, and after marching twelve miles met the enemy, from fifteen hundred to two thousand strong, on the bottom of the Del Norte, near the mouth of a creek which was nearly surrounded by high, sharp hills, from one to two hundred feet high; they were crests, having no level ground on the top, but falling directly back with a steep declivity. Beyond this to a snowy mountain, distant one mile, was a very rough country, broken into conical hills and deep ravines. The enemy, on our approach fled to the top of the hills, and commenced firing on us at 3 P.M. As soon as the howitzers could be brought into line on the plain, the colonel ordered Lieut. Dyer, assisted by Lieut. Hassendueble, of Captain Fischer's company, to open his fire of shells upon the enemy, which order was promptly obeyed, but not with the success we could have wished, for when the guns were elevated sufficiently to reach the top of these crests, the shells would pass within a few feet of the enemy and fly many hundred yards beyond them into the opposite valley, the enemy dropping flat at every flash, behind the sharp points of the hills. At this time it was discovered that they were outflanking us on each side, and that the wagon train, one mile in the rear, was in great danger, indeed, it was evident that this was their object, as well as to prevent us from running away, supposing, from their great superiority in numbers, we could not escape them. At this period of the battle, Col. Price ordered Capt. St. Vrain with his 60 mounted volunteers, citizens of Santa Fe and mounted men to go back and bring up the train. This he did as speedily as possible, under a sharp fire from the enemy from the sand hills and some houses. As Capt. St. Vrain approached the creek on his return, he discovered a number of the enemy outflanking us on the right; he charged upon them and killed the two; after which he returned to the main body of the army.

The Mexicans and Indians, emboldened by their same position, came down the hill on our left, and occupied a house and orchard on the edge of the plain, firing with great accuracy at the artillery men. The colonel then ordered Lieut. Dyer to move his battery within one hundred and ninety yards of the house and adobe wall, behind which the enemy were posted, and to drive them from their position. This was done by firing about twenty shells through the wall and house; but not until six artillery men were severely wounded. The enemy then joined their companions on the hills. There was another house near the foot of the hill, three hundred yards to the right of the one just mentioned, which was supposed to contain enemies. Captain Angney, a company of infantry volunteers, was ordered to charge it. He did so promptly, and had one man mortally wounded from the hill; but no one was in the house. He cut openings through the walls, left a detachment of his company, and returned with the remainder to the main body. Finding that the enemy could not be subdued at the distance we were fighting, Col. P. ordered a charge, leaving a reserve on the plain, to fire on the enemy as long as they could do so with safety to our own troops. Capt. Angney, supported by K company, Lieut. White, with two companies of infantry volunteers, charged most gallantly up the steepest part of the hill in front; Capt St. Vrain, with his mounted Santa Fe volunteers on his right, up a more gentle slope; and the artillery was ordered to occupy the hill on the left, where the ascent was more easy. All these positions were occupied in a few minutes, and the enemy put flight. They ran in every direction over the broken ground spoken of before; but the troops where so much exhausted by the charge that pursuit was impossible: but they were fired on continually from the smaller arms and howitzers, and considerable execution was done. Lieutenant Irwin, A company infantry volunteers, was severely wounded through the leg, and one private killed, and two of the enemy were bayoneted on the hill. It was now near night, and the colonel ordered the troops to take possession of the town, Canada, which was done without any resistance, the men being with the enemy, except the priest – the women having fled.

It is impossible to say how many were killed in this fight; the battle ground was more than one mile in extent, and few saw the whole number, some make it twenty six, others twenty – the latter number probably correct. Among the slain was their general, Tyrphoya. Colonel Price was struck by a ball in the early part of the action: but his sword belt probably saved his life, and his wound was only a severe contusion.

January 28 – As we were about to march, heard of the battle of Moro town, in which Capt. Henly, of the volunteers, was killed; and the previous murder of Prewit, Waldo, Culver and several other Americans at that place – in all seven. Marched to Securo, and encamped. Captain Burgwin, with his company, having marched all night, joined us with the 6 pounder. At this point, Captain Burgwin, with his company of dragoons, and Capt. St. Vrain's company of volunteers, and company K volunteers, were sent forward to El Emboda, on the near route to Taos, to attack a small party of the enemy, said to be about 60, with orders to join the main body at Tampus the next night; the colonel having determined to accompany the wagons and cannon which were compelled to take a more circuitous route on account of difficulties in the mountain. Captain Burgwin had proceeded only about four miles when he met the enemy in great force, instead of sixty as had been represented. A severe battle ensued; the firing was distinctly heard by us, and Colonel Price sent forward Captain Slack's company to reinforce Capt. B.

30th – Pursued our march through the mountain, which was covered with snow. The labor of getting the wagons and cannon along this day was very severe on men and mules as the road was rough and precipitous. Encamped in the mountain – weather very cold. 31st – Continued our march, and fatigued reached Tampus at 12 M., where we met Captain Burgwin's command. They killed 20 of the enemy the previous day, and drove them towards Taos. – Captain B had one man killed and one severely wounded. Marched three miles further and encamped at Chamaral.

February 1 – Marched 8 miles through deep snow, and encamped on the top of a high mountain; weather very cold, snowed on us all night. 2d – Continued our march; many of the men's feet were badly frozen; reached the first town in the valley of Taos at night. The town had been abandoned, and we fared well enough, as there was an abundance of pigs, poultry, corn & c.

Feb. 4 – Marched four miles to Fernando, where Governor Bunt and other Americans had been murdered, and thence to Pueblo de Taos, distant two miles. On our approach the Indians and Mexicans shouted so loud that we heard them at a mile distant, and as we came near the town, they used all sorts of abusive epithets towards us, thinking themselves safe in their strong place. The troops were soon brought into line, and a heavy cannonading was opened upon them, with discharges of small arms – this was continued till all the ammunition for the cannon was exhausted, the ammunition wagon having been left miles in the rear. Night was now close upon us, and the colonel ordered the troops to return to Fernando, to prepare for a renewal of the attack the next morning.

Feb 5 – We were again before the town soon after sunrise. The six pounder in charge of Lieut. Welser, 1st dragoon, and two howitzers, all under Lieut. Dyer, Ordnance, with a portion of the volunteers, were placed in position on the side of the town, and the two other howitzers, in charge of Lieut. Hassendeubel, with Captain Burgwin's company of dragoons, and one company of volunteers, took position on another side, so as to make a crossfire. The action now commenced at three hundred yards distance, and continued cannonading was kept up with shells and grape shot from the howitzers, and solid shot from the six pounders, till 11 A.M., with occasional tires from our sharp-shooters, as chances offered – by which means the enemy were driven from the streets and plaza and had ceased their yelling.

At this time the colonel ordered a charge from each side. This charge was made promptly and vigorously, but unfortunately, Captain Burgwin's company of dragoons, with Captain McMillen's company of mounted volunteers, reached the church door before the other party came up; the consequence was, that the intended diversion was not effected, and Captain Burgwin's command received the full shock of the enemy's fire, for a time. Captain B had five dragoons killed, and nineteen severely wounded, several of whom soon died – among them, Captain Burgwin. Captain McMillen had six severely wounded. So destructive was the cross firing on these two companies, that they were compelled to retire behind the adobe wall which surrounds the town, and which ran a few feet from the church. The whole soon came up, and breaking down the wall, placed themselves close under the walls of the church, and commenced cutting an opening into it with an axe. Still they were being shot from the top of the church, from its interior, through loop holes, and from other buildings which commanded it. As we had only axes to work with, our progress was slow; but while it was progressing, a temporary ladder was put up, and the top of the church was soon cleared. Howitzer shells were lighted and thrown into the opening which the Indians had made – these exploded beautifully, and no doubt did good execution; but still they would shoot a man if he presented himself at the holes. Fire was communicated to the roof, but being flat and covered with earth, it burned slowly. The wall had been cut only about one foot deep, and as it now appeared that the town must be taken house by house, and for that purpose it was all important to get possession of the church that night, which was close on us.

Colonel Price ordered Lieutenant Dyer (he ought to be a Captain) to bring up the six pounder within a few yards of the building, and with solid shot to make a break, where the men had been cutting with axes. This was a hazardous duty, as he and his men were dead marks for the enemy, but the other was promptly obeyed – the breach was made, and after throwing in a charge of canister and lighted shell, the troops rushed in. The Indians who had not been killed, fled; the front door was broken open from the inside, and we had possession of the church but it was so full of smoke that it could not be occupied. The colonel had taken precaution to place Captain St. Vrain’s company of Santa Fe mounted men, and Captain Slack’s company of mounted volunteers, in rear of town, and between it and the mountain, supposing that when the charge was made many would attempt to escape. Such proved to be the case; the Mexicans all fled, and left the Indians to fight it out. These two companies killed fifty-five. We soon gained possession of two or three houses near the church, but beyond them, one hundred yards distant, stood two immense buildings, seven stories high, each story receding; and the opening to the room was from the roof down – Lieutenant Hassendeuble, of the artillery, has promised me a plan of them, which I will send you, if I can get it in time, for without this you can scarcely form an idea of their great size and strength. – Into these Indians all fled, and the colonel being convinced that they could not be taken without a heavier gun, sent an express to Santa Fe for one of the 24 pounders howitzers, and a supply of ammunition. We slept soundly that night, but were awaked early by the discharge of fire arms, which proved to be a sentinel firing on an Indian who was endeavoring to make his escape. He killed him after two discharges.

Early in the morning, (February 5th) the women came in crowds to the colonel, on their knees, with white flags, crosses, &c., begging for mercy; and very soon the men followed them. The colonel, thinking that the slaughter had been sufficiently great, listened to their supplications, and granted them peace on condition that they would bring him Tomas, one of the leaders that had fled. This was subsequently done. Much of the property stolen from the American citizens at Fernando, who had been murdered by them, was brought forward and restored to the relatives of the owners, and after solemn promises of good conduct in the future, and sundry hugs and leave taking we returned to Fernando. February 6th – Montoya, the ringleader has been delivered to Col. Price, by some friendly Mexicans, residing a few miles off. He was tried by court martial to-day, and condemned to be hung. 7th – Montoya was executed at 1 P.M. He acknowledged his crimes, and asked pardon of the "Mexicans, the Americans, and God." 9th – Commenced our homeward march, and arrived in Santa Fe on the 11th. The campaign of nineteen days was made without tents, and two of the nights were spent in a high mountain, covered with snow from one to two feet deep, and all without one word of complaint. Missouri may well be proud of her sons, for every man did his duty. As for the United States dragoons, under Capt. Burgwin, their killed and wounded will show where they were in fight. Col. Price displayed the finest qualities of a soldier, and all seemed to court danger where duty called them. Killed of the enemy, from two to three hundred. The Indians acknowledged 175 at the Pueblo – no wounded seen. Capt. Burgwin died of his wound on the 8th, and his remains, with those of Governor Bent, and Mr. Leal, district attorney, where brought to this place and interred with appropriate honors, on the 13th instant. I think that all will now be convinced that New Mexico cannot be held without a strong military force; and for the sake of the Americans residing in this territory, and of its interest generally, I hope the government will not be slow to furnish soldiers to replace those whose term of service will soon expire. Colonel Price received a letter from Lieutenant Colonel Mitchell last night dated at "El Passo,"

Feb 1. He with Colonel Domphan’s regiment and Major Clark’s artillery, were about to start for Chihuahua. No news at that time of General Wool’s having arrived at that place, and rumor said the Mexicans had five thousand soldiers to defend the place. Battle at Moro Town – As soon as Colonel Price received the first intimation of the murder at Taos of Governor Bent and others, and of the disaffection at St. Miguel, he sent an order to Captain Hently, who had been stationed in that neighborhood, as well to take charge of grazing parties as to protect Captain Murphy, who was expected soon to be there with money from St. Louis – to collect all his forces, and to put down any attempt at a revolution, and give convoy to Capt. Murphy. Hearing of the murders at Moro town, he repaired immediately to that place – a battle ended in which he killed several of the enemy and took fifteen prisoners, who are now in the calaboose, at this place, and was himself slain in storming a fort. As soon as Colonel Willock, who commanded at Santa Fe – Colonel Price being absent – heard of Captain Henly, he sent Captain Morin, of Platte county to command at Moro town; he destroyed it entirely, and I am sorry to add, a large quantity of grain, which was very much needed here. He made the inhabitants feel the horrors of war, but unfortunately, we must come in for a share of it, by the destruction of the wheat and corn. [MSM]
Leaving Lieut. Col. Willock in command of this post, on the 23d of January I marched from this place at the head of companies D, Captain McMillin, K, Captain Williams, L, Captain Slack, M, Captain Halley, and N, Captain Barber, of the 2d regiment Missouri mounted volunteers, Captain Angney's battalion of infantry and a company of Santa Fe volunteers, commanded by Captain St. Vrain. I also took with me four mounted howitzers, which I placed under the command of Lieutenant A. B. Dyer, of the ordnance. My whole force compose three hundred and fifty three rank and file, and, with the exception of Captain St. Vrain's company, were all dismounted. On the march Captain Williams was taken sick, and the command of company K devolved upon Lieutenant B. F. White. On the 24th of January, at half past 1, P. M., our advance (Captain St. Vrain's company) discovered the enemy in considerable forces near the town of Canada, their position at that time being in the valley bordering the Rio del Norte. Preparations were immediately made by me to attack them; and it became necessary for the troops to march more rapidly than the ammunition and provision wagons could travel, in order to prevent the escape of the enemy or to frustrate them in any attempt they might make to occupy commanding positions. As I entered the valley, I discovered them beyond the creek on which the town is situated, and in full possession of the heights commanding the road to Canada, and of three strong houses at the base of the hills. My line of battle was immediately formed — the artillery, consisting of four 12 pounder mountain howitzers, being thrown forward on the left flank and beyond the creek, the dismounted men occupying a position where they would be, in some degree, protected by the high bluff bank of the stream from the fire of the enemy, until the wagon train could be brought up. The artillery opened the houses occupied by the enemy, and on the more distant height, on which alone the guns could be brought to bear. The enemy discovering the wagons to be more than a mile in the rear, sent a large party to cut them off; and it became necessary to detach Captain St. Vrain’s company for their protection. This service was rendered in the most satisfactory manner. So soon as the wagon train had been brought up, I ordered Captain Angney to charge with his battalion of infantry, and dislodge the enemy from the house opposite the right flank, and from which a warm fire was being poured on us. This was done in the most gallant manner. A charge was then ordered to be made upon all the points occupied by the enemy in force. Captain Angney, with his command, supported by Lieutenant White’s company, charged up one hill, while Captain St. Vrain’s company turned the same, in order to cut off the enemy, when in retreat. The artillery, supported by Captains McMillen, Barber and Slack, with their respective companies, at the same time took possession of some houses (enclosed by a strong corral densely wooded with fruit trees, from which a brisk fire was kept up by the enemy) and of the heights beyond them. — Captain Halley’s company was ordered to support Captain Angney. In a few minutes my troops had dislodged the enemy at all points, and they were flying in every direction. The nature of the ground rendered pursuit hopeless; and it being near night, I ordered the troops to take up quarters in the town. The number of the enemy was about fifteen hundred. Lieutenant Irvine was wounded. In the charge my loss was two killed and six wounded. — Of the killed, one was a teamster, who volunteered in Captain Angney’s company. The loss of the enemy was thirty six killed; wounded not ascertained. The next morning the enemy showed themselves in some force (I think no less than four hundred) on the distant heights. Leaving a strong guard in the town, I marched in pursuit of them; but they were so shy, and retreated so rapidly, that, finding it impossible to get near them, I returned to town.

While at Canada, the number of the horses belonging to Captain Slack’s company were brought in by Lieut. Holcomb.

On the 27th, I advanced up the Rio del Norte as far as Luceros, where, early on the 28th, I was joined by Captain Burgwin, commanding company G, 1st dragoons, and company A 2nd regiment. — Missouri mounted volunteers, commanded by Lieut. Boone. — Captain Burgwin’s command was dismounted, and great credit is due to him and his officers and men for the rapidity with which a march so long and so arduous was performed. At the same time Lieut. Wilson, 1st dragoons, who had volunteered his services, came up with a G pounder, which had been sent for from Canada.

My whole forces now comprised 479, rank and file. On the 29th I marched to La Joya, where I learned that a party of sixty or eighty of the enemy had posted themselves on the steep slopes of the mountains which rise on each side of the cannon, or gorge, which leads to Embudo. Finding the road by Embudo impracticable for artillery or wagons, I detached Captain Burgwin in that direction, with his own company of dragoons and the companies commanded by Captain St. Vrain and Lieut. White. This detachment comprised 180 rank and file.

By my permission, Adjutant R. Walker, 2d regiment Missouri mounted volunteers, accompanied Capt. Burgwin. Lieut. Wilson, 1st dragoons, also volunteered his services as a private in Captain St. Vrain's company.

Captain Burgwin, pushing forward, discovered the enemy, to the number of between six and seven hundred posted on the side of the mountains, just where the gorge becomes so contracted as scarcely to admit of the passage of three men marching abreast.

The rapid slopes of the mountains rendered the enemy's position very strong, and its strength was increased by the dense masses of cedar and large fragments of rock which everywhere offered shelter. The action was commenced by Capt. St. Vrain, who, dismounting his men, ascended the mountain on the left doing much execution. Flanking parties were thrown out on either side, commanded respectively by Lieut. White, 2d regiment Missouri mounted volunteers, and by Lieutenants Mellvaine and Taylor, 1st dragoons. These parties ascended the hill rapidly, an the enemy soon began to retire in the direction of Embudo, bounding along the steep and rugged sides of the mountains with a speed that defied pursuit. The firing at the pass of Embudo had been heard at La Joya, and Captain Slack, with twenty – five mounted men had been immediately dispatched thither. He now arrived, and rendered excellent service by relieving Lieutenant White whose men were much fatigued. Lieutenants Mellvaine and Taylor were also recalled; and Lieutenant Ingalls was directed to lead a flanking party on the right slope, while Captain Slack performed the same duty on the left. The enemy having by this time retreated beyond our reach, Captain Burgwin marched through the defile and debouched into the open valley in which Embudo is situated, recalled the flanking parties, and entered that town without opposition, several persons meeting him with a white flag.

Our loss in this action was one man killed, and one severely wounded, both belonging to Captain St. Vrain's company. The loss of the enemy was about twenty killed and sixty wounded.

Thus ended the battle of the pass of Embudo. On the 30th, Captain Burgwin marched to Trampas, where he was directed to await the arrival of the main body, which, on account of the artillery and wagons, was forced to pursue a more southern route. On the 31st I reached Trampas; and being joined by Captain Burgwin, marched on Chamasil with the whole command. On the 1st of February we reached the summit of the Taos mountain, which was covered with snow to the depth of two feet; and on the 2d, quartered at a small village called Rio Choito, in the entrance of the valley of Taos. The march of the 1st and 2d were through deep snow. – Many of the men were frost bitten, and all were very much jaded with the exertions necessary to travel over unbeaten roads, being marched in front of the artillery and wagons in order to break a road through the snow. The constancy and patience with which the troops bore these hardships, deserve all commendation, and cannot be excelled by the most veteran soldiers. On the 3d, I marched through Don Fernando de Taos, and finding that the enemy had fortified themselves in the Pueblo de Taos, proceeded to that place. I found it a place of great strength, being surrounded by adobe walls and strong pickets. – Within the enclosure, and nears the northern and southern walls, arose two large buildings of irregular pyramidal form, to the height of seven or eight stories. Each of these buildings was capable of sheltering five or six hundred men. Besides these, there were many smaller buildings, and the large church of the town was situated in the northwestern angle, a small passage being left between it and the outer wall. The exterior wall and all the enclosed buildings were pierced for rifles. The town was admirably calculated for defense, every point of the exterior walls and pickets being flanked by some projecting building, as will be seen from the enclosed drawing.

After having reconnoitred the town, I selected the western flank of the church as the point of attack; and about 2 o'clock P. M. Lieutenant Dyer was ordered to open his battery at the distance of about 250 yards. A fire was kept up by the 6 pounder and the howitzers for about two hours and a half, when, as the ammunition wagon had not yet come up, an the troops were suffering from cold and fatigue, I returned to Don Fernando. Early on the morning of the 4th I again advanced upon Pueblo. Posting the dragoons under Captain Burgwin about 260 yards from the western flank of the church, I ordered the mounted men under Captains St. Vrain and Slack might attempt to escape towards the mountains, or in the direction of Don Fernando. – Te residue of the troops took ground about 300 yards from the northern wall. Here, too, Lieut. Dyer established himself with the six pounder and two howitzers, while Lieutenant Hassandaubel, of Major Clarke's battalion light artillery, remained with Captain Burgwin, in command of two howitzers. By this arrangement a cross fire was obtained, sweeping the front and eastern flank of the church.

All these arrangements having been made, the batteries opened upon the town at 9 o'clock, A.M. At 11 o'clock, finding it impossible to breach the walls of the church with the six pounder and howitzers I determined to storm that building, at a signal Captain Burgwin, (1st regiment United States dragoons) at the head of his own company, and that of Captain McMillin, (of the volunteers) charged the western flank of the church, while Captain Angney, infantry battalion, and Captain barber, and Lieutenant Boon, 2d regiment Missouri mounted volunteers, charged the northern wall. As soon as the troops above mentioned had established themselves under the western wall of the church, axes were used in the attempt to breach it; and a temporary ladder having been made, the roof was fired. – About this time Captain Burgwin, at the head of a small party, left the cover afforded by the flank of the church, and penetrating into the corral in front of that building, endeavored to force the door. In this exposed situation, Captain Burgwin received a severe wound which deprived me of his valuable services, and of which he died on the 7th instant. – Lieutenants McIlvaine, 1st United States dragoons, and Royall and Lackland, 2d regiment mounted volunteers, accompanied Captain Burgwin into the corral; but the attempt on the church door prove fruitless, and they were compelled to retire behind the wall. In the mean time small hole had been cut into the western wall, and shells were thrown in by hand, doing good execution. The six pounder was now brought around by Lieutenant Wilson, who at the distance of two hundred yards poured a heavy fire of grape into the town. The enemy during all this time kept up a destructive fire upon our troops.

About half past three o'clock the six pounder was run up within sixty yards of the church, and after ten rounds, one of the holes which had been cut with the axes was widened into a practicable breach. The gun was now run up within ten yards of the wall, a shell was thrown in, and three rounds of grape were poured into the breach. The storming party – among whom were Lieutenant Dyer, of the ordnance, and Lieutenants Wilson and Taylor 1st dragoons—entered and took possession of the church without opposition. The interior was filled with dense smoke, but for which circumstance our storming party would have suffered great loss. A few of the enemy were seen in the gallery, where an open door admitted the air, but they retired without firing a gun. The troops left to support the battery on the north were now ordered to change on that side: --The enemy abandoned the western part of the town. Many took refuge in the large houses of the east, while others endeavored to escape towards the mountains. These latter were pursued by the mounted men under Captains Slack and St. Vrain, who killed fifty one of them, only two or three men escaping. It was now night, and our troops were quietly quartered in the houses which the enemy had abandoned. On the next morning the enemy sued for peace, and thinking the severe loss the have sustained would prove a salutary lesson, I granted their supplication on the condition that they should deliver up to me Thomas, one of their principal men who had instigated and been actively engaged in the murder of Governor Bent and others. The number of the enemy at the battle of Pueblo de Taos was between six and seven hundred. Of these about one hundred and fifty were killed – wounded not known. Our own loss was seven killed and forty five wounded. Many of the wounded have since died.

The principal leaders in this insurrection were Tafoya, Pablo Chavis, Pablo Montoya, Cortz, and Tomas, a Pueblo Indian. Of these, Tafoya was killed at Canada, Chavis was killed at Pueblo, Montoya was hanged at Don Fernando on the 7th instant, and Tomas was shot by a private while in the guard room at the latter town. Cortez is still at large. – This person was at the head of the rebels in the valley of the Mora. For the operation in that quarter, I refer to the sub adjoined letters from Captains Henley, separate battalion Missouri mounted volunteers, and Murphy, of the infantry, and Lieut. McKamey, 2d regiment Missouri mounted volunteers. In the battles of Canada, Embudo, and Pueblo de Taos, the officers and men behaved admirably. – Where a; conducted themselves gallantly I consider it improper to distinguish individuals, as such discrimination might operate prejudicially against the just claims of others.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your ob’t serv’t,
STERLING PRICE,
Colonel commanding the army in New Mexico

The Adjutant General of the Army, Washington.

From the correspondence of the N. Orleans Delta.

March 22.-At 10 o'clock to-day a white flat was sent into the city. The bearer of it conveyed a message from Major General Scott, addressed to Gov. Morales, commander of the Mexican forces. The message was a formal summons to surrender the city of Vera Cruz without further defence, as the general-in-chief of the American forces desired to avoid any further bloodshed. Gov. Morales replied in a very dignified tone and style of language, in substance, that he was sorry to be the cause of unnecessary bloodshed and loss of life, but that he had a high and important duty to perform, involving the honor of his army and the interest of his country, and that he would not surrender until he had exhausted every means of defence.

The Mexicans, during the forenoon, set fire to several buildings, and cleared away the masks to some batteries they had not hitherto exposed, notwithstanding they have kept up a constant fire on our entrenchments during the process of preparation from the Castle, For Santiago, and a bastion front in the rear of the city.

The conferences between the belligerent forces having concluded at 2 o'clock, at 4 the American battery, consisting of only seven mortars, commenced the bombardment of the city. The shells fell into the place after the first fires, and exploded with as much precision as could have been desired. The city, from one end to the other, soon became enveloped in a cloud of smoke—the vivid and lurid flashes of the artillery, from their city batteries, breaking through it at brief intervals, and report after report followed each in quick succession, until after the dusk of evening had passed, when they comparatively ceased. The round shot and shell tell heavy and fast as the entrenchments behind which our batteries were planted.

As soon as Com. Perry perceived the land forces engaged, her ordered Capt. Tatnall, with what is called the "Mosquito Fleet," consisting of the steamers Spitfire and Vixen, and five gunboats, viz: Reefer, Bonita, Tampico, Falcon, nd Petrel, to attack. Capt. Tatnall inquired at what point he should engage. Com. Perry emphatically replied, "Wherever you can do the most execution, sir." Accordingly the little fleet took position under a point of land known as the "Linmekiln," about a mile from the city, where they were protected from a point blank shot of the castle. As soon as they got their position in line they opened a fire of round shot and shell at a rapid rate, and threw them "handsomely" into the town and Fort Santiago.

The castle soon paid its respects to Capt. Tatnall, and the powerful engines of havoc and destruction were now in full blast from every quarter, hurling their dreadful and deadly missiles into each other's ranks in rapid succession, which they kept up until about dark, when the Mexican batteries comparatively ceased, and the "Mosquito Fleet" also held off for the night.

At eight o'clock the party that were in the trenches were relieved by another detail. The troops who returned from the entrenchments were literally covered with smoke and dust, and so much disfigured that they could not be recognized except by their voices. Shell after shell exploded in their midst, and shot after shot threw barrels of earth from the embankments over their heads as they lay in the trenches. Their escape seems to have been miraculous indeed, and every person is surprised that at least one half of their number were not slain.

March 23-A norther sprung up this morning, which has been blowing tortuously all day, filling the air and covering every body with sand. The Mexican batteries have been quiet, with the exception of a few shots about midnight, when they opened a sharp fire for a short time. Our mortars have not ceased during the night, but continued to pour into the city a constant stream of fire. At one time I saw as many as six shells in the air, the whole of which exploded in the city about the same time with a terricec and deadly effect.

Just as daylight was approaching, Captain Tatnall's Mosquito Fleet weighed anchor, and, under cover of a moon somewhat clouded, approached within 600 yards of the castle. As soon as they had got their respective positions, they opened a broadside from the fleet, which was answered by the castle with great spirit, both by round shot and shells. Capt. T. continued the engagement for about half an hour, although the signal from the commodore's ship, calling him off had been hoisted for some time, but I suppose was not seen on account of a cloud of smoke which hung around the shipping.

This attack of Capt. T. on the castle is considered one of the most daring feats that has been attempted since the commencement of the hostilities.
During the whole of to-day Gen. Patterson, in conjunction with the navy, has been making the most extraordinary exertions to finish an entrenchment to plant a marine battery, consisting of three 68's and two long 32's, when have been landed during the course of the day from on board different vessels of war.

The officers and sailors have heretofore borne the brunt of all the labor in landing the arms and munitions of war belonging to the army, and have applied themselves to it with an energy that certainly entitles them to great credit; but now that they had an opportunity of participating in that part of the expedition where honors are to be won and laurels gathered they exerted themselves with an almost superhuman effort. About two hundred volunteers and sailors were attached to each piece of ordinance, which was by them conveyed over sand-hills and hollows hold knee deep in sand, and through a lagoon about two feet deep and seventy yards wide, with a soft bottom. They were all placed in protection, about three miles from where they landed, during the night. The sailors and the volunteers worked admirable together.

During the early part of last evening the town was lighted up by a building on fire, which was ignited by the bomb-shells. It was impossible to tell what building it was, but it was supposed by the engineers to be the barracks. As soon as the fire was discovered from our mortar battery, I was very much gratified to observe the cessation of our fire; for, notwithstanding we were endeavoring to destroy their town, or compel them to surrender it, with their other strongholds and fortifications, still humanity would seem to require that a temporary cessation of hostilities should take place under such circumstances. Was is terrible in its most modified form; but the besieging of a city like Vera Cruz when we know that we are battering down the houses over some fellow creatures' heads, but cannot tell whether we are destroying the soldiers-our real antagonists--or the women and children. And then to witness the burning houses lighting up the church spires and domes of the prominent buildings with the families moving about on the tops of the houses it e utmost consternation and apparent despair, cannot do otherwise than excite a feeling of commiseration.

March 24.-After the fire in town last night, our batteries again opened and continued until morning.-During the day the army guns have worked very slow, on account of a short supply of ammunition, being prevented from landing any yesterday by the norther.

Early in the day Gen. Patterson let the town hear from him. The entrenchments and guns were entirely undiscovered by the Mexicans until the "sailor lads" commenced unmasking. They soon commenced pouring into the city a severe and effective fire, until bout 4 o'clock-their position being only seven hundred yards from the wall of the town, and with such a man as to enable them to flank most of the fortifications and works from whence the enemy was firing.

The following is the size and weight of the guns, with their officer, as far as I could learn them:

Potomac-Two 32 pounders, 63 cwt, Captain Aulick and Lieut. Baldwin.
Raritan-One 32-pounder, 63 cwt., Lieut. Ingersoll.
Mississippi-One 8 inch gun, 63 cwt., Lieut. Lee.
Albany-One 8-inch gun, 63 cwt., Lieut. Perry.
St. Mary's-One 8-inch gun, 63 cwt., Lieut. Kennedy.

The navy battery set the town on fire again to-day.

The Mexicans did not fail to return Gen. Paterson's fire with great energy and rapidity, and I am sorry to say with some effect-killing 4 and woundign 6-among the latter was Lieut. Baldwin, of he Potomac.

At 4 o'clock the officers and crews from the navy were relieved by the following: Captain Mayo, Lieuts. Semems, Decamp, Franey, and Studman; Passed Midshipmen Nelson, Cazler, and Wager; Midshipmen Shubrick, Joe Smith, Magaw, and Upshur.

March 25- To day the combatants appear to be more eager on both sides, and the firing more rapid the army battery mounts eleven 10-inch mortars, four long 24's, and four Cohorns. During the morning the Mexicans concentrated their fire as much as possible upon Gen. Patterson and the navy, but the return fire through the day silenced two of their batteries, and the navy breached the walls in different places. Midshipman Shubrick the three sailors were killed and on mortally wounded.
The naval officers at Gen. Patterson's battery were relieved to-day by Capt. Breese, Lieuts. Knox, Wemford, Alder, Taylor, Purser Harris, Midshipmen Bennett, Mayo, Morris, and some others whose names I could not learn. Drs. Baxter, Nuna, and Hambleton.

To-day a white flag was sent in asking, on behalf of the people to allow them to leave the city, with their families and persons who were making no resistance. I could not learn what was the precise nature of his reply, but they did not get what they desired—they had waited a little too long. Gen. Scott was not the person to be caught by a ruse of this kind.

March 26-Last night Gov. Morales was strongly importuned by the inhabitants, who are said to be suffering severely, to surrender the town; but he was obstinate, and would not listen to their appeals. He declared he would not surrender the garrisoned works until every man was buried underneath their ruins, and not one stone left on top of another. Thereupon a meeting of the National Guard was held, an Gov. Morales was deposed, and Gen. Landero placed in command.

Our batteries worked last night, and up to 9 o'clock this morning, with apparent increased vigor, when a flag of truce was received by Gen. Scot, with a proffer on the part of the Mexicans to treat for a surrender. Accordingly, a commission on our part was appointed, consisting of Gens. Worth and Pillow, Col. Tonten. And Capt. Aulick, of the navy, who met the Mexican commission at the time kiln, on the right of our mortar battery, another one mile distant, and they continued in session during the day.

Early this morning a norther sprung up very suddenly, and blew most gloriously all day. Rude Boreas piped his shrillest whistle, and old Neptune seemed to do his best, in the general commotion by land and sea; the rifted clouds flew like sable winged messengers of death through the air; while the furious lashed ocean piled her crested waves far upon the beach. The clouds of sand swept like hail across the strand, from hill-top to the valley's depth, and almost like the famed sirocco fo Egypt, with maelstrom-force, or the sweeping blast over Zahara's desert, filled the air with darkness, and man and beast with feelings of dismay. The mariner was tempest-tossed by the quick surges of the angry deep, and fear might well blanch the cheek of the boldest.-The soldier cowered low, to escape the drifting sand that, in almost impalpable particles, penetrated even the smallest apertures; tents were lifted from their positions, and in many instances torn literally into ribands, and clothing and camp equipage were strewn in confusion for miles around.

During the prevalence of this violent gale, the steam ship Alabama went ashore, but was got off with assistance of the boat's crew of the Princeton, under Midshipman Bassett. The brig Porpoise, about ten miles at sea, was thrown on her beam ends, and compelled to throw overboard her lee guns. About thirty vessels were driven ashore opposite Sacrificios, of which the Eliza S. Lepper was got off by the boats of the Princeton.

During the whole day, amidst the prevalence of the storm, the commissioners were endeavoring to settle the terms of treaty. They adjourned at night, and gave the Mexicans until 6 o'clock of the 27th, to accept or reject. The enemy was evidently in a bad position and trying to get the best terms possible. But Gen. Scott, I think I may safely say, representing the interests of our country, and holding, as it were, the honor of our arms in his grasp, will accede to no proposition but such a one, in general terms, as he may advance. He would prefer whipping terms out of them, inch by inch, if necessary, than to yield the interest of the nation, or honor of our flag. Our banner must be planted upon the walls of the city and castle of San Juan d' Ulloa, in honor and respect by the world at large.

March 27.-This morning the Mexicans did not accede to the terms of the commissioner, and orders were given to fire again at 9 o'clock. However, about that hour the enemy solicited another meeting of the commissioners.

Gen. Patterson's battery was relieved to-day by the following officers from the navy: Capt. Forrest; Lieuts. Case, Blunt, Eld, Humphrey, Almy, Rogers, and Clairborne; Midshipmen Hunter, Renshaw, Cilley, Smith, Genet, Barbour, Carter, Jones, and Lodge.

A general impression pervades the camp to-day that the Mexicans are treating only for the purpose of repairing breaches and fixing up their destroyed fortifications; but our engineers and ordnance officers have not been behind them in this respect. During the day we have been placing our guns in better position, supplying the magazine with ammunition, and providing the army with scaling ladders and their appurtenances, ready to scale the walls and pass the breaches, if necessary to take the city by storm.

The terms, however, were agreed upon and submitted for ratification.

March 28.-Com. Perry was preparing to land another battery of ten guns from the Ohio, but the necessity was obviated by the ratification by both parties of the stipulations agreed upon by the commissioners.

The Mexicans surrendered the city of Vera Cruz and castle of San Juan d'Ulua, and the armament and munitions of war, together with their small arms. The officers retained their side-arms, and the whole surrendered as prisoners of war, and are allowed to retire into the country on their parole.

The following was issued from headquarters, which directs the manner and force to take possession of the surrendered works:

Army Headquarters,
Camp Washington, before Vera Cruz, March 28.

1. By articles of capitulation signed and exchanged, the city of Vera Cruz and the Castle of San Juan d'Ulua, with their dependencies, are to be garrisoned by the forces of the United States to-morrow at 10 o'clock A.M.

2. In the mean time no officer or man of said forces will approach either of those places nearer than our batteries Nos. 1,2,3,4,5, respectively, except by special order of permission on some matter of public duty.

3. Pending the ceremony of surrender, the whole army shall stand by its arms, each corps near its present ground, ready to advance and attack if necessary.

4. The first brigade of regulars and a volunteer brigade to be designated by Major Gen. Patterson, together with any detachment from the United States squadron under Com. Perry that he may be pleased to designate, will be present at the ceremonies of evacuating and surrendering. These forces will occupy such positions at the ceremonies as may be assigned by Brig. General Worth, detachments of whose brigade will garrison the surrendered works.

5. Until these garrisons, with their necessary guards, sentinels, and patrols, are duly established, no other person whatsoever will be allowed, except on special duty, to enter either of the surrendered places.

6. The inhabitants of Vera Cruz and their property, are placed under the safeguard of every American's honor; and any miscreant who shall do injury to any persons of property shall be promptly brought before a military commission, under general orders No. 20.

By command of Major Gen. Scott:

March 29.-The camp of the first brigade has been very active in making preparations to receive the compliments of the Mexican army and their arms, and to occupy the position which they are about to yield to the superiority of our arms and courage of our troops. The following order (No. 16) will show you the disposition of our troops in the garrison and the order of taking possession:

Headquarters First Brigade,
Camp Washington, near Vera Cruz, March 28.

1st. The brigade (except the guard of all descriptions) will be under arms at 8 A.M. tomorrow morning, canteens filled and haversacks supplied as prescribed.

2d. Lieut. Col. Duncan's light battery will take the head of the column, and be prepared to fire a salute of twenty-eight guns.

3d. One company of 2d artillery and one company of 8th infantry, under Major Wright, will occupy Fort Conception; one company of 3d artillery and one company of infantry, under Major Scott, will occupy Fort St. Jago; one company of artillery, and one company of 4th infantry, one company of 6th infantry, and one company of 8th infantry, under Lieut. Col. Belton, will occupy the Castle of San Juan d'Ulua; the remainder of the brigade, not on duty, will be marched to the Plaza.

4th. At 2 o'clock P.M. the flag of the United States will be hoisted on the several named works, and a salute of twenty-eight guns fired from each, beginning at Fort St. Jago, next Fort Conception, next San Juan d'Ulua, and, finally, from the light battery of the Plaza.

5th. Not an officer or soldier will be allowed to leave their ranks or station until further orders.

6th. During the ceremony of the surrendering of the Mexican troops not the slightest noise or cheering will be permitted. When our flags are hoisted, in addition to the batteries, they may be saluted with cheers by soldiers not under arms.

By order of Brigadier General Worth.

NNR 72.128 April 24, 1847 Gen. Zachary Taylor's letter to Gen. E.G. W. Butler of Gen. William Orlando Butler, the presidency, Buena Vista, &c

General Taylor—Another confidential letter from the old warrior, certainly not designed for publication, has found its way into public journals, too late for our space this week. It was communicated to the N. Orleans Picayune, by Gen. E. G. W. Butler, of Iberville, Louisiana, to whom it was addressed. W extract for the publication so much of it as has relation to the subject in hand—the presidential topic. After a very friendly introductory, and assigning reasons for not sooner answering his friendly letter, the publication says:

"[The general then alludes to the misrepresentations which have been made in regard to Major Gen. Butler at Monterey. Those misrepresentations had been the subject of conversation between them, and left no feeling lie distrust or unkindness towards each other in heir breasts." The letter then goes on:]

I was aware of the report as well as statements in a few of the public journals, that it was intended by certain individuals to bring Gen. Butler forward as the successor of Mr. Polk, which gave me no concern, and would not, even, had it been the case, which I did not credit and which had been forgotten. I doubt if the subject would have again crossed my mind, had it not been brought to my notice by you or someone else. I have never heard him or any of his friends allude to this matter. He (the general,) in consequence of his wound not hearing, which gave him so much pain as to render him unfit for duty, left short time since, by advice of his medical attendant, for New Orleans, where I hope he has arrived in safety, and where I truly hope he will very soon recover, so as to be able to take the field once more.

I may observe that I have been also named as a candidate for that high office by a few newspaper editors and other, which has been done without my knowledge, wishes or consent. This I have assured all who have written me on the subject; assuring them I had no aspirations for that or any civil office; that my whole energies, mental and physical, were and been absorbed I such a way as I thought best calculated to bring this war to a speedy and honorable close, believing it was for the interest of both countries the sooner it was done the better—at any rate so far as ours was concerned; and that president-making should be lost sight of until this was accomplished." NNR 72.128 April 24, 1847 ILLUMINATIONS IN HONOR OF VICTORIES

The recent victories over the Mexicans are being celebrated in numerous cities over the Union. Apalachicola, Florida, was illuminated on the evening of the 9th inst.;
Nashville, Tenn., On the 10th; Augusta, Ga., on the 12th; the city of Washington on the 19th; Philadelphia, by proclamation of the mayor, Mr. Swift, on the same evening; Baltimore, by Mayor Davie's proclamation, on the evening of the 21st. These are but a few of the many we have the details of. Several of them have been splendid affairs, the brief details of which, fill columns of the journals of the respective places. Coleman's Hotel, Washington, had 1,400 lights exhibited. Bonfires, artillery firing, fuex de joies, [ ] lights, bands of music, transparencies, and all the usual accompaniments of such exhibitions, were of course.

We have not seen a single item indicating any disrespect to those citizens who, whether from not approving of this war, or from any other motive, have thought proper not to join in those celebrations. [MSM]

NNR 72.128 April 24, 1847  GEN. STEPHEN WATTS KEARNY'S WINTER MARCH, ENCOUNTERS WITH ANDRES PICO, REACHES SAN DIEGO

Yesterday’s National Intelligencer contains a letter from a gentleman who was attached to General kearny's command, giving an interesting account of their operations, too long for the space we have left in this number, but too long for the space we have left in this number, but too interesting to be left unnoticed. It is dated San Diego, Upper California, Jan. 19th, 1847. From this letter we learn that,

On reaching the Rio Gila, Gen. K. met the first intelligence of a counter revolution in California, brought by peaceable families that were flying into Sonora, to escape the troubles.

After passing the desert of Homada, which had neither water nor grass for their mules, the detachment on the 2d December reached Warner’s [ ] in a most pitiable condition. Most of the men had to walk the last 500 miles; few of the mules survived, and the mad had to carry their packs. At this place they learned that Andros Pico was at the head. A 120 superbly mounted and disciplined Mexicans, at short distance ahead. As an encounter was inevitable, Gen. K. determined to attack him. The action took place on the 6th. After a desperate hand to hand fight, with repeated rallyings, the Mexicans were finally driven from the field. Our loss was severe; three officers and 16 men were killed, and Gen. Kearny, 7 officers, and 14 men were wounded, but for the gallant interposition of Lieut. Enory, Gen. Kearny would have been killed.

The march was resumed the next day after burying the dead. They had now their wounded to carry, and were obliged to be very cautious. Only nine miles were made, before the enemy made a charge on their rear. Finding they would be duly received, they suddenly wheeled off and attempted to clamber and occupy commanding hills on the right.

It became necessary to dislodge them. An exhibited skill in bush fighting. Few were hurt on either side. The Mexicans were driven off. It became evident that Pico intended to harrass the detachment at every defile. Gen. K. [ ] to occupy a strong position, and send on a trustful Indian to Com. Stockton for aid. He remained here four days, so closely surrounded by the enemy, and mustering 200 men, that his men had to survive entirely on mule flesh.

Com. Stockton despatched to his relief 75 Marines and 100 seamen under Capt. Zeilm, from the ship Congress and [ ]. This enabled him to reach San Diego in two days, a distance at 30 miles. He arrived there on the 12th December. [MSM]

NNR 72.129 May 1, 1847 ALEJANDRO JOSE ATOCHA'S COMMENTS ON REPORTS OF HIS DEALING WITH MEXICO

The Washington correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce says: Senor Atocha remarks upon the sketch of his correspondence with Senor Rejon, the Mexican minister of foreign affairs, as copied or translated from the Diario del Gobierno, that is incorrect in some particulars. He denies having representing himself as authorized to negotiate for peace or the preliminaries necessary thereto. He also asserts that he could not have made the proposition stated respecting the parallel of latitude as the boundary, as it would have been at variance with the wishes and contrary of the orders of his government. Senor Atocha further states that the whole of his correspondence with Senor Rejon, and others in authority, will hereafter be published. When the correspondence shall appear it will be communicated probably to the next congress. [MSM]

NNR 72.131, May 1, 1847 Maj. Luther Giddings' official report of a battle near Cerralvo while he
We are indebted to a friend of Major Giddings for a copy of his official report to Col. Mitchell, detailing the particulars of the fight with the Mexicans at Seralvo. Major G. with his brief experience in the field was more that a match in tactics, for "three Mexican generals," having a force six times greater than his own! These men behaved nobly through all the discouragements under watch they fought, and the fact that they were ultimately successful, proves the skill and presight of their commander, as well as their own [ ]. [MSM]

Upon receipt of this note, Capt. Keneally had requested an interview with Colonel Langberg, and demanded of him one hour to consult me--which time, and permission to visit me, was politely granted by my rear. Captain Keneally was furthermore kindly informed that the enemy's force amounted to 1,600 men and three generals.

I immediately returned to General Romaro, a brief reply, and desired that the parley might be terminated.

Soon after, I dispatched Capt. Bradley, with the force previously designated, to communicate with the rear, and assist in bringing up the wagons, which had thus far been successfully defended by Captain Keneally. Capt. Bradley cut through the enemy's line in the most gallant manner,--his volleys were responded to by the artillery and musketry of the rear guard, and in a few minutes I had the satisfaction of seeing my little band again united around 100 of the wagons which he had succeeded in saving.--In the absence of Capt. Bradley on his duty--a parley was sounded by the enemy still in force between us and the town, and which portion of his troops Gen. Urrea commanded, in person. They reiterated their demand for a surrender, and desired to know, why I had fired upon the general in chief whilst a truce existed. To their first demand I sent the same reply that had been previously communicated to Gen. Romaro; and also that during the time my fire was continued in front, I was ignorant of the parley existing in the rear.

Towards night the enemy drew off towards the town; in which direction I also continued my march, with little progress however, as the wagons closed in mass were much impeded by the thickets skirting the road. It soon became quite dark and supposing that the enemy would oppose my entrance into the town, I deemed it best to await until daylight before making the attack. As my men were suffering exceedingly for water, I found it necessary during the night drive off a party of lancers stationed near to the stream, distant from us about half a mile. At dawn on the 8th inst. I took possession of Seralvo without opposition,--the enemy having evacuated it during the night. Discovering that there were but ten or twelve rounds of ammunition remaining in the cartridge boxes, I was detained at Seralvo until the arrival of Col. Curtis' command on the 12th instant. Obtaining from him the necessary supplies, I proceeded on my march and arrived at this post on the 15th instant.

There were killed in the affair at Seralvo, on the 7th inst. Two privates of Capt Bradley's company F, 1st rig. Ohio volunteers, and 15 teamsters. I was informed that the Mexican loss in the engagement, amounted to 45 killed and wounded--which number I believe to be nearly correct.

I take great pleasure in stating that the officers and men of my command, met the overwhelming force by which they were surrounded, with the greatest coolness and gallantry. Lieut. A. McCarter and Sergeant Wm. Howell, did good service with the artillery--firing with great rapidity and accuracy.--Lieuts. Jas. P Fytte and James Moore of my staff, performed the many duties with which they were entrusted, with promptness and gallantry.

NNR 72.131 May 1, 1847  LT.CHARLES G. HUNTERS OFFICIAL REPORT ON ALVARADO

I wrote you from Havana, and gave you the reasons of our determination at this place. That detention deprived us from sharing in the glory at Vera Cruz, for on the very day of our arrival Vera Cruz was evacuated by the Mexicans, and possession was taken by Gen. Scott and Com. Perry. The whole of the naval forces having been called to Vera Cruz to fight off this place blockading, the commodore ordered this vessel down for that purpose, not dreaming that she would venture to attack the great Alvarado, but we had lost too much at Vera Cruz, so our gallant commander, Charles G. Hunter, at all risks, determined to make an attempt. The city, after two attacks, surrendered to the Scourage. I wish I had time to give you all concerning the affair, but its impossible. The Scourage was sent to Alvarado to blockade, and Com. Perry had made all arrangements to attack Alvarado with a large force by sea, while Gen. Quitman was to enter by hand, but the squadron and the troops got here too late, the Scourage had done all. This force to make the attack. When it came off the port, the American colors was seen hoisted on the forts. This caused the greatest disappointment in the squadron. The commander immediately arrested out gallant commander for having attacked Alvarado without his orders, and commander Hunter is, therefore, to be tried by a court martial for taking this place. Our gallant commander also captured the city of Tlacotalpan, a city of about 7,000 inhabitants. [MSM]

NNR 72.131 May 1, 1847 THE CAPTURE OF ALVARADO.

United States steamer Scourge, Alvarado, April 3, 1847.

I wrote you from Havana, and gave you the reasons of our detention at this place. That detention deprived us from sharing in the glory at Vera Cruz, for on the very day of our arrival Vera Cruz was evacuated by the Mexicans, and possession was taken by Gen. Scott and Com. Perry.

The whole of the naval forces having been called to Vera Cruz to fight the great battle, and finding that no vessel was off this place blockading, the commodore ordered this vessel down for that purpose, not dreaming that she would venture to attack the great Alvarado, but we had lost too much at Vera Cruz, so our gallant commander, Charles G. Hunter, at all risks, determined to make an attempt.

The city, after two attacks, surrendered to the Scourge. I wish I had time to give you all concerning the affair, but ‘tis impossible.

The Scourge was sent to Alvarado to blockade, and Com. Perry had made all arrangements to attack Alvarado with a large force by sea, while Gen. Quitman was to enter by land, but the squadron and the troops got here too late, the Scourge had done all.

Com. Perry arrived off Alvarado with the following vessels:

Steamer Mississippi, Frigate Potomac,
Steamer Vixen,
Do Spitfire, Schooner Reefer,
Do Tampico,
Do Bonita Ship Germantown,
Do St. Mary’s
Brig Porpoise, Ship Albany,
Schooner Petrel,
Do Falcon.

This force to make the attack. When it came off the port, the American colors was seen hoisted on the forts. This caused the greatest disappointment in the squadron. The commodore immediately arrested our gallant commander for having attacked Alvarado without his orders, and commander Hunter is, therefore, to be tried by a court martial for taking this place.

Our gallant commander also captured the city of Tlacotalpan, a city of about 7,000 inhabitants. [ANP]

NNR 72.132 May 1, 1847 OHIO VOLUNTEERS FEND OFF MEXICAN LANCERS AT AGUA FRIO

We have not yet seen the particulars of the battle which has been frequently referred to as having taken place between Col. Morgan, of the 2d regiment of Ohio volunteers, and Gen. Urreah’s lancers. The following extract from a letter from an esteemed correspondent of Saltillo, will in some degree supply this vacuum:

Part of the 2d Ohio, hastening to the relief of Gen. Taylor, from Cerralvo, in all 212, under Col. Morgan, fought with over a thousand lancers, until artillery came to their aid from Monterey. Lieut. Stewart, of company C, of that regiment, merits the highest praise for his daring bravery in riding through the Mexican lines to ask reinforcements. The American force, drawn up in a hollow square repulsed charge after charge of the horse, sustaining a heavy fire from the chaparral. Capt. Latham with his riflemen, was about charging into the chaparral for a hand-to-hand fight, but was recalled, as it appeared evidently the design of the enemy to both break the square and induce the men to charge into the sides of the road, where singly they would both be able to meet horsemen. There was every reason to believe that men were in ambush, ready to rake, at a single volley, and small body of men opposed to them. And so it afterwards appeared; for, on the first fire from the cannon into one of these suspected places, nearly thirty of the enemy were killed. After fifteen minutes' fight with the cannon, the lancers fled in every direction. Leaving more than a hundred on the field. We lost but four killed and a few wounded. The enemy kept up a heavy fire from escopetas, but generally overshot us. Capt Graham quartermaster at Cerralvo, was shot through the heart, in the beginning of the fight, and died instantly. Colonel Morgan was himself cool, brave, and determined, with the heart of youth, and head of age, as a young man but old Texan will always feel in battle.

The word now passes along the line—“San Luis in six weeks.” As soon as the rainy reason commences, ho, for San Luis! And judging from what has happened—catching a prophetic gleam of the future by the reflection from the past—we can well concur in the rude but truth sentiment of a wounded volunteer—“Taylor will take it like a d--n!” [MSM]

THE BATTLE OF SACRAMENTO.

We have no account as yet from the division under Col. DONIPHAN, (of the Missouri volunteers) nor of this affair, except what reaches us through Mexican papers. The furnish a despatch of the Mexican General Heredia, dated the 2d March, the material part of which is as follows:

At 12 o'clock on the 28th the enemy was seen by my advance guard, and at 2 o'clock P.M. he appeared in sight of my camp. I instantly drew up three columns of infantry under the orders of Gen. Garcia Conde, and posted my artillery in the most suitable manner; but as the enemy changed his route, and marched to the right in order to turn my position, I was obliged to change my whole plan, and ordered Gen. Garcia Conde with the cavalry to oppose the passage of the enemy, while I supported him with the remainder of my forces. The enemy halted when the cavalry came in front of him, and I, with the greatest despatch and all possible order, was arranging to form the infantry and artillery into battle on the right of the cavalry, and was already placing the pieces of artillery, when the enemy opened with his cannon on the cavalry, and at the third fire I had the mortification to see it completely dispersed. My artillery returned the enemy's fire, and kept firing with activity while I was trying to form the infantry, which had been thrown into confusion by the cavalry; and, owing to my great exertions and those of Capt. Don Angel Trius, Don Francisco Padilla, and Don Cayetano Justiniani, we succeeded in again forming the infantry, and collecting nearly all the cavalry which was stationed in my former encampment, it being necessary to establish a line with the new position, which was accomplished in the midst of the firing, all the infantry and artillery falling back without leaving in the other camp even a cannon that had been dismounted, and bringing away all the dead and wounded.

Being by this time established at Sacramento with all my forces, the enemy attacked us with a heavy fire of artillery, and a charge which his cavalry made on a redoubt was most chivalrously beaten off by fifty men of the 7th infantry and thirty men of the Durango squadron, under the command of the valiant captain cazadores, D. Rafael Gonzales, who fell victim to his bravery, he receiving a wound of which he died in a few moments. At the same time fell Lieut. D. Augustus Quintana, and several men of both companies. While they were thus defending the redoubt, the cavalry which I had sent to its assistance fled, and dispersed completely, carrying confusion into the ranks of the infantry. In this critical situation I withdrew the artillery to an elevation in the vicinity, and succeeded in collecting 200 infantry, and there I maintained myself until, without having the power to prevent it, I was completely abandoned, except byCols. D. Francisco Padilla and D. Cayetano Justininiani, Capt. Salvado Santa Maria, of the artillery of the National Guard, and the veteran Lieut. D. Manuel Flores, and Lieut. Col. D. Matias Conde, the commander of he artillery, who with a new men of the artillery maintained the fire for nearly half an hour. Under these disastrous circumstances Col. D. Angel Trius, and the commander of a battalion. D. Vicente Sanchez, used the utmost efforts to reorganize the infantry, assisted by Cols. Padilla and Justiniani, whom I had sent for the same purpose; but it was in vain: they could not collect twenty men. The rest fled to the mountains terrified, following the example of the cavalry, of which only the first squadron of Durango made any resistance; their commander, Don Manuel Aponte, having ordered tem to dismount in order to extricate them from the confusion in which they were involved. Abandoned even by their (illegal), the officers of artillery already mentioned were forced to retire. Having lost all hope of regaining the day, I was obliged to retreat with bitter grief, as all in the camp remained in the possession of the enemy, nothing being saved except eight rounds of ammunition, which a servant of Col. Padilla hid in the mountains. In my retreat I endeavored to collect some infantry to lead them to Chihuahua, but all my efforts were useless.

"On account of the complete dispersion it is impossible to give an exact detail of the number of killed and wounded; but I can assure your excellency that they cannot be less than eighty to a hundred." [ANP]
Vol. 72.132 May 1, 1847 GENERAL HOUSTON-THE MEXICAN WAR.

Gen. Houston was at San Augustine, Texas, on his way home from Washington, on the 19 ult.- During the few hours he harried, he delivered a short address to the people. Alluding to his speech, the San Augustine Shield observes:

He stated that the commission of major-general in the army invading Mexico was tendered to himself and his colleague, (Gen. Rusk) but both had declined its acceptance-his own reason for doing so was that he differed in opinion as to the proper plan of carrying on the war with the officers who would have been his seniors in rank, and he would not assist in carrying out measures directly antagonistic to his own judgment. His own experience in fighting Mexicans, which he believed to be greater than that of any of the generals who would have been above him did not approve the idea of marching to Mexico with such a cumbrous train of wagons, and such an immense quantity of hay as Gen Scott required-he did not wish to be encumbered with all the splendor and pomp with which that general was attended. He preferred invading Mexico with Texans, who required but one mule to a mess, and could lay all night with but one blanket around them, and with their rifles hugged close to their bosoms ready to fight at a moment's warning. Whenever his country called him and he was allowed an independent command of any, who, like Texans, were inured to toil, and could feed their horses on grass, and themselves on jerked beef, if necessary, he was then ready to take his life in one hand and his sword in the other, and go as far as his county's good required. SIR: I have the honor to inform you that it has pleased God to crown our poor efforts, to put down the rebellion and to retrieve the credit of our arms, with the most complete success. The insurgents determined, with them whole force, to meet us on our march from San Diego to this place, and to decide the fate of the territory by a general battle.

Having made the best participation I could, in the face of a boasting and vigilant enemy, we left San Diego on the 29th day of December, (that portion of the insurgent army who had been watching and annoying us, having left to join in the main body,) with about six hundred fighting men, composed of detachments from the ships Congress, Savannah, Portsmouth, and Cyane, aided by General Kearny, with a detachment of sixty men on foot, from the regiment of United States Dragoons, and by Capt. Gillispie, with sixty mounted riflemen.

We marched nearly one hundred and forty miles in ten days, and found the rebels on the 8th day of January in a strong position, on the high bank of the "Rio San Gabriel," with six hundred mounted men and four pieces of artillery, prepared to dispute our passage across the river.

We waded through the water dragging our guns after us against the galling fire of the enemy, without exchanging a shot until we reached the opposite shore; when the fight became general, and out troops having repelled a charge of the enemy, charged up the bank in a most gallant manner, and gained a complete victory over the insurgent army.

The next day, on our march across the plains of the "Mesa" to this place, the insurgents made another desperate effort to save the capital and their own necks; they were concealed with their artillery in a ravine until came within gun shot, when they opened a brisk fire from their field pieces on our right flank, and at the same time charged both on our front and rear. We soon silenced their guns, and replied the charge, when they fled, and permitted us the next morning to march into town without any further opposition.

We have rescued the country from the hands of the insurgents, but I fear that the absence of Col. Freemont's battalion of mounted riflemen will enable most of the Mexican officers, who have broken their parole to escape to Senora.

I am happy to say that our loss in killed and wounded does not exceed twenty, whilst we are informed that the enemy has lost between seventy and eighty.

This dispatch must of immediately, and I will [ ] another opportunity to furnish you with the details of these two battles, and the gallant conduct of the officers and men under my command, with their names.

Faithfully your obedient servant. R.F. Stockton

Enclosed I have the honor to send to you a translation of the letter handled to me by the commissioners mentioned in another part of this despatch, sent by Jose Ma. He had violated his honor, and I would not treat with him nor write to him. [MSM]

The Road From Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico, is one of the best Macadamized roads on this continent. C.J. Folsom, of N. York, in a book published in 1842 furnishes the following account of the route:

"The first part of the route, leading through the village of Santa Fe, is low and sandy, over which a calzada or paved causeway was thrown, forming a part of the great road to the capital; but his is now in a ruinous condition, owing, in a great measure, to the want of repairs, which are rendered necessary by the destructive operation of the mountain torrents during the rainy season. Two fine bridges remain on this part of the route, which communicated with the causeway; one of these, called puente del Rey, or King's bridge, crosses the river Antigua 15 leagues from Vera Cruz, and is admirably built with massive stone arches. The other is thrown over a rapid stream at Plan del Rio, and consists of a single arch of very large dimensions. Plan del Rio is a small village 21 leagues from Vera Cruz, where the ascent of the tables may be said to commence. In the six leagues that intervene between that village and another called Encerro, the traveler attains the height of 3,043 feet above the level of the sea, which is sufficient to give an entirely new character to the climate and productions. A farther ascent of 1,292 feet, within a distance of about eight miles, over a rugged and dangerous road, brings him to Jalapa, or Xalapa, where he enters on a portion of the old paved road, leading through fields of maize and gardens filled with a profusion of flowers. 'Here,' says Hum---, the --- merchants of Vera Cruz have --- ---- in which they enjoy a cool and agreeable retreat, while the coast is almost uninhabitable from the mosquitoes, the great heat and the yellow fever.'

"The distance from Tampico to --- is 312 miles. The road leads over precipitous ----, and is unfit for carriages. A traveller who passed over this route in 1822, describes the country as level for 48 miles from Tampico, with a rich beach soil, few trees, except palms, and thinly inhabited. This was followed by a broken and hilly region for a distance of nearly 100 miles, possessing a deep soil, but destitute of water during the greater part of the year. -The traveller now encountered a steep and rugged mountain, belonging to the great chain of Sierra de Madre. The ascent was difficult and fatiguing, and occasionally frightfully precipices showed themselves at the feet of his mule." [ANP]

VERA CRUZ-HEALTH STATISTICS.-From Brantz Mayer's Mexico as it was and is we learn that-In the year 1841, the number of baptisms in the city was 454, whilst the deaths in the same time amounted to 1,017, say about one-sixth of the whole population! Of these by vomito 155, small pox 142, phthisis and diarrhea 212, fevers 142, dysentery 29.

Mr. Mayer says: "In 1842. I am told that near two thousand died of vomito at Vera Cruz. This however, was owing to the number of raw troops sent there from the interior, to be embarked for Yucatan." [ANP]

The evacuation of Vera Cruz.-A late letter of Me. Kendall to the Picayune says-

"I have said but little about the evacuation of this place by the Mexicans, on the 29th ultimo, because I have had little time. It reminded me more of the Departure of the Israelites than ought else I can compare it to; the long procession of soldiers, national militia, and people of all classes and sexes, as they poured out of the walls of a city set off as this is with huge antique-looking domes and other architectural ornaments. As at Monterey, there was the same throng of camp women, carrying every conceivable implement of ornament and use, especially of the former, to say nothing of the innumerable parrots, poodle dogs, and other absurdities of a kindred nature. It is a singular fact the poorer the people in every country the greater the number of dogs they must have about them; but in no nation does the half starved population affect the animal to the same extent as this.

"The weather continues hot -insupportable hot in the middle of the day; but all my inquiries would induce me to have that as yet there is little sickness among the troops. The report that the dreaded vomito had broken out was certainly premature.-All think, however, hat the sickness must appear in the course of a week or two, but probably not until Gen. Scott has moved onward with the main portion of the army. If all Santa Anna's cattle are brought in, or only a portion of his immense herds, it will accelerate movements greatly." [ANP]

Jaylapa, or Zulapa, the capital of the state of Vera Cruz is a pleasant town situated 89 miles from the city of Vera Cruz, on a steep declivity of the table land, 4,340 feet above the level of the sea. It contains eight churches, a good school for drawing, and 13,000 inhabitants. The principal merchants of the city of Vera Cruz reside at Jalapa, and only visit the [ ] city occasionally. An annual fair is held at Jalapa, and much frequented.

NNR 72.136, May 1, 1847 description of Jalapa

City of Jalapa - This city stand on a very elevated ground, yet for many miles the ascent is quite gradual. From the city, Vera Cruz is visible, as is also the sea, 90 miles distant. The city itself is upon a high hill - highest in the centre, so that the streets incline considerably; so much so that no wheeled vehicle can pass along any of them except the main street road, which has considerable rise and descent. The city is surrounded by a wall and has a strongly built church near the western gate, which could be converted into a citadel. The streets are paved. The houses, as in other Mexican towns, are of stone, with flat roofs and iron barred windows. - Opposite the city, on the left of the road, is a hill from which the road might be annoyed, and shells thrown into the town. For the distance of six or seven miles before reaching the town the road is a handsome and substantial structure of chequered pavement, and must have been very costly. [WFF]

NNR 72.136  May 1, 1847  ADDRESS OF SANTA ANNA TO HIS ARMY, ON QUITTING SAN LUIS POTOSI FOR THE CAPITAL.

Companions in arms!-Devoted entirely to the service of the country, I marched to assume the reins of government, in doing which I make the most costly sacrifice, acting contrary to my cherished desires and fixed intentions. But this course will put an end to the civil war which is destroying our beautiful capital; it will give unity to our defences and impulse to the righteous struggle in which we are engaged with the perfidious invaders, and in which you have fought with such bravery and decision in the field of La Angostura.

My friends-I will never forget your glorious actions on that field of battle, your sufferings in the desert, to which you submitted with heroic patience, and, above all, that I had the honor of commanding you. The nation owes you a recompense, and you shall shortly receive it through my exertions, although this is not the consideration which stimulates you to bear yourselves as worth sons of Mexico.

Soldiers-You are the hope of your country, her best defenders. You duty then is to guard all parts; and on this account I have disposed that two brigades of infantry and one of cavalry, with their corresponding batteries, shall march to the defence of the state of Vera Cruz, the rest of the army defending this frontier.

Everywhere you will conduct yourselves as you have done hitherto, and you will ever deserve the illustrious name you have acquired. I am going to procure whatever is necessary to consummate the great work which is committed to you, and be assure that in the hour of danger you will again find in the midst of you your general. [ANP]

NNR 72.136-137  May 1, 1847  Santa Anna's inaugural address

Santa Anna's Inaugural address.

Senores deputies: I have just taken the oath which the law prescribes, and in doing so ought to accompany it with a manifestation of my sentiments and the motives of my conduct to this respectable committee of the legislative body.

The events which have taken place in the capital are known, and are of such a character as to bind me to give them a speedy and pacific termination.—Surrounded by difficulties of all kinds, interested in what is the most important and essential to the whole nation, as is the sustaining of a strong and decisive struggle with a foreign power, in which nothing less is involved than the existence of the nation, it would be the last of evils to enter into a contest with those who ought to unite in repelling the common enemy. These discords ought to disappear at the imperious voice of patriotism which calls upon the sons of the country to have but one will and aim. The moments have been urgent— I have seen the forward steps of he enemy—I have rushed to the field to repel them, and even at the moment of doing so, I have been forced to leave a victorious army, and to come hither to assume a power which I have repeatedly said was repugnant to my feelings, and which I had determined never to undertake.

That which has been and ought to be an object of aspiration and desire, is for me an enormous sacrifice. But I am all for my country, and shall ever serve it, without thinking what it may cost me to do that which the nation desires I should do. I have entered upon the supreme magistracy because I have seen that it was the sole legal means of terminating the disturbances of this capital, because I believe I shall thus be able to facilitate the prosecution of the war, and to save the honor and independence of Mexico, which I wish to present unspilled and brilliant to the world which is beholding us. I have before me the committee of the sovereign congress, of that august body whose decisions I respected and shall constantly continue to respect. Its decisions will be my invariable guide, and I have firmly resolved to preserve a pure union with the legislative body, which union will give us a final victory and the re-establishment of internal and external peace on which the happiness of our country depends, and to which we all aspire. The nation has proclaimed the political principles which ought to be the basis of the administration which I wish to establish.

Thus I understand that its strength will be secured for defending itself, and its rights for which its sons have those guarantees which belong to all men, and which civilization claims, and which has been my aim since my return to the country. This will not be denied, and the nation shall still see me obedient to its wishes without my having any other rule of conduct than its decisions. As a Mexican and a soldier, I shall always take the same road as the nation, and I aspire to no other title than that of a good citizen, and in speaking of me that it should be said that I always loved my country— that I served it with zeal, and that I sacrificed myself for its good. [ANP]

NNR 72.137 May 1, 1847 Gen. David Emanuel Twiggs' division quits Veracruz for Jalapa, arrival of
Col. Bankhead

Latest From Vera Cruz.—The New Orleans Picayune of the 21st says—Our advices by the 'Iona' are up to the 8th inst. Gen. Twiggs, with a division of the army, left Vera Cruz on the morning of that day for Jalapa. There was the same doubt in the army as to whether there would be any more fighting as has always prevailed amongst our troops after a battle with the enemy.

The remaining divisions were to proceed rapidly in the direction of the city of Mexico. Although the opinion was quite current at Vera Cruz that the Mexicans would not make a stand between that city and the capital, yet there were some who regarded future collision as certain. Amongst these was Col. Kenney, who had recently been as far into the interior as Mango de Clava, Santa Anna's hacienda.

It was distinctly understood at Vera Cruz that the Puente Nacional had been abandoned. This was the point at which the first resistance to the march of the American forces upon the city of Mexico would be made; but though the defence of this point was given up, it was by no means certain that the progress of our army into the interior would not be disputed at others.

Indeed it was asserted that the forces destined to defend the National bridge (Puente Nacional) had fallen back a few leagues in the direction of Jalapa, to a stronger position, where preparations were being made for a stout defence. An intelligent officer, just from Vera Cruz, thinks it quite probable that a battle may have occurred about the 14th inst.

Rumors from the city of Mexico represented Santa Anna as more intently bent upon war than ever.—The reports are not the best authority, in so far as the wishes of Santa Anna are concerned; but they indicate the temper of the public mind, which is as good an index of his purposes as any other.

The New Orleans Evening Mercury of the 21st instant says—Col. Bankhead, bearer of despatches from Gen. Scott, and having in charge the trophies of war taken at Vera Cruz, arrived this morning on the ship Elizabeth Dennison, on his way to Washington. The E.D. left Vera Cruz on the same as the schooner Iona which arrived yesterday, and therefore brings no later news. [ANP]

NNR 72.141-143 May 1, 1847 GENERAL ORDERS, DISPOSITIONS FOR MARCHING TO THE INTERIOR, &C.

1. The first infantry, and the two volunteer companies temporarily attached to the first division of regulars, will, upon the march of the army hence, remain to garrison this city and the army hence, Jaun de Ulloa, when Brevet Col. Wilson, assigned to duty according to his [], will become the governor and commanding officer of these places. In the mean time that officer, by arrangement with the present governor and commander, may wish his regiment, relieve so much of the actual garrisons as shall be found desirable. Accordingly, he will report in person to receive orders for his regiment.

2. With a view to a march into the interior, the baggage of all corps and officers will be in the next two days, reduced to the smallest compass and weight. Not more that three common tents principally for arms and the sick, can be allowed for the present, to the officers and men of any company; and general officers, general staff and field officers, will limit themselves in proportion.
All surplus baggage, public and private, will, accordingly, be properly packed, marked, and turned over to the quartermaster's department for storage.

3. Requisitions for means of land transportation (wagons, pack, and draught animals) will be made upon the chief quartermaster, by division and by the chiefs of the other branches of the general staff, subject to the severest revision; and notice is now given that any excess of baggage. Public or private, will be rejected and thrown aside by the quartermasters and their agents, at the time of loading up, or at any time on the march that such excess may be detected.

4. It is absolutely necessary for an early march that all public means of transportation—wagons, carts, horses, and mules, with their harness, saddles, bridles, halters, and pack saddles— in the use of the corps, or in the hands of individual officers and men, should, without delay, be turned over to the quartermaster's department, which has instructions to re-loan three or four horses, in as many extreme cases, for a very short time longer. This order includes all such animals as may be held, under the pretence of capture, or purchase since the army landed near the city. Captured properly is always held for the benefit of the service generally, and no purchase can be respected unless witnessed and approved at the time by a general officer or commander of a brigade—masmuch as if the property be stolen by the seller, it will certainly be restored or paid for by the United States, on demand and proof on the part of the rightful owner.

5. If the foregoing directions be not complied with, fully, before tomorrow night, measures will be taken, however reluctantly, to seize every object designated above, and throw the burden of providing a just private title, upon the possessor of the property. By command of Major General Scott. H. L. Scott, A. A. A. General

NNR 72.144  May 1, 1847  REPORTS OF SICKNESS AT VERACRUZ, SANTA ANNA AT CERRO GORDO

ARMY OF INVASION.

An arrival at New York from Havana, brought startling reports which reached there by the British steamer Vesuvius, of the fever having attacked our army at Vera Cruz.

The arrival of the United States steamer Mississippi at New Orleans on the 22d, relieves the anxiety which this report could not but awaken. The Mississippi left Vera Cruz five days later than the Vesuvius, and furnishes Vera Cruz dates to the 134th, Tampico to the 12th, and city of Mexico to the 3d of April.

The most of the letters and publications that mention the health of the army at all represent it to be good, in the general; The Vera Cruz Eagle, (a paper just issued by our printers,) of the 13th has the following.

The hospital. "Many of our gallant soldiers are now prostrated by disease and the hospitals are filled to overflowing with them. The disease most prevalent is diarrhea, in many cases it has proven fatal."

It is manifest that Gen. Scott had been making every possible effort to expedite the movement of the army to a more healthy position. The whole army was en route for Jalapa—except perhaps about 2000 men including the garrison of the town, and Quitman's brigade, at the time the Mississippi left Vera Cruz.

The advance corps 2,500 to 2,700 choice men under Gen. Twiggs, marched on the 8th.

Shields' and Pillow's brigades followed. On the 9th Gen. Patterson had so far recovered as to be able to leave Vera Cruz with the view of joining them and taking command.

General Worth's brigade took up the line of march on the morning of the 13th. The General himself was detained by a sudden indisposition from accompanying them. About one o'clock an express reached him, with the important information that the column under Gen. Twiggs had fallen in with a large force of the enemy at Cerro Gordo, a strong position beyond Puente Nacional, and that a skirmish had taken place between Twiggs' advance guard and the enemy, in which Capt. Johnson, topographical engineer, was severely wounded, and several others. In a half an hour after the reception of this news General Worth had mounted his horse and was off.

On the 11th, General Scott addressed a proclamation to the Mexicans, from headquarters, announcing the advance of his army on the capital and of that of General Taylor upon San Luis Potosi,— "assures them that Americans are not their enemies, but their friends—and the friends of their holy religion, its hierarchy and its priesthood, -that for the church and the unoffending inhabitants, and their property "I have from the first, done everything to place them under safeguard of marital law against the few bad men in this army. My orders, to that effect, known to all, are precise and rigorous. Under them, several Americans have already been punished, by time, for the benefit of Mexicans, besides imprisonment, and one for a rape, has been hung by the neck."

With these assurances he invites the Mexicans to bring in horses, mules, cattle; beef, and other supplies-and threatens to punish them with rigor if they molest the trains of wagons or teams of mules, &c.-concluding with assurances of a speedy peace. Another general order of the same date regulating the supplies for and order of march of the residue of the forces was issued. [ANP]

NNR 72.144 May 1, 1847 Gen. William Jenkins Worth appoints Lt. Col. Henry Wilson governor of Veracruz, Worth joins the Army

General Worth’s brigade took up the line of march on the morning of the 13th. The General himself was detained by a sudden indisposition from accompanying them. NNR 72.144 May 1, 1847 SQUADRON SAILS TO ATTACK TUXPAN

THE SQUADRON, under Commodore Perry, left Vera Cruz anchorage on the 12th of the purpose of attacking Tuspan, at which place Gen. Cos was said to be posted with sixty pieces of cannon. [MSM]

NNR 72.144 May 1, 1847 Mexican accounts of the seizure of Chihuahua

FROM CHIHUAHUA. The Mexican accounts from Chihuahua were to the 5th March. The loss of the battle of the 28th February by the Mexicans, is attributed to the cowardice of the Mexican cavalry.-The forces of the Americans are stated to have been 1100, and 8 pieces of artillery; whilst those of the Mexicans were 2000 men, and 10 pieces of artillery. The Americans took possession of Chihuahua on the 2d March, and nearly all the Mexican families were abandoning the city. [ANP]

NNR 72.145 May 8, 1847 ADDITIONAL TROOPS TO BE SENT FROM NEW YORK TO CALIFORNIA

A New York letter in the Philadelphia Inquirer says, "Capt. Turner, of the California expedition, now is this city, whither he came some time since the despatched from Col. Stevenson and the American consul at Rio de Janeiro, had received orders from the war department to recruit a sufficient complement of men to make that regiment amount to one thousand. As soon as the recruits are raised he will proceed with them to California." [MSM]

NNR 72.146 May 8, 1847 LIST OF THE COMPANIES OF THE TEN NEW REGIMENTS OF REGULARS EN ROUTE TO MEXICO

The Union of the 26th publishes a statement furnished by the adjutant general, from which we learn that of the ten new regiments of the regular army, the following companies are now en route for the army in Mexico.

NNR 72.146 May 8, 1847 Com. David Conner's orders for landing at Veracruz

"General Order" from Com. Conner.

"When the men of war and other vessels having troops on board get underway for the place of debarkation, each vessel will display one or other of the following signals to designate the line to which she belongs.

1. Those men of war that belong to same line will arrange themselves around their superior officer; and the other troop-vessels, as the Massachusetts, Alabama, Virginia, Endora and Edith, and the vessels having on board Capt. Taylor's and Lieut. Talcott's field batteries, will range themselves around the men of war belonging to the same line with themselves.-In this order, the three squadrons will proceed to the place of debarkation; line No. 1 loading, and the others following in succession.

2. In distributing the surf-boats to the several men of war, care will be taken to assign them boats marked for their respective lines."

NNR 72.146 May 8, 1847 MANNER OF TAKING POSSESSION OF SAN JUAN DE ULLOA

The boats of the Ohio, proceeded to Vera Cruz took thence Gen. Worth's division and landed at the castle.

Capt. Stringham carried the flag of his ship to him, and the stars and strips which once floated to the mizen of the line of the battle ship Ohio now waving over the castle of San Juan de Ulloa.

NNR 72.146 May 8, 1847 ASSURANCES OF THE "UNION" THAT SUFFICIENT FORCES BE IN TIME FOR GEN. WINFIELD SCOTT AND GEN. ZACHARY TAYLOR, REQUISITION FOR 6,000 ADDITIONAL VOLUNTEERS

The Washington Union of the 24th April announces the president had called upon the authorities of certain states for 6,000 additional volunteers, and adds:-

"We understand that reinforcements are about to be thrown into both our armies (under Scott and Taylor) and if Mexico should continue besotted, blind to her true interests, infatuated by her ridiculous pride, we must put forth our powerful arms in more vigorous prosecution of the war.

Subsequently the Union Stated, that about 2,000 of these 6,000 volunteers were designed for Oregon and Santa Fe-which of course would leave 4,000 to be divided between Gen. Scott and Taylor.

We have met with no general official announcements yet, of how the requisition for these 8,000 volunteers has been apportioned amongst the states. From local papers we ascertain that Pennsylvania, Virginia and Maryland, are each required to furnish two companies, New Jersey 5 companies, Ohio and Indiana one regiment each.

The District of Columbia is called upon to furnish three companies, which, with the two companies from Maryland, are to compose a distant battalion, under command of Lieut. Col. CHARLES LEE JONES. [MSM]
NNR 72.146 May 8, 1847 LT. CHARLES G. HUNTER SAID TO HAVE BEEN COURT-MARTIALED FOR HIS ATTACK ON ALVARADO

The New York Journal of Commerce says: "We learn from the authentic source that the trial had been had, that Lieut. Hunter has been found guilty of disobedience of orders in attacking Alvarado we presume and sentenced to be reprimanded at the quarter-deck of every ship in the squadron." We doubt it. [MSM]

NNR 72.146 May 8, 1847 Saint Mary's sails for Veracruz

The sloop-of-war St. Mary's, Com. Saunders, this morning had her signal for a pilot, and is in full sail, with a fair wind, down the bay. She has received an outfit her together with some new spars. The fatigue and exertion of her officers and crew have been incessant-constantly at sea for over two years, without intermission. Many of her officers and men, to us their own words, "are nearly worn out." On her arrival here she sent eighty men to the hospital, and yesterday there were some thirty sufficiently recruited in health to take their former places on board the ship. The St. Mary's in bound for Vera Cruz, and carries the latest instructions from Washington to the navy and army on that station. [ANP]

NNR 72.149 May 8, 1847 Mexican narrative of events at Veracruz

Mexican Narrative of Events at the Heroic City of Vera Cruz, While Besieged by the American Army. -Published at Jalapa, 1847.

How horrible is the scene we are attempting briefly to describe! What sympathizing heart can behold it without his eyes filling with the bitterest tears of grief? We would rejoice to conceal from Mexico this event with the origin of our melancholy abandonment, and the causes of such serious and lamentable misfortunes to the country—but we are compelled to announce to the entire world, what was our true position, during those days of barbarous conflict, without any relief, which this city sustained, and her disastrous end.

This description shall explain the cause of this result: the true language the Bulletin ahs issued, which has been the true expression of the sublime sentiments, animating the hearts of the defenders of ill fated Vera Cruz.

Animated and decided, we awaited the enemies of our nationality, after the beautiful youths of Vera Cruz had devoted many months to the daily practice of fire arms, considering themselves capable of repelling the attack and announced assault, which this city was expected to receive, united with the arms of the valiant veterans we possessed, all studied the best plan of defending our walls, which surrounded our own national and constant hearts, sworn never to surrender them with life. When the squadron of the enemy appeared, bearing the invading army, all our points of defence were at once covered with our veterans and the National Guard. From this first moment, the service was constant, with the greatest vigilance—citizens excused by the law, ran to the common defence, and few were found without their gun, to assist; all worked and ate their ration in the line, momently expecting the assault, and, agreeably to their oath, resolved, at he cost of their lives, to defend their families and their country.

But days and dark nights passed, and the enemy did not approach our walls; remaining concealed behind his works, he was not anxious to measure arms with us—nor venture upon an uncertain deed of arms, selecting as was most agreeable to him, and most in accordance with his character, the barbarous manner of assassinating the unoffending and defenceless citizens, by a barbarous bombardment of the city in the most horrible manner, throwing into it 4100 bombs, and an innumerable number of balls of the largest size, during nights and days, directing his first shots to the powder magazine, to the quarter of hospitals of charity, to the hospitals for wounded, and to the points he set afire, where it was believed the public authorities would assemble with persons to put it out; to the bakers' houses designated by their chimneys, and during the night raining over the entire city bombs, whose height was perfectly graduated with the time of explosion, that they might unite in falling, and thus cause the maximum destruction—but such infamous proceedings indicated from the first day the cowardice of the enemy. His first victims were women and children, followed by whole families perishing from the effects of the explosion, or under the ruins of their dwellings. In short time the hospitals were crowded with the wounded, the dead being simultaneously buried—with the exception of those unknown, who could not be taken from under the ruins. The bombs entered the walls of the church of Santo Domingo, killing the unfortunate wounded, frightening away the nurses and doctors; who after arriving with haste and risk at the church of San Francisco and the chapel of the third order, encountered the same dismal fate; as well as at the hospitals of Belen or Loretto, where it is well ascertained one bomb assassinate nineteen innocent persons. In all quarters perished unfortunate persons, seeking a shelter from this frightful desolation, while the wounded, retaining strength enough to raise themselves, were flying as cripple and sprinkling the streets with their blood.

At the second day of the bombardment, we were without bread or meat, reduced to a ration of beans eaten at midnight beneath a shower of fire, and the light issuing from the projectiles. The citizens had progressively removed to the claleta side, where up to this time less destruction had yet ignorant of the exact number of our killed and wounded; but by the best data we have obtained, estimate both at not less than one thousand persons. The damage done to dwellings and edifices is five or six millions of dollars, which cannot be repaired for many years.

The French consuls and neutral persons, present against their consent to witness such desolating scenes, eulogize the valor and actions of our defenders and the heroic conduct of this population, suffering so many calamities in a war, so furious, so savage, so atrocious, in which positions of our men confronted death, without fear, suffering without the power of defence or vengeance, witnessing at their sides the destruction of their sons, hearing the shrieks of our wounded and the noise of such destructive fires, without moving from their position. These recollections fill the heart with bitterness, and the details, which we omit, will excite horror when published by better talks.

After sustaining this attack, we remain reduced to the most frightful misery, without any knowledge how to-morrow to feed his family.

The good treatment of our illustrious municipality will always be engraved upon our grateful hearts, as well as the noble and generous conduct of the Spanish consul, who sheltered and fed in his house a multitude of suffering women and children, for whose fate and safety he and others have shown the most zealous interest.

On the 26th, the authorities of Vera Cruz hoped that she would merit a conclusion to this work filled with horror, to save from certain death so many sick, wounded and old persons of women and children whose sacrifice, as well as that of the lives of the garrison, was now useless, without increasing the defence, and without postponing the result equally painful, besides augmenting our troubles and our increasing destruction, with the 60 pieces more already prepared by the enemy.
But the entire world will be shocked with contempt when they hear, that without our asking any that we had not a right to, and which honor could but concede, the enemy ignobly not only refused to grant what we merited, but desired to force upon us vile conditions, leaving us but a few hours to decide, between disgrace and death, declaring he would destroy that city, and that none of the inhabitants should escape (not even the neutrals) not even he sick and wounded:
Incredible declaration on the part of those making it, who at the same time classed us as brave men. What would have been the fate then of cowards?

Thus and thus only were they able to conquer us. Our selection could not be doubtful; death was a thousand times preferable to be encountered I passing before his lines, to join the garrison within Ulloa. A furious norther which stopped all communication with the Castle, allowed the reflection although surmounting these difficulties, our families would remain as a target to these demons of the extermination of our race.

Existing and succeeding nations, after ascertaining the truth of our statements, will do us justice;- and hyena North Americans receive the chastisement and execration of all christians. Such is the belief of my heart, at the time of writing these lines, at 3 o'clock at daylight, the 27th, in the body of the guards at the point we are defending; and within three hours of that death which they have threatened to begin at 6 o'clock in the morning, as a voluntary sacrifice of our lives in defence of our country and national decorum.

To morrow we may not exist to write; but from our graves will arise the spirit of resistance and independence, which is so imperative, and which it seems does not exist in Mexico.

Our blood shall cry for vengeance, on the infamous assassinations maliciously perpetrated on our people. The month of March fixes the epoch of scorn, decay and dissolution of North America; this mixed and prostituted people neglecting the counsels and forgetting the virtues of the immortal George Washington, have sowed with their ambition the seed of their future ruin, by an action beneath the dignity of a civilized people.

We believe the representatives of European nations anticipated our decision: foreseeing the conduct of the enemy, they humanely and generously visited his camp, to demand the rights of humanity, seeing us all at our posts, resolved that the women, children, old people and neutrals should depart from the city before we would yield; leaving us a heap of dead bodies in lieu of Vera Cruz! And- who will credit it?-Scott, in imitation of the wild savage, refused that they should save even the lives of the yet living and foreign neutrals. In despite of the cry of reason, of virtue, of honor, he constructed new batteries. Finally, these consuls undertook to communicate to the captains of the neutrals vessels of war, lying at Sacrificios; but their application under the federal flag was not listened to. Commodore Perry giving orders to "fire on."

These men turned a deaf ear to everything; their conduct was cowardly and infamous; their navy affected to approach to fight to fortifications, flying from the fire of the castle and the battery of Santiago. They did not fight; they only desired to destroy by advantage.

The 27th hardly arrived, when the entire population of women, with children in their arms, and some strangers, waited before the dwellings of the French and Spanish consuls, who by their flags, saved the lives of so many innocents.

In the streets were heard only the sights of grief and the moans of the most affliction: mixed with this multitude were most respectable ladies, asking with tears in their eyes, if it were near 6 o'clock, because the city clock had been destroyed by a bomb; all were anxious to know how soon the time would arrive to save them, all asking aid, to allow them to go out on foot to those ardent sands; in the meantime the ferocious Scott brutally smiled, ridiculing the magnanimity of said consuls, the only representatives of their nations, deprived of all communication with their ministers in Mexico.

The negotiations for an agreement to end these horrors in the meanwhile continued, the commissioners making a great sacrifice of "amour propre," so as to bring the business to such a point as it would be accepted by the garrison; but it was already nine in the morning and nothing was known, and the people moved from the centre streets, loaded with bundles of clothes, feeble, and without nourishment, seeking a gate by which to go out. Some got on board of boats f proceed to neutral vessels of war, and were driven back by the enemy. The civil authorities offered to put themselves at the head of this female squad, and present themselves, unarmed, for Scott to rife upon, or else too permit them to go to the mountains, since he denied honor to men, and life to women.

Now in this situation, everything fell into a chaos of confusion. Mothers ran to the lines, and found their sons: Gen. Morales refusing to sign the capitulation, and not to bear arms, retired in a boat, with the Major of the National Guards, leaving the command to Gen. Landero. The withdrawal of these chieftains increased the confusion, and the turn of this spectacle was to yield to the power of necessity, because it became known the National Guard would not give up their arms, and would yield life rather than do so, disbanding, as was partly the case the preceding night, so soon as the capitulation was talked of. On the morning of the 26th, everything was completed by the commissioners, and ratified by Landero and Scott. The sun of this day was but the lamp of a sepulchre. All we speak of and desire is, to get out of the hateful sight of the Yankees.

[Vera Cruz, 28th March, 1847, at 10 o'clock in the day, at the time of leaving the works where for 12 days we desired to end our lives for our beloved country.] [ANP]
The following is a translation of a Mexican order found on the battlefield of Buena Vista. It is interesting as conveying an accurate idea of Santa Anna's preliminary dispositions.

Several orders of the 20th to the 21st Feb. 1847.

Gen. officer of the day, Don Rafael Vasquez; aids, Col Jose M. Bermudes and lieut. Col. Don Florencio Aspeitia. And for to-morrow, Don Francisco Mejia, general officer of the day; Col. Don Carlos Barito and Lieut. Col. Don Gregoria Elati, aids.

In the morning the army will continue its march, which will commence at 11 o'clock precisely, in the following order:

The 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th battalions of the light infantry will take the lead, under the order of Gen. Ampudia, so that he may be able to avail himself of all the advantages that the circumstances may require. Immediately after the battalion of sappers, and in its rear, and at the head of the division of infantry of the van, under the orders of General Pacheco, will be placed the company of Sharp Shooters and three pieces of 16's, with their respective artillerists and reserve—as likewise the ammunition, composed of 100 round shot and 100 grape for each piece, and 80 boxes musket ammunition, each containing 9,600 cartridges. Division of infantry of the centre, commanded by Gen. Manuel M. Lombardini, will follow; at the head of this column there will be five 12's, as above named and ammunitioned, and also 80 boxes of musket ammunition. At the head of the division of the rear, commanded by Gen. Ortega, there will be five pieces of 8's, supplied with men and ammunition as above, and also its 80 boxes of musket ammunition, each containing 9,600 cartridges.

The division of cavalry of the rear will follow closely on the last of the infantry, having at their head the "Hussars" and in their rear the general ammunition train, escorted by the brigade of horse artillery. After the ammunition train all the camp followers of all classes, with the baggage of all kinds, laundresses, cooks, &c. it being distinctly understood that no woman will be allowed to mix with the column. The chief in charge of the commissary department is Don Pedro Ravejel, who is also in charge of the baggage train.

His excellency, the general in chief, furthermore orders that he different corps shall to-day receive from the commissary three days' rations for the 21st, 22d and 23d, and that they require the necessary meat this afternoon for the first meal to-morrow morning, which the troops are directed to eat one hour before taking up the line of march; and the second will be taken in their haversacks, to be eaten in the night, wherever they may halt. This last will consist of meat, two biscuits, and half a cake of brown sugar (piloncello), for each man; for on the night of the 21st there will be no fires permitted, neither will there be signal made by any military instruments of music—the movement at early day break on the morning of the 22d having to be made in the most profound silence.

The troops will drink all the water they can before marching, and will take with them, in their canteens or other vessels, all they possibly can carry; they will economize the water all they can, for we shall encamp at night without water, and shall not arrive at it until 12 o'clock on the following day. The chiefs of corps will pay much much attention to this last instruction.

Each mule belonging to the ammunition train, and the horses of officers, will receive two rations of corn, which they will take with them, and these will be fed to them to-morrow night at dusk and on the following morning at daybreak. The horses' girts will only be slackened, and the mules will not be unfastened while they are eating. The light brigade will likewise obey this order on the night of the 21st—only loosing their saddles a little. The horse and mules will all be taken to water before commencing the march.

Each division will take with it its respective medical staff, hospital attendant, medicines, as regulated by the medical inspector general.

The chaplain I chief will provide each division with its chaplain. He will also, as to morrow is a Feast Day, order mass to be said at 5 o'clock in front of the position occupied by the van guard; at 7 o'clock in front of the centre; at 8 o'clock in front of the rear guard; and at 9 o'clock in front of the division of cavalry.

Gen. Don Francisco Perez is ordered to be recognized as second in command to Gen. Lombardini, and Gen. Don Luis Guzman as second to General Ortega.

To facilitate the duties of the conductor general of the baggage train, the cavalry of Celaza and all the presidial troops are hereby placed under his command.

His excellency the general in chief recommends to every officer punctual compliance with and obedience to each and every part of this his general order.
By order of his excellency,

Manuel Micheltorena,

Chief of the general staff.

[We know not the poetizer that thus condenses the report of Santa Anna to the Mexican minister of war the battle of Buena Vista.]

Your excellency, we've won the day,
My "heroes" fought amid the fray,
And whipped the Yankees without pay,
And then - we ran away.

MAJOR GENERAL SCOTT'S PROCLAMATION.

Headquarters of the army, Vera Cruz, April 11, 1847.

Major Gen. Scott, general in chief of the armies of the United States of America, to the good people of Mexico:

Mexicans!—At the head of a powerful army, soon to be doubled—a part of which is advancing upon your capital—and with another army with Major Gen. Taylor, in march from Saltillo towards San Luis Potosi—I think myself called upon to address you.

Mexicans—Americans are not your enemies, but the enemies, for a time, of those men who, a year ago, misgoverned you, and brought about this unnatural war between two great republics. We are the friends of the peaceful inhabitants of the country we occupy, and the friends of your holy religion, its hierarchy and its priesthood. The same church is found in all parts of our own country, crowded with devout Catholics, and respected by our government, laws and people.

For the church of Mexico, the unoffending inhabitants of the country, and their property, I have from the first done everything in my power to place them under the safeguard of martial law against the few bad men in this army.

My orders, to that effect, known to all, are precise and rigorous. Under them, several Americans have already been punished, by fine, for the benefit of Mexicans, besides imprisonment, and one, for a rape has been hung by the neck.

Is this not a proof of good faith and energetic discipline? Other proofs shall be given as often as injuries to Mexicans may be detected.

On the other hand, injuries committed by individuals, or parties of Mexico, not belonging to the public forces, upon individuals, small parties, trains of wagons and teams, or of pack mules; or any other person or property belonging to this army, contrary to the laws of war—shall be punished with rigor; or if the particular offenders be not delivered up by Mexican authorities, the punishment shall fall upon entire cities, towns or neighborhoods.

Let, then, all good Mexicans remain at home, or at their peaceful occupation, but they are invited to bring in, for sale, horses, mules, beef, cattle, corn, barley, wheat, flour for bread, and vegetables. Cash will be paid for every thing this army may take and purchase, and protection will be given to all sellers. The Americans are strong enough to offer these insurances—which, should Mexicans wisely accept this war may soon be happily ended, to the honor and advantage of both belligerents. Then the Americans, having converted enemies into friends, will be happy to take leave of Mexico and return to their own country.

WINFIELD SCOTT.

A correspondent of the Spirit of the Times says: "On the 4th ult. a party was given by some officers as a slight return for the pleasure they had experienced at the delightful party given them by the amiable lady of the German consul. It was deemed extremely doubtful whether the Mexican ladies could be prevailed to join us. A gentleman well acquainted with them, kindly took the matter in hand, and reported that he believed the affair perfectly practicable. It was decided that it should be a steamboat excursion up the Panuco. The United States steamer Mary Summers was kindly placed at their disposal, and every thing that could possibly be desired was placed on board of her by the energy and taste of the accomplished Captain M----, of the 1st artillery. Just consider the neat little steamboat lying at the wharf, steam up, and tastefully decorated with flags.

At 3 o'clock the ladies and their gentlemen friends commenced assembling. In a very short time we had twenty-five ladies ---with one exception they were either foreigners or Mexicans, and all ladies. The band of the 2d artillery accompanied us. Great anxiety was expressed about the arrival of General S. who was one of the principal persons in getting up the affair; it was his popularity combined with all of the principal families, which induced so many to honor us. The hour arrived-but no Gen. S. Some little anxiety was manifested by our fair friends - the boat was detained. At last much to our regret, apologies had to be made, and we took our departure.

The company had assembled on the hurricane deck—a crowd had collected on the wharf - and, as we shoved off, the band struck p a lively air. I then had time to look around me and take a peep at our fair and trusting visitors. Delicacy forbids that I should individualize, but there was one dark eyed Senora, with true Mexican complexion who attracted universal attention. Her soft drooping black eyes, fine contour of features, and stately form were the subject of admiration. Our interesting her was increased when we were told that she was destined to early widowhood. Her husband, poor fellow, was fast dying with consumption. But few of the ladies could talk English, and I was therefore afraid the affair would go out stiffly.

Before we had gone five miles, partners were called for a quadrille. The ice was broken; the magic of happiness which ever hangs o’er the movements of dance, immediately communicated itself to our fair guests. Eyes that were dull now sparkled- the [illegible] were assured- and all seemed to say, "we have come for amusement, and whether with enemies or friends, we are determined to have it." The graceful waltz took the place of the quadrille. I sat in the stern if the boat and contemplated the scene; it was one that could not but be viewed with the greatest interest. Here we were in the enemy’s country- the fair Mexicans confiding in our honor, were unhesitatingly trusting themselves in the waltz with officers commanding troops opposed to their countrymen. A lady expressed herself to me, “that when it was proposed she had not the remotest idea that it would come[illegible]” This pleasant reunion cannot but have a happy effect socially and politically; it brings us together, and it is only by association that we can be known; they will see that we are not the "barbarian," as represented, but, like themselves are gay and light hearted, and even dance to the "merry castanet."

Stately and rapidly moved the steamer- the graceful and happy couples whirled away in the waltz- the music stole softly o’er the broad and placid rubber, and the deep green woods re-echoed sounds of happiness. I was lost in the quiet tranquil beauty of the scene- was reflecting how soon these graceful arms which now supported beauty, those manly forms might "bite the dust," when my dream was disturbed by the cry of the, "brick yard!” Sure enough there it was, in the elbow of the river. We had sailed 22 miles, scarcely being aware of it.

We soon reached there, and the boat was fastened at the landing. It had been arranged we should sail to the brick yard, and there complete the frolic by dancing at the house of the hospitable owner, who, by the way, was an American. Just as we were going on the shore, a canoe shoved out from the landing, and was paddled up the stream. Seated in it under a cover of raw hides, was a mother and two beautiful girls. They had left the city in the morning, and were on their way to some village of the Panuco.- All explained-"Stop them, and have them join in the festivities!" Every effort was made, but without success.

We all disembarked, and promenaded around the gentlemen's garden, and then betook ourselves to the house; it was quite capacious. With M’s usual energy and management, a room was soon prepared for our dancing; our empty bottles served as candlesticks. Having had the precaution o bring a box of candles, the room was brilliantly illuminated. By this time we were on the nest kind of terms with all, and the dance commenced with renewed glee. Few quadrilles were dances- they are devoted to the waltz and the contre dance, which is a happy combination of the two; the figures of the latter dance are beautiful; even the polka was danced. For the first time in five years I waltzed the whole evening. There is no such thing as an appropriate or monopoly of the belle. During the waltz, if a gentleman wishes to waltz with any particular lady, he signifies his wish, and his partner immediately resigns her. You waltz with her two or three times round, and then return her to her partner. It is a delightful and sensible custom, and, id only introduced into the states, might be conductive to much more sociability and kindness of feeling and prune off a little selfishness of the monopoly of a belle by a few, to the exclusion of many, and probably more ardent admirers.

At eight o'clock a most excellent supper was set on board the boat, to which the ladies were ushered by a march. Sociability, happiness, and confidence reigned throughout, and amidst the exhilaration of champagne we returned to the dance. Whether bright eyes were really brighter, and fair forms fairer, I knew not; but yet they seemed so, as with renewed joy the dance commenced.

Amid a happy dance the steamboat bell tolled the hour of return; we embarked upon the placid river, and, to the sound of music, glided rapidly to the city. The moon, most unfortunately, had been obscured, but she deigned one smile upon us, as if in approbation of the scene. We landed at the wharf, with the band playing, at 12 o'clock; and our fair guests retired to their homes, apparently gratified with their trip. It is to be hoped no matter where the fortunes of war carry is, that the memory of the Brick Yard Pick Nic, given by the American officers to the ladies of Tampico, will ever be fresh. So much for picnics. [KAM]

NNR 72.151  May 8, 1847  Gen. Zachary Taylor's official report on efforts to re-open communications with Camargo

OFFICIAL. Letters have just been received at the war department from General Taylor. The last bears date on the 28th of March. A previous letter runs as follows; and it pays the proper tribute to the gallant conduct of Col. Morgan, of the Ohio volunteers;

Headquarters of the Army, Camp near Monterey, March 22, 1847.

SIR: I deem it my duty to report somewhat more I detail the occurrences attending the interruption of our line of communication with Camargo, and the service recently rendered by troops on that line.

Pursuant to previous orders, issued before the advance of the enemy upon Saltillo became known, the 2d Ohio regiment had occupied three points of the line--Col. Morgan, with--companies, taking post at Seralvo, Lieut. Colonel Irvin, with three at Marin, and Major Wall with--at Punta Aguada. On the 21st of February, Col. Morgan was ordered to concentrate his regiment, and move forward to Monterey. The enemy had already begun to infest the road, but Col. Morgan, who received the order on the night of the 23d, was able to bring up Major Wall's command and march the next morning.

On the road he was advised that a train on its way from Monterey had been attacked that day (24th) near Ramas, and the escort and drivers, with a few exceptions, killed or made prisoners. On the morning of the 25th, Colonel Morgan was joined by twenty-five drivers and wagon masters, who had fled into the hills and escaped the fate of their companions.--[On reaching the scene of the disasters, he found the drivers horribly mutilated, and several bodies thrown into the flames of the burning wagons.] Finding no wounded, the march was continued to Marin, which was fond to be almost deserted. The enemy's cavalry, under Gen. Urrea, had been before Marin for two days, and several skirmishes had taken place between them and Lieut. Col. Irvin's command. The arrival from Monterey of a reinforcement of infantry nd two field pieces under Maj. Shepard, (1st Kentucky regiment) had been surrounded and captured.

At 12 o'clock at night Col. Morgan resumed his march and met the enemy near Agua Fria. Forming his command in square, and marching in that order he continued to San Francisco, hving on the road several encounters with the enemy, who attempted to break his formation. From San Francisco a messenger was dispatched to Lieut. Col. Irvin, then encamped at this place, who promptly took up the march, and, with two pieces of artillery, joined Col. Morgan at 11 o'clock, a.m. The enemy, who had in the meantime continued his attacks, now made a final effort, but after a sharp action of a few minutes was driven back, and retreated from the field.

The loss of Col. Morgan's command in these affairs was three Americans and one friendly Mexican killed, one wagnner mortally, and one soldier slightly wounded. The enemy is supposed to have sustained a considerable loss, but from the nature of the engagement, its amount could not be ascertained. We have to lament the fall of Captain B. F. Graham, assistant quartermaster in the volunteer service, who was killed in the action after behaving in the most gallant manner.

I would recommend to particular notice the gallant conduct and energy of Col. Morgan throughout these operations. Lieut. Col. Irvin, Major Wall, and Adjutant Joline, 2d Ohio regiment, and Maj. Shepherd, are also entitled to notice for good conduct and valuable services.
NNR 72.151 May 8, 1847 rumor of Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna in force between Veracruz and Jalapa

From the Vera Cruz Eagle of the 13 April.

Santa Anna-Again must we appear before our readers without having any positive information as to the doings and whereabouts of the enemy. Rumor, in the meantime, is rife with news, and we must, perforce, set down to her account many things, which, however much we may believe them, we dare not give to the public as veritable. One of the most important outgivings up to this time, is, that Santa Anna, seconded by La Vega, and a force of near 12,000 strong, has taken a position between this and Jalapa, which is said by those familiar with the country, to be very strong.

This report we find very generally believed by many officers of the army, and by the citizens of the place. [ANP]

NNR 72.151 May 8, 1847 Plot discovered among Mexicans at Tampico

Some day last week a number of Mexicans were discovered in the act of inciting the citizens of Tampico to revolt and drive the Americans from the place. We are not advised of the particulars, but learn that Col. Gates banished them from the city, forbidding their return under penalty of death. [KAM]

NNR 72.151 May 8, 1847 Cleaning of San Juan de Ulloa

The castle of San Juan de Ulloa has undergone a thorough cleansing throughout, making it approach much nearer a place in which an American soldier ought to reside. We are informed that a more filthy place could scarcely be imagined at the time our troops took possession. [KAM]

NNR 72.151-72.152 May 8, 1847 breaking up of general headquarters at Veracruz

Breaking up of general headquarters. Yesterday evening at five o’clock, Gen. Scott and his staff left their quarters in the Plaza, and started for Jalapas. They were, and will probably be up with Gen. Twiggs, of the advance, in two or three days. [ANP]

NNR 72.152 May 8, 1847 Alvarado Opened

The port of Alvarado, which has been closed for several months, is now open to our commerce, and to all the neutral vessels not having on board articles contraband of war.

-It appears that there was at Alvarado when the place surrendered to Lieut. Hunter, sixty pieces of heavy cannon; all serviceable and in fine order except three. [KAM]

NNR 72.152 May 8, 1847 Gen. Zachary Taylor's proclamation to the inhabitants of Tamaulipas, Nueva Leon, and Coahuila about losses by banditti

GEN. TAYLOR-MEXICAN BANDITTI.

The general in chief of the American forces to the inhabitants of Tamaulipas, Nueva Leon, and Coahuila

When the American troops first crossed the frontier and entered the above states, it was with the intention, and publicly declared to you, of making war, not upon the peaceful citizens of the soil, but upon the central government of the republic, with an aversion to obtain an early and honorable peace.

The undersigned was authorized by his government to levy contributions upon the people for the support of his army; but, unwilling to throw the heavy burden of war upon those who, with few exceptions, manifested a neutral disposition, he has continued first to pay punctually and liberally for all supplies drawn from the country for the support of his troops.

He has used every effort to cause the war to bear lightly upon the people of these states, and he had hoped by this means, to retain their confidence and to assure their neutrality in the strife between his government and their neutrality in the strife between his government and that of Mexico; but he regrets to say that his kindness has not been appreciated but has been met by acts of hostility and plunder. The citizens of the country, instead of pursuing their avocations quietly at home, have, in armed bands, waylaid roads and under the direction and with the support of government troops, have destroyed trains and murdered drivers under circumstances of atrocity which disgrace humanity.

The undersigned requires from the people of the country an identification for the loss sustained by the destruction of the - (Illegible); and the pillage of their contents. To that end an estimate will be made by the proper officers of the entire loss, and this loss must be made good, either in money or in the products of the country by the community at large, of the states of Tamaulipas, New Leon, and Coahuila each district of juzgado paying its just proportion.

It is expected that the rich will bear their full share.-And the undersigned calls upon all good citizens to remain absolutely neutral, and to give no countenance to the bands which infest the country for the purpose of murder and pillage. It is his anxious desire to continue the same policy as heretofore, and he trusts that he course of the citizens will enable him to do so.

Z. TAYLOR, Major Gen. U.S. Army,
Headquarters at Monterey, March 31, 1847.

[NPR] 72.152 May 8, 1847 Order exempting foreign goods to be re-shipped to Mexico from the American tariff

Denis Prieur, collector of customs at New Orleans, has received instructions from Washington to allow all merchandise liable to foreign duties to be shipped to the Mexican ports occupied to our troops without paying the foreign duties under our tariff. [KAM]

[NPR] 72.152-153 May 8, 1847 American Plan to demand a right of way across Mexico from ocean to ocean

The secretary of the treasury proposes that the United States should require Mexico the right to cross the Mexican Isthmus from the Gulf of the Pacific. - In this connection, it is said, that the steamer Polk has sailed from Norfolk for Huassacualo, in the bay of Campeachy. She takes out an armament for the purpose of taking occupation of that port. She is to make a complete survey of the coast in the neighborhood of the Isthmus, with a view to its occupation, preparatory to the opening if a ship canal across to Tehuantepee. [KAM]

The Campaign of Gen. Wool,
And the Battle of Buena Vista.

We remarked at the commencement of the war with Mexico, that the incidents of no war of the same extent since the world has been peopled, ever have been so accurately and so universally known as those of this war would be. The reason is obvious; nearly every soldier in the ranks of our army is capable of writing an account of what he sees, hears, or does-and we have spread over the Union, a newspaper for every platoon of which the army is composed to speed to the four winds of heaven whatever is written.

The following rapid and truly graphic description of the march of General Wool's division of the army, and his junction with General Taylor, and of the subsequent battle of Buena Vista, written by a person who belongs to the 2d Illinois regiment of volunteers, under General Wool-is as vivid and distinct a picture as was ever sketched by the pen of a historian.

The reference which the writer of the letter makes to his associate and fellow private in the ranks of the Illinois regiment, Alexander Konze, the accomplished young German whose character is sketched in such simple unaffected language, furnishes proof at once of the character of the individuals that contribute largely to compose an army from this republic. The elite, the inspired of all lands, seek a home in ours. Konze came from Wisconsin to join the Illinois regiment at Alton, says his friend, "that he might serve the country whose constitution he respected before all other systems of government, and to gratify his curiosity in a new mode of life, by seeing Mexico, and observing, as he did with a philosophic eye, the character of her people and institutions." Such men amalgamated at once with the mass of kindred spirits here, bringing with them and diffusing their own acquirements and tastes in exchange for ours. His fate is told. Who can read it without deploiring,-and the sigh deepens at the reflection, that many as brave, as timable a man, felt amongst the dead of that battle field, whose taste will never be told. Whose moments History will neglect to rear. "While awaiting upon the field," says the writer, "on the night of the twenty-third o February, the renewal of the attack by Santa Anna, the thought was most consolatory to several of his comrades, that death on the next day might make them companions of Miltiades, of Socrates, and of Konze." "Such is the language, without the least appearance of affection, of a private soldier speaking of a group of soldiers around the camp fire a t the close of a terrific conflict which had lasted all day, and which the next days' dawn, it was expected, would renew. These soldiers, with hearts saddened by the loss of a beloved comrade, yet glowing with a sublime patriotism which placed them in communion with the heroic spirits of antiquity, could speak of death, and await it, not only with composure, but with a serene satisfaction, because of the noble fellowship it proffered them in another world."

From the correspondent of the Boston Evening Post.
Camp at Buena Vista, Coahuila, Mexico,
March 22, 1847.

I seize the first opportunity afforded since the battle of Buena Vista, of writing you from the field, an account of the more recent operations of General Taylor's army, including that of General Wool heretofore known as the centre division. The official details of the battle are, I suppose, already published in the states and made familiar to you; but you must be ignorant of many occurrences of great interest, precedent and subsequent to that memorable event.

General Wool landed from the gulf on the 2d of August last, at La Vaca, Texas, with the first and second regiments of Illinois foot, commanded Cols. John J. Hardin and Wm. H. Bissell, and soon after took up the march for San Antonio de Bexar, one hundred and fifty miles to the north. Here he was joined by Col. Yell's mounted regiment from Arkansas, and by that of Col. Marshall, of Kentucky; by Capt. Washington's well drilled company of flying artillery, eight pieces, from Carlisle in Pennsylvania and by major Bounneville's battalion of regular infantry. Col. Harney, with four companies of dragoons, was also attached to this division. General Wool displayed great activity in organizing his army and putting the commissariat in the finest possible condition. Sugar and coffee of the best quality have always been a part of his soldiers' daily diet. No army was ever better provided that this with all the munitions and appliances of war, if we except the quality of the powder which the government, by some most culpable agents furnished to us, the infantry, for the day of battle,-an article far inferior to that of English manufacture, used by the Mexican soldiers. The tow months passed in this delightful region, were well spent in drilling for active service. On the 26th of September, two days after the capitulation of Monterey, the advance under Colonel Harney marched for the Rio Grande followed soon after by General Wool, who left Colonel Churchill, the inspector, and Colonel Bissell to bring up the rear, as they began to do on the 14th of October. The whole army, at this time, was two thousand six hundred strong. We of the advance, marched to the Rio Grande, two hundred miles in twelve days, resting one, for General Wool to join us.

As I can only approximate to accuracy, I shall use round numbers in mentioning distances and the population of towns. Crossing the present boundary between our country and Mexico, on the 12th day of October, we set foot on the soil of the enemy.-Thence we marched a distance of four hundred miles to the city of Parras, on the southwestern confines of this state and near to a lake of the same name, passing through and taking peaceable posession in our circuitous route of the cities of Presidio del Rio Grande, Nava, San Fernando, Santa Rosa, Monclova, the ancient capital of this state and Parras, which we reached on the 6th December ult. These cities contain, each, a population of from five to fifteen thousand should, except Nava, which numbers about two thousand. Monclova and Parras are quite wealthy and exhibit fine specimens of Spanish art and refinement. We spent some time at nearly all of them, with pleasure and profit, viewing much of Mexican manners and customs and enjoying an apparently cordial intercourse with the citizens.
Our line of march carried us through a great variety of scenery, marked after three days progress in Mexico, by high and barren mountains to the south and west, covered with traces of rich ores; by sterile plains and table lands, scantily supplied, in the dry season, with water; and in the interior by beautiful fertile valleys embosoming the quiet Mexican cities, towns, and haciendas, and surrounded in the hazy distance by clout cap mountains, covered with cedar. You are acquainted with Illinois, and can form some idea of Mexico, as I saw it for six hundred miles, by imagining the Prairie state elevated 50 thousand feet, and made somewhat more broken and undulating with craggy rocky mountains covering from one to two thousand feet above the plains, taking the place of the groves and intersecting the face of the country in all directions. But it is only by actual vision that you can adequately estimate the grand though uninspiring picture of lonely desolation; the inhospitable sterility that met the wearied eye of the soldier in his toilsome, thirsty marches, and often made him wish, in his vexation, that an earthquake had sunk the country which he was sent to conquer.

The country bordering the Rio Grande where we crossed it, and for a considerable distance into Mexico, west and south, is low, level, very fertile and well watered by streams or irrigating canals. It already supports a large population, and contains the cities of Presidio, Nava, and San Fernando; the last two, situated forty and fifty miles west of the river, struck me as quite flourishing.

The land between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, for nearly a hundred miles, except a few fertile prairies, is divided into sandy deserts and marshy chaparrals, almost as difficult of access as the jungles of India. It will be the haunt only of savages and wild beasts for many generations, if not forever. Personal observation satisfied me that senator Benton was right when he pronounced the Nueces, the most profitable western boundary of Texas. Of the country east of this river, of which I saw much, I must say, as of Texas generally, with her rolling prairies, and crystal streams, that here I beheld the future France of America—a land destined to bloom with “the olive and myrtle, the cedar and vine,” and to flow even in our own time with milk and honey.

The effect of our long marching, of the strict discipline enforced by our general, and of the exercise taken in drill was most salutary upon the health of the army. After a professional and sedentary life in the bilious atmosphere of the Mississippi, the campaigning had a most renovating effect. The army lay encamped at Monclaova three weeks, during which period our rear came up, and Gen. Wool was ordered to co-operate with General Taylor at Monterey, instead of marching upon Chihuahua, which up to this time had been our destination. Eleven days brought us to Parras, two hundred miles farther into the country, where supplies were abundant. Here we lay in camp eleven days, in friendly intercourse with the people, of whom many are snot destitute of moral worth and intelligence. The American sharpers among them, soi-distant gentlemen, engaged in trade and marrying fortunes, struck me with more disgust than the most degraded Mexicans. Many of the better classes of natives commanded my highest esteem. One Don Manuel Yvarra, who was educated in the United States, found some old friends in the army, and treated us with a hospitality commensurate with his great wealth. His position was fixed in neutrality, by his intelligence, his prudence, by respect for American character and institutions, sympathy with his countrymen, and by an unfeigned aversion from his own rulers, the demagogues in the city of Mexico. Santa Anna has assessed his contribution for the army at sixty dollars per week. His reply was, “come with your army and take it.” But these halycon days soon passed over our heads, and more stirring scenes were at hand. General Worth, who lay at Saltillo, one hundred and twenty miles north of east from us, with a thousand regulars, on the 16th of December received intelligence which he credited, that Santa Anna was within three days’ march of him with 30,000 men, and was advancing. He despatched expresses to Monterey and Parras for aid, promising to hold out one day against any force, and requesting us to reinforce him on the fourth day. General Taylor had gone to Victoria, but General Lane hastened to Saltillo with two regiments. General Wool received the news in the evening of the 17th, and in less than two hours the whole army was on the march. On the 21st we reinforced Worth but no enemy was present. For three nights in succession on this march, which we accomplished in three days and a half, the army was roused at one o’clock in the morning to resume the advance. The cavalry and artillery called us the sleepwalkers, and complained that we were killing off their horses. The spirit displayed by the men, their alacrity, cheerfulness, and patience, were most admirable. Expecting, as they did, to meet the enemy every hour, their demeanor inspired the staff and all other officers with confidence in the result. Volunteers as they were, and, as compared with regulars, but imperfectly disciplined, they suddenly assumed a bearing and readiness in obeying orders, nor altogether unworthy the old guard of Napoleon. This march was a fitting prelude to the battle of Buena Vista. On the 21st of December, we sat down at Agua Nueva, a small rancho or town, twenty-one miles south of Saltillo, and near the great pass in the mountain leading to San Luis Potosi, the seat of the Mexican power. Here we pased Christmas, watching the appearance of the enemy in this pass and two smaller ones, a few miles distant on each side of us. New year’s day was spent at Encantada nine miles nearer to Saltillo; we still watching however, and enjoying the luxury of frequent false alarms. We soon after took up our fighting position at the Rancho, or Ranch, of Buena Vista, five miles from the city, and prepared to defend the pass two miles in advance of our camp. It is said that Colonel Hardin is entitled to the honor of having first suggested this strong position for a stand against the enemy.

In the meantime, General Taylor had hastened back to Monterey, and was concentrating all the forces at his command, either to receive the attack or to make it himself. General Scott, however, chose that he should receive it. Early in January, General Worth was detached, with his division, from Taylor, and joined to Scott at Tampico. Not content with taking this and General Patterson's command at Matamoros, Scott, broke into our division, the marching column, and drew off to himself Colonel Harney, with two companies of dragoons, and Major Bonneville's battalion of four companies, leaving Wool an army of volunteers, exclusively, if you except Captain Washington's battery, which last, even he had the modesty to request for his own use.

I should have stated before that General Shields, with a body guard, left us at Monclova, in great disgust with matters and things in the "sleeping division," saying we should see no enemy, and that the "old man would deep us gathering up provisions." I am informed that he sent off his aid, G. T. M. Davis, to Monterey, and thence to Washington with despatches, which were mentioned in the papers as coming from General Wool, but of which General Wool denies all knowledge; also, that he was very desirous of supplanting the old man in this command; of all which I have not he least doubt. Wool had alienated many good officers from him, by his 'curst' manner towards them, which was rougher with officers even than with privates.-Among these was Colonel Harney and Major Bonneville, who doubtless received with joy the order sending them to Scott. General Shields thought he saw in these bickerings alone the road between the chief and his colleagues, a fine opportunity to become chief himself, and fanned the flame of mischief with Machiavellian art. We saw him depart without regret, disgusted as most of us were at his fulsome electioneering with the rank and file, and his vain, self-seeking, unscrupulous ambition.

Of Wool, the best language that can be used is his own conduct at Queenston Heights and Buena Vista, and I shall let it speak for him; with the simple remark that his worst faults lean to the side of rigid discipline, and proceeding from the head, have no place in the heart, which is sound to the core.

Our general was encamped on the 5th ult., with Colonel Bissell and Captain Washington, on the heights above and to the south of Saltillo, the rest of the army being distributed through the valley, still watching the passes to San Luis, when he who is called by his devoted soldiers Old Rough and Ready, came up with Bragg's and Sherman's batteries and Colonel Davis' Mississippi regiment. He expressed great satisfaction and pleasure with our discipline and the manner in which General Wool had "brought us up." By command of General Worth, Gen. Lane with his Indians, and Lieut. Kingsbury, had built a very good fort on the heights of Saltillo, and in it Capt. Webster's two twenty-four pound howitzers, with smaller pieces, were placed and commanded every building in the city below as well as the whole plain from mountain to mountain, east and west.

On the 8th of February, the whole army with General Taylor, except four companies of Illinois, left to guard the town, lay in camp at Agua Nueva, and here our generals patiently awaited the arrival of new levies, which they hoped would make their forces ten thousand strong, and forty days' provisions, to enable us to march for Santa Anna's stronghold, San Luis Potosi, three hundred miles south of Saltillo. General Taylor expected to be ready for the march on the first of April. But for a long time the signs had been thickening, that he Mexican dictator was aiming a blow at Scott. The\n

General Taylor expected to be ready for the march on the first of April. But for a long time the signs had been thickening, that he Mexican dictator was aiming a blow at Scott. The could not carry off, he retired to our position. On the next day the birth day of Washington, in the morning, Colonels Bissell and McKee, with their respective regiments, and Gen. Lane with his brigade, marched out to meet his enemy. We left our tents standing, and our baggage and provisions, which were in the Ranch, unguarded, except by teamsters, and one man more, Major Roman, commissary. Our force on the field varied little from four thousand, as all concur in stating. The mountains on each side of our position stand two miles apart, and are high and difficult of ascent. Our flanks rested upon them. The centre occupied the road, with Washington's battery behind a slight breastwork of earth; above, a little on the left and in advance of which, Colonel Hardin was posted, on a high conical hill, behind a low breastwork of stone. His office was to guard this battery on the road below. On a level with this hill to the left was an elevated plain or table land, terminating at the road in high bluffs, and cut up in front and rear of our line, as well as on its right, by very deep, wide ravines, dry, with sloping sides, and running for the most part at right angles with the mountain, and parallel with our line of battle. Here was our left wing. Our right was posted on a low alluvion, cut up in nearly all directions by deep precipitous ravines, now dry, which in the rainy season receive and convey the mountain torrents. This low ground was commanded as far as the mountain, and could be swept by our cannon on the road. Near to and out parallel with the mountain of the right, a creek with high and perpendicular banks ran to the north, between which and the mountain, the Kentuckians of Colonel McKee, with two of Bragg's cannon, were posted on the 22d, and remained there till the morning of the 23d, when, finding nothing to do on the right, they abandoned this position and rushed into the battle, then raging on our left.

It became evident on the 22d, that the high plain was to be the principal field of battle. Most of that day was spent by Santa Anna in throwing a large force of infantry, under General Ampudia, to the mountain to our left, for the purpose of gaining our rear. At four o'clock P.M. of the 22d the battle began, with a cannonade on our right and centre, followed soon after by a sharp engagement in the mountain to our left, between Kentucky riflemen from Col. Marshall's mounted regiment, and the flankers of Ampudia, at least three thousand strong. The mountain sides to the top seemed alive with the enemy, whose bright English muskets glistened in the rays of the setting sun.

Night came and all was still, save the hum of voices from the two opposing armies bivouacked within musket shot of each other. Had our forces been a little larger, that night would have seen the destruction of Santa Anna's army. But our only safety lay in an obstinate defence of our position.-Early in the morning of the 23d the ball opened.-The 2d of Illinois, Colonel Bissell, occupied the right of the plain, his right resting on the head of a ravine, and well guarded by Brigg's and Sherman's artillery. On his left were O'Brien's three pieces, detached from Washington's battery, and still further to our left, next to the mountain, stood the 2d of Indiana, Colonel Bowles, with General Lane and his staff. The 3d of Indiana, Colonel Lane and Colonel Davis' well tried Mississipians, were held in reserve. Behind our line and sheltered by a ravine from the heavy artillery of the enemy, (much heavier than ours,) was our cavalry. The battle today was opened by our riflemen in the mountains, who renewed the attack which they commenced the evening before. To their assistance was soon sent the rifle battalion of the 2d Illinois, three companies under Maj. Trail. Here the blows of our men were soon felt by the enemy who stood at bay, at a respectful distance from their rifles.

The main force of Santa Anna soon advanced against us on the plain, while their artillery played upon our ranks on the left. The infantry came on in admirable order, crossing one deep ravine after another in our front, and deploying out of them into line, with a regularity that excited our admiration, and must have struck the fancy of our two regular generals. Their eight columns of regiments, advancing in line, looked formidable indeed. As the enemy rose out of the first ravine in our front, they opened their fire upon us of the 2d Illinois, which we received some time without returning, and advanced a short way in it; but which, when we did return it, quickly slackened.
The ranks immediately before us soon staggered under our fire, and were ripe for each charge of the enemy's artillery. They were kept back by the fire of our single regiment with destructive effect. By command of Col. Churchill, Col.
Bissell ordered his ranks to cease firing and retreat to the ravine in our rear, which order was several times repeated amidst the rattling volleys before it could be heard and obeyed. Rallying out of the ravine to the right behind the artillery, which was now ploughing through the advancing columns of the enemy, we quickly joined the Kenuckians under Col. McKee, and with them drove back the enemy's left with slaughter into the ravines, where many of them were killed and wounded. But on our left the enemy were citorious, and were fast pushing into our rear. Their flankers in the mountain rushed forward to surround our riflemen, and the swarms of lancers driving before them the Arkansas cavalry, whom Col. Yell in vain called upon that adjured to follow him to the charge.

Our brave skirmishers from the mountains were on the point of being exterminated, when Cols Yell and Marshall, with a few companies and the dragoons of Captain Stern's squadron, slightly checked the career of the lancers, and enabled the greater part of our riflemen to retreat to the
The battle on the plain, meanwhile, was confined to artillery, of which the enemy had planted a battery on our left, and along side of which was the main body of the infantry. On the flanks of our artillery, opposed to that of the enemy, were Cols. Hardin, Bissell, and McKee, ready to repel and expected charge of the Mexican infantry, and in full view of he splendid contest going on in our rear.--Col. Hardin on finding that all the attacks by lancers on Washington's battery were feints, and that the stream of battle flowed only on our side of the field, left his hill and came with a portion of his regiment to the plain. With us was young Clay, whose firm set countenance and eye of fire, called up in memory his eloquent father in the height of an oratorical triumph.

At length, about three o'clock, p.m., we saw the Mexican force in our rear begin to falter and retrace their steps, under the well directed shot of our ranks of marksmen, and the artillery still pouring its iron death bolts into their right. Their lancers, who had taken refuge behind their infantry, and there watched the progress of the fight, made one desperate charge to turn the fortune of the day by breaking the line of Indiana and Mississippi. But the cool, steady volunteers sent them with carnage and confusion to Santa Anna on the plain above, with the report that our reserve was five thousand strong, and filled all the ravines in our rear. The retreat of their infantry, which passed for a moment, was now hastened by the repulse of the lancer, but still under a galling fire. They marched back in excellent order. While making their toilsome and bloody way back, with their men falling at every step, Santa Anna practiced a ruse, to which any French or English officer would have scorned to resort. He exhibited a flag of truce, and sent it across the plain to our right, here stood our generals. The heralds first asked what troops we were, and one officer, a volunteer too, had the folly to say we were regulars, "troupes de tigne." They then asked Gen'l Taylor what terms he had to propose, 'I demand that Gen. Santa Anna surrender himself and his whole army prisoners of war; I will release them on parole'—was his reply. In the morning Santa Anna had summoned Taylor to surrender, representing the folly of his example, and willing to share his fate, seconded the movement and marched with his regiment to the plain. Now came a disastrous movement.—Colonel Hardin called his men to a charge on the retiring enemy. Colonels McKee and Bissell, under the influence of his example, and willing to share his fate, seconded the movement and marched with their men against ten times our numbers. Our batteries took a nearer position and continued their fire. O'Brien with his two remaining guns on our left, accompanied us to the middle of the plain, where he opened on the enemy. We continued to advance, when the Mexicans, wheeling into this, poured upon us, not yet formed into line, a fire such as no ranks ever withstood. At the same time their lancers, in immense squadrons, attacked our right, while their whole line of infantry advanced upon us in rapid, regular march. Their discipline is wonderfully perfect. Had they been less eager to kill and plunder our wounded, and had their officers known the value of life, and how to improve them, the day had been lost to us in blood and horror; for they gave no quarter. Lieut. Robbins surrendered and was stabbed dead, with his own sword. The same fate befell Lieut. Leanhart in the morning, and many others during the day.—We retreated fighting to the head of a ravine far to the right of our batteries, and in advance of our line in the morning. O'Brien's batteries and most of his gunners were gone. We made a short stand at the head of this ravine where McKee, Hardin, and Clay fell, and then ran a gauntlet through it, of three quarters of a mile, in the midst of shot from other sides, to the road where Washington's battery stopped the pursuit and saved us. After crossing a small stream of water, we reached the battery, and climbing Hardin's hill, we were soon greeted with the appearance of Col. Bissell, safe and unhurt. Meantime General Lane with Cols. Davis and Lane and the Monterey heroes of Mississippi, the gallant Indianians and the Illinois Pioneers under their Sergeant McFarland, rose upon the plain, from their victory in the rear, and in full view of our route, with their scathing volleys called off the vultures from the massacre and plunder of the fallen. Following these up, with the American yell, so terrifying to Mexican hearts, they quickly put their discipline to a severe proof to save their own army from a total rout. They formed, however, rapidly, and renewed the battle; when General Lane off to our left to protect our artillery, whose borders, above all other sounds, incessantly and without pause continued to drown the groans of the wounded, and to chant the requiem of the dead, carrying death upon their bolts through the solid ranks of Santa Anna.

As soon as I had found a breathing place, the shrill voice of Gen'l Wool was heard, calling in trumpet tones, "Illinois, Illinois, to the rescue; out my brave boys, out and defend our batteries." So complete had been our rout, and the dispersion of the 2d of Illinois, which, with six companies, had in the morning, kept her iron tanks against the whole Mexican line, that now, only four men of the regiment were within hearing of this appeal, who answered it by rallying instantly, with a few Kentuckians and Illinoians of the first, to repel with General Lane, a threatened charge. These four men were, private Herman Busch, Corporal Charles Gooding, a lieutenant, and Colonel Bissell. I mention the last with greater pleasure, because he is a true man, a good officer, a native of your state and my colonel. Our force augmented swiftly with the rallying fugitives; but Santa Anna judged it prudent not to make this charge, and thus to save a part of his army for other fields. Had he made it, I cannot bring myself to doubt as to the result, when I consider the exasperated mind of every survivor among us, inflamed to the highest and bitterest resentment for the wanton murders of the wounded and vanquished, committed under our eyes throughout the day. We had now determined to conquer or to die.

Santa Anna resumed his retreat. Still under the fire of our artillery and in good order he recrossed the ravines, out of which he had marched upon us in the morning. His bivouack was a little in advance of our position till about midnight, when he retired to Agua Nueva, and thence on the 26th ult., marched for San Luis Potosi. He admitted his loss to have been four thousand killed, wounded and missing, of whom, certainly, not half were deserters.-We exchanged his prisoners for C.M. Clay and the others taken in January, whom he promised to send to Vera Cruz. Our killed and wounded were seven hundred. The dispatches have already informed you who they are. The letter is now so long that I must close with a brief notice of a few of the dead, reserving the most recent events for another epistle.

Captain Lincoln, so distinguished at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, was shot through he head early in the day, while rallying us, and fell from his horse, near me, into the arms of Captain Raith. He was a gallant New Engander, and stood high in the esteem of all. He was adjutant to Gen. Wool.

Colonel Hardin was slain by lancers, near where, and soon after McKee and Clay were shot. He was an excellent officer, a good lawyer, and was a man of talent. His character and late bear a strong similitude to that of Colonel Davies, who fell at Tippecanoe.

Colonel McKee, whom I did not know, is much regretted in the army, and his character spoken of, universally, in the most exalted terms.

It was never my fortune to know a more kind hearted, chivalric and accomplished gentleman than Col. as. He fell with Capt. Porter, with lancers, but feebly knew with but to love him; none named him but to praise.

Lieutenant William Price, of our Illinois rifle battalion, was slain by lancers while retreating from the mountains, after our left was turned in the morning. The frost of seventy two winters had silvered his hairs, and he had left a home of affluence and ease, with the expressed wish to die in the service of his country, and, if need be, on the field of battle. "They cannot cheat me out of many years," said he.-When ordered with the battalion, like a forlorn hope, to the trying contest in the mountains, he exclaimed with a look of joy, as he drew his sword: "Now boys, this looks like doing something." The enemy triumphed over his fall, supposing hi to be General Wool, and some prisoners taken soon after said that General Taylor alone was left to save us. They judged erroneously of us from themselves, and would have found us an army still, though deprived of our three generals.

Lieutenant Colonel Henry Clay, jr., was much lamented. His manners, voice, and features reminded the observer strongly of his father. You saw the suavity, ease, and dignity of his carriage and deportment in them both. The statesman of Kentucky will say with old Siward:

"My son has paid a soldier's debt,
In the unshrinking station where he fought.
Had I as many sons as I heirs,
I would not wish them a fairer death:
And so his knell is knolled.
In the same part of the field, and about the same time with Clay, McKee, and Hardin, another fell, pierced by a lance, whose name is worthy of a place in the rolls of fame—Private Alexander Konze, of Company H, 2d Regiment of Illinois. The writer was honored with his friendship, and had an opportunity of knowing him well, being a member of the same company and his tent mate. His conduct on the field was most soldierly, cool, calm, deliberate, and prompt in obeying orders. His courage was conspicuous, even in the moment of his death, when he refused to surrender. Except a brother in South America, he left no relatives on this continent. His widowed mother lives in Bueckenburg, in Hanover, near to his native city—Hamburg. He received a splendid education at the universities of Jena and Goettingen. He had been but a year in the United States when he joined our regiment in Alton, whither he had come to volunteer, from Wisconsin. His motives in taking this step were, that he might serve the country, whose constitution he respected before all other systems of government, and gratify his curiosity in a new mode of life, by seeing Mexico, and observing as he did with a philosophic eye, the character of her people and institutions. The writer promised much pleasure to himself in travelling with him through this country. He was twenty-seven years of age, and probably the most learned man in the army. His knowledge of philology was accurate and profound. Such was his familiarity with the Latin, that by one day's examination of a Spanish grammar he was able to read this cognate language with facility. Many pleasant hours have we sent together in rambling over the plains and mountains of Mexico, while he filled his haversack with new plants to send to Germany, and which his knowledge of botany often enabled him to class in their several genera and species.

A better or a braver heart than his never beat its last on a field of battle. While awaiting upon the field, on the night of the 23d of February, the renewal of the attack by Santa Anna, the thought was most consolatory to several of his comrades, that death on the next day, might make them companions of Militates, of Socrates, and of Kunze. This man died for a country of which he was not a citizen; shall it be said that he, the republican son of Germany, was not a true American? May his example animate the hearts of those whom alone he would acknowledge as countrymen—the good and the true of every clime and country.

Respectfully, Nath'l Niles.

pursued a party of about thirty lancers who turned off in a byroad, and all but five were wither sabred or dismounted. Major Sumner and Lieutenant Silby. At the head of first set of fours, had several personal encounters with the enemy, who were, in every instance, either killed or dismounted. The pursuit was continued to the village of Madeline, six miles from the bridge, from which another party of lancers were seen retreating and Lieutenant Neill, my adjutant, being in advance, pursued them with three men.

A party was sent to support him; but his horse being fleeter than the rest, he came first upon the enemy, and two of them closing upon him, he received two severe lance wounds in the breast and arm, in consequence he fell from his horse, but not until he displayed uncommon gallantry in his defence. Hearing this, and believing the enemy in force, I continued the pursuit two miles further; but night coming on, I was reluctantly compelled to desist. I had Lieutenant Neill brought to the village of Madeline, where I halted for three hours to refresh the men and horses, and then I returned to camp with my command, which I reached at 3 o'clock in the morning. After my disposition had been made for the attack, Major General Patterson came up with Colonel Campbell's regiment of 1st Tennessee volunteers. He did not assume command, but rendered important aid by his gallant bearing and demeanor. Colonel Campbell's regiment participated in the attack and assault; and my thanks are due to him. Also to Colonel Haskell and Captain Cheatham, who evinced great zeal and gallantry. Colonel Haskell was the first to leap the parapet. Lieut. Judd's position was perilous, and he exhibited rare judgment, coolness, and intrepidity; and the service of himself and his subaltern, Lieutenant H. Brown were of inestimable value. The steadiness and gallantry displayed in the presence of the enemy by officers and men, both of regulars and volunteer service, merit my highest approbation. As to my own regiment, it would be invidious to particularize where all behaved so nobly. Especial thanks are due to my staff, Lieut. Lowery, Lieut. Neill, and Dr. Barnes who were active and zealous in the discharge of their respective duties. Neither can I omit to mention the effective service rendered by Brevet Major B. L. Beall and Captain W.J. Hardee, of my regiment. The former, though confined to his bed by sickness, joined my command on the first imitation of engagement. The latter mounted at the commencement of the pursuit, and joined me as one of my staff. In the day's action I lost two men killed and nine wounded, among them my guide Thomas Young, of Texas, who discharged his duty with fidelity and bravery. It is not ascertained precisely what number of the enemy was killed; but it is known that not less than fifty fell in the attack and subsequent pursuit.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. S. HARNEY, Colonel 2d Dragoons, com'dg

Lieutenant H.L. Scott, A.A.A.G. Camp Washington, before Vera Cruz

NNR 72.159 May 8, 1847 Order No. 94 relative to transportation &c.

Limited means of transportation being in readiness, portions of the army will march as follows:

The second division of regulars on the 8th instant, the division of volunteers (two brigades only twenty-four hours later.

Major General Patterson will leave one of his three brigades in this immediate vicinity for further means of transportation, and also the Tennessee dismounted cavalry until the arrival of their horses. Both of these corps for the time, will be under the immediate orders of the same brigadier general, and the latter, when his division marches, will report to general headquarters for instructions.

The respective chiefs of the general staff will assign to the headquarters of each marching division an engineer, topographical engineer and ordnance officer, an assistant quartermaster, an assistant commissary, and a medical officer.

The chief quartermaster will assign to the second division forty-five wagons, and to the division of volunteers fifty-five, for the entire baggage of the officers of every grade, the regiments and companies.-The interior distribution of wagons will be made at the headquarters of each division.

Taylor's and Talcott's field batteries will march with the second division, and Steptoe's with the division of volunteers.

Col. Harney will detach a squadron of 24? Dragoons with each of these divisions.

A special requisition for transportation will be made for those field batteries and squadrons, and one wagon will be assigned to the medical director of the division for extra medicines and hospital
Every man will take, for his musket or rifle, forty rounds of ammunition, and in his haversack, hard bread for four days and bacon or pork (cooked) for two days. Fresh beef, with rations of salt, will be issued on the march.

The utmost care will always be taken of ammunition and food for the troops.

The chief quartermaster will send in extra wagons, grain for the saddle, artillery, and cavalry horses of each division for four days, and each baggage wagon will take grain for the same number of days for its own team.

He will also turn over to the chief of ordnance ten wagons, and to the chief commissary one hundred wagons, to be loaded by them, respectively, with cartridges for small arms, and subsistence stores.

These extra wagons will be divided between the two divisions, march with and be escorted and guarded like other wagons attached to the division.

The quartermaster's and commissary departments will take prompt measures for the purchase and issue on the march of such forage and subsistence as it may be practicable to obtain, as also for trains and escorts that may be sent back to this depot.

Each general of division will receive a route of march and instruction from general headquarters.

By command of Major General Scott:

H.L. SCOTT, A.A.A. General.

NNR 72.160 May 8, 1847 ACCOUNT OF THE VICTORY AT CERRO GORDO

POSTSCRIPT.

ARMY OF INVASION.

GREAT BATTLE AND VICTORY OF CERRO GORDO.

New Orleans papers of the 29th and 30th ult. furnish us with brief accounts of a bloody battle fought at Cerro Gordo, on the 18th April, in which the American army under Gen. Scot was signally victorious, though not without severe loss on our side.

Gen. Shields was mortally wounded; Gen. Pillow slightly wounded. Major Sumner was shot in the head by a musket ball, but will recover. Capt. Mason of the rifles lost a leg. Lieut. Ewell badly wounded. Lieut. McLane wounded, but not severely—Pierson of the 4th, wounded, also Lieuts. Gibbs, Maury, Kervis; Lieut. Davis; Capt. Patton slightly.

The conflict commenced by the advance under Gen. Twiggs, and a severe but not decisive battle ensued.

Shields, with the Wabash and Illinois regiment, went to the aid of Twiggs—the victory was complete.

Cols. Baker, Childs, Harney, Riley, Foreman, Haskell, all behaved beyond all praise.

On the 17th the Mexicans took possession of a hill in front of all their works, from which to dislodge them Gen. Twiggs ordered the rifles under major Sumner, with some detachments of artillery and infantry, including Capt. Williams' company of Kentucky and Capt. Nailer's company of Pennsylvania volunteers, to the charge. It was done in style, but the loss was severe. The Mexican defense was obstinate. The rifle regiment suffered terribly. In Col Haskell's command, Lieut. F.B. Nelson, and Lieut. C.G. Gill, both from Memphis, were killed; Lieut. Col. Cummings, major Farquharson, Adj't Haile, Lieut. Yearwood, Forest, Murray, and Sutherland were wounded. The regiment went into action with less than 400 men, and lost 79 killed and wounded.

This engagement had not been contemplated. Every arrangement had been made by Gen. Scott to commence the attack on the morning of the 18th and orders issued accordingly. The Mexicans were posted in a Gibraltar from which it was necessary to dislodge them.

The attack was made—the victory is complete.

La Vega on the 17th commanded the Cerro Gordo. Ascertaining that night from a deserter, that the main attack was to be made on the right of their line, he changed places with Gen. Vasquez, in order to meet the assault, which was made there by Gen. Pillow.—La Vega defended the post until the Mexican lines were completely turned.

The Mexican loss upon the heights was awful!—the ground in places covered with the dead. Amongst the bodies were found those of General Vasquez, and near him Col. Palacio, mortally wounded. Their loss in the retreat was terribly severe.—Mr. Kendall, who writes the account, says he thinks five hundred will cover our entire loss. Col. Baker who charged on the last fort taken, had forty five men killed or wounded out of but a portion of his regiment. Lieut. Cowardin killed, Lieut. Murphy mortally wounded, Lieut. Johnson wounded three times, thigh amputated, Lieuts. Scott, Freman, and Maltby, wounded.
Santa Anna lost all his valuable personal effects including plate, money, and even his wooden leg. He narrowly escaped by mounting a saddle mule and taking to the chaparral. The dinner prepared for him was left in haste. His coach is taken and appropriated to the use of major Sumner.

Gen. Vega behaved nobly, but is again taken prisoner. His brother, a colonel is mortally wounded.

There were Mexican general and colonels enough taken to command an abstract army.

Gen. La Vega and Jarero, with fourteen other Mexican officers who refused parole, reached Vera Cruz on the 21st under charge of Capt. G.W. Hughes (Top. Engineers). They will be sent to the U. States. The most of the prisoners will be paroled.

A postscript gives a gleam of hope that General Shields may possible survive. He was wounded leading his brigade to storm one of the enemy's furthest works. Gen. Pillow and all of Col. Haskel's field officers but himself, were wounded in storming the fortification under La Vega.

The rifles, Haskel's Tennessee volunteers, the 1st artillery, the 7th infantry, and Capt Williams' Kentucky volunteers suffered most.

At one o'clock Gen. Twigg's division, who had been in the hardest of the fight, was pursuing the flying enemy towards Jalapa. Gen. Worth allowed Peirson, who commanded the forts near Plan del Rio, fifteen minutes to consider. He surrendered unconditionally. Gen. Worth's division took up the line of march for Mexico on the morning of the 19th,--Gen. Scott was to follow at noon.

NNR 72.160 May 8, 1847 Position of Gen. Zachary Taylor's forces

Our latest dates from Matamoras are to the 18th, and Monterey to the 12th of April.

General Taylor was still encamped at the Walnut Springs, near Monterey. The returning volunteers, it is evident, leave him without an adequate force where with to advance upon Sans Luis, even if his munitions, supplies, and transportations were adequate for penetrating to such a distance, He is waiting for reinforcements.

The 2d regiment of Mississippi volunteers have reached Monterey, all armed as riflemen.

It was rumored at Matamoros that the Massachusetts regiment would be relieved by the 2nd Ohio, and proceed on to Monterey.

The New Orleans Delta, states that the following are the positions and movement of Gen. Taylor's column. According to the last advices:

Our wounded men are doing well. In one hospital, of which Dr. Herrick had charge, one of eighty wounded men of the Illinois regiment, not more than three or four dies-the remainder were fast convalescing. [KAM] was evidently a gallant and well conducted affair.

[Anxious to insert the colonel's account at large in this number we made the effort, but find we would lose the mail b the delay required. It is too good an article to attempt to abbreviate. Our officers write as well as fight.[ANP]

NNR 72.161 May 15, 1847 Scourge (formerly the Bangor) purchased, its voyage to Cuba

The Scourge, we ascertain, was the steamer Bangor, built some years since at Wilmington, Del. intended as a regular boat between Boston and Bangor, Maine. Some misfortune happened to her in her first or second trip--and we heard no more of the Bangor, until the United States being sadly in want of boats of her daft for the Mexican coast, the Bangor, amongst others was brought up at a round price, refitted at New York, and newly names the Scourge. An officer on board of her, gives the following account, in a letter dated Havana, March 18, 1847:

"I do not know whether you were aware of the prognostications made by many persons previous to our departure from New York; but sir, if you were, certainly, you as well as a large portion of our friends must be desirous to hear from us, for many were the doubtful looks and expressions ventured as to whether she would ever cross the gulf stream. Painful as those expressed doubts were to the friends of those that composed her crew, yet frequently they were repeated, and indeed, some were advised to leave her. But our country called for service, to defend her rights, and although from the ominous look of many an experienced eye in naval affairs, we were disposed to doubt the capacity of the steamer for weathering the storm, yet all were willing to brave the battle and the breeze. And accordingly we sailed from New York on the 4th inst. in company with the steamer Scorpion. The evening of our departure, we left astern our companion, as she could not keep up with us and on the third day we experienced quite severe weather. All on board anxiously watched the movements of the little steamer when the bad weather commenced, and we soon found that all was right, for she mounted the big seas like a duck; and during the greater part of our passage, notwithstanding that the weather was bad, and the sea running pretty high, yet was her quarter deck dry. Of course the wind being generally ahead, our passage has been longer than we had hoped for. We arrived yesterday, making it 13 days passage. The Scorpion is not yet in, but we look for her momentarily.

I had forgotten to say one thing, that is, notwithstanding the doubt, as to the capacity of this vessel for sea service, that not even a spare sail was put on board for cases of emergency; this omission looks much as if it was thought she would never arrive in port again and therefore not necessary to go to farther expense in fitting her out. The sails are all old; scarcely is there a common croger upon the ocean, that has spare sails. With regard to other matters, they are very delicate--so excuse me.

We sail for Vera Cruz in three or four days-we would leave sooner, but deficiencies must be made up, for we are undergoing repairs in the boilers, we have found them, also in a bad condition, &c. &c.

Com. Perry passed this place some days ago, on his way to the squadron. We shall hope for a pleasant passage to Vera Cruz, and when there, if opportunity happens, I think that our gallant commander, Charles G. Hunter will give a good account in his log to the country.

March 20th.--We are still here, repairing a defect in the boilers, and very anxious to get off. The United States bomb brig Heela has just made her appearance off the harbor. One officer in a boat has come in and after communicating with our consul (General Campbell) will continue on to Vera Cruz.

The letter bag is yet on board, and I have opened this to give you an example of American character. This day four American citizens, mechanics, have volunteered to come on board tomorrow, (Sunday) and assist in putting our boilers in order; this arises from pure motives of patriotism, as they have said that any offer of pay for their services will be looked upon as an insult to them. This is too good to go unmentioned, and I hope that their names will be sent by our generous commander to the navy department." [KAM]

NNR 72.162 May 15, 1847 Illuminations for Victory

The celebration in honor of the victories in Mexico, took place at New York on Friday evening, the 7th inst. It must have been a splendid affair. The public places and many private dwellings were illuminated, transparencies innumerable, fire works, and flags displayed in all directions. The crowd of course was immense; it is estimated that 400,000 people witnessed the spectacle.
The celebration at Washington city took place on Saturday evening the 8th, the anniversary of the first victory at Palo Alto. It was for that community, equally as imposing as that of New York. The details fill over two columns of the National Intelligencer. A bonfire composed of 100 tar and turpentine barrels and other combustibles, erected into a pillar forty feet high illuminated the space between the capitol and navy yard. [KAM]

NNR 72.162 May 15, 1847 hospitals at Veracruz full, but few deaths, numerous discharges to permit a change of climate

The Hospitals at Vera Cruz.-We were told last evening that there were between a thousand and twelve hundred sick soldiers in the hospital at that place, but that the deaths were comparatively few.-Many of these men are completely prostrated, worn down with disease, and the nature of the climate is such as to make a change absolutely necessary to bring them up again. TO enable them effectually to recover, discharges are given in every case where the certificate of the physician to that effect is given.-Several hundreds have already been sent home, and we notice too that many of the volunteer officers are retiring from service because of ill health.-American Eagle of April 20th. NNR 72.162 May 15, 1847 Alejandro Jose Atocha's peace proposal to the Mexican government

The New York "Courier des Etats Unis" of the 1st May, publishes a letter from Vera Cruz dated the 9th of April. The writer says that, to his own personal knowledge, M. Atocha just before his departure from Mexico, and at three o'clock in the morning, wrote a confidential letter to Rejon, in which he made the following proposition, (in his own name and not officially,) as the basis of a treaty, that, in his opinion and according to his instructions, would be acceptable to both countries:

The adoption as a boundary line between the two countries of the Rio Grande del Norte as far up as parallel of California, which intersects the Rio Gila between the 33rd and 34th degrees of latitude. [This line would only include New Mexico, in addition to California; while the 26th parallel would have deprived Mexico of only one-third of her territory.] The United States were also able to pay for these acquisitions $15,000,000 or 20,000,000, and also become responsible for Mexican claims.

The expenses if the war, M. Atocha estimated at 60,000,000. There was also to be a treaty of commerce, and of alliance between the United States and Mexico, offensive and defensive; the former engaging to protect the latter, as well as to refuse to acknowledge the independence of revolting provinces, and also to defend the frontier against the Indians, keeping thereon a force of from five to ten thousand men.

This letter-writer also (continues the Courier) says that these liberal conditions were read, and M. Atocha was charged by the Mexican Cabinet with a reply to the effect that it would open negotiations the moment the American arms were withdrawn from the Mexican soil.

The Courier des Etats Unis, in its comments upon this letter, remarks that M. Atocha defrayed the expense of his own mission, and that he is going again to Vera Cruz in a few days; this time as a simple traveler. His presence there (adds the Courier) may prove beneficial to the cause of peace. [KAM]

NNR 72.162-72.163 May 15, 1847 British notions about the position of American forces at Veracruz

English notions as to the attack on Vera Cruz, and a march to Mexico.-The London Chronicle says-"The attack on Vera Cruz appears still to stand; that is to say if the yellow fever and the Mexicans permit the troops stationed in the north of the province to advance by land through the passes. Our correspondent has estimated the attacking force at seventeen thousand men. We have not the slightest hesitation in saying, that if in any manner the United States can contrive to congregate that number of men in the neighborhood of Vera Cruz, the town must infallibly fall. The American in sheer fighting will knock the Mexicans to pieces-so that there can be no doubt. It would only be on martial prowess that the result could depend, for the United States by sea could keep their army well supplied and victualled. The puzzle is, however, to see how much further forward the United States will be even when they have won Vera Cruz. Their plan is, it is said, to advance upon Mexico itself, by Jalapa and Perote; but, unless we are much mistaken, this hope is as absurd as that of Napoleon upon Moscow. There is but one thing we know of that is more difficult for the United States army than to get to Mexico, and that would be to get back again to Vera Cruz. The expectation of a successful advance is, however, out of the question. Two gaunt spectres,-disease and famine,-stand in the passes between Vera Cruz and Mexico, and waive the invaders back." [ANP]

NNR 72.163-72.164 May 15, 1847 Jalapa Taken

War With Mexico. "Army of Invasion." Jalapa and Perote Taken.
The U.S. transport ship United States, arrived at New Orleans on the 5th with Vera Cruz dates to the 29th April.
By this arrival the New Orleans Delta received the following letter from their correspondent, "Chaparral."
Jalapa, Mexico, April 21, 1847.

I arrived at this lovely place yesterday, and found that Gen. Twiggs had hoisted the American flag in the city the day before. He followed the retreating heroes of Cerro Gordo to within a few miles of Jalapa, when all traces of them, as a body, disappeared, and he encamped for the night within three miles of the town that evening, and entered and took possession of it early the next morning.

Santa Anna did not pass through Jalapa, but, in company with Ampudia and Torrejon, turned off to the left at his hacienda, and halted for the night at the "nine mile pass," which was being fortified, but which, on second consideration, it was deemed prudent to evacuate. This evacuation took place yesterday morning, and in the evening Col. Harney's dragoons took possession of the Pass. - Gen. Worth following in their footsteps. A number of small arms was taken at the Pass, but they are all of little or no value.

Gen. Worth, it is said, will move on to Perote, at which place many think he will have a fight, as it is reported here that additional defences are being made.

All along the road between Perote and Puebla, the Mexicans here say we will be opposed, and contrary, to the general belief, it is said the commander-in-chief will shortly move in that direction.

The list of killed and wounded, on our side, is much larger than was at first reported - it is over 350. Colonel Childs is the military governor of Jalapa.

April 22d. - Gen. Worth approached last evening within four or five leagues of Perote, and entered the city today. We had accounts last night that it had been evacuated by the soldiery, who spiked all the guns before leaving.

I am extremely glad to have it in my power to state to you that Gen. Shields has improved much since my last, and Lieut. Hammond, who came from him this evening, thinks there is probability of his recovery.

Most of the wagons here will leave for Vera Cruz in the morning, and if it is the intention to remove early, it will retard it for ten or twelve days.

Jalapa, April 23, 10, A.M.

An express has just got in from Perote. General Worth reached that town yesterday, at 11 o'clock, A.M. He found it completely evacuated by the soldiers of the enemy, and a Col. Vasquez left behind to surrender it with decency. An immense number of small arms, the big guns of the castle and city, and ammunition were taken possession of. It was unfounded, the report that the guns had been spiked in the castle; they were found in excellent order. Gen. Ampudia, with about 3,000 cavalry, in a wretched condition, was near the town when our troops entered it, when he put off.

Santa Anna had not been in Perote since the fight at Sierra Gordo, and he is supposed to be somewhere in the mountains. [JLM]

NNR 72.164 May 15, 1847 scenes witnessed on the route from Cerro Gordo

From the correspondent of the Vera Cruz Eagle.

Jalapa, April 20, 1847.

Yesterday, at noon, I left the encampment near Sierra Gordo simultaneously with the thousands of Mexican prisoners who had been released on parole, and who were winding their way to their different homes, or to some place from whence they may again be forced to take up arms against us. I believe their line, extended as it was along the road, was full five miles in length. The Guarda Nacionale was the only corps that maintained any order in their march—the residue trudging along as best they could, and in most admirable disorder.

We rode over the road on which they marched with great difficulty, turning our horses’ heads twenty different ways in the space of half an hour, to avoid riding them down. They were less sad than men under similar circumstances would generally be, and cracked many a joke at their own expense. This was in the early part of the march. But towards sunset, when they had measured 18 or 20 miles of their journey—most of them in their bare feet—they became quite silent and sad, and the effects of the fatigue of the day combined with previous privations, told sensibly upon them. I felt much interested in the numerous camp women—those devoted creatures who follow them through good and evil—and it grieved me to see them, worn down with fatigue, moving at a snail’s pace, their heavy burthens almost weighing them to the earth.

The woman of sixty or more years—the mother with her infant wrapped in her rebosa—the wife, far advanced in that state that "women wish to be who love their lords"—the youthful Senorita frisking along with her lover’s sombrero on her head; even to the prattling girl who had followed padre and madre to the wars—could all be sent at one view moving along—and bearing the hardships of the tramp, unconscious of the existence of misery in this world.

These women, like the Indians, are the slaves of the men—a slavery they submit to under the all powerful influence of affection. In addition to their bedding and wearing apparel, they pack upon their backs the food and the utensils to cook in it, and worn out as they are by the toils of the day, whilst their husband or lover sleeps, they prepare his repast.

I noticed one man—a general—who left General Scott’s quarters about the time I did. He was an elderly man, and I soon perceived from his hobbling that he had but one leg. His progress on the march was an object of curiosity to me, and I was surprised to see him keep up so well with the more youthful and perfect limbed. I halted for some time at the hacienda of Santa Anna, to rest my horse, and my eyes ran eagerly over the column of prisoners to see if he had kept up. The fourth or fifth man to the writer was himself. He had refused a dozen offers to ride, both from our men and his own. About 11 o’clock at night all of them passed my tent—save those who had sunk down from the effects of the march—which was about three ills from this place. An hour afterwards a polite voice at the tent asked permission to light a segar from the fire. I looked out, it was he. He said he had not been able to keep up with the advance, but would reach Jalapa in one hour’s time. The segar lighted, he hobbled off again, and this morning I met him in the streets, apparently not at all affected with the jaunt.

When the Mexicans surrendered, it was about their dinner hour. In one of their forts the camp kettles were taken from the fire, and the rations were being proportioned out, when the order for surrender came from the second in command—so they had to march out without their dinners. That evening, although large quantities of food had been served out to them by our commissaries, they were picking up old bones, stale pieces of bread, and everything that could be eaten. Yesterday, on the march, they would run up to a beef, killed the day before by our advance, and cut off every piece that could be obtained, as eagerly as though they were half famished.

From the foot of Sierra Gordo to Santa Anna’s hacienda, the roadside was lined with dead Mexicans and horses. At or near the rancho where General Twiggs overtook the retreating enemy, they lay thick around, and a more horrid scene it would be difficult to picture. Mexicans lay dead in every direction; some resting up against trees, others with legs and arms extended, and occasionally a lancer lying with his arm upon his charger that received his death wound from the same volley that ended the career of his rider. Some of the prisoners passing through would occasionally halt to view the features of the deceased, and then, mending their gait, regain their place by the side of those who were more fortunate in the fight.
At the place above cited was to be seen all the property, other than munitions of war, taken from the enemy. In one place, arranged in good order, were all the pack saddles—then the pen containing mules—the provisions next, comprising rice, beans, bread, pepper, pilonveos, garlic, &c.
piles of shoes, knapsacks, and all the paraphernalias of a Mexican camp. Captain Robert Allen, A.
Q.M. stopped for a moment and gave orders as to he removal of these things.

The muskets taken from the enemy were broken on stones as I passed the spot where they were.-
They were of no earthly use to us, and hence the summary mode of disposing them. [ANP]

NNR 72.164 May 15, 1847 64 Effects at the capital of the news of the defeat of Gen. Antonio
Lopez de Santa Anna

The Mexicans here, one and all, denounce Santa Anna as a coward, a traitor, and everything else that is bad; and I verily believe that a majority of them would rejoice exceedingly had General Scott captured him the other day and hung him upon the first limb strong enough to bear his weight. That he is playing them false you cannot beat out of their heads— that he has sold the battles of Buena Vista and Sierra Gordo for a consideration they are equally confident, and in proof they are internally talking about the $300,000,000. They do not understand why it was that President Polk allowed him to pass freely into Vera Cruz from Havana, unless there was bribery and corruption. [KAM]

NNR 72.165 May 15,1847 expectation that Gen. Winfield Scott will cut himself off from Veracruz to approach Mexico City

Col. Martin Scott went on this morning with the 5th infantry, to join the division of Gen. Worth.-
The general impression now is that Gen. Scott, unable to keep up his communications through the tierra caliente for want of horses and transportation, will cut himself loose from Vera Cruz, push on towards the city of Mexico, and to a certain extent depend upon the natural resources of the country. [ANP, KAM]

NNR 72.165 May 15, 1847 Rumors in Mexico City about offer of British mediation with the United States

Among other rumors brought by passengers, is one to the effect that Mr. Bankhead, the British minister, has renewed his offers of mediation between Mexico and the United States, and that when the last diligencia left the city of Mexico the congress was acting upon his propositions, whatever they may have been. Notwithstanding the fixed and denunciatory tones of the public press, there is certainly something in this report of English intervention in the distracted affairs in Mexico. [KAM]

NNR 72.165 May 15, 1847 Troops Stationed at Saltillo

An officer of the army who left Saltillo on the 14th of April, states, says the N. Orleans Delta of the 6th, that the force stationed there and at Buena Vista, under the command of Gen. Wool, was composed of the 1st and 2d Illinois regiments, the 2d Kentucky regiment, the 2d and 3d Indians, and the Arkansas cavalry. The 1st and 2d Illinois were about to leave; the term of enlistment of the whole of them will have expired between the 1st and 20th proximo.

The artillery force that was in the battle of Buena Vista, are still stationed there, as are also Col.
May's dragoons. A squadron of the latter, numbering some 200 under Lieut. Rucker, made a scout in the adjoining country. They found Gen. Minon in the neighborhood of Encarnacion, at the head of a thousand or fifteen hundred lancers. They thought to draw a fight from Minon, but were unsuccessful. Three of the party, who separated themselves from the main body, got killed before they returned to camp, by some prowling Mexicans who hung about their lines.

The troops at Buena Vista and Saltillo were in excellent health; and the wounded, who were daily visited by gen. Wool, and who saw that all their wants were attended to, were rapidly improving.
With the wounded Mexicans, who are in a separate hospital, it is different. The place is in a most filthy condition, attended by their own surgeons; the American governor of the town had to compel the alcalde to pay more attention to their wants and to the cleanliness of the place.
Gen. Taylor is still at the Walnut Springs. He has heard of his nomination for the presidency by several presses in the United States, but avoids referring to it or saying aught about it. He evidently appears chagrined, but at or about what he does not communicate to those about him. Our informant left his camp on the 18th ult.

The Kentucky rifles, who were then at the Walnut Springs, were to start for Camargo, on their way home, with the next down train.

The headquarters of Humphrey Marshall's Kentucky cavalry was Cerralvo. Tom Marshall's company was at Camargo. But few or none of the volunteers will reenlist. [JLM]

NNR 72.165 May 15, 1847 Gen. Zachary Taylor's preparations for advancing on San Luis Potosí, Indian rubber bags for water requested, terms of volunteers

There is no longer a doubt of Gen. Taylor's intention to advance upon St. Luis Potosí, so soon as he can obtain a sufficient number of men and means of transportation for the enterprise.

I have satisfied myself of this by the general's requisition upon the quartermaster's department for a large number of Indian rubber bags, calculated to carry water. Several thousand of these were yesterday sent up in a train. Each one is capable of holding from four to six gallons. This seems to me conclusive evidence of a contemplated march through the waterless county between Buena Vista and San Luis.

On the other hand, the disbandment of volunteers, whose term of service is shortly expiring, will leave General Taylor with but a very small force. Several regiments of Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and Kentucky, and one from Mississippi and Arkansas, will before long return home. The Louisville legion is just now embarking at this place on their way home. You will perceive by this, that unless new forces are sent here, it is scarcely probable that any active operations will take place in this quarter.

Camargo is almost entirely deserted by the Mexicans, But few, and those in the government's employ, are remaining. [KAM]

NNR 72.167 May 15, 1847 Gen. Jose Mariano de Salas summons a council of war, defense by small parties expected

On the 20th of April, immediately after the receipt of Santa Anna's defeat, Gen. Mariano Salas called a meeting of officers to devise some measures by which to preserve the nation from utter obliteration. No one here thinks that the Mexicans can ever make another stand, and to give another battle, but the impression is prevalent that small parties will be organized to annoy the roads, cut off supplies, and kill all stragglers. How great, in this case, is the necessity for two or three, or even one regiment of Texans. [KAM]

NNR 72.165 May 15, 1847 BATTLE OF CERRO GORDO

Official.
Orders issued by General Scott the evening before the battle of the 18th:
Headquarters of the Army
Plan del Rio, April 17, 1847

The enemy's whole line of entrenchments and batteries will be attacked in front, and at the same time turned early in the day to-morrow - probably before 10 o'clock A.M.

The second (Twiggs') division of regulars is already advanced within easy turning distance towards the enemy's left. That division has instructions to move forward before daylight to-morrow, and take up position across the National Road in the enemy's rear so as to cut off a retreat towards Jalapa. It may be reinforced to-day, if unexpectedly attacked in force, by regiments - one or two - taken from Shields, who will march for that purpose at daylight to-morrow morning under Brigadier General Twiggs on getting up with him, or the general in chief, if he be in advance.

The remaining regiment of that volunteer brigade will receive instructions in the course of this day.
The first division of regulars (Worth's) will follow the movements against the enemy's left at sunrise to-morrow morning.

As already arranged, Brigadier General Pillow's brigade will march at 6 o'clock to-morrow morning along the route he has carefully reconnoitered, and stand ready as soon as he hears the report of arms on our right, or sooner if circumstances should favor him, to pierce the enemy's line of batteries at such point - the nearer the river the better - as he may select. Once in the rear of that line, he will turn to the right or left, or both, and attack the batteries in reverse, or, if abandoned, he will pursue the enemy with vigor until further orders.

Wall's field battery and the cavalry will be held in reserve on the National Road, a little out of view and range of the enemy's batteries. They will take up that position at 9 o'clock in the morning.

The enemy's batteries being carried or abandoned, all our divisions and corps will pursue with vigor.

This pursuit may be continued many miles until stopped by darkness or fortified oppositions towards Jalapa. Consequently, the body of the army will not return to this encampment; but be followed to-morrow afternoon or early the next morning, by the baggage trains of the several corps. For this purpose, the feeble officers and men of each corps will be left to guard its camp and its effects, and to load up latter in the wagons of the corps. A commander of the present encampment will be designated in the course of this day.

As soon as it shall be known that the enemy's works have been carried, or that the general pursuit has been commenced, one wagon for each regiment and one for the cavalry will follow the movement, to receive, under the directions of medical officers, the wounded and disabled, who will be brought back to this place for treatment in general hospital.

The surgeon general will organize this important service and designate that hospital, as well as the medical officers to be left at it.

Every man who marches out to attack or pursue the enemy will take the usual allowance of ammunition, and subsistence for at least two days.

H. L. SCOTT, A. A. A. Gen.

NNR 72.168 May 15, 1847 Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna's address on quitting the capital to encounter Gen. Winfield Scott

MEXICAN OPERATIONS

General Morales, who so long as he was allowed to command, gallantly defended Vera Cruz, as well as General Landero, who surrendered the city and the castle, were immediately put under arrest by Santa Anna, and ordered to Guanajuata.

The following address was issued by Santa Anna before quitting the capital.

Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, president ad interim of the Mexican Republic, to his compatriots.

MEXICANS! Vera Cruz is already in the power of the enemy. It has succumbed, not under the influence of American valor, nor can it even be said that it has fallen under the impulses of their good fortune. To our shame be it said, we ourselves have produced this deplorable misfortune by our own interminable discords.

The truth is due to your from the government; you are the arbiters of the fate of our country. If our country is to be defended, it will be you who will stop the triumphant march of the enemy who now occupies Vera Cruz. If the enemy advance one step more the national independence will be buried in the abyss of the past.

I am resolved to go out and encounter the enemy. What is life worth, ennobled by the national gratitude, if the country suffers under a censure the stain of which will rebound upon the forehead of every Mexican!

My duty is to sacrifice myself, and I well know how to fulfill it! Perhaps the American hosts may proudly tread the imperial capital of Azteca. I will never witness such an opprobrium, for I am decided first to die fighting!

The momentous crisis has at length arrived to the Mexican republic. It is as glorious to die fighting as it is infamous to declare ourselves conquered without a struggle, and by an enemy whose rapacity is as far removed from valor as from generosity.

Mexicans! You have a religion - protect it! You have honor - then free yourselves from infamy! You love your wives, your children - then liberate them from American brutality! But it must be by action, not by vain entreaty nor barren desires, with which the enemy must be opposed. The national cause is infinitely just, although God appears to have deserted us; but His ire will be appeased when we present, as an expiation of our errors, the sentiments of true patriotism and of a sincere union. Thus the Almighty will bless our efforts, and we will be invincible; for against the decision of eight millions of Mexicans of what avail are the efforts of eight or ten millions of Americans, when opposed by the fiat of divine justice?

Perhaps I speak to you for the last time! I pray you listen to me! Do not vacillate between death and slavery; and if the enemy conquer you, at least they will respect the heroism of your resistance. - It is now time that the common defence should alone occupy your thoughts! The hour of sacrifice has sounded its approach! Awaken! A tomb opens at your feet! Conquer a laurel to repose on it!

The nation has not yet lost its vitality. I swear to you I will answer for the triumph of Mexico if unanimous and sincere desires on your part second my desires. Happy will have been, a thousand times happy, the unfortunate event at Vera Cruz, if the destruction of that city may have served to infuse into the Mexican breast the dignity and the generous ardor of a true patriotism. Thus will the country succumb, she will bequeath her opprobrium and her censure to those egotists who were not ready to defend her; to those who traitorously pursued their private turmoils to trample upon the national banner.

Mexicans! Your fate is the fate of the nation! - Not the Americans, but you, will decide her destiny. Vera Cruz calls for vengeance! Follow me, and wash out the stain of her dishonor.

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.
Mexico, March 31, 1847

NNR 72.168 May 15, 1847 Feud between the parties in Mexico suppressed after the departure of Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna from the capital, Don Pedro Maria Anaya elected substitute president

The feud between the party at the head of which has been the vice president, Gomez Farias, and the party of revolutionists, had been restrained so long as Santa Anna was president, but it becomes necessary for congress to decide who should succeed to authority during the absence of the president from the capital. Santa Anna was probably inclined in favor of Gomez. A majority of the congress were opposed to him, but the constitution was imperative. By its provisions the vice-president was entitled to the charge of government during the absence of the president. To obviate this difficulty, a bill was brought in declaring the vice presidency created by the act of the 21st of December, 1846, suppressed. A violent debate on the bill ensued.- The vote was taken on the 31st of March, and stood, for the proposition 38, against it 35.

Decree.- The next day April 1st a decree was passed, granting the provisional president of the republic permission to take command of the army in person, suppressing the vice presidency of the republic, and authorizing the congress to fill the place of the provisional president during his absence, and, finally, ordering that the legislature of the state on the 15th of May, shall proceed to elect a president of the republic, according to the form prescribed in the constitution of 1824, except that they shall vote for one individual only.

This decree was passed, and congress at once proceeded to the choice of a substitute for the president, Senor Don Pedro Anaya received 60 votes, and Almonte 11, when the members voted by person. The vote was 18-3 when voting by states. [KAM]

NNR 72.168 May 15, 1847 Mexican clergy men bind themselves to contribute to the government

The clergy of the archbishop of Mexico have bound themselves to the government for a million and a half of dollars, payable monthly. The clergy of the different bishoprics are to do the same. [KAM] MEXICANS: At the moment in which the loss of Ulua and of Vera Cruz, in which the danger of the capital itself obliges the worthy president of the republic to vacate the government and take command of the army, the vote of the representatives of the people has committed to me the executive power of the Union.

Ever devoid of ambition, and deeply penetrated with the terrible difficulty of existing circumstances, the imperious force of duty alone could impel me to accept the responsibility. But a citizen and a soldier, I owe to my country the sacrifice of repose of life, and even of my reputation. The voice of patriotism cries to me that it is necessary to save our country or to perish.

The war which devastates Mexico is for us the most sacred of causes. The world contemplates with disgust our neighbors of the north converted into conquerors, to gain possession of a territory which the faith of treaties, which rights the most worthy of respect assure to us. Never was there a defense more legitimate, never a war more necessary. In it every thing is at stake- our honor, as well as our national existence; the present and the future.

The territory we have lost, the cities which have bombarded, the blood which has so profusely flowed in this war, all constrain us to prosecute it undismayed by reverses. It is necessary to prove that our name ranks with justice among those of the free people of the universe. Let us accept the trial to which providence subjects us- that from great crises nations are regenerated.

This people cannot think of peace, because it involves its consent to the dismemberment of our country; it cannot think if the disgrace of our name, because the unworthy thought would proclaim that Mexico, incapable of showing her valor and enduring sacrifices, is at the disposal of every people who can bombard her cities and march an army upon her territory. After such disgrace our independence would be a derision, our nationality a transitory act. War, then is the cry of the people; war is the policy of the government.

To wage it successfully but one element is necessary union. Too long has our strength been wasted in senseless conflict; it is necessary to unite the whole against the foreigner. In the name of the country, I conjure all Mexicans that they rally around the sacred standard of independence and the republic; that they cease from these pernicious divisions which facilitate the projects of the invader, which excite smiles of criminal joy in those who count upon erecting a foreign throne upon the ruins of our conquered and humiliated country.

Mexicans: I have not accepted power for the triumph of any party. The government thinks only upon the common salvation. In its eyes all generous opinions are worthy of respect; all republicans are good sons f the country. Throughout my life, liberty, the republic, and federation have been my cause; this cause I am going to defend, not to forget; to this my power, my blood is to be devoted.

Upon the banners of the enemy is inscribed "To conquer or die;" and, in order that our country may be independent, that the cause of our race may triumph, it is necessary to oppose to this fatal inscription "Force and Liberty;" it is necessary that our arms should thrust forth the enemy from out territory, and that our institutions should restrain them upon the frontier. Destined to a permanent rivalry, it is necessary, in order to struggle with them, that we become great and strong by that power which rules the universe- the power of democracy and civilization.

In accepting power I have sworn to defend our independence and our institutions. The oath is sacred. The nation can confide in my loyalty and my honor. But these are not sufficient to save us; the situation is difficult, and I should not have consented to accept the government, had I not hoped to be able to unite all efforts against the common enemy. Independence demands the cooperation of all Mexicans, the sacrifice of all animosities, the exercise of every virtue, thee exertion of all our energies.

Let the nation rise up united; let it enter upon the struggle with the vigorous enthusiasm of the days of independence, and then Vandals who have threatened us shall repent their rash iniquity.
Victory will crown our exertions, and we shall speedily have a nationality assured, a name worthy of respect, a permanent existence secured. If, in the hour of danger and of sacrifice, we imitate the lofty virtues and the indomitable valor of our fathers, Mexico will be saved.

Pedro Maria Anaya
On the 5th of April Senor Gamboa addressed the Mexican congress to the following effect:

GENTLEMEN: Vera Cruz has succumbed, and it has been indicated that an army of 9,000 to 10,000 men is marching into the interior of this republic. This, as it has been seen by every one of us, has caused a general sensation, and it is feared that at the end of the present month or beginning of the next the Vandalic army of North America will reach the capital of our republic. In consequence of this it has been suggested to remove the sovereign congress to another place, and several measures have been proposed, but none of these have reference to fortifying or putting our city in a proper state of defense. It is feared, however, that a resistance may be useless; that all will give up to the impulse of the enemy; and, lastly, that our beautiful and costly buildings will be destroyed and the city ruined. I do not know how any such thing could be expected; and, even if I should see the city of Mexico taken by that handful of adventurers, I would still doubt my eyes.

I flatter myself that the army that General Santa Anna is now commanding will undoubtedly sustain the glory of the nation; and I believe, not from what the love of our country makes me believe, but from the conviction of my mind, free from all partiality.

General Santa Anna takes with him an army composed of 5,000 men brought from San Luis, of 3,000 which we have seen taking the line of march a few days ago, and of 2,000 which will join him near Jalapa; in all more than 10,000 men. It is to be presumed, likewise, that a multitude of National Guards from the states of Mexico and Puebla, and the jarochada (rabble) from the department of Vera Cruz, will join him.

The enemy’s army, according to information from every person who has seen it, has only about 5,000 regulars, and the remaining forces are composed of banditti, without the slightest knowledge of military tactics, without instruction of any description, without confidence, and generally easily terrified.

And it is possible to imagine that only by its powerful artillery the enemy will conquer and exterminate our troops? I hope that the God of justice cannot afford a visible protection to these banditti, the blind instruments of perversity, and of the most barbarous usurpation which could be found in modern and ancient history. But should it be decreed by providence that we must suffer this blow, and that we should once again taste of the cup of bitterness, will this be a motive why we should leave open and unprotected the gates of our capital, and allow the enemy to penetrate into the very heart of our republic, to carry on their customary depredations? I would, in no case, recommend such a course, and will urge the necessity of defending ourselves and of opposing them with all the strength and resources we have at hand, should such an unfortunate event take place.

Let us suppose for a moment that the American army, without losing a single man, should arrive even within sight of this city, would it be possible that 9,10,15, or even 20,000 men should cause a city of more than 250,000 inhabitants to surrender? If such a thing should happen- if we should consent to such a surrender without the strongest resistance- the whole world would forever refer to us as an example of the vilest, most cowardly, and contemptible place on earth, and we should not deserve from any nation the slightest regard or compassion. I will not propose what I would wish to see- that ism that the Mexicans should imitate the Numidians and Carthagarians, when attacked by the Romans in ancient times; or should follow the example of the memorable Saragossa, which, under the command of that great hero Palafox, was reduced to a pile of ruins, burying 100,000 combatants beneath them; but I do wish to see that we should do what has been done throughout the world on similar occasions- that is, we that shall resist the enemy to the last possible extreme.

Paris, in 1814, did not capitulate against the whole forces of Russia, Prussia, England, and Austria, until it had suffered considerable losses under generals Marmont and Mortier. That same city, Paris, after the battle of Waterloo, where the immortal Napoleon lost forever his glory, endeavored to defend herself against the immense torrent that threatened to destroy her, and, organizing an army with the divisions of General Davoust and Grouchy, they still fought hard battles at Serves and Izly. Even Madrid, the capital of the nation to which we were once united, did, by herself, resist the powerful army that France sent against her; and, notwithstanding her oppression, a popular movement was formed against the French, and there Murat exercised his most bloody vengeance.

And can it be imagined that the Mexicans will be frightened and quail at the sight of a handful of adventurers? Such a conquest would surprise the world more than that which Cortez obtained over the Empire of Montezuma; for at the time it was necessary, in order to cause this city to surrender, that it should be besieged by more than 200,000 [illegible], united with the Spaniards, and that very resources of subsistence should have been exhausted. And at the time the natives had not the incomparable means of defence which we now possess- means which I will not mention here-as by so doing I suppose it would be an insult to persons of common sense.
In accordance with what I have here manifested, I am of opinion that the city should be immediately put in a state of defence, and this is the object of my first proposition.

I also beg that congress should not be removed, unless the extreme case should arrive of the occupation of the city by the enemy. My object is not a request of the representatives of Mexico to repeat before the world the pathetic scene of the Romans, when Brennus, general of the Gauls, attacked Rome when sitting in open ground in their council chairs, they awaited the enemy and challenged the death which they received. I repeat that this is not my desire, but I wish that we may not act on the opposite extreme - deserting this place with a shameful fury- that we may remain here until the moment when prudence and necessity should dictate that we must move elsewhere, as in similar cases has been done by the civilized assemblies.

When the Spaniards, had nearly lost all their peninsula, a regency was established at Cadiz, which provoked the Cortes of the kingdom, and immediately promulgated the political constitution of the Spanish monarchy. These events took place in the midst of the bombs and shells which the French army was throwing into the city, and then they were (unsuccessfully) besieged by Gen. Victor.

In France, when the allies conquered for the first time, the senate did not change its residence, and instead constituted a provisional government.- [illegible] like happened after the fall of Napoleon, and the chamber of representatives appointed a commissioner of government, of which Fouche was the president.

All foreign nations have their eyes fixed on our [illegible] And what judgment can we expect them [illegible] of our valor and our cause, if we are [illegible] into a sudden dismay and disquietude? It is fairly necessary, for this very reason, that we hold by our extraordinary efforts prove the justice our rights; and lastly, we must show that we come [illegible] the inconquerable Spanish race, and that we [illegible] in our veins the blood of Guatimozin, Hidalgo, Morelos, and thousands of others, who shed the last drop of it in honor and defence of their country, and who taught us by their examples the course we are to pursue. These considerations have caused me to make the following proposals to congress.

"1st. That our government will proceed immediately to the place the city in a manner fit to resist the invasion of the North Americans. 2nd. That every power which may be considered necessary for this object shall be granted to the executive. 3rd. That, should be the means of resistance be exhausted, and the capital be occupied by the Americans, congress will meet where the president should determine.- 4th. When the removal of congress shall be determined, any majority will be sufficient to constitute it."

[NKR 72.169 May 15, 1847 Decrees and appeals addressed to the Mexican people about carrying on the war with the United States

MEXICO- The editors of the Spanish paper La Patria, of New Orleans, have received city of Mexico papers to the 10th April.

The Mexican congress had passed a decree, which is published on the 10th to the following effect:

1st. In order to carry on the war, which our nation wages against the United States of the north, all the Mexicans capable if bearing arms are hereby summoned to enroll themselves immediately.

2nd. The government will publish the necessary rules and instructions, in order to make effective the organization of the National Guards, according to what is established in part XIX, article 50th of the constitution.

3rd. The executive may dictate measures which may be considered necessary in order to use all the arms and ammunition which may be in possession of private individuals, and which may not be employed by the police or National Guards: also for the use of wagons, baggage, ammunition, and provisions, and any other articles or utensils which may be necessary for the fulfillment of this object, providing always the means of indemnification, &c.

A meeting of the principal citizens took place on the 8th April, when they unanimously agrees to establish the "guerrilla" system for resisting the North Americans. These resolutions were made known to the government and to congress, the respectable bodies, in order to start immediately for the mountains, passes, and cliffs.

Among the persons singing the propositions we see the names of many prominent lawyers, military, and other public men. The papers have before announced this as the means of saving the nation, and sustaining Mexican independence.

All the papers are filled with appeals to the citizens, and one of them asks- "can it be possible, that among eight millions of Mexicans we cannot find a sufficient number of patriotic and determined men, who will resist the enemy that is invading our soil without the least regard to our rights?"

NNR 72.169-72.170 May 15, 1847 ARMY OF OCCUPATION.

In the New Orleans Delta of the 2d instant, we find the following general description of the battle, founded on information furnished by Capt. Hughes, of the Topographical corps:

On the arrival of the other division of the army at the encampment of General Twiggs, on the 16th of April, Gen. Scott, after taking a reconnaissance of the enemy's works, determined to storm them. The position occupied by the enemy was regarded by them as impregnable, and truly to any other than American soldiers it must have appeared an insurmountable and impracticable undertaking to carry it by storm or take it by strategy.

The road from Vera Cruz, as it passes the Plan del Rio, which is a wide rocky bed of a once large stream, is commanded by a series of high cliff's rising one above the other, and extending several miles, and all well fortified. The road then debouches to the right, and curving around the ridge, passes over a high cliff, which is completely enfiladed by forts and batteries. This ridge is the commencement of the Tierra Templada- the upper or mountainous country. The high and rocky ravine of the river protected the right flank of the position, and a series of most abrupt and apparently impassable mountains and ridges covered their left. Between these points, running a distance of two or three miles, a succession of strongly fortified forts bristled at every turn, and seemed to defy all bravery and skill. The Cerro Gordo commanded the road on a gentle declination, like a glacis, for nearly a mile. An approach in that direction was impossible. A front attack must have terminated in the almost entire annihilation of our army. But the enemy expected such an attack, confiding in the desperate valor of our men, and believing that it was impossible to turn their position to the right or left. Gen. Scott, however, with the eye of a skillful general perceived the trap set for him, and determined to avoid it. He therefore had a road cut to the right, so as to escape the front fire from the Cerro, and turn his position on the left flank. This movement was made know to the enemy by a deserter from our camp, and consequently a large increase of force under Gen. Vega was sent to the forts on their left. Gen. Scott, to cover his flank movements, on the 17th of April ordered forward Gen. Twiggs against the fort on the steep ascent, in front and a little to the left of the Cerro. Col. Harney commanded this expedition, and, at the head of the rifles and some detachments of infantry and artillery, carried this position under a heavy fire of grape and musketry. Having secured this position in front and near the enemy's strongest fortification and having, by incredible labor, elevated one of our large guns to the top of the fort, Gen. Scott prepared to follow up his advantages. A demonstration was made from this position against another strong fort in the rear, and near the Cerro, but the enemy were considered too strong, and the undertaking was abandoned. A like demonstration was made by the enemy.

On the next day, the 18th, General Twiggs was ordered forward from the position he had already captured against the fort which commanded the Cerro. Simultaneously an attack on the fortifications on the enemy's left was to be made by Generals Shields' and Worth's divisions, who moved in separate columns, whilst General Pillow advanced against the strong forts and difficult ascents on the right of the enemy's position. The enemy fully acquainted with Gen. Scott's intended movement, had thrown large bodies of men into the various positions to be attacked. The most serious enterprise was that of Twiggs, who advanced against the main for that commanded the Cerro. Nothing can be conceived more difficult than this undertaking. The steep and rough character of the ground, the constant fire of the enemy in front, and the cross fire of the forts and batteries which enfiladed our lines, made the duty assigned to Gen. Twiggs one of surprising difficulty. Nothing prevented our men from being utterly destroyed by the steepness of the ascent under which they could shelter. But they sought no shelter, and onward rushed against a hailstorm of balls and musket shot, led by the gallant Harney, whose noble bearing elicited the applause of the whole army. His conspicuous and stalwart frame at the head of his brigade, his long arm leading his men on to the charge, his sturdy voice ringing above the clash of arms and the [...] of conflict, attracted the attention and admiration alike of the enemy and our own army. On, on, he led the columns, whose front lines melted before the enemy's fire like snow flakes in a torrent, and staid not their course until, leaping over the rocky barriers and bayoneting their gunners, they drove the enemy pell mell from the fort, delivering a deadly fire into their ranks, from their own guns, as they hastily retired. This was truly a gallant deed, worthy the Chevalier Bayard of our army, as the intrepid Harney is well styled. Gen. Scott, between whom and Col. Harney there had existed some coolness, rode up to the Col. After this achievement, and remarked to him, "Col. Harney, I cannot now adequately express my admiration of your gallant achievement, but at the proper time I shall take great pleasure in thanking you in proper terms." Harney with the modesty of true valor, claimed the praise as due to his officers and men. Thus did the division of the gallant veteran Twiggs carry the main position of the enemy and occupy the fort which commanded the road. It was here the enemy received their heaviest loss, and their Gen. Vasquez was killed.

A little after, Gen. Worth having, by great exertions, passed the steep and craggy heights on the enemy's left, summoned a strong fort in the rear of the Cerro to surrender. This fort was manned by a large force under Gen. Pinzon, a mulatto officer of considerable ability and courage, who, seeing the Cerro carried, thought prudent to surrender, when he did, with all his force. Gen. Shields was not so fortunate in the battery which he attacked, and which was commanded by Gen. La Vega. A heavy fire was opened on him, under which the fort was carried with some loss by the gallant Iliansions; under Baker and Bennett, supported by the New Yorkers, under Burnett. Among those who fell under this fire was the gallant general, who received a grape shot through his lungs, by which he was completely paralyzed, and, at least accounts, was in a lingering state. On the enemy's right, Gen. Pillow commenced the attack against the strong forts near the river. The Tennesseans, under Haskell, led the column, and the other volunteer regiments followed. This column unexpectedly encountered a heavy fire from a masked battery, by which Haskell's regiment was nearly cut to pieces, and the other volunteer regiments were severely handled. Gen. Pillow withdrew his men, and was preparing for another attack when the operations at the other points having proved successful, the enemy concluded to surrender. Thus the victory was complete, and four generals and about 5,000 men were taken prisoners by our army. One of their principal generals, and a large number of other officers, killed.

The Mexican force on this occasion certainly exceeded our own. The Mexican officers admitted that Santa Anna had 8,000 men in the lines, and 6,000 including 2,000 lancers, outside of the intrenchments. Gen. Scott's force was about 8,000. Gen. Quitman's brigade not having arrived in time to take part in the engagement. Gen. Ampudia was second in command of the Mexicans, and superintended the operations of the enemy. When the Cerro was carried he was seen retreating on a fine white charger, his hat falling off as he galloped away. Many of the Mexicans escaped by a bye path which runs off from the main road between the Cerro and the fort carried by Gen. Worth. As to Santa Anna and Canalizo, they retreated in time to escape by the main road. Their conduct was regarded as most cowardly. Some of the Mexican officers who were take prisoners do not hesitate to attribute their defeat to the cowardice or corruption of Santa Anna. The force of the enemy was composed of their best soldiers. The infantry that fought so well at Buena Vista, all the regular artillerists of the republic, including several able naval officers, were present. Some of the officers whom Gen. Scott released at the capitulation of Vera Cruz, without extorting the parole on account of their gallantry, were found among the killed and wounded. A gallant young officer named Halzinger, a German by birth, who extorted the admiration of our army in the bombardment of Vera Cruz, by seizing a flag which was cut down by our balls and holding it up in his hand until a staff could be prepared, had been released by Gen. Scott without a parole. He was found among the desperately wounded at Cerro Gordo.

The enemy's loss, in killed and wounded, was about as large as our own; but, in addition to this, the loss of 6,000 prisoners and some of their best officers. Our army captured about thirty pieces of beautiful brass cannon, of large caliber, and mostly manufactured at the Royal Foundry of Seville. A large quantity of fixed ammunition, or very superior quality, was also taken. The private baggage and money chest of Santa Anna, containing $20,000, was also captured. The latter was delivered over to the pay master. The volunteers who were employed in carrying the specie into camp cracked a joke over the prospect of being soon paid off in Mexican coin and free of expense of Uncle Sam.

When our forces had carried the various positions of the enemy, and the road was cleared, General Twiggs started in hot pursuit of the fugitive Santa Anna, and pressed close upon his heels. A strong position, five miles west of Cerro Gordo, fortified and defended by a fine battery of long brass guns, was abandoned by the enemy and occupied by our troops. Gen. Twiggs bivouacked within three miles of the lovely town of Jalapa.

In concluding our imperfect sketch of this brilliant achievement, we cannot sufficiently express or admiration of the extraordinary deeds of or gallant army and able general. Scarcely a month has elapsed since our troops, under Scott, landed on the enemy's shores. In that time a strong walled city has been captured, together with an impregnable fortress; a pitched battle has been fought under the most formidable natural defences; twelve thousand prisoners have been taken, including some half a dozen general officers; five hundred splendid cannon, and an immense amount of munitions of war have been added to the national trophies. Truly, such results are glorious testimonials of the valor of our soldiers, and of the skill, gallantry, and perseverance of the accomplished general who led them. [JLM]
PRISONERS. A list of Mexican officers captured at Cerro Gordo, on the 18th April, who have given their parole of honor to report themselves without delay to the commandant of the American forces at Vera Cruz as prisoners of war:

Jose M. Jarero, brigadier general.
Romulo de la Vega, brigadier general.
P. Ruiz y Baranda, captain of Mexican navy, commanding artillery.
Vicente Argüella, captain artillery.
Jose Ma. Mata, captain.
Jose Ma. Gallegos, commanding grenadiers.
Mariano Camacho, 1st lieut. artillery.
Barthome Amable, 2d lieut. artillery.
Jose R. Coburbias, 2d lieut. artillery.
Jose de Lastor Bras y Soller, lieut. col. battalion de la libertad.
Jose Nufiez, capt. 6th regt. infantry.
Jose Ma. Moreno, capt. 6th regt. infantry.
Gregorio del Callejo, capt. 6th regt. infantry.
Rafael de Berrabidas, 2d lieut. 6th regt. infantry.
Salvero Velez, aid-de-camp to Gen. Vega.
Francisco Fernandez, 1st lieut. Mexican navy.

The above prisoners, under the charge of Capt. Geo. W. Hughes, corps of topographical engineers, arrived at Vera Cruz on the 21st inst. Gen. Scott has left it to their election whether they should remain close prisoners in the castle of San Juan d'Ulua or proceed to New Orleans, where they should be allowed such personal liberty as their condition and conduct might seem to require of the commandant of that post. It is understood that all of the foregoing captured officers have expressed a desire to be transferred to the United States, and that Col. Wilson, Governor of Vera Cruz, had acceded to their wishes, and had directed that a vessel should be held in readiness to sail, for their accommodation, about the 25th of April. [JLM]
We crossed the Colorado about 10 miles below the mouth of the Gila, and, marching near it about 30 miles further, turned off and crossed the desert - a distance of about 60 miles - without water or grass.

On the 2nd December, reached Warner's rancho, (Agua Caliente), the frontier settlement in California, on the route leading to Sonora. On the 4th, marched to Mr. Stokes' rancho, (San Isabella) on the 5th were met by a small party of volunteers, under Capt. Gillispie, sent out from San Diego by Commodore Stockton, to give us what information they possessed of the enemy, 600 or 700 of whom are now to be in arms and in the field throughout the territory, determined upon opposing the Americans and resisting their authority in the country. Encamped that night near another rancho (San Maria) of Mr. Stokes' about 40 miles from San Diego.

The journals and the maps kept and prepared by Captain Johnson, (my aide-de-camp) and those by Lieutenant Emory; topographical engineers, which will accompany or follow this report, will render anything further from me on this subject unnecessary. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J.W. Kearney, Brig. Gen. U.S.A.

Headquarters, army of the west
San Diego, Upper California, Dec. 13, 1846.

SIR- In my communications to you of yesterday's date, I brought the reports of the movements of my guard up to the morning of the 5th instant, in camp near a rancho of Mr. Stokes, (Santa Maria) about 40 miles from San Diego.

Having learned from Capt. Gillispie, of the volunteers, that there was an armed party of Californians, with a number of extra horses at San Pasqual, three leagues distant, on a road leading to this place. I sent Lieut. Hammond, 1st dragoons, with a few men to make a reconnaissance of them. He returned at two in the morning of the 6th inst. reporting that he had found the party in the place mentioned, and that he had been seen, though not pursued by them. I then determined that I would march for and attach them by break of day. Arrangements were accordingly made for the purpose. My aid-de-camp, Capt. Johnson, dragoons, was assigned to the command of the advance guard of twelve dragoons, mounted on the best horses we had; then followed about fifty dragoons under Captain Moore, with but a few exceptions, on the tired mules they had ridden from Santa Fe ( New Mexico, 1,050 miles); then about 20 volunteers of Capt. Gibson's company under his command, and that of Capt. Gillispie; then followed our two mountain howitzers, with dragoons to manage them, and under the charge of Lieut. Davidson, of the regiment. The remainder of the dragoons, volunteers, and citizens, employed by the officers of the staff, &c. were places under the command of Major Swords, (quartermaster), with the orders to follow on our trail with the baggage, and to see to its safety.

As the day, (December 6) dawned, we approached the enemy at San Pasqual, who was already in the saddle, when Captain Johnson made a furious charge upon them with his advanced guard, and was in a short time after supported by the dragoons; soon after which the enemy gave way, having kept up from beginning a continued fire upon us. Upon the retreats of the enemy, Capt. Moore led off rapidly in pursuit, accompanied by the dragoons, mounted horses, and was followed, though slowly, by the others on their tired mules, the enemy well mounted among the best horsemen in the world, after retreating about half a mile, and seeing an interval between Captain Moore with his advance, and the dragoons coming to his support rallied their whole force charged with their lances, and on account of their greatly superior numbers, but few of us in front remain untouched; for five minutes they held the ground from us, and then fled from the field, not to return to it, and which we occupies and encamped upon it.

Our howitzers were not brought into the action, but coming into the front at close of it, before they were turned, so as to admit of being fired upon the retreating enemy, the two mules before one of them got alarmed and freeing themselves of their drivers, ran off, and among the enemy, and was then lost to us.

The enemy proved to be a party of about 160 Californians under Andreas Pico, brother of the late governor; the number of their dead and wounded must have been considerable, though I have no means of ascertaining how many, as just previous to the final retreat, they carried off all excepting six.

The great number of our killed and wounded proves that our officers and men have finally sustained the high character and reputation of our troops; and the victory thus gained over more than double our force, may assist in forming the wreath of our national glory.
A most melancholy duty now remains for me is to report the death of my aid de-camp, Captain Johnson, who was shot dead at the commencement previous to the final retreat of the enemy, and Lieut. Hammond, also lanced, who survived but a few hours. We had also killed two sergeants, [illegible] corporals, and ten privates of the 1st dragoons; [illegible] private of the volunteers, and one man engaged in the topographical department. Among the wounded are myself, (in two places,) Lieut. Warner, [illegible] topographical engineers, (in three places), Captains Gillispie and Gibson of the volunteers, (the former three places), one sergeant, one bugleman, and three privates of the dragoons; many of them were unhorsed and incapable of resistance.

I have to return my thanks to many for their gallantry and good conduct on the field, and particularly to Capt. Turner, 1st dragoons, (assistant [illegible] general) and to Lieut. Emory, topographical engineers, who were active in the performance of their duties, and in conveying orders to me to the [illegible].

On the morning of the 7th, having made [illegible] for our wounded, and interred the dead proceeded on our march, when the enemy showed himself occupying the hills in our front, but which they left as we approached; till, reaching San Bernado, a party of them took possession of a hill near to it, and maintaining their position until attacked by our advance, who quickly drove them from it, killing and wounding five of their number, with no loss on our part.

On account of our wounded men, and upon the report of the surgeon that rest was necessary for them, we remained at this place till the morning of the 11th, when Lieut. Gray, in the navy, in command of a party of sailors and marines, sent out from San Diego by Commodore Stockton, joined us. We proceeded at 10, a.m. the enemy no longer showing himself; and on the 12th, (yesterday), we reached this place; and I have now to offer my thanks to Com. Stockton, and all of his gallant command, for the many kind attentions we have received and continue to receive from them.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J.W. KEARNEY, Brig. Gen. U.S.A.

Headquarters, army of the west
Ciudad de los Angelos, Upper California, Jan. 12, 1847

SIR- I have the honor to report that, at the request of Commodore R.F. Stockton, United States navy, (who in September last assumed the title of governor of California), I consented to take command of an expedition to this place, (the capital of the country) , and that, on the 29th December, I left San Diego with about 500 men, consisting of about sixty dismounted dragoons under Capt. Turner, 50 California volunteers, and the remainder marines and sailors, with a battery of artillery- Lieut. Emory, (topographical engineers) acting as assistant adjutant general. Com. Stockton accompanied us.

We proceeded on our route without seeing the enemy till on the 8th instant, when they showed themselves in full force of 600 mounted men, with four pieces of artillery under their governor, (Flores) occupying the heights in front of us, which commanded the crossing of the river SAN Gabriel, and they ready to oppose our further progress. The necessary disposition of our troops was immediately made, by covering our front with a strong party of skirmishers placing our wagons and baggage train in the rear of them, and protecting the flanks and rear with the remainder of the command. We then proceeded, forded by the river, carried the heights and drove the enemy from them, after an action of about an hour and a half, during which they made a charge upon our left flank, which was repulsed, soon after which they retreated and left us in possession of the field, on which we encamped that night.

The next day, (the 9th instant) we proceeded on our march at the usual hour, the enemy in our front and on our flanks; and when we reached the plains of the Mesa, their artillery again opened upon us, when their fire was returned by our guns as we advanced; and after hovering around and near us for about two hours, occasionally skirmishing with us during that time, they concentrated their force and made another charge on our left flank, which was quickly repulsed; shortly after which they retired, we continuing our march, and in the afternoon, encamped on the banks of the Mesa, three miles below this city, which we entered the following morning, (the 10th instant), without further molestation.

Our loss in the actions of the 8th and 9th was small, being but one private killed and two officers, Lieut. Rowan of the navy, and Capt. Gillispie, of the volunteers, and eleven privates wounded. The enemy, mounted on fine horses, and being the best riders in the world, carried off their killed and wounded, and we know not the number of them, though, it must have been considerable. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"ARMY OF THE NORTH."

OFFICIAL REPORT OF COL. DONIPHAN DEFEAT OF THE ENEMY- CAPTURE OF CHIHUAHUA.

Headquarters of the Army in Chihuahua, City of Chihuahua, March 4, 1847.

I have the honor to report to you the movements of the army under my command since my last official report.

On the evening of the 8th of February, 1847, we left the town of El Paso del Notre, escorting the merchant train or caravan of about 315 wagons for the city of Chihuahua. Our force consisted of 924 effective men, 117 officers and privates of the artillery, 93 of Lieut. Colonel Mitchell's escort, and the remainder the 1st regiment Missouri mounted volunteers. We progressed in the direction of this place until the 25th, when we were informed by our spies that the enemy, to the number of 1,500 men, were at Inseneas, the country seat of Gov. Trias, about 25 miles in advance.

When we arrived, on the evening of the 26th, near that point, we found that the forces had retreated in the direction of this city. On the evening of the 27th we arrived at Sans, and learned from our spies that the enemy, in great force, had fortified the pass of the Sacramento river, about fifteen miles in advance, and about the same distance from this city. We were also informed that there was no water between the point that we were at and that occupied by the enemy; we therefore determined to halt until morning. At sunrise on the 28th, the last day of February, we took up the line of march and formed the whole train, consisting of 315 heavy traders' wagons and our whole commissary and company wagons, into four columns, this shortening our line so as to make it more easily protected. We placed the artillery and all the command, except 200 cavalry proper, in the intervals between the columns of wagons. We this fully concealed our force and its position, by masking our force with the cavalry. When we arrived within three miles of the enemy, we made a reconnaissance of his position and the arrangement of his forces. We could easily do- the road leading through an open prairie valley between the sterile mountains. The pass of the Sacramento is formed by a point of the mountains on our right, (their left,) at a good elevation to sweep the plain, and at the point where the mountains extended furthest into the plain. On our left (their right) they had another battery on Capt. Thompson, of the 1st dragoons, acted as my aid and advisor on the field during the whole confusion. The field was literally covered with the dead and wounded from our artillery and the unerring fire which have since died, and forty prisoners.

Our force was nine hundred and twenty-four effective me, at least one hundred of whom were engaged in holding horses and driving teams.

The loss of the enemy was his entire artillery, ten wagons, masses of beans and pinola, and other Mexican provisions, about three hundred killed and about the same number wounded, many of whom have since died, and forty prisoners.

The force of the enemy was 1,200 cavalry from Durango and Chihuahua, with the Vera Cruz dragoons, 1,200 infantry from Chihuahua, 300 artillerists, and 1,420 rancheros badly armed with lassos, lances, and macheteos or corn knives, ten pieces of artillery, two nine, two eight, four six and two four pounders, and six culverins or rampart pieces. - Their forces were commanded by Major General Heredia, General of Durango, Chihuahua, Senora, and New Mexico; Brigadier General Garcia Conde, formerly minister of defence; General Uguert, and Governor Trias, who acted as brigadier general on the field, and colonels and other officers without number.

Our force was nine hundred and twenty-four effective me, at least one hundred of whom were engaged in holding horses and driving teams.

The loss of the enemy was his entire artillery, ten wagons, masses of beans and pinola, and other Mexican provisions, about three hundred killed and about the same number wounded, many of whom have since died, and forty prisoners.

The field was literally covered with the dead and wounded from our artillery and the unerring fire.
of our riflemen. Night put a stop to the carnage, the battle having commenced about three o'clock. Our loss was one killed, one mortally wounded, and seven so wounded as to recover without any loss of limbs. I cannot speak too highly of the coolness, gallantry, and bravery of the officers and men under my command.

I was ably sustained by the field officers, Lieut. Colonels Mitchell and Jackson, of the first battalion; and Maj. Gilpin of the second battalion; and Maj. Clarke and his artillery acted nobly, and did the most effective service in every part of the field. It is abundantly shown, in the charge made by captain Weightman with the section of howitzers, that they can be used in any charge of cavalry with great effect. Much has been said, and justly said, of the gallantry of our artillery, unlimbering within two hundred and fifty yards of the enemy at Palo Alto; but how much more daring was the charge of Capt. Weightman, when he unlimbered within fifty yards of the redoubts of the enemy!

On the 1st day of March we took formal possession of the capital of Chihuahua in the name of our government.

We were ordered by General Kearny to report to General Wool at this place. Since our arrival, we hear that he is at Saltillo, surrounded by the enemy. Our present purpose is either to force our way to him, or return by Bexar, as our team of service expires on the last day of May next.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
Colonel 1st regiment Missouri Volunteers.

Translation of Col. Doniphan's proclamation on taking possession of Chihuahua:

Proclamations of the Commander-in-chief of the North American forces in Chihuahua

The commander-in-chief of the North American forces in Chihuahua announces to all the citizens of that State that he has taken military possession of the capital, and has the pleasure of assuring them that in it complete tranquility exists.

He invites all the citizens to return to their homes, and continue in their ordinary occupation, promising to them security of person, property, and religion.

He declares also, in the name of his government, that, having taken possession of the capital since he conquered the forces of the state, he holds possession of the whole state.

He invites all the citizens, pueblos and rancheros, to continue their trade, coming to this capital to buy and sell just as they did before the recent occurrences, for no one will be molested or annoyed in any thing, as he before explained that the property each person will be respected, and that, in case the troops of his command need anything, the value of it will be paid at its just price with all punctuality.

He pledges himself in like manner that the American troops will promptly punish every excess committed, either by the savage Indians or any other individuals.

He assures again all good citizens that we war only against the army, and not against individual citizens who are unarmed.

For this we exact only, not that any Mexican should take up arms against his country, but that, incase if actual war, he shall remain neutral; for it must not, in the contrary, be expected that we shall respect the rights of those who take up arms against our view.

SIR:- The forces under my command are a portion of the Missouri volunteers, called into service for the purpose of invading New Mexico, under the command of Brigadier General (then Colonel) Kearney. After the conquest of New Mexico, and before General Kearney's departure for California, information was received that another regiment and an extra battalion of Missouri volunteers would follow us to Santa Fe. The service of so large a force being wholly unnecessary in that state, I prevailed on Gen. Kearney to order my regiment to report to you at this city. The order was given on the 23rd September, 1846; but after the general arrived at La Joya, in the southern part of the State, be issued an order requiring my regiment to make a campaign into the country inhabited the Navajo Indians, lying between the waters of the Rio del Norte and the Rio Colorado of the west. This campaign detained me until the 14th of December, before our return to Del Norte. We immediately commenced our march for El Paso del Norte with about 800 riflemen. All communication between Chihuahua and New Mexico was entirely prevented. On the 25th of December, 1846, my van guard was attacked at Brazito by the Mexican forces from this State; our force was about 450, and the force of the enemy 1100; the engagement lasted about forty minutes, when the enemy fled, leaving 63 killed and since dead, 150 wounded, and one howitzer, the only piece of artillery in the engagement on either side. On the 29th we entered El Paso without further opposition; from the prisoners and others I learned that you had not marched upon this State. I then determined to order a battery and 100 artillerists from New Mexico. They arrived in El Paso about the 5th February, when we took up the line of march for this place. A copy of my official report of the battle of Sacramento, enclosed to you, will show you all our subsequent movements, up to our taking possession of this capital. The day of my arrival I had determined to send an express to you forthwith; but the whole intermediate country was in the hands of the enemy, and we were cut off, and had been for many months, from all information respecting the American army. Mexican reports are never to be fully credited; yet, from all we could learn, we did not doubt that you would be forced by overwhelming numbers to abandon Saltillo, and of course we could send no express under such circumstances. On yesterday we received the first even tolerably reliable information that a battle had been fought near Saltillo between the American and Mexican forces, and that Santa Anna had probably fallen back on San Luis de Potosi.

My position here is exceedingly embarrassing. In the first place, most of the men under my command have been in service since the 1st of June, and have never received one cent of pay. Their marches have been hard, especially in the Navajo country, and no forage; so that they are literally without horses, clothes or money, nothing but arms and a disposition to use them. They are all volunteers, officers and men; and, although ready for any hardships or danger, are wholly unfit to garrison a town or city. "It is confusion worse confounded." Having performed a march of over 2,000 miles, and their terms of service rapidly expiring, they are restless to join the army under your command. Still, we cannot leave this point safely for some days- the American merchants here, oppose it violently, and have several thousand dollars at stake. They have sent me a memorial, and my determination has been made known to them. A copy of both they will send to you. Of one thing it is necessary to inform you: the merchants admit that their goods could not be sold here in five years; if they go south they will be as near to the markets of Durango and Zacatecas as they now are. I am anxious and willing to protect the merchants as far as practicable; but I protest against remaining here as a mere wagon guard; garrisoning a city with troops wholly unfit for it, and who will be wholly ruined by improper indulgencies. Having been originally ordered to this point, you know the wishes of the government in relation to it, and of course your orders will be promptly and cheerfully obeyed. I fear there is ample use for us with you, and we would greatly prefer joining you before our term of service expires.

All information relative to my previous operations, present condition, &c., will be given you by Mr. J. Collins, the bearer of these dispatches. He is a highly honorable gentleman, and was an amateur soldier at Sacramento.

The Mexicans report your late battle as having been entirely favorable to themselves; but taking it for granted they never report the truth, we have fired a salute for our victory in honor of yourself and General Taylor, presuming from report, you were both present.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A.W. DONIPHAN,
Comd'g. 1st reg. Missouri mounted vols.

Should the horses or mules of those bearing this express fail, or prove unfit to return upon, I have to request that they may be supplied by the government with the proper means of returning,

Organization of Government on New Mexico- Power of the Courts- Treason- Drumhead Court Martial- What does it all tend to?

Charge of Judge Houghton to the jury, in the case of Senior Trojillo- (Trohea)

In charging the jury before retiring, on the case of the Unites States vs. Trojillo, the judge ruled out all consideration, by the jury, of the arguments of the counsel for the defence, that the court had not, under the constitution, the right to adjudicate upon a case of treason, where the accused was a citizen of New Mexico, upon the ground that the court, as it was constituted, could not permit the question of its own existence to be the subject of decision by a jury; that it was bound by its oath to rely upon the authority which constituted, could not permit the question of its own existence to be the subject of decision by a jury; that it was bound by its oath to rely upon the authority which constituted it as sufficient, and under that oath, made before that authority, were solemnly bound to administer justice within the extent of its jurisdiction, and to submit all cases to juries, as judges of the evidence and facts, allowing the responsibility of the constitutional right of the court to sit on cases of high treason, as charged against New Mexicans, to fall back upon the authority who constituted it. The court, therefore, let the case go before the jury to be decided as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, by the facts and the evidence.

Don Antonio Maria Trogillo's order.

By order of the inspector of arms, Don Antonio Maria Trogillo, who has directed me to order you, the moment you receive this notice, to raise the whole of your company, and also all the people that are able to bear arms, to present themselves in San Juan de los Caballeros, to-morrow, the 22nd inst., at the latest at 8 o'clock.

We have declared war against the government of the United States; and it is now to take up arms in defence of our abandoned country- to see if we can regain the liberty that we possessed in this unfortunate department. You will be held responsible of you fail to obey the order.

Gen. Taffola's order, No. 1.

The defenders of the country, with the view of shaking off the yoke that binds us to the government of the stranger, and as you are the inspector of arms, and commander of militia, lawfully appointed by your supreme government, which is the one we now claim; at the moment you receive this communication, you will proceed to unite all the companies under your command, and holding them in readiness for the 22nd inst., on which day these forces will be at that point. You will take all the necessary steps, and see if the enemy is advancing this way with any force; and if it should so prove, you will send a messenger quickly, so that I may redouble my march.

You are to understand that there is to be no resistance to this order. Answer this by the bearer.

PROCEEDINGS OF A DRUMHEAD COURT MARTIAL,

Convened at Fernando de Taos, New Mexico, on the 6th day of February, 1847, by the following order:

Headquarters, Army in New Mexico,
Don Fernando de Taos, Feb. 6, 1847.

Order No. 115

A drumhead court martial, to consist of five members will assemble at headquarters this morning, at 10 o'clock, a.m., for the trial of Pablo Montollya (Montoya,) and such other prisoners as may be brought before it. The court will consist of the following members:
Capt. Angney, infantry battalion; Capt. Barbe 2nd regiment Missouri volunteers; Capt. Slack, do. [illegible] Lieut. Ingalls, 1st dragoon; Lieut. White, 2nd regiment Missouri volunteers; Lieut. Easton, infantry battalion, judge advocate.

By order of Col. S. Price.

[signed] B.Walker, adj't.

The court met pursuant to the above order. Present, all the members.

The prisoner not objecting to any of the members, was arraigned on the following charge and specifications:

Charge- Rebellious conduct.

Specification 1st- In this: That the said Pablo Montoya did, on or about the 19th day of January, 1847, excite the Indians and Mexicans to rebellious conduct, assuming to be one of their principal leaders.

Specification 2d- That the said Montoya did, on or about the 25th of January last, issue a proclamation, exciting the people to rebellion.

Specification 3d- That the said Montoya was engaged in exciting the people to rob the United States wagons, loaded with public funds, then on their way from the United States to Santa Fe. All this in the territory of New Mexico.

[signed] R.WALKER, adjutant, 2nd reg't Mo. Mounted volunteers

To which charge and specifications the prisoner pleaded not guilty.

The court being duly sworn in the presence of the prisoner, Messrs. Lucian Thrustoa and Thomas Rowland were sworn as interpreters.

Jose Maria Sandaval, a witness for the prosecution being duly sworn, said: I was secretary for the prosecution being duly sworn, said: I was secretary for Pablo Montoya, the prisoner, and wrote the following letter, [marked A] which I read to him, and he approved.

"From the superior authorities in command."

"No. A- The alcalde will, the moment he receives this, arrange it so that he will present all the people of the Pueblo before me, at sunrise, well equipped with arms and provisions, that they may leave for Santa Fe with dispatch. This moment, I have received intelligence of importance, requesting us to be in readiness before the forces of Santa Fe advance and overcome our forces at the different points, Rio Abajo, Canada, &c., &c. God and law.

[signed] Pablo Montallo Senor Alcalde of the Pueblo."
San Fernando de Taos, Jan. 21, 1847."

Witness further states, that the letter marked B., was written by himself, at the instance of the prisoner, Pablo Montallo, which he read to him, and he approved; and also letter marked C, was written by witness, at the instance of the prisoner, which he read to him, and he approved it, and authorized him to sign his name to it,

No B- The citizen Pablo Montolia, being the highest person empowered to command and also to appoint officers who will faithfully discharge their duties according to the arrangement of the splendid plans found on the 21st day of the present month- I hereby give authority to the alcalde of the Pueblo de Taos, Don Francisco Navauso, to write and the letters of this tribunal, and also to cause the people under his command to keep themselves well equipped with arms, with the understanding that they will be chastised who disobey the orders and commands of Senor Alcalde; published for good government.

Given in San Fernando de Taos, 22d Jan., 1847
[signed] Pablo Moulla.
Empowered general of the superior command

No. C- This day I received intelligence from the commander of the Mexican forces, that yesterday, at the setting sun, the war commenced at the Canada with the foreign army. He also states that they have already vanquished them; believing which, honored Mexicans we shall come out triumphant in all our undertaking. I will commend you to God, that he may give you the souls of valiant men, so that all the enemies you encounter, you may be able to conquer, keeping in mind the rules and regulations presented in the organized plan formed on the 21st day of the present month, the third observance of our adored laws. We are now fighting, and should we vanquish our enemy, we will again place our laws in the best security the nature of the case will admit of. Any prisoners that may be taken you will remit to this tribunal.

Mexican citizens! Live in the hope that we will yet shout glory hallelujah in our province, and live in the confidence that the Divine Protector of the Indians will never permit his people to be vanquished.- Believing in His powerful assistance, no harm can befall us.

Companions in arms! I request you to try and make yourselves possessors of the money and effects that they are now taking to Santa Fe in the wagons.- Accomplishing this, you will place it under the strictest orders according to our plan, until it is in my disposal, taking care not to let the people steal it, it being alone for the defence of our sacred country.

Do the favor to communicate all this as far as El Bao, that the people may rise and protect their frontier. You will give assistance with your people near Santa Fe, at the points where they may be most needed. It is extremely necessary that the orders should be vigilantly executed.

God and liberty.
San Fernando de Taos, Jan. 25, 1847.
[signed] Pablo Montolla.

Antonio Jose Martinez, the priest, a witness for the prosecution, being duly sworn, says: On the morning of the 19th of January last, immediately after the murder of Gov. Bent, prisoner, with others, came into my room for the purpose of finding Elliot Lee, an American, whom they had supposed I had concealed. They were hunting William Lee. My room at that time, was filled with Indians and Mexicans. The murder of Governor Bent and others, was the commencement of the revolution. The prisoner being tendered the appointment of general, at first refused it, but afterwards accepted it. The appointment of prisoner as general, it was said, was to restore good order among the Mexicans.

Elliot Lee, a witness for the prosecution, being duly sworn, says that prisoner on the 20th of January last, told him that he was commander in chief of the Mexican forces, and that he was the Santa Anna of the north, and that he was going to retake this territory, which the Americans had taken from the Mexicans. Prisoner asked me whether there were wagons coming from the states to Santa Fe, with powder, and ball, and money? I told him I understood there were, and that there were some two hundred thousand dollars in money in them.- Prisoner told me to tell a straight take, and if I did, I should not be hurt. He said they were sending out men to take them: they did go out, and brought back some mules and horses. Prisoner started from home with troops to go against the Americans, and said there were no Americans in Santa Fe, for that all of them had been killed.

Jesus Maria Tafoya, a witness for the prosecution, being duly sworn, says: I was interpreter on the 20th January last for Mr. Lee. Prisoner told me to tell said Lee, if he did not answer the questions correctly, he had an instrument with which he could cut his throat. Prisoner told me to ask Lee about some wagons going to Santa Fe from the states, and whether there was powder and ball and plenty of money in the, Prisoner said something about sending out men to take those wagons, and that he would give out the proceeds among the people here. They did go out, but only brought back some horses and mules. Prisoner said that there were not more than two hundred troops in Santa Fe; boys, said he, don't mind that; we can kill them all off. Prisoner said he was the Santa Anna of the north: he said he was commander in chief of the forces against the Americans. Prisoner did not start for Santa Fe; the other generals went; he remained here to keep good order.- The "good order" was to keep the Mexicans here in arms and readiness to flight. This was the order to prisoner, which he had to execute as a part of his duty.
The evidence was here closed, and the court adjourned.

After mature deliberation on the testimony adduced, which was read over by the judge advocate, the court find the prisoner, Pablo Montoya, guilty of all specifications to the charge, and guilty of the charge, and sentenced him to be hung by the neck until he is DEAD- at such time and place as the colonel commanding may direct, after the approval of the proceedings,

The court adjourned sine die.

[signed] W.Z. ANGNEY,
President of the court, com'd infantry battalion.

L.J. Eastin, judge advocate.

The proceedings and sentence of the court in the above case are approved, and in conformity with the sentence, the said prisoner, Pablo Montoya, will be hung by the neck until he is dead, in the centre of the plaza, in this town between the hours of 11 o'clock a.m. and 2 o'clock p.m., tomorrow, the 7th inst.

Headquarters, Bat. Mo. Light Artillery,
Camp near Chihuahua, Mexico, March 2, 1847

SIR- I have the honor to report that, agreeable to your instructions, I left camp, near Lauz, on the morning of the 28th ult. Accompanied by my adjutant, Lieut. L.D. Walker, and non-commissioned staff, and proceeded in advance to a position commanding a full view of the enemy's camp and entrenchments, situated about four miles distant. From this point, the enemy was discovered to be in force awaiting our approach, having occupied the ridge and neighboring heights about Sacramento. Upon examination it was discovered that his entrenchments and redoubts occupied the brow of an elevation extending across the ridge between Arroyo Seco and that of Sacramento, both of which at this point, cross the valley, from the elevated ridge of mountains in the rear of the village of Terreon, known by the name of Sierra de Victorias, and that of - on the east, and through which runs the Rio del Nombre de Dios. This valley is about four miles in width, and entrenched by the enemy entirely across, from mountain to mountain, the road to the city of Chihuahua running directly through its centre, and of necessity passing near to and crossing the Rio Sacramento at the rancho Sacramento, a strongly built and fortified beach, with adjoining corrals and other enclosures belonging to Angel Trias, the governor of Chihuahua. From observation it was ascertained that the enemy had occupied the site between these hills, and that the batteries upon them were supported by infantry, his cavalry being in advance positions, formed into three columns, between the Arroyo Seco and our advance. During these observations the enemy's advance guard discovered my party - approached rapidly, with the evident intention of intercepting it; but being met by that of our troops which I had sent forward, it as rapidly retreated; at this time, also, the three columns of the enemy's cavalry recrossed the Arroyo Seco, and retired behind their entrenchments. I then approached within six hundred yards of their most advanced redoubt, from which point the enemy's formation was plainly discernible. The entrenchments consisted of a line, with intervals composed of circular redoubts from three hundred to five hundred yards intervals, with entrenchments between each, covering batteries partly masked by cavalry. The redoubt nearest to my position contained two pieces of cannon, supported by several hundred infantry. The enemy's right and left were strongly positioned- the Cerro [illegible] on his right having high, precipitous sides, with a redoubt commanding the surrounding country and the pass leading towards Chihuahua through Arroyo Seco.

The Cerro Sacramento, on his left, consisting of a pile of immense volcanic rocks, was surmounted by a battery commanding the road to Chihuahua leading directly in front of the enemy's entrenchments, crossing the Rio Sacramento at the rancho, directly under its fire, and also commanding the road from Terreon, immediately in its rear. The crossing of the main road over Arroyo Seco, at the point from which my reconnaissance was made, laid directly under the fire of the batteries on the enemy's entrenchments. The passage was found to be practicable with some little labor, and the point selected as the best passage of the artillery and wagon and merchant trains.

The whole front of the enemy's line of entrenchments appeared to be about two miles, and his force 900 men; the artillery being masked, the number and caliber of his cannon could not be estimates. - Rather, I have the honor to report that the battalion of artillery under my command composed of 110 men and 7 officers, with a battery of six pieces of artillery, were, on the morning of the battle, directed from under the direction of Captain Weightman, between the two columns of merchant and provisory wagons, being this masked from the view of the enemy; in this column my troops continued to march to within about 1,500 yards if the enemy's most advanced position. Our direction was then changed to the right, and the column having crossed the Arroyo Seco within reach of the enemy's fire, rapidly advanced towards the table land between the Seco and Sacramento; at this time the enemy was perceived advancing from his entrenchments to prevent our seizing upon these heights, but by a rapid movement of the battery it was quickly drawn from its mask, and seizing upon a favorable position, protected at the rear by a marsh from the attack of a large body of the enemy's cavalry ascertained to be hanging on our rear, it was formed, and at once opened fire upon the enemy's cavalry rapidly advancing upon us. At this moment, his charging column was about 900 yards distant, and the effect of our strap shot and shells were such as to break his cavalry into confusion. The enemy now rapidly deployed into line, bringing up his artillery from the entrenchments. During this time our line was preparing for a charge, my artillery advancing by hand and firing. The enemy now opened a heavy fire of cannon upon our line, mainly directed upon the battery, but with little effect.

Lieutenant Dorn had his horse shot from under him by a nine pound ball, at this stage of the action, and several mules and oxen in the merchant wagons in our rear were wounded and killed, which, however, was the only damage done. The fire of our cannon at this time had such good effect as to dismount one of the enemy pieces, and completely to disperse his cavalry, and drive him from his position forcing him to retire behind his entrenchments. For a short time the firing on either side now ceased, and the enemy appeared to be moving his cannon and wounded, whilst our line prepared to change our position more towards the right, for the purpose of occupying a more advantageous ground. One object being soon gained, the order to advance was given, and immediately after I was directed to send the section of howitzers to support a charge upon the enemy's left. I immediately ordered Captain R.H. Weightman to detach the section composed of twelve pound mountain howitzers, mounted upon carriages, constructed especially for field service, and drawn by two horses each- these were commanded by Lieutenants E.F. Chouteau and F.D. Evans, and manned by some twenty men, whose conduct in this action cannot be too much commended. Captain Weightman charges at full gallop upon the enemy's left, preceded by Captain Reed and his company of horses; and after crossing a ravine some 150 yards from the enemy, he unlimbered the guns within 50 yards of the entrenchments, and opened a destructive fire of canister into his ranks; which was warmly returned, but without effect. Capt. Weightman again advanced upon the entrenchment, passing through it in the face of the enemy, and within a few feet of the ditches; and in the midst of a cross fire from three directions again opened his fire to the right and left with such effect that, with the formidable charge of the cavalry and dismounted men of your own regiment, and Lieutenant Col. Mitchell's escort, the enemy were driven from the breastworks on our right in great confusion.

At this time, under a heavy cross fire from the battery upon Cerro Sacramento, I was advancing with our battery of four 6 pounders, under Lieuts. Dorn, Kribben, and Labeaume, upon the enemy's right, supported by Major Gilpin on the left, and the wagon train, escorted by two companies of infantry, under Captains E.J. Glasgow and Skilman, in the rear, when Major Gilpin charged upon the enemy's centre, and forced him from his entrenchments under a heavy fire of artillery and small arms; at the same time the fire of our battery was opened upon the enemy's extreme right, from which a continued fire had been kept up upon our line and the wagon train. Two of the enemy's guns were now seen dismounted on their right; that battery silenced, and the enemy dislodged from the redoubt on Cerro Frijoles. - Percieving a body of lancers forming for the purposes of out-flanking our left, and attacking the merchants' wagons under Capt. Glasgow, I again opened upon them a very destructive fire of grape and spherical case shot, which soon cleared the left of our line; the enemy, vacating his entrenchments and deserting his guns, was hotly pursued towards the mountains beyond Cerro Frijoles, and down the Arroyo Seco to Sacramento, by moth wings in the army, under Lieutenant Colonel Mitchell, Lieutenant Colonel Jackson, and Major Gilpin, and by Captain Weightmen, with the sections of howitzers. During this pursuit my officers repeatedly opened their fires upon the retreating enemy with great effect. To cover this flight of the enemy's forces from the entrenched camp, the heaviest of his cannon had been taken from the entrenchments to the Cerro Sacramento, and a heavy fire opened upon our pursuing forces and the wagons following in the rear. To silence this battery, I had to anticipate your order to that effect by at once occupying the nearest of the enemy's entrenchments, 1,225 yards distant; and notwithstanding the elevated position of the Mexican battery, giving him a ploughing fire into my entrenchment, which was not defiladed, and the greater range of his long nine pounders, the first fire of our guns dismounted one of his largest pieces, and the fire was kept up with such briskness and precision of aim, that this battery was soon silenced and the enemy seen precipitately retreating. The fire was then continued upon the Rancho Sacramento, and the enemy's ammunition and baggage train retreating upon the road to Chihuahua. By this fire the house and several wagons were rendered untenable and useless. By this time Lieutenant Col. Mitchell had sealed the hill, followed by the section of howitzers under Capt. Weightman, and the last part of the Mexican forces taken possession of by our own troops, this leaving the American forces masters of the field. Having silenced the fire from Cerro Sacramento, our battery was removed into the plain at rancho, where we gained the road and were in pursuit of the enemy when I received your order to return and encamp within the enemy's entrenchments for the night.

From the time of first opening my fire upon the Mexican cavalry, to the cessation of the firing upon the rancho and battery of Sacramento, was about three hours, and, during the whole time of the action, I take the utmost pleasure in stating that every officer and man of my command did his duty with cheerfulness, coolness, and precision, which is sufficiently shown by the admirable effect produced by their, the great accuracy of their aim, their expediency and ingenuity in supplying deficiencies in the field during the action, and the prompt management of the pieces, rendered still more remarkable from the fact that I had, during the fight, less than two thirds of the number of cannoneers generally required for the service of light artillery, and but four of the twelve artillery carriages belonging to my battery harnessed with horses, the remaining eight carriages being harnessed to mules of the country.

During the day my staff were of the greatest service, Adjutant L.D. Walker having been sent with the howitzers, and the non-commissioned officers remaining with me to assist in the service of the battery. In this action the troops under your command have captured from the enemy one 9 pounder, one 6 pounder, and seven 4 pounder guns, all mounted in new stock-trail carriages. Their pieces were all manufactured in Chihuahua, except the six pounder, which is an old Spanish piece. Three of the four pounders were made at the mint in Chihuahua; seven of the ten pieces were spiked, but have been unspiked since their capture; four of them were rendered unserviceable in the action; one entirely dismounted and seized by my adjutant whilst in the act of being dragged from the field by the retreating enemy.---There were also taken two pieces of artillery, mounting three wall pieces of 11/2 inch caliber each, and these are formidable weapons upon a charging force. With these twelve pieces of artillery was taken a due proportion of ammunition, implements, harness, mules, &c., and they may be rendered serviceable by being properly repaired and [illegible], for which purpose I would ask for future reinforcement of my command. It is with feelings of gratitude to the Ruler of all battles that I have now the honor to report that not one man of my command has been hurt, nor any animal. With the exception of one horse, killed under Lieutenant Dorn, chief of the first section of 6 pounder guns, and of one mule belonging to the United States, shot under one of the cannoneers; neither had a gun or carriage of my battery been touched except in one instance, where a nine pound ball stuck the tire of a wheel without producing injury. This is a fact worthy of notice, that so little damage was done to a command greatly exposed to the enemy’s fire, and of itself made a point of attack by the enemy, if I may so judge by the showers of cannon and other shot constantly poured into us as long as the enemy continued to occupy his position. I might call your attention to the individual instances of personal courage and good conduct of the men of command, as well as of the intrepid bravery and cool determined courage of many of your own regiment and Lieutenant Col. Mitchell’s escort, who charged with us upon the enemy’s works, were it not impossible, in any reasonable space, to name so many equally of distinction, and did not presume that other field officers on that occasion would repost the proceedings of their own commands and the praiseworthy conduct of their own officers and men,

72.176 May 15, 1847 Mexican orders for fortifications around the capital

The Mexican government have directed every place in the vicinity of their capital to be fortified, and have directed Generals Almonte, Bravo, Rincon and Agea, to superintend their construction. Almonte on the 14th commenced his duties by reconnoitering the road from Venta de Cordova, to San Martin Tesmelucan. [KAM]

NRR 72.176 May 15, 1847 Killed and Wounded at Cerro Gordo

The number of the killed and wounded of our army at the battle of Sierra Gordo, is ascertained to be, says the N. Orleans Picayune: 1 volunteer officer killed: 14 regular officers, and 7 volunteer privates killed; 195 regular and 48 volunteer privates wounded. [JLM]

NRR 72.177 May 22, 1847 Mexican notice of appointment of Alejandro Jose Atocha as emissary from the United States to Mexico

Senor Atocha. The New Orleans Picayune of the 5th speaking of the intelligence brought by the steamer James L. Day, from Vera Cruz says:
The Mexican papers continue their declamatory strictures upon the mission of Atocha. It would appear that the sending of this miserable fellow on any important mission to Mexico has given greater umbrage than all else that has been done by the United States. They regard him in the light of an official pimp, a treasonable pander, a perfidious miscreant, and indeed the concentration of baseness. They think he was sent there by the American cabinet in mockery and scorn.

We have already copied the article of "El Republicano" upon Atocha. That paper- the very best in all Mexico- the highest tone and the sturdiest defender of the republican institutions when the monarchical part was in the ascendant- after noticing the arrival of Atocha on a mission from this country, and recounting his past history in Mexico, exclaims:

"O, God! This is the greatest sign that thou hast forgotten us. Send upon us bombs, rifles, grape shot and every class of projectile and misfortune; burn us, reduce us to ashes, destroy us, annihilate, but do not dishonor us. Send the entire north to subjugate and rule over us, but do not let Atocha be the broker of a contract of piece, because that, devolving upon us the greatest scorn and the greatest humiliation, would be [O God] thy greatest punishment."

This, we are assured, is a true reflex of the feelings of the better order of Mexicans in regard to the unfortunate appointment. [KAM]

NNR 72.177 May 22, 1847 Number of Enlistments in the Army

The Recruiting Service.- Reinforcements ordered to the seat of war.

We learn from the war office that the ranks of the new regiments are rapidly filling up, and that the following companies of the same are now concentrated at Point Isabel, or en route for Vera Cruz and that point. The results here exhibited are highly gratifying, and show the great energy and promptitude with which this new force has been raised and sent forward:

9th Inf'y- Col. Ransom, (aggregate) 258
12th Inf'y- Col. Temple 794
11th Inf'y- Col. Ramsey (companies and detachment of a company) 633 12th Inf'y- Col. Wilson, (now in Mexico) Lieut. Col. Bonham, superintending 110
13th Inf'y- Col. Echols 280
14th Inf'y- Col, Trousdale 180
15th Inf'y- Col. Morgan (now in Mexico) Lieut. Col. Howard, superintending 810 16th Inf'y- Col. Tribbatts 827
Voltigueurs- Col. Andrews 712
3rd Dragoons- Col. Butler 711

-----
Total- Ten regiments 5,315

This number (5,315) is probably considerably below the actual strength now in Mexico, or even en route for the seat of war. [KAM]

NNR 72.177 May 22, 1847 Assurances of the "Union" that Gen. Winfield Scott will be reinforced by the end of May, equal to the number of volunteers that leave

The "Union" from which the above is extracted, concludes that Gen. Scott's army will be strengthened by the above and other recruits that will reach him by the end of may, fully equal to the volunteers that he will have to part with.

No mention is made as to reinforcing General Taylor. [KAM]

NNR 72.177 May 22, 1847 Letter from Thomas Corwin

Senator Corwin and the Mexican War.
Lebanon, (Ohio) April 4, 1847.

DEAR SIR- I had the pleasure of receiving your letter on the 28th of March yesterday: and I cannot...
deny myself the gratification of expressing to you the satisfaction with which I receive that among many other such evidences of approval of my course on the Mexican war. I felt strongly as any one could the responsibility I assumed. I differed from all the leading whigs in the senate, and saw plainly that they all were, to some extent, bound to turn, is they could, the current of public opinion against me. They all agree with me that the war was unjust in our part; that, if properly begun, (which none of them admitted,) we had already sufficiently chastised Mexico, and that the further prosecution of it was wanton waste of both blood and treasure; yet they would not undertake to stop it. They said the president alone was responsible. I thought we who aided him, or furnished him the means, must be in the judgment of reason and conscience equally responsible, equally guilty, with him. I see the "democratic" presses prate about refusing to feed and clothe the brave men now in the field. Do not these praters know that it was not for that purpose that we were asked for supplies? - Did the president want twenty-eight millions of money and ten regiments more of men to bring Gen. Taylor back to Camargo? No, he told us he wanted them for the purpose of further prosecuting the war. He wanted to storm the halls of the Montezumas! And for what? That question he will not answer. It is for conquest alone. The great model republic of the world makes war upon one modeled after her, to take away her territory and utterly destroy her, till her leading men are driven to bed the aid of Kings to prevent us, the great republic, from robbing and murdering those who, as well as they know how to do it, are trying to establish free governments after our example. I am amazed that a people calling itself democratic-hating kings and loving free government - should act thus. What does it portend? I confess it fills me with melancholy forebodings. I can honor the brave soldier who does his duty in battle; but I despise the mistaken, wicked policy that sends him to fight in such a war. Had the president asked for money to bring home our army after the taking of Monterey, and to send a commission of one or more of the first men in America to treat for peace, I would have given my vote with more hearty goodwill for such a bill then I ever gave any in my whole public life. I often urged this course in private interviews with leading men of both parties. But all in vain. Further battle - more blood - more laurels; these were the insane and barbarous aspirations of men who now hold the power of a nation boasting itself the exemplar of Christendom; vaunting that it "asks for nothing, which is not right, and will submit to nothing which is wrong."

I send you only a few copied of my speech on the subject. I only regret that it is not more worthy of the cause it proposes to uphold. I shall be satisfied if it shall induce a few to ponder the subject of which it treats.

Very truly, your friend,
Thomas Corwin.

NNR 72.179 May 22, 1847 Government declines tender of additional brigade from Maryland

Gen. John Spear Smith, of Baltimore, has tendered to the president of the United States, a brigade of volunteers to serve in the Mexican war, from the state of Maryland. The Washington "Union" compliments the patriotism of the corps volunteered on this occasion, and exhibits it as an instance of the public spirit of the people of Maryland, but adds that the president has been constrained, in justice to the like claims which are pressed from other states, to decline accepting the services thus proffered, and adds: "We understand that Gen. Scott will, in all probability, have under his command, in the month of June, at least twenty thousand men, or more, consisting too of regulars, or during the war men." [KAM]

NNR 72.182-72.183 May 22, 1847 George Wilkins Kendall's account of the battle of Cerro Gordo

The Battle Of Cerro Gordo.

Mr. Kendall, of the New Orleans Picayune, furnished that paper with regular details from which we extract the following:

Plan del Rio, Mexico, April 16, 1847.
General Twiggs's division of the army reached this place on Sunday last 11th, and Gen. Patterson's on Monday evening. Both are now encamped in a delightful valley, on the banks of the Plan del Rio, or river of the plain, awaiting the arrival of Gen. Worth's division and Gen. Quitman's brigade of the Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina volunteers. General Scott arrived last evening, and we anticipate in a few days a hard battle. The Mexicans, to the number of from 12,000 to 15,000 men, with General Vega, if not Santa Anna himself, at their head, are strongly fortified about three miles in our advance, and appear to be constantly engaged in making their position, if possible still stronger. They have several batteries planted, and if they do not make a desperate stand when attacked, they must be a greater set of cowards than I have yet supposed them. Our present force here is not over 6,000 men, including Steptoe's, Wall's, and the howitzer batteries. The sappers and miners are busily engaged in cutting roads, and when our batteries are erected we shall give them "particular fits," to use a vulgar phrase.

We are fifty-seven miles from Vera Cruz and thirty-three from Jalapa. Several volunteers have been wounded or killed in our march from Vera Cruz, having lagged too far behind the main body. It was, I assure you, hard work to the men while marching, and many more a poor fellow dropped upon the road from complete exhaustion.

April 16-evening.—The Mexicans, under Santa Anna, are occupying a chain of works along the road, the nearest of which about a mile and a quarter from Gen. Scott's headquarters in a direct line. The road this side is cut up and barricaded, and every possible means of defence and annoyance has been resorted to. Beyond the first work there are three or four others, completely commanding the gorge through which the road to Jalapa runs—these fortifications on hills and rising so as to defend one another. It is thought that Santa Anna has 20,000 men with him—the lowest gives him 15,000—and with these he has twenty four pieces of field artillery, besides some fourteen heavy cannon in position. Some of the prisoners and deserters from the enemy's camp even place higher estimates, both as to the number of men and guns.

To turn these different works a road has been partially cut through the rough ground and chaparral to the right; and, although the reconnaissance is as yet imperfect, it is still thought that a point near the enemy's farthest work can be reached. General Twiggs, with his division, is to march at 8 o'clock to-morrow morning by the new road, and on the following morning it is thought the attack will commence on the works on this side. If Gen. Twiggs succeeds in reaching the rear of Santa Anna—and he will use every exertion—I do not see what is to save him. He is generally fox enough to have plenty of holes out of which to escape, however, and, from the great difficulty of reconnoitering his position fully, he may have some means of escape here. The general impression now in camp is, that this is to be the great battle of the war; and the immense natural strength of Santa Anna's works would justify the belief.

The Mexicans are on the alert than they have ever been before, and more bold in throwing out their pickets. Not a party can go near their works without being fired upon, and yesterday a soldier of the 7th infantry fell with no less than seven bullets in his body. It is said that Almonte is their pickets. Not a party can go near their works without being fired upon, and yesterday a soldier of the 7th infantry fell with no less than seven bullets in his body. It is said that Almonte is their pickets.

Gen. Worth left Puente Nacional this afternoon with his division, and will be up during to-night.—He started a little after 1 o'clock this morning, with near 2,000 picked men, determined to make a forced march through; but learning on the road that the attack upon the Mexican works as not to commence as soon as anticipated, he returned to Puente Nacional, after marching a mile and a half. Capt. Pemberton, one of his aids, rode over here last evening after dark, and returned with the information that the attack had been postponed.

The wounds of Capt. Johnston are doing well. I regret to state that Gen. P. F. Smith is confined to his bed—utterly unable either to ride or walk. He has a violent inflammation of the right ankle and knee, resembling crysipelas, which, from neglecting several days when he should have remained in his cot, has finally compelled him to lay up. I will write again to-morrow.

April 17, 8 o'clock, A.M.—General Worth's division came up during last night and this morning, ready for anything that turns up. A section of the siege train, comprising twenty four pounders and an eight inch howitzer will be along this forenoon. A subsistence train is also close by, and is very much needed, as the army is nearly out of provisions.

Gen. Twiggs's division will march by 9 o'clock.—The 1st brigade, composed of the 1st artillery, 2nd dragoons and Captain Kearney's company of the 1st and 7th infantry, is under command of Col. Harney during the illness of Gen. Smith; the 2d brigade consists of the 4th artillery and 2d and 3d infantry, under Col. Riley; and to these must be added Taylor's battery and Talcott's mountain howitzer and rocket men, acting under the immediate orders of General Twiggs. The latter company will probably have plenty of work on their hands, as this is just the country for their operations.

April 17, 11 A.M.—The division of General Twiggs started two hours since, and a heavy cannonade has already commenced upon his line from the farthest of the Mexican works. At intervals, too, the rattling of small arms can be heard distinctly from the dragon camp where I am writing this. I am going out, with Cols. Duncan and Bohlan and Capt. Pemberton, to the seat of action, and will return here at night to report the progress of the fight.-it was not intended, I believe, that General Twiggs should opened the fight to-day, at least to bring on a general action, and it is therefore presumable the Mexicans have commenced upon him. I write in great haste.

5 P.M.-I have just returned from the scene of conflict, and a bloody one it has been considering the number engaged. A hill this side of the farthest Mexican work; and on which there was no one seen last evening, was found occupied by the enemy's light troops this morning, and to force it was at once deemed indispensable. For this purpose the rifles under Maj. Sumner, besides detachments of artillery and infantry, were ordered to charge up the rugged ascent. This they did in gallant style, driving the Mexicans, after a resistance which may be put down as most obstinate. Great numbers of the enemy were killed, while on our side the loss was also severe.
Major Sumner was shot in the head by a musket ball-severely but not mortally: Lieutenants Maury and Gibbs, of the rifles, were also wounded, but not severely, as was also Lieutenant Jarvis of the 2nd infantry. I could not learn that any of our officers were killed. The entire loss on our side, in killed nd wounded, is estimated at about one hundred; but from the nature of the ground-broken, covered with brush and thick chaparral, and extremely uneven-it is impossible to tell with accuracy.

About 3 o'clock the enemy made a demonstration from the fort on the neighboring height to the one our men captured, as if with the intention of retaking it; but it all ended in marching down the hill blowing a most terrific charge on their trumpets, firing a few shots and then retiring. Their appearance as they came down the slope was certainly most imposing. The cannon on the height meanwhile kept up a continuous fire on General Twigg's lines, yet doing little execution other than cutting down trees and brush. As we returned to camp the fire still continued-the enemy had evidently ascertained the position of the road which had just been cut, with accuracy, but their balls principally went over.

General Shields, at 3 o'clock, was ordered out to support General Twiggs, with three regiments of volunteers-two from Illinois under Colonels Baker and Barnett. They will have warm work tomorrow if the Mexicans stand up as they did to-day.

There has been not a little skirmishing to-day between the forage and beef parties, sent out in the rear, and the rancheros. One Illinois man was killed and one of the same regiment and a Tennesseean wounded. I could not learn their names.

To-morrow the grand attack, both upon the front and rear of the enemy is to be made. General Worth is to move at sunrise, and a little peace will the Mexicans have for one twenty-four hours at least.

The loss on both sides has been heavy-how could it have been otherwise? The rough and rocky road, cut through rugged defiles and dense chaparral by our troops, is now lined with our wounded. The rifles, Col. Haskell's Tennessee volunteers, the 1st artillery, the 7th infantry, and Captain William's company of Kentucky volunteers, have perhaps suffered most. Gen. Shields was severely, and I am fearful, mortally wounded, while gallantly leading his brigade to storm one of the enemy's farthest works. General Pillow was also sounded, although slightly, while storming a fortification on this side, commanded by La Vega. All the field officers of Col. Haskell's regiment were wounded at the same time, save himself. Of the rifles, Capt. Mason has lost a leg, Lieut.
Ewell has been badly wounded, Lieut. McLane slightly. I have already mentioned the gallant Maj.
Sumner and other officers wounded yesterday.

I have specified some regiments above which signalized themselves: it happened to be their fortune, in the disposition of the battle, to fall upon what all good soldiers may term pleasant places-the most difficult works to storm-and bravely and without faltering did they execute the perilous duties assigned them. At 1 o'clock this afternoon General Twiggs, whose division has been in the hardest of it, was pursuing the flying enemy towards Jalapa. Pinson, who commanded the forts nearest Plan del Rio, asked of Gen. Worth time to consider before the capitulated.
Desirous to come to terms, Gen. Worth gave him fifteen minutes, and he surrendered unconditionally. Had he not done so, the slaughter would have been terrible.

April 18-4 o'clock, P.M.-The American arms have achieved another glorious and most brilliant victory. Out numbering General Scott's force materially, and occupying positions which looked impregnable as Gibraltar, one after another of their works have been taken to-day, five generals, colonels enough to command ten such armies as ours, and other officers innumerable, have been taken prisoners, together with 6000 men, and the rest of their army driven and routed with the loss of every thing, ammunition, cannon, baggage train, all. Nothing but the impossibility, of finding a road of the dragoons to the rear of the enemy's works saved any part of Santa Anna's grand army, including his own illustrious person.

It is now impossible to name officers who have distinguished themselves. I cannot, however, omit to mention Colonels Harney, Riley and Childs, of the regulars; Colonels Baker, Forman and Haskell, of the volunteers, as every one is talking of them.
April 19.-The rout of the Mexicans last evening was complete. They were pursued within 4 miles of Jalapa by Gen. Twiggs, at which point there were none to follow. Santa Anna himself, instead of entombing himself as he threatened, escaped by cutting the saddle mule of his team from the harness of his magnificent evach, mounting him, and then taking to the chaparral. His service of massive silver, nearly all his papers, his money—every thing in his carriage, even his dinner, was captured. I have a capital story to tell about this dinner when I have a moment to spare. The Mexican loss upon the heights was awful—the ground in places in covered with the dead! Among the bodies found was that of General Vasquez, and near him was Colonel Palacio, mortally wounded. Their loss in the retreat was terribly severe—every by-path was strewn with the dead. Had our dragoons been enabled to reach them in season, all would have been killed or captured—Santa Anna among them. Canalizo, with his noted lancers, had the prudence to "vamos" early.

NRR 72.183 May 22, 1847 Prisoners taken at Cerro Gordo

The Mexican Prisoners. - There were at least 6,000 Mexicans taken prisoners at Cerro Gordo. But few who were within the entrenchments escaped. Santa Anna kept a large corps of reserve outside the batteries, all of whom escaped. The want of cavalry was severely felt in the pursuit of the fugitives. - If Twiggs had had a cavalry force of one thousand he would have taken Santa Anna and his whole army. The officers who were taken prisoners were the bravest and best in the Mexican army. General Jarrero is an old and experienced officer, who has long commanded the castle of Perote. When the Texan prisoners were confined in that gloomy fortress, Gen. J. treated them with great kindness and generosity. We trust that on this account, as well as from a regard to his position, he will be kindly and hospitably treated by our citizens when he visits New Orleans.

Of General La Vega we need only say, that he is well known throughout Mexico and the United States, for his gallantry at Resaca de la Palma, and for his dignified and gentlemanly bearing during his sojourn in this country as a prisoner of war. There are among the prisoners several naval officers, who were very efficient in managing the artillery batteries. They are intelligent gentlemen, and speak the English language. The younger officers were very much exerted against Santa Anna. They declared, that if he had not kept out of the entrenchments and showed a determination to fly, they would have been able to maintain their positions. They openly charged him with being either bribed or frightened—a traitor or a coward.

Seventeen Mexican officers were brought to Vera Cruz under a strong escort. The Mexicans on the road had not heard of the battle or of its results, and when they saw the escort approaching, they ran out of their houses to see what it meant. As soon as the well known faces of their own officers, under an American guard, came within view, they seemed to be struck dumb with astonishment and alarm. Gradually these feelings gave way to sorrow, and their lamentations over the misfortunes and disgrace of their country were loud and affecting.

NRR 72.183 May 22, 1847 the storming and capture of the strong works at Cerro Gordo

The Storming and Capture of the Strong Works on Sierra Gordo, by the brigade under Colonel Harney, may be looked upon as one of the most brilliant achievements of the Mexican war—the fate of the battle turned upon it, and here the enemy had placed an overwhelming force of his best troops. - The hill was steep and naturally difficult of ascent; but independent of this the ground was covered with loose, craggy rocks, an undergrowth of tangled chaparral, besides many small trees, the tops of which were cut off some four or five feet from the ground, and turned down the hill to impede the progress of the stormers. TH climb the height at all, even without arms of any kind, would be an undertaking that few would care about essaying; what then must it have been to men encumbered with muskets and cartridge boxes, and obliged to dispute every step of the precipitous and rugged ascent? Murderous showers of grape and canister greeted our men at the onset, and as they toiled unfaltering through a tempest of iron hail a heavy fire of musketry opened upon them. Not a man quailed—with loud shouts they still pressed upward and onward. At every step our ranks were thinned; but forward went the survivors.

When within good musket range, but not until then, was the fire of the enemy returned, and then commenced the dreadful carnage of the strife. The Mexicans held to their guns with more than their usual bravery, but nothing could resist the fierce onset of the stormers. Over the breastworks with which the Mexicans had surrounded the crest of the hill they charged, and shouting attacked the enemy in his very stronghold. The latter now fled panic stricken, but still they were pursued; and it was not until the affrighted fugitives had reached a point without the extreme range of their own cannon, which had been turned upon them at the onset, that they ceased in their flight. The national colors of our country now supplanted the banner of the enemy, the different regimental flags were also planted on the crest, and shouts louder than ever from the victors rose upon the air, struck terror into the very hearts of the enemy in the works still untaken, for they knew that their strong position had been turned and that they were at the mercy of the men they had scoffed at in the mooring. Never was victory more complete, although purchased with the blood of our best men. Lieut. Ewell, of the rifles, was among the first within the enemy's breastworks, and it was her that he received his death wound.-The interior of the work was covered with the dead of the enemy, among them Gen. Vasquez, Col. Palacio, and many of their officers, while the hill side down which they fled was strewn as well. Near 200 men were left dead, while the wounded would swell the number to at least 500-some even put it down as high as 700.

The regiments composing Col. Harney's command, and which successfully stormed the noted Cerro Gordo, were the 1st artillery under Col. Childs, the 3rd infantry under Captain E. B. Alexander, the 7th infantry under Captain E. B. Alexander, the 7th infantry under Colonel Plympton, and a portion of the rifles under Maj. Loring. Many cases of individual bravery, performed by subaltern officers, have been mentioned; but as I cannot particularly notice such as I have heard of without perhaps doing injustice to others equally meritorious, I shall forbear writing until I have more full information. I had almost forgotten to state that four companies of the 2nd infantry under Colonel Riley, took an active part in the assault. [ANP]

NNR 72.183 May 22, 1847 Letter from Jalapa

A private letter published in the Union, from Major Wm. Turnbull, of the corps of topographical engineers. Giving some particulars:

Headquarters of the Army,
Plan del Rio, April 18th, 1847.

"I have but a moment to tell you that we have had a glorious day. The enemy were in great force, some twelve thousand men, and fortified in a very strong pass in the mountains, called Cerro Gordo, with over thirty pieces of artillery; but by careful reconnaissance we discovered a route, and made a road through the ravines, so that we got in rear of most of their guns and the principal force; but when we came out expecting to reach the Jalapa road, we came upon a very high conical mountain, on which there was a square tower of masonry and a breastwork, with five or six pieces of artillery. It was essential that this place should be assaulted, and it was ordered and done in a style never before exceeded. I wish I could give you a description of it, or had the time to attempt it. The hill was between five and six hundred feet high, covered with large rocks and loose stones, and brush and chaparral, and so steep that we of the staff who were mounted, of course, could not ride up, but had to lead our horses. The heat was excessive. As we went up we passed by men exhausted and dropping out of the column, but enough succeeded in getting up to drive the enemy; and I do not think that the greater gallantry was ever displayed. The men advanced steadily up the hill, and under a galling fire from both artillery and musketry, without firing a shot, until they reached the brow of the hill, when they opened, and in a few minutes the American flag, and that of the 7th infantry, took the place of the Mexican, which was received with a shout from all around the hill. I will not attempt to describe the scenes I witnessed; passing the wounded, the dead, and dying of our own people affected me exceedingly.

"We remained but a few minute on the hill, and passed down to the road where a large portion had already reached; the portion of the enemy opposed and near to us took the road to Jalapa; the rest, whose rear we had reached, we bagged between our portion of the army posted to attack in front.

"Some six thousand men surrendered unconditionally, and as many escaped; but this is rough guessing, as I rode through them after they had laid down their arms and were marching back to camp.-Our loss is comparatively small, considering the circumstances; but I think three hundred will cover the whole loss, killed and wounded, in the skirmishing of yesterday, and fighting of today. Among the number of wounded is one of my party, Lieut. Derby; he was with the storming party, was wounded in the left thigh, but is doing well. I had him brought back to camp. I omitted to mention that Gen. Twiggs's division was sent forward to take position, but were discovered, and some severe skirmishing took place, in which the rifles took the lead, behaved well, and suffered much. Capt. Johnston, who was sent forward with this division, whilst reconnoitering the position of the enemy, was severely but not dangerously wounded- one ball through the right thigh below the hip, and another entered his right arm as he was holding his glass to his eye, between the elbow and the shoulder, and was taken out near the back bone. No bones were broken, and he is doing extremely well, and is in good spirits. Santa Anna, Ampudia, Almonte, and others escaped us, but we got Santa Anna's carriage, his leg, and they say some thirty or forty thousand dollars. Among the prisoners are five generals, and God knows how many colonels, &c.- La Vega one of the,. The general-in-chief seems to be a negro; he is very black.- We march in the morning for Jalapa; in fact, the greater part of the army have gone in pursuit, in that direction, already." [KAM]

Major Sumner, who led the rifles in the attack of the 17th on the enemy's advanced position, made a very narrow escape. In the charge, he was struck on the head by a musket bullet. The bullet was flattened to the thinness of a dime, and retained on its surface the print of the Major's hair, and yet, strange to say, except the severance of an artery, he sustained no serious injury. The artery was taken up, and at the last accounts, the Major was doing well. This excellent officer-accounted one of the best tacticians and disciplinarians in the army-may certainly felicitate himself on the strength of his craniological defences. He will never find any difficulty in getting a liberal policy in any of our life insurance offices.

Captain Johnson.--This valuable officer, lately appointed lieut. Colonel of the new ten regimen's was badly wounded in a reconnaissance made by order of General Twiggs, two or three days before his battle, and before the enemy's position was known. He received two musket balls, one through the thigh, cutting the femoral artery, and another through the shoulder. His robust constitution and great endurance will, it is believed, triumph over his severe wounds, and he is now renounced by his surgeons to be out of danger.

Gen. Patterson was on the field and under fire, though seriously indispose and greatly weakened.
by sickness. He was unable to take command of his division, both on account of his physical debility and the separation of the two brigades under his command, which were operating at different and distant points.

Gen. Smith was severely ill, confined to his cot, and thus lost the occasion which his brave heart so warmly panted par, or leading his gallant rifles in their brilliant charge against the Cerro.

Gen. Quitman did not arrive on the field until the day after the battle. Our gallant Southern regiments again lost the opportunity of showing their mettle. The Alabamians and Georgians had the misfortune to be omitted in the programme of the storming of Monterey, and the sorely complained on account of it. A like misfortune at Cerro Gordo, coming so close upon the time of their disbandment, has no doubt given these gallant regiments great mortification and chagrin.

NNR 72.184 May 22, 1847 Gen. Jose Antonio Mejia's Son Captured

GEN. Mejia's son is among the Mexican prisoners now in New Orleans. He is a first lieutenant and aid de camp of Gen. De la Vega. He is quite a young man, and behaved very gallantly at the battle of Sierra Gordo, having his horse shot from under him and being wounded. Like la Vega he was found at his post. General Brooks received his parole of honor, and is now residing with his mother, a resident of New Orleans, until further orders. [JLM]

NNR 72.184 May 22, 1847 Mexicans Massacred

The Delta contains a letter dated Monterey, April 4, from which we make the following extracts:

"Three days ago the Alcalde and Priest of a small town some twenty miles distant, on the road to China, came in and reported to Gen. Taylor the murder of twenty four Mexicans, at Guadaloppa, a small rancho, about six miles from Ramus. The murder was committed, they say, by a party of Americans numbering about twenty, and was done in the night. The murdered men were first made prisoners tied, and afterwards all shot through their heads. The murder is said to have been committed on the 28th [ultimo]. On that night a train of loaded wagons, escorted by two hundred infantry and about the same number of horse, under the command of Col. Mitchell, of the first Ohio regiment, encamped at Marin, which is about five miles from the scene of the murder. The mounted men were composed of United States dragoons and Texas Rangers, under the command of Capt. Graham, of the 2d dragoons. Suspicion rests upon some part of this corps, though no clue has as yet been found to discover the guilty. The officers in command-gentle men, and rigid disciplinarians- are using every means in their power to investigate the matter.

Gen. Taylor has got his steam up on the subject, and is determined to have hung every one who, it can be proved, has taken part in the murder. The town where these men were killed is but a few miles from the place where the large train was captured and so many wagoners massacred on the 22d of February. Some fifteen or twenty of the wagoners who escaped from that massacre came up in the last train, yet there is no evidence that they were engaged in the Guadaloppa murder.

I passed over the place of the massacre of the 22d February a few days ago, and the scene is truly the most horrid and revolting that I have ever witnessed. The remains of the murdered men, yet unburied, stripped of every particle of clothing, lay upon the plains, their flesh devoured by Mexican wolves and buzzards, and their bones bleached in the sun.

"The train was a very large and valuable one, and stretched out from three to four miles in length.
The attack was made upon the escort, who were in the advance, by a large body of lancers. The escort forty men, under Lieut. Barbour, of the Kentucky legion. Were all taken prisoners, and are now in the possession of Urrea. The lancers charged down the train, and lanced without mercy the wagoners as they ran for their lives to the chaparral. More than three fourths of them, it is thought, were killed, and their bodies shockingly mutilated and disfigured.

"Urrea, by last accounts, was at Linares, expecting reinforcements. It is rumored that he has 4 pieces of artillery with him. Marin, Ceralvo, Mier, and China will be garrisoned by our troops, which will render our communication with Camargo entirely safe. The troops here are in excellent health and condition.

NNR 72.184 May 22, 1847 Conquest of Mexico urged by various journals

The last "Democratic Review," has a leading article in which the writer assumes that there can be no end of the war, short of the annihilation of Mexico as a nation." "The Mexican race," says the writer, "now see in the fate of the aborigines of the north, their own inevitable destiny."

The New York "Globe" of Tuesday last has a long article in favor of the conquest of all Mexico. We extract the following paragraph.

"We cannot control the current of events; we gave been compelled to fight; we gad a succession of victories, and always offered peace, and while we were confident that the victories of Vera Cruz and Cerro Gordo would be followed by pacific overtures, we are told by the Mexican congress that no peace can be made with us on any terms. What follows as the inevitable consequence? The conquest of all Mexico; bringing all Mexico into the Union; and event not desired, not sought for by us, but by the Mexicans themselves! Tired of revolution, tired of military despotism, bent down by oppression, impoverished and almost ruined, the civil power of Mexico wishes to change its rulers; wish to come under the protection of the laws and government of the U. States, and state after state in Mexico will declare in favor of the measure, until the Anglo-Saxon race is extended even beyond the Isthmus of Panama. Mexico desires to annex herself to us, with all the declarations of national integrity, and national glory, the common bond of national safety and sympathy urges the Mexicans to this change. Whenever our army occupied a city, the Mexicans felt themselves safe-in person, in property, and in religious rights; and whenever they surrendered a place even after resistance, they considered the change a happy one, and not a calamity; it is an homage to our laws and national character. What are we to do? The whigs, relying upon an increased strength in the next congress, intend to demand of the administration its policy, towards Mexico, as contingent on voting further supplies to carry on the war. They will be answered, we want peace-we have offered peace on honorable terms; we want indemnity for the past and security for the future, and the whigs will not dare assume the responsibility of withdrawing our array, and submit to any terms which Mexico and its military chieftains will dictate." [KAM]

NNR 72.184-185 May 22, 1847 Occupation of Mexico necessary, estimate of proceeds of the tariff on Mexico

The New Orleans Delta, of the 4th inst. concludes its details of the victory of Sierra Gordo, with the following paragraph.

No Prospect of peace. There is no reason, however, to believe that the victory of Sierra Gordo will bring us any nearer to a peace than we were before. The war is not unpopular with the mass of the Mexicans. They have suffered none of the horrors. Besides the controlling spirits of the country, keep up the war spirit, knowing that if the country is occupied by the United States, they will loose their offices and their influence. It is believed by Gen. Scott, and the officers with him, that it will be necessary to occupy the whole country. This, he thinks can be easily done. With 20,000 men he will march to the capital, take possession of the government, disarm the people, establish a provisional government under the authority of the United States, and defray its expenses from the customs and mines, the chief source of revenue in Mexico. Without this force, Gen. Scott will not be able to move with safety to his communications beyond Jalapa. He will have to occupy the Orizaba road, to prevent the enemy operating against the rear from that position.
Having arrived in the Tierra Templada, and encamped in a perfectly healthy position, he will no doubt wait for reinforcements before he pushes further at least than Perote, then the next point of attack.

Instead of peace, a military occupation of Mexico, appears now to be in contemplation.

The Vera Cruz "Eagle" looks to the probably necessity of the military occupation of Mexico, in case he should stubbornly refuse to enter into a negotiation for peace, and thinks that the following force will be requires:

Tampico 1 Regiment Guanajuato 3 Regi.
Vera Cruz 1 do Zacatecas 4 do
Making in all 47 regiments, amounting, according to the present regulations of the United States to 40,000 men, which, to a certainty, would be enough to carry out the military occupation of the country. The expenses of these 40,000 troops will amount to $15,000,000 per annum, which we shall have to pay.

The expense of maintaining this army the editor sets down at $15,000,000 per annum. He estimates a revenue from the new tariff of $13,000,000, and recommends the imposition of a direct tax on the towns in our possession of $7,000,000; thus leaving a surplus in the treasury instead of drawing from it.

He further estimates, if permanent possession should be kept of the country, that the sale of the public lands, by encouraging emigration from the United States and Europe, would annually amount to more than one fourth of the above sum.

The Eagle expresses the opinion that our government can raise twenty millions of revenue by customs and direct taxes, besides the sale of the public lands in Mexico.

It will be recollected, that the revenue to be derived from this source, whatever the amount may be, is to be at the entire control of the president of the United States, in his capacity as commander in chief of the army and navy, as well as the enactment of all the laws by virtue of which it was levied and the appointment of officers required for collecting and disposing of it.

The Richmond Enquirer quoting the above extract from the Eagle, adds- We shall not venture a suggestion as to the probably course of events in Mexico. The future is veiled in mystery and no one can reasonably speculate upon the erratic conduct of so obstinate and weak minded a people as the Mexican nation. It is true that the members of her congress breathe nothing but "war and vengeance," and that they have recommended a system of guerrilla warfare- but we gave already learned how little faith to attach to such swelling pronunciamentos. Without undertaking to speculate upon what our government may do, in case a negotiation of peace does not follow the capture of the Mexican capital, we are sure that we are not far wrong, when we avow the opinion that our armies will not be withdrawn, until we have secured sufficient territory to indemnify the expenses uncured by us in a just war, and the heavy wrongs and injuries inflicted upon our nation and citizens by Mexico. As to the revenue to be raised from the duties in the Mexican ports, which we have established, in perfect accordance with the laws of nations, we are assured by merchants who have resided in Mexico, that they will realize ten millions of dollars.

The Washington Union speaks of Gen. Scott's advance without delay towards the city of Mexico. It says- "Some of the southern papers are still harping upon the twelve months' men. It is true that the time of a few more than three thousand volunteers will expire in June and July; but we have ascertained from the adjutant general's office that reinforcements have already arrived, or are en route, of men to serve during the war, who will more than supply the vacancy. General Scott will have a strong and most efficient army, to meet and overcome any force which the enemy may send against him. And we learn that fresh detachments of a force now in the service of the government, will probably be sent forward to participate in the war with Mexico." [KAM]

NNR 72.185, May 22, 1847 ARMY OF INVASION
72.185 May 22, 1847 Guerrilla Warfare

The New Orleans Delta of the 11th says--"Immediately before the James-L. Day started from Vera Cruz, Major Leonard, who is stationed there, sent an officer on board to inform Gen. Pillow that an express had just arrived from Gen. Scott, with a dispatch, in which it was stated that a deputation of Mexican citizens from the capital had arrived at the general's headquarters, inviting him to advance, assuring him that it would be surrendered to him without opposition, and asking protection for their persons and property. To such favorable terms Gen. Scott assented. He is, therefore on his way to, if not already in the "halls of the Montezuma."

The Delta gives the following statement on the authority of a gentleman direct from Vera Cruz.- Whatever be the fears of the Mexicans, their feelings are anything but amiable towards the Americans.-The road along Jalapa to Vera Cruz is dotted with the mangled and murdered bodies of our countrymen, who were caught straggling away from the parties with which they happened to be marching.-One person counted no less than twenty one victims of Mexican revenge on the line of road. The bandits which prowl about there, recently attacked a party of infantry, on their way to join the main body of the army. They fell back on the last wagon tram, which was close in the rear. The escort charged on the ranchers, who, on the first fire, fled. One American was killed; it was not known how many Mexicans. This occurred eight miles this side of the National Bridge.

Gen. La Vega and his associate prisoners are now in Vera Cruz. They are at large in the city, on their parole. When Gen. Pillow arrived at Vera Cruz, he found them confined in the castle, and believing this to be done from a misrepresentation or a misunderstanding of the orders of Gen.
Scott, he had them liberated.

They would willingly come to this city, if ordered, but as it has been left optional with them wither to remain in Vera Cruz or come here, they think that were they to so the latter it might be constructed into a desertion of their country, in her day of difficulty and danger. A keen sense of honor dictates the feeling.

The National Intelligencer of the 11th, on the authority of a New Orlanans correspondent, says-the city of Puebla had sent a deputation to Gen. Scott, and will make no resistance to his occupation of that place.

Arrangements had been made to defend the capital, but after Gen. Pillow was on board at Vera Cruz he received a message from shore stating that an express had arrived with intelligence that the Mexican government had abandoned the capital, taking with it the archives, and that the citizens had sent a deputation to Gen. Scott to advance and afford them protection.

Proclamations were being circulated by the Mexicans calling for the organization of guerrilla regiments, which plan of warfare was to be adopted on an extensive scale.

In consequence of sickness, death, and loss in battle, it is said that Gen. Scott will not have left in his army more than about 5,000 effective men, after the return of the volunteers whose time shortly expires, and who General Pillow states will return almost to a man. Of the seven regiments, he says not a company will remain.

Santa Anna's army was entirely dispersed, and he, wholly without power and influence, was seeking to leave his country.

"The American Star," is the title of an American paper already issued at Jalapa. It states that mid shipman Rogers, of Delaware, was removed from Perota to Puebla on the day of the fight at Sierra Gordo.

We find the following proclamation in the Jalapa Star. That paper says, with some feeling, that if this mode of warfare is adopted, it will be the most sorrowful time Mexico has ever known. War without pity will be met with war without pity! [JLM, WWF] astonishment and alarm. Gradually these feelings gave way to sorrow, and their lamentations over the misfortunes and disgrace of their country were loud and affecting. [ANP]

NNR 72.185 May 22, 1847 Gen. Jose Mariano de Salas' guerrilla proclamation

My friends- The present moment is the most proper to excite the public spirit and form a nation of men truly free. When an enemy triumphs by his union to rob us of our dearest interests, there us nothing more sure and more certain than to vanquish him by valor and constancy.

For this end I have obtained permission to raise a guerrilla corps, with which to attack and destroy the invaders in ever manner imaginable. The conduct of the enemy, contrary both to humanity and natural rights, authorizes us to pursue him without pity, [misericordia] "War without pity and death!" will be the motto of the guerrilla warfare of vengeance; therefore I invite all my fellow citizens, especially my brave subordinates, to unite at general headquarters, to enroll themselves, from 9 until 3 in the afternoon, so that it may be organized in the present week.

72.185 May 22, 1847 Various rumors about the fortifications at Mexico City

In the "Eagle" of the 1st, which I send you, you will learn that Don Pedro Anaya has been declared dictator. The Swedish consul, who arrived yesterday from Mexico, tells me that it is true that Anaya has been elected dictator; Canalizo spoken of as commander-in-chief of the army, and that preparations are being made for the removal of the government to Calaya, incase our army marches into the city.

The Swedish consul tells me that he visited Santa Anna at Orizaba, and obtained from him a passport to come down. He had but a thousand men with him. Badly equipped, and he looking haggard and very much dejected. His day was passed. Both soldiers and officers have lost all confidence in him- and I have no doubt, that were he to come to Vera Cruz during the present state of feeling of the Mexican population, he would be murdered.

When the Swedish consul left, they were busily employed in fortifying Mexico. No stand will be made at Puebla, unless we delay marching on it for some time- Gen. WORTH IS STILL AT Perote-Scott at Jalapa. [KAM]

NNR72.185-186 May 22, 1847 Position of the Catholic Church in Mexico with regard to the war

The Washington Union had the following as a leading editorial:

It seems that the church in Mexico has volunteered to supply funds for the prosecution of the war. It is well known that in Mexico the property of the church is not subject to taxation, and therefore, whatever is contributed from this quarter, is done gratuitously. This is part of the system, which has been indicated, in other modes, of giving to the war a religious character. It is denounced as a war of infidels and heretics against the holy church, and against Christianity. Those who are familiar with our history and institutions, know full well that there is nothing either hostile to the Roman Church. - A high dignitary of that establishment, drawing a contrast between the U. States and other Christian communities, including his own, he pronounced his decisive opinion that that branch of the Christian church occupied more advantageous ground in this country, and is advancing with more prosperity and solid strength among us, than in any other nation.- The position and high public estimation which many of our Catholic brethren occupy, the intelligence, patriotism, and social virtues which they exhibit, corroborate this statement.

It is not as a religious body, but as an engine of state, that the Catholics of Mexico look upon us with a hostile eye. It is for their own special political purposes- to retain their vast possessions, which impoverish the nation- to sustain their own hierarchy, which lords it over the people- to preserve their power, which weighs down the rest of the community into the slough of ignorance and slavery- that they are thus solicitous and active. It is a zeal for the mammon of unrighteousness- not for the welfare of souls- which inspires and animates the Catholics of Mexico.

In this aspect of the case, it may become a matter of grave consideration, if the church continues to oppose a peace and furnish the fuel of war, whether the immense revenues of the church in Mexico, shall be left untouched whether they shall be suffered to remain at the disposal if the enemy and be applied to sustain the war against us- whether justice and policy do not equally dictate that they should at least be sequestered during the continuance of the war as a legitimate means of cutting off the enemy's supplies.

The experience we have already had on this point leads to another suggestion. Cannot Mexico be prevailed upon to adopt a more tolerant system? Could not the two nations agree that reciprocal stipulations should be made for the free and unrestricted enjoyment of religious liberty within the territories of both nations? Independently of the great good which would thereby result to the whole Christian commonwealth, and to ourselves as constituting a portion of it, it may with perfect truth be said that no greater blessing- no higher or more substantial benefit could be bestowed upon Mexico herself. It may well be doubted whether such an arrangement would not be productive of advantage to both countries, which would more than compensate for all the expenses and losses of the war; and our invasion of Mexico be the parent of her general civilization, diffused intelligence, wide spread happiness, and solid prosperity. At the same time it should be distinctly understood that we have no right to dictate this condition to the Mexican government- none to insist upon it as a stipulation of any treaty- none to make it the slightest impediment to the establishment of peace. Mexico may, probably, resist any such suggestion. We should be bound, therefore, to leave the whole question as it is, trusting alone to the progress of the age to effect an object which may be desirable to the whole Christian world.

NNR 72.186 May 22, 1847 Gen. William Jenkins gathering up grain

Gen. Worth was gathering all the grain he could, and has all the bakeries at work, as if in anticipation of breaking all the communications with Vera Cruz.

NNR 72.186 May 22, 1847 Gen. Winfield Scott's design to relinquish the line of communication

It was the intention of Gen. Scott, upon the arrival of the wagon train that was to start from Vera Cruz, about the 6th instant, to cut off all connection with the sea coast, rely upon the country for sustenance and push forward for the city. This general order dated at Jalapa, 30th April, intimates as much. But Mr. Kendall's letter of the 4th - the very latest news- throws some doubt upon the speedy adoption of this plan, in consequence of the determination of the 12 months' volunteer, in a body not to re-enlist. This may retard the advance if the army, unless indeed the reported readiness of the city to surrender be confirmed.

NNR 72.186 May 22, 1847 Mexican account of the Battle of Cerro Gordo

Mexican Account of the Battle of Sierra Gordo.

The following is the despatch of Gen. Canalizo, the second in command at the battle of Sierra Gordo, to the Mexican secretary of war.

"Headquarters, Branderilla, April 18, 1847.

"Sir-One of those unfortunate reverses which will occur in the course of he war, has been productive of most disastrous consequences to this army, and under circumstances that seemed to indicate that fortune was on the point of favoring us, as the enemy were repulsed entirely on the previous day in their charge on the Cerro Telegrato, situated on the right of our works; but this morning at 7 o'clock, availing themselves doubtless with their better acquaintance with the country, they charge with their entire force in such a manner as to dislodge the troops that guarded the newly finished fortifications, after a most vigorous resistance.  After this they succeeded in taking the headquarters and other points of our encampment, giving rise to confusion and disorder on our side, which even the commander in chief, aided by his generals, found it impossible to prevent, occasioning thereby the complete dispersal and rout of the infantry troops, and involving the loss of almost of all our pieces of artillery. The cavalry forces only were not included in this disorder; but, being hemmed in by a column of the enemy's troops that were in the vicinity of a wood on the left, it became necessary for them vigorously to open a passage, in order to avoid being taken prisoners.  This it was that prevented us joining the commander in chief and the other generals who were engaged in defending the battery situated in front of the headquarters.-During this time I was laboring under the most serious apprehension as to the fate of the commander in chief, whether he was killed or taken prisoner; but, as I passed Jalapa, I happily heard of his safety, and hope soon to be reunited with him. In brief, I will say to your excellency, that, with the few remaining troops, infantry and cavalry, that I have reunited, and of which I shall hereafter give a more detailed account, I pursued my march, passed this night at la Hoya, and I shall proceed until I receive further orders from the government, as I am unable to defend any point on the route, in consequence of the total loss of the artillery and ammunition, as I have no sufficient powder left for one round. I would also mention that I have at present no means for supporting the troops that follow me; and as for the cavalry, in consequence of the lengthy march they underwent from San Luis to this point, they are I a most deplorable state as regards service.
"I feel much at having to communicate, through you, to the acting president, such unfortunate new; but, nevertheless, I present you my respects and consideration. Go I and liberty!

Valentine Canalizo.

"To his excellency the minister of war." [ANP]

NRR 72.186 May 22, 1847 Gen. Winfield Scott's official report on the Battle of Cerro Gordo

Headquarters of the army, Jalapa, April 23, 1847.

Sir—In forwarding the reports of commanders which detail the operations of their several corps against the Mexican lines at Cerro Gordo, I shall present in continuation of my former report, but an outline of the affair; and while adopting heartily their commendation of the ardor and efficiency of individuals, I shall mention by name only those who figure prominently, or, from position, could bet be included in those sub-reports.

The field sketch herewith, indicates the positions of the two armies. The tierra caliente, of low level, terminates at Plan del Rio, the site of the American camp, from which the road ascends immediately in a long circuit among lofty hills, whose commanding points had all been fortified and garrisoned by the enemy. His right, entrenched, rested on a precipice overhanging an impassable ravine that forms the bed of the stream; and his entrenchments extended continuously to the road, on which was placed a formidable battery. On the other side, the lofty and difficult height of Cerro Gordo commanded the approaches in all directions. The main body of the Mexican army was encamped on level ground, with a battery of five pieces, halt a mile in height toward Jalapa.

Resolving, if possible, to turn the enemy's left, and attack in rear, while menacing or engaging his front, I caused daily reconnoissances to be pushed, with the view of finding a route for a force to debouch on the Jalapa road and cut off retreat.

The reconnoisance, begun by Lieut. Beauregard, was continued by Captain Lee, engineers, and a road made along difficult slopes and over chasms-out of the enemy's view, though reached by his fire when discovered-until, arriving at the Mexican lines, further reconnoisance became impossible without an action. The desired point of debouchure, the Jalapa road was not, therefore, reached, though believed to be within easy distance; and to gain that point it now became necessary to carry the height of Cerro Gordo. The dispositions in my plan of battle-general orders No. 111 heretofore enclosed-were accordingly made.

Twiggs' division, reinforced by Shield' brigade of volunteers, was thrown into position on the 17th, and was, of necessity drawn into action in taking up the ground for its bivouac and the opposing height for our heavy battery. IT will be seen that many of our officers and men were killed or wounded in this sharp combat-handsomely commenced by a company of the 7th infantry under Bvt. First Lieut. Gardner, who is highly praised by all his commanders for signal services. Col. Harney coming up with the rifle regiment and first artillery, (also parts of his brigade), brush away the enemy and occupied the height-on which, in the night was placed a battery of one 24-pouner and two 24-pound howitzers, under the superintendence of Capt. Lee, engineers, and Lieut. Hagner, ordnance. These guns opened next morning, and were served with effect by Capt. Steptoe and Lieut. Brown, 3d artillery, Lieut. Hagner, (ordnance), and Lieut. Seymour, 1st artillery.

The same night, with extreme toil and difficulty, under the superintendence of Lieut. Tower, engineers, and Lieut. Laidley, ordnance, an 8-inch howitzer was put in position across the river and opposite to the enemy's right battery. A detachment of four companies under Major Burham, N. York volunteers, performed this creditable service, which enabled Lieut. Ripley, 2d artillery, in charge of the piece, to open a timely fire on that quarter.

Early on the 18th the columns moved to the general attack, and our success was speedy and decisive. Pillow's brigade assaulting the right of the entrenchments, although compelled to retire, had the effect I have heretofore stated. Twigg's division, storming the strong and vital point of Cerro Gordo, pierced the centre, gained command of all the entrenchments, and cut them off from support. As our infantry, (colonel Riley's brigade) pushed on against the main body of the enemy, the guns of their own fort were rapidly turned to play on that force,(under the immediate command of Gen. Santa Anna), who fled in confusion. Shields' brigade bravely assaulting the left, carried the rear battery, (five guns) on the Jalapa road, and aided materially in completing the rout of the enemy.
The part taken by the remainder of the forces, held in reserve to support and pursue, has already been noticed.

The moment the fate of the day was decided, the cavalry, and Taylor's and Wall's field batteries were pushed on towards Jalapa in advance of the pursuing columns of infantry-Twiggs' division and the brigade of Shields, (now under Col. Baker)-and Maj. Gen. Patterson was sent to take command of them. In the hot pursuit many Mexicans were exhausted by the heat and distance.

The rout proves to have been complete-the retreating army, except at small body of cavalry, being dispersed and utterly disorganized. The immediate consequences have been our possession of this important city, the abandonment of the works and artillery at La Hoya, the next formidable pass between Vera Cruz and the capital, and the prompt occupation by Worth's division of he fortress of Perote, (second only to San Juan de Ulloa), with its extensive armament of sixty six guns and mortars, and its large supplies of materiel. To General Worth's report, annexed, I refer for details.

I have heretofore endeavored to do justice to the skill and courage with which the attack on the height of Sierra Gordo was directed and executed, naming the regiments most distinguished, and their commanders, under the lead of Colonel Harney. Lieutenant G. W. Smith led the engineer company as part of he storming force, and is noticed with distinction.

The reports of this assault make favorable mention of many in which I can well concur, having witnessed the daring advance and perfect steadiness of he whole. Besides those already named, Lieutenant Brooks, 3d infantry, Lieutenant Macdonald, 2d dragoons, Lieut. Vandorn, 7th infantry-all acting staff officers-Captain Magruder, 1st artillery, and Lieutenant Gardner, 7th infantry, seem to have won especial praise.

Colonel Riley's brigade and Talcott's rocket and howitzer battery, were engaged on and about the heights, and bore an active part.

The brigade and Talcott's rocket and howitzer battery, were engaged on an about the heights, and bore an active part.

The brigade so gallantly led b General Shields, and, after his fall, by Colonel Baker, deserves high commendation for its fine behavior and success. Colonels Foreman and Burnett, and Major Harris, commanded the regiments; Lieutenant Hammond, 3d artillery, and Lieutenant Davis, Illinois volunteers, constituted the brigade staff. These operations, hid from my view by intervening hills, were not fully known when my first report was hastily written.

Brigadier General Twiggs, who was in the immediate command of all the advanced forces, has earned high credit by his judgment, spirit, and energy.

The conduct of Colonels Campbell, Haskell, and Wynkoop, commanding the regiments of Pillow's brigade, is reported in terms of strong approbation by Major General Patterson. I recommend for a commission, Quartermaster Sergeant Henry, of the 7th infantry, (already known to the army for intrepidity of former occasions,) who hauled down the national standard of the Mexican fort.

In expressing my indebtedness for able assistance to Lieut. Col. Hitchcock, acting inspector general to Majors Smith and Turnbull, the respective chiefs of engineers and topographical engineers, and Lieuts. Derby and Hardcastle, topographical engineers-to Captain Allen, chief quarter master, and Lieut. Blair, chief commissary-and to Lieutenants Hagner and Laidley, ordnance, all actively employed-I am impelled to make special mention of the services of Captain R. E. Lee, engineers. This officer, greatly distinguished at the siege of Vera Cruz, was again indefatigable, during these operations, in reconnoissances as daring as laborious, and of the utmost value. Nor was he less conspicuous in planting batteries, and in conducting columns to their stations under ht heavy fire of the enemy.

My personal staff, Lieutenants Scott, Williams and Law, and Major Van Buren, who volunteered for the occasion, gave me zealous and efficient assistance.

Our whole force present, in action found reserve, was 8,500; the enemy is estimated at 12,000 or more. About 3,000 prisoners, 4 or 5,000 stands of arms, and 43 pieces of artillery were taken. By the accompanying return, I regret to find our loss more severe than at first supposed, amounting in the two days to 33 officers and 398 men-in all 431, of whom 63 were killed. The enemy's loss is computed to be from 1,000 to 1,200.

I am happy n communicating strong hopes for the recovery of the gallant General Shields, who is so much improved as to have been brought to this place.

Appended to this report are the following papers:
A.-General return by name of killed and wounded.

B.-Copies of report of Lieut. Col. Hitchcock, acting inspector general (of prisoners taken) and accompanying papers.

D.-Report of Major Gen. Patterson, and reports of brigade commanders.

D.-Copy of report by Brig. General Worth, announcing the occupation by his division of the castle and town of Perote, with an inventory of ordnance there found.

I have the honor to remain, sir, with high respect, you most obedient servant,

Winfield Scott.  [ANP]

NNR 72.187 May 22, 1847 communication of Gen. Ethan Allen Hitchcock on operations at Cerro Gordo

A communication from Lt. Col. E. A. Hitchcock, Inspector General, to Major Gen. Scott, dated Jalapa, April 24, makes a return of the paroles of the Mexican prisoners captured at Sierra Gordo. It compromises the paroles of three general officers and 185 officers of lower grades; and also the paroles of 2,837 of the rank and file of the Mexican army. A separate return comprises the names of 288 officers, besides those, sixteen in number, sent to Vera Cruz.

Col H. goes on to say-

I think proper to remark, with regard to the operations at Sierra Gordo, that by turning the left flank of the enemy, and storming the principal hill occupied by him, which was executed under your personal observation on the morning of the 18th instant, his force was divided-all of the batteries east of the hill begin separated from the main body of the army encamped on the Jalapa road west of the hill.

All of the positions of the enemy were commended by the hill itself, which was believed by the Mexicans to be inaccessible to our troops. The hill being stormed and taken the main body of the enemy fled in the utmost confusion, and but a very few were taken prisoners. Many of the troops in the batteries, at the same time made their escape in the hills, throwing away their arms.

A Mexican officer assured me that no less than 1,500 thus escaped from one single battery. Of those in the batteries who laid down their arms, more than a thousand contrived to escape on their march from the field of battle of Plan del Rio, some five miles or more, along a circuitous road bounded by woods and ravines-and hence the number of prisoners on parole is diminished to about 3,000 men, exclusive of officers. And although this may not be the place for the expression of an opinion, I feel warranted in saying that the defeat was as complete as it was unexpected by the enemy-that he was utterly destroyed, captured, or routed, spreading terror and consternation throughout the country. NNR 72.186-187 May 22, 1847 Letter About the Capture of Tuxpan

Correspondence of the New Orleans Delta

Tuspan, Mexico, 21st April, 1847

Eds. Delta- Very little time we have for scribbling now a days I assure you, but as the press is stopped, just as present, I will drop you a few lined to keep you acquainted with the last operations of the squadron, On Saturday, 17th inst., the following vessels anchored three miles distant from the bar at the entrance of the Tuspan river- the steam frigate Mississippi, Commodore Perry's flag ship; the frigate Raritan; the corvettes Germantown, Albany, John Adams, and Decatur; the steamers Spitfire, Vixen, and Scourge; the gunboats Reefer, Bonita, and Petrel-and every preparation was made for commencing and finishing a successful attack upon the forts and city on the following morning. The small steamers were lighted, so as to enable then to cross the bar, by removing a part of their coal, masts, spars, rigging; etc., and on the 18th inst., at daybreak, we ran in towards the mouth of the river, with the steam frigate and all the light draught vessels of the squadron. The Mississippi anchored in five fathoms of water, within a mile of the breakers and, as all things were in readiness, boat load after boat load debarked from the vessels, stood in for the shore, dashed through the breakers, into the smooth water of the river, and then landed their men in safety on the sandbeach. The small steamers, with the gunboats in tow, likewise ploughed their way through the foaming surge, safely crossed the bar, and anchored where there was scarcely a ripple on the surface of the water. Com. Perry came on board the steamer Spitfire, Commander Tattnall, and hoisted his broad pendant. Just about that time Mexican troops were discovered some distance above, on the bank of the river, apparently engaged in throwing up a breastwork; and instantly the order was given, "all hands up anchor"—and in the shortest possible time the almighty steam was driving us a head on the enemy, but as we neared them we were convinced that they were only a reconnoitering party and they fled with the utmost precipitation. The steamer was then put about, and again took up her position preparatory to forming line, in order, to ascend the river to the city, some five miles distant. The Spitfire, flag ship, led the way; then followed the Vixen, Comar'r Sands; The Scourge, Lieut. Comm'g Lockwood, the gunboats Bonita, Lieut. Comm'g Benham, Petrel, Lieu. Comm'g Turner; and all the cutters of the squadron, under the commands of Captains Breese and Forest, and Capt. Lowery, and several of the crew were wounded, but no so as to endanger their lives, very accordingly it did not pass through her, but penetrates the plank and lodged in the timbers, one struck the Vixen, and that was full in her bow, but fortunately just below her water line; - and in regular order, under a full head of steam, we rushed up to the first fort, situated in a bend in the river, about a mile from the city. Here from the fort a curling smoke and a booming sound passed the intimation round that we should not take the place without a struggle; but their shot fell short, and the Commodore, apparently regretting the circumstance, sung out "go ahead fast," and the good old steamer commenced paddling her wheels [illegible] double quick time. And then the enemy opened upon us in earnest: shot after shot flew over the vessel, and struck the water some distance astern.

The tort was located high above us, on a steep bank of the river, and therefore they could only bring a plunging fire to bear upon our approaching squadron. This proved of great advantage to us, for as we ran rapidly towards them they must alter the train of their guns every time they delivered their fire. And now the scene became admirably exciting. The whole of our small squadron had closed up so that we formed a perfect phalanx of steamers, gun boats, and cutters. The marines of the Mississippi were drawn up on the wheel-house, and away from any position of the starboard wheel house, and I had a fair view of the boat tout ensemble. From the flash of their guns I could judge that the shot were not going to strike us, and then I watched them in their course until they plunged into the water astern; many fell right amid a group of cutters, and what astonished and delighted me most, was o see that not a single boat was injured in any wise. And now we were running up to within a hundred yards of the fort, and the enemy commenced firing with musketry and escopetas. The marines returned the fire with musketry, when Lieut. Parker, from the hurricane deck, called out "don't fire yet," but the marine officer answered "we are within musket range," and scarcely were the words spoken when Lieut. P. and three other officers were simultaneously wounded by the enemy's fire, which feelingly demonstrated the fact, that some were inclined to doubt. Comm'r Tattnall, Lieutenants Parker and Hartstein, and Passed Midshipman Lowery, and several of the crew were wounded, but no so as to endanger their lives, very fortunately, and therefore their friends at home have no cause for disquieting themselves thereupon. A few discharges from the pivot guns of the Spitfire, Vixen, and other vessels, served to silence the batteries of this fort, for the peculiar tune hummed by our Paixhan shells had such a startling effect upon the elongated nerves and sinews of our enemies that, beyond a doubt, they are running yet. On passing by the fort we observed that a party of seamen and marines, commanded by Capt. Breese, and led by Lieuts. May, DeCamp, and others, had taken possession of the fort, and hoisted the soul inspiring stripes and stars, which brought forth peals of loud buzzes, which far o'er the hills and valleys ring, and check the vulture on the wing, who, poised in the air hung hovering, to watch the strife below. The river, at this pass, was so narrow that we could have jerked a stone on shore at either side, and the second fort, half a mile above, had already opened a raking fire upon us— but the shot either fell short or flew over our ship, and only one struck the Vixen, and that was full in her bow, but fortunately just below her water line; consequently it did not pass through her, but penetrates the plank and lodged in the timbers, doing but little damage. On the starboard hand, all along, the enemy, his in the chaparral, kept up a steady fire of musketry upon us, but an occasional volley from the marines drove them from their concealment. As related of the first batter, the second and third forts were silenced in detail by our Paixhan guns; - and in regular order, under a full head of steam, we rushed up to the anchorage opposite the city of Tuxpan. All three forts, in quick succession, were taken possession of by the seamen and marines, under their immediate commanding officers, who had landed in their boats among the shores of the river. Directly after coming to anchor, the Commodore's barge was called away, and he, with his staff, proceeded to the shore and took possession of the city, without the least shadow of opposition on the part of the enemy. Subsequently we learned that Senor Gen. Don Martin P. de Cos, Commandate of the place, had struck out for country quarters some time before the fight was done. As soon as the scattered boats could be collected together, the debarkation of the marines was effected, and a battalion of stalwart sea-soldiers, paraded in the Plaza, thoroughly convincing the few remaining citizens of Tuxpan that it were better to receive us as friends than enemies.

Two brass field pieces, drawn and worked by seamen, and commanded by Lieutenants Blunt and Henry Rodgers, of the Mississippi, were stationed in the Plaza; and with due ceremony fired a national salute in honor of the victory. Com. Perry established his headquarters in the custom house, one of the best constructed buildings in the city. The marine officer, with the guard of the steam frigate was quartered on the ground floor of the same building; and Capt. Edson, commanding marines of the home squadron, occupied the deserted Barracks and an old church in the Plaza. Capt. Breese has been appointed governor of the place, by the commodore, and here we have been for three days, with everything most judiciously arranged, and are as comfortable as circumstances will admit of. From one of the public stores we have taken sails, rigging, etc., that belonged to the wrecked brig Truxton; and an expedition has just returned from up the river, with her boats; besides schooners, launches, and boats captured from the enemy. Gen. Cos' house is handsomely fitted up with costly furniture, and he must have fled in great alarm, for on going to his quarters we found his bed just as he had turned out of it, with shirts, drawers, etc., strewn about in most admirable disorder. On his table were the remains of a jollification: bottles half full of Champagne, sherry and Madeira, with the best of Cubanos distributed about in all directions. Last night it was rumored that Gen. Cos would bear down upon us, and give us "goss," with a thousand lancers; and to prevent the catastrophe, we kept our "harness on our backs" until daylight appeared. The number of killed, wounded, and missing is not yet correctly ascertained, and it will be difficult for us to so with any degree of certainty until we return to our respective vessels. Some of the Truxton's guns were taken from the forts and conveyed to the shipping, and all others rendered useless by the usual process of dismounting, spiking, breaking off the trunnions, etc.- The citizens are returning to their homes, and seem very willing to accommodate us in any way they can; but they are an unfortunate race of beings, take them by and large, and we do not accept of anything without making full and satisfactory remuneration to the owners.

NNR 72.188 May 22, 1847 Arrangements for pay to soldiers and volunteers in the west

We learn that the United States government has given orders for the immediate transmission from the east to Major Steuart, United States paymaster of this department, of about five hundred thousand dollars, a very large proportion of it to be in gold, chiefly doubloons. This, in addition to the sum now on [illegible] with the subtreasurer in St. Louis, about six hundred thousand dollars, is to be applied to the payment of troops now in New Mexico, the troops for that quarter, &c., &c. Several paymasters, will be added to this department, and a large sum of money, say two hundred thousand dollars, will at an early day, be sent directly to Santa Fe, in charge of one of the paymasters, assigned to his command.- The payment of those already in the service, and those now preparing to go there, must throw a large amount of money into circulation in this quarter.

NNR 72.189-72.190 May 22, 1847 LIEUT. CHARLES G HUNTER, THE CAPTURE OF FLA-CO-TALPAM AND ALVARADO

The trial, defence, and reprimand of Lieutenant Charles G. Hunter, before a naval court martial.

CHARGES AND SPECIFICATIONS.

Charges and specifications preferred by Commodore M. C. Perry, commander-in-chief of the United States naval forces in the Gulf of Mexico, against Lieutenant Charles G. Hunter, United States navy, late commanding the United States steamer Scourge.

Charge first- Treating with contempt his superior, being in the execution of his office.

Specification first-In that he, the said Lieutenant Charles G. Hunter, United States navy, did, on the 21st day of March, 1847, being then in command of the United States steamer Scourge, enter the port of Alvarado, and did there arrogate to himself, (the said Lieut. Charles G. Hunter,) the authority and power, that are vested only in the commander-in-chief, by entering into stipulation for and receiving the surrender of Alvarado and its dependencies.

Specification second- In that the said Lieutenant Charles G. Hunter, U. S. navy, did on the 31st day of March, 1847, with the U. S. steamer Scourge under his command, proceed from Alvarado to the town of Fla-ca-talpam, without any orders or authority, and there demand the surrender of the said town of Fla-ca-talpam, and enter into and sign articles of capitulation, although aware of the immediate approach of the commander-in-chief, to whom alone such powers are confided-thus treating with contempt the authority of his superior, being in the execution of his duty.

Specification third- In that the said Lieutenant Charles G. Hunter, United States navy, did on the 31st day of March, 1847, in proceeding from Alvarado to Fla-ca-talpam, capture four schooners, one of which he set on fire and burnt, and another he abandoned, thus substituting his own will for the discretion of the commander-in-chief, who was within a few hours reach of communication, and treating with contempt the authority of his superior; all of which is in violation of the laws of the United States, as contained in "an act for the better government of the navy of the United States, approved, April 23d, 1800."

Charge second--Disobedience of orders.

Specification first- In that he, the said Lieutenant Charles G. Hunter, United States navy, having been ordered to report to Captain Sam L. Breese, and assist in blockading the port of Alvarado, did, in disobedience or disregard of said orders, enter the harbor and take possession of the town of Alvarado.

Specification second- In that he, the said Lieutenant Charles G. Hunter, United States navy, having been ordered on the evening of the 1st April, 1847, to report himself in person to the commander-in-chief at his quarters in the town of Alvarado, at 10 o'clock A. M. of the following morning, did disobey said order; all of which is in violation of the laws of the United States, as contained in "an act for the better government of the navy of the United States, approved, April 23d, 1800."

(Signed) M. C. PERRY,
Commanding Home Squadron.

DEFENCE OF LIEUTENANT HUNTER

Mr. President and gentlemen of the court- I will not trouble you with unnecessary verbiage, but proceed at once to the point. My orders were, (as stated in the 1st spec. 2d charge) to report to Captain Breese, and to assist in blockading Alvarado. I did not consider them (can they be fairly considered?) as forbidding me to annoy the enemy in every way in my power, as modifying in the slightest degree the general duty of every officer having a military command in time of war to molest and cripple the enemy in every possible way. On the evening of the 30th March, being sufficiently near, I opened upon the fort at Alvarado with shot and shells. Apprehensive of a norther, I stood off and on during the night, with a strong breeze and rough sea. Towards morning, it having moderated, I stood close in to the bar, again opened upon the forts. Shortly afterwards I discovered two horsemen upon the beach holding a white flag, and a boat crossing the bar at the same time. This boat brought me an offer on the part of the authorities to surrender the city.- Permit me here to observe Mr. President, that as there are two sides to every question, so there may be two results to every affair of this kind. Alvarado is now in our possession; but let us suppose that was not to be; that we had been foiled a third time in our efforts to take it. What would have been my position, I say, if I, having refused the offer of the town when the authorities were ready to yield it- the American forces had been a third time baffled in their efforts to capture it? Mr. President, the worst that can now befall me, is a trifle to the infamy and disgrace which would have remained attached to my name, perhaps, long after I was in the grave.

If you, Mr. President, (or any member of this honorable court,) will fancy yourselves in my place when the offer of capitulation reached me, I think that you must perceive that it placed me in a difficult, a most embarrassing position-one that might have got a much more experienced officer than myself into trouble. I had to decide upon the disobeying of my orders on the one hand, and the possible consequences which my refusal to take such a responsibility might lead to on the other. I had to decide between two courses- the one leading to present personal safety, and the possibility of future infamy; the other to some personal risk, perhaps, but by which the honor of the navy and my honor, at least, were safe. I have stated thus the view which I took of my position, and the motives on which my actions were founded. I will not say, Mr. President, that under similar circumstances you would have taken a similar view of your position; but I think I may say, without the danger of dissent here or elsewhere, that taking the same view I did, that you, or any other member of this honorable court, would have done just what I did.

My summons for the surrender of the city of "Alvarado," was not made until the authorities hesitating to sign the articles of capitulation, - I thought myself entrapped; when it became necessary to use strong measures and strong language. Upon the reception of that summons, they signed the articles, and in the name of the United States of America, I took possession of "Alvarado" and its dependencies. Shortly afterwards, I learned that after our attack the evening previous, the garrison had fired the public vessels, spiked and buried their guns, placed a large quantity of government property, chiefly munitions of war, on board of several small vessels, and were proceeding up the river in the direction of the city of "Fla-ca-Talpam." I followed, as I conceived it to be my duty, and captured one of them loaded with arms, &c. that got ashore, and buried her to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy. Another, worthless to ourselves or the enemy, and abandoned, and two others, I brought to "Alvarado." The pursuit of these vessels brought me to the city of "Fla-ca-Talpam," where I arrived about 2 o'clock in the morning; trusting to the suddeness of the attack, I ordered the junta to assemble, and demanded within thirty minutes an entire and unconditional surrender, and my demands were complied with. I contend Mr. President, and gentlemen of the court, that all that happened after the capitulation of Alvarado, followed as a natural and necessary consequence (not, however, foreseen by me) when I first accepted of their offer to surrender. I contend that my error consisted in the original disobedience of my orders (which, from what I have since learned, I regret,) and that what I did afterwards, I was in a great measure obliged to do. Knowing that several small vessels of the enemy, laden with military stores were within my reach, could I doubt that it was my duty to destroy or capture them? Seeing, from the conduct of the enemy at Alvarado, that a panic prevailed among them, and that there was a prospect of success, I demanded the immediate and unconditional surrender of Fla-ca-Talpam. I contend that the two acts followed as a necessary consequence to my first disobedience of orders. Of the motives that led to that step, I have made an honest exposition to the court, and I hope that you will consider them, together with the difficulties of my position, and my want of experience in such matters, as some &Û230; of my fault.

I regret my error apart from the trouble it has brought upon me. I regret it, because it has given offence to the commander-in-chief. (I speak from rumor only- I have no certain knowledge of the fact,) as I have heard there was an understanding between the commander-in-chief and commanding general ashore that there was to be a combined attack made by the squadron and army, on these places; it might thus seem that I had sought to rob of its just participation in this affair that arm of the service which in the progress of this war, has acquired for itself and for our country, so much honor and glory. Nothing could be farther from my intentions- I knew nothing of any such understanding. One or two matters remain to be touched upon. I am charged in the two 1st spec. of the 1st charge, with arrogating to myself the powers of commander-in-chief, in signing articles of capitulation, &c. although aware of the immediate approach of the commander-in-chief. In regard to the first, my error was one of simple ignorance. I knew that I had obtained possession of these places, and meant of course to hand them over to the first senior officer that might approach; but I had not the remotest intention of exercising any of the powers of commander-in-chief. I knew, or perhaps I should rather say, had reason to believe, that the commander in chief would arrive in a short time; but I did not know precisely when, still less did I know that he was nearer than Vera Cruz.

In the second specification of the second charge, I am charged with having disobeyed an order to call at a specific time at the commander in chief's quarters.

Gentlemen, I was so absorbed at the difficulties that surrounded me, that his order to me to report myself, entirely escaped my recollection, - this may seem a lame excuse, but it has at least the merit of truth. But, Mr. President, none of us are entirely free from occasional acts of forgetfulness; the honorable member yesterday who gave in his testimony, made a mistake, and I must say that the confidence with which I leave my case in his hands has been increased by the handsome manner in which he corrected his error when reminded of it.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the court, I have been much mortified and excited, by the many and numerous difficulties that surround me. I have aimed at nothing but the glory of my country- the honor and dignity of the service to which I belong. I leave my case with perfect confidence in your hands.

G. G. HUNTER, Lieut. Comdg.

FINDING AND SENTENCE OF THE COURT.

The first specification of the first charge proved. The second specification of the first charge proved. The third specification of the first charge proved.

And the accused guilty of the first charge.

The first specification of the second charge not proved, of the accused not having reported himself in person to Capt. Samuel L. Breese, according to his orders; but proved that the accused entered the harbor of Alvarado, instead of assisting in blockading that part.

The second specification of the second charge proved, and the accused guilty of the second charge. The court then, upon due deliberation upon the above finding, pronounced the following sentence:

That the accused, Lieutenant Charles G. Hunter, United States navy, be dismissed from the United States home squadron, and reprimanded by the commander in chief, which reprimand is to be read on the quarter deck of every vessel of the squadron, in the presence of the officers and crew.

The above is a true copy from the records of the court.

(Signed,)
J. BRYAN, Judge Advocate.

THE REPRIMAND OF COMMODORE REPLY.

United States flag ship Mississippi,
Anton Lizardo, April 9, 1847.
SIR: I enclose herewith the findings and sentence of the court martial, convened on the 7th instant, for your trial, which imposes upon me the task of expressing, in the form of reprimand, my opinion of your conduct as proved before the court martial.

However lenient the sentence in your case may seem to be, I have approved it, as I can conceive of no punishment more severe than a dismissal in time of war from a squadron actively engaged before the enemy. The sentence, while it condemns in a most signal manner, your conduct cuts you off from further association in this squadron, with men whose patient endurance of the most trying duties, and whose character for courage, obedience, and subordination, have won my highest approbation.

How different has been your course? Scarcely a day on the station, and you disobey orders, arrogate to yourself the duties belonging to a commander in chief, talk of opening upon the town, and of ordering the troops to advance when you had but one gun, and not a solitary soldier, and "all for the purpose" (as you say,) "of securing an unmolested entrance of the squadron into the river."

It would be difficult, if not impossible, to pint to another instance of similar folly; and the most charitable construction that can be given to it, is—that in the elation of a first command, you had truly imagined yourself actually in command, of the naval and military detachments then approaching and within a short distance of the scene of your exploits.

With due respect,
(Signed) M. C. PERRY,
Commander in chief of home squadron.
To Lieutenant Charles G. Hunter, United States navy

NNR 72.192 May 22, 1847 List of volunteers whose time expires, promise of the "Union" that troops will be adequate

The terms of service of the several, volunteer regiments mustered for the period of twelve months will expire at the following dates:

Twelve months volunteers under Major Gen. Scott

Captain Blanchard's company Louisiana volunteers, July 30, 1847.
Col. Coffee's Alabama regiment, between the 8th and 29th June, 1847.
Col. Jackson's Georgia regiment, between the 10th and 19th June, 1847.
Col. Forman's 3rd Illinois regiment, between the 9th June and 2nd July, 1847.
Col. Baker's 4th Illinois regiment, between the 9th June and 2nd July, 1847.
Baltimore and District of Columbia battalion, between the 30th May and the 8th June, 1847.
Col. Thomas's Tennessee mounted regiment, between the 28th May and 2nd June, 1847.
Col. Campbell's 1st Tennessee foot, between the 4th and 18th June, 1847,

Volunteers under Major General Taylor

Three regiments of Ohio, between the 23rd and 29th June, 1847.
Three regiments of Indiana, between the 18th and 26th June, 1847.
Three regiments of Illinois, between the 17th and 30th June, 1847.
Three regiments of Kentucky, between the 17th May and 15th June, 1847.
Mississippi regiment, between the 3rd and 15th June 1847.
Arkansas regiment, between the 30th June and 3d July, 1847.

From this statement we are happy to say that the reinforcements for Gen. Scott's army, which for several weeks have been en route, including those that must reach Vera Cruz, by the end of May, will be fully equal to the number of twelve months' men who are to be discharged in June and July, as they will, of course, remain in the field for service up to the end of the twelve months, for which they are engaged. NNR 72.192 May 22, 1847 Col. Sterling Price at Santa Fe

Army of the North. Santa Fe dated to the 3d April. Left Col. Price with about 450 troops at that place, enjoying rather better health, though but few of them had escaped sickness. The remainder of his command were stationed through the country guarding stock or garrisoning posts. [KAM]

Major Campbell's expedition from Chihuahua to New Orleans

NNR 72. 192 May 22, 1847

Major Campbell took possession of a number of places not before being captured, on his route in; had several skirmishes with Comanche Indians; at one time was surrounded by 500 of them, and had to cut his way through. They captured his pack mules and provisions, and cut off his hunting parties, obliging his party to subsist upon mule meat as lean as Pharaoh's kine, relieved occasionally by a prairie dog, wolf, skunk, and other such, to the number of twenty two varieties. In this condition, almost naked, the gallant little party reached General Tarrants, on Chambers creek, Navoo county, Texas, and from thence by the Red River to New Orleans, where they arrived on the 10th instant, hale and hearty. [KAM]

Col. Alexander William Doniphan's uncertainty on how to proceed in the absence of instructions

Maj. Campbell, of Springfield, Illinois, left Chihuahua on the 15th of March, with a detachment of 32 men and dispatches for the government. Col. Doniphan in the absence of instructions from government, was at a loss to know what course to pursue. His troops were in good health, but their term of service would expire in June and July. [KAM]

Nicholas Philip Trist reaches New Orleans for Veracruz

NNR 72.192 May 22, 1847

Mr. Trist, second officer in the department of state, and formerly United States consul at Havanna, reached New Orleans from Washington, left there on the 26th, and sailed from the mouth of the Mississippi on the 28th of April, for Vera Cruz. [ANP]

Marines employed in land service

THE MARINE CORPS

The marines attached to the squadron before Vera Cruz, forming three companies under the command of Captain Edson, were placed by Com. Conner at the disposition of Gen. Scott. They were attached to the 3d artillery under Col. Benton, and were actively employed during the investment. The first man killed in the trenches was a marine. They were detached by Gen. Scott when the city surrendered, and received the thanks both of the general-in-chief and general Worth in general orders for the effective services they rendered.

The Philadelphia American says - We had a report from the Mouth yesterday, that some movement was contemplated in Mexico, in which the services of the marine corps were to be exclusively employed. - There has been no clue as to the nature of the service, but we have no doubt that something is in preparation which will give this valuable but much neglected arm of the service, full and honorable employment.

Orders have been received, as we learned yesterday, for six companies of the United States marines, numbering about 600 men, under command of Major L. Twiggs, for several years past the commander of the Barracks at this station, to repair immediately to join the army in Mexico. Eight additional companies, under command of Lieut. Col. Watson, have received preparatory orders, and will shortly follow the first battalion.

Upon their arrival at Vera Cruz they will be joined by all the disposable force of the marine corps now attached to the gulf squadron, and the whole amounting to about 1,700 men, will be formed into two regiments, the first under command of Lieut. Col. Watson, and the second of Major Twiggs, the whole comprising the brigade of the veteran Brigadier General Henderson of the marine corps. The object of this movement we have yet to learn. - Phil American [JLM]

NNR 72.194 May 29, 1847 The Capture of Tuspan

From the Vera Cruz Flag of the 28th April.

The expedition consisted of the steamer Mississippi, (flag-ship) frigate Raritan, sloop of war Albany, ship John Adams, Germantown, Decatur, Spitfire, Vixen, Scourge, Vesuvius, Heela, Bonita, Petrel and Reefer. Among the vessels were distributed 150 men belonging to the Potomac, and 340 belonging to the Ohio, both of which remained at this place. After some delay at the Island of Lobos, awaiting the arrival of the sailing vessels, and subsequently at sea owing to a dispersion of the vessels by a norther, everything was ready for landing on the morning of the 18th instant, at which time the Mississippi was anchored off the bar of Tuspan river, while the other steamers, having had their masts taken out, and otherwise lightened in every possible way, took in tow the gun boats and barges of the expedition, carrying, in all, about 1200 men, and two pieces of field artillery. The other vessels of the squadron remained at anchor under Tuspan shoals, which lies six or eight miles to the eastward of the bar.

In crossing the bar the Spitfire led the way, and was followed by the Vixen and the Scourge, each having a gun boat in tow. Two of the steamers struck on the bar, but were not suffered to be stopped for a moment. They literally ploughed their way over it. By 12 o'clock, the whole expedition succeeded in gaining an entrance of the river, notwithstanding the serious difficulties presented by the breakers of the bar. Shortly afterwards, everything being in readiness for an attack, Commodore Perry hoisted his broad pendant on board the Spitfire, and at once led the rest of the vessels up the river.

After ascending it about five miles, two forts were discovered on the right bank, both of which opened upon the squadron. Immediately all the boats were manned with storming parties, and while the steamers and gun boats were gallantly returning the fire of the forts they (the boats) dashed on and quickly took possession of the forts, the Mexicans retreating down one side of the hill as the sailors ascended the other.

The whole expedition now moved on steadily towards the town of Tuspan, but a little while another fort, situated on high hill, opened upon the vessels and barges.

At the same time volleys of musketry were fired by the enemy from the chaparral; this latter fort was also promptly attacked, and like the other two was carried without the enemy waiting to cross bayonets, our noble tars proving themselves first rate fellows for this species of boarding work. - Simultaneously with the occupation of this fort, a division of the expedition landed in the town, and at once took possession of it. The greater part of the inhabitants had fired and left but a few scattering soldiers within reach of our balls.

In the course of the contest seventeen men and officers were killed and wounded. Capt. Tatnall received a ball in the right elbow joint Lieut. Jas. L. Parker aid to the commodore, severe wound in the upper part of the left breast, Lieut. Whittle, a flesh wound in the right leg, and Lieut. Hartstein, a flesh wound in the right wrist and thigh. All the wounded, however, are now doing well.

Several guns of the Truxton, were found mounted upon the forts, all of which were found mounted upon the forts, all of which were recovered and brought on board the squadron. Other articles belonging to the Truxton were likewise recovered. - After retaining possession of the town from the 18th to the 22d inst., force was withdrawn and embarked, leaving, however, the Albany and gunboat Reefer, under Capt. Breeze, to guard and command the place.

It may be proper to state, that all the forts of the place were destroyed by our forces. There being no further work on the coast, for the squadron, Com. Perry contemplated, we learn, a movement towards the interior, with a fine body of 2500 tars, thoroughly organized, should such a step be deemed advisable. [JLM]

NNR 72.194-195 May 29, 1847 Massachusetts resolution on the Mexican War, the extension of slavery, and thanks to Gen. Zachary Taylor, proceedings thereon

Resolution relative to the war with Mexico- The legislature closed its session on Monday the 26th of April. On the Saturday preceding, the following resolutions were proposed in the house of representatives, and ultimately adoption by a party vote, the whigs in the affirmative, and their opponents in the negative.

Resolved, That in the present war with Mexico has its primary origins in the unconstitutional annexation to the United States of the foreign state of Texas, while the same was still at war with Mexico; that it was unconstitutionally commenced by the order of the president, to General Taylor, to take the military possession of territory in dispute between the United States and Mexico, and in the occupation of Mexico; and that it is now waged ingloriously-by a powerful nation against a weak neighbor-unnecessarily and without just cause, at immense cost of treasure and life, for the dismemberment of Mexico, and for the conquest of a portion of her territory, from which slavery has already been excluded, with the triple object of extending slavery, of strengthening the "slave power," and of obtaining the control of the free states, under the constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That such a war of conquest, so hateful in its objects, so wanton, unjust and unconstitutional in its origin and character, must be regarded as a war against freedom, against humanity, against justice, against the free states; and that a regard for the true interest and the highest honor of the country, not less than the impulses of Christian duty, should arouse all good citizens to join in efforts to arrest this gigantic crime, by withholding supplies, or other voluntary contributions, for its further prosecution, by calling for the withdrawal of our army and, in every just way, aiding the country to retreat from the disgraceful position of aggression which it now occupies towards a weak, distracted neighbor and sister republic.

Resolved, That our attention is directed anew to the wrong and "enormity" of slavery, and to the tyranny and usurpation of the "slave power" as displayed in the history of our country, particularly in the annexation of Texas, and the present war with Mexico; and that we are impressed with the unalterable conviction, that a regard for the fair fame of our country, for the princed of morals, and for that righteousness which exalteth a nation, sanctions and requires all constitutional efforts for the abolition of slavery within the limits of the United States, while loyalty to the constitution, and a just self defense, make it specially incumbent on the people of the free states to co-operate in strenuous exertions to restrain and overthrow the "SLAVE POWER."

Thanks to General Taylor -after the passage of the above-

Mr. Hayden, of Boston, asked to obtain leave to introduce the following resolutions:

Resolved tendering the thanks of the legislature of Massachusetts to General Taylor, his officers, and men.

Resolved, That the people of Massachusetts have beheld with patriotic pride the bravery, the skill, and sagacity of the commander of the American forces in Mexico, General Zachary Taylor, and the gallantry and good discipline displayed by the officers and men associated with him in the campaign, in which admirable conduct of the one, and cordial co-operation of the other, the flag of the Union has been nobly upborne, and our name in arms gloriously maintained.

Resolved, That while the people and the legislature of Massachusetts feel proud of the brilliant achievements of the army employed in the war against Mexico \, they mourn the loss of the officers and men who have gallantly fallen upon the battle field, and sincerely sympathize with their relatives and friends.

Resolved. That his excellency the governor be requested to cause these resolved to be communicated to Maj. General Zachary Taylor, and, through him, to the officers and men under his command.

The resolution having been read, and a motion made to go into committee to consider them; which met opposition from Mr. Boutwell, a locofoco member, on the ground of their introduction from the committee of which Mr. Hayden was chairmen at so late a day in the session.

Mr. Hayden explained that, so far as the committee was concerned, he was but one of eleven members, and he was willing to assume all responsibility which could justly attach to him. But he was somewhat astonished that the gentleman from Groton, who had so often, so earnestly, and so recently sought the passage of similar resolutions, should now oppose the consideration of these. He [Mr. H.] had before declared that he would not consent to any vote of thanks to Gen'l Taylor while no opinion had been expressed upon the war. Now we had a solemnly declared opinion of the legislature upon that subject, by the yeas and nays of the house, and he was ready to testify his admiration of the conduct of our general and troops, whatever he might think if the justice and honor of the contest. - He would not now have proposed these resolves, nor advocated any like them, had there not been a clear reprobation, on the part of the house, of all favor to the war with Mexico. And, so far as his own political reputation was concerned, though he might cheerfully submit to the decision of the house, he should neither ask the assistance of the gentleman from Groton in his support, nor much fear his assaults as an enemy.

The resolutions were passed to a third reading by yeas 121, nays 71, and afterwards ordered to be engrossed and read a third time without a count.

The senate negatived those resolutions, by a vote of 4 to 14, without debate, in the last hour of the session.

NNR 72.197 May 29, 1847 excitement about the appearance of the vomito at Veracruz

On the 11th he writes that General Patterson had directed the Fashion to be reserved for himself "and the wounded officers, of which I did no know there were any in town, except Colonol Haskell." "The Endora is to be filled at once and despatched, and two or three sailing vessels will take the remainder of the officers and troops."

He adds-same date: "Quits an excitement is produced amongst the unacclimated this morning, by reports of the appearance of the vomito. Two deaths have occurred during the night, and both are attributed to that disease. One victim was a French lady, and the other Mr. Smith, the sutler of the Pennsylvania regiment. Both were in full health two days ago." [ANP]

NNR 72.198, May 29, 1847 Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna appointed commander of the Mexican Army, fear that he will attack the supply train

SANTA ANNA has again been appointed commander of the army by the Mexican government. At the last accounts from him, he was at Orizaba, rallying what troops he could. His force was variously estimated from 600 to 6,000 men. What his designs were, was all conjecture. There was certainly some little apprehension that he might make a dash down upon Vera Cruz, provided General Scott adventured to the capital. More immediate apprehensions however were entertained of his attempting to make a dash at the wagon train which he knew was about to leave Vera Cruz for General Scott's army, and a formidable escort therefore had to be provided to accompany the train, which commenced leaving Vera Cruz on the evening of the 8th, and which took up its regular line from Santa Fe, eight miles on the Jalapa road, on the 9th inst. It was the most formidable train that ever entered that country, being no less than six miles in length having over four hundred wagons and took, it is said, a million dollars in gold, besides munitions, stores, &c. It was accompanied by about a thousand pack mules. The escort consisted of 1,000 men, 500 of whom were dragoons sent down by General Scott for the purpose.

It was, no doubt, the want of the stores which this train starts with from Vera Cruz on the 8th and 9th of May, that prevented General Scott from following up the decisive victory which he achieved on the 23d of February at Sierra Gordo;--the same hard fate that Gen. Taylor was compelled to submit to after his victory at Matamoros.

[WFF]

NNR 72.198 May 29, 1847 Capt. Samuel Hamilton Walker's dragoons arrive at Vera Cruz

CAPT. WALKER, with his troop of over 100 dragoons reached Vera Cruz from New Orleans in good order and ready to mount, and were very acceptable to the Americans at the moment. [JLM] “Mexicans! We are all one, and Mexicans only. Let us be unanimous; let there be but one cry, and let the cry be war.”

The Jalapa ‘Star’ assigns as a reasons for the volunteers leaving at the time they did, the fact that Vera Cruz was now comparatively healthy. At the period their time would expire, the vomito would almost certainly be prevailing, and home they determined to come then, if not now.

The proceedings at Washington, it is said, had created a general disaffection in the army. General Shields is recovering.

The Mexicans have evacuated Puebla, and at least partially if not entirely discontinued their labor upon the fortifications of the city of Mexico.

On the 7th of May, the first division of General Scott’s army under General Quitmen, marched from Jalapa to take possession of the city of Puebla. Three other divisions were to follow, each on a successive day. They exported to occupy Puebla on the 17th inst.

Gen. Scott and General Twigg’s brigade were to follow in a few days.

Santa Anna has again been appointed commander of the army by the Mexican government. At the last account from him, he was at Orizaba, rallying what troops he could. His force was variously estimated from 600 to 6,000 men. What his designs were, was all conjecture. There was certainly some little apprehension that he might just make a dash down upon Vera Cruz, provided General Scott adventured to the capital. More immediate apprehensions however were entertained of his attempting to make a dash at the wagon train which he knew was about to leave Vera Cruz for General Scott’s army, and a formidable escort therefore had to be provided to accompany the train, which was commenced leaving Vera Cruz on the evening of the 8th, and would take up its regular line from Sante Fe, eight miles on the Jalapa road, on the 9th inst. It was the most formidable train that ever entered that country, being no less than six miles in length, having over four hundred wagons and took, it is said, a million of dollars in gold, besides munitions, stores, etc. It was accompanied by about a thousand pack mules. The escort consisted of 1,000 men, 500 of whom were dragoons sent down by General Scott for the purpose.

It was, no doubt the want of the stores which this train starts from Vera Cruz on the 8th and 9th of May, that prevented General Scott from following up the decisive victory which he achieved on the 23rd of February at Sierra Gordo; the same hard fate that Gen. Taylor was compelled to submit to after his victory at Matamoros.

On the same day that this train left Vera Cruz, the first divisions of General Scott’s army left Jalapa for Puebla.

Later the steamer Mary Kingsland reached New Orleans on the 18th with Vera Cruz dates to the 13th Mayor Count de Bongars, aid to General Shields, and several companies of the Illinois volunteers became passengers.

The two Tennessee, the 3rd and 4th Illinois, the Georgia, and the Alabama regiments, have all left the army, and returned home.

Occasionally a case of vomito occurred but apprehensions from the cause as well as of an attack from Santa Anna were subsiding, though speculations as to Santa Anna’s whereabouts and designs are the principal themes of all the letters by this arrival.

The return of so formidable a portion of General Scott’s army, and the want of other troops to replace them, has paralyzed the movements towards Mexico. General Patterson, who had started to take command of the advance, is now in the city of New Orleans. General Scott’s disposable force is said not to exceed 6,000 men. He will advance as far as Puebla, and there await events.

Families were rapidly leaving the city of Mexico. At Toluca rents went up to such a price in consequence, that the authorities interfered.

A Tampico letter of the 12th, in the New Orleans Times, says: “WE have dates from the city of Mexico to the 5th instant. Peace appears to be further off than ever. I think the war is just commencing. We had an alarm yesterday, that Urrea was within 30 miles of they city with a large body of cavalry.” [CPO]

NNR 72.198 May 29, 1847 Foray Upon Santa Fe.

FORAY UPON SANTA FE. - The great wagon train started from this village eight miles from Vera Cruz, on the 9th of May. On the night of the 12th a detachment of eleven dragoons were there, and whilst all were asleep except the sentinel, a band of Mexican guerrillas rushed upon them. The sentinel's gun missed fire and he was killed defending himself. Six of the other dragoons were killed and three wounded. One only escaped. On learning the event at Vera Cruz, Captain Walker's dragoons were despatched in search of the banditti. [JLM]

NNR 72.199 May 29, 1847, Gen. Winfield Scott’s general order on advancing from Jalapa

General Orders no. 128.

Headquarters of the Army

Jalapa, April 30, 1847.

1. The division of the army in the neighborhood will be held in readiness to advance soon after the arrival of trains now coming up from Vera Cruz.

2. The route and the time of commencing the march will be given at general headquarters.

3. Mayor Gen. Patterson, after designating a regiment of volunteers as part of the garrison to hold this place, will put his brigades in successively in march, with an interval of twenty-four hours between them.

4. brig. Gen. Twiggs' division will follow the movement, also by brigades.

5. Each brigade, whether of regulars or volunteers will be charged with escorting such part of the general supply train of the army as the chiefs of the general staff may have ready to send forward.

6. Every man of the division will take two days' subsistence in his haversack. This will be the general rule for all marches when a greater number of rations are not specially mentioned.

7. As the season is near when the army may no longer except to derive supplies from Vera Cruz, it must begin to look exclusively to the resources of the country.

8. Those resources, far from being over abundant near the line of operations, would soon fail to support both the army and the population, unless they are gathered in without waste, and regularly issued by quartermakers and commissaries.

9. Hence they must be paid for or the people will withhold, conceal or destroy them. The people, moreover, must be conciliated, soothed or well treated by every officer and man of this army, and by all its followers.

10. Accordingly, whosoever maltreats unoffending Mexicans, takes without pay, or wantonly destroys their property, of any kind whatsoever, will prolong the war, waste the means; present and future, of subsisting our own men and animals as they successively advance into the interior or return to our water depot, and no army can possibly drag after it to any considerable distance, no matter what the season of the year, the heavy articles of breadstuffs, meat, and forage.

11. Those therefore, who rob, plunder, or destroy the houses, fences, cattle, poultry, grain, fields, gardens, or property of any kind along the line of our operations are plainly the enemies of this army. The general in chief would infinitely prefer that the few who commit such outrages should desert at once and fight against us; then it would be easy to shoot them down or to capture and hang them.

12. Will the great body of intelligent, gallant and honorable men who compose this army tolerant the few miscreants who perpetrate such crimes? Again, the general in chief confidently hopes not. Let, then the guilty be promptly seized and brought to condign punishment, or the good must suffer the consequences, in supplies and loss of character, of crimes not their own.

13. To prevent straggling and marauding, the roll of every company of the army will be called at every halt by or under the eye of an officer. In camp and in quarters there must be at least three such roll calls daily; besides, stragglers on marches will certainly be murdered or captured by rancheros.

14. The waste of ammunition by neglect and idle or criminal firing is the most serious evil in this army. All officers are specially charged to see that not a cartridge be lost from the want of care, nor fired except by order, otherwise, fifty wagon of ammunition would not suffice for the campaign, and it is difficult to find ten. Let every man remember that it is un-safe to meet the enemy without he has forty round in his cartridge box.

15. Every regiment that leaves wounded or sick men in hospital will take care to leave a number of attendants, according to the requisition of the principal surgeon of the hospital. Those least able to march will be selected as attendants. This rule is general.

By command of Major Gen. Scott

NNR 72.198, May 29, 1847 THE GUERRILLA WAR

"The Guerrilla War"

From the N.O Commercial Times.---Furnishes the following items, brought by steamer James L. Day, from Brazos.

Terrible Retribution.--A heavy retribution has been visited upon a rancho near Ceralvo, by some persons, unknown as yet, for the inhuman massacres of teamsters and travelers on the Monterey road. This rancho, which has a considerable population, was known to be the rendezvous of a number of the Mexicans who have at different times strewn the road between Camargo and Monterey with the bodies of butchered Americans; and a recourse has been had to a means of bringing to punishment, its guilty population, which all must condemn, and which can result in nothing but evil if preserved in as a principle. We acknowledge that it is the only way in which the offenders can be punished; but in thus punishing, the enhancers are many that the innocent are made to suffer with the guilty. We do not know that such has been that case in the present instance, but it is gratifying to hear that Gen. Taylor is making strenuous; exertions to ascertain what Americans have dared to act in so unauthorized a manner. The full particulars of the affair we have not heard all we know is that some fifteen or twenty Americans made a descent upon the rancho and hung upwards of forty Mexicans. Considerable property and some valuable papers belonging to Americans who had been murdered on the road, were found on the persons and in the habitations of the Mexicans who had been killed. The commission of this deed was laid at the doors of Capt. Gray's company, (Corpus Christi Rangers) but we are pleased to hear that an investigation instituted by Gen. Taylor has proved the charge groundless. Capt. Gray has had his headquarters at Ceralvo, and his command is actively employed in keeping the road free from robbers and murderers. The name of Mustang Grey possesses many terrors for Mexicans to allow of the commission of many evil deeds by them on his scouting ground. [WFF]

NNR 72.198, May 29, 1847 THOMAS SIMONS

Thomas Simons-The Mexicans have ceased their murders on the road, but have dared to attack a rear party coming down with the last train from Monterey, and in the attack mortally wounded one of Capt. Grey's men=a Mr. Thomas Simons of Texas--a young man very respectably connected, a great promise, and deservedly by all who knew him, we speak of him from a perfect knowledge of his many good qualities. Mr. Simons was some distance in the rear of the train, in company with three others; all unarmed but himself; when they were on upon from the chaparral and seven Mexicans charged upon them. The tight had to be maintained a lot by young Simons, his companions deserting him and the friag commenced. An escort ball broke his thigh and he fell from his horse. The Mexicans closed round and fired him whilst on the ground but with a revolving pistol he killed one, disabled a second, and kept the rest at bay until his companions charged in advance, came to the rescue, drawn hither by the firing. He was taken to Calvaro-his leg was nearly shot off, and it is supposed impossible that he can recover. It needs no prophet to foretell how dire will be the vengeance visited upon the Mexicans for this murder. The life of young Simons was worth a thousand of them. [WFF] Declaration of martial law in Mexico City, address to the citizens of the federal district

On the 1st of May President Anaya declared the city of Mexico in a stage of siege-equivalent to declaring of martial law.

The governor of Mexico, in an address to the citizens says: "War, and war only; war to the death; war as it was waged by the Morelos; the Galeana's, the Matamoros. Let us die rather than negotiate. He is a traitor who seeks to divide us. He is a traitor who speaks of peace, who dared to propose the slightest truce." And again: "Mexicans! We are all one, and Mexicans only. - Let us be unanimous; let there be but one cry, and let that cry be war." [KAM]

Mexicans evacuate Puebla

The Mexicans have evacuated Puebla, and at least partially if not entirely discontinued their labour upon the fortifications of the city of Mexico. [KAM]

Gen. Winfield Scott's advance corps quits Jalapa for Puebla a large train with supplies for which he had been waiting quits Veracruz the same day

On the 7th of May, the first division of General Scott's army under General Quitman, marched from Jalapa to take possession of the city of Puebla.-Three other divisions were to follow, each on a successive day. They expected to occupy Puebla on the 17th inst.

Gen. Scott and General Twigg's brigade were to follow in a few days. [ANP]

Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna appointed commander of the Mexican Army, fear that he will attack the supply train

Santa Anna has again been appointed commander of the army by the Mexican government. At the last accounts of him, he was at Orizaba, rallying what troops he could. His force was variously estimated from 600 to 6,000 men. What his designs were, was all conjecture. There was certainly some little apprehension that he might make a dash down upon Vera Cruz, provided General Scott adventured to the capital. More immediate apprehensions however were entertained of his attempting to make a dash at the wagon train which he knew was about to leave Vera Cruz on the evening of the 8th, and would take up its regular line from Santa Fe, eight miles on the Jalapa road, on the 9th inst. It was the most formidable train that ever entered the country, being no less than six miles in length, having over four hundred wagons and took, it is said, a million of dollars in gold, besides munitions, stores, &c. It was accompanied by about a thousand pack mules. The escort consisted of 1,000 men, 500 of whom were dragoons sent down by General Scott for the purpose. [KAM]

Nicholas Philip Trist reaches Veracruz and proceeds to headquarters

N.P. Trist, Esq. Second officer of our state department, reached Vera Cruz on the 6th of May.-He may possibly have in charge some commission as to the disposition of the three millions which the President had authority from congress to employ in negotiating a peace with Mexico.

The correspondent of the N. O. Times, writes on the 7th: "Mr. N. P. Trist arrived yesterday with despatches for General Scott and Commodore Perry. The commodore came up to-day and held long conversations with Mr. Trist, evidently very confidential, and often in a tone of voice and in a manner which indicated communications and sentiments of no ordinary importance. Mr. Trist is the government, in Mexico. He goes with the train to-morrow to meet General Scott, and will doubtless give him ample instructions for the effectual prosecution of the war!"

The Vera Cruz Eagle contains a list of fifty five soldiers that have died there within the last three weeks. [ANP]
NNR 72.198, May 29, 1847 barbarities committed on the road from Veracruz

Many barbarities are committed on the road by small parties, which speak like Indians among the brushwood, and watch for stragglers from the trains. A lieutenant, Kingsbury, of the volunteers, (not the intelligent and intrepid member of General Taylor’s staff,) was, the other day, mangled in a dreadful manner—barely escaping to Jalapa with his life. Many others who have observed too little caution have fared much worse—some being found dead in a few minutes after they had stepped out of the train, or line of escort, and no trace of their murders remaining distinguishable. [ANP]

NNR 72.198, May 29, 1847 apprehensions subsiding over the vomito and a Mexican attack

Occasionally a case of vomito occurred but apprehensions from that cause as well as of an attack from Santa Anna were subsiding, though speculations as to Santa Anna’s whereabouts and designs are the principal themes of all the letters by this arrival. [WFF]

NNR 72.198, May 29, 1847 Gen. Juan Morales’ statement about the alleged warning before the bombardment of Veracruz an account of the Battle of Cerro Gordo

Juan Morales, general of brigade of the Mexican republic—To the nation and her allies—It having arrived to my knowledge that some chiefs and officers of the invading army of the United States, which has operated against Vera Cruz, say that Gen. Scott had previously advised me that the families could leave to avoid the evils attendant on a bombardment, and consequently those which have happened are chargeable upon me.

In order that neither now, nor at any future time, any accusations of injustice may stigmatize the defence of Vera Cruz, I declare that it is false that any such advice was given!—that the only communication I have received from Gen. Scott, tended to summon me, in general terms, to surrender; that even the neutrals were prevented from leaving the place; and that if the Mexican families could have left the enemy would not have occupied the place without first burying its defenders in the ruins.

NNR 72.199, May 29, 1847 Gen. Antonio Canales’ proclamation of no quarter

From the Picayune
PROCLAMATION OF NO QUARTER.

Frontier Brigade of Cavalry.
Camp. In San Augustin, April 4, 1847.
I this day send to the Adjutant Inspector of the National Guards the following instructions:

I learn, with the greatest indignation, that the Americans have committed a most horrible massacre at the rancho of the Guadalupe. They made prisoners, in their own houses and by the side of their families, twenty five peaceable men and immediately shot them. To repel this class of warfare, which is not war but atrocity in all its fury, there is no other course left us than retaliation; and in order to pursue this method, rendered imperative by the fatal circumstances above mentioned, you will immediately declare martial law, with the understanding that eight days after the publication of the same every individual who has not taken up arms (being capable of doing so) shall be considered a traitor and instantly shot.

Martial law being in force, you are bound to give no quarters to any American you may meet or who may present himself to you, even though he be without arms. You are also directed to publish this to all the towns in this state, forcibly impressing them with the severe punishment that shall be inflicted for the least omission of this order. We have arrived at that state in which our country requires the greatest sacrifices; her sons should glory in nothing but to become soldiers, and as brave Mexicans to meet the crisis. Therefore, if the army of invasion continues, and our people remain in the towns which they have molested, they deserve not one ray of sympathy; nor should any one ever cease to make war upon them. You will send a copy of this to each of you subordinates, and they are authorized to proceed against chiefs of their squadrons or against their colonels or any other, even against me, for any infraction of this order--the only mode of salvation left. The enemy wages war against us and even against those peaceable citizens who, actuated by improper impulses, desire to remain quiet in their houses. Even these they kill, without quarter; and this is the greatest favor they expect from them.--The only alternative left us, under these circumstances, is retaliation, which is the strong right of the offended against the offending. To carry this into effect attach yourselves to the authorities. Your unwilling to do this will be considered a crime of the greatest magnitude. All the officers of the troops are directed to assist you in carrying out this order, and it is distinctly understood there shall be no exceptions. Neither the clergy, military citizens nor other persons shall enjoy the privilege of remaining peaceably at their homes. The whole of the corporation shall turn out with the citizens, leaving solely the authority of the town one of the members who is over the age of sixty years; at the same time, if all the of the members are capable of bearing arms, then one shall be expected; leaving to act, some one who is incapable of military service. You yourself must be an example to others, by conforming to this inquisition. And I send you for publication, and charge you to see it executed in every particular, and communicate it also to the commanders of the squadrons in your city, who will aid you in carrying into effect these instructions; and in fact you are directed to do all and everything which your patriotism may prompt. God and Liberty!

NNR 72. 199 May 29, 1847, Comanche depredations

CAMANCHE INDIAN DEPREDATIONS

Amongst the news reported verbally by a gentleman recently from Monterey and Camargo, we have an account of a recent visit in that neighborhood of a party of Camanche Indians, who have extended their depredations for a considerable distance from there up and down the river, stealing horses and murdering and carrying off Mexican women and children. From their conduct at several instances where they made their appearance, it is supposed that they did not design to molest Americans but tried rather to avoid interfering with them. In ending their visit for the especial visit of the Mexicans. But is so happened that they were not aware of the Americans had turned rancheros, and located themselves upon the banks of the Rio Grande, and in the instance at least, it is presumed they perpetrated an injury upon Americans, unwittingly, of which, right punishment was visited upon them, and greatest is in store. NNR 72.199 May 29, 1847, an account of the Battle of Cerro Gordo

Of the battle of Sierra Gordo, so far as the 7th infantry were concerned, and indeed so far as the finally effective movement which insured the victory is described, we have met with nothing furnishing so distinct an idea, as the brief account written by an officer of the 7th, to his relatives in this city, to whom we are indebted for the privilege of inserting it.

Jalapa, Mexico, April 20, 1817.

Before this reaches you, it is probable that you will hear that we have had another battle and are again victorious: We left Vera Cruz for this place on the 8th, and saw nothing of the enemy until we approached a pass called Sierra Gordo, (mountain gorge,) where our advance was fired upon; and upon examination it was found to be strongly fortified and defended by a large army, commanded by Santa Anna in person. On General Scott’s arrival two or three days after, preparations were made to turn the enemy’s flank, and take rear fort, situated on a high hill, and commanding the pass, or road. In advance of this work, they had several more all commanding the road, which was barricaded, and several large pieces of cannon planted which would rake the road for several hundred yards. On the morning of the 17th, our division commanded by General Twiggs, marched out of camp, and after going about 2 miles, left the main road and made a circuit through the woods, it being necessary to cut a road as we advanced. When we reached nearly opposite the last fort the enemy perceived us, and immediately attacked one company of the 7th stationed on a high hill on our left. This company repulsed them and was soon reinforced. The enemy also sent reinforcements on their side, and the engagement became quite warm; the result was that they were driven back to their woods. They still kept up a firing with artillery during the afternoon. During the night we were able to get up the hill some pretty large pieces, and opened our fire on their work next morning, The men were told to hold themselves in readiness for storming; soon as the bugle sounded the charge, and with a cheer away we went over the crest of the hill, down its steep sides, through the valley, and up the heights on which their fort was situated. They had erected a small breastwork round the top of the hill up to which our regiment charged, and commenced a deadly fire on them. Soon we charged over this and were in the fort; many of the Mexicans still fought and were shot dead beside their guns. Others retreated still fighting; the ground was strewed with the dead and wounded, and many of our gallant fellows fell. Soon our regimental colors were flying in the place of the Mexican flag and the fight was won. Their own cannon were turned upon them and they were flying in all directions. Santa Anna escaped, leaving behind his carriage, money, and cork leg, (this is a fact,) with probably four or five thousand of his troops. About 4000 men and 5 generals surrendered, together with 40 pieces of cannon. I have not time to go into details, but for the time the fight lasted, it was the hardest fighting I have yet seen. Our regiment lost about 60 or 65 in killed and wounded, and looks quite small. There is some talk of our being left to garrison this place. It is one of the most beautiful places in Mexico, the garden spot. I will write you again the first opportunity.

Yours, &c.

OCCUPATION OF PEROTE.

Headquarters 1st Division
Perote, April 22, 1847,

Sir: I have the honor to report, for information of the general in chief, that my division occupied the castle and town of Perote at 12 m. today, without resistance, the enemy having withdrawn the night before last, and yesterday evening leaving Col. Valsquez, as commissioner on behalf of the Mexican government to turn over the armament of the castle, consisting of fifty four guns and mortars, iron and bronze, of various calibers, in good service condition, eleven thousand and sixty five cannon balls fourteen thousand three hundred bombs and hand grenades, and five hundred muskets.

In the retreat hence, the enemy carried away no material of war. No force has passed, embodied except some 3,000 cavalry in deplorable plight, headed by the recreant Ampudia. The infantry some 2,000 passed in small bodies, generally without arms. The few having any, sold them, whenever a purchaser could be found, for two or three reals. The rout and panic is complete, and the way opened. A stand may be made at Puebla, but doubted. These are the fruits of the victory at Sierra Gorda.

The fortress affords quarters for 2,000 troops and their officers, with ample storehouses, hospitals, and a supply of good water within the walls.

The Generals Landero and Morales confined in Perote for the affair at Vera Cruz, as also some American prisoners, were allowed to go at large on the retirement of the garrison. I have several of the latter belonging to the South Carolina regiment captured near Verz Cruz. Lieut. Rogers, of the navy had been previously sent to the capital.

I have the honor,
W.J. WORTH
Maj. General Commanding

Others retreated still fighting; the ground was strewed with the dead and wounded, and many of our gallant fellows fell. Soon our regimental colors were flying in the place of the Mexican flag and the fight was won. Their own cannon were turned upon them and they were flying in all directions.-Santa Anna escaped, leaving behind his carriage, money, and cork leg, (this is a fact,) with probably four or five thousand of his troops. About 4,000 men and 5 generals surrendered, together with 40 pieces of cannon. I have not time to go into details, but for the time the fight lasted, it was the hardest fighting I have yet seen. Our regiment lost about 60 or 65 in killed and wounded, and about 500 prisoners. Deeming it impracticable to advance with advantage beyond the position which I had gained during the reconnaissance on the 12th, (being some three and a half mile from water,) I withdrew my main force to my old camp, keeping up a strong picket to retain the ground I had passed over, intending on the following morning,(the 13th,) at 4 o'clock, to make the attack with effect.

Two brigades of volunteers, under the command of Brigadier Generals Pillow and Shields, respectively, arrived at my camp on the 12th instant. Major General Patterson, United States volunteers, having reported sick, I assumed command of the whole.-The volunteers wishing to participate in the fight, and being so much broken down from the recent march from Vera Cruz, I thought proper, at the suggestion of Generals Pillow an Shields, to defer the attack one day. Having done so, and having matured my plan of attack, and assigned to each division its duty, I was overtaken by an order of Major Gen. Patterson, after night on the 13th, to suspend all further offensive operations until the arrival of the general-in-chief, or until ordered by himself,(General Patterson.) Agreeably to this arrangement I received, one the evening of the 16th, verbal orders from the general in chief to proceed on my line of operations on the right of the national road. At 11 o'clock A.M. I got in my position, the right of my column being about 700 yards from the enemy's main work. Lieut. Gardner's company, 7th infantry, was then detached to observe the enemy from the first commanding height on my left. In a short time a strong reconnoitering or skirmishing party was observed approaching towards him, having in reserve a large force, in all numbering about two thousand.-Lieut. Gardner held his position, under a heavy fire, until relieved by Col. Harney with the rifle regiment and 1st artillery. With this force Colonel Harney cleared the two hills in front of the enemy's main work, and held secure the position intended for our heavy battery, which was established during the night under the direction of Capt. Lee, of the engineer corps. During this evening Brig. Gen. Shields joined me with his brigade of volunteers, composed of two Illinois regiments, under Colonels Baker and Foreman, and one New York regiment, commanded by Col. Burnett.
On the morning of the 18th, when our heavy guns opened, Colonel Harney, having been reinforced by the 3d and 7th infantry, pushed forward his skirmishing parities. Overcoming all obstacles presented by the nature of the ground, and under a most galling and destructive fire, this command advanced with steadiness and regularity, and finally succeeded I driving from the strong position of the enemy all his forces, and in putting them in complete rout.

In speaking of the individual efforts of the officers in command of regiments and companies, I am unable to do ample justice. Each and every one seemed to be endeavoring to excel in all that is required of gallant officers. Hey all responded to the encouraging voice of their gallant leader, and conducted their men to victory and glory.

The 2d brigade, under Colonel Riley, advanced under a heavy fire to gain a position on the Jalapa road in rear of the enemy, with a view of cutting off his retreat. After crossing the valley at the foot of the Cerro Gordo, the fire of the enemy became so annoying that two companies of the 2d infantry were ordered out as skirmishers to occupy them.-The remainder of the 2d, conducted by Captain Lee engineers, proceeded on this course. Perceiving that the enemy were extending to their left, I ordered General Shields to cross the ravine on our right and keep us the left bank on the part previously reconnoitered by Captain Lee. In the further progress of this portion of Colonel Riley's brigade, he was obliged to turn his whole column to the left to oppose the enemy's direct movement down the spur.-Captain Lee continued his course, supported by Lieutenant Benjamin's company, 4th artillery. On coming out in the plain west of the Cerro Gordo, and in full view of the Jalapa road, a battery of five guns, supported by a body of lancers, was discovered by this portion of the enemy. The battery opened with grape on him and on Lieutenant Benjamin's company. The gallant general, with a shout from his men, pushed boldly for the road on the enemy's left, who, seeing their position completely turned as well as driven from the hill, abandoned themselves to flight. General Shields was here severely wounded, the command of the brigade devolving upon Colonel Baker, who conducted it with ability. The pursuit was continued as far as Encerro, when I was overtaken by Major Gen. Patterson, United States volunteers, who then assumed command of the advance and ordered a halt.

I cannot speak in too high terms of the conduct of Colonel Harney, who, united with his indomitable courage, possessed the cool judgment which enabled him to know just how far to advance to obtain the desired object. That sterling soldier and accomplished officer, Major Sumner, 2d dragoons, who was in command of the regiment of mounted riflemen, exhibited all the skill and ability required of a permanent commander of a regiment. He was severely wounded in the head by an escopette ball, and obliged to leave the field, the command of the regiment devolving upon Major Loring.

Captain Magruder, 1st artillery, by his wary and good management in the face of the enemy's works, driving before him the parties immediately in the front. His gallant conduct deserves especial notice. Brevet First Lieutenant Gardner, 7th infantry, whose company was the first sent on the hill, by sustaining himself against a vastly superior force, displayed that ability as commander of a company which, on a former occasion, acquired for him the distinction he now has as brevet first lieutenant.

I am sorry that the advantages gained over the enemy the first day were attended with some loss on our side. Besides Major Sumner, 2d dragoons, and Lieutenant Maury, rifle regiment, who were severely wounded, and Lieutenant George H. Gordon, rifle regiment, serving in Major Talcott's battery of mountain howitzers, and Lieutenant Gibbs, mounted riflemen, slightly, some fifty casualties occurred, principally in the first artillery and rifle regiments.

Of the conduct of the volunteer force under the brave General Shields, I cannot speak in too high terms. After he was wounded, portions of the three regiments were with me when I arrived first at the Jalapa road, and drove before them the enemy's cannoniers from their loaded guns. Their conduct and names shall be the subject of a special report, as also that of the several officers of the regular army who are distinguished on the occasion.

Accompanied with this, I transmit the several reports from brigade and regimental headquarters. In all the recommendations for praise and promotion I entirely concur.

Although whatever I may say may add little to the good reputation of Captain Lee, of the engineer corps, yet I must indulge in the pleasure of speaking of the invaluable services which he rendered me from the time I left the main road, until he conducted Colonel Riley's brigade to its position in rear of the enemy's strong work on the Jalapa road. I consulted him with confidence, and adopted his suggestions with entire assurance. His gallantry and good conduct on both days deserve the highest praise. I again present to the favorable consideration of the commander in chief, and the president, the names of my personal staff, First Lieutenant W.T.H. Brooks, third infantry, A.A.A. G., and First Lieutenant P.W. McDonald, second dragoons, A.D.C. Captain R. A. Allen, A.Q.M., rendered me invaluable services, not only in communicating orders when he was in the field, but in keeping at hand, under all disadvantages, the necessary supplies for my division. For his services on this and on former occasions, I most earnestly recommend him for promotion. To Lieutenants Mason, Beauregard, and Tower, of the engineers, and Lieutenant Sikes, third infantry, A.C>S. to the division, I am indebted for valuable services. Whilst on reconnoitering duty on the 12th, I lost the valuable services of Lieut. Col. Johnston, who was on duty with me as chief topographical engineer, and was very severely wounded under the enemy's works on the left of the road.

In conclusion, I have the pleasure of tendering my thanks to the commanders of regiments and batteries, whose conduct tended so much to the attainment of our glorious victory. The 1st brigade, under Col. Harney, was composed of the 1st artillery, commanded by Col. Childs, the rifle regiment, (after Major Sumner was wounded,) commanded by Maj. Loring, and the 7th infantry, commanded by Colonel Plympton.

The 2d brigade, under Colonel Riley, was composed of the 4th artillery, commanded by Major Gardner, the 2d infantry, commanded by Captain Morris, and the 3d infantry, commanded by Captain Alexander.

The volunteer force under my orders was composed of the 3d Illinois regiment, commanded by Colonel Baker, the 4th Illinois regiment, commanded by Colonel Foreman, and the New York regiment, commanded by Col. Burnett. The field battery was commanded by Capt. Taylor, and the howitzer battery by Major Talcott.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D.D. TWIGGS,
Brigadier General U.S. Army.

NRR 72.200 May 29, 1847 reports of Gen. Robert Patterson on the actions of his volunteer division at Cerro Gordo

72.200-201 May 29, 1847, reports of Gen. Edward Dickinson Baker on the operations of the third brigade during the action at Cerro Gordo

Report of Major General Patterson.

Headquarters volunteer division,
Jalapa, April 23, 1847.

Sir: I have the honor to report, for the information of the general in chief, the operations of the volunteer division of the United States army under my command, at the pass of the "Cerro Gordo," on the 17th and 18th of April.

On the afternoon of the 17th, a rapid and continuous fire of artillery and infantry announcing that the second artillery and infantry announcing that the second division of regulars was closely engaged with the left of the enemy's lines, I was instructed, and immediately directed the 3d volunteer brigade, under Brigadier General Shields, to proceed at once to its support.

Before the brigade reached the position of what division the action had ceased for the day; the night was, however, occupied in establishing several pieces of artillery upon a height adjacent ot the "Cerro Gordo."

Early on the morning of the 18th, the brigade moved to turn the extreme left of the enemy's line resting upon the Jalapa road. This was done, over rugged ascents and through dense chaparral, under a severe and continuous flank fire from the enemy.

Brigadier General Shields, whilst gallantly leading his command, and forming it for the attack of the enemy posted in force in his front, fell severely wounded, and was carried from the field.

Colonel Baker, 4th Illinois regiment, having assumed the command, the enemy's lines were charged with spirit and success by the 3d and 4th Illinois and the New York regiments of volunteers under their respective commanders-Colonel Foreman and Brunett, and Major Harris. The rout now becoming general, the brigade pressed forward in rapid pursuit, leaving a sufficient force to secure the artillery, specie, baggage, provisions, and camp equipage, left in our hands.
Whilst our troops were engaged with the enemy’s left, the 1st volunteer brigade, under Brigadier General Pillow, proceeded to operate upon that portion of the Mexican army which was posted upon the heights on the right of the pass, and either to storm their works, or, if impracticable, to divert attention from the main attack to be made on their left and rear.

A storming force, composed of the 2d Tennessee volunteers, Captain Naylor’s company of Pennsylvania volunteers, under Colonel Haskell, was directed upon one of the enemy’s batteries, (No.2.) which it approached with great enthusiasm and firmness, until, after sustaining a heavy loss of both officers and men, it was obliged to retire.

Dispositions for attacking another point, (battery No. 1,) by a column under Col. Wynkoop. Were rendered unnecessary in consequence of the carrying of he works on the heights of Cerro Gordo.

The attention of the general in chief is particularly called to the gallantry of Brigadier Generals Pillow and Shields, who were both wounded at the head of their respective brigades; to Colonel Campbell, 1st Tennessee regiments, temporarily in command of Pillow’s brigade; and to Colonel Baker, who led Shield’s brigade during a severe part of the action and during the pursuit. The chiefs of brigade speak in the highest terms of the courage and conduct of the regiments under their command, and of their personal staffs, viz:

I desire to recommend to the favorable notice of the general in chief Dr. Wright, surgeon, United States army, medical director; and 1st Lieutenant Beauregard, of the engineers, on duty with my division; and the officers of my personal staff, Brevet Lieutenant Abercrombie, 1st infantry, aid-de-camp; 1st Lieutenant Wm. H. French, 1st artillery, acting ass. Adj. General; and 1st Lieutenant Seth Williams, 1st artillery, aid-de-camp; to each of whom I am under many obligations for valuable services.

I am, very respectfully, your ob't serv't,

R. Patterson,
Major General United States army,
Comd'g Volunteer division.

Headquarters Volunteer division,
Jalapa, April 26, 1847.

Sir. I have the honor to state, as a supplement to the report made by me to the general in chief on the 23d instant, that after the action of the 18th of April, as soon as the dragoons effected a junction with the main body of the army upon the Jalapa road, in obedience to instructions received on the field from Major General Scott, I moved with them as rapidly as possible in pursuit of the enemy.

At Corral Falso, overtaking Brigadier General Twiggs, I directed him to follow on with his division, part of which was returning. Late in the afternoon I arrived at El Encerro, where the exhausted state of the cavalry horses compelled me to remain for the night.

Captain Blake, with a squadron of dragoons, continued the pursuit for some miles, and returned with several prisoners.

The 2d dragoons, under Maj. Beall, and company of the 1st dragoons, under Capt. Kearny, exhibited great activity and zeal in the pursuit, which was very severe on both horses and men.

Colonel Baker had advanced near Encerro, with a small portion of Shields’ brigade, some time previous to my arrival, but had retired when the battery of the 2d division of regulars was recalled.

On the morning of the 19th, leaving Brig. General Twiggs in command of the infantry and artillery, I moved on with the dragoons, and entered Jalapa with a deputation from its authorities, who had come out to implore protection for the inhabitants of the cit.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. Patterson, Maj. Gen. U.S.A.
Jalapa, Mexico, April 20, 1847.

Sir: I have the honor to report that my battery served with the division under the command of Brig. General Twiggs in the recent conflicts on the 17th and 18th instants, but had no opportunity, (although exposed occasionally to the fire of the enemy,) from the nature of the ground, of engaging with him actively.

I succeeded, however, in getting two pieces, under the command of Lieut. J. G. Martin, on the main road in rear of the enemy's position, in time to follow up his retreat, and was enabled from time to time to fire upon his rear. The pursuit was continued for about twelve miles, when I was ordered to go no further, being then considerably in advance of the whole army, with but a small force of infantry to support me.

The second section of my battery, under Lieut. Irons, joined me in the advance as soon as it was possible for him to do so; and, through the great exertions of Lieut. Jack on, the caissons were brought up early in the night.

It may be proper for me to add, that the difficulties of getting artillery over the hills of the Cerro Gordo were great. Taking out the horses, the pieces were drawn up by men by means of picket ropes attached tot he carriages.

On the 18th instant, the laborious work of getting the pieces over the last hill was performed by the companies of volunteers under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Willie, who had been detached to support my battery. My thanks are due to him, his officers and men, for this important service.

On the 17th instant I had one corporal and one private wounded.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Francis Taylor,
Capt. Comd'g light battery 2d division.

Jalapa, April 24th, 1847.

General: On the 5th instant I had the honor to lay before you the paroles of honor by which the Mexican troops, captured by the army under you immediate command at Vera Crus and the Castle San Juan d'uluia, were enlarged, I have now the satisfaction of enclosing the paroles of those captured at the pass of Sierra Gorda on the 18th inst., to wit:

1. The original paroles of honor of three general officers two others being accounted for below, together with similar paroles from hundred and 185 officers of all grades.

2. Original paroles of honor given by officers of the Mexican army on behalf of the troops of the several corps, prisoners of war, respectively, under their command, binding them not to serve during the war unless duly exchanged. These rolls embrace two thousand eight hundred and thirty seven (2,837) names-the rank and file of the army.
3. A copy of the parole of Gen. Pinson—a translation of the same; and a list of all others on a parole, numbering, in all, two hundred and eight officers.

4. Copies of the several papers referred to above in No. 2, to wit: the paroles for the rank and file.

Besides the above, I enclose an original paper, signed by two general officers, (including Gen La Vega,) and by fourteen other officers of various grades, who declined giving their paroles not to serve during the war unless exchanged, but pledged themselves, as the paper shows, to report as prisoners of war to the commander at Vera Cruz, who was instructed under your orders to secure them in the Castle San Juan d'Ulloa, or send them, if they preferred it, to the United States.

A separate list of these sixteen officers is also furnished.

I think proper to remark, with regard to the operations at Sierra Gordo, that, by turning the left flank of the enemy, an storming the principal hill occupied by him, which was executed under your personal observation on the morning of the 18th instant, his force was divided—all of the batteries east of the hill being separated from the main body of the army encamped on the Jalapa road west of the hill.

All of the positions of the enemy were commanded by the hill itself, which was believed by the Mexicans to be inaccessible to our troops. The hill being stormed and taken, the main body of the enemy fled in the utmost confusion, and but a very few were taken prisoners. Many of his troops in the batteries at the same time made their escape in the hills, throwing away their arms.

A Mexican officer assured me that no less than 1,500 thus escaped from one single battery. Of those in the batteries who laid down their arms, more than a thousand contrived to escape on their march from the field of battle to Plan del Rio, some five miles or more, along a circuitous road bound by woods and ravines; and hence the number of prisoners on parole is diminished to about 3,000 men, exclusive of officers. And, although this may not be the place for the expression of an opinion, I feel warranted in saying that the defeat was as complete as it was unexpected by the enemy; that he was utterly destroyed, captured, or routed, spreading terror and consternation throughout the country.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E.A. Hitchcock,

Major General Winfield Scott,
General In Chief, Jalapa Mexico.

One private missing, not included in the total.

The killed and wounded of Capt. Magruder’s company 1st artillery is not included in this return, the company being detached since the action. Twelve non-commissioned officers and privates of company F (Illinois) are known to have been either killed or wounded; but, as the company has been detached since the action, details cannot be furnished at this date.

To the above we add, from the same paper, a list of the killed and wounded in the brigade under General Pillow:

Officers killed- Lieuts. F. B. Allen and C. G. Gill.

Making a total of killed and wounded in this brigade 103; which, added to 308, the list published above, gives 411. These are all the killed and wounded whose names have been ascertained. The others, say fourteen men, belonged to Captain Magruder’s company of first artillery and company F, Illinois, from which no returns were made, as they were detached immediately after the action.

NNR 72.202 May 29, 1847, Gen. Zachary Taylor’s official report on Maj. Mike Chevallie’s expedition

Dispatches from General Taylor’s army received on the 21st from the camp at Monterey.

Headquarters Army of Occupation
Camp near Monterey, April 21st, 1847

Sir: Since my dispatch of April 11th, Major Chevallie has reached this place with a part of his command, the remainder being detached with a train now on its way up, VIN China. Agreeably to my order, Major Chevallie has explored the country between China and Montemorelos, and has ascertained satisfactorily that Gen. Urrea has left that region and has probably recrossed the mountains. The communications are now infested only by bands of robbers, which are very numerous in the country. Our escorts can thus be reduced much below the strength, which it has hitherto been necessary to employ.

I learn that Colonel Doniphan is probably by this time at Parras, on his way from Chihuahua to Saltillo, having anticipated my order to march on the latter place.

You will perceive from my order that we have received authentic intelligence of the fall of Verz Cruz. Our latest date from the city of Mexico is March 31st, on which day General Santa Anna is issued an address or appeal to the Mexican people. I do not enclose it, presuming that it will reach you much sooner by Vera Cruz or Tampico.

It is represented by a person who has just arrived from San Luis that not more than one half of Gen. Santa Anna's original force was saved in the retreat after the battle of Buena Vista, and the his march is indicated by the dead strewed along the road for 60 leagues. Nearly all the troops have been withdrawn from San Luis and the adjacent positions.

I am, sir, very respectfully you ob't serv't,

Z. TAYLOR

NNR 72.202-204 May 29, 1847 Gen. John Ellis Wool's official report on Buena Vista

Battle of Buena Vista.

Headquarters Camp Taylor, Agua Nueva, Twenty miles south of Saltillo, Mexico,

March 4, 1847.

Major: Agreeably to the orders from the commanding general, I have the honor to report that, on the 21st ult. the troops at Agua Nueva broke up their encampment and preceded by the supply and baggage train, marched for Buena Vista and Saltillo, except Col. Yell's regiment of Arkansas volunteers, which remained to look out for the enemy, reported to be advancing on Agua Nueva in great force, and to guard some public stores left at the hacienda until transportation could be obtained to carry them to Buena Vista.

On the arrival of the commanding general at Encantada, he directed that Colonel McKee's regiment 2d Kentucky volunteers, and a section of Captain Washington's battery be kept at that place to give support to Colonel Yell in case he should be driven in by the enemy. Between Encantada and Buena Vista, called the pass, Colonel Hardin's regiment 1st Illinois volunteers was stationed. The rest of my command encamped near the hacienda of Buena Vista. The major general commanding, accompanied by Lieutenant Colonel May's squadron (2d dragoons,) Captains Sherman's and Bragg's batteries, (3d artillery,) and the Mississippi regiment, commanded by Colonel Davis, proceeded to Saltillo to provide against the attack meditated by General Minon with a cavalry force reported to be 3,000 strong. As many wagons as could be obtained were ordered to return forthwith to Agua Nueva and bring off what remained of the stores at that place.

In the course of the evening, agreeably to the instructions of the commanding general, transmitted from Saltillo, Colonel Marshall, with his regiment the first dragoons were ordered to Agua Nueva to reinforce Colonel Yell, who was directed, in case he should be attacked, to destroy everything at that place he could not bring off, and to retire before 12 o'clock, PM. Colonel McKee at Encantada, with the section of artillery, was directed to join Colonel Yell on his retreat, and the whole to fall back to Buena Vista, should the enemy pursue them to that place. Before leaving Agua Nueva, Colonel Yell's pickets were driven in by the advance parties of the Mexicans. He then retired with the reinforcements, under the command of Colonel Marshall, after destroying a small quantity of corn yet remaining at the hacienda, and leaving a few wagons which had been precipitately abandoned by their teamsters.

All the advance parties came into Buena Vista, except Col. Hardin's regiment, before daylight on the morning of the 22d.

At 8 o'clock, A.M., on the 22d, I received notice that the Mexican army was at Agua Nueva, and ordered a section of Captain Washington's artillery to move foreword and join Colonel Hardin. Shortly afterwards I repaired to that position where it had been determined to give battle to the enemy. During the previous night, agreeably to my orders, Colonel Hardin's regiment had thrown up a parapet on the height, on the left of the road, and had dug a small ditch, and made a parapet extending from the road around the edge of the gully, on the right of he road. They were then directed to dig a ditch and make a parapet across he road for the protection of Capt. Washington's artillery, leaving a narrow passage next to the hill, which was t be closed up by running into it two wagons loaded with stone.

About 9 o'clock, our pickets, stationed at Encantada, three and half miles distant, discovered the enemy advancing. Word was immediately dispatched to the commanding general at Saltillo; and I ordered the troops at Buena Vista forthwith to be brought forward.

Captain Washington's battery was posted across the road, protected on its left by a commanding eminence, and its right by deep gullies. The 3d Kentucky infantry, commanded by Colonel McKee, was stationed on a hill immediately in rear of Washington's battery. The six companies of 1st Illinois regiment, commanded by Colonel Hardin, took post on the eminence on the left, and two companies, under Lieut. Colonel Weatherford, occupied the breastwork on the right to Washington's battery. The 2d Illinois regiment was stationed on the left of the Kentucky regiment. The Indiana brigade, commanded by Brigadier General Lane, was posted on a ridge immediately in rear of the front line, and Captain Stein's squadron in reserve, in rear of the Indiana brigade. The Kentucky regiment of cavalry, under the command of Colonel Marshall, and the Arkansas regiment, under the command of Colonel Yell, were stationed to the left of the second line towards the mountains. Shortly afterwards the rifle companies of these two regiments were dismounted, and, with the cavalry companies of the Kentucky regiment, and a battalion of riflemen from the Indiana brigade under Major Gorman, under the command of Colonel Marshall, were ordered to take post on the extreme left, and at the foot of the mountains.

These dispositions were approved by the major general commanding, who had now returned for Saltillo, bringing with him Lieut. Col. May's squadron of the 2d dragoons, Capt. Sherman's and Bragg's batteries of artillery, and the Mississippi regiment of riflemen.

The enemy had halted just beyond cannon shot, and displayed his forces on either side of the road, and commencing pushing his light infantry into the mountains on our left. At the same time, indications of an attempt on our right induced the commanding general to order the 2d Kentucky infantry and Capt. Bragg's battery, with a detachment of mounted men, to take post on the right of the gullies, and at some distance in advance of Capt. Washington's battery, in the centre.

Capt. Sherman's battery was held in reserve in rear of the second line.

The enemy was now seen pushing his infantry on his right towards the heights, showing evidently an intention to turn our left in order to get possession of the key to our position—the eminence immediately on the left of Washington's artillery—and thus open a free passage to Saltillo.

Colonel Marshall, with his regiment, the Arkansas riflemen, under Lieutenant Colonel Roane, and the Indiana rifle battalion, under Major Gorman, was charged with meeting this party, and checking their movement on our left. Brigadier General Lane, with the 2d Indiana regiment, and a section of Capt. Washington's artillery, under Lieut. O'Brien, since captain in the quartermaster's department—was ordered to the extreme left and front of the plain, which was terminated by a deep ravine, extending from the mountain to the road, with orders to prevent the enemy from coming around by the base of the mountain.

At 2 o'clock as the enemy's light infantry were moving up the side of the mountain and in the ravines, they opened a fire on our riflemen from a large howitzer posted in the road; and between three and four o'clock Colonel Marshall engaged the Mexican infantry on the side of the mountain, and the firing had ceased, the major general commanding again returned to Saltillo to see to matters at that place, and to guard against Gen. Minon and his cavalry, taking with him the Mississippi regiment and squadron of the 2d dragoons.

The troops remained under arms during the night in the position they occupied at the close of the day. About two o'clock, A.M., of the 23d, our pickets were driven in by the Mexicans, and at the dawn of day the action was renewed by the Mexican light infantry and our riflemen on the side of the mountain.

The enemy had succeeded during the night, and early in the morning, in gaining the very top of the mountain, and in passing to our left and rear. He had reinforced his extreme right by some 1,500 to 2,000 infantry.

Major Prail, 2d Illinois volunteers, was ordered, with his battalion of riflemen, to reinforce Col. Marshall, who was engaged holding the right of the enemy in check.

The enemy now opened a fire upon our left from a battery planted on the side of the mountain in ear where his light infantry had commenced ascending it—everything now indicating that the main attack would be against our left.

The 2d Kentucky infantry and Bragg's battery of artillery were, by instructions given to major Mansfield, ordered from the extreme right, and Sherman's battery ordered up from the rear to take post with Colonel Birrell's regiment, (2d Illinois volunteers) on the plateau which extends from the centre of the line to the foot of the mountain, the sides of which were now filled with the Mexican infantry and our riflemen, between whom the firing had become very brisk. About this time the major general commanding was seen returning from Saltillo with the Mississippi regiment and the squadron of the 2d dragoons; and shortly after he arrived and took his position the centre of the field of battle, where he could see and direct the operations of the day. At 8 o'clock a large body a of the enemy, composed of infantry, lancers and three pieces of artillery, moved down the high road upon our centre, held by Capt. Washington's battery and the 1st Illinois volunteers, but were soon dispersed by the former. The rapidity and precision of the fire of the artillery scattered and dispersed this force in a few minutes with considerable loss on their side, and little or none on
In connexion with this movement, a heavy column of the enemy's infantry and cavalry and the battery on the side of the mountain moved against our left, which was held by Brigadier General Lane, with the 2d Indiana regiment, and Lieutenant O'Brien's section of artillery, by whom the enemy's fire was warmly returned, and, owing to the range, with great effect, by Lieutenant O'Brien's artillery.-General Lane, agreeing to my orders, wishing to bring his infantry within striking distance, ordered his line to move forward. This order was duly obeyed by Lieutenant O'Brien. The infantry, however, instead of advancing retired in disorder; and in spite of the utmost efforts of their general and his officers, left the artillery unsupported, and fled he field of battle. Some of them were rallied by Col. Bowles, who, with the engagement fell in the ranks of the Mississippi riflemen, and during the day did good service with that gallant regiment. I deeply regret to say that most of them did not return to the field, and many of them continued their flight to Saltillo.

Lieutenant O'Brien, being unsupported by any infantry, and not being able to make head against the heavy column bearing down upon him with a destructive fire, fell back on the centre, leaving one of his pieces, at which all the cannoneers and horses were either killed or disabled, in the hands of the enemy. Seeing themselves cut off from the centre by the flight of the 2d Indiana regiment, and the consequent advance of the Mexican infantry and cavalry upon the ground previously occupied by it, the riflemen under the command of Colonel Marshall retreated from their position in the mountain, where they had been so successful engaged with the enemy, to the other side of the dry bed of a deep torrent that is immediately in the rear of our position. Here many fled in disorder to the rear. Some of them were subsequently rallied and brought again into action, with their brave companions; others were stopped at he hacienda of Buena Vista, an here reformed by their officers.

The enemy immediately brought forward a battery of three pieces, and took a position of the extreme left of our line, under the mountain and commenced an enfilading fire on our centre, which was returned with so much effect upon the advancing column of the Mexicans, containing near 6,000 infantry and lancers, that it forced them to keep to the upper side of the plateau close under the side of the mountain; and, instead of turning to the left and advancing on our centre, against the heavy fire of so much well served artillery, continue its course perpendicular to our line on the extreme left, crossed over the bed of the dry torrent in the direction taken by our retreating riflemen, keeping all the while close to the foot of the mountain. Colonels Marshall and Yell with their cavalry companies, Colonel May, with his squadron of the 1st and 2d dragoons, and Captain, Pike's squadron Arkansas regiment, in connection with a brigade of infantry, formed of the Mississippi regiment, the 3d Indiana (Colonel Lane,) and a fragment of the 2d Indiana regiment under Colonel Bowles' and Bragg's artillery, and three pieces of Sherman's battery, succeeded in checking the march of this column. The Mississippi regiment alone, and a howitzer under Captain Sherman, moved against some 4,000 of the enemy and stopped them in heir march upon Saltillo. A large body of lancers, from this body, formed column in one of the mountain gorges, and advanced, through the Mexican infantry, to make a descent on the hacienda of Buena Vista, near which our rain of supplies and baggage has been packed.-They were gallantly and successfully met by our mounted men, under Colonels Marshall and Yell, and the attacking column separated-part returning to the mountain under cover of their infantry, and a part going through he hacienda. Here the latter were met by a destructive fire from those men who had left the field in the early part of the action, and had been rallied by their officers. Colonel May's dragoons and a section of artillery, under Lieutenant Reynolds, coming up at this moment, complete the rout of this portion of the enemy's cavalry. The column that had passed our left, and had gone some two miles to our rear, now faced about, and commenced retracing their steps, exposing their right flank to a very heavy and destructive fire from our infantry and artillery, who were drawn up in a line parallel to the march of the retreating column, of whom any were forced on and over the mountains and many dispersed.

Gen. Santa Anna, seeing the situation of this part of his army, and, no doubt, considering them as cut off, sent in a flag to the major general commanding to know what he desired. The general asked me to be the bearer of his answer, to which I cheerfully assented, and proceeded immediately to the enemy's battery under the mountains to see the Mexican general in chief. But in consequence of a refusal to cease firing on our troops, to whom the news of the truce had not yet been communicated, and who were actively engaged with the Mexican infantry, I declared the parley at an end, and returned without seeing General Santa Anna, or communicating the answer of the general commanding.

The Mexican column was now in rapid retreat, pursued by our artillery, infantry and cavalry, and, notwithstanding the effect of our fire, they succeeded for the greater part, favored by the configuration of the ground, in crossing the bed of the torrent, and regaining the plateau from which they had previously descended.

Whilst this was taking place on the left and rear of the line, our centre, under the immediate eye of the commanding general, although it suffered much in killed and wounded, stood firm, and repelled every attempt to march upon it.
he Mexican forces being now concentrated on our left, made a bold move to carry our centre by advancing with his whole strength from the left and front. At this moment Lieut. O'Brien was ordered to advance his battery and check this movement. He did so in a bold and gallant manner, and maintaining his position until his supporting force was completely routed by an immensely superior force. His men and horses being nearly all killed and wounded, he found himself under the necessity of abandoning his pieces, and they fell into the hands of the enemy. From this point the enemy marched upon the centre, where the shock was met by Col. McKee, the 1st Illinois, under Col. Hardin, and the 2d, under Col. Bissell, all under the immediate eye of the commanding general. This was the hottest as well as the most critical part of the action; and at the moment when our troops were about giving way before the greatly superior force with which they were contending, the batteries of Captains Sherman and Bragg coming up most opportunely from the rear, and under the immediate direction of the commanding general, by a well directed fire checked and drove back with great loss the enemy, who had come close upon the muzzles of their pieces. A part of the enemy's lancers took our infantry in flank, and drove them down the ravine in front of Captain Washington's battery, who saved them by a well directed and well timed fire from his pieces.

This was the last great effort of Gen. Santa Anna; the firing, however, between the enemy's artillery and our own continued until night.

The troops lay on their arms in the position in which they were placed at evening. Major Wareen's command, consisting of four companies Illinois infantry and a detachment of Capt. Webster's company, under Lieut. Donaldson, were brought on the field from Saltillo, where they had performed, during the day, important services in connexion with Capt. Webster's battery, under a piece ably served by Lieut. (now Captain) Shover, 3d artillery, in repelling the attack of Gen. Minon and his cavalry on that place. Every arrangement was made to engage the enemy early, the next morning, when, at daybreak, it was discovered he had retreated under cover of the night, leaving about 1000 dead and several hundred wounded on the field of battle, and 295 prisoners in our hands, one standard and a large number of arms.

Our own loss was, I deeply regret of say, very great, equaling if not exceeding in proportion to numbers engaged, that of the enemy. In killed, wounded, and missing, it amounted to rising of 700. Among the dead, some of he most gallant of our officers fell while leading their men to the charge, and some who are well known to the country for distinguished services on other fields: among whom were Col. A. Yell, of Arkansas, Col. M. Wm. McKee, Lieut. Colonel H. Clay, of Kentucky, and Col. Hardin, of Illinois. I also lost my assistant adjutant general, Capt. Lincoln, who was as brave, gallant, and as accomplished an officer as I ever knew. He fell in the execution of my orders, and in the attempt to rally our men.

The troops posted in the centre were constantly under the eye of the commanding general, and their movements and bearing during the battle are better known to him than myself. I think it proper, however, to bear witness with him to the particular good conduct of the 1st Illinois volunteers, under Colonel Hardin, and after his death under Col. Bissell; and the 2d Kentucky infantry, under Col. McKee, Lieut. Col. Clay, and after their death, under Major Fry. These regiments suffered greatly in the contest, and were ably and gallantly led on by their officers, as their number, names, and rank of the killed will abundantly testify.

I also desire to express my high admiration, and to offer my warmest thanks to Captains Washington, Sherman, and Bragg, and Lieutenants O'Brien and Thomas, and their batteries; to whose services at this point, and on every other part of the field, I think it but justice to say, we are mainly indebted for the great victory so successfully achieved by our arms over the great force opposed to us—more than 20,000 men and 17 pieces of artillery. Without our artillery we would not have have maintained our position a single hour.

Brigadier General Lane was very active and prompt in the discharge of his duty, and rendered good service throughout the day. He reports, among many others, Colonel Lane and the 3d Indiana regiments as having done themselves great credit. To Colonel Davis and the Mississippi regiment under his command, whose services were conspicuous in the open engagements on the rear of our left, great credit is due for the part they performed, and much praise for their conspicuous gallantry, which caused them to be a rallying point for the force that was driven in from the left, and who, in connexion with the 3d Indiana regiment, and a fragment of the 2d Indiana regiment, and a fragment of he 2d Indiana regiment, under its gallant colonel, constituted almost the only infantry opposed to the heavy column of the enemy.

Colonel Marshall rendered gallant and important services, both as the commander of he riflemen I the mountains, where he and his men were very effectual, and as the commander of the cavalry companies of his regiment, in connexion with those of the Arkansas regiment, under Colonel Yell, and after his death under Lt. Colonel Roane, (who commanded them in a gallant manner,) in their operations against he enemy's lancers. Col. Marshall reports that Lt. Col. Field was everywhere during the battle, and equal entirely to his station, and rendered the most essential assistance.

Brevet Lieut. Colonel May, 2d dragoons, with the squadron of the 1st and 2d dragoons, and Capt.
Pike's squadron of Arkansas cavalry, and a section of artillery, admirably served by Lieutenant Reynolds, 3d artillery, played an important part in checking and dispersing the enemy in the rear of our left. They retired before him whenever he approached them. The gallant Captain Steen whilst rallying under the orders of the commanding general, some men running from the field of battle, was severely wounded in the thigh.

Major McCullock, quartermaster in command of a Texas spy company, has, on the field, and in all the reconnaissances for several days previous to the contest, given me great assistance and valuable information.

Though belonging to the staff of the major general commanding, yet the very important and valuable services of Major Mansfield, to whom I am greatly indebted for the aid I received from his untiring exertions, activity, and extensive information, as well as for his gallant bearing during the days and nights of the 21st, 22d, 23d, and 24th, gives me the privilege of expressing to the commanding general my entire admiration of this accomplished officer's conduct.

My thanks are also due to Major Monroe, chief of artillery, for his services rendered by him on the field as chief of artillery, and for his exertions in rallying the men at Buena Vista, and disposing of them at that place, to meet the attack of the enemy's lancers. Paymaster Dix and Captain Leonard rendered very valuable aid by their gallantry in rallying the troops. Lieut. Renham, engineer, was very gallant, zealous, and efficient at all times, night and day, in the performance of the important duties with which he was charged.

Of my staff I cannot speak in too high terms; their devotion to duty at all times, day and night, and their activity and gallant bearing on the 21st, 22d, 23d and 24, not only command my admiration, but is worthy of all praise. Of those entitled to this commendation I would mention the following:

Lieut. Irvin McDowell, my aid-de-camp, I would recommend to the special notice of the commanding general for his activity and devotion, at all times, in the discharge of his duties, and especially for his gallant and efficient services throughout the 22d and 23d, on the field of battle.

Of Colonel S. Churchill, inspector general, I would speak, for his assistance on the field, where his coolness and judgment were in accordance with his previous reputation as a brave veteran. He had his horse shot under him during the heat of the action. I would take occasion, at this place to express to commanding general the aid and support I have received from this officer in disciplining and instructing the troops under my command since the opening of the campaign.

Captain W. W. Chapman rendered me great assistance, as extra aid-de-camp, in gallantly conveying my orders, in rallying and sending back to the field many of the volunteers who had fallen back, and in his admirable arrangement for the defence of the train. He has been a most active, efficient, and diligent officer during the whole campaign and I would recommend him particularly to the attention of the commanding general.

Lieutenant Sitgreaves, topographical engineer, was distinguished for his gallantry and good conduct, and especially in conveying my orders on the field of battle.

Capt. Geo. P. Howard, A.C.S., and Capt. C.W. Davis, A.Q.M., are equally entitled to praise for their efficient services and gallant bearing on the field of battle.

Surgeons Hitchcock, Levely, Hensley, Price, Roane, Madison, Peyton, Herick, Roberts, and Glenn, for their devotion to the wounded of the Mexican army, as well as those of our own, are entitled to my highest praise.

Mr. Thomas H. Addecks, my interpreter, is entitled to high commendation for his readiness to engage in daring enterprises, and especially for fearlessly carrying my orders on the field of battle, on the 22d and 23d.

To these I would add Mr. E. C. March, a most valuable government agent, and who rendered me important services on the 22nd and 23rd, and conducted himself with great gallantry on the field of battle.

I would also mention Mr. A.R. Potts, Mr. Henry A. Harrison, Mr. C. J. Burgess, and Mr. J. E. Dusenbury, all valuable government agents, who rendered important services in the execution of my orders, and exhibited a bold and fearless spirit during the actions of the 22d and 23d.

I cannot close my report without expressing, officially and formally, as I have heretofore done personally to the major general commanding, the feelings of gratitude I have for the confidence and extreme consideration which have marked all his acts towards me, which has given me additional motives for exertion and increased zeal in the execution of the responsible duties with which I have been charge.

Herewith I have the honor to enclose a translation of the proclamation of the President General Santa Anna, dated the 27th January, 1847, at San Luis Potosi, when the army was about to leave for this place.

Also, a translation of his general order of the 21st of February, and a return of the Mexican prisoners, and the morning report of the force under my command on the 21st ultimo.

The forces engaged in the great battle of the 22nd and 23d ultimo were as follows:

The United States troops commanded by Major General Taylor, amounted to only 4,610, including officers.

The forces under the command of General Santa Anna amounted to 22,000. Some of the Mexican officers, taken prisoners, stated the number to be 24,000, exclusive of artillery. This number, I presume, included General Minon's cavalry, reported to be from 2,000 to 3,000.

The army is represented to be in a disorganized state, and that the losses in killed and wounded, and by desertion, exceed 6,000 men. The dead, the dying, and the wounded in starving condition, everywhere to be seen on its route, bespeaks a hurried retreat and extreme distress.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

John E. Wool,
Brigadier General.

Gen. Wool's Account of the battle - The American Whig publishes extracts from a letter received from General Wool, at which he gives an account of the battle of Buena Vista. At the conclusion of it he says.

"If Gen. Scott had only left Gen. Taylor with a regiment of regular infantry General Santa Anna's army would have been annihilated, whilst for the want of a few regular infantry we came near losing the battle. At a moment when no one doubted that two thousand Mexican lancers were in our power, and would have become our prisoners, one of the Indiana volunteer regiments broke and fled the field of battle, which relieved the Mexicans from their critical position, and at the same time, joined by another column of lancers, bore down upon us, and came nigh wresting from us our strong position. It required all the activity and energy of General Taylor and myself, as well as all the staff officers to maintain our position. Fortunately, the Mississippi regiment and artillery came up in time to restore the fortunes of the day. The commanding General, Taylor, showed himself equal to the crisis, and with the Mexican lancers, but not until they had killed and wounded many of the bravest and most gallant of our little army. We finally repulsed the Mexicans at all points, when, under the darkness of the night, they made good their retreat. We could not, however, pursue them, for every man, horse and mule, was worn down with fatigue. For three nights we lay on our arms, and for more than twenty four hours we had been engaged with the enemy, and for sixteen hours subjected to a continuous and tremendous fire. Our position was a strong one and we made good use of it.

Santa Anna is rapidly retreating with his army, reduced to one half its original numbers, on San Luis Potosi; from thence it is reported he will proceed to Mexico, to denounce congress for not furnishing him with the necessary means of carrying on the war."  [JLM]

NRR 72.204-205 May 29, 1847, Com. Robert Field Stockton’s difference with Gen. Stephen Watts Kearny

DISPUTES ABOUT AUTHORITY AND LAURELS.

The posture of affairs as between our own officers in the new territory of which they or Com. Sloat, had taken possession, was exceedingly unpleasant when our latest information left them. We have been reluctant to refer to the subject, which must be painful to all of us, and have refrained from doing so in expectation of obtaining something more authentic than we have yet met with. We are obliged to resort to statements which are evidently colored by the feelings and partialities of those from whom they proceed. The Executive are no doubt in possession of far more of the facts in the case than it would at all be prudent in them to make public in the present state of affairs. Those who censure an executive for not publishing forth with whatever comes under their notice in regard to the public service can have little idea of the responsibilities and difficulties incident to executive duties.

A fair and generous latitude in that respect is due from the public to the public authorities, and we have no doubt is freely awarded, notwithstanding the captious objections of partisans. But to our subject:

On the arrival of the last dispatches from the Pacific squadron, a number of publications appeared from which we ascertain, that Gen. Kearny and Com. Stockton are at issue as to which is entitled to the government of California. One account stated that Gen. Kearny had not at the time formed a junction with Com. Stockton, received his bevel and commission of governor of the territory, and that he therefore waived his authority for the occasion rather than that the public authority for the occasion rather than that the public service should suffer. Another statement, and as we think the most probable one is, that Gen. Kearny carried out full powers as governor and military commander of California. Whether they revoked the like powers when is presumed Com. Stockton took out also remains to be ascertained. Col. Stevenson who left New York in command of the California expedition fitted out from thence, it was generally understood he took with him an authority from our government as the governor of California, which however he will hardly have an opportunity of exercising, as Col. Mason, of the U.S. army, was subsequently started express across the Peninsula of Panama, with authority to supersede him, and Com. Shubtick supersedes Com. Stockton as commander of the Pacific squadron.

After Com. Stockton took command, and before Gen. Kearny’s arrival, several unpleasant disasters occurred. San Angelos, which Com. Sloat had captured, was retaken by the Mexicans. Capt. Mervine of the nay, in attempting a recapture, landed according to orders some 200 seamen and marines without artillery. The Mexicans had the advantage of having a couple of flying artillery. The Mexicans had the advantage of having a couple of flying artillery which they worked very actively. The Americans had some fifteen or twenty killed and wounded, and were obliged to relinquish their object.

The New York Sun gives the following statement: “When Gen. Kearny was on his march from Santa Fe, he met an officer and party on their way to the United States with dispatches from Com. Stockton, who informed him that the country was in a quiet state, which induced the general to send back a part of his force, and to come on with only 100 men in advance of the rest of his troops. When within eight leagues of San Diego, to the surprise of all they were surrounded by the enemy from 300 to 400 strong.

“The general entrenched himself, and sent an express to Com. Stockton for assistance, who was at San Diego with about 500 sailors and marines; which not being promptly compiled with, from some cause not known, another messenger was dispatched by the general, on the third day, who informed the commodore that the general was surrounded by the enemy, that his little army was in great distress, and subsisting on their mules, and that he did not receive immediate relief, the general would cut his way through the enemy if it cost the lives of his whole party. The commodore then sent out a force of 250 to 300, and as soon as they made their appearance, the cowardly Californians fled. General Kearny then marched to San Diego, joined Com. Stockton, and planned the battles of the 8th and 9th of January, when La Ciudad de los Angelos was a second time taken."

"The general showed his orders, instructions and appointment as military and civil governor of California to Com. Stockton, who immediately suspended the civil functions of the general, issued his own proclamation as governor, and afterwards appointed Lieut. Col Fredmont governor of the territory. Gen. Kearny informed Com. Stockton that he would temporarily submit to his assumption of authority, as he did not wish at this critical period to create a civil war, and soon after took passage in the Cyane for Monterey, where he met Com. Shubrick, who supercedes Com. Stockton as commander-in-chief of the naval forces." [CPO]

SANTA FE AND CALIFORNIA

From the St. Louis Republican, May 17.

Yesterday evening several gentleman arrived on board the John J. Hardin, direct from Santa Fe and California, from whom we have gathered the following information:

Lieut. Wm. G. Peck, of the topographical corps left Santa Fe in company with Messrs. Woods and Sandford, and their party. At the time he left Santa Fe, Col. Price was still there, and all was quiet, but it was believed to be the sullen and stubborn quiet which superior force along compels. Although the insurrection, which we have heretofore noticed, had been put down, it was the general opinion that they only needed the aid of a competent leader to rise again. The civil government was going on trying the insurgents, Judge Beaubien presiding.

After Lieut. Peck was out some days from Santa Fe, he was joined by Mr. McKnight, from Chihuahua; Lieut. Theodore Talbot, who went out with Col. Fremont; Lieut. E. Beal, of the U. States Navy, C. Toplin, U. States Army; Christopher Carson; Robert E. Russell, and others, from California. From these gentlemen we learn that the court at Taos had condemned a number of the insurgents to be hung, and that eleven had been executed and a large number whipped. Six were hung on the day that Lieut. Talbot passed through Taos.

The executions excited the Mexicans very much, and when Mr. McKnight passed through Vegas they were endeavoring to raise volunteers for another insurrection. The alcalde and other influential men were opposing the effort, but with what success remains to be seen.

At the bend of the Arkansas, a party of Pawnee Indians made an attack upon their camp, and attempted to excite a stampede among the horses, but didn’t succeed. They, however, stole two horses. They shot a good many arrows into the camp, but without effect. They appeared to have but one gun among them. These gentlemen report that it is the intention of the Indians to attack every party which they think they are strong enough to contend with and are very hostile to us. This being the case, it behooves the general government immediately to send out a force and whop them into better behavior.

Lieuts. Talbot, Beal, and the other gentlemen from California left San Diego on the 25th of February.  At the time of their departure, Lieut Col. Fremont was at Ciudad de Angelos, acting as governor of the territory under and appointment from Com. Stockton.  The commodore had returned on board his shop and had left the part of the coast.  Col. Wm. H. Russell, of Calloway County, in this state was setting as secretary of the territory.

Gen. Kearny was joined about the 9th of January at San Diego, by Lieut. Col. Cooke, with the battalion of Mormons under his command.  Great praise is bestowed on Col Cooke, for the condition in which he brought his command in.  It is said that all his men were in fine health, with their arms as bright as when they set out in March, in excellent discipline, and without any serious loss.

Soon after being joined by Col. Cooke, General Kearny with the Mormons and dragoons, preceded to Monterey, where he was when our informant left.  There he had been joined by the two artillery companions from Baltimore.  We cannot learn from our informants that any portion of Col. Stevenson’s command, from New York had arrived.  Com. Shubrick had joined Gen. Kearny at Monterey, but we are unable to learn what their operations would be.  The question of the right to act as governor of the territory was still in dispute between General Kearny and com. Stockton.  It was understood that Gen. Kearny intended setting out his return about the 1st of July, but the state of affairs, it was supposed might delay his departure.

Some of the gentleman named, we understand are bearers of dispatchers to Washington.

A correspondent of the St. Louis Republican writing from Santa Fe under date of the 7th April says:

“All is apparently quiet here, but every observing man knows that we are walking daily over a volcano which is ready to burst upon us if an opportunity offers.  As I said in a former letter, in peace or war, this country cannot be retained but by military force.  We hear that Colonel Doniphan intends to return to Missouri, through Texas.  If he does so before other troops arrive to relieve him, Chihuahua will fall again into the hands of the Mexicans.  For my part, I cannot think he will do so unwise a thing.”

A letter in the Republican, dated City of Angels, Mexico, January 26, speaking of the arrival of Col. Fremont’s force at that place, says:

“I cannot, in a short letter give you the details of our march from Monterey to this city of Angels, but it was replete with incidents, and throughout furnished me continued evidence of the gallantry, skillful maneuvering, and noble bearing of our youthful commander, Col. Fremont.  He is a scholar, and officer, and a gentleman.

“We found Gen. Kearny here with instructions from the secretary of war to conquer the country, and institute a civil government; but Com. Stockton who was also here, maintained that the conquest had been made by him and Colonel Fremont, and was an incident to it, the right of forming a civil government belonged to him; and that Gen. Kearny's orders were now obsolete, because the business for which he had come, had been anticipated by others.” [CPO]

THE CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS FROM MISSOURI

The official papers in relation to this call here been placed in our hands, and we publish them below.  It will be observed, that the requisition is for a regiment of mounted men, but the government in a contingency which has happened contemplate a requisition for a regiment of infantry; and a letter from Governor Edwards says: “I have no doubt but a call will be made in a few days for infantry”

The governor has authorized Captain N. Koseialowski, of this city, who raised a company of volunteers last year fro the Santa Fe service, to recruit a company for this new regiment of volunteers.  If he can raise a suitable company in time, it will be received.

We understand that Mr. E. H. Shepard, of this city, has raised a company of volunteer infantry, and has gone to Jefferson City to tender their services to the governor.

[Missouri Rep.]

War Department, March 25, 1847.
Sir: The reports, which have reached this place from Santa Fe, are of a questionable character; yet they are calculated to excite some apprehension in regard to the condition of things at that place. It is regretted that Col. Duniphan was sent down the Rio Grande towards Chihuahua. As Gen. Wool did not proceed with his expedition to the latter place, the colonel and his command may find themselves in an exposed situation.

As soon as it became known here that General Kearny contemplated sending a part of the forces designated for Santa Fe in that direction, and that Gen. Wool might not proceed to Chihuahua, Gen. Taylor was apprised of Gen. Kearny’s suggestion, and requested to cause information to be sent to notify and such detachment that it would not find Chihuahua in our possession. I am not aware that any such information has reached Col. Duniphan. If he should have received timely notice of the fact, he may have returned, as it helped he has to Santa Fe.

It will be necessary, even if there be no disturbance at Santa Fe, to keep up quite as large a force, as that now stationed there. The period of service of the volunteers, first mustered, will expire in June, July, and August, and others will be required to take their place. These will be mainly volunteers, and it is quite probable that they will be drawn, in part or wholly from the state of Missouri, if they can be there readily organized. It is designed to send them one in detachments with each train of supplies for the troops at Santa Fe, until a sufficient force shall be concentrated at that place to hold it safely; unless that state of affairs at Santa Fe should require a different arrangement.

If there has been an insertion attempted in New Mexico, and not fully put down, and increase of force may be there needed. Should you receive accounts to be relied on, which satisfy you that an additional force is promptly required; you are requested, at once to take the necessary preliminary measures in anticipation of advices from this place, to have them held in readiness for the entering into the public service. This it is expected may be done without incurring any public expense. It is probable that the regiment, which was organized last autumn, and afterwards mustered out of service, may claim preference to others, and if so, I hope it will be consistent with the views of your Excellency to yield it to them.

The volunteers sent last year, were all mounted. It is probable that in this respect there will be a change, and that most of the new volunteers for this service, will be infantry.

It is desired that the term of service should be during the war, unless sooner discharged; and it is hoped that this change as to term of service will present no embarrassment to obtaining the number, which may be required. Those now in New Mexico will be invited to re-enter the service under the 3rd and 4th sections of an act of congress, of the 3rd of March, instant. I herewith transmit to you a copy of the act. By this act it will be perceived that a liberal bounty will be given to those who reengage in the public service, immediately after the expiration of their present term.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W.W MARCY, Sec of War.

His Excellency, John C. Edwards, Governor of Missouri.

LATEST FROM GEN’L SCOTT’S ARMY.

The New Orleans Picayune of the 20th, contains a letter from Mr. Kendall, brought by this Mary Kingsland, which furnishes the agreeable intelligence that.

Majors Borland and Gaines, Capt. C. M. Clay, and Midshipman Rogers and other officers were set at liberty in the city of Mexico.

The proposition of the English government offering to mediator a peace, were taken up in the Mexican congress, and a motion to even consider them was lost, ayes 33, nays 44, “from this it would appear that the present congress is determined to shut the door.”

The diligence which reached Jalapa on the 11th was full of passengers from Mexico, all of whom say that in the capital there was no government, no order, all was anarchy, Anaya was president protem, but without authority or influence. The states north talk of separating from Mexico, they send her no supplies, but little was doing towards defending the city. “The property holders, the merchants and perhaps the clergy, the military that had disgraced themselves, and all the demagogues among the lawyers were for peace, but still it was far from being popular.” [CPO]

NNR 72.208 May 29, 1847 half of Gen. Zachary Taylor’s dragoons ordered to Veracruz to reinforce Gen. Winfield Scott

Army of Occupation.

Brazos dates to the 11th and Matamoros to the 9th, are received. An express from Gen. Scott to General Taylor passed Matamoros on the 6th. Fifteen hundred troops are encamped on the field of Palo Alto.

The New Orleans Picayune of the 20th, states that the destination of one half of the 3d dragoons that had been ordered to join Gen. Taylor, had bee changed. There are about to embark to join Gen. Scott. The editor infers from the diversion of the troops from the Rio Grande, that it is not intended that Gen. Taylor should advance. [ANP]

NNR 72.209 June 5, 1847, Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna’s pass, New York “Sun”

Santa Anna’s Pass. Since the denial of the Union that President Polk gave any pass to Santa Anna to enter Vera Cruz, the opposition Journals asserts that the order to allow him to pass emanated not directly from the president, but from the department. The quotation, which the Union inserts from Pres. Polk’s annual message to congress, in reference to the subject clearly implies that the president considered it to be his best policy, if not his duty, to allow Santa Anna to return to Mexico, and there can be no doubt of his having encouraged him to do so, and of course would afford him every facility to effect the object.

The Richmond Enquirer, in a leading editorial, considers the allowing of Santa Annas return to have been a capital stroke of policy on the part of the president in a view of its having had the effect of giving to the Mexican army the very worst commander that they could have obtained. This by the way, is not exactly so complimentary to our army as should have been expected from the Enquirer, as it implies of course that their victories were attributable in a great degree to the defective character of the Mexican commander.

The editor of the New York Sun, has been for some months past in Mexico. The New York Mirror, intimates that he had a secret mission from President Polk to negotiate for peace. It was announced some time since that he had been arrested and confined in Mexico. The Sun denies that he was engaged in any agency from government of the kind, and says he was engaged in a depilation connected with the gold mines. Whatever was his object, it is stated that he did not succeed. [CPO]

NNR 72.209 June 5, 1847, Lt. G.W. Harrison’s gallant act in cutting out an enemy brig

Lieut. Harrison of the United States navy. We have seen a letter dated in January, from an office of our squadron in the Pacific, briefly describing a gallant action performed by Lieut. G. W. Harrison, in the boats of the Cyane, in cutting out an enemy’s brig from the port of Guaymas, where she was laying within pistol shot of the shore, protected by 500 troops and two pieces of cannon. A continual fire of cannon and small arms was kept up on the assailants from the streets and houses, and it was for a while doubted, by their shipmates on board, whether they would succeed. They did succeed, however boarded the brig, set her on fire and towed her out a blazing mass, under a shower of grape, and musketry. The Cyane plied her guns during the attack, but owing to the shallowness of the water in the harbor she could approach me nearer than half a mile, and even then, was obliged to take such a position that an intervening hill sheltered the enemy. Her fire consequently lent the boats but little aid, except by preventing the Mexicans from debouching on a narrow slip of ground, which lay between them and the water. The boats’ crews were received with great enthusiasm on their return to the Cyane, and the captain praised, in warm terms, the intelligent, gallant and handsome manner in which his orders had been executed. “New Mexican Tariff”

From the New York Evening Post, of the 1st June.

Mr. Editor- In requesting space in your columns the following, from an evening paper, (evidently by one conversant with the subject, confirmatory of the views you so kindly published on the 8th instant, I beg distinctly to disapprove the imputation of an intent to deceive, the part of the administration, either our own countrymen or native Californians, and am still confident that correct statement of the evil effects of the “New Tariff” on Upper California will secure speedy relief.

NNR 72.210 June 5, 1847, Samuel Houston’s explanation for declining commission as major-general with the Army invading Mexico

To C. N. Webb, Esq.

General Samuel Houston, ex-president of, and now United States senator from Texas, passed through St. Augustine, on his way home on the 26th ult.  The Picayune says. “He remained there several hours, receiving the warm greetings of this numerous friends, and during the time made a speech to a large audience at the customhouse. He gave a general account of his stewardship as a senator from the state, and among other things said that “the commission of major general in the army invading Mexico, was tendered to himself and colleague, Gen Rusk, but both had declined its acceptance- his own reason for doing so was, that he differed in opinion as to the proper plan of carrying on the war, with the officers who would have been his seniors in rank, and he would not assist in carrying out measures directly antagonistic to his own judgment.”

General H, as our readers are aware, has been spoken of and written about, as a suitable candidate for the next presidency.  [CPO]

NNR 72.210 June 5, 1847, comments on Gen. Winfield Scott’s proclamation

GEN. SCOTT’S PROCLAMATION
The Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger writes, May 30th:

The proclamation of General Scott is the theme of universal comment; but no one ventures to ensure it. It is a document very much to the purpose, and that made me believe at first that it might, like the proclamation of General Taylor, have been either prepared in, or texturally furnished from, Washington. On further inquiry, however, I learn that it is altogether the production of General Scott himself; though, in the confidential interviews he has had with the president and his cabinet, it may be supposed that the subject of a proclamation was talked of, and the points agreed upon, as this is the most natural way its coincidences with the views entertained by the administration can be accounted for. I was perfectly correct in stating that the confidence reposed by the administration in General Scott, not only as a general and commander, but as a negotiator and diplomat, is unlimited and that he and Mr. Trist have full power to negotiate with Mexico should she exhibit any disposition to come to an amiable arrangement.

When General Scott's proclamation was issued Mr. Trist, I believe, was not with General Scott, but still at Verz Cruz. General Scott may have sent a copy of it confidentially to Mr. Trist, or Commodore Perry (which latter step all military usages would have required him, to take, in order that the commander of the fleet may not do things, or suffered them to be done, which might come in conflict with the commander in chief on terra firma, in order to be certain not to commit his government beyond what the latter would be willing to approve and consider itself bound by. That General Scotts' brought in unison, previous to Gen. Scott's departure, no one can doubt in the fact of the general's proclamation, but how, under those circumstances, the lieutenant general should have been started, is a wonder, and justifies to a certain extent the general's apprehension of a "fire in the rear." NNR 72.214 June 5, 1847, Gen Winfield Scott’s proclamation to the Mexican nation

"ARMY OF INVASION"

THE GENERAL IN CHIEF OF THE ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TO THE MEXICAN NATION:

Headquarters of the Army.
Jalapa, May 11, 1847.

Mexicans! The recent events of the war, and the measures adopted in consequence by your government, made it my duty to address you to show you truths of which you are ignorant, because they have been criminally concealing from you. I do not ask you to trust my words, but to judge of these truths by facts with the views and knowledge of you all.

Whatever may have been the origin of the war, which my country saw itself forced to undertake by irremediable causes, which I learn are unknown to the greater part of the Mexican nation, we regard it as a necessity, such is it always to both belligerents, and reason and justice, if not forgotten on both sides, are in dispute, each behaving them its own. You have proof of this truth as well as ourselves, for in Mexico as in the United States, there have existed and do exist two opposite parties, desiring the one peace, the other war. But government have sacred duties, from which they cannot depart, and often these duties impose, for national reasons, a silence and a reserve sometimes displeasing to the majority of those, who from views purely personal or individual make opposition. To this a government cannot pay any regard, expecting the nation to place in it the confidence inherited by a magistracy of their own election.

Reasons of high policy and of continental American interest propitiated events, in spite of the circumspection of the cabinet of Washington, which ardently desiring to terminate its differences with Mexico, spared no resource, compatible with honor and dignity, to arrive at so desirable an end; and when it was indulging the most flattering hopes of accomplishing its aim by frank explanations and reasoning, addressed to the judgment and prudence of the virtuous and patriotic government of General D.J. Herrera, the misfortune least looked for dispelled this pleasant hope, and at the same time, blocked up every avenue which could lead to an honorable settlement between the two nations. The new government discarded the national interests, as well as those of continental America and elected in preference foreign influences the most opposed to those interests, and the most fatal to the future of Mexican liberty and of the republican system, which the United States hold it a duty to preserve and protect. Duty, honor, and dignity itself imposed upon us the necessity of not losing a season of which the monarchical party was taking violent advantage for not a moment was to be lost; and we acted with the promptness and decision necessary in a case so urgent, to avoid thereby a complication of interests, which might render our relations more difficult and involved.

Again the course of civil war the government of Paredes was overthrown. We could not but hope this would prove a fortunate events, and that whatever other administration might represent the government, it would be less deluded, as well as more patriotic and prudent, if it looked to the common good, weighing probabilities, its own strength and resources, and especially the general opinion as to the inevitable results of a national war. We were deceived, as perhaps you, Mexicans were also deceived, in judging of the true intentions of Gen. Santa Anna, whom you recalled, and whom our government permitted to return.

From this condition of things the Mexican nation has seen what have been the results, results lamented by all, and by us sincerely, for we appreciate, as is due, the valor and noble determination of the unfortunates who go to battle ill led, worse governed, and almost invariably outraged by deceit for perfidy.

We have witnessed and we cannot be taxed with partiality for lamenting with astonishment that eh heroic department of the garrison of Vera Cruz, in its valiant defense, was aspersed by the general who had just been defeated and put to shameful flight by a force far inferior to that which he commanded at Buena Vista; that this general, rewarding the insurgents and promoters of civil war in Mexico, heaped outrage on those who had singularly distinguished themselves by a resistance beyond what could be expected, and of admirable decision.

Finally, the bloody event of Cerro Gordo has shown the Mexican nation what it may reasonably expect, it is longer and continues blind to the true situation in which it has been placed by some generals whom it has most distinguished, and in whom it has most confided.

The hardest heart would be moved to greed in contemplating the battlefields of Mexico a moment after the last struggle. Those generals whom the nation has, without service rendered, paid for some any years, with some honorable exceptions, have in the day of need betrayed it by their bad example for unskilful ness. On that field, amongst the dead and dying, are seen no proofs of military honor; for they are reduced to the sad fate of the soldier, the same on every occasion, from Palo A lot to Cerro Gordo, the dead remain unburied and the wounded abandoned to the clemency and charity of the conqueror. Soldiers who go to fight, expecting such a recompense deserve to be classed amongst the best in the world, since they are stimulated by no hope of ephemeral glory, of regret, of remembrance, or even of a grave.

Again, Mexicans of honorable pride, contemplate the lot of peaceful and laborious citizens in all classes of your society. The possessions of the church menaced, an d held out as an enactment to revolution and anarchy; the fortunes of the rich proprietors pointed out for plunder to the ill-disposed; the merchant and the artisan, the laborer and the manufacturer, burdened with contributions, excises, monopolies, taxes, upon consumption, surrounded with restrictions and charged with odious internal customs; the man of letters and the statesman, the man of liberal knowledge who dates to speak, persecuted without trial by some faction, or by the rulers who abuse their rorer, criminals unpunished and set at liberty, as were those of Perote: is this, then Mexicans, the liberty which you enjoy?

I will not believe that the Mexicans of the present day are wanting in courage to confess errors which do not dishonor them, and to adopt a system of true liberty of peace and union with their brethren and neighbors of the north; neither will I believe that they are ignorant of the falsity of the culminate of the press, intended to excite to hostility. NO! Public sentiment is not to be created or animated by falsehood. We have not profaned your temples, nor abused your women, nor seized your property, as they would have you believe. We say this with pride, and we confirm it by your own bishops and by the clergy of Tampico, Tuspan, Matamoros, Monterey, Vera Cruz, and Jalapa, and by all the authorities, civil and religious, and the inhabitants of every town that we have occupied. We adore the same God, and a large portion of our army, as well as of the population of the United States, are Catholic like yourselves. We punish crime wherever we find it, and reward merit and virtue.

The army of the United States respects, and will always respect, private property of every description and the property of the Mexican church. We to him who does not know who we are!

Mexicans, the past cannot now be remedied but the future may be provided for. Repeatedly have I shown you that government and people of the United States desire peace, desire your sincere friendship. Abandon, then, feverous prejudices to be the sport of individual ambition, and conduct yourselves like a great American nation; leave off at once colonial habits, and learn to be truly free, truly republican, soon you will become prosperous and happy, for you possess all the elements to be so. Remember that you are Americans and that your happiness is not to come from Europe.

I desire, in conclusion to declare and with equal frankness that, if necessary an army of on hundred thousand could promptly be brought, and that the United States would not terminate their differences with Mexico in a manner uncertain precarious, or less dishonoring to yourselves.
I should insult the intelligent of this country if I had any doubt of their acquaintance with this truth.

The order to form guerrilla parties to attack us, I assure you, can produce nothing but evil to your country, and no evil to your army, which will know how to protect itself how to proceed against them; and if so far from conciliating you succeed in irritating, you will impose, upon us the hard necessity of retaliation, and then you cannot blame us for the consequences which will fall upon yourselves.

I am marching with my army upon Puebla and Mexico; I do not conceal it; from those capitals I shall again address you. I desire peace, friendship, and union; it is for you to select whether you prefer war. Under any circumstances, be assured I shall not fail my word.

NNR 72.214-72.215 June 5, 1847 AMERICAN PRISONERS IN MEXICO

Castle of Santiago. City of Mexico, April 3.

Dear Brother - I have written to you frequently since I became a prisoner of war. My former letter related to business almost exclusively.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

I shall now speak a little of Mexico and Mexicans.

From Saltillo to Agua Nueva is eight leagues and here there is fine water. Thence to San Juan de Venago 150 miles, there is no water except in tanks and wells. The tanks are built of earth and cement and filled in the wet season; but may be easily emptied by opening the bottoms. The wells can be readily ruined by throwing in dead animals. Hence the almost impossibility of an invading army marching through the country. This part of the country is also very unproductive, on account of the scarcity of water, it being impossible to irrigate to any extent from the tanks and wells, and agriculture cannot be prosecuted without copious irrigation, in consequence of the length of the droughts.

From San Jaun de Venegas to Matedaula is twenty four miles. This town is situated in a mining district and contains sixteen thousand inhabitants. From this place to San Luis Potosi there is a tolerably good supply of water. The country presents a beautiful level plain, bounded by rugged barren mountains. - The people are poor, miserable, stupid. The country is going to decay, evidences of which are seen at every step. This has been the case from the time of the revolution - some, indeed, say as far back as the invasion of Cortez.

San Luis Potosi is a beautiful town with some sixty thousand people. We arrived there on the 5th of February, and left the 15th. We passed a number of small towns containing from three to eight thousand people, and arrived at Queretaro on the 21st. This city I had never heard of before. It is the handsomest I have seen, and its reported population varied from thirty to seventy thousand souls. The buildings are truly superb, and the aqueduct, which supplies the city with water, is indeed magnificent.

We reached the vicinity of this place, Mexico on the 27th, when our conductors, learning that the civil war had broken out, detained us at a point three leagues off, for a day and a half - to preserve us from the mob as they said, but as we found out, to save themselves, as not knowing which party was uppermost, they did not know to which they belonged. We reached the castle after midnight and were smuggled into it with great privacy. A few moments after we entered an alarm was raised by the discharge of four guns in rapid succession. We heard some one say four men were killed and ten had escaped. We now ascertained that we were lodged in a prison containing about two hundred convicted felons. The escape made it necessary to change their cells and they were brought out and passed through the yard where we were, chained two and two, and placed in safe dungeons. The fight was yet raging in the city, and I shall never forget my entrée into the city of the Aztecs.

The civil war lasted till about the 20th ult. when the arrival of Santa Anna put an end to it. Whether there were many killed during the twenty day's fight I do not know; but it is said that a great many old women, cats and dogs were slain. The insurrection was a god send to Santa Anna as it furnished him a small job after his dreadful defeat at Buena Vista. He left here yesterday with the shattered fragments of his army, pretending that he would immolate himself, if need be, between this and Vera Cruz, should Gen. Scott attempt to march upon the capital.

This nation, so far as government is concerned, may be said to be annihilated. They are without an army, money, or men, capable of ruling. Santa Anna himself is said to be superior to his countrymen only in knowledge of the Mexican character and his ability in humbugging them.
Whether a peace would follow the capture of this city is extremely uncertain; amongst our friends her the opinion is it will not.

General Scott having taken many prisoners at Vera Cruz we are in daily expectation of being exchanged, in which case we will rejoin the army and probably return to the United States as soon as we would had we never been captured. [Santa Anna appears to be as forgetful as his friend La Vega, as it seems to have escaped his memory that he had engaged with Gen. Taylor for the release of these prisoners. - Eds.]

I have written you several letters since my captivity.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

Although in the city of Mexico I have seen but little of it - and that little through the iron gratings of the castle of Santiago. Whether we shall be indulged with a view of it after our release, I know not. I trust we shall.

Your affectionate brother.

JNO. P. GAINES

NNR 72.214-72.215 June 5, 1847 THE INDIANA VOLUNTEERS AT BUENA VISTA

When the first account of the Victory at Buena Vista reached us, we took the liberty of qualifying as we believed would prove to be but just, the relation relative to the retreat of the Indiana regiment. The subsequent official report went to confirm the first account. We delayed for further developments confident that it would be ascertained that the men composing the regiment in question were not as striking a contrast to the other volunteers on the field, as they stood implicated as being. A very different version of the whole affair was soon after given in the Indiana journals derived from letter from the army deeply implicating some of those that were represented as having acted with signal bravery and as retrieving the character of Indiana to some extent. These indicated that an inquiry would be demanded, and the truth would be elicited before proper tribunal. Col. Lane's statement of the attack came next, and then the finding of a court martial. We shall have the whole truth in due time.

COLONEL LANE'S STATEMENT.

The commandant of the 3d Indiana regiment writes to the editor of the New Orleans Delta as follows:

Camp Buena Vista, April 19, 1847.

It is an error that the Indiana brigade, as a brigade was in the fight. The first regiment was on the Rio Grande, the 2d on the extreme left of the line of battle, and the 3d on the extreme right - further separated than any two regiments upon the field.

[...] suppose your informant was led into error because Brigadier General Lane was with the 2d regiment. It is an error that my regiment ever hesitated for a single instant, and it has the signal merit of being one, if not the only one in the action, that did [not] retreat.

Our position was in the road, by which alone the artillery of the enemy could be brought forward, and only exposed to the artillery fire until the 2d Indiana, Kentucky, Illinois, Mississippi troops had been driven successively back by the overpowering force of the enemy. The enemy having been twice repulsed in our front and having completely turned our left flank and taken position next the mountain, we were ordered there, and formed a junction with Col. Davis' regiment and the 2d Indianians, which had been rallied. This force advanced upon the infantry and lancers and kept up a brisk fire until it was ordered to cease by Gen. Taylor. It was now that the lancers made the charge alluded to, and for the repulse of which the credit is given to the Mississippians. This charge was made in column upon the extreme right of my regiment; the 2d Indianians and Mississippians being on our left. They were permitted to approach within twenty five steps of the line before I gave the command to fire; they were repulsed, and fled under cover of their battery, and their infantry dispersed among mountains. We now moved to the vicinity of O'Brien's battery, and when we arrived there the Kentucky and Illinois troops, overpowered by numbers were retreating, and the enemy pressing hotly upon them and the battery, which was in imminent danger of being captured. We opened a fire upon them, and they retreated in the greatest disorder. This last blow terminated the battle, and, instead of leaving the battle field as stated, we (the 3d Indianians) bivouacked in the most advanced position held by our troops in the morning, and the enemy drew off.
As troops never fought better than the 3d Indianians; as their steadiness and coolness is proverbial, (as you will see by the official report), I am astonished that such calumnies should be fabricated against it. We were brought into the actions when the day seemed extremely critical, and were victorious in every engagement, and, in my opinion, are entitled to the credit of having twice saved the fortunes of the day. I have not mentioned the retreat or chance of position of other regiments invidiously, but as a proof that the fortunes of the day, in an eminent degree, rested upon and was sustained by my regiment. So much for the 3d regiment of Indiana volunteers.

The 2d Indiana regiment opened the "ball" on the 23d, and I undertake to say they deserve credit for maintaining their first position as long as they did; they were on the extreme left next the mountain. They stood firm and steady as veterans, and exchanged twenty one rounds with a vastly superior force in their front; with their entire line, from left to right, raked by a deadly fire of grape and canister, from one 24 pounder and two 18's; with their right flank threatened, and their rear exposed from a force that was contending with the riflemen upon the mountain. They did not retreat until they were ordered to do so by their commander, as is in evidence before a court of inquiry now sitting. The only possible charge which can be made in truth against the 2d Indianians is that they did not rally as soon as they should; but the fault is not with them, but with the commander, who designated no force or point for them to rally upon.

It would be criminal in me to permit our brave soldiers, who have done so much to sustain their country's honor, to sleep under the gross injustice which your article does them, and I respectfully request that you will give this notice a place in your paper. Very respectfully. J.H. Lane [JLM]

NNR 72.215-72.216 June 5, 1847 Gen. Gideon Johnson Pillow's report on Cerro Gordo

Battle of Sierra Gordo.

Reports of Gen. Scott to the War Department.
Report of Brigadier General Pillow.

Headquarters 1st Brigade, Volunteer Division,
Plan del Rio, April 18, 1847.

Sir: I have the honor to report, for the information of the general commanding the division, that, in compliance with general orders No. 111, I took up a position with my brigade in front of the works occupied by the enemy's right wing, but had not time to gain this position before the attack on his left commenced.

My command was composed of the 1st and 2nd Tennessee and the 1st and 2d Pennsylvania foot, and a small detachment of Tennessee horse, commanded by Captian Caswell, and Capt. Williams' company of Kentucky volunteers. It was divided into tow storming parties, each supported by a strong reserve. It was my intention to assail with these parties, simultaneously, the adjacent angles of batteries Nos. 1 and 2-those points having been indicated by the engineer officer on duty with the brigade, as those proper for the assault-and thus, if possible, turn the whole line of works; but before the proper dispositions for the assault could be made, our movements were discovered by the enemy, who immediately opened upon our ranks with a most galling fire of musketry, grape and canister. In this critical position of affairs, I found myself compelled either to retire beyond the range of the enemy's guns to complete my dispositions for the assault, or commence it at once with such force as I had already I position; but apprehending the moral effect which a retreat might produce upon troops many of whom were comparatively inexperienced and unaccustomed to fire, I resolved to adopt the latter alternative.

I therefore directed Col. Haskell, who commanded the assaulting force intended for the attack of battery No. 2, to assail that work with vigor, and carry it at the point of the bayonet; his party moved onward to the assault with great energy and enthusiasm, but, owing to the many serious obstacles, such as dense chaparral thickets and brush entanglements, the unexpected weight of artillery fire concentrated upon it from seven guns, and to the strong supporting force of infantry, it was compelled to retire with a great loss of both officers and men.

In the mean time, Col. Wynkoop, who commanded the storming party, designed to attack battery No. 1, succeeded in gaining the position where the assault was to have been made, but finding that the fire of the main attack on the enemy's left had ceased, I deemed it prudent to suspend further operations, until it should recommence, or until further instructions should be received from the general in chief. My whole force being drawn up for the attack of battery No. 1, I remained in this position until the news of the enemy's surrender arrived, when I withdrew my command to the national road. It is proper to state here, that Lieut. Ripley, of the artillery, assisted by Lieut. Laidley, of the ordnance, although separated from the rest of my command by their position, were actively engaged in the service of an eight inch howitzer, which, with extraordinary exertions, they succeeded in having dragged over the eights upon the right bank of the river, and which they established so as to obtain an enfilading fire upon the enemy's lines.

Col. Haskell's assaulting force, composed of his own regiment, (2d Tennessee foot,) Captain Williams's Kentucky company, and Capt. Naylor's Company of 2d Pennsylvania regiment, being, from the nature of its duties, most exposed to the terrible fire of the enemy sustained the shock—both officers and men—with a firmness and constancy worth of high commendation.

In the action, Col. Campbell, finding that I was too severely wounded for the moment to give orders, assumed temporary command, and began, with his accustomed energy and promptitude, dispositions for another attack, which was only deferred by myself for reasons before stated.

Lieutenants Tower and McClellan, of the corps of engineers, displayed great zeal and activity in the discharge of their duties in connexion with my command.

My staff—composed of Captain Winship, A.A.G., Lieutenant Rains, my aid-de-camp, and Lieut. Anderson, 2d Tennessee foot, acting aid-de-camp—were of essential service to me; for on account of my wound in the early part of the action, I was compelled to rely more than ordinarily upon their assistance.

I should do violence to my own feelings, as well as injustice to my command, were I to omit a notice of their coolness and good conduct generally upon this occasion. Although, at the time of their assault, the enemy was found to have a much larger amount of artillery bearing upon the approach of our troops than had been supposed, and which had been, until the moment, concealed by the nature of the ground, as well as by artificial arrangements, still none seemed to doubt its final accomplishment, or to shrink from its performance.

Respectfully submitted, G. J. Pillow,
Brig. General U.S.A.

To Wm. H. French a A. Act'g. Adj't. Gen. [ANP]

NNR 72.216 June 5, 1847 Col. William Selby Harney's report on Cerro Gordo

Jalapa, Mexico, April 21, 1847.

Sir: On the evening of he 16th inst: owing to the illness of Brevet Brig. Gen. Smith, I was placed in command of the 1st brigade of the 2nd division, and it is now my grateful duty to report the operations of that brigade in the actions of the 17th and 18th inst. Our encampment at Plan del Rio enabled the engineer officers of make frequent and close observations on the enemy's position, and it was ascertained that he had fortified himself on a range of hills for two miles in a mountain pass, and that he last of his works was on the Sierra Gordo which, from its position and defences, was considered almost impregnable. On the morning of the 17th the 2d division, under the command of Brig. Gen. Twiggs, was directed to turn the enemy by the right flank, and I was ordered by that officer to seize and maintain all the heights in the neighborhood of the Sierra Gordo, with, from their proximity and position, might be of advantage I an attack on that fortress. Shortly after the column turned off to the right from the main road, Brevet 1st Lieut. F. Gardner, 7th infantry was directed with his company to move to the crest of a hill on the left, and to watch the enemy's movements. While in the execution of this order, Lieut. Gardner became engaged with the enemy, but, he gallantly maintained his position against fearful odds, until he was succored by the riflemen under Major Sumner, and the artillery under Col. Childs, who drove the enemy, after a severe conflict, from their first position, and continued the pursuit until they made a second stand on a hill near the Sierra Gordo, which, from our troops suffered a severe loss but the hill was stormed and carried, and afterwards maintain, although he enemy made three successive charges to regain it. A portion of the troops under Col. Childs led on by their zeal and impetuosity, rushed down the hill the ascent of the Sierra Gordo, but as an attack was not intended at that time they were recalled and joined Gen. Twiggs. The rifles and 7th infantry slept on the hill, and to that point were brought, in the night, a 24 pounder and two 24 howitzers, which, at 7 o'clock in the morning, commenced a cannonade on the enemy's fortification of the Sierra Gordo. Early in the morning I was reinforced by four companies 1st artillery, under Lieut. Col. Childs, and six companies, 3d infantry, under Capt. Alexander, and I immediately gave directions to the different commanders to prepare their troops for stormsing Sierra Gordo. The rifles were directed to move to their left in the ravine and to engaged the enemy; and I instructed Major Loring that, as soon as I discovered hat he had commenced the attack, I would move forward the storming force which I was about to organize.
The 7th infantry was formed on the right, the 3d infantry on the left, and the artillery was formed I rear of the infantry, with orders to support it. Observing that a large force was moving from the left on the main road, towards the Sierra Gordo, I deemed it prudent to advance at once, and immediately ordered the charge to be sounded without waiting for the fire the riflemen. The enemy poured upon my line a most galling fire of grape, canister, and musketry from different positions around the hill; but my troops advanced intrepidly and as steadily as on a parade day. I cannot speak too ardently of heir animation, zeal, and courage under such trying circumstances, and without which they never would have surmounted the natural and artificial obstacles which opposed their progress. Around the hill, about 60 yards from the foot, there was a breastwork of stone, which was filled with Mexican troops, who offered an obstinate resistance, continuing to fire until the troops reached the breastwork, and where, for a few moments, bayonets were crossed. Beyond this, and immediately around the fort, there was another work, from which our advance was again obstinately opposed; but the troops immediately surmount it, carried the fort, pulled down the Mexican flag, and played our colors amid the proud rejoicing of our troops. Agreeably to instructions the rifles moved to the left, where they became engaged with a succoring force, but which they held in check, notwithstanding a most galling fire from the enemy's entrenchment's and from the musketry in front. After the enemy's canon had been captured. I directed Captain Magruder to take charge of the pieces and to direct their fire upon the enemy, which he executed with zeal and ability. It is also due to Lieut. Richardson to state that, as soon as he came into the fort, he took possession of one of the enemy's gun's, and, with his men, promptly turned it with great effect upon the enemy. I also directed Lieut. Colonel Plympton, at the same time, to move with his regiment in the Jalapa road to cut off the enemy's retreat, which he promptly executed, and maintained his position until the forts and forces of the enemy had surrendered. Such is a plain, but I know an imperfect and hasty account of the actions of the 17th and 18th inst:

For further particulars, I would respectively refer the commander of he division to the reports of the different commanders of regiments which are herewith enclosed. It is now my delicate duty tot report he different acts of personal gallantry displayed by individual officers, non commissioned officers, and privates; and as many of these did not come under my own observation, I would again refer the commander of the division tot he different reports of the regimental commanders, with the hope that the merits of all, however humble their situation, may be properly brought before the notice of the government. To Col. Plympton, Col. Childs, Major Sumner, Major Loring, and Capt. Alexander, my especial thanks are due for their coolness, zeal, and gallantry, and for the promptitude with which, on all occasions, they executed my orders. Captain Step toe, 3d artillery, Lieut. Hagner, and Lieut. Reno, Ordinance department, and Lieut. Seyour, of the artillery, rendered efficient service in the management of the artillery on the hill. Lieut. G. W. Smith, of the engineers, with his company, rendered very efficient service in his own department, as well as in storming of the fort. The conduct of Capt. Mason, of the rifles, who was so unfortunate as to lose his leg, came under my personal observation, and it is not the first time I have had an opportunity of witnessing his coolness and intrepidity in danger. Capt. Magruder's gallantry was conspicuously displayed on several occasions, and he rendered me efficient service. I lament to refer tot he death of Lieut. Ewell, whose gallant demeanor, throughout the several engagements with the enemy, attracted my special notice, and who fell in the breastwork noble lead his men to victory. Particular mention is due to Capt. Hanson and Lieut. Gardner for distinguished gallantry. Major Bainbridge, whose good conduct has been so conspicuous on so many occasions since the war with Mexico, was the second officer in rank in his regiment, and deserves my warmest approbation for his gallantry and promptitude. Special thanks are due to my personal staff, Lieut. Van Dorn, 7th infantry, Lieut. Oaks, 2d dragoons, and Lieut. Derby, topographical engineers, for the efficient aid which they rendered me both days in transmitting my orders, and for the individual gallantry which they uniformly displayed. Lieut. Derby was wounded, and Lieut. Van Dorn killed two Mexican soldiers at the breastwork with his own hands. I have been reluctant to mention the names of any, where all acted with so much energy, zeal, and intrepidity; no doubt many behaved as those I have mentioned, but who did not come under my observation; and I know that all, if occasion had offered, would have gladly embraced the opportunity for personal distinction. In two days, had in my brigade, including the 3d infantry, 2 officers killed, 9 wounded; 29 non commissioned officers nd privates killed, 175 non commissioned officers and privates wounded. The officers killed in my command are Lieuts. Ewell and Davis, of the rifles; and wounded-Major Sumner, Capt. S.T. Mason, Lieuts. G. McLane, D.H. Maury; and A. Gibbs, of the rifles; Lieuts. J. N. Ward and Bea, 3d infantry; Lieut. N.T.J. Dana, 7th infantry, and Lieut. Derby, topographical engineers.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. S. Harney,

Col. 2d dragoons, commanding 1st brigade.

To Lieut. W.T.H. Brooks, A.A.A. G. 2d division.

[ANP]
Sir: Agreeably to instructions from Colonel Harney, commanding the 1st brigade, 2d division, of the army of invasion, I have the honor to submit the following report of the operations of the 1st regiment of artillery under my command, on the 17th and 18th of April, at Cerro Gordo.

On the 17th, the 2d division marched from Plana del Rio in pursuance of orders from the headquarters of the army. In taking up a position, the enemy appeared in large force on the hills in front of the mountain of Cerro Gordo. The 1st brigade, consisting of the rifle regiment, the 1st artillery, and the 7th infantry, were ordered to drive back the enemy. The two first named regiments, being nearest the enemy, advanced in line under a heavy fire, driving the Mexicans from hill to hill, and finally to their stronghold, and supposed impregnable position, the heights of Cerro Gordo. In passing the rest of the hill immediately in front of Cerro Gordo, the 1st artillery became separated from the left of the rifles: and, supposing that as the action had commenced, it would only terminate with the capture of the height before us, and hearing a continued fire upon my left, the 1st artillery rushed down the side of the hill and commenced the ascent of Cerro Gordo under a most galling fire.

Having reached within 150 yards of the batteries of the enemy, I found that no other troops had advanced over he hill, and but a portion of my own regiment consisting of a part of three companies, and amounting only to about 60 men, had come up; Captain Magruder, with his company, and Lieutenant Johnston, with a part of Lieutenant Haskin's company, having been ordered by Major Sumner to remain where they then were, in rear of the crest of the hill, in front of Cerro Gordo.

Captain Magruder, in attempting afterwards to join me, with nine of his men, passed gallantly through a shower of bullets from the enemy's musketry, and Major Sumner, in coming to my support, was wounded.

Having maintained my position until the recall was several times sounded, and, seeing that the first attack was not to be made, I fell back with only men enough to carry down the wounded—having had 9 killed and 23 wounded. Before leaving my position I was joined by Captain Nauman, who from severe indisposition, had not been able to keep up with his company.

I cannot close the notice of the operation of the regiment on this day without calling the attention of the commander of the brigade to the gallant conduct of Captain Burke, acting as my adjutant, to Capron, Lieuts. Haskin and Brannan, who, with the few men, stood the deadly fire of the enemy and encourage them to deeds of valor. Among those who particularly distinguished themselves, were Sergeants Heymes, Teahan, and Private O'Brien, of company F; Corporal Littlebrand, of company B; and Corporals Harvey, Williams, and Private Bracklin, of company H.

It is proper for me to state that Lieut. Gibbs, of the rifles, with ten or twelve men, having become separated from his regiment, joined the 1st artillery, and was particularly active and gallant—having shot one of the enemy with his pistol, so close was our proximity.

On the 18th, the 1st artillery, composed a portion of the storming party that so gloriously carried the height of Cerro Gordo defended by thousands of Mexicans; and I can do no less than name the officers who participated in this bloody conflict, all of whom deserve the notice of the general in chief. They are as follows: Captains Naumen, Magruder, Capron, and Burke; Lieuts. Haskin, Dawson, Brannan, Coppee, and Hoffman.

I have again the pleasure to speak in high terms of Sergeant Holden, of company F. privates Ferguson and Foster, of company B. and Corporal Harvey and private Bracklin, of company H.

I beg particularly to notice the untiring attention of Assistant Surgeon Steiner to the wounded of the regiment, and to those of the enemy that fell into our hands. His professional services we in constant requisition for more than forty eight hours.

I have the honor, likewise, to transmit a Mexican standard captured by the regiment.

The loss of the 1st artillery, on this day, was 1 killed, and 17 wounded: making a total of 10 killed and 40 wounded—amounting to one third of the men actually engaged. All which is respectfully submitted.

I am, sir, ver respectfully your obedient servant.
Jalapa, April 23, 1847.

Colonel: I have the honor to report that the regiment of mounted riflemen, under he command of Major Sumner, was, on the 17th instant, directed, in advance of the 1st brigade, 2d division of regulars, then in motion, to take position with a view of turning or storming the enemy's position at the main height of the "Cerro Gordo." The first squadron of riflemen was halted about 400 yards of the point of attack, partly under cover from the enemy's batteries. While awaiting orders, it was fired upon by the enemy's battery in front and their skirmishers on its left flank. The squadron was immediately deployed, and a charge ordered. Simultaneously with this the enemy was attacked upon the summit and farther slope of the hill by the regiment of riflemen and a company of infantry. The enemy was driven from this position under cover of their own batteries. In this attack Major Sumner, commanding the regiment of mounted riflemen, was severely wounded and carried to the rear, leaving myself I command. The rear squadrons having been deployed on the left as skirmishers, advanced and continued the attack and assisted I driving the enemy into their works. At this time the mountain howitzer battery having been placed I position upon the height from which the enemy was driven, the regiment was directed to sustain the battery in lace, and also to prevent the enemy from turning our left flank—a large force being seen advancing down the Jalapa road from the main height towards the two others—and here remained through the day and during the night, assisting, with others, in sustaining the heavy batteries that were planted. At the dawn of day the brigade was ordered to prepare for battle. At an early hour, and before the attack upon the min work, a large succoring force was seen advancing on the Jalapa road; the rifles were ordered to pass to the left, attract the attention of the enemy, and keep them in check until the storming of the heights commenced, in which the regiment was to join on the left flank. During this diversion, it was exposed to a galling and destructive fire of round, grape, canister, and musketry, upon its front and both flanks, from the enemies' three main entrenchment's and batteries, in which it suffered great loss. In this movement, a large force of the enemy was held in check, which, from their position, would have been able to have turned the assaulting column. The general assault having been ordered, a portion of the regiment joining it, the works having been carried before the whole line, which was necessarily extended to the left, could possibly reach the heights; this being effected, the regiment, with others, was place in position on the heights. Ina very short time the enemy surrendered. The regiment of mounted riflemen followed, in company with others, the retreating army to within 10 miles of Jalapa.

The distinguished gallantry of the officers and men of the regiment of mounted rifles was so universal that the task of discriminating is one of extreme difficulty.

Foremost in the assaulting column, and that in the enemy's citadel, was 1st Lieut. Thomas Evell, of company "A," who, in desperate personal conflict with the last of the retreating foe, fell mortally wounded on the scene of his imperishable glory.

The regiment has also to deplore the death of 2d Lieut. Thomas Davis, company "H," who was killed gallantly advancing to the attack.

Capt. Mason, of company "F," had his leg carried off by a round shot whilst leading his company into action, and Lieut. D.H. Maury had his arm shattered in the conflict of the preceding morning.

It is due the regimental staff, Lieut. Frost, regimental quartermaster, and Lieut. Jatch, adjutant, to state that they were upon all occasions found where their services were most wanted, and throughout both days highly distinguished, themselves by their gallantry and good conduct.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. H. Loring,

Major Comdg. R. M. R.

NNR 72.217 June 5, 1847 Capt. Thompson Morris' report on Cerro Gordo

Headquarters 2d Regiment, U.S. Infantry.
Jalapa, Mexico, April 20, 1847.

Sir: In obedience to instructions from brigade headquarters, I have the honor to report the following facts in relation to the operation of the 2d regiment of U. S. infantry, which I had the honor to commend at the recent engagement at the heights of the Cerro Gordo on the afternoon of the seventeenth, and on the morning of the eighteenth instant.

Early in the afternoon of the seventeenth instant, the "rifles" engaged the enemy on a height just to the left of their centre and drove off a large force and carried the first height, when the second infantry was ordered forward to their support; and on arriving in position was ordered to halt until further orders. Shortly after, the regiment was ordered to press forward to the support of Brevet Col. Childs' command, then engaged in advance; but owing to the nature of the ground, which was rocky and precipitous, and to the distance from these latter, they had been withdrawn before it could come up with them. All of this time a plunging and galling fire was kept up by the enemy from their batteries and their musketry without intermission. Lieut. Jarvis, commanding company "A," was wounded so as to be obliged to retire from the field, and the command of the company was give to Lieut. Davis. Two privates were also slightly wounded.

The regiment did not engage the enemy on that afternoon owing to there not being time enough to do so before it would be dark; and accordingly it was place under partial cover near the base of the height above mentioned, and on which our battery was afterwards posted. We remained during the night on our arms in order of battle, completely commanding the pass.

It affords me pleasure to mention that it has been reported to me that Lieut. Hayden, in charge of the pioneers of the division, was constantly employed in preparing a road suitable for artillery to advance in, under a heavy fire, which service he performed with much coolness and energy.

Early in the morning of the 18th instant, the regiment was ordered forward to take position on the Jalapa road in rear of the enemy's works. At the commencement of this movement, which had to be made directly across a ravine swept by the enemy's batteries, Captian Patten, commanding company "K," had his left hand nearly cut off by a grape shot, and the command of his company devolved upon sergeant Shaw, who behaved well throughout the day. The enemy appeared increasing in numbers all over the side of the hills along which it was necessary to pass, and an order was given for a detachment of be sent out to drive them off at every hazard.

Capt. Penrose, commanding company "I," and Lieut. Davis, commanding company "A," the whole under the command of the former, were detached and deployed as skirmishers for this purpose, and I soon had the pleasure of seeing them charging up the height in rear of the main work of the enemy in a most gallant manner, and driving them from their positions of the height; while engaged in which Capt. Smith commanding company "B," and shortly after, Capt. Anderson, commanding company "H," were in like manner detached; and I beg to refer to the reports of Capts. Smith, Penrose, and Anderson, herewith enclosed, for information respecting their commands.

During most of this time the regiment had been advancing towards the Jalapa road, but was at the same time ascending the height in reverse around the sides of which it had bee ordered to deploy as skirmishers. No sooner had this height become our than the enemy appeared in large force on the Jalapa road and we were ordered to hasten to that point. Capt. Canby with a small detachment, accompanied by Lieut. Lyon, pressed hotly on their rear, and were soon in possession of a batter of three pieces which had been firing upon us in reverse.

The Jalapa road was now gained and the enemy were flying in all directions.

Owing to the very difficult character of the ground, orders could not be communicated to the whole regiment simultaneously, nor to even parts of it separated but a short distance from each other.

Capt. Kingsbury, acting major of the regiment, and Lieut. Jones, the adjutant of the 2d infantry, did much to ensure a harmony of action, an by their untiring exertions contributed to the general
It gives me pleasure to state that the whole of the 2d regiment of infantry, officers and men, behaved with so much gallantry, that I am forced to regret I cannot make any more special mention of individuals than I have done.

"A list of the killed and wounded" is enclosed herewith.

"I am sir, with respect, your obedient servant,

NNR 72.217-72.218 June 5, 1847 Col. Bennet Riley's report on Cerro Gordo

Headquarters 2d Brigade, 2d division,
Jalapa Mexico, April 20, 1847.

Sir: I have the honor to submit, for the information of the brigadier general commanding the division, the following report of the operations of my brigade before Sierra Gordo, in the affairs of the 17th and 18th instants. On the morning of the 17th, and while on the march from the camp at El Plana del Rio, the 3d infantry, commanded by Captain E. B. Alexander, was detached from my command by the orders of the brigadier general commanding. Early in the afternoon of that day I received his instructions to move with the 2d infantry, Captain T. Morris commanding, to the heights in front of the Cerro Gordo, on which the first brigade was then engaged with the enemy, and to make an attack wherever I could do so with effect. That regiment was accordingly led to the top of the hill, and ordered to halt until the rear should close up. In order to learn the position of affairs, I immediately proceeded to the opposite hill, then occupied by the regiment of mounted riflemen, when I was informed by Colonel Harney, commanding the 1st brigade, that no additional force was required at that point, but that it was essential that the height of had just left should be held. Orders were immediately sent to the 2d infantry to remain in the position it then occupied. Before the order could be communicated, one of the leading companies of the regiment (A) had crossed the ravine separating the heights, and was then lying under cover on the left of the rifles. A few minutes afterwards I was requested by Colonel Harney to move my command around the hill to the assistance of Colonel Childs, commanding 1st artillery, who was warmly engaged on the opposite side, and required support, whilst a direct attack would be made by his command over the crest of the hill. The advanced company of the 2d infantry was accordingly ordered around the ridge, and halted under cover ant at the foot of the hill on which Colonel Childs's command was engaged, for the purpose of concentrating the regiment before assailing the hill. The remainder of he 2d infantry, being still in the position I which it had been halted, did not reach the new position. The attack having been suspended, and the command of Colonel Childs withdrawn, it was halted, and took up a position on the road near the batteries. The 4th artillery had remained , during the interval, as the guard for Talcott's and Taylor's batteries. During the greater part of h night this regiment was employed in the arduous duty of placing the guns of the heavy battery in their positions on the height in front of the enemy's castle. The 2d infantry was established upon the pass leading to the Jalapa road, and retained that position during the night.

Early on the morning of the 18th my brigade was moved in the direction of the enemy's left on the Jalapa road, under the guidance of Captain Lee, of the engineers, who was supported by company D, 4th artillery, commanded by Lieut. Benjamin. This movement was made under a heavy fire from the castle and from the enemy's infantry posted on the ridge on our left. When the advance of the 2d infantry reached the foot of this ridge, two companies of that regiment (A and I) were detached for the purpose of driving in the enemy's skirmishers.

Orders were at the same time given Major Gardner to make a similar detachment when the head of his regiment should reach that point. The remainder of the brigade moved on in the original direction until halted by the orders of the brigadier general commanding, who also soon afterwards detached, in succession, company B, Capt. Smith, and company H, Captain Anderson, of the 2d infantry, and the 4th artillery, to support the companies first thrown forward. The remainder of the 2d infantry was immediately afterwards ordered up for the same purpose. Companies B and H, of the 2d infantry, joining A and I already engaged with the enemy, gallantly stormed the reverse of Cerro Gordo, driving the Mexicans from before them with great loss, and gaining the crest of the hill at he same moment that the 1st brigade reached it from the front-the advance of both brigades meeting near the castle, and joining in the pursuit beyond the hill. Of the companies of the 4th artillery and 2nd infantry, last ordered up the hill but one, the advanced company of the latter, under Lieut. Lyon, reached the crest I time to be engaged with the enemy.

From the crest of the hill I discovered that the enemy's batteries on the plain below, which were still firing upon us, could be turned on the right and carried. I immediately directed the advance of the 2d infantry, guided by Captain Canby, to move down, attack, and carry the batteries, and ordered the whole brigade to move as soon as possible in the enemy's camp. A few minutes after these orders were given, I received, through Lieut. Tilden, my acting aid, the orders of the brigadier general commanding to move with my brigade upon the enemy's left. The movement in that direction, already commenced, was accordingly hastened; but, from the great difficulty in communicating orders, it was sometime before my command was collected. The batteries in the camp were abandoned by the enemy after a few harmless shots as our men approached them—that on the right, of three guns, was taken possession of by the advance of my brigade; the one on the left—two guns—by a body of volunteers. A portion of company "D," under Lieut. Lyon, was pushed on in pursuit of the flying enemy, and company "E," under Lieut. Schureman, was established as a guard over the property found in the enemy's camp.

The whole of my command, every portion of which came under my observation at some period of the operations, was characterized by the utmost coolness and steadiness when exposed to a heavy fire of the enemy, which could not be returned, and the most intrepid gallantry when closely engaged.

To the commanders of the 4th artillery, Major Gardner, and of the 2d infantry, Capt. Morris, much credit is due for the promptness in transmitting my orders, and in moving their commands in obedience to them, under circumstances of great difficulty—the nature of the ground, and the extended order of the troops being such that council of actions was almost impossible.

My staff officers, Captain Canby, A.A.G., and Lieutenant Tilden, 2nd infantry, my acting aid, was constantly engaged in the affairs of the 17th and 18th, either in communicating order or in conducting detachments; and by their intelligence and activity in both capacities, rendered highly valuable services.

Although not appropriately within the range of this report, yet coming under my immediate observation, I cannot refrain from hearing testimony to the intrepid coolness and gallantry exhibited by Capt. Lee., United States engineers, when conducting the advance of my brigade under the heavy flank fire of the enemy.

In this connexion, the attention of the brigadier general commanding is particularly called to the cool and gallant conduct of the commander of supporting company, Lieut. Benjamin, 4th artillery.—The officers mentioned by battalion and detachment commander, in almost every instance, came under my own observation, and I am happy in adding my own testimony to that of their immediate commanders.

Authenticated copies of their reports, and a return of the killed, and wounded, and missing, of the brigade are herewith enclosed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. Riley,
Brevet colonel commanding 2d brigade.

Lieut. W. T. H. Brooks,
Acting Ass't. Adj't Gen., 2d division.

[ANP]
discover our movement before we had effected the object; hence a partial engagement was brought on, and one company (E) 7th infantry, under the command of Brevet 1st Lieutenant F. Gardner, was detached to skirmish with the enemy on our left flank, and the regiment under my command, then forming the left of your brigade, was ordered by Brigadier General Twiggs to advance on the general route to check the enemy’s advance in that direction from a strong position on the height from one hundred to six hundred yards.

The enemy, seeing his view frustrated at this point, turned his attention to the vigorous attack made by our troops on his advance on our left; upon which General Twiggs ordered me to march my regiment by the left flank up the height, and report to you, to support and relieve the mounted riflemen, and afford them an opportunity, to get water. Upon reporting to you, I placed my regiment in the line established a little below the crest of the height, within six hundred yards of the enemy’s battery.

At this time he had been driven back, in which Lieutenant Gardner participated, and rendered signal service. On the morning of the 18th, your directed me to advance my regiment by the right flank, so as to cover the space made by a company of rifleman which had left to join its main body, and to be prepared to storm the enemy’s fort on the height. This order was promptly obeyed and the regiment waited in silence for the word of command, ‘charge.’ This being repeated, the regiment charged with cheers-passing the crest of this height, and ascending under a raking fire of grape and canister and a heavy fire of musketry on my right, and extending towards the left and front.

Under the disadvantage of the enemy’s heavy fire, and the rough and steep ascent of the mountain, to reach the fort at its summit, the same spirit prevailed in the regiment from right to left, and although it paused for a few moments for breath, and to force back the enemy, who made a strong effort to turn my right flank, in which I found it necessary, with the sufficient aid of Major Bainbridge, to strengthen and restore the line which has been weakened under the enemy’s destructive fire, and particularly after Lieutenant Dana fall, supposed mortally wounded. I then directed Major Bainbridge to attend to the right, whilst I examined the position of the centre and left. At this time the command “charge” was renewed, and the front was carried by a simultaneous rush of the 7th infantry, driving back the enemy with much slaughter; the enemy’s flag at this moment being taken down by the intrepid and gallant Quartermaster Sergeant Henry, and the flag and standard of the 7th infantry were raised and floated in its place by the brave color sergeants Bradford, Brady, and Murphy, whom Lieut. Page, adjutant had left in pursuit of the enemy down the height. It would appear invidious to name any one gentleman in commission of the regiment for any individual act of gallantry over another upon this gallant occasion, for all were individually determined to execute your orders to carry the fort of he enemy. It is due to remark, tat the first officers who entered the fort of the enemy were Captains Paul, Whiting, and Handson, 1st Lieuts. Henshaw, Little, Adjutant Page, Gantt, and Brevet 1st Lieut. Gardner.

The enemy was driven out with great slaughter, and their guns turned upon them.

After the firing of the enemy had ceased at this point you ordered me to put myself at the head of the regiment, descend the mountain to the National road to cut off the retreat of the enemy, which order was promptly obeyed; and I believe your object thereby secured, as many thousands of the enemy immediately surrendered.

Deeming it an act of justice due to the gentlemen in commission of the 7th infantry on this occasion, I herewith annex a list of their names, viz:

Major Bainbridge, Captains Ross, Whiting, Paul, and Hanson, 1st Lieutenants Henshaw, Little, (regimental quartermaster,) Humber, Adjutant Page, Gantt, Dana, Brevet 1st Lieut. Gardner, 2d Lieut. Smith, and Brevet 2d Lieut. Maxie.

I am sir, respectfully, your obedient servant.

J. Plympton,
Lieutenant Col. 7th infantry

NNR 72.218 June 5, 1847 report on the actions of Maj. John L. Gardner's artillery regiment at Cerro Gordo

Headquarters 4th Artillery,
Jalapa, Mexico, April 19, 1847.
Sir. In compliance with the directions contained in the circular of this date, addressed to regimental commanders, I have the honor to report the operations of the 4th artillery on the 17th and 18th inst.

The regiment forming the right of the 2d brigade of the 2d division, under my command, marched with the division on the morning of the 17th in its place, in the order of battle, on the difficult and critical expedition of turning the enemy's left flank, through a road of three or four miles in extent for the most part cut the previous day.

Nothing worthy of special remark occurred until the division had arrived near the enemy's strong point, called the Cerro Gordo, here the division was met by the fire of the enemy. The fire becoming very warm, and the right flank of the troops engaged being threatened, I was ordered to cover with one company the advance of the mounted howitzer battery, the remaining companies to cover Captain Taylor's battery, itself threatened, through a gorge in the mountain. Our troops maintained the position acquired on the height, and all bivouacked for the night.

The 4th artillery was then employed through the greater part of the night in the extremely arduous duty of taking the heavy gun and howitzer battery to the height wrested from the enemy.

On the morning of the 18th the regiment was ordered to join the 2d infantry and proceed on the line turning the enemy's left-company D, under Lieut. Benjamin, being detached as a guard to Capt. Lee, of the engineers.

The regiment was halted some fifteen minutes, and was then ordered by the general of division rapidly to advance-passing under the fire of Cerro Gordo, and file to the right into a ravine. Our flank being here exposed, a portion of the regiment, under the order and lead of the general of division, rapidly advanced up the height, and then descended to the Jalapa road, and with its brigade moved it the direction of this city.

I would remark, that to Brevet Major Brown, with Lieutenant Howe (the adjutant) and Lieuts. Benjamin, Porter and Gill, the main credit is due, so far as the regiment was concerned of taking the heavy ordnance up the height that bore upon the enemy's works; and may be allowed to add, (probably a little out of place,) that the major, with Capt. Drum and Lieuts. McCowen and Benjamin, rendered highly valuable services in reconnoitering the enemy's position of the previous day.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obed't. serv't.

J. L. Gardner,
Maj. 4th Artillery, comd'g. regiment.

Capt. E. R. S. Canby, Assistant Adj't. General, 2d brigade, 2d division.

NNR 72.218-72.219 June 5, 1847 Maj. George Henry Talcott's report on Cerro Gordo

Jalapa, Mexico, April 21, 1847.

Sir: In obedience to instructions I have the honor to submit the following report of the movements of the howitzer and rocket battery under my command, while the 2d division, under General Twiggs, was forcing the pass of Cerro Gordo on the 17th and 18th inst.

On the 17th we followed the 1st brigade closely without assistance, until it ascended the hill on which the enemy was posted, when a halt was necessary till the general decided whether we should continue round the hill or take post on the top.

During the halt, Lieutenant Gordon, of the rifle regiment, temporarily attached to the battery, was wounded, and some other slight damage done to horses and battery.

Two pieces, and one-half our rockets, were soon ordered up the hill, under the command of Lieut. Reno, who, assisted by ten of the rifle regiment, easily and quickly placed them in a good position in advance of our line of troops.

The enemy shortly after appeared forming in the ravine and on the slope of their hill in large numbers as it to attack, but a few well directed rounds from the howitzers scattered and drove them back in confusion to their entrenchment's.

Orders were then given by Col. Harney, who commanded, to cease firing, unless the enemy approached, and the pieces were withdrawn to within our line on the hill.

The other two sections, under Lieuts. Callender and Gordon, were thrown to the extreme right to command the gorge of our route, when the enemy formed for the attack, and the battery remained as thus posted till the 18th, except one piece, under Lieut. Gordon, withdrawn and held in reserve during the night.

On the morning of the 18th, two sections, under Lieutenant s Callender and Gordon, were in readiness to follow the right, but the pass having been blocked by a section of artillery, they could not be brought into action as desired, but were able to follow handsomely the troops in pursuit of the flying enemy.

The section and rockets on the hill, under Lieut. Reno, opened and fired on the enemy with great effect, till our troops had closed on them-the rockets first towards the enemy's left, below the hill into the cover occupied by his advanced force, and then he howitzers, by direction of Colonel Harney, towards his right at troops in the hollow and a battery, while the 1st brigade was so gallantly storming the heights in front.

Thirty rockets and forty rounds of spherical case shot were fired in all by Lieutenant Reno, who deserves great credit for his judicious placing of he battery, and his cool and galling conduct in so efficiently using it.

The whole command behaved as was to have been expected, and we are fortunate in escaping with but one man severely wounded.

With the greatest respect, your most obedient servant,

G.H. Talcott, Major Commanding.

Lieutenant W. T. H. Brooks,
A.A.A. G., 2d division of reg.

Headquarters 3d Infantry,

Jalapa, April 20, 1847.

Colonel: On the morning of the 17th, the 3d infantry marched from the Plana del Rio, with the balance of the division, to the attack to the rear of the enemy's works at Cerro Gordo; but after the column had proceeded some four or five miles, I was ordered to await the arrival of a 24-pounder and howitzer battery, and to conduct them to their position. This was a duty of much heavy labor, and was not completed until some time after dark; so that my regiment did not have the good fortune to participate in the achievements of that day. Early on the morning of the 18th instant, I was ordered to proceed to the top to the eight, occupied by our troops, and to report to yourself. Upon arriving there, I was informed that the Mexican works on the opposite height were to be immediately stormed. The 3d infantry was formed on the left of the front line of the attacking force; and when the order was given to advance, it moved steadily over the hill, under the heavy fire of canister and grape which was poured in from the opposite height. That height was ascended with the same steadiness, the enemy was successively driven from his different lines of breastworks, and in an almost incredible short time, considering the obstacles natural and artificial, the height was ours.

I trust I will be pardoned if I indulge in a slight expression of pride at the conduct of my regiment throughout this affair; and when it is considered that it was composed of at least one half raw recruits, who had only had the benefit of some eleven days or two weeks imperfect drilling, and who fired a musket for he first time, when they came into this action, I feel assured that it will speak more for the gallant manner in which the men were conducted into action by their company officers than anything I can express.

Besides the general good conduct of the regiment, I feel it my duty to bring to your notice individual instances of gallantry which came under my observation. I cannot speak in too high terms of the gallant bearing, throughout the day, of Capt. L. S. Craig, first Lieut. D. C. Buell, adjutant of the regiment, and second Lieutenants B. E. Bee H. B. Clitz, and J. N. Ward. The latter was wounded a short time before the height was carried.
These officers came under my personal observation, and their conduct deserves the highest praise I can give it. In the attack on the height, two companies of the regiment, Captain Gordon’s and Lieut. Richardson’s, became somewhat separated, moving around with the 7th to the opposite side of the hill, so that I cannot speak so particularly of them. It is, however, in my knowledge that as soon as the height was carried, Lieut. Richardson manned one of the captured guns with men of his company, and fired upon the Mexican positions. I should also speak of Lieut. Bownman, regimental quartermaster, who went into action with the regiment entirely voluntarily, (his duty not requiring him to be there,) and who conducted himself with great coolness and credit to himself.

Lieutenant McConnell, of Lieut. Richardson’s company, s reported to me to have conducted himself with a great deal of gallantry, being active in assisting Lieut. Richardson in working the captured guns.

Every possible care was bestowed upon our wounded by our assistant surgeon, Dr. Keeny, who was actively engaged during the greater part of the day after the attack.

Respectfully submitted:
E. B. Alexander,
Captain commanding Brigade.

Col. W. S. Harney, comd’g. 1st brigade.

P.S. Return of killed and wounded accompanies my report. E.B.A.

NNR 72.219 June 5, 1847 arrival of the storeship Lexington in California, disposition of forces there, erection of fortifications California.

The St. Louis Union has received from Mr. Benton full files of the "Californian," printed at Monterey by Messrs. Colton and Semple, down to the 13th February last.

That paper of the 6th of Feb. notices the arrival of the United States storeship Lexington. Captain Tompkins. Which with his company and field artillery, is now stationed at Fort Mervine. Lieut. Haleck, of the United States engineers, was to make permanent fortifications at the most prominent points along the coast. He was well provided with all necessary implements for the purpose, and had besides a saw and grist mill. The Lexington was loaded with batteries, 24 pounders, mortars, &c. for military purposes. Three other transports with Col. Stevenson’s regiment were shortly expected; "sufficient, with General Kearny’s column, to secure California as a territory of the United States." A fortification will be erected at San Francisco. There is abundance of timber, and water power almost inexhaustible, up the Sacramento river. [ANP]

NNR 72.219 June 5, 1847 report by Gen. Jose Maria Jarero on the Battle of Cerro Gordo

Mexican official Account of the battle of Cerro Gordo.-The annexed official account of the late fight, was despatched to the central government, in the city of Mexico, by General Jarero, after he became an inmate of the castle of San Juan d’Ulloa.

San Juan d’Ulloa, 23d April, 1847.

Most Excellent Sir:

Made prisoner or war, together with Brigadier General Romulus de la Vega, who is with me in this fortress, where we have been placed by the unfortunate events of the morning of the 18th instant, at Cerro Gordo; and separated from Brigadier General Don Louis Pinzon, I conceive it to be my duty to report to your excellency the occurrences of that day, the bitter results of which have place me in the power of the United States of the north.

His excellency the president of the Republic and general in chief of the army, directed Cerro Gordo to be fortified, on the left of the National road, or carriage way, from Jalapa. This road crosses the brow of the mountain, and along it were place our infantry, together with the headquarters, believing that our cavalry were stationed near the Corral Falso and the Encerro.
The broad mountain, called the Telegraph, is the highest of the eminences of that chain, on the Vera Cruz side. Beyond the Cerro, on the right of the present road, and at the point of intersection of the old road, the general in chief ordered a battery to be placed, which would overlook the wagon road, the deepest and narrowest place in the glen. The old river road was commanded effectively by the heights, which were designated by the names of the advanced lines of the right, left and centre. The first, and last named, and the river in front, along which the enemy was stationed; the second commanded, upon its left, the National road, at the point mentioned before, as the deepest in the glen, in such a manner as to enable it to defend the passages from the old river road. The command of these lines was assigned by the general in chief as follows: The right, to General Luis Penson; the left, from the battery on the National road, to Gen. Romulus de la Vega; and the centre, to me.

We were in our positions on the 17th, when about noon, we saw the enemy advancing in column by the left of our vanguard, pushing directly forward for the heights, near the Telegraph. The battery of the advanced line of he left opened its fire of round shot upon them, from our largest pieces and with the best effect.

Soon after the enemy was discovered from the salient angle, upon which another battery of the same advanced line had been place, which also opened its fire, together with the battery of the centre, both acting with such effect that the enemy was driven from his position in less than half an hour. The enemy, compelled to abandon that point by the injury received with the greatest firmness by our troops, and retired in great disorder, with considerable loss.

The following day, (unfortunate for the republic,) the 18th April, the enemy presented himself to renew the attack upon the Telegraph, and opened a fire upon all our fortified positions. The height, after a severe and bloody combat, was taken by main force, at the moment when my advanced line of the centre was attacked by another column, at the point directly under the command of Post Captain (naval) Don Buenaventura Araujo. The battalions of Zacapustla and Hatlanque, the Artillery and Pickets of Matamoros and Libertad, covered themselves with glory, and effectively sustained the right wing of the left line, putting to flight the enemy's column in the short space of five or six minutes, which formed again on our right, among surrounding thickets and ridges.

The height of the Telegraph being taken, the enemy became a master of our rear guard on the left, and the receive orders of instructions from his excellency, the general in chief, I sent my adjutant, Lieutenant Francisco Ruiz, with orders to see him or the senior general, [providing Santa Anna had not run, we suppose,-]but he returned with the information that he found no one there-in our camp and headquarters-and that a flag of truce was flying attached, a fact which was subsequently confirmed by my own observation.

Under these circumstances, Gens. Pinzon, Vega, Noriega, Osando and myself held a consultation, and considering that, our position having been changed by the capture of the Telegraph height; that our rear guard was hemmed in by the enemy in front and rear, and that our supply of water, which had before been scantily furnished in barrels, was now entirely cut off; that the general in chief had previously withdrawn the battalion of grenadiers which had covered our rear guard in the woods, the enemy were thus masters of our fate-and although some of us, by our knowledge of the hollows and ridges, might have saved ourselves, we preferred to be prisoners, to the further sacrifice of the lives of our troops.

In giving myself up to the generals of the enemy I gave them to understand that on opprobrium to our honor to our country, belonged to he act, and although they were the conquerors, I could never in any form palliate the war, which they had made against my country.

In those expressions I was joined by Gen. R. D. de la Vega, whose services in and out of the republic have before this reflected so much honor upon the Mexican name. Col. Jose Maria Pavon, Post Capt. Pedro Ruiz, Major Jose Maria Mta, Captains V. Arguelles, Gregorio del Callejo, Jose M. Nunez, Jose Maria Moreno, Silverio Velez, A. M. Gallegos, Adjutant M. Camacho, (Lieutenant of the navy,) Francisco Fernandez, sub-lieutenants B. Amable, J. R. Covarubias, and Jose Lastortas, all of whom were brought to this place, and as prisoners of war will be conducted to such place in the United States as the present government of Vera Cruz may direct.

I beg your excellency to lay this narrative before his excellency the president of the republic, and to remember me to him and to the nation, whom we should all serve to the last, that this result is an instance of the caprice of fortune, as at the same instant that our three lines of the van-guard had achieved a victory, driving our assailants before us, we found ourselves under the imperious necessity of surrendering ourselves to those who, on the height of the Telegraph, the National road and in our headquarters, had made themselves masters of the field. In numbers there were more than twelve thousand Americans, against less than two thousand Mexicans, who were surrounded by their advanced lines.

I have the honor, &c.
Jose Maria Jarero.

To his excellency, the Minister of War.

NMR 72.219-72.220 June 5, 1847, affairs in California

The Californian of February the 13th says it learns by an arrival from Yerba Buena that a party of emigrants, 60 in number, left on the other side of Californian mountain, had suffered severely. Nineteen started for the valley, but only seven arrived, having been compelled to eat the dead bodies of their companions to save themselves from starvation. Among the survivors were two girls. A public meeting was held at once in Yerba Buena, and $800 raised for the relief of the sufferers in the mountains. Ward and Smith offered their launch and Passed Midshipman Woodsworth, with a small party, started up the river with the intention of disembarking at the foot of the mountains and going on foot with packs of provisions to save the sufferers. The distressed party lost their cattle on the Salt Plains at Hasting’s cut off, a route, which never should be traveled.

Mr. Larkin was at Monterey, attending to his business on the 13th of February, having been released by the enemy. An English school was about to be established there. The Alcalde publishes an order, forbidding men to employ Indians, unless they have certificates from their former employers that their services are not due to the latter for wages advanced. Mr. Semple is about to found a city at San Francisco Bay, to be called Francisco. He has purchased for that purpose the half of a five-mile tract. [CPO]

Col. BENTON’S CARD TO THE EDITOR OF THE ST. LOUIS UNION.

The public mind has been misled in relation to General Kearny and Colonel Fremont, in California; and a letter written in Washington, assuming to speak semi-officially, and from a knowledge of the contents of unpublished dispatches, imputes, the supposed difference to an intrigue of mine to place Col. Fremont in command over General Kearny, and of which General Kearny had got wind. He says:

"It is supposed that General Kearny has reason to believe that, through the influence of Colonel Benton, Colonel Fremont is to be, or has been, put in command over him."

To put an end and end to the anxiety of the friends of the two absent officers on account of such reports, I will here publish an extract from a private letter from General Kearny to myself, dated Ciudad de los Angelos, January 14, 1847, and brought in by the same messenger who brought his official dispatches. Of course, I limit myself in the extract to what concerns Colonel Fremont and myself. Gen. Kearny says:

"I have not written a line to you for three months, because no opportunity itself of sending a letter to you; one is now offered, by way of Panama, and I seize a few moments, and must write, though hurriedly.

After the revolt against Captain Gillespie, at the city of the Angels, in September last, Commodore Stockton sent Colonel Fremont to the Sacramento, to raise volunteers to put down what he termed the rebels. On my arrival on the 12th of December, at San Diego, I found the commodore there, and prevailed upon him by the close of the mouth to send what force he could spare from there in this direction for the purpose of uniting with Colonel Fremont in an attack upon the Californians or to make a diversion in his favor.

On the 8th and 9th we encountered the whole force of the Californians, about 500 mounted men under Governor Flores, and defeated them each day, but as all our men, except about fifty volunteers, were on foot, and all the enemy were well mounted, we could not catch them. The enemy finding that the struggle against us was useless, and unwilling to submit to, marched to meet Colonel Fremont, and on the 12th capitulated to him at San Fernando, twenty-five miles from here, agreeing to submit and to acknowledge the American authorities, never again to rise against them. This day Colonel Fremont at the head of 400 volunteers entered the city. He is now here and perfectly well, and has gained great credit for the manner in which he has raised his volunteers and conducted the expedition from the Sacramento.

Will you please in my name, congratulate Mrs. Fremont upon the honor and credit gained by the colonel, with my best wishes for herself and all your family."

So wrote General Kearny of Colonel Fremont on the 14th of January, and the praise he bestows on the raising the volunteers on the capitulation, are well merited. Colonel Fremont had gone six hundred miles to the American settlements on the Sacramento to raise troops to reconquer the southern half of California, and had raised 400 men and brought them back in an incredibly short space of time. He had done this without means, and legal authority, and wholly by his personal influence, and the weight of his personal character. The defeated Mexicans marched two days to surrender to him, from their confidence in him, and the capitulation to which he admitted to them was wise, just and comfortable to the law of nations expected no oath of allegiance from conquered men deferring that until a definite treaty of peace should make them citizens of the United States. He treated no one as a rebel. He only exacted what the law of nations authorized, namely a promise of submission to the conquerors, revisiting in return protection for life, liberty, and property. The capitulation pacified the country and prevented the wear from becoming guerrilla.

I publish this card to relieve the anxieties of the friends of the two absent officers, and of all well disposed persons, who would be sorry to see Colonel Fremont dishonor himself. I do no publish it to contradict the Washington letter writer, nor do I object to his including my two sons-in-law in his old and daily work against me: but I think that a writer who assumes to be semi official, and to has a knowledge of unpublished dispatches, and who is certainly cormorant, couchant, and levant about the departments, ought to have more respect for the president than to make him my instrument, and subject to my influence, in an intrigue to put Brigadier General Kearny under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Fremont.

THOMAS H. BENTON

St. Louis, May 14th, 1847.

[CPO]
This report, we are gratified to say, has the sanction of Col. Benton himself for its correctness.

Mr. Benton commenced with returning thanks for the honor of the invitation to a public dinner from his political friends. He had declined the honor of the dinner, in conformity to a rule which he had long followed; and as for the speech which might have been expected at the dinner table, he preferred to make it under circumstances which admitted a more general attendance, and would prevent no one from hearing it who chose to listen to it.

Great questions, he said, he occupied the public mind, and received their solution, in the last two or three years of his public service, on all of which he had been called to act on a decided, and even a prominent part, and on each of which it was natural for him to say something on the present occasion. The Oregon question was one of these. At one time big with all the calamities of war, it was now hushed in repose, and the country tranquil and happy under its peaceful settlement. His own course in relation to it had been consistent and uniform. He had opposed the joint occupation treaty of 1818: he had labored for its termination ever since and he had always held the parallel of 49 to be the proper dividing line between the American territory of Oregon and the British territory of Frazer's river. But the public mind, and especially the mind of his own party, had been worked up to a different and a higher view of our rights. 54, 40, and all or none, had become our demand. War was the British answer and although a threat of war would be no bar to a rightful demand, yet in answer to a wrongful one, it was very serious. He believed the whole demand of the United States to be wrongful so far as it applied to Frazer's river, which happened to run through the whole territory from fifty four forty to forty nine, and to have been discovered by the British in 1793, and covered by their forts since 1806. The administration had taken high ground; the party sustained it: but it was an occasion, which required a public man to rise above party, and to look to his country alone. He had resolved to do so, and to go for forty-nine, even if it should cost him his political existence.

This determination, though not formally promulgated, was no secret, and was early enough made known to his friends and to the administration. From the first explosion of the question on April, 1845, from the first reverberation of the thunder which came rolling back from London, in answer to the president's inaugural address, he had made known his opinions to the secretary of state, and informed him that he should support a treaty upon the line of 49, if the president made one upon that basis. From that determination he had never swerved. His friends thought there was great danger to him in the course he took: he himself did not think there was so much. He knew his constituents had been wrought up to fifty-four forty, but he relied upon their equity and intelligence to give him a fair harming and a safe deliverance. He paid them the compliment to rely upon their justice and intelligence, and the event had not deceived him. The boundary was settled at 49. The British kept their river, and we kept ours. War was averted. Great Britain and the United States remain at peace: he and his constituents were at peace: and long might they all reason so.

The settlement of this question, Mr. B went on to say, have cleared away the only remaining difference between the two kindred nations. It left them not only at peace, but also without a remaining cause of quarrel. For the first time since the stamp act of 1764, the two nations came to agreement without a quarrel. For the first time in nearly three generations of men, the two grand divisions o the Anglo-Saxon race, the northern stock in Great Britain and its gigantic progeny in our America were without a cause of disension: and to crown this happy state to give to peace its highest ornament and noblest occupation, and to friendship its most endearing cement, a calamitous visitation in a part of the British empire has called forth all the sympathetic of the human heart, on the side of one nation, and all its gratitude from the other. Ireland famishes! Succor and sympathy fly to her from the United States! And the swelling tide of gratitude comes rolling back better than being at war with each other, at war for Frazer's river, under the sad delusion that it was a part of Oregon! He thanked God that he had been an instrument in diverting aiding to avert, this calamity, and in producing the present happy state between the two nations; and he thanked his constituents for approving his conduct in going for their present wishes.

The annexation of Texas, and its sequences, the present war with Mexico, was another of the great subjects on which he had been called to act within the last few years. This great drama, Mr. B. said divided it into many acts, and covered along space of time, during all which he had been an actor in it, and he hoped a consistent and a prudent one. He considered this drama as beginning 1819, when Mr. Monroe's cabinet seceded Texas to Spain. It was then given away; and if it had not been given away there could have been no war Mexico about getting it back. He denounced that treaty in many newspaper articles as soon as it was made and vowed at the time unceasing efforts to get back the ceded province. Mr. Adams' administration with Mr. Clay the then administration broke up the peaceful negotiation, dispersed the ministers, assumed the

The question of admission of Texas then went to sleep, and was quietly waiting the end of the war with Mexico. All the old friends to the recovery of the country were willing to await the event: but in the year 1842, during Mr. Tyler's administration, a new set of friends, who had cared nothing about Texas before, and one of whom had given her away when we had her, became furious for immediate annexation; and the annexation treaty of 1844 was the fruit of that new and sudden impatience. The old friends of Texas stood upon their ground: the countries were still at war, but actually negotiating for peace: they wanted Texas annexed, but without war with Mexico, and urged a little delay, to permit their ministers, then negotiating under the auspices of Great Britain and France to make peace. All day was refused, the treaty was signed, and was rejected by the senate because its ratification would have been immediate war with Mexico. He was one of the majorities of the senate, which rejected that treaty, and his constituents, though all in favor of annexation, appreciated his motives and justified his conduct, and he made them his profound thanks for the justice of that verdict, and the honor of that election.

The treaty of annexation was reject, but annexation in another form was still prosecuted. A resolution for the admission of Texas as a state passed the House of Representatives; an additional alternative resolution was added in the senate, to appoint commissioners to negotiate for admission and to conciliate, and recognize Mexico, and thereby prevent the annexation from bringing on war. The expiring administration of Mr. Tyler snatched the alternative from the hands of the president elect hurried off the house resolution by a midnight messenger, slammed the door of consolation in the face of Mexico, and inflamed her pride and resentment to the highest degree. From that time forth everything berthed war between the two countries, which broke out the ensuing year.

Mr. B. said this way the history of this loss and gain of Texas, and its sequence, the war with Mexico. The country is recovered a war has followed and the question now is how to finish it? For himself he felt clear. His policy had been uniform from first to last, it was to get back Texas, without a breach with Mexico; and he was certain it might have been done if wise and temperate counsels had prevailed. The United States had only to wait for peace: that was upon the point of being signed in January, 1844, under the powerful mediation of Great Britain and France, when the then administration broke up the peaceful negotiation, dispersed the ministers, assumed the war, and placed the army and navy under the control of the President of Texas to fight Mexico.

Neither justice nor policy permitted this, especially as, if left alone, they would make peace after awhile, and then annexation could be effected without a breach with Mexico. Upon this view they acted. Mr. B. concurred with them, and so did all the people of the United States.

secretary of state, presented the first opportunity to make the efforts for its recovery. Mr. Clay as a member of the House of Representatives had severely condemned the treaty, which gave away Texas: Mr. Adams had opposed that article of the treaty at the council table when the majority of Mr. Monroe’s cabinet adopted it. But this was not known to him until bong afterwards. His reliance at the time was on Mr. Clay, as a western man, and from his publicity known optimist on the subject. He and Mr. Clay were than separating in the new division of political parties, but it did not prevent them from communing together on the subject of Texas, and co-operating to get her back. They had an interview at Tennison’s Hotel at Washington. Among other things intended by the new administration. Mr. C. mentioned the recovery of Texas: he cordially concurred, and promised his faithful cooperation. The administration made the attempt: he wrote articles to promote it but the scheme failed. Mr. Poinsett was then minister in Mexico, and favorable to the object, but could not succeed and so ended the first attempt to recover back the great province which the unwise treaty of 1819 had given away. I speak historically, said Mr. B., and justly, and without design to favor or injure any man, but to place a right before my constituents my own conduct, and that of others, in this great drama, which has ended in a war between two republics, Mr. Adams, at the council table, voted against the article which gave Texas away. Mr. Clay, in the House of Representatives, denounced the cession. They made the first effort to get it back: and in a speech which professes to be fair and impartial, let justice be done to every actor. Let every one take his proper place for censure or for praise in the great drama of the Texas question and its bloody sequence.

The next attempt was in Gen. Jackson’s time, Mr. Van Buren being secretary of state. A larger sum was offered than in the previous administration, but with no better result. The negotiation miscarried, though zealously supported by President Jackson, his secretary of state, and the minister at Mexico, He, Mr. B., co-operated with them, filing the newspapers with articles in praise of Texas, and using all the arguments for getting her back which have since been repeated by others who gave no help then. And so the second attempt to repair the mischief of the treaty of 1819, failed as the first had done.

The mission of General Memucan Hunt, minister from Texas, was the next serious attempt to bring Texas herself into the Union; but the parties were then changed: it was after a battle of San Jacinto, and Texas herself became the applicant. Mr. Van Buren was then president. Mr. Forsyth his secretary of state, and both in favor of getting back the country. But Texas and Mexico, though not fighting had not made peace: they were in the legal state of war with respect to each other: and to have admitted Texas into the Union would have been to adopt her side of war, and to have placed the United States at war with Mexico.

The treaty of annexation was reject, but annexation in another form was still prosecuted. A resolution for the admission of Texas as a state passed the House of Representatives; an additional alternative resolution was added in the senate, to appoint commissioners to negotiate for admission and to conciliate, and recognize Mexico, and thereby prevent the annexation from bringing on war. The expiring administration of Mr. Tyler snatched the alternative from the hands of the president elect hurried off the house resolution by a midnight messenger, slammed the door of consolation in the face of Mexico, and inflamed her pride and resentment to the highest degree. From that time forth everything berthed war between the two countries, which broke out the ensuing year.
The rejection of the treaty stopped the war then assumed: but the midnight transmission of the house resolution started it again, and soon placed the two republics in the unhappy condition in which they now stand.

Mr. B repeated. His policy from beginning to ending had been to get back Texas without war, or even a breach of friendship with Mexico. He was greatly averse to such a war. He saw great and extraordinary evils in it. Besides the evils common to all war, loss of lives, distress of families, interruption of commerce, ruin to many merchants, and a load of debts and taxes. Besides all these ordinary evils incident to all wars, he saw others of anew and extraordinary kind of war with Mexico. She was a republic, and a weak one, and our neighbor, and had done us the honor to copy our constitution and form of government, and had maintained civil wards at home to keep it up. She was one of the Spanish American states, which stretch from the southern boundary of the United States to Cape Horn, the whole of which had copied our form of government, and established close political and commercial relations with us. All these states had just emancipated themselves from European domination, adopted the republican system, and taken the United States for their model and their friend, the elder sister and parental guardian of the cordon of republics which stretched across the United States, at the head of this long chain of republics, was grand an impressive and imposed upon her an enlarge and enlightened system, which had been carefully acted upon by all American statesmen from the time these Spanish American states began to establish their independence. Europe had a system of monarchical, consolidated by the holy alliance. The new world had its system of republics, to be cemented and united by sympathy and friendship. To maintain our position at the head of this republican system in the new world was due to the human race and ourselves. To cherish and perpetuate these republics, to preserve their friendship and their commerce, to continue to be their political mentor, to continue them in the republican system of the new world, and prevent their relapse into the monarchial system of the old world, this way our true and noble policy. War with any one of them would endanger that policy; for being all of the same, origin, religion, language, customs, they would naturally sympathize with each other, and having war with one, the friendship of all might be jeopardized.

Mr. B had endeavored to act upon these enlarged principles, originating not with him but with enlightened statesmen before he came into public life. He had endeavored to get back Texas without a war with Mexico, and was certain it might have been done with all ease by this simple process of leaving Mexico and Texas to make peace, and treating Mexico with the respect and deference due to a sister republic, the more proud and sensitive because weak and unusable to contend with us. The first great error was the annexation treaty of 1842, and the manner in which it was conducted: that was the work of the Tyler administration, and of selfish and unworthy purposes. The send great error, or worse than error, was the rejection of the senate’s alternative resolution, and dispatch of midnight messenger to Texas with the absolute resolution of admission, on the night of the 31 of March, 1845; that also was the work of the Tyler administration; and in the last moment of its expiring existence. The first of these steps the treaty would have made instant war if it had been ratified by the senate, the second made the war! And now the great question it to finish it. How finish it? That was the question which every body was putting to him, and on which every one present, no doubt, would wish to hear from speak. Bu this was not the time to speak upon the point. The time would come but it was not now. His opinion had been asked by the president, and given to him, and approved by him, and in time would be given to the public.

But he could say that relied more upon policy that upon arms to finish this war with a weak and proud neighbor. Eight battles, she could not. That was proved from San Jacinto to Sierra Gordo; and wherever the two races met, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Bay of San Francisco, victories would come as often as fights came, but there was a danger to be feared, the danger of fanaticism, and the conversion of the war into a death contest for country and religion. The Spanish race is susceptible of deep national emotion, fanatical emotion, both religiously and politically, and of which their history furnishes abundant examples both into eh Old and in the New World, and from the time of the Carthaginians and the Romans to that of the French under Bonaparte. Policy more than arms, but combined with arms, he considered the road to peace.

He would not say that victories alone would not bring peace they might do so, but not the kind of peace he was in search of. He wanted the peace, which was not merely a collection of hostilities, but a restoration of the fruits and blessings of peace, the restoration of friendship and commerce, and of our position as head and chief and paternal guardian of the system of republics in the New World. The peace, which leaves all the animosities and resentments of war behind, was not the peace, which the interests of the countries, and the good of the republican system, and the safety, and independent of the two Americans, required.

Mr. B said he stood upon ground which he could not explore: he alluded to subject which he could not unfold: but he could say that it was a great error to confound the whole Mexican people, the whole eight million of their mixed population, under any one general view either politically, morally, or intellectually, or in their feelings towards the United States and the war. It would be great error to confound this larger and mixed mass under any one general view and a worse error to act either militarily or politically on that view. It had its division, both of races, and of political parties; and leaving out the illiterate, impoverished, and depressed part of the Indian race, which signified nothing politically, though the half of the whole population and the sole resource for day
Mr. B. said he had expressed his opinions publicly and responsibly in the senate, both in speeches and in votes, and privately and frankly to the president whenever asked. He had done more. He had been willing to resign his place in the senate and go to the field of operations, not so much to command armies as to make military movements subservient to diplomatic policy, and produce a peace which should be a restoration of friendship and not a mere truce, extorted by force from weakness, and leaving the animosities of war behind. He who had refused embassies to the first courts of Europe, was willing to go to Mexico: he who had refused to let his friends propose him of first major general in May, which would have put him at the head of the army was willing to have taken a commission when the war began to take the appearance of continuing and long, and of becoming fanatical, and giving strength to the monarchical European party. He was willing to have taken the place of lieutenant general; for that would have shocked no military feeling, and displaced no military man, and would have allowed a policy approved by the president to have been completely carried out. He could say no more, at this time, upon that point, but when the plan which he submitted to the president comes to be made known, it would be seen that the military men would have nothing to complain of, that Gen. Taylor instead of struggling at Buena Vista with 5,000 men against 20,000 would have been advancing on Santa Anna with 20,000 that Gen. Scott, instead of entrenched army at Sierra Gordo would have probably found the road open to Mexico that the two generals would have probably met sooner at the city of Mexico, and found themselves attended by a diplomatic mission, nationally constituted, both in a geographical and in a political sense, and prepared to take advantage of all events to smooth the way to a solid and lasting peace.

Mr. Benton passed to a new subject, one which had not yet excited the public attention, but which in his opinion was pregnant with much danger, and required early attention. It was not a question of foreign war, to be settled by arms or diplomacy, but of domestic legislation, to be settled by public opinion and by voters. He alluded to the slavery propagandist resolutions, introduced into the senate towards the close of the last session, and which he had stigmatized as fire-bran on the day of their reintroduction. On their face these resolutions contemplate a subversion of the Union, thrown guilt of the subversion upon those who oppose their enactment into law. At the same time, they propose what no citizen of a non-slaveholding state can ever stand, and what many from the slaveholding states; himself in the number would not stand if they could. The propose the abolition of all compromised, past and future, on the slavery question, and treat as violators of the rights of the states, and of the constitution, and as subverts of the union, all who will not agree to extended slavery to all the territories of the United States, even to the most remote and hyperborean, to Oregon itself, in the latitude of Wisconsin and the Lake of the Woods. They go the precise length of the northern abolitionists and with the same practical consequence, only in a reversed form. The abolition creed is, that the admission of constitution, and dissolution of the Union; the new resolutions declare that the prohibition of slavery in any territory of the Union as a violation of the constitution and of the rights of the states, and subversions of the Union! So true it is, that extremes meet, and that all fanaticism, for against any dogma terminates at the same point of intolerance and defiance.

The first effect of this new slavery creed, which the south was summoned to adopt most summarily would be to establish a new political test for trying the orthodoxy of all candidates for the presidency, and as no northern man could stand such a test at home, the whole of their would be knocked in the head, so far as the south was concerned, at a single lick. The next effect of these resolutions, if adopted, in the non-slaveholding states, would be to put an end to the present political editions of parties, and to substitute a new party in the south, bounded by geographical lines and founded on the sole principle of slavery propagandist. The third effect of these resolutions would that which is stated, hypothetically on their face, namely, the subversion of the Union.

Seeing these resolutions in this dangerous point of view, Mr. B. had stigmatized them as a freestanding on the day of their reintroduction, and had since depreciated their application to the Oregon bill, by which the Oregon people were left without law or government for a year longer. Many persons thought him too prompt in his denunciation of these resolutions perhaps the same persons thought him too prompt in douncing the Oregon joint occupation treaty in 1818, the treaty which gave away Texas in 1819, and all the measures of the Tyler administration which led to the Mexican war in 1846: but the truth might be that he was not too fast, but themselves too slow. The resolutions appeared dangerous to him, and he struck them at their first apportion into the senate chamber. He had done his duty: he had sounded the alarm: it was for the role of the United States, all the friends of the Union to do the rest. There was no Jackson now to save the Union by a voice, like the command of destiny, proclaiming “IT SHALL BE PRESERVED.”

Mr. B. concluded with saying that he limited himself on the occasion, to the few subjects on which he had touched, without exhausting them. They were subjects of present, interest, and of national import, and rose above the level of party, and were fit to be discussed in the assemblage, which was not one of party. He had not acted upon them in a party character when before the senate, and did not speak of them as party measures now. On proper subjects, when party principles were applicable, he was found close enough to his party tune. When principles did not apply, when the subject was either too large or too small for party, when a foreign war, or domestic discussion, was the question, or a poor clerk, or laborer to be turned out of employment, on such great, and on such little subjects as these, he chose rather to act in the character of a patriot who felt for his country, and of a man who felt for his fellow man. MEXICAN PRIVATEER

A Barcelona date of the 3rd of May states that the Mexican privateer Unico, of Vera Cruz, carrying one gun and 53 men, had captured in the waters of Arica, and brought into Barcelona the American ship Carmelita, 190 tons, Captain Edwin, Littlefield, from Poace, with a cargo of coffee, bound to Trieste.

The above is no doubt true. The American vessels named sailed from Puerto Rico the latter end of March. [CPO]

NAVAL. Capt. Mayo, U.S.N., governor of Alvarado, started with 80 men in gun boats on the 13th for Talascoya, situated nearly 100 miles S.W. from Alvarado. The place submitted, and he was received with respect. He considered it best not to leave a garrison. On his return down the narrow river, he was fired upon from the chaparral, and one officer and five seamen were wounded.

Com. Perry, with a squadron, had gone to the south, searching for laurels.

NNR 72.231-72.232 June 12, 1847 address of the second regiment of Tennessee volunteers about Cerro Gordo

Cerro Gordo

From the New Orleans Picayune

Address of the 2nd Reg. Tennessee Volunteers.

If sacrifices in the service of the country entitle patriotic and brave men to a hearing before the tribunal of public opinion, the 2d regiment of Tennessee volunteers may surely claim that privilege. The attack upon the enemy's batteries by that regiment was the only one of the battle of Cerro Gordo that failed; and although the general orders announcing this fact bear testimony to the courage of the men and gallantry of its officers, the regiment is concerned that the public shall know the circumstances of the assault, that it may be judged how far the commendation of official reports is deserving, and how far it has attempted to smother up an unsuccessful enterprise in the ambitious phraseology of a military despatch. The commander in chief, the generals of divisions, and the heads of detachments have been heard. That regiment now asks to be heard also, and this is all the recompense it seeks for the loss of comrades, mowed down in an effort upon which, it is contended, it was precipitated by the infatuation of a superior officer.

The general of division, whose military capacity is impeached by the regiment, has received the reward due only to exalted abilities or eminent services. HE has enjoyed the credit to leading the 2d regiment of Tennessee volunteers upon the desperate charge in which its flower was cut down. He hastened from the battle field and received the firstlings of the public gratitude from the fields of Cerro Gordo. The sympathies of the people were excited on account of a wound, which was reported to have nearly severed his sword arm in twain, whilst in fact he carried the ball that hurt him in his breeches pocket. And the remnant of the only regiment of his brigade which was actively engaged in battle, and which was repulsed with terrific slaughter, without having accomplished anything, comes forward and asks the calm judgment of their countrymen upon the facts as they occurred. The survivors of the that fearful and needless slaughter have the reputation of being driven from the field, whilst from the blood of the slain incense is exhaled to glorify an officer, who in the language of the address, "neither led nor followed in that assault."

We have heard before now, and from sources which left no room to doubt its truth, a narrative of the events of the battle similar to that now made public. We have heard these same facts from parties who were not interested in the successful assault, beyond the concern which was felt by soldiers and officers of different corps for brethren in arms. And we have no doubt that public opinion will settle down in the conviction that the 2d regiment of Tennessee volunteers did all that men could do under the circumstances, and that the assault miscarried because they were commanded to do an impossible thing by an officer who enjoys the exclusive credit of having ever ordered a regiment from that gallant state to make a charge which necessarily resulted in a repulse. The fact that this regiment immediately rallied for another assault, and was ready to repeat an attack, over ground, upon which in three minutes time, one fourth of its members were shot down, is an evidence of courage of the strongest signification.-These brave men were prepared to sacrifice themselves for the honor of their state and the glory of the United States, and they will not be the less cherished on that account by their fellow citizens for that, the most devoted chivalry, when misdirected, would only achieve and honorable martyrdom.

Certain impressions which are abroad with the public in reference to the operations of the brigade of Gen. Pillow, at the battle of Cerro Gordo, seem to require of the undersigned, officers of the 2d regiment Tennessee volunteers, a simple statement of facts. IT will be seen that the statement differs materially from the accounts which have heretofore reached the public ear, and that the idea it conveys of the military talents of Gen. Pillow is by no means complimentary to that officer. By the undersigned utterly disclaim any other motive in making this publication that such a s arises from a desire to do justice to others and to have justice for themselves. They are unwilling to accord to the uncharitable the privilege of yielding to the brave men they commanded only that impossible sort of reputation which often attaches to men who have been engaged in an unsuccessful enterprise, unless it be shown that impossibilities were required of them.

On the evening of the 17th April last Gen. Scott promul gated to the army his orders for the action on the ensuing day. TO Gen. Twiggs' division, with Shields' brigade, was assigned the duty of carrying the height of Cerro Gordo, of turning the enemy's left wing and securing the Jalapa road, in his rear, so as to intercept his retreat; while Gen. Pillow was to march "along the route he had carefully reconnoitered, and stand ready, as soon as he heard the report of small arms on our right, or sooner if circumstances should favor him, to pierce the enemy's line of batteries-the nearer the river the better, as he may select." Gen. Pillow's plan of attack was arranged by himself, as follows: The command of Col. Haskell, supported by Col. Roberts, 2d Pennsylvania volunteers, was to assail No. 2, the centre fieldwork on the enemy's right; while at the same moment No. 1, on the extreme right of the enemy's line, was to be attacked by Col. Wynkoop, 1st regiment Pennsylvania volunteers, supported by Col. Campbell, of the 1st Tennesseans.

The right of the enemy extended from the left of the Jalapa road to the gorge of he mountains thro' which the river flows. Along this line the enemy had established himself on three different heights, divided from each other by almost impassable ravines. Each of thee three heights were strengthened by admirable constructed fieldworks, known to our engineers as No. 1, 2, and 3. These works were manned by upwards of 3,000 men, 1,500 of whom occupied the central fieldwork.

There can be no doubt but that Gen. Santa Anna, relying oftentimes of the greatest natural strength of Cerro
On the morning of the 18th the brigade of Gen. Pillow was moved by him from the camp in the following order—Co. Wynkoop in front, followed by Col. Haskell, behind whom came Colonel Campbell, while Col. Roberts brought up the rear. Diverging from the Jalapa road to the left, nearest the fieldworks, the regiments moving in the same order, each by the right flank, entered a narrow path leading to a point near the centre of the enemy's line of works. In this order the brigade was moved to the scene of action. Continuing along the path, the right of Col. Wynkoop's regiment had reached a point of rising ground about 350 yards from the enemy, when Gen. Pillow, fearful that the enemy had either discovered him or would do it, suddenly withdrew Col. Wynkoop by the left flank, filing him by the left flank square off tot he left from the path, and directed him to cross the ravine which was immediately on the left of the path and form his line of battle parallel with the enemy's works, under cover of the hill and chaparral and hold himself in readiness to assault No. 1.

While Col Wynkoop was executing this order as rapidly as the ruggedness of the ground would allow him, the General commenced the work of placing the command of Col. Haskell in position. This he did by directing Col. Haskell to rest his right on the right of the path, extending his left square off to the left so as to form his line of battle parallel with the centre fieldwork of the enemy. By this maneuver it will be perceived that the ranks of Col. Haskell's command were reversed, the front rank becoming the rear and the right of the regiment its left. While this novel order was in the process of execution, and before the independent company of Kentucky volunteers, under Capt. John S. Williams and Captain Charles Naylor's company of Pennsylvania volunteers, which were the 9th and 10th companies, had got into position, the enemy opened his fire upon us. (It is proper to remark here that the command of Col. Haskell consisted of this own regiment and Capt. Williams's Kentucky company and Capt. Naylor's company of Pennsylvania volunteers.) The General immediately ordered the assault. The men answered the order with a shout and advanced rapidly and with the greatest enthusiasm in the direction of the enemy who was totally concealed from them by the density of the chaparral. Progressing steadily in the face of a most deadly and incessant fire for more than 250 yards, over a rugged and stony ascent, the command emerged from which the chaparral had been felled for nearly tow hundred yards and left lying on the ground. Here we were greeted us by seven pieces of artillery immediately in front of us. No. 1 opened on one of our flanks with two guns, No. 3 on the other with three, while two small pieces on an extension of the redoubt behind No. 2 kept time with the others. This terrible fire was in the state of New Jersey, exceeds that of last year by 100,000 acres, which ought to yield three or four millions of bushels." [ANP]
About 8 o'clock, a.m. of the 23d instant, an art of the Kentucky mounted riflemen and cavalry, (dismounted for that purpose) were sent up the side of the mountain to support the forces already there, at which time the fire of the enemy became tremendous, but which was returned by our gallant force for more than one hour longer. My instructions from yourself were to hold my position on the left of the field against any force which the enemy might bring against me in that quarter. The enemy had been in great force all the morning of the 23d, directly in my front, and in sight, but too far distant to be reached by Lieut. O'Brien's battery.

About 9 o'clock I was informed by Col. Churchill that the enemy were advancing towards my position in great force, sheltering themselves in a deep ravine which runs up towards the mountain directly in my front. I immediately put my columns in motion, consisting of those eight battalion companies and Lieut. O'Brien's battery, amounting in all to about 400 men to meet them. The enemy, when they deployed from the ravine and appeared on the ridge, displayed a force of about 4,000 infantry, supported by a large body of lancers. The infantry immediately opened a most destructive fire, which was returned by my small command, both infantry and artillery, in a most gallant manner for sometime. Is soon perceived that I was too far from the enemy for my muskets to take that deadly effect which I desired, and immediately sent my aide de camp to Lieutenant O'Brien, directing him to place his battery in a more advanced position, with the determination of advancing my whole line. By this movement I should not only be near the enemy, but should also bring the company on my extreme left more completely into action, as the brow of the hill impeded their fire. By this time the enemy fire of musketry and the raking fire of ball and grape of their battery posted on my left flank had become terrible, and my infantry instead of advancing, as was ordered, I regret to say retired in some disorder from their position, notwithstanding my own and the severe efforts of my officers to prevent them. About the same time, the riflemen and the cavalry on the mountain retired to the plain below. The Arkansas cavalry, (who had been posted by your orders in my rear at the foot of the mountain to act as circumstances might require) also left their position, the whole making a retrograde movement towards the rear. At the same time one of the Illinois regiments, not under my command, but stationed at some distance in rear and on the right of my position, also retired to the rear. These troops, the most of them were immediately rallied and fought during the whole day like veterans. A few of them, I regret to say, did not return to the field at all. By this apparent success the enemy were much elated, and poured down along the side of the mountain on the extreme left of the field their thousands of infantry and lancers, and formed themselves in good order along the mountain fronting perpendicularly to where our lines had been posted. At this critical juncture, the Mississippi regiment, under the command of Col. Davis, arrived on the field, and being joined by a part of the 2d Indiana, met the enemy in a most gallant style, and after a most severe and bloody engagement, repulsed them with great loss. In the mean time a large body of lancer, 600 or 800 in number, who had passed down along the left toward our rear, made a most desperate charge upon the Arkansas and Kentucky cavalry, with a view of cutting off and plundering the baggage train of the army which was at a ranche near the battlefield.

This charge was met and resisted most gallantly by those cavalry, aided by about two hundred infantry who had taken refuge there after they had retired, from the field. This repulse discouraged the enemy, and the Mississippi regiment and part of the 2d Indiana, being joined by the 3d Indiana regiment commanded by Col. James H. Lane, now advanced up towards the foot of the mountain for the purpose of dislodging the enemy's force stationed there. In this enterprise I was aided by Captain 's battery of light artillery and it was crowned with complete success, the enemy retreating in disorder, and with immense loss, back along side of the mountain to the position which they had occupied in morning some flying in terror up the sides of the mountain, and into the ravines, while a few were taken prisoners. Amongst the last desperate attempts of the enemy to regain and hold the left of the field, was a charge made by a large body of lancers upon my command. This charge for gallantry and determined bravery on both sides, has been seldom equaled. The forces on either side were nearly equal in numbers. Instead of throwing my command into squares to resist the charge, the enemy were received in line of two ranks, my force reserving its fire until the enemy were within about seventy yards, which was delivered with a deadly aim, and which proved most destructive in its effects—the enemy flying in every direction in disorder, and making a precipitate retreat towards their own lines. About sunset the enemy withdrew from the field, and the battle cease. In a brief report it is impossible to enter into the details of a day like the 23d. The fighting throughout consisted of different engagements in different parts of the field, the whole of them warm and well contested; many of them bloody and terrible. The men under my command actually discharged eighty and some ninety rounds of cartridges at the enemy during the day. The 2d regiment under my command which opened the battle on the plain, in such gallant style, deserves a passing remark. I shall attempt to make so apology for their retreat; for it was their duty to stand or die to the last man until they received orders to retire; but I desire to call your attention to one fact connected with this affair. They remained in their position, in line, receiving the fire of 3,000 or 4,000 infantry in front, exposed at he same time on the left flank to a most desperate ranking fire from the enemy's battery, posted within point blank shot, until they had deliberately discharged twenty rounds of cartridge at the enemy.

Some excuse may be framed for those who retired for a few minutes and then immediately rallied, and fought during the day; but unless they hasten to retrieve their reputations, disgrace must forever hang round he names of those who refused to return, and I regret to say there were a few of those from nearly every volunteer corps engaged.

In a battle so fierce and protracted as this, where there were so many exhibitions of coolness and bravery, it is a delicate and difficult task to particularize. But justice compels me to mention Col.
Davis and his regiment of Mississippians, who so nobly and so bravely came to the rescue at he proper time to save the fortune's of the day.

Col. J. H. Lane and the 3d regiment of my command were ordered in the action soon after Col.
Davis; and the coolness and bravery displayed by both the officers and men of that regiment have rarely been equaled—never surpassed—by any troops at any time. They have done infinite honor to the state and nation that gave them birth. Lieutenant Col. Hadden, of the 2d regiment of my brigade; aided me in rallying his regiment after they retired; and he in person succeeded in marching a party of them back towards the enemy, with whom he immediately became engaged, and fortunately repulsed with considerable loss. In another part of the field he succeeded in killing an officer of the enemy with his own hand, by sending a rifle ball through him at a great distance.

I was also much indebted to Maj. Mooney, quarter master; Major Dix, paymaster: the gallant and lamented Capt. Lincoln, of Gen. Wool's staff; and to Lieut. Robinson, for their assistance in rallying the forces after they had retired from their position.—They all behaved nobly, and deserve the thanks of the country for the coolness and intrepidity which they displayed on that trying occasion. The latter acting as my aid e camp during the entire day—is entitled to particular attention for the gallant manner in which he executed my orders. Lieutenant O'Brien—who commanded the battery of light artillery on my right—is deserving of particular praise for his courage and self-possession throughout the day, moving and discharging his battery with all the coolness and precision of a day of ordinary parade. Major Mooney, quartermaster, and Major Morrison, commissary, attached to my brigade, although not belonging to the line of the army, nor expected to take an active part in the battle, are entitled to great honor for their bravery and coolness in promptly rallying the scattered forces at the rancho, who assisted, under the command of Major Morrison, in resisting the desperate charge of the lancers made upon the Arkansas and Kentucky cavalry, as, by this repulse, the whole baggage train of the army was saved from destruction. This important duty they discharged, in addition to those which strictly appertained to their respective departments. A statement of the killed and wounded has already been submitted, which need not be recapitulated here. Although censure does justly attach to a few who proved recreant to their duty on that day, yet I am of the opinion that veteran troops, either of this or any other country, could not have fought and won the battle better than those engaged.
It is a victory without a parallel in this or any other war on this continent; and the men and officers who did their duty at the battle of Buena Vista deserve to have their names inscribed on the brightest pages of their country's history.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,
Joseph Lane,

To Brigadier General Wool, U.S. Army,

NRR 72.232-72.234 June 12, 1847 official reports of officers of the light artillery on their actions at Buena Vista

Battle of Buena Vista.
Light Artillery Report.
Official.
From General Taylor's Army.
Camp Taylor, near Agua Nueva, (Mexico,)
February 28, 1847.

Sir: Agreeably to your orders of to-day, I have the honor to report that my battery of artillery took position in the line of battle on the 22d instant, at its intersection with the road leading to San Luis Potosi, which was maintained during the conflict. Every demonstration of the enemy on this point was promptly repulsed. Two instances, especially, are worthy of notice: the first, about 0 o'clock on the morning of the 23d, when the enemy appeared in very large force, consisting of lancers and infantry, covered by a very heavy battery of artillery. The rapidity and precision of our fire scattered and dispersed this force in a few minutes, with considerable loss on his side, and little or none on our own. The other occurred late in the day—after three regiments of our volunteers had been overpowered by the enemy, and a strong body of lancers, in close pursuit of them, was almost instantly driven back—thereby saving several hundred of our men from impending destruction. During these operations, four pieces of my battery (which was composed of eight) were detached at different times, under 1st Lieutenant O'Brien, 4th artillery, and brevet 2d Lieutenants Bryan, topographical engineers, to a distant part of the field, and entirely out of my sight. For the part taken by these gallant officers and their brave men, I am compelled to refer you to the report of Lieutenant O'Brien, which is herewith transmitted, and which also explains the cause of the loss of three pieces of his artillery.

Without entering into minor details of the engagement, which lasted the greater part of wo days, and during a large portion of which my battery was the object of a heavy fire from the enemy’s large guns, I have only to bear willing testimony to the good conduct of the officers and men, without exception, who served under my immediate command and within the scope of my own eye. Lieutenants Brent and Whiting, 4th artillery, commanded sections, and breved 2d Lieutenant Couch was either in command of a piece or in charge for promptitude and gallantry in carrying out my order should not be surpassed. It is with great pleasure, therefore, that I recommend them to your favorable notice, and, through you, to the consideration of our government. I would also ask for Lieutenants O’Brien and Bryan the rewards due distinguished merit.

Among my non-commissioned officers it might be considered invidious to draw distinctions, where all did so well. The long experience, however, of my 1st sergeant, Shields, and the greater skill to which he had attained in gunnery, made the fire of his piece quite conspicuous amidst the general accuracy of the other cannoneers.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, you obedient servant,

J. M. Washington,
Captain 4th artillery, command battery.

Lieut. J. McDowell, acting assistant adjutant general, Gen. Wool’s division, Mexico.

Camp on battle ground of Buena Vista, Mexico,
February 25, 1847.

Sir: I have the honor to report to you’re the part taken in the action of the 23d instant, by that portion of artillery which was detached from your battery and placed under my command.

On the morning of the 22d instant I was placed on the elevated plain, which afterwards became the battle ground, in command of three pieces of light artillery, viz: one 12 pounder howitzer, one six pounder gun, and one four pounder Mexican gun.-No opportunity was afforded for the use of these pieces till the morning of the 23d instant, when I pushed the howitzer close tot he mountain and fired a few shells at a body of Mexicans that were advancing along its slope, in order to get possession of the head of ravine, near which our troops were then posted. Finding the elevation ad distance so great as to cause some of my shot to be wasted, I discontinued the fire and moved my battery to the position assigned it in line. During this time a battery of heavy Mexican artillery was playing against me, at such a distance that it was impossible for me to attempt to return its fire.

Soon after this, I was directed by Brigadier General lane to move my battery forward, in order to check the advance of some lancers who were reported to be coming up the ravine nearest the enemy’s line. The 2d regiment of Indiana volunteers was ordered to support me.

On arriving at the point indicated, I found myself within musket range of about three thousand Mexican infantry, while their battery three hundred yards on my left, was pouring in heavy discharged of grape and canister. I opened the fire against the infantry and lancers with tremendous effect. Every shot, whether canister or shell, seemed to tell.-The enemy wavered and fell back. I advanced on him about fifty yards. He was strongly reinforced, until, in fact, I found his main body pressing on me. The pieces were admirable served, but failed any longer to check his advance. Every gap in the Mexican ranks was closed as soon as made. On looking round, at this moment, I discovered that the tremendous cross fire of the enemy had forced the regiment ordered to my support to fall back. Deeming it useless to remain alone, and sacrifice my pieces needlessly, I waited till the enemy came still closer, and then gave the order to limber up and retire. I found that all the horses and all the cannoneers of the Mexican 4 pounder were either killed or disabled. The other pieces were in but little better condition I succeeded, however, in withdrawing them, and retired to our line.

On arriving there, I had not a cannoneer to work the guns. All had been disabled or killed. Finding it impossible to replace them, either from the other batteries or any other source, I was compelled to return your battery, which was guarding the pass at the foot of the heights.

You then furnished me with two 6 pounders, with which I again ascended to the battle ground. I then found myself opposed to a strong line of the Mexican infantry and cavalry and to one of their heavy batteries. I was supported by a body of infantry posted in two ravines on my right and left. The remainder of our artillery and infantry were engaged with the enemy about a half a mile, or more, to our left. We kept the enemy in check, while our troops on the left drove the body opposed to them round the head of the ravine, where they united with those against whom I was firing. At this moment, I received orders to push my section forward. I advanced, and again opened a heavy fire. The enemy was strongly reinforced by infantry and lancers. Finding themselves so superior in numbers by their junction with this reinforcement, and with their troops driven from our left, they advanced. The position of things now appeared very critical. If the enemy succeeded in forcing our position at this point, the day was theirs. There was not other artillery opposed to them but my section and one other piece. It was all important to maintain our ground until our artillery came round the ravine from the plain on our left and joined us. I therefore determined to hold my post till the enemy reached the muzzles of my guns. The firing from the section became more and more destructive as the enemy advanced. It repelled a body of lancers which was about charging on the Illinois regiment. My own loss was severe. I had had two horses shot under me; the one I was then on was wounded and limping. I had received a wound in the leg. All my cannoneers, except a few recruits who had joined some days before, were killed or disabled. In the midst of this heavy fire, with horses and men dropping around them, the few recruits who were fit for duty lost their presence of mind; and I found it impossible, with all my efforts, to keep them to their guns. I remained with the pieces to the last, until the enemy came within a few yards of the, when I was forced to retire for the want of a single cannoneer to load or fire. I was, however, delighted to find that I had maintained my ground sufficiently long to cause the victory to be secured; for, at this moment, the rest of our artillery arrived and came into action.

You are, well aware that it is often the duty of an artillery officer to sacrifice his pieces for the safety of other troops. Such was my position. He could have saved the guns, had I withdrawn them earlier; but, in such case, the day might; perhaps have been lost.

The large number of killed and wounded (men and horses) in the small commanded me, will sufficiently show the nature of the service in which we were engaged. There was but one man and two horses killed by round shot. All the rest were struck by musketry or canister.

It is with unalloyed gratification that I have to speak of the conduct of Brevet Second Lieutenant Bryan, topographical engineers, who commanded two of the pieces that were first with me. He had been for days suffering from sickness, and ought, in prudence, to have been then in bed. I saw him, when exposed to a close and murderous cross fire of grape and canister on one side, and musketry in front, directed the fire of his pieces, and give his commands with the same coolness as if he were on parade. He received a flesh wound in the arm. I beg leave, through you, earnestly to recommend him to the favorable notice of the government.

It is also my duty to commend greatly the coolness and bravery of Sergeants Williams and Queen, of your company, and of Sergeants Williams and Queen, of your company, and of Sergeants Evans and Moore, attacked to your company—the former of the 1st, the latter of the 2d Illinois volunteers. Corporals Nixon and May, of your company, deserve equal praise. Sergeant Pratt behaved with great coolness and courage, but was, unfortunately, wounded so early, that he could take but little part in the affair. All the cannoneers, regulars and volunteers, who were with me in the beginning of the action, deserve high praise for their coolness, precision, and activity. The same remark applies to those who were with me the second time, with the exception of a few raw recruits; who, I am inclined to think, were affected rather by the confusion incident to raw troops when exposed to a tremendous fire, than by fear. Had they remained at their posts coolly, I might have delivered two more fires on the enemy before he reached the guns.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JNO. P.J. O'Brien,
Capt. U.S.A., Comd'g detachment Art.

To Captain J. M. Washington, Comd'g Company B, 4th Art.

Major: I have the honor to report, for the information of the commanding general, that as soon as the action commenced at Buena Vista on the morning of the 23d instant, a large body of the enemy's cavalry, (supposed about eighteen hundred,) under General Minon, left the position they had occupied during the night, and began to move up near the base of the mountains to my left, apparently to make a demonstration on this redoubt and on the encampment on my right, and at the same time to place themselves in the rear of the army. As soon as they came within range of my guns, I opened from both of my 24 pounder howitzers, which caused them some loss in men and horses, and drove them beyond the reach of my shot. They succeeded, however, in occupying the road between the army and the town, where they remained for some hours, picking up such stragglers as attempted to leave the field and gain the city. Between two and three o'clock, they began to move apparently with the design of gaining their former position; and as they could pass entirely beyond he range do the guns of the redoubt, I ordered one out under the command of Lieutenant Donaldson, supported by Capt. Wheeler's company if Illinois volunteers with directions to advance and take a position so as to annoy the enemy, but not to go beyond supporting distance of the gun remaining in the redoubt. Lieut. Shover also advanced one six pounder from the camp, and both guns took such a position as to flank each other, and at the same time reach the enemy. A brisk fire was then opened with fine effect, driving them with great precipitation and considerable loss up the base of the mountain, along which they skirted, till they gained the position they first occupied on the plain near the rancho de los Ceritos, where they apparently encamped for the night. Next morning at daylight they were seen crossing the mountains, through the Palomas pass, since which they have not shown themselves on the Saltillo plain.

From all the information I can obtain, General Minon's loss must have amounted to fifty or sixty men and one captain, while no one was injured on our side.

I am, sir, most respectfully, your ob't ser't,

L.B. Webster,
Captain 1st Art., Com. Redoubt.

Maj. Munroe, Chief of Artillery.

Agua Nueva, March 2, 1847.

Sir: Having been directed to report the operations of my light battery, during the action of the 22d and 23d of February, I have the honor to state, that the action of the 22d, having been confined to the skirmishing of the infantry on the left flank of our line of battle, the battery was not brought into action of that day, remaining in reserve a short distance in rear of our line. Early on the morning of the 23d, Lieutenant Thomas's section took a position upon the plateau on our left; a 6 pounder, under Lieut. Thomas, in support of the right of a brigade of infantry, and a 12 pounder howitzer, under Lieutenant French, in support of its left. Soon after this section had taken its position, the action became general upon this flank, and indeed throughout the line; and my reserve section was ordered up, and took position on the right of Lieut. Thomas's piece-three pieces of my battery forming the right of a line of artillery, having Captain Bragg's battery in the center, and one of my howitzers on the left-the brigade of infantry having changed its position during the first part of the action, so as now to be engaged on the flanks of the artillery. The action was here kept up with intense warmth, the enemy making many efforts to sweep us from the plateau, with the evident intention of gaining possession of the only practicable passage for his artillery across that flank of our line. Though the plateau was held in spite of the desperate efforts of the enemy to gain it, yet, by closely hugging the mountain on our left, he succeeded in crossing large masses of cavalry and infantry over that part of our line, and thus seriously threatened in rear our most important positions. Here a crotchet in rear, with its left resting on Buena Vista, having been hastily formed for the purpose of repulsing these rear attacks, I was ordered, with a section of my battery, round to its support. A 6 pounder, under Lieutenant Reynolds, was left for the immediate support of a brigade of infantry, composed of the Mississippi and 3d Indiana regiments, forming the right of the crotchet, whilst I moved forward with a 12 pounder howitzer to disperse a large body of infantry that had sought shelter from our fire in a gorge of the mountain in my immediate front. This infantry having been dispersed and sent up the mountain, I then took the howitzer round to the immediate support of the Mississippi and 3d Indiana regiment-Lieutenant Reynolds's piece having been removed by Colonel May for the support of his squadron on the left of the crotchet. Here I would state that Lieut. French having been severely wounded in their action, his detached piece fell in the hands of Lieutenant Garnett, 4th artillery, who conducted it with great ability until it joined Lieutenant Reynolds, on his way to the support of Buena Vista. Although Lieutenant Reynolds did not reach that place with his two pieces in time to assist in repulsing the serious attack made upon it, yet he was enabled to bring up and serve his guns, so as to effectually disperse a large body of lancers which had still held together, and showed a firm front on the left of the place. The enemy having utterly failed in his attacks upon Buena Vista, and upon the left crotchet, he made another desperate effort to get possession of the key of our position by charging, with a heavy column of lancers, the right formed by the Mississippi and 3d Indiana regiments, and my 12 pound howitzer. This column, with a body of infantry opened such a galling fire as would almost stagger the best of troops. The brigade of infantry very judiciously fell back a short distance to obtain an advantageous position to receive the charge: the movement being covered by my howitzer. The proper position having been secured, a deadly fire was opened upon the column by the line of infantry, which at one hurled it into deep ravine below. The unwavering firmness and deadly fire of the Mississippi regiment on this occasion showed them equal to the most veteran troops. Every effort of the enemy having failed, he was compelled to retreat before the forward movement of the troops forming the crotchet, who gradually wheeled to the right, closing upon his disorganized masses, and driving him back before a sharp fire of canister and shell from battery, supported by that of Capt. Bragg of the left, and some pieces under Lieuts. O'Brien and Thomas upon the plateau on our right. During this movement the several parts of the crotchet, before separated by deep ravines and gullies, now closed upon each other, permitting the two pieces under Lieut. Reynolds to now join me. After having completely dispersed and driven the enemy into his old position, I was directed to take my battery back to the plateau, where I joined Lieut. Thomas, who had been constantly engaged during the forenoon in the preservation of that important position, and whom I found closely engaged with the enemy, and that too in a very advanced position. Here the enemy, taking an other stand, again made his greatest efforts to sweep us from the plateau-the battle raging as hot as ever. The whole of my battery, supported by Capt. Bragg's and by the Mississippi and other regiments of infantry, was her engaged during the rest of the day.-The position was preserved, and my battery bivouacked upon an advanced position of the plateau during the night. The enemy, having exhausted himself in his efforts to carry our positions, retired during the night with an immense loss.
I cannot close without taking pride in mentioning the warm and hearty cooperation given me by nearly every member of the company. The services of Lieut. French, I regret to say, were lost early in the day, but his severe wound attests the zeal with which he entered upon the field. Lieuts. Thomas and Reynolds behaved nobly throughout the action, and their coolness and firmness contributed not a little to the success of the day. Lieut. Thomas more than sustained the reputation he has long enjoyed in his regiment as an accurate and scientific artillerist.

I also regard it my duty to bring to the notice of the commanding general Sergeant Swaine and Artificer Austin, whose services stood conspicuous during the day as the result of both distinguished skill and bravery.

I enclose here with a report of the casualties which occurred in the battery during the action.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

T. W. Sherman,
Capt. 3d Art'y, com'g light company "E."

Major W. W. S. Bliss, Ass't Adj't Gen'l.

Agua Nueva, Mexico,
March 2, 1847.

Major: I have the honor to report that I marched from Saltillo, under instructions from Major Monroe, chief of artillery, on the morning of the 22d of February, 1847, with one section (two pieces) of my battery—one gun under Captain Shover, having been detached for the defence of the town, and one under 2d Lieutenant Kilburn, to escort a train. On my arrival at Buena Vista, I was placed in reserve, and directed to hold myself in readiness for orders. About noon, under instructions from the commanding general, I crossed the deep ravine to the right of the road, and took up a commanding position on the extreme right of our line, supported by Col. McKee's regiment of Kentucky infantry. In this position, after throwing up a slight breastwork, I placed my guns in battery, and remained through the night, keeping a vigilant watch.

Early on the morning of the 23d skirmishing commenced on the extreme left of our line. From my position, I could clearly observe the enemy's movements, and perceived that, unless I recrossed the ravine, I should be excluded from the action then about to commence. At this time I was visited by Major Mansfield, engineers, and, after a short consultation, finding we fully coincided, I started to recross the ravine, and rejoin our main body. On facing to the rear, a heavy cloud of dust was perceived several miles off on the Saltillo road, and, knowing the enemy had a cavalry force in that direction, I feared he was moving upon our depot and train.—With the concurrence of Major Mansfield, I moved rapidly to that point, and on my arrival met a horseman who reported the force to be the commanding general with his escort. The action had now commence in my rear, and I countermarched and moved up to our lines. Passing no one in my route to instruct me, and finding an opening on the left of Capt. Stein's squadron, 1st dragoons, I came into action with marked effect on masses of the enemy's infantry then hotly pressing our front. Here I remained, and kept up my fire until I observed our left flank turned, and the enemy rapidly gaining our rear.—Being very closely pressed with musketry in front, and without adequate support, I retired some two or three hundred yards, and changed the direction of my fire to the left, so as to harass the head of the enemy's column, and check his advance upon our rear. A impassible ravine prevented my gaining his front. In this position my guns were arduously served for a considerable time. Captain Sherman was in my vicinity, and fired in the same direction with admirable effect. So destructive was our fire that the enemy's column was divided, and a large portion of it retired, leaving those in front, as I hoped, totally cut off. I immediately limbered to the front, and moved up in the direction of the foot of the mountains. Passing Colonel Hardin, with his regiment if Illinois infantry, I requested his support, which was promptly given. Having advanced as far as I deemed prudent against so heavy a force as opposed me, I came into action, and again played upon the enemy's infantry and cavalry. It was but a short time, however, before I discovered a light battery of several guns had been advanced by the enemy with in canister range of me; and in a short time it was opened with such effect, that I saw my men and horses must all fall if I maintained my position. I accordingly retired again beyond their range and fired upon the force which had gained our rear. I am particularly indebted to the lamented Colonel Hardin for his able support under this heavy fire.

My ammunition, by this time, was exhausted from my limber boxes; my old cannoneers could not leave their guns; and my recruits—for the first time under fire—I found unequal to the task of replenishing my supply. I therefore moved under cover in the ravine behind me, and rapidly transferred my ammunition to the forward boxes. Before completing it, a loud noise and a cloud of dust attracted my attention to the depot and train. I moved off in that direction, without orders at a rapid pace, supposing the enemy had attacked that point, and my presence might be essential in maintaining it.

Finding, when I arrived, that the attack had been made and repulsed, I directed my attention to the large infantry and cavalry force which had turned our left flank, and was still advancing. At this time I saw that lieutenant Kilburn had joined me with his gun. He had been actively and gallantly engaged in my vicinity during the greater part of the day; but my close occupation caused me to overlook him. Seeing that force which had turned us was gradually moving along the foot of the mountain towards Saltillo, and was only held in check by Captain Sherman, with one gun, under the support of the Mississippi riflemen, which he had dashing advanced against at least 4,000 of the enemy, I put my battery in motion towards them, and sought support from scattered parties of mounted men in the vicinity of the train. About fifty followed me. By the time I arrived within range of the enemy—my movement being very slow, owing to the jaded condition of my horses—I noticed the Mississippi regiment gallantly led against a force immensely superior. Overwhelmed by numbers, it was forced to fall back. I am happy to believe that my rapid and well directed fire, opened just at this time, held the enemy in check until Colonel Davis could gain a position, and assume a stand. Under my fire the enemy retired some hundred yards, and I advanced the same distance, and again came into action. From this point I several times fell back, and as often advanced, regulating my movements by those of the enemy, my support being weak and uncertain. The effect of my fire was very apparent, frequently throwing whole columns into disorder. Whilst thus engaged, Gen. Wool came up, and at my request, ordered our cavalry, then some distance to my left, to move to my support. I at once approached within canister range, and felt confident I should inflict a loss upon the enemy from which he could not possibly recover. A white flag, however, rapidly passed me, and I ceased my fire. The enemy seized the opportunity, availed themselves of his protection of our flag, and drew off beyond the range of our guns.

As they were retiring by the very route they had advanced, I feared they would avail themselves of our weakness at that point and renew the attack, regardless of our flag; I accordingly reversed my battery, and urged my horses to their utmost. They were so exhausted, however, that a walk was all that could be forced from them by both whip and spur. Several deep ravines had to be passed by circuitous routes before I could reach my desired position; and, as I feared, before I could possibly get there, and awful roar of musketry commenced.—Knowing the importance of my presence, I left some of my heaviest carriages, caissons, and pushed on with such as could move most rapidly. Having gained a point from which my guns could be used, I put them in battery, and loaded with canister. Now, for the first time, I felt the imminent peril in which we stood. Our infantry was routed, our advanced artillery captured, and the enemy in heavy force coming upon us at a run. Feeling that the day depended upon the successful stand of our artillery, I appealed to the commanding general, who was near, for support. None was to be had; and, under his instructions to maintain our position at every hazard, I returned to my battery, encouraged my men, and, when the enemy arrived within good range, poured forth the canister as rapidly as my guns could be loaded. At the first discharge, I observed the enemy falter, and in a short time he was in full retreat. A very heavy loss must have been sustained by him, however, before he got beyond our range. My guns were now advanced several hundred yards, and opened on a position held by the enemy, with a battery of heavier calibre than our own—the same from which our left flank had been driven in the forenoon. Under the support of the Mississippi regiment, I continued my fire until convinced that nothing could be effected—the enemy holding an eminence from which we could not dislodge him without a sacrifice which might compromise the success of the day. I accordingly withdrew their fire.

Thus closed my severe labors for the day, except a few scattered shot fired at different parties of the enemy passing within our range. I had expended about 250 rounds of ammunition for each gun.

About sunset I withdrew my battery in the ravine in rear of our line, and took a position for the night from which I could readily move to any assailable point. Here I reminded—officers and men on the alert, and horses in harness. At daylight the next morning the rear guard of the enemy was seen in full retreat; and a minute examination of the field showed the awful destruction to his ranks, which we could scarcely realize before, but which not fully accounted for his movement.

Captain W. H. Shover, my 1st lieutenant, having been detached with one of my guns for the defence of Saltillo, I must refer to his report for a full account of the operations of that portion of my company. His deportment there, when viewed in connexion with his former distinguished conduct on more that one occasion, and his long and arduous services since the commencement of the war—he being the only officer with my battery who originally accompanied it to the field—deserve, and I hope will receive, the special notice of the commanding general.

Of Lieut. Kilburn, whose coolness, efficiency, and gallantry came under my particular notice, I cannot speak in terms of more complimentary than he deserves. His services are invaluable to me, whether in the camp, on the march or in action. I feel that it is unnecessary for me to say more of men, than to express the hope and belief that they have fully sustained the distinguished reputation the company has enjoyed since it first encountered the enemy of the field of Palo Alto.

It is a source of regret that, just at his critical time, I should have had so many recruits but partially instructed. By it, the accuracy and rapidity of my fire were both impaired, and my attention was frequently withdrawn from its proper direction to encourage, inspire and instruct them. The want of a full complement of officers to my company was also seriously felt.
I am, sir, very respectfully, your obed't. serv't.,
Braxton Bragg,
Capt. 3d art'y, commanding light Co. "C."

NNR 72.234-72.235 June 12, 1847 report from Col. Charles Augustus May on actions of the dragoons at Buena Vista

Dragoon Camp, (near Agua Nueva, Mexico,)
March 3, 1847.

Major. In compliance with your directions, I have the honor to submit the following report of the services rendered by my command in the affair of the 22d, and the battle of the 23d ult. with the Mexican army. Immediately on receiving intelligence of the advance of the Mexican forces on the morning of the 22d, I accompanied the general chief with my squadron to the battle field. The action not becoming general that day, the duties of my squadron, consisting of seventy-two total, seventy-six aggregate.—As soon as I reached the scene of action, I took position near the squadron of the 1st dragoons, so as to be able to co-operate with it, if necessary, and also to be in supporting distance of Captain Sherman's battery. Shortly after this the battle became general, the enemy's grand column of attack having forced the position occupied originally by the Kentucky and Arkansas mounted volunteers, and driving them before it, was rapidly gaining ground towards our rear. At this moment the commanding general directed me to assume command of the dragoons, and check that column.

Capt. Stein, 1st dragoons, being absent or engaged in some other portion of the field, the command of the squadron of the 1st dragoons devolved on Lieut. Rucker. Owing to the numerous deep ravines cutting the entire field of battle, I was compelled to pursue a circuitous route to gain the head or front of the advancing column. On my way thither I was joined by Capt. Pike, Arkansas mounted volunteers, with his squadron, who informed me he had been ordered to report to me for duty. So soon as I appeared with my command in front of the enemy, his cavalry halted, under cover of a deep ravine, supported by large masses of infantry. At the same timeCols. Marshall and yell, separated from my command by a deep ravine, advanced their respective commands towards the enemy. By these combined movements the progress of the seemingly victorious column was checked. I maintained that position nearly an hour; during which time the enemy didn't advance beyond he defensive position assumed on my first appearance I his front. I was, however, unable to charge his cavalry, owing to he intervention of deep ravines.

The position I then occupied was eminently favorable for the use of artillery, and I accordingly despatched Lieut. Wood, my adjutant, to the commanding general requesting a piece of artillery to be sent to me. Before the arrival, however, of the piece of artillery placed under my orders by the general, I was ordered by Brigadier General Wool to return to the position I occupied first in the morning to support the batteries situated on the ridge nearest to he enemy, and which were also immediately under the eye of he general-in-chief. While in that position I was directed to detach Lieutenant Rucker, with the squadron of the 1st dragoons, with orders to proceed up the ravine under cover of the ridge and to charge the enemy's batteries situated on the plateau at the base of the mountain. He had not, however, proceeded more than a few hundred yards, when it was observed that he enemy's column on the left flank was again advancing, driving the Kentucky and Arkansas mounted volunteers, and menacing our rear. I was ordered by the commanding general to recall the squadron of the 1st dragoons and to proceed with my three squadrons and a section of artillery under Lieut. J.F. Reynolds, to check and force back this column. Before the squadron of the 1st dragoons could be recalled, it had gone so far up the ravine as to be in close range of the enemy's artillery. It was thus, for a short time, exposed to a severe fire, which resulted in the loss of a few men. The other two squadrons and the section of artillery were in the mean time placed in motion for Buena Vista, where a portion of our supplies were stored, and against which the enemy was directing his movements. Lieut. Rucker joined me near the rancho, and in time to assist me in checking he heavy cavalry force, which was then very near and immediately in our front. A portion of the enemy's cavalry, amounting, perhaps to two hundred men, not perceiving my command, crossed the main road near to the rancho and received a destructive fire from a number of volunteers assembled there. The remaining heavy column was immediately checked and retired in great disorder towards the mountains on our left, before, however, I could place my command in position to charge. Being unable, from the heavy clouds of dust, to observe immediately the movements of the body of cavalry which had passed the rancho, I followed it up and fond it had crossed the deep and marshy ravine on the right of the road, and was attempting to gain the mountains on the right.—I immediately ordered Lieut. Reynolds to bring his section into battery, which he did promptly, and, by a few well directed shots, dispersed and drove the enemy in confusion over the mountains. I next directed my attention to the annoying column which had occupied so strong a position on our left flank and read during the whole day, and immediately moved my command to a position whence I could use my artillery on the masses crowded it in the ravines and gorges of the mountains. As I was leaving the rancho =, I was joined by about two hundred foot volunteers, under Major Gorman, and a detachment of Arkansas mounted volunteers, under Lieut. Colonel Roane. Believing my command now sufficiently strong for any contingency which might arise, I advanced it steadily towards the foot of the mountains and to within a few hundred yards of the position occupied by the enemy. I then directed Lieutenant Reynolds to bring his section again into battery; and, in the course of half an hour, by the steady and destructive fire of his artillery, the enemy was forced to fall back. This advantage I followed up; in doing which I was joined by a section of artillery under Captain Bragg. My command still continued to advance, and the enemy to retire. We soon gained a position where we were able to deliver a destructive fire, which caused the enemy to retreat in confusion. While the artillery was thus engaged, by order of General Wool I steadily advanced the cavalry; but, owing to the deep ravines which separated my command from the enemy, I was unable to gain ground on him. The enemy having been thus forced to abandon his position on our left and rear, I was again directed to assume a position in supporting distance of Captain Sherman's battery, which occupied its former position on our left and rear; I was again directed to assume a position in supporting distance of Captain Sherman's battery, which occupied its former position some time, the general in chief directed me to move my command up the ravine towards the enemy's batteries and to prevent any further advance on that flank. This position was occupied until the close of the battle, the enemy never again daring to attempt any movement towards our rear.
The cavalry, except Captain Pike's squadron, which was detached for picket service on the right of the road, occupied, during the night of the 23d, the ground near where I was directed last to take my position before the close of the battle.-Finding, on the morning of the 24th, that enemy had retreated it was joined by Capt. Pike's squadron, and ordered by the general in pursuit.

In closing this report, I should o injustice to my feeling were I to omit to bring to the notice of the commanding general the steady bearing and gallant conduct of the officers and men of my command.-The squadrons of the 1st and 2d dragoons, under command of Lieutenants Rucker and Campbell, and the squadron of Arkansas mounted volunteers, under Captain Pike, displayed the greatest coolness and steadiness under the heaviest fire of the enemy, and the greatest promptitude in obeying all my commands that day. To Lieutenant Thos. J. Wood, my adjutant, my thanks are particularly due for the prompt manner in which he conveyed my orders, and for the battle energy and zeal he displayed throughout the battle, and to Lieutenant Reynolds, 3d artillery, I must also tender my warmest thanks for the gallant and bold manner in which he maneuvered his section of artillery, which rendered the most important and effective service.

I regret my inability to state the killed and wounded of the whole command, squadron commanders not having furnished me the necessary information.

I have the honor to be, your very obed't. serv't.
C. A. May,
Brevet Lieut. Col. 2d dragoons, com'dg.

Major W. W. S. Bliss, Assistant Adj't Gen'l. army of occupation. [ANP]

"ARMY OF THE NORTH"

SANTE FE- The St. Louis Republican of the 28th ultimo says:

"About a dozen volunteers discharged from service in Col. Price's regiment at Santa Fe, on account of ill health arrived in the city yesterday on the John J. Hardm. They left Santa Fe in detached parties, the latest on the 21st of April, and reached Independence on Sunday last. They brought a mail with them; but as it was deposited in the post office at Independence, our letters have not yet reached us.

We learn, generally, from these volunteers that everything was in a tranquil state when they left Santa Fe. The natives of the country were deprived of the means of doing mischief, even if they were so disposed, having no arms upon which they could rely and no ammunition. The courts of the trials of the rebels had closed both at Taos and Santa Fe, and the sanguinary executions, which had taken place under their adjudication, were at end. The old man at Santa Fe, under sentence of death for the part he played in the drama of rebellion, was awaiting the decisions of the president of the United States in his case on a representation of all the facts, as contained in papers which passed through this place some weeks since.

Colonel Price was in command at Santa Fe, which has proved the graveyard, for many young and gallant men. Our informant states, that nearly four hundred persons were buried there, and in the company commanded by Captain Horine, of St. Genevieve, 11 deaths had taken place. 13 others were discharged from the same company on account of ill health. One hundred had been discharged from Colonel Price’s regiment, on the same account.

In coming in, these parties met great numbers of Indians, whose principal object seemed to be the stealing of mules and horses. On the 12th instant, they were attacked at Pawnee fork, by about one hundred Comanche and Arapahoe Indians, and in the fight one Indian, the leader of the band was killed and several wounded, one or two of the Americans were slightly wounded. The Indians succeeded in driving off one hundred and five head of horses and mules, principally the property of a party of Mexican traders, traveling in company. The party, on their arrival at Independence, numbered 65 men, with 18 wagons and $65,000 in specie, belonging to Mexican traders.

The winter at Santa Fe had been excessively severe and of great duration. A man by the name of Hicks was killed at a dance in Santa Fe, shortly before the last of the company left.

Of the number of volunteers at Santa Fe, very few will enroll themselves for a new term of service.”

The St. Louis New Era at the same date says:

“A party of Mexican traders arrived this morning from Santa Fe, bringing with them $65,000 in specie. They contemplate going past to purchase goods. Another party is on them, and brings with them also a large amount of money.

We are delighted to learn by the latest dates from Saltillo that the AMERICAN XENOPHON, Col. Doniphan had been heard from. After returning to Chihuahua, as we mentioned before, had reached his started his march towards Saltillo. He had reached Parras, and was expected at Saltillo in a day or two, escorted by Capt. Pike, whose company of Arkansas, cavalry whose company of Arkansas had been dispatched for the purpose by Gen. Wool. A letter to Gen. Cushing from Monterey, states that Col. Doniphan was expected down the river shortly with his command. Massena's masterly movement with the French army when surrounded by the Russian Suwarrow, had been fairly matched by our intrepid western volunteers. [CPO]

NNR 72.240, June 12, 1847 ARMY OF INVASION

ARMY OF INVASION

Vera Cruz dates to the 25th, and Tampico to the 27th, reached New Orleans on the 31st May.

No arrivals from Gen. Scott’s army at Vera Cruz for several days. The diligence due on the 24th from Mexico, had not arrived. Mr. Kendall writes from Jalapa, May 16th, that owing to the non-arrival of the train expected that day, Gen. Scott would not be able to leave for some days. No official account of Gen. Worth's entrance into Puebla had reached headquarters on the 20th, although he occupied the place on the 15th. On the 21st, a diligence arrived with intelligence that all was quiet at Puebla.

The Jalapa stage was attacked by rancheros or robbers a few miles from Puente Nacional, on the 23d ult., and robbed. The driver managed to escape after having been dreadfully beaten, and reaching Vera Cruz, gave the alarm. It is much feared the passengers have been killed. This circumstance, however, must not be taken as a guerrilla affair. For it does not appear that there are any regularly organized bands between Vera Cruz and Jalapa. The assailants were, no doubt, acting independently, and were careless whom they attacked, friend or foe, countryman or foreigner, provided they obtained booty.

El Republicano of the 19th announces that General Bravo has proposed to the supreme government that American prisoners should be sent off “successively and with due security” to Tampico to be released, inasmuch as Mexican prisoners taken at the Augustura and Sierra Gordo and been released without condition. NAVAL. Com. Perry has returned to Sacrificio from his cruise to the south, having touched at Laguna, Frontera, and other ports on the coast putting the American-Mexican tariff in operation. He took possession of the fort at the mouth of the river Guascaualco, and of a town some 20 miles up that river.

On the 19th the English frigate Alarm, brig Darling and steamer Vesuvius, left the anchorage of Sacrificios for Havana, with several cases of yellow fever on board. The vomito has made its appearance in this city, but as yet in few cases. Vera Cruz has already nearly recovered from the effects of the siege, the people are returning, the knocked down houses are being rebuilt, the streets cleaned, shops opened, and all the activity of a seaport displayed. Among other things we have an American circus in full operation. [CPO]

NNR 72.240 June 12, 1847, denunciation of Gen. Winfield Scott’s proclamation to the Mexican people

MEXICO
By way of Tampico, city of Mexico dates to the 19th of May have reached New Orleans.

The election of president was held on the 15th of May, but as the election is made by the states, it will be some time before the result can be known. Herrera, ex-president, had received the vote of Queretaro, which probably gave rise to the report that he had been elected president. Each state, so far as heard from, has voted for candidates of their own, no candidate having as yet more than one vote, nor had Santa Anna received a vote, so far. Alvarez is a competitor for the presidency. After placing Acapulco on the Pacific in a state of defense, he is now approaching the capital at the head of 4,000 troops. Melchor Ocampa a friend of Anaya, is also a candidate and got the vote of Puebla. Angel Trias got the vote of Mexico.

General Scott’s proclamation to the people of Mexico, reached the Mexican congress on the 14th May. The Republicano denounces it severely. [CPO]

Santa Anna at the Capital- Santa Anna after precipitately quitting Puebla, as Gen. Worth advanced and took possession thereof on the 15th published an account of his previous operations, and of the skirmish near Puebla with his cavalry, in which he admits the loss of some half dozen men. Another of his publications gave account of preparations for defending the approaches to the capital. He afterwards issued a manifesto, addressed to the nation, but of which no copy has yet been received.

Leaving his army, variously estimated at from 15,000 to 30,000 men to the command of other officers, Santa Anna proceeded towards the capital, which he entered on the 19th of May. His reception was very different from what he had hoped. "The populace or rabble, principally leperos, assembled to receive the President an interim and at first showered upon him curses, both "loud and deep", and soon afterwards commenced stoning him. An armed force of his friends with great difficulty saved his life, and conveyed him to the palace. La Patria, the Spanish paper at New Orleans, has this information from a commercial correspondent at Mexico, whose letter is dated the 21st of May.

The Republicano of the 18th tells us that the Mexicans were fortifying the hills or bridges of Loreto, Guadalupe and San Juan, and that an advanced division of Mexicans had been pushed as far as Rio Prieto, four leagues west of Puebla.

The Pacific Squadron, on the 28th of April a squadron of six of eight vessels was off Mazatlan, and a thousand men were to disembark to take the town. Letters from Mazatlan say they were making there every operation for defense, but if the descent is made in as great force as it is represented, they can make no defense of much account. Other accounts say that the port of San Blas too was menaced by our squadron, and that is was the purpose of the Americans to land and take the town. [CPO]

ARMY OF OCCUPATION

Brazos dates to the 25th, Monterey to the 15th and Saltillo to the 14th of May, were received at New Orleans.

A letter to the N.O. Delta dated Monterey 15th May says: "Here we are pretty much after the old sort. Again all thing, seem to denote a movement of this column, and I think, by the 1st of June, old Rough and Ready will pack his knapsack for San Luis Potosi. I intended going, and have attached myself to the company of Captain J. H. Bean. The young captain is from old Kentucky, and is a good specimen of that noble state, of whose gallantry and courage Americans say well, be proud. You may look out for squalls at San Louis. They say it is there the Mexicans will make their final great struggle, but we will see what we shall see. The whether here at present, is as hot, if not more hot, then you have it in New Orleans.”

An article in the Picayune, leads us to apprehend that a duel had taken place between a couple of lieutenants of the Virginia volunteers, at China about the 21st, in which both the combatants were killed. The name of one Mahan is given, the other not recalled. We hope the whole story may prove to be unfounded.

Lieut. Mahan was a law student, the son of F. Mahan, the publisher of Taylor’s fashions, Philadelphia, where the lieutenant left a wife and had two children, one born since he left for Mexico. He took an active part in raising the fifty-one recruits from the city of Philadelphia for the VA regiment, and preceded with them to Richmond, under assurances from the Virginia recruiting officer, that he should be one of the lieutenants of the company. At Richmond he found competitors, and it was not until the Pennsylvanians refused to embark for Mexico unless he was made an officer, that his claim was recognized. Ill feeling was engendered, and a sad tragedy has resulted.

General Taylor had been unwell, but has recovered.

A letter from the Brazos correspondent of the New Orleans Bee furnishes particulars respecting the return of the volunteers that had constituted most of Gen. Taylor’s forces at Buena Vista. They were all en route for home, and reinforcements on their way to replace them, were by no means equal in numbers, nor were what there were of them, yet disciplined, or even organized, except one or two regiments. The writer thinks it manifest that General Taylor will neither be in force or donation to make a movement beyond his present location, shortly.

Gen. Cushing had received orders to proceed with the Massachusetts regiment from Matamoras, to join Gen. Taylor. Though not recovered, he designed setting out in a few days. Capt. E. Webster now at New Orleans, has been appointed aid to Gen. Cushing. An election was to be held in the Massachusetts regiment on the 27th, for a colonel to succeed Col. Now Gen. Cushing. Three men of the regiment recently deserted, and attempting to reach Brazos, were murdered by a party of Comanche’s that met with them.

The Ohio regiment was to leave Monterey on the 19th and the 1st Indiana regiment on the 20th for home.

The traders of Matamoras are indigent at the new tariff to Mexican ports. The flag advises them to call public meeting to denounce it.

The Indians are becoming very troublesome in Texas and along the Rio Grande. [CPO]

He shoots for the darkest quarter in the horizon, there to contribute his mite to enlighten the benighted. After rising again at Puebla, for a short season, he expects to assist in illuminating “the hails.” [CPO]

NNR 72.240 June 12, 1847 Tennessee volunteers return to New Orleans

The Heroes of Monterey. - Just one year ago there marched through our streets as noble and splendid a body of men as ever went forth to battle. They were about nine hundred strong. The men were in the vigor of youthful manhood, and as in perfect order and with military precision they paraded through our city, the admiration of our people broke forth in loud applause of the gallant array. This was the first Tennessee regiment, under the heroic veteran Col. Campbell. They left our city fresh from their own happy homes in the mountains and by the river sieds in beautiful Tennessee, full of hope, ambition, and patriotism: they departed in cheerful spirits with impatient ardor for the scene of war. * * *

On Friday last the whole of this gallant regiment, whose history we have thus briefly sketched, arrived in our city. It numbers just three hundred and fifty, about one third the force with which it left. And this loss it has sustained in a twelve months’ campaign. It has averaged a loss of fifty men a month. [NGP]
Money Matters At The South. Money and exchange. The exchanges continue depressed, and money scarce, principally, if not exclusively, owing to the action of the government. The complaints are justly loud and general, as to the mode the department has adopted, for making their numerous and heavy payments at this place, in which, notwithstanding its manifest injustice to individuals, and the general injury and derangement it occasions to the business of the city, they will still persevere.

Parties having claims for supplies, or otherwise, are still compelled to take drafts on the north, and those receiving army bills from Mexico, can only get them settled in the same manner, all, or most of which drafts coming on the market, in addition to the usual supply of bills from regular business operations, depresses exchange and obliges the holders to part with them at from 2 to 2 1/2, and in some instances even at 3 per cent loss.

In looking over the American newspapers published in Mexico, we see the disbursing officers of the army advertising their bills on New Orleans for sale, and when parties, with full confidence in the good faith of the government, pay their specie funds for these drafts, they find, on presenting them to the proper officer at this place, that the government has entirely neglected to provide and funds to meet the payment, and they have no claim for damages nor interest, which they would have against an individual. They are then compelled to go without their money, or take in settlement other drafts on distant point, on which they must suffer a heavy loss! The natural consequence of this violation of the public's faith has been to destroy the credit of these drafts in Mexico, and to deprive the government of the great facility of obtaining specie there, free of expense, thus obliging them to send coin from the United States at an enormous cost, particularly when it is recollected what are the expenses for transportation there, to say nothing of the necessity of escorts, to protect it, and the loss of the services of these troops.

But oppressive and unjust as is the tax thus inflicted on individuals, it is not a tythe to what it saddles upon the planters and farmers of the country, who have sent their produce for sale at this place. The present state of exchanges in this city, is an actual and indisputable tax, of one dollar upon every bale of cotton - of fifteen cents on every barrel of flour, and two cents upon every bushel of corn, sold in New Orleans, during the present state of things.

To a business man all this is self-evident, and requires no explanation, for it is very clear that parties who buy and ship produce, landed in a foreign port, must include the loss of exchange on their bills, just as much as the cost of freight; and a purchaser, who will give ten cents per pound for cotton, when he sells his bill at two and a half per cent loss, would give ten and a quarter cents, if he could obtain par for his drafts.

Including what the two armies in Mexico will require, the public expenditure at New Orleans, between this and the first of August, will, it is said, be five millions of dollars; and if the present system is to be continued, and this large sum to be raised by forcing government drafts on the market, the effect on exchange, and the general injury to business, may readily be imagined.

Our banks already hold between four and five millions of northern, exchange, and there is still immense quantity of produce to go forward, (of cotton alone, the present stock is about 175,000 bales, worth seven million dollars,) all of which when shipped must be drawn for. These mercantile bills will furnish a supply, fully equal to what the market can legitimately absorb, and to have the government drafts thrown upon it, in the extra amount of four or five millions, cannot result otherwise than injuriously.

This derangement of exchanges, and consequent loss to the growers of produce, is one of the legitimate results of the subtreasury system, but, at present, greatly aggravated by the want of foresight, or want of financial knowledge, or of both, at Washington.

It is more inexcusable, because Mr. Walker has the prompt and effectual remedy in his hands, by issuing treasury notes to the parties here, in payment for their claims. But if he is unwilling to allow them the benefit of the premium, they at present command him even sell them in the market, and put the premium into the Treasury, and then pay the claimants in par funds. Let us, at any rate, no longer see the disgraceful practice continued of the treasury sheltering itself behind its immunity from the operation of legal proceedings and compelling its creditors to accept a depreciated currency in settlement of just demands. [NGP] employed, of late, by orders from Government for bombshells, for which they are paid five cents a pound. Since the war commenced, the whole quantity turned out, in that city, exceeds 420 tons. The St. Louis bombs are said to be equal in quality to those made in the Eastern States. They are, doubtless, warranted to kill! [NGP]

NRR 72.242 June 12, 1847 modification of the tariff on Mexico

Sir: In compliance with your directions, I have examined the questions presented by the secretary of war, in regard to the military contributions proposed to be levied in Mexico under the tariff and regulations sanctioned by you on the 31st of March last, and respectfully recommend the following modifications, viz:

1st: On all manufactures of cotton, or of cotton mixed with any other material except wool, worsted, and silk in the piece or in any other form, a duty, as a military contribution, or thirty per cent ad valorem.

2nd: When goods on which the duties are levied by weight are imported into said ports in the package, the duties shall be collected on the net weight only; and in all cases an allowance shall be made for all deficiencies, leakage, breakage, or damage, proved to have actually occurred during the yokage of importation, and made known before the goods is warehoused.

3rd: The period named in the 8th of said regulations, during which the goods may remain in warehouse before the payment of duties, is extended from thirty to ninety days; and within said ninety days any portion of the said goods on which the duties of a military contribution, have been paid may be taken, free of any further duty at any other port or ports of Mexico in our military possession; the facts of the case, with a particular description of said goods, and the statement that the duties thereon have been paid, being cotton from by the proper officer of the port or ports of shipment.

4th: It is intended to provide by the treaty of produce that all goods imported during the war into any of the Mexican ports in our military possessions should be exempt from any new import duty of confiscation by Mexico, in the same manner as said goods had been imported, and paid the import duties prescribed by the government of Mexico.

Most respectfully, your ob't serv't
R.J. Walker,
Secretary of the Treasury

NRR 72.244 June 12, 1847 prompt response in Illinois to War Department requisition for additional troops

Requisition for volunteers from Illinois. The war department has called upon the governor of Illinois for an additional regiment of volunteer infantry, and one company of mounted men. This is in addition to the regiment of infantry and the mounted company recently called from the state, for which the governor issued his proclamation on the 29th of April, and on the 8th of May, four companies more than were required had reported themselves ready for the field:

From

Schuyler county cavalry Capt. A. Dunlap
Bond do infantry Thos. Bond Manion do do C. Turner
Williamson do do J. Cunningham
Brown do do E. B. Newby
St. Clair do do G. W. Cook
Cook do do -- Kerney
La Salle do do H.J. Reed
Williamson do do Jas. Hampton
Shelby do do R. Madison
Four companies, one from Alton, Captain Wheeler; one from Edwardsville, Capt. Niles; one from Vandalia, Captain Lee; and one from, Green, Capt. Bristow, were reported but a few hours after the requisition was filled. [NGP]

NNR 72.244 June 12, 1847 return of Mississippi volunteers from Mexico to New Orleans

Mississippi troops arrived. On Saturday morning companies F, K, and I, on the 1st Mississippi regiment arrived in the sch. P. B. Savoy, from Brazos St. Jago. These companies are commanded by Capatain Delaye, Taylor and Rogers. The Savoy left the Brazos on the 30th.

The brig Forrest arrived yesterday from the Brazos bringing five more companies of the 1st regiment Mississippi volunteers, company A, Capt. Sharp; company B, Capt. Cooper; company C, Capt. Willis; company E, Lieut. Fletcher, commanding; company H, Capt. Glendenning and Col. Jefferson Davis, numbering 185 men rank and file. [NGP]

NNR 72.244 June 12, 1847 notice of Army troop movements

Troops. The steamer Arkansas No. 4 Captain Beatty, from Little Rock, brought down Capt. Woods, with company C, 12th regiment U.S. Infantry from fort Smith.

The steamship Fashion left Vera Cruz 30th unit and reached New Orleans on the 3rd with Lieut. Murray, company E, 2nd regiment Pennsylvania volunteers; Lieut. L.H. Kane, company D, 1st regiment regulars; Lieut. Fellingale, 1st regiment. Pennsylvania volunteers; James Johnson, quartermaster's sergeant, 2nd regiment Pennsylvania volunteers, and about forty discharged volunteers, many of them wounded and very sick.

The ship Zenobia arrived at Vera Cruz from New York on the 28th, having on board 193 troops principally of the 4th and 5th, 1st, Lieut. H. Price of the 4th infantry, and 2nd Lieut. J.W. Lendrum of the 3rd infantry. Fourteen of the men, were recruits for several regiments of infantry, under command of Capt. J.H. Whipple, of the 5th. [NGP]

NNR 72.244 June 12, 1847 return of the Tennessee volunteers to Nashville

Tennessee Volunteers. The principal portion of the first Tennessee volunteer regiment reached Nashville Thursday and Friday week. They were received by the citizens with every public demonstration. All business was suspended during the reception, and the people turned out in mass and escorted them from the boat to the market house, where they were welcomed home by Major R. B. Turner. During the evening the rejoicing was kept up by a torch - light procession, firing of salutes, &c. [NGP]

NNR 72.244 June 12, 1847 return of the Louisville Legion from Mexico

The Louisville Legion of Volunteers, returning from the wars, (their term having expired,) arrived at home on Tuesday morning last. NNR 72.245 June 12, 1847 Gov. Jared W. Williams of New Hampshire on the war

Under this administration our rights have been manfully asserted and maintained - our resources and means of national security and defense augmented, and the area of this great republic and the blessings of Christianity and free government, greatly extended.

True it is to be regretted that the republic of Mexico should have refused the just and conciliatory terms proffered her by our government for an amiable adjustment of difficulties, and that misguided counsels should have instigated her citizens to invade our soil, slay our innocent citizens, and involve our country in war. It is however, consolatory to know that inability to resist could alone have justified our government in longer forbearing to protect our rights against Mexican barbarry and outrage. Any further surrender would have furnished proof that there was no limit in degradation and disgrace to which we might not be carried, and that we were unworthy to enjoy the liberty purchased by the blood of our fathers. Our country fortunately under the smiles of heaven has her destiny in her own hands. Though strongly attached to peace, when duty requires her to relinquish it, danger has no terrors to deter her from the performance of her sacred obligations. These obligations have been clearly delineated in the appeal made by our patriotic president to the people, and with heartfelt and patriotic feeling they nobly responded to the appeal. Shielded by the justice of their cause, they gallantly rushed to the battle field, and by deeds of invincible valor vanquished greatly superior forces of the enemy, and vindicated the rights and honor of our country.

So strong, however, is the disposition of some detract from the justice of the war and the imperishable fame acquired by its brave officers and soldiers, that they would gladly connect its objects with the extension of slavery. [NGP]

NNR 72.246 June 12, 1847 new regiment of Texas six months' men in service

Volunteers. Texas has now in the service a new regiment of six month's men, recently organized at Brazos: three companies under Major Chevalin; six companies under Major Thomas J. Smith; M'Callouch's company of Rangers, Captain Conner's company, General Lamar; and perhaps some others. [NGP]

NNR 72.249 June 19, 1847 several Mexican robbers taken and tried, robbery of Mexicans by their countrymen

From the Vera Cruz Eagle of the 29th of May.

HORRID.--It is with pain mingled with a desire for vengeance that we undertake to relate another massacre of our countrymen in the most cruel and brutal manner. In our paper of last Saturday (only one week ago) we announced the fact that Col. Sowers was in this city as bearer of despatches to General Scott, and to-day we are called upon to inform the public of his horrid death--not with his enemy in front to oppose him, but cowardly shot by those who dared not show themselves.

It appears that he left this city on Saturday last, with an escort of five men and Lieutenant Donnell of Capt. Wheat's company; expecting to find the captain at Santa Fe, or at most a very short distance the other side. They arrived at Santa Fe and lodged there during the night, finding that Capt. Wheat had left; in the morning, anxious to push forward (although it was ascertained that Capt. W. was some thirty miles ahead) with an addition of two more to the escort, Col. Sowers set out for Jalapa. The next that we know of this little party is by the arrival of one of the men, who returned and reported its surprise and destruction. In consequence of the falsity of the greater number of similar stories, Col. Wilson, our governor, had the man arrested as a deserter.--Thus matters stood until yesterday, when developments were made by an arrival from Jalapa--the first that had reached us for a week--tending to confirm our worst fears.

We conversed yesterday with a gentleman who arrived in the morning, and he informs us that at a point two miles on the other side of Puente Nacional, he saw the ruins of the diligence, underneath which was a human body stripped, with the exception of a pair of drawers, and mutilated in the most beastly manner. This is supposed to be the body of Colonel Sowers. Near him lay another perfectly naked and likewise dreadfully mangled. Our informant was assured that five other bodies lay in some thick chaparral a short distance from the road. Now the number of killed, with the man who escaped, exactly corresponds with that of the party which accompanied the unfortunate Colonel Sowers, and leaves no doubt in our mind of its destruction.

A party of Mexican robbers recently captured near Vera Cruz by a party of amateurs under Col. Banks. Ten of them have been tried for robbing, secreting arms and ammunition, &c. Five have been acquitted and five convicted. The latter were sentenced to four and a half months' work upon the public streets and thoroughfares in chains. Two more yet remained to be tried. We hope this example may be salutary.

The Eagle informs us that on the 28th a party of six Mexicans, coming into Vera Cruz from Santa Fe were attacked by some of their own countrymen and robbed of all they had about them. [CCB]

NNR 72.249 June 19, 1847 vomito prevailing at Veracruz

The yellow fever, el vomito, as it should be called, is not getting really serious amongst us. Thirteen cases terminated fatally yesterday, and to-day already I have heard of the death of three individuals whom I personally knew. Two of these are from New Orleans, Mr. Cohen, of the firm of Smithfield and Cohen, and a Mr. Michael, more recently from Tampico. Col. Kearny, the government contractor is now lying in a very dangerous state. [ANP]

NNR 72.249 June 19, 1848 rumors of Jose Joaquin Herrera’s election premature, Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna still at Mexico and in the presidential chair

Well, our reports of Herrera’s elections prove to have been premature, to say the least of it. Santa Anna is at the capital, in much less discredit that we have been led to believe, and in the full of exercise of the functions of his office. Upon his arrival he proposed to resign his seat, but contrived matters so as to have his proposition rejected.

An election will take place on the 13th, when it is hoped that Herrera will be chosen; but Santa Anna creatures are too numerous, and its possible now to favorable for the control of the required interests, to permit me to indulge in such a hope, in any degree confidently.

He expresses an intention to fortify the town, at least with a large ditch and embankment, and to place a force in the city capable of keeping off the Americans. For these purposes he demands four hundred thousand dollars, and has impressed all the horses and mules that can be reached.

A letter from a well informed German merchant of the capital, to his brother in this city says, that Santa Anna has within his control a force of near ten thousand men, besides those on their way under Alvarez, and that he will soon have an army around him capable of annoying, if not of seriously opposing Gen. Scott. Valencia and Bravo are said to have resigned their respective commands. The government is to be established at Morelia.

No disturbances whatever had taken place at Puebla; on the contrary, the people both of the city and country seemed to be much pleased with their conquerors, and trade is quite brisk. Communication with the seacoast seems only to be required, to bring all right again. Generals Scott and Worth were both in Puebla when the courier passed through that city. [NGP]

NNR 72.249 June 19, 1847 recruitment of reinforcements to replace the twelve months' volunteers in Mexico

Reinforcements - The Washington Union says: - "We learn that the measure adopted by the government to send forward reinforcements to replace the twelve months' volunteers withdrawn from the army under the immediate orders of Major General Scott, have been very successful; and that, although the twelve months' troops have left the seat of war some weeks before the expiration of their term, their places will soon be supplied by other troops.

It is calculated that nearly 7,000 regulars, old and new regiments, will soon reinforce the main army via Vera Cruz - of which between 2,000 and 3,000 doubtless have arrived at Vera Cruz in all April and May; and, of the residue, a large proportion will reach that place, it is supposed, by the middle of June." NNR 72.249 June 19, 1847 Col. Sowers with dispatches for Gen. Winfield Scott massacred and the dispatches captured

Horrid. It is with pain mingled with a desire for vengeance that we undertake to relate another massacre of our countrymen in the most cruel and brutal manner. In our paper of last Saturday (only one week ago) we announced the fact that Col. Sowers was in this city as bearer of dispatched to General Scott, and today we are called upon to inform the public of his horrid death - not with his enemy in front to oppose him, but cowardly shot by those who dared not show themselves.

It appears that he left this city on Saturday last, with an escort of five men and Lieut. McDonnell of Capt. Wheat's company, expecting to find the captain at Santa Fe, or at most a very short distance on the other side. They arrived at Santa Fe and lodged there during the night, finding that Capt. Wheat had left; in the morning, anxious to push forward (although it was ascertained that Capt. W. was some thirty miles ahead) with an addition of two more to the escort, Col. Sowers set out for Jalapa. The next that we know of this little party is by the arrival of one of the men, who returned and reported its surprise and destruction. In consequence of the falsity of the greater number of similar stories, Col. Wilson our governor, had the man arrested as a deserter. - Thus matters stood until yesterday, when developments were made by an arrival from Jalapa - the first that had reached us for a week - tending to confirm our worst fears.

We conversed yesterday with a gentleman who arrived in the morning, and he informs us that a point two miles on the other side of Puente Nacional, he saw the ruins of diligence, underneath which was a human body stripped, with the exception of a pair of drawers, and mutilated in the most beastly manner. This is supposed to be the body of Col. Sowers. Near him lay another perfectly naked and likewise dreadfully mangled. Our informant was assured that five other bodies lay in some thick chaparral a short distance from the road. Now the number of killed, with the man who escaped, exactly corresponds with that of the party which accompanied the unfortunate Col. Sowers, and leaves no doubt in our mind of its destruction.

A party of Mexican robbers recently captured near Vera Cruz by a party of amateurs under Col. Banks. Ten of them have been tried for robbing, secreting arms and ammunition, &c Five have been acquitted and five convicted. The latter were sentenced to four and a half months' work upon the public streets and thoroughfares in chains. Two more yet remained to be tried. We hope this example may be salutary.

The Eagle informs us that on the 28th a party of six Mexicans coming into Vera Cruz from Santa Fe were attacked by some of their own countrymen and robbed of all they carried with them. [NGP]

NNR 72.249 June 19, 1847 Mexicans fortifying Rio Frio Pass

The Rio Frio Pass - Now becomes the great point of interest, as the enemy intend to make a stand there, and that we shall have another severe battle. A gentleman who has traveled through the country, and is familiar with this pass, describes it as much more formidable than that of Cerro Gordo. It goes through the mountain with a steep ascent and for nearly three miles the road, with high and rugged sides, is only sufficient to admit the passage of a single wagon at a time. There is no possibility of turning it, and no mode of attack, except by a direct movement, through the pass. If this really be so, we should think, that with ordinary sciences and courage, it could be readily defended, but we heard pretty much the same story of Cerro Gordo some other plan of attack will be more practicable, than by marching through a single narrow gorge of the mountain, for two or three miles under the fire of an enemy, on the steep sides of the road. The pass is about 36 miles from the capital, and Rio Frio (Cold River) supplies the city with water. [NGP]

NNR 72.249 June 19, 1847 rumors of insurrection at Puebla

Vera Cruz dates to the 1st of June were received at New Orleans on the 1st an exciting rumor from Puebla, mentioned in letters from Vera Cruz, that the citizens of Puebla had risen upon Gen. Worth, and cut off six or seven hundred of his men. The rumor was in every man's mouth at Vera Cruz and much credence given to it. The latest accounts prove the tale to be unfounded. [NGP]

The last took place at Santa Fe, at an early hour in the morning of Wednesday last, which resulted in the complete rout of the enemy, over 200 hundred in number, who had 10 killed and many wounded. Our men had several wounded, but none dangerously. The 2nd dragoons who were first attacked by the lancers, while reposing in slumber, had six killed and eleven wounded. Walker, in person, pursued the wretches, as far and well as the darkness of the occasion would admit, captured six prisoners, who were handed over to the dragoons, and almost instantly shot dead. The officers complain much at being kept here so long in a sickly encampment. There a some ten or fifteen hundred men waiting to march.

NNR 72.250 June 19, 1847 George Wilkins Kendall states Gen. Winfield Scott's aggregate available force at 9,000 men

A statement is made in many of the papers of the United States, I believe in the Union among others, to the effect that Gen. Scott will shortly have 20,000 men with which to march upon the city of Mexico. The assertion may not be positively made, but it is given in such a way that the public may really think that he has this overwhelming force. Now what is the real state of the case? I will give it formed upon the last . . . [illegible].

Wright, with the remaining six companies, was to proceed by boat to Camargo hence to Monterey, as soon as transportation could be had. The troops remaining at Matamoros after the departure of the Massachusetts regiment will be three companies of the 3rd dragoons - Hayes, Butler's, and Merrick's. NNR 72.251 June 19, 1847 term of volunteers under Gen. Zachary Taylor expires

Gneral Taylor's Forces. The Flag has a long article entitled "facts against fiction" in which the statement of the Union that the twelve months' volunteers are to be replaced by fresh troops sufficient to swell the forces under Gen. Taylor to nearly 10,000 men is controverted. The Flag says: But four regiments of the late ten have been allotted to Gen. Taylor, and those even, but a few companies have arrived, although the twelve month volunteers are being mustered out with the utmost celerity. But supposing these four regiments to be complete, and here is all the force that is even promised to this division army. The three and a half regiments above alluded to, comprise, 2,400

Four regiments, considering of the Virginia, North Carolina, Massachusetts, and Mississippi, 2,400

Six companies of artillery, 420
Four companies of dragoons 240 and of mounted Texans, about 350

5,810 total

From this deduct for sickness and other casualties
At least twenty per cent. 1,700
And we have Gen. Taylors real effective force 4,640

From this small force garrisons are to be supplied for the longest line of communication known to the modern times, extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the confines of the desert beyond the Sierra Madre. By stripping this line almost to the verge of total abandonment jeopardizing immense depots of provisions and military stores, &c., Gen. Taylor would leave Saltillo at the head of about 2000 men.

This, with due deference to the late edition as Washington, is the Rio Grande arithmetic, where we counted muskets in the field, instead of parading unfilled muster rolls; or in plain English, the fact as it really exists, instead of the round assertion of warrior-politicians. [NGP]

NNR 72.251 June 19, 1847 further discussion of reinforcements for Gen. Zachary Taylor

Gen. Taylor's force - The New Orleans Delta, of the 8th instant, says -- "We yesterday conversed with several gentlemen who came passengers in the steamship New Orleans, from the Brazos; they are directly from Gen. Taylor's camp. Whether, when Gen. Taylor would be fully reinforced, he would make any advance movement was known. At present there is nothing to give indication of it. The dispatches from Washington, of which Mr. Parish was bearer, who has before this reached the general's camp, may influence his movements."

It is strange enough, and it goes to show what little concert of action or interchange of opinion there is between the two commanding generals, that Gen. Taylor should, on the 28th have received a letter from Gen. Scott, addressed to him at San Luis Potosi. Kentucky, Illinois, Ohio, Mississippi, Indiana, and Arkansas withdrew from the field between the 1st and 25th, 13th regiments. He would have only the two squadrons of May and Steen, Bragg's and Washington's batteries, and Hunt's company of artillery, but that the new regiments of volunteers are coming to supply the place about to be vacated. Virginia has sent forward a regiment of infantry, Mississippi another, North Carolina another, and Massachusetts another. Texas has the three mounted companies of Chevalie in the field, and Gen. Taylor is to have four of the ten regiments lately raised. This gives him eight regiments to supply the loss of thirteen. Half of the force of Gen. Taylor is disposed of in placing garrisons at points on the line of communications with his supplies. [NGP]

NNR 72.251 June 19, 1847 address of the clergy of San Luis Potosi to the people of Mexico

The clergy of this state would not be a depository of the high and sublime power which has been placed in its hands, nor worthy of the glorious name of Mexicans, if it should behold the last sigh of our holy religion and our beloved country, and remain in cold indifference, without raising its voice to arouse its compatriots from that indolent apathy in which for more than a year they have been submerged; and if it should not cause them to comprehend our present lamentable and disastrous situation, and to know and secure the means of our salvation. To do this, is our sole object.

The cabinet of Washington have determined to perpetrate, in the present age, a horrible crime - rare, indeed, in the annals of the whole world: Ambitious to extend their prosperity and temporal power, and to perpetuate their race to the last of coming generations, they have not hesitated to violate towards the gentle society of Mexico the most sacred of human rights. In their wild delirium, they behold, with raving thirst, the opulence of our temples, the riches of our church, the magnificence of our homesteads, the angelic beauty of our weaker sex, the immense and inexhaustible treasures of our mountains, the fertility of our fields, and the beautiful variety of our climate; and ever the implacable enemies of our race and origin, they have taken rapid steps to extinguish our name, and possess themselves of all these precious gifts.

You have already seen them, compatriots. In vain is the memory of the thousand and thousand assassinations committed at Palo Alto Tesaca de la Paima, Monterey, Augustura, Vera Cruz, and Cerro Gordo - in vain have we seen multitudes of Mexicans wandering in the woods, and pursued like wild beasts in heir own country robbed of their property and driven from their families - in vain do we recall the multitude of peaceable and honorable men, who have been insulted, seized and beaten, in presence of a beloved daughter or idolized wife - in vain do we recollect the proud barbarity, the shameless cruelty required to burn the village, to stay the simple rustic, the feeble woman, and the innocent child, as we beheld at Agua Nueva, Hidalgo, and other towns at the North. But what can we hope from a horde of robbers, destitute of humanity - monsters, who bid defiance to the laws of nature when they even insult, rob and condemn God in his hold temple? -
When a man enters on a career of vice, and throws aside the reins of religion, the insensibility and obduracy of which he is capable can hardly be believed. What can we expect from these Vandals, who will fly to a more hardy soil, disgrace and sin will fall upon you. To your Priesthood will fulfil its duties - No! It concerns our common interests - all that man holds most dear on earth.
Let us fly them, all of us, to the combat - placing ourselves under the direction of our authorities - let us let us enlist with promptitude, and with whatever arms we may be able to obtain - let us throw aside the senseless desire of living longer - let us encourage solely an insatiable desire to die for our religion! Our country, and the honor of our families - make effective that compassion, hitherto sterile, which you should show for your tender children. Let us die before we see ourselves degraded to slaves in a strange land, deserted, or followed, perhaps, by some ancient father, some son, or a wife whose ancestral virtues have been punished by the weight of indigence, sending forth cries and lamentations, without finding a single being to extend to us a hand of pity! Potosinos! For the slave there is no consolation; his respect and his glory are eclipsed forever.

These are the sole means of salvation. Let us all unite. Let us forget our domestic disagreements:
and authorities, army, people and priesthood, all form a compact mass and resign ourselves to death rather than turn our backs to the enemy, or survive our misfortunes and disgrace. Let us swear to God to die for His religion, and to the country for its independence. Let us swear to the tender child, the delicate maiden, and the decrepit age, that we shall have sunk into the grave before one of those proud Vandals shall place a hand upon them!

Potosinos! These are the words of your clergy, and we shall not fail to inculcate, in the villages and towns, and from the pulpits of the capital, these grand sentiments. In your hands is the religion which your fathers have left you, the country which Heaven has awarded you, the honor of your daughters and your wives, the lives of your tender infants, and your whole future fate. If you wish it, you may enjoy them all. It depends on a heroic sacrifices - Make it!

Two fates are left open for you: To be vile slaves, or independent Catholics. Choose. If the former, bend the knee to the invaders if the latter, prepare for the combat.

Comprehend it - these are the last moments. If my indolence your incurring unhappy late, if your religion must fly to a more hardy soil, disgrace and sin will fall upon you. To your Priesthood will rest in the satisfaction of having exposed to you the danger and indicated the means most affectual and best adapt to your circumstances. And we conjure you to listen to our words without emotion, assume that you meet in us a tender parent who consoles your families, a human friend who adopts your wounds, a Christian Priest who dispenses to you the last consolations of religion, who guards and remembers your ashes; a companion that does not abandon you in the day of battle, and who now ever are willing to bare his breast in defense of the religion of Jesus Christ and of the most beloved republic of Mexico.

NNR 72.251-72.252 June 19, 1847 Lt. William H. Shover's official report on the Battle of Buena Vista

On the morning of the 22d I was left at the camp near Saltillo with one piece of artillery (6 pounder) to assist in protecting the camp. Two companies of Mississippi riflemen left in the camp for its defence. During the afternoon the wagons were so placed as to form a barricade for part of the camp, the front being protected by my gun and two companies of riflemen, with a cross fire in front from the fort.

On the morning of the 23d, the General gave me directions to watch the motions of a large body of the enemy's cavalry in the plain below Saltillo; and if they came upon the plain below Saltillo; and if they came up upon the plain above the city and attacked the camp, to "defend it to the last extremity."

Soon after the General left for the lines beyond Buena Vista, I discovered small parties of the enemy coming up from the lower plain, and climbing high into the mountains to the left of the road, evidently to overlook the upper plain and battle field.

Just at this time two heavy squadrons of the enemy's lancers came upon the plain at the foot of the mountain, and above Arispa's Mills. They advanced rapidly towards the road and halted near it so as to be just out of the reach of my gun and those at the fort. I fired two shots, but without effect. In this position they picked up a few stragglers. As the runaways from the army reported our force routed, and believing we should have to make a desperate stand to defend the camp, I deemed it impossible, at that moment, to attack them on the open plain. I had my gun ready, horses harnessed, &c., to make a dash at the first favorable moment:

I watched with a glass, from an elevated position, and saw that our troops were not all routed, and that from the direction in which our cannon were firing that every thing was going well in our lines. The lookouts in the mountains had evidently communicated by signals with the enemy in the plain below the city; for early in the afternoon, the whole body of the enemy's cavalry (mostly lancers) came upon the plain in one vast column. They halted in column behind the advanced squadrons near the road. Capt. Webster, from the fort, fired some shells at them, but without effect, as the distance was too great.

After remaining a short time in this position they wheeled into line and moved off towards the mountain, and obliquely towards Buena Vista. I saw this was the time to attack them, believing that I could drive them from the plain, or else bring them down in a charge upon our position, where I knew perfectly well, with two companies of riflemen to support me, we could beat them off, and rout them. Thus my first intention was to advance rapidly upon them, and fire, and retire to camp if they attempted to charge with their whole force.

Accordingly I advanced at a rapid gallop, with a single piece, in an open plain, upon from fifteen hundred to two thousand cavalry, mostly lancers.-By the time I was within striking distance, the whole column was in motion towards the lower plain. I halted and fired several shots at the flank of the column. I again advanced upon them, halted and fired a few rounds in rapid succession, producing some confusion at least, in their ranks. About this time a large crowd of stragglers, &c., something like a hundred, had gathered about my gun, mounted in all sorts of style, and armed, some with swords, some with pistols, some with muskets, rifles, doubled barreled guns, &c., and yelling tremendously, but with out any order or organization.

I again advanced and fired several rounds, when I discovered that Captain Webster had started a piece to my support. About this time I found I was getting rather too far from camp to retreat if the enemy made a rapid charge, thus placing myself and command in imminent danger unless I observed great caution. I discovered that the head of the enemy's column was far advanced along the foot of the mountains, and, in consequence of the many ravines, could not readily come to the assistance of the rear. I again advanced with confidence, believing I could easily keep off the rear of the column. When within good range of the foot of the mountain, nearly all the enemy had passed into the ravines and behind a small hill in my front. Suddenly I discovered a single horseman in our front watching our movements. I suspected at once that there was a large force drawn up under cover of the hill to charge upon my gun the moment I should come upon the hill, the hill, thus, being within two or three hundred yards of them. I advanced alone at full gallop several hundred yards, when suddenly I saw, close in front of me, a heavy column, eight deep, ready for the charge. I galloped back, moved my piece to the right to a commanding position, and fired a single shot into them, when they all fled. Just at this moment, by some accident, the pole of the gun-limber was broken. I immediately caused the limber of the caisson to supply its place. The men, with most commendable activity, replaced it with a spare pole from the caisson. Whilst this was being done, I galloped to the top of the hill above Arispa’s mills, where a grand sight burst upon my view. The whole column was winding its way along the foot of the mountain and through the ravines, more than half the column being in range of my gun. I galloped back to bring it up, placed it in position and fired rapidly into their crowded ranks, producing considerable confusion and much execution. One squadron was faced to the rear by fours, and began to move briskly with the evident intention of charging me, when a shot sent into their ranks sent them off to the left about in a gallop. I continued to fire upon them as long as they were in reach, evidently doing them much damage. Owing to the deep ravines over which they passed I could follow them no further, but I felt very much gratified that we had been able to drive them from the plain.

During the latter part of the firing, the howitzer under Lieut. Donaldson did serious execution as we could see shells bursting in and near their ranks.

Thus having followed the enemy over an open plain for near three miles, from which he was compelled to retire, I leisurely returned to camp.

W. H. Shover, 1st Lieut. 3rd Art.

NNR 72.252 June 19, 1847 dismal picture of affairs at Santa Fe

“We have a military establishment wastefully extravagant to the government, but which has most signally failed of redeeming any of the promises made by General Kearny, in his proclamation. Instead of being the strong arm on which the civil authority can depend to enforce order and law, and administrator justice to all, the soldiery have degenerated into a military mob, are the most open violators of law and order, and daily heap insult and injury upon the people of the territory; and as matters now stand the civil government is powerless to grant them redress.” [NGP]

NNR 72.252 June 19, 1847 Col. Alexander William Doniphan’s advance corps reaches Saltillo, affairs on the route

Col. Mitchell with the advance of Col. Doniphan’s command, including a picked party, were expected to reach Buena Vista about the 15th of May.

In passing through Durango, they took possession of a small fort, and 1 captain, 21 privates and 46 stand of arms. These were released on parole and furnished with defenses against the Camanches. At Massey, they have 125 muskets and 35 lances, but the troops had fled. [NGP]

NNR 72.252 June 19, 1847 a march from Camargo to Monterey

On our way from Camargo to this place through several ranchos, or small settlements of the houses have been burnt down since . . . [illegible] of the seventy teamsters, of whom you have heard of before now. For three miles each side of the road, where this brutal crime committed are strewed the bodies of the dead, which are still lying exposed to the heat of the sun, out and mangled in such a way as to shock the sense of humanity: and the wildest savage that ever run the forest wonder at the sight. But, to describe that troubling scene, as we passed that morning, to think, defy the descriptive powers of mankind to be first seen to be realized and keep you and the good people of Mexico from witnessing such a sight. And here is the scene which brought forth all the sympathetic nature. It was a respectable looking . . . [illegible] of his brother who had gone but a short trip to Monterey, with ten thousand dollars worth of goods, when he, among the rest came to an untimely end, and his goods perhaps the there . . . [illegible] the backs of the wives and children of the skinned rascals. It was heard rendering and extreme to see the brother of the deceased buried in tears, and overwhelmed with grief, attentively examining the decomposed bodies of those unfortunate men. But, alas, they had laid too long in that situation for any to be recognized, even by their nearest relations. We had all said in my last letter a company of Texas Rangers, who were the advance guard of . . . [illegible] rain, and on witnessing what I have described above, they swore they would have revenge, and just before coming in Monterey they struck off through the chaparral, and next morning a complaint was sent in to General Taylor, stating that twenty eight of their neighbors had been murdered last night by the Texan Rangers. Gen. Taylor called a court of inquiry, but as the rangers have no uniform, either officers or men (and I am told, that when they get into a scrape of that kind they change clothes with each other, for fear of detection,) and as nothing could be clearly proved against them, individually, the matter was dropped. The city of Monterey is not what it is represented to be at home and the individual who says that the streets, houses, public buildings, public works and the like are handsome, or even what is called neat, has a taste that I do not admire; and , I think, will get a few to side with him. And even the ladies, some will say that they account for my not admiring their beauty. The many fine crystal streams, shade trees, and gardens, (although the latter has not been cultivated since the capture of the town,) together with the varied high and lofty mountains, are, in my opinions, all that can be admired in or about the Virgin city, as it is called, because, during the war with Old Spain, the town of Monterey was not taken, and, has been the stronghold of Mexico ever since, until old Rough and Ready, and the 1st Ohio regiment, together with the bold Montgomery Guards, of your city, entered on the 21st of September, 1846 and made Ampudia condescend and acknowledge that Old Zack was not only Mr. Taylor, as he styled him on a former occasion but that he was General Taylor, and nobody else.

The next town to be stormed by the 1st Ohio regiment will be Cincinnati, about the middle of June or the first of July.

This will be my last till I see you.

NNR 72.252 June 19, 1847 Mormon detachment near San Diego

NNR 72.256 June 19, 1847 Nicholas Philip Trist said to be clothed with full power to conclude a treaty

The Washington correspondent of the N. York Courir and Enquirer writes on the 19th, in the most confident language, predicated he says upon information from New Orleans, and from Jalapa, which admits of no mistake, "that the treaty prepared to be signed by Mr. Trist as commissioner, has been seen at Jalapa; that Mr. Trist is clothed with the fullest diplomatic powers to conclude a definitive treaty of peace, upon the terms and articles as set forth in the project exhibited at Jalapa, and need not wait for any further instructions from Washington, but can have the treaty as it is, signed by him, ratified at once by the Mexican government. I assert further, that Gen. Scott is to cooperate in the negotiation and carrying the treaty into effect." [NGP]

NNR 72.257 June 19, 1847 discharge of the Baltimore Battalion at Tampico

It has been the earnest wish of the col. Commanding, that orders from the general headquarters of the army should have been received directing him where and when the battalion of Baltimore and Washington volunteers should be honorably mustered out of service; but circumstances not within his control have obliged him to detain it at Tampico until the last day of its term of service. He cannot here refrain from expressing the satisfaction he has experienced in beholding this brave body at its post where it is so much needed, and where he would gladly retain it during the continuation of the war; nevertheless, as that period had arrived, when the expiration of the relations so long amicably existing between that corps and their commanders must cease, he herewith proclaims it honorably discharged, this day. His excellency the president of the United States foreseeing these results, and desiring the continuance of the service of volunteers, requisite for the prosecution of the plans in the event of the prolongation of hostilities with the enemy, the Col. Commanding would testify his desire that these well drilled, experienced and gallant companies would again promptly present themselves for enrollment under their respective officers, determined to abide the issue of their country's struggle, whatever it may be, secure in their acknowledged prowess and capacity in asserting her rights. Maj. Buchanan, whose well tried fidelity, and judicious performance of service have won the entire confidence of your commander, who seizes this opportunity to make known his thanks, and has been officially authorized to make terms with the officers and men of this battalion - from the city of heroic monuments and patriotic associations - by which, if any of you shall think proper to enroll yourselves, leave of absence for sixty days will be given, and on your return to Mexico the $12 bounty paid; and highly pleased will the commander be if even one company will raise their standard on the parade for this purpose; but if not, and he is left to see you pass away, he offers you his cordial good wishes that you may have a speedy passage, and find your families, relatives and friends ready and joyous to greet you, as your honorable services justly entitle you.

By order of Col. Gates

NRR 72.258 June 26, 1847 Mexican privateers in the Mediterranean

MEXICAN PRIVATEERS.--Government, as well as insurance companies and shippers, were somewhat startled a few weeks since by the announcement from Europe that an American schooner had been captured by a privateer under Mexican colors fitted out from Barcelona, and that the prize was carried into that port. It was stated that orders were promptly issued to some of our armed ships to repair immediately to the Mediterranean for the protection of American commerce in that quarter. Apprehensions subsided considerably on learning by a subsequent arrival from Europe, that so far from countenancing the proceeding, the Spanish authorities had promptly released the captured vessel, and condemned the privateers for capturing her. Decided demonstrations against allowing such captures were made at London also on this occasion.

But a new source of uneasiness is started--The Boston Journal of the 19th says: "Captain Ingersoll, of the barque Nautilus, which vessel arrived at this port last night from Gibraltar, says, that four feluccas, under Mexican commissions, were known to be cruising in the Mediterranean, and one, formerly belonging to Gibraltar, was said to have been stopped by the French authorities while fitting out at or near Oran, on the coast of Barbary. A river to the south of Mogadore, on the Barbary coast, was said to be the place where they carried their prizes. One of these feluccas was said to be cruising to the westward of the Straits." [CCB]

NRR 72.258 June 26, 1847 remarks on case of Lt. Charles G. Hunter

The Southern Patriot, commenting on Com. Perry's reprimand, says "The latter is really a model of official sermonizing. One would be inclined to think, on reading it that Lieut. Hunter had been guilty of treason, cowardice, or military imbecility at least, instead of an act of gallantry, which, however contrary to the wishes of his superiors, was certainly not very injurious to the interests of his country. O'meara states in his "Voice from St. Helena" that Napoleon found great fault with Wellington, and complained that at the battle of Waterloo the ron Duke did not beat him according to the approved principles of war. This or something like it, appears to be the amount of charges against the gallant Hunter. In taking the tow of Alvarado, he did not go to work secundum artem, and be is dismissed from the squadron least he should take any more places in the same irregular and unscientific method." [NGP]

NRR 72.264 June 26, 1847 intense heat at Veracruz, fever on the increase

ARMY OF INVASION."

Major General Gideon J. Pillow left New Orleans on the 9th instant, in the steamer Fashion for Vera Cruz, together with Col. G. W. Morgan, 15th infantry; Major G. A. Caldwell, of the Voltigeurs; Wm.
Trousdale, of the 14th infantry, and the following officers and men attached to his regiment, viz:
Captains Pierce B. Anderson, Thomas Glen, Julian P. Breedlove, and Robert G. Beale; Lieut. Jas
Blackburn, Thomas Shields, Richard Steele, Samuel B. Davis, Alex C. Layne, Henry B. Kelley,

The New Orleans Picayune of the 13th contains intelligence from Vera Cruz to the 5th June, by the steam ship Fanny.

There had been no arrival from Gen. Scott's army since the night of the 31st. ult.
The heat at Vera Cruz was intense, the thermometer ranging for ten days from 87 degrees to 92 degrees day and night in the shade. The fever was on the increase, though when taken in time, the physician had been pretty successful in its treatment.

A large train was to leave Vera Cruz on the morning of the 5th instant, for Puebla, under the command of Colonel McIntosh. It was to carry up a mail, the first, says the Eagle, for nearly a month and about $300,000 in specie, in charge of Major A. G. Bennett, paymaster. The train was to be escorted by a large force of soldiery composed of company F of the 4th infantry, company B 5th infantry, company G of the 7th infantry, companies D, G, and K of the 3d. dragoons--in all about 800 men. NNR 72.264 June 26, 1847 discussion of the forces under Gens. Winfield Scott and Zachary Taylor, their proposed operations Considerations were manifested sometime since, for fear government would allow the term of the twelve months volunteers to expire before sufficient reinforcements were furnished to enable the commanders of the armies in Mexico to avail themselves of their recent victories, or to continue their operations according to the project of the campaign. The Washington "Union" replied to publications which appeared on the subject, by a semi-official statement derived from the departments, showing conclusively, according to their arithmetic, that there was not the least danger to be apprehended, but that both Gen. Scott, and Gen. Taylor would receive reinforcements in time and in numbers to prevent any inconvenience to either, the troops the anticipated return of the volunteers, and that both would be in sufficient force to prevent any delay occurring from their withdrawal.

We had hardly completed the publication of those assurances however before the fact became undeniable that the operations of Gen. Scott and Gen. Taylor were paralyzed by the return of the twelve months men, leaving them with forces entirely inadequate to make forward movements with. Neither of them could venture to advance with such a force as was left them, and both were, beyond all question when the last intelligence left them, at a dead half for want of reinforcements.

The Washington "Union" very properly resort once more to the departments for official information wherewith to relieve public anxiety upon the subject. The public are entitled to the best information that can be obtained upon so important point. But whilst copying the figures and following the calculations of the officers and clerks in the departments, there is no concealing the disparity between those figures and estimates predicated thereon and the actual returns received from the armies. With the political party complexion which many of the papers on each side attempt to give to so grave subject, the people have just right to complain. They want the facts in the premises; from these they will judge for themselves.

We inserted in our last, one article from Jalapa and another from the Vera Cruz Eagle giving statements as to the forces under Gen. Scott, and in the same number, a statement from he Matamoro "Flag" as to the forces under Gen. Taylor's command all of them in reply to the statement which the "Union" had inserted, as from the department assuring the country that the armies under both those commanders would be in ample force to proceed the campaign without delay. The whole of the articles we find inserted in the Union of the . . . [illegible] and treated as misrepresentations seized upon by the opposition presses for vile purposed. They tempted to make party capital, and is some certain statements, is too true, nevertheless, there is so much accuracy in the figures and known facts where the statements give, that the statements to with the "Union" now resorts, as derived from the department, may have as . . . [illegible] efficiency in enabling either General to advance very speedily, as their former statement "derived for the war office" had in enabling them to propose without one day's delay. We would willingly believe to the utmost, but cannot conceal our misfinding.

As to the notion of Gen. Taylor advancing to San Luis Potosi with the force now under his command, the "Union" is conclusive. In their article on the 17th, the Union thus notices the comments of the New Orleans Picayune upon the statement in Matamoros Flag, to which we have alluded.

The Picayune said, "The belief has been very propagated in various influential quarters, months, that Gen. Taylor was to move upon San Luis Potosi. From various statements, from time to time made in the Union, the country has been led to believe that Gen. Taylor has had, or shortly will have, forces adequate to commence his march with letters from Gen. Scott and his army, for the (unreadable) of Gen. Taylor, are addressed "Headquarters command", Taylor's army, San Luis Potosi" It will not be long before we shall hear reproaches cast upon the hero of Buena Vista for his inactivity.

The Union replies "The Picayune labors under one mistake. We have seen allusions made in the western papers, and in letters, of Gen. Taylor's preparing to move upon San Luis Potosi. We have never sought to countenance such a belief. We would never have stated that such was the instruction of the war department, or such the plan of the General. Besides every military man know, that in a war with Mexico, there is a time for all things. The climate of the northern and of the southern portions is different. We could not have attacked Vera Cruz when the war broke out, for fear of the vomito Nor could we very well advance upon San Luis Potosi until the rainy season commences.”

AN UNPUBLISHED LETTER OF GEN. TAYLOR. The following is a portion of a letter from a gentleman in Pensacola in the New Orleans Bulletin.

"Superb as the battle of Buena Vista was in all its details; skillful as was the selection of the ground; devoted as were those who laid down their lives en face to the enemy; distinguished as was every man who bore arms that day; yet all these glories fade in comparison with the determination of that calm old man, who was called upon to decide between a retreat and assured security within the walls of Monterey or a battle with four times the number he could bring into the field.

He reasoned thus, here are 6,000 men left to hold Saltillo and our positions at Angostura, with the alternative of retreat upon Monterey, where there are provisions for six months. Circumstances justify a retreat. There are precedents for it, and the order of Gen. Scott. If the army retreats the consequences are certain. It will be safe in Monterey until reinforcements can reach it, but before these reinforcements can arrive the numerous enemy, falling by our flanks, will occupy the Rio Grande from Camargo to the Brazos, destroying the garrisons and magazines, and cutting off the communications. This result will be most disastrous. It is inevitable. If the army remains in its present position, there is a chance of success, and supposing it happily realized, everything is saved. But the chances are in favor of the triumph of 20,000 men, led on by the hope that our small forces of undisciplined troops must give way in the attack and by the expectation of great booty.

In the first case, then, the consequences of retreat are certain.

In the second case, the consequences of defeat would be no less disastrous than in the first case, but to the latter must also be added the immolation of our army. But still it affords a chance of success. We will take that chance! So deciding, General Taylor quietly gave his orders, and after the day's work was done, sat down on the night of the 21st of February, just seven hours before he was attacked by Santa Anna, and wrote to his relative and friend, describing his situation, and speaking plainly, of the treatment he had received from his supervisors; also of his arrangement to meet the approaching crisis; of his confidence in his little army; of his hopes, but not of his fears. One sheet, and the page of another, as record, were thus devoted. The remaining pages were given to his private affairs, directing the management of his estate, and expressing affection for his family.

The writer of this communication has been honored with a perusal of that letter. He marked the bold character in which it was written; the even lines and the unblotted pages, giving evidence that it was written as calmly as if the writer had been seated by the fireside of his own happy home. It was written in simple but easy style, without effort, as one wishes to write to relatives and friends. But still it bore evidence, as all his writings do, of a clear judgment and pure thought.

NNR 72.265 June 26, 1847 communications to Gen. Zachary Taylor from San Luis Potosi, expectation of an advance on San Luis and Mexico City

A short time after my last letter closed the town was thrown into a fever of excitement by the arrival at Gen. Wool's camp of two Mexican officers from San Luis Potosi, charged with dispatches for their contents, but to believe that they had come from the city of Mexico and contained the intelligence that an armistice had been granted, and that negotiations for peace were under discussion between Gen. Scott and Santa Anna.

Exstactic was the joy of many who are in for the war and pine for the day when they shall rejoin their friends and families. The dispatches were immediately forwarded to Gen. Taylor by Lieut.
Franklin, and the Mexican officers treated with the most marked courtesy by our officers at this post. They professed ignorance of the character of the dispatches, but believed that the above was their purport. Singular to say, this ideas was generally believed; for myself I have so little confidence in any thing Mexican, that I believe it to be a paper from the department of San Luis a remonstrance against the advance of Gen. Taylor, or something of that character.

Private letters received from San Luis by citizens here, brought by the Mexican officers, announced that the inhabitants were in a state of excitement from the expected approach of our army from this quarter, which was looked for by the 28th instant. The dispatches arrived her eon Tuesday and were immediately forwarded, and the protracted absence of the bearer, Lieut. Franklin, tended to excite the curiosity felt to be apprised of their contents.

About 1 oclock today he returned, and lo! The bubble bursts. The important dispatch was a communication from the Governor of San Luis Potosi, announcing that he had beard of the intended approach of the American army, and begging to inquire whether it was the intention of the commanding general to conduct the war according to the usages of civilized nations, or according to the manner adopted by the Camanches.

There is no doubt that we shall march upon San Luis at a very early period, as soon as a sufficient number of troops arrive from below, and from San Luis to the city of Mexico. A communication received from Gen. Scott by Gen. Taylor a few days ago, giving a brief account of the battle near Jalapa, directs Gen. T. to more at once, or as early as possible, from San Luis where he expected the letter would reach him, to the city of Mexico. So that Gen. Taylor will not probably remain any time at San Luis, unless he receives orders there but leaving a garrison for the place, will proceed with the residue of his command to the city of Mexico.

The two Illinois regiments will march from here on the 30th or 31st and the Arkansas cavalry on the 1st of June. The two Indiana regiments, 2nd and 3rd, will proceed on Monday. The troops then, of the old stock, will be gone, except Ben McCulloch's company of Texan Rangers, now commanded by Lieut. Tobin, and not a company will go to San Luis, except the artillery batteries, that have been in any of large fights with Gen. Taylor.

Another letter says, "The volunteers are returning from Gen. Taylor with great rapidity. Ere this he is left without any of the volunteers who fought under him at Buena Vista." [NGP]

NNR 72.265 June 26, 1847 general orders of War Department commending conduct at Veracruz

[General Orders, No. 146.]

Headquarters of the Army,

Jalapa, May 10, 1847.

The despatch, given below, is announced in this form, for the information of the gallant officers and men of the army of Vera Cruz remaining in Mexico, that they may see how joyously their glorious achievements have been received by the government and people at home:

War Department, April 12, 1847.

Sir: the gratifying intelligence of the bombardment of Vera Cruz, and of the capture of that city and the strong fortress of San Juan, together with the surrender of the Mexican army which garrisoned the two places, effected by the joint and cordial co-operation of the army and navy, was officially made known here by your despatch of the 20th ult., and others of a previous date.

The expedition, so far as it embraced the important objects, has been carried out in a manner highly creditable to yourself, to the commander of our squadron in the gulf, and to the gallant officers and brave soldiers, marines, and sailors, engaged in the difficult and dangerous enterprise.

In compliance with the direction of the president, it is my pleasing duty to make known to yourself, and through you to the army under your command, the high gratification which this additional instance of the eminent skill and good conduct of our officers, and of the endurance and intrepidity of our soldiers, has given him.

This signal triumph of our arms has called forth rejoicings throughout the nation, mingled with heartfelt gratitude to those who, in winning battles for their country, are everywhere securing glory and face for themselves. That the possession of so important a place in the enemy's country as the city of Vera Cruz strongly fortified and garrisoned by a large body of troops, and a castle renowned for its strength and deemed impregnable by its defenses, have been obtained at so small a sacrifice, is just cause of admiration; and while millions of our fellow citizens joyously exult at this splendid achievement, it is pleasing to reflect that so few among us have occasion to mourn.

Though the sacrifice of life on our part has been comparatively small, yet the nation has cause to regret the loss of some of the bravest and best of her gallant sons. The tribute of honor and respect rendered by a grateful people, will embalm their memories, and assuage the grief of their relatives and friends.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

W. L. March, Secretary of War.

Major General Winfield Scott,
Commanding the Army of the U. States, Mexico.

By command of Maj. Gen. Scott:

H. L. Scott, A.A.A.G.

NRR 72.265 June 26, 1847 communication of Secretary of War William Learned Marcy on the success at Buena Vista

The following "orders," issued by General Taylor, have been transmitted by him to the war department.

[Orders No. 46]

Headquarters Army of Occupation,
Camp near Monterey, May 1847.

Under the instructions of the secretary of War, the commanding general has the gratification to publish to the troops of his command the following communication, received by him from the war department:

"War Department, April 3, 1847.

"Sir: Your communications of the 24th and 25th of February and the 1st of March, announcing the brilliant success of the troops under your command at Buena Vista, against the force of the enemy vastly superior in numbers, have been laid before the president: and I am instructed to convey to you his high appreciation of the distinguished services rendered to the country by yourself and the officers and soldiers of your command on that occasion.

"The victory achieved at Buena Vista, while it adds new glory to our arms, and furnishes new proofs of the valor and brave daring of our officers and soldiers, will excite the admiration and call for the gratitude of the nation.

"The single fact that five thousand of our troops, nearly all volunteers, who, yielding to the impulse of patriotism, had rallied to their country's standard for a temporary service, were brought into conflict with an army of twenty thousand, mostly veteran soldiers, and not only with stood and repulsed the assaults of the numerous host, led by their most experienced general, but in a protracted battle of two days won a glorious victory, is the most indubitable evidence of the skill and gallant conduct of our officers and the devoted heroism of the troops under their command. It will ever be a proud distinction to have been in the memorable battle of Buena Vista.

"The general joy which the intelligence of this success of our arms has spread through the land is mingled with regret that it has been obtained as so great a price—that so many heroic men have fallen in that sangninary conflict. They died in the intrepid discharge of a patriotic duty, and will be honored and lamented by a grateful nation.

"You will cause this communication to be published to the troops under your command.

"I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant, (signed)

"W.L. Marcy, Secretary of War."
By order of Major General Taylor:

W.W.S. Bliss,
Assistant Adjutant General.  [ANP]

NNR 72.265 June 26, 1847 Gen. Zachary Taylor's announcement of Gen. Winfield Scott's victory at Cerro Gordo

[Orders No. 47.]

Headquarters Army of Occupation.
Camp near Monterey, May 8, 1847.

The commanding general has the satisfaction of announcing to the troops of his command another decisive victory achieved by the American forces under Major General Scott, on the 18th of April, at Cerro Gordo, in the State of Vera Cruz. The Mexican army under the immediate orders of Gen. Santa Anna, president of the Republic, is known to have been entirely routed, with the loss of all its artillery and munitions of war.

The army of occupation will hail with joy this brilliant success of the American arms.

By order Major General Taylor:

W.W.S. Bliss,
Assistant Adjutant General.  [ANP]

NNR 72.265-266 June 26, 1847 Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna's official notice of Gen. Winfield Scott's proclamation

Army of operations Excellent sir: The commandant of the flying revenue guard of tobacco of Orizaba, the Col. Juan N Caraveo, whom I left with his command near the National road between Perote and Napalucan, to observe the movements of the enemy and to harass him when the opportunity might offer, has remitted to me the accompanying documents which were taken from the enemy's mail trail which left Jalapa for Col. Worth's camp.

Among them you will find Gen. Scott's proclamation to the Mexican nation, which, from its style appears to have been written originally in Spanish and not translated from the English.

This proclamation of Scott is written with the most refined hypocrisy and with the most infamous perfidy. It is the greatest insult yet offered to the Mexican people, whom it has attempted to lull to make a victim of race, when in another place it feels no embarrassment in proclaiming by the press and in its official documents, that it carries on against us war of conquest, and that this war must be made at the cost of the blood and treasury of this unfortunate country.

Your excellency will not in one of the accompanying intercepted letters, that Scott, the Inspector General of the United States Army, considers the above proclamation well adapted to aid the views of the invaders.

You will observe that this letter harmonizes with others which have been lately published in this capital, and which with reason have been regarded by all well disposed Mexicans as more prejudicial for the venom which they conceal that the loss of a battle.

But in the midst of the malevolence which Gen. Scott shows he has against me, he does me too much honor when he says that they had been deceived as to my real intentions, and that on account of this mistake his government had permitted me to pass to my country. Indeed, most excellent sir, the United States did deceive themselves when they dreamed that I was capable of betraying my country. Before this should happen, I would prefer to be consumed by fire, and my ashes should be scattered that not a single atom be left.

Would to God the Mexicans would open their eyes to discover the poison in the golden chalice that the perfidious Scott proffers to them, and that the reply to his proclamation may be one shout of universal indignation against the invaders of our soil. Let a war he made against these without period, that when we may no longer be able, because Providence may have decreed the subjugation of this unfortunate country, there may remain to our children or grand children, when the wrath of the Omnipotent shall have passed, the noble work of revenging the outrages committed by the republic of the United States on Mexico.

God and Liberty!
Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna.

NNR 72.266 June 26, 1847 Gen. Zachary Taylor's farewell to the Mississippi regiment

The Mississippi regiment of volunteers; those men who so signally distinguished themselves at Buena Vista, have reached New Orleans on their way home, their term of service having expired. One of the New Orleans papers says: Gen. Taylor was extremely affected, on bidding adieu to this gallant regiment. When the time arrived for their parting, and the men were filing past him, almost choked with emotion, he exclaimed "Go on boys, go on, I can't speak." It was his intention to address them on their return home, but the recollection of the trying scenes in which they had stood by each other, quite overpowered him. [NGP]

NNR 72.266 June 26, 1847 Col. Alexander William Doniphan's command passes down the Rio Grande, reaches New Orleans

We heartily rejoice to learn that the colonel with seven companies of Missouri volunteers under his command reached New Orleans where they met a most cordial and hearty welcome. Honors, gallantly won, were showered think and fast upon them. They look as if they had seen hard se rvice, and will remain a few days in the city. [NGP]

NNR 72.266 June 26, 1847 arrival of gentlemen from Santa Fe

Several gentleman, among whom were Dr. Edmondson and Lieut. Hawkins, arrived here yesterday, on the steamer J.J. Hardin, direct from Santa Fe, which place they left on the 3rd of May. Everything was quiet up to that time, and nothing later had been received from California. The sickness among the troops at Santa Fe, which had been very extensive and fatal, had partially subsided, and very few cases were occurring. The party consisted of twenty-seven persons, with four wagons. They saw no Indians on the route; but some of them made their way into the camp one night, including the vigilance of one guard, and succeeded in stealing three mules. Several parties traders and government trains were met this side of the Semirone; but of the latter, only one or two were beyond Council Grove. One of the trains was fired upon by the Indians, at the Cotton Woods, but no injury was done. A Santa Fe mail was brought in, and left at Fort Leavenworth, but the letters have not yet reached this city. [NGP]

NRR 72.269-72.270 July 3, 1847 Gen. Joseph Lane's supplemental report on the action at Buena Vista

Gen. Lane's Supplementary Report.

From the N.O. Picayune.

The following report by Brigadier General Lane is supplementary to his first official report of the operations of his brigade in the battle of Buena Vista. He has thought it called for by the developments of a court of inquiry held since his first report was made, and by the various statements made in the papers injurious to the character of Indiana. As an act of justice to the Indiana troops and as a part of the record of the great deeds of the 23d of February, we cheerfully give the report an insertion in our column.

Buena Vista May, 1847.

From the comments of the press, the numerous letters that have been written and published, the many false and ridiculous statements uttered by different persons at sundry places concerning the battle at this place on the 22d and 23d of February last, and more particularly in consequence of the erroneous statements invented and circulated in reference to the Indiana brigade in connection with that memorable day, I feel myself constrained, in discharge of an imperious duty to give to the public a succinct account of facts which may enable every candid reader to arrive at correct conclusions, and that the public mind may be disabused of a studied and systematic attempt at misrepresentation and detraction.

The disposition of the troops seems to have been confided to General Wool, and they were posted in the following order, viz: The 2d regiment of Indiana volunteers, commanded by Col. Bowles, with three pieces of artillery under Captain O'Brien, were posted on the extreme left. The 3d regiment volunteers, commanded by Colonel Lane, occupied a height in rear of Washington's battery. The 1st Illinois regiment, commanded by Colonel Hardin, were stationed on a high hill near and a short distance to the left and front of he same battery. The 2d Kentucky volunteers, under Colonel McKee, was on the 22d posted on the right of a deep ravine at the distance of a half mile, on the right of he battery, but on the morning of the 23d were ordered to recross the ravine, and took place near Col Hardin and to his left. The 2d Indiana regiment were placed; which regiment, as before remarked, occupied the extreme left of the field, near the base of the mountain. The four rifle companies of my command, under Major Gorman, were at early dawn of day ordered to move up the side of the mountain to engage the enemy, some three of four thousand strong, who were endeavoring to cross the points of ht mountain and to turn our left flank. These riflemen were directed to check their advance if possible. Three rifle companies of the 2d Illinois regiment, three companies of Col. Marshall's mounted regiment, were dismounted and sent up the mountain so the assistance of Major Gorman, who had not for some time been hotly engaged with the enemy. The contest on the mountain brow raged with fury for the space of about three hours, when I was informed by Colonel Churchill that the enemy in great force were advancing under cover of a deep ravine about four hundred yards in my front and to the right. I immediately put my small command in motion to meet them. It should be borne in mind that my whole force was the eight battalion companies of the 2d Indiana regiment and Capt. O'Brien's battery of three guns-in all about four hundred men. On arriving at a narrow ridge between two deep and rugged ravines, I found the Mexican infantry, from four to six thousand strong, supported by a body of lancers. The infantry were coming out of the ravine on my left and forming in beautiful order across the ridge, leaving the lancer in the ravine. I immediately directed Captain O'Brien to halt his battery and get ready for the fray. The column was halted when the first company was up with and on the left of the battery, and formed forward into line of battle. I rode in front of the column, and continued in front as the companies were forming in line, and was much delighted to see the officers and men move forward in good order; coolness and courage were depicted in every countenance. By the time in companies were inline, and while I was yet in front, the Mexicans opened their fire from their entire line. In a moment the left companies were in line. I passed to the rear, and the fire was returned with promptness and good effect.

Thus commenced the battle on the plain of Buena Vista. The distance between the enemy's line and my own was about one hundred and twenty yards. About the time the action commenced, the enemy opened a tremendous fire from their battery of three heavy guns, posted on my left and a little to the rear, which nearly enflamed my line. In this manner the battle continued to rage for nearly twenty minutes, the firing being very severe on both sides, the lines of the Mexican infantry presenting one continued sheet of flame. I observed the Mexican line to break and fall back several times, but their successive formations across the ridge enabled them at once to force the men back to their position and keep them steady. I then formed the determination to take position nearer the enemy, with the hope of routing and driving them from that part of the field, and for the purpose of placing the lines out of range of the enemy's guns, which had succeeded in getting the range so as to be doing some execution nearly every fire. For that purpose I sent my aid to direct Captain O'Brien to advance his battery some fifty or sixty yards to the front, and to return to the same point. He went with the battery to its advanced position. I was at that moment near the left of my line. Before my aid returned to me, I was much surprised to see my line begin to give way on the right, and continuing to give way to the extreme left, not knowing at that time that Colonel Bowles had given an order to retreat, and it was several days after the battle (and not until after I had made my official report) before I was satisfied that the regiment had retreated in obedience to an order given by Colonel Bowles. The order was not obeyed until it had been thrice repeated, as has since been proved in a court of inquiry, appointed to inquire into the conduct of the colonel. Lieut. Col. Haddon and twelve other good witnesses have testified to his having twice or thrice given the order before the line broke, so unwillingly were they to abandon their position. The 2d regiment occupied an important position—it was the key to that part of the field—and were unsupported by any other troops. An evidence of their being in a very hot place is that about ninety of them were killed and wounded before they retreated.
They had stood firmly doing their duty, as well as ever did veteran troops, until they had discharged over twenty rounds of cartridges at the enemy, killing and wounding some three hundred of them; and I have no hesitation in saying that if it had not been for that unnecessary, unauthorized and cowardly order to retreat, they would not have left their position. I hesitate not to express my belief that if my order to advance had been carried out and we had taken the advanced position as intended, that we would have driven the enemy from the ridge. Although the men retired in some confusion, the most of them soon rallied—say, to the number of two hundred and fifty—and they continued to fight like veterans throughout the day. Lieut. Robinson (my aid-de-camp) and Lieutenant Colonel Haddon were ordered to proceed to the rancho and bring back such of our men as had gone in that direction; which was promptly done. Capts. Davis, Kimball, McRae, Briggs, Lieutenant Spicely (then in command of his company in consequence of the fall of Capt. And lamented Kinder, Adjutant Shanks, and Lieutenants Hoggart, Burwell, Lewis, Foster, Bennefield, Kunkle, Londermilk, Roach, Rice, and Zenor, with most of the company officers, were also very active in rallying their men. Capt. Sanderson, and Lieutenants Davis, Hogan, and Cayce, and several other officers were wounded and had to leave the field; as also Captain Dennis, who had fought like a hero with a gun in had, found himself from fatigue and indisposition unable to remain longer the field. Paymaster Major Dix, having arrived on the field.
Paymaster Major Dix, having arrived on the field at this moment, was very active in assisting to rally our broken and scattered forces—He seized the colors from their bearer, who was unable to carry them longer, and handed them to Lieut. Kunkle, who carried them triumphantly throughout the day. These colors, now in possession of Capt. Sanderson, are well riddled with balls—one 24 pound shot, one 6 pound shot, and many musket balls passed through them while they were in the hand of this victorious young officer, and they could at all times be seen high above the heads of the Indiana brigade, moving to and from wherever it was necessary to meet and repulse the enemy. Lieut. Peck (now captain) of the rifle battalion, who had been compelled to retire from the mountain to the plain, after the fall of his gallant old Captain Walker, succeeded in rallying about twenty men, and joining the regiment continued to fight gallantly throughout the day. The severe lost in killed and wounded which the 2d Indiana regiment sustained in the action will convey some idea of the danger they faced and the tenacity with which they struggled: 107 of their number were killed and wounded.

At or about the time of the retreat of my small command under that ill-fated order, the riflemen were compelled by superior numbers to abandon their position on the mountain side and retreat to the plain below. The cavalry which had been posted some distance in my rear, and out of range of the enemy's battery, to act as circumstances might require, either to advance upon the enemy and cut them off in case they should be compelled to fall back, instead of affording me the least assistance, left their position without receiving one fire from the enemy, and made a precipitated retreat to the rear along the foot of the mountain, pursued by a large body of lancers, who succeeded in cutting of and slaughtering quite a number of our forces, most of them riflemen. If they had made a bold stand and allowed the riflemen and the 2d Indiana regiment to rally on them, altogether they would have been sufficient to check the enemy before he had gained any considerable advantage. After these successful and simultaneous retreats of the different forces on the left, it remained wholly undefended, and the enemy, numbering several thousand, came pouring down from the mountains and from the front, and formed in good order along the foot of the mountain and in the rear of the position at first occupied by our forces. Soon after the retreat of the 2d, and while I was rallying them, the Mississippi
At this time the 3d Indiana regiment, under Col. Lane, was ordered into the fight, and, joined with the 2d Indiana and Mississippi regiments, composed a force of about one-fifth as large as the enemy, but sufficient to engage them with success. Capt. Sherman, with one gun of his battery, at this time joined us. The whole moved towards the foot of the mountain and engaged the enemy. Here the artillery proved very effective. This portion of the enemy's forces became at length so closely pressed, and our artillery continuing to waste them away with its destructive fire, and they begin separated from the enemy's main force, would have in a short time been compelled to surrender, when a white flag was seen on the field, and we were ordered to cease firing. We did so; but the Mexicans continued to fire from their battery, thus covering the retreat of their forces. This flag was sent to the left wing from Gen. Taylor, in consequence of Santa Ana having sent him a flag, which the general naturally supposed conveyed propositions either of truce or surrender. Hence the white flag on our part of the battle field. This flag proved to be nothing more than a stratagem of the Mexican general to extricate that portion of his troops which he saw was absolutely in our power. During the delay occasioned by this interchange of flags, this portion of his army, so completely in our power, moved off and made good their retreat to where the enemy's main force was posted.

We now moved and took position to meet a large body of lancers supported by about 2,000 infantry. The Mississippi and a portion of the 2d Indiana regiments were formed across a narrow ridge, between two deep ravines, supported by one gun from Capt. Sherman's battery, and the other part of the 2d and all of the 3d Indiana regiments were on the brow of one of the ravines and parallel to the same, the line being nearly in the shape of an L, and faced by the rear rank. The charge was made on the left flank of he 3d Indiana-now right, as they were faced. This charge, it is due to the enemy to say, was made most gallantly, and was as gallantly received by our forces, delivering our fire when they were within a short distance. It proved most destructive to the enemy, felling many a horse and his rider, breaking their columns and putting them to flight, leaving many of their companions dead on the field.

Soon after this successful repulse the field on the left was completely cleared of the enemy's forces; and hearing a sharp and continued firing on our right, and to the left of Washington's battery, I put my command in motion at double quick time, for the purpose of taking part in the conflict. This fire proved to be a severe action between the entire Mexican infantry and the 1st and 2d Illinois and 2d Kentucky volunteers, which was Santa Anna's last and greatest effort. These forces had been repulsed by overwhelming numbers, and were retreating in confusion, hotly pursued by thousands of Mexicans, who were loading and firing on our men, at every jump, when my command, consisting of the 2d and 3d Indiana and Mississippi regiments, arrived within musket shot, which we did by coming up suddenly of a ravine, and opened a destructive fire upon them. Finding themselves suddenly attacked, and from an unexpected quarter, they quit the pursuit, formed promptly in line, and returned our fire with considerable effect; but they in turn were compelled to retreat under our well directed fire to the position they had occupied in the morning. This was the last firing between the infantry of the opposing forces on that memorable day, although the cannon continued to play at intervals until dark. The battle on the plain was opened, as has been shown, by the 2d Indiana regiment, and the last musketry fired was by the 2d and 3d Indiana and Mississippi regiments. It should also be stated that our forces had been under arms since the morning of the 22d, and remained upon the field of battle until the morning of the 24th.

I have here given a brief and faithful account of the operations of the Indiana brigade on the 23d of February, as came under my observation, and there was not one minute, from the time the battle commenced until the last gun was fired, that I was not with them. Captain O'Brien who commanded the battery of light artillery posted on my right at the commencement of he battle, as well as Capt. Sherman, who acted with us part of the day, are deserving particular praise for their gallantry and good conduct-moving and discharging their pieces with all the coolness and precision of a day of ordinary parade. The intrepit and honorable conduit of the 2d Kentucky and 1st and 2d Illinois volunteers could not have been exceeded, and no commendation of mine could add lustre to the glory that should and would be theirs. There is enough of honor and glory for each man who did his duty at Buena Vista, and he must be an uncharitable and selfish citizen who would knowingly wish to detract from any portion of that glorious little army, with a desire to augment that of any other corps at the expense of another. The many gallant officers and men who did their duty on that day should not suffer by invidious comparison.

If I have neglected to particularize the conduct of the Arkansas and Kentucky cavalry, or to define their position on the field, it is not because I deemed them of little moment or importance, but for the reason, that from the time of their retreat I had no opportunity of seeing any thing of their movements. They participated in the rancho fight, when the gallant Yell fell nobly at the head of his column. He, with the noble should who fell on that day, should never be forgotten. The ambition of distinction should never prompt us to deface any portion of the tablet of fame which our country will erect to the honor of the actors in that battle, and the regular and volunteer army should be proud of it, as one of the greatest epochs in our country's history.

It is due to the commanders of he different batteries of light artillery to say that their efforts were most powerful and efficient towards gaining the almost unparalleled victory of Buena Vista. Ready at all times to meet the enemy at fearful odds, their guns wasted them away with their fire in a handsome manner, compelling them to retreat whenever coming within their range. Gens. Taylor and Wool were present as commanders—the former as commander in chief. They were exposed to dangers almost every instant of the day, watching the movements of the enemy, and ordering and disposing our troops to meet and repel them. By their coolness and courage in gaining this victory they have won laurels and a fame that shall endure as long as traces of American history shall exist.

Respectfully your obedient servant,
John Lane, Brig. Gen.

NRR 72.270-72.271 July 3, 1847 Gen. Gideon Johnson Pillow's address to the public on his attack Cerro
Gordo

Gen. Pillow's Statement.

An article in the Picayune of the 29th ultimo, signed by Col. Haskell and other officers of the 2d Tennessee regiment, addressed to the public, calls for some notice from me. This article professes to be "a simple statement of facts;" and, in advance, disclaims any other motive in making the publication that such as arises from a desire "to do justice for themselves." If those gentlemen had made a correct statement of facts, and had left the public to form its own judgment upon those facts, I should have been content to have passed the publication by unnoticed; for, from a statement of facts I have nothing to fear.

This article professes to describe the enemy's works, and the order of attack of my brigade in the battle of Cerro Gordo. It says: "There were on the line of works, extending from the National Road to the gorge of the mountains, through which the river passes, three works, known to our engineers as batteries Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and that, by the order of battle for my brigade battery No. 1, situated upon the river bluff was to have been assaulted by Col. Wynkoop's regiment, supported by Col. Campbell's; and battery No. 2 was to have been assaulted by Haskell's regiment, supported by Col. Roberts' regiment.

Instead of three works in this line of works, as those gentlemen say, there were known to be four before the battle. Battery No. 1, situated on the river bluff, and No. 2 at the extreme left of the enemy's line of breastwork, and not nearer to the point assaulted than from four hundred to six hundred yards, and batteries Nos. 3 and 4 were still further towards the National Road—the place assaulted made the 5th battery. Col. Haskell (who is the author of this article) says further that he was to assault battery No. 2, and Colonel Wynkoop battery No. 1.

It never was, however, intended by me to assault batteries No. 1 and 2, and no order was ever given to that effect. He was not ordered to assault battery No. 2, nor was that battery ever assaulted.
Col. Wynkoop was not ordered to assault battery No. 1. The position intended to be assaulted was, what was believed by both the engineers and myself, to be the angle of those batteries formed by the long line of stone breast-works, about four hundred yards from battery No 1. In my official report, bearing date 18th April, 1847, and prepared immediately after the battle by an officer of my staff, (for being disabled in my right arm I could not write,) I distinctly stated that the points of assault were "the adjacent angles of batteries Nos. 1 and 2." But, in the after part of that report, for the sake of brevity, and for the purpose of designating the positions of his two assaulting forces, I speak of batteries Nos. 1 and 2, without repeating in each paragraph the words "adjacent angles."

At this suppose dangle no guns could be seen, and none were believed to be there—though, on the last day of reconnoissance, something presenting the appearance of one gun was seen. Still it was believed to be the weakest point in the line of works, and was therefore selected by the engineer on duty with my brigade for the assault.

Agreeably to my plan of attack, Haskell's assaulting force was to attack the left of this angle and Wynkoop's the right, so as to engage at the same time the forces upon both sides of the angle.—General Scott's order of battle was ling, and reached me about 9 o'clock the night of the 17th, and too late for me have the necessary copies of it prepared and issued to my command. I therefore sent for Colonels Campbell, Haskell, Wynkoop, and Roberts, and at my own quarters read to them the general order of battle, and explained to them particularly the position of the different batteries, my position for assault, and the order of movement for each regiment, and the order of movement for each regiment, and for the position to be assumed by each preparatory to the assault.

The assault was made at the place previously determined upon, and made known to these officers; and, though this point turned out to be a strong work, mounting eight pieces of artillery immediately in front, and two more on a retired line, all which were to the moment of attack, entirely Colonel Haskell cannot understand why his regiment was placed between Wynkoop's and Campbell's in Campbell's between his (Haskell's) and Roberts' regiment, on the march from the encampment. This (to him) incomprehensible order of march, which he seems to think was a blunder of mine, will perhaps be under stood by him when I state to him the object.

The narrow pathway along which we were obliged to march pierced the enemy's line of works just at the place selected for the assault. By my order of attack, Wynkoop's assaulting column was to form on the left of the path, fronting the right side of the angle, and Haskell's assaulting force was to form on the right side of the path, and was to attack the works on the left side of the angle. Wynkoop's position was further advanced on the road that Haskell's and therefore he was place dint he advance.

When Wynkoop's regiment reached its position, it was to form, and did form, on the proper side of the 5th. When Haskell's regiment had formed, it cleared the path for Colonel Campbell's regiment to ass up to Wynkoop's support. The passage of Campbell's regiment left the way clear for Roberts' to come forward to Haskell's support. Thus it will be seen that the only order of march by which it was possible to have placed the regiments, with their supporting forces, in proper position was adopted; and it resulted in the proper formation of each assaulting force, without the least confusion or disorder, although there was no road but a narrow pathway.

Again: Colonel Haskell says that I placed his regiment in position by directing him "to rest his right flank right of the path, extending his left square off to the left, so as to form his line of battle parallel with the centre field work of the enemy." He en says that, "by this maneuver, it will be perceived that the ranks of Colonel Haskell's command are reversed, the front rank becoming the rear, and the right of the regiment its left." Now, how s possible for a regiment which is marching by the flank to reverse its ranks and change its wings from right to left, by this order, it will be difficult for any military man to comprehend. If the right of the regiment was upon the right of he path, and the left extended square off to the left, as the says was ordered by me, it was as impossible for the wings to have been reversed any that order, as it would be for a man to reverse the position of his own arms, and equally so for the ranks to have been reversed; for they could not possibly be reversed except by the whole regiment being ordered to face by the rear ranks, which would have turned to backs of he men to the enemy; and yet, Colonel Haskell comes to the conclusion that, by this order, his wings and his ranks were reversed. I cannot account for such inexplicable confusion of mind in a military man. To suppose him so ignorant of he principles of military science, would show him utterly unfit for the command of a regiment. It would be entirely immaterial by which flank he marched; the order which he says I did give, would, if executed, place the regiment in proper position for the assault upon the enemy's works.

First, then, Col. Haskell misstates the number of works in the enemy's line, and their positions. Secondly, he misstated the work which in fact I indented either himself of Wynkoop to assail, and the work which was actually assailed. Thirdly, the order of march, which he regards as a blunder of mine, was proper, and the only one by which the assaulting parties could possibly reach their positions; and the regiments were each placed in the march with this express object. Fourthly, my order for the formation of his command into line of battle, which he says reversed the wings and the ranks of the regiment, was right and proper; and, agreeably to that order, there was no possibility of his wings and his ranks being reversed; and yet the public are told, in the very outset of this article, that the publication made is "a simple statement of facts, "which is by no means complimentary to the general's talents as a military man." Is my military reputation to be affected before an intelligent nation by such an assault as this?

Again: He says I professed to have carefully reconnoitred these works; "but the truth is, the general was ignorant of the ground and enemy's strength and preparations of defence." I did profess to have reconnoitred these works as carefully as, from the nature of he ground and other obstacles, I could; but I deny that either the engineers or myself did or could carefully reconnoitre them, or ever said we had. Colonel Johnston, engineer, while engaged in a reconnoissance of these works was shot through the body twice. Lieutenant Tower, engineer, and myself devoted three other days to the examination of these works, were repeatedly shot at, and once hotly pursued, and narrowly escaped a capture. On this last occasion Colonel Haskell was along himself. Lieutenant Tower and myself had as carefully reconnoitred these works as it was possible to do under the constant fire to which we were exposed from the enemy's picquets. I professed to have examined them as carefully as I could, but we did not know, and could not, by any possibility, have known, the character of the works which we attacked, for they were completely masked by the stone wall and brush. In the strength of this work we were all deceived. It was not my duty professionally to examine or to know these works; that belonged exclusively to the engineer corps; but I took it upon myself to reconnoitre them that I might have a personal acquaintance with the ground, which could only be acquired by a personal reconnoissance. Colonel Haskell was invited to be present at these reconnaissances, and was along more than once, and was as much deceived as any one else. Who does not know that it is impossible to look through stone walls, covered over with brush? What means have either engineers or other officers of discovering works completely masked when the approach to the vicinity of those works is concealed and completely masked by the stone wall and brush, yet, up to that time, it was believed to be an angle in the large stone breastwork, connecting the batteries Nos. 1 and 2. That such was the position tended to be and actually assaulted, will conclusively appear from my official reports of this battle, made almost immediately after the battle, dated 18th and 28th April.
New Orleans, June 7, 1847.

Gideon Pillow.

The question is distinctly asked, "why I assaulted battery No. 2? Why I did so before I was ready, and with so small a force?" As an answer to these questions, I refer to the following portion of my detailed report: "Upon arriving at my position for assaulting forces, without the loss of a moment's time. I had myself placed Colonel Haskell's regiment in position for assault, upon the left side of the angle; had placed Colonel Roberts' regiment (the supporting force of Haskell's regiment) in position in a short distance in the rear; had ordered Wynkoop's regiment (the advance of he other assaulting force) to its position; (and it was on its way to its position, with Colonel Campbell's regiment as its supporting force,) when the enemy, discovering our position, directed a most galling fire into the command. This fire was so destructive that it would have swept away my entire command, had it remained in its position even long enough to have completed the formation of the forces for the assault. Owing to the impenetrable chaparral which covered the whole face of the country, it was equally impossible to fallback and complete the movement, even if such a movement would not have thrown the force entirely out of position. Seeing that no alternative was left me but to retreat, with the whole command, in the face of he enemy's fire,, and break up the order of battle, and violate the orders of he general in chief, and thus bring disgrace upon the whole brigade, or to dash rapidly forward upon the enemy's works with the forces which were in position, I instantly sent my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Rains, with orders to bring Col. Roberts' regiment as quickly as possible to the support of Colonel Haskell, and directed this last regiment to charge the enemy's works with the forces which were in position, I instantly sent my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Rains, with orders to bring Col. Roberts' regiment as quickly as possible to the support of Colonel Haskell, and directed this last regiment to charge the enemy's works. I also directed my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant and Anderson, to Colonel Wynkoop, with orders for a similar movement upon the works in front of his position, being on the opposite side of he angle. Haskell's regiment dashed nobly forward, with a shout of enthusiasm." Hence it will be seen that the course which I took of charging the works was the only one left me.

It is manifest, therefore, tat the effort to throw upon me the responsibility of the failure to carry the work assaulted at Cerro Gordo is altogether unjust. The alleged errors in my orders and dispositions of the assaulting forces, I have shown were not errors; but that they were, on the contrary, the proper orders and dispositions for hat purpose. A most vigorous and determined effort was made to carry them by Colonel Haskell's regiment. It was not successful because of he strength of the work assailed, and the almost insurmountable obstacles and barriers to its approach. Though Col. Roberts was in close supporting distance of Colonel Haskell, being within 150 or 200 yards, and was ordered to is immediate support before the latte was ordered to charge, yet he did not get up in time to sustain the assault mad by Haskell's regiment before it was cut down and forced to retire. Upon the report of the fact to me, though at the time I was entirely disabled in the use of my right arm by a canister shot, Immediately formed the whole command to renew the attack, and had ordered the charge, when the enemy ran up the white flag and surrendered..-I am not disposed to charge the fault of this failure to the misconduct of any officer or portion of my command, but to the Gibraltar like strength of the works themselves.

The colonel further says I enjoy the reputation of leading his command in this charge at Cerro Gordo. I was not aware that I enjoyed the reputation of doing what I nowhere claim to have done. In my official report I distinctly state that I was at the head of the column-in person, placed his regiment in position, ordered Colonel Roberts to his support, ordered Colonel Wynkoop to his position, and that, after having ( for reasons which are fully explained in my detailed report) ordered the charge of his regiment, I then moved across the line of the enemy's fire, intending to lead in person the storming party of which Colonel Wynkoop's regiment constituted the advance, but was prevented by a wound received from doing so. If I had led the charge of Haskell's command, I think I should have let it differently and with different results; and if he severity of he fire had cut sown all my filed officers except myself, and driven back my command, I think I should have fallen back with it in good order.

Gideon Pillow.

New Orleans, June 7, 1847.
THE TRAIN ATTACKED--On the night of the 4th inst. Colonel McIntosh, with 800 troops, started from Vera Cruz with the train of 125 wagons and 600 pack mules from Puebla, having $225,000 for paymaster and quartermaster departments in specie in the wagons.

At a well selected pass, twenty-five miles from Vera Cruz, where a party of guerrillas had made some preparations for the purpose, an attack was simultaneously made on the 6th instant on each extremity, and on the center of the train, but mainly directing the assault at the wagons which they supposed contained the specie.

Private accounts represent that the attack was so far successful that forty of our wagons were destroyed--though not those containing the specie--two hundred mules loaded with subsistence were taken, and thirty of our men killed. The American Eagle of the 9th says twenty, but private accounts, from responsible sources, give the loss, at thirty men.

The check was so severe that Colonel McIntosh determined not to hazard an advance without reinforcements. Our troops accordingly entrenched themselves behind their wagons, and despatches were sent off to General Cadwallader at Vera Cruz. The general left on Monday evening, the 7th instant, with a force of about five hundred men and four howitzers. Private accounts say that on the 10th a part of the voltigueurs also left, with four howitzers, to join the train.

The Eagle represents that our troops received the attack with the utmost coolness, and that the enemy, being repulsed feel back towards the Puente Nacional, which some suppose they may attempt to defend. No later news from the train had been received the morning of the 11th.

But the audacity of these guerrillas does not stop here.

They are entering Vera Cruz and stealing our horses. For several nights alarms had been created in the city by these predatory attempts. Private letters say that sixty horses were stolen from one pen in the immediate vicinity of the town. A regiment of Texas rangers, it seems to us, would find ample scope for employment in the vicinity of Vera Cruz.

The steamers Palmetto and Edith arrived at Vera Cruz on the 8th inst. The schooner Gen. Worth had also arrived with one company of voltigueurs. [CCB]

Vomito is on the increase at Vera Cruz. Paymaster Bosworth, who left New Orleans on the 18th ult. sickened and died of it. His brother returns in the Massachusetts with his remains. [CCB]

No later news had been received from the army of Gen. Scott. The reason is obvious; communication has been entirely cut off. But it indicates a necessity for some cavalry force upon the line to clear away the brigands which infest it, and who must have mustered in greater force than had been anticipated to attack a train guarded by 800 troops.

A letter from an American officer, a prisoner in Mexico dated the 28th, states that the had been again and again promised his liberty, and expected to be released on the 30th beyond doubt. He writes that it was expected that General Scott would reach the capital in eight days, and he thought no formidable opposition would be made. [NGP]

The Picayune says that private letters which they have seen express the persuasion that Gen. Scott will meet with further opposition to his entry to the capital. [NGP]

El Republicano urges strenuously that the seat of government should at once be removed; the government should still exist and form a centre of union for a rallying point. [NGP]

In an earlier article upon the subject of the defense of the capital, El Republicano sets down the troops available for the purpose as follows: The garrison them in the capital was not far from 10,000 men, while there were to arrive, says the editor, from the state of Guanajuato 3,000, from the south of Mexico 3,000 from Michoacan 2,000, and from Queretaro 1,000. We enter from allusions made to an article in El Razonador that the latter paper ridicules the idea of making any defense of the city, says the Picayune. [NGP]

We see nothing in the paper about the formidable works said to be going on at Rio Frio. We are inclined to the opinion that the resistance anticipated at this point has been much exaggerated. The Mexican papers which we have seen say nothing about it, and speak only of the fortifications in the immediate vicinity of the capital. It looks as though parties were marshalling their forces for a struggle for power among themselves rather than to defend their country against a foreign foe. [NGP]

Gen. Urrea was stationed at Tula, with a large guerrilla force, levying contributions alike on friends and enemies. [NGP]

We find in the papers a copy of the new constitution, or rather the amendments to the constitution of 1824, which have been adopted. The address, too of Gen. Herrera, Gen. Santa Anna, and the president of the supreme court upon the former promulgation of the new law, are given at length. We have looked into that of Gen. Herrera with much curiosity to find what he has to say of the war. He touches upon it only in general terms. He says that a people truly free was never yet conquered by a foreign invasion; and conjures Mexicans to lay aside their animosities and unite in support of the laws and constitution. This done he promises that their defense of the independence of their country cannot fail.
Santa Anna's address is in his usual vein; we get no new ideas of his designs from it.

From San Luis Potosi we have dates to the 25th of May. All is quiet and indifference there. There were about 7,000 of the debris of Santa Anna's army in the place, but they had orders to repair to the capital, leaving a few of the national guard for the defense of the place. Fortifications miserably constructed, nothing were doing in them.

They were under the impression that Gen. Taylor would not march on that place, but would advance on the capital, by way of Zacatecas, the inhabitants of which are said to be highly favorable to the Americans. [NGP]

NNR 72.274 July 3, 1847 ship Carmelita expected to be released, Privateers

MEXICAN PRIVATEERS.
The Barque Carmelita. A letter from Capt. Littlefield, of said barque received by Messrs. Brett & Vose,
New York, dated "Barcelona, 20th May," says:

"After being retained as prisoners of war on board the privateer until the 9th inst., during which time I protested against the capture, we were put in possession of our own vessel, and the prize crew removed on board the privateer May 12th. The Mexican colors were hauled down on board the privateer, the vessel taken possession of, and the crew imprisoned by the Spanish authorities, to be tried for piracy. The probability is that more or less of them will be shot and the remainder of them will have to be confined to the galleys for life. There has been a report of other vessels being fitted out on this coast as privateers, but I know it to be incorrect. We are detained to await some formalities concerning the prisoners. As I have avoided being the accuser, I think soon to be able to proceed on our voyage unmolested. The Queen's Governor has informed the American minister, as soon as proof shall be received that she was not a legal letter of marque, the captured should immediately be set at liberty, and all expenses and damages should be paid by the felucca and owners, they being Spanish subjects, and most of them old offenders against the laws." [CCB]

NNR 72.274 July 3, 1847 Com. Matthew Calbraith Perry's order opening Mexican ports

Flagship Mississippi, Sacrificio, May 24, 1847

Notice having already been given of the opening of the ports of Matamoras, Tampico, Vera Cruz, and Alvarado, it is hereby made known that the additional ports of Tuspan, Goaxacoalcos, Frontera, and Laguna, now in the possession of the United States naval forces, are also open to the admission of American and neutral vessels not having on board articles contraband of war, and subject to the regulations, established by an order of the United States government, dated April 7th, 1847.

Sad news from the plains - Capture of a wagon train - murder of teamsters. A gentleman arrived at St. Louis, on the evening of the 21st, from Westport, who informs the editors of the Reveille, that just before his departure, a Delaware Indian had arrived from the Plains, giving an account of a wholesale murder of teamsters, by a combined force of Arapahoes, Camanches and Pawnees. The Indian is a son of Nacomi, the principal chief of the Delawares, and is generally considered a man of voracity. He was found a prisoner at Taos, when Col. Price took that place and was liberated.

His story is, that having started homeward, he fell in with a large body of Indians, of the tribes mentioned, on the Arkansas. They made him prisoner, and only spared his life on the condition that he would join them against the whites. He sets their number down at two hundred fires, which would make the total number of the force about 1,000 men.

Near Walnut creek, he states this formidable party met and attacked a train of thirty wagons, drawn by mule teams, and accompanied only be the drivers and eight or ten horsemen. The Indians surrounded them and charging suddenly drove the teamsters from their saddles, and massacred every man of the party. The wagons were loaded with government stores, which, with the mules, the Indians appropriated to their own use.

The day succeeding this massacre, young Nacom was permitted to depart, having been presented with a fine large American mule. This animal bears the mark "U.S." and has been recognized as one of those belonging to a government train which left Fort Leavenworth a few weeks since.

We further learn that the Delawares are preparing to send a war party against the Osages. The latter tribes have recently taken three Delaware scalps. The Indian who gave the information respecting the murder of the teamsters, says there were a few Osages among the murderers. [NGP]

Gen. Winfield Scott's preparations to advance on the capital

Dispatches were received on Saturday night by the war office from General Scott's camp. Several of the soldiers were sick in the hospitals of Vera Cruz, Jalapa, Perote, and Puebla; but, with the reinforcements that were en route from Vera Cruz, he would probably have troops sufficient by the 22nd to march to the capital, perhaps without any serious opposition. He had ordered all our troops to evacuate Jalapa, in order to strengthen his active army. The last accounts by the steamer James Day are from Vera Cruz to the evening of the 16th which state that Gen. Scott had advanced to Rio Frio, where a dispatch is said to have met with him a proposition for peace. If this last report be true, it is probably that he will remain at Rio Frio, and not forth march to the capital, but according to the intimation in his own dispatches, wait till about the 22nd, both to give himself the opportunity of receiving reinforcements, and to allow the Mexicans more time to negotiate with the better grace. [NGP]

Gen. William Jenkins Worth's official report of march to and occupation of Puebla

Sir I have the honor to report, for information of the general in chief, that the forces under my command, including the brigade of Major Gen. Quitman, took military possession of this city at 10 o'clock today. Halting yesterday at Amosoque, to await the junction of Gen. Quitman, I found my position suddenly menaced, at 8 o'clock, by a large body of cavalry. This force approached somewhat stealthily by a road on our right unknown to us. A rapid examination, as it unmasked itself, exhibited, as was supposed, some 2,000, but from accurate information obtained here, 3,000 cavalry of the line, unsupported either by infantry or artillery, and moving a mile on our right and toward the rear, led to the conclusion that it was a ruse to attract attention in that quarter, while the real attack was to be looked for on the high road in front, or a movement on Gen. Quitman, who might have been supposed the usual day's march in the rear. It was presently reported that a heavy column was actually approaching on the main road. Thus it became necessary while directing a portion of the force against the visible enemy, to guard our large train, reserve ammunition, packed in the square, against the invisible.

The 2nd artillery section of Duncan's battery under the brigade commander, Col. Garland the 6th infantry under Maj. Bonneville, with Stephoe's battery, was promptly moved, and so directed as to take the enemy in flank. The head of his column having now reached a point opposite the center of the town, and distant about half a mile, the batteries soon opened a rapid and effective fire. After some twenty five rounds, the entire column broke without attempting a charge or firing a shot, and hastily fled up the sides of the convenient hills. Only one company of the infantry was enabled, from distance, to deliver its fire. The march in the direction of Gen. Quitman’s approach. The 2nd artillery and 8th infantry, with two sections of the light batteries, was put in its track, when the enemy again swerved to the left, and disappeared in the hills. Two miles distant Gen. Quitman was met by the last named detachment. He had already discovered the enemy, of whose proximity the firing had admonished him, and promptly taken his order of battle. This discomfited enemy reached Puebla late at night, and evacuated the place at four in the morning. We took some prisoners, and found a few dead. The enemy acknowledged a loss of 89 killed and wounded. Gen. Santa Anna conducted the enterprise. Enclosed, marked A, is a copy of a communication addressed on the 12th to the civil authorities of Puebla. Again, marked C, on the 14th with reply to the latter, marked D: also copy of circular, dated 9th, addressed to commanders of corps, to regulate their conduct in certain contingencies on the march. It is understood the force which retired from this city the day before yesterday, and today is to take post at Puente del Tesmaluca, distant 12 leagues on the road to the capital, where it is where it is proposed to fortify. Our reception was respectfully and coldly courteous, but without the slightest cordiality. Incassent occupation has not allowed me a moment to look into the resources in way of supply; but Mr. --- says, breadstuff will be had in abundance, less of beef, and perhaps a liberal quantity of small rations.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant
W.J. Worth
Brevet Major General Commanding

NRR 72.275-72.276 July 3, 1847 account of the attack on the train from Vera Cruz

The arrival of the Galveston at N. Orleans, from Vera Cruz, which she left on the 15th June, furnished a variety of interesting items from the army, of which we proceed to furnish a synopsis.

THE ATTACK ON THE TRAIN UNDER COL. McINTOSH.

A correspondent of the N. O. Bee, in a letter dated Paso de Ovejas, June 12th, writes: The train of wagons and pack mules under the direction of Col. McIntosh, which left Vera Cruz on the 4th inst., escorted by Capts. Duperu, Ford, and McReynolds, companies of dragoons--the two latter mounted--and three hundred infantry commanded by Major Lee, arrived in this village on the 7th inst., after a march of three days.

The train consisting of 150 wagons laden with specie, and ammunition, and 500 pack mules with provisions &c., proceeded without molestation until about noon on Sunday last, 6th inst., when our advanced guard of Capt. Ford’s Indiana dragoons was suddenly attacked by a large body of Mexicans, killing two men and wounding five or six. In this skirmish the enemy succeeded in capturing several horses and a large quantity of baggage, among which I have to regret the loss of all my clothing and papers. Half an hour afterwards the rear of the train was attacked, and before the rear guard who were unfortunately too far behind could come up to its defence, the Mexicans captured a large number of pack mules, and robbed several wagons of a portion of their contents. With their booty their retired into the dense chaparral, where it was impossible to pursue them. One of the rascals actually dragged from a wagon, the wife an hospital steward, and throwing her across his horse, was making his escape, when he was fortunately shot by one of the infantry, and the terrified lady delivered in safety into the arms of her husband.

After the train which reached several miles had come into order, the whole body moved forward, the two companies of mounted dragoons forming the rear guard. At sunset, when passing along a low portion of the road, with an open chaparral on our left, and a large cleared field hemmed in about 100 yards from the road, by a heavy chaparral and commanded at the further end by a hill on the side of which is a small line fort, our whole advanced guard, consisting of 25 mounted dragoons, about 250 infantry, and our company (Duperu’s) of dismounted dragoons, was assailed by a heavy discharge of musketry, from the fort, the hill in its rear, and the chaparral beyond, and the cleared field. Our boys received their tire, steadily and unflinchingly, and returned it briskly for a few minutes. We hen charged on the chaparral at the rear of the open space, silenced the fire of the enemy and drove them entirely off. At the same time the mounted dragoons charged on the hill, routed the Mexicans out of the fort, and drove them over the hills.

The whole action lasted about half an hour, and our troops, who were principally raw recruits, behaved in the most gallant manner. The Louisiana boys acquitted themselves admirably, and were the first to reach the chaparral. The friends of Capt. Duperu and his company, in New Orleans, will be gratified to learn that we have sustained their highest anticipations. The loss in our company, on this occasion, was three wounded, viz: Samuel Lankin, in the thigh, severely;-----Wallace, in the thigh and hand, severely; William Hassel, in the thigh, slightly. They are all doing well.

We suffered greatly for want of water, but about 9 o'clock, came to a small muddy brook, were we bivouacked for the night, sleeping in the middle of the road. The next morning early we were put in An hour afterwards we entered the town of Paso de Obejas, (passage of the sheep,) where we were quartered, to award the arrival of reinforcements of artillery from Vera Cruz, with which to pass the National Bridge, six miles from this place, and the heights of Cerro Gordo, where, it is supposed, the enemy will show opposition. About 9 o'clock yesterday morning a small train of 4 or 5 wagons came in direct from Puebla. They contained the baggage, and were escorted by some two hundred discharged sick soldiers and a few teamsters, whose term of service had expired. They were attacked from the heights, while in the act of crossing the National Bridge. Not being able to return their fire, the Mexicans being concealed, they simultaneously raised a shout and ran towards them, whereupon the yellow skinned cowards vamoosed. One wagon master was killed. I have forgot to mention in the proper place, that our whole loss in the two days fighting was 40 killed, wounded, and missing.

The forces at Jalapa have received marching orders, and will join us on our route to 'headquarters,' Gen. Scott and his whole army, with the exception of the Jalapa force are occupying Puebla. He will remain there, until sufficiently reinforced to march on the capital, which will not be, it is anticipated, until fall.

Late yesterday afternoon reinforcements arrived here from Vera Cruz, under the command of Brig. Gen. Cadwallader. They number near five hundred strong; two twelve pound howitzers: the Kentucky company of mounted dragoons, under Capt. Gaithers and four or five companies of infantry. We will probably leave here tomorrow, and should the rancheros give us a fight, we will demolish them.

YOURS, THE DRAGOON.

NBR 72.276 July 3, 1847 George Wilkins Kendall's account of movements, detachment under Capt. William Phillips Bainbridge leaves Puebla for Veracruz, affairs on the route

The New Orleans Delta gives the following synopsis of the news.

The following highly important intelligence was communicated to us by Lieuts. Floyd and McWilliams, of the 2d Pennsylvania Volunteers, who came over on the steamship Galveston, this morning at 6 o'clock. On the 8th a small recruiting party, together with some citizens disbanded soldiers, in number about 150 with 75 armed men, and thirty mounted, left Puebla for Vera Cruz. This party was under command of Capt. Bainbridge, of 3d artillery.-On leaving Jalapa and getting near Cerro Gordo, this party was informed hat it would bet be prudent to go through the pass, as here were about 4,000 Mexicans in the chaparral along the pass. Previous to this tow officers who had gone to the rear of the train were fired at from the chaparral. At the mouth of the pass the party was organized and marched through without meeting an enemy. Arrived at the bridge that evening. Whilst they were bivouacked on the other side of the bridge, being so fatigued that they were unable to furnish a guard, they were informed that some persons were barricading the bridge. A guard was then stationed between the bridge and the encampment, to prevent the party being surprised. At this time signal lights on the ridges and cliffs were distantly seen.

Before daylight the sick and wounded of this little party were removed to Santa Anna's hacienda-a quarter of a mile from the bridge. A scouting party was then sent out, and also a party to clear the bridge, which was done without any opposition. The main body of he party then passed over the bridge. Everything appearing then to be safe, and all danger being passed, Lieut. McWilliams and Mr. Frazer were sent back to bring on the train on the other side of he bridge. Just as they were entering the bridge a party of about twenty five Mexicans appeared on the ridge, and fired several volleys on them. The wagon master and four others, who were passing the bridge, were fired on and the whole five were killed, and a wagon was captured, of no great value.

After the fire had ceased, a party of lancers appeared on the bridge and seemed to be preparing to charge, but seeing that Capt. Bainbridge's party were preparing to receive them, they wheeled their horses and galloped off.

Capt. Bainbridge resume his march in good order, followed by 400 or 500 of the lancers, who hung upon his rear and flanks for four or five miles, but at a respectable distance. Thus hemmed in this little party pursued its way until it arrived at the pass of La Voilta, where Col. McIntosh had encamped with his large train. The Mexicans who had attacked Bainbridge's party were the same who had compelled Col. McIntosh to halt and wait for reinforcements. The party remained that night in McIntosh's camp, and during the whole time the Mexicans kept a continual fire on the camp, approaching, with the greatest boldness, very near to our sentinels.

On the next day Capt. Bainbridge's party resumed its march to Vera Cruz, being joined by Capt. Duperu's dragoons, who were sent back to get their horses. This company, with its gallant Captain, had behaved very handsomely in the attack on McIntosh's camp. Its gallantry was the theme of universal praise and admiration in the army. Indeed, it was generally admitted that Col. McIntosh's command was saved by the gallantry of Duperu's party. Bainbridge's party continued their march to Vera Cruz, where they arrive in safety. In the meantime Duperu's party, having a long return train to guard, and being threatened by a large body of lancers, halted at Santa Fe, where they were charge by a greatly superior force, which they gallantly repulsed, killing many of the enemy, and suffering no loss themselves. It was said however, that some of our wagons were cut off, and the drivers taken prisoners. Capt. Duperu arrived safely in Vera Cruz, having lost three killed and three wounded.

On the day Capt. Bainbridge's party left McIntosh's camp Gen. Cadwallader had arrived, with a force of 800 men and two howitzers. The two commands were then joined, making, in all, about 1000 men, with two howitzers, under the command of General Cadwallader, and pushed on towards the National Bridge.

On approaching the bridge General Cadwallader occupied the heights commanding the bridge from which the enemy had fired on Capt. Bainbridge's party, where he was attacked by a large force of the Mexicans, posted in the ridges and chaparral, and some hard fighting was carried on for several hours, the Mexicans losing more that 100 men, a and Gen. Cadwallader loosing some 13 killed and some 30 or 40 wounded. The Mexicans were repulsed; the bridge was successfully passed by General Cadwallader, who was on his way to Jalapa.

The estimate loss of Colonel McIntosh's party is about $40,000. For miles the road is strewed with empty boxes and bacon sides, which had been captured by the enemy. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction in the army, respecting the of conduct of the command which had charge of the train. There will be a court of inquiry into the subject.

The garrison at Jalapa has been broken up, by order of Gen. Scott and all he sick and government stores have been sent to Perote Castle, so that this line of communication is entirely closed. General Scott has had a road opened from Perote to Tuxpan, from which in future, all our stores and men will be sent, in preference to the old road. The Engineer corps have completed a fine road from Tuxpan to Perote, the distance being less than one half that from Vera Cruz to Perote, and Tuxpan being a healthier place.

The success of the attack on McIntosh's command has given great confidence to the guerrillas, who are swarming in great numbers through the country, and attacking all our parities, large and small.

It was chiefly owning to the gallantry of Major Bennett, the paymaster, that the specie wagons in McInosh's party were saved. He was in one of them himself when the wagon was attacked, and fought like a tiger.

We are pained to hear that the fine charger sent out by the citizens of New Orleans to Col. Harney was captured by the Mexicans. Their daring was so great that even lariated a woman who was in the wagon, but she was rescued by our men after some hard fighting.

There are about 1000 men in camp at Vera Cruz. General Shields was at Jalapa, and was about to leave for the United States, when he received an order from Gen. Scott to join him at Puebla.

There are no preparations to defend any point between Puebla and the Capital. All the odds and ends of the army are collected in the city, about 20000 in number, but poorly armed, and of miserable material. There was a small pronunciamento at the city of Mexico, which was easily putdown by Gen. Bustamente. It was got up by factions of the peace party. The cry was "down with Santa Anna!" but the president ad interim still maintains his power and influence. Congress has refused to accept his resignation.

We have about 6000 men at Puebla, under command of Worth and Quitman.

Gen. Scott will remain at Puebla until he is reinforced. Gen. Bravo is in command of the army at the capital.

There is much sickness at Vera Cruz, but very little in the Castle. Col. Wilson publishes a card in the Eagle pronouncing the statement of Col. Mata, that La Vega had been confined in the guard house of the Castle to be false.

The little party, who cut their way from Jalapa to Vera Cruz, and so narrowly escaped the many perils that surrounded them, express themselves under the greatest obligation so Capt. Bainbridge, Mr. Karns and Adj Dutton, for their coolness, prudence and judgment in conducting them in safety through their many dangers.

Gen. Cadwallader is much praised for the energy and promptness of his movements to the rescue of McIntosh, and or the bravery and skill with which he scattered the swarms of guerrillas, grown confident by the success of their previous enterprises.

Rejon, and five other generals, whose names are not given, had been arrested and sent to the different states for confinement.

The gallant Captain Walker has commenced his work of retaliation on the guerrillas. On the morning of the 8th inst. he started with his command from Perote on an expedition some distance since the interior. During the expedition he succeeded in capturing nineteen guerrillas and an alcalde—he has employed them in cleaning the streets and sinks. [ANP]

NNR 72.276-72.277, July 3, 1847 return of Capt. Duperu’s dragoons to Veracruz, his account of the train, arrival there of the dead and wounded, arrival of troops, Gen. George Cadwalader reaches the train with reinforcements and takes command

The Vera Cruz correspondent of the Times writes June 14th—"I have just seen Captain Duperu, who came in this morning from the train, which he left about three miles this side of the bridge, at a stand. It is his opinion that the train will not move forward for some days, if at all. The guerrillas are gathering in great numbers and from all quarters, and the chief danger is in delay. Every hour renders its advance more difficult. Within the past three days a number of young Vera Cruzanos have gone out, and are now under arms against us, after enjoying our protection for the past two months, during which time their property and persons have been more respected than they have for any two months together since they were born. The city has several emissaries within its walls from Jarauta and Robledo, one of which, in a gray friar’s dress, was just pointed out to me.—Persons in the interest and pay or promise of pay—of the Mexican authorities, Mexicans by birth as well as Spaniards, are also in the employ of our authorities in this city, some of them receiving large salaries and holding offices of trust connected with our courts and different departments in administrative and clerical capacities, ready at any moment to turn over their files and books to parties with whom their natural sympathies lie; people openly rejoice at the success—for success it is—of the guerrillas over our troops. The Spanish paper here teems with covert appeals to the sympathies of the foreigners and the patriotism of the Mexicans; magnifies our losses and the Mexican gains; makes a great display of wrongs inflicted on our side, and patient suffering on the part of injured Mexicans, and all passes unnoticed as far as I can see.

The writer goes on to detail of, to him, alarming reports, and appears to be alarmed for the safety of Vera Cruz.

Since I commenced this page I have seen Dr. ----- who has just arrived with thirty wounded and dead men from the train—the latter have died on their way here, from the severity of their wounds and many of the wounded are in such a state that they will probably sink under the amputating knife. The train had reached the bridge when this party left, and the fight had been suspended for the moment. The General, (Cadwallader), however, expected to meet the enemy in full force at Encerro or at Cerro Gordo, and will have to fight every inch of the way to Jalapa, or, indeed, to Perote, as we have reason to believe that our troops have evacuated the former post.

NNR 72.277 July 3, 1847 Report of the determination to remove the military depot from Veracruz to Tuxpan and opening a new line of communication

A letter had been received in Vera Cruz on the 15th previous to the sailing of the Galveston, direct from the headquarters of Gen. Scott, stating that Gen. Scott had issued orders for the removal of the Government from Vera Cruz to Tuxpan and Puebla than between the latter place and Vera Cruz. All the public stores in Vera Cruz would in that case be removed to Tuxpan, and troops only sufficient to garrison the place, left at Vera Cruz. The activity displayed among the different vessels in the harbor of Vera Cruz in shifting the cargoes from vessels having but small portions of Government property on board, into others nearly full, with the evident intention of a move, would go far to confirm the rumor of a change in the base of operations. [NGP]

NNR 72.277 July 3, 1847 Tampico threatened

The steamer James Day arrived at New Orleans from Vera Cruz on the 21st. She left Vera Cruz on the 16th, touching at Tampico on the 17th, Brazos St. Jago on the 18th.

The main interest excited by this arrival, centers on the report communicated to the James L. Day, by Mr. Clifton, the pilot of Tampico, who boarded her on the 17th of that city. He stated that they were in daily expectation of an attack from the Mexicans, who were reported to be 1,500 strong in the vicinity of the city. [NGP]
NNR 72.277 July 3, 1847 insurrection attempted at Tampico

On the night of the 12th a demonstration was made by the Mexicans in Tampico to rise. The American authorities, however, had timely information of the contemplated movement, and to suppress it, if attempted, called out the troops, who lay on their arms all night. There was then no demonstrations of revolt made.

On the 15th a party of Mexican lancers attacked the outposts at Tampico, and drove the sentinels into the city. On the 16th a party of rancheros attacked the pilot station and were greeted by a discharge from half a dozen muskets, when they retreated.

NNR 72.277 July 3, 1847 report that Gen. Winfield Scott had advanced, and that the Mexicans had sent propositions of peace

The most important intelligence brought by this arrival is the flattering prospect of peace. Capt. Wood, of the D. informs us that information had been received at Vera Cruz before the day left, that Generals Scott and Worth, with the main body of the army, had advanced as far as Rio Frio, without opposition, and were met at that place by a deputation from the capital, with propositions for peace. The exact tenor of the propositions was not known; they were however, of such a nature that Gen. Scott refused to accept them, and was determined to push on his forces to the capital. From the deep anxiety felt by the new government if the term government can be applied to any party or power in Mexico, to stay the march of our forces on the capital, it was thought that further concessions would be made to Gen. Scott before he took up his line of march from Rio Frio.

NNR 72.277, July 3, 1847 Capt. Samuel Hamilton Walker’s retaliation on Mexican guerrillas

The gallant Captain Walker has commenced his work of retaliation on the guerrillas. On the morning of the 8th inst. he started with his command from Perote on an expedition some distance into the interior. During the expedition he succeeded in capturing nineteen guerrillas and an alcalde—he has employed them in cleaning the streets and sinks.

NNR 72.277 July 3, 1847 exhaustion of the troops returning to Veracruz, rumors and dissatisfaction at the manner in which the train had been managed

ONE DAY LATER ACCOUNTS. The steamer James L. Day arrived at New Orleans from Vera Cruz on the 21st ult. She left Vera Cruz on the 16th, touching at Tampico on the 17th, Brazos St. Jago on the 18th.

The main interest excited by this arrival, centers on the report communicated to the James L. Day, by Mr. Clifton, the pilot of Tampico, who boarded her on the 17th off that city. He stated that they were in daily expectation of an attack from the Mexicans, who were reported to be 1,500 strong in the vicinity of the city.

On the night of the 12th ult. a demonstration was made by the Mexicans in Tampico to rise. The American authorities, however, had timely information of the contemplated movement, and to suppress it, if attempted, called out the troops, who lay on their arms all night. There was then no demonstration of revolt made.

On the 15th ultimo, a party of Mexican lancers attacked the outposts at Tampico, and drove the sentinels into the city. On the 16th a party of rancheros attacked the pilot station and were greeted by a discharge from half a dozen muskets, when they retreated.
A letter dated Santa Fe, (near Vera Cruz), 5th ultimo, says—"Yesterday it was painful to witness the men dropping down along the road, from sheer exhaustion. Captain Duperu's company, owing to some culpable mismanagement in the commissary's or quartermaster's department at Vera Cruz, was sent as a portion of the escort to the large train, without either horses or arms! Last night when we encamped at a small stream, called Rio Medio, the horses in the train were without a particle of forage. The men of Capt. Duperu's company were in a like condition, so far as the article of provender, as Maj. Dalgetty would say, was concerned. Capt. D. although provided himself with a splendid horse, preferred to share the fate of his brave men, and refused to ride while his men had to foot it."

A letter received in Savannah, dated Tampico, June, 1847, says—"Since I last wrote you, the sickness has decreased somewhat; but the truth is, that nearly all those sick have died. The Louisiana regiment have now but 300 men fit for duty. The rest are either in the hospital or in their graves." [CCB]

NRR 72.277-278 July 3, 1847 Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna's resignation and manifesto on resuming executive power

The unpropitious events of the war have conducted me to the capital of the Republic, and in obedience to the law I have once more, and that for a short time, seized the reins of the state. It becomes my duty to explain to the nation the grave and powerful motives of this conduct and the course I intend to pursue in the solemn moments which are to decide the life or death, the honor or disgrace of our country.

Ever since the commencement of our just contest with the United States, fortune has treated us with disdain, and has rendered unavailing the efforts of honor and patriotism, made for the most noble and holy cause which has ever been defended on earth. The defeat of Cerro Gordo has only been a link in the chain of our misfortunes, to try, perhaps whether we are capable of overcoming by our constancy the iron destiny which purses us without pity.

Hardly had the valor of the soldiers of the republic succeeded in humbling the pride of the Americans in the field of Angostura, carrying off the trophies of victory, when the imperious necessity to put an end to the discord which was destroying the beautiful city brought me hither, in conformity with the invitation of a respectable majority of the national Congress. Having accomplished this object, I proceeded to the next most important, that of preventing, if possible, the advance of the enemy, who, being already in possession of Vera Cruz, and Ulua, was in search of a better climate to escape the rigor of the season. In three days I went from Mexico to a position recommended of old by those experienced in the art of war, and fortified it as well as the want of time and scarcity of means permitted, uniting in it two brigades of the army of the army of the north, some other troops, without discipline, and some bodies of recruits. The enemy fought with the greater and the most select portion of his army, and although he gained the battle, it cost him much blood, and he received another proof that Mexicans do not refuse to fight, although the circumstances are unfavorable to them. As far as regards myself, I am satisfied that I spared no exertion nor fatigue to snatch a favor from fate, and that Mexicans do not refuse to fight, although the circumstances are unfavorable to them. As far as regards myself, I am satisfied that I spared no exertion nor fatigue to snatch a favor from fate, and that I exposed my existence as long as I entertained any hope of regaining the day.

Escaped as by miracle out of the hands of the enemy, I proceeded to Orizaba with the intention of uniting the dispersed, to gather new troops, and to prepare further resistance to our daring invaders, my firmest resolution having always been never to despair of the fate of the country, nor to abandon it under its greatest reverses. Twenty days sufficed to form an army, with which I proceeded to the city of Puebla with the privilege sanctioned by our laws and which the United States do not respect. Does the land proprietor know how hard and exacting are the degrees of the conquerors? If the high social disdain, and has rendered unavailing the efforts of honor and patriotism, made for the most noble and holy cause which has ever been defended on earth. The defeat of Cerro Gordo has only been a link in the chain of our misfortunes, to try, perhaps whether we are capable of overcoming by our constancy the iron destiny which purses us without pity.

Twenty days sufficed to form an army, with which I proceeded to the city of Puebla with the privilege sanctioned by our laws and which the United States do not respect. Does the land proprietor know how hard and exacting are the degrees of the conquerors? If the high social advantages, if the blessings of independence are so little appreciated, and if to be ranked among the independent and sovereign nations has no longer any value to Mexico, why did we contend during eleven consecutive years, spilling torrents of blood and desolating our town country, in order to make it free? The moment has finally arrived to explain all in order to save all. Woe to him who does not comprehend the gravity of our position!

It is now we are reaping the bitter fruits of our inexperience during the years in which we have governed ourselves. A nation, arrogant and coveting our elements of power and wealth, has been watching, like a tiger lying in wait for its prey, the moment when the civil discord should have debilitating and prostrated the nation, to surprise and subdue us. And when the enemy is carrying into the execution his [ . . . ] intentions we do not even correct ourselves. Disunion progresses sedition increases the political passions are agitated in the worst devise and as if it were nothing that the foreign enemy should be combating us, we endeavor to deprive the authorities of power, and with a fatal blindness and perverseness prevent them from undertaking the defense of our country.

Of these truths I am at once the witness and the victim. Since my return from exile I have only thought of the salvation of the republic. Did I not hasten to create and organize a powerful army? Did I not meet the enemy without regard to risk and danger? Did I not traverse the whole republic to close the to the cruel conqueror of Vera Cruz? Have I not in all directions sought the front of the enemy? My duty was to combat and I have fought! My courage was not more vigorous at Tampico than at Cerro Gordo, and torture which permitted me there to add another laurel to the many glories of the nation, als refused to let me secure her happiness. It is, however, counseling to me that the injustice of men is not lasting, and what still more consoles me is that the majority of my countrymen are important and intelligent, and that they will pardon my errors and esteem my constant devotion to the service.

As regards the interest and [ . . . ] of the nation I shall be inflexible. I intend that the war must be continued until our position improves. The conqueror oppresses the vanquished and accords him nothing but an inglorious peace. Will the nation permit that an immense portion of its territory shall be torn from it? Can it consent to be called a nation when it has ceased to be so by its mutiny and impotence!

Should the close of my public life he near at the hand, I desire to terminate it leaving exalted lessons of devotion without limit to the cause of the country. As long as I live her sovereign will shall be the constant rule of my conduct. I desire to serve my country and wish that all may serve her with a firmness and constancy which may form a rampart against which all the efforts of her enemies may prove unavailing.

Mexicans, my countrymen, examine my actions and let them respond for my intentions. If the Supreme [ . . . ] of society has probed us in the crucible of misfortune, he already commences to show his compassion by allowing us to form a constitution which will be a table of salvation in our troubles. I have sworn to it. I have signed it and I will defend it. With respect to the independence and integrity of the nation, I have but one wish, and that is the most of my heart. "to combat and die for them."

NNR 72.279 July 3, 1847 Col. Alexander William Doniphan's achievements, casualties, fight with Lipans at El Paso, letter to Maj. E. M. Ryland

COL. DONIPHAN'S LETTER.

A note from Major E. M. Ryland, to the editor of the St. Louis Republican, dated Lexington, Mo., June 10, encloses for publication the following letter presuming that "it is only through the medium of the private letters which have been addressed by the officers in command of the different divisions of the army, to their intimate friends at home, and which have found their way into the newspapers, that the country has been enabled to learn and to understand the real nature and extent of the difficulties and dangers which have, from time to time, encompassed those officers and their respective commands in the progress of the war with Mexico. And without this knowledge it would be impossible for the people in general to appreciate properly the indomitable courage and energy which have enabled those gallant commanders and their brave troops, to surmount every obstacle and defy every danger, and to achieve a series of brilliant victories, the memory of which can perish only with the institutions and language of the country under whose banner those victories have been won.

City of Chihuahua, March 7, 1847.

DEAR MAJOR: How often have I again and again determined to send you my hearty curses of everything Mexican? But, then, I knew that you had seen the sterile and miserable country, and its description would be, of course, no novelty to you. To give you, however, a brief outline of our movements, I have to say, that we have marched to Santa Fe by Bents' Fort; thence through the country of the Navajo Indians to the waters of the Pacific ocean; down the St. Juan river, the Rio Colorado, and the Gila, back again to the Rio Del Norte; across the Jornada Del Muerto to Brazos, where we fought the battle of which you have, doubtless, seen the account; thence to the town of El Paso Del Norte, which was taken by us; thence across two other Jornadas, and fought the battle of the Sacramento, and have sent you, herewith, a copy of my official report of the same. We are now in the beautiful city of Chihuahua, and myself in the place of Gov. Frias.

My orders are to report to General Wool, but I now learn that, instead of taking the city of Chihuahua, he is shut up at Saltillo, by Santa Anna. Our position will be ticklish, if Santa Anna should compel Taylor and Wool even to fall back. All Durango, Zacatecas, and Chihuahua, will be down upon my little army. We are out of the reach of help, and it is as unsafe to go backward as forward. High spirits and a bold front, is perhaps the best and the safest policy. My men are rough, ragged, and ready, having one more of the R's than General Taylor himself. We have been in service nine months, and my men, alter marching two thousand miles, over mountains and deserts, have not received one dollar of their pay, yet they stand without murmuring. Hall rations, hard marches, and no clothes!--but they are still game to the last, and curse and praise their country by turns, but fight for herself all the time.
No troops could have behaved more gallantly than ours in the battle of Sacramento. When we approached the enemy, their numbers and position would have deterred any troops, less brave and determined, from the attack; but as I rode from rank to rank, I could see nothing but the stern resolve to conquer or die--there was no trepidation, and pale forces. I cannot discriminate between companies or individuals; all have done their duty and done it nobly. Lafayette has sent out hosts of gallant spirits; the whole company behaved nobly.--Your nephew, Lieut. Robert Barnett, (Lafayette volunteers) was in Captain Reid's cavalry company, in the most dangerous charge that was made during the battle. Captain May's charge at Resaca de la Palma, was not bolder or better executed. Robert (your nephew) is a gallant and high tempered boy, and feels himself privileged to praise and to blame his commanders, as may suit his fancy for the time. Lieut. Desha Graves (Lafayette volunteers,) is also a very gallant man. Indeed, it is a fine company, not better than my others; but it is great praise to say that it is equal to the best. I regret most deeply, the death of poor Kirkpatrick. He was in Reid's charge, and fought like a lion.

Col. Samuel C. Owens lost his life by excessive bravery or rather rashness. He rode up to a redoubt filled with armed men, and continued to fire his pistols into it until himself and his horse fell pierced with balls upon its very brink.

When we are to leave here--where we are to go, or what is to become of us, you will be enabled to conjecture more correctly by the time this letter shall have reached you, than I can at this time.

Give my best respects to C. French, Esq. Judge Ryland, Col. Wood, Judge H. Young, &c., and for yourself I send the assurances of my earnest prayer for your continued prosperity, and also for my own speedy reunion with my family and friends in Missouri. Your friend, very truly.

A. W. DONIPHAN.
the celebrated arrived yesterday with dispatches for Gen. Scott and Com. Perry. The commodore came up today and held long conversations with Mr. T, evidently very confidential, and often in a tone of voice and with a manner which indicated communications and sentiments of no ordinary importance. Mr. Trist is the government, in Mexico. He goes with the train tomorrow to meet Gen. Scott, and will doubtless give him ample instructions to execute the prosecution of the war.

The New Orleans correspondent of the New York Courier wrote: "That Mr. Trist had communicated from Vera Cruz with Gen. Scott, at Jalapa; that in all probability, Mr. Trist would proceed with the next train to Jalapa. And that the negotiations might, perhaps, be brought very suddenly to a favorable conclusion. This is not absolutely certain; but he has diplomatic survey of Gen. Scott, and a [ . . . ] officer in Mexico. The exceedingly strong probability now is that we shall soon have peace. Buena Vista was a more brilliant affair than Cerro Gordo; but the results of the latter are now in conjuction with Mr. Trist, sign a treaty of peace in “the Halls of the Montezumas,” he will have achieved glory enough even although he should never be president. Rest assured there is a perfect understanding with Scott and the administration, and that the terms on which both coincide in opinion are: Upper California and New Mexico, and no other or greater portion of territory; and the right of way across the Isthmus, if it can be obtained. These terms are so much more moderate than were anticipated by Mexico, that whenever they are promulged it is believed that the popular voice of Mexico will be clamorous for peace. Unless then, the Mexicans are more besotted than Hotentots or Esquimaus, we must have peace.

The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun wrote that "The proclamation was substantially written by Gen. Scott, Mr. Trist have been at the same time, in Vera Cruz and in communication with Gen. S, and no doubt approving of the matter contained in it. The text of the proclamation coincides perfectly with the views of the government.

A Jalapa correspondent of the St. Louis Republican, under date of the 26th April, has the following "I neglected in the hurry of writing my last, to mention that a warm and somewhat severe rupture had broken out between Gen. Scott and the clerk of the state department, Mr. Trist, who has been sent here a s a sort of generalissimo of the American army. This is the same Mr. Trist if I err right, who imparted to Charles J. Ingersoll the knowledge of the existence in the state department of private and confidential papers, during the absence of Mr. Secretary Buchanan, and who found out a way by which Mr. Ingersoll unconstitutionally got access to them, which enabled him to make his attack on Mr. Webster. A pretty representative of a great nation at a foreign court to be sure!

This Mr. Trist in the exercises of his mongrel plenary civil and military powers addressed letter to Gen. Scott, directing him as to what move he must make with his troops. A portion of these directions were such as Gen. Scott believed were at war with the best interests of our government, and the tendency of which would be the protraction rather than a recommendation of host allies.

It was the correspondence growing out of this difference of opinion that was the immediate result of this rupture. Copies of all the correspondence. I learn have been transmitted by Gen. Scott to the war department. [NGP]

NNR 72.288 July 3, 1847 vomito prevails at Veracruz

Latest. The steamer left Palmetto reached New Orleans the 25th ult. from Vera Cruz. Vomito still prevails-many are dying. The report of the Mexicans having proposed peace is fully contradicted. Gen. Scott has left Puebla, expecting to have to fight his way to the Capital. [ANP]

NNR 72.288 July 3, 1847 Col. Alexander William Doniphan's division reaches the states

The Washington correspondent of the New York Courier on the 27th wrote that the Mexican Gen. Trias had made known his views in favor of negotiation [incides] with him, it was supposed, would be elected president; that the terms proposed were known to both of them; that in truth, Mexico is astonished at the moderation of these terms.

Stockjobbers it is said, generally continue to see as deep into political millstones as those that peck them. The New York Express of Wednesday says This is quite a peace day in Wall street. There are so many predictions by the letters from Washington, for the press in various sections of the country, that quite an impression is made on the money market in Wall street. Very large capitalists as well as some of the banks, made heavy purchases of United States treasury note today at 7 and a half percent premium. There is a great desire to speculate in this description of security; and the margin for a rise in case of peace with Mexico is considered most favorable. [NGP]
The army of the north had the severest time of it. The division under Col. Doniphan having left Chihuahua to the enemy, have reached the states after an unprecedented campaign. The division under Col. Price, at Santa Fe, was left in no enviable posture, and a train going to them with supplies has been captured by the Indians and all the treasurers murdered. [NGP]

Accounts from California state that Mazatlan had been blockaded by our squadron for two months. The Cyane had captured a prize valued at 200,000 dollars. The California regiment had arrived out in very bad condition; the men not what they ought to be. The coast was quiet, the Yankee ax and hammer ringing about Monterey, and Yankee girls in Yankee bonnets tripping along, and shawl covered senoras. [NGP]

In business there was little or nothing doing. The whole amount of duties collected under the tariff, at Matamoros, Brazos and the mouth of the river, was short of $20,000. No revival of trade was expected until that tariff was very materially modified.

Major. B. M'Culloch had reached the Brazos with 150 horses, of which 50 were for his own company, the rest for Col Butlers dragoons.

Col. J.P. Taylor, subsistence department, being relieved at Brazos by Capt. Eaton, has returned to New Orleans. [NGP]

The Monterey correspondent of the Picayune, writes that: Capt. Toban with a party of Mculoch's rangers, on a scout, a considerable distance from Buena Vista, came across a Mexican express rider with dispatches from Gen. Sanchez to the Governor of San Luis, with an escort, mostly deserters from the American army. The latter made their escape, but the bearer of dispatches and his horse and papers were captured. Sanchez urges that a movement be made immediately against Saltillo, as but few Americans are left there and the Mexicans were burning for an opportunity to relieve themselves of them.

The horse recovered on this occasion had been stolen from Lieut. Sturgis some time since. General Wool dispatched some of the rangers and a company of dragoons in pursuit of the men that had escaped. [NGP]

GUERRILLA WARFARE--On the 31st May, a member of the Arkansas cavalry while leading his horse in a grove near the Alameda, used as a race track, was accosted by two Mexicans, who extended their hands to him in a friendly manner; but, instead of the grasp of friendship, the assassin's knife was plunged into his heart; and he was cast into a ditch while his horse was made away with. Some of the companions of the deceased, who came to join him on the track soon after, discovered traces of blood, and on pursuing them found the wounded man breathing his last, with just life enough to tell the cause of his situation. Not far from the place two Mexicans were shortly afterwards discovered, whose conduct was suspicious, and they were captured. It was afterwards deemed inadvisable to permit them to be regularly tried, a party of men demanded them, and they were taken out and shot. In the sleeve of one was found a bloody knife, corresponding with the size of the wound. This was not enough! I regret to state that many Mexicans were killed that day--some say seventeen, and some more. Comment is unnecessary.

Col. Curtis, formerly of the Ohio regiment, has volunteered for the war and been appointed Governor of Saltillo.
We have had no more news of Urrea. The 2d battalion of Virginia volunteers garrison this place, but will move on as soon as they can be relieved. --There is still a good deal of sickness here, but of mild character, and but few deaths. For the last few days we have had several showers during the day, and I imagine it is brewing up for the rainy season.

It seems there is still a bare possibility of our going to San Luis at a more advanced period than was contemplated by Gen. Taylor at first, but all depends upon whether troops can be had.

Col. Curtis, formerly of the Ohio regiment, has volunteered for the war and been appointed Governor of Saltillo.

NNR 72.289 July 3, 1847Gen. Winfield Scott and Nicholas Philip Trist

Unless we have been entirely misled by our southern correspondents, Mr. Trist's first step on his arrival at Jalapa, was to request Gen. Scott to transmit to its destination a sealed packed, addressed to the Mexican Secretary of the State, which he enclosed to the General, and of the contents of which he gave him no account. Gen. Scott promptly informed him that he declined to do so; but that he should retain the letter, subject to Mr. Trist's order. His reply to Mr. Trist was of course in writing, and was so emphatic and explicit as to leave no room for misapprehension. This letter we know is now on file in Washington; and if the report that has reached us of its contents is incorrect, the Union, by procuring a copy of it can set us right.

Mr. Trist or more properly the Executive of which in all this he is simply the tool, was thus baffled in his first attempt to throw upon Gen. Scott the responsibility of whatever proposition to the Mexican government his sealed packet contained. He then informed the General that he had come to Mexico with full authority to conclude an armistice with the government of Mexico; to suspend all military operations; and to make all necessary arrangement preliminary to the negotiation of a treaty of peace. This fact has already been asserted in letters from Mexico, published in New Orleans and elsewhere; and we are assured by private advices that it is strictly true. Mr. Trist, moreover submitted to Gen. Scott a letter from the Secretary either of State or of War, confirming in every respect the statement he had made, and directing him to recognize, in its fullest extent, Mr. Trist's plenary authority.

Gen. Scott thus found himself, under the orders of the department, virtually though not formally deprived of his command, and made subordinate to a clerk in the state department. He at once informed Mr. Trist that he should not permit him to interfere with the operations of the army which was under his command; that under the circumstances in which that was placed, an armistice was strictly a matter of military policy; and that he should recognize no suspension of hostilities to which his assent, as commander in chief of the forces in the field, should not be previously given. At the same time, he wrote to the Secretary of War repeating his declaration to Mr. Trist, and assuring the department that he should retain the actual command of the army until formally recalled.

"This correspondence is on file at Washington; and although we do not pretend to give the language used by either party, we appeal with confidence to the documents for full confirmation of this statement of their purport."

"This is the difference which has been characterized by the apologists of the Executive as simply a disagreement upon a point of etiquette. It involves, as will be seen from this statement of facts, a direct attempt to degrade Gen. Scott from his position as Commander in Chief, to that of subordinate to a clerk in the State Department, and that, too, upon questions belonging exclusively to the military authority." [NGP]
The New Orleans National says the peculiarities of our institutions make common traits of character which take by surprise even those that were familiar with them through birth and education; how must they then appear to those educated under foreign governments. Among the volunteers in Col. Doniphan's command, was a young man who enlisted to keep from running for the Missouri Legislature! This gave umbrage to his constituents, and his name was put up and he was elected by a unanimous vote. The unfortunate individual, who thus had honors thrust upon him, while marching in slow time with his musket on his shoulder over in Santa Fe, is suddenly disturbed by the appearance of an express from the executive of Missouri demanding of Co. Doniphan, on pains and penalties if neglected, the body of a member elect of the Missouri Legislature, now a volunteer on his regiment. The Col. as a military man, was obliged to obey his commander in chief; so he kicked the legislator out of the ranks, and told him that he must foot it back, under a guard, to Missouri, willingly if he would or chained as a prisoner. The representative vented imprecations upon his constituents and upon his sovereign state, and took the back track home perfectly disgusted with his popularity at the polls. Another private in Col. Doniphan's command, now in California, has been elected to congress. Thus it is, our institutions make it consistent for the American citizen to occupy every place under government, whether distinguished or obscure, and each alike, shed honor if faithfully fulfilled. [NGP]

The report of Gen. Scott having advanced from Puebla towards the city of Mexico turns out to be unfounded as was the report that the Mexicans had sent propositions for peace. General Scott was at Puebla on the 16th June, with a force not exceeding 6000 men, waiting for reinforcements to enable him to advance.

Gen. Cadwallader, who left Vera Cruz on the 7th with some 500 men to reinforce Col. McIntosh, after overhauling the train of which the latter was in charge, and taking command, finally reached Jalapa, after several conflicts with the guerrillas. The entire force of the column was now probably about 1700 men. With these he is said to have proceeded from Jalapa on the 19th, with a view of joining Gen. Scott. One of the latest letters from Vera Cruz states that Alvarez is said to have taken his station with six thousand of his Sonora troops, between Puebla and Jalapa, for the purpose of cutting of Cadwallader's train, and would probably be reinforced. That we do not credit, but the march will be one of difficulty we have no doubt.

Another reinforcement consisting of about 1800 men, that have arrived at Vera Cruz after General Cadwallader left there, were to march under General Pillow, with a view of joining General Scott.

The utmost that the most sanguine can now flatter themselves with, is that those two columns will join Gen. Scott during the month of June. His forces will then fall short of 10,000 men being less than half the number which it appears the government at Washington wrote to him in one of their latest dispatches, that he should have by the last of June.—The dispatches alluded to were captured by Mexicans and their contents or at least part of them have been published. NNR 72.297 July 10, 1847 vomito fatal

Vera Cruz June 24th.--The vomito is yet picking our poor follows off, one or two at a time in the city.
Col. Banks well known in N. Orleans and here as one of the finest fellows, and most enterprising men in the country, is one of the last victims of which I am informed. He died yesterday morning, after forty-eight hours of illness. The disease cannot be said to be raging, nor do I think it is nearly so fatal in its operation as it has been in other years; but it is a serious matter, and it is impossible to feel any degree of comfort in its neighborhood. [CCB]

NNR 72.298 July 10, 1847 punishment of various criminals

In the case of the United States vs. Henry P. Norris, found guilty of manslaughter, the court sentenced him to two years' imprisonment or to the end of the American war.

Two notorious robbers, (one of them has already been punished by sentence of the court). Manuel Estradillo and Francisco Montero, have been found guilty of burglary, sentenced each to receive fifty lashes and six month hard labor.

A. Smith, found guilty of abusing a Mexican woman, to pay a fine of twenty dollars, one week's imprisonment and costs of court. [NGP]

NNR 72.298 July 10, 1847 guerrillas audacious

GUERRILLA AFFAIR--The man we reported a few days ago, as being seen by Captain Cummings lying dead by the roadside a few miles below Reynosa, it has been ascertained was a member of Capt. Faul's company, Massachusetts men, under Captain Walsh, escorting a train to Camargo, passed the spot a few days ago, and identified and buried the body. Capt. W. demanded of some Mexicans residing near the scene of murder to produce the murderers or would burn down their ranchos. The threat had the desired effect, and three incorrigible scoundrels were handed over to him--one of whom was killed in endeavoring to make his escape--the other two are imprisoned at Reynosa. The clothes of the murdered men were upon the Mexican who was killed. [Flag, 3d June NNR 72.298 July 10, 1847 Gen. Gideon Johnson Pillow marches with 1,800 men and 125 wagons, his skirmish with guerrillas

From the New Orleans Picayune.

GEN PILLOW--More Generalship.--We are assured by a gentleman who came passenger in the New Orleans, and one who has done good service to his country, that Gen. Pillow, who left Vera Cruz with a large force to join Gen. Scott, selected the middle of the day for marching a part of the road, which is the dread of even old soldiers.

The sand between Vera Cruz and San Juan is over ankle deep, and the rays of the sun in mid-day are terrific. The result of this experiment upon raw recruits was the death of six men, who were sun struck, and disabling of near a hundred and fifty more. At San Juan so many of the troops were used up that it was proposed to send them back to Santa Fe and establish a hospital there.

After consultation, and as there was adequate force to protect such a hospital, it was decided to send the men back to Vera Cruz. The Vera Cruz Eagle for the 23d instant says that some thirty of them had then reached there. In this encounter with the sun the poor soldiers had less chance than even Haskell's command at Cerro Gordo enjoyed. [CCB]
NNR 72.298 July 10, 1847 report arrives at Veracruz that Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna was dictator and at head of 30,000 men

From the New Orleans Bulletin.

A letter from an officer of the army, at Vera Cruz, states they had received information from the capital, via Orizaba, that Santa Anna had been declared dictator, but without authority to make peace. That he was at the head of 30,000 men, and that Gen. Scott was within 25 miles of the city. Another fight was thought to be inevitable.

The same letter also states the General Alvarez is between Perote and Puebla, and is making great exertions, with a view to attack and destroy General Cadwallader. His force is reported to be 5000 men and increasing.

Gen. C., it will be recollected, left Vera Cruz with about 1400 men, nd as he will probably hear of this Mexican fore previous to reaching Perote, he will no doubt halt until joined by General Pillow, who has 1800 men. Two detachments joined will, no doubt, be able to force their way to General Scott's headquarters. [ANP]

NNR 72.298 July 10, 1847 guerrilla affair

You will gather a fair notion of the daring, and audacity of the guerrillas, from their repeated atrocities under the walls of this city. Within the past thirty-six hours, another man has been hanged by them almost within gun shot of our batteries. The victim was one of the most active police officers, a Dane, named Miller. He and a Frenchman were out riding, when they were "lassoed" and carried into the woods. The Frenchman was released, but Miller is said to have been put to death as stated.--arties were out most of the day and night of yesterday, in search of the depredators of the outrage, and seven Mexicans were seized on the roads and brought in. Five of these proved to be gentlemen bound to Medelin, but the others are suspicious characters, and the governor has imprisoned them to await further examination. One of them was taken on the horse which Miller was riding when attacked.

Business is still, of course, at a stand. Another vessel, the Spanish brig Amistad Campecheana has arrived with a cargo of the goods in Havana, nearly the last, I think, of that stock. A vessel is expected soon from Campeachy, where one cargo was stored during the blockade, and that, I fancy, will pretty much close the foreign trade with Vera Cruz, for some months at least.

I am informed that the head of one firm, and one of the very first in the city, has replied to a demand for duties, from the collector, that he has no more and cannot pay. His thirty days are out, and it remains to be seen what will be the result. His goods will not be sold, as nobody can buy them, for the same reason that prevents the payment of his duties.

The brig Petersburg, from New York, is now here, discharging a small, but rather valuable cargo--chiefly silks and drugs, to owners, Hargous & co.

Destruction of guerrillas by dragoons

General Cadwallader left Jalapa on the [ . . . ] 300 of our dragoons were guided by an [ . . . ] Perote, who led them into a ravine where they surrounded 400 guerrillas, killed 30 of them, and wounded many more, so that these fellows will be very careful how they join another party.

"I understand that for duties as they fall due under the temporary tariff, drafts are given on Jalapa and Puebla. For the heavy amounts due from the British and German houses on the new tariff, the goods are stored. They will give drafts on Mexico as soon as Gen. Scott reaches that city.

Santa Anna, for the present has full powers to defend the city; so it all appears. Another report is, that he will treat with Gen. Scott or some one else.

The English part of "The Sun of Anahuac," of the 24th of June, says "Captain Duperu's company of United States dragoons have received their horses. They paraded through our streets yesterday. A fine company it is. We shall soon learn some of their exploits." [NGP]

Speculators harvesting on bounties paid to discharged soldiers

A correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser, dated Washington, June 16 says "The speculators have it seems, been very busy at New Orleans in gathering up the fragments that fall from Uncle Sam's table, in the shape of land warrants for discharged soldiers. These warrants are convertible into treasury scrip for 100 dollars, bearing six per cent interest and payable in ten years. Each of the soldiers lately discharged at New Orleans has become entitled to land scrip convertible into stock. Speculators from the north have had agents in New Orleans for the purchase of this scrip. Large amounts have been expanded in these purchases, and the soldiers were doubtless greatly benefited thereby; because in their situation a certain sum in hand was of more value than double the sum a year or two hence. The purchased soldiers certificates came to the pension office, and the chief of that bureau had adopted such a construction as to render it scarcely possible for any speculator to obtain any advantage from these purchases, or even to avoid an almost total loss of the amount invested.

As a proof of this I may mention for the information of all parties concerned, that, a day or two ago, a person came here from New Orleans with five hundred of these soldiers' certificates, convertible into stock worth some fifty thousand dollars. Col. Edwards applied to the give hundred certificates the square and compass of his legal construction, and threw out and rejected the whole five hundred certificates on one point and another, with the exception of twenty three. But these twenty three certificates which were made special pets were perhaps even worse treated than those that were rejected.

The commissioner of pensions required that these twenty three favored documents should go back in pursuit of the persons from whom they emanated and, in case they should be found in the land of the living, they are required, severally, to confirm the sale already made, and to execute a new transfer of their interest, in order to make good the old certificate. They are not obliged by law to make any new transfer, but may draw the stock themselves. In case of the death of any of the parties, their heirs and representatives can alone obtain either the land warrant or the stock. Thus the speculators have been
From the same caution against speculators. It is a well known fact that immense fortunes were made out of the poor soldiers who shed their blood in the revolutionary war by speculators who preyed upon their distress. A similar system of depredation was practiced upon the soldiers of the last war. And now we find by the "St. Louis Union" of the 8th that the sharpers are already at work at New Orleans, waiting for the volunteers as they return from the war, and pouncing upon them the moment they land in the city. We call upon all our brethren to warn the volunteers of the tricks and frauds which will be practiced upon them in all parts of the country, and to put them upon their guard against these harpies. If they do nothing more, we beg them to republish the following article from the St. Louis Union.

"In conversing with the gallant Illinoisians who have just returned from General Scott's army, we were sorry to learn that many of the privates, whilst in New Orleans were induced to sell their certificates. Not knowing the importance of retaining those evidences of their service, they parted with them to sharpers, who, regardless of the soldiers' welfare, extorted from them the bounty to which they were entitled. Each of those privates is entitled to 160 acres of land, and yet many of them sold their bounty to which they were entitled. We learn that there is a set of person's in New Orleans who make it a regular business to seize upon the returning volunteers, and but their certificates for a trifling sum. It is thus they filch from men who have been battling for their country the fruits of a nation's gratitude. In most cases, gross imposition is practiced. If a volunteer parts with his certificate, knowing its value, no one has a right to complain; but if deceived as to its importance, he is outrageously wronged, and the Shylock who abuses him deserves unmitigated execration."

It is far better for the soldiers to preserve these evidences of their service as long as possible, at all events, not to act too hastily; but take time, and consult with their friends at home about the proper disposition of their certificates. Meanwhile, we may add that, according to the act of February last, all sales, mortgages are null and void prior to the issue of the land warrant or certificate. [NGP]

NNR 72.299 July 10, 1847 return of Alabama and Georgia volunteers to the United States

Some hundred or more of discharged volunteers of the Alabama and Georgia regiments arrived here on the steamer Brad Street, and we are much gratified to find and take by the land several of our own glorious fellows who had stood out the campaign, and though bronzed by a Mexican climate still look as fresh and hearty as ever. We welcome them back with pride and pleasure, as deserving he respect and honor of the community as citizens who have done their duty well and manfully under their countries banner. Many of the volunteers bore trophies, Mexican swords, lances, cacopetes, uniforms and acquired in the campaign. Mr. T.J. Noble of our city, has among other things, a writing desk which belonged to Santa Ann, taken at Cerro Gordo, and which contains his autograph letters to Gen. Salas and others. Owing to circumstances, only seven men out of a full battalion which Montgomery county raised for the field, remained in service; and since so much has been said about whig "aid and comfort," Mexican whigs it may not be deemed invidious to remark that six out of the seven which remained in the field were Whigs. NNR 72.302-303 July 17, 1847 reception of returning volunteers at New Orleans

The citizens of New Orleans have not only distinguished themselves since the commencement of war, by prompt and spirited contributions of supplies, funds, or personal services whenever, they were required, but they have also been conspicuous in their attention and respect to those who have served their country.

Upon the arrival at New Orleans during the month of June, of the volunteers whose term of service had expired, the citizens received them with curious and repeated marks of cordiality. One of these evidences was a public dinner, provided in the most commodious manner for the whole of them, and of which thousands partook. The whole affair was highly gratifying. A number of patriotic toasts and sentiments were given, and a number of admissible speeches were delivered, of which one must serve as a specimen. [NGP]

NNR 72.304 July 17, 1847 peace rumors, &c.

The prospect of peace seems more remote than it was a week ago. The latest accounts from Mexico left Santa Anna in power, the election of president postponed at least until September, and every prospect of a fight if Gen. Scott advanced. The latest prediction of the Washington Union, however, if we mistake not, was, that Gen. Scott, would celebrate the 4th of July in “the halls of the Montezuma.”
Such an expectation was undoubtedly entertained at Washington. [NGP]

NNR 72.304 July 17, 1847 Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna's withdrawal of his resignation

The Mexican general has his own second sober thoughts. In a letter which is published, he says:

"During the time since I gave in my resignation, I have received singular tokens of the confidence of all classes of persons; the most influential in society, all have besought me not to persist in my intentions. I see in them a determined purpose to force me to remain, founded on the necessity of preserving the present state of things without innovation, in order not to endanger the fate of this populous city and the nation. The excitement has been very general, and even the troops in the garrison and most numerous portion of the people have been constant in their solicitations and their prayers."

General Almonte was still in prison, nor can we distinguish exactly for what.

General Arista is also arrested and confined.

General Gutierrez, Gaona, Martinez and Palomino are entrusted with the command of the lines of defense of the city.

Bodies of the National Guards are on their way, and constantly arriving from the adjoining States. It is believed that from seventeen to twenty thousand troops will be concentrated for the protection of the city.

The papers are filled with accounts of great feats performed by the guerrillas.

The Mexicans have certain information that Gen. Scott cannot expect reinforcements to a greater extent than two thousand men and money to the amount of $200,000 nothing more. They therefore think it doubtful whether he will march to the capital, and talk of marching out to meet him. "There are but 6000 men," they say, "from Vera Cruz to Puebla, who lord it over a population of a million of inhabitants, which the two States contain. It can be believed only because it is seen."

On the first of June all the natives of the United States were ordered to leave the city of Mexico for the states of Jalisco or Morelia, or they would be dealt with according to the law of nations. [NGP]

Mexico City, accounts of the guerrillas. Mexican skepticism about troops and funds available to Gen. Winfield Scott. Natives of the US ordered to leave Mexico City.

Mexico.—The N.O. Delta received Mexican city papers from the 30th May to the 5th June.

Santa Anna's resignation withdrawn.—The Mexican general has his own 'second sober thoughts.' In a letter which is published, he says:

Later.--The N.O. Commercial Times of the 29th ult., received by the streamers New Orleans, Very Cruz dates to the 24th, giving letters from the city of Mexico to the 15th June. One of them states that Santa Anna is elected President, with extraordinary powers to use in the prosecution of the war, but is expressly forbidden to enter in negotiations for peace.

The Editor of "El Arco Iris," the Vera Cruz Mexican papers, says he has information that the election did not come off at the time appointed, but is postponed until the 21st of September. He says the general impression is, that Herrera will be elected and that negotiations for peace will immediately follow his installation.

It is stated that twenty thousand troops are in the city of Mexico and reinforcements constantly arriving. Those under Alvarez now amount to 8000, well armed. Supplies of arms are said to come by way of Acapulco, from abroad. "Taking everything into consideration," says the Vera Cruz correspondent of the Times, "I have no doubt that a bloody battle will precede Gen. Scott's entry into the capital." [SRP]

NNR 72.304 July 10, 1847 consideration of Tuxpan as a port of supply in lieu of Veracruz

Tuspan.--Is a small town say "half the size of Matamoros" situated between Vera Cruz and Tampico, recently taken possession of by Commodore Perry. It is about seventy mile from Puebla and has long been used as a smuggling port to that department. It would o doubt have become a principal port of entry, but for the bar which prevents vessels of over 5 feet draught from entering the harbor. The road from Tuspan to Puebla is at present a mere mule path through a country of very sparse population. Gen. Cos was the Mexican in authority at Tuspan before Perry captured the place. He owns a large property there. Gen. Scott may have been induced to a direct temporary use of this port and route. The idea of its being substituted for Vera Cruz as the channel for supplying the army and maintaining communications with the interior, can hardly be entertained by any one acquainted with the danger of navigating the gulf coast, and the difficulty of making a port during a considerable portion of the year. A regular "norther" would be apt to settle that point. Is the Vera Cruz to be abandoned?-or are two routes to be occupied and to be defended? [ANP]

NNR 72.304 July 10, 1847 Position of forces in California

Late from California. A letter has been received at St. Louis from Monterey, Upper California, dated the 14th of April last. It was transmitted through the interior of Mexico. It does not appear that any event of public interest had transpired between the date of the letter and our previous advices. Gen. Kearny was at Monterey; Col. Mason, of the dragoons, had arrived there; Com. Biddle and Com. Shubrick were in port, with their squadrons. Every thing in Upper California was then quiet. Gen Kearny was expected to leave for the United States about the first of July, taking the route by way of Santa Fe. [SRP]

NNR 72.304 July 10, 1847 Rumors, votes for Mexican President

The rumors relative to peace.

The prospect of peace seems more remote than it was a week ago. The latest accounts from Mexico left Santa Anna in power, the election of president postponed at least until September, and every prospect of a fight if Gen. Scott advanced. The latest prediction of the Washington Union, however, if we mistake not, was, that Gen. Scott would celebrate the 4th of July in "the halls of the Montezumas."-- Such and expectation was undoubtedly entertained at Washington.

As to the dispute between General Scott and Mr. Trist, we have the most confident, and yet contradictory statements from those who pretend to know most about it. The Washington correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce, and also the correspondent of the New York Enquirer, state that the whole affair is reported to the department, and that Gen. Scott "takes the responsibility" in the premises. The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, writes on the 8th inst:

"The difficulty between Gen. Scott and Mr. Trist seems to be of a nature not so easily reconciled as I had at first imagined, and the way to heal it will be to allow Mr. Trist to come home, and Gen. Scott to finish the conquest of Mexico."

The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, wrote on the 7th inst:

"We expect the arrival of the president tomorrow. I do not know that he hastens back for the special purpose of calling the senate together, to lay before them the Scott and Trist treaty. I advised you on the 3d, that, according to rumor, the treaty had been received here, and that this important intelligence had been transmitted to the north. It was, accordingly, published on that day in Philadelphia, and created a profound sensation. But why the rumor-maker should have postponed the treaty so long as twenty days, I cannot imagine, unless he was pressed to sell his stocks within that time. The president, by the way, could have issued his proclamation from Boston as well as from Washington. Gen. Jackson issued his order for the removal of the deposits, from Boston.

But, unless all signs fail, the president will, soon after his return, be compelled, not perhaps to call congress, but to use whatever power he has under existing acts of congress to raise troops and send them to the support of Gen Scott, in Mexico.

While we are amusing ourselves with the cry of peace, peace, our army of invasion is not only suffering intolerable hardships and privations, but is, at this moment, probably, in a very critical condition. While we are daily assured, by the highest authorities, that all Mexico was for peace, that we have none but friends to meet there, that Scott and Trist are daily begged to come into the capital and assume the government, our army is undoubtedly acting on the defensive, against a numerous, wily, treacherous, and resourceful foe.

We are forsooth, sending instructions to Scott and Taylor how to make peace, when we have not given them the means to carry out war. It would be better, ten thousand times over, to resort at once to the disgraceful alternative of withdrawal of our troops and the abandonment of the war, than to suffer it to languish in the manner that it was done and is likely to do. If General Scott had merely a smart skirmish with the enemy in advancing to the capital, his loss of horses and mules, and the care of his wounded, altogether, would delay his march thirty days. Any practical military man will tell you this.

The enemy, in the meantime, are swarming in his rear, and gathering in his front.

All this talk of sending instructions to our generals begins to be considered as mere nonsense. Send them troops. I do not know what glories may be hereafter acquired by Mr. Trist, in the diplomatic line, but a good deal of fighting is yet to be done, in order to prepare a theatre for the exercises of the extraordinary functions said to be assigned to him.

By the way, we have a rumor,--and one rumor is as good as another just now, that Mr. Trist has been recalled for some alleged reason, and will be here in a day or two,--but without any treaty, except the project of one that he carried out with him.

Those people who are seriously desirous of a peace, have become convinced that we are not using efficient measures to conquer it. We have nothing to expect, for the next six months, but a languishing, inefficient, and expensive war. The next congress must send a hundred thousand men, and raise one hundred millions of dollars, to bring it to an end." [SRP] clerk in the state department;" and they profess to see in this alleged movement of the administration additional evidence of hostility on the part of the government towards its commanding general in the hold. The "Courier and Enquirer," indeed, goes so far as to assert that Mr. Trist has not only been guilty of such interference with General Scott's command, but that he has shown "a letter either from the department of state, or the department of war," fully authorizing such a course on his part.

Since the disappointment of the editor of the "Courier and Enquirer" in reference to the object of his visit to Washington last winter, the motive of his virtuous indignation against the government is so well known as to render any charges against it quite harmless, so long as they are confined to its own columns, though put forth in terms intended to create the impression that the material of them may have been furnished to him, duly exaggerated and discolored, "by private advices" from the scene of our military operations. The repetition of these charges in other journals, however, has led us to make careful inquiry into the matter; and we now state positively that all these accusations against the administration, of giving Mr. Trist any authority to interfere in any form, or in the slightest degree, with Gen. Scott's military command, are absolutely and totally without foundation.

Having made these statements thus positively, we deem it proper to suggest to those Federal journals which persist in charging upon the administration an attempt to do injustice to Gen. Scott in this matter, that the intercourse and the relations between the government and General Scott are matter of record. In due time that record may be made to speak for itself. Meantime, it will be no more than prudent for, those journals which now seek to put the administration in the wrong against Gen. Scott, to remember the fate of a similar ill-judged attempt by the professed friends of that officer, which led to the publication, on their call, of the well known correspondence between him and the war department at a previous period of the war. If the success of that experiment warrants, in the judgment of General Scott's friends another call for the record, we undertake to say, on the part of the administration, that such a call, when made in due season, and by due authority, will be cheerfully and at once complied with. We say this, not only without the slightest feeling of unkindness towards Gen. Scott, but, on the contrary, with a full sense of the distinguished services which he has rendered to his country in the field. [SRP]

Col. Doniphan, is described, by the New Orleans National, as, "a man of giant frame, and of that loose carriage peculiar to the west, that deceives the eye as to proportion and strength." "His officers and men (that paper tells) have a strange, uncouth appearance: Piecemeal, the ill made clothing of the volunteers has fallen from them, and they have supplied its place with what chance and the wild beasts of New Mexico have thrown in their way. Their sun-burnt faces, grizzly beards, and withal their devil may care air, is perfectly irresistible. Yet beneath those rough exteriors, are concealed minds of educated and high toned sentiments, full of lofty thoughts and love of liberty--minds that are destined to be felt in the councils of the nation, and to play a prominent part in the stirring events of the times." [SRP]

British Mediation. Lord Palmerston stated in the house of commons recently, that an offer of mediation had been made by the British government between Mexico and the United States, but that as yet it had not been accepted by either of the belligerents. [SRP]

Connecticut.--The legislature adjourned, after the longest session (of fifty days) ever held by any legislature of the state.

Mexican war.--On the morning of the adjournment resolutions were passed in the strongest terms of approbation of the bravery and skill displayed by our officers and soldiers in the Mexican war. The resolutions were prefaced by the following preamble:

"Whereas, in consequence of the admission of Texas into the Union, and of the order of the president without the authority of the constitution and the law, directing troops to march into territory in the occupation of Mexico; a state of war exists between the United States and Mexico, conducted at a great expense of life and treasure, and which may result in the acquisition of large portions of territory, hereafter to be made states of the Union: Therefore," &e. [SRP]
Passports from Cuba.--A letter from which we inserted an extract, recently written from Vera Cruz, signified amongst other alarming things to the writer, that officers and adventurers were making their way from Cuba to Mexico, taking command of guerrillas, &c. The La Patria of the 2d, states that the authorities of Cuba are taking measures to prevent their subjects from interfering in the war. The Sol de Anahuac of June 23d, referring to intelligence recently received from Havana, says that the government of Cuba refuses passports to the United States or to Mexico, to every person born in Spain or in that island, except those above thirty-six years of age, or those who can show that they have commercial business in the places to which they wish for passports. [SRP]

City of Mexico--Dates to the 16th June, have been received by the Mobile Herald. The Diario del Gobierno, of the 12th says: "Trustworthy letters and the evidence of persons of veracity confirm the report that the Yankees in Puebla do not number 6,000, the artillery does not amount to 25 pieces, most of 8, 6, and 4 pounders. What garrison will they think of leaving in Puebla in case they move forward? Certainly not less than 2,000. And with hardly 4,000 will they attempt to come to Mexico? In such cases it is vulgarly and the meat is too little for so much broth."

The same paper of the 13th of June, contains the decree of Santa Anna prohibiting the publication of notices as to the state of defense of the city of Mexico, and cutting off all communication "with the point of the republic occupied by our common enemies, the North Americans." All persons infringing this decree are to be proceeded against according to the laws against spies of the enemy. All persons, therefore, requiring to pass into or to write to such parts must obtain a safe conduct form the supreme government, or from properly constituted military authorities. [SRP]

"Union" insists that Gen. Winfield Scott will have over 20,000 men

The Washington Union of the 12th, says: "our army in Mexico has already (notwithstanding the dilatory action of congress) been largely reinforced. It is ascertained by the latest accounts from Vera Cruz, that several thousand additional troops have been already reported there, to strengthen General Scott's command. Besides these, a corps of six hundred marines must have ere this time arrived at Vera Cruz, for the same purpose. The battalion from this District, under the command of Colonel Hughes, will start immediately for the same destination. Additional regiments are also now mustering for the scene of action from Illinois, Ohio, Louisiana, and Georgia. Indeed, almost every mail embarkation of new troops for Vera Cruz. In a word, instead of giving General Scott 20,000 troops on the principal theatre of operations, (which Col. Doniphan calls for, and which the intercepted letter of the secretary shows were intended to be assigned to Gen. Scott), the design now is to give him more than 20,000.

"The administration has done all that the action of congress permitted it to do, in furnishing its generals with the amount and description of force which they required. And the feats which our arms have already accomplished--the armed occupation, both of the Pacific and the Atlantic seaboard of Mexico--the subjugation of vast regions of Mexican territory--the prostration of the Mexican military power, and probably presence, at this moment, of an American general in the Mexican capital--attest the power and success with which the efforts of the administration have been put forth. In these efforts there will be no relaxation, until the objects of the war are secured in a just and honorable treaty of peace." [SRP]

MAJOR GENERAL PILLOW is recognized as one of the army officers with whom the president is upon terms of confidential intimacy. Gen. Pillow was on his return from a visit to his residence in Tennessee, at the time of the public reception of the returning volunteers to that state--and an invitation was given to attend. The following paragraph from his letter declining the invitation shows what his notions are of the objects of the war, and considering his peculiar relations to the president, must be regarded as some inclination also of the views of our chief magistrate on the subject:
"My intention is not again to leave the field of active duty to my country until a permanent peace can be secured by such a form of government in Mexico as will guaranty with certainty to the citizens of the U. States those advantages which may be contained in such treaty; or the establishment of a complete military occupation of Mexico, whereby the revenues may be secured to the use of the United States arising from the internal taxes in the Mexican states, besides the present duties on imports, and affording to the productive classes in Mexico that protection from their enormous taxes which they have not heretofore enjoyed, and thereby also teaching them how such taxes can be correctly collected and honestly accounted for to the people from forced loans, levied by their ever changing revolutionary Government." [CCB]

NUR 72.307 July 17, 1847 Gen. Robert Patterson's opinion of the plan for conquering peace

Major Gen. Patterson. The N. Orleans Deltas of the 19th ult. Says--"It is the opinion of officers just returned from Mexico--and we may mention the name of Gen. Patterson in this connection--that the probability of conquering a peace, upon the plan of warfare hitherto pursued is slender indeed. It is thought by them that an army of forty thousand rank and file, should be in the field; that captured cities should be put under the jurisdiction of American citizens; that the revenues of the states should be seized to defray the expenses of the war; that all the resources pertaining to the Government should be held as spoils of war, and that the military authority set up by the United States army should exercise all the powers of taxation and legislation belonging to the civil administration of the country. This plan embraces the idea of actual conquest and absolute jurisdiction, and is deemed the only feasible on of the bringing the war to a close."

"It is the belief of Gen. Patterson and others who have given the subject a large consideration, that an authority embracing all the necessary attributes of sovereignty, set up in Mexico, could collect revenue equal to its wants, and that the people of that country can alone be brought to their senses by the exhibition of such an authority. To permit the alcalde to use his functions in a captured city, or the native civil magistracy to conduct public affairs, is keeping an enemy in power who will be surely contriving against the army. This system as been productive of hurt wherever it has been tried in Mexico, and experience demands its abandonment.

"A military government, administered upon civilized principles, it is contended would be preferable to the one now existing in Mexico. It would be more acceptable to the tax payers, it is supposed, than the present arbitrary and vacillating one. It would be able to maintain itself without greater exactions than the country is able to bear, and might in the end leave the people in a better condition to govern themselves than they now are. These ideas seem plausible, and it might be wise to give them an experiment in some of the captured states. The opinion is becoming more and more general that that United States may conquer Mexico; but a peace--never." [SRP]

Tampico. The U. States transport ship Sarah, Capt. Farwell, reached New Orleans on the 6th inst. With Tampico dates to the 27th and Brazos Santiago to the 30th ultimo.

"Capt. Farwell reports that news was received at Tampico the night before his departure, that Col. Cassius M. Clay, Majors Borland and Gaines, and all other American prisoners in the City of Mexico had been released and ordered to Tampico, under a very large military escort. When within 150 miles of Tampico, it is stated that the liberated prisoners were met by Gen. Urrea, who detained them as captives, and ordered out all the men he could raise for the purpose of attacking Tampico. It is further reported that as soon as the intelligence was received, three companies of the 11th regiment of infantry which had been waiting at Tampico bar for transportation to Vera Cruz, were ordered up to the city; and the authorities fearing an attack, placed every man under arms. It was estimated that including the escort, prisoners, and all others with Urrea, that commander had under him fully 900 men.

The steamship Alabama left Vera Cruz on the 2d. touched at Brazos Santiago on the 4th and reached New Orleans on the 7th. The New Orleans Times publishes letters from the Vera Cruz correspondent "Indicator," of the 28th, 29th, and 30th June. They appear to have had no later intelligence at Vera Cruz from Gen. Scott nor from the trains that were on the road from Perote, to Puebla, where Gen. Scott, according to the latest accounts still remained--Indicator writes:

Vera Cruz, June 28th. Jalapa, I believe has been entirely abandoned by our troops; and, indeed, we this evening have intelligence that the guerrillas have taken possession of that city. Vera Cruz has less than three hundred men in her garrison. The National Bridge, Encerro and Cerro Gordo certainly, and Jalapa, probably, are not all guarded, and the country is flooded with the native enemy.
29th--Lieut. Merrifield, of Capt. Ford's company of Indiana Dragoons, this morning blew his brains out with a pistol.

The health of the city has suffered but little change for the past week or two, and all circumstances considered, may be pronounced good. The mortality has averaged less than ten daily within the time mentioned.

30th--We have news this morning from both the west and the south, from the city of Mexico and from Tobasco. A merchant's express came in from the capital, but with only half a dozen letters, and the political information contained in them is negative in the extreme. One of them, however, tells us that the Government which is of course Santa Anna, has demanded a forced loan of one million of dollars, and is raising the money at the point of the bayonet. --The work of fortifying the approaches to the city is proceeding vigorously; but one of the letters states, that great want of judgment is shown in the selection of portions for defense.

The writer says that the strongest fortifications are placed exactly where the Yankees are sure not to pass, while the most important points are left nearly open. The letters are very cautiously written, except the one which gives us the intelligence; and these are about all the remarks which it contains on the subject of general interest. The dates are up to the 18th only. The British Courier will bring news as late as the 26th, and I hope will be in this evening.

Capture of Tobasco. Commodore Perry and his squadron arrived at Anton Lizardo last evening, from his expedition against Tobasco. Upon his arrival at the entrance of the river, he found that a short distance up, chevaux de frise had been sunk so as to render the passage of his vessel impracticable. He consequently landed his men and his lighter guns, and commenced his march to the town. This was a most tedious business, but he managed to get ahead at the rate of one knot per hour until he reached the neighborhood of the town, where he found the enemy ready to receive him. Drawing up his army of tars into a very respectable column, he advanced within musket range when he received the enemy's fire, and instantly opened upon them his artillery, charged with grape and canister. The Mexicans did not fire again--Perry's single volley scattered them to the winds. Horses with the stampede could not get over the ground as they did. Some three or four of our men were wounded, but I believe none were killed. Lieutenant May lost an arm, and I believe one other officer only was badly wounded.

None of the officers of the squadron have yet been in town, and I have these particulars at second hand, although from good and intelligent authority.

The N. Orleans Times says--"We learn verbally that the British Courier reached Vera Cruz on the 1st instant, but as the Alabama sailed at day light on the following morning, no news, if any were received through that medium, had transpired. The Courier probably left the city of Mexico on the 26th or 27th ultimo."

Passengers per steamship Alabama--Capts. Clarke and Acker, and Lieuts. Gouverneau, of the 2d Mississippi regiment; Captain Kerrinton, and Lieuts. Kinney and Ashley, of the Virginia regiment. [SRP] Matamoras, June 23, 1847.

Gen. Wool is at Agua Nueva or Saltillo, with only about four hundred men, composed of several fragments of companies of artillery and dragoons. There are scarcely any volunteers of the old levy with Gen. Taylor. He has with him, or approaching Monterey, the Virginia and North Carolina and Massachusetts regiments, an perhaps a few hundred of Texan rangers and Mississippians. The united forces of these regiments and parts of regiments is not more that 2,500. There are at Camargo, Mier, and Reynosa 960 of the 16 infantry, Colonel J. W. Tibbats, with his staff, passed up the river yesterday morning. Of this regiment 125 are at New Orleans awaiting transportation, together with 400 of the 13th infantry. This camp is formed of he 10th infantry, the New York regiment, under Col. Robert E. Temple, 841 rank and file, and about 400 of the 3d dragoons, under Col. Butler. They are all under the immediate command of Brigadier Gen. Enos D. Hopping, and are impatiently awaiting orders from Gen. Taylor to move up and join him. Major Towler Hamilton, of the 10th, is daily expected with the closing detachment of that regiment, which will complete its full number of 1,100 men. The whole of the 13th will probably soon be here, as, in addition to the four companies an New Orleans, two others have sailed from Mobile. Col. Hays was, two weeks since, on his way to join Gen. Taylor with 350 Texans, three months' men, raised under Col. Curtis' requisition for 3,000 men, but was met with an order to turn back, as the general had no use for me whose terms of service were so short. A recapitulation of the above details will show that Gen. Taylor will soon have at his disposal 4 or 500 artillery and cavalry of the old regiments, 500 dragoons, or one half the new 3d regiment; about 3,000 effective men of the 10th, 13th, and 16 regiments of infantry; and 2,500 volunteers, including several hundred of the very useful no nondescript Texans above referred to as rangers and scouts. NNR 72.308 July 17, 1847 Preparations for defense of Tampico

"Army of Invasion"

Later.--N. Orleans papers of the 8th furnish further intelligence brought by the Alabama, including city of Mexico dates to the 29th, and Puebla to the 30th June.

General Scott had not been able to leave Puebla for want of reinforcements. Gen. Cadwallader was at Perote on the 20th awaiting the arrival of General Pillow. Some of the papers mention that Cadwallader reached Puebla on the 30th, but Kendall's letter of that date from there makes no mention of it. Gen. Pillow is said to have been compelled to contest the road with the guerrilla parties till beyond Cerro Gordo. Guerrilleros took advantage of every defile to resist his progress. His loss is said to have been severe.

Lieut. Col. Belton, 3d artillery, is governor of Puebla.

The American Star, published at Puebla, states that Gen Alvarez was at Atlixco on the 14th June, with 300 Mexican cavalry.

The Star says there is three month's provisions in the city for the army, and that the fields around the city supply all the forage necessary.

A Mexican named Heredia detected by his countrymen on his way from the capital to Puebla with drawings of the different fortifications around the capital was tried and condemned as a spy and a traitor, to be shot on the 21st ult.

The Star of the 24th contains an account of a party of eight or ten men not belonging to the army, who left Puebla on the 20th, and proceeded about 18 miles in the direction towards Mexico, to purchase some mules for the government. As they were about to start by a bye path after procuring them and partaking of a repast, they were discovered by a large party of Mexican lancers, from whom they were endeavoring to escape when their passage was interrupted by another party. The pursuing party over took and charged on them. Dickinson the leader, though severely wounded, managed to escape. John Kinsey is supposed to be killed, and all the others are wounded and taken prisoners.

A rumor was current in Vera Cruz on the morning of the 1st instant, that Gen. Scott had entered the city of Mexico, and the Gen. Pillow had been captured by the guerrilla parties. We know the former report to be false, and believe the latter to be. Our Vera Cruz correspondent puts not faith in either story. [WWF,SRP]
The vomito still prevailed at Vera Cruz. The deaths were from 30 to 40, of these, it was said, full one half were Americans, including not only soldiers, but also laborers, teamsters, and private citizens; the balance were Mexicans. [ANP]

Passengers by the Alabama say that Gen. Pierce, with a large train and a column, said to be 2,000 strong, reinforcements for General Scott, would leave Vera Cruz probably about the sixth. These troops arrived since the departure of the last column, under General Pillow, and embraced nearly all the balance belonging to the ten new regiments, and with the troops of Generals Pillow and Cadwallader, would make an addition to General Scott's army of between 5 and 600. [ANP]

"ARMY OF OCCUPATION."

A letter received at Washington from an officer in Gen. Wool's division, inserted in the National Intelligencer, says:

"Saltillo, June 12, 1847.

Our troops are nearly all taken off this line and ordered to Vera Cruz, and we are here in rather a bad fix. Gen. Valencia, who has been appointed to the supreme command of the Mexican army, is in San Luis re-organizing his forces for another campaign, while we are doing nothing, and can do nothing, owing to the rawness and fewness of our troops. We hear of troops arriving at Matamoras and Point Isabel, but immediately they are sent for by Gen. Scott and we are left alone. We have here about fifteen hundred men, all told: one regiment of Mississippi, one battalion of Virginia, an done company of North Carolina below, keeping up the line of communication." [CCB]

The reception of the returning volunteers at New Orleans, including Colonel Davis's 250 Mississippians, on the 10th ult. at New Orleans, is described as an imposing affair. Two columns of the Delta are occupied with all that was said, done, or seen, on this thrilling occasion. The day was brightly beautiful, and the military escort large in numbers and brilliant in appearance. The gallant Mississippians numbered in all about 250 men--what a wreck of this once powerful regiment! It must have been a sight to make "the pulse throb and the heart beat" with redoubled vigor, to see those heroes of Buena Vista! The city authorities, Governor Johnson, &c., were on the platform in the center, from which S. S. Prentiss welcomed them from their triumphs, in behalf of the city, in one of the most stirring speeches. Col. Davis and Lieut. Col. McClung responded. The day's celebration wound up with a grand banquet at the Place d'Armes. The tables were three hundred feet long, and were filled with every thing that the heart could wish. When the gates of the Place d'Armes were thrown open for the reception of the honored guests, a shout arose from the assembled multitude that might have been heard for miles.

Mississippi volunteers---Major Bradford.--Of all the regiments which have repaired to the field of battle and done yeoman service for their country, none perhaps are entitled to more respect and regard, or occupy a larger space in the public mind than the 1st regiment of Mississippi volunteers, commanded by Col. Jefferson Davis, Lieutenant Colonel McClung, and Alexander B. Bradford. No other regiment has acquitted itself more gallantly, and none, it is stated, shares more largely the affections of General Taylor. The current story that the old hero shed tears when he parted with his favorites, is doubtless strictly true, and is entirely consistent with the general's warm attachment to a body of troops commanded by his son-in-law, and with the known sensibility of his character.

Every officer of this heroic band occupies at home considerable distinction. They are all gentlemen of talents and respectability. Heretofore they were distinguished in the arena of political controversy, and had gathered laurels in combats only of intellectual strife; but they have no added military glory to civil honors, and stand forth as accomplished and successful soldiers. The press has circulated for and wide a thousand laudatory notices of Davis and McClung, and these names are as familiar to the people in the remotest parts of the union, as to their immediate friends and supporters in Mississippi. Less, however, has been said of Major Bradford--not the least worthy and valiant of the noble trio.--We have, therefore, obtained from a friend the material for a slight sketch of his character and career.
Alexander B. Bradford is a native of Tennessee, and is about 47 years of age. His person is commanding and rather handsome. The marked feature in his countenance is his eye, which is black, piercing and full of intelligence. His character has most of the strongly defined attributes of the South. He is brave to rashness—loving danger for the excitement it creates—of rapid perceptions—a nice and jealous sense of honor—eminently endowed with those social and kind qualities calculated to render him popular among his acquaintances. Major Bradford was several years a member of the Tennessee legislature, and in that capacity displayed decided talent and ability. He commanded the Tennessee regiment of infantry in the Florida war, and at the battle of With [lacouche] distinguished himself by his intrepidity and coolness. After serving some time in Florida Maj. Bradford returned home, and shortly after removed to Mississippi, where he at once assumed a prominent position at the bar, as an able advocate and popular lawyer. He was sent to the legislature of his adopted state in 1840. Maj. Bradford is a wig in politics and not only enjoys the utmost confidence of his own party, but is loved by his political opponents. He will probably be the nominee of the Whigs in the northern congressional district of the State, and though the democracy have an immense majority, Major Bradford's strength with the people is such as to throw a shade of doubt over the result.

At the storming of Monterey, Major Bradford played a conspicuous part, and was close upon the heels of the intrepid McClung. At Buena Vista he fought like a lion, and was particularly fortunate, it is said, in rallying a portion of the Indians, when the latter fell back in confusion and jeopardized the day. The stubborn and desperate bravery of Major B. gives him that influence over his men which this first of soldierly qualities generally creates; while his sagacity enables him to act with judgment, and his kindness of heart endears him to those under his command. He is probably without a personal enemy in the world.—N.O. Bee. [SRP]

COL HASKELL'S REPLY TO GEN. PILLOW

To the Public.

While on my way from my residence in Jackson to this city, which I was visiting on private business, I met at Huntingdon with the reply of Gen. Pillow to the communication of myself and officers, published in the N.O. Picayune of the 29th of May last, in relation to the operations of Gen. Pillow's brigade at the recent action of Cerro Gordo.

In rejoining to the reply of Gen. Pillow, I shall endeavor to do so with that dignity of manner and temperateness of tone befitting the columns of a public journal; for, however provoking the language of Gen. Pillow may be to me, and however much I might be justified in the employment of harsher terms than I shall use, still, in the absence of Gen. Pillow, I should suffer in my own esteem if ill temper betrayed me to the use of stronger words than such as are necessary simply to convey my meaning.—Besides, I have a high public duty to perform; and although Gen. Pillow professes to treat the communication of myself and officers as coming alone from me, and endeavors to divert the public mind from a contemplation of his own misconduct by making this controversy purely personal between us, still I cannot bring myself to believe that the pages of a newspaper, while the parties are separated from each other by the distance of two thousand miles, are the proper places for the use of personalities or the settlement of personal affairs.

Following the order in which the general has arranged his reply, I notice, first, his attempt at special pleading and mystification in reference to the enemy's position and number of batteries. In the communication of myself and officers, the enemy's line of works is described in the following language: "The right of the enemy extended from the left of the Jalapa road to the gorge in the mountains, through which the river flows. Along this line the enemy had established himself on three different heights, divided from each other by almost impassable ravines. Each of these heights were strengthened by admirably constructed field works, known to our engineers as Nos. 1, 2, and 3, commencing at the gorge."—This description the general denies to be correct, and says that, "instead of three works in this line of works, as these gentlemen say, there were known to be four before the battle; battery No. 1, situated on the river bluff, and No. 2, at the extreme of the enemy's line of breastwork, and not nearer to the point assaulted than from four hundred to six hundred yards, and batteries Nos. 3 and 4 were still further towards the national road; the place assaulted mad the fifth battery." This singular description of the enemy's work is opposed by General Pillow without one particle of proof to the combined testimony of myself and sixteen of my officers. These counter statements make direct issue of fact between myself and General Pillow. How is it to be determined? So far, the weight of testimony is with me, and if Gen. Pillow desires to relieve himself from the appearance of having endeavored to mislead the public mind by wrongly describing these works, let him produce a map drawn by any intelligent officer of the engineer corps who examined the ground; and if he does, it will prove that he was but only ignorant of the ground before the battle, but that he has learned nothing about it yet; and that if he had his work to do over a second time, he would do it as blunderingly as he did it before. The truth is that there were but four distinct field works on the whole battlefield of Cerro Gordo. Commencing on the enemy's right, they stand in the following order:
No. 1, situated on the bluff immediately above the gorge through which the river flows, and totally disconnected from No. 2 by a deep and almost impassable ravine—leaving a space of some hundred years or more where there was no wall or works of any kind. This work mounted some five or six guns. No. 2 next on the left of No. 1, was divided from 3 by a still deeper ravine, and disconnected from it by a still greater space—say two hundred yards of more—each elevation having its separate battery and fortification. This work had seven guns on its front line, three of four on its redoubt, and two more on what General Pillow calls a “retired line.” No. 3 contained about six or seven guns. This work extended from the top of the height where the guns were placed, along the side of the mountain and nearly parallel with the national road, to the point where it struck the road, nearly opposite the heights of Cerro Gordo. At this point in the road, where this field work terminated, there was a battery of six large brass guns enfilading the road. The next and last field work was that which circled the height of Cerro Gordo, which rose on the right of the road. On this height there were six guns, all mounted on carriages. Higher up the Jalapa road, at or near the headquarters of Santa Anna, there were some five or six brass guns, but no field works. It was the second of these works (No. 2) which my regiment was ordered to attack—and one of the strongest and most reckless declarations which General Pillow, has made is, that I "was not ordered to assault battery No. 2, nor was that battery ever assaulted." In the same paragraph which contains this extraordinary misstatement, Gen. Pillow declares that it never was intended that Colonel Wynkoop should assault No. 1. How does this subsequent statement agree with the language of his of his official report of the 18th April, 1847. In that paper he says: "I therefore directed Col. Haskell, who commanded the assaulting force intended for the attack of battery No. 2, to assault that work with vigor, and carry it at the point of the bayonet. His party moved onward to the assault with great energy," &c.

And in a subsequent paragraph of the same report he says: "In the mean time, Col. Wynkoop, who commanded the storming party designed to attack battery No. 1 succeeded in gaining the position where the assault was to have been made, &c. "How flatly the official report and his reply contradict each other! But the general, for the purpose of relieving himself from the ridicule which necessarily follows him for having ordered the attack on No. 2, while the attacking party was exposed to its dreadful fire in front and to the raking fire of the batteries on either flank, asserts that adjacent angles of Nos. 1 and 2 were the intended points of assault! Why, what sort of quibbling is this? Is not the angle of a work a part of the work itself? How attack the angle of a work and leave the work itself unattacked? Ridiculous!

"But the truth is, there were no such angles as he describes there, and Gen. Pillow unwittingly confesses the fact. In one portion of his reply he says, "The position intended to be attacked was what was believed by both the engineers and myself to be the angle of those batteries, &c., in another part he says: "At this supposed angle no guns could be seen," &c.; and that he was deceived in the supposition, if he ever supposed any such thing, is fully admitted by him in the following language: "The assault was made known to these officers; and, though this point turned out to be a strong work, mounting eight pieces of artillery immediately in front, and two more on a retired line, all of which were, to the moment of attack, entirely concealed and completely marked by the stone wall and brush, yet up to that time it was believed to be an angle in the large stone breastwork connecting the batteries Nos. 1 and 2. Such was the position intended to be and actually assaulted."--Yet General Pillow says No. 2 "never was assaulted."

As to "the stone breastwork connecting the batteries No. 1 and 2, " Gen. Pillow knew well enough when he said so that there was no such stone breastwork there. Nos. 1 and 2, I again say, are separated from each other by a deep ravine. Why did not Gen. Pillow acknowledge this at once? The reason is evident. He is unwilling that the world should know the truth, and is endeavoring to mislead it;--and I will just remark in this connection, that Gen. Pillow, contrary to all courtesy and military etiquette failed to call upon his colonels for reports of that day's work. Why did he do so? The answer is easy. These reports would have elicited the truth, and a description of the ground. This failure on his part to call for reports, and his misrepresentations in his own official report, were among the reasons which implied my officers and myself to give the whole affair to the public.

Reviewing the reply of Gen. Pillow in its proper order, I notice next his defense of the manner in which the regiments were moved to the scene of action. As stated in the communication of my officers and myself, and not denied by him, Col. Wynkoop, supported by Col. Campbell, was to assault No.1, and my regiment, supported by Col. Roberts, was to attack No. 2. These regiments were all moved along a narrow path to the scene of action by the right flank. Wynkoop first, followed by me; Campbell next, who was to support Wynkoop; and Roberts in the rear, who was to support me. This order of march placed a regiment between each of the assaulting and their supporting regiments; and yet the general says this was the only proper order of march. Does not any man of common sense see that each supporting regiment should have moved directly in rear of its assaulting regiment; for instance, Campbell in rear of Wynkoop, and Roberts in rear of me? These regiments, also, that is to say, Campbell's and Wynkoop's, should have been moved by the left flank so that when they reached the point at which they were to file square off to the left from the path towards the river, at an intimation from the general the colonels could have given the command, "file left--march," and the regiments, in obedience to the order, moving simultaneously square off to the left, would have crossed the ravine, and, gaining the hill opposite No. 1, would have been in position, in line opposite of battle, parallel with each other and the batter, at one and the same time. In the mean time, while these regiments were reaching their position, having cleared the path, my regiment and Robert's could have reached the point on the path where they were to file off and at an intimation from the general, at the command of each colonel, "file right--march," our regiments would have moved square off to the right of the path.
and from the river, and in a moment each regiment would have been in line of battle, parallel with each other, fronting No. 2, the left of each regiment resting on the path. This simple movement could have been executed without the slightest confusion, and in three minutes; yet General Pillow contends that the blundering manner in which he brought up the regiments, "was the only order of march by which it was possible to have placed them." I make no comment here.

The error of the General is too palpable. I attributed it, at first, to inadvertence, on his part, and should have continued to do so yet, but that he has defended the movement as right and proper; and I now find that I did him too much justice in my own mind, and place the error to his want of military skill and capacity.

Gen. Pillow, as he has twice stated, placed my regiment in position. He has denied that he changed its wings and reversed its ranks. And for the purpose of sustaining himself in this denial he has seized hold of an error in my first article, which occurred either from inadvertence or in the hast of copying for the press, and of which error he was previously informed; and for the purpose of exculpating himself and implication me in a blunder, has endeavored to make the world believe what he knows to be untrue. In my first article it was stated that Gen. Pillow directed "to rest my [his] right on the right of the path, extending my [his] left square off to the left, so as to form my line of battle parallel with the center field work of the enemy." Instead of "square off to the left," this sentence should have read "square off to the right." An officer of high rank, who participated in the assault told me in this city, that while at New Orleans, and when Gen. Pillow was reading my publication to him, he pointed out this error, and explained to Gen. Pillow that it was either a typographical error or had been hastily and inadvertently written, and was not according to the fact. He informed me, further, that he explained to Gen. Pillow the effect of this error, and showed him that it would make my regiment appear to be on the left of the path, its right resting on the left of the path and its left square off to the left, from the river--which was all wrong, because it changed the wings and reversed the ranks. Gen. Pillow, who, as my informant believes, had not up to that time perceived this inadvertence, immediately took hold of it, and, outraging all fairness and candor and known fact, has actually made it the chief argument of his defense, endeavoring to make the world believe that my regiment was on one side of the path when he knows it to have been on the other. Will General Pillow deny that my regiment was on the right of the path? He cannot. In one part of his reply he has himself confessed it. I quote his language: "By my order of attack, Wynkoop's assaulting column was to form on the left of the path, fronting the right side of the angle; and Haskell's assaulting force was to form on the right side of the path." In forming my regiment in line of battle, as my officers and myself have previously said, and as I now here repeat, the general directed me to rest my right on the right of the path. If my right rested on the right of the path, where was its left necessarily thrown? Still further out to the right. Would not this, I ask any military man, have changed the wings and reversed the rank? I challenge Gen. Pillow to deny in explicit terms, that the wings of my regiment were changed and its ranks reversed. He has not denied it. He only contends in his reply, that if he ordered me to rest my right on the path, and throw my left square off to the left, that then, by that order, the regiment was properly placed as to its wings and ranks. But have no such order, and he knows it. He rested my right on the right of the path, and threw my left square off to the right, not left, as inadvertently said in the first publication of myself and officers; and this he dare not deny; for, if he does, he well knows that every officer and private of my regiment will testify differently. I have now fully exposed General Pillow's unfair quibbling about a word, and have proved upon him the blunder which my officers and myself first charged him with, and still insist on.

The next point in the general's reply relates to his reconnaissance of the enemy's position. I pass over his admissions of his ignorance of the ground, because, as he says, the works could not be perfectly reconnoitered, with one or two inquiries. Why did he induce Gen. Scott to believe that he had "carefully reconnoitered them? And why did he assault No. 2 at all when he was ordered by the general in chief only, "if circumstances should favor him," to pierce the enemy's line of batteries, and then as near the river as possible? The order of Gen Scott was that Gen. Pillow would "march along the route which he had carefully reconnoitered, and stand ready, so soon as he heard the report of arms on our right, or sooner, if circumstances should favor him, to pierce the enemy's line of batteries at such a point, the nearer the river the better, as he might select." Now where is the point of attack clearly indicated in this order of the general in chief? Certainly battery No. 1, nearest the river. If this battery had been assaulted by the whole brigade it would have been carried. Then, turning his own guns upon the enemy, and at the same time attacking him in reverse, he could have been easily driven from the field. Instead of doing this, however, Gen. Pillow assaulted the center battery, it being the strongest of the three, with but one regiment, leaving the other three regiments unemployed! In all this I have contended, and still contend, that Gen. Pillow exhibited a total want of ability to command. [SRP]

NLR 72.316-319 July 17, 1847 "Welcome home" to Col. Alexander William Doniphan's detachment at Saint Louis

The reception of the Missouri Volunteers.

From the Missouri Republican.
The ceremony of receiving the Missouri volunteers, after their victorious march from Missouri, by way of Santa Fe, to Chihuahua and Saltillo, is at an end—and it terminated with great gratification to the citizens, and, we hope, to the volunteers who were the recipients of it.

The uncertainty which attended the arrival of the volunteers—the limited number arriving in each boat, and the very great desire of many of them to return to their homes and friends—all conspired to create solicitude on the part of those who were anxious that everything should go off well. This was the case up to yesterday morning, when, at an early hour, the Clarksville came into port, having on board Major M. L. Clark, Capt. Weightman, Lieutenants Dorn and Chouteau, and other officers, and some of the privates of the battalion of light artillery. Their arrival determined the committee of arrangements to proceed with the ceremonies, and, under their instructions, the chief marshal issued orders to that effect. Thousands of citizens, leaving their usual avocations, turned out to honor the guests of the city, and long before the time appointed for the reception, in front of the Planter's House, and in the streets leading to it, a dense multitude of people were collected. Flags were displayed in every direction and the bells of the churches and of the various engine houses rang a merry peal. Just as everything was ready for the orator appointed to welcome the volunteers, to proceed with his address, it was announced by the chief marshal, that the Pride of the West, having on board Capt. Hudson, and several other officers of the command, and also the artillery capture from the Mexicans at the battle of Sacramento, was in sight, and by common consent any further proceeding was postponed until they could arrive and be participants in it. New spirit seemed to be infused into the multitude by this fortunate coincidence. The committee of arrangements at once repaired to the boat, and, through it, Biennerhassett tendered them the hospitalities of the city, and an invitation to partake in the festival. This invitation was responded to by Captain Hudson, and in a very short time the volunteers, and the train of artillery were on their way to Fourth street, where, in front of the Planter's House, it was arranged that the address welcoming the volunteers to the city should be made.

Judge Bowlin’s welcome home.

Judge Bowlin, who had been selected for the purpose, then addressed the volunteers as follows:

Colonel Doniphan, officers and soldiers of the Missouri volunteers:

In the name, and on behalf of the people of St. Louis, I bid you a warm and cordial welcome back to the land of your cherished homes, and tender you the hospitality of their city—a city proud of her identity with your gallant achievements. In doing this, it becomes me to assure you, gentlemen, we are performing no idle ceremony, in which the heart has no participation; but it is the spontaneous homage which we, as your fellow countrymen, feel proud to award your patriotism—your valor—your self-sacrificing devotion to country. Indeed, we hail your return to your homes with no ordinary emotions; as a long anxiety for your safety, a consciousness of the perils that everywhere environed you, a doubiuousness of your false spread a gloom over the community which your security has been dispelled; and awakened, in lieu of it, mingled feelings of gratitude for your deliverance, and admiration for the heroic deeds that won it. Besides, we feel proud as your countrymen, in sharing that halo of glory which your gallant deeds have thrown around the name of the “Missouri volunteer.” You have baptized that glorious title with your blood, and laurelled it with brilliant victories, the memory of which can only perish with the language in which they are recorded. Your deeds have encircled around that hallowed name a wreath of imperishable renown, never to fade or decay:

“For the true laurel wreath which glory weaves,

Is from that tree no bold of thunder cleaves.”

We feel, upon the occasion of this meeting, as the stranger cannot feel. We feel that the perils, the privations, the dangers were yours; but that the fame acquired by your heroic achievements, is the common property of our cherished state, and reflects a luster upon the humblest citizen, who reaps, with you, your harvest of glory. What Missourian does not feel proud to be pointed at as the countrymen of the victors of Brazito and Sacramento?

Gentlemen, in thus tendering you the hospitalities of our city, it may not be inappropriate to allude to the condition of the country, the service, and notice some details of your own heroic adventure, which assumes more the character of romance than reality.

On the breaking out of the war, the promptness with which our citizens volunteered in the service not only surprised ourselves, but actually astonished the governments and people Europe. They could not comprehend that feeling of patriotism in the citizens of the young republic, which prompted fifty thousand swords to spring from their scabbards and their tendered service to their country, upon a call for a tithe of that number. They could not conceal their surprise, I might almost say their chagrin, at beholding such a display of patriotism in a country, which presents the last, best hope of republican liberty. But if that astonished them, our victories, won chiefly with those volunteers, and the demonstrations of the vast resources of the country, bare surprised them more. We have been one year in the war, we have maintained thirty thousand troops in the field, victory has everywhere perched upon our standard, the national stocks above par, whilst individual property is such that we are feeding the starving millions of Europe by voluntary contributions. We may be literally said to be conquering one nation whilst we are feeding another. The history of the world presents no parallel to this spectacle of national and individual prosperity. After a year's absence, characterized by wild adventure and heroic deeds, amidst the mountains and plains of Mexico, this is the picture of prosperity with which your country greets you on your return.

But, gentlemen, amidst the glorious achievements of this war, your own gallant march will occupy a prominent place upon the page of history. It assumes so much the air of romance, that the world will contemplate it with mingled feelings of doubt and admiration. Organized upon the frontier of Missouri, your first march was for eight hundred miles across wild and barren plains, whose solitude is only awakened by the low of the buffalo and the yell of the savage. New Mexico received you and surrendered without a blow--determined she should have no foe but yourselves, you immediately followed the conquest by an expedition against the Navaho Indians, the natural enemies of your conquered people, and by chastising them, gave the people a repose from the incursions of those daring marauders.

There being no longer a field for enterprise in New Mexico, you sat out on your daring and perilous march to join the army of occupation, with scarcely exceeding a single regiment in number. --You met the enemy in greatly superior force at Barite, and put them to flight without the loss of a single man, and entered El Paso in triumph--with the trophies of the battle field to adorn your march.--This victory, considering the disparity of numbers, the amount of loss on your side, and the results, would be left almost without a parallel, but for the more brilliant achievement at Sacramento. After a march of twenty days into the interior of the enemy's country, it was your fortune again to encounter them, their fortified position, at Sacramento. You no time to number the foe, or weigh the chances of success, but in the name of your county rushed gallantly to the charge, and with your own good swords, cut your passage to the city of Chihuahua, through hosts arrayed to oppose your advice. The loss of the enemy in this engagement, in men, in munitions of war, in trophies of victory, was great, whilst you lost but one man on your side, who fell gallantly charging upon the enemy--

"With his back to the field, his feet to the foe,
And leaving in battle no blot on his name,
Looking proudly to Heaven from the death bed of fame."

His solitary tomb on the battle-field, will serve to point the future traveler to the spot where his countrymen so gallantly triumphed in arms, and where his own spirit arose amidst shouts of victory to Heaven. Long, long will that solitary tomb attract the passing pilgrim's eyes and demand from his heart the homage of a tear. His lonely tomb shall be the battle's monument; and his fame as imperishable as the field of his glorious death.

This battle opened your passage to Chihuahua; you entered in triumph the proud capital of the north, and unfurled the stars and stripes from her battlements, and dictated terms to her people, as creditable to your humanity as to your courage.--From thence you marched Saltillo, and, having completed your glorious work, you were sent home to repose upon the laurels won by your gallant achievements.

This march, with its battles, its perils, its dangers, and its privations, is unparalleled in this or any other country. One thousand men, entering the enemy's country, and marching through it for fifteen hundred miles, meeting and scattering two armies, like the leaves of autumn before a northern blast, looks more like it belonged to the regions of romance, than sober reality. But, gentlemen, you have left nothing to doubt--your cannons and your flags, the trophies of your glorious triumphs, are spread before us, as witnesses of your glorious deeds.

In conclusion, I again bid you welcome to the shores of our own Missouri--welcome to her proud and favored city--welcome to the hospitality of her people--welcome to all that a generous and chivalrous heart casts at the shrine of valor--welcome to the homage due to the brave, welcome to our hearths and our hearts.

To this address, Lt. Col. Mitchell responded, in a brief, yet very appropriate speech.

Under the escort of the volunteer companies of the city, the procession was then formed, and proceeded to Camp Lucas. Col. Kennett was in command of the volunteer companies. We observed, among the number, the Grays, Captain West; the Montgomery Guards, Captain Watson; the Iagers, Capt. Resick; the Missouri dragoons, Capt. Steitz, and a company of mounted men. Several of the engine companies, in full uniform, were also in the procession. At Camp Lucas, an immense crowd of people had assembled, and very soon the chief marshal introduced, in fitting terms, the Hon. Thos. H. Benton, who had been selected to deliver the reception speech.

Col Benton's Speech.

The orator of the day, Col. Benton, then addressed the returned volunteers, as follows:

Col. Doniphan, and officers and men: I have been appointed to an honorable and a pleasant duty that of making you the congratulations of your fellow citizens of St. Louis, on your happy return from your much, and well entitled yourselves to the applauses of your fellow citizens, as well as to the rewards and thanks of your government. A year ago you left home. Going out from the western order of your state, you re-enter it on the east, having made a circuit equal to the fourth of the circumference of the globe, providing for yourselves as you went, and returning with trophies taken from fields, the names of which were unknown to yourselves and your country, until revealed by your enterprise, illustrated by your valor, and immortalized by your deeds. History has but few such expeditions to record; and when they occur, it is as honorable and useful, as it is just and wise, to celebrate and commemorate the events which entitle them to be known.

Your march and exploits have been among the most wonderful of the age. At the call of your country you marched a thousand miles to the conquest of New Mexico, as part of the force under General Kearny, and achieved that conquest, without the loss of a man, or the fire of a gun. That work finished, and New Mexico, itself so distant, and so lately the ultima thule--the outside boundary of percolation and enterprise--so lately a distant point to be attained, becomes itself a point of departure--a beginning point, for new and far more extended expeditions. You look across the long and lofty chain--the Cordillera of North America--which divides the Atlantic from the Pacific waters; and you see beyond that ridge, a savage tribe which had been long in the habit of depredations upon the province which had just become an American conquest.--You, a part only of the subsequent. Chihuahua column, under Jackson and Gilpin, march upon them--bring them to terms--and they bind themselves to cease their depredations on the Mexicans, and to become the friends of the United States. A novel treaty, that! Signed on the western confines of New Mexico, between parties who had hardly ever heard such other names before, and to give peace and protection to Mexicans who were hostile to both.--This was the meeting, and this the parting of the Missouri volunteers, with the numerous and savage tribe of the Navajo Indians living on the waters of the Gulf of California, and so long the terror and scourge of Sonora, Sinaloa and new Mexico.

This object accomplished, and impatient of inactivity, and without orders (General Kearny having departed for California) you cast about to carve out some new work for yourselves. Chihuahua, a rich and populous city of near 30,000 souls, the seat of government of the state of that name, and formerly the residence of the captains general of the internal provinces under the vice regal government of New Spain, was the captivation object which fixed your attention. It was a far distant city--about as far from St. Louis as Moscow is from Paris; and towns and enemies, and a large river, and defiles and mountains, and the desert whose ominous name portending death to travelers--el jornada de los muertos--the journey of the dead--all lay between you. It was a perilous enterprise, and a discouraging one, for a thousand men, badly equipped, to contemplate. No matter. Danger and hardship lent it a charm, and the adventurous march was resolved on, and the execution commenced. First, the ominous desert was passed, its character vindicating its title to its mournful appellation--an arid plain of ninety miles, strewed with the bones of animals perished of hunger and thirst--little hillocks of stone, and the solitary, cross, erected by pious hands, marking the spot where some Christian had fallen, victim of the savage, of the robber, or of the desert itself--no water--no animal life--no sign of habitation. There the Texan prisoners, driven by the cruel Salazar, had met their direst sufferings, unrelieved, as in other parts of their march in the settled part of the country, by the compassionate ministrations (for where is it that woman is not compassionate?) of the pitying women. The desert was passed, and the place for crossing the river approached. A little arm of the river, Bracito (in Spanish) made out from its side. There the enemy, in superior numbers, and confident in cavalry and artillery, undertook to bar the way. Vain pretension! Their discovery, attack, and rout, were about simultaneous operations. A few minutes did the work! And in this way our Missouri volunteers of the Chihuahua column spend their Christmas day of the year 1846.

The victory of the Bracito opened the way to the crossing of the river Del Norte, and to admission into the beautiful little town of the Paso del Norte, where a neat cultivation, a comfortable people, fields, orchards and vineyards, and a hospitable reception, offered the rest and refreshment which toils, and dangers, and victory had won. You rested there till artillery was brought down from Santa Fe; but the pretty town of the Paso del Norte, with all its enjoyments, and they were many and dainty and the greater for the place in which they were found, was not a Capua to the men of Missouri. You moved forward in February, and the battle of the Sacramento, one of the military marvels of the age, cleared the road to Chihuahua, which was entered without further resistance. It had been entered once before by a detachment of American troops; but under circumstances how different! In the year 1807, Lieut. Pike and his thirty brave men, taken prisoners on the head of the Rio del Norte had been marched captives into Chihuahua: in the year 1847, Doniphan and his men enter it as conquerors. The paltry triumph of a Captain General over a Lieutenant, was effaced in the triumphal entrance of a thousand Missourians into the grand and ancient capital of all the Internal Provinces! and, old men, still alive, could remark the grandeur of the American spirit under both events--the proud and lofty bearing of the captive thirty--the mildness and moderation of the conquering thousand.

Chihuahua was taken, and responsible duties, more delicate than those of arms, were to be performed. Many American citizens were there, engaged in trade; much American property was there. All this was to be protected, both lives and property, and by peaceful arrangement; for the command was too small to admit of division, and of leaving a garrison Conciliation, and negotiation were resorted to, and successfully. Every American interest was provided for, and placed under the safeguard, first, of good will and next, of guarantees not to be violated with impunity.
Chihuahua gained, it became like Santa Fe, not the terminating point of a long expedition, but the beginning point of a new one. Gen. Taylor was somewhere--no one knew where--but some seven or eight hundred miles towards the other side of Mexico. You had heard that he had been defeated, that Buena Vista had not been a good prospect to him. Like good Americans, you did not believe a word of it; but, like good soldiers, you thought it best to go and see. A volunteer party of fourteen, headed by Collins, of Boonville, undertook to penetrate to Saltillo, and to bring you information of his condition. They set out. Amidst innumerable dangers they accomplish their purpose; and return. You march. A vanguard of one hundred men, led by Lieutenant Colonel Mitchell, led the way. Then came the main body, (if the name is not a burlesque on such a handful) commanded by Colonel Doniphan himself.

The whole table land of Mexico, in all its breadth, from west to east, was to be traversed. A numerous and hostile population in towns--treacherous Camanches in the mountains--were to be passed. Every thing was to be self-provided--provisions, transportation, fresh horses for remounts, and even the means of victory--and all without a military chest, or even an empty box, in which government gold had ever reposed. All was accomplished. Mexican towns were passed, in order and quiet: plundering Camanches were punished: means were obtained from traders to liquidate indispensable contributions: and the wants that could not be supplied, were endured like soldiers of veteran service.

I say the Camanches were punished. And here presents itself an episode of a novel, extraordinary, and romantic kind--Americans chastising savages for plundering people whom they themselves came to conquer, and forcing the restitution of captives and of plundered property. A strange story this to tell in Europe, where back-woods character, western character, is not yet completely known. But to the facts. In the muskeet forest of the Bolson de Mapimi, and in the sierras around the beautiful town and fertile district of Parras, and in all the open country for hundreds of miles round about, the savage Camanches have hold dominion ever since the usurper Santa Anna disarmed the people; and sally forth from their fastnesses to slaughter men, plunder cattle, and carry off women and children. An exploit of this kind had just been performed on the line of the Missourians' march, not far from Parras, and an advanced party chanced to be in that town at the time the news of the depredation arrived there. It was only fifteen strong. Moved by gratitude, for the kind attentions of the people, especially the women, to the sick of General Wool's command, necessarily left in Parras, and unwilling to be outdone by enemies in generosity, the heroic fifteen, upon the spot, volunteered to go back, hunt out the depredators, and punish them, without regard to numbers. A grateful Mexican became their guide. On their way they fell in with fifteen more of their comrades; and, in a short time, seventeen Camanches killed out of sixty-five, eighteen captives restored to their families, and three hundred and fifty head of cattle recovered for their owners, was the fruit of this sudden and romantic episode.

Such noble conduct was not without its effects on the minds of the astonished Mexicans. An official document from the Prefect of the place to Captain Reid, leader of this detachment, attests the verity of the fact, and the gratitude of the Mexicans, and constitutes a trophy of a new kind in the annals of war. Here it is in the original Spanish, and I will read it off in English.

It is officially dated from the Prefecture of the department of Parras, signed by the Prefect, Jose Ignacio Arrabe, and addressed to Capt. Reid, the 18th May, and says:

"At the first notice that the barbarians, after killing many, and taking captives, were returning to their haunts, you generously and bravely offered, with fifteen of your subordinates, to fight them on their crossing by the Puzo, executing this enterprise with celerity, address and braver worthy of all eulogy, an worthy of the brilliant issue which all celebrate. You recovered many animals and much plundered property; and eighteen captives were restored to liberty and to social enjoyments, their souls overflowing with a lively sentiment of joy and gratitude, which all the inhabitants of this town equally breathe, in favor of their generous deliverers and their valiant chief. The half of the Indians killed in the combat, and those which fly wounded, do not calm the pain which all feel for the wound which your excellency received defending the Christians and civilized beings against the rage and brutality of savages. All desire the speedy establishment of your health; and although they know that in your own noble soul will be found the best reward of your conduct, they desire also to address you the expression of their gratitude and high esteem. I am honored in being the organ of the public sentiment, and pray you to accept it, with the assurance of my most distinguished esteem.

"God and Liberty!"

This is a trophy of a new kind in war, won by thirty Missourians, and worth to be held up to the admiration of Christendom.

The long march from Chihuahua to Monterey was made more in the character of protection and deliverance than of conquest and invasion. Armed enemies were not me, and peaceful people were not disturbed. You arrived in the month of May in General Taylor's camp, and about in a condition to vindicate, each of you for himself, your lawful title to the double sobriquet of the general, with the addition to it which the colonel of the expedition has supplied--ragged--as well as rough and ready. No doubt you all showed the title, at that time, to that third sobriquet; but to see you now, so gaily attired, so sprucely equipped, one might suppose that you had never, for an instant, been a stranger to the virtues of soap and water, or the magic ministrations of the blauchissee, and the elegant transformations of the fashionable tailor. Thanks, perhaps, to the difference between pay in the lump
You arrived in General Taylor's camp ragged and rough, as we can well conceive, and ready, as I can quickly show. You reported for duty! You asked for service! Such as a march upon San Luis de Potosi, Zacatecas, or the "halls of the Montezumas," or anything in that way that the general should have a mind to. If he was going upon any excursion of that kind, all right. No matter about fatigues that were passed, or expirations of service that might accrue: you came to go, and only asked the privilege. That is what I call ready. Unhappily the conqueror of Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, Monterey, and Buena Vista, was not exactly in the condition that the lieutenant general, that might have been, intended him to be. He was not at the head of 20,000 men! He was not at the head of any thousands that would enable him to march! And had to decline the proffered service. Thus the long marched and well fought volunteers--the rough, the ready, and the ragged--had to turn their faces towards home, still more than two thousand miles distant. But this being mostly by water, you hardly count in the recital of your march. But this is an unjust omission, and against the precedents as well as just. "The ten thousand" counted the voyage on the Black Sea as well as the march from Babylon; and twenty centuries admit the validity of the count. The present age, and posterity, will include in "the going out and coming in" of the Missouri Chihuahua volunteers, the water voyage as well as the land march; and then the expedition of the one thousand will exceed that of the ten by some two thousand miles.

The last nine hundred miles of your land march, from Chihuahua to Matamoras, you made in forty-five days, bringing seventeen pieces of artillery, eleven of which were taken from the Sacramento and Bracito. Your horses, traveling the whole distance without United States provender, were astonished to find themselves regaled, on their arrival on the Rio Grande frontier, with hay, corn, and oats from the States. You marched further than the farthest, fought as well as the best, left order and quiet in your train, and cost less money than any.

You arrive here today, absent one year, marching and fighting all the time, bringing trophies of cannon and standards from fields whose names were unknown to you before you set out, and only grieving that you could not have gone further. Ten pieces of cannon, rolled out of Chihuahua to arrest your march, now roll through the streets of St. Louis, to grace you triumphal return. Many standards, all pierced with bullets while waiving over the heads of the enemy at the Sacramento, now waive at the head of you column. The black flag, brought to the Bracito, to indicate the refusal of that quarter which its bearers so soon needed and received, now takes its place among your trophies, and hangs drooping in their nobler presence. To crown the whole--to make public and private happiness go together--to spare the cypress where the laurel hangs in clusters--this long perilous march, with all its accidents of field and camp, presents an incredibly small list of comrades lost. Almost all return! And the joy of families resounds intermingled with the applause of the state.

I have said that you made your long expedition without government orders; and so indeed you did. You received no orders from your government, but, without knowing it, you were fulfilling its orders-orders which never reached you. Happy the soldier who executes the command of his government; happier still he who anticipates command, and does what is wanted before he is bid. This is your case. You did the right thing, at the right time, and what the government intended you to do, and without knowing it intentions. The facts are these: early in the month of November last, the president asked my opinion on the manner of conducting the war. I submitted a plan to him, which, in addition to other things, required all the disposable troops in New Mexico, and all the Americans in that quarter who could be engaged for a dashing expedition, to move down through Chihuahua and the State of Durango, and if necessary to Zacatecas, and get into communication with General Taylor's right as early as possible in the month of March. In fact the disposable Missourians in New Mexico were to be one of three columns destined for a combined movement on the city of Mexico, all to be on the table land, and ready for the movement in the month of March. The president approved the plan, and the Missourians being most distant, orders were dispatched to New Mexico to put them in motion. Mr. Solomon Sublette carried the order, and delivered it to the commanding officer at Santa Fe, Col. Price, on the 23d day February--just five days before you fought the marvelous battle of Sacramento.

I well remember what passed between the president and myself at the time he resolved to give this order. It awakened his solicitude for your safety. It was to send a small body of men a great distance, into the heart of a hostile country and upon the contingency of uniting in a combined movement, the means for which had not yet been obtained from congress. The president made it a question, and very properly, whether it was safe, or prudent, to start the small Missouri column before the movement of the left and center was assured. I answered that my own rule in public affairs was to do what I thought was right, and leave it with others to do what they thought was right; and that, I believed it the proper course for him to follow on the present occasion. On this view he acted. He gave the order to go, without waiting to see whether congress would furnish the means of executing the combined plan; and, for his consolation, I undertook to guaranty your safety. Let the worst come to the worst, I promised him that you would take care of yourselves. Though the other parts of the plan should fail--though you should become far involved in the advance, and deeply compromised in the enemy's country, and without support--still I relied on your courage, skill, and enterprise to extricate yourselves from every danger--to make daylight through all the Mexicans that should stand before you--cut your way out--and make good your retreat to Taylor's camp. This is what I promised the president in November last, and what you have so manfully fulfilled. And here is a little manuscript volume (the duplicate of it in the hands of the president) from which I will read you a page, to show you that you are the happy soldier who have done the will of the government, without knowing its will.
"The Right Wing. To be composed of all the disposable troops in New Mexico--to advance rapidly through the states of Chihuahua and Durango, and towards Zacatecas, and to attain a position about on a line with General Taylor in the month of March, and be ready for a push on the capital. This column to move light--to have no rear--to keep itself mounted from horses in the country--and to join the center column, or cut its way out if the main object fails."

This is what was proposed for you in the month of November last, and what I pledged myself to the president that you would perform; and nobly have you redeemed the pledge.

But this not the first, or the only time, that I pledged myself to you. As far back as June, 1846, when a separate expedition to Chihuahua was first projected, I told the president that it was unnecessary—that the Missouri troops under Gen. Kearny, would take that place, in addition to the conquest of New Mexico—and that he might order the column under Gen. Wool to deflect to the left, and join Gen. Taylor as soon as he pleased. Again: when I received a letter from Lieut. Col. Mitchell, dated in November last, and informing me that he was leaving Santa Fe with one hundred men, to open a communication with Gen. Wool, I read that letter to the president, and told him that they would do it. And again: when he heard that Col. Doniphan, with a thousand men, after curbing the Navahos, was turing down towards the south, and threatening the ancient capital of the Captains General of the Internal Provinces, I told him they would take it. In short, my confidence in Missouri enterprise, courage, and skill, was boundless. My promises were boundless. Your performance has been boundless. And now let boundless honor and joy salute, as it does, your return to the soil of your state, and to the bosom of your families.

Col. Doniphan’s Reply.

In response to this address, Colonel Doniphan said:

Fellow Citizens: I return to you, on behalf of my command, our most heartfelt thanks for the distinguished reception which we have this day received at your hands. Such a reception entitles you to our warmest gratitude, and is deeply felt by those to whom it is extended. The honor conferred is greatly enhanced by the consideration of the medium through which it is presented. No selfish considerations could, we are satisfied, have induced the honorable senator to have passed this flattering eulogy upon us. The part which he has taken here today, can add nothing to his fame. From an early day, his history has been identified with the history of the state of Missouri, and a feeling of state pride has induced him to give a favorable consideration to the services rendered by the volunteers of Missouri. To him, and yourselves, I again return our warmest thanks. The minute description given by the orator of scenes through which we have passed, has excited our wonder. Indeed, so correct and minute are his details, that they resemble history, and I might almost say that they have become a part of history.

The few brief remarks which I shall make to you, fellow citizens, will of necessity, be disconnected. Man seldom speaks of himself, without vanity; and it is a habit in which I do not often indulge. Officers of the regular army, whose lives are devoted to their country, may, by their prowess--by their long continuance in the service, obtain promotion. The ladder of fame is before them; and by their deeds of chivalry, they may at length reach the top-most round. Not so with volunteers. They only enlist for a limited period, at the call of their country in her emergency; and then return, to mingle with their friends. The only reward that awaits a volunteer, is the gratitude, and warm reception, and honor of his fellow citizens. If our services have merited honor, then we have been more than repaid.

Upon returning from our arduous campaign, and when entering upon the bosom of that noble stream that washes the borders of your city—when, in passing the magnificent country seats, bright eyes and smiling faces greeted us, and white handkerchiefs were waived in honor of there turning volunteers, we felt that we were sufficiently rewarded for all our toils. When we arrived at the great city of N. Orleans, we were all unknown. That city is the thoroughfare through which have passed the heroes of Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, Monterey, Buena Vista, and Cerro Gordo—indeed, the heroes of all the brilliant victories achieved in Mexico—and it was to be supposed, that they would have been wearied long ago. Yet their patriotism, their regard for their country, is increasing. There was not a volunteer in this corps who was not proffered a welcome hand. The hospitalities of the city were extended to all. Men who arrived there in rags, were clothed—the wealthiest merchants, who never had seen them, proffered them every thing they wished for their comfort and on credit.

Fellow Citizens: It has been said of republics, which have existed heretofore, that they have been ungrateful. However true the charge may be with regard to former republics, it is not true of our own. Patriotism, talent, and virtue, have ever been remembered, in this government; and they ever will be.

It is not for me, fellow citizens, to discuss the merits of this war. But it is natural that I, for one, should say, something in relation to it. It is a strange war: when first commenced, it was denounced by a large party in our county—the party to which I belong—as a war for political purposes. But, when soldiers were to be raised for its prosecution, you find that men of all parties—the opposers and the advocates, the accusers and the accused—were ready to engage in that war, to rally under the same standard, to fight in the same tented field. What a spectacle for the people of the old world to gaze
Men who were engrossed in the strife of political prejudices were willing, like Roderick Dhu and Fitz James, to lay aside those prejudices, for the time, when a common enemy was to be engaged--to renew their dissensions, if ever, when peace should be restored. Fellow citizens--I wish that the same patriotic feeling had existed in the councils of his nation: I wish that Mexico could have seen the same unanimity in our people, in the prosecution of this war, that they have seen in our forces, in the field. I recollect well, the impression made on my mind, on one occasion, when an express sent by me to General Wool, brought me such stray papers as had found their way to general's camp--the latest dates were to the 29th of November--consequently, we had seen nothing of the proceedings of the last session of congress, or of the president's message. The first thing I cast my eye upon was a speech of Mr. Corwin, senator from Ohio, denouncing the war, and those engaged in it, as little better than a band of robbers. Gentlemen, a winter shower bath would have been pleasant compared with my sensations on reading it! Freezing--chilling! Such speeches might have been deemed patriotic in the United States; but, place yourselves where we have been, and endure what we have undergone, and then imagine our sensations. We were in a city numbering in population at least twenty times our forces, and surrounded by enemies on all sides. We had crossed the Sierra Madre, and found, when we had arrived at Chihuahua, that we were looked upon as little better than a band of robbers! Fellow citizens, the speeches which were made in opposition to this war, are said to come from the peace party; but I say that they are made by those who are postponing the peace internally!

If the honorable senator's (turning to Mr. Benton) plans had been adopted, the war would have terminated long ago. If our government had placed at the disposal of Generals Scott and Taylor, each 20,000 men, they would ere this, have subdued the whole Mexican power. To talk about guerrilla warfare is nonsense, against such forces as this. If General Taylor, with 4,500 men, whipped Santa Anna at Buena Vista, with 20,000 he would have hunted him down and crushed him! If Gen. Scott had had a sufficient force on his march from Vera Cruz to Mexico, to establish a line of communication between his army and Vera Cruz, he would, long ere this, have marched into city of Mexico, and there dictated the terms of peace.

Fellow citizens! What have we gained by this war? Of General Taylor I can safely speak, having been through all his lines of operation. He has gained four distinguished victories--perhaps the most brilliant victories that have ever been gained in this continent--and yet he has gained nothing. Why, sir, (turning to Mr. Benton), is it that the efforts of our army are like the efforts of a fevered patient, who spends all his strength in spasms, and as soon as they are over, is prostrated? After the brilliant victories which they have achieved, they have been forced for the want of men, ammunition, money, and conveyance, to lie idle until the enemy have been able to gain strength anew, and then the battles have to be fought over again. In our victories, nothing has been gained. Suppose General Taylor remains where he is, will we have gained any thing? He has been there ever since last September, and unless some better means are afforded him, he will remain there until next October! The expenses of this war are enormous. I have been told that $1,000,000 a week has been paid to sustain the war, and yet General Taylor lies in the very position he was eight months ago, and there he must lie.

Although I have not been over Gen. Scott's line of operations, yet it is clear that he cannot sustain himself from his want of means. He may take the city of Mexico, but he cannot sustain himself then--take it he may, but it is impossible for him to keep it. For Santa Anna, although he was stoned when went to the city of Mexico, from some cause has gained new strength, (some have thought that it arose from Gen. Scott's proclamation), and he will soon have an army sufficient to cope with General Scott.

It is true, fellow citizens, that this war has not been without its effect. It has had a great moral effect upon Europe. We now present to the world a spectacle such as we have never before presented. It has been said, that the United States could not wage a war of invasion. We have shown that we have waged it successfully. We have shown to the astonishment of the world, that volunteer troops can be depended upon--that private citizens can be transformed into good soldiers by a proper discipline. We have shown it at the battle of Buena Vista, where the whole force was composed of volunteers; and I defy to world to produce a parallel to that battle. The whole left wing was turned, and the myriads of Santa Anna's army came pouring down on that handful of volunteers, almost surrounding them on all sides; yet they were sufficient to drive this superior force, and victory perched on their standards. This, fellow citizens, was done by volunteers alone; it was done by volunteers disciplined in the school of Taylor, and of that scientific officer and accomplished gentlemen, Gen. Wool.

Fellow citizens--I deem it necessary to consume your time by the detailed account of our operations as I had intended to do before I closed, for Col. Benton has anticipated me in many of the remarks which I had intended to make. But, I think it my duty to address something to the soldiers who have been under my command. It is natural, that many of you whom I now address will never meet again. It is natural that I should be endeared to you, after having been united with you for more than a year, and by the battles in which we have been engaged--by the sufferings which we have endured.

You have endured much toil and hardship. It is now about to terminate. You have arrived once more in the land of civilized society, and again we are citizens mingling with our fellow citizens. Your lot has been a hard one in many respects.
Before reaching New Mexico, by two hundred miles, you were on half rations, and never afterwards, for a single day, during our long and arduous march to Saltillo, did you receive full rations. Yet all this you have borne, and you have borne it with fortitude. The order which you received to march in Major Gilpin's command, with a large column, over the Sierra Madre, covered with perpetual snow--proceeding on your march on short allowance, without tents or transportation; and many other comforts, because the Government was unable to furnish them; yet you bore it all, and were ready to resume your march in two days, on the city of Chihuahua. You have traveled over five states of Mexico, and five very large ones, in point of territory. Perhaps the citizens of St. Louis do not know what a Bonava is, but I will answer for every man in my command, knowing what they are. I may assure you, had you crossed them, you too, would have known what they are. The shortest one that we crossed was fifty miles, and one ninety five miles, which we crossed in three days in December, without wood, without water, without tents, at an elevation of 7,000 feet above the Atlantic ocean. In sending expresses to the distance of 600 miles, when I was enabled to furnish them with the means of carrying provisions and other comforts with them over immense sand prairies covered with snow, I have never made a detail, but all were volunteers, or when I have sent out parties for the purpose of watching the enemy who have had to starve for days, I never made a detail in this column, but all were volunteers, and I am proud to say it.

But your labors are over, you are now again to return to the enjoyments of civilized life; you are now to return to your homes: you are now to make glad the hearts of your fathers and mothers and sisters and brothers: you are again to mingle together with your friends. But you have not all returned--many a gallant heart, that rallied at their country's call, now lies cold in a far distant country, whilst the hearts of the fathers and mothers, sisters and brothers of some are made to mourn, others are to be made glad by the return of their friends. No soldier dreads to die upon the battle field; but to be worn down by a slow disease, far from the care of friends and the comforts of home, without the attendance necessary to the sick bed, without the tender care of mother or sister--dragged over a rough country in rougher wagons, for hundreds of miles without water to moisten the fever-parched mouth--to be worn down thus by slow disease, this, this, is death indeed. And many a gallant spirit has thus yielded up his life, and lies buried in the arid plains of Mexico, if the wild fanaticism of the country have not dragged them from their resting place, and left them to bleach in the storms and winds of Heaven. They will be remembered gratefully by their country. Their friends will have the consolation of knowing that they yielded up their lives in a patriotic cause. But you have been more fortunate. You have fulfilled every trust with faithfulness, that has been reposed in you; you have performed faithfully every duty required of you. You carry with you the gratitude of your country; you carry with you my gratitude, which never can be effaced. Your noble, heroic, conduct on the battle fields of Brazito and Sacramento will ever be remembered with gratitude by your countrymen. No peculiar generalship was displayed in these battles. If ever the rank and file of an army should have the honor of a victory, such should be the case at the battle of Sacramento. At the battle field we found the enemy. You were marched until you came in view of the enemy's redoubts planted with cannon. You were told that there was the enemy. You were marched until within the proper distance when you were turned loose! The enemy first recoiled, then gave way, then fled. The charge was impetuous. The battle was won! It was yours. It was the battle of Sacramento. Fellow citizens, I have not time to say any thing about the battle of Okachobee; but it is sufficient to say that whatever annoyance it has been to you, however our fair fame my seem to have been tarnished, you will remember that the battle of Okachobee, and the battle of Brazito were both fought on Christmas day. Fellow citizens, I will not detain you longer; may your destiny be onward, border of your great city. [Tremendous applause.]

As soon as Col. Doniphan's speech was concluded, Capt. Hudson was called for, but upon his suggestion, that a very agreeable part of the entertainment--the collation--remained to be discussed, the company adjourned to the St. Louis Park, and did full justice to the ample cheer provided for them.

Speeches and toasts followed the dinner. In answer to calls of the company, Col. Mitchell, Major Clark, Capt. Weightman, Capt. Hudson, Capt. Reid, and others, made speeches. Responding to a sentiment which had been given, Capt. Reid expressed his high gratification at the cordial reception of the Missouri volunteers on this occasion. He took the opportunity to allude particularly to his conduct while at Parras, on his march to join Gen. Taylor's column, as the advance of Col. Doniphan's command. He spoke of the former kindness of the inhabitants of Parras to Americans and strangers, while Texas and Coahuila, (in which Parras is situated), were an integral portion of the Mexican republic. Upon Gen. Wool's being obliged to fall back from this point, and to leave the hospital at Parras, he spoke in the highest terms of the kind treatment which the soldiers had received at their hands--especially at the hands of the ladies. He adverted to the time of his arriving at this place--when the Comanche Indians had been committing depredations in the very sight of the town, and to his meeting an old acquaintance from Illinois (the son of the Rev. Mr. Peck, as he was understood), who had been left behind in Gen. Wool's hospital, and to his being introduced into families warmly sympathizing with the Americans and their institutions. His sympathies were aroused in their behalf, he said, and this impulse induced him to turn out against the Indians, with only fifteen men; afterwards having been joined by 15 Americans, he attacked and defeated the Indians, and restored a large heard of cattle to their owners. Capt. Reid concluded by giving a sentiment in honor of the distinguished senator then present.

Col. Benton being called on for a toast, said that he would take great pleasure in giving one, which he was sure would be warmly received by every person who had witnessed and enjoyed the day's celebration. The ceremonies of the day had been to commemorate a most extraordinary expedition--extraordinary under many aspects, and especially under that of unparalleled exemption from losses, casualties or accidents. The celebration of the day had been attended with a similar felicity. In the vast multitude which had turned out—in the tens of thousands which thronged the streets, military and citizens, horse, foot and dragoons, carriages and carmen, men, women and children—and in the midst of the firing of cannon, beating of drums, waving of standards, not an accident of any kind had occurred to mar the universal joy! All was order and regularity, in the midst of a city of fifty thousand souls, all in motion to honor the return of citizen heroes who had gained honor for themselves, their state and their country. This extraordinary exemption from the slightest accident—this order or regularity where confusion seemed inevitable—is clearly due to the committee of arrangements, the marshal of the day and his assistant marshals, and well were they entitled to what he knew they would cordially receive the thanks of the company in a toast and a glass. Col. B. Then gave:

The committee of arrangements, the marshal of the day and his assistant marshals: to whom the immense concourse of this day are indebted for the unalloyed happiness they have felt in a celebration as happy as the expedition it commemorates is glorious. [Drank with great applause.

Colonel Grimsley, being loudly called for, came forward and stated concisely, that he did not intend to make a speech but that he would condense the sentiment of all into this—"The North American continent to the Isthmus of Darien—the progress of the Anglo Saxon and his institutions!"

Soon after, the crowd dispersed, and Colonel Doniphan and a large number of volunteers took passage on the Little Missouri for home. [SRP]

NNR 72.320 July 17, 1847 Movement of government funds to New Orleans

Money matters. The Boston city loan of $1,000,000 at 5 per cent. has been taken by various bidders, at from 90 to 99 per cent. —general average 94 cts. on the dollar. It is to be applied for the introduction of water into the city.

The New York Herald of the 15th, states that according to the custom house returns, about 25,000,000 of specie has been received in this country since the 1st of January, besides about 5,000,000 brought by emigrants.

The New York Tribune of the same day, says that there is two and a half millions of specie in the subtreasury there. The receipts at custom house average $125,000 per day. Within the last month two millions in specie have been sent to New Orleans, and half a million to the Philadelphia mint. Yesterday half a million was paid out at the counter of the subtreasury on drafts from Washington.

The New Orleans Bulletin, says that government has ordered in all six millions to that point, from the north, and that the transportation and insurance costs 11 per cent.; whole cost of moving it $67,500.

The New Orleans Picayune of the 9th says: "One million of dollars in gold arrived here yesterday on the steamboat Paul Jones, Capt. Williamson, from Cincinnati. It is for account of the government."

Government funds. We notice some fluttering in Wall street owing it is said, to the government having ordered on a few more millions of specie from thence to New Orleans, in which direction several millions have been sent within a few weeks, to defray the war expenditures. [SRP]

73.320 July 17, 1847 Col. Sterling Price at Santa Fe, Attack by Indians on government wagon trains

Col. Price was Santa Fe, with portions of several companies of volunteers. Of his movements and plans we know nothing.

On his way in, Mr. Murphy met Mr. Wethered, some other traders and two government trains of wagons, at the crossing of the Pawnee fork, detained there for three or four days by a freshest in the river. The Indians annoyed them very much, and succeeded in killing 150 head of cattle belonging to the government train.—Mr. Goodrich also lost 27 in the same way. The cattle were all speared, and their tails cut off close, to be used as trophies of victory. A Mr. Smith, of Platte county, who was on guard at the time, received seven spear wounds, one of which struck him in the throat. About this time, this party, who were traveling the river road, heard the discharge of cannon on the ridge road, and as a train of government wagons, having a piece of artillery with them, were on that route, it is supposed that an attack had been made upon them by the Indians.

Lieut. Love's command of dragoons, with the money for the pay of the troops at Santa Fe, was met a few hours' travel from the Pawnee fork, going on well.
Eight miles from Council grove, met Cunifee and other traders, waiting until reinforcements should come up. Met Capt. Shepard's company of infantry near Council grove. The companies of mounted men under Capts. McNair and Korponay, were met 15 miles from 110, going on well.

Col. William H. Russell, secretary of the territory of California, came in with Mr. Murphy, bearer of despatches from Col. Fremont for the government at Washington, stopped at his residence in Calloway county to see his family. We expect a full account of operations in California.

Mr. Murphy heard nothing of the news brought to Westport, by the "Delaware Indian," some days ago, of the attack upon a train of government wagons, and the killing of some 50 teamsters and others, near Walnut creek. [TNW, SRP]

NNR 72.320 July 17, 1847 Battle at Red River Canyon

SANTA FE.—Mr Murphy, an intelligent gentleman, says the St. Louis Republican, of the 7th instant, left Santa Fe on the 29th May, and arrived this morning.

A BATTLE AT THE RED RIVER CANYON, 150 miles southeast of Santa Fe, took place on the 27th May, between Major Edmonson with 175 men, and a party of Mexican and Apache Indians supposed to number 400, who, having stolen 150 of our horses, the major was despatched in pursuit of. He encountered them unexpectedly and under disadvantageous circumstances as he was crossing a miry place at the mouth of the Canon. He was obliged to abandon his horses, and a fight on foot continued for two hours. Two Americans were killed and a third was wounded and left on the ground when a retreat was ordered. Lieut. Elliot, in command of 27 men, principally Kaclede rangers, rendered very efficient service at this juncture. He occupied a point of rocks, and kept the enemy from advancing upon the retreating force until they had got out of difficult position. In doing the service, he had two men wounded, M.W. Wash and John Eldridge, but neither of them dangerously. All the horses were either shot down or captured.

On the 3rd June, Lieut. Col. Willock, with about 115 men, was met on his march from Taos, in pursuit of the Mexican and Indian forces. He has got upon their trail, and was resolved upon an engagement with them. He had Mr. Boggs with him as a guide. Circumstances had led him to suspect Jim Beckwith, mulatto, born in this city, but for many years employed in the mountains, as having been concerned with the Mexicans and Indians in the affair with Major Edmonson. He was found in Taos, and arrested by Col. Willock, and was taken with him on his expedition. A garrison of only fifteen soldiers was left at Taos, all of whom were on the sick list. [TNW]

Bustle of exports from Cuba to Mexico after announcement of the American administration regarding the tariff imposed on Mexico

American Mexico Tariff. A Washington letter in the New York Courier says:

"I hear from Havana, that the recent pledge given to the president, to exempt all imports under our Mexican tariff from confiscation, or any further duties to be imposed by Mexico, after a peace, has produced great excitement there, and that immense shipments of sugar, molasses, coffee, tobacco, sugars, and especially segaritos will be made from Cuba to Vera Cruz, a part to be sold during the war; but chiefly in the expectation of realizing an immense profit in the moment of peace. No doubt the same course will be pursued in Europe, on hearing of this pledge; and since the imports into Mexico will be very large and the revenue very considerable. You must bear in mind that this pledge was not contained in Mr. Walkin's Tariff, as promulgated; but the suggestion came from Scott and Taylor, and has been adopted by the administration. [SRP]

List of Killed and Wounded in the attack on Tabasco

The following is an official list of the killed and wounded:

Killed:
- James White, seaman, Spitfire.

Wounded:
- Mortally—James Mitchell, ordinary seaman, Potomac, since dead.
- Dangerously—James Hoy, ordinary seaman, Mississippi; Crosby, Etna, from explosion of gunpowder;
- Slightly—Geo. Jonson, Potomac, from explosion of gunpowder. [TNW]

Order of Com. Matthew Calbraith Perry commending the forces involved in the seizure of Tabasco

Notwithstanding the extensive and judicious arrangements made by the Mexicans for defense, they exhibited little gallantry in maintaining their well-chosen position, and the only disappointment evinced by the brave officers and men, proceeded from the fact that the enemy did not stand more firmly to their arms. M. C. Perry, Commanding home squadron.

The commodore arrived at Anton Lizardo on the 30th June, with the squadron. [SRP]

Correspondence between Mexico and the United States concerning the mission of Philip Trist to Mexico

An extra of the Republicano of Mexico, of the 28th of June, has been received at the department of state, containing copies of two notes from the minister of foreign affairs of Mexico, dated the 22d of June last, and a translation of the letter addressed to the Mexican government, by our secretary of state, on the 15th April previous. We here present translations of the two notes first mentioned, together with a copy in the original of Mr. Buchanan's letter; all of which will doubtless be read with interest in every part of our country. [Washington Union.]

Most excellent sirs: By order of his excellency, the president ad interim of the republic, as resolved in a council of ministers, I have the honor to place in the hand of your excellencies, that you may submit it to the sovereign congress, at its first meeting, a copy of the official note, addressed by the secretary of state of the United States to this government, under date of the 15th of April last, in which he declares that the president of that republic intends to dispatch, as a commissioner, to the headquarters of the army operating in Mexico, Nicholas P. Trist, esq, with full powers to conclude a definitive treaty of peace with the Mexican United States.

I likewise transmit to your excellencies, for communication to the sovereign congress, a copy of the answer which the most excellent president resolved, in a council of ministers, to have made to the above mentioned note; his excellency feeling assured that the august assembly, to which is reserved the determination on the affair to which the present communication relates, will dispatch it with the promptness and wisdom to be expected from its patriotism and its distinguished enlightenment.

I repeat to your excellencies, on this occasion, the assurances of my high consideration.

Domingo Ibarra.

To his Excellency the Minister of Foreign Relations of the Mexican republic: Department of State, Washington, April 15th, 1847.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency’s note, of the 22d February last, in answer to mine of the 18th January, proposing, on the part of the president of the United States, immediately to "dispatch either to the Havana or Jalapa, as the Mexican government may prefer, one or more of our most distinguished citizens, as commissioners, clothed with full powers to conclude a treaty of peace with similar commissioners on the part of Mexico, as soon as he shall be officially informed that the Mexican government will appoint such commissioners."

The president deeply regrets the refusal of the Mexican government to accede to this friendly overture, "unless the raising of the blockade of our (the Mexican) ports, and the complete evacuation of the territory of the republic by the invading forces, shall by previously accepted as a preliminary condition."

The president has instructed me to inform you that this "preliminary condition" is wholly inadmissible.
Such a condition is neither required by the honor, nor sanctioned by the practice of nations. If it were, this would tend to prolong wars, especially between contumacious countries, until the one or the other power was entirely subdued. No nation, which, at the expenditure of blood and treasure, has invaded its enemy’s country, and acquired possession of any considerable portion of his territory, could ever consent to withdraw its forces, as a preliminary condition to the opening of negotiations for peace. This would be at once to abandon all the advantages it had obtained in the prosecution of the war, without any certainty that peace would result from the sacrifice. Nay, more: should such a negotiation prove unsuccessful, the nation which had thus imprudently withdrawn its forces from the enemy's territory, might not be able to recover, without a cost of blood and treasure equal to that first expended, the advantageous position which it had voluntarily abandoned.

Fortunately for the cause of peace and humanity, the history of nations at war affords no sanction to such a preliminary condition. The United States are as jealous of their national honor as any power on the face of the earth; and yet it never entered into the contemplation of the great statesmen who administered our government during the period of our last war with Great Britain, to insist that the latter should relinquish that part of our territory of which she was in actual possession, before they would consent to open negotiations for peace. On the contrary, they took the initiative, and appointed commissioners to treat for peace whilst portions of our country were held by the enemy; and it is a remarkable fact, that the treaty of Ghent was concluded by the plenipotentiaries of the two power whilst the war was raging on both sides; and the most memorable of the conflicts to which it gave rise took place upon our own soil after the negotiators had happily terminated their labors. History is full of such examples. Indeed, so far as the unsigned is aware, there is not to be found, at least in modern times, a single case, except the present, in which it has been considered a necessary preliminary that an invading army should be withdrawn before negotiations for peace could commence between the parties to the war.

It would, also, be difficult to find a precedent for the course pursued by the Mexican government in another particular. The president, anxious to avoid the war now existing, sent a minister of peace to Mexico for this purpose. After the Mexican forces had attached the army of Gen. Taylor on this side of the Rio Grande, and thus commenced the war, the president, actuated by the same pacific spirit, made repeated overtures to the government of Mexico to negotiate for its termination; and although he has, from the beginning, solemnly declared before the world that he desired no terms but such as were just and honorable for both parties, yet the Mexican government, by refusing to receive our minister in the Historical documents published in Republicano of the 28th of June, 1847. [translation] first place, and afterwards by not acceding to our overtures to open negotiations for peace, has never afforded to this government even the opportunity of making known the terms on which we would be willing to settle all questions in dispute between the two republics. The war can never end whilst Mexico refuses to hear the proposals which we have always been ready to make for peace.

The president will not again renew the offer to negotiate—at least until he shall have reason to believe that it would be accepted by the Mexican government. Devoted, however, to honorable peace he is determined that the evils of the war shall not be protracted one day longer than shall be rendered absolutely necessary by the Mexican republic. For the purpose of carrying this determination into effects with the least possible delay, he will forthwith send to the headquarters of the army, in Mexico, Nicholas P. Trist, Esq., the officer next in rank to the undersigned in our department of foreign affairs, at a commissioner, invested with full powers to conclude a definitive treaty of peace with the United Mexican States. This gentleman possesses the entire confidence of the president, and is eminently worthy of that of the Mexican government.

The undersigned refrains from all comment upon the concluding paragraph, as well as some other portions, of your excellency's note; because the strong sense which he entertains of their injustice toward the United States could not be uttered in the friendly tone which he desires to preserve in the present communication. He turns from these, therefore, Caldwell—as he does with unfeigned pleasure—upon the sentiment contained in an early part of the same note, where the Mexican government expresses how painful it is "to see disturbed the sincere friendship which it cultivated with your [our] republic, whose continued progress it has always admired, and whose institutions have served it as a model."

This feeling is most cordially reciprocated by the president, whose earnest desire it is that the United Mexican States, under institutions similar to our own, may protect and secure the liberties of their people, and maintain an elevated standing among the nations of the earth.

The undersigned embraces this occasion to offer to your excellency the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

JAS. BUCHANAN.

NNR 72.327 July 24, 1847 Article from the New York "Herald" about forces in the field

The forces in the field.--It appears to us that Father Ritchie has been playing the jack-o-lantern with reference to the actual and even the prospective forces of Scott and Taylor. The administration has been active; but we understand a great number of volunteers have been declined, who would now do efficient service if they were in the field.--We understand that the whole force of Scott is as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Location</th>
<th>Number</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>At Puebla</td>
<td>6,000 men</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At Vera Cruz</td>
<td>500 do</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Along the road with trains, &amp;c.</td>
<td>1,000 do</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sick at Vera Cruz and along the road</td>
<td>500 do</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>8,000 men</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

His expected reinforcements in process of arrival at Vera Cruz, deducting casualties, cannot exceed, we suppose, in all the reinforcements for June, 3000 garrison Puebla, leaving for the march upon the city of Mexico a force of 6000 men. And if Gen. Scott has celebrated the 4th of July in the imperial city of the Aztecs, he has done it, in default of reinforcements, with less than 5000 men. So that if he is there, and fails of dictating a peace, the question will next recur how is he to get back?

Gen. Scott has conducted the invasion with singular boldness, enterprise, and success; but has he provided for the "fire in the rear?" He has not had the means. He has done the best that could be done; but how is he to progress or retrograde? He can do neither, and unless Gen. Taylor is dispatched to his relief, the prospect appears to be that General Scott must stand fast at Puebla.

But Gen. Taylor has not the men. To march with even five thousand via San Luis, he must break up all his depots in the rear, and abandon entirely the Northern departments to the enemy. Will that answer?
We think not.

The prospect is, therefore, that both armies will have to stand fast till more troops are sent down.---Ten thousand more men are wanted in Mexico, and they can be had. [SRP]

NNR 72.327 July 24, 1847 Letter from Maj. John Pollard Gaines

Letter from Major Gaines--The New Orleans Picayune of the 14th instant, has the following:--City of Mexico, June 26, 1847.

Dear Sir--I am very sorry that I have it not in my power to advise you our release from bondage.--This execrable government, in violation of repeated promises and a solemn engagement entered into with Gen. Taylor the day after the battle of Buena Vista, still detains us as prisoners of war.

On the 3d instant, I received a note from the government to present myself at the Castle of Santiago, our late prison, and there received the final determination of the authorities in our case. At the castle we were informed that we were exchanged, and that we should depart the next day for Tampico--the officers only, without the men--and were directed to go to the palace, receive our instructions, expense money, &c., &c., preparatory to our departure.

At the palace we were told to call the next day, and on the next day we were informed that they were without means to send us, and that we could not go. Thus were our hopes blasted, after having made all necessary preparations on our part for the trip. This disappointment was the more galling because the reason assigned was known to be a mere subterfuge, and it turned out that four days afterwards our men, one hundred and seventy in number, were sent off to the same place without our knowledge, which required a much larger sum than it would have required to end the officers.

Indeed, it would have taken a very small additional sum to have sent us with them, and that we would cheerfully have paid ourselves. By sending off the men without our knowledge, they were subjected to great suffering and inconvenience on a long road to Tapioca, without the preparation necessary in the way of clothing, shoes, &c., which were then in fact being furnished them. The true reason why the officers were not allowed to accompany them remains to be seen. Since that time (the 4th) I have heard from this infernal government, if government it may be called, but today I have received an assurance from Gen. Scott that immediately upon his arrival in the vicinity of the city, which will surely be within twelve days, he will make a peremptory demand for us. It will be complied with, I think. You may therefore look for me early in August.

Gen. Scott we are assured has made every possible effort to procure our enlargement, but to no purpose. His approach to this city will certainly take place in a very few days. His measures preparatory to moving are all taken, and preparations nearly complete. He comes with a force sufficient to accomplish his object effectually.

I have received no letters from the states except one from A. K., since my captivity, so that the world as to me may be said to be hermetically sealed up. [Here follow passages of a nature altogether private and domestic, and the letter concludes as follows:]

I have now the most positive information of Gen. Scott's readiness to move on his capital within the next three or four days. He will have an easy conquest.

My intercourse with Gen. Worth is frequent. By his generous conduct towards me, he has endeared himself to me for life.

Your affectionate brother,

JNO. F. GAINES.

The Picayune remarks--

We regard these remarks of Major Gaines upon the movements of General Scott as of the utmost interest. He is a cool and cautious gentleman, guarded in what he says or writes, and must have strong grounds for the judgment he expresses as to the Mexican means of defense. We confess that our opinion as to the degree of resistance General Scott will encounter from the Mexicans has been modified by this letter; but that Gen. Scott would promptly and thoroughly flog the Mexicans when he met them, we have never doubted. This letter confirms the expectation of our Vera Cruz correspondent, and of the editors in the city of Mexico, that General Scott would advance from Puebla about the last of June. We look eagerly for further arrivals from Vera Cruz. [SRP]
Tennessee Volunteers - The Jonesborough Tennessee Whig has the following statements respecting the two regiments of Tennessee volunteers who went through a year's service in Mexico.

Colonel William B. Campbell's first regiment of Tennessee volunteers numbered one thousand brave men on their march to Mexico. Only three hundred and fifty, rank and file, of this gallant regiment, returned with their colonelcy to their homes.

Colonel William T. Haskell's second regiment of Tennessee volunteers numbered 1040 on their march to Mexico. Only 360 of those gallant men, rank and file, returned with Col. Haskell to their homes and friends - their wives and children - their fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, and other relatives and friends.

The rest of the, thirteen hundred and thirty, sickness and bullets, disease, and shot and swords, have consigned to an early grave in a foreign land, far from their native home, without coffins and winding sheets, or headstones, to tell who they are or where they are. [TNW]

Gen. Pierce had not left Vera Cruz with his detachment of troops. It was expected that he would do so in two or three days. [ANP]

On the 26th ultimo rumors which the Republicano calls very alarming were in circulation in the capital. It said that the Mexican government had acceded to the mediation of England; and that the English secretary of legation had been down to Puebla and returned on the 24th; that the object of his visit to negotiate with Gen. Scott a treaty of peace; that the terms agreed upon between them would be the surrender of the Californians to the Americans, the recognition of the independence of Texas, and the acknowledgement of the line 36 degrees as the northern boundary between the United States and Mexico. - The line would give Santa Fe and over a third of New Mexico to the United States.

The Republicano has no faith in these rumors. It denounces them as false, but at the same in such a manner as to betray its fears lest the rumors should be true. The existence of these rumors confirms the information we derived from a distant source in Vera Cruz, that Mr. Buchanan's letter was transmitted through the English embassy. The same considerations may lead the reader to attach some faith to the terms of treaty, which are enumerated above. The English secretary returned to the city of Mexico on the 26th, and at the same time these rumors obtained general currency. [KAM]

Mexico - The U.S. brig Washington, Lieut. S.P. Lee, arrived below Mobile on the 12th instant; in eight days from Anton Lizardo.

Nothing later had been heard from Gen. Scott, No news at Vera Cruz.

The Raritan and the Potomac, the former from Tabasco and the latter from Vera Cruz, had sailed for Norfolk.

There were lying at Anton Lizardo the steamships Mississippi and Vixen, and the ships Albany, Germantown, John Adams and Decatur. The health of the squadron was good.

The Washington left Anton Lizardo on the evening the 4th. On the morning before she sailed the steamer Vixen arrived from Tabasco bringing intelligence that shortly after Com. Perry left Tabasco, Commander Bigelow, who had been left in charge of that post, went out about six miles from the town and attacked and put to rout a largely superior force of the Mexicans, with the loss of two killed and some six of eight wounded. The Mexican loss not ascertained. Lieut. Rodgers understood the Mexicans were commanded by Col. Garcia, and that they numbered some five or six hundred. Com. Bigelow's command consisted of some three hundred sailors and marines. Com. Perry was preparing to sail for Tabasco.
The steamer Mississippi. On the night of the 2nd of July, about 10 o'clock, shortly after the officers and crew of the war steamer Mississippi had turned in, an alarm was caused on board by an apprehension of the ship being on fire, which was induced by the smell of burning wood and an unusual quantity of smoke in the engine room. The fire was at last discovered in one of the coal bunks, and soon extinguished. It is attributed to spontaneous combustion on account of there being an unusual quantity of sulphur in the coal. [TNW]

NNR 72.327-8 July 24, 1847 Mexican Congress summoned, apparently to consider appointment of Nicholas Philip Trist. Rumor of British mediation in arranging a peace. Forces in the field.

City of Mexico.--The Picayune says:--Our files of papers from the city of Mexico, by the way of Vera Cruz, come down to the 29th of June. A summons for Congress to assemble we find in almost every paper we open. We presume it is summoned to take into consideration Mr. Buchanan's letter announcing Mr. Trist's appointment. It is certain that no quorum had been assembled up to the 29th ultimo. The Republicano publishes daily the list of members present and absent. They have several times come very near a quorum, and there is doubtless a sufficient number of members in the city to from one. Seventy one are required; sixty were present on the 25th.

The papers of the city appeared to expect that the American army would move from Puebla by the end of June. They say not a word in their later numbers of their own means of defense, or indeed of their own army. In this particular they show perfect acquiescence in the wishes of Santa Anna. We see no allusion in the papers to the fact which we have stated elsewhere upon the different authority that Gen. Scott had given the government to the 39th ultimo to consider of Mr. Buchanan's letter before pushing on the capital. The Republicano says our army is too insignificant to advance, but hopes it is true that Gen. Scott intends doing so, as it will afford a good test of the fidelity of those Mexicans who have pledged themselves to defend the capital till death. This reads much like a sneer at the Mexican officers—a thing the Republicano is very capable of doing.

On the 26th ultimo rumors which the Republicano calls very alarming were in circulation in the capital. It was said that the Mexican government had acceded to the mediation of England; that the English secretary of legation had been down to Puebla and returned on the 24th; that the object of his visit to negotiate with Gen. Scott a treaty of peace; that the terms agreed upon between them would be the surrender of the Californians to the Americans; the recognition of the independence of Texas; and the acknowledgment of the line 36 degrees as the northern boundary between the United States and Mexico. The line would give Santa Fe and over a third of New Mexico to the United States.

The Republicano has no faith in these rumors. It denounces them as false, but at the same in such a manner as to betray its fears lest the rumor should be true. The existence of these rumors confirms the information we derived from a distant source in Vera Cruz, that Mr. Buchanan's letter was transmitted through the English embassy. The same considerations may lead the reader to attach some faith to the terms of treaty which are enumerated above. The English secretary returned to the city of Mexico on the 24th and Mr. Buchanan's letter was published on the 26th, and at the same time these rumors obtained general currency.

The Republicano gives the following as the result of the election for president made on the 15th May:

Queretaro, Oajaca, and Michoacan voted for Gen Herrera.
Mexico, Guanajuato, and San Luis Potosi voted for Senor Angel Trias.
Puebla voted for Senor Ocampo.
Chiapas voted for Senor Anaya.
Chihuahua voted Gen. Santa Anna.
Durango voted for Senor Elorriaga.
Zacatecas voted for Senor Lafragua.
Jalisco, Coahuila, Vera Cruz, Tabasco, Yucatan, New Leon, the Californians, and New Mexico did not vote.

There is too, a dispute about the vote of Oajaca; a revolution having occurred there since the vote was given to Gen. Herrera, and the new legislature voted Gen. Santa Anna.

The eighty first article of the constitution provides that, to make an election valid, three fourths of the states entitled to vote must vote. As there are twenty three states entitled to vote at the election and only fifteen votes were cast, being less than three fourths, the election has failed. Nor can congress proceed to elect, says the Republicano; for, having concluded its mission of forming a constitution and sworn to the fundamental code, it has no power left to exempt itself from the operation of the law. [SRP]
Camp of Instruction.- General Hopping, now in this city, proceeds immediately to Mier, to superintend the formation of a camp of instruction at that place, for the troops now here and to arrive out for Gen. Taylor's column. The 18th regiment entire, is now at Camargo, and will be the first at the camp. Two companies of the 18th regiment passed up the river on Monday; one company is in fort Paredes, where it will remain for the present, and two more are at the Brazos, expected up. The other five companies of this regiment are yet to arrive. The 10th regiment, complete, is in camp of instruction, when relieved by the Illinois troops, understood to be on the way out. The battalion of third dragoons, now here are under orders to remove the camp, but their march is delayed in consequence of the non-arrival of horses.

In addition to the troops above mentioned, the following forces, raised and to be raised, under the recent call for volunteers, and assigned to Gen. Taylor, will enter Gen. Hopping's school at Mier as fast as they arrive:

One regiment of infantry from Indiana and one from Ohio; one battalion ( 5 companies ) from N. Jersey; one battalion ( 5 do. ) from Delaware and Maryland; one battalion ( 5 do. ) from Alabama; one company of foot from Florida; four companies of horse from Illinois, Arkansas, Ohio, and Alabama; two companies of foot from Virginia, and one company from North Carolina.

The troops will be exercised in their studies at this school under Col. Belknap, and when they shall have passed through a course of instruction under him, they will be fully prepared to fight under Gen. Taylor's invincible banner. [TNW]

From the Baltimore "American" about the inadequacy of troops in the field

"If General Scott had had a sufficient force," said Colonel Doniphan, in his speech at St. Louis, "on his march from Vera Cruz to Mexico, to establish a line of communication between his army and Vera Cruz, he would long ere this, have marched into the city of Mexico, and there dictated the terms of peace."

This declaration is not likely to be doubted. But instead of supplying men enough, Gen. Taylor was stripped of his regulars and left in a perilous position while Gen. Scott's force, increased by the deprivation of Taylor, was still left inadequate. Peter was robbed and Paul was not paid.

It was known to the government that a large portion of Scott's army when he landed at Vera Cruz consisted of twelve months men whose period of service must soon expire. The entire aggregate of his force was never large enough to allow him to march three hundred miles into the heart of an enemy's country, leaving garrisons at every town, with troops sufficient to escort the trains and to keep up communications with Vera Cruz--and not only to do this, but to fight his way as he advanced, and then at the end of his long and dangerous march to assault and carry and occupy the capital of the enemy's country--a city of more than one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants.

Scott's entire force, we say, when he landed at Vera Cruz, was not sufficient for all this. He had scarcely more than half enough men--taking into the account detachments for garrisons and escorts and the losses in battle and by the diseases of the climate. Yet of his aggregate force a large portion soon left him--their period of enlistment being at an end. The Union talked much of reinforcements which were to arrive in time to supply and more than supply the places of the twelve months' men. By the last of June or the first of July we were told that Scott would have 20,000 men under his command and Taylor 10,000. The fact is not so. There are rumors that Taylor has been stripped again; that the reinforcements which had been sent him, in reliance upon which the old hero had made all ready for an advance on San Luis Potosi, have been withdrawn from him to be added to Scott's army.

Whether this be so or not to the full extent, it is very certain that the assurances of the Union as to Scott's 20,000 and Taylor's 10,000 men by the first of July, are not made good by facts. The case is altogether otherwise. At the last advices Scott was at Puebla, awaiting reinforcements; and as for the brave old chief at Monterey, he has been kept for eight or nine months in the valley of the Rio Grande without the power to advance. If he had been supplied with men and means the storming of Monterey, last September, would have been the thundering prelude to the fall of San Luis--the capture of Zacatecas--the procession of the city of Mexico. But as fast as he accumulated men they were taken from him and he has had to do garrison duty for nearly a year, with one grand episode at Buena Vista.
During all this period in proportion as our gallant soldiers have brought honor and glory to our arms in the field, the administration has been making itself ridiculous at home. Last fall it was announced that no more men were needed for the army; and companies of volunteers offering for service were rejected. In a little while afterwards came the president's call for nine new regiments. This was in November. The administration had passed through one of its intermittent hallucinations concerning negotiations and pacifications and all that. These fits come on periodically, it would seem, and are followed by spasms. There was the Santa Anna admission crisis, which paralyzed operations on the Rio Grande for a while. Why reinforce Taylor when peace was so surely at hand by the good offices of Santa Anna? Next followed the Buchanan negotiation through Com. Conner, which was so confidently relied on for peace that the secretary of war in November declared that no more men would be needed. Afterwards came the Atocha mission—a miserable abortion; and now we have the Trist overture, which is likely to be worse.

These are the hallucinations. The spasms follow immediately after the patient has obtained a lucid interval; they exhibit themselves in paroxysms of martial fury and incoherent patriotism. The Union vents columns of enthusiasm and speaks of nothing but "gun, drum, trumpet, blunderbuss, and thunder." These tones are raised with anathemas against "Mexican Whigs" and eulogies upon Mr. Polk, with occasional rhapsodies about the halls of the Montezumas.

But in truth the patience of the nation is sorely tried by these repeated and aggravated exhibitions of irresolution, infatuation, and imbecility, which are persisted in with an insane obstinacy which is as provoking as it is foolish. In the meantime the lives of our gallant men are wasted in Mexico; treasures are squandered; debts are accumulating; the war drags on, and every body is growing sick of it. What next? Mr. Trist is coming home, the newspapers say, with his finger in his mouth. No peace; no signs of peace. Gen. Scott, too weak to advance, cannot remain where he is without danger of having his communications cut off. If he had twenty thousand men, apart from garrisons and detachments, twenty thousand fighting men in one body, he could enter the city of Mexico as a conqueror should, and from the National Palace he could dictate with dignity the terms of an adjustment which Mexico would have to observe and in due time sanction. This is what the government should have enabled him to do long since. [SRP]

NRR 72.328 July 24, 1847 Article from the Alexandria "Gazette" questioning the administration's energy and vigor in prosecuting the war

From the Alexandria Gazette.

The Washington Union says that "it is the fixed determination of the government to prosecute the war with all possible energy and vigor" until peace be obtained. With all due respect, we must be permitted to doubt it. Our gallant soldiers fight with energy and vigor, whenever an opportunity is afforded them, but as to any energy or vigor on the part of the administration in its management of the war, we have yet for the first time to see it, save on paper. In the very first war message of Mr. Polk, on the 11th of May, 1846, he invoked congress "to place at the disposal of the executive the means of prosecuting the war with vigor, and thus hastening the restoration of peace." Two days after, congress placed at his disposal fifty thousand volunteers and ten millions in money. On the 16th of June following, Mr. Polk states his determination to prosecute the war, "vigorously," and asked, in order that "no contingency should be permitted to occur in which there would be a deficiency in the treasury for the vigorous prosecution of the war," that "authority be given to issue treasury notes or to contract a loan." This was granted. All the men and all the money subsequently asked for have been granted, and all the messages of Mr. Polk have reiterated the determination of the administration to prosecute the war with all possible energy and vigor. Notwithstanding all these professions, and notwithstanding the fact that congress has granted all the supplies of men and money asked for, (except the lieutenant general), the war has never to this day been "prosecuted vigorously," in the sense in which the administration journals use that term.

Our troops have done all that brave men could do, but they have always been left by the administration with such limited means, both of men and supplies, that they have never, in a single instance, been able to follow up their victories as they might have done had the administration performed its duty. So far from adopting or encouraging a "vigorous prosecution" of the war, the administration appears to have done every thing in its power to prevent it. Instead of retaining and employing the volunteers raised by General Gaines, at a time when their services would have proved of more importance probably than at any subsequent period of the campaign, and when they could have been employed under the act of 13th May, 1846, they were disbanded. Subsequently thousands of volunteers who offered themselves have been rejected, and it is but a few weeks since the services of a company raised in Wilmington (Del.) were refused, although both Gen. Taylor and Gen. Scott are well known to have their hands tied for want of troops. The Union some weeks ago published elaborate statements showing that by the first of July, Gen. Scott would be at the head of 20,000 men, and Gen. Taylor at the head of 10,000; and yet, at the last dates from Gen. Scott, his force did not exceed 8,000 effective men, including the garrisons at Jalapa and Perote, while only about 3,000 were on the march from Vera Cruz to reinforce him; and General Taylor had only about 5,000, including every man bearing arms, from Brazos to Buena Vista. Thus has it ever been; and while the president has authority... to employ (regulars and volunteers) something like 80,000 men, we doubt whether at any one period since the war commenced we have had one-fourth the number in the field. With these facts staring us in the face let us hear no more from the administration or its organs about "a vigorous prosecution of war." [SRP]

NNR 72.328 July 24, 1847 Article from the Washington "Union" about the troops in Gen. Winfield Scott's Army

The Washington Union of the 19th, has the following statements respecting the armies in Mexico:

Troops in Gen. Scott's army. We learn at the adjutant general's office that more than 7,000 troops (new regiments and reorganized companies of the old) have been sent to reinforce the army under Major Gen. Scott; and that official reports have been received which show that nearly 5,000 had arrived at Vera Cruz between the 24th of May and 26th of June, and which we understand have been pushed forward to join the advancing column of the army with all practicable expedition.

The entire force in advance of Vera Cruz, operating in the interior, and moving in the direction of the capital, exceeds fifteen thousand. These are of course exclusive of the garrisons at Tampico and Vera Cruz. It is impossible to determine what deduction should be made on account of the sick; but, according to the best judgment of the military men, it should be put down at not less than 2,000; which would make the efficient force in the heart of Mexico about thirteen thousand, exclusive of staff corps.

The army under Gen. Scott must soon be further increased, since more than 2,500 are known to be en route for Vera Cruz; among which are six companies of the United States infantry, and several companies of marines, &c. In addition to these, a respectable number of troops, of an effective character, are now rising, and will be promptly en route for General Scott's army.

We will say, once for all, that the pay rolls--that infallible test of numbers--will show that the forces in Mexico, under Major General Scott and Major General Taylor, in the month of July, will exceed 30,000. [SRP]

NNR 72.329 July 24, 1847 Letter from Monterey

Monterey, Mexico, June 20, 1847.

Nothing of any note has transpired since my last, and we are all in pretty much the same condition now as then, except that the prospect of moving upon San Luis has grown a little brighter; and we look forward to the arrival of the 1st of September with considerable importance--at least the majority of those here do. I understand that Gen. Taylor has been apprised from headquarters that three of the ten regiments and one battalion of the 3d regiment of dragoons are assigned to his column, and that three of the volunteer regiments recently called for are also to be assigned him. They will probably be in the field by the latter part of August and ready to march by September.

Accounts of the crops in the interior are very flattering; the wheat crop is said to be unusually fine and corn also gives token of an abundant harvest. This is very cheering, as by the time a movement is made the corn harvest will be at its very height, and there will be no difficulty in foraging the animals. The army will probably be subsisted upon fresh beef on the route, to avoid the necessity of transporting salt provisions, and levies will be made on the surrounding country. I am perfectly elated with the prospect of going to San Luis and coming home by the other route. I imagine that General Taylor will visit the states late in the fall, after penetrating into the interior and uniting with Gen. Scott. If his return to the states does not create a sensation exceeding anything of the kind within the memory of "the oldest inhabitants" I shall be most egregiously mistaken; and never was there a more deserving object of admiration and respect than the brave old general who has so valiantly and bravely sustained the honor of our flag, borne it from the bleak sand hills of Corpus Christi, and planted it triumphantly over the yawning gullies of Buena Vista, which were red with the blood of the conquered foe. Never did that spot so well deserve the name of Buena Vista as when our flag unfolded its beauties over that field of deadly strife. In the space of one short year how many brave deeds have been accomplished--what victories won! and in the short space of time how firmly and closely has the brave leader of brave men become "enshrined in the hearts of his country men?"

A Mexican of considerable intelligence arrived direct from San Luis Potosi a few days since, and reports that General Taylor has been expected there for some time. He states that there are some regular troops there, but no very large force, and that but little had been done towards fortifying the place.

By far the most important news he brings is a report which was in circulation in San Luis, and of the correctness of which no doubt was expressed, that Santa Anna had resigned the command of the army and his office of president and retired. If the reports of the general feeling against him have any foundation, he perhaps resigned none too soon to save his precious life. Mexicans here state that Urrea has levied a tax upon all the inhabitants in this region for the support of his forces, and that he has agents attending to its execution. All those who have arms are directed to keep them in good order and be ready at a moment's warning to stand forth again to protect their soul. It is thought by the Mexicans here, and they could not be made to believe otherwise, that Gen. Taylor contemplates a very speedy movement upon San Luis, in consequence of all the troops being sent on to Saltillo immediately after their arrival here, and Urrea is said to have expressed his intention of retaking Monterey as soon as Gen. T. departs. I am afraid that he will be disappointed in his expectations. That Urrea has issued orders and promulgated an address I cannot and do not doubt. Why should he not as well as Canate?

Eight companies of the North Carolina regiment, Col. Payne, part of who arrived with the last train from below, marched up to Saltillo on Thursday, and apparently with pretty full ranks. A part of the Massachusetts regiment is at Cerralvo and the rest at Camargo, and are soon expected up. There have been a great many discharges in the Virginia regiment of sick; incompetent to perform duty, and the great portion of them were never fit to perform duty when they were mustered into the service in Virginia. Government has been put to the expense of bringing them out here to be kept on the sick list the greater part of the time and finally discharged. The mustering officer of course is the person to blame for not having the men properly inspected. Captain Carrington and Lieutenants Kinney and Ashby are under orders to proceed to Virginia to raise recruits to fill up the companies to their proper standard.

Gov. Early, in consequence of the exorbitant prices demanded for all sorts of marketable matters, meats and vegetables, has been compelled to fix prices for everything at reasonable and remunerative rates. The Mexican hucksters are in a great rage about it, but, to make use of a vulgar expression, have to "grin and bear it." J.E.D. [SRP]

NNR 72.330 July 24, 1847 News of Naval Operation in the Pacific

From a private letter received yesterday, we learn that Monterey has been fixed upon, by Governor Kearny and Com. Shubrick, as the temporary seat of Government for the territory.

The point for the permanent seat of government has not been determined upon, and probably will not be by the existing authorities, but will be left to the people.

The entire northern Pacific squadron of the U. States are, no doubt, at Monterey, with the exception of the Cyane now at this port. Their destination is not yet know; but it is probable that a greater part of them will be stationed along the coast. The Warren will be sent home if, after inspection, she is not considered seaworthy. The Savannah, it is thought, will also be sent home.

The members of the legislative council have not yet been appointed; and it is not likely that they will be, until the nominations from the various parts of the country are sent in.

Our Monterey correspondent informs us that Capt. Turner left that place on the 2nd inst. for the Pueblo of the Angels, with orders from Governor Kearny to disband or reorganize the California battalion, and to forward all the Government archives to Monterey. Col. Fremont has been ordered to Monterey.

NNR 72.330 July 24, 1847 Establishment of civil government in California, proclamation, choice of a seat of government

From California. The Washington Union says the latest dates from Mazatlan are to the 1st May. Commodore Shubrick, in the Independence, was blockading that port, but would probably leave for the Sandwich Islands to refresh his crews, having had no vegetables since leaving Valparaiso in December. He will return from the Islands to Monterey. Commodore Biddle was at Monterey on the 19th April. The Preble had not arrived. The Congress was at San Diego, but was expected soon at Monterey. The Portsmouth was off San Jose on the 27th--all well. The Warren was employed transporting volunteers from San Pedro to San Francisco. The store ships Xylon and Mount Vernon had both reached Monterey, and the squadron is well supplied with provisions. The Portsmouth had been employed in taking possession of the towns in Lower California, on the gulf; but at no place was there the means of making resistance to our flag.

A file of "The California Star," a weekly journal edited by E. P. Jones, at Yerba Buena, in California, extends through January and February, and down to March G, inclusive contains very little intelligence which has not been received by previous arrivals. The "Star" of the 27th February gives the following: "Civil Government. Gen. Kearney sailed from this port in the United States frigate Savannah, Capt. Mervine, on Thursday last, for Monterey, where it is understood, in conjunction with Com. Shubrick, he will immediately commence the important work of organizing a civil government for California.

From the California Star, March 6.

We are indebted to our Monterey correspondent for a copy of the circular just issued by Gen. Kearny and Com. Shubrick, which will be found in our paper today. It will be seen by the circular that Gen. Kearny is now Governor of California, and has already entered upon his duties as such. It will also be observed that Com. Shubrick, according to the present arrangement of our government, is to have command of the northern Pacific squadron, and to have control of the important trade of California and the general supervision of the American commerce in the Pacific:

Circular--To all whom it may concern, be it known:

That the president of the United States, desirous to give and secure to the people of California a share of the good government and happy civil organization enjoyed by the people of the United States, and to protect them at the same time from the attacks of foreign foes, and from internal commotions, has invested the undersigned with separate and distinct powers, civil and military; a cordial co-operation in the exercise of which, it is hoped and believed, will have the happy results desired.

To the commander in chief of the naval forces, the president has assigned the regulations of the import trade, the conditions on which vessels of all nations (our own as well as foreign) may be admitted into the ports of the territory, and the establishment of all port regulations.

To the commanding military officer, the president has assigned the direction of the operations on land, and has invested him with administration functions of government over the people and territory occupied by the forces of the United States.

Done at Monterey, capital of California, this first day of March, A. D. 1847.

W. BRADFORD SHUBRICK, Commander in chief of the naval forces. S.W. KEARNY. Brig Gen. U.S.A. and Governor of California.

From a private letter received yesterday, we learn that Monterey has been fixed upon, by Governor Kearny and Com. Shubrick, as the temporary seat of Government for the territory.

The point for the permanent seat of government has not been determined upon, and probably will not be by the existing authorities; but will be left to the people.

The entire northern Pacific squadron of the U. States are, no doubt, at Monterey, with the exception of the Cyane now at this port. Their destination is not yet known; but it is probable that a greater part of them will be stationed along the coast. The Warren will be sent home if, after inspection, she is not considered seaworthy. The Savannah, it is thought, will also be sent home.

The members of the legislative council have not yet been appointed; and it is not likely that they will be, until the nominations from the various parts of the country are sent in.

Our Monterey correspondent informs us that Capt. Turner left that place on the 2d inst. For the Pueblo of the Angels, with orders from Governor Kearny to disband or reorganize the California battalion, and to forward all the Government archives to Monterey. Col. Fremont has been ordered to Monterey.

Distressing account of a party of emigrants. The Star gives the most distressing details of the sufferings of the party of emigrants, of whose destitution in the mountains, on account of the snow, we have already heard. The company was composed of twenty three wagons and some sixty or eighty persons, and was a part of Colonel Russell's company, which left Missouri a year ago last May. Through some neglect or mismanagement they parted company with other wagons which reached the settlement in October last, and losing their way, were overtaken by impassable snow. After suffering much for want of water and grass, and losing many oxen, they sent forward two of their men to find assistance. These men reached Fort Sacramento, where Capt. J. A. Sutter furnished them with seven mules and two Indian vaquetos, and a supply of flour and beef. With these they returned to the company.

This was about the middle of November last, and from that time until the first of February nothing more was heard of them. Then a message came to Fort Sacramento from Capt. Wm. Johnson's, the first house of the California settlements, bringing the astounding information that five women and two men had arrived at that point, almost entirely naked, with their feet frost bitten. They said that the company had reached a small log cabin near Tucker's Lake, on the east side of the mountains, and about 100 miles from Johnson's, where they found the snow so deep they could not travel. Fearing starvation, 16 of the strongest, (11 males and 5 females) agreed to start for the settlements on foot. Scantily clothed and ill provided with provisions, they commenced a journey over the mountains, in comparison with which Napoleon's feat on the Alps was child's play.

After wandering a number of days, bewildered in the snow, their provisions gave out, and, after long hunger, they resorted to the horrid step of casting lots to see who should give up their lives and bodies as food for the remainder. As the weaker ones began to sink under their sufferings, however, it did not become necessary to take life. One after another, nine of the men died, and their bodies were eaten by their companions. Mr. C.S. Stanton, a young man from Syracuse, New York, was the first who died. He was one of those who went forward to Sutter's fort, as we have mentioned, and returned to the relief of his companions. After traveling thirty days, the seven survivors of this band of pioneers reached Capt. Johnson's settlement, as stated above.

All the five females withstood the horrors of the journey, and it seems, but only two of the eleven men, and one of them was so exhausted that he was brought into Johnson's on the back of an Indian. The party were at one time 36 hours in a snow storm without fire, and they had but three quilts in the company. One woman was obliged to eat part of the body of her father and of her brother; and there are other statements in regard to their sufferings which are too horrid to repeat. [SRP] breastwork commanding it. As the shades of evening stole over us, we were fired upon again from the bushes, the discharge breaking a man's leg on board of the Vesuvius. We opened the big guns on them again, cleared the woods of the mosquitoes, and went to bed.

At daylight Lieutenants May and Alden were sent ahead some 100 yards, to sound on the bar, and examining the obstructions, which could be seen projecting out of the water. This was a perilous undertaking, but they went boldly to work, when a shower of balls were poured down upon them from the breastwork and bushes. Lieut. May's boat, being in advance, received the fire, severely wounding him and several of his crew, compelling the boats to return to the vessel. The order was then given for the forces to embark in the boats and form into line, three deep, in the middle of the river. This was done with great dispatch and in beautiful order.

While forming into line, a heavy cannonading was kept up from the vessels. At a signal given from the commodore, the steamers ceased firing, the men gave an awful shout, 700 men dipped their blades into the water, and a thousand Yankee tars stood on the banks of the Tabasco.

The forces were now drawn up in the order of march; the pioneers and scouting party, commanded by Lieut. Maynard, in advance, then the marines, in the command of Capt. Edson, then the "old hoss" and suite, with his broad pendant in front, the artillery, by Capt. Mackenzie, and infantry, in two divisions, by Captains Forest and Breese, the ambulance party following after, to pick up the killed and wounded.

Marching about 300 yards brought us out of the woods into an open space; the grass and flags up to our armpits and an occasional marsh to wade through, rendering our advance extremely painful and laborious. We had ten field pieces dragging after us, with twenty rounds of grape and canister, yet our tars never flinched, but dragged them through muck and mire until we planted them in the Plaza in Tabasco.

As we neared a dense chaparral skirting the woods, the Mexicans opened on us again. Caps. Mackenzie and Buchanan immediately brought forward the artillery, and opened on the thicket, the marines and infantry advancing and returning the fire at the same time. About this time the ran along the line that the enemy was advancing on the right, the field pieces were turned on them, and in the act of firing, when it was discovered to be Lieut. Maynard, with his prisoners, returning from a scouting expedition; five seconds later and they had been dead men.

The Mexicans retreated before us as we advanced, keeping up a running fire, but, rarely showing themselves. It was impossible to charge them for the marshes and chaparral; there was no means of forcing our way through the woods, the undergrowth of briars, vines, snakes, scorpions and other vegetables, rendering it perfectly impregnable. We now struck into a foot path, which we kept until we got in sight of Tabasco.

It was with the greatest difficulty that the artillery could be got along, and but for the indomitable energy and perseverance of the officers commanding them they must have been left on the road.

Our march now for two or three miles was uninterrupted by the appearance of a Mexican, but the roadside was strewn with cartridges, beds, haversacks, and other indications of people moving in a hurry. Scouting some distance in advance of the main body, the pioneers suddenly came upon a large party of the enemy waiting in a close chaparral to give us a volley as we approached. Maynard charged in upon them in gallant style and routed them out, and now you should have been there to have seen what a Texan would call a specimen of "tall walking," the Mexicans running and the pioneers after them. This was our last brush, and toward evening the advance guard came in sight of the fort commanding the approach to the city by land and water. I have never seen a more commanding position, constructed on a bluff, taking in a line of the river one mile and a half long, exposing our vessels to a raking fire the whole distance. In the fort they mounted three long 32's, three heavy field pieces, and a 24 pound carronade, and as the Scorpion and Spitfire came around the bend of the river, they opened on them from the fort with grape and round shot.

The two little steamers came steadily along, paying more attention to steering clear of the shoals than to the shot. The Scorpion coming up first opened her fire as she got abreast, the Spitfire joining in; the grape fairly rained, and soon drove the enemy from their guns, their fire slackening, and Capt. Bigelow, thinking the fort silenced, put on steam and passed up to the city, when the fire reopened from the fort, which the Spitfire returned most gallantly, again driving them from their guns.

The Scorpion at this time landing a party of men to take possession of the town, and thinking in the fort that they were about to be attacked in the rear, prepared to limber up their field pieces, when Lieut. Porter landed with a force from the Spitfire and gallantly rushed up the hill to board, when the enemy fled, leaving two of their field pieces behind all limbered up for moving off. He then spiked the guns and hoisted the American flag.

The wheelhouses of the Scorpion and Spitfire were driven in, by the shot of the fort, paddles shattered, wheel shot away, and several men and an officer wounded. With the assistance of Capt. Taylor's camels the Etna and Scourge were subsequently brought over the bar. We now formed into line, and with flags flying marched into the city.

On reaching the public plaza, the men and officers were quartered in the public buildings around the square, the commander and suite occupied the government house. Every Mexican had left the city. Not an officer of the government civil or military, could be found in the place. We were in the city nine days, during which time not an outrage was committed by a man, and private property respected most rigidly. At night our jolly tars would assemble together in squads of a hundred in the plaza, and sing their sea songs.

The ladies always assembled in the balcony of the Spanish consul's house every evening, and never left until the last note was sounded. The guns were all put on board the steamers, and the forts and magazine razed to the ground. On the 26th we left Tabasco. Capt. Van Brunt is left as governor. The Etna, Spitfire, and Scourge remained to hold possession of the place. Bruno is still in the woods, in command of 1400 men, and will no doubt annoy the vessels from the river banks. [TNW]

NNR 72.336 July 24, 1847 Prisoners Detained at Huejutla, Col. Lewis Gustavus DeRussy's Expedition to Relieve American Prisoners

From the N.O. Picayune, July 15.

From Tampico we have some verbal intelligence not without interest. The American prisoners had not arrived there, but were at a place about forty leagues distant, probably Huejutla. On the 8th inst., Col. DeRussy, of the Louisiana regiment, left Tampico, at the head of about two hundred men, intending to proceed to the relief of the prisoners.

He took with him a small force of the regular artillery, a portion of his own regiment and some of the mounted men of Tampico- a serviceable description of force raised in the town. It is more than probable that the colonel will have a brush with the enemy before he gets back. There are said to be pretty strong parties of guerrillas on the route to be followed. [TNW]

NNR 72.336 July 24, 1847 Health of Tampico Reported more Favorable

Our accounts of the health of Tampico, and especially of the Louisiana regiment are more favorable.

There is very little yellow fever in the town, and the cases have been confined to the civil hospital.- The fevers which prevail are becoming more malignant as the season advances. [TNW, SRP]

NNR 72.336 July 24, 1847 Capt. J. Mayo’s expedition in search of Caledonio Domeco Jarauta (guerrillas)

The U.S. steamer Vixen, Captain Smith, arrived at Anton Lizardo on the 4th instant from Tabasco.

Capt. Mayo of the navy and Governor of Alvarado having received intelligence that Father Jarauta was in the vicinity and designed to surprise and take Alvarado, went off in pursuit of him at the head of one hundred and fifty men, proceeding up the river. At last dates the expedition had now returned to Alvarado, nor had any account been received from it. [TNW, SRP]

NNR 72.336 July 24, 1847 celebration of the Fourth at Veracruz, train still not started from Veracruz

Vera Cruz, July 6, 1847.

Such a celebration of the glorious fourth as took place in Vera Cruz would do credit to any place in the United States.

The train which was to hale left yesterday has not yet started, and will not probably get off until next Saturday. [ANP, WWF, SRP]
By the way of Tampico, (from Mexico), we received a copy El Repulicano from the city of Mexico, of the 30th June; also the number of the 28th, which was missing from our previous file. Both papers contain matter of the great interest.

A postscript in the paper of the 28th contains a report of the proceedings of a council of war said to have been held in Gen. Scott's camp on Thursday, the 24th, the business of which was to determine whether or not to advance upon the capital. One general, whose name is not given, is said to have argued that it would be imprudent, nay, an act of madness to advance upon the city with less than twenty thousand men; that upon the supposition that every thing should work favorably for them, it was evident that they could not enter the capital without resistance: and that supposing in their different engagements they should lose half of their force or more, they would be left with some four thousand men, with which number it was extremely hazardous to attempt to hold so populous a city.

General Worth was of a different opinion. He maintained that every invader who hesitated was lost; that in their situation a single retrograde movement involved the most disastrous consequences, and that this had already been proved. He added proudly that six or eight thousand Americans were sufficient to conquer twenty thousand Mexicans; that their triumph was certain, and there was no reason for not pressing on.

Gen. Scott and others are said to have approved these sentiments, so that it was at last determined that they should commence the forward movement on the 28th, but upon the suggestion of some one that it might not be proper to act so promptly after having just dispatched the communication from the government of the United States with renewed offers of peace, General Scott replied that he would wait some days at Rio Frio to receive the answer of the Mexican government.

The American force at the time of this council was set down by the Mexicans at eight thousand five hundred men, thirty pieces of artillery, and one mortar.

The Republicano remarks upon this information: "We believe the Americans have compromised their situation beyond measure; and even in the event, certainly very difficult, that they win triumphs upon triumphs, their very victories will cause their ruin."

The council above spoken of was held on the 24th. It is not alluded to in the Star of Puebla of the 26th, nor in Mr. Kendall's letters, which came down to the 30th. Yet the facts are said to be derived from a responsible source, and they look plausible—General Worth's opinions particularly so. The Republicano of the 26th says nothing about the subject, but in that paper of the 30th is another postscript to which is prefixed in large letters "Very Important."

This postscript mentions the receipt of letters announcing the debarkation of 1,800 men at Vera Cruz from Tampico, who had marched immediately for Puebla. (This is probably Gen. Cadwallader's detachment). The letters further said that General Scott had already ordered the march of the first brigade, consisting of fifteen hundred troops with ten guns and a mortar towards the city of Mexico, when he learned that the train was detained at Nopalucan (forty-two miles this side of Puebla and fifty one beyond Perote); that he thereupon countermanded the march upon Mexico, and dispatched a force to the assistance of the train coming up.

The letter then speaks of the review of the troops which took place on the 26th. The number of troops is again set down at 8,500 men, without including those who occupy the fortifications of San Juan, Loreto, &c. But the most important paragraph is that Gen. Scott would probably postpone his march upon the city until the 10th July, to allow these reinforcements to come up. We give these various pieces of news as we find them, but the reader will constantly bear in mind that our advices from Puebla are later than those by the city of Mexico.

The Republicano, in the same postscript, thinks it very probably that Gen. Taylor will abandon Saltillo, Matamoras, and other towns in the north of Mexico, and shortly proceed to Vera Cruz to assist in the taking of the capital, which is now, it adds, the objects of the aspirations of the Americans. It is very anxious that the government should direct Generals Valencia and Salas, now at San Luis, that they harass the retreat of Gen. Taylor.

The Republicano blames the Government for not communicating at once with Mr. Trist, without referring the subject matter of Mr. Buchanan's letter to congress. It holds that it is the business of the executive thus to manage negotiations, and refer the result to the wisdom of congress. Besides it says, that in all probability it will be impossible to procure a quorum of congress. To refer overtures thus is to break them off in the outset.
That paper takes good care to prevent the inference from this remark that it favors peace. It is on the contrary opened-mouth for war. It would not grant a truce for a single day, nor omit preparation for defense. However, it concludes its article by trusting that the executive as well as congress, will show themselves "extremely difficult" in relation to peace, and not consent to one unless the conclusion of it shall protect in every particular the honor, the good name and the interests of the nation. We regard this as a concession on the part of the Republicano and of good omen for peace.

The New Orleans Timesheet of 15th inst. has the following:

Most important—Again a rejection of the olive branch! Mexico declines treating. At the moment when the Galveston was leaving Vera Cruz, a courier, with the mail from the capital, entered the city, bringing dates to the 5th instant. The principal item of intelligence brought from the city of Mexico, is of momentous character, viz: The Mexican congress, with some difficulty, had been brought together, and Mr. Buchanan's communication, containing the president's overtures for peace, were laid before them.

Their decision was immediate, and to the effect that Mexico would listen to no terms for peace. Gen. Scott left Puebla, at the head of his army, for the capital, on the 30th ult. We received this news from a passenger, and have every reason to believe that is authentic.

From the New Orleans Bulletin, July 15.

Gen. Pierce, with the reinforcements that were at Vera Cruz, exceeding 3000 men, was nearly ready to start for Jalapa and Puebla. [SRP]

NRR 72.336 July 24, 1847 Complaints Among Troops in Command at Gen. Gideon Johnson Pillow

From the New Orleans Bulletin, July 15.

Gen. Pierce, with the reinforcements that were at Vera Cruz, exceeding 3000 men, was nearly ready to start for Jalapa and Puebla.

By a passenger in the Galveston, we learn that a great deal of excitement existed at Vera Cruz, in consequence of the numerous deaths among those men of General Pillow's command, that had broken down and been compelled to return to Vera Cruz, in consequence of the mid-day's march, in the hot sun and burning sands, when they first left Vera Cruz.

The "Sun of Anahuac," printed at Vera Cruz, thinks that General Scott will not advance until he receives further orders from Washington, and is of opinion that the reply of the Mexican minister to Mr. Buchanan, informing him that his letter will be submitted to congress, denotes a disposition to deliberate upon the question of peace, instead of abruptly rejecting all overtures. NRR 72.337 July 31, 1847 Members of a legislature nominated in California

California affairs. A letter dated Monterey, Feb 1st, says:

"Seven persons have been nominated to form a legislature. They are to hold two sessions this year; the first in the town of Angeles, in March; and the second some time in autumn, at Monterey. The persons nominated to form this legislature, are the Ex-Governor of Alvarado, Gen. Valleyo, David Spencer, Esq., Thomas O. Larken, Esq., Don Juan Vandine, Don Santiago Arguelir, and E. Grimes, Esq. It is very much doubted if either of the three first mentioned persons will accept of the office to which they have been appointed; neither does this proceeding meet the approbation of the community. Perhaps it would have been better, if the legislatures had been elected; and there is some expectation that ultimately such will be the course pursued; at all events it is the method most desired. NRR 72.339 July 31, 1847 Resolution on slavery and acquired territory in the Maine legislature.

Resolutions of the New Hampshire Democratic Party convention against the extension of slavery in acquired territory

The legislature of Maine, now in session have adopted the following resolutions. It will be recollected that the administration party have the ascendancy of both Branches of the legislature.

Resolved, That Maine, by the action of her state government, and by her representation in congress,
Resolved, That the sentiment of this state is profound, sincere, and almost universal, that the influence of slavery upon productive energy is like the sight of mildew; that it is a moral and social evil; that it does violence to the rights of man, as a thinking, reasonable, and responsible being. Influenced on such considerations, this state will oppose the introduction of slavery into any territory which may be required as an indemnity for claims upon Mexico.

Resolved, That in the acquisition of any free territory, whether by purchase of otherwise, we deem it the duty of the general government to extend over the same the ordinance of seventeen hundred and eighty seven, with all its rights and privileges, conditions and immunities.

Resolved, That our senators in congress be instructed, and our representatives requested, to support and carry out the principles of the foregoing resolutions.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to transmit a copy of the above resolutions to each of our senators and representatives in congress, and to the governors of several states.

The New Hampshire Democracy. The Democratic members of the New Hampshire Legislature, responding to the message of the governor, have proposed the following resolution:

Resolved. That in all territory which shall hereafter be added to or acquired by the United States, where slavery nor involuntary servitude, except for the punishment of crime, whereof the party has been convicted, does not now by law exist--the same should ever remain free; and we are opposed to the extension of slavery over such territory; and that it also approve the vote of our senators and representatives in congress in favor of the Wilmot proposal."

It will be recollected that these are the gentlemen were endorsed by the Editor of the Union, their selection heralded as a great Democratic triumph, and Virginia was call on to imitate the example of "Glorious New Hampshire!" [Charleston Mercury]

The Ohio Statesmen contains a letter from Camargo (Mexico), which thus describes an incident of an occurrence in that place:

"A sooty Mexican, in no respect superior to the longest scented darky in Columbus, called upon the commandant of that post, and demanded his assistance in securing an eloped slave. An investigation followed. A senorita of much fairer complexion and superior in every respect to her master, her master's wife, or any of his children, had fallen, as her fairer ones of the north often do, into Cupid's snare. She married. Her hombre, either not having the means or the inclination to pay the debt for which she had been enslaved by her parents, the difficulty alluded to ensued. The then commandant, though not an abolitionist, had too much gallantry to comply with the sordid demand of the sooty master. The newly wedded pair still love, and live together in the fully enjoyment of all the connubial bliss of Mexican matrimony. Should Mexican laws, however, be again extended over Camargo, neither the tears of our heroine, nor all their Abolition brethren, could save her from the heartless grasp of her former master's tyranny." [SRP] perpetrated, and I can assure you that neither yourself nor the president of the republic can have felt deeper pain than that which I felt on the occasion. All the means at my disposal within the limits of our laws were employed, but in the greater number of cases fruitlessly, to identify and punish the delinquents. I cannot suppose that you have been so ill informed as to believe that such atrocities were committed by my connivance, order, or consent, or that they by themselves give an idea of the manner I which the war has been prosecuted in the part of Mexico. They were in truth unfortunate exceptions, caused by circumstances which I could not control.

It appears to me in point to inform you that from the moment the American army set foot upon the territory of Mexico it has suffered individually the loss of officers and soldiers who have been assassinated by Mexicans, sometimes almost in sight of their own camp. An outrage of this character preceded the melancholy affair at Cantana. I do not mention these truths with the view of justifying in any manner the practice of retaliation, because my government is sufficiently civilized to make a distinction between the lawless acts of individuals and the general policy which governs the operations of an enemy; but you have endeavored to make a comparison between our respective governments in regard to the manner in which they conduct the war, which I cannot pass without remark. In this connection it should be borne in mind that the Mexican troops have given to the world the example of killing the wounded upon the field of battle.

It is with pain that I find myself under the necessity of addressing you in a manner to which I am little accustomed; but I have been provoked to do so by the object and the manner of your communication, which is objectionable, in my estimation, as well in its insinuation as in its tone. With respect to the implied threat of retaliation, I beg you to understand that I hold it at its true worth, and that I am at all times prepared to act accordingly, whatever may be the policy or mode of carrying on the war which the Mexican government or its generals may think it proper to adopt. I am, sir, with much respect, your obedient servant.

As you have adverted to the requisition which I have made upon the people of these states to make indemnity for the losses incurred by the destruction of one of our trains, I take the liberty of informing you that this was not the act of the Mexican troops exclusively, but that the rancheros of the country were chiefly concerned in it; and that the subsequent assassination and mutilation of the unarmed teamsters were marked by an atrocious barbarity unequalled in the present war. [BRR]

NNR 72.341-342 July 31, 1847 "the war and its generals"

THIS WAR AND ITS GENERALS.

I do not propose, Messrs. Editors, to favor or to trouble you with a critique (as you might infer from my caption) upon a new work lately announced, and which has no doubt been suggested by the success of Mr. Headley’s works and of "Taylor and his generals," rather than by that of those heroes of a day whose deeds are about to be commemorated, in the forthcoming work alluded to, styled "Polk.
However inviting a theme, the martial renown of Generals Polk, Cushing, and Pillow and "Lieutenant General" Benton may be, I must leave it to the Louisville Journal and the American Punch. Of these four worthies, only one has given any evidence of his merits and this has involved him in a dispute, which, however decided, cannot but tarnish his laurels. I suppose that his abilities were not very erroneously described, when the editor of the Louisville Journal said that Gen. Pillow was only a little softer than Gen. "Cushing." The latter unfortunately has shown his prowess by breaking his own leg, instead of those of the enemy.

But to be serious:-What I wished to say was this, whatever animadversions are made upon the administration in reference to the Mexican war, however true and well timed they may be, are attributed to federalism, party spirit, and the like, and supposed to be adequately answered by the charge of "giving aid and comfort to the enemy." But there is a voice that speaks not from the present aspect of our affairs,- that belongs to no party,- that utters only the warnings of the past for the guidance of the present,- the voice of impartial history. To what can its lessons be ascribed, should they be found applicable to the existing condition of our affairs? We have been at war before, and events then have left their teachings behind them.

A few of these may be found in a work which lies before me,-written before the war of 1812 and have no reference to any immediate purpose to be subserved: It is "Lee's Memoirs of the revolutionary war in the southern department of the U. S."-a work of considerable ability and great fairness and liberality.

"Little minds," says the author, "always, in difficulty, resort to cunning, miscalling it wisdom: this quality seems to have been predominant in the Cabinet of Great Britain, and was alike conspicuous in its efforts to coerce and its proffers to conciliate."*

What quality predominated in our cabinet, when the miserable cunning was resorted to of letting Santa Anna into Mexico, in hopes that he would prove traitor to his country? Or what, in the proffers of conciliation to the Mexicans, in the various proclamations issued, and the proposal to seize all their church property? Or what, in the various arrangements for "conquering a peace" by force of arms?- The field of discussion is wide and inviting, but I shall only briefly survey it.

But again, if Col. Lee had been announcing the appointments and promotions in our army, or describing the curious efforts to put Thomas H. Benton, over it and its veteran officers, or giving an account for the battle of Cerro Gordo, how could he have closed more appropriately than in the following language.

"Thus it is," says he, "that the lives of brave men are exposed, and the public interest sacrificed. Yet, notwithstanding such severe admonitions, rarely does government honor with its confidence the man whose merit is his sole title to preference: the weight of powerful connexions, or the arts of intriguing courtiers too often bear down unsupported through transcendant worth."

And how often has this war changed its face? First volunteers for six months-then, for twelve, and many ardent ones offended by a violation of the terms of their enlistment, now they are called for the whole war. This should have been done sooner. Here comes in the wise voice of the "Father of his Country;" and how forcibly has the immoral hero of Buena Vista,-as his troops have daily melted away from him, leaving him on the borders of Mexico's sultry deserts with a handful of men-felt the truth of Washington's sentiments and the strength of his apposite and original figure. Washington, writing to George Mason, of Virginia, October 22 1781, says: "We must have a permanent force; not a force that is continually fluctuating, and sliding from us, as a pedestal of ice would leave a statue in a summer's day; involving us in expense that baffles all calculation." Such expense will be the sad result of this mismanaged war.

President Jefferson is the political stock from which the modern democratic party claim to have descended. Yet, this administration have set at nought one of his best examples. When Governor of Virginia, he adopted a system by which "Continental officers were substituted, in the higher commands, for those of the militia; which although not very well relished by those who retired, was highly grateful to the soldiers; who perceiving the perils before them, rejoiced in being led by tried and experienced men." President Polk has not only disregarded this system of Mr. Jefferson, but reversed it-by which the soldiers are led by untried and inexperienced civilians, suddenly elevated from merited mediocrity over the heads of scientific, experienced and able generals. Should any thing take General Scott now from his command, Gen. Pillow, late of the Tennessee militia, now under the serious imputations of Colonel Haskell and others, would command the whole army in Mexico!! Far, far better had the door keeper of the White House presided over the levees of the East room, or the merest pettifogger be chief justice of the U. States. Now, may doctors suddenly turn judges; carpenters, saddlers; and cabinet makers, statesmen, and philosophers!

Once more to history and I am done: - "When presidents, kings, or emperors confide armies to soldiers of common minds, they ought not to be surprised at the disasters which follow." This observations, too, is called forth by a review of the career of such men as Gage, Howe, and Clinton,- British generals bred and inured to arms. It is true that few disasters have befallen our arms, but their splendid successes have been achieved by those whom the administration endeavored to supplant and dishonor.

May its unworthy favorites never have an opportunity to verifying the evils of a system which has called them to such responsible stations—a system so unjust, impolitic, and imbecile, that it requires no disasters to cover it with opprobrium.

GEN. TAYLOR’S COLUMN.
ORDER-NO.68.
Headquarters, Army of Occupation,
Camp near Monterey, June 17th, 1847

I. Matamoros and the posts, camps, and departments below that city, to Brazos Santiago inclusive, will constitute a military district, known as the "Lower Rio Grande," under the command of Col. Wm. Davenport, U.S.A., whose headquarters will be established in Matamoros.

II. Camargo and its dependencies, from Reynoso to Ceralvo, inclusive, will constitute the district of the Upper Rio Grande, under the command of Brig. Gen. Hopping.

III. With a view to perfect the instruction and discipline of the troops, "regular and volunteer," ordered to this column, and at the same time secure their health, a camp of instruction will be established by Brig. Gen. Hopping, at some healthy position near the town of Mier.

The 3d dragoons (five companies) and the 10th, 13th, and 16th regiments of infantry, will be concentrated at that camp as soon as practicable.

IV. The 3d dragoons and 14th infantry may occupy that camp without delay. Also the 16th infantry except such portions (say four companies) as Brigadier General Hopping may deem sufficient to hold Camargo. General Hopping will establish his headquarters at the camp of instruction.

V. Of the numerous regiments and battalions of volunteers destined for this line, it is supposed that the Illinois regiment has already arrived, or will be the first to arrive at the Brazos, under the direction of Colonel Davenport; it will relieve the 1st infantry at Matamoros, where the latter corps, without delay, will join the headquarters of its brigade at the camp of instruction. All other volunteer troops, as they land at the Brazos, will be ordered forward by Col. Davenport to that camp, except one of two companies of volunteer horse, which he is authorised to retain at Matamoros, if he deem their services necessary at that place. An exception will be made of companies from Virginia or North Carolina, which, as they arrive, will be ordered, without delay, to Saltillo.

VI. As soon as the camp of instruction shall be established, Colonel Belknap will be relieved in the command at Camargo and in his capacity of inspector general, attached to the headquarters staff, will superintend the police discipline and instruction of the troops concentrated at that camp. He will report for that duty to Brig. Gen. Hopping, and by letter to headquarters on all subjects connected with his duty.

By order of Maj. Gen. TAYLOR

NNR 72.342 July 31, 1847 ESCAPE OF EIGHT AMERICAN PRISONER- THEIR ARRIVAL IN NEW ORLEANS.

The schooner Home, Captain Kinney, arrived at New Orleans on the 15th from Tampico, bringing over eight of the American prisoners who have been so long and so unjustly detained in Mexico. The names of these men are A.W. Holeman, W. P. De Normandie, William Funk, John Thomas, John A. Scott, Robert S. Cockrill, John Swigert, and Wm. Russel. The last named belonged to the Arkansas cavalry, the others to the two regiments from Kentucky.

The Picayune gives the following account of their escape.

They left the city of Mexico on the 5th of June, with other prisoners, it being understood that their destination was Tampico. They marched with a small escort in charge of a colonel and two or three other officers. On the 17th they reached Huejutla, where they were turned over as prisoners to General Garay, in command of that town, where several hundred troops were stationed. The prisoners were treated with much consideration by Gen. Garay, and much more kindness that they had before met with. They were informed by him that he had no orders to dispose of them, and although he presumed it was the purpose of the government to send them on to Tampico he had no instruction to that effect. The prisoners were furnished with twenty five cents each daily for their expenses. This money Gen. Garay appears to have raised by contributions among the town's people. After waiting here some days, seeing no prospect of release, and fearing lest events at the capital might induce the government to chance its intention of forwarding them to Tampico, they determined to effect their escape. They attempted this in small parties of five at one time, two at another and five at another. Seven in all left on the 27th- the first five were all retaken and carried back to Huejutla, but one of them again escaped and with the other seven reached Tampico. They marched principally by night and were from four to six or seven days on the route.

After their arrival at Tampico, news reached there by a Mexican that about thirty of the men had also attempted to escape, that twenty-five of them had been retaken, and three others shot in the pursuit. These were the reports in Tampico, but our informant does not place implicit confidence in them. He has little expectation that Col. De Russy's expedition will prove of any avail in procuring the release of the other prisoners. He thinks it certainly will fail, if the intention be to rescue the men by force. The movement of the colonel will inevitably be reported to Gen. Garay in advance, and if he does not feel himself strong enough to receive and attack he can very readily send off the prisoners further into the interior.

The fate of these men is greatly to be deplored and we cannot but think there has been remissness on the part of Gen. Scott in not obtaining their release. With a number of Mexican officers in our power, we would have brought that government to sense of its obligations to our prisoners, by hanging up some of their own to the first tree. [TNW]

NNR 72.342 July 31, 1847 effects of illness among the Virginia volunteers in Mexico

THE VIRGINIA VOLUNTEERS IN MEXICO.-A recent letter from the editor of the Staunton (Va.) Spectator, who commands one of the companies of the Virginia regiment of volunteers at Buena Vista states that there was a good deal of sickness among his men. His report on the morning of the date of his letter (the 15th June) told a melancholy tale- twenty-nine on the sick list, and but two officers, seven non-commissioned officers, and thirty-one men fit for duty. In speaking of this fact he says:

"It is deeply painful to me to look upon my thinned ranks. When we arrived in Mexico, not yet four months ago, we mustered eighty strong- now we are the mere skeleton of a company. But [ . . . ] of our number as yet have died, but many have become disabled by sickness, and either have been or will be discharged. As to our sickness here- I do not know how to account for it. The climate is pretty much like our own, and the water excellent."

He refrains from mentioning the names of the sick, (thinking it probable that many of them will recover in a short time) to avoid giving undue alarm or uneasiness to their friends. In a postscript to the same letter, dated at Saltillo, June 20, to [ . . . ] place his company had been unexpectedly ordered in consequence of a representation from the American governor that a greater force was needed [ . . . ] states that the health of his men had somewhat improved, and that three officers, seven non commissioned officers, and thirty-eight men were reported as fit for duty, and the remainder of the sick, with few exceptions, were getting better. NNR 72.342-43 July 31, 1847 Disturbances in and Around Tabasco

From Tabasco.-- The editors of the N. Orleans Times have been favored with the following extract of a letter, dated,

" Tabasco, June 30, 1847
"We have been far from tranquil ever since the departure of Commodore Perry; small parties of Mexicans having entered the town at night and fired upon the sentries.

"This has led to the burning, the day before yesterday, of about two hundred houses at the back and south end of the city, by order of our governor and military commander. Yesterday reinforcements of about 110 marines and sailors were sent up by Commodore Perry from the bar, and this morning about 250 men have gone out to try and meet some of the Mexican forces that are in this neighborhood, and drive them away."

"The city remains deserted and no business at all doing; not a single shop in the place being opened, and all our usual supplies from the neighborhood suspended. We understand Com. Perry has declared his intention to retain possession of this city unless he receives orders to the contrary from the government in Washington.

"July 1.--The result of the expedition yesterday appears to have been in favor of the Americans, but with a loss of two men killed in ambush and four wounded. The Mexican force waited for them in ambush at Tamulte, but after about twenty minutes' firing retired -- it is not yet known with what loss.

NRR 72.343 July 31, 1847 Letter from Lt. William T. Barbour, A Prisoner in Mexico

AMERICAN PRISONERS IN MEXICO.

From the New Orleans Picayune of July 20.

We have been allowed the use of a letter from Lieut. Barbour, of the 1st regiment Kentucky volunteers, who is now a prisoner in the city of Mexico. It will be recollected that he was taken prisoner when in command of the escort of a train cut to pieces by the Mexican. After the publication of the paragraph in this paper which elicited the letter, intelligence was received of Lieut. Barbour’s fate, and published, yet the letter is interesting for some of its details, and we give it, omitting paragraphs of private nature.

City of Mexico, June 29th, 1847.

Dear Sir: I was surprised on receiving a number of the New Orleans Picayune of the 5th instant, to find that nothing was known of me and my command since our capture on the 24th of February inst. A correspondent of the Picayune supposes that we were murdered and the editor concurs with him in opinion. I had written repeatedly and had confidently hoped that some of my letters had reached their destination; indeed, I was very certain that my friends in Monterey had received intelligence of us. I regret this the more, as it has doubtless caused my family and friends much unnecessary uneasiness.

On the 4th of this month 190 of our prisoners (among whom were Charles and John Swigert) left the Castle of Santiago in this city for Tampico, there we were told they were to be released, but it is with regret that we learn through the city papers where that they stopped at an Indian village 150 miles from this by order of Gen. Santa Anna and that they were starving. Gen Garay, who has them in charge, writes to the government here that he cannot obtain provisions, &c. I refer you to the paper El Republicano, which I send you.

We have suffered great hardships, particularly the men. They have been in a state of nakedness, famine, and disease for the last five months, and many of them would have died had it not been for the foreigners here through whom aid was given them. -- We have been on our parole since the 20th of April last, and this city is assigned us as our charter. The government has paid us during part of this time four rials (50 cents) per diem, and they charge us the same to obtain it; so in fact we get nothing. But we have not been in want, for mercantile houses here are willing to supply us with whatever funds we want.

It is known officially to us that Majors Gaines and Borland, Capt. Clay, Heady, and Danley, Lieuts. Churchill and Davidson were agreed to be exchanged at the battle of Angostura. Capt. Smith quartermaster, Midshipman Rogers, of the navy, and myself were not provided for. But this government, or rather Santa Anna, has no idea of releasing any of us. It is his wish to send us to Acapulco on the Pacific. The most rigid and compulsory measures on the part of our government will do us any good. -- (There is evidently a word wanting in this sentence in the original, and we have ventured to supply it.--It is but a conjecture.)

As I send this by the British courier, thence by the packed via Havana to New Orleans, I cannot mention any news of a local or military character, as it would compromise his neutrality. Respectfully your friend and servant.

WM. T. BARBOUR.

NNR 72.343 July 31, 1847 rumors about a descent on Reynosa by Gen. Jose Urrea, troops sent there, suspicions of Urrea’s object

FROM THE BRASOS.

The steamer Mary Kingsland arrived yesterday from the Brasos, which place she left on the 15th, but brings no intelligence of interest.

There were various reports of large bodies of the enemy being about to attack the posts on the Rio Grande, but they obtained but little credit.

We learn from Capt. Davis, of the steamship, that the steamer Rough and Ready, with troops on board, had started for Mier, where a Camp of Instruction has been formed, under General Hopping and Col. Belknap.

It was rumored at Brasos, when Capt. Davis left that Gen. Urrea, with a force of 3,000 men, was about making a descent on Reynosa. One company, belonging to one of the new regiments, on their way to Camp Instruction, had been landed at Reynosa, and the quartermaster was making every preparation to defend the place.

Several bodies of Mexicans had been seen on the river lately, and it is supposed that Urrea’s object was to attack some of the depots of wagon trains between Camargo and Monterey.

A gang of desperadoes, commanded by a man of the name of King, composed of Mexicans and others had been near the Brasos. Some of them had been taken prisoners—the balance of them were dispersed, and the rancho burnt to the ground.

The tenth regiment, stationed at Matamoros, is highly spoken of for its discipline. It is commanded by Col. Temple, an accomplished officer. The regiment is composed of men from the states of Maryland and New Jersey. [BRR]

SANTA FE.

A mail from Santa Fe was brought to St. Louis on the 16th, containing some interesting information. The latest dates are to the 27th of May, the time at which Mr. Murphy, Col. Russell and others left Santa Fe.

One of the letters which the Republican has seen, states that there were instructions from the war department, which had been received by the last mail brought by Mr. Boggs, directed to the colonel commanding in Santa Fe, in which it was announced that the president refused to sanction any of the acts of Gen. Kearney, so far as they confer any rights upon the citizens of the territory of New Mexico, as citizens of the United States; and General Kearney, or the officer commanding, was directed not to permit to be carried into effect such part of the organic and statute laws of the territory as confer such rights. On the strength of these instructions, Col. Price officially demanded the release and remission of sentence of Antonio Maria Trujillo, convicted of treason against the government of the U. States. The accused was thereupon set at liberty.

The next step to be taken, says the letter, will necessarily be to announce to the natives that, not being citizens of the United States, they cannot elect a delegate to congress.

“The instructions go on to say, that the laws for the internal government of New Mexico received the full sanction of the president, and of course we shall proceed to elect members of a legislative council, and do all other acts and things that a people not quite slaves may do.” This is the writer’s deduction, says the Republican, from the instructions, but if they, as citizens, can elect members of a legislative body, the distinction must be very nice which will prevent them from electing a delegate to congress.
Except in the particulars which we have stated, the letter says all goes on as before. "Some fugitives from the valley of Taos, combined with guerrillas and Camanches, are committing depredations beyond the Moro. A day or two ago, they run off from Santa Clara, or the Wagon Mounds, with 250 horses, killing one, and wounding two of the party in charge."

Col. Russell, the letter says, made a speech on the public square on Sunday, taking the Fremont side of the quarrel in California.

The writer, alluding to the condition of things in Santa Fe, says: "One thing must be done speedily. This military mob must be relieved, or we must be relieved of them soon: they become more lawless and insubordinate every day." "By the instructions lately received here, all the officer created under the government for this territory are declared temporary--to continue only until such time as the country shall be declared annexed, or its possession shall be renounced." NNR 72.343-44 July 31, 1847 THE ATTACK ON LIEUT. LOVE--DEPREDATIONS OF THE INDIANS

Camp on the "Arkansas," June 17, 1847.

Sir: I have the honor to report, that company "B," 1st dragoons, marched from Fort Leavenworth on the 7th instant, to join the army in New Mexico, escorting some three hundred and fifty thousand dollars--government funds. On our arrival at "Pawnee Fork," (about three hundred miles from Fort Leavenworth,) we found two "trains" of wagons bound for Santa Fe, and one returning to the United States. The day before our arrival, one of the "trains" for Santa Fe, and the one for the United States, (encamped about one mile apart,) were attacked by the Indians, supposed to be either Pawnees or
On the morning of the 26th—just as the oxen of the first train were turned out of the coral, (a pen formed by the wagons,) the oxen of the second about turning out to graze, and the horses of the company were picketed—the Indians made their appearance a half mile distant, in full chase after the oxen.—The herdsmen used every effort to drive the oxen back into the coral; but, unable to do so, placed themselves between the oxen and Indians, hoping to prevent their being driven off. The Indians charged boldly amongst the oxen, frightened them, and drove them into the prairie; wounding in the charge two or three herdsmen. As soon as I saw the Indians, I ordered the company to saddle. Some Indian, seeing my intention to pursue, immediately appeared on the opposite bank of the river, numbering fifty or one hundred men. It now became necessary for me to protect our own camp; I therefore dismounted all but 25 men I ordered, under Sergeant Bishop to pursue the Indians, and recover the oxen.—When the sergeant arrived in the vicinity of the oxen, the Indians swarmed in from all directions, and completely surrounded his platoon; he charged fearlessly amongst them, but our horses being wild, and unaccustomed to the yells of the Indians and shaking of blankets, (all done to frighten the horses,) could not be held by the riders. So great was the number of Indians—supposed to be three hundred on the north side, and two hundred on the south side of the river— that all hope of cutting a way through to the oxen was abandoned. It is with the deepest regrets that I have to report five of our best men killed: privates Arledge, Dickhart, Gaskill, Short, and Ylake; and Sergeant Bishop and five men wounded. Sergeant Bishop (who so gallantly led the charge) and privates Lovelace and Vankastar are severely wounded; privates Bush, Wilson, and Ward slightly. With pride, I call your attention to the gallant conduct of this platoon of the company, as shown in the list of killed and wounded we have no means of telling, as their dead were carried off the field.

The oxen of one train having been driven off, I have encamped both trains together, and shall remain with them until enough trains together, and shall remain with them until enough trains arrive to take the government property to Santa Fe. I would respectfully call your attention to the fact, that it is the determination of the Indians, headed (as I have every reason to believe) by white men and Spaniards, to destroy all the government property in their power. It would seem at first sight that one company of soldiers ought to be enough to secure any number of oxen and mules from spies to watch our movements, never attacked unless by the Indians, but, sir, you must reflect that the animals of a train have to be scattered over a large extent of country for grazing; that in an attack, it is nearly as much as a company of dragoons can do to prevent their horses from taking a "stampede;" that the Indians, thoroughly acquainted with the country, and constantly having everything is in their favor; that being the most expert horsemen in the world, they are enabled to make an attack, alarm the animals, and be out of sight in an incredibly short time. You can judge, when from the time they were first seen approaching on the 26th, until they had the oxen over the river and out of sight, was not more than half an hour.

The only way, then, sir, to insure safety to public property on this road, is, in my opinion, to station about 300 mounted men at Pawnee Fork, 300 near the crossing of Arkansas, and 300 more at or near the upper Cimeron spring. These troops to have their permanent encampments at these points, but to scour the country in all directions, and at least keep the Indians in check, or they cannot catch them.—Scarce a party has crossed the prairie this spring in sight of Pawnee Fork. One man of Mr. Wethered's trading party was severely wounded lanced in five or six places. I at once determined to travel with the trains for Santa Fe, and give them all the protection in my power. Our first day's march from Pawnee Fork brought us on the Arkansas river, where we encamped; one train a quarter of a mile from the river; the other nearly the same distance from the river, and three or four hundred yards from the first. With my company I encamped on the bank of the river between the two trains.

With the highest respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JNO. LOVE,
lieut. 1 dragoons, comd'g. comp. B.

Brigadier General R. Jones,

[TNW]
A DICTATORSHIP, has been suggested as one of the expedients for meeting the threatened emergency.

The Republicano opposes the dictatorship as unnecessary, in consideration of the immense powers with which the government is already invested by a law of congress, passed on the 20th of April last which powers have been construed with the utmost latitude. There are in fact, says the Republicano, only the following six restrictions upon the government: It has not power to make peace; to conclude a negotiation with foreign powers; to alienate the territory of the republic; to enter into colonization contracts; to impose penalties; or, lastly to confer other civil and military employments than those expressly sanctioned by the constitution. To perform any of these six prohibited acts, the co-operation of congress is required.

Our readers, says the Washington Union of the 27th, "will readily perceive what bearing this has upon such a treaty as Mr. Trist may enter into with any government de facto which may grow up on the fall of the capital. For all the purposes of carrying on the war, the powers of the government are already ample. It is only to make peace that there is any need of a dictatorship; and the project of a dictatorship, having been broached and discussed, has been generally condemned and abandoned. Should, then, congress skulk- as they probably will- from the responsibility of advising peace, the course to be pursued by Mr. Trist and Gen. Scott to secure a treaty is not very obvious.

In reading the Mexican papers, it is very clear that the different states have ceased to anticipate a prolonged resistance on the part of the capital to the American arms. In view of the speedy fall of the city, they are congratulating themselves upon the wisdom of the federal system. Had they been placed under the rule of a consolidated central government, the fall of the capital would have involved the subjection of the whole country. The federal system (they reason) has created new centres of action; and even if the capital succumbs, the states, each one for itself, will resist the ascendency of the American arms, and refuse to recognise a treaty which may be forced upon the central government.

"Out of views of this nature has grown a coalition among the states of Jalisco, San Luis Potosi, Zacatecas, Mexico, Queretaro, and Aguascalientes- the latter claiming to be a state, though not so recognised by the constitution of 1824. The new combination of states is regarded by the editors of El Republicano as an alarming feature of the times, threatening to aggravate the anarchy which before prevailed in Mexico. The coalition have published a long address to the nation. The document is almost as important to this country as to Mexico. In it are represent3d the views of reading men in the most powerful states. It will be seen that they look to the triumph of our arms, to the occupation of the capital by Gen. Scott, and the conclusion of a treaty of peace. To such a treaty these states do not propose to submit."

NRR 72.344 July 31, 1847 Coalition of states in defense of federalism

Address of the commissioners of the coalition of the states of Jalisco, San Luis Potosi, Zacatecas, Mexico, Queretaro, and Aguascalientes, to the nation:

Grave and sacred were the objects which impelled the states to form a coalition. Their independence being in danger, and their institutions attacked, it became necessary to strengthen the ties of the confraternity which unites them; it became urgent not only to maintain the relations which constitute their unity by means of the reciprocal obligations which bind the parts to the centre, but also to invigorate the parts themselves, in order to oppose a staunch and vigorous resistance to the tendencies of centralism, and to the attacks, more or less covert, that have been made on the sovereignty of the states; and finally to maintain, at all hazards, the federal institutions which, in less stormy times, secured the happiness of the republic.

The bloodthirsty enemies of these institutions, who at every step have raised difficulties to the peaceable development of the federal system, have assumed every color, have sown distrust and excited party interests, have complicated more and more the state of public affairs, have relaxed the moralities of society, which now presents the confused and strange image of a nation proceeding with out a guide, and with uncertain steps, from precipice to precipice.

By a lamentable fatality, the Mexican nation has had to contend under such sad circumstances, not only with domestic misfortunes, but also with an enemy, who, disguising his unlimited ambition, has, without even a plausible complaint to justify his hostility, violated our territory and seized one of our ports as soon as the fate of arms was adverse to us at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma. And although the spirit of a free people and the noble pride of the Mexicans have since made numberless and costly arms and to erase from its escutcheon the blot which disgraced it, a fatality presiding over our destiny has rendered our efforts useless and futile, and on the field of battle we have succumbed not to the valor and daring of the enemy, but to the fate that persecutes us.
Far from being disheartened by such a concatenation of adverse events, farm from having recourse to disgraceful preliminaries which would lead to degrading treaties, the states, aware of the value and power of a people for whom love of country and of liberty are not merely idle words, have called into action the means of defence and the resources on which they rely, not only to maintain their independence, but also the federal institutions adopted by the nation; free, sovereign, and independent, they are conscious of their duties; they have obligations to fulfil, and also rights to maintain and to make respected. As integral parts of the Mexican republic, they cannot be indifferent to the insult which has been brought upon them by the reverses of their arms; they cannot look with tranquility and serenity on the combinations of a weak and infamous policy which drags them into miserable and disgraceful compromises, but, free and independent they will never permit themselves with impunity to be under any pretext whatsoever reduced to the dependence and servility. A free people identified with the institutions which govern them are the only one capable of grand and heroic actions; but a degraded people pass without emotion from one hand to another, the name of their master being entirely indifferent to them. The Mexican nation, which feels and knows its dignity and calls to mind the glorious actions of its ancestors, cannot submit to the domination of foreigners, nor can it suffer the attacks of its internal enemies; it has superabundant forces to repel the former; and to inspire respect into the latter.

Mexicans! The coalition has been formed not to be the echo of paltry interests. Its noble mission has no other object than to defend the independence of their country, and the free institutions by which it is governed. The coalition, in the names of the states which it represents, declares to the nation that their object is no other than to maintain the independence and the republican federal system; that in the event that the national representation should by any accident be unable to exercise its functions, or if, without any fault of its own, the sovereign general congress should not have the requisite liberty in its deliberation, in the opinion of the coalition, then the coalition will reassert the representation of the confederate states as a centre of union for them. They protest that never will they consent to, nor be bound by, and convention or treaty of peace with the North American enemy, as long as he threatens or occupies the capital or any other point of the Mexican republic; they also will not recognise any general suspension of arms which should comprise all the belligerent forces of the nation. The main objects of the coalition being to defend independence and the federal system, they protest in the same manner, that so far from separating from the national union, the states which represent are determined to aid with their private resources the general government, independent of the assistance they are by law bound to give; so that the one cause common to them in its disgraces and in its perils may be sustained, the nation credit and honor re-established, and all possible opposition and resistance made to every attack upon the popular federal representative system.

Lagos, June 6, 1847. Antonio Escudero for the state of Mexico, vice president; for the state of Jalisco, Cayetano Perez Castro; for the state of San Luis Potosi, Mariano Avila, Luis Guzman; for the state of Zacatecas, Teodosio Maria Herrera y Zavala, Manuel Maria Vertiz; for the state of Aguascalientes, Jesus Teran, secretary; and for the state of Mexico, Eulogio Barrera, secretary.

The above coalition has been thought worthy of several able denunciatory articles in the Republican, although, in the principal end it has in view—the prevention of peace with the United States—it has had the Republicano for an ally. This is but one piece of evidence we could present of the hostility of the different states to a peace, even should the central government enter into a treaty with us. We might multiply similar statements, indefinitely, but it were useless. [BRR]

NNR 72.344 July 31, 1847 Letter about the collection of American troops at Puebla

The New York “Sun” contains a letter written at Puebla, 28th June, which says:

General Worth arrived here with the van of the army about 43 days ago, and

General Scott, with the division of Gen. Twiggs, about a month ago- making in all about 6,000 effective men, which is quite sufficient to make a paseo in the country, but without being of any other utility that I can perceive; and had they money enough, they might pass a tolerable good time here, as it is a fine climate and fine season of the year. But money is scarce, and the enemy knows it, unfortunately, and care very little about the American troops, as they do not molest them in any manner whatever. It is supposed that; on the arrival of more troops and trains, we will move on to the city of Mexico- the possession of which city will be beneficial to us in some small respects; but I doubt if the advantage we are to gain will repay the cost of out long separation from the coast, and we shall only finish our paseo to sit down and wait some other move on the board. I of course speak confidently of our entering the city without any difficulty, because, although the Mexicans have lots of people badly armed, they cannot deserve the name of an army. The last good troops of the government having been entirely dispersed at Cerro Gordo, Santa Anna resigned, but knew at the same time that he had a majority in congress that would not accept his resignation, and in fact he never will let go the reins of power as long as he can hold on to them. [BRR]

NNR 72.344 July 31, 1847 letter of the Mexican Gen. Juan Alvarez about his plans

A letter from General Alvarez, dated [ . . . ]June 18th, says that he has just learned that Rebolledo had attacked a train from Vera Cruz for Puebla, and killed over three hundred. Alvarez was upon the point of marching to join him with 600 cavalry, to see if they could not destroy the whole account, but the conclusion is as follows: "I leave in the immediate vicinity of Puebla some guerrillas to protect deserters, and prevent the introduction of provisions, and keep up the communications I have established." We imagine that this is about all the harm our main army will receive from the redoubtable Gen. Alvarez. [BRR]

NNR 72.344 July 31, 1847 description of Puebla

PUEBLA.- an army correspondent of the Raleigh Register says: "We have no city in the U. States which can equal Puebla, in solidity of buildings, and general beauty, although we doubtless possess many cities of greater extent and mercantile importance. But this city, with its well paved, broad, well lighted, and clean streets- its numerous churches, everyone of which is a specimen of architectural beauty and splendor of decoration- its picturesque and charming suburbs, and its no less delightful public walks and fountains, in a mild and superb climate- render Puebla one of the most attractive cities on the continent of America." NNR 72.352 July 31, 1847 Gen. Franklin Pierce's Train Attacked, Returns to Vera Cruz for Reinforcements, Advances Again

Postscript--Battle Between General Pierce's Division and the Mexicans.

Just as the Register was going to press, a telegraphic dispatch from Richmond, Va., reached here with later news.

Gen. Pierce left Vera Cruz with the most formidable train and force that had yet marched to reinforce Gen. Scott. Previous letters from Vera Cruz estimated his command at about 4000 men, the train at 150 wagons and seven hundred mules, conveying besides other things, about one million of dollars in specie.

The telegraphic dispatch states that General P's. force consisted of 2,500 men, -- that on reaching the national bridge-- which is 23 miles from Vera Cruz, they were intercepted by a body of 1,400 Mexicans, and a severe fight ensued, in which the Mexicans were routed, with the loss of 150 men;-- 30 Americans killed and wounded.

General Pierce, not considering it prudent to push on, had returned to Vera Cruz for artillery and reinforcements. The opinion seemed to be that an immense Mexican force had lined the whole road, not only with a view to intercept the valuable trains, but to cut off General Scott from reinforcement, so as to embarrass him in his onward movement, as well as to make his army a more easy conquest to the forces concentrated at the capital.

General Scott, at the latest accounts, was still at Puebla, waiting the reply of the Mexican congress. General's Cadwallader and Pillow were at Perote, awaiting the summons of Gen. Scott to join him in his forward movement against the capital. They had routed the Mexicans at Lahoya.

Col. De Russey attacked twelve hundred Mexicans at Higinetta, with a few hundred men, and was surrounded and placed in great peril. He, however, succeeded in cutting his way through the enemy, with a loss of 20 killed and 10 wounded. A reinforcement having arrived at a very opportune moment.

Amongst the killed we regret to learn, was Capt. Boyd, who commanded one of the companies, of the Baltimore battalion, and remained at Tampico in service after the battalion was discharged.

Capt. Boyd's lieutenant, Tauneyhill, was mortally wounded.
Another account states that 16 of the Louisiana volunteers were killed, and 16 of other regiments lost or missing, -- killed on the Mexican side one hundred and eleven.

De Russy's detachment reached Tampico on the night of the 16th. They lost their horses and pack mule.

The steamer New Orleans left Vera Cruz on the 14th, -- the same morning that Gen. Pierce marched from thence. She arrived at Tampico the 15th, and was despatched back to Vera Cruz by Col. Gates, with a requisition for four companies of infantry and two steamers, to go to the rescue of Col. De Russy. She arrived at Vera Cruz on the 16th, at 2 P.M., -- found the city in great excitement. General Pierce had returned for reinforcements, and had marched again with 700 additional, making his force 3,200,-- but leaving the city in apprehension of an attack-- The aid could not be furnished. POSTSCRIPT- BATTLE BETWEEN GENERAL PIERCE'S DIVISION AND THE MEXICANS

Just as the Register was going to press, a telegraphic despatch from Richmond, Va., reached here with later news.

Gen. Pierce left Vera Cruz with the most formidable train and force that had yet marched to reinforce Gen. Scott. Previous letters from Vera Cruz estimated his command at about 4000 men, the train at 150 wagons and seven hundred mules, conveying besides other things, about one million dollars in specie.

The telegraphic despatch states that General P's. force consisted of 2,500 men,-that on reaching the nation bridge- which is 23 miles from Vera Cruz, and a severe fight ensued, in which the Mexicans were routed, with the loss of 140 men;-- 30 Americans killed and wounded.

MEXICAN COMMISSIONERS APPOINTED TO CONFER WITH MR. TRIST.- The despatch goes on to say that the letter of Mr. Buchanan seems to have received a more favorable reception in the Mexican congress than was reported or anticipated. They have appointed two commissioners to confer with Mr. Trist, and it was asserted that General Santa Anna had declared himself in favor of peace. Santa Anna is a much more successful negotiator than general, and with doubtless endeavor to reinstate himself in the favor of his countrymen by his management of the negotiations that may ensue.
This news caused a great sensation at New Orleans on the 23d, and was fully relied upon. The commissioners were to meet Mr. Trist at San Martin, eight leagues from Puebla. [BRR]

Gen. Wool at the last dates, 27th June, was at Buena Vista with the Virginia, Mississippi, and North Carolina volunteers, and Sherman's, Washington's and Prntiss' batteries,-- in all about 2700 men.

General Taylor was at Walnut Springs with the 16th regiment, Bragg's battery, and two squadrons of dragoons.

General Hoppin is near Camargo, "at the camp of Instruction," drilling about 2000 of the new levies.

About the 13th of June, Gen. Wool was notified of the advance of about 1000 cavalry, from Matahula, under Alvarez and Minon. The Mexicans believed that these were to be joined by a large force under Valencia and Salas, and that an attack was to be made on Gen. Wool. Valencia was otherwise occupied. The 'advance corps' became dissatisfied; at the last accounts they were retrograding.

There was a great dinner given at Monterey on the 4th of July, and a volunteer toast given to "Gen. Taylor, the next president of the United States." This brought out the old hero, in a speech of some length, which described by those who heard it to have been a very able and eloquent one, indeed, and one calculated, if reported in full, to create quite a sensation in the country. NRR 72.357 August 7, 1847 spirit of the Mexican press, index of popular feeling in Mexico, threat of enslavement of the Mexican people

MEXICO.

Spirit of the Mexican press: The following article translated from a San Luis Potosi paper, sent to a gentleman in this city by a distinguished officer of our army, has been placed at our disposal, and we publish it as an index of the popular feeling in that part of Mexico.

[Troy Adv.

Can it be possible that the Mexican people can for a single moment doubt the justice, the holy justice with which the government of our republic defends itself against the atrocious barbarity of the war which our deceitful neighbors of the north wage against us? Can there be any doubt to the right to resist the assassin who attempts to take our lives, the robber who attempts to break into our house, or the infamous raptor who disturbs the peace of our families? Mexicans! we are in our own country, bequeathed to us by the heroic patriarchs of liberty, and purchased at the price of their venerated blood and who by all manner of sacrifices burst the bonds which, for a period of three hundred years, had enslaved the unhappy Mexicans; they burst them for the purpose of making us free and independent and to restore to us the territory usurped by the Spanish conquest. — Spain, together with the other nations, recognized our independence, but notwithstanding this recognition, the nation which is called enlightened and whose government is held up as a model for a free people, from a blind caprice of their basted government, stimulated by covetousness and the insatiable envy of the host of infamous speculators who she calls her citizens, prosecutes against us a war, condemned by reason and by all laws both human and divine, and those whom she entitles her generals execute this war, not after the manner permitted by humanity and civilization, but much more cruel, more bloody and desolating than that of savages? Can we hesitate for a single moment to reflect whether or not we are justifiable in defending ourselves? But there is not, nor ever can be the least doubt of the justice of our cause.

Is it possible that the Mexican people can hope for compassion from these frantic adventurers full of rapacity and lasciviousness, who with their detestable vices and unbridled appetites have come to satiate themselves upon our wealth and our women? Can we hope for compassion from those who destroy our crops, set fire to our barns and houses, profane our temples of worship, scoff at the emblems of our religion, violate the chastity of our virgins, employ brutal force with our wives, and surrounded by general licentiousness, stain our soil with all manner of crime!

If the Mexican people, if the inhabitants of Potosi wish to be slaves, let them bear in mind that the chains of the Americans will not be of the same temper as those broken by the heroes of the 16th of September 1810; let them bear in mind that the slavery with which they wish to oppress us will be more insupportable than that of the African negroes. Let them bear in mind that the hordes of banditti, of drunkards, of fornicators, of heretics who have neither country, religion, families nor generous sentiments of any kind, are those who wish to subjugate our country. Let the people of Potosi bear in mind that there is near their doors a horde of shameless, daring, ignorant, ragged, bad smelling, long bearded men, with hats turned up at the brim, thirsty with the desire of appropriating our riches and our beautiful you females. Bear in mind people of Potosi, that a multitude of pirates, galley slaves, prisoners escaped from the penitentiary, and fugitives from justice, burning with the brutal desire to corrupt the virtues of our delicate and handsome damsels-these are those who come to establish within our walls the ignominy of slavery!

People of Mexico! People of Potosi! People descended from the curate Hidalgo! Do you wish to become the slaves of such men? Do you wish, people of Mexico, that your women be the humble servants of such a vile rabble? Do you wish, people of Potosi, that in your holy temples, where you have placed the cross of God; where the holy sacrament of the altar is; where the immaculate and holy virgin, the pure and undefiled mother of God resides; that there, this and of drunken pirates, should revel in their fierce licentiousness, commingling all their brutal passions? Do you wish, people of Potosi, that within the precincts of the church, where are heard the sacred hymns of christianity; where the ministers of God send up to heaven their praises of our Creator, and the sincere prayer for the welfare of our country, from whence rises the pure incense which elevates our supplication to Jesus Christ for a remission of the misfortunes to which we are condemned, and pardon for our sins, that from this same place we celebrate the triumph of their arms and the ignominy and servitude of our children? And this, people of Potosi, where you full of faith and hope, assemble to adore the holy sacrament—do you wish this species of slavery?

NNR 72.357-358 August 7, 1847 WAR WITH MEXICO, Battle of Huejutla

THE BATTLE OF HUAJUTLA, FROM THE CORRESPONDENT OF THE NEW ORLEANS TIMES.
TAMPICO, ( MEXICO, ) JULY 18, 1847.

Gentlemen-- Considerable excitement has existed in this city for the past two weeks, in relation to the detention, by General Garay, at the town at Guautala ( pronounced Wahoutla ) 140 miles from here, of one hundred and eighty Americans, who were recently liberated in the city of Mexico, and sent towards this city of Mexico, and sent towards this city with a small escort. They are those who were taken last February at Encarnacion. The renowned General Garay, were not correct, and that he would be under the necessity of detaining them at Guautla, until he could hear from his government.

Six of them made their escape, and arrived in safety in this city, and immediately communicated the above facts to our governor, Col Gates.

An expedition was fitted out on the 8th instant by order of Col. Gates, and the command of it given to Colonel De Russy, of the Louisiana regiment. The expedition consisted of 120 men, and one six pound field piece; 40 men third artillery, commanded by Captain Wyse; 40 dragoons, mounted on untrained mustang horses, and commanded by Capt. Boyd and Lieutenant Tannehill, late of the Baltimore battalion; and 40 mounted men from the Louisiana regiment, commanded by Captains Mace and Seguine-- Lieutenants Lindenbergoer, Campbell, and Heimberger, of the Louisiana regiment, accompanied the expedition, to act in such capacities as might be required.

Their march for four days was uninterrupted, passing through the towns of Puebla - Viejo, Tampico-Alto, Ozuama and Tantoyuca, in all of which the people made professions of friendship, and got within seven miles of Guatla, eight miles beyond the last mentioned town, and one mile from the Rio Calabosa. Here the Colonel met an Indian, who informed him that a large force of Mexicans, under the command of Garay, had heard of his approach, and was in ambush on both sides of the river. Col. DeRussy immediately dispatched Lieutenant Lindenerburger, acting Adjutant, with an order to halt the column, ( advanced guard ) under command of Captain Boyd. The Captain had halted at the river for the purpose of watering his horses, and while in that act, he received a destructive fire from an unseen enemy. As I said before, the horses were all mustangs, and at the report of the musketry they became unmanageable, threw most of the riders and created great confusion. [TNW]

NNR 72.359, August 7, 1847 march of the train under Col. James Simmons McIntosh from Veracruz to Perote

MARCH OF THE TRAIN FROM VERA CRUZ TO PEROTE.
From the correspondent of the Missouri Republican.
JALAPA, Mexico, June 17, 1847.
This is the last letter I shall write you from this place, and I pen this without knowing how or when I shall be able to give it a direction that will insure its ever reaching even the Gulf Coast. On the morning of the 15th inst., a train of about three hundred wagons, principally loaded with ammunition, succeeded in reaching this place. They were fourteen days coming from Vera Cruz, a distance of seventy miles, have been attacked by the guerrillas, twelve miles out from Vera Cruz, and skirmishing from that point to the hacienda Encerro, kept up during the whole way. The principal object of attack was the large amount of specie in the train—between three and four hundred thousand dollars—which had drawn together between fifteen hundred and two thousand guerrillas. They were principally commanded by three priests, Spanish Carlists, who had been banished from their own country for their ferocity, their fanaticism, and bigotry. They gave us a great deal of trouble, and succeeded, during the entire route, in killing and wounding between forty and fifty of our men. We lost, also, about thirty public wagons, number of a horses and mules, and a great deal of subsistence that was thrown from the wagons, with a view of lightning the loads. Our loss in property, trifling as it is—and especially which compared to the loss of men—is, of course, greatly magnified by the enemy, and the report is industriously circulated by them, throughout the entire country, that they have captured half of the train, and killed half of the escort.

The train left Vera Cruz with an escort of about five hundred men, under Col. McIntosh, under whose management most of the disasters to the train took place. An express was sent to Vera Cruz, informing Col. Wilson, in command of that post, of the number of guerrillas that were annoying the escort, and of the danger that surrounded the train. Gen. Cadwallader, with what men he had there, immediately left to reinforce them, and reached them a short distance the other side of the National Bridge. So soon as he took command, something like order and system was restored, where, before, nothing but confusion and alarm prevailed: and although constantly attacked by the guerrillas from their ambush, he had but little trouble, comparatively speaking, or met with but little loss, after leaving the National Bridge. At the National Bridge the enemy made a regular stand, availing himself of the fort and breastworks upon the heights and sides of the hills that had been thrown up with a view of intercepting General Scott, in his march upon Jalapa. Here, the heaviest of our loss in men occurred, and here the most obstinate attack was made upon the train by the guerrillas. To the prudence, and military skill and experience of Gen. Cadwallader, is solely to be attributed the rout of the enemy and the preservation of the train, specie, mail, &c.

On the 8th instant, a part of citizens, with a number of discharged officers and the wounded men of the 4th Illinois regiment, left here, taking with them some five or six wagons, in one of which was contained a large and important mail. So soon as the news reached us of the number of guerrillas, and the obstinacy of their attack upon the upward train, the greatest solicitude was felt for the company of between one and two hundred men who had left here for Vera Cruz. They were, at best, but poorly armed, were without any organization whatever, and generally composed of better running than fighting material. In the event of attack, all here concluded that the brave wounded Illinoians, and their attendants, would be abandoned, and that the whole would have their throats cut by the merciless and bloodthirsty guerrillas. At the National Bridge they were attacked, and lost five of their number, the greater portion preferring trusting to the speed of their horses, rather than the prowess of their arms. Most fortunate was it for them that Gen. Cadwallander happened in their vicinity at the time, with his command; but for that, not one would have been left to tell the tale of the fate of the rest. The General most kindly detached a company of cavalry, under Captain Duperu, to protect them from further attack, and the whole succeeded in reaching Vera Cruz in safety.

The above incidents will give you some little idea of the state of the road between this and Vera Cruz, and of the immense hazard a man runs, even in a large body, of losing his life in attempting to reach the sea coast. General Scott is in a far more precarious situation than ever General Taylor was in at Buena Vista, and if he succeeds in cutting his way with the small number of men he has, to the city of Mexico, and holding his position, the battles of Buena Vista and Cerro Gordo will sink into utter insignificance, compared with such an achievement.

An express reached Colonel Childs from the generals-in-chief, night before last, placing him on his guard against a contemplated attack on the part of the enemy, upon the train, between this and Perote, and Perote and Puebla. General Bravo had been thrown upon the road, by Santa Anna, with a force of three thousand men, a portion of whom are cavalry, sent from the city of Mexico. General Scott also wrote, that he was now satisfied we should have one of the severest, and most obstinate battles, this side of the capital of the republic, that had yet been fought in Mexico, and he was waiting with the most anxious solicitude to hear of the arrival of more troops at Vera Cruz, and of their being on their march to reinforce him. I rather think, by this time, the general-in-chief has abandoned the idea of celebrating the 4th of July in the city of Mexico, and that his mind is somewhat changed as to the facility with which he would lay the basis for peace by the above mentioned period. A short time more, and you will be able to ascertain from passing events, who has understood the Mexican character and their policy best, your humble correspondent, or the commanders of our armies, who, according to public opinion in the United States, as well as from their own reports, have “conquered a peace” every successive battle that has been fought, from that of Palo Alto to the most signal one of all Cerro Gordo.

To-day, this post is to be evacuated, and our troops take up their line of march for the advance of the army. Colonel Childs, with the garrison, leaves this morning, at 10 o’clock; and, in the afternoon, or very early to-morrow morning, Gen. Cadwallader leave with his command. The aggregate of the strength of the two commands, will not exceed twenty-two hundred men, and the number of pieces of artillery we shall take along is six. With this strength and materiel we expect to fight ourselves through, let the number of guerrillas be what they may. The strongest point of attack is a pass in the Perote mountains, about a day's march from here, which is said, by those acquainted with the topography of the country, to be equally as formidable a position for the enemy as was that of Cerro Gordo. The present object of the guerrillas, is more to secure the large amount of money, and the ammunition we have along, than to capture or destroy the force that is protecting it.—The "hope of reward" has induced a large number to join the guerrillas, who, but for the money, never would have risked their necks, even in a skirmish.—When I reach Perote, I will again write you, though it will be without any assurance that the letter will get off for weeks to come.

Yesterday, about noon, the entire force that was at Jalapa succeeded in reaching here in safety, and without any loss whatever to the train. The march was conducted under the immediate command of Brigadier General Cadwalldrader, who, although slow in his movements, is generally sure and safe. We were parts of four days in making a distance of thirty five miles, owing to the unwieldiness of the train and the annoyance the guerrillas gave us. They had posted themselves along the heights of the La Hoya for nearly two miles, and were about a thousand strong. The pass of the La Hoya is much longer than that of the Cerro Gordo, though not so formidable, in my judgment; and in the hands of any thing like a warlike people, it would have been very difficult to have got the train through without immense loss.

On the 20th, we encountered the guerrillas, and after some six hours' skirmishing, in which we took eighteen prisoners, and killed between seventy and eighty of them, they were completely and effectually routed. We threw out, in the first instance, large flanking parties, and then scaled every height both with our infantry and cavalry. Two caves were discovered by the 1st artillery, in which were stowed large quantities of provisions, some ammunitions, and a few fire arms. Among the former were American hams, sugar and hard bread. After occupying the heights with our forces, so as to effectually command the pass its entire distance, the train was passed through and halted at the village of Las Vigas, a short distance this side of the La Hoya. The evening previous to our attempting to force our way through the pass in the mountains, Col. Wynkoop, who is in command at this place and the castle of Perote, hearing of the number of the enemy that had posted themselves at La Hoya with a view of cutting off the train, left at eight o'clock in the evening with the greater part of the 1st Pennsylvania regiment and Capt. Walker's company of mounted riflemen. They were engaged with the guerrillas, on this side of the pass, from eleven o'clock that night up to the time we got through the next morning, and did most excellent service. They drove the enemy for several miles back from the road, and burnt every rancho in their route, leaving desolate the whole country over which they passed. On our reaching Las Vigas, a pretty and flourishing little town, it was found that the dwellings were entirely deserted by the Mexicans, and was satisfactorily ascertained that they had identified themselves with the guerrillas. With the consent of the commanding general, the torch was applied to the buildings, and in a few moments the entire town was one universal scene of conflagration. Every building in it, numbering between eighty and one hundred, was destroyed by fire— the only one that was spared being the neat little Catholic church that adorned the town. Its solitary appearance among the smouldering ruins of the town, created sensations better imagined than described; and the example set in this instance, it is greatly to be hoped, will have the effect of restraining the enemy in future in their murderous course of warfare.

Our loss was, comparatively speaking, nothing.—Capt. Guthrie, of Iowa, attached to the 15th infantry, was badly wounded in the knee, the ball having lodged between the bones, where it is impossible for the surgeons to reach it, without his undergoing an operation that he is unwilling to submit to. The opinion of the surgeons is, that it will not require amputation, though he will, of course, have a stiff leg, and be rendered unfit for service. In Captain Walker's company there was one private slightly wounded in the leg, and they had eleven horses killed. Captain Walker himself was very slightly wounded in the hand, scarcely enough to call it a wound. This was the sum and substance of our loss.

On reaching here, Gen. Cadwallader was met by an express from Gen. Scott, desiring him not to advance with the train, except in conjunction with Col. Childs' command, and the force that was to go forward from their post, as a large body of cavalry, between two and three thousand strong, with a small field battery, under the command of Generals Bravo and Alvarez, had posted themselves between this and Puebla, more with a view of securing a part of the train than in any expectation of doing much injury to our forces. We shall, therefore have another brush with these gentleman robbers before we reach the advance of the army. But as the country is generally a plain, we can have fari chance at them, and cut them up more effectually than was done at La Hoya. From here, we take six companies of the 1st Pennsylvania regiment, under Colonel Black, in addition to our force that we left Jalapa with; and the train will be materially lessened, in consequence of the number of wagons we leave here, that brought forward the sick and some subsistence designed for this post. The sick, alone, required nearly forty wagons, all of which are to remain here.

Colonel Wynkoop, with four companies of the 1st Pennsylvania regiment, Capt. Taylors's battery, and Capt. Walker's company of mounted riflemen, remain to garrison the castle of Perote and this town; which, when considering it is the principal hospital and the depot of subsistence between the advanced of the army and Vera Cruz, is certainly a very small force. But there is no other alternative, if General Scott is ever to get to Mexico, so slow are the reinforcements in reaching him. In addition to the force now going forward under Gen. Cadwallader, it is expected that about two thousand more are now on their march from Vera Cusz to Puebla. If they arrive within four or five days after we do, they will be in time for the big battle that is to be fought this side of the city of Mexico.

Among the eighteen prisoners taken by us on the 20th inst., at La Hoya, were two Germans, deserters, from our army. There are four others among the guerrillas that I regret we could not have secured. The doom of the two captured, will be that of a traitor's death. Among the Mexicans taken were three men of influence and wealth. One of them was an extensive coffee dealer, and has a large coffee plantation in the vicinity of Jalapa. He had been treated with the greatest kindness by the army while garrisoning Jalapa, and the commissary of subsistence, Lieut. Blair, had paid him several thousand dollars for coffee and other articles purchased of him for the use of the army. He always professed the greatest friendship for the Americans, received a great many favors at their hands, which he reciprocated by selling us property at the highest rates, up to the last day we were in Jalapa, and then hastening to the fastnesses of the Perote mountains where he joined a guerrilla party to rob the train and cut the throats of every American they could lay hands on. I hope he will be hung, "sans ceremonie." Another of those taken, was also from Jalapa, and was at once recognized by a number of our men and officers as a clerk in a store at that place. A third, who had a very genteel appearance, maintained he was a professor in the college of Jalapa. How he came to be out in the mountains of Perote among guerrillas, is a question. Being a literary character, however, I suppose he was studying philosophy, that he as well as his

I was in hopes we would have left here to day, but in consequence of the insufficiency of the quartermaster's department, we shall not get off before tomorrow, if we do then. We ought to get through to Puebla in five days, and flog all the Mexican forces besides, that there is between this and the advance of the army; yet if we do not move with more rapidity than we did from Jalapa here, it will take us from eight to ten days.

The castle of Perote, next to that of San Juan de Ulloa, is the strongest fortification in Mexico. It is however, in a most filthy condition, and the sick are dying out of the hospitals in large numbers, daily. Disease is making far greater havoc among our forces, than is the enemy. Perote is a most miserable little place even for Mexico, though the country that surrounds it, is picturesque and grand in the extreme. The valley of Perote is a very fertile soil, and the fields of corn, barley and wheat, are immensely extensive. Upon the whole, it is more generally cultivated than any other section of Mexico for the same extent, over which I have passed.

GOMEZ.

[This command had not arrived at Puebla on the 30th, nor had any thing been heard of it- so that greater difficulties must have been encountered than our correspondent appears to have anticipated.]

A SPEECH FROM GEN. TAYLOR.

At the celebration at Monterey, in Mexico, of the anniversary of the Independence of the United States, the whole company assembled on the occasion was agreeable surprized by a speech from the old soldier who has so often led them to battle and to victory. An account of the incident as given by the correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune: We had in type, but a more detailed statement was furnished in the National Intelligencer of the 3d instant from which we abstract the following:
