which the States must ever entertain towards a neighbor whose form of government was based on the same principles, pointing out that the opposition of Great Britain to the annexation of Texas arose solely from its antislavery policy, and urging the necessity, to prevent future disagreement, of having all pecuniary claims, as well as the frontiers of California and Texas, definitely arranged.

I wish I could convince you that the United States, in seeking the annexation of Texas and the possession of Oregon, are pursuing a means, not an end. At one side, their object is to approach the rich mining district of Mexico, and on the to establish their claim on San Francisco. Texas, taken apart from other considerations, is a burden to the Central Government, inasmuch as it gives a preponderance to the southern and slave-holding states; but it is valuable beyond measure so far as it secures the line of he Rio Bravo and a sure approach to mines which furnish 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 sterling of silver annually. Oregon is an unproductive waste, and the river Columbia, in consequence of he bar and interrupted navigation, of comparatively little value. The fur trade, which rendered the Oregon and the mouth of the Columbia as a trading station desirable, is now nearly exhausted from the avidity of the hunters; and evidently it is not Oregon, but the extension of Oregon below the 37th and 36th parallel, that the United States are resolute in maintaining. It has been said at home, that it was absurd to quarrel with the United States for the possession of an unproductive territory possessing no interior advantages, nor a good harbour in the Pacific, but we must not forget that Oregon will embrace the bay of San Francisco, possibly the port of Monterey, and the upper part of California, should the Mexican Government yield the frontier which the United States have so long desired. These are the real motives of American aggression on Mexico; and I can never understand the policy which our Government pursues while it suffers them to be successfully developed. The present frontier is, I believe, the 42d degree of latitude. There the Mexican possessions end, and there commence the disputed grounds, which are commonly called Oregon. If the Americans can by negotiation reduce the Mexican limits to the 36th or 37th parallel, more than 300 miles of coast, including the bays of San Francisco and Monterey, and much fertile land, will be embraced in the litigated territory. If we, therefore, accept a higher latitude in the settlement of he Oregon dispute, we play the game of the Washington Cabinet, and relinquish to America the ports for which it has been so long and perseveringly struggling. We have it on record that in 1835 the United States offered an immense sum to the Mexican Government for the line of the Rio Bravo, and the 37th parallel. Think you, that they will now, reduced as this nation is, relinquish a tittle of their original demands? I repeat it, over and over again, the object of the United States is to get the above-named frontier, and to force Mexico, which, mind you, she must do, to place herself under their protection. For this the United States will fight, if they cannot delude by negotiation, Great Britain or any other European Power that actively interferes on behalf of Mexico. They consider all North America—from the Isthmus to the Lakes—as their natural possessions; and by slow, but sure degrees, they are determined to obtain it. Will it suit us that a maritime power like the American Union shall arrive at such unprecedented greatness; and will our naval superiority long withstand the increased force of such an able and ambitious rival? I lay down these truths because I believe they are too little understood in England. Before I came to Mexico I was ignorant of the true state of the republic, and of the remote consequences of American aggression; and I am anxious to induce others to examine the question in all its details, satisfied that they must arrive at the same result as I have.

I must be confessed that Mexico has played a very inglorious part since the Texan aggregation was proclaimed. The Government, over and over again, declared, that war should take place the moment an official account of annexation was received; and all the papers, Ministerial and Opposition, were filled with the war-cry and denunciations against the United States. The President Herrera was the only person who preserved his temper; he said, from the beginning, that Mexico was not in a condition to declare war, and, no doubt, it was through his influence that the Ministers were to M. Odillon Banet, or Le Baron Gros is to replace the Baron de Cyprey; the Mexican Government has asked for the latter, as during his former mission he gave general satisfaction.

Several insidious but well-timed articles have appeared in the Government papers, enforcing the propriety of the church contributing its share to the relief of the public burden. We expect to hear shortly of a contribution equal to $3,000,000 being levied. Santa Anna had a knowing way of managing these matters; he did not tax the church, regular or secular, but he borrowed from both many millions never to be repaid.

The Minister of Justice has resigned: he is replaced by Senor Montes de Oca. It is said that Senor Pena y Pena, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Senor Castillo, Minister of Finance, have also the intention of resigning. Their successors are not yet pointed out.

Private letters from the Havannah say, that a young man was arrested there charged with the intention of assassinating Santa Anna. These letters add, that the individual in question was hired for that purpose by one of the Mexican senators; and a private session of the Senate was held the other day to inquire into the truth of this assertion. The inquiry terminated in favour of the gentleman alluded to.

The peace of the city is undisturbed, though not a day passes without rumours of plots and pronunciamientos.

October 30.

At the last moment I have got the substance of the American not referred to in my correspondence, taken down by a person who has just read it.

On the 11th a conference took place between the Minister of Foreign Relations and the Consul of the United States, in which the latter presented a note to the following effect:—

"When the Minister of Mexico, General Almonte, retired from the United States, the President and Government expressed their regret that such a step had been taken by Mexico, as it was this anxious desire that the same good relation of friendship and amity which till then had prevailed between both countries, should still continue. In accordance with this feeling, and notwithstanding that Mexico had taken an hostile attitude, the Government of the United States had authorized their Consul at Mexico, Mr. Black, to ask the government of the Republic if it would consent to receive a diplomatic agent, with the object of negotiating a settlement of the differences which existed between both countries in consequence of the annexation of Texas. This result was necessary in order that neither the United States nor Mexico should be made the victims of the machinations of the common, enemy who, in pursuance of its anti-slavery policy, had, uncalled or, interfered in the affairs of Texas.

To this note the Mexican Government, though under the conviction that the United States has not acted with good faith in the affair of Texas, being desirous of peace and good harmony, consented to receive the diplomatic agent proposed by the Cabinet of Washington, in the hope that existing difference should be regulated in a manner creditable to the Republic. It recommended that the agent in question should be qualified for the negotiation by a previous knowledge of the interests of both counties. But it made and absolute condition, that previous to receiving the said diplomatic agent, the United States fleet, now at Vera Cruz, should be withdrawn, as it was not consistent with the dignity of the Republic to treat with so large a fleet menacing its principal fortress.

December 17, 1845: THE AFFAIRS OF MEXICO

We have as yet received no answer from Washington to the dispatches sent on the 18th of October, accepting the renewal of diplomatic relations offered by the American Government. We consequently remain in a state of political inactivity, which is not likely to be disturbed until the arrival the United States Minister or Commissioner. I would gladly say that the Mexican Government had profited by this temporary repose to do something effectual towards relieving the unfortunate position of the country, but nothing whatsoever has been done, and the republic is gradually crumbling to pieces without an effort being made to save it from ruin. I know not whom to blame, for as to good intentions, I believe the President and the actual ministers are animated with excellent sentiments; but these qualities are altogether negative, and it would be difficult to select a set of men more unfitted to struggle with the embarrassments that crowd on every side. The choice of General Herrera has in this respect been most unfortunate. He is an excellent person, honest and honourable, but his constitution is very delicate, and he sacrifices the future to the daily repose necessary to his health. Mr. Pena y Pena and M. Castillo, the Ministers of Foreign Affairs and of Finance, are equally well-disposed, but both look on their possession of office as temporary, and neither will risk the great experiments that are necessary to extricate the state.

The task is no doubt difficult, and I know not the public many capable of successfully carrying it through; but I equally well know that unless something decided be done the republic will not exist in a very few years; and it will split up into several petty states, until all that are worth having are annexed to the North American Union. All classes of people are convinced of this truth, but so apathetic is the national character, that nothing is attempted to direct the course of events. Gladly would the people see a despotic power rise up from amongst them; and freely would they receive a foreign prince as sovereign, provided his position was seconded by any leading European Power. But help themselves they will not, and cannot; and they await events with the most culpable indifference.

As a natural consequence of the position thus described, plots and conspiracies are every day talked of, and actually commenced; but these intrigues are so lazily conducted, that not one has been brought to a head. We have had alarms daily and nightly during the course of the month; the troops have been kept under arms, the posts all doubled, and the line of convents which connect the chain of defense all occupied, but no disturbance has taken place; and, with the exception of sending General Ampudia to a respectable distance from town, no act of severity has been committed by the Government. The conspirators are officers on half pay, or rather without any pay, of whom about 20,000 exist to a military establishment of the same number; but they are kept in awe if not by the power of the President and Ministry, by the dread of General Paredes, in whose hands the destinies of Mexico are for the present placed. The two great parties in the republic are the Centralists and the Federalists. Towards the latter the Government

Inclines, as it feels that it has power and numbers; but Paredes, allied with the church, arbitrates between both, threatening the Government if it favours the views of the Liberal side, and openly denouncing the Federalists, should they venture on extreme measures. Parades himself will not accept the Presidency; but he is no less the master of the country, and, as long as he and the church remain faithful to each other, his word must be all powerful. But Paredes cannot always be depended on, and his most intimate partisans cannot determine what his ultimate intentions are. We all understood a few days since that he had pronounced, as the phrase is, and even the official papers gave credit to the news. But we now find that he has not done so, and that his menaces against the Government were contingent on certain supplies of money which he then demanded, and has since received. The division of Paredes consists of nominally 10,000, but in reality of 6,000 or 7,000 men; but such is the state of Mexico, that even with that small body he is the only man on whose word the existence of the Government depends. He is at present stationed at San Luis Potosi, keeping up a communication with General Arista, who commands on the Texan frontier.

We are daily receiving most afflicting news from the provinces of Durango and Zacatecas, which the Cumanchee Indians have been ravaging, without the slightest effort being made by the Government to check their inroads. The inhabitants of these provinces have made a few attempts to meet the savages, but with plans so badly organized that they have invariably failed. Indeed, on one occasion the people sustained a loss of 40 killed and 70 wounded out of an attacking force of twice that number; and so ineffectual has the opposition been, that all the haciendas or farms have been plundered, and their horses, mules, and oxen carried away, for sale, no doubt, in the United States. The Mexican people do not hesitate to accuse Brother Jonathan of sending in these hordes, as they are better armed and mounted than they have been on former occasions; and whence could they be provided but from the States? The accusation may be groundless, in fact, it cannot be proved; but the effect has been produced, and one of the conditions proposed by the American Government is, as I understand, to force these Indian tribes to retire beyond a respectable distance from the Mexican territory, and which condition will be among the most palatable coming from Washington. The alarm occasions by these inroads was greater in the beginning of the month than it is at present, and it is hoped that the savages have retired with their booty; but at one moment the town of Zacatecas expected to be attacked, and in fact the Cumanchees were within a few days’ march of the city of Mexico itself. These things can scarcely be credited, but how can the Government bring a sufficient force to repel the Cumanchees, when it even cannot insure the safety of any road within ten miles of the capital, or even the very streets of the capital, from nightly robberies and murders? It is absolutely imprudent to go out after nightfall without being armed, and there is not a suburb or road leading in any direction, except that of Tacubaya, which is generally crowded, where a stranger can be secure from robbery at any hour of the day. In truth, there is perfect impunity for crime of every kind - a large proportion of the inhabitants of every town are notorious public robbers; and so audacious are sometimes their attempts, that a plan was lately formed by a band of 500 for sacking the city of Puebla, which was fortunately discovered in time to prevent its execution.

The embarrassments of the Government have been increased by the conduct of General Urrea in the department of Sinolon, bordering on the Gulf of California, and by that of General Alvarez in the district called the Sur of Mexico, in the vicinity of Acapulco, on the Pacific. In the former Urrea, who was arrested by order of Government, was released in triumph by the people at whose head he placed himself, threatening to march on Mazatlan and plunder the custom-house; and in the latter Alvarez has, supported by a peculiar colored race called Pintos, openly pronounced. The Government is equally powerless against both; and these upstarts and their followers are at liberty to plunder as long as they think proper; but their ravages must be confined to their own districts, as beyond these limits they exercise no control. The Central Government, therefore, takes no heed of their proceedings; and it will wait still Generals Alvarez and Urrea of their own accord return to their duty. The province of California remains in the same state of quasi allegiance. It seems to be almost forgotten by the Government, as no means are taken to advance the expedition of Iniestra, planned at least eight months ago; but if it be true that the United States are determined on forcing the fanatical and powerful sect called the Mormons to take up a settlement in California, the Mexican Government must at last awake, or submit to the loss of one of its finest provinces. I need not speak more fully on this Mormon project, as what we hear on the subject comes through the States; whence you are fully supplied with information; but the project excites a strong sensation in the city of Mexico, and all the newspapers discuss it with evident alarm.

Want of money is still the apparently incurable sore of the Mexican Government. The Minister lives from day to day anticipating at an enormous discount every month a quarter's revenue. The utmost he can do is to cover absolute daily expenses; and as to meeting all demands or making provision for the future, such ideas never enter his head, and happy is he at the end of the week if he can supply the pressing exigencies of the army. Various projects are invented to cure this wretched state of things, and to a certain extent the Congress gives facility to the Government. For instance, it has just voted full powers to the Government to recognize contracts made with Santa Anna on receiving adequate compensation, which vote is calculated to draw a bout half a million of dollars from the persons interested in those contracts. It likewise tries to facilitate the import of a certain quantity of cotton wool at a duty of six dollars the quintal, but there it is met by the agricultural interest, and the cotton-growers of the district of Vera Cruz and of the Sur of Mexico threaten to pronounce if that plan be persevered in. The licenses for the importation of cotton... wool, or of low priced cotton goods at remunerating duties, cannot be granted until two-thirds of the departmental assemblies give permission for the alteration of what is called the organic base. But even then there will be a violent contest between the landed and manufacturing interests, and the Government will find it difficult to carry out the only plan that would effectually relieve the treasury. The evils attending a total disregard of first principles is fully exhibited in this country. The Government in attempting to reconcile the two impossibilities of giving protection, amounting to absolute prohibition, to oppose interests, has entangled itself with both. To save the agriculturists, it prohibited the importation of cotton wool, and now the mills must stop for want of an adequate supply, the quantity raised in the republic falling far short of the demand; and to protect the manufacturers it prohibited the importation of all low cottons, though a large revenue might be raised by even 100 per cent duty on the first cost. The cotton spinners are ruined unless a sufficient quantity of wool be imported, and the cotton growers are destroyed if the desired importation takes place. In the meantime, the people are paying ls.6d. for an article that could be furnished by the British merchant at one third the price, and the Government is deprived of a revenue which would bring in annually several millions of dollars. In short, free trade and encouragement to immigration are the only means of saving Mexico; but though several members of Congress are impressed with the truth of these doctrines, the great bulk of the Chambers oppose them in the most decisive manner.

Nearly all the British merchants of Mexico have left town for the great annual fair of San Juan de los Lagos, in Jalisco, which is to take place in a few days. This is the greatest fair of the year, and buyers from the most distant parts of the republic attend to supply themselves with stocks of British cottons and linens and French articles of taste. About 200,000 l of British goods are annually sold. This year the supply from Vera Cruz, Tampico, and Mexico is larger than usual; but the expected supply from Mazatlan will fail, in consequence of the non-arrival of vessels with cargoes from Liverpool and Glasgow destined for the fair. The dealers in the interior are, generally speaking, out of stock, and a smart market is expected by the British merchants, particularly as the usual quantity from Mazatlan is not to come forward; but on the other hand, the reduction in the tariff may induce holders to keep off, in the hope of lower priced importations specially being made, so that the result of the fair is still problematical. The fair of Aguas Calientes has gone on very well, so that the importers are, generally speaking, sanguine of success at San Juan de los Lagos.

I understand that reductions have taken place in the Real del Monte mining concern to the extent of 500% a month. This should have been done long since, as the concern has been overburdened by expense. But it is still uncertain whether that reduction will be sufficient, as, in consequence of the high price of quicksilver, which prevents a great quantity of ore being realized, and the vast body of water which interferes with the working of the two principal veins, the company has not of late been doing well. I have not yet personally inspected the mines; but I am told that one of the consequences of the tremendous earthquake of the 7th of April last was that such a flood of water has been poured into the two principal veins that all the power of steam cannot keep it under. It is a bold assertion to make after so many years; failure at the Real del Monte, but I am informed by sound authority that under a cheap and efficient management, and a return, in some things, to the Mexican system, the mines could be made to pay.

A shock of an earthquake was felt here about 3 in the afternoon of Thursday last. It was too slight to cause any mischief, but sufficiently strong to alarm the people. The crowds, who are extremely sensitive to such indications, fell on their knees in the great square and public streets; but their alarm and their piety were soon over, as the shock passed away without causing damage of any kind. It is said that earthquakes have been more frequent in this country within the last two years than has usually been the case; and the inhabitants of Mexico still speak with terror of the shock of the 7th of April last, which affected

Almost every house in the city, and which, if it has lasted one minute longer, would have converted this fine capital into one heap of ruins.

The Siglo publishes the following as the plan which the conspirators in the late threatened pronunciamento threatened to enforce:--

"Revolutionary Plan"

"Article I. The existing Legislature and executive powers cease, by the will of the nation, from today their respective functions.

"2. The supreme executive power of the nation shall be temporarily placed in three individuals, the following being invited to form the junta, namely, Don Nicolas Bravo, Don Juan N. Almonte, and Don Mariano Paredes. In case these persons refuse to act, the following shall be named, -- Senores Jose Maria Jauregui, Don Gabriel Valencia, and Don Cosmo Furlong. But, should these persons decline the task, then the General-in-Chief who may be placed at the head of the garrison of Mexico shall exercise for the present the whole executive power.

"3. The Government, in the space of one month, shall call together a national assembly to be charged with the reconstruction of the republic.

"4. The said national assembly shall commence its sittings in the capital within five months of its convocation, or sooner if possible.

"5. The same sovereign assembly - always bearing in mind the several constitutions by which Mexico has been governed, and the full power which the deputies of departments possess - shall form a code of fundamental laws within the space of six months.

"6. The Government shall be empowered to take all necessary steps for the purpose of making war with due activity and energy on the usurpers of Texas, and of preserving the national entirety.

"7. The Government will call to immediate account the Administration which has this day ceased to exist for the traitorous conduct is observed in the affair of Texas and in the convention which it has initiated with the United States of America.

"8. A new political era having this day commenced, the Government will not exclude from political competition any citizen no matter what his opinions may be, provided he is possessed of honour and intelligence.

"9. The departments until the new constitution is sanctioned and published will be governed by the existing laws.

"10. The army and clergy are guaranteed their rights and privileges conformably to justice and reason, and for the common good of the country.

"11. Government will answer for all its acts before the first constitutional Congress.

"12. The actual council of Government shall continue to act until the promulgation of the new constitution."

Such is the model of a constitution, copied nearly from what has been called the "Plan of Tacubaya," which the disaffected offer to the people. For the present the movement is tranquil, but a revolution must take place when the new deputies take their seats in Congress, on the Ist of January next, unless Paredes and the church should determine to strike the first blow, and enforce by the aid of the army a despotic state of things.

I have just learned that Iniestra has resigned the command of the California expedition, and that the ships so long detained on demurrage, to carry the troops from Acapulco, have been discharged. This is tantamount to an abandonment of the upper California.

At the moment of closing my despatch, I have received information brought by express from San Luis Potosi, that Paredes and his division at length pronounced, and determined to substitute for the present system a dictatorship.

[PGC]
The British and North American Royal mail steam-ship Britannia, Captain Hewitt arrived in the Mersey at half-past 5 o'clock this morning, having on board Lord Metcalfe, who has retired from the fatigues of his responsible office. The Britannia left Boston on the 2d inst., her departure on the usual day having been prevented by fog, and consequently our accounts from Halifax extend to the 4th inst. She brought 75 passengers.

The advices received by this arrival, though indefinite, are yet highly interesting. In New Orleans, as in the northern commercial cities, the inflammatory article published in the Washington Union, under the head

"The whole of Oregon, or none," had created much excitement and alarm lest the peaceful relation existing with this country should be violently disturbed. The Locofoco press of the South had also very generally taken ground against the extreme pretensions of Mr Polk; while the power wielded by Mr. Calhoun will, in all probability, be exercised against any policy which may endanger the preservation of peace.

In Michigan, on the contrary, according to the Detroit Advertiser, the rampant nonsense of the Union was received with pleasure by the Democratic party.

A Washington letter in the Journal of Commerce thus delineates the course chosen by Mr. Calhoun on the Oregon question:--

"But what was the course of Mr. Calhoun, in the Cabinet, on the Oregon question? This I am well prepared to state. He was determined not to yield one inch of that territory to the British claim. In making this statement I use his own words, as often expressed to his friends who counselled with him on the subject.

He went on with the negotiation, however, in good faith, and endeavoured to convince the British Minister, that our title to the whole of Oregon was clear and unquestionable. His last letter to Mr. Pakenham put the question in the form of a dilemma, so that in whichever way the British Minister should answer, Mr. Calhoun would be ready to make good the American claim. To this letter there was no reply, for the reason that Mr. Calhoun was turn out by the incoming Administration. From this statement, however, it will be easy to see which way Mr. Calhoun will go upon the Oregon question, as a senator. He will take the stand that he has always taken - neither relinquishing our title, nor pressing it to a collision with Great Britain. Adopting "a wise and masterly in activity", he will leave the claim to work itself out".

"There is reason to believe that this definition of Mr. Calhoun's position on this subject comes from someone who has authority to make it, and to announce the course which Mr. Calhoun will pursue in the Senate. It appears, therefore, that Mr. Calhoun will advise inactivity, in reference to Oregon, as the surest method of securing in the end all our claims - and that should this prove impossible, he will not yield one inch of the territory in dispute to the British claim. We confer we shall be greatly disappointed in Mr. Calhoun should he pursue the policy here indicated. As to the wisdom of his inactive policy, we have no doubt that it is the very best course our Government can adopt. If the territory could be allowed to remain in its present position, subject to existing tendencies for 20 years, the natural course of events would make it American soil and transfer its sovereignty, without a blow, to the Government of the United States. The policy recommended by Mr. Calhoun, is therefore the best adapted to secure the result aimed by our Government. But it must be remembered that Great Britain is perfectly aware of this fact, and that she will therefore by no means be disposed to allow this "wise and masterly" inactivity to work out its natural result in the establishment of the American claim. She may deem it for her interest to terminate the existing convention of joint occupancy and to insist upon a final and immediate settlement of the whole dispute. We deem it, indeed, most probable that this is the course she will pursue. And in this contingency, what will be the position of Mr. Calhoun: This indeed will be the only contingency in which his action can be of much importance. And in that case, we are told that he will not yield one inch of the territory that he is maintaining our title at all hazards, that, in short, he is for war rather than compromise or arbitration. This is not the position we had hoped to see him take. In every aspect from which it can be viewed, in reference alike to the title and the interest of the rival claimants, this question is eminently one for compromise - for adjustment by mutual concession and by a surrender of extreme claims on either side. Arbitration, should negotiation fail, should be resorted to and in no event should any statesman allow himself to look to war as the probable issue of a dispute in every way so unimportant and so easily settled by peaceful means, without the slightest derogation from the honour of either party. We trust that it will appear in the end that Mr. Calhoun thus regards it, and that he will not allow himself to be made the tool of Mr. Polk, in his aspirations for a re-election, with reference either to this or any other question of public policy.

The United States Gazette writes upon the same topic:--

"We have occasion to know that Mr. Calhoun has since his visit to Louisiana expressed himself freely in regard to the Oregon question. He does not doubt as to the right of the United States to the territory, and he has no doubt that the right can be asserted and sustained, without the least disturbance of the present happy state of peace and commerce between the United States and Great Britain. But at the same time, Mr. Calhoun fears that the Cabinet will not be guarded in its language and conduct relative to the claim of Great Britain and will thus impose upon Congress the necessity of a course which might be easily avoided, and which will be full of misery and woe to the people of both countries. Mr. Calhoun looks at the Oregon question, then, as liable to precipitate us into war, not because war is necessary, but because prudence is wanted."

The New York Herald gives the following:

"We learn from our private and confidential correspondent at Washington, who has the best means of knowing that a few days since Sir George Simpson, The Governor of the Hudson Bay Company, was there, and had several interesting conversations with Mr. Pakenham, the British Minister, relative to the forthcoming message of Mr. Polk, the the position of the American Government on the Oregon question. The result of the interview between the two British functionaries, was that a visit was made by Mr. Pakenham to the Secretary of Treasury, and other members of the American Government. What was the precise nature of the conversation that ensued between the British Minister and the Government, our correspondent does not profess to know; but he learned that Sir George Simpson departed, and is now in New York, highly elated with the belief that the position which Mr. Polk intends to assume on the Oregon question in his message, is highly favourable to the maintenance of peace between the two countries, and to an agreeable termination of this difficult question. Governor Simpson will probably remain in New York up to the sailing of the next steamer from Boston; the agents of the company being Messrs. Maitland, Kennedy and Co. It is the general belief among the British Embassy here, that Mr. Polk will moderate his views on the Oregon question and such probably will be the rumour in New York.

The Nashville Union contradicts a rumour that the democratic members of the Tennessee legislature intend to nominate Mr. Polk for reeelection to the Presidency.

The New York Herald, of the 24th ult., revives the remour current many months ago, to the effect that Mr. Pakenham was endeavouring to negotiate a commercial treaty with the United States Government. The Herald justly remarks that, -=-

"This would be an example for the regulation of the commerce of the world;" and that "two leading commercial nations, commencing a reciprocal system of commerce with low rates of duties, would soon cause the principle to extend to every portion of the world;" and "would also exercise on the Oregon question an influence beneficial and advantageous in the extreme.

The Boston Post gives currency to a rumour that Mr. Pakenham, "Who, it is understood, has been placed hors decombat in the negotiation about Oregon with Mr. Buchanan, will be recalled, and that a new Minister will be sent out to adjust the differences between the two nations upon more liberal terms than have heretofore been insisted upon by Great Britain."

The Washington Union, of the 26th ult., thus attempts by a side blow, to damage the pacific influence of the Whig journals and Mr. Webster: -

"What has been the effect of the course, pursued by the National Intelligence; and other Whig papers, upon the Oregon question? Can any one in this country believe, for one moment, that the policy adopted by these journals, with a view, as we believe, to annoy the Administration to which they are opposed, has not exerted a malign influence abroad? How can it be otherwise? If the English Government shall see us divided in opinion - if it discovers that a large and respectable party, or the editorial representatives of such a part, are defending and sustaining the anti-American side of the Oregon question - will not that Government be encouraged to
"Again, what effect is likely to be produced in Great Britain, when the position of a person of Mr. Webster’s reputation is known upon the Oregon question? Can such evidence of division and distraction in our midst whether partial or extensive, exert any other than an unhappy influence? To establish our rights to get them recognized in their proper extent, we should have harmonious action. Amity, concord will accomplish all. Division, serious division, upon such a question as that of Oregon, may be productive of infinite mischief. With this conviction, we earnestly exhort the friends of peace and of Oregon to act in unison. We invoke the Whig party - numbering, as we believe, so many who are ready to participate in the adoption of all proper measures - to assert and maintain our title to the Oregon territory, to abjure all mere partisanship, and rally, upon this national question, at leas to the support of the Administration”.

Rumors having been afloat that Mr. Buchanan would be transferred from the Secretaryship of State, the "Official journal" reiterates its assertion that Mr. Buchanan will retain his present position in the Cabinet, and states that no effort has been made to "persuade" that gentleman to retire from the executive department of the Government, nor to accept a seat upon the supreme bench, whatever may have been intimated to the contrary.

The New York Herald gives the following: -- We learn from our private and confidential correspondence at Washington, who has the best means of knowing that a few days since Sir George Simpson, the Governor of the Hudson-bay Company, was there, and had several interesting conversations with Mr. Pakenham, the British Minister, relative to the forthcoming message of Mr. Polk and the position of the American Government on the Oregon question. Governor Simpson will probably remain in New York up to the sailing of the next steamer from Boston; the agents of the company being Messrs. Maitland, Kennedy and Co. It is the general belief among the British Embassy here, that Mr. Polk will moderate his views on the Oregon question, and such probably will be the rumour in New York.

The Nashville Union contradicts a rumour that the democratic members of the Tennessee Legislature intend to nominate Mr. Polk for re-election to the Presidency.

The New York Herald, of the 24th ult, revives the rumour current many months ago, to the effect that Mr. Pakenham was endeavouring to negotiate a commercial treaty with the United States Government. The Herald justly remarks that -

"This would be an example for the regulation of the commerce of the world.

London, Saturday, December 27, 1834

It is impossible but that the tone in which the President discusses the questions of Oregon and Texas must grate rather harshly on every Cin-Atlantic ear. In the old world we are not accustomed to hear statesmen and rulers announce new principles of public morality, to demand an insulation from the universal laws and sympathies of their kind, and in their place to erect a convenient system of original and axiomatic claims: we only aspire to develop the old. Whoever declines to rest his claims on the ancient foundations of equity and truth, is immediately asked for his credentials, and nothing less than a heavenly sanction with satisfy us for the absence of admissible human pleas. From the beginning of time the man who promises a new morality, or what comes to the same thing, an exemption from the old, is solicited for a sign. We still confess our dependence on Divine authentications. When a miracle has been performed, and Congress has attested the presence of supernatural powers, then, and only then, shall we yield our convictions to the novelties of the American creed.
Then and then only shall we admit it to be a mortal sin deserving the summary vengeance of the Union, to offer our mediation or advice to any North American state, to enforce ancient treaties and defend ancient occupation in a neutral and unappropriated American territory.

The President himself betrays the novelty of his position, when he claims at the same time independent principles and an independent sphere. Unless he had been prepared to claim a world of his own he could not have represented the obligations of all humanity. He consistently outlaws America before he establishes the laws of the old world. New laws demand a new tribunal. The old world has long been subject to a supreme international Government, which, whether by the regular operation of its rules, whether by continued negotiation, whether by treaties and conventions, in a certain effected way does more or less embrace every civilized realm. It protects the weak from the strong, and brings every claim to one and the same universal test, obviates those disastrous claims, which one allowed, are apt to divide all in a common calamity. The United States of North America proclaims to the whole world and especially to the Family, that they are members of no such system and will be accountable to no such authority.

The United States sincerely desirous of preserving relations of good standing with all nations, cannot in silence permit any European interference on the North American continent; and should any such interference be attempted, will be ready to resist it at any and all hazards.

The people of the United States cannot, therefore, view with intolerance attempts of European Powers to interfere with the independent actions of the nations on this continent. The American system of this Government is entirely different from that of Europe. Jealousy among the different sovereign nations of Europe, lest any of them might become the powerful for the rest, has caused them anxiously to desire the establishment of what they term as the Balance of Power. It cannot be permitted to have any application of the North American continent, and especially to the United nation, than President Polk would give them credit for. They do not cut down their prospects to the compass and policy of a Presidential address. Like all other nations of the earth, they air an exercising what they consider a beneficial influence on all their brotherhood of the human kind. They feel the universally innate desire to regenerate all the world after the image and type of self. To extend the principles of "self-government" and "free institutions", to extinguish tyrants and aristocrats, to level all social irregularities, all over the world, especially where reform is most needed,. and the change will be the greatest, are objects ever on their lips and deep in their bosoms. They only hide their time to fulfill their great "mission" and execute a glorious deliverance from class legislation and territorial bondage for every nation of the earth. That golden vision is circumscribed by no continual bounds. Old and new are all alike to the American philanthropist, and philanthropy in that country is the theory and profession of every citizen. Any substantial and resolute resistance offered by an considerable portion of Europe to the dominion of the altar and the throne may almost reckon on the certainty of Anglo-American cooperation.

The classified reader will find in this theory of political insulation a most exact counterpart of one advanced with much plausibility and eloquence, though without either truth or effect, by an ancient sate, in many respects the prototype of the Anglo-American commonwealth. It was a people of great enterprise, daring, and power; famous in those days, the America of Greece, though of no great consideration now. It was the little island of Corfu; once the "far west" of civilization, now absorbed into its most central recess and innermost bosom. When another country of that colony, long after the actual independence of the latter, had some occasion to resent the arrogance of its offspring, the ambassadors of Coreyra pleaded in the Athenian assembly their distance and separation from all the old world, and independence of interests, and their habitual "practice" of non-interference, in lines which the American President might almost be supposed to have borrowed for his purposes. We will not enter into the arguments adduced on the Corinthian side of the controversy. The facts of the case were certainly against the Coreyreans, who do not appear to have made the last use of their insulation, and their theory of being, as Mr. Polk says,"the best judge" in their own cause. However, they were now forced to solicit Athenian aid, and soon became the focus of a most dreadful and disastrous war, which ended in the utter disruption of the community, and ruin of their state. Such was the end of their theory of political and moral insulation.

It is the misfortune of those who write for the daily press, that they are often called on to do the duty of posterity long before the sun has risen on the momentous and every-varying discussions of a midnight Legislature. In the space of two or three hours they have frequently to forecast the sentence of ages, and to review the umost gravity of sentiment, the calmest circumspection, and most prophetic prudence, announcements, the very words and tones of which are still lingering in the ear and never attempted to propagate it by intrigues, by diplomacy or by force.
We may claim on this continent a like exemption for European interference. The nations of America are equally sovereign and independent with those of Europe.
They possess the same rights, independent of all foreign interposition, to make war, to conclude peace and to regulate their internal affairs.

As a matter of fact nothing can be more untrue. By the proof of history America is inextricably mixed up with European politics. In the last European war the Union sympathized with our continental foes, and took advantage of our embarrassments to assert its claims. In so doing it only followed the instinct of all its contending parties, who, whatever be the nature of the quarrel, or the principles on which they maintain it, do in fact select the season of their adversary's weakness as the best opportunity of striking a blow, and cannot help feeling a common cause with other hospitable parties. France sympathized with the States, and rendered them most important service in the war of independence; and that sympathy was long after returned. We cannot express the fact better than in the words of Governor Strong, addressed to the Legislature of Massachusetts on January 12, 1814:

"The friends of peace (says the Governor) are accused of being under British influence, but their accusers ought to reflect whether partialities of an opposite kind have not produced the evils we suffer, and whether if our conduct to both belligerents had been impartial, a war with either would have been though necessary.

We had assumed the character of a neutral nation, but had we not violated the duties imposed by that character? Had not every subject of complaint against one belligerent been amply displayed, and those against the other been concealed or palliated? It has been suggested we have no connection with regard to the war, but when France and England are in a most arduous struggle, and we interfered with one of them, will any man doubt our intention to the other?"

And as it happens, and as every one moderately reacts, the more popular Anglo-American literature knows full well, our republican kinsmen do feel a more generous, more expansive, more universal and we may even say, a more humane and social ambition, then President Polk would give them credit for. They do not cut down their prospects to the States. We must over maintain the principle, that the people of this continent alone have the right to decide their own destiny. Should any portion of them, constituting an independent state, propose to write themselves with our confederacy, this will be a question. For them and us to determine, without any foreign interposition. We can never consent that European Powers shall interfere to prevent such a union, because it might disturb the balance of power which they may desire to maintain upon this continent.

The natural insulation of the new continents must be great indeed, which can justify such a social or rather anti-social independence. It must be shown not only that there is no necessity for political relations, but not even a possibility, not even a case in which such could possibly arise. The fact, however, is far otherwise. The old and the new world are separated by much less distances than those which divide the constituent nations of each. The western nations of Europe are within a fortnight’s voyage of nearly the whole North American population from the Isthmus of Darien to the shores of Lake Superior. We have more frequent and more intimate communications with the States than we have with Russia. In the same practical point of view we are far nearer to North America, we could almost add the South, "than we are to Africa and Asia. If America is a world of its own, then also is each of the four conventional quarters of the globe. In fact, there is no more reason in nature why America should segregate itself from the universal system and universal code, than any other quarter. Nor does history present any contradiction to this antecedent and natural unity of the whole world; and the President only shows the utter groundlessness of his theory, when he affects a reference to the political facts of the question:

"It is well known to the American people and to all nations, that this Government has ever interfered with the relations existing between Governments. We have never made ourselves parties to their wars or their alliances; we have not fought their territories by conquest; we have not mingled with parties in their domestic struggles; and believing our own form of government to be the best, we have never attempted to propagate it by intrigues, by diplomacy, or by force. We may claim on this continent a like exemption from European interference. The nations of America are equally sovereign and independent with those of Europe. They preserve the same rights, independent of all foreign interpretation, to make war to conclude peace, and to regulate their internal affairs."

As a matter of fact, nothing can be more untrue. By the proof of history, America is inextricably mixed up with European politics. In the last European war the Union sympathized with our continental foes, and took advantage of our embarrassments to assert its claims. In so doing it only followed the instinct, of all contending parties, who, whatever be the nature of the quarrel, or the principles which they maintain it, do in fact select the reason of their adversary's weakness as the best. LT 1845/12/30/4a Diplomatic correspondence with the US

LONDON, Tuesday, December 30, 1845

Our columns of yesterday contained, and were almost monopolized by the prolix and interesting, but no amusing correspondence carried on during the last twelve months between our Minister to the United States and the two Foreign Ministers of the Republic, Messrs. Calhoun and Buchanan. With out at all professing to dissect these State papers with the accuracy and minute criticism which their importance deserves, we may yet lay before our readers a summary of the more important points which this voluminous correspondence presents,

The first letter of the American Minister, Mr. Calhoun, dated September 3, 1841, commences rather ominously:

"The undersigned declines the proposal of the British Plenipotentiary on the ground that it would have the effect of restricting the possibilities of the United States to limits far more circumscribed than the claims clearly entitle them to. It proposes to limit their northern boundary by a line drawn from the Rocky Mountains, along the 19th parallel of latitude to the north easternmost branch of the Columbia river and then down the middle of that river to the sea giving to Great Britain all the country north and the United States all south of that line except a detached territory extending to the Pacific, and the Straits of Fuca from Bulfinch's Harbour to Hood's Canal. To which it is proposed, in addition, to make free to the United States any port which the United States Government might desire, either on the mainland or on Vancouver's Island, south of Latitude 49 degrees." His successor, Mr. Buchanan, concludes his letter of the 12th of July, 1845, by proposing to the British Government, in the name of the President that--

"The Oregon territory shall be divided between the two countries by the 49th parallel of north latitude from the Rocky Mountains, to the Pacific Ocean; offering, at the same time, to make free to Great Britain any port or ports on Vancouver's Island, south of the parallel which the British Government may desire."

It will appear, therefore, on reference being made to the map that the representative of the American Government claimed for his country all the district between the 49th degree of north latitude, including the Columbia River and the land on each side of it, and exclusive only of such port or ports on Vancouver's Island as we might wish to retain, south of this line; whilst, on the other hand, our Minister claimed on our behalf all the territory that lies to the north, and northwest of a line continued from the present boundary in the parallel 49 degrees to the northeast point of the Columbia, and drawn through that river to the sea, with the reservation of a coast district in favour of America. A glance at the map will show that the object of both diplomatists was to obtain for their respective countries the navigation of the Columbia and the possession of the ports at its mouth. The former of these the American Minister claims for the United States exclusively; whilst ours was content to share both the benefits of its navigation and the possession of its banks on equal terms with the counter-claimant. But the terms proposed pleased neither party. Mr. Pakenham expressed a hope that the American Government would be prepared to offer some further proposal for the settlement of the Oregon question more consistent with fairness and with the reasonable expectations of the British Government." And Mr. Buchanan replied to this in a letter which concludes the published correspondence, by withdrawing the proposition previously made by the United States Government to Great Britain.

Such is the aspect, as yet revealed, of our diplomatic relations with the American republic. It is one which presents difficulties, but not such as can only be cut by the sword. The correspondence which has taken place, while it reflects great credit on The rights on which rest the claims advanced by the Ministers of the two nations are threefold; viz., those of discovery, occupation, and the transmission of Spanish rights. England claims the valley of the Columbia River and the coast to the south of Vancouver's Island, on the authority of discoveries by Cooke, Vancouver and Mackenzie; on the authority of the Nootka Sound Convention in 1790 with Spain, and of settlements effected by American traders. It will be obvious that the right of sovereignty which attends discovery, unless backed by some decisive measures on the part of the Government by whom or by whose subjects the discovery is made is worth very little. Did the rule prevail that every nation was entitled in perpetuity to the sovereignty of any territory discovered and claimed by any of its subjects, without any immediate act on the part of its Executive to enforce such claim, the tenure of most colonial dependencies at the present day would be one of very equivocal legality, and indeed there is so much obscurity and doubt hanging over the history of all territorial discoveries, that it would be difficult to suggest a worse title than that which is formed by the assertion of such a claim, unsupported by any evidence of confirmation by the Government in whose behalf it is represented to have been made. In the present instance, the honours of discovery appear to be due to a Spanish navigator of the 17th century, Juan de Fuca, who has given his name to the strait that separates Vancouver's Island from the mainland. Nor is a much better title afforded by mere occupancy unprotected by the home Government of a state, and unrecognized by foreign nations. The question of right is thus narrowed to the consideration of the original proprietorship and subsequent alienation. The American Ministers assert, that not only the valley of the Columbia, but the whole of the Oregon territory as far as the 52d degree of north latitude - belonged to Spain, and was Spain transferred to the United States at the Treaty of Florida in 1819. They say that they have a title not only to the valley drained by the Columbia, but also to the whole of the Oregon; and they take credit to themselves for evincing no small moderation in proposing the parallel of the 49th degree as a boundary line. The question therefore arises, which is the better claim; that which is founded on the treaty by Spain with England in 1790 or that which rests on the Florida Treaty with the United States in 1819? By the former Spain agreed to give indemnity to British subjects dispossessed of their settlements about Nootka Sound, and to guarantee the same liberty of access to the citizens of both nations "as well in those parts" which were restored to British subjects, as in the other parts of North America, which then belonged to Spain. By the latter, she ceded all her authority and jurisdiction over her provinces in North America to the United States. Now, when it is recollected that in 1789 Spain abandoned her settlements in Nootka Sound, and that from this time she appears to have neglected this portion of her colonies empire altogether, it seems a very questionable doctrine to hold that any treaty made 50 years afterwards could transfer to another nation possessions left, and recognized as left in the hands of Englishmen. The only parties to the treaty of 1790 were England and Spain, The country which was the subject of the treaty was afterwards abandoned by Spain. The parties expressly mentioned in the treaty as to be "indemnified" and "restored" were English. It seems difficult to avoid one of two conclusions on premises like these, viz., that the property and possession of this district were virtually ceded to England, or that Spain and England were to hold it on terms of joint occupancy. In the former case Spain could have no right whatsoever to transfer it by a treaty made 30 years afterwards; in the other she could only surrender her possessions and rights which she shared with England. In neither case can the United States claim the exclusive sovereignty of the Oregon territory.

But we are aware that it is not the equity of a title which is alone allowed to determine questions of this kind. The interests of the litigant parties form an important element in the materials for the deliberation of diplomatists. It is for the advantage of the two countries that the dispute should be speedily settled; it is for the advantage of the whole civilized world that it should be settled amicably. It would be monstrous that two nations which have for twenty or thirty years been enjoying this vast territory on terms of joint occupancy, should not proceed to a violent and sanguinary termination of their several claims. It would be monstrous that claims virtually disallowed by the hitherto existing conditions of settlement, should now be set up to deprive British settlers of some of the chief advantages which they have heretofore possessed in security. If Great Britain had no right to any portion of the Oregon territory, or if the occupation of the Columbia valley was an invasion, how comes it that the United States Government did not remonstrate long ago? Why were Englishmen allowed to settle at all in Oregon? How came they there at first? The answer is plain. There could have been no exclusive right avowed on the part of the United States to the possession of this district at the period of their first settlement. There is nothing of the kind pretended to in this correspondence. The whole country was probably regarded as open to the colonists of every nation. Afterwards, the Treaty of Florida was pronounced or pretended to have ceded the entire government of it to the United States. But the very policy pursued by them shows that they felt the difficulty of acting upon such a title. And, if there were difficulties then in the way of an exclusive claim, there are no less difficulties now, when the numbers of the settlers have been increased and their relations complicated by time.

It must be a matter of arrangement. Each of the two nations has enjoyed the full advantages of the district, in respect of rivers and harbours. It would be unjust to make such a partition as would take from the subjects of either state privileges to which they have been accustomed. Great Britain proposes to divide the use of the Columbia River with America. Why should the latter reject this offer? The subjects of Great Britain hitherto enjoyed this privilege in common with American citizens. It would be carrying concession to the verge of servility were the English Government to assent to such a deprivation, without obtaining some compensatory benefit; and why did the American Government reject the proposal of submitting the question to arbitration? The English Government has no other desire on this subject but that which inspires the English people to act in the spirit of fairness and peace. It covets no extension of empire; it seeks no unjust aggrandizement; it earnestly deprecates the notion of hostilities between two kindred nations, but as earnestly revolts from the idea of neglecting a few helpless subjects in a remote and unprotected district, or of submitting to any sacrifice incompatible with the national honour. It therefore would willingly confide the decision of its claims and the definition of its rights to any impartial arbiter, if it should be found impracticable to arrive at a satisfactory settlement by negotiation.

THE FRENCH PRESS UPON THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

December 27, 1845

"The message of the President of the United States respecting the Oregon question, observes the Journal des Debats - "is not of a tenour to indicate that Mr. Polk is animated by a spirit of conciliation. He dwells much upon his moderation, but he shows it so little, and his tone is such, that should a similar tone be assumed by the British Government, the affair must inevitably terminate in a war. Negotiations rejecting the Oregon territory have been pending since the year 1818. Both Powers wish to possess the river Columbia, the only important stream in the west of the New World. In the conferences which were held in 1818, 1824, and 1826, it was agreed that the navigation should be free for both countries, but the United States wished to possess both banks from the 49th degree of latitude to the ocean. England offered the left bank, preserving the other for herself, both countries having the free right of traffic with the Indians. Such is the convention which at present exists, and which Mr. Polk wishes to put an end to. The President, instead of exerting himself to bring the debate to a pacific termination, appears to have done all in his power to render it impossible. During the negotiations of 1844, England gave up to the United States a part of the right bank of the river, and one or more ports in the Archipelago. Thus England evinced every desire to arrange the affair amicably, by offering more than in the former negotiations. Mr. Polk, on the contrary, offered less, and was strenuous in his endeavours to prevent the English navigating the Columbia; as a compensation he consented to give them one or more ports in the island of Quadra and Vancouver - a compensation of little value. He, moreover, declared, that when he consented to leave any portion whatsoever of the Oregon territory to Great Britain, he did it, not as an acknowledgment that she had any right to it, but simply from a desire to preserve peace, and out of respect for those of his predecessors who had negotiated upon the basis of a partition with England. England having refused to listen to the offer made by Mr. Polk (and which he was pleased to consider a most gracious one), the President withdrew it, and then maintained that the whole of the Oregon territory was the lawful property of the Union. Notwithstanding the tone of the President's message, it does not follow that a war must necessarily ensue. How often in Europe have different Powers been as near hostilities? The Chamber of Representatives may vote certain offensive measures for England, it is even to be expected that such will be the case, as the President is doing all in his power to excite it to do so, but it is hoped that the pacific interests will find a refuge in the Senate. The President breathes war, and his message in that respect is a novelty, even after those of General Jackson. Mr. Polk evidently belongs to a new school; and the American democracy, since the taking possession of Texas, abandons itself to an ambition which may prove fatal to it. His message is without precedent, not merely as regards the manner in which the Oregon question is treated, but on account of the general tone which characterizes it. Up to the present time, or at least up to the time of General Jackson, it was customary in the messages to speak in a differential tone to the European Powers. The Presidents were men who had seen Europe, and who duly appreciated the power of the great states of the old continent. In those solemn documents concocted principally for the multitude, they showed themselves proud of the republican institutions, they made a pompous parade of the prosperity sans egale (the favourite term of the country), but they carefully avoided anything which might be regarded at the other side of the Atlantic as vain and ridiculous bravadoes. They exhorted the nation conformably to the last proclamation of Washington to confine itself to domestic affairs and not to aim at other conquests than those which she accomplished so honourably, as well as profitably, over the wild and uncultivated lands at its disposal. Mr. Polk, very different from his illustrious predecessors, reduces himself to the level of the rough cultivators of the valley of the Ohio, in whose opinion Europe is a collection of degraded beings groaning under the weight of monarchical government, and which it would be no difficult matter for the forces of the Union to overcome. It is impossible to explain the imprudent language contained in the President's message in any other manner. But England is not the only Power to which the arrogant message applies. France us likewise roughly handled with respect to the Texas affair. France is reproached with wishing to have Texas made an independent state instead of going to swell the American federation, and the incorporation of Texas is represented as a victory over the European monarchies. The message reminds France that she was an ally formerly of the United States, that she has a common interest with the Union - that of the freedom of the seas. France is, in truth an advocate for maritime liberty; but this liberty was not in question in the affair of Texas. France has been a useful and powerful ally of the United States. She has ever applauded the increase of the prosperity and power of America, but that is no reason that she should applaud the United States when they gave themselves up to the spirit of conquest, when by a procedure ever to be condemned they took from Mexico one of its finest provinces to appropriate it to their own use, and for the express purpose of reestablishing what the Mexicans had so nobly abolished, viz. The infamous slave trade. France although not republican, is not the less devoted to the cause of liberty. She loves justice, and could not see America openly violate the rights of men without feeling painfully hurt. A propos to that detestable hypocrisy, for in reading that document any person ignorant of the real facts of the case would imagine that it was the United States, and not Mexico, which had a right to complain. France then was acting a noble part when she negotiated with the view to put a period to those encroachments which nothing could justify."

The Press states that "The message of the President of the United States is more diffuse than any previous document of the same nature. It is with difficulty contained in nine columns of small text. The Oregon question being the most important matter eluded to in that document, merits attention before all the others. Upon that question the language of the President is clear and determined, and boldly maintains the pretensions already manifested last year as to the totality of the territory. After having, at considerable length, explained that the different proposals made by his predecessors to Great Britain had been rejected by that Power, Mr. Polk declares that, according to his judgment, the British Government could not legitimately prove any right over any portion of the contested territory, according to the recognized principles of all nations. There were three proposals made by the predecessors of Mr. Polk to the British Cabinet. It was offered to arrange the question in litigation by surrendering to Great Britain the portion situated beyond the 49th degree of north latitude, and on two different occasions it was proposed to declare the navigation of the river Columbia free. Mr. Polk considers that those concessions were excessive and he congratulates himself that they were refused, and that consequently they may be withdrawn. The free navigation of the Columbia appears to him to be a privilege which ought not on any terms to be accorded by the American Government, and on this subject his opinion is so firmly fixed, that Mr. Pakenham, the British Minister at Washington, desiring to convince the President, had abandoned all discussion on that point. A convention passed on the 6th of August 1827, between the two nations, stipulated that, pending a definitive arrangement, the territory should be occupied conjointly by the two parties. One or other of the Governments must, however, give way, or the difference must be settled by force. Notwithstanding the gravity of this question, we believe that the affair will be arranged. Reciprocal concessions will be made. The American Government has never been so absolute as it appears at present. The rights which Mr. Polk affirms to be so clear are on the contrary, contestable. His predecessors opened the way to a compromise, and he will, no doubt, return to the same course. England was wrong not to have accepted at a former period the arrangement proposed to her. She has, as she has frequently done previously, erred through being too obstinate. But at present she will, no doubt, prefer to a war which would be disastrous for the two nations, the proposal which was previously refused. The question, moreover, is now placed on such grounds that no further adjournment is possible, and the attention of the two countries ought, therefore, to be directed to it immediately. It is not doubtful that in the American Chamber of Representatives the views of the President will obtain a considerable majority. The election of Speaker, which took place on the 2d of this month, is in this respect a certain indication. The candidate of the Opposition party, Mr. Davis, was elected by 120 votes to 72 given to the Whig candidate. "We want time and space," says the National - "To appreciate in a becoming manner, the clear, firm and decided language of Mr. Polk. We will content ourselves today with stating, that the measures proposed by the President, from the abrogation of the convention of 1828 to the establishment of military posts, clearly indicate the resolution of the American Government to occupy the contested territory, not temporarily, but permanently. The English press, which affects to find the President's message more moderate than it expected, will no doubt explain to us what more it had to dread than the formal declarations - 1st, that the right of America over Oregon was absolute, and that she was determined if necessary to assert it by the force of arms; 2d, that no compromise is practicable; 2d, that the temporary convention must expire in a year; 4th, finally that the soldiers, laws and post office of the United States shall extend to the contested territory, and render it hereafter a truly American land. Mr. Guizot and his theory of the European balance of power applied to the American continent, will find it difficult to triumph over the principle which Mr. Polk means to uphold with regard to Europe."

"As respects the Oregon question," says the Constitutionel -

"It is easy to perceive that the President was abashed by the bad effect of the philippies of his journal. After the warlike declarations of the Washington Union after the semi-official announcement of some of the Democratic journals that the message would contain a complete vindication of the rights of the United States, and reject all of a compromise, the language of Mr. Polk must appear singularly pale and subdued. President after referring to anterior negotiations and announcing that a compromise being no longer possible, it was time to renounce that course and set up a claim to the entire of Oregon. He next recommended the adoption of measures of protection on behalf of the Americans already settled in Oregon. He says nothing of the mode of conducting that negotiation with England, nor does he allude in the least to the more or less probable necessity of recurring to arms to terminate the difference. So far from that, Mr. Polk subscribes beforehand and most heartily to any measure different from his own which Congress may think proper to adopt, in order to settle the question. That language is little in accord with the declaration of the Union, or the menacing and provoking tone assumed last year by Mr. Tyler on the subject of Texas and Oregon."

The Sicle observes that the "messages of the Presidents of the American Union exceed in general all the limits assigned to documents of a similar nature in the European States. Mr. Polk has enlarged the practice of his predecessors and the twelve columns of our journal would scarcely suffice to republish the detailed exposition which he thought proper to make of his policy. We shall confine ourselves at present to indicate the principal features of that message, in which all Europe and in particular France and England have been rather rudely cast at the feet of the United States. It will be seen from the perusal of the President's message that without having more intimately conciliated England, M. Guizot has succeeded in producing a serious coolness between France and the United States, which are our natural allies. Not only did not the Minister for Foreign Affairs prevent the annexation of Texas by his unfortunate interventrator, to which he aspired in the contest raised on the Oregon territory. Never, says Mr. Polk, will the United States submit this question to the arbitration of a third power. The President after having given an historical statement of the negotiations, commenced by his predecessors, declares that England, after having refused all the proposals made to her, and not having proposed in return any that were acceptable, the negotiations had closed for the present. Mr. Polk does not refuse to enter into a compromise. He declares himself disposed to follow in this respect the instructions given him by the Congress; but at the same time declares himself determined to dissolve the convention of 1826, by virtue of which a joint occupation has been held, and to solicit from the Congress certain measures to extend immediately the protection of the American laws to the colonists of the Oregon. The joint occupation ceasing after a notice of twelve months, the question must then be solved by force or by diplomacy. But it is difficult to affirm that the Congress will sanction Mr. Polks proposal, although the Democratic party reckons a strong majority in the Chamber of Representatives, and a majority of six votes in the Senate. LT 1845/12/30/6f US, report of the Secretary of War

THE UNITED STATES, December 30, 1845

We subjoin abridged reports from the several Secretaries of State, which are extremely valuable as evidence of the efficiency of the several departments:

REPORT OF SECRETARY OF WAR:

This document occupies five columns of the Union, but the following synopsis from that paper tells the whole of a long story:

It exhibits in the first instance the organization, strength, and constitution of the regular army. The rank and file - embracing every arm of the service - does not exceed 6500men. At this time there is stationed but a single regiment on the whole northern frontier, from Maine to Lake Superior - an extent of 2000 miles and on the whole line from the Falls of St. Anthony to New Orleans (1500 miles) only one regiment of dragoons and two of infantry. The artillery regiments - reduced by detachments of four companies from each - now garrison the fortification of the seaboard from Newport to New Orleans. The remaining and larger proportion of the army is now stationed in Texas. The report gives an interesting account of the political reasons which have induced the government to give them this destination. The secretary does not think it prudent to remove the troops from this position until our relations with Mexico have assumed a more decidedly amicable character. In the event of there being any necessity to increase the army he proposes to build upon the basis of the regiments by adding to the rank and file of each company, instead of creating new regiments. This necessity may be found in the course of Mexico, or in the conduct of the Cumanches, or of the Indians found in Oregon, or that may interrupt the increased current of the emigrations to the Rocky Mountains. By the proposed arrangement of filling up the infantry companies to 68 men and the dragoons to 60 the privates are increased without a corresponding augmentation of the officers.
The report suggests that besides this increase of the number of privates in the two existing regiments of dragoons, another regiment of dragoons or of mounted riflemen may be necessary in the event of extending our posts to the Rocky Mountains.

It states that though the concentration of so large a proportion of the army on the frontier of Texas may have, in some measure, enlarged the expenditures (certainly in the article of transportation), yet it has in some degree been compensated by the improvement which has taken place in the discipline of the troops. It renews the recommendations for establishing a corps of sappers, miners and pontoniers, to assist, among other things, in constructing bridges, in consequence of the military occupation of Texas. 100 men will be sufficient for the purpose.

The report gives a rapid but interesting account of Colonel Kearney's expedition, during the last summer to the south pass of the Rock Mountains, the impressions it produced among the Indians, the number of emigrants which it met on their way to Oregon, to the number of 2325 men, women and children, with 7000 head of cattle, 400 horses and mules, and 460 wagons. This report of Colonel Kearney accompanies the communication of the commanding general, and will furnish, no doubt, an interesting store of extracts at a season of greater leisure. It also refers to the adventures of another detachment of the dragoons, under the command of Captain Sumner, nearly to the northern line of the United States, between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods.

Among the Indians whom they met with on their route, and upon whom they made a due impression with their military array, was number of bands, the half-breeds of the Red River of the North, who had come from the region of the Hudson Bay Company into our lines to hunt buffalo. They had even solicited permission to reside in the United States.

The Secretary refers to the considerations which had prompted General Gaines to dispatch the volunteers of Louisiana to the camp of General Taylor. Ample justice is done to their gallantry and Congress is invited to make appropriations for their compensation. General Taylor had also accepted the services of four Texan companies of mounted men for three months.

The estimates for the ensuing year do not greatly vary from those of former years. The item for arming the fortifications is increased 100,000 dollars. The attention of Congress is directed to the state of the fortifications - to the armories of Springfield and Harper's Ferry - to the establishment of a national foundry for cannon - to the preservation of the gunpowder belonging to the Government - to the condition of the mineral lands in the northwest, which the Secretary proposes to transfer from the management of the Ordnance department to some other (The President's message suggests to the land office).

It calls the attention of Congress to the 48 forts in process of construction, and to the propriety of erecting new forts at other points. Among these, as suggested by the reports of the Engineers, are fortifications of the narrows at Staten Island and Sandy Hook, and the condition of the long-suspended fortress at the Pea Patch; an additional work at Solles' Point, for the protection of Baltimore; and projected fortifications on the Florida reef.

The Secretary speaks with great consideration of the school at West Point, and proposes some improvements. He calls special attention to the report of the chief of the corps of Topographical Engineers to the improvement of the harbours on the lakes, which are so well calculated to furnish accommodations to steamers, that in a state of war, may be turned to the most effective purposes, and to furnish facilities to a commerce that now estimated at $100,000,000. Annually.

The secretary speaks with enthusiasm of expeditions under Captain Fremont, and his valuable services. He refers to the reports of the pension office, which has now returned on its books 28,921 pensioners - 2371 added during the last year and 1438 known to have died. He devotes a considerable space to the Indian agency and the Indians - the Pottawatomics, the Choctaws, and particularly the Cherokees. He lays before the President some highly interesting communications from our Indian subagent in the territory of Oregon.

He dedicates the conclusion of his comprehensive and very interesting report to a subject which is of so profound an importance in a free government, viz., the organization of the militia. He suggests various alterations, and, amongst the rest, submits the question, whether it might not be advisable to reduce the period of service from 18 years of age to 21, upon the ground that although citizens of 18 years of age are not too young to bear arms, they were not generally in a situation to equip themselves with arms as the law requires.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY

The communication of the Secretary of the Navy opens, without any preface, with the following sentence: "During the past year the usual squadrons of the navy of the United States have been maintained." In the Mediterranean, Commodore Smith had command of the Cumberland and the Plymouth. The Plymouth was ordered to the Brazil squadron, and the Cumberland returned home, and their places will be taken at the opening of the present season by a part of the present African squadron. The African squadron was organized under the command of Commodore Perry, who was relieved by Commodore Skinner; the Preble and the Truxtun contracted disease on board, and were sent home; the Southampton, with stors, was sent out to remain and was followed by the Marion and Dolphin. The Boxer is destined for the same station; and in January the Cumberland, bearing the broad pennant of Commodore Read, will relieve the Jamestown and Yorktown, which will proceed to the Mediterranean.

The disposition of the remainder of the naval force is thus stated:

On the Brazil station, Commodore Rousseau, the first officer west of the Alleghanies ever selected to command a squadron, relieves Commodore Turner. The Raritan will repair to the home squadron; the Boston is ordered to return to the United States. The Columbia, the Saratoga, the Plymouth, and the Bainbridge, will for the present constitute the Brazil squadron.

Commodore Parker, after a very successful cruise, returned from the Asiatic station in September, bringing home the Brandywine, the St. Louis, and the Perry. At the Bay of Islands, Captain McKeever, in the St. Louis, had the happiness to render valuable service to the inhabitants of an infant British settlement.

In May Commodore Biddle sailed for the East Indies in command of the Columbus ship of the line, and the Vincennes, bearing the Minister to China and the ratified treaty between the United States and the Chinese Emperor. The health of Mr. A.H. Everett, the minister, having induced his return, the exchange of the ratification of the treaty was committed to the charge of Commodore Biddle, who will doubtless show that an able and gallant naval officer conducts satisfactorily all affairs entrusted to him.

The Constitution is on her return from China after having visited different ports and islands in the Indian seas.

The Pacific squadron, under Commodore Sloat has consisted of the Savannah, the Levant, the Warren and the Shark. The first three will return in 1846 and will be relieved by the Congress, the Portsmouth and the Cyane.

The home squadron has been under the command of Commodore Conner, who has distinguished himself by sound judgment in the performance of his duty. His force, which consisted of the Potomac, the Falmouth, the Vandalia, the Lawrence, and the Somers, was weakened by the return of the Vandalia, which visited Hayti, and was driven home by the yellow fever, contracted at Port-au-Prince, where she had been ordered on duty. The squadron was increased by the Princeton and Porpoise, the St. Mary's and the Saratoga, under Commodore Stockton, and soon after by the John Adams, and the steamship Mississippi.

He recommends that the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, at which are now more than 100 sailors, be never enlarged, but that new pensioners should be placed "in some salubrious spot near the ocean, where the aged seaman can watch ships as they come and go, and have old familiar objects in sight." There is a dash of romance in this suggestion which is rather unexpected.

He condemns as a fruitless expenditure the employment of professors and instructors on board ship and suggests midshipmen in the intervals of sea duty, may be collected together on shore and be suitably instructed. The instructors being provided, the idea was carried out by organizing a school at Fort Severn, at Annapolis, under the direction of Commander Buchanan.
He recommends that the plates of all the charts engraved by order of Congress be deposited in the National Observatory building.

The grant of a large sum for the establishment of a well furnished and efficient navy yard at Pensacola is recommended, and he disapproves of the grant for the Memphis Depot, as too large for a mere work of preparation. He thinks Congress should confine the use of the money first to the construction of a rope walk, and next to simple arrangements for building and equipping steamships. He justly adds that "the United States should produce all the hemp used in the Navy and that to introduce at the west the manufacture of American hemp for the navy will prove a national benefit.

The subject of lake defenses is reserved for a special communication.

The present contract system requires modification.

No estimates are presented for the increase of the navy. The department awaits in that matter the instruction of Congress; but he remarks, that in comparison with other nations, our own is poorly supplied with sea-going steamers.

The navy is praised for its excellency and efficiency, and its able and skillful officers. He thinks the capable only should be promoted, and his position is illustrated by the following remarks:

"Many of the best among the older officers received high promotion while comparatively in early life. The younger officers of today are equally full of talent and ambition; but the present system refuses to them the opportunity of command while life is in its vigour, and reserves it for the decline of their powers."

We have already spoken in terms of merited approbation of the courteous tone which pervades the communications of Mr. Buchanan with Mr. Pakenham on the Oregon question. Such praise is due not only to the style of his correspondence, but also to the ability by which it is characterized. But whilst we are ready to allow this generally, we see no reason for retracting the charges which we have before advanced of special pleading and verbal sophistries, against his final note to Mr. Pakenham.

It seems to us that Mr. Pakenham's argument is a fair one. The claim of the Americans to the Oregon territory must be founded either on prior occupancy, or on the transfer by Spain. It cannot rest on both. If the occupancy were undoubted both in time and kind - if it had been accompanied by all the external symbols of property as well as all the evidences of undivided possession - then an alienation by Spain after an interval of 30 years would be worth nothing at all, for Spain would have in that case transferred what she had no right to; and the American title would thus be good as one of prior occupancy only. But if on the other hand America founds her pretensions to the Oregon on a cession by Spain made in the year 1819, any previous occupation can only be considered as an usurpation; and a state has no more right than an individual to fortify its title by its own wrong. The prior occupation and the after cession may be cited as distinct facts, but they cannot confer one title. Two bad titles can no more make one good one than two affirmatives can make a negative. By putting forward the cession by Spain the American Minister destroys the claim arising from an earlier right; and likewise by appealing to this antecedent right, he destroys all the validity of the Spanish cession. Instead of the two titles coalescing, they are repugnant and mutually destructive. Nor is this a question of words, but of consequences. For if America's right be founded on the early possession, it can only be of the same kind as the possession itself was. If that was divided and distributed, this right can only be divided and distributive one. Even if that ownership were distributive - if it were, on a grand scale, a permicetpertout tenancy - the argument is not affected by it. Supposing this to have been the case, Spain could only have alienated a moiety of her proprietorship and not the exclusive possession of the whole territory; and most certainly the United States could not acquire a claim to an exclusive sovereignty by such an alienation.

In either case, then, it appears to us that the republic has no right to more than a moiety of the disputed territory upon any ground of right, whether 1st prior occupancy; or 2dly a transfer from Spain be alleged in support of that right. For the first is too doubtful, as a matter of fact, to be relied on singly; and as far as it goes it tends to subvert the second; and the second, if admitted irrespectively of the first is impaired by a previous doubt. First, that since the year 1790, at any rate British subjects have been settled in the Oregon, and have had the privilege of using the river Columbia; secondly, that it is an object of equal interest both to British and American subjects to have this privilege continued to them. Let any man sense and impartiality take a broad and liberal view of the points at issue between the two countries, and what facts present themselves to his notice? Why these - That from a period antecedent to the year 1790 some British settlers, and from a period posterior to the year 1818 both British and American settlers, have cultivated the valley, and navigated the river and enjoyed the harbour of the Columbia. And now, at last, when both British and American colonists have certainly for 30 and probably for 60 years together, been tilling, buying, selling, sailing, anchoring, importing and exporting from and to the banks of the Columbia, an American Minister discovers that the Oregon territory once belonged to Spain, and was with all its rights and privileges transferred by Spain to the republic. What would any man of sense say to such a statement as this? Why, that the title of Spanish alienation, even supposing it to have been valid for 45 years ago, could not stand against the prescriptive use of 60 years; and that British subjects who had for upwards of half a century possessed with American citizens the usufruct of that great district, the easement of its capacious river, and the license of traffic with the Indians, might indeed be driven out by force, but could not be evicted by justice. But if, in addition to this, it were made to appear that long before the treat of Florida - in the year 1790 - Spain had claimed that at that time a British Minister, Mr. Pitt, had described this claim as the "most absurd and exorbitant that could well be imagined - a claim which they had never heard of before, which was indefinite in its extent, had originated in no treaty nor formal establishment of a colony; nor rested on any one of those grounds on which claims of sovereignty, navigation and commerce usually rested: - that similar language was used by the peace-loving leader of the opposition, Mr. Fox - that in return to the remonstrances of the English Court the Spanish Monarch replied, that "His Most Catholic Majesty had at no time pretended to any rights in any ports, seas or places other than what properly belonged to his crown, and that the rights and immemorial possession of Spain in those parts were still not quite certain;" - that after this repudiation and a second extravagant reassertion of Spanish authority, the Spanish Minister finally consented to make reparation for the insult offered to the English crown, and restitution of property to English subjects of both states should be at liberty to carry on their trade and make settlements, as well in the places which were to be restored to the British subjects as in all other parts of the north-western coast of North America, wherever the subjects of either of the two Powers might have made settlements since April, 1789; whereas in South America it was provided by the same treaty that "no settlement should be formed on the eastern or western coasts of it, either by English or Spaniards, in such parts of those coasts as were situated to the south of the territory already occupied by Spain;" - if we say that these facts were acknowledged - and acknowledged they must be, for they are matters of history - what we ask is the inference that any impartial and intelligent man would draw from such premises? Simply this, that Spain had no exclusive sovereignty in North America; that she had formed settlements on the coast on the same terms and in the same way as England had; that by the express phraseology of the Florida treaty, a contrast is stated between the "not quite"certain" rights of Spain in North America and her recognized authority in South; and that, therefore the United States could only come in as joint tenants with Great Britain, and have no earthly right to eject Great Britain from possession. Spain and Great Britain agreed to share the whole coast district between them, share and share alike. The United States are now in the place of Spain.

LONDON, Saturday, January 3, 1846

We think it must be tolerably clear to the generality of unprejudiced minds, that, on the grounds of positive right, the American Republic cannot claim the Oregon territory; and we think it is equally clear that the matter cannot be determined at all on grounds of abstract right. In this respect the United States are nearly in the same predicament as Spain was in the year 1789. Spain asserted a proud and unlimited claim to the whole northwest coast of America. In the belief, or assumed belief, of a just title to this vast empire, she seized on the ships, the cargoes, and the persons of British sailors, and destroyed the huts and factories of British settlers. The Spanish Minister, Florida Blanca, supported the violence of Don Esteman in a memorial which justified the pretensions urged by the former in favour of his country to a district extending as far as the 64d parallel of north latitude. But when the matter was sifted, it came out that these gigantic pretensions rested on a vague expression in the 8th article of the Treaty of Utrecht; that no insignia of Spanish sovereignty had been exclusively displayed, no Spanish settlements exclusively founded, on that coast. That there had been Spanish settlers was true. That Spanish vessels had been in the habit of touching there was also true. True, too that those seas had in that and the preceding century were still not quite certain. What, then did England propose, under the counsels of Mr. Pitt; and what did Spain assent to, under the administration of Count Florida Blanca? The one proposed and the other accepted, conditions which every man who loves peace and justice must approve now, as they were approved then by the friends of peace and equity - condition of joint occupancy, extending over the whole of the northwest of North American hitherto claimed by Spain.

AMERICA, January 8, 1846

The New York Courier and Enquirer of the 10th contains the following:

A letter which we publish this morning from our Washington correspondent contains a statement which may be deemed as having an important bearing upon our relations with Great Britain, and will be found confirmatory of the opinions expressed by ourselves on that subject. An interview of some length had taken place between Mr. Buchanan and the British Minister, undoubtedly on the Oregon question, and if, as the rumour is at Washington, Lord Aberdeen has expressed the feeling imputed to him in relation to Mr. Pakenham's correspondence with our Government, it is certainly of some importance.

RUMOURS OF CABINET CHANGES:

The return of Mr. Calhoun and the elevation of Mr. Walker to the Bench continued afloat. The Oregon question was brought up in the Senate on the 17 ult as follows:

FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD

General Cass moved the adoption of the resolutions which he submitted last week to with instructions to the committee on naval affairs to inquire into the condition of the navy, and to the military committee to institute a similar inquiry into the condition of the land defences, and to the militia committee rejected its reorganization all of which inquiries were to be considered with the view of an efficient preparation by land and sea, against the dangers apprehended of a foreign invasion. General Cass said it was impossible to read the annual message of the President, and the commentaries of the public press, without the apprehension that a crisis is arriving which will demand the cordial cooperation of the whole country. The President tells us in his message that negotiations are closed - that the claims of the two nations have failed to be settled by arbitration. The influence of England with the European Powers, from which an arbitrator would have had to be chosen, had doubtless decided our authorities against the process - that we had better hold on than submit to a Royal arbitrator. Conceding his entire and cordial adhesion to the views of the President, in the present attitude of the two nations, arising from their conflicting claims, what are we to do? Shall we recede or stand still or go on? To recede was not to be thought of at this stage of the question. There was nothing to be gained from national pusillanimity - we cannot purchase present peace at the expense of the national honour. It would be sowing the wind and reaping the whirlwind. No. General Cass would not repeat what he had expressed heretofore that it was better to fight for the first inch of Oregon than the last to better meet the enemy at the threshold, than await his approach to the hearthstone. And however separated now by party difference, or by space, all parties throughout the Union to its extremities, he knew would be united in defense of the national rights. Our destiny is onward - its westward movement cannot be resisted; you might as well attempt to stay the waves of the Pacific as the tide of our emigration setting in that direction. We cannot recede, we cannot stand still, our claim must be maintained or abandoned. Our hardy population of Oregon demanded the support of the Government, or they would establish a government of their own. We had an explicit and able memorial upon this very subject last week, setting forth that the memorialists were tired of waiting for you and would cast off all diplomatic chicanery and national pusillanimity, and set up for themselves. It was impossible that a people under two distinct Governments at the same, as are the people of Oregon, could under the existing state of things, long remain so. This point Government was not designed for a civilized and growing community, nor adapted to them, and if continued, could not fail to lead to bloodshed. It is hoped that England would yield, rightfully and honourably, in order to the peaceful settlement of this question. But will she? It was safest to act upon the conclusion that she will not. When did she, in any case where she had fastened upon a claim to territory or power, relinquish it of her own accord? Never had she exhibited no symptoms of relaxation of her hold upon Oregon. (Here General Cass referred to the London Morning Chronicle of the 5th of April last, and read extracts from the debate in Parliament of the previous day, particularly from the speeches of Lord John Russell and Sir Robert Peel, bullying Brother Jonathan upon the Oregon title, the President of the United States having assumed that our title to the whole or Oregon is clear and unquestionable.) Sir Robert Peel, on the contrary, roundly asserting that the British claim was clearly irresistible. General Cass, in his commentaries and congratulated our country that we secured Texas in spite of her collusions to wrest it from us. Recurring to what he esteemed as almost an inevitable alternative of the future, General Cass briefly reviewed, in the aggregate the power and dominion of Great Britain. This little narrow island, on the western frontiers of Europe, held dominion over 153,000,000 of people or nearly one-fifth of the population of the globe. She held, subject to her laws, an aggregate territory of 3,812,000 square miles, or nearly one-eighth of the surface of the habitable earth, all of which, from the subjugation of Ireland (saving the acquisition of Scotland, and certain discoveries in the South Seas), she had torn from the original possessors by the sword. It afforded no pleasure to review her ambitious policy; but we could not shut our eyes to the fact, that she had been prosecuting, and is now pursuing, a systematic attack upon our institutions. And yet we had been charged as an ambitious and grasping nation. To this, we can reply that we have made but three acquisitions of territory (Florida, Louisiana and Texas) all of contiguous territory, and all peacefully, and with the assent of the possessors and the inhabitants and our latest acquisition and best (Texas) was a proud example of the moral power of our Republican system. It was our latest acquisition but he hoped not our last. There was nothing to fear from the extension of our borders. If this administration could secure the peaceable acquisition of California, it would receive the lasting gratitude of the people. California, of course California, we must have that and then Cuba. We have started and must go on. We must give the twelve months' notice and if England persists in her claims, war must inevitably follow; and it will be a war in which all the strength and the prejudices of both nations will be brought into force. Let us then make adequate preparation. Le us show to the world that we are a united people, anxious for peace, yet prepared for war. The President had discharged his duty ably and fearlessly. Let us cooperate with him not by words but by deeds. The only means of preventing war is an immediate preparation for prosecuting it will all the means and energies we command. Vast portions of our country are but sparsely settled, and they are without defenses; our navy is not in a condition for active and efficient protection of our coasts. Means and materials are wanted - men are always ready. We have to do with a people who have arsenals, depots, dockyards filled to repletion, and with a Government better fitted than ours for prompt action. But let us show to our constituents that we are ready for duty; and that we meet the assumptions of England, not in a spirit of deprecation, but in a tone of firmness and self reliance. Let us show the world that republics are jealous of their rights and prepared to defend them and well as monarchies. Mr. Mangum, in a very energetic and eloquent manner, followed against the adoption of the resolutions. We regret that our time will not permit even a thread of his remarks. He argued that the resolutions and the remarks upon them by the senator from Michigan were injudicious. This matter could be more properly confided to the Executive - he could advise the Senate, with closed doors, of the means of defense required; and this would be wiser than inviting the enemy by an exposure of our weakness! Besides the committee would inquire, of course into the subjects introduced in the resolutions, with out instruction. He opposed to plunging the country into a war; he prayed to God that this worst of all evils might be averted; but if it did come, then there would not, he believed, be an anti-war man on the continent. He believed, however, there would be no war; but that this dispute would be yet satisfactorily and amicably adjusted. If a war were to break out, it would be, not a war for Oregon, but a war between the antagonistic systems of the European monarchies and republican institutions. It would enlist every man on this continent our side, and half of Europe would revolt against it. He hoped the resolutions would be permitted to lie over. But the Senate refused.

LT 1846/1/14/5d France on the US annexation of Texas

Wednesday, January 14, 1846: France and the Annexation of Texas.

Paris Jan 20, 1844

Monsieur le Comte - Lord Cowley has read to me a dispatch, written to him by Lord Aberdeen on the project formed at Washington of preparing the annexation of Texas to the United States Confederacy. The principal Secretary for Foreign Affairs expresses in that dispatch the wish to know if the King's Government be disposed to furnish its Envoy to the United States with instructions similar to those which the Britannic envoy will receive to manifest the opposition of his Government to such a project. You may announce to Lord Aberdeen that I shall write to the same effect to Mr. Pagoot. Texas having been acknowledged as independent, by several of the great Powers, and particularly by that which now seems inclined to absorb it, it is evident that we have a right to appreciate the act which now seems inclined to absorb it, it is evident that we have a right to appreciate the act which would annihilate that independence, and to urge the objects to which it may give rise, as respects either right or interests. Those objects are numerous. It is known that even in the United States the wish for annexation in question is far from being unanimous. If the slave states are very anxious for it, in order to subject a system of Customs' duties, by which they are bound, country whose commercial competition they dread, and above all to secure to themselves, by the acquisition of an ally a preponderance in the confederacy, the other states would, by a natural consequence, view it with extreme repugnance; and though it behooves us not to meddle with that internal contention, the consideration on which it rests is certainly not of a nature to make us lean to the side of the partisans of the annexation. Our direct information from Texas seems, besides, to prove that the majority of the Texan people are contrary to it, and that the thought of it is energetically rejected by the existing Government. It is therefore only by the aid of violence more or less avowed, or more or less disguised, that it could be accomplished; and, I repeat it, it would in no respect suit us to accept such a change.

Sir - I have received without opposition the despatched you have addressed me unto No. 36, and the date of the 28th of December last. "What President Tyler's message has disclosed, respecting the projects of the Federal Government, regarding the annexation of Texas to the United States, and what you have written to me about it, could not fail to attract my serious attention. That of the London Cabinet is not less excited as to this question, as you will find by the accompanying copy of a dispatch I addressed on the 29th of January to Count de St. Aulaire, in consequence of a communication made to me by Lord Aberdeen through the medium of Lord Cowley. This communication referred to the opposition which the English Government proposed offering to any project of incorporating Texas with the Confederacy's territory, as well as to the instructions to be forwarded to Mr. Pakenham, Lord Aberdeen having wished to know whether we had the same intentions I have desired Count de St. Aulaire to inform him that you would receive similar instruction." The last reports from the French Legation in Texas, whilst informing me of the efforts of the Washington Government and its representatives at Amstin to forward annexation, represented President Houston as energetically opposed to any arrangement of that description, and protesting that nothing of the kind should take place so long as he should direct affairs. The language held here by M. Ashbel Smith is not less explicit. Nevertheless, it behoves us to know whether both faithfully express the opinion and wishes of Texas and whether the question of the annexation to the States of the confederacy, if agitated in the Texan Congress, would not be affirmatively resolved on there. That annexation would be lawfully justifiable, but only in the event of its being voluntary, and not the result of violence on the part of the United States - and with us, as well as with England, it is above all on the resistance of the majority of the Texan people to the accomplishment of such a project, that the opposition we should

The despatches which have been laid before the French Chambers with reference to the annexation of Texas, and the part taken by France and England in opposition to that transaction, are documents of great interest, and they completely demonstrate the cordial cooperation of the two Powers in this negotiation. One whole year before the correspondence of Mr. King and Mr. Calhoun, to which we called the attention of the public on the 2d of January, 1845, was known in Europe, the French Government had given the most formal and precise instructions to its diplomatic agents in direct contradiction to the system of encouragement and connivance which Mr. Calhoun ascribed to it. In a dispatch from M. Guizot to the French Ambassador in London, dated the 20th of January, 1844, on the Texas question, Mr. Guizot announces, in reply to the question of the Earl of Aberdeen - "Is the French Government disposed to furnish its envoy in the United States with the same instructions as those which will be received by the British Envoy against the annexation? That he will write to Mr. Pageot in the same sense; and adds "Texas having been recognized as independent by several of the great Powers, and particularly by that which now seems desirous of absorbing it, it is evident that we have a right to take into consideration an act by which that independence would be destroyed, and to bring forward the objects to which it is liable, either as regards questions of right or interest." In the despatch to M. Pageot, dated the 10th of February, M Guizot fulfills the promise made to the Early of Aberdeen, and enters with more detail into the subject. Amongst other arguments, he says, "In a political point of view there is connected with the preservation of this independence a a real interest of equilibrium. The union of Texas, by extending the limits of the territory of the United States as far as Rio Grande would as immediate consequence, place the United States in direct contact with Mexico - that is to say in a condition to invade that country whenever it might please the Government of the United States to do so". In concluding this despatch, M.Guizot says "As France was the first of the European Powers to recognize the independence of Texas and to enter into a treaty of commerce and friendship with that republic, it is due to our dignity that what we have solemnly recognized should be preserved and respected.

In spite of the non-success of this negotiation, we see no reason to regret the part assumed by the two great European Powers. They gave the United States and the world a signal proof of their union in support of those principles of political justice and moderation which can nowhere be violated with impunity. They protested against the assumptions of the Cabinet of Washington, when it first affected to deal with the interests of its feebler neighbours on the American continent in the headstrong and arbitrary spirit of unlimited sovereignty; And although the presence of an overwhelming majority of American citizens in the province of Texas had, in fact, extirpated or crushed those parties in the new state which might have maintained its independent existence and therefore rendered our interference in their favour nugatory, the Governments of France and England would have abandoned Mexico and all America to the arrogant domination of the Anglo-American democracy if they had not consistently opposed the annexation of Texas.

The time, however, is now come when the attention of the Governments of Europe must be directed to still more important events, which are already distinctly indicated by the pretensions of Mr. Polk's message, and the whole policy of the United States towards their Spanish neighbours. General Cass's warlike speech in Congress was answered by the cry "We must have California," "We must have Cuba". To the fulfilment of these designs nothing is wanting but opportunity; and unhappily the increasing decrepitude of the native Government of Mexico seems to promise opportunities of spoliation as ample and immediate as the most insatiable aggressor could desire. The letters of our correspondent in Mexico have furnished us with an accurate and lamentable picture of the state of the country. The attempt to send a small detachment of troops into the province of California has proved a miserable failure, and they have not been able, for want of money, to leave the port of Acapulco. The Governor of the province of Sonora has pronounced against the feeble Government of the republic; and every province which is thus successively detached from the confederation may be regarded as a morsel prepared for the next meal of the United States' Government. Finally, it is not improbable that the next mails may bring us tidings of another revolution in the capital, and Herrera will probably sink before Paredes, at the head of the only body of troops which still follow the standard of a leader. In several parts of the country, the Indians and mixed population have availed themselves of this state of complete anarchy to commit acts of violence and pillage; and the European capital invested in various undertakings in Mexico is, more than ever in a situation of great peril. It is clear to demonstration that such a state of things as we now witness is rapidly preparing the whole country for subjugation, and after having asserted their independence of the Court of Madrid, the provinces of New Spain lie prostate at the feet of the Congress of Washington. There is but one solution of the difficulty. Mexico cannot remain as it is. It must either sink without a struggle under the yoke of a neighbouring republic, hostile and opposed to the whole character of its native population by race, by religion, and by institutions, or it must seek by strengthening its connexion with Europe a protection against the spirit of territorial aggrandizement and dominion which is eager to establish an universal sovereignty over the continent of America. Such a connexion with Europe can clearly have but one form and one origin - the form, monarchical; the origin, Spanish. The results of Mexican independence are before the world. The people of Mexico cannot be insensible to their own ruin, however powerless they may be to avert it. Under such circumstances, what would be the effect of the reappearance on the shores of America of that flag of Spain which was originally planted there by the great discoverers and captains of former ages, and which left indestructible traces of its pristine authority in the colonial descendants of the Spanish people? It would be as easy to accomplish the conquest of Mexico at the present moment with a handful of the troops which form the garrison of Cuba, as in the days of the aboriginal Mexican princes. Would it be impracticable to accomplish such an expedition with political institution, fitted to the wants of the Mexican people and calculated to rescue them from the perils which threaten their national existence: When we threw out this suggestion some months ago, we confess that it wore an air of romance, and might be received with incredulity. But the more the world has learned of the utter weakness of Mexico and the unquestionable designs of the United States, the more urgent has the case become, and the more practicable the application of the only remedy which has been thought of. As far as Spain herself is concerned, such an enterprise would not be unworthy of the man whose military success and whose resolute character have already restored so much of the lustre of the Spanish monarchy. In Mexico, a Prince of the House of Spain, bringing with him a moderate force to restore order to the country, and the guarantees of a constitutional government for the protection of its liberties, would be hailed with enthusiasm by a considerable party, and would confer inestimable benefits on the people, whilst he would re-establish a natural and salutary connexion with the maritime and constitutional Powers of Europe. Amongst the cognate suitors of Queen Isabella it would not be difficult to point out the very individual best fitted for such an enterprise by his personal qualities and his liberal sentiments. And if the pretensions of the United States were thwarted by a measure with which they have not the most distant right to interfere, they are certainly not in a condition to oppose the united policy of the European Powers, when its sole object would be to preserve a national government in New Spain and to repair the disastrous effects of abortive revolutions upon the provinces which were once annexed to the Spanish crown.

JANUARY 16, 1846, OREGON QUESTION

ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA, LIVERPOOL, TUESDAY

The British and North American Royal mail steamship Acadia arrived in the Mersey this morning, with the usual mails, of the 1st instant, from Canada and the United States. These accounts are of great importance. The position of the Oregon question in the House of Congress is most interesting. We annex the usual excellent summary of the New York Courier and Inquirer, and also an outline of the proceedings of Congress. "The year which began so prosperously, and which in its career has, generally speaking, been one of satisfactory results to commercial enterprise, closes in gloom and uncertainty.

The political sky, overcast during the summer, by reason of the annexation of Texas, and the menace of resentment of Mexico, had scarcely become clear again, when graver and more serious concern is inspired by the aspect of our difficulties with Great Britain.

On this head, we design neither unnecessarily to alarm, nor unduly to impart confidence, which we do not ourselves feel in the ultimate preservation of peace between the two countries. Hitherto, we have expressed the belief that all might be well, notwithstanding present adverse appearances. We are bound now to say that our confidence of such a result is somewhat diminished, not because of any change in the facts of the case, but because of the temper in which, on both sides of the Atlantic, it seems likely to be treated.

The recommendations of the Presidential message respecting Oregon were all subordinate to what might be done without any violation in letter or in spirit, of the treaty of joint occupation; but in both houses of Congress bills have been introduced which go beyond these recommendations and do infringe upon the treaty stipulations. These indeed as yet are only bills, and of course lack the sanction of laws; but that reported by Mr. Douglas, in the House of Representatives is from the Committee on Territories, and comes, therefore, with weight before the House. It proposes the immediate extension of a territorial government over the whole territory of Oregon - thus asserting, or appearing to assert, the sovereignty of the United States over the region in question, and not simply - as it might rightfully do, over citizens of the United States there resident. It also contemplates prospective grants of land to settlers, another assertion of sovereignty. These provisions may possibly be modified, so as to make them conform to the President's recommendations - but the mere proposal...
England should renew the offer made by this Government, and rejected by Mr. Pakenham, of the 49th parallel. On the other hand, and notwithstanding, these unfavourable manifestations, there is a strong impression that if shape an overture to this Government for the cession of any part of Oregon, there may be some hesitation on the part of England - even if otherwise well disposed - to renew in any shape an overtture to this Government for the cession of any part of Oregon.

On the other hand, and notwithstanding, these unfavourable manifestations, there is a strong impression that if England should renew the offer made by this Government, and rejected by Mr. Pakenham, of the 49th parallel, with the freedom of the ports in the straits of Fuca - it must be accepted by us.

In the course of a speech on the resolutions submitted by General Cass, instructing the Committees on Military and Naval Affairs to inquire and report upon the actual condition and necessities of those arms, Mr. Niles, a senator from Connecticut, and a supporter of the Administration, used this emphatic language:--

It was true the negotiation had been broken of, yet it can it probably will be resumed. Whether it was wise in our Government to have renewed the offer made on former occasions, by way of compromise to divide the territory upon the 49th degree of north latitude, he would not pronounce an opinion, but having made that offer and withdrawn it after it had been declined, he could not see how it well could be refused, should Great Britain hereafter propose that as the basis for compromising the dispute."

This is in coincidence with the sound opinion of sound men of all parties, and it would thence seem that the decision of the question of war or peace is in the hands of the British Government. Can they, for the mere barren triangle of land which constitutes the difference between what they ask and we have offered, be willing to put at hazard the peace of the world? For a war between the United States and England would not long be confined to those two powers.

Certainly both countries have much to lose by such a war, but England most of the two; and surely it is wise on both sides to fortify the claims of peace by the consideration of enlightened self-interest. The first blows of a war between the two countries would - because England is always armed, and the United States are habitually destitute of armour - fall heavily upon us; and national hatred, if the passion exist, might be gratified by the injuries it could inflict on our commerce and on our sea-board. But these would not touch the power of the country, while they would kindle all its spirit and nerve it to efforts, which in the end would be triumphant. Meanwhile, English manufactures would be cut off from our cotton. English trade would be cut off from our consumption - while our own manufactures, increasing and multiplying in every quarter, would weaken permanently and irreparably the source of the power of England. There is another consideration to which we advert reluctantly, but which, as we are dealing frankly with the whole subject, we think well worthy of being pondered on the other side - the amount of stock of the different states held there.

There are, it has been computed, about $260,000,000 (in round numbers) of stock of the different states now afloat. Of this amount, two thirds are, it is quite safe to assume, held in England. On many of these, the interest has been, and is regularly paid, and as the period comes round for their redemption, they are punctually redeemed." A case in point in the redemption at this moment of some $1,300,000 by the state of New York - of which almost all was held abroad. But if war should supervene between the two countries, and it should be any possibility be conducted on the part of the British, as there has been some threatening that such a war would be - by burnings and devastations, might there not be danger in a country, where the popular vote gives power and makes the law, that a stop would be put to the payment either of the interest or of principal to those, to whom it would only furnish fresh means of annoyance and injury to ourselves. We desire not to press this point, contenting ourselves with suggesting it for the deliberation of those whose influence, for peace or war is certainly not inconsiderable.

Leaving their ungrateful speculations, which can only find their apology in the deep anxiety we feel for the preservation of peace, we proceed to give an account of the condition of our markets and money concerns.

There has been great fluctuations in the stock since the 1st instant - partly owing to political apprehensions, partly to the large sums locked up in bread stuffs held on speculation and partly to the contraction which the position of the banks requires them to make.

In this state of expansion come rumours of war, which whether well or ill founded, affect public confidence.
JANUARY 17, 1846, LONDON, SATURDAY

The accounts brought by the Acadia from the United States are interesting; but it would, as yet, be premature to draw any positive inference either from the rumours and opinions circulated in that country, or from the legislative transactions which have produced them. Most of the latter are of a formal or preliminary nature, and hardly to be relied on as indications of definite purpose on the part of those who have brought them forward; certainly not as signs of the popular will and determination. It is perfectly natural that, pending the crisis of an indecision, words of swelling import should be uttered, and resolutions of a martial tone proposed; but it would be erroneous to infer from these easy resources of unsettled minds that war is seriously contemplated as the ultimate expedient of our difficulties and aggression desired as the necessary precedent to war.

We attach, therefore, less consequence to sundry vehement speeches and strong propositions in the two Legislative Chambers than the American press seems to claim for them. On the other hand, we feel great satisfaction at the comparative strength and energy of a party which is proverbially weak in all republics, and most obnoxious in young republics - the moderate party; the party which prefers peace to war; compromise to aggrandizement; tranquility to invasion, triumphs, and victories.

An unfavourable impression, however, has been made by the report brought up from the Committee on Territories by Mr. Douglass. It proposes an extension of the American laws and government over the whole territory of Oregon; an extension which supposes the right, and would involve the fact, of American sovereignty over a vast amount of territory which previous negotiations have uniformly and invariably allowed to belong to Great Britain. It suggests that it be considered as part of Wisconsin territory up to 54 deg. 40 min., and that military posts be established therein. Viewed by itself, this is one of the most flagrant projects of injustice which the history of nations records. Nor is it wholly to be condemned. It is not merely the scheme of one man, but the recommendation of a committee. So far it suggests grounds for alarm. But the considerations and modifications which ought to be applied to all strong proposals may safely be applied to this, especially when it is borne in mind that these resolutions must be debated in the House of Representatives before they can assume the form and have the virtue of legislative acts. And we should with very great difficulty, bring ourselves to believe that the representatives of the United States would enact, or the people of the United States ratify, a policy at once heinously unjust and unprovokedly warlike.

Meanwhile, we readily incline to the belief that the opinion of Mr. Niles is one viewed with approbation by the majority of intelligent and influential citizens in the States. He sees no reason why negotiations should not be resumed by an offer on the part of Great Britain to take the parallel of the 49th degree as the line of boundary; and no reason why, in the event of this offer being made by Great Britain, it should be refused by the republic. We have already stated our opinion most fully on this subject and it is hardly necessary now to repeat it. We still retain our conviction that the offer made by Mr. Gallatin, in the Presidency of Mr. Adams, concedes no more and no reason why, in the event of this offer being made by Great Britain, it should be refused by the republic.

The dwellers of the forest and the traversers of the lakes are our countrymen. We have sent them on a mission of commerce to distant and inhospitable climes. It behooves us to see that their mission be fulfilled with safety; that all its purposes be carried out efficiently; and that neither the paucity of their numbers nor the insufficient of their equipments deprives them of the fruits or materials of their occupation. But of what avail will it be to possess a large superficial area of uncultivated district, from the Rocky Mountains to the sea, if we lose that which has hitherto constituted its almost sole advantage, viz., a transit to those engaged in traffic from Hudson's Bay down the southern branch of the Columbia? What is Oregon worth to us without the easement of that river? What would be the inevitable consequence of its loss? Would it not be that immediately the great carrying trade between the northern lakes or the northeast country and the sea would pass into the hands of Americans? - that what our countrymen have hitherto shared with the citizens of the United States, and would be content to share with them in future, would be monopolized entirely by the latter? Does the American Government, does the American Republic, seriously think that an English Minister would tamely yield, would be allowed to yield, benefits which have constituted the chief value of that dependency to English subjects? It is the very essence of our rights in Oregon that we should preserve the free - we do not claim the sole - navigation of the Columbia; take that away, and we lost at once our trade between our possessions in the North East of America and our growing colonies in the Pacific. Such a loss would involve the ruin of perhaps very few individuals, but it would inflict a wound on the honour, it would damage the solid interests of this country; and it would raise immeasurable disgust and unbounded distrust in the breast of every colonist in our most remote dependencies. Give up, if you will, a large strip of territory, cede as much as you like between the Rocky Mountains and the lowest bend of the Columbia; but preserve whatever solid and substantial benefit has been enjoyed by the hardy adventurers of the forest and the lake, who have gone forth in reliance on your faith, in confidence of your readiness, and without a doubt of your power to protect them. To desert them were ignominious enough. But an ignominy of such a kind is among the worst disasters that a nation can suffer. Preserve for your colonists the great and precious privileges of anchorage, navigation and coast settlement. Preserve for them the right of sharing with Americans the trade to the other settlements of their own mother country. Deprive them of this, and you make them poor, helpless and contemptible; but you dishonour yourselves when you damnify them.
We have not reverted to the question of title, because in the reports which have come to hand we have not observed an argument which affects it. But we have noticed several conjectures as to the probabilities and no few suggestions as to the means of carrying on war. We will not dwell on a subject so painful, and we hope so remote. We do not for a moment doubt that it would be in the power of either country to inflict upon the other the most serious injuries, the most dire calamities, that human nature can sustain. We do not doubt that an American war would carry devastation into a thousand districts, ruin and sorrow into families innumerable; that it would give a terrible shock to the mechanism of commercial intercourse, the stability of commercial faith; and do in a few years more evil than a century of peace could repair. We will not dispute this. We will not stay to argue which nation could inflict the greatest amount of evil. It is superfluous. We feel too keenly their mutual powers of mutual injury not to be grateful that the fairest, and most peaceful, and most statesmanlike proposal - that of an adjustment by arbitration - was advanced by an English, and declined by an American, Minister. The hope that a more speedy settlement of the question might be attained by negotiation was the motive assigned by Mr. Calhoun for rejecting this proposal; the negotiation which ensued unfortunately resulted only in an offer of compromise upon grounds which Mr. Pakenham found himself compelled to refuse and as this mode of arranging our conflicting claims to the territory has been, for the present, at least unsuccessful, we rejoice to hear that Mr. Pakenham had, shortly before the departure of the Acadia, once more urged upon the American Minister his proposal of an arbitration.

The conversation which took place in the House of Commons on Friday night, respecting the Oregon question, was eminently satisfactory, as evincing the unanimous desire of all parties to maintain peace with the United States, but their no less determination that the peace so maintained should be consistent with the dignity of a great country, and rest upon the solid foundations of equity and self-respect. The regret expressed by the Premier at a seeming precipitancy on the part of Mr. Pakenham proves how sincere is the wish of the Government that no undue occasion of offense, no casual cause for war, be offered by this country to the American Republic; while the unusual heartiness of Mr. Hume, the accordant cheers of the House, and the concurrent approbation of the Opposition members, in affirming the propriety of increasing our military resources, are no less demonstrative of the tone and temper with which an unjust aggression will be confronted, and an involuntary war will be prosecuted. With regard to the alleged indiscretion of Mr. Pakenham, it seems to us that he has sinned rather against the forms of diplomatic etiquette than the spirit and interest of a diplomatic commission. It appears that the last proposal submitted to him by Mr. Buchanan - viz., a division of the territory - he rejected at once. Now it is urged that he should have communicated with the Home Government before he took so summary a course. It would require a fuller acquaintance with the circumstances of the case than is afforded by Sir. R. Peel's explanation to pronounce positively upon the propriety of his conduct. If by the term "division" be understood a division formed by a line continued from the 49th parallel, we can understand the motives which forced him to reject the offer. This partition of territory would have deprived us of the Columbia river; in fact, of the most essential property - the only beneficial interest in the disputed country. Excluding this, it excluded not only the most important part of our claims, but that which previous conventions and previous proposals had conceded to us. It would have been impossible for an English Cabinet to accept offers so humiliating, or rights so truncated. But would it not have been more prudent to wait for the answer of the Home Government, in order that upon it future negotiations might be based? This is not self evident. If the Home Government could return but one answer to such a reference - the very answer, in fact, which was given by our Minister at Washington - we do not see, what good could have resulted from the delay. But if, in addition to this, it should be made clear that pending these negotiations, or previous to them, the President's Message to the Senate had developed the policy of the Washington Cabinet, then Mr. Pakenham's decision must, we think, be pronounced not only not precipitate, but natural, reasonable, and worthy of his position; for be it remembered, that Mr. Buchanan's proffers were on the most attenuated scale. He receded considerably from the terms of his predecessors. He offered to the British Minister far less than was rejected by a British Minister when Mr. Adams was President of the republic. And if after such an offer the latter had deliberated - if he had delayed - if he had even professed a willingness to consult his Government at home as to the expediency of accepting conditions which he must at the time have known to be derogatory to the just rights of his country, it requires little more than a knowledge of the transactions of the last few years to aver that such an hesitation would have been followed by counter-claims more ambitious and aggressive than before. If Mr. Pakenham had betrayed an undecided or doubtful mind when called upon to cede the navigation of the Columbia and the rich soil upon its banks, what would have been said by the politicians of the United States, by the mob constituencies, by the mob flatterers, by the panders to bad passions and the suitors for popular favour? What but this? See how these English vapour and bluster how easily they can be bullied. They once scouted the notion of accepting half the territory with the notion of accepting half the territory with the Columbia and Vancouver's Island, and now their representative is half ready to yield the latter why should he have what we have offered? Why half or any of it. Strike for the whole country. The whole of Oregon or none. His Government fears to go to war. For peace she would surrender all that she has claimed. It will be our own fault if we do not get more than we once hoped for.

Such would have been the cry; it would spread like wildfire - "The whole of Oregon, or none and whilst relying on the probity of the American Government and the faith of international intercourse, diplomatic modes were exchanged, an American army might have been encamped on the Columbia, and the Oregon proclaimed a part of the Wisconsin.

We believe Mr. Pakenham as acted as he ought to have acted on such an emergency. Even if he has erred, much allowance should be made for the errors of one whose every word and deed is scrutinized with the most critical minuteness of jealousy - who has no other support than his own self reliance - and the exigencies of whose position demand from him a directness and prompt of action inconsistent with appeals to distant authority and remote counsel. Such allowance should be made for the errors of every diplomatist. It should therefore be made for any which Mr. Pakenham may have committed. But it is not clear to us that he has committed any.

It is not by the tactics of diplomacy or the wisdom of statesmanship alone that a great question like this can be settled. It is a hard thing to raise a cry for war. It is an easy thing to pique the vanity, to wound the pride and disgust the prejudices even of an enlightened people into national hatred. The time may come when an unseasonable joke, a sarcastic allusion, or any other trifle, may spur great kingdoms or republics into mad and sanguinary hostilities.

JANUARY 28, 1846 - The Oregon Question - AMERICA

We have received important advices from New York to the 8th inst. Inclusive by the arrival of the ship, Henry Clay, Captain Nye.

The Oregon question has been taken up in the House, and warmly debated, with a warlike aspect. On the 2d inst. Mr. Adams gave his views at great length in favour of promptly giving the notice to terminate the existing joint occupancy of the Oregon territory. On the 5th the Committee of Foreign Affairs recommended the adoption of that measure. The report was debated and adjourned on the 6th until the first Monday in February, by a majority of 102 to 82.

Some conversation then took place as to the time fixed for the special consideration of the Oregon Bill, reported from the Committee on Territories, and on the motion of Mr. Douglas, the second Tuesday of February was substituted for the first for that purpose.

A bill was introduced on the 2d instant, by Mr. Haralson from the Committee on Military Affairs, for the organization of two regiments of riflemen, and also for increasing the infantry, artillery, and dragoons, to be at the disposal of the President for the protection of emigrants to Oregon or the defense of the frontier. After considerable discussion upon the question of making the resolution of a special order for the first Tuesday in January.

Mr. JQ Adams rose and addressed the house. He referred to the variety of bills providing for the defense of the country before Congress, and asked what reason there was for increasing their military establishment when they were at profound peace with the whole world? Three or four years ago, when the prospect of war was as great as then, they had reduced the military establishment by one third; but he said, I don not believe at all in any danger of war at this time. If there was danger, the first measure should be to give notice to Great Britain of their desire to terminate the existing joint-occupancy of the Oregon. Last session he had declared himself ready, as he did then, to give this notice. He hoped it would be given; and that then they would proceed to a real occupation of the whole territory. He was surprised the Committee on Foreign Affairs had not reported the notice in question, and he should deeply regret if a majority of that Committee should not be prepared to do so. If he hoped that a majority of the house would support him, he would press such a resolution that day. While the existing convention remained, he would vote for no resolution such as that then before them. It did not follow that if they gave notice there must of necessity be war; nor did it follow that they should then take possession. It would only be saying to Great Britain, "After negotiating 20 years about this matter, we do not choose to negotiate any longer; we shall take possession of what is our own; and then, if so settle, the question what is our own you wish to negotiate, we will negotiate as lone as you please. They might negotiate after they had taken possession. I say therefore, he continued - "That I hope the first measure adopted by Congress will be to give, in the most solemn manner, the notice to Great Britain which the treaty requires; then the coast will be clear for us to do what we please. It does not, I repeat, follow as a necessary consequence, that, because we give this notice, we must take possession, though it is my hope that we shall. It does not necessarily draw after it a war; and if Great Britain chooses to take such notice as an act of hostility on our part, and forthwith commence hostilities on hers, we have been told that we shall all be one party, and God Almighty grant that it may be so. If it shall be so, the war will have less of those very extraordinary terrors which my friend from South Carolina (Mr. Holmes) has now just discovered, notwithstanding the extreme military propensities which he manifested on this floor last year with regard to Texas. And of this I am very sure, that in that case Great Britain will not long occupy Oregon, or anything else north of the Canada line. (Great sensation, and incipient indications of applause). But if you will agree to give notice, strong as in my horror of war, and of all military establishments, if there should then be the breath of life in me, I hope I shall be willing to go so far as any in making any sacrifice to render that war successful and glorious. I can say no more. However, we may without giving notice, extend our laws and our protection to our brethren who have settled at least in that part of Oregon which is not claimed by Great Britain; but there can be no need of increasing our army and our navy to do that. I hope that such an act will not be offensive to Great Britain, and that she will not think of going to war about it. But if we are going to take actual occupation of the country, then some additional force will be needed to our army, and in that case, however unwilling I have ever been to increase our military establishment, I think I should get over my difficulties especially if a disposition should be manifested by Great Britain to take offense at the measure I have just mentioned. I believe it will not be necessary for me to refer to any other part of this subject. There have been, as I understand, two applications made to this house by fellow citizens or ours settled beyond the Rocky Mountains for the protection of this Government. The Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs presented, as I think, one memorial while another from a different quarter is also before the territorial committee - possibly is a copy of the same." 1846/1/29/6f US, preparations for war

We noticed that orders had been sent to Norfolk for estimates of the expense of fitting out all the United States ships at that port. It seems that Norfolk is not the only place where inquiries have been made, but that New York has come for a share. It is stated that a party of naval gentlemen have been in this city on a tour of examination; and, besides examining the vessels at the navy yard, have inspected the mammoth river steamers. The report of the committee in relation to these steamers, if we may judge from what we hear in conversation, will be not a little amusing as well as curious. So far as steamers are concerned, the river boats are entirely unfit for any Government service, except the transportation of troops or munitions of war on the North River. The extreme lightness of their construction, and the mass of top hamper about them all, make them totally worthless as armed vessels. They would be quite as unsafe for their own crews, from the effect of their own guns, as they would be dangerous to an enemy. If Government requires steamers they must build them at once. One of the steamers of John Bull that rejoice in the names of the heathen gods would sink as many steamers like the Colonel Harney, and such as the river boats would make, as would be built in years. We are glad the Government is looking round, and that it has found out that blows are to be received as well as given in a war with England. War or no war, it is indispensable that we have a large addition to our steam marine; and if the present state of affairs stimulate a minute inquiry into our means of defense, it will end in a little good. So far as war steamers go, we are not fit to be named as having a navy at all and the sooner the want is supplied the better - New York Evening Express.

JANUARY 30, 1846

The American journals brought over by the last packet are fraught with matter of the most interesting and important kind. The Oregon question is daily advancing towards a definite and positive shape, and as far as it is possible to augur the result of legislative deliberations or popular sympathies, no great length of time can be expected to elapse before some strong decision is expressed as to the occupation of the disputed territory. The first thing that strikes us in the proceedings of the American Congress is the confirmation which that Assembly stamps upon a previous assertion made by ourselves. On a former occasion we declared that, in reference to a mere question of equitable right, the data of history or of treaties were insufficient to establish the claims of either of the two nations to the contested territory and that it would be impossible to adjust the present dispute without considering the peculiar wants and interests of the two litigant parties. It is to use the words of Mr. Rhett in the House of Representatives now a question of interest and policy that we are to settle.

With some of the representatives, as Messrs. Baker and Hilliard, the claim of property as deduced from prior occupancy or from the Spanish title is still in vogue. But it is exceedingly difficult to see the force of the evidence which has convinced them that their title is good on the former ground, and we think that we have already shown that it fails on the latter. The sole evidence of prior occupancy rests on the supposed discovery by Captain Robert Gray, who as Mr. Winthrop said, had no more idea than the man in the moon that he was discovering this or any other country; and who does not appear to have left any permanent or recognized symbol of his country’s power on that coast. But if positive discovery were to be laid down as the foundation a territorial claim, the partial discovery by Captain Gray cannot weigh against that more complete one effected by Broughton, who sailed 90 miles up the Columbia. But we suspect that the statesmen of both countries feel the impossibility of adjusting the question on the authority of what an intelligent American representative acknowledges to be vague traditions.

Disposing then of the question of prior occupancy and original right until the time when it shall be clearly shown that one country or the other exercised unquestioned, undivided, and universally acknowledged Jurisdiction over the coast and northwest continent of the Oregon - which means for ever let us again recur to the validity of the title as deduced from Spain. Now, it cannot be doubted that if Spain was rightfully possessed of the territory in question, she might rightfully alienate it. But if she had it not, any professed alienation by her would not be worth the parchment which professed to convey it. Now no one American legislator professes to believe that Spain had alienated her right over the Oregon to the United States till after 1790. Whatever treaty was adduced as the Spanish title - whether that of 1796 or 1818 - there is no treaty whatever of or before the year 1790 which confers a claim to the United States, derived from the Spanish title. But there is a treaty on record - no ignoble or obscure treaty - but one signalized by many coincidental and consequential events of importance - a treaty dictated by an English Minister who inherited a proud sense of English honour and a firm determination to maintain it - the treaty of Nootka Sound, ratified at the fall of the year 1790 - which ceded to England rights and titles, not indeed paramount nor undivided, but totally incompatible with any after alienation or disposition or demise of plenary jurisdiction to or by any other Power in the world. Whatever interpretation may be affixed to the 3d, 4th and 5th articles of that convention, no interpretation, however strained, however distorted, can construe them so as to make them consistent with a reserved license for Spain to transfer her right of full sovereignty in these regions to any foreign Crown or State whatever. Spain may indeed at a later period, either by a careless phraseology or al pompous assertion of non-existent rights, have spoken of her possessions even to the 52nd of north latitude, and proposed to transfer her rights therein. But if she did this, she acted as a mortgagee who sought to transfer over again an interest in property already encumbered without notice of that previous encumbrance, or as a simulated proprietor professing to sell land to which he had no title. The right of the mortgagee in the one instance, and of the vendee in the other, is just that sort of right which the United States have in this case derived from Spain, and none other.

But we are bound to admit that the terms in which the Nootka Sound convention is couched are curious, and we believe, unprecedented. As far as relates to North America, they are negative on the subject of sovereignty.
They express an agreement between the two high contracting Powers that it should be lawful for their respective subjects to fish, erect huts on the coast, trade with the natives, etc. but they reserve no right of paramount sovereignty to either of them. The British Crown are to fish, settle, trade with the natives, apparently on a footing of perfect equality. If a paramount jurisdiction are modified (rather than resisted) by some of the stipulations in the treaty. The subjects of both Powers believe, unprecedented. As far as relates to North America, they are negative on the subject of sovereignty.

But the relative position of Spain and England at that time appears to have been just such as we have described it; and such the interest of Spain in those regions - an undivided moiety of the whole possession, not the whole of an undivided moiety - in fact a distributive and diffused possession. And such was the interest, and only such, that Spain could transfer to any other power. If therefore Spain in 1796 or 1818 pretended to alienate a plenary authority over these regions to any other state than Great Britain (which she could have done by a sort of release on a grand scale), such alienation would be as inoperative as that of Texas by Mexico after annexation to the United States. Nor is this view materially affected by any war which might have broken out after the first compact of co-equal possession. The two contracting countries might go to war; but no war could affect the rights of their subjects already established and settled by a previous treaty. Spain might have quartered her troops on the northwest coast of America, and have carried on an internecine contest with individual British settlers, and thus have reconquered the whole settlement by degrees; but the law of 1818 pretended to alienate a plenary authority over these regions to any other state than Great Britain (which she could have done by a sort of release on a grand scale), such alienation would be as inoperative as that of Texas by Mexico after annexation to the United States.

There is reason to believe that the Senate will declare against the measures which may be voted. In the interval which will ensue, in consequence of this inevitable conflict, the British Government would do well to commence a decisive negotiation, if it wishes to escape serious complications abroad. This is the course expected on the Stock-Exchange in London and in the city; for although the public mind was excited by the tone which pervades the message, the public funds were not paralyzed by it."

Columbia River and the coast to the south of Vancouver’s Island, on the authority of discoveries by Cooke, Vancouver and Mackenzie; on the authority of the Nootka Sound Convention in 1790 with Spain, and of settlements, effected and maintained at different times by British subjects. The United States claim the territory on the ground of discoveries made by her citizens, Gray, Kenbrick, etc; of the cession made by Spain in 1819, and of occupation and settlements previously, as well as afterwards, effected by American traders. It will be obvious that the right of sovereignty which attends discovery, unless backed by some decisive measures on the part of the Government by whom or by whose subjects the discovery is made, is worth very little. Did the rule prevail that every nation was entitled in perpetuity to the sovereignty of any territory discovered and claimed by any of its subjects, without any immediate act on the part of its Executive to enforce such claim, the tenure of most colonial dependencies at the present day would be one of very equivocal legality; and, indeed, there is so much doubt hanging over the history of all territorial discoveries, that it would be difficult to suggest a worse title than that which is conferred by the assertion of such a claim, unsupported by any evidence of continuation by the Government in whose behalf it is represented to have been made. In the present instance, the honours of discovery appear to be due to a Spanish navigator of the 17th century, Jean de Fuca, who has been given his name to the strait that separates Vancouver’s Island from the mainland. Nor is a much better title afforded by mere occupancy unprotected by the home Government of a state, recognized by foreign nations. The question of right is thus narrowed to the consideration of the original proprietorship, and subsequent alienation. The American Ministers assert, that not only the valley of the Columbia, but the whole of the Oregon territory, and territory as far as the 42nd degree of north latitude - belonged to Spain, and was by Spain transferred to the United States at the Treaty of Florida in 1819. They say that they have a title not only to the valley drained by the Columbia, but also to the whole of the Oregon, and they take credit to themselves for evincing no small moderation in proposing the parallel of the 40th degree as a boundary line. The question therefore arises, which is the better claim; that which is founded on the treaty by Spain with England in 1790 or that which rests on the Florida treaty with the United States in 1819? By the former Spain agreed to give indemnity to British subjects dispersed of their settlements about Nootka Sound, and to guarantee the same liberty of access to the citizens of both nations as well as those parts which were to be restored to British subjects are in the other parts of North America, which then belonged to Spain. By the latter, she ceded all her authority and jurisdiction over her provinces in North America to the United States. Now, when it is recollected that in 1789 Spain abandoned her settlements in Nootka Sound and that from this time she appears to have neglected this portion of her colonial empire altogether.

THE UNITED STATES

We subjoin abridged reports from the several Secretaries of State, which are extremely valuable as evidence of the efficiency of the several departments:

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR

This document occupies five columns of the Union, but the following synopsis from that paper tells the whole of a long story:

It exhibits, in the first instance, the organization, strength and constitution of the regular army. The rank and file - embracing every arm of the service does not exceed 6500 men. At this time there is stationed but a single regiment on the whole northern frontier, from Maine to Lake Superior - an extent of 2,000 miles; and on the whole line from the Falls of St. Anthony to New Orleans (1500 miles) only one regiment of dragoons and two of infantry. The artillery regiments - reduced by detachments of four companies from each - now garrison the fortification of the seaboard from Newport to New Orleans. The remaining and larger proportion of the army is now stationed in Texas. The report gives an interesting account of the political reasons which have induced the Government to give them this destination. The secretary does not think it prudent to remove the troops from now stationed in Texas. The report gives an interesting account of the political reasons which have induced the Government to give them this destination. The secretary does not think it prudent to remove the troops from this position until our relations with Mexico have assumed a more decidedly amicable character. In the event of this being any necessity to increase the army he proposes to build upon the basis of the regiments by adding to the rank and file of each company instead of creating new regiments. This necessity may be found in the present instance, the honours of discovery appear to be due to a Spanish navigator of the 17th century, Jean de Fuca, who has been given his name to the strait that separates Vancouver’s Island from the mainland. Nor is a much better title afforded by mere occupancy unprotected by the home Government of a state, recognized by foreign nations. The question of right is thus narrowed to the consideration of the original proprietorship, and subsequent alienation. The report suggests that, besides this increase of the number of privates in the two existing regiments of dragoons, another regiment of dragoons or of mounted riflemen may be necessary in the event of extending our posts to the Rocky Mountains.

It states that, though the concentration of so large a proportion of the army on the frontier of Texas may have, in some measure, enlarged the expenditures (certainly in the article of transportation), yet it has in some

The disposition of the remainder of the naval force is thus states:

On the Brazil station, Rosseau, the first officer of the Alleghanies ever selected to command a squadron, relieves Commodore Turner. The Raritan will return to the home squadron; the Boston is ordered to return to the United States. The Columbia, the Saratoga, Plymouth, and the Bainbridge, as for the present substitute the Brazil squadron.

Commodore Parker, after a very successful cruise, returned from the Asiatic station in September, bringing home the Brandywine, St. Louis and the Perry. At the Bay of Islands, Captain McKeever, in the St. Louis, had the happiness to render valuable service to the inhabitants of an infant British settlement.

In May Commodore Bidelle sailed for the East Indies in command of the Columbus ship of the line, bearing the Minister to China and the ratified treaty between the United States and the Chinese Emperor. The health of Mr. A.H. Everett, the Minister having induced his return, the exchange of the ratification of the treaty was committed to the charge of Commodore Biddle, who will doubtless show that an able and gallant naval officer conducts satisfactorily all affairs entrusted to him. The constitution is on her return from China, after having visited different ports and islands in the Indian Seas.

The Pacific squadron, under Commodore Sloat, has consisted of the Savannah, the Levant, the Warren, and the Shark. The first three will return in 1846 and will be relieved by the Congress, the Portsmouth, and the Cyane.

The home squadron has been under the command of Commodore Conner, who has distinguished himself by sound judgment in the performance of his duty. His force, which consisted of the Potomac, the Falmouth, the Vandalia, the Lawrence, and the Somers, was weakened by the return of the Vandalia, which visited Hayti, and was driven home by the yellow fever, contracted at Port-au-Prince, where she had been ordered on duty. The squadron was increased by the Princeton and Porpoise, the St. Mary's, and the Saratoga, under Commodore Stockton, and soon after by the John Adams, and the steamship Mississippi.

The Secretary visited all the naval establishments but those at Pensacola and Memphis, and they are generally in excellent order.

He recommends that the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, at which are now more than 100 sailors, be never enlarged, but that new pensioners should be placed "in some salubrious spot near the ocean, where the aged seaman can watch ships as they come and go, and have old familiar objects in sight." There is a dash of romance in this suggestion which is rather unexpected.

He condemns as a fruitless expenditure the employment of professors and instructors on board ship, and suggests that midshipmen, in the intervals of sea duty, may be collected together on shore and be suitably instructed. The instructors being provided, the idea was carried out by organizing a school at For Severn, at Annapolis, under the direction of Commander Buchanan.

He recommends that the plates of all the charts engraved by order of Congress be deposited in the National Observatory building.

The grant of a large sum for the establishment of a well-furnished and efficient navy yard at Pensacola is recommended and he disapproves of the grant for the Memphis Depot, as to large for a mere work of preparation. He thinks Congress should confine the use of the money first to the construction of a rope walk; and, next, to simple arrangements for building and equipping steamships. He justly adds that "the United States should produce all the hemp used in the navy, and that to introduce at the west the manufacture of American hemp for the navy will prove a national benefit.

The subject of the lake defenses is reserved for a special communication.

The care of the reservations and plantations of live oak, should be transferred to the Land department which has the proper means of ascertaining title.

The present contract system requires modification. The estimates for next year contemplate no increase in the force employed during the present year.

No estimates are presented for the increase of the navy. The department awaits in that matter the instruction of Congress; but he remarks, that in comparison with other nations, our own is poorly supplied with sea going steamers.

The navy is praised for its excellency and efficiency, and its able and skillful officers. He thinks the capable only should be promoted and his position is illustrated by the following remarks:

"Age alone now claims precedence, though that claim is unauthorized by the constitution, and unsustained by the law. Seniority demands promotion as its right, and the highest rank and pay are awarded to the longest life. Yet the chances are that the eldest are not the most meritorious. Excellence seeks the opportunity of displaying itself, and is selected for the most perilous and wasting service; while mediocrity fails to be employed, and obtains length of days in safe and affluent retirement. Promotion by seniority is a premium upon inactivity."

"Many of the best among the older officers received high promotion while comparatively in early life. The younger officers of today are equally full of talent and ambition; but the present system refuses to them the opportunity of command while life is in its vigour, and reserves it for the decline of their powers. In consequence the average age of captains is constantly increasing, and is already nearly 60. The average number of annual promotions is about two. The average age of commanders, from whom captains are and should be taken, is not much less than 50. From their great numbers, the little sea service to which they are called is favourable to longevity. Continue the present usage 20 years longer, and while hope will be crushed in the young men in the service, the class of commanders will itself be composted of none but aged men, and there will not be a captain under three-score years and ten.

"This custom discourages the most worthy, and leads the incapable and the indolent to cling with tenacity to their commissions".

"Those that are capable, and our service abounds in those, only should be promoted."

He argues against the probably objection that selection will degenerate into favouritism, and asserts that wherever the principle of discrimination has been carried out, it has been attended with success.

The number of midshipmen in the navy has become so reduced that new appointments begin to be made, and he suggests that it would be desirable if a system of free competition could be devised.

A remedy in the mode of paying pursers, and against the progressive amount of salary given according to service, is desirable.

A change is needed to protect the Treasury, and to secure the prompt payment of balances.

An increase of six acting boatswains, and as many acting runners in the navy, is represented as being needful.
The apprentice system will soon be revived, in a simple form, in the hope of better results than heretofore.

The report closes with some general remarks upon the evils which exist in the navy, and the causes whence they have sprung.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury (RJ Walker) states the receipts for the year ending June 30, 1845, $29,769,133 to which the balance in the Treasury of $7,857,379 may be added, making the total means $37,626,513. The expenditure during the same period was $28,968,206 and therefore left a balance in the Treasury of $7,658,306, July 1, 1845. The total means estimated to accrue up to June 30, 1846 is $34,478,306, including the balance left over from the former year. The expenditures are estimated as follows:

The actual expenditures for the first quarter, ending 30th of September 1845, amounted to $48,463,682,

The estimated expenditure for the public service during the other three quarts from 1st October, 1845, to the 30th June 1846, are as follows:

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous purposes 6,739,211

Army proper 2,584,735

Fortifications, ordnance, arming militia, etc. 2,346,778 [PGC]

LT February 2, 1846, 4b, Oregon Question

The Oregon Queston

The position which we cited on Friday from Mr. Admas's speech in the House of Representatives is, as an argument, more of use to us than to himself, as it shows that in the disputed territory the right of sovereignty has hitherto been intentionally kept in abeyance, and that the United States have no original indefeasible jus imperii therein. It leads to no inference of American rights; it supports no pretensions of American seisin. It establishes more evidently than before our own assertion, by an appeal to the actual manner in which the district has been settled, and the light in which that settlement has been regarded by a third party, viz., the aboriginal Indians.

But, however refutable any inference my be which he seeks to deduce from such premises in favour of imperial claims to the Oregon, it will require something more powerful than argument to meet declamatory exhortations to war, and exulting predictions that, in the event of such a contingency, England would lose not only Oregon, but all that she now possesses north of those latitudes. We can easily believe that of such an import, coming from one who, in addition to the inheritance of a time-honored name, may boast the recollection of long public services and the homage paid to acknowledged merits—we can easily believe that such words, from such a man, will thrill in the hearts of thousands. And indeed to no other cause but an example so authoritative can we attribute the violent and belligerent language which was used by such speakers as Messrs. Ingersoll, Simms, Baker, and M'Dowell.

Now, we readily admit that in the democratic assembly of a republican state, the temptations to exaggerated or menacing language are very great at all time, and in times of international differences almost irresistible. For this reason we feel great admiration for the intrepidity and true wisdom of those men who, like Messrs. Winthrop and Rheett, have ventured to use the language of moderation and peace in the front of a majority clamorous for dissension, and a populace inflamed with the visions of conquest. When, waving the question of right either as inconvenient or indifferent, legislators are found telling the people that it "is their destiny" to commit a great injustice; that they do not fear the odds of a tussle with Great Britain; that the British Lion has, ere now, quailed before the American Eagle, and may soon quail again; that as the power of the Republic has run down south-west as far as Texas and the mines of Potosi, and north-west across the Rocky Mountains to an indefinite extent, and the Columbia, adding state to state and region to region to keep up its balance of power; -- when these things are said, repeated, and applauded, the moral courage of those who scout such morality and repudiate such pretensions cannot be too highly praised or too thankfully acknowledged. They are vindicating the cause of morality and justice in the eyes of Christendom.

But, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, you must be aware that you cannot go on talking thus for ever. These big, swelling words must produce some definite and palpable issue of fact. They must either become utterly nugatory, or lese must be lead to a war. You cannot escape from this dilemma. It follows from your own speeches and protestations. The representatives of a great people cannot discharge their duty by uttering a torrent of declamations about the "destiny" of their country and the invincible strength of its arms. A continuance of such language, not followed by the most vigorous policy, exposes those who speak to some ridicule, and their country to some reproach. Are you, then, prepared to meet the only alternative which is indicated by your own words and shadowed forth by your own predications? Are you prepared for war? Have you calculated its cost, its consequences, its calamities? Have you reflected on the condition in which it must leave your country?--on the revolution which, be its result what it may, it must work in your political and social systems? Are you prepared for military aristocracy, perhaps an autocracy?--for a centralization of power round one governmental unit, and its fortification by the breastwork of a large military force? Are you prepared for the creation of a new and dominant class?--for the display of oligarchical distinctions, the thirst after courtly decorations, the overthrow of republican equality? Yet to this end, to these results, so alien from the intentions of your pilgrim fathers, so adverse to the spirit of your polity, you are driving your country by your advocacy of warlike measures. Even supposing that in the conflict which you provoke, a success greater than you expect attends your arms—that you plant your victorious standard upon the two banks of the Columbia, or advance it to the shores of Hudson's Straits—that you beat the troops of England and the volunteers of Canada or New Brunswick on every field and in every siege between the two oceans which encompass the Canaan of your vaunted "destiny"—what will you have gained? The responsibility of a great empire, the invidiousness of detected pretensions, and the domination of some military chief! But if you fail—if the armies which conquered under Wellington retain their fortune under other leaders—if the pride which has spurned at mediation is chastised in war—if New York is given to plunder, and Washington again beholds the English flag floating over her Capitol—what will you not have lost by the issue of a contest at once unfortunate and unprovoked! In neither case will you resume your former position—in neither will you be as you were before the war. You will have created new pretexts of taxation—you will have called into existence new institutions repugnant to you old ones—you will have laid the foundation of future encumbrances or future despotism. But, more than this, you will have aroused the jealousy, awakened the vigilance, and armed the hostility of foreign Powers. You will have forced them to defend themselves against your aggressive, or to punish your defeated efforts. But in the long interval that separates the commencement of a war from its conclusion, what enormities may be practised! What calamities inflicted! Have you thought on these? Have you reckoned their cost, or their guilt? You remember the scenes of 1774: will you re-enact them? You might do us great injury; but your country would suffer dreadfully in the attempt. You might invade our colonies by guerilla detachments, but we should lay our ships of war against the cities of your pride and the homesteads of your wealth. You might destroy our merchant vessels, but we should devastate your provinces and depopulate your towns. We might lay Washington in ashes; but could you invade England with effect? And have you forgotten the secret danger which you nourish in your bosom? Can you forget that to the horrors of a foreign would be added the greater horrors of a servile war?—a war not of lines, columns, or camps, but a war waged against heads of families, in houses, by ambuscade, and every species of treachery complicated with every kind of cruelty that vengeance could devise and opportunity provoke? Again, do you not remember that a war with England could not be a little war, nor confined to two states; that it would up the world in its conflagration, and add to the cruelty of an unnatural contest the inconvenience of unnatural of faithless alliances? You rely on France, and forget Russia. But do you forget the traditinary fickleness of the former, and the antidemocratic mission of the later? Do you not know these things? do you not fear them? We seek not to intimidate you with vain menaces and unreal bugbears. But we bid you, as patriots who love your country, as statesmen who are legislating future times, above all, as men who profess to adore justice and to sever truth—we bid you pause, and reckon the fearful risk which you are running and the monstrous misery which you are courting.

What is your case? You lay claim to a greater amount of territory than Great Britain says is yours by right. She offers to refer the dispute to arbitration—you reject this offer. What is the obvious and fair inference suggested by such a refusal? Again, what are the facts of your claim? Make a "Case" of it—state it fairly, and lay it before the jurists of the world. It would run thus:—

"There is a vast extent of territory lying between the 43d deg. north latitude and the 52d deg. north latitude. It was settled some time towards the close of the last century. The accounts of its discovery are conflicting and
The house having resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Yancy said, he considered that the discussion upon the Oregon notice question in the House of Representatives had been reassured on the 7th. These accounts are important. The proceedings of Congress present, in the Senate, the introduction into that house of resolutions for giving the Oregon notice, and in the other house the continuation of the former debate.

He reviewed the course of the President in relation to this question, and exhibited his inconsistency in having in his inaugural address considered it as a war measure, and that war was expected by the Administration as the result of this measure. They exercised a joint protection, and gave such of their subjects as chose a joint interest in it. Afterwards a war broke out between them; and many years after Spain made a conveyance of 'all her sovereign rights' in this country to another Power--the United States--a Power as yet in the obscurity of infancy when the first settlements were made. After this cession citizens from this new Power immigrate in to this country. Not content with holding a distributive possession, and giving to her colonists the divided tenancy of this tract, the Republic of the United States, relying on the vague phrase contained in the Spanish conveyance, claim entire sovereign dominion over it as far as 52 [degrees] north latitude, and offer, as a matter of compromise, to take the parallel of 49 [degrees] as its boundary line. But while it offers this, it obstinately claims the sole usufruct of the principal river, which for 60 years has been shared on equal terms by previous occupants--the English and Spanish at one time, the English and Americans at another--in those parts wherein alone it is navigable. It refuses the offer of Great Britain to share this river, or the harbours on the coast. It thus seeks force Great Britain into surrendering for ever the only commercial advantage--the only benefit indispensable to a naval country--which the district affords, and which she has hitherto enjoyed; and it proposes, as a solution of the dilemma, to seize on the whole of the territory of which the limits are thus contested.

American representatives, would you submit such a case for the consideration of just men all over the world? Would you abide by their opinion? Or will you go to war to decide the righteousness of your claims?

LT February 3, 1846, 5b, U.S. Congress, Oregon Debate

"AMERICA"

[The following appeared in the greater part of our impression of yesterday:-]

We have received New York advices to the 13th of January inclusive, by the arrival of the packetship Stephen Whitney, Captain Popham, after a fine run of 19 days.

These accounts are important. The proceedings of Congress present, in the Senate, the introduction into that house of resolutions for giving the Oregon notice, and in the other house the continuation of the former debate.

A bill to repeal the existing tariff had been introduced into the Lower House.

The discussion upon the Oregon notice question in the House of Representatives had been reassured on the 7th. The house having resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Yancy said, he considered that peace had given them the territory of Oregon, and he believed it could only be lost by war. He was for all the Oregon--would take no line of compromise--but he could not sympathize with the cry of "Now or never." If they were not now prepared to assert by force of arms their right to Oregon, it would be well to delay it. He regarded that to give the notice would be a measure of war, and if it had been considered by previous Administrations as a measure of peace, why had it not before been given? He maintained that Mr. Adams in his speech considered it as a war measure, and that war was expected by the Administration as the result of this measure. He then considered the relative condition of the two countries to enter into war, and as regarded their own want of preparation, he charged it to the votes of western men, who were now furious for war and who had voted against all appropriations for Atlantic fortifications and for the increase and supply of the navy. He did not think there was anything offensive in the refusal of Mr. Pakenham to accept the offer made by Mr. Polk. A better offer had been repeatedly made and refused, and, as the negotiations were opened on the basis of compromise, Mr. Pakenham was justly surprised at receiving a proposition offering less than had before been refused. He thought the true course to lose Oregon was to precipitate action on this question. If they wished to preserve it, they must call time to our aid and people the territory.

Mr. Smith repelled the charge that the west were desirous of involving the country in war; but said there was a deep and absorbing feeling in the west, that the honour and interests of the nation were deeply interested in the maintenance of our rights in Oregon, and he had no fear that the United States would ever yield those rights to negotiation or to force. It was a mistake to suppose that the west would not suffer as well as other sections of the country in the event of war, as it was also that they were controlled by selfish considerations. If war should come, the west would do its duty, and would furnish its full quota of men and of treasure. He reviewed the course of the President in relation to this question, and exhibited his inconsistency in having in his inaugural
In the Senate, on the 7th, the bill to raise a regiment of mounted riflemen was taken up and enforced by the committee.

President Polk declares himself decidedly in favor of giving the Oregon notice, and expresses his discretion. The Washington correspondent of the New York Times writes, on the 7th ult., that "in speed, designed to arouse feelings of hostility, but containing no argument, and exhibiting neither sense nor the whole of that territory, even if war should come. He then proceeded in a most violent and inflammatory war provided for in the treaty. He would not, however, consider this question; their right to Oregon was complete, occupancy, and if undisturbed in these she would suffer things to move on as they were.

War would rest upon her. Great Britain claimed no exclusive jurisdiction, but the right of settlement and of would, give the notice. This he did not think probable, but if she did so the responsibility and the guilt of the their interest suffered from letting things remain as they were. It was said Great Britain might, and probably it would be arbitrated, but he much preferred that things should remain as they were. Neither their honour nor prosecuting a war of supremacy over Great Britain. If the question must now be pressed to an issue he trusted was perfect for protection, but inefficient for conquest, and its whole character would inevitably be changed in would change the character of their domestic institutions, and establish a military despotism. Their Government a period, while more favourable terms would not be procured unless Great Britain was utterly humbled. War accepted in preference to war. If war arose, it would involve Mexico, and their fellow-citizens in the Oregon, could not be peacefully settled by negotiation, he would wish that arbitration, if again proffered, should be would change the character of their domestic institutions, and establish a military despotism. Their Government was perfect for protection, but inefficient for conquest, and its whole character would inevitably be changed in prosecuting a war of supremacy over Great Britain. If the question must now be pressed to an issue he trusted it would be arbitrated, but he much preferred that things should remain as they were. Neither their honour nor their interest suffered from letting things remain as they were. It was said Great Britain might, and probably would, give the notice. This he did not think probable, but if she did so the responsibility and the guilt of the war would rest upon her. Great Britain claimed no exclusive jurisdiction, but the right of settlement and of occupancy, and if undisturbed in these she would suffer things to move on as they were.

Mr. Kennedy did not believe that the notice was a war measure. It was a simple exercise of a right provided for in the treaty. He would not, however, consider this question; their right to Oregon was complete, and they had a right to take possession of it. He was for giving the notice and for extending jurisdiction over the whole of that territory, even if war should come. He then proceeded in a most violent an inflammatory war speed, designed to arouse feelings of hostility, but containing no argument, and exhibiting neither sense nor discretion. The Washington correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer writes, on the 7th ult., that "in conversation President Polk declares himself decidedly in favour of giving the Oregon notice, and expresses his strong desire that the resolutions now before the House of Representatives should be adopted as reported from the committee."

In the Senate, on the 7th, the bill to raise a regiment of mounted riflemen was taken up and enforced by Mr. Benton. It had nothing to do, he said, with war, or rumours of war, but was a kind of force peculiarly required on the western frontier. The appropriations are as follows, viz., $76,500 for raising and equipping the regiment; $3,000 for each military post which may be established on the route to Oregon; and $2,000 to buy the land for the site of such posts from the Indians. This last item was added by Mr. Benton at the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun. The bill was passed.

The St. Louis New Era refers to the declamation founded on the extension of British laws over subjects of the Crown in Oregon by American orators and writers, and draws attention to the fact that "two acts of Congress of 1834, under the provisions of which our laws regulating Indian intercourse, and the criminal laws which apply to places over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, are all extended to that country; not confined in their operation to American subjects, but extending to every case of crime, except offences committed by Indians against Indians. We refer to the act to regulate intercourse with the Indian tribes, and the act to establish the Indian Department, and under that act men have been tried for capital offences and convicted in the Circuit Court of the United States at St. Louis."

"It may be added," says the New York Courier and Enquirer, "that under the other act 'establishing the Indian Department,' and Indian sub-agent has been appointed for, and resides in Oregon - the same Dr. White who is now, or recently was, at Washington."

The following excellent letter is taken from the correspondence of the New York Courier and Enquirer:---

"The anxiety in New York, in regard to the question of war or peace has been so great that newspapers and their correspondents have seized upon every rumour, no matter how improbable, which appeared to offer a hope that the Oregon question would be speedily and satisfactorily adjusted. To these rumours of pending negotiations, &c., the readers of the Courier and Enquirer well know that we have given no countenance; while we have always said, and still think, that the Oregon question will be settled without a resort to war, although the whole commercial community have to a certain extent experienced, and will continue to suffer, from many of its consequences. I now desire to state, however, for the benefit of all concerned, and I do so upon the very highest authority, that from the day on which Mr. Buchanan transmitted to Mr. Pakenham his letter of, I think, the 29th of August, in which he withdrew the proposition of our Government, and virtually suspended all negotiation on the question of Oregon, -- from that day up to this time our Administration have not received directly or indirectly through Mr. McLan, Mr. Pakenham, or any other source whatever, either here or in London, the slightest overture or intimation of any kind or description whatsoever. This declaration is intended to cover the whole ground, and to guard against misconstruction, he who made this declaration added, -- 'the administration knows nothing of the intentions, the wishes, or the expectations of the British Government wish to is equally known to the whole people of the United States.'

"Of the truth of this there is no doubt whatever; and while it is with me a subject of regret that the fact should be so, it is best that the truth should be known in order that all may form their own conclusions from this state of things. I have no doubt myself, that if Mr. Paknham had forwarded to the British Government the correspondence up to and exclusive of the last letter from Mr. Buchanan, he would have been informed that his rejection of the offer made by our Government was premature, and that it should have been accepted. But when that rejection was followed by the withdrawal of the rejected proposition and the abrupt suspension of all negotiations, the British Government apparently arrived at the conclusion, that they had nothing more to do but to prepare for any and every contingency which might arise; and accordingly, they have observed the most studied and profound silence on the subject, while the whole energies of the nation have been devoted to preparations for war. Wellington truly said, that England could never again wage a 'little war;' and if war comes, it will be of a character far more serious than any in which she has heretofore been engaged.

"England, then, is quietly awaiting the action of our Government; and, in my humble opinion, the question of peace or war depends solely and exclusively upon the fact whether we do or do not give notice of the termination of the convention for joint occupancy. I know there are those who think differently, but they are very few in number; and nine-tenths of all who hold such language believe in their inmost souls that, if we give notice, war in inevitable. Mr. Adams, whose hatred of England is only surpassed by his malignity to the south, has recently declared in the most solemn manner that the contemplated notice is a peaceful measure, and that it cannot possibly produce war. And yet this same gentleman only one year ago as solemnly, and far more honestly, proclaimed to the House of Representatives, and through it to the people of the United States, that the giving of this notice was the exercise of the war power of the house, and that the house had a right to entertain it, because war could not be declared without its sanction, and that the giving of this notice was virtually a declaration of war: that, once given, war was inevitable! Beyond all question he was honest in the expression of this opinion last January; and, whatever he may now say to the contrary, in the hope of involving us in a war with England to punish the south, not a man in this city doubts but he is still of the same opinion.

"It is to be deeply regretted that one so distinguished should thus sacrifice even the appearance of a decent respect for truth to his hatred of England and the south but his friends point to his almost second childhood as an apology for such conduct. I wish I could in charity attribute his inconsistency and want of truth to this cause; but his reply to Mr. Rhett on Wednesday conclusively proves that his mind is too vigorous to have been so, it is best that the truth should be known in order that all may form their own conclusions from this state of things. I have no doubt myself, that if Mr. Paknham had forwarded to the British Government the correspondence up to and exclusive of the last letter from Mr. Buchanan, he would have been informed that his rejection of the offer made by our Government was premature, and that it should have been accepted. But when that rejection was followed by the withdrawal of the rejected proposition and the abrupt suspension of all negotiations, the British Government apparently arrived at the conclusion, that they had nothing more to do but to prepare for any and every contingency which might arise; and accordingly, they have observed the most studied and profound silence on the subject, while the whole energies of the nation have been devoted to preparations for war. Wellington truly said, that England could never again wage a 'little war;' and if war comes, it will be of a character far more serious than any in which she has heretofore been engaged.

"The passage of the resolution requiring the Executive to give notice of the termination of the convention of 1826 is not in itself an offensive act; and, had it been given pending negotiation last winter, very probably no injury would have resulted from it. But the whole aspect of affairs is no longer the same, and the circumstances under which the notice would be now given entirely change its pacific character. All negotiations have been abruptly suspended, and not only has our proposition for compromise been withdrawn, but the Executive in his annual message virtually apologizes for having made it. Under these circumstances, the President recommends a termination of the joint occupancy, accompanied with a declaration that we are entitled to every inch of Oregon, and that at the expiration of the year's notice we are to take possession of and govern it as a part and parcel of the territory of the United States. In addition to this, the military committee, and prominent members of both houses, proclaim from their places that at the expiration of the notice of England is to be forcibly driven from Oregon.

"Most assuredly, all these circumstances take from the notice its peaceful character, and make it (as Mr. Adams once truly said) a war measure! No man in his senses--certainly no honest man, who is capable of reasoning upon the current events of the day and exercises his reason,--either does or can believe that the giving of the contemplated notice will not involve us in war. Many, doubtless, desire to think otherwise, and that they may do so, and have an excuse for their conduct, refuse to reason with themselves or any other person upon the subject; and it is only these, together with the fools who cannot reason, and the knaves who desire war to make money out of it, who are prepared to vote for the notice. True, there are in the House of Representatives men of both parties, so weak that.

"I ask of the honest, intelligent, and considerate members of both houses of Congress a carefully and calm consideration of this aspect of the question, and of the very decided advantages which this country platted notice. Beyond all manner of question, if we refuse to give such notice, England will be placed in a most awkward and embarrassing position, while our country will have a re-acquired that which slowly but most certainly, was securing to us all we desire. Every consideration, then, of patriotism and interest; every motive which can or should operate upon the minds of public men--of men representing alike the wishes, the feelings, and the interests of the people--of men presumed to be jealous of the honour of the nation--demands a prompt rejection of the resolutions before both houses of Congress. I say a prompt rejection of them, because we know not what intelligence the next arrival from Europe may bring us. Now we may act without fear of any, the slightest apprehension, of a misconception of the motives which guide us; but if we postpone action until after the arrival of further intelligence, it is by no means impossible that it may embarrass our actions. Our true course, then, is to act promptly; and to repudiate the ridiculous idea that England is averse to a war with the United States, or that such a war would be injurious to her interests.

"This is the great error of the age. Bullies imagine that England is not in a position to go to war with us, and therefore, resort to bullying; yet at no period in the last 100 years has a war been so necessary or desirable for her; at no previous period in her history has it been so universally demanded by her people; never before has she stood before the civilized world as the injured party; and never, since she was a nation, was she so thoroughly prepared, and so capable of bringing into action all her immense resources. War would add but little to her expenses; it would restore to her the China and South American markets for her manufactures, whence we have driven her; it would lessen her population, divert public attention, and revive a spirit of nationality, the deadening of which by 30 years of peace is threatening all those institutions upon which is based her monarchy.

She will not go to war with us unless she can secure to herself the sympathies of Europe; but give her these--and they are now with her--make her the injured party by threatening to drive her out of Oregon after 30 years of peaceable residence there--and she will bless the statesman who thus forces her into hostilities. But I repeat, there will be no notice; and consequently, no war.

Mexican accounts to the 8th of December, published in the American journals, contradict he reports formerly received, that Paredes had declared against the Government. The General, it is stated, had addressed a despatch to the Secretary of War, dated San Luis Potosi, November 26, in which he says that, having learned that Colonel Barragan had circulated reports of his intention to pronounce for a dictatorship, he had ordered Barragan to be arrested, and proceedings to be taken against him.

We further find it stated, that the Diario de Gobierno of the 3d of December publishes this dispatch with an editorial paragraph, affirming that all the reports imputing to General Paredes designs hostile to the Government are utterly without foundation.

Accounts from the British Guiana to the 16th of December, received in New York, possess no features of importance.

Our Canadian accounts are unimportant. The previous rumours of Cabinet dissensions had died away.

AMERICA
London Times: Liverpool, Feb. 3.

We have received important advices from New York, to the 18th ult. Inclusive, by the arrival of the packet-ship Yorkshire, Captain Bailey, after a fine run of 15 days.

These accounts are of a more satisfactory character than those published in The Times of this morning. The excitement created by the warlike tone of the discussion in the House of Representatives had in a great measure subsided, and apparently more moderate counsels prevailed. The Senate had refused to discuss the question of giving Great Britain notice with regard to the joint occupancy of the Oregon until the 10th of February; and in the Lower House the speeches delivered were less hostile in their character. As will be seen below, a bill of appropriation towards increasing the navy in both branches of the service had been received in Tuesday, the 10th of February. The votes are as follows:--

Upon this vote the Washington correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer terminated the joint occupancy of the Oregon be made the special order for the 27th of January, Mr. Calhoun appropriating the sum of $11,190,000 for the addition to the United States navy. On a motion that the notice to terminate the joint occupancy of the Oregon be made the special order for the 27th of January, Mr. Calhoun and other senators urged further delay; and the question having been put to the vote, the order was delayed to Tuesday, the 10th of February. The votes are as follows:--

Nays.--Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Breese, Bright, Cameron, Cass, Dickinson, Dix, Fairfield, Hannegan, Jenness, Niles, Semple, Sevier, Sturgeon, Turney.--18.

Mr. Hannegan's resolutions, deprecating a compromise on the 49th parallel, were also postponed to the 10th of February. Upon this vote the Washington correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer remarks--

"This, though not clearly indicative of the course that Senate will take on the question of notice, shows that that body is determined to proceed with proper deliberation and with the benefit of all the information that time can give them. What the final action of the Senate will be on this question cannot now be said with certainty; a majority of that body is unquestionably in favour of a but pacific course, and it is probable that a measure will yet be devised con which they can unite, and which will satisfy the hour of the country while it shall maintain our rights to Oregon, and at the same time preserve the peace of the country."

The proceedings of the 13th were devoid of interest.

On the 14th Mr. Allen offered the following

"JOINT RESOLUTION.

"Resolved, &c.,--That recent manifestations of a disposition, by certain Powers of Europe, to interfere in the political arrangements of this continent, with a view to the enforcement of the European principle of 'the balance of power' upon the independent nations of America, having made it, in his judgment, the duty of the President of the United States to call the attention of congress to this subject in his annual message, and to announce, on the part of the United States, the counter-principle of non-intervention, it is the judgement of Congress that the announcement thus made by the President was demanded by the manifest hazard to which such interference would inevitably expose the relations of peace now subsisting between the old world and the new.

"Resolved. -- That Congress, thus concurring with the President, and sensible that this subject has been forced upon the attention of the United States by recent events, so significant as to make it impossible for this Government longer to remain silent without appearing ready to submit to, and even to invite, the enforcement of this dangerous doctrine, do hereby solemnly declare to the civilized world the unalterable resolution of the United States to adhere to and enforce the principle that nay effort of the Powers of Europe to intermeddle in the social organization or political arrangements of the independent nations of America, or further to extend the European system of Government upon this continent, by the establishment of new colonies, would be incompatible with the independent existence of the nation, and dangerous to the liberties of the people of America, and therefore would incur, as by the right of self preservation it would justify, the prompt resistance of the United States."

Some discussion ensued. Mr. Calhoun said--

These resolutions embraced a principle of action which called for the most solemn declarations on the part of the Senate. It afforded matter for consideration how far this resolution could be efficiently acted upon, if adopted. No man could view with stronger feelings of opposition all impertinent intervention of the Powers of Europe in the affairs of this continent than himself. And he would not take occasion to say, that the late extraordinary interference of Great Britain and France in the political domestic relations of Buenos Ayres was an outrage unprecedented in its character. But the great question here suggested was, were they now prepared to take this whole continent under their protection? Had they reached that state of maturity to admit of this wide and exclusive guardianship? Were they prepared to take all the consequences that must grow out of the assumption of such a policy as was there indicated? If they were determined to take the course indicated by the resolutions, if they were determined to take the course indicated by the resolution, if they indicated anything, they might as well at once call into action the whole energies of the country. They wanted time. Mr. Calhoun was of the firm opinion that at this moment the resolutions of the hon. Senator could have no good result--no good effect upon the nations of the world. The President had announced the principle--why not be reported a preamble and resolution on the subject of the Oregon controversy. The preamble recapitulated treaties and the inconvenience of the existing state of things; the resolution gave discretion to any time after the expiration of the President to give the 12 months' notice, provided, however, that he should be limited in that discretion to any time after the expiration of the present session of Congress.  After some remarks between Mr. Calhoun and Mr.   Crittenden as to the order of this proceeding, Mr. Calhoun waved his objection;

the resolution was read, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for the 10th day of February, when the whole subject would come up for discussion.

The subsequent proceedings of the Senate are devoid of interest.

He did not think the question before the committee on of peace or war.   He deplored war but would

Mr. Allen said that he had been apprehensive that even this proposition might be resisted in the senate, but he had not supposed that the bare introduction of it would encounter opposition.  He would not now go into a general examination of the resolutions, but would simply remark that the President, in his official message to congress, had denounced the principle of foreign interposition in American political affairs, and without the approval of congress, he would stand, in the eyes of the world, as taking a stand unsupported by the concurrency of the balance of the Government.  Never, since the declaration of Mr. Monroe against foreign interference in the domestic relations of this continent, had Mr. Allen heard the justice of the policy of this position question, nor had known it to meet with opposition from any American mind.  Mr. Allen further expatiated upon the propriety of Congress confirming this position of the President. He did not ask the consideration of the resolution now; it would be referred, if received, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, who would doubtless give it that serious reflection which the case required, and would report accordingly.

Mr. Calhoun inquired if the chairman on Foreign Relations had submitted the resolution on his own individual responsibility?  (Mr. Allen replied in the affirmative.) Mr. Calhoun said that he considered that an unprecedented proceeding, and entirely out of order.  He was not disposed now to rush forward into any measure that would further entangle foreign relations.  If they were resolved upon this measure, they ought at once to put forth the whole of their strength.  They ought to declare themselves military republic,  and that the whole continent was under their especial protection.   Why did not the senator at once come forward with specific resolution touching the affairs of Buenos Ayres?  It was the part of wisdom to look to wise ends from wise means.  Mr. Calhoun positively objected to the reception of the resolutions, and called for the ayes and noes.

The notice of introduction was laid on the table by a vote of 28 to 23.  Mr. Crittenden then, on leave,
On the 13th, Mr. C.J. Ingersoll submitted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for his plan of a Constitutional Treasury, as suggested in his report and in the message of the President, but being objected to it had to lie over.--Mr. Baker then submitted a resolution declaring it to be the sense of the house that the President of the United States has no right to offer to cede any portion of the territory of the United States, to which its title was clear and unquestionable, either by treaty or arbitration. The resolution was laid on the table. A resolution of inquiry was offered, whether any negotiations had taken place about Oregon since the President's message was delivered.

On the 14th, the policy of giving the notice under discussion to Great Britain was argued by Messrs. Staunton, Godon, Brinckerhoff, and Wentworth, and further continued on the following day by Mr. Cooke:--

He was not prepared to say that the British nation had no rights in Oregon; if he were to deny that she had, he would thereby cast reflections upon the eminent patriots and statesmen who at various times have offered to divide that territory with Great Britain on the 49th degree. He believed the giving of the notice was not within the competency of Congress, but was an executive function. It was not a question in which our honour was concerned, and he was in favour of settling it by negotiation; and, that failing by arbitration.

Mr. Bedinger believed their title to the whole of Oregon to be perfect, but it was their policy to remain quiet. He did not know that the would ever listen to a proposition from Great Britain to compromise the matter.--Mr. Morse was in favour of the notice, and did not believe that it would produce war.

The jealousy previously noted as being entertained in the Untied States as regards the Mormon emigrants to the borders of the Pacific, we find again started in the St. Louis Reporter. "It is quite time," says that journal--

"The United States Government had taken notice of the treasonable practices of these declared enemies of our country. There are now many respectable witnesses in St. Louis ready to make oath that, the twelve have held secret councils, in which they have concocted treasonable plans of hostility to the citizens and Government of the United States, and that they have numerous agents now among nearly all the Indian tribes, for the avowed purpose of embittering their minds against us and preparing them ultimately to join them in a war against us. Will the United States allow 200,000 of these bitter and irreconcilable foes to take possession of any portion of the Pacific coast that is now or may hereafter by purchase become ours? The President of the United States should be authorized by a law of Congress, if he has not now the authority, to issue his proclamation, forbidding them to settle on the United State' lands or to pre-empt them, and to inform them that they will not be allowed to remain on any lands that we may acquire hereafter, while these hostile views against us continue to be cherished and taught to their people. If war should ensue between this country and England about Oregon, there is little doubt that one of England's most efficient forces will be the Mormons. Will the country supinely permit this important item to be thrown in the scale against us in the settlement of our apprehended difficulties in that quarter? The writer believes, from information that has reached him, that treasonable correspondence might now be found in Nauvoo. At all events, there is sufficient evidence now in St. Louis to warrant the immediate arrest of the twelve, and to hold them to answer to the country for treason. The proper authorities can be furnished with the names and residences of witnesses for that purpose. If the twelve are arrested and tried for treason, more of a better stamp and more pacific views towards this country are likely to become leaders in their stead, and trouble with them, as well as emigration to California, might thereby be avoided. Let the country look to it in season."

In the fears thus expressed the New York Courier and Enquirer concurs.

Washington letters contain the rumour that despatches had been received by the Government from the United States' Minister at Mexico, Mr. Slidell, and that upon these several Cabinet meetings had been held. It is added, that no intelligence confirmatory of the reputed revolutionary movement of General Paredes had been received.

Mr. Parrott had been appointed Secretary to the Mexican Legation.

The celebrated corn law announcement of The Times had arrived out at New York by the packetship Oxford, on the 14th of January, and had created a great sensation. The Courier and Enquirer thus remarks:--

"There seems, indeed, to be no good reason to doubt the announcement of The Times, and none appears to be entertained. Assuming that it is substantially correct, the intelligence is of the utmost commercial moment, and the effect which it must necessarily produce in the United States can hardly be overrated. It is proper for us to state, at the same time, that the London Standard, understood to be the Ministerial organ, gives an apparently flat and emphatic contradiction to all the asseverations of The Times on this subject, but The Times reiterates them with an increased boldness, and submits its own statements to the decision of the country, exultingly remarking that a very short time will show which of the two journals (the Standard or itself) is most entitled credit.

"We do not see anything in the London papers to change the view we have expressed, or to shake our confidence in the important statements of that paper, for we do not see that they materially invalidate the substance of The Times article."
We learn from Indiana that bills, providing for the adjustment of the public debt of the state, had been introduced into both branches of the State Legislature from the Joint Committee appointed to consider the subject. The bills, it is stated, appeared to be formed on the plan suggested by Mr. Butler, the agent of the bondholders.

The New Orleans journals censure the recent proposition advanced to Congress by Senator Levy for the annexation of Cuba.

The New York Legislature was discussing the anti-rent question.

Canadian accounts are interesting. The journals were very generally occupied in discussing, with patriotic warmth, the doubtful state of our relations with the United States. To the "patriotism" of the two races of settlers, the Albany correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer bears the following testimony:

"I have to-day seen a letter from a reliable an well-informed source in Canada West, and it alludes to the sentiments and feelings of the population there in reference to the question of war with this country. They are, the letter states, united firmly and warmly in loyalty to the Government, and the French part of the population especially have become convinced of the friendship of the present Government towards them, and they hold the same loyal language as their English fellow-citizens. There seemed to be a general expectation in the Canadas that war would come, and the population generally would be prepared for such an event."

The Canadian journals are also urging upon the Government the necessity of providing for a more efficient drilling of the militia, should any difficulty ensue from the Oregon question. New fortifications were about being erected at Kingston, and the Montreal Courier states, that--

"A board of officers of high rank has been sitting for some time in this city to consider the steps to be taken for the defence of the colony; and another board is engaged for the inspection of the military stores." [AEK]

LT London Times: February 9, 1846

From the Madrid Eco del Comercio

An article in The times, of London, written in view of the preponderance of the United States of America, and the weakness to which Mexico is reduced by her internal revolutions, appears to us a very remarkable one. The London journal—a journal of sound doctrines of government, and the most influential in the politics of that country—deplores the condition at which affairs have arrived in America, and laments because the emancipation of the ancient Spanish colonies has entailed an evil upon Europe. We have at sundry times turned our attention to this question, and some years ago we embodied our views in political pamphlet. If Europe contributed in no small degree to promote and assist the insurrection of the Spanish colonies, she did not perceive that she suicidally sacrificed her political influence in an equal ratio, even if she gained in her mercantile and industrial enterprises. It is not easy to combine everything at once. For the manufacturing interests of England, the rapid progress of the North American Union has been useful, and the emancipation of those states has been more profitable to Great Britain than if they had been maintained as an English colony. Under colonial domination, and subject to the mother-country, the states of the Union would not have attained the rank of a first-rate power; their population would no doubt not have increased in a greater proportion than has been observed in those parts for 50 years; and for a corroboration of this truth it is only necessary to turn our eyes to the English colonies in those regions.

England finds in the markets of the United States of America the principal outlet for her commerce and manufactures; and without doubt, the amount of the value of her exportations may be placed as the first and greatest of the commercial balance between the other nation of the world.

If, in this part, she gained in wealth, she lost in power, and from her colonies arose a colossal flag which at present curbs and restrains her.

Political economists will be able to calculate the exact value of this difference.

We have adduced this example in order to prove that the Machiavellism of foreigners, although the Spaniards contended with the great captain of the age; has been fatal to us. Instead of assisting us, and being grateful for and compensating our sacrifices, they contributed to the emancipation of our colonies; and as there was no Washington in them, neither were they customs of our colonists like those of Philadelphia, they have been torn for the last 30 years by civil discord, the fruits of which the United Stated and Brazil will gather in course of time. Behold here the grand error of European Governments, and principally that of England, which had the greatest interest in the non-separation of those countries from Spain.

This is acknowledged by The Times, and this illustrious journal would now desire to see a monarchy erected in Mexico, which would serve a centre and basis of peace, in order that, under its shadow, the wars between the republics of that extensive territory might cease; and with this motive our contemporary, after some luminous reflections, says,--

"As far as Spain herself is concerned, such an enterprise would not be unworthy of a the man* whose military success and whose resolute character have already restored so much of the lustre of the Spanish monarchy. A Prince of the House of Spain, bringing with him a force capable of restoring order to the country, and the guarantees of a constitutional Government for the protection of its liberties, would be hailed with enthusiasm by a considerable number of Mexicans, and would confer immense benefits on that people, re-establishing its relations with the maritime and constitutional Powers of Europe. Amongst the cognate suitors (relations) of Queen Isabella, it would not be difficult to point out the individual best fitted for such an enterprise, by his personal qualities and his liberal sentiments. And even if the United States should attempt to interfere in this question in a manner for which there is not the least justification, they would not certainly be able to oppose the political march of the united Powers of Europe, when their sole object would be to preserve a national Government in New Spain, and to repair the disastrous effects of abortive revolutions upon the provinces which were once incorporated with the Spanish crown."

We approve the idea of our English contemporary; but a few amendments suggest themselves to our minds.

If the Mexicans, for example, looking to their interests, should say spontaneously--"We wish to be transformed into a constitutional monarchy; and without wars, without disasters, without opposition, we accept a Spanish prince, in the same way that the Swedes, the Belgians, and the Greeks accepted foreign princes, who must have entertained less sympathy with them than he whom we adopt,"--we at once agree that this declaration would be a blessing to Spaniards, to both the Americans, to Europe, and especially to England. But does our esteemed contemporary believe that Spain could oppose any force, if the slightest opposition were offered? Does it imagine that the United States would not use those forces which are being organized diplomatically, and without ostentation for the purpose of impeding the creation of a monarchy which might be extended to the Pacific, which might annex the Californias, and oppose, farther on, its rights in the Oregon? Would it not also secretly influence, in opposition to our idea, the ponderous sceptre which rules in South America? What will France say to this? Without an European league we deem the proposal of The Times impossible. Will this be possible without promoting a maritime war? Will Europe wish to undertake one? This is a question of much interest, and we leave to our contemporary the right of solving it with the masterly skill which we acknowledge it to possess.

We are very willing that our American correspondent "A 'States' man" should put the finishing stroke to the diplomatic reputation of Mr. King, the American Minister in Paris, and to the little controversy in which we happen to have found ourselves engaged with reference to that person. Our correspondent assures us, and he doubtless speaks from competent authority, that Mr. King "attached no signification at all in writing" to the words which he was transmitting to Washington. Whatever M. Guizot may have said, and whatever Mr. Calhoun may have thought, Mr. King neither said nor thought anything; and, with this assurance on the part of his champion, we take leave of him.

I expected by this packet to describe a revolution ended; but I cannot do more than announce a revolution commenced, the result of which, in the opinion of many, is all in favour of the General who has the courage to undertake a radical change in this ill-governed country. I informed you by the December steamer that General Paredes had pronounced, in San Luis Potosi, against the present Administration. The fact was communicated by express at the moment of the departure of the British courier for Vera Cruz. Since that period to the middle of the present month the further intentions of Paredes were involved in mystery, as he made no forward military step, with the exception of advancing his cavalry four days' march on the road to the capital, and it was understood that the heads of the church had induced him to remain inactive. However, the post of the 15th from San Luis put an end to all uncertainty, as it brought us the formal pronunciamiento of all the officers of his division, and the actual manifesto of Paredes himself. The former of these documents I subjoin, and the latter I incorporate in my correspondence, as it gives a true and well drawn picture of the unfortunate situation of this country, and explains at full length the motives that induced the General, who a twelvemonth since set up the present Government by banishing Santa Anna, not to work its destruction.

Paredes in one sense is right, for certainly the system pursued by the actual Administration must have reduced the republic in the course of a few years to the lowest stage of misery; but who has constituted Paredes an umpire in the case, and what principle gives him authority to build up and know down Governments at his pleasure? The nation at large has given him no such mission, and the representatives of the nation in Congress are openly opposed to his designs. His conduct is prima facie unconstitutional; but still such are the crying evils of the ruling system--so degraded is the country by former corruption and present weakness--that many thinking men accept the pronunciamento as a great good, believing that Paredes, as an honest and intrepid man, will, if he succeeds, root out the cause of all these evils.

There is only one fear mixed up with these favourable anticipation, and that is the dread that Paredes is but the creature of the Santa Anna Party, and that the support he now receives proceeds from those who are determined to have back that notorious character. I know not how far this apprehension be true, as Mexican intrigue is too profound for our own common-sense examination; but the fact is patent, that the heads of the conspiracy in the metropolis are Santa-Anistas. It is possible, at the same time, that Paredes may be using them, as they imagine they are cajoling him; and from all I hear of the sound headstrong resolution and honesty of Paredes I do not think it possible that he is working for such an end. Santa Anna at one time might have been saviour of his country. He had popularity, prestige, and means of success in his hands; but he lost all these by selfish and avaricious proceedings, and his return to power would be looked on by all classes as the treaties affliction that could befal the nation. More over, Paredes and the heads of the church, with whom he is identified, have, it is said, conceived a project for constitution Mexico into a monarchy, and seeking a sovereign from one of the roman Catholic Royal families of Europe. Their great difficulty is to fix from what race the monarch is to come. There are objections to Carlstein and Christino, so far as Spain is concerned; and Austria and Bavaria offer no advantages; and Naples has no strength beyond her territory. France, to be sure, has scions of Royal race, but the French are radically unpopular in Mexico, and how would Great Britain like this extension of Bourbon influence and power? these speculations are uppermost in the minds of several families of wealth, who admit that republican institutions are totally unfitted for the country, and I should hope that Paredes's personal views have amore a tendency that way than in favour of Santa Anna.

With this introduction I give the manifesto of Paredes before I proceed to narrate the various circumstances that have followed his pronunciamento:

"To the Mexican Nation.

"In undertaking the duty which the general voice of the army and the will of the people confide to me, my first care is to address the nation. A soldier of the country, elevated higher than my merits deserve, I owe to it a so solemn a moment an account of my conduct, plans and intentions.

"it is now 24 years since Mexico appeared before the world as an independent and sovereign nation. The army of the three guarantees then occupied the capital, and all Mexicans hailed with enthusiasm the promise of happiness which presented itself. The independence of the nation was then an irrevocable fact; the long and sanguinary contest of independence, ending by a fusion of all parties by the constancy, valour, and patriotism of the heroes of Iguala, destroyed the hopes of those bands who had opposes its progress, and general confidence and public satisfaction anticipated many and long years of peace to our beloved country.

"The state of the Administration justified these hopes. The tact, moderation, and prudence of the leaders of 1821 had conquered our independence in an honourable manner; and by casting an eye on our interior position, we shall see what was the brilliant inheritance they received form our former masters. The revenue was sufficient, without pressing heavily on the country, to maintain the State in all its proper splendour, as well as the magistracy and the many charges on its vast administration, to assist the defective colonies of the Philippine Islands, and to give a considerable surplus to the peninsula. The tribunals were models of integrity, and the Mexican army--that army which made the independence--was numerous, warlike, and well disciplined.

"Then, indeed, we possessed all the elements of a great nation, and in the first years q four independence the entire world believed that we were about to establish on the new continen a strong and powerful empire. The fetters of monopoly being removed, our commerce acquired importance and our agriculture consideration, and both sent to European markets productions till then unknown from the Mexican soil. Mines recovered their former splendour, and from all parts of the globe foreign capitalists hastened to give life and movement to our national industry. All American nations acknowledged our independence, some European monarchies followed their example, and we confidently hoped that all the States of both continents would speedily establish with us relations of mutual interest and reciprocal alliance.

"Nothing was wanted to justify our hopes. We had a prosperous revenue, greater than our wants, a vigorous and skilful administration, a numerous and valiant army, a laborious and obedient people, the support of the sympathy of the civilized world, and the more fully to develop the elements of prosperity given to us by Providence, we had a perfect union of all parties, public confidence, the benefits of independence, and the hopes of liberty.

"The actual state of the country will show how far these expectations have been realized and these promises fulfilled. Selfish parties, without patriotism, without faith, have followed in command, to tyrannize over and ruin the republic. Civil discord exhausted its rage; confusion entered into society. We have spent 23 years in trying every species of system and that time has been marked by continual revolutions. What fruit have these revolutions yielded? The slightest glance at our condition will show how the action has been insulted and humiliated by foreign arms or policy. The weak and thoughtless Governments that have succeeded each other have allowed Texas to be separated from the national territory: and now to conquer that rebellious department, we have to engage in war with a powerful state. Our relations with other countries are not satisfactory, and our neighbors say, and the statesmen and journals of Europe maintain, that the stars of North American shall rule over all Mexican lands, and reach the Isthmus of Panama. Such is the opinion formed by the civilized world or our division, weakness, and misery.

"If we look at what is going on in the interior, we only see chaos and anarchy. Texas is separated from the national union; the rebels of other department, speculating on the impotence of the Government, openly preach insurrection; and the Executive, ruled by party, and occupied solely by its miserable quarrels, abandons to the sanguinary incursions of savages all our frontier departments. The impoverished army is unequal to watch over the interior security and protect us from foreign war. Its patience and constancy are beyond all praise; but the soldier is naked and without food, and the military administration in the most lamentable disorder. The revenue, which in former times exceeded all demands of the State, has been frittered away by tricks and quackery. The old servants of the republic, the magistrates and the army, are in miser; while in Mexico, and in some departments, the corrupt amass colossal fortunes. Our finance is bankrupt at home and abroad; we are devoured by a debt which daily increases, and which must one day swallow up all the property of the nation. The revenues are pledged to our creditors, and the Government is seen begging from hour to hour, at exorbitant usury, the common expenses of the garrison of the capital. The balance of justice ahf been perverted in the hands of faction, and recently we have seen a solemn tribunal consecrate the impunity of sedition. Our agriculture fails for want of protection and security, and that commerce which at one period fertilized the whole country is daily abandoning our coasts.

"This wretched picture is unhappily not overcharged. It is the faithful image of that which all thinking men believe and lament. Let us compare what we are and what we were 24 years ago, and our true situation will be understood. In vain hope of improving our position daily revolutions have been got up, but these, made from personal motives, have not touched the true source of evil. Congresses and Presidents are hourly changed, but the sore has been touched; and the same scandals, and the same abuses, still consume the substance of the land.

"No movement could be more popular than that of last December. The nation rose en masse to put down a disgraceful dictatorship. But has our situation been improved? Have the evils been remedied? The Democratic party sought to fit to destroy the power of the General Santa Anna; but, not satisfied with the concession since made to it by the Government, it has preached war merely to arm its adherents, trying, at the same time, by all means in its power to lower the spirit and character of the army. Concealing beneath the pretence of a stupid federation, its well known plans of vengeance, and its instincts of revenge, this party seeks to ruin a country with which it has no common interest, and for which it feels no attachment. It has paralyzed the Government, which, either afraid or lazy, has yielded to its concession on concession. It has worked by defamation and calumny, and now, having weakened the Executive by the most treacherous means, it organizes a force for the purpose of once more imposing its shackles on the nation.

"The army, however, is determined to save the country, and terminate at once the precarious and dangerous state in which the nation has for some time been. I, who had the honour of fighting for the independence of the nation—i, who had the glory of fist raising in Salisco the standard of revolt against an odious tyranny—feel bound to secure for the people the due results of that national movement. Mexico has not risen against the despotism of a soldier to sink under the tyranny of demagogues. If such were not my proper conviction, it would have been forced on me by the prayers that have been addressed on all sides, by the entreaties I have received, the common accord of the army, and by the wailings and fears of the whole people.

"In marching on the capital to crown the great work in trusted to my care I declare, in the most solemn manner, in face of the nation, that we do not seek a revolution of persons only; we look for one more great, complete, and productive. We think not of usurping a presidency or of changing a Congress. We have in view the calling together a whole nation, in order that, undisturbed by faction, it may use its sovereign will, and erect a barrier against that ruining by which it is threatened. We prevent the supreme power falling into the hands of rebels, lest as we have often seen, the country should again be scandalized by outrage. Our object is to restore to the productive classes their long lost influence, and to give to wealth, to industry, and labour the share due to them in all good social government. The nation, wearied by useless changes and barren revolution, will hail, after its long fatigues, the promise of order and stability. For this I have resolved—for this have the army resolved—to undertake a new revolution, determined that it shall be the last, and that the country under the shade of peace shall develop the elements of our wealth.

"I do not aspire to personal power or distinction. I seek not that dictatorship which has hitherto served to foment ruin and destruction. On this head my opinions are well known; I have proved them more than once in my difficult career. The stain of corruption or of party has never fallen on my character. My ambition is of a higher order. I despise political intrigues and irresponsible authority, but I aim at effecting a solid, a great and lasting change.

"These are not the hypocritical protestations with which ambition covers its design. The moment the army enters Mexico a national assembly shall be convoked, invested with the fullest power, and without limit to its sovereign will. This convention shall, at the very instant of this installation be invested with sovereign body. Its sole mission shall be to constitute the nation in a solemn and efficient manner; and from the moment of its meeting no other power shall exist in the country but such as may emanate from it.

"Satisfied, then, with the approval of my conscience, convinced of having performed my duty, I will retire into private life, or ask leave to march to the frontier as a private soldier to fight against the usurpers of our country and the enemies of our independence and prosperity."
This manifesto, immediately on its arrival in Mexico, was communicated by Government to the Chambers, and I must say to the credit of both houses, it was received in the most spirited term of open defiance. Several members in the lower house denounced Paredes as a violator of the constitution, as a military despot, as an usurper and a tyrant, and all without exception agreed to give the ministry the powers it might demand, to raise troops and levy money to resist his pronunciamento. The extra senate was held at night, and a little circumstance occurred which threw some doubt on the vigour andsteadiness of that patriotic body. An alarm of a rising of the garrison having been spread, all the senators cut short the subject under discussion, scampered away like frightened hares, and left the Government to take care of itself. Fortunately the alarm was unfounded, and the august body had the honour, on the following day, of confirmiting by its votes the plenary powers conceded by the deputies. These good dispositions were encouraged by every account that came in from the several departments which the news of Paredes's movements had arrived. All declared in favor of the Government, and offered men and money to support the President. Unfortunately these were moral, not physical demonstrations, as none of their departments possessed any armed troops, and the vain promises came from corporate bodies, whose downfall would be sealed by the triumph of Paredes. To understand this, you must be informed that one of the first acts of the Government after the fall of Santa Anna, was to return to the departments the collection and control of their local revenues. This unwise measure has been one of the principal causes of the poverty of the treasury for the last six months. But it is sufficient to show that the departments have a strong interest in supporting the present system, and every reason to dread the presence of Paredes, whose ideas are all for central government, and the determined enemy of that minor species of federation established by the concessions of Herrera.

The inhabitants of the city of Mexico, as far as their opinion could be collected, also exhibited a strong distaste for the extraordinary conduct of Paredes. They declared that his plan was subversive of all order—that he offered the country no guarantees—that whatever the faults of the present Government might be, it was strictly legal and constitutional, and that public liberty was sager in its hands than it would be under the rule of military despotism. Satisfied by the vote of the Chambers, and the expression of general sympathy, the President and Minister determined to stand their ground; and General Herrera opened the campaign by the publication of the following address to the nation:—

"Fellow countrymen.—The division of reserve failing in the sacred duty it had undertaken of defending the integrity of our territory, has, after avoiding the presence of the enemy, turned its arm against the Government to which it owed obedience, and the General-in-Chief of that division, who, under various pretexts, had constantly refused to move against the usurper of Texas, is now marching on the capital.

"The same General in Penasco corrupted the good faith of an army anxious to fight the battle of its country. He then abused the credulity of a Government unconscious of the existence of treachery like his, and then, under the cloak of judicial forms, he contrived to save from punishment the partners in his criminal acts.

"A plan ill-conceived, false, and perfidious, which omits to state by whom the Congress it invokes is to be called together, which under the name of liberty disguises slavery, is the plan now offered to you by a general whose monarchial and despotic tendencies are well known—by a general author of the monstrous plans of Jalisco, and the chief actor of Tacabaya.

"Mexicans, is he who seeks to restore the position of the country to the same state that existed at the epoch of our independence—is he who regrets that Mexico formed a free republic out of the ruin of a powerful empire, the man to proclaim sound republican principles, and to establish a system consonant to the warmest wishes of your hearts? Consider that his vain and confused plan offers no guarantees and that marching, as he was ordered, to the field of battle, deceived both his Government and the army he commands. Is this the man to lead you to the Texan frontier? He who under so many false pretexts refused to send assistance to the brave and suffering fourth division.

"The good sense of the nation, the love of liberty, and of republican institutions the loyalty of the army and the firmness of the authorities, will cement a barrier against one who seeks once more to involve hi country in revolution. The ministry of the 6th of December of last year, called on the nation, throws itself into the arms of the people, determined to follow its sovereign will whatever course events may take.

"But persuaded that several persons who follow the standard of rebellion are led astray by error and ignorance, the Government commences by offering pardon to all who recognize their faults and return to their duty, as servants of the republic and defenders of the laws.

"Fellow-citizens—Your liberties are at stake; hasten to assist me in defending them, as I swore to do on the 16th of September last. With your aid we shall be invincible.

"Your compatriot.

"JOSE JOAQUIN DE HERRERA"
The Senate, the Chamber of Deputies, the Corporation, the Garrison, and, in short, all public bodies in the metropolis, followed the President's example, and all the walls were placarded with volumes of patriotism. I will not fatigue you with translations of the manifestos, as they are all set to the same tune, breathing defiance to Paredes, and calling on the people to unite for the preservation of the Constitution. The Congress voted extraordinary powers to the Government of the space of six months—the Civicos or National Guard were called out—the city declared in a state of siege—all men between the ages of 16 and 60 compelled to take arms, and fines of 100 dollars each inflicted on those who refused to answer the appeal. Barricades were erected at the entrances to the town, roads cut up to prevent the approach of artillery, and, in short, all due preparations were made to give Paredes a warm reception. The Government went even the length of issuing warrants of arrest against suspected person, and a few gentlemen of known respectability were put into close confinement.

These measures were approved, with the exception of the army of the Civicos, as every person recollects the sue made by such patriots of their power in the pronunciamento of 1828. On that occasion they sacked the city, plundered all shops and stores, and sold their plunder in the open market under the protection of the successful faction. The citizens are naturally apprehensive of a repetition of the same scenes, though greater care is now said to be used in the selection of the Leperos to whom these dangerous services are to be entrusted. Indeed, so much alarm did the organization of the Leperos inspire, that Mr. Bankhead, the British Minister, addressed a note to M. Pena y Pena, stating "that as he understood the Government was arming the populace of Mexico for the purpose of opposing General Paredes, who, with a large portion of the army, had pronounced against the existing order of things, he, in conformity to the treaty of 1826, thought of to notify that, in the event of collision taking place between the troops and the populace, he would hold the Government responsible for injury that might arise to the persons or property of British subjects." This menace, however, had no effect, and not only did the arming of the Leperos continue, by M. Pena y Pena answered Mr. Bankhead in a decided tone, stating "that the Mexican Government was arming the people in defence of the laws and constitution, for the purpose of protecting the lives and properties of foreigners as well as natives, against the insurgents; and that as foreigners incurred no further risk than the natives did, they Government could not hold itself responsible for any accidental injury arising to them during the present contest."

The next step taken by the Presidents is to name General Bustamente, a former president, and who lately returned from a long exile in France, as commander-in-chief and to make temporary arrangements with some of the Mexicans capitalists to obtain temporary supplies. Excellent terms were offered to foreign bankers, but so little reliance do strangers place on any established order of things here, that none yielded to the temptation.

In the mean time, the usual festivities preceding Christmas went on among the great body of citizens—the theatres were attended as usual, and balls and parties were given every night. The streets were perfectly quiet, no agitation of any kind, save that of amusement was visible, and no one could suppose that a revolution was at hand. The support of the different departments, given freely to the Government; no doubt aided in tranquilizing the public mind and as the garrison, consisting of 3,000 men, apparently remained true, and as 2,000 men more were expected from Puebla, it was supposed that Government would put down the insurrection. This confidence was increased by the failure of an attempt made by General Ampudia to ensnare a part of the garrison into a pronunciamento. This officer, who has been for some time concealed in the city, suddenly appeared a few nights since at the barracks of one of the regiments, and stating that he was sent by Bustamente to conduct them to the citadel, got the men under arms, and was marching to the place where the pronunciamento was to be made. Fortunately for the Government, Ampudia fell in with the officer of the night, attended by a strong escort, and he and his partisans taking flight, ran away leaving the men who were passive instruments to be reconnected to their quarters. The hopes of the people were likewise supported by the tardiness of Paredes operations, who, though he had pronounced on the 15th, within 120 leagues of Mexico, was not heard of in the vicinity of the capital at the close of the month. It was said that he and the committee in Mexico had disagreed, and it was even hoped that as so many departments pronounced against him, he would see the propriety of abandoning the enterprise.

This favourable state of things continued up to Friday evening last, when the confidence of the Government was shaken by a courier from Vera Cruz, announcing that the garrisons of that important place, and of the citadel, of San Juan de Ulloa, and the crews of the flotilla in the harbour, had all pronounced in favour of Paredes and that they had been joined by the small garrison of Jalapa. It was at the same time made known that Paredes and his division had arrived at Tala, but one day's ride from Mexico. So that between the loss of Vera Cruz and the absolute approach of the insurgents, the friends of the Government began to be disheartened, and the wavers threatened to change sides. News, at the same time, came in from several of the departments where the municipalities were supporting the Government, that the people refused to answer the appeal, and it was still further stated that the inhabitants of Pueblo to whom the President particularly looked for assistance, where getting up a pronunciamento of their own, both against him and Paredes, and in favour of federation. These adverse symptoms did not, however, prevent the Chamber of Deputies doing its duty. All the forms for installing the new Congress, which is to commence its labors on the 1st of January, were complied with, and the Congress resolved to continue its sessions until that day. The Government likewise sent off doers to suspend the march to Tampico and Mexico, lest British dollars should fall in the way of Paredes, and the temptation be too great for him or his division.

The Chambers passes a law authorizing the Government to sanction the contracts made with Santa Anna about which so much noise has lately been heard, and a sum of money was obtained from the Mint Companies and other persons interested in these affairs, which afforded a seasonable supply. On Sunday the bold step was taken of confining the archbishop with a guard of surveillance to his palace at Tacabaya, half a
In the meantime Paredes kept steadily advancing, and he and his vanguard arrived yesterday at a farm called the Lecheria, about three leagues from Mexico. We presume he will remain there until the whole of this division comes up, and consequently we calculate on his division comes up, and consequently we calculate on his opening a fire on the city on Wednesday or Thursday, unless a pronunciamiento should take place in the interim by the garrison, when, of course, resistance by the Government would be totally useless. The Government and the people are equally apprehensive of this event, and I find that the theaters are ordered to be closed, the convent and church bells silenced, and the shops are half shut, as in time of public mourning.

The division of Paredes consists, I am told, of 5,000 foot, 2,000 cavalry, and 32 pieces of artillery. The men are the best disciplined in the Mexican army, and the artillery are highly spoken of. The Government have, in the city of Mexico, about 3,000 regular troops and 2,000 Leperos, or Civicos, as they call the scum of the people in whose hands they have placed arms.

The places that have, by their civil authorities, pronounced for the Government, are--Pueblo, Guanazato, Jalapa, Guadalaxara, and Vera Cruz. The officers who remain faithful to the Government are General Rincon, at Vera Cruz; Inclan, at Peubes; Gaona, at Perote; Arista, on the Texan frontier; and Romas, at Guanaxato.

The principal persons arrested are Senores Lombardo, Under Secretary of State to Santa Anna; Villamil, private secretary; and Sierra y Rosas, agent of the same.

The persons suspected of connection with Paredes, but against whom no steps have been taken, are General Almonte, late Minister to the United States; General Tornell, and Senores Alaman and Canera, bankers and manufacturers.

It is very strange, how the Government finds money, but its payment for the last nine days are unprecedentedly regular. The daily expense of this state of siege are 9,000 dollars, all of which are paid with unexampled punctuality. Paredes's expenses amount to 7,000 dollars a-day, and he pays his troops with the same punctuality.

At the moment of closing my dispatches for the courier of the British Legation going to Vera Cruz, I find that the revolution is nearly accomplished. The citadel pronounced last night for Paredes. The troops in the convent of San Paulo followed that example. The rest of the garrison has given in this morning, save the 4th Foot and the one regiment of Cuirassiers, and they remain on duty at the Palace, not for the purpose of opposing the insurgents, but to guard the persons of the President and Ministers from injury. General Valencia, who has taken the command of the Pronunciados in the citadel, has offered to negotiate between the Government and Paredes. He proposes that a Junta, consisting of two members of the Supreme Court of Justice, six senators, and six deputies, elected by their respective Chambers should be named to appoint a President, and that the present organize bases should be respected. If the Government accede to their propositions they will be submitted to Paredes; but I do not believe that Paredes will accept them, or have anything to do with the Chambers as at present elected. Not a shot has been fired--the city is perfectly quiet--and the people pass more freely in the streets than they did yesterday. The alarm of a conflict has subsided in a great measure; but the Civicos have still muskets in hands; and until those gentry are disarmed, I do not consider the peace of the city assured.

Paredes will probably enter to-day or to-morrow. He has accomplished a bloodless, though illegal revolution. He has a noble field opened before him; for a man of honesty and intellect, with supreme power, would soon make this country one of the most flourishing in the world.

I have already informed you that the new American Minister, Mr. Slidell, arrived here about a fortnight since and a second letter would have communicated the fact that the Mexican Government refuse to acknowledge him, on the ground that they consented to receive a Minister ad hoc to regulate the affairs of Texas, and not an evenly accredited for general purposes. This decision has given much umbrage to Mr. Slidell, who has determined to leave Mexico for Jalapa, and there await the orders of his Government, and it will, most probably, give still greater offence to the Cabinet of Washington, and produce the rupture, with seeming right at its side, which it is desirous to bring on. We even think here, that it will be converted into a casus belli, or at least, into a greater offence to the Cabinet of Washington, and produce that rupture, with seeming right at its side, which it is desirous to bring on.

THE FOLLOWING IS THE MANIFESTO OF THE AMRY ADDRESSED TO GENERAL PAREDES.

"In the city of San Luis Potosí, on the 14th December 1845, being assembled at the request of the general commanding this department, Don Manuel Romero, the undersigned general chiefs and officers of the army of reserve, as well as of the garrison, the beforesaid general stated to them that although, in every well constituted nation, the mission of the armed force was no other than that of sustaining the institutions and the authority derived from them, our country, by a series of misfortunes, had failed to attain the social perfection for which so many sacrifices had been made by the soundly thinking portion of the state; and as the national movement of last year produced no better results than the establishment of an administration, which commencing its existence at the auspicious moment when party spirit had disappeared, and supported by the votes and hopes of all, frustrated those expectations by an inconceivable blindness, conduction the republic to the border of a precipice, from which it cannot be saved by those who pretend to establish the most ridiculous theories as axioms for our internal policy, evading a just and necessary war by concessions which stain our dignity and destroy the only barrier capable of opposing the ambitious pretensions of a nation equally powerful and treacherous, proposing a law of unexampled atrocity, having for its object to arm, and thereby let loose, the mob, composed of men destitute of morality, and devoid of interest in the peace and prosperity of society--endeavoring, by various artifices, to get rid of the army, whose existence was opposed to the views of a Government that destroyed its means of support--disregarding the repeated applications of the same army to march and expel from our territory the invading enemy--permitting, at the same time, the Ministerial press to calumniate the troops for a state of inaction which they were the first to lament, while admitting a commissioner with whom they were to submit to an ignominious loss of part of our territory; and finally provoking the most disastrous anarchy, exciting different factions, and attempting to carry on a Government without revenue, without force, or the support of public opinion; and the said general having further stated that these evils require a prompt and efficient remedy, which cannot be expeditious from those who, attaining power under happy circumstances, behave led the nation to this present state of chaos; who, by their own confession, have no remedy to propose; and who have lost the respectability so essential to every government, when a plenipotentiary of the United States is actually resident in the capital, being there with the consent of the present Cabinet, to purchase our independence and nationality; and finally, the said general and the whole army, considering themselves in the same position as they were in 1821, when, sustaining public opinion, they effected the independence at present endangered; and having no doubt either of the nature of the evils referred to, or on the national opinion respecting the proper remedy, as manifested by the press as well as by repeated solicitations from respectable and influential men of all parties, the said general proposes for the consideration of the meeting the following resolutions:

"1. The army sustains the protest which the nation makes against all future acts of the present administration, and which acts from this day are null and void.

"2. As neither the actual Chambers, or executive power can continue in the exercise of their functions--their functions now cease.

"3. Immediately on the occupation of the capital by the army, an extraordinary Congress shall be convoked, with ample powers to constitute the nation, and free it from all restrictions in its august functions.

"4. In the formation of this Congress, the representation of all classes of society shall be combined.

"5. Immediately on its installation, and on entering on the exercises of its high functions, the said Congress will establish an executive power, and no authority whatever can exist without its sovereign sanction.

"6. In the Departments the existing authorities shall be continued, until replaced by those appointed by the National Congress.

"7. The army names for its chief in this political movement the Most Excellent General of Division Don Mariana Paredes y Arrillegara, who shall be invited for that purpose by a commission appointed from this meeting, the meeting remaining in session until his answer be received.

"8. Another commission shall be appointed to invite the governor and assembly of this department to adhere to these resolutions.

"9. The army protests in the most solemn manner that in no case will it purpose the personal elevation of the chief it has elected.

"10. In like manner the army declares that it will punish severely all shot who with arms oppose the present plan.

"(Signed by 300 officers of the division of Paredes.)"
FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

SAN JUAN DE LOS LAGOS, DEC. 18, 1845.

I have just closed the business that brought me to the fair of San Juan de los Lagos, and write you these lines in the hope that a few particulars may be of some interest to you.

The village of San Juan is situated in a small valley, in the state of Jalisco (or Guadalaxara), and the fair annually held there in commemoration of the feast of "La Purissima," on the 8th of December, has risen into great importance as a general mart for all the northern departments of the republic, for all kinds of produce and manufactures, as well foreign as domestic. There was an unusually large concourse of people upon the present occasion, and I think that from 100,000 to 150,000 would not be an over-estimate of the number of souls crowded together into this small spot. All the principal foreign houses of Mexico, Tampico, Guanaxuato, Zacatecas, and Guadalaxara, were represented in the fair, and the value of the foreign goods brought here for sale must have exceeded a million sterling, although it is impossible to make the calculation with any great accuracy. The competition amongst the foreign merchants was likewise greater than usual; and this may be accounted for by their anxiety to get rid of their stocks before the new tariff comes into operation.

There was a new feature in the fair this year, to which I beg to call you particular attention, as it cannot fail to be of interest to those who, like yourself, are watching with a jealous eye the perpetual encroachments of our northern neighbors--I allude to the arrival of about 100 Yankee waggons, loaded with the manufactures of the United States. They brought principally "Domestics," or white cotton goods. By an extraordinary regulation of the Mexican Custom-house, these waggons are allowed to pass the frontier upon the payment of a fixed duty, viz., 750 dollars per waggon, no matter what be their contents; and I heard it computed that this will not much exceed 10 per cent. Of the duties which, upon an average, would be levied upon the same goods imported through Vera Cruz or Tampico; and the necessary consequence of this is, that British goods of this description stand no chance whatever in the competition. The annexation of Texas must greatly tend to promote this kind of traffic; and I beg to impress upon you most strongly, therefore, the necessity of opening the eyes of the British authorities to this important fact; for should so enormous a preference be continued in force much longer, now that the opportunities for availing themselves of it are daily increasing, the Americans will soon be able to supplant European manufactures throughout all the northern departments of the republic.

THE AFFAIRS OF MEXICO.

The following resolutions, arrived at by the Mexican Congress before it so tranquilly submitted to the General they so energetically denounce, are a fine specimen of bluster, and might serve as a model for some of those to be proposed by an equally fierce but equally impotent party nearer home:--

RESOLUTIONS OF CONGRESS.

"1. The powers of the Executive are enlarged, with the privilege of exercising them in all the republic for the term of six months, in conformity to the 198th article of the Base Organicas.

"2. The pronunciamiento made by the army reserve, adopted and proclaimed by its General-in-Chief, and seconded by the Assembly of San Luis Potosi, is declared subversive to the laws of the realm and the authorities established by them.

"3. The rank held by the General-in-chief and other officers of the army of reserve previous to the said pronunciamiento, shall be insured to them if, within the space of one month from the date of this decree, they place themselves in the capital at the disposal of the Government.

"4. It is likewise decreed that no officer shall continue to belong to the Mexican army who does not present himself to support and obey the legitimate Government.

"5. The nation is called on to sustain the actual order of things, and the power of ameliorating our institutions in a legal manner, to support the Government and free the republic from the new dictatorship by which it is menaced."
"6. It is resolved that pecuniary assistance given to the revolted forces shall in no case be considered as a national debt.

"7. All acts of civil or military authorities adhering to the plan pronounced by the revolted forces, shall be null and void.

"Mexico, Dec. 22, 1845."

"ADDRESS OF SENOR PENA Y PENA, MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR AND FOREIGN RELATIONS, TO THE GOVERNOR OF DEPARTMENTS.

"By an express received this morning, the Governor of the Department of Queretaro has communicated to the supreme Government a plan proclaimed by General D.M. Paredes, having for its object the upsetting the established order of things and the removal of the supreme powers of the nation, affecting to consider that society has returned to its primitive state, and proposing the convocation of a convention to constitute the nation as it may judge convenient without any restriction, and establishing in the interval a dictatorship nearly similar to that of the execrable decree of the 29th of November of last year.*

"The pretences alleged for this movement are--that the war of Texas has not been commenced; the favourable disposition shown by the government to hear the proposals which the United States have evinced a desire to make in order that this question may have a pacific solution; the arrival of a commissioner from the United States; they extension given to the superior powers of the departments; and others which your Excellency will see in the accompanying documents. So extravagant a pronunciameinto has caused profound grief to the President of the Republic, who sees thus frustrated his noble and constant efforts for the preservation of peace, the consolidation of order, the gradual and legal reform of the constitution, the correction of old abuses, and the improvement of every branch of administration.

"The President, however relying on the good sense of the nation and the justice of his cause, and firm in his determination to sustain, at every cost, the popular representative system and the basis of the political organization of the republic, with such reforms as the supreme legislative power may think necessary, will, since he is obliged to do so, oppose force by force; and the result is not doubtful.

"But as in the question now raised the departments are mainly interested, hi Excellency the President desires that each of them, through the medium of their superior authorities, should manifest publicly their decided reprobation of this new germ of anarchy with the expedition which the case demands.

"The Supreme Government, compelled to sustain with arms a contest which it has not provoked, will put in action the whole force at its disposal, and expects that the Governor, in the mean time, will attend to the tranquility and security of the inhabitants of the departments both in the town and on the roads.

"God and liberty.
"PENA Y PENA.

It would be as yet premature to assume a speedy and satisfactory settlement of the Oregon question as certain, or the disposition of the American congress as decidedly pacific. But at the same time the recent advices from the United States are of such characters to dispel all fears of a hasty resort to warlike counsels, and to encourage a hope that a question of international right--a great question, and one almost without a precedent--may be adjusted without injury to the interests or detraction from the honour of the two contending parties. We acknowledge, indeed, that in the discussion to which this matter has given rise, many irritating words have been uttered, many offensive and aggressive schemes have been recommended, against Great Britain. But we are too conscious of the personal motives which often sway legislative assemblies, we are too well aware of the diverse interests by which the different states of the Transatlantic republic are distracted, and of the influence which these exercise on the conduct of individual representatives, to feel undue uneasiness at bombastic threats or turgid declamations. We know that the American republic has many parties; the American states many debts. We are not surprised, therefore, that some orators should encourage the clamor for war to earn a cheap popularity; nor that others should hail it as the most effectual sponge for the absorption of claims which cannot otherwise be discharged. But we trust that there are other men in the Congress of the republic besides the panderers to a sanguinary passion, or the advocates of a dishonourable insolvency. And if we be disappointed in the opinion we have formed of her senators and her representatives, we believe that America contains men of thought, of judgment, of honesty, and ability, who, knowing the substance of the matter in dispute, and the value of the interests depending on its termination, reject the notion of embroiling two kindred nations in a frightful conflict, as at once unnatural and unnecessary. We trust that the proper influence of such men will, even if not felt with in the walls of Congress, be recognized throughout the country.
by the agency of that powerful and extra-legislative instrument, the American press. We have good reason for believing that the great mass of the wealth and intelligent citizens will be rather induced by the reasoning of such men as Mr. Everett and Mr. Gallatin to study the elements of the question with impartiality, than be inflamed by the ad captandum invectives of interested politicians into a hostile jealousy or an aggressive policy.

It is well for the republic that she has citizens honest enough to examine and bold enough to assert the truth. Otherwise she would be urged into the commission of a great crime. We should, doubtless, see the honest advice of General Cass carried out—an advice which we would vain hope was received with other than the reported feelings of mirth—and the whole Oregon would be occupied by an American army, and severed from the British Crown, pending negotiations of professed amity between the American and the British Governments. We would be loath to underrate the influence of honest statesmen or the eventual preponderance of a moral sense in the American mind; and we reflect with just pride, that the press, no less than the Government of this country, had done all in its power to pave the way for an honorable and pacific settlement.

The question has been considerably narrowed by the admissions of American jurists and diplomatists. The round of prior occupancy is virtually surrendered by nearly all. The coalition of different titles is repudiated by some, the title grounded on the war between Spain and England by others. The merits of first discovery are contested with equal reason on both sides; and, as far as the principles of juis gentium apply, or inferences deduced from it avail, it is confessed, at the very least, to be impossible to make out a better title for the United States than for Great Britain. If it were worth while to argue the point of discovery, the voyages of Meares might be pitted against that of Gray; and the objection that the former was sailing under foreign colours might be met by a counter-objection, that the latter was sailing in a private vessel; whilst the very appeal to priority of discovery by the United States must be held fatal to an assertion of their title grounded on Spanish cession. Again, if the prior entrance into the inlet of the Columbia be cited in favour of the American title, the more complete exploration of its banks by Vancouver and Broughton may be cited in favour of ours, to say nothing of a more recent claimant in behalf of the British Crown. And should the extravagant claim made to the whole of the Oregon be supported by the title derived from the possession of Louisiana, than on the same principle—viz., that discoveries made on the coast give a title to the whole breadth of the contiguous continent—on this principle the possessions of the Hudson's Bay Company to the north of the parallel 49 [degrees] would give us precisely the same title to the whole continent above that parallel which some Americans now arrogate to the whole continent below it.

We mention these things, not as new arguments for us, but as admissions made by our opponents. They reduce the question to narrower limits. They do away with the necessity of re-enacting an old farce, and reiterating the old forms of diplomacy. They show us and the world that sensible and honest men in America are conscious of the difficult and debatable points which beset the dispute. They indicate the impossibility of adjusting it on principles of abstract right, and the necessity of having recourse to a more obvious and easy solution. It then becomes a question, what are the circumstances which ought to regulate the future demarcation to the territory, and what are the considerations which it is the duty of both countries to act upon? Upon this head it will be sufficient to say, that two opinions have been expressed—the one, that a partition of a region like the Oregon is not desirable; the other, that supposing it to be decided on, it can be made in such a way as not to be derogatory to America, nor prejudicial to Great Britain. There are many considerations of a prospective kind—considerations of the character of this district—its capacity for being colonized—its great extent—not less than of the necessity which may hereafter be acknowledged of organizing some new state on the north-west coast of America—which give importance to this suggestion of Mr. Gallatin, and will induce us to recur to it. But we cannot dismiss the subject for the present without laying it before our readers, not as a proposal to be definitely accepted or rejected at once, but as a sign of the temper and spirit with which a respectable diplomatist of America is disposed to conduct negotiations between his country and ours. Mr. Gallatin's offer is this,--to draw the line of partition through the middle of Fuca' straits from the entrance to a point on the main situate south of the mouth of Frazer's River, which should leave to the United States all the shores and harbours lying south, and to Great Britain all those north of the line, including Quadra and Vancouver's Island. This would be along the parallel 48 1/2 [degrees]. The great cause of objection to such a division—namely, the reservation to the United States of the River Columbia—and the feasibility of surmounting this, and retaining the joint use of that river, without traduce to American interests, will form the subject matter of a future article.

The great importance of the present debate, and other matters of domestic interest, have hitherto prevented us from recurring, as we had intended, to Mr. Gallatin's proposal. It is of a twofold character. It first intimates a doubt whether the Oregon territory should be partitioned at all. Secondly, it proposes that any partition made should give to Great Britain all the region north of the parallel 48 1/2 north latitude from the sea, through the Straits, including Quadra and Vancouver's Island, leaving to the United States the country south of that line, and the sole possession of the Columbia River, and the harbours in the south of the Straits.

Both these suggestions are worthy of being weighed, not only on account of the position and character of the person from whom they emanate, but of the various and prospective interests which the adoption of either of them must affect. Now we will, in justice to Mr. Gallatin, suppose that the first suggestion is made bona fide. The consequence, then, of its being carried out would be this,—both England and the United States would either continue in precisely the same relation as that in which they now stand towards each other in Oregon, that is, the sovereignty of both states would remain in abeyance; they would each be joint tenants in the use rather than in the Seikan of the Oregon; or else the Oregon would be recognized as an independent state, guaranteed in its rights, and protected by the joint guardianship of the American Republic and the British Crown. It is to the latter contingency, rather than to the former, that our attention should, for the present, be confine,

Inasmuch as the tone of American politicians hardly encourages the notion that the joint occupancy of the contested country is possible for any length of time, and the character of the possible for any length of time, and the character of the present dispute must ah warned the statesmen of both countries that to leave the question of sovereignty open can only complicate the difficulties of the ease, and increase the embarrassment of their successors. Recurring, then, to the alternative left by the first suggestion, let us ask what must be the inevitable consequences of erecting Oregon into an independent state? In the first place, it is almost impossible not to foresee that its government would be democratic. It is almost equally certain that its tendencies would be anti-Anglican. This result necessarily flows from the anterior condition of its settlement. Its contiguity to the republic of the United States has within a few years caused a migratory influx of citizens from the latter, and hold out the prospect of a continual immigration for some years to come. Those who understand the feelings of all emigrants, and particularly of American emigrants, will at once agree that the new Government thus constituted must have prejudices and sympathies of an anti-British nature. Nor would any counterpoise to this general prejudice be supplied by an extensive influx of British subjects. The colonization of the Oregon has for the last two or three years been almost entirely conducted by Americans; whilst the settlement of our own people has been considerably thwarted, if not wholly prevented, by the exclusive privileges of the Hudson's Bay Company. Their servants have been settled and their forts and huts erected on different sites throughout the territory in dispute; but no extensive colonization has been carried on by other subjects of the Crown. This circumstance alone, apart from all others, would operate to our prejudice, if the Oregon became an independent state; but, when it is viewed in conjunction with the vicinity of a great republican Government, it is impossible not to foresee that British interests would be swamped, even if they were not openly disregarded or wantonly insulted, by the hostility of American prejudice, and the collision of democratic influence. It would be impossible for the British Government to urge as a precedent stipulation, that the traditionary rights of British subjects or the former privileges of a British company should be respected in a new republic. And, even if such a stipulation received the assent of the other contracting parties, it would be impossible for the British Crown to insure its fulfillment, without recourse to a conflict which duty and humanity enjoin it to avoid or to defer.
However adapted, there fore, the Oregon may be for extensive colonization, --however its magnitude and extent may entitle it to the rank of a separate state, --no English Minister who cares for the interests of English subjects can propose or accept a proposal for a scheme which, at the outset, would injure the interests of the latter, and hereafter sacrifice them, by aggressive violation or collusive intrigue, to American ambition. No one who has attended to the recent debates of Congress, and remarked the sentiments which are most popular in the United States, can be ignorant that the American Government contemplate the extension of their great empire from the shores of the Atlantic to those of the Pacific, and that the American people look forward to the time when no European Power shall dare to interfere with the mutual policy of the numerous states spread over the great continent of the west. How far such a consummation is desirable for the peace and happiness of nations it is not for us to say. It is sufficiently apparent that it is not the interest of the English people nor the duty of an English Minister to play into the hands of the United States by assenting to the organization of new Governments, which must either become merged in the growing dominions of their powerful neighbours or subsidiary to their designs. It were wiser to wait the time when the conflicting interests of the separate states and the encroachments of the Federal Government shall dissolve an union incompatible with intestine jealousy or foreign dears. The proximity of British possessions and the establishment of British principles in North America will always afford a resort and a protection to those who fear the growth of popular license, and seek an escape from popular turbulence. For this reason, no less than for the preservation of national honour, it is the duty of our Government to see that we secure for our subjects a firm footing, for our laws a permanent validity, on that continent which has been peopled by our countrymen, and governed by the maxims of our constitution. It is not extent, so much as certainty an definitiveness of dominion, that we ought to care for. It insure its fulfillment, without recourse to a conflict which duty and humanity enjoin it to avoid or to defer.

Let us now turn to Mr. Gallatin's second proposal. He would give us all north of 481/2 degrees north latitude, in a line running east from Fuca's Straits to the present recognized line of division. He would reserve for his own country Admiralty Inlet and its sounds, and the sole possession of the Columbia River. Now, the very first thing that strikes us is this:--It has been urged that it would be anomalous or inconvenient to divide Th use of the Columbia River between English and Americans. Supposing (that Americans say) that we retain possession of both banks of the Columbia, how can English vessels pass and repass without danger of collision between the sailors the two Powers? Now, we ask, is there not the same chance of collision between them when the two Powers have an equal right to the navigation of Da Fuca's Straits? To concede an equally divided possession in the straits, and to make such a partition of the adjacent land as shall exclude either of the possessor nations from the harbour of the other, is at least as like to breed frauds and contests as the equal right of navigation in a river. The navigation of the coast is difficult, the threading of the bay is intricate, and it is easy to conceive that in rough weather disputes may arise between American and British seamen as to the right of their respective countries. Each of them have been accustomed to enjoy equal privileges, and to regard themselves equally as masters on these seas and this coast; it will hardly, therefore, be wondered at that they should reciprocally feel exclusion and resistance to be arbitrary and offensive. So that, in truth, the argument against the division of the Columbia would apply with equal strength to the division of the straits and partition of the harbours, with this difference--that if the harbours, with this difference--that if the harbours of Admiralty Inlet, &c., are the best, exclusion from them grounds a greater grievance on our side. But the fact is this,-- partition and division are now matters of expediency. Both parties are sensible that the claims founded on discovery and occupancy are very debatable, and admit of being cited on both sides alike. It is, therefore, the object of both parties to effect such a compromise as shall damnify neither party. now, if we only get one half the harbours in Da Fuca's Straits, and are wholly excluded from the Columbia, a great injury will be done to those of our countrymen who have thereto enjoyed the use of both. But if the harbours which are given to us be the worst, then we are both injured and insulted at once by the arrangement. Our object, we repeat, is not extent of territory. We wish to have our territory accurately defined, in order to prevent heartburnings and quarrels between the colonists of the two nations. But we contend only for the joint use of those privileges which have always been enjoyed in common by both nations, and the exclusive possession of which we feel that we have as much right to as our competitors, and are more able to enforce, if we so choose. But we are unwilling to provoke a war which we know would be unnatural, and hope may be unnecessary. We are willing to cede the title of sovereignty and dominion over the greater part of the Oregon. We only require that the commercial advantages of the country be continued to us. We will not give up to the United States places "restored" to us by Spain. We will not renounce our right to participate in the navigation of that great river which, if not discovered first, was certainly traced furthest by our own people. The joint navigation of the Columbia--and the right of traffic for the Hudson's Bay servants on one band of the river, are, we think, demands neither unjust nor extravagant. Nor do we think that their concession would be incompatible with the reserved sovereignty of the United States in the districts which are washed by the waters of the Columbia. [AEK]

Sir George Clerk, it is stated, will proceed immediately to Calcutta. Major-General Sir George Pollock retires from the Council on account of his health.

The Revolution in Mexico.--In reference to this subject, the news of which had just reached Madrid, El Universal observes, "Now that General Parades represents, according to all appearance, the monarchical feeling indispensable to the restoration of New Spain, our Government is bound to use every effort that the sceptre shall not be seized by any hand but that of a Spanish Prince. The glorious conquest of Mexico in the 16th century was that of Spain; and they were her sons who, for the space of three centuries, ruled that country. The natives of Mexico owe to us the customs and habits which distinguish them, the language they speak, and the Deity they adore. They are our descendants, and they honour themselves with our names. They have always called us brothers. If the fortune of war emancipated them from our rule, the voice of nature has preserved the sympathies they feel towards the nation to which they owe their existence. Let us not doubt it; if in the city of Mexico a throne be raised, and a Spanish Prince occupy it, no other will rival him in authority and influence. For the present, we shall content ourselves with merely offering a suggestion on a question of such importance. We shall at a future period again refer to it, and at greater length." [AEK]

The packet-ship Sheridan, Captain Cornish, arrived in the Mersey this morning from New York, bringing advices from that city to the 5th inst. inclusive.

With regard to the Oregon question, these advices indicate further improvement in the feelings and opinions of the citizens in and out of Congress. Rumours were prevalent that Mr. Pakenham had resumed correspondence with Mr. Buchanan, and had been received with great favour. The democracy entertained more pacific views, and an impression gained ground that a compromise on the basis of the 49th parallel would be effected. In the senate the question had remained in abeyance, but the proceedings of the House of Representatives are highly interesting. On the 2d instant the following resolutions were introduced by Mr. Dargan:--

"That the differences existing between the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain, in relation to the Oregon territory, are still the subject of honourable negotiation and compromise, and should be so adjusted."

And,

"That the lines separating the British provinces of Canada from the United States should be extended due west to the coast south of Fraser's river, and thence through the centre of the Straits of Fuca to the Pacific ocean, giving to the United States that portion of the territory south, and to the Government of Great Britain that portion of the territory north of said line."

By Mr. Tibbalt's,

"1. That the President forthwith cause notice to be given to the Government of Great Britain, and that the President of the United States accompany said notice with an assurance of the sincere desire of the Government of the United States for a speedy and amicable settlement of all disputes between the two Governments in
2. That the President is authorized to repel any and all aggressions upon the commerce of the United States; to resist any attempt which may be made to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over any part of the territory claimed by the United States, and to repel invasions of the same; and, for these purposes, to imply such portions of the militia of the United States as he may deem advisable, agreeably to the provisions of the second and third section of an act entitled 'An Act giving to the president of the United States additional Powers for the Defence of the United States, in certain cases, against Invasion, and for other purposes,' approved the 3d of March, 1839; to accept the services of any number of volunteers, not exceeding, to serve during the war, or for any less period, in the manner provided for by an act entitled 'An Act authorizing the President of the United States to accept the Services of Volunteers, and to raise an additional regiment of dragoons or mounted riflemen,' approved the 23d of May, 1836; to employ the regular military force of the United States, and to expand and increase the same to any number not exceeding men; to complete the public armed vessels now authorized by law, and to equip, man, and employ, in actual service, all the naval force of the United States; and to build, purchase, or charter, arm, equip, and man such vessels and steam-boats as he shall deem necessary for the purposes aforesaid.'

"That the sum of millions of dollars is hereby appropriated and placed at the disposal of the President of the United States, for the purpose of executing the provision before said; to provide for with, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to cause certificates to be issued therefore, agreeably to the provisions of the fifth section of the act aforesaid, approved March 3, 1839."

By Mr. Peltat--

"That the President of the United States forthwith cause notice to be given to the Government of Great Britain, that the convention between the United States of America and Great Britain, that the convention between the United States of American and Great Britain, concerning the territory on the north-west coast of American, west of the Stony or Rocky Mountains, of the 6th day of August, 1827, signed at London, shall be annulled and abrogated 12 months after giving said notice."

And by Mr. G. W. Brown,--

"That, whereas the friendly relations now existing between the United States and Great Britain are in danger of begin interrupted, in consequence of the unsettled claims of the respective countries to the territory lying on the north-west coast of America, west of the Stony Mountains; therefore, with a view to a speedy and amicable settlement of their differences, the President of the United States cause notice to be given to the Government of Great Britain."

A resolution was then offered to terminate the debate on the 9th of February. This was rejected; and the ordinary Oregon debate was resumed by Mr. Thompson.

On the 3d instant, Mr. Black, of South Carolina, introduced a series of resolutions in relation to Oregon, which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. Mr. Dromgoole on leave reported the following bill:--

"Whereas by the convention concluded on the 20th day of October, 1818, between the United States of America and the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, it was, in the 3d article thereof, agreed that any country that may be claimed by either party to the northwest coast of America, westward of the Stony Mountains, shall, together with its harbours, bays and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open for the term of 1 years from the dated of the signature of the present convention, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers, it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim with either of the two high contraction parties may have to any part of the said country; the only object of the high contracting parties in that respect being to prevent disputes and differences among themselves: whereas by a convention between the same party, concluded on the 6th of August, 1827, it was agreed to continue in force for an indefinite period the provision of the 3d article of the convention of the 20th of October, 1818, and was also further agreed and provided that it shall be competent, however, to either of the contracting parties, in case either shall think fit at any time after the 20th October, 1818 and was also further agreed and provided that is shall be competent, however, to either of the contracting parties, in case either shall think fit at any time after the 20th October, 1828, on giving due notice of twelve months tot he other contracting party, to annul abrogate this convention; and it shall in such case be entirely and abrogated after the expiration of said tem notice; and whereas is thought fit on the part of the United States to annul and abrogate said convention--"

"Be it therefore enacted by the Senate and House of representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the said convention shall be annulled and abrogated at the expiration of 12 months after the date of delivery to the Government of Great Britain of the due notice required to be given:
"Be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and required, in such solemn and respectful mode as he may deem proper, to cause the said due notice to be given in the name of the United States, one of the contracting parties, to the Government of Great Britain, the other contracting parties, to the Government of Great Britain, the other contracting party:

"Be it further enacted, that for the purpose of enabling the President to comply herewith, at as early a day as he may think advisable, there be appropriated a sum not exceeding--dollars, to be used, if necessary, and to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but nothing in this act is intended to interfere with the right and discretion of the proper authorities of the two contracting parties to renew or pursue negotiations for an amicable settlement of the controversy respecting the Oregon Territory."

The house then went into committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of the Oregon question.

Mr. Collamer, of Vermont, submitted a resolution, requesting the President to communicate to the house copies of all correspondence that have passed between this Government and that of Great Britain since the date of his last annual message, which was received. The resolution was adopted, and the house adjourned.

The domestic affairs of the Union present no feature worthy of note.

Foreign exchanges were dull. The quotations were, on London 108 to 108 1/2; on Paris, 5.27 to 5.26 1/2. The money-market was easy, and the banks were discounting freely.

The interest on the Pennsylvanian debt had been paid on the 2d inst., but three-fourths in depreciated securities, one quarter only in specie. This policy had given rise to strong complaints.

Freights were scarce, and the rates very low.

There were some indications of the opening of the spring trade.

Canadian accounts report that an increase of 55,000l. will be exhibited in the revenue return of the province for 1845, as compared with the previous year.

Important accounts from the city of Mexico to the 8th., and from Vera Cruz to the 13th of January; had been received, via New Orleans. These advices announce the elevation of Paredes to the Presidency of the republic, and the formation of a Cabinet headed by Almonte. We have no further accounts respecting Mr. Slidell.

AFFAIRS OF MEXICO.

General Paredes and his division entered Mexico yesterday, and at once took possession of the citadel and the principal points of the city. He was not received with the enthusiasm I expected; indeed, I did not hear a single vivat; but I believe that active demonstrations of joy are not consonant to the habits of the people, and that successful revolutions are of too common occurrence in this country to cause excitement of any kind. If we can get over the staring facto f the illegality of Paredes' pronunciamento against a Constitutional Government, we must admit that his conduct in this affair is perfectly irreprouachable. Instead of occupying the apartments of the Palace, which any other conqueror would have done, he retired to his private house, and at once set about the convocation of notables charged with the formation of a provisional Government. He showed a great deal of pluck in getting rid of the clique of notorious public robbers, who aided the pronunciamento in Mexico for their own corrupt purposes. He told them in plain words that he did not make a revolution to place them at the head of the Government, and applied expressions which cannot be translated for "ears polite."

The public were delighted on hearing his unceremonious treatment of these designing men, as from the readiness with which they had seized on the chief off ices of state, and parcelled out the best lots among the band, it was feared that Paredes would not have the means or the power of dislodging them. You must, therefore, consider all lists of Ministers or appointments sent home by the last packet as non avenues, and that up to the present moment Paredes held the supreme power in his hands. He is in hourly communication with the Junta charged with the nomination of an interim President, and though the fact is not yet quite positive, I understand their choice is fixed on General Almonte. Paredes himself declines the Presidency, and as Almonte is a man of the world, of superior intellect, I must consider the selection as the best that could be made.
The provisional Government is to last four months, by which time the National Convention, which they are to convene, will have elected a President and established a permanent form of Government.

Such has been the result of the San Luis pronunciamento, that the whole army has given in its adherence; but it remains to be seen if the civil authorities in the departments at large be equally obedient. On this point opinions are much divided—as, on the one hand, the people are apathetic and indifferent as to how or by whom they are ruled, while, on the other, the interest of the departments is federation, and the country, if it can be moved by anything, it will be by the desire of obtaining that. Some well-informed persons, therefore, contend that the revolution is not yet over, and that though Paredes may hold the capital, his power is but nominal in the departments. It is also hinted that the persons who assisted the movement in Mexico, and whom he has sent to the right-about, are quite capable of calling back Santa Anna, and opposing the influence of that once popular name to the prestige of Paredes. I place very little reliance of the value of the departments, or of the power of the Santa Anna party, but I give these statements for the purpose of showing the many difficulties that lie in the way of the would-be regenerator of his country.

The probability of a war between Mexico and the United States is also a serious impediment to Paredes. Unfortunately for him he has made the willingness to treat with the States a main cause of complaint against the Government of Herrera, and he is almost pledged to commence hostilities; but if he does so, what will be the result? Why—without speaking of the long odds against Mexico in such a contest—the very General who may be placed at the head of a sufficient army marching on Texas will probably pronounce against the Government, as almost every general officer in the Republic does who commands a large body of troops; and if Paredes weakens the capital, the Federalists will take advantage of the fact to get up what they call a popular movement. War with the States is the stumbling-block of Mexico, against which even Paredes has contrived to run his head. In his address to the army he insists on the necessity of at once marching against the usurpers of Texas; and General Valencia, the ad interim President of a day, by way of giving his helping hand to mischief, declares that the presence of the American Minister, Mr. Slidell, in the capital, is an insult to the republic. I am greatly mistaken if the Cabinet of Washington will hear with patience the refusal to receive it’s minister, the avowed purpose of Paredes to march on Texas, and the insulting language of General Valencia; so that I look upon war as imminent, and I hourly expect to hear of the declaration of a blockade, and the occupation of Matamoros.

The great blunder committed by Paredes is this anti-American manifestation, as time and tranquility are essential to him for the rectification of the enormous and numerous abuses that prevail here in every department of state. I am told he is bent on the task, and none but a bold and honest man like him can effect it. I am not able to specify all the abuses that exist, or the various shifts by which the public revenue is turned away from the public service; but I can give a short statement, to show how easily a good result can be obtained by a man determined to secure it. For instance, the whole revenue of Mexico, customs, Excise, and taxation, amounts net to 4,500,000l. to meet the interest of the home and foreign debt. I take the revenue as it now stands, but a reduction of prohibitory duties, the doing away with inland custom-houses, and breaking down monopolies, would give 3,500,000l. more and augment the net revenue to 8,000,000l., from which, if we deduct the 3,000,000l., all sufficient for the ordinary expenditure, we shall have an absolute surplus of 5,000,000l. sterling.

Will it be believed in the face of these figures, which by the wary are not in the least exaggerated, that out of the revenue at present raised, not 2,600,000l. reach the Treasury, the rest being consumed by robbers, money agents, usury, and every species of corruption, and that the estimate of the standing army alone is 4,000,000l.? Yes, for the Mexican army, which counts 30,000 officers to 20,000 soldiers, and in which, of general officers alone, there are, I believe, 500.

The fact is so painful in Mexican finance, stript of the various disguises which corruption has raised about it, that an honest Commander-in-Chief, and a good bank clerk as Minister of Finance would make it one of the most flourishing treasures of the world. President Herrera had not the courage to venture on the broad road of reform, and, therefore, it is fortunate that his mile-and-water Government is at an end,—but Paredes is the man to do it; and, if he be not outmaneuvered by the intriguers of Mexico, he will. It is with the hope of seeing a result so favourable to British holders of Mexico stock, that I have evinced—perhaps for a Briton—too great an inclination to the unconstitutional proceedings of Paredes. But, of what use are forms when the substance is rotten, and what great moral revolution has ever been effected without the prominent agency of one distinguished man? I do not know Paredes personally, and I hear many faults attributed to him which are inconsistent with true greatness, but I am struck by his integrity, which is unimpeachable, and his abnegation of power at a moment when he is the master of the whole country and may dispose of its wealth and dominion as he pleases.

Herrera, the late Ministers, and the Commander-in-Chief made a most ignoble termination of their career. It is true they had treason in the camp, and that their apparently most violent partisans were wishing secretly for Paredes; but their inefficient measures almost invited treason, and I cannot learn anything they did during the 15 days of preparation but expend money on ridiculous fortification that would not have held out five minutes. Had they one smart man among them, they might cut off Paredes, when he advanced within ten leagues of the city with only 400 horse, leaving even the most advanced of his troops two days' march behind him. The Senate and the Chamber of Deputies gave up the ghost in the same manner. After all their protests, not a member was to be found at the hour of danger. In truth, the apathy of the Government invited defection, and no one seemed inclined to help those who would not help themselves. It is truly ridiculous to see the walls of Mexico still barricaded with enthusiastic manifestos against Paredes, and to observe the men who signed them foremost in the conqueror's suite. But here there is no feeling when politics are concerned, and every one applauds the man who turns round at the proper moment. The officer sent by Herrera to summon Paredes to an immediate surrender under pain of death, traveled with Paredes in his carriage one or two stages, and I have no doubt he would bear a similar message to the former president from his new mast to-morrow. Heaven help the country where this is no political principle, and no political shame!

I must say that Herrera maintained his personal dignity to the last, and that, though fallen, he is as much respected as before. The following is the address he published on abdicating the presidency:--

"Fellow countrymen--Raised to the supreme magistracy of the republic by the free and unanimous vote of the people. I have fulfilled the programme of administration exhibited by me solemnly before the Congress on the 16th of September last. Persuaded that the observance of constitutional order is the only means of securing the peace and felicity of a nation, I have invariably performed that duty; and true to my oaths, I have followed no other guide in my administration, but the exact fulfillment of the laws. I promoted all the useful reforms which I submitted to congress for examination. I enforced economy, and a careful collection of the public revenue. I respected the independence of judicial authority; and, in a word, I bestowed on all classes of society the same protection. All the acts of my administration are before you, and I am satisfied that the nation will not accuse them of injustice or illegality.

"The army of reserve, commanded by General Paredes, proclaimed in San Luis Potosi a plan destructive of our national institutions. He has been seconded by fractions of the army in other places whence accounts have been received, with the exception of San Luis, have declared solemnly against him, and adhered to the established order of things. the Government lost no time in taking measures to place the capital in a state of defence; but this morning the garrison of Mexico has proclaimed a plan somewhat different from that of General Paredes, and all having deserted it, the Government is left without the means of resistance. Therefore, and not wishing that any person should serve as the pretext for the shedding of Mexican blood, or for injury to the fortunes of our fellow-citizens, I have sent to the Chamber the formal resignation of the supreme command.
I separate myself from it, protesting at the same time in face of the nation, against both these plans and against all others that derange constitutional order. The consequences of civil war shall not weigh against the government, as it in no manner provoked them. I leave the nation to judge of the acts of your fellow citizen.

"JOSE JOAQUIN DE HERRERA, MEXICO, 30th Dec. 1845."

I must not omit at the same time to give you the address published by Paredes yesterday, on taking the city.
It is as follows:

"Soldiers--I congratulate you that, without effusion or blood, you have consummated the great work which your enthusiasm commenced at San Luis and I have the satisfaction to salute you in the capital of the republic.

"Soldiers--you have performed a sacred duty in uniting cordially so save the country from the evils of anarchy. The nation admires, and will so recognize the service you have done it. Your generals and officers are now arranging the political principles adopted in San Luis, in order that the vacuum indispensably left out of respect for public opinion, and due regard to the rights of the people, shall be adequately filled up.

"Mexicans--In leading the army to the capital I have no other view but the good of the country. I offer you all guarantees of society until a Junta, named in the most popular manner, shall appoint the ad interim Government, charged to watch over your interests, and to convocate the extraordinary congress which is given to the nation to constitute and secure its facility.

"Mexicans--I entreat you to wait with that patience worthy of true republicans, and to place full confidence in the chief of any army which offers all the guarantees of order and peace."

"Mexico, Jan. 2, 1846.

"MARIANO PAREDES.

The intentions of General Paredes are well known; but some mystery hangs over those of the heads of the church and several leading personages who have been working for some time past on her behalf. It is said they are determined on converting Mexico into a monarchy, and that one of Royal family of Spain is to have the offer of the Crown. The peace of the city has not been disturbed for a moment, and so anxious are the people to give in there adhesion to Paredes, that I saw the chiefs of many noble families, senators, and deputies, who, a few days since, signed formal protests against him, this day going in grand toilette to a levee he held at his private house.

The American Minister has not yet left us, as a military escort all the way to Jalapa cannot be arranged.
We are most uneasy on the subject of Mexican affairs, and I have every reason to dread an immediate blockade of the Gulf ports, if not the taking of Matamoros.

It is said that Puebla pronounces for federation, and that the people are armed.
The congress is dissolved.

America.
The Oregon question.
Liverpool, Monday Evening.

By the packet-ship Patrick Henry we have received New York advices to the 9th ult. Inclusive.

These advices contain the following outlying of the correspondence which has passed since the 1st of December last between Mr. Pakenham and Mr. Buchanan, the American Secretary of State, and with Mr. M'Lane, on the Oregon question, from which it will be perceived, that the twice repeated offer of the British Minister to decide the whole question by arbitration has been rejected, and that the extreme pretensions advanced by Mr. Polk in his inaugural message are now again enunciated. The full correspondence has not yet reached us. It is however, looked for hourly, a clipper schooner, of large tonnage, having sailed in company with the Patrick Henry for this port, supposed to bring despatches for Government.

The following is the outline referred to:--

Washington, Feb. 7.

A message was received from the President of the United States, covering the correspondence which has transpired since August last, upon the subject of our foreign relations. The President states that the correspondence is furnished in answer to the resolutions.

The first letter is dated Dec. 13, 1845, and is addressed by Mr. Buchanan to our Ambassador at the Court of St. James. He desires Mr. M'Lane to call upon the Earl of Aberdeen, in order to procure the reasons of the warlike preparations then making by England. Mr. M'Lane is also required to give his own opinions as to these preparation.

January 3, 1846, Mr. M'Lane answers, that on the day after the receipt of Mr. Buchanan's he called upon the Earl of Aberdeen, by whom he was received with great kindness. It being difficult to obtain a categorical answer to questions upon so delicate a subject as this, Mr. M'Lane put his questions frankly, and received frank answers. Definite and precise information was not expected. The Earl of Aberdeen, however, informed him that the preparations making for defence had reference to the possibility of a rupture—that they were commenced before any difficulties between England and the United States—they, however, had no particular reference to the possibility of such a rupture—that they were commenced before any difficulties between the two countries were remotely apprehended—that they would have been made had not the difficulties between the two countries existed—they he believed the nature of these preparation shad been overstated—that they had no reference to the defence of remote places, but to all places peculiarly exposed. They were defences proper in time of peace to meet the possible dangers of war, and such as every prudent nation would make for the security of his own Government. In conclusion, he again declares that the defences made and making have no immediate reference to the United States.

For himself, Mr. M'Lane says, his opinions are that the preparations have no immediate reference to the United States. They originated, in his judgement, in the state of affairs in Europe. Mr. M'Lane says that his interview confirmed him in the unabated confidence he had before entertained in the frankness and straightforwardness of the Earl of Aberdeen. Mr. M'Lane further says that he is not prepared to state how far the United States have a right to demand a disclaimer form England in making preparations for the deviance of the country. As to the defences made, it is to us, in the even of a rupture, immaterial what their object may have been. We should feel their full force, whether made for one object of another. England will exert her utmost power, and to the utmost of her ability, to inflict injury upon us in case of war.

On the 27th of December, 1845, Mr. Pakenham sends a letter to Mr. Buchanan, in which he says, that under instructions from his Government, he now renewably offers to refer the question of the disputed part of the territory to any Sovereign State which may be jointly agreed upon by the two Governments. It is argued that the effects of this reference will be conducive to the best interests of the two countries—that it would have been better for both had the United States previously accepted it. The fact that England consents to renew the offer affords proof to the world of the fact that she still retains the highest confidence in her own claims, and of her sincere desire to preserve the peace between both countries.

Mr. Pakenham, in the same letter, speaks of the smallness of the territory disagreed about, compared with the importance of preserving the friendly relations between two such Governments as England and the
On the 3d of January, 1846, Mr. Buchanan replies, that as the proposition submitted merely names a partition of the territory in dispute, to be referred to the powers of arbitration, and not the question of title, he cannot consent to such an arbitration. The very terms of the proposition received would exclude arbitration upon the question of title to the whole territory which is here claimed by the United States. The President, he says, does not believe that arbitration would lead to a clearance of difficulties; upon the contrary, he thinks it would involve the two countries in new difficulties. In conclusion, the President expresses the hope that the present aspect of this question may not lead to a disturbance of the friendly relations so happily existing between the two countries.

Mr. Pakenham makes two answers to this letter. In the first, he says he will submit the reply of Mr. Buchanan to his Government, and in a letter, dated January 16, he says that he has reflected upon the letter of Mr. Buchanan, dated the 3d, declining, for reasons named, to accept arbitration in the form proposed. He now wishes to state to the American Secretary of State, that England has claims to the Oregon territory wholly incompatible with the exclusive claim set up by the United States. But supposing the British Government would consent to refer the entire question of title to arbitration; thus removing the form of reference objected to by Great Britain, he wished to know if it would be accepted by the United States; and if there should be objections to the reference to a crowned head, he submitted that it might be made to a mixed commission, with an umpire, or to a board of Commissioners of legal ability, and in whom there should be a mutual confidence. If such reference should result in a disagreement as to an equitable division of the territory, would the United States agree upon the division which might be recommended?

Mr. Buchanan, in a letter dated the 4th of February, answers this letter. He says at first that the last clause named would prevent the acceptance of arbitration, if presented in the form which had been named. The United States, if it would consent to arbitrate at all, would never consent to submit to any other question than that of title. A reason is then given why the United States, will admit of such an arbitration. Our claims are referred to again, and the whole disputed territory claimed again by the President. The question is presented as offering a very different amount of importance from that between us and England. There were 13 degrees of boundary upon the Pacific, and but one good harbour, near the 49th degree of north latitude. The territory would make many valuable states, will to England they would be a matter of small advantage. To no Power, however intelligent or respectable, nor to any body of citizens, could the United States consent to refer a claim of a character like that she possesses to the Oregon country.

The correspondence having been read, was immediately referred to the committee of the whole and ordered to be printed. The proceedings of Congress in the interval since the departure of our dispatches by the Sheridan were important. The discussion on the Navy Increase Bill had been resumed on the 5th ultimo. Mr. Westcott advocated the measure as one peaceful in its tendencies. The Senate adjourned, on the termination of his address, to Monday, the 9th ultimo. The Oregon debate would commence on the Tuesday. The debate in the House of Representatives had continued until the 5th ult.; then, after three several divisions, it was determine that a vote should be taken on the following Monday. The speeches present no features worthy of note.

The House having called for information respecting the relations of the Union with Mexico, a message from the President may shortly be expected.

Mr. Bancroft, the Secretary of the Navy, in reply to the chairman of the committee on the naval affairs, had transmitted to the Senate, on the 6th ult., a letter requiring larger appropriations for the navy than was contemplated, in consequence of the condition of the foreign relations of the country. He especially urges the accumulation of stores in the naval depots, and the increase of the number of steamers fit to cruise at sea.

Commercial accounts are unimportant, the operations of commerce having been violently disturbed by the publication of the Oregon correspondence.

Our Canadian accounts are unimportant.

We learn from Yucatan that the alliance with Mexico had been thrown off.

The above outline of this extraordinary correspondence having reached new York but shortly before the departure of the packet-ship, we have yet received but few comments of the American journals upon it.

"This correspondence," says the Courier and Enquirer of the 9th ult.,--

"Is of very high importance, and diminishes very much the grounds upon which we have been hoping for a peaceful solution of pending difficulties. It will be seen by our correspondent's letter, that our Government had declined to accept an offer of arbitration, made in two different forms by Great Britain, and that, too, upon the very offensive ground that to accept it would be to admit that Great Britain had rights in Oregon, and that the British Government has informed our Minister at London, that her military preparation, though not commenced with special reference to that question. The whole matter, not only with reference to pacific settlement, but with regard to the honourable and defensible positions of this country, seems now to be in the worst possible position."

"Has now reached a most important crisis. According to the best information, there is not doubt that negotiations, which have been re-opened at Washington by Mr. Pakenham, will result, probably in good time, upon a basis of compromise similar to the offer which had been twice made by the United States, but which had been refused by England. The position of England within the last few years has compelled the Government of that country to moderate some of the conditions on which her various negotiator planted themselves, and to meet in a more compromising spirit the propositions heretofore offered by the United States. But while England has, by the change of time and the gradual progress of affairs, been led to the necessity of coming nearer to a point of settlement in the matter, the United States, from the course of public opinion and the growth of natural events, have been reducing farther form their former opinions, and limiting a greater extent of territory in that region. It is now said, on such authority as will satisfy reasonable men, that Mr. Pakenham has received full power from his Government to open negotiations, either on the old basis of the proposition which was formerly offered by Mr. Gallatin, or on nearly the same as that offered by Mr. Buchanan.

It is further said, that while the British negotiator approximates the offer made by the United States, the United States are receding, and the Government actually has been deliberating to insist upon having the whole territory, down 54[degrees]40[degrees], and have, therefore, refused the offer of the British Government to arbitrate, and will take the chance of accomplishing their purposes by future events and contingencies. In the mean time, Mr. Pakenham will send the last correspondence, by express, to London, and bide his time to make perhaps another proposition, a most important and delicate crisis in the affairs of Oregon. The United States have now, through the action of our Government, reached the turning point of the century in our foreign relations. This country will have been an independent nation 70 years on the next 4th of July. It is now a full-grown power of the civilized world, exercising a most important influence on all the Christian nations of the earth, both in peace and war--in civilization, commerce, and everything that can benefit the human race. It is important, therefore, that the Government of such a country should take such a position, and adopt such a course of conduct, as will tend to promote the happiness of the human family, and command the respect of nations. It is evident that the Oregon negotiation has now reached a crisis from which will spring the turning point in the destinies of the human family. If peace be secured by reasonable compromise between the two leading countries of the world, we may presume upon a long career of prosperity, religion, intelligence, literature, and everything that can benefit or delight civilization. In a state of peace, we are the rivals of the greatest nation of the Old World. We are also the leading spirit of the age, in all political and religious reforms. Our example will tend to produce great rational and peaceful reforms in the Old World, and, in process of time, change society, religion, and government, throughout all the nations of Europe. The conflict will be continued, but it is a conflict of peace. It is the war of mind, of morals, and of intellect--the campaign of genius; and not that of rude and barbarous arms, and the elements of death. Such is the prospect in the event of a peaceable termination of this controversy. On the other hand, if by any influence a change should occur--if the United States Government should throw themselves upon the whole of their rights, and insist upon having the whole of the Oregon territory, down to 54[degrees]40', as they apparently seem disposed to do--then the course of things will be entirely different;--excitement in our own country--alarm abroad--everything that can provoke the two nations gradually to put themselves in a hostile attitude to each other, will be encouraged by the circumstance of the time, and the estrangement of the two Governments; the consequences of which would be a tremendous political struggle throughout the country, and a complete revolution in parties. In due course of time, the example of the United States, on American and Europe, according to the inevitable laws of nature, would produce a change in Government, and a revolution in dynasties, which the reforming spirits of the age in this country would seek through war, battle, fire, and the sword. Thus, the refusal to submit to reasonable terms, and to persist in the whole of our claims to Oregon, would naturally lead to a hostile feeling in both countries, which, by little and little, would lead to war of the most desperate kind. It will be seen, therefore, that the position of the Oregon question is most important, as regards the future history of this country and of the world. If reasonable terms be offered and accepted, we may have years of peace before us, during which we may cultivate the attainment of those arts which are of the highest benefit to civilization. On the other hand, if the approaches of the British negotiator continue to be repelled, and our Government believe that the mass of the people would sustain them in insisting upon claiming up to 54[degrees]40', that mighty fact would lead to events of the most exciting character, far different from those that would grow out of peaceful relations. All eyes will be turned towards Washington during this negotiation, in order to discover from the decision what the probable history of the country and civilization for centuries hereafter may be." [AEK]

The rejection of the renewed proposition for terminating the Oregon dispute by arbitration has not take any one by surprise; but this proceeding on the part of the English Minister at Washington has enabled him to renew the negotiation which had been suspended since his absolute refusal of Mr. Buchanan's last scheme of adjustment. It appears, indeed, from the dates of the last communications received by the packet-ship Patrick Henry, that the Oregon question had reached a most important criticism which could not fail to remove all uncertainty within a very few days. On the 29th of January the Senate had adopted a resolution of inquiry as to the state of negotiations. No answer was given to that resolution for several days; and, in fact, the final reply of Mr. Buchanan on the subject of arbitration was not made until the 4th of February. On the 7th a message from the President was sent down to congress, together with the whole diplomatic correspondence which had been exchanged between the British and American Governments since last December. Meanwhile, the House of Representatives had resolved that the debate on the question of giving notice should be terminated by them before 3 p.m. on Monday, the 9th ult.; because the senate was expected to resume the adjourned debate on The principle question for us to decide--the point upon which it is essential for us to arrive at a clear and correct conviction--is simply what are the bona fide intentions of the American Government. As to the views and intentions of England, we presume than not uncertainty can be alleged, even by our opponents, to exist. Adhering firmly to rights which have been recognized and confirmed by several treaties, and which are now connected with the mercantile and personal interests of British subjects, we, nevertheless, have invariably professed our readiness to submit these rights to any equitable arrangement, either as a voluntary compromise of under the award of an arbiter. The difficulty on the side of England has never been a difficulty on the side of England has never been a difficulty of principle, but of detail and application. On the side of the United States there has been a much more devious course, more undefined pretensions, and more suspicious designs. Even when the American Ministers have proposed a species of compromise, they have only done so as if it were a dereliction of public duty and a surrender of the acknowledged rights of the Union. They offered to give up what they have not got, and have never held, as if they were sacrificing a portion of New England; and they propose, a species of compromise, a plan which would expel the agents of the Hudson's Bay Company out of territories and hunting-grounds which they alone have occupied ever since they have been trodden by civilized man. More or less openly avowed, more or less boldly asserted, the intention of all American policy on this question has been the acquisition of the whole territory in dispute. If both parties had honestly and sincerely sought a compromise, a compromise would infallibly have been effected, and may be effected yet. But, instead of that auspicious prospect, Mr. Buchanan has declared, that "if the United States would consent to arbitrate at all, they would never consent to submit to any other question than that of title." As if the very fact of arbitration, like the fact of the actual offers of partition which they have repeatedly made, was not a conclusive admission of the imperfection of title by both parties, which leaves nothing to be determined but the relative value of the conflicting claims!

We cannot persuade ourselves, therefore, that we thoroughly comprehend the intentions of the American Government, or if we comprehend them, it is in a sense which belies the occasional moderation of its language. Whilst the British government has been calmly continuing the preparations which were thought necessary to place the naval establishments of the country on a most efficient footing, contenting itself with the resolute but reserved intimation given to both Houses of Parliament last spring by the Ministers of the Crown, the extreme moderation of its language may have been as much misinterpreted upon the banks of the Potomac as upon the banks of the Sutlej, and in both cases we may pay the penalty of an excessive forbearance. To the Cabinet of Washington we have offered a compromise under forms which the haughtiest Power on the earth might and would have accepted. To the people of America we offer the advantages of a system of free-trade, not, as is suggested by one of our correspondents, within the stipulations of a commercial treaty, or as the purchase-money of a settlement of Oregon, but as the spontaneous and enlightened act of the first mercantile nation in the world. To such measures as these they have hitherto responded by a narrow, grasping policy, or by captious objections which indicate the petty motives in which they originate. We are solicitous for the maintenance of peace and the welfare of mankind; they are intent on the chances of the next Presidential election; and if war appears likely to contribute to the success of a candidate, his party would not scruple to wage war upon the human race. Happily for the chances of peace, we must still believe that war would not only be prejudicial but fatal to the party which should render it inevitable. Mr. Calhoun's meritorious exertions in the cause of peace will, we trust, not only be rewarded by success now but by higher honours and a more extended influence hereafter. But he has to deal with ungenerous rivals and insincere allies. The Government to whish he give a partial support cannot command his confidence or esteem; and Mr. Polk's conduct has certainly tended to embitter the question on the eve of the great debate, which has by this time probably terminated in the abrogation of the existing convention. [AEK] aggravated by the notice. But this resolution having been irrevocably taken, the peace of the world depends upon the next step which may be set along this slippery path. Is Mr. Polk now prepared to reopen the negotiation on an admissible basis, or must we infer from his silence that the settlement of this question is not the really object of his policy, but that he entertains very different designs, which the next twelve months will dislike to the world?

In贵宾 the causes which guide human conduct and govern the destinies of the world, there is unhappily a very wide distinction to be drawn between good reasons and probable motives: and the history of the defiencies and disasters which befal mankind is nothing more than the result of the preponderance which the worst incentives sometimes acquire over the best convictions. That form of government is undoubtedly safest and wisest which is best able to preserve the balance of a temperate and reactional policy from the accidents of passion and popular delusion. But the more a Government tends to the extreme of despotic power democratic license, the less can we rely upon this salutary control, and the more reason have we to dread the predominance of its inane impulses over its sane reasons and its true interests. The other day, when the Governor-General of India doubted the intentions of the Sikh army, and affirmed that they would not cross the Sutlej, until he was actually apprised that their whole force had taken up a strong position on the left bank of the river, his opinion was formed on reasons which would have been conclusive if they had applied to a rational Government and prudent General, but which were false with reference to the sots and strumpets of Lahore and to the Sirdars of that licentious camp. Sir Henry Hardinge miscalculated the course of event by giving the enemy credit for more self-control and for less fool-hardiness than the Sikhs really possessed. They were, no doubt mistaken in the objects and prospects of their invasion, but it required three days of frightful slaughter to convince them that they had better have stayed at home.

The same remark may be applied, matatus matandis, to the attitude which has now been assumed towards this country by the Cabinet and Congress of the United States. Excellent, innumerable, and unanswerable arguments and wickedness of a war between the United states and Great Britain—the immense disproportion between the forces of the contending Powers—the close relation of their common interests—the worthlessness of the territory in dispute—the enormous injury which war must inflict on the states engaged in it, and may possibly on the whole world—and the infamy which such a catastrophe must heap upon the heads of the accidental statesmen and the popular dupes by whom alone it is provoked. Nothing can be truer, nothing more certain; but is it ascertained that truth and reason are exclusively the guiding lights of the policy of Mr. Polk?
Must we not rather argue against truth and against reason, if we would arrive at a correct calculation of his perseverance? From the portentous declaration contained in his inaugural address down to the very last act of his Government, which was to heap fuel upon an angry debate by the precipitate publication of the negotiation so lately renewed by Mr. Pakenham, every part of his conduct has evinced a direct tendency to war, which we have only treated lightly, because it seemed, in spite of himself, to be utterly incredible/ the good reasons against war are so evident to the public in this country and throughout Europe, --and the bad motives which may lead to war are so obscure, so peculiarly American, and in part so nefarious, that we have never condescended to acknowledge that the cause of peace could be sacrificed to such considerations. But, since the repeated messages and the public acts of the President have thrown off all disguise, and rejected every alternative, he must be judged of as a man actuated by the most deplorable motives, and who can only be arrested in his disastrous career by the reaction which the consequences of his policy must occasion. No doubt that reaction will occur; it is the rettributive punishment of the excesses of democratic governments; but we are compelled to add, that it seldom acts with sufficient energy and opportunity to prevent them; and it is more likely to pursue Mr. Polk’s Administration that to restrain it in its course. At present, the recent votes of Congress have placed the game in his hands.

An American President is raised for a limited period to the exercise of a limited power. As nothing but impeachment can shorten the duration of his term to office, whilst it may be doubled by his re-election, he has a strong inducement to play the highest stakes of ambition, to repay a hundredfold to his party the support which that party has given him, and to make all the power he enjoys, and all the interests of the state, contribute to this personal and party object. The outbreak of war, and especially of a war, and especially of a war which has been rendered popular by artful appeals to the passions of the democratic party, is the only event which can suddenly enlarge the powers of the executive Government in the United States. It places at once at the disposal of the Administration immense sums of money, loan contracts, army and navy contracts, and military and naval patronage on a great scale. The whole people are constrained to concur in strengthening and concentrating the forces of the executive power; and in the excitement of success, or the terrors of defeat, they become alike insensible to the effects of measures which would be regarded at another time as dangerous inroads on their freedom. Mr. Polk probably does not aim at any serious encroachment on the liberties of the United States; but we have no doubt that he does aim at securing, by every possible means, the unbounded ascendancy of the democratic party. If war be possible, if its horrors and disgrace are to be inflicted on the world, there is not a man in either hemisphere who will not clearly know that such a war could only be caused by the democratic party in America, and for the supposed interests of that party. That execrable motive, that false and deluded policy, may, we are told, prevail over all the higher considerations which stand forth so prominently before that he who runs may read. We disbelieve it, for we refuse to attribute to our own American descendants, in this civilized age, a conduct which was discredited even in the barbarians of the Sikh camp.
But the resistance to this dangerous and alarming tendency must not be looked for in the Cabinet of Washington; it can only arise amongst the American people. upon them the hopes of peace now rest. The courage of moderation is the rarest of all courage in popular states, but the tone of the greater part of the press in the United States has of late much improved, and we trust the nation will pause to weigh the consequences of the resolution which has just been carried. The guarded and dignified expressions of the Queen’s speech, the temperate language of the Government, the opinion delivered by Lord John Russell at Glasgow, the free trade measures of Sir Robert Peel, and the attitude which has been assumed by France for the maintenance of a strict neutrality in this dispute, implying her disapproval of the aggressive and warlike policy of the American Government, are all important circumstances which cannot fail to act on public opinion in America. They were not known there upon the 9th of February. The next step upon the path of Mr. Polk has hitherto pursued must be one of active preparation for war. Congress must be prepared to give into the hands of the rashest Government which ever assembled at the White-house the means of sustaining the most formidable and the most wanton conflict the Union has ever engaged in. The real pressure of danger will then be felt; and at the same time easy and honourable means of preserving the amicable relations of the two countries will lie open to the choice of the people. If in that choice they err, the curse of all that may ensue will rest upon their country. [AEK]

The latest intelligence received from the army of the Sutlej is dated January 19. No official information has been received of any action having taken place since the 22d of December between the British troops and the Sikh force.

We received yesterday, via Havre, New York papers to the 16th ult., four days later than our last previous advices. They bring, however, little intelligence of interest. The Oregon question, having as our last accounts informed us, been decided in the House of Representatives, was discussed in the Senate on the 12gh ult. Mr. Clayton, who is in favour of giving notice to England for the terminations of the joint occupancy of that territory, was the chief speaker, and at the close of the sitting the further discussion of the subject was adjourned until the 16th ult. The papers thus received publish at length the late correspondence between Mr. Pakenham and Mr. Buchanan: but the precis of these documents which appeared in our impression of Tuesday last was so ample and correct that it is unnecessary to inflict them upon our readers. [AEK]

The Oregon Question

In the way of concession and of argument on the Oregon question, little now remains to be said or done by the British Government. The strongest desire has been repeatedly expressed on our side to terminate this controversy. Our case has been stated with such moderation, and our claims confined to such narrow limits, that nothing but extreme presumption, or rather a species of hostile infatuation, on the part of the American Democrats, could lead them to suppose we should make any further abatement of our rights. We are in actual possession of rather more of the Oregon territory than we have ever claimed as our own, because as long as the joint occupancy lasts the concurrent right of both parties extend over the whole country. We have at our disposal ample means of defending our rights. We had never, at any period in the history of this country, less reason to recoil from a war, or to fear the result of a contest with any Power, but more especially with the United States. Yet we, on our side, have strenuously and sincerely labored to effect a compromise. We have not alluded to the superiority of our maritime strength; from a misplaced respect for the American Government, no use has been made of those blunt arguments to which alone they now appear to be accessible; until at length we learn with more contempt than surprise, that Mr. Polk and his advisers are embarking in a course which can only lead, if they are allowed to persevere in it, to aggressive hostilities.

In our zeal for the maintenance of peace, and our deference for a nation with which we have so much in common, we have gone so far as to admit that their claim to the Oregon territory is equal to our own, and to argue that a partition is the fairest solution of the difficulty. The Americans, however, are not to be satisfied until they convert this concession of a part into a surrender of the whole. Their claim is, to say the most of it, not better than our own, since they themselves do not dare to submit to the arbitration of a third party, knowing that the public opinion of the world has already pronounced against it. Yet from this most imperfect and controvertible claim they seek to extract twice as much as we contend for -nay, they raise their own pretensions to absolute and total sovereignty, whilst they altogether annihilate the rights we have practically enjoyed for more than half a century. Thus in fact, the question in dispute has never been brought to a true issue. The two quantities have not been reduced to a common denomination; they differ in their very nature; and whilst our position not only admits of a compromise, but suggests and requires it, theirs is utterly at variance with the first principle of such an agreement. Mr. Buchanan's last note says too much, unless indeed it says inadvertently what is the truth; for the arguments by which he endeavors to show that the United States cannot submit their claim to arbitration, are equally cogent to prove that their claim will not admit even of negotiation. Mr. Buchanan appears to forget that the United States have negotiated; that he himself, by his last proposal, for the fourth or fifth time conceded that point; that the House of Representatives, by their second resolution, have in fact sanctioned the principle of negotiation, which is, in other words, the principle of mutual concessions. When the American Secretary of State says he cannot do what the manifest interest and dignity of the two countries require, he must either mean that the Government to which he belongs will not do it, or that the Government is acting under the compulsion of the party, excited to madness on this question, which carried Mr. Polk's election. The practical question for us is to ascertain the intentions of the American Government. If Mr. Polk and his advisers are sincerely pacific, they cannot but succeed: there is no obstacle, no impediment, no difficulty in the way, except those which they have themselves created. To bring about a war with us under such circumstances, they must be the worst statesmen in the world if they do not seek it, or the
We are informed by the prodigious volume of American statistics recently prepared for both Houses of Parliament by the diligence of Mr. Mac Gregor, that the standing army of the United States consists of one regiment of dragoons, one regiment of riflemen, four companies of artillery, and eight regiments of infantry. The whole number of troops now in the service is 9,847, exclusive of 781 commissioned officers. An act of Congress of 1842 reduced the rank and file of the army 3,920 men; this reduction is now proceeding, and when it is completed the standing army will consist of 7,590 non-commissioned officers, musicians, artificers, and privates. It is true, that if this corps should appear rather small for the defence of the United States, and the invasion of a region situated 2,000 miles off, on the other side of the American continent, its number at least, have excited the envy of Xerxes or Bonaparte. The Army Register for 1843 contains the appalling announcement, that this multitude of host is commanded by 627 generals, 2,670 general staff officers, 13,813 field officers, 44,933 company officers, being in all 62,205 officers; nor are the forces under their command consist of 1,385,645 men! For the purposes of defence against a foreign invasion we have no doubt that these American citizens would exert themselves creditably. A considerable number of the younger men may even volunteer to take a part in offensive operations. But we have no hesitation in saying that to bring an efficient army of even 30,000 men into the field, prepared to march beyond their own frontiers, is the most arduous task which has ever devolved upon the Federal Government of the United States, and with its present powers and resources we believe it to be absolutely impracticable.

The navy of the United States consists of 11 ships of the line, two of which are afloat, three are receiving ships, and six on the stocks or under repairs. The 14 first-class frigates of 44 guns are the best part of the fleet; of these four are on the stocks and three ordinary. The two 36-gun frigates are old. The smaller vessels are 17 sloops of war, 8 brigs, 9 schooner, and 6 steamers. The navy list contains 67 captains, 94 commanders, 324 lieutenants, and 133 passes midshipmen, 410 midshipmen, and 31 masters. No estimate can be formed of the real strength of the crews of the American navy, because it is well known that a considerable proportion of this fleet is manned by British seamen, who are attracted by the high pay of the American navy in time of peace. But that very circumstance shows the extreme difficulty of manning an American fleet in war, and especially in a war with England their ships are, in fact, worked to a great extent by English mercenaries, a large proportion of whom would unquestionably return to their own colours on the outbreak of hostilities.

We content ourselves with this simple enumeration of the forces of the United States by land and by sea, which we hope is correct. We know not what course Mr. Polk may intend to pursue after the notice for the abrogation of the treaty of join occupation has been duly given; and we shall await with more curiosity than alarm the enterprises which may be projected for the purpose of expelling British subjects form a district where we happen to command the coast and the interior, the Indians and the forts. The world is perfectly aware that England is not the attacking party, and that we are content to leave matters in Oregon as they now are. If the Americans mean anything, they mean to dispossess us of what we hold. At the same time, if this intention be avowed by the Cabinet of Washington, or if it be disclosed by votes of money and warlike preparations which imply a fixed determination to engage in the is absurd and flagitious contest, no state is bound to wait to be attacked. Mr. Polk has already instructed the American Minister in London to ask for an explanation of activity in our dockyards. His own conscience might have given it to him; his own language has put us upon the defensive: and although the termination of the convention of 1827 by notice is no casus belli, yet the disposition indicated by that notice, and the means which may be taken to carry that disposition into effect, may hereafter furnish ample ground of suspicion, of remonstrance, and finally hostilities. A bold and manly course on the part of the British Government will probably not be without a good effect in the United States; and it will undoubtedly command the unanimous support of the people of England. LT London Times: March 10, 1846, p6/c Mexico, affairs of

I wrote you on the 1st that Paredes had successfully accomplished his revolution; and on the 3d, that he entered the city with the whole of his division, and that once commenced the good work of reform by sending to the right about several suspicious characters, some of whom were connected with the late Ministry, and others who had joined in the pronunciamento in the hope of making the military chief their instrument and dupe. I am glad to say that Paredes still continues the same efficient and unsparing course, and that he has established a Ministry in all respects approved by the people, and well disposed to carry out the plans indicated by him. I can only observe once act of inconsistency on his part, namely, the acceptance of the ad interim Presidency; but his friends say that the dignity was forced on him, and that he had no other means of concluding the great object for which he pronounced in San Luis. This excuse may be well-founded, but Paredes should have struck out of his manifesto and correspondence those passages in which he renounced all personal elevation or advantage, or adhered to the letter and spirit of his promises and placed the Presidency in other hands; but putting aside the inconsistency, so far as the author of the revolution is concerned, it is fortunate for the country that Paredes is at the head of affairs, as there is every reason to believe that an underplot was formed in the midst of the general conspiracy for throwing him over the moment he accomplished the downfall of the late...
Government. Had this plot succeeded, the position of the republic would have become disastrous, and a fatal civil war commenced between the old leaders of corruption and the Federalists; but Paredes's straightforward and decided conduct has set at rest both parties, and he is now going on unfettered in all respects, apparently determined to renovate the nation.

To follow the regular order of things, I should state that a Junta of Notables was held on the 3d inst. at the Palace, and that the following additional articles to the plan of San Luis Potosi were agreed on by it:--

"1. The persons charged with the legislative and executive powers are suspended in the exercise of their functions, in consequence of not having corresponded to the wishes of the nation, and not having supported the dignity or secured the integrity of its territory, in accordance with the first and second articles of the plans of San Luis Potosi of the 14th of December, 1845.

"2. A junta of representatives, composed of two persons from each department, named by the General-in-Chief of the army, shall immediately elect the person charged with the supreme executive power until the meeting of an extraordinary Congress, which is to be called in accordance with the 3d article of the plan of San Luis.

"3. The junta of representatives shall be dissolved as soon as the ad interim President be elected and sworn to sustain the independence of the nation, the popular representative republican system, and the existing administrative plan of the republic.

"4. The faculties of the ad interim President are determined by the actual laws, he having no power to exceed them except for the defence of the national territory, and even then they are to be subject to the guarantees established by existing laws.

"5. The Ministers of the ad interim President are responsible for their acts before the first constitutional Courts, but the acts themselves are at no period revisable.

"6. Within eight days of his acceptance of office the ad interim President shall issue warrants for the convocation of an extraordinary Congress, which is to meet in four months in the capital of the republic; and until the constitution be determined by that congress, he shall not touch or alter the principles adopted by the interim regulations of the existing Constitution.

"7. The existing Council of State shall be maintained, and the ad interim President will consult it on all important occasion.

"8. Such functionaries only of the departments who may oppose the regeneration of the republic shall be suspended, and their places be given to others, in conformity with the actual laws.

"9. The judicial power shall continue to exercise its important functions without any variation from the existing law.

"10. No person shall be persecuted for political opinions anterior to this declaration."

The day after this declaration was signed a Junta of Notables was assembled, in accordance with the second article of the above additional plan; and after some immaterial proceeding a ballot for an ad interim President took place, and Paredes, as already stated, was elected unanimously. A difficulty arose about the form of the oath which was to be administered to him, as some persons desired to incorporate in it an obligation to make war against Texas; but the majority being convinced of the impolicy of such a clause, the following oath was drawn up and taken by Paredes:--

"I swear before God to preserve the independence and integrity of the national territory against all foreign aggression, the republican system, popular and representative, and the administrative plan of the republic as determined by the act of the 2d inst."

The installation was then confirmed by a grand Te Deum and ceremony at the cathedral; and thus, without a shot being fired or a sabre drawn, in one short month after the pronunciamento at San Luis, the supreme power of the State was placed in the hands of General Paredes.

I am sorry to say that neither the Senate nor Chamber or Deputies displayed any energy on this occasion. They surrendered to the mandate of dissolution without either remonstrance or protest, and made no attempt to place the new President in the false position which he must have been in, had they met in their respective Chambers, and compelled him to expel them by force. Only two persons acted with spirit--Generals Minon and Alcorte--both of whom protested against the proceedings of the Junta of Notables but so fallen is public feeling in the republic, that I hear no one praises those officers for their independence, and I fear they are left alone with their glory.

Two articles of the additional plan merits your attention--namely, the third, by which Paredes undertakes to maintain the representative republican system; and the fourth in which it is determined that the Ministers shall be responsible before the first Congress for their acts; the acts themselves shall not be
I have now to give the list of the new Cabinet, and I do so with great pleasure, as I find on all sides the selection much approved:

War, General Almonte.

Finance, Senor Luis Parres.

Foreign affairs and Interior, Senor Castillo y Lanza.

Grace and Justice, the Bishop of Chiapas.

The first is well known as late Minister to the United States and as a man of talent and courage; the second is the Aristedes of Mexico--the honestest man in the republic; and the third has natural gifts improved by an education in England. I know nothing of the fourth; but I must say for the three others, that even their enemies cannot speak in their disfavor; and that Paredes, with their aid, will find no difficulty in carrying on good government. The Cabinet will, I believe be supported by M. Castillo, the late Minster of Finance, who agrees to take the head of the Treasury, an efficient chief in that department being essential to the good working of the whole machine. I hope for great things from this Cabinet; and I shall be grievously disappointed if it does not succeed, as if even only one sound measure be enforced, one half of the public disabilities disappear--I allude to the simple plan of compelling the whole of the revenue to be paid into the Treasury, instead of having it frittered away in the collection and distributed to the different persons who have liens on it, as present.

I maintain, of course, that good faith should be held with all creditors, whether honest or usurious, but the very fact of the revenue being paid directly into the Treasury would create so enormous a saving, that even in its present dilapidated state the public income would cover expenditure. As to what may be done by opening the ports to European manufactures at reasonable duties, removing inland custom-houses, and remodeling the system of customs and taxation, I cannot ascribe a limit; and I adhere to what I said in a late letter, that under a new and efficient system a surplus of five millions sterling beyond all necessary expenditure for the payment of interest on national debt could be raised without the slightest pressure on the country. From this calculation of course I exclude the chances of civil war, or a contest with the United States. I hope Mexico may be saved from the former evil by the energy of the Government, and I think I already see symptoms of wavering on the part of the President and the new Minister of Foreign Affairs on the subject of American Affairs.

I find that an escort is constantly refused to the Minister of the States under one pretext of another, and I take that to be a gentle hint to him not to hasten his departure. The true state of affairs with America we cannot determine until Mr. Slidell receives fresh instructions from his Government; but I should think, from present symptoms, that if the United States yield the point of etiquette, and accredit him ad hoc, Paredes will see the propriety of abandoning Texas, and then settling the north-western and eastern frontier.

The command of the army on the Texan frontier has been taken from General Arista and given to Ampadia. It remains to be seen whether Arista will submit, or whether his troops will not prefer adhering to the pronunciamento of San Luis instead of to him. That is the only quarter from whence evil may be expected, as nearly all the departments have joined the present order of things. Civil war at this moment would be a great evil, as it would interfere with the determination taken by the President to clear all the roads of the republic from the bands of robbers that infest them. When Paredes undertook the government of the province of Guadalaxara, he found all the roads covered with banditti, who plundered and murdered at their pleasure, but before six months elapsed not a robber was to be found in the department. The plan he adopted was, to send scouring parties of cavalry, attended by a priest, and whenever a robber was taken half an hour was granted for confession, and he was shot on the spot. Paredes is now following up the same plan in this vicinity. A squadron of dragoons, attended by half a dozen friars, has been despatched on the road to Vera Cruz, with orders to shoot without mercy every culprit against whom a prima facie case can be made. A few examples will be enough to disperse the bands that at present infest that route, and by whom nearly all the diligences, as well as muleteers charges with the transport of British goods, are plundered.

Your readers may think it strange that the correspondent of that great constitutional journal The Times should speak favourably of a revolution which commences by dissolvign the regularly organized Chambers and vesting the supreme power, even temporarily, in the hands of a military chief. It is also possible that you may reprove me for taking a course so dissimilar to that followed by The Times when public principles are at stake. But I hope your readers and yourselves will, for a short time, place confidence in me, and be convinced of the distinction that exists between sound government at home and the management of a country like this, where not a single element of a constitutional system can be found. In 20 years 24 attempts at establishing representative forms have been made, all of which have failed; and so little reliance has latterly been placed in the Senate of the Deputies, that their proceedings were never thought of, and the only quality they possessed was that of being a drag on the execution of public business. No one now complains that their sittings are at an end, and I am convinced the people will not be pleased if the National Convention, to be held next month, decide on their re-establishment. The late Chambers neither promoted reform, improved the revenue, nor cut
The city of Mexico is perfectly quiet, and the new President and Ministry are very popular.

I understand that a Junta of Hacienda, or committee of finance, has been installed to-day, for the purpose of pointing out to the Minister such reforms as are necessary in that department, and how money can be raised with least injury to the public service. It is supposed that the Junta will recommend the granting of licenses of the importation of a certain quantity of raw cotton, as the manufacturers are nearly out of stocks, and a large sum can be easily raised in that manner.

4,000 troops, under the orders of General Ampadía, march towards Zacatecas to-morrow.

Puebla has submitted.

The president has declared that he will not commute the punishment of General Rangel, who, you will recollect, attempted an unsuccessful pronunciamento on the 7th of June last.

LT 1846, March 11, p5/a US, biblical right to Oregon Territory

The 26th, 27th, and 28th verses of the 1st chapter of Genesis are, in the opinion of Mr. John Quincy Adams, the foundation of the American title to the Oregon territory, and his case finds some additional strength from a passage in the 2d Psalm. There are moonstruck madmen both in and out of Bedlam, whose lunacy takes a colour from Holy Writ, and is the more awful and distressing from the distortion and debasement of the sublimest truths which are embodied in human language; but when we learn that the ravings of one of these fanatics were listened to with interest and excitement by one branch of the most important legislative assembly of the New World,—when we are told that the text of Scripture, which was to be polluted by this insane commentary, was read by the clerk at the table of the House of Representatives at Washington,—and when we remember that all this blasphemous extravagance is uttered as the apology or the pretext of an atrocity war, and that the promises of GOD are invoked to justify the capacity and the lawlessness of man, we look in vain for any parallel for such an exhibition except in the midst of anarchy and revolution. A democracy intoxicated with what it mistakes for religion is the most formidable apparition which can startle the world. It defies its own excesses; its desires and its passions seem to be direct emanations from the law of GOD; its will claims a divine authority. The hypocrisy of the popular leaders feeds the enthusiasm of the multitude; and crimes are committed of which human nature itself is hardly capable until it is inflated by presumption and falsehood beyond all the bounds of reason and truth.

The speech of Mr. Adams, which will be found in another place, deserves to be recorded as the most recent and astounding instance of this species of popular delusion. Yet the affairs of the United States and the peace of the world are intrusted to the prudence of an assembly in which this scene could take place! Secular prudence and political integrity are bent on nothing more than an equitable and amicable termination of this controversy; but they have arrayed against them the arrogance of a Government too feeble to restrain the bad impulses which drive it along; the excitement of a populace apparently unconscious of the consequences of its acts; and, lastly, the frenzy of a religious enthusiasm which confounds the rudiments of right and wrong. Such is the aspect of the United States under their boasted forms of popular government. Their democrats are aping the crimes of despotism, and resuscitating the claims of priestcraft. The rights of neighbouring nations, the fundamental principles of public law, the common suggestions of humanity, are all sacrificed with a recklessness worthy of the worst enemies of mankind. To advocate a war on such motives for such objects as these is to preach an insurrection against the very principles on which society is based. Such a war becomes a revolution, and, if it be tinged with religious fanaticism, a revolution of the most unscrupulous kind.

We cannot believe, with one of our most esteemed correspondents, that these elements of evil exist only at the surface of this democratic society, and that the Senate of the United States is prepared and resolved "to hearken to no measure calculated to inflame the passions, and to produce a desolating war!" Can "the Senate do its duty faithfully?" Or, if that duty be now performed, and the negotiation be reopened under the auspices of the Senate, will the temperate and pacific portion of that body be able to hold its ground against the excitement of the people and the cabals of the Executive? In the hands of a man like WASHINGTON, resolutely co-operating with the Senate for the maintenance of peace, and executive power was strong enough to resist the popular impulse. But when we have a President inciting the popular part of the community to do its worst, and intriguing in and against the Senate, we have no trust in the resistance of that body. The odds of the constitution are against it; and the impediments it may oppose to the popular will would only add a fresh impetus to the agitation of the question. Such was the fate of the annexation of Texas, which was rejected by Whatever may be the infatuation of the people and the comparative weakness of the moderate party, and the main responsibility of the crisis rests on the members of the executive Government of the United States. With them rests the initiative of negotiation, of war, or of the preparations of war. They alone are enabled to estimate the dangers of the position in which their imprudence has placed themselves and the country. These dangers, or at least the difficulties with which they have to deal, are materially increased by the state of the relations of the United States and Mexico. In the latter republic a revolution has been successfully consummated, which has placed the temporary exercise of the supreme power in the hands of a man who is at least resolved to oppose the further encroachments of the United States on the Mexican territories, to rescue California from the projected inroad of American emigrants, and, if opportunity serve, to avenge the annexation of Texas. In Texas the United States have acquired another doubtful question of boundary, and an immense additional extent of coast and of territory, which they are bound to provide with adequate means of defence by sea and land. It would be a singular consequence of Texan annexation, if the first result of its union to the territory of its northern neighbours was to make it the theatre of war. But, in the event of hostilities between the United States and Great Britain, such an event is highly probable. The Mexican Government is evidently influenced by the probability of such a catastrophe in its own relations with the Cabinet of Washington. Mr. SLIDELL, the American Envoy, has not been received, and he awaits the further orders of his Government of Jalapa. The first indication of hostilities towards England by the American Government would be followed (if it be not preceded) by a declaration of war against the United States by Mexico. The whole continent of North America, beyond their own frontiers, would then resent the excessive pre-tensions of the democrats of the north. The whole coast of the Pacific would be closed against the vessels of the United States: that of the Atlantic Ocean would be open to the attacks of the greatest maritime power. Without an army, without a fleet, without a revenue, without credit, with a divided public opinion, a strong party opposition, a fluctuating populace, and in the southern states a slave population, Mr. POLK has thought fit to raise up difficulties which might appall the best generals, the most experienced statesmen, the mightiest states of the old world. We shall see how he surmounts them; but he will not surmount them by inducing England to stoop to conditions she has already rejected, or to engage in a fresh negotiation on any other terms than those of perfect equality of right to the Oregon territory.

I send you duplicates of my dispatches of the 3d and 10th inst.,* but I hope the originals have long since reached, and put you in possession of all the leading facts connected with the revolution so peaceably accomplished by General Paredes. I have now the satisfaction to say, that every event confirms my anticipations, and that, in my opinion, Mexico has now fairer prospects of arriving at good government than she has enjoyed since she effected her independence. Such are appearances; but, warned by experience, I must be cautious in not being over sanguine as to results. Corruption is so engrained in the daily habits of the people-sound principles of government are so little understood—so much apathy succeeds every unusual exertion, that I cannot venture to do more than express a strong belief that the republic has now a chance of gaining that elevation to which by position and internal wealth she is so well entitled. Paredes has begun well, and is inclined to pursue the same straightforward course. He has selected the most honest and most able men in Mexico to form a Cabinet; but he finds the army so disorganized, and the finances in so dreadful a state of disorder, that time must be allowed before a cure can be effected, and then, if he succeeds, a miracle will be accomplished.

One great good he has already done—namely, freed the roads leading from the republic from the organized bands of robbers who plundered the diligences four days out of seven, and stripped every traveler who had property to lose. Since Paredes sent forth detachments, accompanied by a chaplain, with orders to shoot, with half an hour’s grace, every robber caught in the fact or with stolen goods on him, all the well-known practitioners in that line have disappeared. I have myself made the experiment, and having lately had occasion to undertake a journey of 250 miles, I traveled with full confidence in the terror of Paredes’ name, and had no reason to regret what others called my temerity, in carrying a watch and a reasonable sum of money about me.

This is a social reform of such practical utility that one forgives the despotic order of preceding, and well it would be for Mexico if the other great evils of the country could be cured in the same effectual manner, even at the sacrifice of the like abandonment of principle. I must of course except the measures taken with respect to the public press, as I cannot see the necessity of the interim President’s reviving Santa Anna’s laws of 1839 and 1843, by which all superior authorities are allowed to arrest, and imprison in the fortresses of Acapulco and San Juan de Ulloa, the proprietors and editors of newspapers containing notorious libels, submitting at the same time the libels in question for decision to the regular tribunals. This you will admit is a very Irish mode of proceeding, punishing first and trying after; and few newspapers will risk articles open to the misconstruction of some dependent of the Government, and I have only to hope that Paredes has revived the law more for the purpose of inspiring terror among the Federalist writers, than for carrying it absolutely into effect. Indeed, judging from the abundant creation of new journals within a few days, no alarm has been excited in editorial circles, and I find one paper, the Tiempo, advocating a monarchy with considerable ability in the very teeth of the programme laid down by Paredes.
The convocatoria, or warrant for the calling together a national convention charged with fixing definitively the Constitution, has just appeared. It consists of 156 articles; but I need not trouble you with more than a general abstract. The Congress is to consist of 160 deputies, 38 of whom are to be chosen by the landed interest, 20 the commercial, 14 the mineral, 14 the manufacturing, 14 the literary, 10 the public administration, 20 the church, and 20 by the army. The right of voting for deputies is limited to Mexican subjects of 24, and of being deputies to those of 30 years of age. Persons paying to the department of Mexico 150 dollars a year of direct taxes, for the districts of Puebla, Vera Cruz, Michocan, Guanajueto, Zacatecas, and Jalisco, 90 dollars a year, in all other departments 60 dollars, are eligible as deputies. The qualifications of electors vary in the several departments, but the rate of payment of taxes is fixed so high that none but the better classes of society can appear at the hasting. Each province is allotted a number of deputies from the different professions according to its extent and property. The elections are all to take place before the 1st of May, and the Congress is to assemble within four months of that period. The Congress must determine of the Constitution within six months of its formation, with power to postpone the decision for three months more, should extraordinary circumstances require delay. All deputies to be inviolable for opinions expressed in the Congress. The Congress is based on the principle that according to the last census the population of the republic was 7,000,000 inhabitants, and that one in 70,000 shall be represented.

What the result of this national experiment may be, it is impossible to foresee, but it is evident that in the mean time, nearly for 10 months, Paredes will be absolute master, and that the fate of the country is vested in his hands. I hope for the best, but it is hard to say what use he will make of these extraordinary powers. Santa Anna had the same authority with greater prestige; but he was a public robber, while the breath of suspicion has not yet soiled Paredes name. I understand that Paredes has declared he will not accept the pay of President; he lives in his private house, no in the palace; and he does no pilfer himself, he will not allow others to rob the State. Good intentions, a firm will, and a hand of iron he possesses, but his allies are the church and the jobbers in Government, negocios as they are called, and I know not how improvement can take place under the control of thousands of lazy friars, and of the habitual vultures of the Treasury. The influence of the latter has been shown lately in too decided a manner for one to neglect the warning it contains. Paredes a few days since declared he would put down the gaming tables with which Mexico abounds, and in which some of the great capitalists, general officers, and colonels of the army are partners and agents, but he was obliged to give way to the power of these people, and though he refused the large yearly contribution they offered, the order against monte has not appeared. The influence of the former is less apparent but equally efficacious, and I am told that public institutions for improvement of science and art have been suppressed in consequence of secret intrigues, which could alone arise from that suspected quarter. Paredes' good intentions are greater than his capacity, and therefore am I slow to anticipate the future, though I cheerfully admit that all his actions, save that relative to the monte tables, up to the present hour are admirable and well-timed.

I see that all opposition to the new order of things has ceased in the army and the departments. General Arista made a show of resistance and marched on Tampico, but finding that his troops were not warm in their cause, he gave up the command, and retired to his farm, to use his own words, "because the country no longer required his services." The departments that a few weeks since spoke, by the months of their civil authorities, open defiance to the revolution, have likewise submitted to Paredes. Yucatan alone has ventured on a great game. It has declared its independence, and means to set up for itself. The connexion between Mexico and this province has been for some time past merely nominal, as it refused to contribute a soldier to the public service or a shilling to the revenue, so that little is lost but the name, and the pretext that the example holds out to other departments that hang equally loosely on the Central Government. We are afraid, for instance, of its effects on Upper California, and on New Mexico, as both provinces daily show strong symptoms of declaring independence, with a view towards annexation with the United States.

The want of money is, as you are prepared to expect, the great difficulty which the Government of Paeedes is destined to meet, and I hope to overcome. It has agreed to admit an unlimited import of cotton wool on payment of 10 dollars the quintal when the license to import is taken out; but this plan does not produce the expected addition to the revenue, as speculators do not like paying so large a sum in advance with the prospect of an American war, or at least a blockade of the ports, before them. Claims have likewise been set up by private individuals, as no doubt they will be by the agents of British bondholders, for their percentage on the said revenue, as they contend that cash paid for a license to import is tantamount to customs paid on imports at Vera Cruz. This is a question which may give trouble to the British Minister at Mexico, and probably to the Foreign-office at home; but, in my opinion, the case is quite clear in favour of the British claimants, and the evasion of granting licenses instead of receiving duties is too palpable to command a moment's respect. The Mexican Minister has shown but little tact in this affair, for had he declared the port of Vera Cruz free for the importation of cotton, and then put an internal duty on its removal to any part of the interior, he would have escaped the difficulty. The Minister's object, however, is the supply of ready cash, and in trying to attain that object he overlooks the serious difficulties that interpose. Moreover, an agricultural opposition will arise from the cotton-growers, whose harvest of good prices is destroyed at the moment is should be gathered in; so that the Government has to contend with manufacturers whose works are nearly stopped for want of cotton; with the landed interest, who have just reason to complain of broken faith; and with the public editors, who are strong enough to prevent faith being broken with them.

We received only a few days since the American President's message. One passage in it relative to Mexico excites general astonishment, and the unblushing boldness of it should open the willful blindness that appears to exist in England with regard to the designs of the United States-I allude to that sentence in which Mr. Polk declares that the Union has now carried its frontier to the Rio Grande; as well might we say that the Union extended its frontier to the Isthmus of Panama, for it has just as much right to one as the other. Texas is incorporated with the United States, that is a fait accompli, and whatever Mexico may say we English have no right to question the transaction. But how does the incorporation of Texas extend the frontier to Rio Grand or Bravo el Norte—both being names of the same river? The frontier of Texas is the Nueces, and beyond that is Mexican land, as clearly as that south of the Bidassoa belongs to Spain. Many moths since I advised you of these intentions; I regret to see thus soon my anticipations realized.

Let us look for a moment at the extent of the territory thus swallowed by the insatiable maw of the States. Texas Proper contains 21,000 square leagues; the part of Chihuahua between the Rio Grande and Texas contains 8,600 square leagues; that of New Mexico, in the same condition, 4,000 leagues; of Cohuilla, 1,175 leagues; and of Tamaulipas, 6,000 leagues. So that with one dash of the pen President Polk, in addition to the 21,000 square leagues of Texas, cuts off from the republic of Mexico no less than 11,075 square leagues. And this, let me persuade you, is but one step toward its final object namely, the possession of the mining districts. We may be indifferent to this plunder; but shall we be equally indifferent when the silver currency of Europe is controlled by the President of the United States, and when the States in the possession of the Mexican mines become the richest nation in the world. I have repeated this idea in almost every letter addressed you since I came here, and I shall never cease to repeat it as one of those homely truths which statesmen resist till the evil result be accomplished and beyond belief.

I now find, by late intelligence from Washington, that negotiations between England and the States are reopened with respect to the Oregon, and on the basis that the 49th parallel from the Rocky Mountains to the sea is to be the final boundary. If such be the case, and Great Britain cedes to the United States the Oregon south of the 49th parallel, Mr. Polk has accomplished the great object for which his predecessors so long struggled in vain. By it the fate of Upper California, from the 36th parallel, is decided; and in a short time we shall see another state added to the Union, embracing the Bay of San Francisco and the river Columbia, with 700 miles of the coast of the Pacific. As the policy of the United States has been to secure Texas as a stepping stone to the mining districts of Mexico, it is equally desirable to obtain any portion of the Oregon as the sole barrier between the Union and the Bay of San Francisco; and England, in agreeing to terms by which the States attain legal and undisputed possession of the land above the 43rd parallel, or Mexican boundary, abandons the finest harbour in the world, and the command of the Northern Pacific. I hope we do so with our eyes open, and that the sacrifice is made for objects substantial in reality, though not apparent to persons unacquainted with secrets of state. The Oregon has been the pretext, but California is the end of the United States, and the noise and bluster they made about the former have been raised for the purpose of covering their real views on San Francisco. Had we insisted on the 45th instead of the 49th parallel, it would have been granted. All that the States desire is to get such a footing above the Mexican frontier as will prepare the way for seizing the coveted portion of the territory of that country. Thieves take possession of an empty house for the purpose of more securely robbing the rich man's residence next door; so the United States obtain the barren lands of the Oregon, with the intention of plundering their Mexican neighbour at their ease. We must call things by their right names, and learn at last to understand that when the United States speak of Texas they mean the Mexican mines—and of Oregon, they mean the Bay of San Francisco. I suppose we shall find the President of next year announcing that the frontier of the States has been extended to the 36th parallel, with the same unblushing boldness that Mr. Polk announces this year the extension to the Rio Grande. The next step will be the annexation of the department of New Mexico; and thus in the center, and on each flank, the Mexican territory is disposed of at the pleasure of its grasping neighbour. Indeed, I see, by late American papers, that nothing less than the possession of the whole of Mexico will content the States. One writer, for instance, says, "Any one can see where these things will end; they will cad in the annexation of Mexico to the United States—silver mines, gold mines, cathedrals, and plantations. Hell cannot stop the rapidly approaching climacteric of the annexation of Mexico, and the compromise upon the 49th parallel for Oregon will give us Mexico. The work of annexation is just beginning, we cannot stop short of the Isthmus of Darien. This is the realization of more than a poet's dream—the onward progress of our model republic." I believe that every man in the United States participate in these anticipations; and I venture to add that our cession of any part of the Oregon is the proximate step to their accomplishment.

The new tariff will come into operation on the 1st of next month. It will afford some relief to British trade, but I fear the duties are still too high to bear competition with smuggling through Texas, or the wagon trade to Santa Fe. English houses are already, I understand, turning their attention to the establishment of depots at Galveston, and of passing goods through the undefended frontiers of the Rio Bravo, and I find that Englishmen are already on the prairies competing with American enterprise to Santa Fe. I understand that every year a large convoy of wagons is formed at a town called Independence, in the far west, about 3,000 miles from New York, to which goods are brought by rail and steam on the Missouri; and that the journey is accomplished from Independence to Santa Fe in 60 to 70 days over the prairies, and through the midst of hostile Indians. At Santa Fe an arrangement is made with the Mexican Custom-house-office for $750 duty on each waggon load, after which the journey is continued for 90 days more to the great fairs of San Juan de los Lagos, or of Aguas Calientes. Large profits have been made in this trade, as the duties paid at Santa Fe, and all expenses of the road, do not amount to one-fourth of those which would be charged at any seaport of entry, and as coarse goods, which are prohibited in a regular way, can thus without difficulty be introduced. This trade, which has been for some years past in the hands of natives only, is now opened by a few spirited Englishmen; and next season I have some reason to believe that all the north of Mexico will be supplied from our fabrics with goods prohibited at Tampico and Vera Cruz. A late enactment made by the United States, which entitles the importer of goods seaward to a drawback of the whole duty on receiving the certificate of the American Consul at Santa Fe, is an absolute bounty to our countrymen; and if it be continued, few American manufacturers can compete with them in the articles suited to that particular trade. Goods that are prohibited in the several Gulf seaports of Mexico are thus introduced overland into the heart of its territory, and British mantas undersell the home made at San Juan de los Lagos.
Mr. Slidell, the American Minister, continues at Jalapa, one day from Vera Cruz, waiting definitive orders from his Government. The Mexican Cabinet refuses to receive him, under pretence that it only agreed to accept a Minister ad hoc for the settlement of the Texan affair; but the correspondence between the Consul at Mexico and the Government, which I subjoin, proves that the Mexican Cabinet made no such condition, and for once the United States are in the right. Mexico may pay dearly for this duplicity, as a fleet may be hourly expected at Vera Cruz, and the Constitution frigate has arrived at Mazatlan, with orders, it is said, to seize on one of the Pacific ports, should Mr. Slidell not be received. An opinion generally prevails at Mexico that war is inevitable between England and the United States, and that idea renders the Government more difficult in acceding to the terms of the Washington Cabinet.

Late advices from the Havannah state that M. de Cyprey, the ex-French Minister at this place, continued there with his family, waiting orders from home. I'm also glad to find that illicit importation of Negroes at the Havannah had altogether ceased. Santa Anna is still living at the Havannah, occupied with his favourite amusement of cock-fighting, and apparently indifferent to the march of events in Mexico. His friends here are still numerous, at least to judge by the letters which, I understand from good authority, he receives from this---one-half of the correspondence between Mexico and the Havannah being addressed to him.

The Spanish Government is intriguing here with the hope of establishing one of its princes as sovereign, should the advocates for monarchy succeed in gaining a majority in the Convention. Two agents have been lately secretly employed here under the orders of the Captain-General of Cuba, and a new journal, called the Espectador, is announced under the direction of Colonel Valdes and the son of one of the most notorious Christino partisans at Madrid, for the purpose of supporting these pretensions. The Infante Don Sebastian, who married the sister of Donna Christina, and a son of Don Francisco de Paula, are the candidates. [CCB]

LT March 13, 1846, 5b, "AMERICA"

We have received Washington advices to the 19th ult. Inclusive by the packet-ship Rochester, Captain Britton, arrived from New York, whence she sailed on the 21st ult.

The adjourned debate in the Senate had been resumed on the 16th ult. in accordance with resolution; and during the interval between that date and the dispatch of our latest accounts from Washington the house had been addressed by Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Colquitt, Mr. Dix, Mr. Benton, and Mr. Dickenson.

We extract from the New York Courier and Enquirer a brief resume of the speeches delivered by the gentlemen named.

The proceedings of the House of Representatives are totally uninteresting.

The new Tariff Bill, so late as the 19th ult., had not been reported from the Committee on Finance. Upon this subject we make the following interesting extracts from the Washington correspondence of the Courier and Enquirer: --

"WASHINGTON, FEB. 16.

"Repeated efforts were made in the House today to have the Tariff Bill, framed under the direction of Mr. Walker, and now in the possession of the committee on finance, laid before the House, but none of them were successful. The members generally know nothing of the bill, except through the correspondence from this city which has come back; and its importance, together with the fact that its provisions are directly at variance with the laboured theory of the Secretary of the Treasury, as set forth in his annual report, creates a strong desire among members to have possession of the bill. Its provisions please neither the Protectionist nor the Free trader, and unless it shall win friends to its support which it has not now got, the indications are that it cannot be enacted into a law; but its fate is so intimately connected with that of the great question of the day---that of Oregon--that it is impossible to predict with any degree of confidence what will be the action of Congress upon it.

"FEBRUARY 19.

"You will observe that there have been several unsuccessful efforts in the House to reach the Tariff Bill prepared under the supervision of the Secretary of Treasury. The reason is that it does not suit the chairman of the Committee on Finance, Mr. M'Kay, who prefers the bill reported by himself at the last Congress. It is also rumoured that he and the Secretary have had interviews on the subject which have partaken more of the character of altercation than consultations. The article in the Union of last evening headed 'A War for Oregon Preferred to a Reduction of the Tariff,' has attracted very general attention. It purports to be in reply to an article in the Baltimore Patriot, but its perusal leaves the irresistible impression on the mind that the Government have it in contemplation to sacrifice the protection of our home industry, and accommodate our tariff to British interests, for the purpose of securing the whole of Oregon. That this had been suspected from former articles in the Union, and this suspicion is, in the minds of many, verified by the article of last evening. If it is true, as intimated in the Union, that unless we sacrifice the tariff we shall have to fight for Oregon, if
The coast had been visited by terrific storms of wind and snow. The New York papers teem with accounts of the disasters received by the shipping.

The money-market was easy. Discounts were effected at 6 to 7 per cent. Exchanges were inactive, 5 28³⁄₄ to 5 27¹⁄₂.

The Cambria, with the mails of the 4th of February, had arrived at Boston on the 18th ult., communicating the remarks made by Sir R. Peel upon Mr. Pakenham's rejection of the proposal made last autumn by Mr. Polk. The Courier and Enquirer remarks,--

"The news from England is important, as exhibiting the anxious desire of the British Government to settle the Oregon question if this country will consent to any arrangement compatible with the honour of Great Britain; and now, more than ever, the question of war or peace rests solely with this Government. We sincerely hope that the Cambria brings instructions from the British Minister to offer to our Government the propositions rejected by him in July; because if it does not, we doubt whether the British Ministry will feel disposed to make any offer after the rejection of the proposition to arbitrate, in an offensive manner, and upon the distinct ground that to agree to an arbitration would be to admit that Great Britain has some rights in Oregon, which Mr. Buchanan in that correspondence again denies. The uncourteous character of that last correspondence is, in our judgment, the principal difficulty in the way of an early adjustment of existing difficulties between the two countries. True, the Administration may in its obstinacy and folly presume upon the pacific disposition evinced by the British Cabinet, and in the hope of getting the whole of Oregon, refuse all compromise; but this, we think, Mr. Polk dare not do without first submitting the question to the people's representatives, who will never countenance such folly. But be this as it may, we must now look solely to Washington and our own Administration for the settlement of the question, for beyond all doubt, if we renew the original proposition made by Mr. Buchanan, it will be transmitted to England for the decision of the British Government, if it should not be at once accepted by Mr. Pakenham. And why would we not renew that proposition? It was made in good faith--not to Mr. Pakenham, but to the British Government; and now that we are officially informed that it did not reach the Government before it was withdrawn, surely good faith, self-respect, and a desire to promote an honourable and equitable settlement of the question, require that it should be renewed for the specific action of those for whom it was originally intended. Such, we contend, after the manly declarations of Sir Robert Peel in the House of Commons is the course which this Government owes it to pursue. Let them do this--and not to do it is to fail in self-respect--and there can be no doubt but the whole difficulty will be promptly and honourably arranged. This proposition to reduce the duties on Indian corn, beef, pork, &c., is only another evidence of the pacific character of the English Government, and if adopted will add largely to our export trade."

Our Canadian advices are uninteresting. No later accounts had been received from Mexico. [CCB]

LT March 16, 1846, p4/e US, France, and the Oregon question

When the Cambria left Boston on the 1st inst. it was known that the Senate of the United States had adjourned the debate on the abrogation of the Oregon convention to the 2d of March; but there was no doubt that Mr. Colquitt's resolutions would be carried by a large majority in that assembly. These resolutions are substantially the same as those adopted by the House of Representatives, although in a more qualified form; but they express with greater energy an "earnest desire that this long standing controversy may be settled by negotiation and compromise." In fact, they impose upon the Cabinet of the United States the duty of reopening the negotiations on such terms as may convince the American people that a sincere attempt has been made to effect a peaceful settlement of the dispute; and we sincerely hope these terms may be admissible by England. Mr. Allen, however, in the course of the debate, declared that the President's views and determination to assert his title to the whole territory up to 54 40' had undergone no change. On the part of the British Minister, Mr. Pakenham, no fresh overture has been made.

Whatever may be the motives which induce the Congress of the United States to voted the abrogation of the convention of 1827 for the joint occupancy of the Oregon territory, we are chiefly concerned to examine the effect of that measure on the relative rights of the two claimants. As soon as the Senate shall have concurred in these resolutions, and the President proceed, as he undoubtedly will, to give the notice, the whole question will assume a new shape, or rather it will revert to the condition in which it stood before ever the conventions of 1818 and of 1827 were thought of, that condition being only modified by the actual settlements in the country made under the specific protection of those very instruments. It may, we think, be demonstrated by strict reasoning that the abrogation of these conventions under the present circumstances of
Under the agreement which the Americans are resolved to cancel, two kinds of claims have existed: the first conventional, which were on the footing of strict equality; the second claims of settlement, which depend on the relative extent of occupation by either party. If the convention be annulled, the conventional privileges of the Americans, which were equal to our own, cease and determine, as far as we are concerned; their right is reduced to a mere abstract title; whilst we stand upon the British rights of occupation, sanctioned by all the arguments in support of our claim, and especially by the treaty of 1790 with Spain. The settlements of the Hudson's Bay Company in the Oregon territory have been made under a right recognized by these conventions; but the right existed before the conventions, and the settlements, with all the rights accruing to their founders, will subsist after them. Dr. Twiss, in his most interesting and elaborate survey of the whole question, points out the passage of Vattel by which such a case must be determined. "If," says that great authority, "two or more nations at the same time discover and take possession of an island or any other desert land without an owner, they ought to agree between themselves and make an equitable partition; but, if they cannot agree, each will have the right of empire and domain in the parts in which they first settled."

In this particular case, the effect of occupation and priority of settlement as conferring sovereignty is more than usually decisive. For the right of fishing, landing for the purpose of trade with the natives, and of making settlements, having been formally secured to Spain and to England by the treaty of 1790, the settlements made in pursuance of that right by either Power became absolute possessions of the Crown. Let us now ascertain from an unquestionable witness, Mr. Greenhow himself, the champion of the American claims, what the relative importance of these settlements is. He observes that the difficulty of the negotiation undertaken in 1826 had been materially increased since 1818--

"By the great inequality which had been produced in the relative positions of the two parties as regards actual occupation. After the union of the two great North American Companies in 1821, and the establishment of civil and criminal jurisdiction throughout their territories, the Hudson's Bay Company became a powerful body; its resources were no longer wasted in disputes with a rival association; its regulations were enforced; its operations were conducted with security and efficiency; and encouragement was afforded for the extension of its posts and communications by the assurance that the honour of the Government was thereby more strongly engaged in its support. Many of these posts were fortified, and could be defended by their inmates--men inured to dangers and hardships of all kinds--against any attacks which might be apprehended; and thus, in a few years, the whole region north and north-west of the United States, from Hudson's Bay and Canada to the Pacific, particularly the portion traversed by the Columbia and its branches, was occupied, in a military sense, by British forces, although there was not a single British soldier, strictly speaking, within its limits.

Such is the American account of the state of district in 1826, when Mr. Gallatin proposed as his ultimatum the cession by England of the territory up to the 49th parallel. Nor is it now materially altered. Two or three thousand American emigrants have formed a village on one of the southern tributaries of the Columbia; but neither their means nor their objects extend to any command of territory beyond the valley of the Willamette. They have an undoubted right to form such settlements under the convention; but they owe the means of completing their journey across the vast and rugged wilderness to the liberality and hospitality of the agents of the Hudson's Bay Company. Captain Fremont, who conducted the United States exploring expedition beyond the Rocky Mountains in 1843, attests the fact. On arriving at Fort Nez Perce, a British post situated at the confluence of the River Wallawalla and the Columbia, he observes that at this point, which is just 2,000 miles overland from the western frontier of the state of Missouri, the emigrants who arrive by the South Pass and from the valley of the Mississippi may embark on the broad stream of the west. He himself and the heads of the emigrants there at the same time were hospitably entertained by Mr. Mackinsley, the commander of the post. At Fort Vancouver, Captain Fremont was received with the greatest courtesy by Dr. M'Loughlin, the executive officer of the Hudson's Bay Company in the territory west of the Rocky Mountains, and the expedition was furnished with all necessary supplies. He adds--

"I found many American emigrants at the fort; others had already crossed into their land of premise--the Wallahmette Valley. Others were daily arriving, and all of them had been furnished with shelter, so far as it could be afforded by the buildings connected with the establishment. Necessary clothing and provisions (the latter to be afterwards returned inkind from the produce of their labour) were also furnished. This friendly assistance was of very great value to the emigrants, whose families were otherwise exposed to much suffering in the winter rains; at the same time, they were in want of all the common necessities of life. Those who had driven their stock down the Columbia had brought them safely in, and found for them a ready market, and were already proposing to return to the States in the spring for another supply."

We quote these facts, which are given on American official authority, because it is impossible to place the relative importance of the British and American settlements in the territory in stronger contrast. In fact, if the emigrants from the United States had not been liberally and humanely assisted and protected by the British agents, they would probably have perished miserably on that bleak shore, beyond the reach of all human aid. But what is the return the instigators of the American people propose to make for these offices of humanity? What effect has this information, officially presented to Congress, upon the deliberations of the Legislature? It only incites them to endeavour to expel their benefactors from the country, and to wrest from the Hudson's Bay Company those very forts which have sheltered their own emigrants from the hardships of the wilderness.
No appeals have been made to public opinion or to Parliament by the Hudson's Bay Company, probably because that body feels sufficiently strong in its own resources and in the resolution of the Government. But a stronger case for public interest and support we have never known. A great trading company enters upon the enjoyment of certain rights secured by a treaty between the Crowns of Spain and England, with the full sanction of royal charter and acts of Parliament; it occupies a vast uninhabited region, where settlement was all that was needed to assert and establish indefeasible rights of dominion; it exercises those rights with so little jealousy, that even the emigrants from the rival state are housed within its walls and supplied from its magazines. It has organized the sole system of regular communication and traffic that the present state of the northern parts of America admits of. All this has been going on actively for the last quarter of a century, and less actively ever since 1790; when suddenly, by the mere will and pleasure of a democratic community, whose nearest possessions are distant 2,000 miles of land travel, this company and the power it represents are summoned to evacuate, surrender, and renounce their forts, their posts, their settlements, the navigation of the rivers, the possession of the country, and to retire beyond the 54th parallel of latitude. Such a cession of territory would at once paralyze the whole operations of the Company and the North-Western coast. Yet, such is the extraordinary perversion of public opinion in America on this subject, that we are expected to abandon a title, supported by effectual occupation, in favour of another title, which rests upon no superior legal claims, and is backed by no occupation whatever!

As soon as notice of the abrogation of the treaty of 1827 is given, we trust that no mere formalities will deter the British Government from informing the Cabinet of Washington and the world what are the definitive claims of this country and what are the concessions England is prepared to make. Nothing is gained by the secrecy of diplomacy in treating with the United States, because public opinion in that country is the last arbiter of the national policy and the Government has shown itself less disposed to peace than the more enlightened part of the community. Whatever be the proposals of the American Executive, we must trust to the fairness of our own views, to our ability to defend the ground on which we stand, and to the magnitude of the alternatives. But, as we observed more than two months ago, in an article which has been much discussed in the United States, we cannot acquiesce in the surrender of positive long-enjoyed benefits; and the navigation of the Columbia, the harbour of St. Juan de Fuca, and Vancouver's Island are included in those we undoubtedly and rightfully possess.

AMERICA

Liverpool, Saturday, March 14.

The British and North American Royal mail steam-ship Cambria arrived here this morning from Boston and Halifax, with a portion only of the usual mails of the 1st instant.

The advices received from Washington are important. The discussion in the Senate had not been resumed until the 24th ultimo, when Mr. Dickenson addressed the house in favour of the notice and "the whole Oregon."

We subjoin the subsequent proceedings of Congress:--

Washington, Wednesday, Feb. 25.

There was an interesting debate in the Senate to-day on the Oregon question, and the character of the late intelligence from England.

After Mr. Dickenson had concluded his speech,

Mr. Dayton moved that the further discussion of the subject he postponed to Monday fortnight. He did not think that any good could come from a discussion at this time. The character of the late intelligence had impressed him as very amicable, and it was proper to meet it in the same spirit. We could not, in a better manner, meet that amicable disposition than by showing that we were in hot haste.

Mr. Allan said,--In regard to the pacific news of which we had heard so much men might well differ in opinion. He had seen nothing in the language of Ministers or in that of the press which afforded any evidence of a change in the designs of England. The British Cabinet were too sagacious to disclose their designs in advance; and, if we were to gather any thing from their declarations, it would be the very reverse of what they professed. But the British Government had had the President's message before them for two months, and they knew what measures were proposed by us. There was no propriety in our taking counsel from the movements of Great Britain; and if we now postponed the subject it would show that we lacked nerve and heart for the work we had undertaken. This subject had now become connected with another of greater importance--our political relations with other countries. He alluded to the project of a monarchial government, under European guarantee, for Mexico.
Mr. Dayton,—The senator from Ohio may be right. The sentiments of the British Ministers and press might not be a fair exponent of the designs of the British Government. If so, he wished that a little of the same discretion could be manifested here. He did not propose a postponement with a view to shrink from the question, but with a view to more deliberate action. The Senate was not now prepared to act, and the discussion had become stale.

Mr. Cass made some remarks with a view to justify his former inferences as to the position of the British Government on this question. Nothing in the Queen’s speech or in Parliament showed any pacific intention towards the United States, but the reverse. He was astonished at the remark of the Government paper (the Union) that the news from Great Britain was pacific.

Mr. Berrien was disposed to support the motion, but he agreed that our right to give the notice was indisputable.

Mr. Dayton withdrew his motion to postpone.

Mr. Colquitt wished to submit an amendment which would express the sense of the Senate that the question was a proper one for negotiation and compromise.

Mr. Calhoun said, he hoped every senator would come tomorrow prepared to vote on the amendments.

The Senate went into consideration of executive business.

Thursday, Feb. 26, Half-Past 4 O’Clock

The following is the form of the notice proposed by Mr. Colquitt yesterday, and which, it is believed, meets the views of Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Crittenden, and others of both parties.

Upon the adoption of this resolution, it is surmised that Mr. Buchanan will retire from the Cabinet, and the negotiations will be renewed.

The following are the joint resolutions:--

"That notice be given, in terms of the treaty, for abrogating the convention made between Great Britain and the United States on the 20th of October, 1818, and continued by the convention of 1827, immediately after the close of the present session of Congress, unless the President, in his discretion, shall consider it expedient to defer it to a latter period.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, that it is earnestly desired that the long standing controversy respecting limits in the Oregon territory be speedily settled by negotiation and compromise, in order to tranquilize the public mind, and to preserve the friendly relations between the two countries."

Mr. Webster, after alluding to the importance of an expression of opinion on this subject, by the Senate, in reference to the interests of the business community, which were suffering by the state of suspense, inquired whether the senator from Kentucky (Mr. Crittenden) had determined to accept the proposition of the senator from Georgia (Mr. Colquitt)?

Mr. Crittenden had determined, he said, to accept the point alone; and he would accept the latter with some qualification. Mr. Crittenden went on to say, that whatever might be the occasional popular effervescence in this country, or the fervour of debates here, he trusted that it would be found that the Senate would come to a wise and temperate conclusion on this subject. There was a great desire that action should take place to-day, in order that the result might be transmitted by the steamer, but he did not see its importance.

Mr. Webster did not differ a hair’s breadth in opinion from the hon. Senator from Kentucky as to the propriety of the course that he proposed. He went on to say that the exercise of the treaty right to give the notice was in just cause of offence, but the circumstances attending it were to be considered. The house accompanied the naked notice with a proposition qualifying it. Some such proposition had been offered here.
It seemed to be the sense of the Senate that some qualifications ought to be adopted. It was desirable that we should know the opinion of the executive Government as to the effect and use of this notice. The President did not expect war; but how did he propose to escape it? The question must be settled, and, if so, by negotiation.
But what was to be the bias of the negotiation? What were to be the terms? All that we heard from the Government was, that they claimed the whole of Oregon or none. He could not understand the position of the Government. It would not treat for anything less than the whole of Oregon, but propose negotiation. Did they expect by negotiation to persuade Great Britain to give us the whole of Oregon? He wished success to the project. There seemed to be a gross inconsistency in the positions of the Government. If they did not intend to compromise, the result often predicted by the senator from Michigan must happen. Mr. Webster, in the course of his remarks, said that a majority of the Senate would vote for the two propositions of Mr. Colquitt.
Mr. Mangum here said,—Two-thirds will vote for it.

Mr. Breese, Mr. Hannesan, and Mr. Allen opposed the amendment of Mr. Colquitt; and Mr. Breese declared that he did not wish the President to negotiate further. Mr. Allen, in the course of the debate, asserted that the President's views and determination to assert our title to the whole territory up to 54 deg., 40 min., had undergone no change.

Mr. Calhoun said it as now evident, if not before, tat the point in controversy was whether this question should be settled by arms or by negotiation and compromise. It was the most important question that had ever come before the American people since the revolution. He dwelt on the importance of an early expression of the opinion of the Senate upon it.

Mr. Cass said the resolutions could not take anything from the constitutional power of the President.

Mr. Breese moved to adjournment.

The Senate adjourned to Monday.

The New York Herald, of the 28th ult., rumours that Mr. Pakenham had submitted a new proposition to the American Executive. We believe this rumour to be altogether unfounded.

It was stated that a large fleet would shortly be assembled in the Gulf of Mexico.

Our Canadian advices are unimportant. The recent diplomatic correspondence on the Oregon question had been received as rendering war almost inevitable. The new commercial scheme propounded by the Premier had caused considerable excitement and alarm; and the Board of Montreal had determined to memorialize the home Government to admit Canadian corn and flour duty free, without a certificate of origin, and with other advantages.

We learn from Mexico that the hostile movement of Arista had failed.

LT March 17, 1846, p5/b Oregon question

The statement of the Washington correspondence of the New York Herald, that Mr. Pakenham submitted his ultimatum to the consideration of the American Government on the evening of the 26th of February, and that a Cabinet was immediately held to deliberate upon the definitive proposal, is, we have reason to believe, wholly without foundation. It is equally false that "Mr. Crampton brought out instructions to Mr. Pakenham to re-open negotiations by an offer of the 49th parallel, the whole of Vancouver's Island, and the navigation of the Columbia for 20 years." These statements are, however, made by certain organs of public opinion in the United States with such an air of confidence, that we are not surprised that some of our contemporaries in this country should have been imposed upon by them, in spite of the manifest absurdity of the terms suggested. The correspondent of the New York Herald even affects to know what the nature of the British Minister's proposition was, although unwonted scruples deter him from revealing it. The fact is, that no such proposition could have been made at all, especially pending the debate on the resolutions which was then actually going on in the Senate of the United States. The last attempt made by Mr. Pakenham, in pursuance of the instructions he had received from home, to re-open the negotiation by a proposal of arbitration, was abruptly frustrated by the prompt and peremptory rejection of that expedient in Mr. Buchanan's dispatch of the 5th of February, and by the immediate publication of that correspondence. On the following day but one the debate on the resolutions for terminating the convention by notice began in the House of Representatives. A similar debate soon afterwards commenced in the Senate, and was not finished when the last advices left Washington. It is clear from the position in which the question stood after the rejection of the last overture made by the British Minister, and also from the positive injunction to negotiate which is contained in the second of the resolutions under discussion in both Houses of Congress, that the American Cabinet should make the next step towards the adjustment of the controversy. If, however, Mr. Polk and his advisers should give the notice to terminate the existing convention, without accompanying that act by a fresh proposal calculated to promote an amicable settlement, we trust that there will be no hesitation on the part of the British Government in replying to that act by a precise intimation of what our definitive claims to the Oregon territory really are. It would have been premature and ill-timed for Mr. Pakenham to anticipate the "action of Congress (as they call it in the United States) by offering an ultimatum, or any other proposal, at that particular moment. But as soon as the decision of Congress, and the course which the President is prepared to take upon it, are officially known, we have no doubt that Mr. Pakenham will be furnished with instructions to enable him to meet the emergency with conciliation and with moderation, but without the slightest surrender of the dignity or the interests of this country. At present no such final instructions have been called for by the state of the question.

We have read with regret the language of the Washington Union, the avowed organ of Mr. Polk's Government, upon the receipt of the pacific intelligence which had just reached the United States from England. The construction which that journal puts upon the pacific tone of the British press and of some of the leading
It is unnecessary to point out to any human being in this country, capable of reading these lines, the total delusion, the perverse misconstruction, and the fatal consequences contained in these expressions of the Washington Union. It is in the highest degree dangerous to the peace of the world that such statements as these should go forth with authority in a foreign country to convey the supposed feelings and intentions of the people of England. When we see the labours of the British statesmen traduced in this manner, we could almost regret that we have not employed a rougher language and coarser arguments in the discussion of this question, as better adapted to the comprehension of trans-Atlantic controversialists. Our reluctance to irritate and embitter public feeding on this question, either at home or abroad, is misrepresented into a doubt of our own rights and a recognition of the superior rights of the other party. We are dispassionate, therefore we are about to yield; we are calm, that is a sing that the violent policy and language of Mr. Polk are on the eve of accomplishing a signal victory.

Whoever knows anything of Englishmen and England knows how false and mischievous these views of our national conduct are. Few instances have occurred in the history of nations of a people more completely and unanimously resolved than we are not to maintain the rights we have long possessed and enjoyed; yet England has not shown the slightest indication of a brutal passion for war, but, on the contrary, an earnest desire to avoid a conflict, in which we have nothing to fear and everything to inflict on our antagonist. This full confidence in the justice of a cause, which claims no more than half the object in dispute, and actually less than the territory now in our possession--this reliance on the conciliatory disposition and on the firm resolution of the Cabinet--this consciousness of possessing the most tremendous naval resources which ever hurled destruction on an enemy--have allowed the English people to remain calm, even to apparent indifference. But the American Government which builds its hopes of a speedy triumph on this foundation, deceives the people of the United States. No such indifference, no division of opinion, no hesitation as to the course it may be necessary to pursue, exist at all in England. We are told of the unanimity of the United States in the face of debates and divisions, even on the preliminary resolutions, which indicate an extreme diversity of opinions, and great doubt on all hands as to the result. In this country and in the British Parliament we are confident that the unanimity would be absolute. It is absolute both ways. Nobody is for war if it can be avoided by an equitable partition of the territory; nobody will hesitate to give the war the whole support of our national power and our individual might, if it be forced upon us by the presumption, the exorbitant demands, and the delusions of the opposite party.

Mr. Polk stands in a fearful predicament. He has endeavored to persuade the people of America that England will yield without much further difficulty to the demands he has reiterated in so peremptory a manner; and if he has failed in intimidating us, he has succeeded in deceiving them. Hence his own organs and his own declarations have made him powerless to negotiate. How can he negotiate, who assures the country that England is about to abandon to him the sum total of his demands? What concessions can he make to avoid war, when he asserts that is by refusing all concessions that England will be brought to yield? Such policy is of the most short-sighted and perilous kind; for in the position in which he now stands, the President of the United States must either make concessions, perfectly inconsistent with all his declarations, or he must run al the risk of plunging the country into a contest, which he has pretended to avoid, but which he alone may render inevitable.

[CCB]
They are grossly and dangerously mistaken. Whatever reserve may be imposed upon peers of Parliament by courtesy or by official prudence, we are confident that not one of the English statesmen who spoke last night upon this subject, contemplates the abandonment of a territory in which our rights are equal to those of any Power. The time and the place might not be fitted to a more precise and emphatic declaration of the views and intentions of England, but it would be absurd to suppose that they are a whit below the level which the interests and the dignity of the country prescribe. It would be foolish to overstate our just pretensions, but it is dangerous and unwise to allow them to be thought less than they are. We have offered to submit them to any fair arbitration; we are ready to assent to terms of equitable partition, on a principle of equality. But arbitration has been rejected, and partition itself is scarcely compatible with the claims advanced on the other side, since they are absolute and paramount. Nothing in fact remains for us to concede, since a divided right is all we are contending for, and the very principle of division is not yet admitted by the American Government.

The declaration which it now becomes us emphatically to repeat is, what we have "rights in the Oregon territory which we are resolved and prepared to maintain." That expression of Sir R. Peel and Lord Aberdeen was certainly to intemperate and ill-considered; and we have no doubt that subsequent events have not in the slightest degree diminished their resolution to adhere to it, and to all that it was understood to imply. We see nothing in the present posture of affairs which calls for, or can justify, a more subdued language on the part of the English Government; and we are persuaded that the false construction which has been put upon the very guarded declarations of the English Ministers is one of the circumstances most calculated to mislead public opinion in the United States, and possibly to enhance the unwarrantable presumption of the American Government.

Preparations for War--The American Government must be in earnest about the Oregon question, for we have just heard that General Tom Thumb has received an order to return immediately to his country to take the command of the Yankee army. -Pench

Money Market and City Intelligence

The English funds were without particular variation to-day, the amount of business transacted being exceedingly small. The last quotation for Consuls was 96 1/4 to 3/8 both for money and the account. Exchequer-bills closed 26s. to 29s. pm., and India Bonds, 25s. to 20s. pm.

The foreign securities continue much the same as yesterday. Mexican supports the advance then attained both as respects the Active and the Deferred stock. The latest bargain in the one description was at 32 3/8, and in the other at 17. Chilian was done at 96 ex div.; Colombian, at 16; Peruvian, at 36; Portuguese; at 57; Spanish Five per Cents., for the account, at 25 1/2; Venezuela, at 43 1/4 ex div.; the Deferred, at 13; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents., at 59 1/8; and India Bonds, at 25 1/2 ex div.

The Government broker's purchases to-day consisted of 21,000 l. Consuls for the National Debt Commissioners, and 5,000 l. for the savings-banks.

The rumours current yesterday respecting the transfer of the money from the former Mexican agents to their successors prove to have been not without foundation, though much which has been confidently stated on the subject turns out to be incorrect. We have the best authority for asserting that the following is the definite settlement of the point in dispute between Messrs. Lizardi and the bondholders:--Messrs. Lizardi admit the total sum due from them to the bondholders to be 65,651 l. 7s. 9d., and give bills for the amount payable in 3, 6, 9, 12, 15, and 18 months, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent from the 10th inst. At each of the first two periods one-tenth of the sum is to be paid, and at each of the four others one-fifth. The bills are already accepted, and placed in the hands of Messrs. Schneider, the present agents.

A case has recently occurred at Liverpool which has created much interest in the commercial circles of that place. It appears a person engaged in manufactures having failed, called a meeting of his creditors, when a committee of inquiry was instituted, and a compromise of 12s. 6d. in the pound was offered. This was accepted by all the creditors excepting one, who had bought a returned acceptance of the insolvent's at the rate of about 11s. in the pound. This one creditor, it should be observed, is in the same line of business as the insolvent, and he purchased the bill from one of the parties who formed the committee of inspection. He now serves a notice of bankruptcy for the full value of the bill, and the fact (say our letter) is not concealed that "the object of the bankruptcy is solely to break up the materials of the establishment, and thus stay competition."
The result is, that a large number of creditors lose the present advantage which a compromise would afford, and will have ultimately to sustain a certain loss (as no one expects 10s. in the pound under the bankruptcy), because one creditor, for some private object, refuses to take 12s. 6d. in the pound for a bill for which he gave 11s.

LT April 6, 1846, p6/b Addresses from English cities to American citizens to advocate peace

The Boston Address.

"Esteemed Citizens of Boston, in New England.—We, the inhabitants of Boston, in Old England, assembled at a public meeting convened by our Mayor, in the Town-hall, January 26, 1846, beg leave respectfully to present you this friendly address on the subject of international peace.

Two centuries ago, the inhabitants of your city, because they had received from this place the persecuted but truly venerable minister of the gospel, Mr. John Cotton, honoured our town by changing the name of their own, and adopting that of Boston. We trust that the respect then showed will always continue to be deserved; and that friendship, along with commercial intercourse, will for all generations be perpetuated, never to be interrupted by national jealousies, or by the horrors and crimes of war.

We believe war to be an evil—a pure evil, unattended by any good in its motives, actions, or results—an evil so tremendous that no earthly consideration can justify it.

We are convinced that war is destructive to all the interests of humanity, to happiness and liberty, to commerce and wealth, to science, arts, and civilization, to learning and intelligence, to philanthropy and religion.

We regard war as unreasonable; for even should it prove which party had the most strength, it would never show on which side was the most right: and we doubt no that any good which may in some cases be supposed to have resulted from fighting, could have been secured in a greater degree, more rapidly, more effectually, more widely, more permanently, and far more cheaply, by negotiation.

We observe that any Government designing an attack on the rights, liberty, happiness, and commercial prosperity of any other nation, in all cases commence by assailing the rights, liberty, property, happiness, and commerce of their own people.

We consider war to be condemned alike by the voice of conscience and experience, by natural and revealed religion; and to be unworthy of the nature of man, and contrary to the will of God. We therefore protest against our being called out to fight either against you or any other portion of the one family of man. We hope to see the day when it will be proved that war is as needless as it is pernicious; that it may be avoided; that the friends of reason and religion are able to awaken such a public sentiment on the subject, as will render it impossible for the selfish and the ambitious to turn the hand of man against his brother.

Citizens of Boston! permit us to exhort you to cherish and to spread these pacific principles; till all nations shall repose amid all the blessings of a universal and perpetual peace."

"On behalf of the Meeting, J. NOBLE, Chairman, a Member of the Town Council of Boston, Lincolnshire, England.

B. FARRINGTON (Baptist Minister), Secretary."

The Huddersfield Address

"From the Manufacturers, Merchants, and other Inhabitants of Huddersfield and its Neighborhood, To the Citizens of the United States of North America. Friends and Fellow Christians,—Permit us to take this mode of communicating with you in a spirit of friendship and brotherhood on a subject which is at present agitating the public mind, both in this country and in yours—a subject of immeasurable importance in every point of view, to our mutual interests.

We have observed with regret in many of the public papers, on both sides of the Atlantic, the manifestation of a warlike spirit, in reference to the disputed boundaries in the Oregon territory. As it is not our business, so we have no inclination to enter upon the merits of the respective claims of the two nations: our object is to induce you to unite your efforts with ours to avert the threatened calamity.

That war under any circumstances, and especially a war between two countries bound together by innumerable ties, as are England and the United States, would be a terrible calamity, is a self-evident proposition, whether as regards the severance of the nearest domestic bonds, the disturbance of our ever-growing commercial and political relations, or the disgrace of our common Christianity.
And shall it be, that two nations so far advance in civilization and refinement must, in the middle of the 19th century, adopt the brutish maxim of the most barbarous ages and countries, that 'might is right?'

Shall it be that two professedly Christian countries, both engaged in instructing and evangelizing the heathen, must set such an example to the Pagan world? Forbid it, humanity! Forbid it, justice! Forbid it, Christianity!

When private individuals adopt such a mode of settling their differences, and loss of life ensues, so great a crime is visited with the extreme penalty of the law. Happily, this manner of acting in private life is now chiefly confined to the most illiterate and depraved portion of the community; and why should we, in a national capacity, adhere to a barbarous practice, condemned by our own laws, in the relations of social life? If two intelligent and reasonable tradesmen differ, they settle the matter by arbitration; and why should not all international disputes be settled by arbitration also? It is not only more sensible, more humane, and more Christian, but far more likely than a resort to arms to terminate the disagreement to mutual satisfaction, and certainly with incomparably less expense to the exchequers of both countries.

We therefore appeal to you, the intelligent merchants and citizens, in all parts of the Union, to exert to the utmost your powerful influence with the public, and with the Federal Government, to prevent the occurrence of a war in which it would be the extreme of folly and wickedness to engage, whilst we are endeavoring to exercise a similar influence in this country. We feel confident that were the moral power thus possessed but exercised to its full and legitimate extent on both sides of the Atlantic, it would not fail to effect the object we have in view—the preservation of peace and prosperity, both in your country and our own.

Ardently desiring this happy result, we remain, &c. 16th of January, 1846. [This Address has been received the signatures of most of the leading firms in Huddersfield.]

The Plymouth Address

"Friendly Appeal from the Inhabitants of Plymouth, Great Britain, to the Citizens of the United States of America, for the purpose of averting War between the two Countries.

To the Legislators and Citizens of the United States of America.

Friends and Brethren,—We are deeply concerned to perceive that there are any indications, how remote soever, of threatened hostility between your country and our own. Towards your nation we entertain, in common with the vast majority of our fellow-subjects, feelings of sincere good-will. As the friends of peace throughout the world, we desire that all those who delight in war may be scattered; but with you, to whom we are allied by community of national origin, by identity of language, by similarity in many of our laws and institutions, we earnestly and especially deprecate hostility. Moreover, by War our commercial intercourse would be seriously impeded, the progress of civilization and of science be obstructed, immense pecuniary loss be incurred, domestic ties be broken, humanity be outraged, life to a fearful extent be sacrificed, and dire offence committed against the laws of our beneficent Creator. By war we must both lose much; and what could the victor gain that would be worth one-thousandth part of the cost of the conflict?

Again, whatever be the value of the Oregon territory, it would be a poor compensation to the owner for the blood and treasure which would be spent in acquiring it; and then, and treasure which would be spent in acquiring it; and then, too, the dispute respecting it may be easily be settled by arbitration, if other and simpler means to be ineffectual.

Let us, we entreat you, agree to exert all our influence, personal and political, on each side of the Atlantic, to frustrate the devices of those ambitious and reckless spirits, in either country, who, by precipitating us into conflict, would render us the scorn of the world; while the energies and influence of two great nations, which ought to be combined for the benefit of the entire human race, would be foolishly and wickedly employed in inflicting mutual and widely-spread injury and destruction.

Allow us, then, to hope that your cordial response to this appeal may strengthen the bonds of amity between us, and promote the interests of universal peace.

Dated Jan. 27, 1846."

[ Signed by several hundreds of the inhabitants of Plymouth, headed by the mayor, and six borough and country magistrates, and two clergymen of the Establishment.]

To work upon the feelings of brotherhood between the inhabitants of the two countries, it will be observed, that when it is possible, a town in Great Britain addresses a town of the same name in America.

To the documents which have been collected in this country, in the form of a little pamphlet, we are enabled to add another—namely, an address from New York, a copy of which is inserted in the New York Journal of Commerce:—
"To the friends of peace throughout the British realm, and especially those in Manchester, Boston, Huddersfield, Plymouth, and other places, who have issued 'Friendly Addresses' to the people of the United States.

The undersigned merchants and other inhabitants of the city of New York, earnestly desiring the preservation of the North America, and the more encouraged to expect it when they find the hearts of so many in the father-land beating in unison with their own. No triumphs of brute force over moral right ever did or can command our admiration as do these peaceful overtures, coming from a nation so powerful as England, and so well prepared for a conflict of arms, and none, we are sure were ever so approved by the Prince of Peace. The effect of these 'Friendly Addresses' upon the public mind in this country will be eminently favourable, and will do much to promote that hearty good-will which ought ever to prevail between nations bound together by so many sacred ties. Go on, then, respected friends, in your labour of love and mercy. Tell your people that our noisiest men are not the best exponents of the national sentiment towards Great Britain, or in regard to war. Tell them that in the nation at large there is a vast aggregate of moral worth, which, when called into action, as it is beginning to be, by the threatened calamities of a causeless and unnecessary war, will assurably-repress ambition, or turn it into a more peaceful channel. Tell them that this effect is already visible to a most gratifying extent, not only I your maritime cities, but throughout the land; and that it has been aided by the realization of the restrictive features of your commercial policy.

"A war of concession, compromise, mutual forbearance and good fellowship, resulting, as they necessarily must, in increasing trade, intellectual advancement, and progress in everything truly great and good, is the only war which we wish to see waged between the two nations.

As to Oregon, although from comparative proximity we naturally desire our proper share of that extensive territory, yet we will gladly concur (and we believe such is the general voice of the nation) in any fair measures of compromise, or reference, which the two Governments may see fit to adopt, for the peaceable adjustment of the question. It is clearly one which ought not, under any circumstances, to breed a war between the two countries; and we hold that without the most deplorable obstinacy and the blackest guilt on the part of one or both of the claimants, such an issue is impossible. As a matter of profit it would be infinitely better that the whole of Oregon should be sunk to the bottom of the ocean, than that two such nations as Great Britain and the United States should go to war about it, to the disgrace of civilization, Christianity, and rational freedom.

With a firm belief in the pacific disposition of both Governments, and that they will yet be enabled to settle the controversy in a manner at once just and honourable to all concerned, we look forward with hope to the future, and in the mean time beg leave to subscribe ourselves your friends and well-wishers."

LT April 10, 1846, p5/b Oregon question

The United States
Liverpool, Thursday, April 9.

Important accounts from New York to the 9th ult. inclusive, and from Washington to the 7th ult., have been received this morning by the packet-ship Independence.

On the 4th and 5th ult., as will be seen from the summary annexed, the Senate had been addressed by Mr. Heywood on the Oregon question, attacking those of his own party who held up the President as pledged to the whole Oregon, and intimating the desire of the President to compromise the question on the basis of the offer previously made by him to Great Britain. The speech created great excitement, and spread consternation amongst the extreme war party. We extract the following comments from the American journals.

"Is supposed to be an intimate friend of the President, and the end of his speech was to prove that the President stood on 49, that he held the door open for negotiation, and that he recommended Congress to give notice for the termination of the convention, with the view and expectation of bringing the controversy to a peaceful close. He insisted that the country was committed by 40 years' negotiation to agree to the parallel of 49 degrees as the boundary; that the President felt bound to act in obedience to the opinion of the country, though in his private opinion convinced that our title was clear to 54 40, and that by what he had done, and he had omitted to do, it was evident he was desirous of adjusting the controversy on the principles of compromise and peace. He had such confidence in the President, that he would vote for giving the notice without conditions. But if it should be found (of which he had no fear) that it was sought by the President as a weapon of war, and not as a means and instrument of peace, he would oppose his Administration. While then, I presume, the notice will be given by a large majority of the Senate, it will be upon conditions expressed or implied that negotiations proceed, and that should Great Britain offer to compromise on the parallel of 49, it be accepted. Such is the present aspect of the case. But these indications, auspicious to the peaceful settlement of the Oregon controversy, may, be hidden, subtle, and at present imagined causes, be darkened and disturbed. So many elements, interests, and passions are involved in the case, that to calculate their results is hardly less

"May we be permitted to say that we did not ourselves understand Mr. Haywood as intending to speak authoritatively in the name of the President, except from the printed documents. We say, with all respect, that no man, out of his Cabinet, is authorized to speak cathedra for him on this delicate and important question. He has expressed his opinion in his own message, or through the letters of the Secretary of State. We presume, that no one has a right to speak for him but from the documents which he has submitted to his country. His future course must be judged by his past conduct. Mr. Allen was himself interrogated the other day upon this question by the senator from Maryland, and Mr. Alllen referred to the President's documents for his answer. We can entertain no doubt that such was the meaning of the senator from North Carolina; and nothing but the extraordinary character of the passing scene probably prevented him from making a similarly prompt explanation. But the scene is over, and we have no doubt any little irritation, and all hasty remarks, have passed with it. The generous spirit of the senators will prevent their repetition. They are all the friends of the President. No evanescent remarks will swerve him from his course, nor disturb that self-balanced equanimity of spirit which graces the chief magistrate, who is determined to do his duty amid all the difficulties that beset his path, whether they proceed from political enemies or his friends at home, or from the Cabinets of foreign nations. Let us add that our true policy seems to us to be written in sunbeams. Decision of action and promptitude in carrying out the measures that the message recommends--the notice, the means necessary to protect our emigrants to Oregon, military preparations to meet any contingency, and the utmost harmony in our party, and unanimity in our public counsels. Are not these better (we frankly and respectfully inquire) than any speculations as to the precise terms on which we may settle the question--terms which should not now be communicated to foreign nations, or any remarks or hypothetical opinions which may be unauthoritatively attributed to the President. Upon one other topic we must venture one more remark. The question of the next presidency came into the debate. Were we to point out the most direct way of breaking down any man, it would be to start him now, or soon, on the presidential track. Those who try it all this early day would be sure to be defeated; for it would be an evidence of an ambitious and selfish spirit, which would be sufficient to forfeit the confidence of a great, enlightened, and free people. What is the this noble country, the like of which sun never shone upon, to be converted into a mere plaything of any man's ambition? Is this great people to be moved backwards and forwards like the pawns upon the chess-board, at the foolish and mischievous bidding of any reckless aspirant? This country belongs to the people. It is their Government--their offices to give, and theirs to take away. And it is a duty they owe to themselves, to tell all men to wait their will, and bide their time. When they want a man to serve them, they will call upon him, and not before."

"Has taken a turn which must awaken through the land an interest like that which it excited in Washington. The speech of Mr. Heywood, exhibiting the subject in its present position, touching its main points with great force, and claiming distinctly and repeatedly that the President is pledged to accept the offer, should it be made, of a settlement on the basis of the 49th parallel, might well be expected to create the sensation it did among the war members of the Senate. The interlocutory altercation respecting the President's position and pledges made some startling expositions. It would seem, from their own statements, that such men as Messrs. Allen and Hannegan still insist on 'every inch of Oregon' at all hazards, and would fain commit the President to that extreme demand, with the full expectation of its leading sooner or later to war. They go, 'neck or nought,' for the whole of Oregon; talk of the President as turning traitor (to whom or what? To his country or only to the clique of a party?) if he should compromise upon the 49th, and in hot passion declare, 'he would be sunk in an infamy so profound, a damnation so deep, that the hand of resurrection could never draw him forth.' It is, however, an ill wind that blows no good; and even from this hurricane of disappointed wrath we gather new hope of peace. The bear, driven to the wall, growls and gnashes his teeth in sheer vexation at his own impotence; and the war spirits of the Senate, the sticklers for a claim so extravagant as to be discarded by all fair minds, betray by their extreme sensitiveness to the statements of Mr. Heywood, how fearful they are of being abandoned by the President to the recoil of their own suicidal folly. They must, if their ears are open, hear every day echoes from the people calling for peace, on such terms of fair and honourable negotiation or compromise as are still within the reach of either party to the pending dispute. Even their own West will not sustain them in the mad policy of plunging 50 millions of people into war about such a bone of contention; and, left in so small a minority of the Senate and the country, we wonder not that they should write under the speech of Mr. Haywood, and threaten to empty the vials of their wrath upon the President if he does not lend himself to the execution of their favourite, but fatal plans. To us it seems quite clear that these men are really bent on war. No other supposition can account for their course; because they must know that England will never yield to the exorbitant claim which they make. On looking again over the map of Oregon, drawn by the late exploring expedition, we have just counted nearly a dozen English forts in the country north of 49, and about half as many in the regions drained by the Columbia river. If we take the number of places thus occupied as the basis of comparison, we shall find the British claim, on the score of actual possession, much better than ours; and it would seem from this very map of our own, that a compromise on the 49th parallel would oblige England to yield far more than we should, and give us decidedly the best bargain. Indeed, we should give up nothing that is now in our possession, while she would relinquish a considerable number of places which she has occupied for a long time. No man, looking at this map, and seeing how extensively England has dotted it over with her forts, can for a moment suppose she will ever yield the whole territory to a claimant occupying not a quarter so many places as she does, and none at all between 49 and 54 40, of which tract she has had actual possession for some 40 years. We wonder at the strange demands of these men; and we feel a thrill of honest pride as co patriots, when we hear Mr. Heywood boldly avowing, in the name of our Government and our country, that 'we would not demand the whole of Oregon, even if we could obtain it without a war.' That was a noble anewal; the world will admire it; all fair-minded men through the land will cordially respond to it; and, if such a spirit were carried into renewed negotiations, we should confidently anticipate a speedy adjustment, to the substantial satisfaction of both parties. We think it clear that the question of peace or war now rests with ourselves. England has evinced a spirit decidedly pacific; but our rulers and people must take care not to calculate too much on her continued forbearance. The war passion once roused there in earnest would render a collision inevitable; and, should popular sentiment here second the demand of the war-men in our Senate for all Oregon at all hazards, then war must come. Here is the alternative; and it is time for the nation to look it full in the face; and, as they wish for peace, to rebuke the spirit and policy which would provoke war."

The secret position of the Oregon question still continued to excite many and varied rumours. The official organ at Washington remarks upon them, declaring that the Cabinet at that city had decided to submit a proposition to Great Britain for the settlement of the question upon the basis of the 49th parallel:

"We have no doubt that these are all visions of the imagination. No ultimatum has been sent-no offer has been made--none will probably be made, because we humbly conceive it becomes the duty of the British Government to offer one in its turn. The theatre of any negotiation has no been shifted to London. And yet the President has not abated in the slightest degree the desire which has been twice expressed by his Secretary of State, to adjust the whole question in a harmonious and peaceful manner. Certainly these rumours are not calculated to advance their object, because they deceive the people of both countries as to the views and designs of the American Government. They only tend to prevent the adoption of the measures which may consummate this desirable object."

The Journal of Commerce of the 9th ult. contains the following interesting statement:

"The expectations which have been formed in New York, and I may say here too, of a speedy renewal of the Oregon correspondence are too sanguine. It is true that, on Wednesday morning, the 25th ult., Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Colquitt had an interview of two hours on this subject with the President; and all the rumours of another offer to Great Britain--of the transfer of the negotiation to London--of a renewal of the negotiation to London--of a renewal of the negotiation by Mr. Pakenham, &c., have grown out of that circumstance. It appears that the interview spoken of had some reference to Mr. Colquitt's proposition, which was that day offered, and the next day discussed. But you will see from Thursday's discussion, that Mr. Calhoun was very far from entertaining the belief that the question very near to an adjustment; and, indeed, he exhibited in his manner, as well as in his remarks, more than usual anxiety on this subject. He was exceedingly anxious Mr. Colquitt's proposition should be adopted at once, and sent out to England by the Cambria, as a sort of invitation to an overture from the British Government. He said that he was convinced that the British Government would make no further offer until the action of Congress was known. If Mr. Calhoun had been apprised that this Government will make an overture. He thinks the British Government may, when the Senate have shown an 'earnest desire that the question be settled by compromise and negotiation;' and he justly infers that the President will be influenced also to accept an overture for a compromise, by so strong a majority as to show that he will be sustained by the Senate in any treaty that he may make. Nothing can be more manifest than that the initiation of the renewed negotiation belongs to the British Government. The most that Mr. Polk will do, in my opinion, is possibly to intimate, through Mr. M'Lane, that the United States Government expect another overture, inasmuch as theirs was not received not entertained by the British Minister. Unless the British Government choose to make some overture similar to that which their Minister refused to communicate to his Government, then the two Governments are much farther off from an adjustment of the question than they have ever been--as far off as they could be, even in case of the refusal of Mr. Polk to negotiate any further."

Relations with Mexico excited little attention, and remained apparently unchanged.

The domestic affairs of the Union are unworthy of note.

Money was easy, and stocks buoyant. Bills were steady at 1081/2 to 9 premium, though with low sales since the departure of the steamer.

Twenty-Ninth Congress. Senate, March 4.

The Oregon Question.

On the motion of Mr. Servier, the Senate resumed the special order of the day, being the resolutions from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the various amendments proposed in reference to the abrogation of the convention with Great Britain establishing the joint occupation of the Oregon territory.

Mr. Heywood took the floor, and if the Senate were startled at the bold and fearless positions he assumed, they were not less interested and attracted for upwards of two hours by the singularly fearless and unshaken spirit which characterized the senator's argument. Mr. Heywood, in the outset, said he should discuss the subject in the love of man and in the fear of God. He denounced that spirit which had sought to take the subject of our foreign relations from the authority of the Executive department—that spirit of faction which would break down great men and great measures for the elevation of very little men into great offices. He justified the patriotic motives of the President in the policy he had pursued. He disapproved of the reproduction in this debate of a certain old speech of Colonel Benton, which had been abridged, but not improved. He bore down heavily against the practice, which had become so notorious, of decrying and carping against the Treaty of Washington, for the settlement of the north-east boundary, and wondered why some one of the 39 senators voting for that treaty had not refuted the factious clamours by which they had been assailed. He did not (to use a familiar term) like this singing of old psalms over dead horses; that in this treaty we had been overreached, and cheated, and the country dishonoured. No, the President, in adopting that treaty resolved all hazards of this sort into the sense of moderation, and prudence, and national justice, that forms the higher character of this Senate. Mr. Heywood denounced the clamorous spirit of discord which had characterized the discussions in Congress upon this subject—which would urge the President to issue his mandate of defiance against all the nations of the earth. The great and patriotic question which now presented itself was, what shall we do for the country, and what is our position? On the 12th of August, 1845, the President stood on the line of 49 degrees; he offered it; it was refused. The British Government had offered arbitration, and that had been refused by the Executive; and if this were with a view of shutting off all compromise, the Executive; and if this were with a view of shutting off all compromise, the Executive had, indeed, incurred a fearful responsibility. But the line of 49 was not now inadmissible. Mr. Heywood challenged any senator to show that 54 40 was mentioned in the President's Message. No, Sir, if the line of 49 is proposed to him, he is bound to accept it; a different policy would provoke certain differences, a national dishonour and irremediable war. The door of negotiations was still open. Mr. Heywood had said so at the opening of the session; he said so now. He was prepared for a compromise at 49 without disputing about inches. He was prepared, then, to go for the notice, with a view to the facilitating a pacific adjustment. He wanted no finesses in this matter; he believed there would be none; that there was none on the part of the Administration. Our title, however "clear and unquestionable," was not unquestioned. It had been in dispute for 40 years. 40 years ago, we had offered that line as the boundary westward, as it was eastward to the Rocky Mountains. The convention of 1818 had been approved by a vote of 38 to 1, and yet, in the opinion of gentlemen, all but the one man were traitors to their country. This was the necessary conclusion from their opinions of the treaty. The convention with Russia was held with an especial design to negotiate Great Britain to the concession of the 49th degree; and in the very treaty with Russia settling the northern boundary of the territory at 54 40, which under the Spanish claims should have been at the 61st degree, our ancestors had sanctioned a dismemberment of the union; we had been bullied, so to speak, by Russia, out of our national rights. And yet that treaty passed by a vote of 41 to 1. (Voices--"Who was he? Who was that one, pray?") Mr. De. Wolf. (A laugh.) He was from Rhode Island, and was therefore, perhaps, infavour of large states. In 1826 our Minister at London renewed the efforts of our Government for a settlement upon the line of 49—he almost implored that settlement. Had he threatened, he might, for all we know, have had better success. The treaty of 1818 was adopted by the Senate by a full, a very full two-thirds, notwithstanding the opposition and the prophecies of the Senator from Missouri (Colonel Benton), and under that convention we have been living ever since. When was the discovery made that all these proceedings, so often renewed by our predecessors, involved a surrender of national soil, of the national honour, and the rights of the people? Where was the warning voice against Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Monroe, and Mr. Adams? Are all these lofty precedents to be overruled by the dictation of the Baltimore Convention? And are we to assume that the Government is now released from its policy and concessions of 40 years? The President was right in his offer of 49. He felt that his official character was of greater moment than the declarations of James K. Polk. The President and James K. Polk were two different personages. And if the President was right in offering the line of 49, he was right in holding himself in readiness to meet that offer. The President was not released by the pitiful appeal to the Baltimore Convention. Mr. Heywood took occasion to say, that "if the Administration, as assumed, after all that has transpired to a contrary conclusion, be inexorably fixed it 54 40, the, God knows, I'll turn away from it." Mr. Heywood then said, in opposition to the Radicals, that if truth was logic—if there was faith in public servants, and meaning in the English language, he should demonstrate that the administration was open to all compromise on the Oregon question. If there was an Englishman here, if you were an Englishman (looking to a senator), and it was proposed to kick you out of a territory (north of 49), which you had occupied exclusively for 40 years—would you not fight, Sir? It was useless to talk about it. President Tyler had negotiated for the line of 49, and there had been no complaint. Mr. Heywood continued by an examination of the President's message, his acts of omission and commission, in the prosecution of his argument. One of the omissions of the President was a failure to recommend preparations for war. The estimates were even less than usual. And yet while Mr. Heywood knew that a treaty of compromise would meet the concurrence of the Senate by a vote of two-thirds or three-fourths, there were gentlemen who would make an after-use of their clamours, by saying "if my advice had been followed, there would have been no surrender of a foot south of 53 40." In a most scathing strain of criticism upon the position of the advocates of the northern extreme of 54 40, Mr. Heywood came down to the remark of Mr. Allen in his last speech, that in the formal occupation of the whole territory we had nothing to fear—that upon the Oregon question, single-handed, England dare not fight.

Mr. Allen explained his remark. England would not dare to go to war upon the Oregon question alone; but that, if she did go to war, there would be other state questions embraced in the issue.

Mr. Heywood replied, that as Chairman on Foreign Relations, the hon. Senator might have information in his possession not accessible to the Senate, in reference to those other causes of war. He had understood the senator to say, however, that England dare not go to war about Oregon, and Oregon was the question now under discussion.

Mr. Allen desired the senator should report truly what he had said.

Mr. Heywood said he was very much in the habit of doing so. He was not, however, in the habit of carrying printed speeches about him, and he believed the senator had not reported his yet. They were told by the papers, too, not to rely on what had been reported as the senator's speech, so that they were left at a loss
Some further remarks, of no particular moment, passed between Mr. Heywood and the Chairman on Foreign Relations, and the former was again about resuming the thread of his argument, when, upon suggestion, he suspended till to-morrow, and the Senate adjourned.

March 5.

The adjourned debate was resumed by Mr. Heywood. He said, at the close of his remarks yesterday, that in the acts of omission and commission, which were charged on part of the President of the United States, it was manifest that his object was pacific, and not such as one (looking at Mr. Allen) would have the Senate believe. The President had not closed the doors of negotiation, nor had he an intention to trap us into war. He would ask, what was there in the President's message to justify the conclusions drawn by some senators, to justify these opinions in relation to war? Mr. Heywood here cited that portion of the President's message, commencing at page 10, having reference to the question of Oregon, and then went on to say that the President had not closed the doors of the Executive department against negotiation, which was abundantly evident from the tenor of his remarks in the message. These very passages in the message were yet the passages which a certain senator held up as tending to close all negotiation. In addition to this the President expressed a "hope" in his message, that "some further proposals shall be made to settle this question. What other proposal that was, or whether it was or was not offered, was another question. He (Mr. Heywood) was defending the President and the Administration against the inference drawn by certain senators which gave so warlike a character to his message. The message spoke of the "wholly inadmissible demands of the British Government;" but nothing could be inferred to show that negotiation had closed. The President had marched up to 49; but as regards 59 40, the ground was yet open. If there was any senator in the Chamber who would stand up and say that he believed the President was abusing the trust reposed to him, by the introduction of this notice, he should wish to see him. The President was, by withdrawing his proposition as to the 49th parallel, did not close the doors of negotiation. He (Mr. Haywood) would give way this moment, to shut the doors, and dispose of the question; but there was a difference between making a speech, and giving a vote. (Laughter). Some members could make a speech one way, and voted another. (Laughter). When asked how he thought upon the subject he had discussed, he could, if he chose, say to one party. "Look at my vote," and to another, "Look at my speech." (Renewed shouts of laughter.) It reminded him of an advice which a member had received, "never to vote with the majority;" for, if he did, and the law happened to be a bad one, the people would condemn him--if a good one, they would then give him credit for great sagacity. (Loud laughter.) His (Mr. Heywood's) first appearance in public life was in compliance with a call from his political friends to attend a meeting for the purpose of adopting measures to alter the constitution. He attended, but gave them an (Mr. Heywood's) representation on the 6th protocol, as quoted by Mr. Heywood. It was irregular action in any shape, and expressed his faith in the controlling supervision of Providence. He deprecated the consequences which would result from a rash or precipitate, or unwise, or irregular action in any shape, and expressed his faith in the controlling supervision of Providence.

Mr. Johnson.--Three, if you please.

Mr. Heywood--Yes, the "Tyler Convention" was the third. (Loud laughter.) As to the charge of "Punic faith" against the south, which it was stated had been bound by the Baltimore Convention, he repudiated that charge. He should be glad to know if the President himself knew the terms of the Baltimore convention when he accepted the nomination? He had not known the terms, for he had only time to respond to the nomination. He was merely asked, "Will you accept the nomination?" and he answered as quick as the magnetic telegraph, "I will, to be sure; and I wish you may elect me." (Loud laughter). Much declamation had been used, much discussion in distrusting political opponents--some saying it was a western question--others damning the British, (laughter)--some saying it was an American question, others turning it into a question of party politics and President-making among the people. Mr. Heywood deprecated the idea of allowing the people to have a share in the treaty-making power, which was reserved by the constitution exclusively for the Executive department of the Government. This was southern democracy; and if it were "Punic faith," they might make the most of it. He denied that the people, organized by factions and instructed by demagogues, had a right to instruct the Senate in the discharge of its public duties. If this was democracy--as was held by some to be--it was that democracy that grows at the root, like the potato, and not at the blossom; it was going backward. If it were, however, to be viewed as a national question, he, in common with the Senate, would be found by the side of his country. But according to the terms of the Baltimore Convention--they went by the terms of the Convention, for the "reannexation of Texas," and for the "reoccupation of Oregon." The 49th parallel was the highest degree to which any American foot ever went in Oregon. The south would go for that; and if that was "Punic faith" in going for the "reoccupation of Oregon," let them make the most of it. He was in favour of the simple "notice," but would not vote in favour of the resolution of the house. He also objected to the propositions contained in the resolutions of some senators in the Chamber, and had a particular objection to the word "forthwith," which accompanied the resolutions from the Committee on Foreign Relations. He was willing to give the President legislative aid, if he required it; but if not, and he preferred to manage it himself, he would allow him to do so, for he had a right to do so if he pleased, under the clauses of the constitution. Mr. Heywood, after expounding his objections to the amendment of Mr. Colquitt, recommending negotiations and a compromise, advocated the adoption of the house resolutions as covering an all-sufficient ground. He wished no interference or advice with the duties of the executive, until the case should imperatively demand it. He then extended his thanks to the Senate for their indulgence; and said that if he had, perhaps, wearied the Senate, his heart felt lighter and his conscience easy. He deprecated the consequences which would result from a rash or precipitate, or unwise, or irregular action in any shape, and expressed his faith in the controlling supervision of Providence.
simply a part of a letter of Mr. Pakenham, and not of the protocol paper. It related to the Oregon boundary.

Mr. Hannegan apologized to the Senate that his remarks should be limited. Before he proceeded, he wished to ask of the senator from North Carolina whoever had authority, direct or indirect, for saying that the President was desirous of settling the question upon the line of 49?

Mr. Heywood replied, that what he had said he had written down beforehand, that he might not make a mistake; and that was, that it would be indecent and impolite for the President to communicate the progress of negotiations.

Mr. Allen then said he should construe the reply of the senator to mean that he had no authority form the President for his declarations.

Mr. Heywood said that he had already endeavoured to prove that the senator was erroneous in his constructions.

Mr. Allen demanded it as a right, that the senator should answer his question. If not, he should deny that he had any authority.

Mr. Heywood said, that if he were a chairman of a committee, say, for instance, the Committee on Commerce, and he were not accessible to the executive confidence, he would quit.

Mr. Westcott--I call the senator to order.

Mr. Heywood--Don't be alarmed. There is no harm done. He did not recognize the right of any body to make demands upon him upon that floor. Out of doors he was disposed to accommodate a gentleman in anything reasonable; and for the sake of order he had submitted to circumstances which were humiliating. He repeated what he had said, and he would print it afterwards.

Mr. Allen did not demand his answer of the senator as a personal, but as a public right. The senator from North Carolina had assumed to be the exponent of the President; and he desired to know--

Mr. Westcott called the senator to order.

Mr. Heywood contended that he had denied the right of any senator to catechize him, and refusing to answer such demand, the senator was out of order in persisting in it.

Mr. Allen--Then the senator takes back his speech.

Mr. Heywood--No Sir, but I am glad to see the speech takes. (Laughter.)

Mr. Allen exclaimed, amid the excitement, "Its British, British."

Mr. Hannegan did not see the senator's (Mr. Heywood's) speech in print, in any of the papers, &c. He (Mr. Hannegan) assumed that the President's position at 54 40, was as clear as proofs from Holy Writ--clear as the Bible--and that he would be a recreant to his pledges and his party if he deserted this stand. Referred to the Baltimore Convention Oregon resolution, and thought the senator had misapplied it.

Mr. Heywood said he saw it in the speech of Mr. Breese, the only place, perhaps, where ever he did see it, and read it, and again commented upon the re-occupation of Oregon.

Mr. Hannegan read the resolution, and contended that the interpretation stood at 54 40; and spoke at some length under evident excitement in denunciation of the speech of Mr. Heywood. He said that if the President did desert, the 54 40 standard, he would become a traitor to his faith, and would meet with an infamy so profound, a damnation so deep, that the resurrection trumpet would not wake him. (General laughter and some applause.) Mr. Hannegan was proceeding to some commentary upon the constructions put upon the President's message by Mr. Heywood, when

Mr. Mangum called the senator to order.

Mr. Hannegan thanked the senator, and resumed his retaliation. He referred to Mr. Heywood's declaration that there was a movement on this question to elevate very small men into very large offices. He had heard such talk before to day--"Glass houses," &c., old maxim, but true. But Mr. Hannegan would prefer to be one of these small men to the mere tool of power, courting its becks and nods. If the President was in the position in which the senator from North Carolina had placed him, then had he spoken the works of falsehood with the tongue of a serpent.

On the motion of Mr. Evans, at ten minutes past 4, the Senate adjourned.
There is a split, and there will be the deuce to pay.

LT April 11, 1846, p4/b Oregon question

We acknowledge our inability to follow the devious and interminable course of the American debate on the resolutions for the abrogation of the Oregon Convention, for it bids defiance to all the ordinary limitations of space and time. On the 4th of March we find that the Senate resumed the special order of the day upon this subject, and Mr. Heywood, the senator for North Carolina, took possession of the floor for that and the following day, and delivered a speech which was understood to convey a very mitigated version of the President's own opinions and intentions. Upon the announcement of this gentleman that the President was by no means indisposed to renew the negotiation for a compromise upon the 49th parallel, Mr. Hannegan, a member of the "whole of Oregon faction," declared, with that felicity of expression which belongs to Transatlantic Parliamentary eloquence, that "if the President did desert the 54 40' "standard, he would become a traitor to his faith, and meet with an infamy so profound, a damnation so deep, that the resurrection trumpet would not wake him.” The excitement produced by this memorable sitting and this awful announcement appears to have disturbed the wanted composure of even the reporters' gallery; for the account of the proceedings of the day concludes with as much portentous information as could be crammed into a single line,—"there is a split, and there will be the deuce to pay;" and in that condition the American newspapers of that date barbarously leave us.

It happens, however, that some loose papers of the 18th of March have since been received through Havre, and from them we learn that on the 16th ult., nine days after Mr. Heywood's speech and Mr. Hannegan's adjuration, the debate was going on with unabated activity, though we have fortunately escaped the flood of eloquence which must have been poured forth between Mr. Heywood and Mr. Calhoun; and we may pass at once to the consideration of the speech of the latter eminent politician. Mr. Calhoun's declaration were eminently pacific and courageous. He did not flinch from telling the people of America those wholesome but unwelcome truths which can alone restrain them from plunging their country into a disastrous war. Under a popular form of government there is no greater danger than that the multitude should be amused by pleasing delusions, and the no one should have the courage to address them in the stern language of truth. Louis XIV., surrounded by his mistresses and his courtiers, was not more unlikely to learn unwelcome and disparaging fact, than the American people in the pride of their democratic power; but men are apt to palliate this species of deception under the name of loyalty, or of patriotism, and the more so as it seems dangerous to disclose to the world at large a weakness which is so imperfectly known at home. Such disclosures, however, teach nothing new to foreign Governments, whatever they may do to the people of America. Every fact brought forward by Mr. Calhoun in his last speech has long been familiar to the more impartial observer of Europe. We ourselves have repeatedly argued, almost in the words of the American senator, the "war would involve the United States in a new and irremediable national debt—lead to the establishment of a rotten paper system—concentrate all the powers of the state into a federal Government, and terminate in a central military despotism."

Mr. Calhoun's language is plainer and less courteous than that in which we have asserted the same truths; but in Europe they need no vigour of expression or subtlety of argument to enforce them, whilst in America the statesman who would save his country by these means must drive them home to men's minds in sheer opposition to the vanity, and ignorance, and presumption of a whole community. In other states the Government may be silent on its own weak points, provided it has the address to avoid those occasions and collisions which expose them to the light of day. But the weakness as well as the strength of the United States must, to use one of their own metaphors, be "written in the sunbeams," and asserted with all the known patriotism and experience of Mr. Calhoun, before the people can be brought to descend from the preposterous and inflated claims which have been made in their name to the reality of their rights and their situation.

But we rejoice to find that a stout resistance is at length offered, by men who may be ranked, with Mr. Calhoun, amongst the most distinguished of American citizens, to the mischievous delusions and pretensions which have been so industriously propagated and upheld in the United States. Nothing so able, so just, or so strong has been written upon this controversy on our side of the Atlantic as a pamphlet entitled Tracts on the Oregon Question, by an American, which has just reached us from New York. The writer has dealt with the fallacies of the American Secretary of State with signal justice and severity. He has reduced the whole question to those general propositions upon which alone it can ultimately be decided, without sinking the argument into that labyrinth of minute and irrelevant detail from which American sophistry has endeavored to extract a claim, and into which the congenial spirit of a Quarterly reviewer has recently pursued it. We hope this excellent pamphlet may be republished without delay in this country, and in the meanwhile our readers will not be sorry to peruse the observations with which it concludes: --

"we have no hesitation in saying that England has made our Government a liberal offer;--the offer to relinquish to us all those parts of the country of which she is not already the first occupant, under a fair and reasonable, or at any rat, not extravagant application of the doctrines of constructive possession an deconstructive sovereignty. She has even offered to share with us the navigation of the Columbia river, of which she is without doubt the first occupant, the pretenses of the United States to the contrary no withstanding. To say that we will not accept this offer, nor submit the question to arbitration, is unequalled infatuation;--it is taking a stand in which the people of this country, we predict with confidence, will not sustain the Administration. You may depend upon, Mr. Polk, this thing will never do. They will cheerfully go all lengths in vindicating the clear and just rights of the country, either against England, or against the world, if needful; but if you persist in urging your mistaken views of their right, and causelessly assume an aggressive attitude towards foreign nations, you may rest assured that you will soon feel the weight of popular resentment. It is a great national controversy, on which the attention of the whole world is fixed. There is scarcely a lawyer on earth who will not rigidly scrutinize every word which you and your secretary have uttered; and we will venture to affirm, that an immense majority of the profession will condemn your pretensions, will ridicule your arguments, and reprobate your folly. They will tell you that you are wrong altogether wrong; that the United States are shut up by the convention of 1818 to an equitable partition of the country; that such was, no doubt, the meaning of the statesmen and diplomatists who acted on behalf of the United States in framing that convention, whatever any of them may now say, that such is the legal import, the fair construction of the instrument, and that after a quarter of a century of acquiescence in such an arrangement you cannot now evade it. They will tell you, that if the negotiators of the United States on that occasion had considered the exclusive claim of the United States to be 'clear and questionable,' and had intended to keep the question open, they might and ought to have protested against any use or occupation of the country by England in any shape; that the reason why they did not do this was, that the question manifestly depended upon the first occupancy of the country; and it was clearly seen by them, that they should allow England, without any conventional arrangement, to become the first occupant, as she was then likely to become, and has since in fact become, of a large proportion of the country, the claim of the United States, even under a protest, would be foreclosed; that they were therefore willing to make sure of an equal undivided moiety of the country, subject only to the claims of other nation; and to the condition that the arrangement should not be construed to prevent either party, so long as it continued in force, and until it should be superseded by a partition, from asserting any claim to the country, or making any use or appropriation of its soil or its waters, which should not necessarily involve the exercise of exclusive sovereignty. They will tell you that this was the meaning of the subordinate saving clause above discussed--nothing more; and that all your late proceedings are a violation of the spirit of that convention, an insult to the common sense of the world."

The chief valued of these remarks is, that they are essentially American, and that they are dictated by a sound and enlightened view of the American interests which are engaged on the side of peace and good faith. Mr. Polk and his adherents have excited and abetted the warlike declarations of the party which has declared for the whole of Oregon, chiefly with a view to popularity, indirectly perhaps with a view to the effects of military patronage and influence on the community. Reasonable hopes may now be entertained that their policy and their designs will be frustrated and rejected. That popularity which they have dared to seek in false, incentives to war would bring them, in less than six months of hostilities, within the grasp of an impeachment: and the evils they may draw down upon the United States as a nation could fall with tenfold weight upon their own heads as a party. As far as we can judge from the tone of this debate in the Senate, from the press, and from our own correspondence, the reaction has now commenced, and the disposition of the American people is pacific. If that be the case, the termination of the convention of 1827 will not actually take place before the whole question has been equitably adjusted. Mr. Polk will have the rare good fortune of being defeated by a people less rash than the men who govern it; and he will retire from his office unregretted indeed by any one, but free, at least, from the lasting disgrace of having broken the peace of the world.

LT April 11, 1846, p6/b Mexico, affairs of

"The Affairs of Mexico" (From our own correspondent.) Mexico, Feb. 27.

The arrival of the January packet from England was looked forward to by most persons here with considerable anxiety, as some strong manifestation was expected from the English press on the subject of the President's message, and hopes were entertained that its warlike tone would be more than re-echoed from your side of the water. The Mexican Government, anxious not to humble itself to its powerful neighbour, hoped to make some advantageous terms in case of a rupture; and, although they make the "grasping policy of England"--its designs on the Californias, a pretended fear of its intervention in the affairs of this country--a constant theme of declamation and complaint, they cannot shut their eyes to the fact that England has always been her steadiest friend.

They cannot forget that England was the first Power to recognize, their independence, the first to lend their infant republic immense sums on more that doubtful security, and to send out large capital to work their mining district. Later in the day England stepped in to offer her mediation with France; and even the Texas question would have been honourably arranged by her for them if the absurd pretensions and wavering policy of the Mexican Government had not frustrated endeavors.

Thus, in the event of war, they trusted again to the same influence in their favour, although their conduct to England has ever been the reverse of meritng it. Their whole fiscal regulations have been directed against the introduction of British manufactures; and their obnoxious duties on the export of silver, and their manner of enforcing them, have been directed to paralyse British operations. The result may be seen in the effects produced. After 20 years of an open market, British imports have not increased. The exports from England annually to all the ports of this country fall for short of a million sterling, and instead of British mercantile houses, extending themselves over the country, even in the capital the number is yearly diminishing, and I am within the mark when I assert that the number of British houses in all parts of the republic do not exceed 30.

Whatever politically might be the effect of American aggression on this country, commercially speaking, it would be beneficial to the interests of Great Britain. By giving a security to property in the suppression of annual revolutions, by the construction of roads, and rendering their transit free from the now constant attacks of bandits, by giving tolerance in religion, and restraining the benumbing influence of the priesthood, this country, blessed with a splendid climate and fertile soil, now sunk in apathy and degradation, would put forth its dormant energies, would raise bread-stuffs enough to feed the world and cotton to clothe it, and its vast crops of sugar, coffee, tobacco, and other valuable tropical products, would give employment to a vast mercantile marine. An increase of communication and intelligence would create an appetite for the wants of civilization; and that period arriving, Mexico would be a market worthy of the attention of British commerce, and not, as now, only left to those who entered it when the prospects were alluring, and only remain from the difficulty of diverting capital from a channel where it has been once invested.

Speculating thus, if America from no goodwill to us, but following up her grasping policy at the modern Carthage, were permitted by European Powers to plant at any future day her eagles in the city of Mexico, the preponderance of the Southern States would be so great, the slaveholders and cotton growers so much brought into collision of interest with the Northern, that more than probably a dissolution of the Union would violently take place, and two great republics spring out of the disruption. The Northern Republic, having New York for its commercial port and emporium, and the Southern New Orleans, would thus form, when railroads and steam-boats induce a rapid communication, compact republics of what are now disjointed and barely communicable provinces. Suppose this were to occur 20 or 50 years hence? What would Great Britain lose by it? I confess I see on the contrary a positive gain. She would hold the balance between two republics, whose very jealousy would soon convert them into rival and implacable enemies; she would have created for her a vast new market for her ever-progressing commerce, and she would command a choice for raw material, for which she is now mainly dependent on one source. Years may elapse—must elapse—before the semblance of what I have written may come to pass; but the mind of interest tends onwards to this consummation, and the parallel events of the former his of a monarchy and the speculations of this party on the advantage of a monarchy and the choice of a foreign Prince to rule over them, they forget that there must be two parties to a bargain. Few Princes would accept so precarious a crown as Mexico would be, unless Europe, in spite of the blistering of the United States, should at once in this disturbed republic adopt and maintain the policy of armed intervention, and send 40,000 bayonets to maintain him.

With respect to the present state of this country, the recent revolution does not seem to present greater securities or advancement and permanence than the former ones. General Almonte has resigned his post as Minister of War, and has been succeeded by General Tornel; and these changes, occurring so shortly after the formation of the Cabinet, have given rise to distrust and speculation.

The law for calling together the new Congress, or the Convocation as it is called, has been published: it provides for the election of 160 deputies, of which the clergy, commerce, and military each send 20 members. Its further provisions would not be interesting, more especially as it is an extremely verbose document. It seems to have given satisfaction; all events it has been received with the usual apathy, and will be carried out until some newer plan is struck or by some new adventure.

Among the singular features presented by the late revolution is the appearance of a monarchial party here, whose cause is sustained by a new paper established for that purpose, called the Tiempo. Its articles have been written with singular vigour and ability, and are attributed to Don Lucas Alaman, a name known to many in Europe, and formerly a member of the Government. But in the speculations of this party on the advantages of a monarchy and the speculations of this party on the advantage of a monarchy and the choice of a foreign Prince to rule over them, they forget that there must be two parties to a bargain. Few Princes would accept so precarious a crown as Mexico would be, unless Europe, in spite of the blistering of the United States, should at once in this disturbed republic adopt and maintain the policy of armed intervention, and send 40,000 bayonets to maintain him.

It is supposed that General Paredes favours this consolidation of affairs, and his opinion will have great weight; he is a well-meaning man, and although not supposed to be a man of talent, his integrity and honest intentions have never been questioned.

That he has influence, the quick result of his late political movement is a proof; but to captivate these sons of Spanish origin so much verbiage is obliged to be used in professions of faith previously, that expectations are raised that some important changes and improvement are immediately to follow a revolution; then comes disappointment and dissatisfaction, and already unquiet spirits are beginning to foment new projects. I do not think we shall have an outbreak soon, but it will arrive, and it will be a contest for principles; formerly it has merely been a struggle for military successions, but a growing spirit is springing up of inquiry and discussion, which must bring into collision matter and mind.

The new tariff came into operation on the 1st inst. Its reduction of duties weight lightly on woolen and linen goods, but on cottons there is a relief of from 20 to 25 per cent., which must tend to increase consumption. We advance slowly here in the first principles of free trade, and have yet to learn that low duties increase both the demand and the revenue, giving protection by their nature to the fair trader, and an increased income to the Treasury.

The mining accounts are generally favourable, and new mines are commencing to be worked. I believe, on a rough estimate, the produce of the whole mines in the republic last year was nearly 25,000,000 of collars,
The Exchange by this packet, 43d.

Postscript.--The American Minister, Mr. Slidell, is still in Jalapa, watching the progress of events, and it is rumoured that shortly some American claims will be forced on this Government.

This Government have granted licenses for the importation of American cotton into the port of Vera Cruz on the payment of $10 per quintal, and several houses have taken them out for large quantities.

The Minister of Finance has contracted with a commercial house here for 1,800,000, half in cash and the other half in bonds of the 26 per cent., giving to the contractors securities of various kinds, among which is the Vera Cruz Custom house; the part already appropriated for the English dividends and other funds is, of course, requested.

In exchange, or sales of goods, the operations have been very trifling.

The Exchange by this packet, 43d.

El Tiempo, a daily paper established here since the last revolution, and regarded as official, advocates without reserve the establishment of a monarchy in Mexico, with a Spanish Bourbon on the throne--the plan originally proclaimed by Iturbide in Iguala. A Protectorate is perhaps the form of government best suited to his country under present circumstances; and a leader enjoying the popularity which Santa Anna sacrificed to gold would have no great difficulty in establishing such a system, preserving the name and some of the forms of a republic. Paredes may do as much, but without foreign aid the monarchial project is impracticable, and even with such of doubtful success. Young Mexico is altogether republican, and of the old stock there remain no elements from which to form an aristocracy. In a country where the broad distinction of colour has ceased to be regarded, the pride of lineage is, of course, unknown. A few counts and marquises do indeed exist, whose titles (abolished when the republic was established) are still occasionally conceded by courtesy; but no influence is attached to mere rank, no do the habits of those noble personages elevate them in any degree above the rest of the community. At this moment the wealthiest noble of Mexico, owner of vast estates and highly productive mines, is at the same time an eminent wholesale butcher, deeply versed in the mysteries of the slaughter house, though ill-adapted to adorn a court. But while El Tiempo is supposed to speak the sentiments of General Paredes on this question, his Ministers are not all believed to entertain the same views. General Almonte, Minister-at-War, has just resigned, it is said, on the ground. He has lived much in the United States, and is considered a stanch Republican, though not without ambition; he probably speculates on deriving greater advantage from "coming events" out of office, than if attached to the Cabinet of Parades. General Tornel has been named his successor. This versatile personage, though identified with the late, as with most preceding revolutions, had been rather coldly treated by Paredes, and was understood to be occupied in the composition of a work demonstrating the superiority of republican over monarchial Governments, when the retirement of Almonte corrected his opinions by opening to him the doors of his old office at the War Department. If anything could give Santa Anna a chance of recovering his influence in this country, it would be this monarchial scheme, and his re-appearance on the scene as the champion of republican institutions would be quite consistent with some of his former exploits.

In financial matters General Paredes is disposed to proceed with the utmost economy consistent with the maintenance of the army, on whose support his power rests; but so small a portion of the revenue is unencumbered that he has been obliged to solicit assistance from the same parties who have been in the habit of dealing with former Governments here, and whose terms (always severe) are not likely to be relaxed in favour of one who has himself shorn the facility with which a Government may be overthrown. He has obtained some funds by granting licenses for the introduction of raw cotton from the United States on payment, by anticipation, of a duty of 10 per quintal (100lb. Spanish); but his right to the exclusive appropriation of this duty has been disputed and I am of opinion that the British creditors are as fully entitled to their share of it as of that on any other article of merchandise introduced from abroad. The subject has, I believe, been brought under the notice of the Earl of Aberdeen by Mr. Bankhead.

From the want of the sinews of war the expedition to California has not yet moved, and those fine provinces remain abandoned to their fate, which, in the absence of European intervention, must be annexation to the colossus of the north. No settlement of the difficult affair of Texas has yet been made, nor, as far as the public are aware, attempted, by this Government. In proclaiming the presence here of Mr. Slidell, the American Envoy, as one reason for displacing the late Government, Paredes appears to have raised a barrier to his own reception of that gentleman, though he is doubtless well aware that the matter must ultimately be arranged by negotiation. Mexico has everything to apprehend, and nothing to hope, from war single-handed with her powerful neighbour; but hopes have been entertained here (perhaps still are) that Great Britain may be involved in war with "the common enemy" on the Oregon question, and so cause a powerful diversion in favour of fallen Anahhuae. Mr. Slidell remains at Jalapa, waiting instructions from his Government, and Mr. Polk is taking measures to support those instructions, and retain his "peaceful conquest," by replacing the American squadron in the waters of Vera Cruz. Four or five United States vessels of war (one of them with a commodore's pendant) are now at anchor at Sacrificios.

The restoration of the chapel of Santa Teresa, in this city, of which the dome was thrown down by the severe earthquake of last year, is proceeding rapidly. An image standing in the chapel, and denominated Nuestro scour de Santa Teresa, was grievously injured on that occasion (earthquakes having no respect for persons), but having been since repaired and beautified, it was carried in procession two days ago through the city, and lodged provisionally in the cathedral, to the great delight of the inhabitants of all classes, who thronged the streets in dense numbers. This image enjoys a well establish reputation for miracles performed in other days, on which it would have been well to rest its fame, but the indiscreet zeal of its adorers would now attribute to it other more recent and more astonishing performances; however, on these subjects Mexican credulity knows no limits.

We have received the following, dated February 25, from Tampico:--

"We had an express to-day bringing the intelligence that the American troops had taken possession of the Fronton de Santa Isabel, situated near to Matamoras--so near that it is considered Matamoras is already taken by the Americans, for what can the Americans do with such customers? The Fronton de Santa Isabel was taken without a fight, and there were only some Mexican Custom-house officers and pilots, who were made prisoners." [CCB]

LT April 15, 1846, p6/f "Mexican Outrage on British Shipping."

To the Editor of the Times

Sir, --Knowing your readiness to expose a gross injustice, and give publicity to any outrage committed on British shipping by foreigners, I take the liberty of making the following statement, which I doubt not you will insert in the columns of your widely-spread and influential paper:--

The schooner Lord Anson, of Jersey, commanded by me, was chartered to carry a cargo of logwood from Tabasco, in the republic of Mexico, to Liverpool, with liberty to discharge a cargo at Barbados, and from thence to proceed to Tabasco. On my arrival at the Bar of Tabasco, I delivered to the boarding officer my clearances from Jersey and Barbados, containing the articles I had on board-viz., 55 tons of coals, 1,500 bricks, and 9 casks of lime; and which were indispensably necessary to ballast my vessel, she drawing 13 feet, when loaded, and with the above ballast only 8 feet.

To my surprise the hatches of my vessel were sealed, and the Lord Anson was ordered to sail 25 leagues up the tortuous river to the city of Tabasco, which is quite unusual, my cargo of logwood being ready at the bar, the ordinary loading place for vessels arriving in ballast. It took my 15 days to perform the voyage up to the city of Tabasco, myself and crew being exposed to the deleterious effects of a pestilential climate, and the bite of numerous and venomous insects; the many windings of the river and the strong current render the navigation not only tedious but even dangerous. To all these hardships and dangers my vessel and crew were wantonly exposed; and if it be asked for what purpose, I must answer, in order to be notified by the Collector of Customs, Don Manuel Escoffie, and first officer Ramon Pasquel, that my vessel, the schooner Lord Anson, and everything belonging to her, was seized. I appealed, of course, from this unlawful decision to the tribunal of the country, the judge of which condemned me to pay a fine of 550, and to forfeit the 1,500 bricks and 9 casks of lime, however; declaring the 55 tons of coal free, as this article pays no duty on importation. I submitted to this decision under protest, and requested my consignees to forward the judiciary proceedings to the British Minister resident in the city of Mexico.

It is evident that fiscal laws are enacted to prevent fraud and protect the public revenue; no criminal intention could be alleged against me, as I delivered to the boarding officer the clearances of the articles which I had on board to ballast my vessel. It was found on discharging that the bricks and lime were so entirely valueless that the greater part were thrown into the river, by order from the Custom-house, and certainly no better proof than this was wanting to refute the argument of the collector that brickbats and spoiled lime constitute cargo. Besides, coals and bricks have been considered as ballast in other parts of Mexico, and American as well as French vessels have been permitted to carry them as ballast to Vera Cruz and Tampico.

I am confident that had I offered a bribe, I should have been saved all this annoyance as well as the 550 fine. As the Custom-house officers at Tabasco seldom receive their fully pay, owing to the scarcity of funds, it is the interest of the said officers to levy fines upon foreign vessels on the slightest pretence, as such penalties are divided amongst them.

It is to be hoped that the representation of the British Minister, Mr. Bankhead, will convince the Mexican Government of the arbitrary and illegal treatment I have met with from the Custom-house at Tabasco, and that my owners will be indemnified for the heavy loss inflicted on them.

I have the honour to remain, Sir.
Your most obedient servant,
Charles John Benouf, Master of Schooner Lord Anson, of Jersey.

LT April 16, 1846, p4/a "America. The Oregon Question."

Liverpool, April 14, 6 P.M.

The British and North American Royal mail steamer Hibernia, Captain Ryrie, arrived in the Mersey this afternoon, from Boston and Halifax, bringing intelligence from the United States to the 1st inst., from Canada to the 3d inst., and late accounts from Texas, Mexico, &c. She has brought 148 passengers.

We note briefly the proceedings of the Senate.

On the 16th ult. the committee appointed to inquire into certain charges of collusion with Mr. Pakenham on the part of several senators on the Oregon question, advanced by the Washington Times, which were to the effect that "there was corrupt conversation and collusion with the British Minister at his table," reported to the House, and much discussion ensued.

Mr. Calhoun then rose and addressed the Senate on the question of notice.

On the 17th Mr. Berrien occupied the floor, supporting the views and policy of Messrs. Allen, &c.

On the 18th a resolution inquiring for the latest correspondence with regard to the Oregon had been offered, and another resolution instructing the Committee on Militia to inquire into the propriety of organizing the militia of the United States.

Mr. Archer then spoke upon the Oregon question in hostility to the notice, and on the binding power of the Baltimore resolutions. Mr. Allen, as on former days, had to re-explain the texoup of his remarks.

On the 19th Mr. Miles addressed the Senate against a "party war," but in favour of the notice, as tending to a quick compromise, and referring to "the prospect of annexation at the southward."

The Senate resumed, after adjournment, on the 23d. Mr. Webster called for correspondence regarding the old boundary question, to defend himself from aspersions.

Mr. Allen then rose and endeavoured to fix the termination of the debate unsuccessfully.

After a few words,

A resolution from the Legislature of Louisiana demanding proper defences for New Orleans was read.
The Oregon debate was then resumed by Mr. Chalmers, in a just and liberal speech in which he accorded warm eulogy to the free trade movement of Great Britain. The following President's message was then read:--

"The Special Message.

To The Senate of the United States.

In answer to the inquiry of the Senate, contained in their resolution of the 17th inst., whether, in my 'judgment, any circumstances connected with or growing out of the foreign relations of this country require at this time an increase of our naval or military force;' and if so, 'what those circumstances are,' I have to express the opinion that a wise precaution demands such increase.

In my annual message of the 2d of December last I recommended to the favourable consideration of Congress an increase of our naval force, especially of our steam navy, and the raising of an adequate military force to guard and protect such of our citizens as might think proper to emigrate to Oregon. Since that period I have seen no cause to recall or modify those recommendations. On the contrary, reasons exist which, in my judgment, render it proper not only that they should be promptly carried into effect, but that additional provision should be made for the public defence.

The consideration of such additional provision was brought before appropriate committees of the two houses of Congress, in answer to calls made by them, in reports prepared, with my sanction, by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, on the 29th of December and the 8th of January last; a mode of communication with Congress not unusual, and, under existing circumstances, believed to be most eligible. Subsequent events have confirmed me in the opinion that these recommendations were proper as precautionary measures.

It was a wise maxim of the father of his country, that 'to be prepared for war is one of the most efficient means of preserving peace;' and that, 'avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace,' we should 'remember, also, that timely disbursements to repel it.' The general obligation to perform this duty is greatly strengthened by facts known to the whole world. A controversy respecting the Oregon territory now exists between the United States and Great Britain; and while, as far as we know, the relations of the latter with all the European nations are of the most pacific character, she is making unusual and extraordinary armaments and warlike preparations, naval and military, both at home and in her North American possessions.

It cannot be disguised that, however sincere may be the desire of peace, in the event of a rupture these armaments and preparations would be used against our country. Whatever may have been the original purpose of the preparations, the fact is undoubted that they are now proceeding, in part at least, with the view to the contingent possibility of a war with the United States. The general policy of making additional warlike preparations was distinctly announced in the speech from the Throne, as late as January last, and has since been reiterated by the Ministers of the Crown in both houses of Parliament. Under this aspect of our relations with Great Britain, I cannot doubt the propriety of increasing our means of defence both by land and sea. This can give Great Britain no cause of offence, nor increase the danger of a rupture. If, on the contrary, we should fold our arms in security, and at last be suddenly involved in hostilities for the maintenance of our just rights, without any adequate preparation, our responsibility to the country would be of the gravest character. Should collision between the two countries be avoided, as I sincerely trust it may be, the additional charge upon the Treasury in making the necessary preparations will not be lost, while in the event of such a collision, they would be indispensable for the maintenance of our national rights and national honour.

I have seen no reason to change or modify the recommendations of my annual message in regard to the Oregon question. The notice to abrogate the treaty of the 6th of August, 1827, is authorized by the treaty itself, and cannot be regarded as a warlike measure; and I cannot withhold my strong conviction that it should be promptly given. The other recommendations are in conformity with the existing treaty, and would afford to American citizens in Oregon no more than the same measure of protection which has long since been extended to British subjects in that territory.

The state of our relations with Mexico is still in an unsettled condition. Since the meeting of Congress another revolution has taken place in that country, by which the government has passed into the hands of new rulers. This event has procrastinated, and may possibly defeat, the settlement of the differences between the United States and that country. The Minister of the United States to Mexico, at the date of the last advices, had not been received by the existing authorities. Demonstrations of a character hostile to the United States continue to be made in Mexico, which has rendered it proper, in my judgment, to keep nearly two-thirds of our army on our southwestern frontier. In doing this, many of the regular military posts have been reduced to a small force, inadequate to their defence, should an emergency arise.

In view of these 'circumstances' it is my 'judgment' that 'an increase of our naval and military force is at the time required,' to place the country in a suitable state of defence. At the same time, it is my settled purpose to pursue such a course of policy as may be best calculated to preserve, both with Great Britain and Mexico, an honourable peace; which nothing will so effectually promote as unanimity in our councils, and a firm maintenance of all our just rights.
Washington, March 24, 1846.

It was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. Webster rose to inquire into the matters referred to in the message, without any comment or remark upon it whatever. We perceive from the reading that in the judgment of the Executive it is necessary to increase our means of defence, military and naval, from increasing necessities. The amount or extent of this necessary increase is not stated in the message. What does the President suppose will be the estimates required? What the extent of the necessities of increase of the military and the navy? Have these estimates emanated from the appropriate committee of this or the other house of Congress, is it highly important to know how and from what authority they do arise. The document before us explains that the practice pursued in this instance is not unusual. Recently it is not unusual; but in my judgment it appears to have commenced with the existing Administration. I do not know whether any member of the Senate has been commissioned to lay these estimates before the body. I would ask the Senator from Missouri (Chairman on Military Affairs) to state what communication has been made to his committee, and why it has not been laid before the Senate? I appeal to the hon. Gentleman from Missouri.

Colonel Benton.--It is proper in the outset that I should state how it happened, in the first instance, that these communications were made to the committee. Colonel Benton then referred to General Cass's resolutions, passed at the beginning of the session, instructing, among others, the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of increasing that branch of the service, &c. The committee, in pursuance of instructions, had addressed an inquiry to the Secretary of War, who had returned an answer, many parts of which it was appropriate to make public, and some not, but it was all in their hands. The committee did not think the present the time to take notice of it.

Mr. Fairfield stated, as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, a similar course of proceeding, and the bill for the 10 war steamers was based upon the secretary's published recommendations.

Mr. J.M. Clayton was understood to ask if there was communicated to the committee any other official information not reported to the Senate?

Mr. Fairfield replied, that there were estimates from the heads of the Naval Bureau, who had reported to the Secretary the data of the recommendations. But these papers were voluminous, and it was deemed in other respects not necessary to bring them before the Senate.

Mr. Webster would pursue the subject a single remark further. He would ask the chairman of the Naval Committee whether the Secretary of the Navy, who had furnished these estimates for the information of the committee, had received the sanction of their recommendation from the President of the United States? Second, why the committee had failed to state to the Senate the sanction of the President?

Mr. Fairfield said that the sanction of the President was verbal—it was not communicated in writing.

Mr. Webster asked if the verbal communication to the Secretary of the Navy was regarded as of the same effect as if in writing? If not equal, why was it communicated to the Committee of the Senate? We now see the posture of things. I hope the chairman on military affairs will, as soon as convenient, state whether he has received his information of the direction or sanction of the President in the same way? I desire him to communicate this information to the Senate as far as is proper, and no further. What are those communications before the committee?

Mr. Benton said, he should answer fully as soon as the sense of the committee could be ascertained. No Secretary at War would, however, recommend so large a measure as this, unless as the organ of the President.

General Cass desired a part of the message from the President to be read again (and accordingly that part was read in which the President declared he sanctioned the recommendations made to the Military and Naval Committees). General Cass congratulated himself on the resuscitation of his resolutions, which he had feared were sleeping the sleep of death.

And with some passing conversation, on the motion of Mr. Berrien, the Senate went into executive session to talk the matter over more explicitly.

On the 25th,--

Mr. Berrien submitted a resolution requiring the heads of the Committees on Military and on Naval Affairs, respectively, to communicate to the Senate the estimates furnished them by the War and Navy Departments, under the sanction of the President, as referred to in his message transmitted to the Senate.
Mr. Fairfield said that the estimates from the heads of bureaux had been returned to the Navy Department from the Naval Committee.

Mr. Benton said that the Military Committee had all the papers in their possession from the War Department, and were ready to communicate them to the Senate. A portion of the papers, however, it was not appropriate to publish; and it was not necessary to do so, as the report of the Secretary at War embodied all the estimates.

[The estimates relate to the organization of the militia, and the purchase of munitions for the several military stations.]

Mr. Yulee hoped the resolution would be so amended as to require the Secretary of the Navy to return the Senate the papers transmitted back from the Naval Committee. They would be useful to the Senate. They would certainly be useful to him.

Mr. Fairfield opposed the furnishing of these documents, and the suggestion, also, to that effect.

Mr. Westcott, with his usual earnestness, protested that the estimates should not be detained from the Senate, because, if unfit for publication, they could be communicated confidentially. The resolution was adopted, by 25 to 11.

Mr. Benton delivered up the papers in his possession.

A motion was made to print these papers for the use of the Senate.

Mr. Allen suggested, as some portions of these papers were not properly subject matter for publication, that thus far they should be excluded from printing.

Mr. Benton explained that the report of the Secretary at War embraced, substantially, all the information of the other papers.

Mr. Berrien then moved, that the order to print be confined to the Secretary's letter to the committee, which was agreed to.

Mr. Sevier then resumed the notice question. He would not vote for a "compromise" resolution; but would accept a treaty. He would leave it in the hands of the President.

The House Bill, for increasing the rank and file of the United States army, was then read a first time.

Mr. Allen again endeavoured to fix a termination for the debate. Considerable discussion ensued. No result.

Mr. Clayton's resolution of inquiry as to the Oregon correspondence was read. Mr. Allen wished for postponement. Mr. Crittenden and Mr. Morehead supported. No result.

Mr. Miller resumed the debate.

The Senate adjourned to Monday, the 30th.

The house proceedings were unimportant until the 23d, the Harbour and River Bill having engrossed attention. No movement on the Tariff or Sub-Treasury scheme.

On the 23d a discussion arose on a bill for the augmentation of the army. The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the Union, and took up for consideration the bill to raise two regiments of riflemen, and for other purposes.

The bill was read. It proposes--1. That, in addition to the present military establishment of the United States, there be raised, by voluntary enlistment, two regiments of riflemen, citizens of the United States, to serve for the term of three years, unless sooner disbanded. 2. That each regiment shall consist of one colonel, on lieutenant-colonel, one major, one adjutant wit the rank of first lieutenant, &c. 3. The President and the Senate to appoint all officers proper to be appointed under this act. 4. The President is authorized, by voluntary enlistment, to add 10 privates to the present number in each company of the existing regiments of Dragoons, Infantry, and Artillery, whenever, in his opinion, the exigencies of the public service may require the same. 5. An appropriation of money, sum not stated.

Much discussion arose.

On the 24th the subject was resumed, and towards the close of a lengthened discussion--
Mr. Adams rose and remarked, that he had been informed that in another part of the Capitol an important message had been received from the President of the United States and which would have a very great effect on this house with reference to the bill before them. If good and substantial reasons, after a perusal of this message, should exist for its passage, it should have his hearty concurrence. If not, he would vote against it. He moved the reconsideration of the resolution to which he referred, in committee, to enable the house to delay action on the bill, and ascertain what effect the message should have upon their action. However, a motion was made to adjourn, which prevailed.

On the 25th the bill was again resumed in committee. After much discussion the bill was adopted. Yeas, 164; nays, 15. Adjourned.

The committee of the Senate appointed to consider the expediency of a month mail to Oregon had reported in favour of that measure.

LT 4/18/1846, 5/c Oregon question

We publish in another place an extract from the speech delivered by Mr. Calhoun, on the 16th of March, in the Senate of the United States, which reflects the greatest credit on that eminent statesman, and does honour to the assembly in which it was delivered. The progress made by the Oregon question within the last two years has convinced Mr. Calhoun himself of preserving in that silent and inactive course of policy which he had hitherto recommended as the surest method of establishing the ultimate sovereignty of the United States in that territory. He has been driven from that ground to the alternative of supporting a compromise, or of declaring for a forcible occupation of the country; and whilst he cordially adopts the principle of compromise, he votes for the abrogation of the existing convention, in order to bring the discussion to a speedy termination. Thus far we are perfectly agreed with Mr. Calhoun. We are happy to adopt as our own every one of the pacific sentiments and the sensible opinions he has so eloquently expressed; and although in his warning of the disastrous consequences of war is especially addressed to the American states, his advocacy of the cause of peace will nowhere be read with more sincere admiration than in this country. Thus far the spirit of the great majority of the Americans is favourable to a peaceful settlement of this difference. We may assume that Mr. Polk's message and declarations, in which there is not the slightest intimation that any compromise is expected, or the slightest expectation that any admissible offer will be made, do not contain the opinion of the most influential American statesmen. Even Mr. Polk's personal friends give very different accounts of his own views; and, if we look to the men out of office, who, as senators, are members of a branch of the executive Government and exercise a portion of the treaty-making power, the preponderance of numbers and of political authority is unquestionable in favor of a compromise. This step, then, may be considered as virtually gained; but it is only the first step towards the solution of the difficulty, and Mr. Polk's pretensions were less formidable when they were carried to an excessive and ridiculous extent than when they are reduced within those limits which have, throughout this protracted negotiations, formed the true basis of the American claim. For though there are differences of opinion between compromise and no compromise, notice or no notice, there is a singular unanimity in all the opinions which have reached us from the United States as to the extent of the only compromise which is regarded as at all admissible. The word "compromise" is synonymous in the mouths of the Americans with the 49th parallel of north latitude. Mr. Calhoun says, -

"The past history of the affair, the fact that it had been frequently offered by us substantially as an ultimatum, added to the fact that 49&deg;730; was the boundary on this side of the Rocky Mountains, left no doubt on my mind that, if settled by compromise, it must be on that basis. It is true that our offer heretofore on that basis had been rejected, and that it might thence be inferred that Great Britain could not accede to it consistently with her honour. I am not of that impression. Things have greatly changed since our offer were made and rejected by her. Then the advantages under the convention were all in her favour; but now they have turned in favour of us"

Mr. Haywood, in a speech intended to be of a pacific character said: -

"I am come to the conclusion, as a senator of the United States, that we cannot, ought not, must not, compromise this controversy in any manner very materially different from that of which the President, as I understand his position and these records, stands committed, and rightly committed; and I shall, therefore, vote to give him the notice, and with it all the moral weight of an American Senate's settled opinion, that if Great Britain will not, or if she cannot, consent to do justice, by yielding her pretensions of dominion over the territory below the line of 49&deg;730; as a compromise, then we will fight. I repeat, we must then fight for it. In a word, we ought to refuse the notice unless there is a solemn determination to make the compromise line of 49&deg;730; our FIGHTING LINE- if it must be so."

After these public and peremptory declarations on the part of men who are comparatively moderate in their tone upon this subject, the Cabinet of Washington may, and probably will, intimate, in the event of the negotiation being re-opened after the notice has been given, that its hands are tied beforehand. There is no diplomacy left in the question. The game is to be played with the cards on the table; and the 49th parallel must be regarded as the ultimatum of the Senate rather than the President and his immediate advisers. We believe this to be a matter of fact; and whither the Americans be right or wrong, prudent or foolish, is beside the question, since it is evident that when all the leading statesmen of a country have deliberately pledged themselves to a particular position, they will rather go to war than abandon it. They have chosen, therefore, to assume for the purposes of their justification that this concession (as they term it) is a sufficient sacrifice for the maintenance of peace, and that although England positively rejected that offer 20 years ago, and on many subsequent occasions, she will accept it now. We are really at a loss to conceive to what circumstances Mr. Calhoun attributes this supposed change, or what imaginable circumstances could release us from the duty of upholding territorial right. But the fact is, that the valley of the Columbia is as much and as exclusively occupied by the British agents of the Hudson's-bay Company as it ever has been, and to suppose that our rights to the country are weakened is a childish invention. They are precisely what they have ever been since 1790.

In the whole course of these negotiations that which has changed most completely is the claim set up by the Americans. In 1818 and in 1826 the territory in dispute was expressly asserted and clearly understood to be comprised between the 42˚ and 40˚; and 40˚ and 49˚; parallels of latitude. As for the more northern tract between 49˚ and 54˚; and 54˚ and 40˚, we are not aware that the paramount claims of Britain to that part of it were then called in question. The proposals for partition ranged between the mouth of the Columbia and 49˚; but not beyond; and the American plenipotentiaries unsuccessfully claimed the whole of that region, but no more. Since that time, and in the more recent discussions, they have raised their demands; they have laid claim to the whole country; and then, as if it were the furthest limits of condescension and concussion, they revert to their original offer, the very same which was before rejected. A man bargaining with another offers to sell him a horse for 80%. The buyer says it's too much, and goes away. Some time afterwards the seller asks him for 100% for the same horse, and, after and elaborate attempt to outwit his costumer, he ends by offering him the horse at 80% as a great bargain. That is precisely the course of the American dealing. They have raised the claim to the whole of Oregon, not with any expectation of acquiring the entire province, but in order to reconcile us to the terms we have before declared to be inadmissible. But the truth is, that the bare 49th parallel is to all intents and purposes the same thing that it was twenty years ago.

We intimated an opinion some time ago that the 49th parallel might conveniently serve as the basis of an arrangement; but it is clear that such a proposal must be accompanied with more extensive conditions than those heretofore annexed to it by the Americans. It must leave us the whole of Vancouver's Island, the navigation and harbour of the straits of Fuca, the free use of the Columbia and its northern branches down to the sea, and an indemnity or compensation to the Hudson-bay Company for the posts they would be called upon to surrender. We do not pretend to point out all the stipulations which it would be the part of a prudent and just policy to require as an equivalent for a concession so much below our original claims, and, as we firmly believe, our just rights. But the cession of the vacant soil might be politic and endurable, provided the private rights already long acquired and enjoyed by British subjects were duly respected; and they must, beyond all question, be protected by the ultimatum of England.

Between these two proposals lies the question of peace and war- narrowed, as these controversies are, to a small issue; but, nevertheless, broad enough to swallow up the peace of the world. The moderate members of the Senate make the 49th parallel their "fighting line." President Polk is evidently more disposed to lean to the side of resistance than of concession; and, on our side, we can really discover no motive or argument to justify us in any farther departure from the position assumed long ago by the British Government, and confirmed by the emphatic declarations of the Ministers of the Crown.

(From the New York Courier and Enquirer, March 18)

The establishment of a paper in Mexico, apparently for the express purpose of advocating the substitution of monarchy for the existing government of that country, as we have already remarked, must be regarded as a very significant indication of the probable future. Nor does the rumor, which we published yesterday, of the extreme unpopularity of the suggestion, diminish its importance. On the contrary, it makes still more probable the suspicion, that foreign powers are the prime movers in this whole project-that it neither originates nor is accordant with the wishes of the people- that public opinion there, to make it acceptable, must be greatly modified- and that the establishment of the paper referred to is the first step, taken by those interested in the movement, to effect the necessary change. We have watched the development of this scheme from its first public appearance; and it may be well to revert to the several steps which thus far have been taken.

When it was finally ascertained that the hostility of England and France to the annexation of Texas would be unavailing, attention was drawn to the condition and prospects of Mexico. The weakness of the Government, the anarchy which has become the only established order in the country, the poverty of the treasury, the lack of attachment on the part of the people to the institutions of the country, and the general and rapid decay of the whole system, led these European powers to regard as highly probable the future annexation of the whole country, one department after another, to the American Union. The overwhelming importance which such a result would give to the United States, as one of the leading nations of the earth, excited their alarm; and suggestions were made as to the most effectual and most feasible means of preventing it.
The first public suggestion was made by The Times, which had just then dispatched a special correspondent to the city of Mexico. In a leading editorial, that paper set forth very clearly and strongly the conditions of the country, the probability of its future absorption in the American Union, the effect of such a result upon European powers, and especially England, and the necessity of some prompt action by which it might be prevented. The Times closed its article by saying that no more fortunate event for Europe and the world could possibly occur than the reconquest of Mexico by Spain; and the assurance was ventured, that whatever means, in force or money, for so bold an undertaking, Spain might lack, would be furnished by those powers of Europe which had the deepest interest in its consummation. We copied a large part of this article at the time it appeared, and spoke of it then as a sufficient indication of designs likely to be entertained in the highest quarters. Next came the letters from the Mexican correspondent of The Times, from which we have repeatedly given copious extracts, and which constantly urged upon the attention of the English public the necessity of some speedy action to prevent the result so much deprecated by England and France, and the feasibility of the plan suggested by the Times itself. In several of these letters it was represented that the people of Mexico would acquire in such a movement, that they felt the weakness and inadequacy of their existing Government, that they were thoroughly sick of their political institutions, which had given them nothing but discontent, and that they wanted the advent of an European prince. These representations were kept up for some months. And the manner in which they were put forward, the familiarity evinced by the writer with diplomatic official documents, not only of England and Mexico, but of the United States clearly showed that he was writing, if not at the dictation, at least with the knowledge and aid of the British Minister at the Mexican capital.

The next step in this development was still more significant, being a simultaneous declaration, on the part of The Times and the Journal des Debats, the organs respectively of the Governments of England and France, so far at least as foreign relations are concerned that a foreign Prince, of the Bourbon family and from the Spanish branch, should be placed at the head of the Mexican Government, and his authority supported and guaranteed, against other nations and especially the United States, by the two European powers already named. These announcements were accompanied, in each paper by manifold details of the plan proposed, and very strong and earnest representations of its necessity and feasibility. Nothing else, it was urged by both, could possibly prevent Mexico from becoming a portion of the American Union; and such an accession to the power and wealth and greatness of the United States, it was confessed, would destroy the supremacy of England and France among the nations of the earth.

Following close upon this joint declaration of the two organs of the English and French Governments, was the establishment in the city of Mexico of a foreign Prince, of the Bourbon family and from the Spanish branch, as the head of the Mexican Government, and his authority supported and guaranteed, against other nations and especially the United States, by the two European powers already named. These announcements were accompanied, in each paper by manifold details of the plan proposed, and very strong and earnest representations of its necessity and feasibility. Nothing else, it was urged by both, could possibly prevent Mexico from becoming a portion of the American Union; and such an accession to the power and wealth and greatness of the United States, it was confessed, would destroy the supremacy of England and France among the nations of the earth.

"To establish a monarchy, we must choose a foreign Prince, and he must be of the Spanish branch of the Bourbon family. We want a king to strengthen our alliance with the European powers; to restore us order by their respectability and influence; to govern us by their wise measures, and save us from our own foolish and backward policy."

This, even to its details, is the scheme first broached by The Times; and it seems to us difficult to avoid the belief, that the whole project, from its inception, has been that of the Governments of England and France, and that the newspapers by which it has been urged, have acted not so much upon their own responsibilities as upon suggestions from those of either country who are in authority. And on that account, as we have repeatedly stated hitherto, we regard the subject as one of the gravest interests. That the movement is contemplated, and will be attempted, we have little doubt. What effect it will have upon this country with regards to it, and how far their hostility to its consummation may be carried, are questions as yet for simple speculation; but, whenever action upon them shall become necessary, they will become the graves, most important, and perchance, the most difficult of solution, which our Government thus far in history has ever encountered.

We have received accounts from New York to the 5th inst inclusive, and from Washington to the 2d, by the arrival in the Mersey of the packet ship Roscius, Captain Eldridge.

The Oregon discussion still remained undecided at the date of our Washington letters. On the 30th ult the "compromise" policy was advocated with great ability by Messrs. Webster and Barrow. The navy estimates were produced. On the 31st General Cass delivered a second speech, designed "to prepare the hearts of the people for war," and in which he took especial care to dwell upon those topics which were calculated to excite national antipathies and to exasperate the public mind of the two countries. On the 1st inst Mr. Benton advocated a compromise on the 49th parallel. The 2d was occupied with explanations.
The Journal of Commerce comments with much approbation upon the speech delivered by Mr. Benton, as follows: -

"Thanks to Mr. Benton for his straightforward manly speech! A friend in need is a friend indeed. Has his great influence been exerted in favour of extreme measures, there might have been some doubt of the result, even in the Senate; but now that he has taken his position alongside of Calhoun, Webster, Haywood, Berrien, Colquitt, Crittenden, and their comppeers, what hope is there for the 54& 40' men, the Aliens, cases, Hannegans, Breeses, &c.? They are left in vocative wanting. They are defeated and the country is safe. There has not for a long time been such a triumph of principle over party dictation, or attempted dictation, in any public body as this in the Senate where democrat, after democrat, to the number, we should judge, of at least one half of the whole, has declared in favour of moderation, compromise, peace, and against the enforcement of claims which can be sustained neither by argument nor arms. Indeed this whole discussion is a delightful comment on the power of truth, and safety of republican institutions. At the first go-off, it seemed as if the whole country, Congress and all, were demented. "Fifty-four forty" was the watchword, and "fifty-four forty" echoed back from all directions. But the examination which the subject had since received in Congress and out, has brought nine-tenths of the people, if not 99-100ths, to the conviction that not 54˚40', but 49˚, is the proper boundary, with such variations as the mutual interests of the parties, and a mutual regard to each other's convenience, may suggest. Upon this basis, substantially, we have strong expectations that England will meet us. The bugbear of the free navigation of the Columbia ought to be no impediment; for we defy any man to show that the interests of our citizens would suffer in consequences of such freedom."

The period which we vote would be taken upon the question of notice still remained undecided. "There appears to be a disposition in the Senate," writes the Herald of the 2nd inst.-

"To put off coming to vote on the notice resolutions as long as possible. It was once understood the Friday the 3rd inst. was set apart as the day to end all debate and settle the question at issue, but from certain indications we settle the question at issue, but from certain indications we judge that a further postponement will take place. It is evidential the intention of many senators to defer taking the vote until after the arrival of the April steamer from Liverpool, that they may be better able to form some opinion, if possible, of the intentions of the British Government in the premises, and govern themselves accordingly."

A meeting in favor of the "whole or none" policy had been convened with much display in Philadelphia, but notwithstanding, the means used to get up an excitement on the subject, it was a complete failure.

The proceedings of the lower branch of Congress are interesting. The Sub-Treasury scheme had, on the 2nd inst, passed by a strict party vote. An amendment we adopted exacting that all payments and disbursements from and to the United States shall be made in coin on and after the 30th of June next, instead of one-third thereof, as provided originally in the bill. No movement had been made with the tariff.

Advices received from Mexico are most important, if true. "We are indebted," says the New York Evening Gazette, "to a gentleman who arrived here to-day from Havannah, via Charleston, in the short passage of eight days, for the following important intelligence: -

"The Juanita arrived at Havannah on the evening of the 22nd, from Vera Cruz, from which place she sailed on the 16th, bringing advices up to that day, and by the Captain we learn that a great change had taken place in the state of our relationship with Mexico. It appears that Paredes has been induced to alter his tone, owing to strong manifestations exhibited against a war with the United States, and that Mr. Slidell, our Minister, had been duly notified that the Government were ready to consider the propositions he had to make on behalf of our Government, and that there existed no doubt but that the matter would be speedily adjusted. Arista and the "troops" under his command had pronounced against Paredes and the war party"

The truth of this report is to be doubted.

Accounts from this port to the 5th March had been received in New York, on the 1st instant, by the packet ship Yorkshire. The advices being un-important excited no comment.

The importations into New York during March had exhibited a large increase. The duties received in the present, as compared with the past years were as follows:

The exchange in London is quoted at 109 1/2 to 110.

Accounts from Texas to the 21st ult so not furnish any further intelligence relative to the movement of the United States army under General Taylor towards Mexico. General Houston, previously to his departure for Washington, had announced his determination to support the Administration of President Polk. A new tribe of Indians, the Canges, are reported to have joined the Camanches in the hostilities of that nation to Mexico. The corn crop in Texas was rapidly advancing in growth.

"Accounts from Yucatan," says the New York Enquirer-

"Have been received by the New Orleans Picayune, confirming the intelligence respecting the willingness of the present government of Mexico to concede everything to the demands of Yucatan, and ratify those treaties the violation of which led to the alienation of that department. Mexico is pressing if her eagerness to win back Yucatan; but sensible men are fearful of the stability of the administration of Paredes, and they would have Yucatan disentangled from Mexico, in case the latter country should become yet more involved with foreign Powers. It is added that they think of sending commissioners to the United States for what purposes is not agreed. Their Congress meets on the 23rd of the present month."

In the whole course of the Oregon negotiation, and the protracted debate to which it has give rise upon the other side of the Atlantic, nothing has been advanced by any side to equal the absurdity of Mr. Benton’s peremptory assertion that the whole question was settled more than 130 years ago by the Treaty of Utrecht. The American public was evidently unprepared for so far a deep plunge into the history of European treaties. Several of the newspapers appear to have a vague notion that the Treaty of Utrecht was signed about the year 1803 or 1813. Mr. Benton, however, resolutely goes back to the Duchess of Marlborough and Mrs. Masham, though he subsequently averred that he had not looked into the English history for 40 years; and it is upon the labours of the Commissioners appointed by France and England under the 10th article of the Treaty of Utrecht, that he claims the 49th parallel as the established frontier between the two States to the Pacific. The following passage from the fourth edition of Mr. Greenhow’s work may supply, in a brief form, the proposition which Mr. Benton laboured to establish, though Mr. Greenhow himself rejects it:

"Mr. Monroe, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States in London, in his letter of September 5, 1804, to Lord Harroby, the British Secretary for Foreign Affairs, makes the following statement with regard to the adoption of the 49th parallel of latitude, as the northern boundary of Louisiana.

"By the 10th article of the Treaty of Utrecht it is agreed that 'France shall restore to Great Britain the bay and straits of Hudson, together with all the lands, seas, seacoasts, rivers, and places situated on the said bay and straits, which belong thereto; and it is also agreed, on both sides, to determine within a year, by commissaries to be forthwith named by each party, the limits which are to be fixed between the said bay of Hudson and the places appertaining to the French, which limits both the British and French subjects shall be wholly forbid to pass over, or thereby to go to each other by sea or by land. The same commissaries shall also have orders to describe and settle in like manner the boundaries between the other British and French colonies in those parts.' Commissaries were accordingly appointed by each Power, who executed the stipulations of the treaty in establishing the boundaries proposed by it. They fixed the northern boundary of Canada and Louisiana by a line beginning on the Atlantic, at a cape or promontory in 58 degrees 30 minutes north latitude, thence southwestwardly to the Lake Misrissin, thence farther southwest to the latitude line of 49 degrees north from the equator, and along that line indefinitely. This statement was made agreeably to the instructions of Mr. Madison, the Secretary of State, contained in his letter of February 14th, 1804, in which he refers to an accompanying paper as showing 'the authority on which the decision of the commissioners under the Treaty of Utrecht rests.' This paper was not printed with the other documents, and no copy of it can now be found, so that the authority for the statement is not known.

"Mr. Madison, however, seems to have derived his opinion chiefly from the Summary, Historical and Political, of the British Settlements in North America, by William Douglas, published at Boston in 1794, which contains the assertion in the words used by Mr. Monroe; and Douglas probably derived it from the 31st column of the Modern Universal History, by Salmon, 1738, Salmon, however, in his Geographical and Historical Grammar, published in 1758, says expressly with regard to these provisions of the Treaty of Utrecht, 'these limits are not settled to this day.'"

In point of fact the statement was utterly unfounded. Nothing whatever is known or recorded of any act or decision of commissaries appointed under the Treaty of Utrecht to settle the line of separation between the Hudson's Bay territories and the French possessions, or the northern boundary of Canada and Louisiana; and the whole argument rests upon a very questionable foundation. But even if such a boundary had been drawn at that early period, and drawn even beyond the Rocky Mountains to the then unknown coast of the Pacific, there is still a complete answer to the argument, though none of the American orators have been so ingenious as to use it. They have chosen to assume for the purposes of their claim that when mention is made of discussions with reference to the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company and the French possessions in North America, Louisiana is the province designate by the latter appellation; and as Louisiana was transferred to the United States by the sale of 1803, they infer that all the standing claims of the French possessions in North America were included in that excellent bargain. The misrepresentation is so gross that no amount of mere ignorance can be supposed to cover it. At the time of the Treaty of Utrecht, and throughout the first half of the 18th century, France was mistress of two great provinces in North America—Canada and Louisiana. Repeated discussions had arisen during the preceding reigns of Charles II, and William III, as to the proper limits of the Hudson's Bay territories and the French colony of Canada, in consequences of the alleged hostile invasion of the lands of the British company in 1686. The French company established in 1627 held under the letters of patent of Louis XIII granted in 1628, "the fort plantation of Quebec, and all the country of New France called 'Canada, up to the Arctic Circle in latitude, and in longitude from the island of Newfoundland westward to the lake called the 'Fresh sea' and beyond, together with the lands and coasts of the rivers which fall into the St. Lawrence." But throughout these discussions it was never alleged on the part of the French that Louisiana was at all affected by the question. They were defending the limits of Canada, and no more. The Treat of Utrecht provided for a final settlement of that controversy, and the labours of the commissioners to be appointed under the 10th article must have been confined to the Canadian claims against the Hudson's Bay territories. Louisiana nowhere came into contact with them.

In 1793, however, the position of England and France in North America was wholly changed. Canada and its dependencies were ceded by the latter Power; Louisiana was retained. The French Government was certainly able and willing to defend its just rights, but from that hour we hear no more of French claims on the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company, until half a century afterwards these pretended claims are resuscitated by the Americans, as part of their purchase of Louisiana. The claims, whatever they might be worth, were clearly attached to, and included in, the ceded dependencies of Canada; and if any Power can rely upon them at the present day it is England, as the representative of France in Canada and the north-west, not the United States, representing France by the purchase on the Mississippi and in the interior. The whole argument of Mr. Benton rests on a juggle, by which he first endeavors to establish his proposition in favour of "the French possessions," and then applies to Louisiana exclusively to Canada; so that, in truth, his argument not only does not make for him, but makes directly against him.

We have never attached much importance to the attempt to settle the Oregon question by an appeal to the wisdom of our forefathers. The continent of North America was, during the last century, the scene of several fierce contests between European Powers, which laid claim to dominions the have now, with the exception of England, wholly lost. But in all these disputes, in the negotiations for peace, and in the treaties by which they were terminated, not an allusion is to be traced to the north-west country, to the coast of the Pacific Ocean, or even to the Rocky Mountains. Whatever rights may before have existed in a general and indefinite form, it was the treaty of 1790 which first brought those regions within the public law of Europe. In 1763 the French had the strongest interests in extending as much as possible the boundaries of the province they were to retain; but we are confident that at that time no French Minister would have contended that Louisiana was to be taken to extend westward to the Rocky Mountains and to the Pacific beyond them. No European Power raised any formal pretensions to those territories. It was hardly known whether Lower California was an island or peninsula. The coast was unexplored till Cook and Vancouver visited it for the purpose of scientific inquiry; and occupation or sovereignty were still more remote. If France had chanced to have retained Louisiana to the present day, we should like to know what the United States would think of a claim advanced by her to hold the Oregon territory up to latitude 49 by virtue of the original charters of that province and the Treaty of Utrecht.

These questions must be settled in our day upon the great principles of policy and justice, not by quibbles on the construction of an old treaty, or by artifices which can impose nothing but the grossest ignorance. It is, however, of little importance for what reasons American spokesmen recommend a compromise, provided a rational compromise be adopted; but we confess that we grudge the time wasted in negotiation; and, however we may deplore the sluggish and reluctant progress of corn and coercion at home, these representative nuisances are even more intolerable when they lay hold to foreign affairs of a great nation.

[SCM]
Meanwhile some incidents of a novel and peculiar character have diverted the attention of the Senate from the artificial excitement created about the Oregon resolutions; and we hope the lassitude displayed by the orators on this threadbare topic is favorable omen for the ultimate adjustments of that difficulty. In the midst of the failing attractions of the peace-and-war question, Mr. INGERSOLL has given a powerful stimulus to the passions of the Senate by personal charges of the gravest character against Mr. WEBSTER--charges which either inflict indelible disgrace on the politicians who can resort to such means of party warfare, if they are disproved, or which, if they are brought home to Mr. WEBSTER, must ignominiously terminate his political career. Mr. INGERSOLL has alleged with the greatest formality in his place in the Senate, that certain papers for which he moved would furnish "proofs of Mr. Secretary WEBSTER'S misdemeanours in office, his fraudulent application and personal use of the public funds, and corrupting party presses with money appropriated by law for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse." And he adds, that when Mr. WEBSTER "was discharged from the department of State he was a delinquent, a public defaulter:" implying the he did not account for various sums of what we should term the secret service money; that some of this money was applied to his own uses, some to the release of M'LEOD; and hinting that as Mr. WEBSTER'S talents have hitherto placed him amongst the wisest and greatest of the citizens of the Union, so the turpitude and corruption of his official conduct makes him a match for the disgraces as well as the honours of Lord BACON. These extraordinary observations terminated by the adoption of a resolution for the production of the accounts for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse from the 4th March, 1841, to the retirement of Mr. WEBSTER, and a variety of correspondence relating to the negotiations in which that gentleman was successfully engaged.

These accusations have been stoutly resisted by Mr. WEBSTER'S friends, though not as yet personally contested by himself; and a counter motion has been made for the production of the secret service money accounts from a much earlier period, in order to establish the fact that Mr. WESTER'S conduct is sanctioned by precedent from the time of Mr. ADAM'S Administration.

We have no hesitation in saying that, until these charges are established by irrefragable evidence, we shall continue to hold Mr. WEBSTER to be a man of honour, and vehemently to suspect his accusers of a base design to destroy his political reputation and influence by the arts of calumny. At this time more especially, it is not difficult to detect strong bad motives amongst a certain party in America for an attempt to defame the negotiator of the treaty of Washington, and the most conspicuous leader of the Whig party in Congress. To that party and to that man we in great measure owe the maintenance of peace upon terms equally honourable to both countries, and the settlement of controversies far more irritating and perplexed than that of Oregon. We repeat, that until the contrary be solemnly proved, we shall refuse to believe that the hands of Mr. WEBSTER have been contaminated by the mean and dishonest acts imputed to him. We are rather struck and disgusted with the air of levity and party triumph with which these ignoble accusations are brought forward. It is only the other day that the editor of a libelous and worthless American paper was brought under the solemn notice of the Senate, for having asserted that corrupt bargains with American senators had been made at Mr. Pakenham's house, and that the whole strength of the compromise party was counted and ascertained at the British Minister's dinner-table. This absurd invention was at once confuted; the journalist was expelled from the gallery of Congress, and his paper ceased to appear. But what is such a charge as this compared to the attack now made upon Mr. WEBSTER? To hear a man who but lately filled the highest office but one in the commonwealth, and who still takes an active part in the present debates of the Senate, publicly called a defaulter, makes the blood boil in any country in which the general notions of the connexion between common honesty and political integrity have not been strangely relaxed. If such a charge can really be sustained against Mr. WEBSTER, the day of his conviction ought to be a day of mourning in the country which his frailty would have in part disgraced.

LT 5/7/1846 4f, Mexico, affairs of, proclamation by Paredes

THE WEST INDIAN MAILS.

The Medway, Royal West Indian mail-packet, arrived at Southampton yesterday. She brought 78 saloon passengers, 20 children, and 8 servants. Among the passengers is Colonel Yturregui, Minister from Peru to this Court.

The Medway has on freight 289,581 dollars (of which 46,003 are on account of the Mexican dividends), and other coin and gold of the value of 30,000 l. Her cargo consists of 59 serons of cochineal, 138 bales of tobacco, 24 bales of jalap root, 115 cases of cigars, 38 cases of preserved turtle, and 94 turtle alive, in fine condition.
Throughout the West India Islands the crops were deficient. The want of rain had been much felt, and especially in Demerara. Very little had fallen up to the 3rd of April, but there was every appearance of its setting in in the Windward Islands, where they had already been visited with many refreshing showers. All the islands were healthy.

The Royal Mail Company's steamer Forth sailed from Bermuda for Nassau on the 21st of April; the Tay was at St. Thomas's on the 14th, bound to Porto Rico; the Thames was at Jamaica on the 8th; the Trent sailed from Havannah on the 9th, for the Gulf of Mexico.

The Medway left at Tampico, inside the bar, two Mexican gunboats; at Sacrificios, Her Majesty's ship Rose, Captain Pelly; the French covettes Perouse, 20 guns, and Mercure, 16 guns; the Spanish corvette Habanera, 18 guns, and the American frigates Cumberland and Potomac, 50 guns each, and covettes St. Mary, Falmouth, and John Adams, 22 guns each. The American steamer Mississippi arrived at Vera Cruz on the 30th of March, and sailed again on the 31st, with Mr. Slidell, the American Minister, on board. Off Havannah on the 10th of April, the Medway met Her Majesty's ship Canopus, on her way to Halifax, New Brunswick, from Jamaica. There was at Havannah on the 10th of April, the Spanish ship Solonora, 74; corvette Fernanda, 24; brig Patriota, 20; and two schooners; at Bermuda on the 18th, Her Majesty's ships Vindictive, Admiral Sir F. Austen; Alarm, Endymion, Hyacinth, Persian, schooner Viper, and the steamer Hermes. The Endymion sailed on the 21st for Barbadoes.

We have, by the Medway, letters from our correspondent in the city of Mexico dated 30th of March, which we publish elsewhere. The Mexican Government had refused to receive Mr. Slidell, the American Minister, who had in consequence demanded and received his passports to leave the country.

General Paredes avowed his intention to adhere to the defensive system, and not to be provoked to declare war against the United States.

A new revolution was thought to be at hand, and the recall of General Santa Anna was openly talked of.

General Almonte had been appointed Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of France, and had arrived at Havannah on the 10th of April, where he remained in close communication with Santa Anna.

Senor Parres had retired from the Ministry of Finance, and was succeeded by Senor Gorostiza.

The following proclamation had been addressed by General Paredes to the Mexican nation:

"At this critical moment, when the nation is perhaps on the brink of war with the United States, in consequence of one of the most unjust usurpations of which history make mention, it becomes my duty to detail to my fellow-citizens the circumstances in which we are placed, the dangers which threaten us, and the sacrifices which may be necessary in order to sustain with valour, enthusiasm, and decision, rights which should be defended at whatever cost, and with and energy corresponding to the extent of the offence received. The dignity of the nation, the march of an American army to the river Bravo, where the headquarters of our troops are stationed, the threatening presence of the American squadrons in both seas, and the previous occurrences known to the civilized world, obliged me to refuse to receive the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, in order not to sanction by an act of debility a usurpation that, unsupported by any plausible reason or motive, is sustained through the hope of intimidating us by force. The American Minister, whose mission was nor limited to the question of Texas in the terms agreed to with the former Mexican Government, has demanded his passports, and I have not hesitated in ordering them to be give to him. I confess that war is one of the greatest evils opposed to the civilization of the are, which suggests rather the progress of industry, commerce and the most intimate relations under the auspices of a universal peace. But this peace must be consistent with the prerogatives and independence of nations, who are called on to repel force by force, when all the means of conciliation are exhausted.

"The Mexican republic having been stripped of the rich and extensive territory of Texas, which has always belonged to it, by acts emanating directly from the supreme authority of the neighbouring republic, whose designs to posses themselves of some other of our frontier provinces have also been discovered, the Mexican

One the 1st of this month Mr. Slidell, the American Minister, addressed a letter from Jalapa to the Minister for Foreign Affairs here, referring to his communications with the former Mexican Government, and desiring to know whether he would be received by the present one in his capacity of Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States, intimating at the same time in tolerably plain terms that a refusal would be followed by a demand for his passports, and an open rupture between the two countries. On the 12th Senor Castillo y Lanzas replied to Mr. Slidell, that the Mexican Government would not receive him as Minister Plenipotentiary from the Government of the United States, that the former Government had agreed to receive a commissioner for the question of Texas only, and had objected to his reception, when it was perceived that, under this pretence, it was attempted to fix a plenipotentiary here, as if the diplomatic relations of the two countries had never been interrupted; and that the present Government adopted to the fullest extent the same objection to his credentials. Senor Castillo took advantage of this opportunity to reargue the whole question of Texas in terms by no means interrupted; and that the present Government adopted to the fullest extent the same objection to his credentials. Senor Castillo took advantage of this opportunity to reargue the whole question of Texas in terms by no means complimentary to the Untied States. On the 17th Mr. Slidell demanded his passports, and replied at length to the arguments of Senor Castillo, "not from any novelty which they contained, but lest his silence should be erroneously interpreted as acquiescence in their justice;" finally, on the 21st, Senor Castillo, in a brief note, transmitted to Mr. Slidell his passports, as required. At the close of this correspondence each Minister congratulates himself on having completely refuted the arguments of the other, and renews to his opponent the assurances of his distinguished consideration. However, the affair has become serious. Mr. Slidell is by this time on board one of the American vessels of war at Sacrificios, and Mr. Polk stands pledged by all that is sacred in democratic sovereignty to exact an exemplary satisfaction.

Intelligence having been received here that a party of the United States troops in Texas had moved to, or towards, the Brazos de Santiago, which is the real port of Matamoras (the bar at the mouth of the Rio Bravo, excluding all but vessels a small burden), about 2,000 men under General Ampudia (the butcher of Tobasco) were ordered to reinforce the garrison at Matamoras. On reaching San Luis Potosi a majority of those troops refused to proceed, alleging, with some show of reason, that Paredes himself had preferred coming here to undertaking the same expedition, though with a larger force. The affair has been kept as quiet as possible, and is not known by what means the meeting was quelled; but the troops are again on the march, consoled, probably, but the reflection that an enormous distance still separates them from the country.

General Paredes, assailed with violence by the Opposition press for his supposed acquiescence in the monopolistic doctrines of El Tiempo, publishes a decree forbidding all discussion respecting forms of government, and recently a proclamation, explaining the state of affairs with the United States, and vindicating his own conduct with respect to the monarchal question. The proclamation contains the usual quantity of bombast, and in substance is rather republican, but it bears the Jesuit's mark, and betrays conscious weakness. He avows that the presence of the American troops on the left bank of the Bravo will not provoke him to any act of hostility against the United States, affecting to consider the right of declaring war as a prerogative of the future Congress. This hypocrisy has disgusted every one, and the Opposition press criticizes the proclamation with unsparing severity; indeed, one paper, La Reforma, goes the length of declaring that Santa Anna should be immediately invited to return here and assume the reins of government. If this advice be followed, and that it will be seems not improbable, what a picture of versatility and weakness will Mexico exhibit to the world!

Since Almonte's separation from the Cabinet he has been looked on by Paredes with distrust, and in consequence has just been named Envoy Extraordinary to France, a species of honourable exile, which Almonte's republicanism does not prevent him from accepting. Two well known writers in the Opposition papers are attached to the mission as secretaries!

Senor Parres has just retired from the Ministry of Finance. He is a man of old school, honest, ignorant, and obstinate. He claimed the right of revising the contracts, made by Santa Anna's Government, and on his own sole authority declared many of them null, some as, "usurious" and others as "burdensome to the Treasury," directing the contractors to refund the money they and received, under pain of embargo, which in one case (that of an American house) he actually made effective. This step excited general reprobation, and is said to have contributed to his fall. While in office, he borrowed 1,800,00 dollars (half money, half bonds of the 26 per cent. fund) on terms quite as bad as any of his predecessors, and in the last days of his Ministry granted a license for the exportation of 2,000 bars of silver (equal to 2,000,000 dollars) at an unusually low rate. The exportation of silver in bars is prohibited, but various Governments have had recourse to this expedient in order to raise money. When the circulation and expert duties on dollars were five and a half per cent., the Real del Monte Company paid eight per cent for a license to export silver in bars. The duty on dollars is now 10 per cent., yet the present contractors pay only 9 1/2 per cent for their license. The Mint of this city will, of course, be injured by the loss of the of the coinage of this sum, but that establishment has long been in a declining condition; and a deficit is known to exist in its funds, which occasioned serious alarm to persons sending silver there. The concern will probably pass ere long into the hands of the Anglo-Mexican Mint Company.

The new Minister of Finance is Don Manuel Eduardo Gorostiza, a gentleman known in Europe and the United States, and who is, in many respects, the opposite of his predecessor.

At the moment of closing this, the mail from Vera Cruz has not arrived, from which the friends of Santa Anna draw an inference unfavourable to the stability of Government, while the adherents of Paredes attribute the delay to the breaking down of the mail-cart.

LT 5/7/1846 7b US, preparations for war

PREPARATION FOR WAR.--Every vessel built, every soldier armed, by our Government is a preparation for war. No nation, however infinitesimal its proportions, is wholly without the protection which nature gives to the elephant and the insect. It is passing strange that our Government, our statesmen, and our journals should consider it necessary to beg the world's pardon for daring to add a few ships to our marine, or a few thousands to our army. All this may be done without the sky falling. Mr. President Polk is in the right in assuming that no foreign Power has reason to take exception to our adding to our army and navy an increase which will leave them of less force than the municipal and revenue police of England. Should this deference to foreign opinion in small matters be cultivated, we must ask Europe for permission that our militia should substitute guns for corn stalks, and powder for pea nuts. This apprehension of foreign jealousy is the means of vanity--the fear that we are so magnificently great that the world trembles before us, and that if we condescend to blow our republican noses the earth will shudder with the reverberations. What folly! Our military and naval force increased tenfold would, in comparison with the relative force of a German principality, be nothing to boast of; and the proposition to defend a territory so extended, a population so vast, by increasing our military police--by some 5,000 or 10,000 men, and our navy by some ten or a dozen vessels, is more likely to excite ridicule than resentment abroad. After having left our fortifications destitute of defenders, we boast an army of 5,000 men. Double it, and the world is in danger! Were our future halcyon, prudence dictates an increase of our means of defence. But, encompassed with storms, and contemplating a deadly issue with the foremost Power of the world, to neglect the means of defence is to invite ruin. A false security is ever boastful; it is easy to defy a danger supposed to be distant; but those who think at all must know that the course of our administration involves imminent danger of a collision with Great Britain, and that such a contest, unless every energy of the Republic be at once put forth, must leave our country to raise its laurels from the ashes of its prosperity. There is nothing in the relations of the two countries to justify to history or to heaven a war. Yet, with the passions excited by the administration through its organs, and which now, when the Executive has kindled the blood of the people to fever heat, rise in opposition to a compromise, it is idle to regard our country as safe without protection. An error, an act of passion or folly on either side, may precipitate the calamity and our people, with the torch at their doors and the sword at their throats, would have reason to complain of the imbecility of the Government that had betrayed them. The diplomacy of armed power is ever more auspicious than that which begs the grudged right that it is not prepared to enforce. It is as necessary for our country to be strong as to be in the right.--- Philadelphia North American. [SCM]

LONDON, FRIDAY, MAY 8, 1846.

The resolutions authorizing the PRESIDENT of the United States to give notice for the termination of the Oregon Convention of 1827, have now, as we announced yesterday, received the sanction of the Senate by a majority of 40 to 14 votes. Nine weeks of continuous debate may be supposed to have exhausted the most sturdy powers of Parliamentary endurance; and, from the senators of Massachusetts to the newly-arrived representative of the state of Texas, not a member of the sedate assembly seems to have let this important topic pass in silence. The doubts and difficulties which are commonly confined to a Cabinet on questions of this nature have here been extended to a species of popular assembly, and aggravated by publicity and party spirit. But the result has been the same as if the resolutions had been introduced by Mr. POLK; and public opinion throughout the Union has been informed and invigorated by the debate. In spite of the length of time during which we have contemplated the approach of this notice—the clear certainty of the result of the discussion—the unanimity which we may be said to have arrived at in both countries as to the expediency and necessity of putting an end to the doubtful condition of the question—and the impatience with which we desired that this preliminary step should be taken, in order that the definitive negotiation might be promptly resumed, it cannot be doubted that the solemn act of the American Government, which is about to assign a term to one of the most important territorial conventions existing between Great Britain and the United States, must be a considerable, and may become momentous, event. In America the debates on this subject have almost exclusively monopolized the time of the Legislature and the attention of the public since the commencement of the session of Congress. In this country, Parliament and the nation have been content to wait the course of the events, and to leave untouched by premature controversy one of the most important functions of the executive Government, and one of the highest prerogatives of the Crown. But, in spite of the excessive discussion to which the Oregon territory has given rise on the other side of the Atlantic, and the extreme reserve which has hitherto been maintained on this, there is at bottom the same deep and earnest hope in both countries that this question will be amicably settled, and we trust there is an equal resolution in the Governments of both countries to make every exertion, consistent with their true interests and honour, to terminate the controversy. It is in this spirit that we are willing to receive the notice for the termination of the existing convention. In this spirit, and with an express recommendation to that effect, the resolutions have been framed and carried in both houses of Congress; and in the same spirit we do not doubt that the negotiation will be forthwith renewed. The alternative is now distinctly indicated. The utmost term to which the peace of the world can be prolonged is one twelvemonth, if indeed circumstances do not bring about a much earlier rupture, unless the partition of the Oregon territory be finally settled within the period. Never was a heavier responsibility incurred by public men; never was a graver question poised in the balance of Providence. The provisional agreement under which our pacific relations with the United States have subsisted for 30 years is to be superseded by a final definition of our respective rights upon the north-western coast of America, or to be succeeded by war. The vessel is already loosened from the moorings at which she lay in peace. The convention of joint occupancy is virtually ended; and the destinies of these two great nations—if, indeed, they can be called twain, which have so great a name, a language, and a freedom in common with each other,—are exposed to the fluctuations of adverse and conflicting claims. The emergency is, doubtless, a most serious one; but, happily for the honour of this country, it is accompanied by none of those feelings of excitement amongst ourselves which have so often perplexed the affairs of the world, and it will be met with the deliberate energy of men as conscious of our duties as of our strength.

The form in which the resolution has been ultimately adopted by the Senate of the United States is extremely dignified and becoming, and in this respect may be regarded as a triumph of the moderate party over the violent and excessive pretensions of the gentlemen who act with Mr. Allen. In the final division which took place, 22 votes out of 40 belonged to the Whig party; whilst only 2 Whigs voted with the extreme party against the form in which it was proposed that the notice should be given. So that, although the division had nothing of a party character, the adhesion of the Whigs secured that moderation of language for which it is remarkable. It seems that, according to the forms of Congress, the House of Representatives must concur in the resolution as amended by the Senate, and for this purpose it will undergo some further debate in the lower house. As the notice stands in Mr. CRITTENDEN'S motion, there is not an expression in the preamble with which we do not cordially concur; and it forms a striking contrast to the peremptory and unqualified expressions used by MR. POLK in his official communications. In fact, when the Senate of the United States speaks of the "evil consequences of the divided allegiance of an American and British population and of the confusion and conflict of "national jurisdiction" in Oregon, they substantially recognize that principle of division which MR. POLK has hitherto denied, and they impose upon him the prosecution of a negotiation which he has endeavoured to render impossible.

Thus far, the, and in more respects than one, the American notice materially improves the prospect of a speedy settlement. It recognizes, in general terms, the basis upon which alone such a settlement can be attempted, and, by putting an end to the period of joint occupancy, it prepares us to maintain to the fullest extent the rights we derive from present occupation. Whatever be the fate of the provisional treaties, we presume that no one will presume that no one will contest that the rights and interests which have grown up by their protection and authority are sacred, both under the letter of those treaties, and under the original rights to which we now revert in all their force. Our positions as claimants upon an equal footing with the United States for the partition of the whole territory in dispute is rather strengthened than weakened by the abrogation of the treaty, and we cannot doubt that the Ministers of the Crown will be ready, upon the receipt of the notice, firmly and explicitly to declare to the cabinet of Washington what those rights are which they have long been "resolved and prepared to maintain." Every incident which has occurred in the course of these discussions has more and more fully convinced us that whilst a compromise is necessary, and, indeed, our own statement of our claims suggests a division, no surrender of those claims can be attempted. We are not conscious of having advanced any argument, or made any assertion, which is not greatly within the strictest limits to which British rights might have been carried; and below the line which has been traced for the policy of this country lies nothing but insecurity and disgrace. To that position we therefor adhere; we have no doubt that the Ministers of the Crown will adhere to it no less firmly, confident that in the maintenance of just rights, as well as in securing peace, they are supported by the unanimous resolution of the people of England.

America.

The Oregon Question.
The Notice.

[The following most important intelligence appeared in a second edition of The times of yesterday, exclusively:--]

We have received, via Havre, most important advices from Washington to the 16th and from New York to the 18th ult. inclusive. They bring the result of the debate in the Senate upon the Oregon Question.

The proceedings in the Senate are thus detailed by our correspondent:-

Washington City, (United States,)

Monday, April 13.

In the Senate this morning there was a conversational debate between Mr. Allen, Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Morehead, Mr. Clayton, and others, which resulted in an understanding (informally) that the vote on the resolutions respecting the 12 months' notice to terminate the joint convention relative to the Oregon territory should be
Mr. Huntington, of Connecticut, addressed the Senate to-day at length in favour of a settlement of the Oregon controversy by a compromise of the 49th degree.

A message was also received from the President in reply to Mr. Clayton's resolution of inquiry, which stated that no further correspondence on the subject of Oregon had passed between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain since the 4th of February (the arbitration correspondence).

Tuesday, April 14.

Mr. Westcott, of Florida, addressed the Senate in support of the title of the United States up to 54 deg. 40 min., but in opposition to the notice, which, he believed, if it is not bring on a war immediately, would at the expiration of the 12 months; and, as the United States were not prepared for war, he should vote against the notice in all shapes and forms.

Mr. M'Duffie, of South Carolina, said a few words by way of addenda to Mr. Westcott's speech, as that gentleman had attempted by appealing to "Hansard" to show that Great Britain had admitted the title of Spain to the territory in dispute. Mr. M'Duffie showed, by quotations from the following page of the same volume from which Mr. Westcott had been quoting, that Great Britain had always denied the right of Spain to exclusive jurisdiction in Oregon.

Wednesday, April 15.

Mr. S. Houston, of Texas, addressed the Senate to-day in a speech in favour of the American title to 54 deg. 40 min, and advocating the "naked notice" as it is called, or a simple resolution giving the notice without preamble or qualifications of any kind. He intimated in the course of his speech, however, that a treaty which settled the matter on the 49th degree would receive his vote.

Thursday, April 16.

The Senate Chamber and galleries were very much crowded this morning by persons anxious to see and hear the closing scenes of this long protracted debate, which has extended over nine weeks, and also to see to what results it would lead.

Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, led off in a very able and eloquent speech, in support of the preamble and resolutions which he had offered, authorizing the President to give the notice at his discretion.

Mr. Allen moved to lay the resolution reported by the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs on the Table, in order that the resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives might be taken up and acted upon, which was agreed to.

Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, moved the adoption, as a substitute, of the following preamble and resolution, which is the same as that offers by Mr. Crittenden, with the insertion of the word "amicable" before the word "settlement" at the conclusion of the preamble, and the omission of the following proviso at the end of the resolution:—

"Provided, however, that, in order to afford ampler time and opportunity for the amicable settlement and adjustment of all their differences and disputes in respect to said territory, said notice ought not to be given until after the close of the present session of Congress."

"Whereas by the convention concluded the 20th day of October, 1818, between the United States of America and the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for the period of ten years, and afterwards indefinitely extended and continued in force by another convention of the same parties, concluded the 6th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1827, it was agreed that any country that may be claimed by either party on the northwest coast of America westward of the Stony of Rocky Mountains, now commonly called the Oregon territory, should, together with its harbours, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be 'free and open' to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two Powers, but without prejudice to any claim which either of the parties might have to any part of said country; and with this further provision, in the second article of the said convention of the 6th of August, 1827, that either party might abrogate and annul said convention, on giving due notice of 12 months to the other contracting party;—

"And whereas it has now become desirable that the respective claims of the United States and Great Britain should be definitely settled, and that said territory may no longer than need remain subject to the evil consequences of the divided allegiance of its American and British population, and of the confusion and conflict of national jurisdictions, dangerous to the cherished peace and understanding of the two countries;—

"With a view, therefore, that steps be taken for the abrogation of the said convention of the 6th of August, 1827, in the mode prescribed in its second article, and that the attention of the Governments of both countries may be the more earnestly and immediately directed to renewed efforts for the amicable settlement of all their
"1. Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, at his discretion, to give the British Government the notice required by its said second article for the abrogation of the convention of the 6th of August, 1827."

Mr. Allen moved to amend this substitute, by striking out the second and third paragraphs of the preamble, and inserting an extract from the President's Message, commencing and whereas it has now "become the duty of Congress," &c.

Mr. Pennybacker, of Virginia, then rose, and spoke at some length in explanation of his reasons for opposing the substitute.

The question being taken on the amendment to the substitute proposed by Mr. Allen, it was decided in the negative by a vote of - Yeas, 22; Nays, 32, as follows:-

In the Affirmative.

Allen, of Ohio          Fairfield, of Maine
Ashley of Arkansas      Hannegan, of Indiana

Mr. Allen then spoke at some length in opposition to the resolution as thus modified, declaring his intention to vote against it, even if he voted alone.

Mr. Crittenden replied to Mr. Allen, who rejoined, and Mr. Crittenden surrejoined in a strain of great severity towards Mr. Allen.

The committee of the whole having reported the amendment to the Senate, it was concurred in.

The question then recurred on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time, which was

So the Senate agreed by a majority of 26 out of 54 votes to adopt the resolution as amended, which will now have to be sent back to the House of Representatives for its concurrence.

The House of Representatives have been engaged since Monday in discussing a bill to protect the rights of American settlers in the territory of Oregon until the termination of the joint occupation of the same.

Of this bill you had a copy several weeks ago. It meets with strenuous opposition from the Whigs and a portion of the Democrats. The House has ordered debate to cease, and the vote to be taken on it to-morrow (Friday), the 17th inst. It is not likely that it will be adopted in the House without being essentially modified, but if it should be, it will be very summarily disposed of in the Senate, by being laid on the table.

On Tuesday the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means reported a bill to the House, "reducing the duty on imports, and for other purposes." It is probable that it will be brought up for discussion in about a fortnight. It is modelled on the same plan as the project of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Walker, but differs from that materially in the rates of duty which it levies; for instance, Mr. Walker's project levied 25 percent on woollens, and 30 percent on cottons, while the bill reported to the House levies 30 and 25 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Slidell has returned from his mission to Mexico without having accomplished anything whatever, Paredes positively refusing to receive him as a Minister Plenipotentiary, though, it is said, they are willing to receive a special commissioner to settle pending difficulties.

Simultaneously, as it would appear, with the orders for Mr. Slidell to return to the United States General Taylor received orders to march troops under his command from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande, and they are now opposite the city of Matamoras, having put the Mexicans into a tremendous fight, so that the Government official there set fire to the Custom House, and ran off as fast as he could.

It is said that the Senate will not act upon any measure of any importance sent to it by the House until that body has acted definitively upon the resolutions of notice which the Senate passed yesterday.

The Tariff Bill, which has been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, is hardly expected to pass Congress this session, or perhaps next either.

LT 5/11/1846-5b Naval and military resources of the United States

The United States' Government have cautiously abstained from submitting any specific demand to Congress for supplies of finance and of war calculated to meet the emergency in which they have placed the United States. Mr. Polk has, indeed, intimated in an official message, that in his opinion the time is now come for augmenting the military and naval establishments of the Union; by the has omitted to state the amount of the deficiency which has to be supplied, of to point out the means by which he proposes simultaneously to fortify the coast, to construct a fleet, to equip an army, and to replenish the treasury. We are left to extract from a scanty correspondence of the army and navy departments the only glimmering of light which has reached us on this subject; and that feeble ray serves rather to indicate the huge extent of the task, than to suggest the means by which it is to be accomplished. The old maxim "Si vis pacem para bellum" has certainly not been observed by President Polk; but though not observed we hope that has not been inverted; and we are unwilling to deduce a great alacrity for war from a total absence of preparation for it. The truth is that Mr. Polk is well aware that, unless the conduct of English Government is such as to rouse a strong fit of excitement and resentment in the United States, the first serious indication of war, the first heavy loan brought into the market and the first proposal of a war budget, would be the signal for a most vigorous and active opposition to the President's Government. So great an increase in the demands of the Federal Government upon the nation would at once indicate the change which has really, though covertly, taken place within the last few years in the policy of the dominant party in the United States. As long as they observed those rules of forbearance, peace, and good faith towards their neighbours which were inculcated by the illustrious founders of their constitution, they were too strong to run any risk of foreign aggression, and too wise to provoke a contest they were unprepared to meet. But since those primitive virtues have disappeared from amongst them, their foreign policy and their military establishments have yet to learn that no State can annex provinces and impose peremptory conditions upon its neighbours, without accepting the great and permanent burdens of standing armies and immense arsenals. Nothing is more certain than that the present tone and conduct of the Cabinet of Washington lead straight, and by a rule of invincible necessity, to the expenditure, patronage, and influence which attend the maintenance of the public forces; and everything seems to indicate that our Transatlantic descendants will not be more free than all the great States which have flourished in the world from the costly and perilous passion of arms.

We recently showed from some American statistics how very inadequate the present military and naval establishments of the Union are, even to the demands of the service in time of peace; and for some time past attention of the American Government has been fixed upon this fact, though they evidently require some incident which shall excite the popular mind in that direction to enable them to carry their measures of augmentation. The necessity of defending the territory of Texas, where the population is too sparse to defend itself from the probability of a Mexican incursion, and the very precarious relations of the United States with the Mexican Government, have, in fact, drawn to the southern frontier the whole disposable force of the Union. The Secretary-at-War recommended, in his letter to the Chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate, in a letter of the 29th of December last, that, considering the amount of the force actually required in Texas and on the Indian frontier, as well as to garrison the existing fortifications on the coast, the President should have authority to accept the services of volunteer companies and State troops for a term not exceeding one year. He adds, "Our situation may be such that for the mere purpose of defence, these volunteers or militia to the number of 50,000 may be needed. This number, in addition to our regular force, would not be more than sufficient to put the country in a reasonable state of security in case of a war with Great Britain. On the northern Frontier, where there are now stationed only 480 men, provisions should be made for placing, on the shortest notice, a force equal to that in Canada, where there are at this time about 7,000 regular British Troops." As for the fabrication of heavy ordnance and materiel, the department had not even ascertained what means would be placed at its disposal; and for the essentials of war; the Chinese were scarcely worse provided to repel our squadrons than the Americans.

The following return of the naval force of the United States was used in a recent debate in the Senate, and may, we presume, be relied on:-

"Naval Force of The United States."

"Of the steamers, one of the three in the column of 'ordinary' is for harbour defence. One other is a steam-tug."

Since this return was made, we believe that orders have been given for the construction of 10 steamers of war; but, at present, the Princeton and the Mississippi are the only two steam-ships which bear the United States' flag.

Some months have elapsed since these facts were brought under the notice of Congress, but as yet nothing has been done on a scale of any importance to remedy the evil and provide against the danger. Such supineness is certainly the best proof of the confidence which must prevail in the United States, that the British Government has no intention of abusing its superior force; for no ally ever displayed a more complete reliance upon the disposition of this country for peace than has been, and is still, shown upon the other side of the Atlantic. But we cannot doubt that if Mr. POLK could have acted with more vigour, he would have done so. No Executive Government ever before placed itself in such a position as he has taken up, with so total an absence of the first elements of military and naval power. But the Cabinet of Washington has probably discovered by experience and inquiry, that the first element of all is of all the most embarrassing to obtain. The United States come into the field not only with a volunteer army and a fleet manned in part by foreigners, but with a blighted credit. Long before a cannon is fired, and whilst war is still no more than a remote contingency, they man discover that the pecuniary transactions of the last few years between America and Europe have done more to lessen their power than the defeat of an army or the destruction of a fleet. What power has Mr. POLK of contending against difficulties of finance, aggravated an hundred-fold by the past policy and present attitude of his Government? Already we understand that his views upon the tariff, which might have given a permanent and pacific lustre to his administration, have been abandoned, or at least postponed-doubtless because they involve sacrifices of revenue which it is absolutely impossible to make. And if the United States are to make preparations, even for the decence of their own territories, at all in proportion to the arrogance of the language in which some of their representatives speak of the territories of other States, the Cabinet of Washington must have in preparation some considerable financial expedient which will reveal their designs to the world, and their weakness to themselves.

LT 5/13/1846 5d America

Wednesday, May 13, 1846 - AMERICA
LIVERPOOL, TUESDAY, MAY 12.
Important accounts from Washington to the 21st ult. and from New York to the 23d inclusive have been received this day by the packet ship Liverpool, Captain Eldridge.

We learn by these advices that the Oregon notice passed by the Senate had been amended by the House of Representatives. The amended form was rejected by the Senate, then insisted upon by the house, and, ultimately, committees of conference were appointed by the two houses to compromise the dispute. The members of the Senate Committee were Messers, Berien, Hayward, and Corwin; those of the House, those of the House, Messers, Ingersoll, Owen, and Hilliard. The amendments of the House of Representatives were as follows:-

Where, in the Senate resolution, one object of giving the notice was declared to be, "that the attention of the two Governments may be more earnestly and immediately devoted to renewed efforts for the amicable adjustment of all their territory," the House substituted "be the more earnestly directed to the importance of a speedy adjustment of all their differences and disputes in respect to said territory." The word "amicable," it will be observed, is here stricken out. The second section of the Senate resolution authorizes the President, at his discretion, to give the notice; the House proposes to authorize and request the President to give the notice,-the phrase "at his discretion," being stricken out.

Should the Committee of Conference fail to arrive at an understanding, and the Senate still refuse to "recede" from its disagreement, the notice will entirely fail.

On the 18thult. the Oregon Occupation Bill passed the House of Representatives in the following amended shape; Ayes, 103;Nays, 46:-
"A bill to protect the rights of American settlers in the territory of Oregon, until the termination of the joint occupation of the same."

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the jurisdiction of the supreme court of the territory of Iowa, and the laws of said territory, so far as the same may be applicable, as they now exist, are hereby extended over all that portion of the territory of the United States which lies west of the Rocky Mountains; and also over all that portion of the intermediate country west of the Missouri river, and between the 40th and 43rd parallels of north latitude. Provided, that this act shall not be construed nor Great Britain of any of the rights and privileges secured by the treaty signed in London, October 20, 1818, and continued in force by the treaty of August 6, 1827."

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, that all the country described in the first section of this act shall constitute one judicial district, and a district court shall be held therein by the judge to be appointed under this act, at such times and places as he shall designate; and the said court shall possess all the powers and authority vested in the present district of the supreme court of the territory of Iowa shall be appointed, who shall hold his office by the same tenure, receive the same compensation, and possess the same powers and authority as are conferred by law upon the other justices of the said court, and who shall hold the district courts in the said district as a foresaid."

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, that the President be hereby authorized to appoint the requisite number of justices of the peace and such Ministerial officers as shall be necessary for the due execution of the laws: Provided, that any subject of Great Britain who shall be arrested under the provisions of this act, for crime alleged to have been committed within the territory of the United States west of the Rocky Mountains, while the same remains free and open to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the United States and of Great Britain, pursuant to stipulations between the two Powers, shall be delivered up for trial, on proof of his being such British subject, to the nearest and most convenient authorities having cognizance of such offence by the laws of Great Britain."

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, that provision shall hereafter be made by law to secure and grant to every white person, male or female, over the age of 18 years, 320 acres of land; and to every white person, male or female under the age of 18 years, 160 acres of land, who shall have resided in the said territory described in the first section of this act for five consecutive years, to commence within three years from the passage of this act; provided, the said land shall be located in said territory."

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, that there shall be appointed, in the manner provided by law for similar officers, a superintendent of Indian affairs, and such Indian agents and sub-agents as shall be necessary for the public interests, to whom may be intrusted, under the direction of the President, and in accordance with the existing laws, so far as they may be consistent with the purport of this act, the regulation of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and the execution of the laws herein extended over the country described in the first section of this act."

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, that the President be, and he is hereby authorized to cause to be erected such blockhouses, stockades, or military posts as shall be necessary to protect emigrants, settlers, and traders on the route to and in the territory of Oregon against Indian depredations and aggressions, and to furnish such ammunition and supplies as shall be necessary to their defence."

"Sec. 7. Be it further enacted, that a post-route be established from Fort Leavenworth, via Grand Island, on the Platte river, Fort Loramie, the South Pass of the Rocky Mountains, Fort Hall, Fort Boise, Fort Wallawalla, and Oregon city, on the Willamette river, to Astoria, at the mouth of Columbia river, on the Pacific Ocean."

"Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, that it shall be there duty of the Postmaster-General to cause the United States mail to be transported on the said route from Fort Leavenworth to Astoria and back, at least once a-month, by such means of conveyance as he may deem most advantageous to the public service, and on the best terms that can be obtained by contract, in the mode now provided by law for the transportation of the United States mail. Provided, that if, in the opinion of the President of the United States, it be expedient to cause the mail on the route aforesaid to be carried by detachments of mounted men in the service of the United States, he may order the said mail to be carried in that way, instead of having it transported by contract, as above provided."

"Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, that the sum of $100,000 be , and the same is hereby, appropriated to carry the provisions of this act into effect."

The charges against Mr. Webster had fallen into universal discredit, and had recoiled upon Mr. Ingersoll with most damaging effect. On the 20th ult. a message was received from the President, in the house, in response to the resolution calling for the accounts of the disbursement of the secret service fund, which Mr. Webster was accused of having appropriated in part to his own use, and in part applied to improper purposes. The president refused to send the accounts' vouchers, and replied that by a law of 1810 this fund had been used by the President, upon his certificate only, without any account or statement of the object; that the amount used during Mr. Webster's administration of the State Department was only $5,169; that he could send President Tyler's certificates, upon which the money was drawn, but that they would furnish no means whatever of judging of the propriety of the expenditure, or even of its objects. In a case of impeachment a committee could examine the confidential papers, but the executive would not, under any light occasion, allow them to be published, for it would destroy the object of the fund. He had not yet used any of the fund, but should not hesitate to do it if occasion required. No President would use the fund except in extreme cases.

Mr. Ingersoll then alleged that Mr. Webster proposed a special mission to settle the Oregon question and make a commercial treaty. Mr. Webster has denied this, and Mr. Adams, being appealed to declared as chairman at that time of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that Mr. Ingersoll's allegations were utterly untrue and unfounded. The affair ended in the President's message establishing the failure of Mr. Ingersoll's charges being printed.

The President, in a message communicated to the House of Representatives on the 20th, had declined to furnish the information in relation to the secret service fund called for by Mr. Ingersoll. This provoked some further discussion:

"Mr. C.J. Ingersoll said the resolution had been answered in a manner different from what he had expected. It had been said, since this subject was up before, that there had been a conspiracy on this subject. If there was a conspirator, he (Mr. Ingersoll) was the only one. Nobody knew of this assault but himself, and all that had been done had been instigated by himself. He had, when provoked by the attack in the other house, gone to the State Department and spent an hour, where he found information very unexpected to himself, and which had led to the introduction of resolutions which he regretted the President had not thought proper to answer. Mr. Ingersoll said he had information in his possession by which he expected to prove the charge that Mr. Webster did make application to the Committee on Foreign Relations to England for a special mission through the gentleman from Massachusetts - Mr. Adams.

"Mr. Adams denied this charge too, so that Mr. Ingersoll's only resource was to do as he had done in relation to the other charges, and persist in his declaration that they were all undoubtedly true; but, unfortunately, he could not adduce one line of proof."

"Mr. King of Georgia, replied, with many interruptions, upon points of order. He denied that the member from Pennsylvania had sustained a single one of all the charges which he had made. He was surprised when they were made; but he was more amazed at the attempt to substantiate such charges, though not one scintilla of proof had been offered; and upon the head of the member who made the charges all the responsibility would rest.

"Of course, the whole thing recoils upon its author, who richly merits the contempt and scorn of every true-hearted American."

The prospects of the Sub-Treasury Bill in the Senate had assumed a doubtful aspect; and it was thought that, should it pass that body, it would be in an amended and ameliorated form. The New York Chamber of Commerce had petitioned against it.

No advance had been made with the Tariff Bill.

The American journals publish, in extenso, the correspondence which has passed between the Mexican Executive and Mr. Slidell. The documents add nothing material to the information we already possess.

"By the latest accounts from the Army of Occupation," says the New York Herald of the 23d ult.,-

"We learn that the Mexican army is now 8,000 strong and continually increasing. To oppose this large force we have about 3,000 men, who, by daily desertion and sickness, are decreasing fast. To increase our difficulties, the Mexican authorities have committed an act which, in all probability, will lead to a general engagement between the two armies. It appears that two men, who were the videttes thrown out by the advanced guard of dragoons, have been captured by the Mexicans; and, on being demanded by General Worth, who proceeded with a flag of truce for the purpose, the Mexican officers who answered him declined to convey any propositions to their commander until the American army should withdraw from its present position. This, of course was not done. Meanwhile the greatest activity appeared to prevail in the Mexican camp. Four redoubts were thrown up in one day and one night, in expectation, no doubt, of a general engagement."

The Herald remarks:-

"It would appear that the same desire to avoid responsibility that marked the course of the Executive in our relations with England has characterized him in the measures taken to maintain the national honour with Mexico. Instead of demanding appropriations from Congress sufficient to equip an army of 10,000 or 15,000 men, General Taylor was despatched to the Rio Grande with a paltry 3,000 men, many of whom have deserted, and many fallen victims to the climate. Such a contemptible display of the military resources of this great country, instead of intimidating the Mexicans, and striking terror into their Government, had quite the contrary effect. Indeed, so insignificant did this force appear in the estimation of the Mexican officers, that they were not afraid to post their forces on their own side of the river, immediately opposite the camp of General Taylor, and point their cannon in such a position as to sweep the American camp and army to the shades. Such is the view the pusillanimous Mexicans, as we are accustomed to call them take of Mr. Polk's measures of intimidation."

"If, under these circumstances, an engagement should take place, we must reasonably conclude that it will end disastrously to the American name, and that a considerable portion of our little but brave army will be sacrificed. The eternal boasting without acting, and the intrigues of the President-makers at Washington, have lowered the American name immeasurably in the eyes of Europe, and defeated the settlement of the Oregon question. The same policy towards Mexico—the same big talking—has inspired the feeble Mexicans with contempt for us; and the probability is, that if the anticipated engagement has taken place, and the American forces have been defeated, a long and bloody war, which may cost millions of dollars, will have to be resorted to before our relations with Mexico will be settled. It would appear, indeed, that the same vacillation which characterized the administration of John Tyler will attend that of James K. Polk.

The New Orleans papers mention a rumour that General Taylor, in an action with the Mexican forces, had sustained a defeat. The statement was entirely discredited.

The Caledonia had arrived at Boston on the 20th ult. The Unicorn had left that port for Halifax on the preceding day.

Lake Champlain was clear of ice, and navigation will shortly be resumed.

Our accounts from Canada are of much importance, and bring reports of a probably resignation of the Ministry, in consequence of an adverse majority in the House of Assembly. The house was in committee on the proposed repeal of the duty of 3s. per quarter now levied upon wheat from the United States, such repeal having been suggested in a despatch from the home Government. The Ministry advocated the repeal. A postponement of the subject, moved by Mr. Merritt, was opposed by the Ministry, but carried by a majority of 7; whereupon Mr. Draper, the Attorney-General, moved that the house adjourn, in order that he might have time to consult with his colleagues as to the course they should pursue. The papers anticipate a resignation, as we have said, but those which support the Ministry express their belief that it will not be accepted by Lord Catheart.

"In consequence of a vote given in the house last night, Mr. Draper moved to adjourn, in order to give himself and colleagues an opportunity of considering what course they ought to pursue, or in plain terms whether they should not resign. The house was in committee to consider the expediency of repealing certain duties, and the resolution under consideration was for the repeal of the duty of 3s. per quarter now levied upon American wheat intended for export, in accordance with a suggestion in a despatch from the Colonial Secretary, which we published some time since. A long and able exposition of the necessity of making this and other changes in our tariff, in order to meet the commercial policy of England, was made by the Inspector-General. He was followed by Mr. Attorney-General Draper, Mr. Sherwood, Messrs. Moffatt, Gowan, McDonald, of Cornwall, and other members, who spoke in favour of the measure. But there were on the Ministerial side some members who thought differently, and the expression of their opinions brought about a result little expected. Mr. Baldwin seized the opportunity of a division of opinion to attempt by a coup de main, to effect what which under ordinary circumstances he could not have done. In speaking to the question, without using one argument for or against the policy, announced by the administration, he said that he was not prepared to vote for the repeal of this duty—that he considered any action the reason as premature; and that even allowing that the position of the colony might call for such a change this was not the time to make it."

He was followed by Mr. Cauchon, who complained of the attempt to take a vote on this motion at so short a notice.

Mr. Attorney-General SMITH replied, that if a delay was required, Ministers were willing to grant it. Mr. Cauchon upon this, taunted the Administration with attempting to force the motion through the house, and being only desirous of granting a delay when they saw they were about to be defeated by the defection in their ranks.

Mr. MERRITT then moved to adjourn the consideration of the question.

Upon a division the motion was carried by a majority of seven.

Among those who voted for the adjournment we may mention the following:—Messrs. Moffatt, McDonald (Cornwall), Gowan, and Ermatinger. The numbers were merely counted, and the names not taken down, so that while stating the names of a few of those who voted postponement, on the Ministerial side, who caught our eye, we cannot give a complete list.

Upon this Mr. Draper made the announcement we have given above.

We believe it possible that Ministers will resign; but we think it highly improbable that the Administrator of the Government will accept that resignation, or that ministerial majority will allow it. This is no defeat, for we believe every member who usually acts with the Government, who voted for the postponement, had no other object in view than to afford more time for the consideration of an all important question, and as an act of courtesy to those members of the opposition who asked for delay, among whom were Messers. DeWitt, Merritt, Chauveau, and McDonald of Glengary. They had no idea that their action would be taken up in the way it was, or the vote would have been a very different one. We think Mr. Draper has not done well; he has allowed himself to be led away by private feeling, instead of consulting higher interests, and being guided by those broad and comprehensive principles on which he usually acts. Had the resolution before the house been negative, we do not think that he would be justified in retiring from the councils of the country, without there...
The English funds were a little flat in appearance to-day, though there was no great decline in prices. The speculators profess to be alarmed at the prospect of war with America, and an attempt was made to "bang" the market this afternoon, but without success. Consols for money closed 96 1/2, and for the account 96 5/8 to 3/4;
Bank stock left off 205 to 1/2; Three per Cents. Reduced, 95 1/2 to 3/4; Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents., 97 3/8 to 5/8; Long Annuities, 10 1/4; India Stock, 265 to 266; and Exchequer-bills, 23s. to 26s. pm.

The foreign securities were not much altered. Mexican activities closed at the better quotation of 33 for the account; Deferred was nominally quoted low, but no actual bargains were recorded. Austrian stock was done at 110; Chilian at 97; Peruvian, at 39 1/2; Russian, at 110; Spanish Five per Cents., at 243/4; the Three per Cents., at 36 7/8; Venezuela Deferred at 13; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents., at 59 1/2; and the Four per Cents., Certificates, at 92 1/8.

The Government broker's purchase to-day amount to 10,000l. New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents., at 97 1/2, for the friendly societies and savings banks. Yesterday they were to the same extent.

The premium on gold at Paris is 16 1/2 per mille, which at the English mint price of 3l. 17s. 10 1/2d. per oz. For standard gold gives an exchange of 25 56; and the exchange at Paris on London at short being 25 70, it follows that gold is 0.54 cent dearer in Paris than in London.

By advices from Hamburg, the price of gold is 435 1/2 per mark, which at the English Mint price of 3l. 17s. 10 1/2d. per oz. For standard gold, gives an exchange at Hamburg on London at short being 13s 11 1/2d., it follows that gold is 0.57 per cent dearer in London than in Hamburg.

The Lords of the Treasury this day issued a notice that they are about to dispose of the sycee silver lately received by Her Majesty's ship Serpent, which is L, 682,000 ounces in weight, and of about $2,000,000 value. The tenders, none of which are made before 1 o'clock on Friday next, and gold exceeding 5 grains per pound troy is to be paid for at the rate of 77s. 9d. per ounce standard.

From the opinions which are expressed in the city as to the terms now offered by the Mexican Government, it may be inferred that there is no great disposition to accept them.

In the first place, setting aside all considerations of value, the greatest disapprobation is expressed as to the principle of the offer. The creation of a new set of bonds, secured on the tobacco revenue, and distinguished from another set of bonds secured on the Customs revenue, would, it is thought, create much confusion in the market. Two descriptions of Active stock issued by the same Republic would be regulated by different circumstances, and discrepancies might arise, embarrassing in the transactions of business.

In the next place, the terms offered for the Deferred Bonds are by no means considered sufficient. By the very nature of these documents they are to become Active next year, and they therefore have commanded a price of about 16 or 17. These, as well as the Debentures, would, by the new term, be converted into Active stock, at the rate of 40l. New Active for every 100l. Deferred. Now, 20l. of these New Actives, which, of course, would be without the overdue coupons attached to the present Active stock, would not command a price higher than 12l. in the market, and the holders do not see why they should sacrifice 4l. or 5l., and part with the position they hold under the original terms. It may be remembered, too, that when these Deferred Bonds were originally issued, another value was attached to them besides that arising from the promised conversion into Actives in 1847. The prospect was held out of giving tracts of land in exchange for the documents, and these were regarded by the Mexican Government as a great temptation. By the operation now announced, all such hopes are of course dissipated.

What may be the decision of the creditors when they attend the meeting on Monday next, is nevertheless extremely problematical, for though the most experienced persons are unequivocal in their disapprobation of the plan, many may be tempted by the offer of a half-yearly dividend, to be paid immediately, when they have so long waited in vain, and the Republic appears to be in so unsettled a condition. At all events, if the terms are accepted, it will be a sign that the credit of the country is held in no high estimation the present moment. [SCM]

The difference which has arisen between the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives, as to the form of the resolutions authorizing the President to give the notice for the termination of the Oregon convention of 1827, is so minute that nothing but the most captious spirit point. It is utterly unimportant to the interests ad the dignity of this country whether the President be "authorized, at his discretion," or "authorized and requested" to give notice; and we are perfectly content that "the attention of both Governments should be the more earnestly directed to the importance of a speedy adjustment of all their differences and disputed in respect to the Oregon territory." It is probable, however, that the more courteous form of the resolution adopted by the Senate will prevail; unless, indeed, this ridiculous verbal difference between the two Houses is to be made a pretext for allowing the resolutions to drop altogether, which would be the case if they cannot agree on the terms used. This solution, however, is as childish and improbable as the conjecture of the Whig organ in this countrymen which argues that President Polk has formally intimated that in his opinion the notice ought to be given at the earliest possible period; and unless he is prepared to retract his own spontaneous declaration, he is of course only waiting for the sanction of Congress to carry it into effect.
Mr. Polk is himself the author of all the agitation springing out of the discussion of the Oregon question, which has engrossed the attention of the American people. To the exclusion of far more important subjects, ever since he assumed the reins of government, fourteen months ago. He must bear the responsibility of all the political perplexity, the mercantile embarrassment, and the national burdens, which are already felt in the United States. At present he has displayed no qualities adapted to such an emergency, but a strange aptitude in multiplying the causes of dissention and offence, combined with a sluggish indifference as to the means of carrying on the negotiation or of preparing for war. We are more curious than anxious to uncover the effects of such a novel and inscrutable course of policy. But, if there is any truth in the precedents of history of the maxims of common sense, a statesman who unites the two extremes of arrogance in language and debility in action is preparing for himself and his country the inevitable retribution of humiliation and disaster.

The American politicians appear to us to have formed lost inaccurate notions of the position in which they really stand. Their ignorance of the resources and powers of European Governments is kept alive by the pernicious flattery of the popular leaders, who tell them they are the first people on earth; and they are encouraged in a stupid disbelief of danger, which they mistake for courage. The state of the relations with Mexico is a striking exemplification of this inconsistent and foolhardy line of policy. When the United States Government, with the full sanction of the American people, consummated the annexation of Texas, and answered the protest of Mexico in a tone of defiance, they should, according to all the usages of civilized Governments, have proceeded to take military means for the protection of the Federal flag. The Cabinet of Washington disdained these precautions, and such has been the neglect of the most obvious and military arrangements on the part of the Americans, that even the Mexicans have collected an army of thrice the strength of the United States' forces on the Rio Grande. When the last advices left the frontier a collision appeared to be imminent; and there are strong reasons for doubting whether the Americans would have the advantage. It would be strange if Mr. Polk was to undergo a defeat from the troops of the least of the Powers of the world, at the very moment when he affects to brave the armies and fleets of the greatest; but certainly his present for way are hardly equal to a contest with Mexico, not to say with England.

It is a common fallacy in political speculation to impute to rivals and opponents a profundity of design and a vigour of character very much beyond their real merits, and these considerations, whether well or ill-founded, are quite as much calculated to inspire caution and to insure respect as a reputation for prowess or strength in arms: but we are not likely to fall into this mistake on the present occasion; for Mr. Polk has neither inspired the world with confidence as a friend of peace, nor with a salutary terror as an author of war. In professing to raise and uphold the character of the United States' Government, he has allowed it to forfeit a character for strength, and the only suggestion which appears to us to account for his conduct is that of extreme incapacity. He has done everything to aggravate the difficulties of negotiation, and nothing to provide for the possibility of their failure. What would have been thought or said in this or any other country of a Government which should deliberately leave its coasts unprotected, its fleets unmanned. Its armies unequipped and undisciplined, whilst its policy provokes a simultaneous resistance from the Powers on each side of their territories? The thing is without a precedent; and it is also without a precedent to have to deal with an adversary so just and temperate, that even this extreme inequality of forces will not induce us to raise our terms. But forces will not induce us to raise out terms. But most assuredly this is no time for us to reduce them. The honourable desire to avoid war will go far to maintain peace; but the fear of a war which it is physically impossible to maintain with advantage ought to go much further in the councils of any wise Government. Before Mr. Polk placed himself in this ridiculous position, he ought to have calculated the means he has at his disposal for getting out of it. A few months ago he might have settled the Oregon question on equal terms, with complete honour and dignity. At present, whatever by the turn given to the negotiation, the President will not escape the imputation of yielding to the necessity of the case, and accepting terms which are backed by the whole force of Great Britain. His own folly deserves this punishment, and it will not be long before the public opinion of the Union will assign him a place in the annal of the Presidents behind even Mr. Tyler.

The chief, if not the only ground of apprehension as to the ultimate effect of this state of affairs, arises from our uncertainty as to the direction it may give to Mr. POLK's own conduct. To suppose that he is capable of kindling a conflagration between two great and cognate states for the sake of covering his own blunders, by calling forth an energetic national demonstration in support of a bad cause, is to impute to him, not weakness, but wickedness. But weak men are apt to resort to the most desperate expedients at the last extremity; and nothing excites our apprehension so much as the fact that Mr. POLK appears to be incapable of any settled policy, and to live by the accidents and vicissitudes of the time.

We only trust that he will not fall into the serious error of imputing to the English Government the same uncertainty and hesitation which so strongly mark his own course. The packet which will sail from Liverpool in a few days will convey to the United States the real impression produced here by the late intelligence. If the resolution was intended a threat or a hostile measure, it has totally failed to have any effect whatever, except that it is probably Mr. PAKENHAM will be at once empowered to bring the controversy to a prompt and final issue. Setting aside all popular clamour and national prepossessions, the object of both Governments must be to effect a settlement upon the basis which they conceive to be practical, honourable, and just. The confidence of the people of England rests with perfect composure on the determination of the Ministers of the Crown in this momentous debate; and we cannot suppose that the American Government, boasting as it does a more popular origin, possesses the confidence of the nation to a less degree, or is less able to carry into full effect the terms of an equitable compromise.
The intelligence published in The Times of this morning from America was read with interest in the city, but it produced no change in the value of Government securities. The market was a little flat towards the close of the day, and the operating cause appeared to be an increasing scarcity of money. Consoles for immediate transfer were finally quoted 96 1/2; Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents. Reduced, 95 5/8 to 1/2; Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents., 97 1/4 to 3/8; Long Annuities, 10 3-16; India Bonds, 28 to 33 pm.; and Exchequer-bills, 20s to 26s. pm.

The business in the foreign stock-market was not of an important character. Process continue steadily maintained, notwithstanding the gradual decline of speculation. The latest operations were Brazilian, Small at 83 1/2; Granada, at 22; Mexican Activities, at 33; for the account at 33 1/8; the Deferred, at 16; Peruvian, at 38 1/2; Portuguese Three per Cents., at 57 1/2; Russian, at 110; Spanish Five Per Cents., at 24 3/4; the Three per Cents., at 36 3/4; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents., at 59 1/2; an the Four per Cents., Certificates, at 92 1/4.

The Government broker has purchased to-day 10,000l. New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents. At the price of 97 3/8.

The new terms for the settlement of the Mexican debt continue to be the theme of discussion among the parties interested, who are by no means a small class. The general argument advanced against the plan is, that it will be absurd for the holders of Deferred bonds to take 40 per cent. new Active Stock for their bonds, when these will become real Active bonds in less than 18 months by the mere operation of time, and without any expense or delay in providing new documents. The paper which is now called a Deferred bond is provided with its regular series of coupons, commencing in April, 1848, and, without any new operation, will be called on Active bond after October, 1847; therefore, say the opponents of the new scheme, let the Mexican Government go on as well as it can with the present Active bonds, and when October, 1847, comes, if it finds itself unable to provide for the total liabilities. Let it call all its Active creditors together, including those whose bonds have become Active by lapse of time, and make some arrangement by which all these claimants shall be placed on the same footing.

On the other side, an argument is advanced in favour of the new measure, which is entitled to consideration, because there is reason to believe it will be adopted by some influential members of the Spanish American committee. The whole reasoning of the objectors rests on the assumption that the Deferred bond, when it becomes Active, is in precisely the same condition as the active of the present day, supposing that no new financial operation takes place. This the defenders of the new plan utterly deny. The peculiar guarantee of the present Actives-namely, the appropriation of the fifth part of the Customs; revenue-belongs, they say, not to Active stock in general, but to the particular bonds which are now Active by a certain definite arrangement made with their holders. According to this view, when October, 1847, comes, there will be a class of Active creditors who have a definite fund appropriated to their claim, and another class who will be indeed "Active" by name, but who will have no fund of the kind, and may not inaptly be called "quasi-Active." Hence the two parties are not so fully demand to be placed on the same footing. Indeed, the Deferred claimants, according to this argument, will be better off by the new arrangement than portion of their nominal claim, they take what they never had before--a portion of the revenue definitely appropriated.

From the present state of opinion on this much-contested subject, it may be inferred that the Active and Deferred interests will take opposite parties at the meeting. The Active bondholders may, indeed, be a little dissatisfied at the composition which is offered them for their three overdue coupons, but they will be pleased to find the large quantity of Active stock which threatens to flow into the market in the autumn of 1847 reduced to less than half its original amount. The Deferred holders, on the same footing as the present Actives, and oppose the arguments upon which the distinction is founded. This position may be illustrated by the fact that the Active stock has advanced nearly 1 per cent. since the plan has been made known, while there has been a depression in market for the Deferred.

A correspondent writes thus on the practice of selling shares by public auction:-
"If I understand the advertisements of the different auctioneers, they solicit orders from the country by post. A man might, therefore, live for a few days in the country, and having sold his shares and received the money, remove to some other town, whence, under another name, he might send more shares for sale.
"There may be some advertising brokers who would execute orders from strangers, but no broker of any standing would do business for any person without an introduction. It is not sufficient to know when and how you receive shares unless you can trace them to some responsible person."

The Bankers' Magazine furnishes the returns of the circulation of the private and joint-stock banks in England and Wales for the four wills ending respectively the 4th, 11th, 18th, and 25th let., and gives the following as the average weekly circulation of these banks for the month ending the 25th of April, viz.:-

Average weekly circulation of private notes in England and Wales during the past month . . . . . .8,044,363
On a comparison of the above with the returns for the month ending the 28th of March last, it shows—
An increase in the notes of private banks of . . . . 227,042
An increase in the notes of joint stock banks of. . . . 125,312
Total increase last month . . . . . . . . . . . . 352,354

And as compared with the month ending the 26th of April, 1845, it shows—
An increase in the notes of private banks of 61,185
A decrease in the notes of joint-stock banks of 4,289
Total increase as compared with the same period
Last year . . . ........56,896

On comparing the above returns with the amounts of the fixed issues of the several banks, after making allowance for those banks which have given up the privilege of issue since the passing of the Bank Restriction Act, and which amounts are stated in the Banking Almanack for the present year as follows, viz.-
197 private banks allowed to issue . 5,009,021
70 joint stock banks allowed to issue . 3,469,872 267 banks is all allowed to issue 8,478,893 it appears that the following is the comparative state of the circulation in England and Whales, with reference to the fixed issues, viz.-
The private banks are below their fixed issue . . 266,625
The joint stock banks are below their fixed issue . . 167,906
Total below the fixed issue . . 434,531

The bank of Messrs. Latham and Co., of Dover (the Dover Union Bank), having ceased business since the publication of the last returns, the actual limit of the fixed issue is reduced 9,577L., that being the amount they were authorized to issue under the new act. The bank is now omitted from the last in the Gazette.

LT 5/16/7b  THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

(From the New York Herald )

Under the present aspect of matters in Mexico, it is impossible to hazard a conjecture even as to the time when the unfortunate condition of our relations with that unhappy country will be settled. It is likewise impossible to say whether it will be settled without bloodshed or not.

From the latest accounts, down to the 6th inst.(ult.), from Vera Cruz, it appears that Parades is in the midst of difficulties and threatened revolutions, which preclude him from adopting any settled line of policy, were he inclined to do it. Although the recent attempt at revolution in Vera Cruz was a failure, through the indecision and want of unanimity among the junta, there is no doubt that a pronunciamiento against Parades will eventually succeed, and that either Almonte or Santa Anna will be put at the head of the Government. By suppressing some newspapers which advocated freedom, and overpowering the National Assembly Parades has made himself very unpopular; and in that country, when the people take a dislike to a governor, his overthrow, sooner or later, is certain. This most obnoxious part of his conduct was his attempt to invoke the aid of the French and English Governments in settling upon him the title of "Constitutional Sovereign of the Mexican Kingdom". This was particularly objected to by the Mexicans, who, notwithstanding their weakness and imbecility, are unwilling to have their Government changed into a monarchy.

There can be no doubt that Parades, in taking this latter step, acted in concert with the Governments of France and Europe, whose proposition to establish a monarchy in Mexico created so much excitement at the time it was first published and made known. We are assured by our correspondent that every proposition to that end will meet with the greatest opposition, and that a more hopeless task never was undertaken than to attempt to establish a monarchy there. It is true that the clergy are in favour of a monarchy, but sooner than have a King again, the Mexican people would prefer being annexed to the United States.

While the Mexicans are discontented with Paredes, and are determined to overthrow him, and almost unanimously in favour of any other man, there is still a great deal of disagreement as to whom they should out in his place. There is a large party in favour of Almonte, and a still larger party in favour of recalling Santa Anna, and putting him again in office. The party favourable to Almonte compromises that part of the population which is exasperated at the conduct of the United States on the annexation of Texas, and which would, at every hazard, engage in hostilities with us. On the other hand, the party favourable to Santa Anna is rather favourably disposed towards the United States.

The election of either of these gentlemen in the place of Paredes will be attended with important consequences to the United States, and will bring our affairs with Mexico to a crisis one way or the other in a very short time after their election. From the admissions and declarations made by Almonte while in this city we are certain that he would rush into hostility immediately, and depend upon the interference of France and England, and his good luck, to extricate him. A war would thus be commenced which would cost us millions before it would be concluded. On the other hand, if Santa Anna were recalled, to judge from his past conduct, there is no doubt that our affairs would be very shortly and peaceably settle, soon after his accession. Were it not that he was suddenly overthrown and banished while negotiations were on foot for a settlement of this sort, all questions of difference between the United States and Mexico would have been settled long since.

In the mean time the aspect of affairs looks threatening, and unless a revolution occur soon, the present state of things will speedily be changed. Conduct towards the United States looks hostile. He has despatched a body of 3,000 Mexican troops to Matamoras, under General Ampudia. The Rio Grande has now rival armies, of equal force, on either side, and a collision is hourly expected. They cannot in the nature of things remain long in their present condition. A stray shot, a false alarm, or something else, will break the monotony; and the battle, once begun, will not be ended until the whole of our difficulties are adjusted. Everything is uncertain, and no one can tell what a day may bring forth. Paredes certainly has his hands full, and is surrounded by difficulties of every kind. The threatened revolution in California demands his attention, or that valuable and rich department will slide from him in the same way that Texas did. Already the inhabitants have declared against the Government, and are ready to revolt and declare themselves independent. To quell these symptoms of disaffection Paredes had despatched an army to that department, and thousands of Americans are crowding there from the West. Ere long we may possibly hear of the battle of San Jacinto being fought over again there.

We are not advised what course our Government will take in this matter, but we hourly expect that the President will send a special message to Congress, and propose some course. The present condition of things cannot be tolerated any longer. We have exercised patience until it has ceased to be a virtue, and we must now pursue a line of conduct that will end in something defensive, or the very end we had in view—viz., an exhibition of our magnanimity in refraining to attack a weak neighbour—will be defeated, and our pacific intentions imputed to cowardice and indecision. Our best policy, probably, would be to follow the classic example of our venerable and merciful Anglo-Saxon mother in her treatment of the Sikhs. These unruly fellows defied her authority, and actually invaded her territory. As a punishment, she thrashed them, butchered 20,000 or 30,000 men, and then annexed the Punjab territory as a compensation for the trouble she had in inflicting the thrashing. We could not do better than follow our mother's example—thrust the Mexicans, and Punjab all Northern Mexico, so as to balance Texas. When all was arranged to our satisfaction, we could have a Te Deum sung in all our churches; and although, unfortunately for us poor republicans, we could not confer any titles of nobility on those who carried out our plan of operations, we would, nevertheless, do them some honour, which would probably be as of much benefit to them as it they were made knights of the garter or of the round table, or some other similar nondescript. We could make them senators in Congress, or members of the State prison.

Saturday Evening

The English stocks remain quiet. Very little business was done in this market all day, and prices indicate no remarkable change. Consols for money finally closed at 96 1/2 to 5/8, and for the account at 95 5/8 to 3/4; Three per Cents. Reduced, at 95 1/2 to 5/8; Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents., at 97 1/2 to 3/8; Bank Stock, at 204 1/2 to 205 1/2; Long Annuities, at 10 3-16; India Stock, at 264 to 265; and Exchequer-bills, at 20s to 24s. pm.

There was a rumour to-day in the foreign stock market that the members of the committee of Spanish American bondholders were not unanimous in their determination of supporting the proposal of the Mexican Government. It is stated that several of them being convinced of the soundness of the views expressed in reference to the injustice of the terms proposed, are prepared on Monday to vote against the acceptance of the measure, and hence the decline which occurred in the value of Active stock towards the close of the day. Some persons have been free enough to express an opinion on the probable course of business at the meeting, and these seem to think that the result will be either an adjournment or a positive rejection of the decree. The meeting is looked forward to with great interest, and the "Active" as well as the "Deferred" holders are expected to muster in great strength. The latest quotation this afternoon was 32 1/2. In other securities the business transacted was exceedingly limited. Brazilian was done at 82 1/2; Buenos Ayres, for the account at 41; Chilian, Deffered, at 51; Ecuador, at 31/2; Portuguese Four per Cents., for the account, at 58 1/2; Russian, at 110 1/2; Spanish Three per Cents., at 37; and the Four per Cent. Dutch Certificates, at 91 3/4.

The question of money having been shown to be the chief ingredient in this new proposal from the Mexican Government for a compromise with its creditors, it may be useful to throw some light upon the system of finance pursued for several years past in that country, and which is extremely important in establishing the degree of credit and confidence to which it is entitled. A letter has been furnished by a "Deferred bondholder" too long for insertion entire, which goes very fully into this subject, and the leading points of which are well worthy a this time of the attention of all concerned. Perhaps in no country, not even in Spain herself, have such ruinous expedients been adopted to meet the exigency of the moment. A license, not long ago, is stated to have been granted to a mercantile house for the exportation of $2,000,000 in bars, at a reduced rate of 9 1/2 per cent., in return for an advance of one half the duty in cash, and the remainder in paper of the home debt, then worth only 23 to 24 per cent. in the home-market, but received by the Government at par! This hard bargain, it should be observed, had the further consequence of lessening those receipts at the Custom-houses, of which one-fifth is declared to be set apart for the English bondholders, but who are thus wronged of a portion of them. Similar results have arisen, it is stated, from licenses at three different times, for the introduction of raw cotton, producing $800,000 in anticipation of duties, no portion of which has passed through the Custom-houses. No doubt the Mexican Government will be in a situation to plead extreme necessity for these desperate sacrifices, but if the facts can be verified, they form a legitimate consideration for capitalists, who will not dispense with the same inquiry in the case of a Government to which they would subject any private firms who offered their paper in the money market.

As to Mexican Deferred Bonds a correspondent suggests that as part of the security was certain vacant lands in departments of Texas and California, the holder of which is absorbed by "brother Jonathan," and the latter likely soon to follow, the bondholders should meet and petition Lord Aberdeen to represent to the American Government that the lands which they will no doubt offer for sale among their other state-lands are saddled with a mortgage.

The great interest felt on the subject at this moment induces us to insert another letter from a correspondent who has before written on the subject:-

"In order that the greatest unanimity may prevail at the meeting of the Mexican bondholders in rejecting the proposition of the Mexican Government, which has been so carefully concocted on order to create disunion among them, I purpose showing that it will be against the interests of the Active bondholders themselves to separate their interests from those of the Deferred bondholders."

"Of the 4,650,000 new stock which is to be created, the Active bondholders will receive in exchange for their overdue dividends. 420,000
The holders of debentures. . . . 200,000

Of course the holders of Deferred bonds will reject the proposition, therefore a balance of 4,000,000 bonds will be in the hands of the Mexican Government throw on the market.

"Even supposing the 4,625,000 Deferred bonds cut down to 1,850,000 of the new bonds, there will remain 2,180,000 of the 4,650,000 created to be sold by the Mexican Government, which must tend to depress the value of the 5,600,000 Active bonds at present in circulation, and 2 1/2 per cent. on the depression, or the prevention of the rise, of the Active bonds is equal to the whole benefit they will derive from the conversion of their overdue dividends, taking the price of Mexican bonds at 33."

"If, therefore, the holders of Active bonds seek their own interest, they will reject that part of the proposition which relates to the conversion of their overdue coupons until such time as the Mexican Government, or their Ambassador in London, who has full power, enters into more favourable terms with the Deferred bondholders."

By this unanimity the position of the Active bondholders will not be injured, whereas that of the Deferred bondholders will be improved, for let it be borne in mind that if the Active bondholders were to accede to the proposition of the Mexican Government, whatever is taken out of the pockets of the Deferred bondholders does not go into the pockets of the Active bondholders, "but into those of the Mexican Government."

In compliance with the terms of the Railway "Relief" Bill, a variety of meetings have taken place this week, to receive the opinion of shareholders and scrip holders whether the projects specially mentioned should be proceeded with or abandoned. In the following cases a determination to proceed has been announced either by a large majority or the unanimous voice of the persons interested:- Manchester and Southampton Railway; Ambergate, Nottingham, and Boston, and Grand Union Railway, Buckinghamshire, Oxford, and Bletchley Railway; Leeds and Carlisle and Yorkshire and Glasgow Union Railway; Birkenhead, Lancashire, and Cheshire Junction Railway; Cheltenham and Oxford Railway; Maldon, Witham, and Braintree Railway; Glasgow, Paisley and Greenock Railway; Norwhich and Dereham Direct Railway; Reading and Reigate Amalgamated Railway; North Staffordshire Railway; Manchester and Lincoln Union and Chesterfield and Gainsborough Canal and Railway; North British Railway; Great Western and Wycombe Railway; Great Western and Uxbridge Railway; Leeds and Bradford Railway; Dublin and Sandymount Railway; Direct Birmingham and Leicester Railway; Windsor, Slough, and Staines Atmospheric Railway; Enfield, Edmonton, and Eastern Counties Junction Railway, Wexford, Carlow, and Dublin Railway; Fermoy Railway; Mountmellick Junction Railway; Malton and Driffield Junction Railway; Bridge of Weir Port Glasgow Junction Railway; Glasgow, Dumfries and Carlisle Railway; Birmingham and Oxford Junction Railway; East and West India Dock and Birmingham Junction Railway; Ely and Bury St. Edmond's Railway; Ilford and Epping Railway; North Gravesend Railway; Edinborough and Glasgow Railway, Irish Great Southern and Western Railway; Killarney Junction Railway; Leeds, Walskefield and Midland Junction Railway; South Staffordshire Junction Railway; and Blackburn, Chorley, and Liverpool Railway.

The Eastern Countries, the London and Brighton and the South-Eastern Railway Companies, like the Birmingham, Midland, and other great companies, held their meetings for sanction to branches, &c., in each of which cases the shareholders were unanimous in their decision, and passed votes of confidence to the directors.

Among the meetings of the week, seven railway companies have determined on the more prudent course of "winding up". The Chester and Manchester Direct is the first on the list. It appears the shareholders in this scheme will receive back about 1l. 1s. per share, if they can throw overboard the unpaid claim of Sir John Rennie, in amount 10,000l, for engineering expenses. The vote for dissolving the Grand Trunk, or Stafford and Peterborough Union line, was all but unanimous. About 1l. 1s. per share is to be returned at once, and a further dividend may be expected before the accounts are finally closed. The scrip holders of the Buxton, Macclesfield, and Crewe Railway receive 30s. per share forthwith, and if any further - [illegible line] The directors - a circumstance rather unusual at assemblies of this description. In the midland and Eastern Counties Railway accounts the two most alarming items were "engineers and surveyors," 13,455l., and "law expenses, including local agents," 15,597l. According to the statement of the directors, only 11s. 9d. can be expected on each share, and though another meeting is convened finally to settle the affair, the result may be readily guessed from the general wish manifested on this occasion to see the company abandoned. The Northumberland and Lancashire Junction Railway "winds up," but its has not yet appeared what sum will be returned to the scrip holders. A first installment of 1l. 1s. per share is to be paid to the shareholders of the Great Grimsby, Louth, Horncastle, Lincoln, and Midland Junction Railway; the vote against proceeding was carried by a very large majority. The Scottish Central and Caledonian Junction directors have been authorized by the scripholders to "dissolve" and "distribute" with all possible despatch.

The Railway Chronicle contains the subjoined sensible observations on the progress of the meetings held under the provisions of the "relief" bill. When we see such remarks emanating from a railway paper itself, we may reasonably judge that the most experienced in the system perceive danger from the further prosecution of the majority of the schemes brought into existence during the late era of railway speculation:-

"We observe, with regret, that the events of the week- the meetings under the new resolutions. Of which we record so many- are meetings not of dissolution, but of confirmation. The commercial interests of the railway world appear now about to be placed in more peril than ever. The panic we have had will be nothing to that which we shall have, if the shareholders in the new undertakings, instead of allowing them quietly to drop, continue to prosecute them and spent in Parliamentary contests all the money, k out of which, by stopping at once, they might have realized a good dividend. The 'wind-up' is likely to be a failure, and to become, in short, a wind-up in which nothing is wound up. There is one cause for this to be found is the transitory rise in the value of shares which took place on the announcement of the probable 'wind-up'. The improvement in the share-market is again gone back under the reaction caused by the fact that there is in reality no general 'wind-up' taking place. We shall soon. Therefore, be as ill off as before. The cause of the 'no wind-up' is manifold. Many scrip holders have mistaken the sudden recovery of the market for a return of public confidence, and for on in the hope that their shares will rise in public favour; whereas the prospect of their extinction was the only ground of that short and mistaken revival. If there be any means more certain than another of preventing a return of confidence, it is the return of the folly which led to the original withdrawal of that confidence. We would now entreat the scrip holders in the great majority of the new schemes to realize what they can, and 'wind-up' concerns of which the ultimate dividend will be diminished in the exact proportion of their present misplaced confidence"

The return from the Bank of England for the week ending the 9th of May gives the following results, when compared with the return of the previous week:-

Public Deposits, 3,031,375 ; increase, 452,924
Other deposits, 16,256,526; decrease, 523,854
On the other side account-Government securities 13,023,065; decrease 280,000
Other securities 17,734,025; decrease 167,123
Notes unemployed6,836,405; increase, 427,935

The amount of notes in circulation is 20,408,590, being a decrease of 255,235, and the total showing an increase of 146,389, when compared with the preceding return.

The rest shows an increase of 9,744 during the same period.

[SCM]
Passing over the minor considerations, which were brought forward at this meeting, we may say that two grand principles are established. In the first place the bondholders recognize no difference between the Active and the Deferred bonds, except the time when they become due, and are determined to reject any plan in which any such difference shall be adopted. This was carried, not as a matter of expediency, but of justice; and Mr. Levy, who stoutly declared for the "share and share alike" doctrine; and at the same time stated that he was speaking against his own interest, for he held more Active than Deferred, was applauded with enthusiasm. In the next place it is established that no proposition will be entertained in which a request for more money is one of the elements. The part of the terms that referred, not to the conversions of existing bonds, but to the creation of new debt was always alluded to in a tone of derision, and probably acted as a damper on the ardour of those who, without it, might have been zealous in favour of the propositions. Whatever terms may be next brought forward by the Mexican Government, they will at any rate have been taught what to avoid.

The amount of business transacted in the English securities was limited, and the prices were consequently heavy. The absence of news to influence the dealers in their opinions was the chief cause of the dullness in the market. Consols for money left off 961/2 to 5/8; for the account, 96 5/8; Three per Cents. Reduced, 951/2 to 5/8; Three and a Quarter per Cents. Reduced 971/4 to 5/8; Long Annuities, 10 7-16; India stock, 265 1/2 to 266 1/2; India Bonds, 29s., to 30s. pm.; South Sea Old Annuities, 93 7/8; Exchequer bills, 20 s to 23s. pm; and Bank Stock, 204 1/2 to 205 1/2.

The foreign securities were little affected by the business transacted in the various descriptions. Mexican Activities closed flat this afternoon at 321/4, and the Deferred rather firm at 153/4: the result of the meeting of bondholders could not of course be considered favourable to holders of the first-named security. Brazilian was last done at 83, Danish, at 87 1/2 Portuguese Three per Cents., for the account, at 57 1/2 Russian at 110 1/2; Spanish Five per cents., for the account at 24 1/2; the deferred at 15 1/8; and Dutch Four per Cents., Certificates at 91 5/8.

The returns of the circulation of notes in England, Scotland, and Ireland, for the month ending the 25th of April, were inserted in this paper on the 14th and 15th inst. These returns, combined with the average circulation of the Bank of England for the same period, give the following statement of the total paper circulation for the United Kingdom as compared with the previous month.

(From the New York Tribune, April 20.)

That Mr. Slidell has returned disappointed and mortified from his Mexican mission is generally known; that Messrs. Polk and Buchanan are now concocting war measures or war fulminations to be submitted to Congress thereupon is highly probable. At the same time we cannot perceive that out Government has any right to take offence at the result of this mission. Mexico apprised us, years ago, that the annexation of Texas to this country would be regarded by her as an act of war: she has since reiterated that statement on every fitting occasion; and has in nothing departed from its purport to this day. Our own Secretary of State, Mr. Forsyth, took identically her view of the matter, when annexation was first formally solicited by Texas, with the concurrence of Mr. Van Buren and his entire cabinet. Mr. Van Buren proclaimed his adherence to this view of the matter so late as 1844, and Mr. Clay heartily concurred with him. A decided majority of all those among our countrymen to whom the designation of statesmen may be applied without seeming irony were of the same opinion. And when our rejected Minister argues that Mexico, in offering to acknowledge the independence of Texas provided she never see the Texan flag displayed save by two or three bands of adventurers, who were promptly captured or chased off by the Mexicans. The left bank of the Rio del Norte, and the whole region watered by the eastern tributaries of that river, is and ever has been just as much Mexican territory, so far as it is not possessed by the aboriginal savages, as Vera Cruz or Xapala. Now the ostensible purpose of sending all such differences to Mexico was the protection of Texas from apprehended Mexican invasion; and for this purpose that position was well chosen. Texas has remained unmolested and secure; she has not felt a shadow of apprehension from the hour General Taylor landed his troops at Corpus Christi, nor has she had a pretext for fear. Not for her sake, therefore--certainly not to afford her increased protection or security--is our army marched down to the great Mexican river, far from resources or reinforcements, in the very heart of Mexican nationality and military power. Up to this time, both banks of the great river have been occupied by Mexican troops, we have dispossessed them of the eastern by a display of a temporarily overwhelming force: can we expect them to remain quiet on the other? Suppose the Mexican forces concentrating in front of General Taylor should speedily be swollen to 8,000 or 10,000 men, does any one suppose they will quietly look on until our army has fortified its position and reinforced its numbers in what the Mexicans cannot but regard as their national territory? General Taylor himself appears to act with all possible circumspection and forbearance; had his place been filled by a Napoleon or Jackson we should have had a murderous battle to chronicle ere this.

General Taylor plainly will not act on the offensive unless to anticipate a meditated blow; but his position is an offensive one, and hostilities are postponed only till the Mexicans feel strong enough to strike with confidence. Let our troops simply hold their ground a month longer, and balls will forestall the yellow fever with many of them. We don't doubt whether half the gallant array which first formed on the beach at Corpus Christi are destined ever to repass the Mississippi, and greet their kindred in their cherished homes. Meantime, the nation lies in listless apathy, hardly asking what is to come next. The tidings of a battle on the Rio del Norte--probably a triumphant, but in any case a deplorable one--will startle hundreds of thousands from ignorance into amazement. They have been told by smooth-tongued orators and current-riding demagogues that annexation was consummated--settled--a "fixed fact," and no longer a subject of discussion or action among us. With a President who is punctual in his Sunday attendance at a popular church, and who allows no dancing at the White House on any day, it is of course to be presumed by the indolent, listless millions that our national affairs are managed in a most Christian and blameless manner. When the tidings shall burst upon us of a battle between our army and the Mexicans, in which some 1,000 or 1,500 fellow Christians have butchered each other to feast the wolves and the vultures, who shall bear the awful responsibility of that wanton, wholesale murder? Not those, surely, who have manfully, actively, resisted the whole Texas iniquity, speaking out decisively at the first, and never faltering to the last. But who beside these can truly exclaim to the specters of our recklessly sacrificed countrymen,

"Shake not thy glory locks at me, Thou canst not say I did it!"

THE WEST INDIA MAILS

The Royal Mail Packet Company's steamer Thames, Captain Hast, arrived at South Hampton yesterday evening at 6 o'clock, bringing mails of the following dates:-- From San Jago de Cuba April 19; Jamaica 25, Jamel 27, Puerto Rico 29, Demerara 19, Tobago 21, Trinidad 20, Barbadoes 27, Grenada 28, St. Vincent 28, St. Lucia 28, Martinique 29, Dominica 29, Guadeloupe 29, Antigua 30, Montserrat 30, Nevis 30, St. Kitt's 30, Tortolos May 1, St. Thomas's May 1, 6p.m.; Fayal 13.

The Thames brings 70 passengers, including his Excellency Sir Henry Macleod, late Governor of Trinidad, and on freight 58 tierces of coffee, 126 barrels of ginger, and 283 packages of arrowroot.

We have our usual files of papers by the Thames, but they are very barren of interest; some of them, however, give a more favorable account of the weather than we have learned from private sources; indeed, almost at the time of the mails leaving the drought appeared to be breaking up. C coolies had arrived in several colonies, and had produced some effect in causing more regular labor; in Jamaica and Trinidad they were much prized, and working steadily, showing great aptness, as were the Portuguese emigrants from Madeira at Demerara and St. Vincent. The colonial newspapers have little interesting local news, if we except those of Trinidad, which are filled with regrets on losing their governor, Sir Henry Macleod, who it appears, had resigned his office in consequence of some misunderstanding with the Colonial Minister. His successor, Lord Harris, left Grenada on the 27th ult., and would arrive next day at Trinidad.

General Richi, the new President of Hayti, was still in the northern part of the island, where all was quiet at the last dates. Pierrot, the late President, had retired to his plantation; it is rumored he will not be allowed to remain there (as a few partisans my still cherish the hope of his return to power), but be compelled to reside near Port-au-Prince, where all his movements can be better watched. In the south, a few hundred men, chiefly cultivators, had risen against Richi's Government; their object, it seems, was to pillage the town of Aux Cayes. The commenced by massacring several persons of respectability, who fell into their hands, and committed all sorts of depredations; but General Jeffran, at the head of the six regiments, had obtained signal and advantages over them in three different combats, when from 500 to 600 banditti were killed. Nothing had been decided upon respecting the Dominicans. Despatches had been received from Santa Anna, the President of the Spanish port, and it is believed that a suspension of hostilities will take place until something more decisive is determined on. The foreigners thought well of the present Government, having in office, clear headed ministers who had been abroad, and had held intercourse with foreign Powers.

By the most recent accounts the Royal Mail Company's steamer Tay left Grenada for Jamaica April 27; the Teviot arrived at St. Thomas's May 1; the Trent left Jamaica for the Spanish Main April 15; the Tweed was in the Gulf of Mexico; the city of Glasgow left for Trinidad April 27.

Her Majesty's ships Imaum, Daring and Pickle were at Jamaica; Her Majesty's ship Pique at Barbadoes, waiting to be relieved by the Endymion.

The Thames passed on the morning of the 18th two of Her Majesty's steamers lying to in a gale from N.N.W.; also passed the Royal Mail steam-ship Dee off Portland, at noon yesterday.
The Thames had remarkably fine weather until nearing the Channel, when heavy N.W. and westerly gales were experienced, particularly on the night of the 16th and morning of the 17th.

LT 1846 5 22 5c US and Mexico, America: Arrival of the Great Western

THE TIMES OFFICE, Friday Morning.
Liverpool, Thursday Evening.

We have received advise from the United States to the 7th inst. Inclusive, together with late accounts from Canada, Mexico, and South America, by the steam-ship Great Western, Captain Matthews, which arrived in the Mersey shortly after 4 o'clock this afternoon, after a fine run of 14 days.

The Great Western conveyed special messengers from the American Government to Mr. M'Lane and from Canada to the Home administration. It is stated, and confidently so, that the former brings the Oregon notice to Mr. M'Lane, with instructions for its due delivery to the British Government. The bearer entertains that belief.

"The form in which the notice was sent," says the Washington correspondent of the Courier and Enquirer, "was to set forth the preamble and resolution as it passed Congress, and then to append to it a formal notice on the part of the Government of the United States."

The proceedings of the House of Congress are entirely uninteresting. The Webster and Ingersoll Committees had sent into Maine for witnesses. The Administration party in Congress are stated to design an adjournment from the 31st of May to the 1st of October. The Union denies the statement, however.

Relations with Mexico had assumed a more threatening aspect. The latest accounts from Rio Grande state that Matamoras was blockaded by General Taylor. Lieutenant Porter and three men had been shot by the Mexicans. Further desertions had taken place. Fears for the safety of the American force prevailed at Washington.

The receipts into the United States Treasury during the quarter ending the 31st of March last were $7,808,870; expenditure. $4,483,897 9c.

It would appear that considerable doubt exists as to the payment of the interest due on the debt of Pennsylvania.

The Princeton steam-frigate was under orders for the Gulf of Mexico.

Late accounts from Canada have reached us. The journals publish an additional dispatch from the Hon. W.E. Gladstone, dated April 1, upon the memorial of the Montreal Board of Trade:

"It announces," says the Montreal Courier, "that should the repeal of the Corn Laws pass the British Legislature, the Canadian Parliament will be allowed to do as it pleases with the 3s. Duty on American wheat. And it does not appear that any opposition will be shown to the repeal of the 2s. Imperial duty on flour. It also enunciates plainly the principle that Great Britain will not in the future grant better commercial terms to her colonies than she allows to other countries, and will not revive the system which once prevailed, of allowing the introduction of goods from colonies t colonial duties with reference, not to their origin, but solely to their place of export, or in other words doing away with the certificate of origin."

Accounts from Vera Cruz to the 18th of April had been received. Mexico is stated to continue uneasy. The threatened return of Santa Anna had called forth Government measures of protection. Despatches for the United States Government had also been received.

Accounts received from Oregon and California, via the Sandwich Islands, are unimportant. Extensive immigrations from the United States are noted. A slight dispute had arisen at San Francisco between the Americans and Mexicans.

Rio intelligence to the 19th of March, from Pernambaco to the 9th of April, and from the River Plate to the 19th of March, had been received. The blockade of Buenos Ayres still continued. At Rio, in consequence of long continued rainy weather, coffee was very scarce, and in demand at rising prices.

Report states that the Cambria ran ashore at Boston; but we are happy to say that the passengers, crew, and all the baggage were saved.

AMERICA. THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

We have received advices from the United States, by the Cambria Royal mail-steamer, to the 16th inst., inclusive, announcing the most important intelligence that the United States had declared war against Mexico.

We subjoin the formal proclamation of war:--

"PROCLAMATION of THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

"Whereas, the Congress of the United States, by virtue of the constitutional authority vested in the have declared by their act bearing date this day, that 'by the act of the Republic of Mexico, a state of war exists between that Government and the United States:'

"Now, therefore, I , James K. Polk, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim to all whom it may concern, and I do specially enjoin on all persons holding offices, civil or military, under the authority of the United States, that they be vigilant and zealous in discharging the duties respectively incident thereto. And I do, moreover, exhort all the good people of the United States, as they love their country, as they feel the wrongs which have forced on them the last resort of injured nations, and as they consult the best means under the blessing of Divine Providence of abridging its calamities, that they exert themselves in preserving order, in promoting concord, in maintaining the authority and the efficacy of the laws, and in supporting and invigorating all the measures which may be adopted by the constituted authorities for attaining a speedy, a just, and an honourable peace.

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed to these presents.

"Done at the city of Washington, this 13th day of May, 1846, and of the independence of the United States the 70th.

"By the President,

On the 11th ult. the President transmitted to the Congress the following message:-

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

"To the Senate and the House of Representatives,"

"The existing state of the relations between the United States and Mexico renders it proper that I should bring the subject to the consideration of Congress.In my message at the commencement of your present session, the state of these relations, the causes which led to the suspension of diplomatic intercourse between the two countries in March, 1845, and the long continued and undressed wrongs and injuries committed by the Mexican Government on citizens of the United States in their persons and property, were briefly set forth.

"As the facts and opinions which were then laid before you carefully considered, I cannot better express my present convictions of the condition of affairs up to that time than by referring you to that communication.

"The strong desire to establish peace with Mexico, on liberal and honourable terms, and the readiness of this Government to regulate and adjust our boundary, and other causes of difference with that Power, on such fair and equitable principles as would lead to permanent relations between the two countries.Every measure adopted on our part had for its object the furtherance of these desired results.In communicating to Congress a succinct statement of the injuries which we had suffered from Mexico, and which have been accumulating during a period of more than twenty years, every expression that could tend to inflame the people of Mexico, or defeat or delay a pacific result, was carefully avoided.An Envoy of the United States repaired to Mexico with full powers to adjust every existing difference.But though present on the Mexican soil, by agreement of the two Governments, invested with full powers and bearing evidence of the most friendly dispositions, his mission has been unavailing.The Mexican Government not only refused to receive him, or listen to his propositions, but, after a long-continued series of menaces, have at last invaded our territory, and shed the blood of our fellow-citizens on our own soil.
"It now becomes my duty to state more in detail the origin, progress, and failure of that mission. I could not for a moment entertain the idea that the claims of our much-injured and long-suffering citizens, many of which had existed for more than 20 years, should be postponed or separated from the settlement of the boundary question.

"Mr. Slidell arrived at Vera Cruz on the 30th of November, and was courteously received by the authorities of that city. But that Government of General Herrera was then tottering to its fall. The revolutionary party had seized upon the Texas question to effect or hasten its overthrow. Its determination to restore friendly relations with the United States, and to receive our Minister to negotiate for the settlement of this question, was violently assailed, and was made the great theme of denunciation against it. The Government of General Herrera, there is a good reason to believe, was sincerely desirous to receive our Minister; but it yielded to the storm raised by its enemies, and on the 21st of December refused to accredit Mr. Slidell upon the most frivolous pretexts. These are so fully and ably exposed in the note of Mr. Slidell of the 24th of December last to the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations, herewith transmitted, that I deem it unnecessary to enter into further detail on this portion of the subject.

"Five days after the date of Mr. Slidell's note, General Herrera yielded the Government to General Paredes without a struggle, and on the 30th of December resigned the Presidency. This revolution was accomplished solely by the army, the people having taken little part in the contest; and thus the supreme power in Mexico passed into the hands of a military leader.

"Determined to leave no effort untried to effect an animicable adjustment with Mexico, I directed Mr. Slidell to present his credentials to the Government of General Paredes, and asked to be officially received by him. There would have been less ground for taking this step had General Paredes come into power by a regular constitutional succession. In that event his administration would have been considered but a mere constitutional continuance of the Government of General Herrera, and the refusal of the latter to receive our Minister would have been deemed conclusive, unless an intimation had been given by General Paredes of his desire to reverse the decision of his predecessor.

"But the Government of General Paredes owes its existence to a military revolution, by which the subsisting constitutional authorities had been subverted. The form of Government was entirely changed, as well as all the high functionaries by whom it was administered.

"Under these circumstances, Mr. Slidell, in obedience to my direction, addressed a note to the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations, under date of the 1st of March last, asking to be received by that Government in the diplomatic character to which he had been appointed. This Minister, in his reply, under date of the 12th of March, reiterated the arguments of his predecessor, and, in terms that may be considered as giving just grounds of offence to the Government and people of the United States, denied the application of Mr. Slidell. Nothing, therefore, remained for our Envoy but to demand his passports and return to his own country.

"Thus the Government of Mexico, though solemnly pledged by official acts in October last to receive and accredit American Envoy, violated their pledged faith, and refused the offer of a peaceful adjustment with our difficulties. Not only was the offer rejected, but the indignity of its rejection was enhanced by the manifest breach of faith in refusing to admit the Envoy, who came because they had bound themselves to receive the want of opportunity of discussing it; our Envoy was present on their own soil. Nor can it be ascribed to a want of sufficient powers; our Envoy had full powers to adjust every question whatever. Nor can it be objected that we, on our part, would listen to any reasonable terms of their suggestion; the Mexican Government refused all negotiation, and have made no proposition of any kind.

"In my message at the commencement of the present session, I informed you that upon the earnest appeal both of the Congress and convention of Texas, I had ordered an efficient military force to take a position between the Nueces and the Del Norte. This had become necessary, to meet a threatened invasion of Texas by the Mexican forces, for which extensive military preparations had been made. The invasion was threatened solely because Texas had determined, in accordance with a solemn resolution of the Congress of the United States, to annex herself to our union; and, under these circumstances, it was plainly our duty to extend our protection over her citizens and soil.

"This force was concentrated at Corpus Christi, and remained there until after I had received such information from Mexico as rendered it probable, if not certain, that the Mexican Government would refuse to receive our Envoy.

"Meantime, Texas, by the final action of our Congress, had become an integral part of our union. The Congress of Texas by its act of December 19, 1836, had declared the Rio del Norte had been represented in the Congress and in the convention of Texas, had thus taken part in the act of annexation itself, and is now included within our Congressional districts. Our Congress had, moreover, with great unanimity, by the act approved December 21, 1845, recognized the country beyond the Nueces as part of our territory, by including it within our revenue system; and a revenue officer, to reside within that district, has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It became, therefore, of urgent necessity to provide for the defence of that portion of our country. Accordingly, on the 13th day of January last, instructions were issued to the Generals in command of these troops, to occupy the left bank of the Del Norte. This river, which is south-western boundary of the state of Texas, is an exposed frontier. From this quarter invasion was threatened; upon it and its immediate vicinity, in the judgement of high military experience, are the proper stations for the protecting forces of the Government.
In addition to this important consideration, several others occurred to induce this movement. Among these are the facilities afforded by the ports of Brazos Santiago and the mouth of the Del Norte, for the reception of supplies by sea, the stronger and more healthful military positions, the convenience for obtaining a ready and a more abundant supply of provisions, water, fuel, and forage, and the advantages which are afforded by Del Norte in forwarding supplies to such posts as may be established in the interior and upon the Indian frontier.

"The movement of the troops to the Del Norte was made by the commanding General, under positive instructions to abstain from all aggressive acts towards Mexico, or Mexican citizens, and to regard the relations between that republic and the United States as peaceful, unless she should declare war, or commit acts of hostility indicative of a state of war. He was specially directed to protect private property and respect personal rights.

"The army moved from Corpus Christi on the 11th of March, and on the 28th of that month arrived on the left bank of the Del Norte, opposite to Matamoras, where it encamped on a commanding position, which has since been strengthened by the erection of field works. A depot has also been established at Point Isabel, near the Brazos Santiago, 30 miles in the rear of the encampment. The selection of this position was necessarily confided to the judgement of the General in command.

"The Mexican forces at Matamoras assumed a belligerent attitude, and on the 12th of April, General Arista, who had succeeded to the command of the Mexican forces, communicated to General Taylor that 'he considered hostilities commenced, and should prosecute them.' A party of Dragoons of 63 men and officers were on the same day dispatched from the American army up the Rio del Norte, on its left bank, to ascertain whether the Mexican troops had crossed with a large body of these troops, and, after a short affair, in which some 16 were killed and wounded, appear to have been surrounded and compelled to surrender."

"The previous wrongs perpetrated by Mexico upon our citizens throughout a long period of years remain undressed; and solemn treaties, pledging her public faith for this redress, have been disregarded. A Government unable or unwilling to enforce the execution of such treaties fails to perform one of its plainest duties.

"Our commerce with Mexico has been almost annihilated. It was formerly highly beneficial to both nations, but our merchants have been deterred from prosecuting it by the system of outrage and extortion which the Mexican authorities have pursued against them, whilst their appeals through their own Government for indemnity have been made in vain. Our forbearance has gone to such an extent as to be mistaken in its character. Had we acted with vigour in repelling the insults and redressing the injuries inflicted by Mexico at the commencement, we should doubtless have escaped all the difficulties in which we are now involved.

"Instead of this, however, we have been exerting our best efforts to propitiate her good will. Upon the pretext that Texas, a nation as independent as herself, thought proper to unite its destinies with our own, she has affected to believe that we have severed her rightful territory, and, in official proclamations and manifestoes, has repeatedly threatened to make war upon us for the purpose of reconquering Texas. In the meantime, we have tried every effort at reconciliation. The cup of forbearance has been exhausted, even before the recent information from the frontier of the Del Norte. But now, after reiterated menaces, Mexico has passed the boundary of the United States, has invaded our territory, and shed American blood upon the American soil. She has proclaimed the hostilities have commenced, and that the two nations are at war.

"As war exists, and, notwithstanding all our efforts to avoid it, exists by the act of Mexico herself, we are called upon by every consideration of duty and patriotism, to vindicate with decision the honour, the rights, and the interests of the country.

"Anticipating the possibility of a crisis like that which has arrived, instructions were given in August last, 'as a precautionary measure,' against invasion, or threatened invasion, to accept volunteers, not from Texas only, but from the states of Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Kentucky; and corresponding letters were addressed to the respective governors of those states. These instructions were repeated; an in January last, soon after the incorporating letters were addressed to the respective governors of those states. These instructions were repeated; and in January last, soon after the incorporation of 'Texas into our union of States' General Taylor was further 'authorized by the President to make a requisition upon the executive of that state for such of its militia force as may be needed to repel invasion or to secure the country against apprehended invasion.' On the 2d day of March he was again reminded, 'in the event of the approach of any considerable Mexican force, promptly and efficiently to use the authority with which he was clothed to call to him such auxiliary force as he might need.' War actually existing, and our territory having been invaded, General Taylor, pursuant to authority vested in him, by my direction, has called on the Governor of Texas for four regiments of state troops-two to be mounted, and two to serve on foot; and on the Governor of Louisiana for four regiments of infantry, to be sent to him as soon as practicable.

"In further vindication of our rights and defence of our territory, I invoke the prompt action of Congress to recognize the existence of the war, and place at the disposition of the Executive the means of prosecuting the war with vigour; and thus hasten the restoration of peace. To this end I recommend that authority should be given to call into public service a large body of volunteers, to serve for not less than six or 12 months, unless sooner discharged. A volunteer force is, beyond question, more efficient than any other description of citizen soldiers; and it is not to be doubted that a number far beyond that require'd would readily rush to the field upon the call of their country. I further recommend that a liberal provision can be made for sustaining entire military force, and furnishing it with supplies and munitions of war.
"The most energetic and prompt measures, and the immediate appearance in arms of a large and overpowering force, are recommended to Congress as the most certain and efficient means of bringing the existing collision with Mexico to a speedy and successful termination.

"In making these recommendations, I deem it proper to declare that it is my anxious desire not only to terminate hostilities speedily, but to bring all matters in dispute between this Government and Mexico to an early and amicable adjustment; and in this view I shall be prepared to renew negotiations whenever Mexico to an early and amicable adjustment; an in this view I shall be ready to receive propositions or to make propositions of her own. Foreign Affairs; and so much of the correspondence between that Envoy and the Secretary of State, and between the Secretary at War and the General in command on the Del Norte, as are necessary to a full understanding of the subject.

"JAMES K. POLK
Washington, May 11, 1846"

This document was immediately acted upon by Congress. Both branches, by overwhelming majorities, declared in favour of recognizing a war against Mexico, and in providing means for its energetic prosecution. The regular army was increased to about 15,000 men; a special War Bill authorized an additional force of 50,000 men, to be placed at the disposal of the President; and $10,000,000 were appropriated for the payment of the troops. The naval force was increased in an equal ratio.

The latest accounts from the force under General Taylor represent his position as one of great danger. His army was surrounded on every side by the Mexican force, and his supplies were in danger of being cut off; and apparently a more serious conflict was impending.

The utmost excitement prevailed throughout the Union, and in the southern states large companies of volunteers were being formed to march to the relief of the army on the Rio Del Norte. Great fears were entertained throughout the commercial classes that the Mexican Government would issue letters of marque. The American journals are far from being unanimous in support of the aggressive war sanctioned by Congress.

We have accounts from Montreal to the 13th inst. Inclusive. A committee had been appointed by the House of Assembly on the 11th to frame an address to Her Majesty, praying that whatever alterations may be made in the duties on the admission of foreign grain, respect may be had to the interests of Canada. The Parliament would separate on the 23d inst.

Advises from Mexico to the 17th of April, and from Vera Cruz to the 22nd, had been received. The Vera Cruz Locomotor of the 22nd states, that a revolution had broken out in the south of the department of Mexico, and that General Alvarez had proclaimed the federal constitution, and the return to the power of Santa Anna. Fears of the immediate blockade of the port of Mazatlan by the American naval force there assembled were entertained; and the Mexican steamers Montezuma and Guadaloupe had been sold.

LT 1846 5 30 4b Mexican War

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1846.

The collision which the increasing arrogance of the American Government and the apparent weakness of Mexico rendered inevitable, has at length taken place. Hostilities have begun upon the Rio Bravo del Norte. An American detachment of 63 men has been surrounded and compelled to lay down its arms, after a considerable loss. General Taylor; the American commander appears to have placed himself, with an excess of presumption or of incapacity, in a position of great danger; his small forces being divided, his supplies cut off, and his line of operations intersected by the Mexican army. The news of this defeat and this danger instantly roused the passions of the American people to the highest pitch of excitement. The population of the southern states is preparing to flock in arms to the scene of adventure. The state Legislatures nearest to the frontier have voted money and troops to proceed at once to reinforce the detachment at Point Isabel. The Federal Government, upon the receipt of this intelligence, took the most vigorous measures, and within four days a bill passed the Congress and received the sanction of the President, "to provide for the prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the Republic of Mexico." All the efforts of the peace party to resist or control this torrent of national enthusiasm for war were wholly unavailing.

These events are manifestly calculated to produce the most important effects on the several Powers of the North American continent, on their institutions at home, and on their relations abroad; but they are no more than the fulfillment of the anticipations we have long entertained and expressed. When a nation like the United States of America forsook all the maxims of its established policy, and violated the laws of good faith an international duty, to gratify the popular passion of territorial aggrandizement at the expense of an inoffensive neighbour, and at the instigation of the audacious leaders of the democratic party, it was vain to hope that an act like the annexation of Texas could be consummated without giving birth to a formidable and uncontrollable series of those events which interrupt the pacific progress of nations, and convulse the world. It was vain to hope that even amidst the savannahs and the solitudes of the new world the wildest of human passions could exhaile their strength with impunity; or that the political crimes, which are now almost banished from the confraternity of European states, could be perpetrated without check or a penalty under the colours of a republican flag, and the defenseless frontiers of an American neighbor. The annexation of Texas, as was repeatedly predicted till within a short time of its accomplishment by almost every American statesman, has ended in war. It could end in nothing short of war, unless Mexico were already dissolved, and the race which occupies the ancient provinces of Spain extinct. The immediate cause of hostilities may be the advance of General Taylor, by the orders of the Cabinet of Washington, into the disputed territory lying between the Nueces and the Del Norte; no one will be deceived as to the true cause of this rupture. The annexation of Texas must be taken as one entire transaction, originating with General Jackson nearly twenty years ago, and ending with Mr. Polk's declaration of war; but twenty years of fraud and hypocrisy have not lessened the enormity or mitigated the violence of this depredation. The interval has only been rendered the resistance of the Mexicans less possible, the booty more attractive, and the designs of the American Government more extensive. To the last moment, indeed, and down to the very preamble of the bill which crowns this masterpiece of double dealing by a declaration of war, the Congress of the United States is made to legislate a lie, and to declare that by the act of the republic of Mexico a state of war exists between that Government and the United States. Every incident of the transactions and negotiations of the last ten years between the United Stated and Mexico demonstrates the falsehood of this assertion. No state ever endured more injuries from another than Mexico has received from the Cabinet of Washington, for no state was ever worse prepared to resent them: but after all these provocations and wrongs, the war declared by the United States is now imputed to Mexico, because she has refused to receive an American emissary to dictate terms in her capital, and has ordered her scanty forces to assemble on a disputed frontier. The territory lying between the rivers Nueces and Del Norte is at most an unsettled and debatable ground; if, indeed, any doubt has ever existed as to the full right of Mexico to the whole province of Tamaulipas, extending to the former and more northerly of these streams. The occupation of the left bank of the Rio Bravo del Norte was therefore an unwarranted and rash act on the part of the American General; and his blockade of Matamoras, a town situated on the right bank of the stream, was a direct aggression on the territorial rights of Mexico.

We cannot suppose that Mr. Polk is do blind as not to have foreseen these events. He must not only have foreseen them, but intended to bring them to pass. In his Message upon the opening of Congress he laid open wide grounds of remonstrances and retaliation against Mexico. Mr. Slidell was dispatched with a message ill calculated to promote any pacific object. General Taylor was ordered to advance by land beyond the true boundary of Texas; a demonstration was made by an American squadron in the Gulf; and we have strong reason to believe that orders had already been given to the American Commodore in the South Seas to seize upon Monterey, Port St. Francis and other positions on the California coast, upon the first intimation which should reach him of the withdraw of Mr. Slidell from the Mexican Territory. This combination of measures, following closely upon the extraordinary language of the President in his public address upon several occasions, and viewed in connexion with the electioneering interests of Mr. Polk's party, leave no doubt that the head of the American Government has, with as much deliberation as he is capable of, plunged his country into this most flagitious war. The evil which must result from it flow straight from the democratic institutions of the United States, from the popular vices of these institutions have fostered when they most needed to be watched, and from the character of the political Empedocles whom they have raised to office. To the calamities caused by such incendiaries there is no remedy but a firm resistance, a severe retaliation, and eventually a popular reaction; but these results are distant, and in the meanwhile Mr. Polk has got possession of the patronage of an increased army and navy, and of the resources of a war expenditure.

The regular army of the United States will be immediately raised to 15,000 men—about double its present force. Provision will be made for 50,000 volunteers; and we are informed that the Government is empowered to build 16 ships-of-the-line, 40 frigates, and small craft in proportion, and to provide for the defense of the sea-board and the protection of trade. Already two English schooners, the Equity and Floridian, have been turned back from the mouth of the Rio Grande by the United States brig Lawrence, before any notification of blockade has been made at all. And, in addition to these dangerous, but inseparable concomitants of war, Great Britain has other and more momentous interests at this moment in dispute. The tie is come when the Oregon negotiation must be brought to close; and there is reason to anticipate that we shall have to encounter a more intractable and excited spirit on that question amongst the American people, of the war party has once asserted its
The tumultuous excitement occasioned throughout the United States by the announcement that a small Mexican army had been collected at Matamoras, and that 2,000 men had crossed the Rio Grande and placed themselves betted General Taylor’s camp and his supplies at Point Isabel, is certainly disproportional to the actual magnitude of the event; and it presents a strange commentary on the aggressive policy and the warlike measures which have been gaining ground in the United States for the past few years. Nothing can be more ridiculous than the contrast between the zeal of the Americans in provoking a war, and their real state of preparation for it; and a defeat will probably be sustained by the American forces, worsted by troops whom they have affected to despise, before the people of the United States have learned that bluster does not win battles, though it may begin brawls. What, we may venture to inquire, would have been the result if the British Government had chanced to be animated by sentiments akin to those which the Cabinet of Washington has so shamelessly disclosed; and if the late preempory declarations of the President on the subject of the Oregon territory had been followed by the advance of well-appointed British army across the Canadian frontier, and the appearance of a British fleet on the coast? The hypothesis is purely imaginary; but if it tends to impress upon the Americans the necessity of remedying their present defenseless position, it also renders it incumbent on the British Government to seize this moment for the adjustment of our controversy with the United States. It is not England that has awakened these dormant claims and kindled these deplorable passions. It is not England that has given notice for the termination of the convention of joint occupancy, and chosen this particular time for the settlement of the dispute by treaty or by war. Still less has England any hand in the recent measures taken by the Mexicans in defense of their territory—an opinion which is too absurd to need contradiction in Europe, though it may begin brawls. What, we may venture to inquire, would have been the result if the British commander done the same, and kept at Corpus Christi, the Nueces, contented with protecting the territory from invasion, no collision could have taken place, for the Mexicans remained strictly on the defensive. But General Taylor not only crossed the Nueces and seized the whole of the disputed territory, but, under some idle plea, he proceeded also to blockade Matamoras, and cut it off from the sea. In this, General Taylor was only commenced hostilities; as indeed, the Whigs and the Senate are prepared to maintain, as they insist that he should not have gone beyond Corpus Christi. Collisions having taken place, it was impossible to refuse the vote of levies and of money, although the leading members of the Senate; Calhoun amongst others, protested that the country could not consider itself at war. The united bodies of Congress could, indeed, alone declare that. War, however, it is, if President Polk chooses to make it so. This he seems scarcely prepared to go upon the land frontier of the Rio del Norte. He may, however, give orders to the fleet in the gulf to operate on the Monterey or the forts of California. And, as compensation or that unlimited store of grievance, which has been amassed on the supposed wrongs done to American citizens by Mexico, Mr. Polk may insist on retaining such provinces or possessions. Federalist movements, too, may be got up at the same time under American influence to paralyze the efforts of the Mexican Government and facilitate the work of spoliation. Is Europe prepared to see Mexico thus dismembered, and the autopsy made before her eyes? It is to be feared that such is the case. A serious measures of effective war would alone be likely to make the Americans hesitate. And neither France nor England is prepared to volunteer in such a struggle. We have had little or no thanks from Spain for having fought and won its independence. We might risk still less profit or gratitude from the Spanish race in Mexico. The age of political, as well as of religious, crusades is past.
which even success in such a cause must impose on the American Union. The war party is everywhere triumphant. The Whigs are discouraged and defeated, even in their faint attempt to modify the preamble of the War Bill. The immediate effect of this rupture with Mexico is, therefore, to weaken the influence of the party which had recently succeeded in smoothing down the form of notice to be given Great Britain—to increase the authority and ascendency of the Executive Government, which is the very core of the war party—to place large sums of money and vast patronage at their disposal—to augment the United States army and navy—to call out a large body of volunteers and drill them into troops, and to promote that martial spirit amongst the population at large to which democratic communities are too prone. In short, if Mr. Polk were to propose to himself the most effectual mode of preparing the people of the United States for a contest with one of the great powers of Europe, he could not have hit upon any scheme more likely to suit his purpose than that of training the country by a little war, in which there is no serious risk, no formidable enemy, but just enough of éclat to whet the passions which the leaders of the American democracy are wont to flatter and to obey. If the Oregon question be reserved until the United States have dictated terms to Mexico, and perhaps possessed themselves of California, no American Government will be able to accede to terms of partition, and they will be better prepared for war with England than, than they are for war with Mexico now. A wise government would, indeed, most carefully have avoided plunging into two quarrels at the same time; and the frontiers of Texas ought to have been settled by treaty before those of Oregon were discussed. But these sage maxims are disregarded on the other side of the Atlantic; and Mr. Polk seems rather to glory in the multiplicity of his dangers, and to act as if one embarrassment was a set-off against another.

If the overture which Mr. Pakenham has been instructed to make in reply to the notice for the termination of the convention be favourably received we may hope that in four or five weeks the Oregon controversy may be settled, and a final treaty of partition signed. But the best means of arriving at this most desirable result are vigorous measures and a strong demonstration of our resolution not to recoil before any alternative. Symptoms have already reached us of an intention on the part of the American Government to convince us of the extreme moderation of their designs towards Mexico, and of their earnest desire to terminate this war. But the American Government must be judged of by its public acts and declarations, not by assurances which we can only regard as subterfuges and pretenses. Its evident object is, if possible, to postpone the settlement of the Oregon question until Mexico has been reduced to terms; and then to put forward its pretensions to Oregon with the whole strength of the democratic party. This scheme must be defeated. Another month will bring us either a treaty of partition and peace, or an answer which would call for more decided steps on the part of the British Government.

With regard to the mode of prosecuting the war against Mexico, we apprehend that whatever may be the feebleness of the Mexican troops, the Nature of the country offers most serious obstacles to an invading army. The city of Mexico is 700 miles from the Rio Bravo del Norte. The roads are bad and ill-provided with water or supplies; and a host of ill-disciplined adventurers, like the American volunteers would inevitably be cut off in detail in the interior of the country by the Rancheros and the Spanish population. The military operations must therefore, be confined to desultory warfare on the frontier. If a blockade be announced of the eastern and western coasts of Mexico, including the ports of Vera Cruz, Tampico, and the mouth of the Rio Bravo on the Atlantic, and the immense extent of the coast from Port St. Francis to Acapulco on the Pacific, the maritime Powers of Europe, whose subjects are so largely interested in the commerce of Mexico, will, of course, require that this blockade should be everywhere enforced by a competent American squadron. But he whole American navy now afloat would not suffice actually to blockade this extent of coast, even if its services were not likely to be required in other places for the protection of American commerce. Whatever may be the laws of particular countries, or the stipulations of treaties as to the rights of privateers, there can be no doubt that if the Mexican Government issue letters of marque, there are seafaring adventurers enough in the world to risk their lives in this species of legalized piracy, and to defy restrictions which can only be enforced here and there by the American vessels of war. In mercantile cities of the Union it was generally expected that the Mexicans would resort to this expedient. A war clause has been inserted in the policies in insurance a New York, and premiums had risen 3 1/2 per cent. in consequence of the additional risk. Some of the American packets for Liverpool were already preparing to sail armed. It is evident that whether these apprehensions be exaggerated or not, a state of war existing along the whole coast of North America and interrupting the vast commercial relations both of the United States and of Mexico with other countries, as well as with each other, is a position of affairs fraught with danger to the general peace of the world. We shall await with anxiety the measures which may be anticipated from the Mexican and American Governments with reference to these maritime questions; and as a proper precaution we hope the British squadron in the West Indies will be at once reinforced. Without any direct interest in the disturbed and declining affairs of Mexico, and without caring in the slightest degree what form of Government exists in that country, since none can be worse than the military anarchy which has existed there for the last 20 years, there are important British undertakings and investments in Mexico which have frequently been the subject of communication between the two Governments, and which cannot be now left unprotected. Nor can we be blind to the fact that the Americans are, to use an expression of their own, about to fight a battle of Oregon in Texas, and that the same passion which is now launching in full career against their weakest neighbor, will ere long incite the most stirring portion of the American people to lay hands upon the American possessions of the British Crown. This then, is the time to prepare resistance—firm, absolute resistance—to pretensions which are incompatible with the safety of neighboring states or the peace of the world.

The meeting of Mexican bondholders, held today in the London Tavern, has resulted in the acceptance of the
MEXICO AND THE UNITED STATES

War has at length been declared between the United States and Mexico, and President Polk has been invested with all the necessary powers for raising an army. When the election of the President took place, the democratic party were divided into two distinct factions on the subject of foreign politics. The one considered a country eleven times more extensive than France to be sufficiently vast, while the other portion was of opinion that the union ought to extend from the Isthmus of Panama to Hudson's Bay and Bearing's Straights. Mr. Polk was elected President, with the express conditions, viz., that Texas should be incorporated with the Union, the whole of the Oregon territory to belong to America, the invasion of Mexico, according to Jefferson's prediction, and the duty on silver, in addition to the fifth part of the Customs' receipts, is a sufficient consideration for parting with a certain portion of capital, even during the present critical circumstances of the republic. Whether the decision will be acceptable to all the bondholders who did not attend the meeting, we cannot tell, but from the letters received on the subject we should be inclined to doubt it.

The temper and tone of this meeting were as different as possible form that of the stormy assembly by which the former terms were rejected. There the feeling was that the terms presented were such as ought never to have been proposed; here the principal discussion was the expediency of coming to any compromise at all, during the present condition of the Mexican republic. The most strenuous opponents of the former terms were in favour of the new ones, and the only opposition that they offered to the recommendation of the committee consisted in a motion to adjourn the consideration of the subject till fresh intelligence from the seat of American hostilities should arrive. One or two persons, indeed, protested against the principle of giving up any portion of the capital debt, but they were not powerful enough to form a party. The question whether the meeting should adjourn for a fortnight was put, and decided in the negative, and then the acceptance of the terms was carried by a large majority.

The principle adopted by the meeting is this---that the special pledge of the tobacco revenue, and the export duty on silver, in addition to the fifth part of the Customs' receipts, is a sufficient consideration for parting with a certain portion of capital, even during the present critical circumstances of the republic. Whether the decision will be acceptable to all the bondholders who did not attend the meeting, we cannot tell, but from the letters received on the subject we should be inclined to doubt it.

The committee of the South-American and Mexican Association have memorialized the Government on the state of affairs between the United States and Mexico, suggesting a friendly interposition for the prevention of hostilities.

The English funds were steady to-day, but the amount of business transacted was particularly limited. Some small purchases made by the Government and Chancery brokers gave support to prices, which were previously firm, owing to the "shutting" about to take place in preparation for the payment of the July dividends. Consols for money left off 96.75; and for the account, 97. Bank Stock closed 205.5 to 206.5; Three per Cents. Reduced, 95.75; Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents., 97 to .75; Long Annuities, 10.25; India Stock, 264 to 266; India Bonds, 22s. to 27s. pm.; and Exchequer-bills, 17s. to 22s. pm.

Although the Mexican bondholders accepted the proposition for the arrangement of the debt, no business was done in the Active Bonds. They were quoted nominally 29.75 to 30.25. The Deferred were firmer, being actually purchased at 16. Brazilian were last done at 82.5; Ecuador at 3; Granada; at 21 ex div.; the Deferred, at 4.25; Portuguese Four per Cents., at 53.5; for the account, at 53; Spanish Passives, at 5; the Deferred, at 15.5; Venezuela, at 42.5; the Deferred, at 12.5; and Dutch Four per Cents., Certificates, at 92.

A great deal of amusement has been created in the city by the arrival of some cotton from President Polk's plantation, marked with the letters and figures--"P.49thD." The connoisseurs of the cotton trade declare that this is no ordinary cotton mark; and, therefore, the question remains as to what it can mean. Two or three explain that "P" means Polk," and that "49th D" means "49th degree," and refers to the Oregon affair. We give this as a mere city anecdote of the day, requesting our readers not to take it at more than its worth.

The same article was literally repeated in the treaty of commerce and navigation concluded in London for 10 two States; and it will be observed that both these treaties of 1794 and 186 are of very doubtful authority at the present moment. If, indeed, we adopt the rule for which the American jurists have lately contended in the Oregon negotiations, these particular stipulations, not having been renewed after the war of 1812, must be held to have lapsed altogether. On this point, however, we express a reserved opinion, because it is manifestly injurious to the best interests of the world that provisions tending to limit and reduce the evils of war should be classes amongst obligations of a temporary and exceptional character; and the general stipulations of this nature which were sanctioned by Washington and Mr. Pitt, as the basis of the neutrality of the United States, and of their mercantile relations with Great Britain, deserve the perpetual respect of both countries.
It is, however, certain that these treaties have not the force of positive law at the present time; they may be understood to recognize certain principles of international jurisprudence, such as the inviolable character of public debts, and the impropriety of privateering by neutrals under the flag of a belligerent Power, but they will not justify the infliction of the penalty of death upon British subjects privateering under foreign commissions, as if they were still in force. It cannot be admitted that an offence which is a simple misdemeanor by the law of England can be treated as a capital felony by the law of nations.
He Foreign Enlistment Act, though it provides a check for these clandestine modes of warfare, does not go so far

However the British Government may be disposed to put in force these powers of the law, it must be acknowledged that these restrictions may prove a very insufficient bar to illicit privateering. There appears to be no power and no precedent for authorizing British cruisers of war to treat such privateers, sailing under a foreign flag, as delinquent vessels; and whatever may be the powers of the law for prosecuting the authors of such enterprises, being British subjects, in the courts of Westminster, it is probable that great difficulty would occur in defeating all the modes of evasion which might be practiced, or in arresting vessels holding such commissions on the high seas, The American Government has already announced that it is prepared to rely on some of the treaties prohibiting the subjects of neutral Powers from accepting letters of marque from a belligerent State; and possibly it may not abandon the clauses of the English treaties of 1794 and 1806 without an effort to maintain that principle of its own maritime jurisprudence. But even if it were admitted that the stipulations are now in force, they only confer upon the contracting parties the right, to render the penalty truly formidable, it must be supported in every part of the world by numerous and efficient naval force, which the American navy does not supply. Our own experience of the extreme difficulty of defeating the practices by which the slave trade is carried on, even though it is confined to a small portion of the coast of Africa, may serve to illustrate the impracticability of putting down a mode of warfare which offers enormous inducements to private avarice, however little it may be sanctioned by law and justice. The subterfuges which may be resorted to are innumerable: the means of defeating them are very limited, since they are confined to preventative measures on the part of the neutral State, and to a imperfect resistance by the injured belligerent. A nice sense of honour and an enlightened regard to the true public and private mercantile interests of this country will discourage all such speculations, and support the cause of strict neutrality. But if the Mexican Government should think fit to issue letters or marque, it will undoubtedly offer a stimulus to a large body of adventurers in various parts of the globe, which will probably prove stronger than the risk of seizure and fear of condign punishment.

AMERICA

Liverpool, Monday, June 8

Important accounts from the seat of hostilities on the Rio del Norte have this morning been received from New York by the packet Yorkshire, Captain Bailey, which left that city on the 18th ult.

The position of the American force under General Taylor had become still more threatening and precarious. Surrounded by a superior force, with his supplies cut off, and harassed by constant desertions, no movement had been made for the relief of Point Isabel; a second party, of some 70 Rangers, had been completely cut off by a Mexican force, variously estimated at from 1,000 to 3,000 men, at the distance of 20 miles from Point Isabel; and it is confidently stated that the point of land commanding the bar of Brazos Santiago, through which alone supplies and reinforcements could reach the Point from the sea, had been secured and strongly fortified by the Mexicans. The advantage thus gained is one of most essential importance, should the American volunteers decline or fail to carry the battery by storm, the whole of the reinforcements would be compelled to adopt the route via Corpus Christi. This would protract the arrival of relief in General Taylor’s camp for several days, and increase most materially the dangers of his position. Considerable fears for his safety were entertained.

It is stated that Mexican letters of marque had been issued in New Orleans, and to American merchants at Havana.

The Washington Union has the following:

"There was a report circulating through our streets today, which produced some surprise and excitement--viz., that Mr. Pckenham had protested against our troops crossing the Rio Grande. As this rumour may have flown by this time half the way to New York, and may affect the price of stocks, if it were not even designed to effect that object, we deem it our duty to say at once, that the story is, so far as we are advised, without any foundation."

The Washington correspondent of the Courier and Enquirer writes,

"Washington, May 16.

"As men's minds are, although anxious for news from the army, beginning to grow somewhat calm after the flurry into which they were thrown by the war message, the war bill, and the unseemly haste with which the obnoxious war clause was forced by the majority down the throats of the minority, more attention is being directed to the message, and the statements it makes relative to the state of affairs, and the steps taken by the Executive. The more these are scrutinized, and the more they are examined, the more clearly will it appear that Mr. Polk's reason for sending the troops to the Rio Grande was with a view of provoking war if he could not force the Mexicans into receiving Mr. Slidell as a Minister Plenipotentiary, when they asked for a special commissioner.

"I have also received an inkling of some facts bearing upon the course of events, on which I shall endeavor to inform myself more fully, and which, if true, will show that Mr. Polk has contemplated having a war with Mexico for considerably longer time than January last, although he has so long kept his intention and the facts secret from Congress."
The proceeding of the Houses of Congress are unimportant.

The Hon. T.C. Reynolds had been appointed Minister to the Court of Madrid.

Accounts from Mexico state, that the project of Alvarez was to erect a triumvirate, composed of Santa Anna, Herrera, and Rincon. The fortifications of St. Juan de Ulloa were receiving considerable additions of strength in men and metal.

Accounts from Rio de Janeiro, to the 9th of April, published in the American journals, mention a report that an engagement had taken place about the 15th of March between the Argentine and Montee Videan forces, in which the latter are stated to have been defeated. The blockade was still strictly enforced.

NEW ORLEANS, MAY 9

Volunteering is proceeding here with all alacrity, but there is no clothing or arms ready for the men already offered. A strange mismanagement of the War Department has been permitted, else the want of equipment and the military stores received here cannot be accounted for.

The Mexican force on this side of the Rio Grande is 3,000 half are above and half below General Taylor's camp. Thus communication is effectually cut off until our volunteers open it. Taylor is about out of the regular provisions of the army, but has 700 head of cattle in camp.

The New Orleans Delta, May 9, says, "that 954 soldiers, rank and file, have received the amount of their bounty money, and one month's pay; that 186 men, rank and file now in the barracks, will receive their pay today; and that 708 men, comprised in different companies, are now ready for inspection, and to be mustered into the service of the United States. Including the latter; there are 1,848 men who may be regarded as ready for service, up to last night. The companies expected from the country, and those still forming in the city, may make up the requisite number."

We take the following from a New Orleans paper of May 9:--"The steamer Hannibal, arrived last night from St. Louis, brought down from Jefferson barracks a portion of the 1st Infantry, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Wilson. They number 242 non-commissioned officers, musicians, and pirates."

It appears that Louisiana's quota of soldiers called for by General Taylor must be raised by conscription, and the order has already gone forth from head-quarters at New Orleans, to "cause an accurate enrolment to be made of all persons subject to military duty within the State, with a view to an immediate draught of troops." It seems from the following paragraph, which we clip from a New Orleans paper, that the patriotism of some who had already enlisted, "oozed out at the ends of their fingers," or some other place, just as they were on the point of embarkation for the seat of war:--

"CAPTAIN BLANCHARD.--This gentleman, regularly educated in the Military Academy, and who served 11 years in the army, had been actively engaged in raising a company of volunteers, but when he thought he was ready yesterday, more than one half were found to have deserted his flag. This is not creditable conduct, and is one among the many instances which have occurred to show that a draught for troops in the first place would have been much better. As to Mr. Blanchard, there are a few who have higher qualifications to lead a company into the field, and it affords us pleasure to see such an old citizen and esteemed officer again offer to take his sword in defence of the country. We really hope that those who have volunteered under him, and others wishing to volunteer, will come forward and behave as men should do."

At Baltimore a company of 200 men has been organized for the Rio Grande. Captain J.E. Stewart has been chosen temporarily to the command, and will probably be elected Captain. Between 60 and 70 have enrolled themselves in Richmond, Virginia, and elected Edward Carrington as their Captain.

WAR MEETINGS

PHILADELPHIA--One of the largest meetings ever assembled in this city was held on the 14th, to respond to the proclamation of the Mayor, upon the present condition affairs here, and on the protection of the country.

Mayor Sift presided, assisted by the Recorder, Presidents of the Councils, the Mayor of the Northern Liberties, the Presidents of the Board of Commissions, and the Chief burgess of West Philadelphia, as vice-presidents.

The spirit of the meeting may be seen by the principal resolution, which was as follows:--
"Resolved.--That while this meeting deeply regrets that negotiations of a friendly character have failed to effect a pacific settlement with our sister republic, we deem it a duty to make known to the nation at large, and particularly to the Government, that our full and entire sympathies are with our country; and that, should the exigencies of the nation require it, our services, our fortunes, and our lives are hereby pledged for the preservation of the integrity of the national domain, the security of the lives and the conservation of the rights of our fellow citizens, and the honour of our beloved country."

The meeting was ably, effectively, and eloquently addressed by many distinguished citizens, among others by Josiah Randall, Mr. Page, General Peter S. Smyth, Judge Conrad, Mayor Swift, P.A. Browne, B.H. Brewster. A fair sprinkling of Whigs, democrats, and natives.

In the Senate, on the 15th, in reference to this meeting, Mr. Cameron presented the proceedings of the war meeting in Philadelphia, and said he was proud of that city for the opportunity she had given him of laying before the Senate this evidence of patriotism of her sons. What she had done for the country she would do again. She had coal enough in her mountains to warm her friends, and iron enough in her mines to repel her enemies.

NEW YORK.--In this mart of commerce the same active movements are in progress—the citizens are beginning to arouse to a sense of the importance of the present war crisis, and of the necessity of strenuously cooperating with the Executive in prosecuting the war with vigour.

WAR WITH MEXICO--

Mexico has commenced offensive war by the invasion of our territory and the slaughter of a detachment of our regular army within our own borders. In less than 33 hours after the official announcement of the actual existence of war by the President to Congress, both legislative bodies, with unexampled unanimity, determined to prosecute it with the utmost vigour, and placed at the disposal of the Executive the militia, naval, and military forces of the United States, and 50,000 volunteers, with an immediate appropriation of $10,000,000 to meet this extraordinary emergency. Such patriotic dispatch, supported, as it is, by the unanimous sanction of the whole people, is the best evidence to the world that we are on all questions of national honour a united nation; and that we will never lay down our arms in so righteous a cause until we receive full and ample reparation for this unprovoked invasion of the soil of our free and happy republic. The only example to the civilized world of a regular and systematic form of Republican government, it became us to bear with the insults and contumely of a neighbouring people torn by intestine divisions and the prey of successive military despots, until the blow accompanied the word, and then forbearance ceased to be a virtue. No strong nation ever bore so much without a resort to the ultima ratio gentium; and we can appeal with safety to the whole course of the administration towards Mexico, as showing that nothing but actual war and bloodshed could induce it finally to dissolve those ties of amity which we had solemnly contracted with our nominal sister republic. The whole has been the deliberate act of Mexico, and the United States stand before all nations absolved from all blame, and offering a bright example of the exercise of those Christian virtues which great communities so usually profess and so seldom practice. This is not, on our part, a war of aggression; but to hasten its conclusion and to limit the loss of life and property, the territory of Mexico must be reached by an American army, so as to dictate those terms which will secure us from future injustice and injury. The temporary possession of the soil of Mexico must decide the fate of the country, and our views should therefore be turned not only to the chastisement of the army of Arista, and the blockade of her ports, but to the bold and speedy occupation of her strongholds. The Mexican population can offer but a slight resistance to the North American race. Its motley character and physical structure are the certain indications of defeat for, out of 7,000,000 of souls, 4,000,000 are Indians, and of the remainder 3,000,000 but 1,200,000 are whites. Whilst thus asserting our rights, and yet strictly maintaining our treaty stipulations with Mexico, which survive the commencement of hostilities, we are bound to protect our citizens on the ocean from the wanton grant of letters of marque and reprisals to foreigners and foreign vessels sailing under the Mexican flag. Mexico has literally no commercial marine, and her navy is a merely nominal one. She has but two or three ports on the gulf, and no Mexican vessels which can be legitimately converted into privateers. The treaty with Spain itself, as was shown in the last evening's Union, treats all such vessels as piratical, and condemns the offending Spanish seaman to be hung up at the yard-arm as a pirate. Mr. Berrien has shown the proper degree of vigilance, by moving yesterday a resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to inquire whether any, and what, legislation is necessary to give effect to the 11th article of the treaty of the 27th of October 1795. Between the United States and Spain ("by which the subjects of Spain are prohibited from taking out letters of marque against the United States, under the penalty of being treated as pirates"), and that they report by bill or otherwise. Mr. Berrien explained the necessity of looking into this matter, in consequence of the passage of the bill recognizing the existence of a war with Mexico, and the probability the privateers might be fitted out in the island of Cuba." Another consideration also deserves to be noted. A vessel purporting to sail under a Mexican flag can scarcely pass into a Mexican port, because it may be blockaded. What, then, will she do with any prize she may make? She cannot carry the captured vessel into any other port for condemnation; and if she undertakes to condemn the prize at sea, without going into an admiralty court for adjudication, she acts like a pirate, and would be treated as such. We regret deeply that our country has been actually forced into war by unwearied hostility of the Mexican military aristocracy, but we have unlimited confidence in the rectitude of our cause, and in the energy, patriotism, and valour of a brave, free, and virtuous people.--Washington Union, May 15 [AKS]
REDUCTION OF THE AMERICAN NAVY.--A highly important report was made the other day to Congress, by Mr. Bancroft, Secretary of the Navy, proposing an extraordinary reduction and radical reform in the present armaments and arrangements of the naval service, equal to 1,000,000 dollars a year. It would appear from the spirit of this report, that the idea of any conflict with a foreign nation could not exist in the Executive mind; yet it is doubtful how long Mr. Polk's thoughts may remain in this complexion. The propositions of Mr. Bancroft, which are stated with much power of eloquence, and with much clearness, will, no doubt, be received with sentiments of a mingled character by the officers of the navy. The whole reduction of expenses proposed by this new plan is equal to 1,000,000 dollars. This consideration will, no doubt, be a recommendation of the plan to the tax-paying people of this country; but it requires much moral courage in the head of the navy department to make a proposition of such a nature, which touches radically the incomes of those who live upon the public. We may expect a great storm of indignation from the friends of the navy, and much excitement growing out of this subject. Mr. Bancroft must know well his ground, and meet the hurricane coolly. Remember the fate of Paulding. This may be called a Government strike for lower wages. One obvious reflection springs up in the mind on reading the masterly and able report of Mr. Bancroft, and also those of his colleagues. While we must acknowledge generally the great talent, ability, and industry, displayed by the Cabinet Ministers, all in their several spheres of action, we cannot overlook the sublime incongruity--the splendid inconsistency, of the directing mind in the White House, by whom the separate views of these Ministers have been devised. The policy of one department of the Government is directly in the teeth of that taken by the other. The State Department argues for 54° 40', the alternative of war, and vast expenditures--while the Treasury and the Navy area bit for economy, radical reduction and peace. Even the same departments, within the interval of a few short weeks, have exhibited the strange anomaly of a tendency to war and expenditure--and then to peace and reduction. Such a strange and contradictory system of government can arise only from imbecility of mind, infirmity of purpose, or incapacity in the intellect that should control the whole in harmony and compactness of difficulty, it will be a miracle. Mr. Polk, no doubt means well--and so does the unfortunate engineer in the midst of an awful explosion of his boiler. Capacity, not motive is the point in question.---New York Herald, May 8.

That inconsistency of resolutions which marks the character of democratic states, and that salutary retribution which follows in the track of political injustice, have seldom been more swiftly or strikingly exhibited than in the revulsion of public feeling which has taken place in the United States on the subject of Texas, and in the hostilities with Mexico, which have originated in the rapacious annexation of that province. We do not doubt that strong exertions will be made by the American government to carry on and to conclude the war. We do not doubt that, partly from patriotism, even in a bad cause, and partly from those incentives of passion and adventure which all wars apply to an energetic population, the United States' forces will soon be in a condition to take the field without dishonor. The regular army will be raised to 15,000 men; and General Scott, who has sometimes been mentioned as a future candidate for the Presidency, will take the command of 25,000 militia in the field; the same number being called out for the reserve. But the few months which have elapsed between the act of annexation and the necessity of accounting for it, have singularly, damped the ardour of that great party whose clamour made Texas the national question of last year. In the insolence of fruition no impending sacrifice or effort was thought too great for the purpose of bullying Mexico, and extending the frontiers of the Union from the Sabine to the Rio del Norte; but the momentary excitement, which gave so intense an interest to the Texan territory, is past. Texas has been annexed, but without benefit of inventory. A vast tract of country has been added to the Union, but the men who are to defend it must be brought down from the healthy states of the west to face the yellow fever and the enemy on the southern coast. The new possessions of the Union must be occupied by an army of American citizens, whose political opinions (in a part of them at least) must be absolutely hostile to the cause in which they are engaged. The funds of the nation and the credit of the Federal government will be expended, and very probably exhausted, in the effort; and yet even at the commencement of a war which will ere long require these vast and increasing sacrifices, so feeble is the enthusiasm excited by it, that scarcely a party of volunteers can be raised in Galveston or New Orleans. The exertions which must now be made by Mr. Polk's Cabinet, the burdens of taxation and conscription which must be borne by the people, the inevitable necessity of bringing the financial credit of the Union to the test in the money-market of the world, and the disgust and dismay which may already be traced in most of the respectable organs of public opinion in the United States, are more than ordinary grounds for hoping that the war party will be unable to stand its ground against the reality of war. To call out 40,000 men, to provide them with equipment and maintenance, to lead this citizen-army across the boundaries of the United States, as they were established by the last treaty with Mexico, and to assume all the powers of government which are indispensable to the conduct of a foreign war, are novel events in the history of the United States; and we may venture to predict either that these military demonstrations will seriously modify the institutions and impair the Union of the American states, or...
that the influence of those institutions and the authority of that Union will ere long give a sever chivk to the warlike tendency of the time, and inflict upon the authors of the policy the chastisement they deserve. The occupation of the territory between the Nueces and the Rio del Norte is an act for which Mr. Polk is exclusively responsible. That act, which, with the forces under General Taylor's command, was beyond all measure rash, culpable, and provocatory, has been followed by war. It is the drop which has made the bitter cup of Texan fraud and violence overflow. And now, with a perfect knowledge of the infamy of the cause in which they are engaged, and with a thorough contempt for the mischievous folly of the Government, by which these evils have been caused and aggravated, the whole American people, the Whig party, the States of New England, the mercantile cities of the coast, are plunged into this aggressive war, which has begun by two humiliating disasters, and cannot terminate, even if it be successful, without branding with a deeper shame the whole policy of the United States towards their sister-republic. These are not mere words; they are things. They are facts, which the necessities of the war, and the consequences of a state of war, will soon bring home to every American citizen; and it is not too much to add, that to suppose the United States to be in a position to wage a vigorous war, and to hold a hostile territory by military means, is to anticipate a social revolution in that country. Mr. Polk, however, must at least be acquitted of inconsistency. He has done all he could to engage his country in war, not only with Mexico, but with England; and he now announces his determination to carry on his military and naval preparations on a scale which proves that England as well as Mexico is in his thoughts.

We know little of the real forces under the Mexican generals, and we rely less upon their strength and discipline. But it is evident that the principal dangers the Americans will have to surmount will not be from large armies in the field. The country, the climate, the season, the irregular movements of partisan corps, and the enmity of the Indian and Spanish races to the Americans, are by far the most formidable defences of Mexico. The larger the force the Americans may bring into the field, the greater will be these obstacles. The want of water, local supplies, or carriage roads, and the scarcity of beasts of burden, render it a matter of extreme difficulty, not to say impossibility, to advance far into the Mexican territory at the head of a numerous regular corps, unless it took with it all the resources of one of our Indian armies. If its base of operations be on the coast, the malignant fevers which prevail there, more especially at this time of year, would depopulate a host; and if war is to be carried on in countries so thinly peopled and imperfectly civilized, it must be on principles quite distinct from the rules of regular warfare. The loose and indecisive operations which are constantly going on between some of the South American republics are more likely to be imitated in a Mexican campaign. If a blow be struck, it will be rather from the absence of the enemy than from his defeat or submission; and the result of such success may be eminently embarrassing to the conqueror.

At present the military interest of the case is confined to General Taylor's position on the Rio del Norte, and to that of the detachment guarding his supplies at Point Isabel, near the mouth of that river. The Mexicans appear with considerable skill to have crossed the river in two places, above and below Matamoras, so as to place the American General between two divisions, one of which has turned his right wing, and the other is interposed between his left and the sea. Point Isabel was selected by the Americans as the post to which supplies could most easily be conveyed by sea; but the bay in which it is situated is divided from the Gulf of Mexico by a long strip of land, leaving a narrow and shallow passage at its southern extremity call the Brazos Santiago. This passage is now said to be closed by Mexican troops and fortifications on the point of land under which all communications with the open sea must pass. If this information be correct, the detachment at Point Isabel cannot be relieved from the sea, and the passage would only be re-opened by a successful attack of the American naval forces on the Mexican position. One other passage in this Bay del Espiritu Santo, as it is called, is marked in our maps about 2 degrees to the north of the mouth of the Rio Bravo, under the name of the Pasa del Caballo or Corpus Christi; but the American papers do not appear to contemplate the possibility of sending maritime reinforcements by that route.

The subject of letters of marque still attracts great attention in the United States; but it is not a little characteristic of this scandalous war, and of the people who are carrying it on, that American merchants and adventurers at Havannah will probably be the first to avail themselves of Mexican letters of marque to prey upon American commerce; and if the war continues, we have no doubt they will organize a system of privateering which will make their country regret the day she produced such miscreants, and eclipse the atrocious frauds of the slave-trade itself.

LT 1846 6/11 5c Mexican cruisers

Mexican Cruisers- It will be recollected that before Almonte broke up his mission in this country, he stated positively, that in the event of war between the United States and Mexico, the latter would cover the sea with privateers under the Mexican flag. There is a great deal of anxiety beginning to me manifested for the result of this threat. Almonte, at the last accounts, was at Havannah. It seems that he was sent there under the pretext of being accredited as a Minister to France; but instead of proceeding to Europe he remained at Havannah, and sent his secretary back to Mexico. Who knows that this was not a mere feint, and that Almonte knew what was about to take place on the Rio Grande, and he went to Havannah for the purposes of issuing letters of marque, as he threatened when he was in Washington? This is certainly a menacing and important view of the case; and what makes it more disastrous is the probability that it is true. The amount of American property in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and in the South Seas, is worth probably $100,000,000, belonging to all the sea ports in the United States. The tonnage enrolled and belonging to the United States, approaches 3,000,000 about one-half of which is actively engaged in the foreign trade. This tonnage, estimated at the moderate sum of $60 per ton, for vessel and cargo, would make the amount of property now at sea $90,000,000. But this is a low
War of the United States of Mexico

LONDON, MONDAY, JUNE 15, 1846.

Whoever has thought fully studied history, whoever profoundly realized that the universe has a Ruler, must condemn the counsels which are now urging our country on to war against eternal justice—a war in which heaven must take part against us. But it is said that Mexico has made war upon us. How can this be pretended? Our army was long encamped at Corpus Christi, on the extreme western limit of all that ever was Texas, either the province or the republic. There our flag waved unmolested—not a Mexican came near our little army. Not an act of hostility was committed on either side. All at once without an imaginable pretext, our army broke up and marched for the Rio Grande. Thus, it will be seen, that while the Atlantic cities and coasts will suffer terribly, the west and the southwest will be benefited, by the vast expenditures that will be required to bring the war to a successful and honourable termination. These expectations are on the gloomy on one side, and glorious on the other. We must take them as they come, and do the best we can. An imbecile Government has brought us into this condition; and, as we elected them, we must make the best we can of a bad bargain, and fight it out with the best energy and courage we have. --New York Herald.

[AKS]
The arrival of the Britannia with the American mails of the 1st instant has put us in possession of the decisive intelligence from the theatre of war on the Rio Grande. The Mexican forces have been wholly unable to support by their courage or discipline in the field the operations which had been conceived and directed, not without considerable military skill, by their commanders. In spite of a numerical superiority amounting to three-fold the American force under General Taylor, the Mexican troops on the left bank of the river have been totally routed; and an opportunity, which is not likely to recur, of inflicting a summary blow upon the enemy in a position of great difficulty, has ended, on the contrary, in a signal triumph of General Taylor's little corps, and a shameful repulse of the Mexican forces.

It will be remembered that by the last accounts which had reached us we learned that General Taylor, with about 3,000 men, was encamped opposite the town of Matamoros, and under the protection of a small fort or earthenwork on the left bank of the Rio Grande. An unsuccessful attempt had previously been made by a party of about 70 American soldiers to force a passage from this camp to Point Isabel on the coast. But on the 1st of May General Taylor resolved to move down the river with the main body of the forces under his command, for the purpose of relieving the post on the coast, and likewise of incorporating with his army the recruits and volunteers he had reason to expect the recruits and volunteers he had reason to expect from New Orleans. He left the position opposite the town of Matamoros to be defended by the 7th regiment of infantry, and a company of artillery, this garrison being under the command of Major Brown. It may here be observed that a brisk fire was kept up between this fort and the Mexican mortar battery on the other side of the river for several days--General Taylor says 100 hours; and that Major Brown was killed by a shell from the enemy's battery.

The principal movement of General Taylor's corps from his camp to Point Isabel was effected, as far as we are informed, without opposition; although at that moment his small force was subdivided into three detachments, incapable of assisting one another. The garrison of the camp was fully employed in the bombardment, the garrison at Point Isabel was afraid to move after the disaster of Colonel Thornton, and the main body of the army was exposed to an attack, at a great disadvantage, whilst it was passing from one position to the other. No such attack was, however, made, and on the following morning (the march having been apparently accomplished by night) General Taylor reached Point Isabel in safety. He remained there five days, during which time some reinforcements arrived and he was able to collect those supplies which he knew to be greatly needed in the camp. On the 7th of May he resumed his march back again to the relief of Major Brown, resolved to fight the Mexicans in whatever force they might oppose his progress. Nothing but the most determined resolution and a signal victory could rescue the American General from the critical position in which he stood. On the 9th of May the Mexican army, on the left bank of the river, being about 6,000 strong, with 7 pieces of artillery and 800 cavalry, met the American corps on its march up the river, near a place called Palo Alto. The American forces did not exceed 2,300 men. The engagement of this day was, however, no more than a protracted and somewhat indecisive cannonade; and the artillery deserved all the honours of the action. Towards evening the Mexicans fell back, and were supposed to have recrossed the river. This following day the Mexicans were again discovered to have taken up a position, flanked by their artillery, in a ravine crossing the road at Resaca de la Palma, a place only three miles from Matamoros. This position was vigorously assailed by the American troops; the batteries were carried, the guns taken, the enemy driven back with considerable loss, and the victory complete. The loss of the Americans was severe. Both these engagements were sharply disputed; but General Taylor's forces displayed an incontestable superiority, under very disadvantageous circumstances, which deserved to be rewarded by success.

The dispatches of that officer, which will be found in another place, are remarkable for their succinct energy, and the absence of those verbose and grandiloquent strains which we are accustomed to meet with in narratives of Mexican exploits. General Taylor writes like a man of sense, skill, and courage; and we have not the slightest wish to detract from the honours he has gallantly earned under the flag of his country. Whatever opinion we may entertain of the causes of this war, and of the political motives in which it originated, the behaviour of the American general and his troops deserves to be judged of by a much higher standard than the policy of the Government which it is their duty to serve.

The conduct of the Mexican army, on the contrary, demonstrates the utter inability of that Government to protect any portion of its dominion from invasion; and it degrades the descendants of the Spanish Americans still lower in the rank of nations.

We are curious to learn what the effects of this victory will be in both countries. In the United States it will probably stimulate to excess the military fever of which so many symptoms are already perceptible; and volunteers, who were slow to relieve General Taylor at his utmost need, will sally forth in thousands to join a victorious captain. But if the American army is yet to undertake a campaign south of the Rio Grande, its greatest perils are yet to come. The hot weather has set in; the yellow fever is raging on the coast; and to advance into the interior of Mexico at this time will be an operation of extreme difficulty. In Mexico, it is not improbable that some fresh revolution will change the aspect of affairs.

LT June 15, 1846: 5e US, war dispatches

America,
Arrival of the Britannia
The Royal mail steam-ship Britannia, Captain Hewitt, arrived in the Mersey from Boston and Halifax about midnight, bringing most important accounts from the seat of hostilities in the south.

The American army, we now learn, had completely retrieved their former disasters, and, it is stated was preparing to cross the Rio del Norto, and carry the war into the enemy’s territories. It was also intended to establish an immediate blockade of the Mexican seaboard.

It will be remembered, that in our last summary it was stated that Captain Walker had with daring courage started from Point Isabel for the purpose of conveying dispatches to General Taylor’s camp. Our advices now received state that this enterprise having been successfully accomplished, the American Commandant immediately determined to march a portion of his army to the relief of Point Isabel. On the 1st ult. Accordingly he left his intrenchments opposite Matamoras with a force of from 1,000 to 1,200 men, cavalry, artillery, and infantry, and on the morning of the following day reached the Point without encountering a single Mexican. On the morning of the 3rd ult. the booming of artillery being heard in the direction of Matamoras, Captain Walker was dispatched to ascertain the cause; and on the 5th, having again safely accomplished his enterprise, that officer reported that the Mexicans, discovering General Taylor’s absence from the camp, had opened upon it from their batteries at Matamoras and on the left bank of the Rio del Norte, an attack being also made upon the rear of the camp. The Americans returned the fire upon Matamoras from a battery of five guns, and in 30 minutes, it is stated, succeeded in silencing the enemy. One life only was lost. On the evening of the 1st, having effectually strengthened the defenses of Point Isabel and obtained supplies for his camp, General Taylor set out on his return, and on the 8th found the enemy in position in front of a "chapparal," lying in the vicinity of a stream named the Palo Alto. An engagement ensued. The details will be found in the accompanying dispatch of General Taylor:

"Sir,-I have the honour to report that I was met near this place yesterday, on my march from Point Isabel, by the Mexican forces, and, after an action of about five hours, dislodged them from their position, and encamped upon the field. Our artillery, consisting of two 18pounders and two light batteries, was the arm chiefly engaged, and to the excellent manner in which it was maneuvered and served is our success mainly due.

"The strength of the enemy is believed to have been about 6,000 men, with 7 pieces of artillery, and 800 cavalry. His loss is probably at least 100 killed. Our strength did not exceed all told 2,300, while our loss was comparatively trifling—4 men killed, 3 officers and 37 men wounded, several of the latter mortally. I regret to say that Major Ringgold, 3rd Artillery, and Captain Page, 4th Infantry, are severely wounded; Lieutenant Luther, 2d Artillery, slightly so.

"The enemy has fallen back, and it is believed has re-passed the river. I have advanced parties now thrown forward in his direction, and shall move the main body immediately.

"In the haste of this first report, I can only say that the officers and men behaved in the most admirable manner throughout the action. I shall have the pleasure of making a more detailed report when those of the different commanders shall be received.

"I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"Z. Taylor, Brevet Brigadier General, Commanding, United States Army

"The Adjutant General, United States Army,

"Washington."

"Headquarters, Army of Occupation, Camp at Resaca de la Palma, three miles from Matamoras, May 9, 10p. m.

"Sir,—I have the honour to report that I marched with the main body of the army at 2 o’clock today, having previously thrown forward a body of light infantry into the forest which covers the Matamoras Road. When near the spot where I am now encamped, my advance discovered that a ravine crossing the road had been occupied by the enemy with artillery. I immediately ordered a battery of field artillery to sweep the position, flanking and sustaining it by the 3d, 4th, and 5th Regiments, deployed as skirmishes to the right and left. A heavy fire of artillery and musketry was kept up for some time, until finally the enemy’s batteries were carried in succession by a squadron of Dragoons and the regiments of infantry that were on the ground. He was soon driven from his position, and pursued by a squadron of Dragoons, battalion artillery, 3d Infantry, and a light battery, to the river. Our victory has been complete. Eight pieces of artillery with a great quantity of ammunition, three standards, and some 100 prisoners have been taken; among the latter General La Vega, and several other officers. One general is understood to have been killed. The enemy has recrossed the river, and I am sure will not again molest us on this bank."
"The loss of the enemy in killed has been most severe. Our own has been very heavy. The extent in killed and wounded is not yet ascertained, and is reserved for a more detailed report.

"The affair of today may be regarded as a proper supplement to the cannonade of yesterday, and the two taken together exhibit the coolness and gallantry of our officers and men in the most favourable light. All have done their duty, and done it nobly. It will be my pride, in a more circumstantial report of both actions, to dwell upon particular instances of individual distinction.

"It affords me peculiar pleasure to report that the field work opposite Matamoras has sustained itself handsomely during a cannonade and bombardment of 160 hours. But the pleasure is alloyed with profound regret at the loss of its heroic and indomitable commander, Major Brown, who died today from the effect of a shell. His loss would be a severe one to the service at any time, but to the army under my orders it is indeed irreparable. One officer and one non-commissioned officer killed and 10 men wounded comprise all the casualties incident to this severe bombardment.

"I inadvertently omitted to mention the capture of a large number of pack mules left in the Mexican camp.

"I am, Sir, very respectfully your obedient servant,

"Z. Taylor, Brevet Brigadier General, Commanding the United States Army.

"The Adjutant-General of the Army, Washington."

------------

"Head-quarters, Army of Occupation, Resaca de la Palma, May 11.

"(Orders, No. 59.)

"I, the Commanding General congratulates the army under his command upon the signal success which has crowned its recent operations against the enemy. The coolness and steadiness of the troops during the action of the 8th, and the brilliant impetuosity with which the enemy's position and artillery were carried on the 9th, have displayed the best qualities of the American soldier. To every officer and soldier of his command the General publicly returns his thanks for the noble manner in which they have sustained the honour of the service and the country. While the main body of the army has been thus actively employed, the garrison left opposite Matamoras has rendered no less distinguished service by sustaining a severe cannonade and bombardment for many successive days. The army and the country, while justly rejoicing in this triumph of our arms, will deplore the loss of many brave officers and men who fell gallantly in the hour of combat.

"2. It being necessary for the Commanding General to visit Point Isabel on public business, Colonel Twiggs will assume command of the corps of the army near Matamoras, including the garrison of the field-work. He will occupy the former lines of the army, making such dispositions for defense and for the comfort of his command as he may deem advisable. He will hold himself strictly on the defensive until the return of the Commanding General.

"By the order of Brigadier-General Taylor,

"W. W. J. Bliss, Acting Adjutant General." [JTW]

LT June 15, 1846: 9a Mexico, letters of marque

Letters of Marque.

(From Le Siecle)

The eventualities of the war opened between the United States and Mexico, strongly preoccupy the attention of the public mind in England. Amongst these eventualities to which, perhaps, the full attention is not paid which they demand there is one, at least, which we cannot exempt ourselves from examining seriously; we allude to privateering, a barbarous practice still authorized by the right of nations.

To require that a maritime nation, at war with another, shall not attack the commerce of the latter, is a political absurdity. Commerce is an instrument of wealth; wealth, and instrument of power. Now, nations fight to diminish or destroy the power of each other; to require, in the name of the rights of nations, that the trade of the belligerent shall remain free is to falsify the conditions of the contest, is to put an injustice in the place of an extension of natural right. For instance, France, possessing a military marine which may, seeing the number of points to be defended, attain a proportionate equality to that of England, and that Power keeping up a merchant fleet five or six times more considerable than ours, it is evident that the freedom of the commerce of the belligerents would rob us of a great advantage, supposing (which is not very supposable) that such liberty could receive sufficient guarantees.

But the right of privateering, conceded by the state to private individuals, and exercised by means of corsairs, is not necessarily derived from the right of attacking the enemy's trade with ships of war. Privateering, which has rendered services to France which we are far from forgetting, variably engenders passions of lucre, and hatred, from which it is of the highest importance to purge a well organized society. The delivery of letters of marque... ought, therefore, to be interdicted by a declaration of France, England, and the United States, to the effect that in future every corsair (privateer) should be deemed a pirate and treated as such by Admiralty law. All the other Powers would certainly hasten to give in their adhesion to this declaration.

The following are the news, we will not say the facts, which determine us to publish the foregoing reflections:

The Mexicans cannot attack the Americans by sea, except by privateering. The law requires that the crew of a corsair shall consist (one-third at least) of men belonging to the nation from which the corsair holds its letter of marque. Nothing can be easier than the evasion of this arrangement. Supposing that the crew consists of 120 men, 40 of them and a sham captain, born or naturalized Mexicans, will first be taken; then a real captain, without any legal title, and 80 "sea-wolves" of all nations will be engaged, including men who have been dragged by love of gain into all the hazards and sometimes all the excesses of an adventurous life. A corsair, thus constituted, will pillage the commerce of Mexico by the hands of Mexicans; for there are on the shores of South America bold Guineamen who will not refuse to enlist on board corsairs bearing the Union flag. Already, even, letters now before us announce that every arrangement is being made for practicing on a large scale this system of pillage legalized by letters of marque.

Ought not this kind of cruising, where you see the legal crew doing the kitchen work and washing the deck, whilst the real crew often belong, if not all, at any rate the larger part, to the nation whose vessel is captured, to excite the reprobation of right minded men in all countries? But this is not all; the neutral cruisers will contest the nationality of many of these corsairs, will stop them, cannonade them, and thence will arise demands which will end in the most grievous results. Never was the necessity for abolishing corsairs more urgent, and never was the opportunity for attaining this object more propitious, than at present.

THE ARSENAL OF NEW YORK.- A visit to this department would prove interesting to the tourist or citizen, at this crisis in particular, when our capabilities for defence in case of a hostile attack, demand the attention of every patriot and citizen. This building, which is situated in Centre street, contains the enormous amount of 50,000 stand of arms, together with 500 pieces of ordnance of different caliber. The trophy room contains several field-pieces which were taken from the British in the last war. The whole are in excellent condition, and capable of immediate use. There has been much agitation, for the past few years, in the board of common council, about the location of this necessary and useful public building. In comparison to its size, the vast quantity of arms contained in it, and arranged with extreme neatness and regularity, would astonish any person viewing the outward dimensions of the building. The erection of a suitable building for the safety and protection of our military stores, will doubtless soon excite the attention of the authorities. We learn that New York could in 24 hours, bring into the field an effective force of 40,000 troops! Good.- New York Herald.

LT June 16, 1846:  8b Mexico, rancheros

THE RANCHEROS OF MEXICO.- The Rancheros part of the material part of the Mexican army, are half India and half Spanish in their extraction; gaunt, shriveled though muscular in their frames, and dark and swarthy visage as they are, these men are the Arabs of the American continent. Living half of the time in the saddle, for they are unrivalled horsemen, with lasso in hand they traverse the vast plains in search of the buffalo and wild horses. The killing of these animals and the preparations and sale of their hides are their sole means of livelihood. Their costumes generally consists of a pair of tough hide leggings, with sandals of the same material, bound together with leather thongs, over which is a blanket with a hole in the center large enough to allow the head to be thrust out, and which falls not ungracefully over their shoulders, leaving ample room for the play of their arms. Add to this a broad straw sombrero, and the lasso hanging ready for use in his girdle, and you have the Ranchero as he appears in the time of peace. Join to this a long lance with a sharp spear head, and his belt plentifully supplied with pistols and knives, and you have the Ranchero as a member of a troop of banditti, or as a soldier in a body of cavalry. Their power of enduring fatigue is almost inexhaustible, and scanty meal per diem of jerked beef and plantain suffices them during months. These are the men who comprise the great body of the Mexican cavalry, and they are to the armies of that nation what the Cossacks are to the Russians—ever on the alert, never to be surprised, and untiring in the pursuit of the foe, when plunder, no matter how trifling, is to be obtained.— Philadelphia Public Ledger.

LT June 18, 1846:  4b Mexico and the US

The urgent pressure of political controversy at home has hitherto prevented us from recurring to the intelligence lately received from the United States, and more particularly to the diplomatic correspondence between the two Republics. As elucidating the causes of the war, or the grounds on which it is undertaken, however, these documents deserve no notice at our hands. The whole tenor of the communications which have passed between the two Governments with reference to the annexation of Texas for several years, has demonstrated that no terms could satisfy the aggressive policy of the United States. The acquisition of Texas was only a name given to indefinite aggrandizement; and the frontiers of that province were purposely represented by the American immigrants as imperfectly defined, in order that when the principle of annexation had once triumphed over the restraints of justice and of treaties, it might be so enlarged and extended as to engorge the largest possible amount of the Mexican territory. In short, it requires no discrimination of political motives, and no minute acquaintance with the secret springs of events, to recognize in this transaction all the ancient characteristics of those vulgar crimes which have in all ages disgraced human nature, disturbed the relation of States, and sacrificed the feeble to the arrogance and ambition of the strong. The war has now broken out, and the American arms have been crowned with success. But, as we had long since anticipated, this contest, this shedding of blood, this excitement and stir of arms, has kindled amongst the American democracy a fiercer passion than would have been dreamt of a few years ago. The severest censors of the declining public morality and the increasing social defects of the Anglo-American communities, have scarcely ventured to predict enormities so great as those which have already been committed. If we had ventured to tell them a few years ago, that they would ere long reject the policy of peace for that of war, appropriate vast sums of money to military and naval purposes, and arm the population of the United States, for the purpose of plundering and bullying a powerless neighbour, we should have been told with indignation that such excesses were incompatible with the principles of the American constitution, and repugnant to the spirit of the American people. But the declivity on which the policy of the United States has for some time been launched, admits of no rest, and has no turning. All the restraints which the prudence of statesmen, the resistance of certain classes of society, and the authority of enlightened and humane opinions, may elsewhere put upon popular impetuosity, are absent or annulled. The passions, as well as the convictions of the majority, are absolute. So that no act is so monstrous that it may not be committed under sufficient excitement by the American people, and sanctioned by the scandalous maxim—
Our country, right or wrong. "These are precisely the consequences which have invariably followed the experiment of pure democratic government in all ages; and the Americans have bid fair to give the most complete and the most unblushing exhibition of a democratic policy abroad as well as at home.

It is very uncertain to what length Mr. Polk may think fit to carry this experiment, or by what means he may expect to surmount the difficulties by which it may be followed; but it is evident that as far as his party objects are concerned, the Mexican war has already served his purpose in a variety of ways. The President has little to apprehend from a hostile investigation of the causes of a war which has armed him with so much patronage and popularity; and he has opened a vein of influence, which will probably raise even his own mediocrity to distinction, and lead his successors to bid for popular support by the same reckless means.

The effect of these general considerations, and of the recent success of the American army on the Rio Grande, is to render it improbable that the war will be terminated by a mere arrangement of the frontier of Texas. The American troops had already crossed the river, and taken Matamoros. No enemy was in sight; and the recruits now arriving in great numbers from the north will not be easily persuaded to return to their homes, without a campaign in Mexico. Even the plunder of the Mexican churches has been publicly recommended by the democratic newspapers of the United States, as an inducement to adventurers to join the army of invasion; and the spirit in which these hostilities are likely to be prosecuted, and are supported by the war-meetings in all parts of the Union, is more like the irritation of a horde, than the systematic operations of a regular army, sent to effect a specific political object and no more. The next intelligence which may be expected from California, where Captain Fremont is preparing to consummate the purpose of his "exploring expeditions," the establishment of the blockade, and the assembly of troops prepared to advance to Mexico itself, will give a still further vehemence to this conflagration, and it is impossible to assign limits to the incidents which may arise in the course of such a war, affecting the interests of European as well as American States. The questions connected with the blockade of Vera Cruz, the blockading squadron was directed not to intercept the transmission of the precious metals in British vessels of war from the ports of Mexico: it is a matter of great interest to ascertain how far this limitation will be observed.

A prudent Government might readily avail itself of the momentary energy with which the public mind in the United States has been turned from the discussion of the Oregon controversy to the seizure of Mexican territory, in order to terminate the former difficulty, and re-establish amicable relations, on that point at least, with this country. The present war, therefore, appears to us to render an adjustment of the Oregon more practicable at this time, though less probable at a more advanced period. This inference confirms the confident anticipations which are entertained in the best-informed quarters in this country, that the proposal taken out by the Hibernia, and which reached Boston on the day Britannia sailed from that port, will be accepted by the American Government: and if so, the Mexican war will perhaps prove the means of averting much greater calamities from the world. But whatever may be our hopes on this subject, we cannot ourselves carry them to the height of implicit confidence. It is impossible to doubt that the general tendency of the American policy is rather warlike and aggressive than pacific and conciliatory. The present successful hostilities will complete the destruction of the Whig party, and render the exaggerated confidence of the American people in their military resources more intense than ever. No nation in such a condition, and animated by such a spirit, ever paused within the limits of a little war. Reaction may follow excess, but it will not produce the benefits of preventative restraint; and if we take into account the effects which the present aspect of American affairs must have on our maritime and mercantile interest, on our colonial dependencies, and on the independence of other States, we cannot allow ourselves to expect that a firm or lasting peace can prevail in the presence of so many elements of discord and hostility.

BORADIL IN AMERICA. - The following account from an American officer engaged in the recent battles on the Rio Grande is highly characteristic of the modesty of the nation. - "At half-past 11 o'clock the enemy opened their batteries, and how awful was the scene; the balls flew in every direction, and the killed and wounded lay on all hands. I was attached to a squadron of Dragoons. I felt perfectly cool, and in truth minded it no more than eating breakfast. About 20 minutes after the commencement of the action poor Major Ringgold was struck by a six-pound shot, and mortally wounded: he has since died. I had lent him my pistols on going into the fight. The shot struck one holster, cut it and the pistol in two pieces, cut all the flesh off the upper part of the Major's thigh, passed through the shoulders of his horse, cut the other pistol in two, and the flesh off the other thigh. He fell from his horse, and Lieutenant Sherer offered to assist him; but he said, 'No, Sir; let me stay-go on-you have enough to do-go ahead.' The action lasted about two hours, and the enemy retired. We rested on our arms until 3 o'clock, and then commenced the action again, and fought them till night closed the scene of carnage. We slept on the field of battle, amid the dead, dying, and wounded, without refreshment, upon the bare ground, and with our arms by our side. In this engagement I lost my mare; in extricating myself from a party of seven Mexicans who had fired at me whilst executing an order on the extreme left for Colonel Twigg's. I snapped her shoulder in wheeling to shoot a Mexican who rushed at me with a lance. On the next day we commenced the fight-the most awful ever known; and the old officers say equal only to New Orleans or Fort Erie. I was in the front rank during the fight, and, thank God, escaped without a wound, though unhorsed, a ball (shot?) through my coat, and my horse struck! We whipped them to death. I took the sword of a captain just wounded by me, and mean to keep it-you shall see my trophy one of these days. Among the officers killed was poor Lieutenant Inge-he had just joined, and was killed in the charge on the enemy's batteries. I charged by his side, and was unhorsed, and doubtless thus escaped. I am too grateful, first for the opportunity of being in the fight, and then to escape unhurt." [JTW]

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT BRITAIN.

LIVERPOOL, Monday,

The steam-ship Great Britain, Captain Hosken, arrived this morning in the Mersey, from New York after a most remarkable passage of little more than 23 days. She reached the bar at 3 o'clock a.m. The Great Britain brings advice from New York to the 8th inst. Inclusive, 42 passengers, and important dispatches, received at the last moment by special messenger from Mr. Pakenham, at Washington. These documents Captain Hosken himself conveys to London.

The important facts of the intelligence by this arrival may be summed up in a few words. Matamoras had been occupied, without opposition, by the American army under General Taylor, and the blockade of Vera Cruz had been established.

The last accounts, it will be remembered, left the American army preparing to cross the Rio del Norte. The advice by this arrival resume, that on the 17th ult. a large portion of General Taylor's force moved down the river for that purpose, the General remaining at the fortifications with about 300 men. The Mexican Commandant Arista, having observed this movement towards the ford, sent a flag of truce to General Taylor, requesting an armistice for six weeks, giving as a reason for his request that he desired to communicate with his government. The Mexican Commandant Arista answered that he would give till 8 o'clock the next morning to evacuate the city of Matamoras, and would permit him to take the public property under his charge. The flag then returned. On the next day, the 18th ult., the army crossed on floats of their own construction, and the bodies of wagons caulked. The passage was made about four miles above Fort Brown. On arriving at the city it was discovered that Arista with his forces had departed, leaving only the mounted batteries. All the mortars, and such of the military apparatus as could not be moved in their haste to escape, were thrown into the wells. A party from the American army went out to reconnoiter immediately after the entrance into Matamoras, and overtook a portion of the retreating Mexicans, 22 of whom were made prisoners. It was understood that Arista's head-quarters were at San Fernando, about 90 miles distant from Matamoras. The Mexican soldiers, it is said, refused to defend Matamoras against the American army, having had no rations served to them for five days. The United States squadron had sailed from the Rio Grande to Pensacola, to refit. Commodore Conner, according to report, intended afterwards to follow up the blockade of Matamoras by the attack of the Castle of San Juan d'Ulloa. The probable plan of the campaign continued to excite much speculation. The journals generally demand that the war shall be short and decisive. The Washington Union professed to have some knowledge concerning the plan of the campaign against Mexico, of which it does not give the details, but which will authorize the belief that the war well be pushed with the utmost vigour. It adds that General Taylor will soon advance into the enemy's country, and that it would not be surprised "to hear of his reaching Monterey, about 130 miles from Matamoras, about the commencement of the table land, at no distant day."

The American victories continued to excite increased gratulations in the principal cities. The citizens of New Orleans had adopted an address to General Taylor; and the Legislature of Louisiana had made an appropriation of 500 dollars for the purchase of a sword on behalf of the State, to present to him. [JTW]
We entertain a confident assurance, from the nature of the communications which have been received by the Great Britain from the United States, that the progress of the negotiation for the settlement of the Oregon dispute was completely satisfactory up to the time of the departure of the last mails. Mr. Pakenham had at once proceeded to communicate to the American Government the proposal which was conveyed to him from this country by the packet of the 18th of May; and the reception given to this overture by Mr. Buchanan and by the President himself was such as to leave little doubt of the prompt conclusion of the transaction. The terms of this agreement will probably be submitted by Mr. Polk to the Senate of the United States before the convention is finally drawn up for signature; but the protracted and violent debate which took place this winter upon notice for the termination of the existing convention, appears in a great measure to have exhausted the acrimony of parties on this subject; whilst the Mexican war has at once diverted public attention into another channel, and impressed upon the American Government the necessity of extricating itself without delay from the danger of a twofold war, accompanied by hostilities on all its frontiers. These considerations, and the moderation as well as firmness of the British Government, have produced their full effect in Washington; and we have little doubt that the next arrivals from the United States will enable us to announce the final adjustment of the Oregon controversy.

The intelligence just received by the Great Britain adds little to what was already known of the position of the belligerents on the banks of the Rio Grande. For although the American General has rejected the proposal of the Mexican commander for an armistice of six weeks, the operations of the campaign are unavoidably suspended, on that point at least, by the various obstacles which we have one than once pointed out. Even if it be supposed that General Taylor's small army was perfectly equipped and provided with all necessary supplies to carry on hostile operations in the enemy's territory, the reinforcements of men who have been suddenly raised and marched southward to the theatre of war require a large additional amount of stores, &c., which certainly were not to be found in the arsenals of the State of Louisiana. In short, the systematic invasion of Mexico by an Anglo-American army is an enterprise of very considerable difficulty; and it is by no means improbable that the two armies may remain for some time watching each other, neither of them being able to strike a vigorous blow at a distance from its own frontier. The coast is protected by the yellow fever more effectually than forts or garrisons; and the castle of St. Juan d'Ullao is said to be in a far better condition to resist an attack than it was at the time of the hostilities with France in 1838. The squadron under Admiral Baudin on that occasion consisted of three 60-gun frigates, 2 corvettes, 5 brigs, 2 bomb-ketches, and 2 steamers—comprising a weight of metal far superior to that which the Americans can now bring to bear on this strongly fortified position.

No country suffers less than Mexico from blockade, for the restrictive policy of the Government and the prohibitive duties of the Mexican tariff have the effect of a self-constituted blockade even in time of peace, and the different provinces produce all that is required by the inhabitants in their present half-civilized condition. The export of the precious metals, an the importation of quicksilver for the use of the miners, which was not prevented by the French cruisers during the last war in which Mexico was engaged, are the principal commercial interests of the country; and with them we trust the Americans will not interfere.

In estimating the amount of moral resistance, if not of physical force, which Mexico may offer to the progress of American invasion, the most important element in the social condition of that country is the Church. The State is impoverished, but the clergy are still possessed of all the landed wealth which was lavished upon them by the profuse piety of the Sovereigns of Spain; their churches are immense depositories of votive offerings made of the precious metals, and accumulated ever since the soil of Mexico first opened its abundant metallic wealth to the European adventurer. Nor is their spiritual authority over the population less unbounded than their possessions. The clergy have, therefore, every reason to resist the approach of a foreign force of heretical and grasping volunteers; and they may even think fit to sacrifice in such an emergency some portion of the unprofitable splendour of the church ornaments to save the power of the Church and the independence of the nation. As yet, however, we have no trustworthy account of the effect produced in Mexico by the events on the Rio Grande, and the defeat of the Mexican troops. Probably the pending Oregon controversy between England and the United States has had as much effect in inciting the Mexicans to resistance as the Mexican war has had in bending the American Cabinet to conciliation and peace with ourselves; and the termination of this threatening discussion may also lead the Mexicans to make overtures for peace on the terms originally offered to them, and which they might still, we trust, obtain.

THE BATTLE AT MATAMORAS.- A letter from an American officer says—“The battle was still uncertain, when General Taylor sent for Captain May, and told him he must take that battery if he lost every man of his squadron. May said he would take it, and assembling his men, he placed himself at their head, and rushed at full speed upon the enemy's battery. As he approached it, at the distance of some 20 yards, he and his squadron received a furious charge of grape from the pieces, and a shower of bullets from the infantry on the right and left, mowing down nearly the whole of his first and second platoons, but leaving him unhurt. In a second he and his remaining force passed through the battery, sabreing the artillerists as they passed, and then reining up their horses in the rear of the battery they charged again through it. As captain May reached it the second time he saw a Mexican officer defending himself against some of his men, when, flying to the rescue, he received the sword of General de la Vega, a gallant officer of the Mexican army, who surrendered himself a prisoner at discretion. May received his sword, and, putting him under the protection of an officer, rode back to General Taylor and said 'General, I have taken the enemy’s battery, and have the honour to present you the sword of General de la Vega, whom I captured gallantly defending his guns, and who is now your prisoner. Glory enough for one day! When the 8th Regiment was ordered to advance to support the bold charge of the dragoons, led by Captain May, the company to which Lieutenant Jordan was attached, rushing on the enemy, compelled them to break their ranks, and fight in detached squads, which, after a brief but severe contest, were destroyed or dispersed. Lieutenant Jordan seeing a group of five Mexicans firing on our forces, rushed upon them sword in hand, thinking that he was supported by three soldiers of his regiment. Two or three shots were discharged at him when at the distance of only a few paces, but they fortunately missed him; and at this moment he perceived he was alone, his men having met with other enemies, and his foes were prepared to receive him with the bayonet. It was no time for hesitation; he made a blow with his sword at the nearest Mexican, which wounded him severely, although it was partly parried by his musket, and at this critical moment his foot struck something, he stumbled, fell forward to the ground, and lost his sword. Before he could recover his feet he received three bayonet stabs in his body, but he instantly threw himself on one of the Mexicans, wrenched a cutlass from his hand, when he was fired upon by another, and a buck-shot was lodged in his arm near the shoulder, and one passed through his arm. He fell upon his back, and his enemies were about to dispatch him, when Lieutenant G. Lincoln, having vanquished those previously opposed to him, hastened with others in good time to the rescue. Lieutenant Lincoln cut down one of the Mexicans, whose comrades were immediately subdued. We are happy to learn that Lieutenant Jordan’s wounds, although severe and painful, are not considered dangerous. No bones are injured, and with care and attention he will probably soon recover." UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

(From the New York Journal of Commerce)

In an article under this head, some days since, we undertook to show the process by which we had become involved in the present war with Mexico.

To sum up all, we may say that the Mexicans were first in declaring war, and first in making it. They alone shut the door to negotiation; they shed the first blood; they made the first prisoners; they commenced the cannonading at Matamoras; they attacked General Taylor, and not be them, on the 8th and 9th of the same month.

Resting, then, the blame of the war chiefly upon Mexico, the question is, what is due to that republic from the United States, if not on the score of justice, at least on that of magnanimity? And again, what is due to ourselves, as the most ancient and powerful of the American republics—a nation vastly superior to Mexico in strength, population, and resources, and claiming to be so in every other desirable respect? A savage nature would perhaps cry for vengeance, and demand that so insolent a foe should be crushed and despoiled. But Christian principle, which remembers that vengeance is not a fit attribute of erring man, and that might does not make right, calls for moderation, forbearance, even-handed justice; and the more loudly in proportion as the enemy is feeble, ignorant, distracted and miserable. The very fact that the present Government of Mexico, which by its blind obstinacy and deliberate insults, and at last by open war, has brought these great evils upon that country and our own, was self-created—forced upon the people at the point of the bayonet—and that the deplorable consequence which have since followed are the result of this forced revolution, is reason enough why we should not visit the sins of the administration and army upon the people at large, beyond what is absolutely necessary for the vindication of our own rights and honour. Another reason why we should be tolerant with Mexico is because, by the annexation of Texas, we have come into possession of a territory once Mexican, and so have inherited as a nation, the ill-feeling which originally attached to the revolted province alone. And although we believe and know that for eight or ten years before her annexation to the United States, Texas was as independent as Mexico, and as likely to continue so; and although her independence had been long since acknowledged by England, France, and other countries is Europe, as well as by the United States; yet we must make allowance for human nature, and especially for Spanish nature, which never counts that lost which by an y possibility, even the remotest, may yet be recovered. The independence of Mexico herself was not acknowledged by Spain until a dozen or twenty years after it was achieved; although during the most of that time nothing was done, or attempted, towards a re-conquest.

As we have got into a war without designing it, the next question is, when and how are we to get out; and what are the objects we propose to accomplish? It is commonly easier to commence a war than to finish it. How it may be in the present case, the event will show. Possibly, the Mexican Government may be convinced by the experiment thus far that it is useless to attempt to cope with "the Colossus of the North," as the Mexican correspondent of the London Times denominates the United States, and that thus impressed they may "be ready to receive propositions, or make propositions of their own;" in which case President Polk is bound by the terms of his war message to "renew negotiations." But we confess we have not much hope from this source. A more probable result is, that the party opposed to Paredes, strengthened by the difficulties in which they find their country involved through his instrumentality, and the ill-success of his measures thus far, will create a counter-revolution, by which his administration will terminate as it began, and thus the way be opened for an immediate cessation of hostilities and resumption of negotiations. On the other hand it will not greatly surprise us if the pressure from without should tend rather to unite the jarring elements of opinion, and strengthen the party in power. In that case we should find even a Mexican war no boy’s play. There is not a country in the world better formed by nature for defence, and every nation is comparatively strong on its own soil.

But to go back to the question, what do we propose to accomplish by this war? Not the conquest of Mexico we hope. The mission of our republic is a mission of peace; not of conquest and carnage. God has given us right arms capable of defending ourselves, but the whole structure and genius of our institutions is unfavourable to offensive war. We are glad it is so. We covet not for our country the glory of crushing the weak, or distressing the mighty. Hitherto no conquered territory has ever been added to our happy union; we trust non ever will be. Purchase and voluntary annexation are the only weapons we have used, and they have been found far more efficacious than the sword. Louisiana cost us $15,000,000, and Florida $5,000,000. This war with Mexico, if it continues a year, will cost us $50,000,000 at least. What territory can we acquire which will at all compensate for this heavy outlay? And yet the expenditure of money is almost the least of the evils we shall suffer and inflict. Besides, we can acquire no territory in this way, which peace would not give us in better time, and in more perfect possession. If we wait till the fruit is ripe, it will fall into our hand. Why, then, should we pluck it while it is green? The vast unoccupied regions of America God has given to the oppressed of all nations. If we but honour our destiny by peace and liberality, it will all be peopled under the flag of these United States. The policy of inactivity is a mighty policy, for it is the policy of destiny, or more properly, of God’s providence. We cannot hurry it but to retard it and mar the perfectness of its work. Armies cannot stop it. The combined nations of the Old World can do nothing against it. We alone can interrupt its mighty march. Inactivity would have given us Oregon to 54 degrees 40’, if only our people would have settled those worthless regions. By hurrying our destiny we have lost all beyond 49 degrees, at least for the present. The same policy will perhaps add Canada to the stripes one day, but since our own Government, after 20 years of importunity, have consented that we should trade with Canada, her more perfect union is of little importance, especially to us. Mexico may one day be joined to us now. Poor and miserable as she is, she has set the noble example of abolishing slavery, and we should take care that this terrible scourge or our country does not cross the Rio Grande. To conquer Mexico would but show our folly, and stamp us with disgrace. What American, with a proper American heart, would take away from Mexico her independence, and her liberty to act freely? There can never be any dignity in treating with a subjugated power. We say, then that in the further progress of this war, though victory should declare for us in every battle, and our armies should march triumphantly.

Whatever may hereafter be said of the precise terms upon which the Oregon controversy has been settled, there can be but one feeling of satisfaction throughout the two great nations which are thus restored to amity and peace at the termination of a dispute which had threatened to sacrifice some of the principal interests of the civilized world for the sake of one of the least important tracts upon the surface of the globe. If the question was to be decided, or even argued, as one of strict right, we have frequently repeated our strong conviction that in opposition to the vast and exclusive claims put forward by Mr. Polk and the ultra-American party, the paramount claims of Great Britain, resting upon discovery, occupation, and treaties, might be, and have actually been, effectually advance and maintained. But it was equally clear, in a controversy which involved so much obscurity and so direct a contradiction of title, supported by such slender political interests on either side, that the practical solution of the difficulty which should be most beneficial to both parties, least injurious to existing interests, and most consistent with the honour and character of civilized states, would be the best. As long ago as the 3rd of January of this year, when the whole negotiation was suspended, and very serious and not unfounded apprehensions as to the result were entertained in every part of the world, we expressed a clear opinion to this effect, to which we now revert with a natural satisfaction in the accurate fulfillment of the views we then took. The maintenance of all existing rights of property, which have been created under the treaties of 1790 and 1818; the use of the great water-privilege of the Columbia; the possession of the whole of Vancouver’s Island, and of the harbor of St. Jan de Fuca, which is in reality the only safe port on the Oregon coast, were the conditions upon which we then contended that the 49th parallel might be adopted as the boundary; and it is precisely on those conditions that Mr. Pakenham’s treaty has been negotiated.

If we compare these terms with the exaggerated and unmeasured language repeatedly used by Mr. Polk, and with “the assertion, in the most solemn form, of the title of the United States to the whole territory,” contained in Mr. Buchanan’s dispatch of the 30th of August of last year, we shall not be surprised that the entire credit of this pacific arrangement has been transferred from the Cabinet of Mr. Polk to the Senate of the United States. That body has felt the responsibility of its executive office. It is less accessible to the influences of popular excitement and of personal ambition any institution of the Commonwealth; and has more than once done before, it has displayed a degree of statesmen like prudence and responsibility sufficient to grasp the true interests of the commonwealth and correct the aberrations of the nominal Executive. In spite of the declamation of excited parties have no doubt that the decision of the Senate will prove highly popular in the United States where people were anxious for means of escaping from the consequences of their own folly, and the Mexican war had already given them some slight (?) burdens and embarrassments, which would have been increased a hundredfold by a war with that land.

As far as the honour and interests of this country are concerned, we have every reason to be satisfied with the stipulations of this treaty. The interests of the Hudson Bay company are fully protected with the whole term of their charter, with an amendment for the indemnity and the purchase of their establishments situated south of the American front upon the expiration of the rights they now have under the British Crown. When we have taken care that no British interest is sacrificed or impaired, and that no British possession ceded without an adequate consideration, there is more of honour and true pride in a Government which can afford to deal with conditions of this kind in a liberal and magnanimous spirit, than in the haggling and grasping at which commonly overreach themselves, and sacrifice character, to gain what is of infinite value to nations. The district of Oregon retains a vast uninhabitable and uncultivated territory, and two points of peculiar interest for maritime and trading nations,—the river Columbia, and the straits of Fuca. The territory is not unequally divided, nor is it of importance what the division of the soil is. But of the other points we share equally with the United States, the navigation of the Columbia being used mutually.

AMERICA.

We subjoin a few extracts from the American papers, received by the Hibernia, for which we had not room yesterday.

THE WAR WITH MEXICO

"Despatches from the Army of invasion' had been received, dated Matamoras, the 24th ult. The investment of Matamoras, as stated in another column, is confirmed by General Taylor's accounts. The following details respecting the future proceedings of the army we copy from the New Orleans Picayune. They are authenticated by the official accounts:-

"We understand that the next demonstration of General Taylor will be upon the city of Monterey. This place is about 90 leagues from Matamoras, and is approached by a difficult road running through an arid and ill-watered country. It is the principal city of the province of New Leon, and commands the entrance of the Table Lands, or the interior of Mexico, through the passes of the Sierra Madre.

"To make the operations of the army upon Monterey more secure, if not absolutely certain, General Taylor designs occupying the town of Camargo, about 250 miles, by water, above Matamoras. To do this securely, it is necessary for him to have transports of a draught suitable to the navigation of the Rio Grande. Camargo will be the basis of his operations upon Monterey, and this point must first be made the depot of supplies, and entrenched in a style capable of sustaining a siege.

"It was the design of General Taylor, as we learn, to be at Monterey by the 1st of July; but the want of transports to convey his stores to Camargo compelled him to delay further progress in the enemy's country till this deficiency is removed. Camargo is situate upon the Rio Grande, and presents an admirable foundation for a display upon the interior, and from Camargo to Monterey is about 40 leagues, or 120 miles. The country lying between that town and Monterey; consequently, it is altogether better for the army to proceed from Camargo upon Monterey than from Matamoras.

"With a view to expediting the march of the army, Captain Sander, who has distinguished himself in the admirable defences he has constructed about Point Isabel, has been dispatched to this city to procure the necessary transports. He is in the city of New Orleans, but will proceed up the river immediately to supply the deficiency in transports which his purchasers here may leave. From the mouth of the Rio Grande to Matamoras, vessels drawing four feet water can run without obstruction; above that placed up to Camargo, there are not more than three feet water in many places. Steamers of the proper draught can scarcely be got in sufficient numbers here to answer the purpose of an invading army, and, therefore, Captain Sanders will go west to find them.

"Before reaching Camargo the army will have to take the town of Reynosa, which is between Matamoras and Camargo. It is not expected, however, that any defence will be made of such villages.

"General Taylor designs now to be at Monterey as soon in July as possible. At that place, it is believed, the Mexicans will make a stubborn stand, if at all during the war. If the troops under General Taylor occupy Monterey, the whole of Mexico this side the Sierra Madre will be in the possession of the United States, including the mining districts of New Leon, New Mexico, Santa Fe, Chihuahua, &c. This calculation is based somewhat upon the idea that the United States will order an exhibition from the Missouri river upon the northern provinces. If this be done, the whole of North Mexico will be in our possession. Such a disposition of the forces of the United States would end the war at once. But it did not, our army would hold the key to the whole of South Mexico, and the gates of the capital would, speaking in a military sense, be in possession of General Taylor."

"Colonel Kearney's expedition against Santa Fe (New Mexico) was expected to start early this month. It would consist of upwards of 3,000 volunteers and a few hundred regulars."

GENERAL ARISTA'S ACCOUNT OF THE BATTLE OF PALO ALTO
From the Boletin de la Division del Norte, published at Matamoras on the 14th of May, we translate the following official document relative to the battle of Palo Alto, on the 8th ult.:

"General-in-Chief,-Constant in my purpose of preventing General Taylor from effecting a junction between the forces he was taking from Santa Isabel and those which he left at the fortifications opposite Matamoras, I set off today from the Tonguas del Ramireno, from which place I addressed to your Excellency my last dispatch, and I marched toward Palo Alto as soon as my spies informed me that the enemy had left Santa Isabel, determined to introduce into their fortifications a number of wagons loaded with provisions and artillery.

"I arrived opposite Palo Alto about 1 o'clock p.m., and saw that the enemy was entering the place. With all the forces I had I proceeded to form my line of battle on a large plain; a woody elevation supported my right flank, with a quagmire on the left, difficult of penetration. Scarcely had we fired our first gun, when the second commander-in-chief, General Don Pedro Ampudia, arrived, as I had warned him to join me as soon as he had well reinforced the several points which were necessary to besiege the enemy's troops that were left in the fortifications opposite Matamoras.

"The forces under my command were 3,000 men and 12 pieces of artillery; those of the invaders were 3,000 men, or a trifle less, and a superior force of artillery, as they numbered 20 pieces of 16 and 18 pounders.

"The battle commenced with such ardour that the firing of cannon did not cease or a moment, during which the enemy endeavored to follow their course towards Matamoras, in order to suspend the siege of their troops at the fortification; and with such object they set fire to shrubbery and grass, so as to form opposite their line a thick smoke, by which they succeeded in hiding themselves from our view; but I, through necessary operations, defeated their object on two different occasions.

"General Taylor maintained his attack more as defensive then an offensive one, using chiefly the best part of his forces—the artillery, protected by one half of his infantry and all his cavalry; reserving the rest to fortify the turf, at a distance of about 2,000 yards from the battle field.

"I was anxious to make a charge on the enemy, because the cannon balls cause great loss on our files, and I ordered General Don Anastasio Torrejon to execute it with the greater part of the cavalry, on our left flank, in order to give the charge at the same time with the infantry and the rest of the cavalry on the right flank.

"I was waiting the moment in which General Torrejon should commence the charge, and that the enemy should begin to feel its effect, in order to give the impulse on the right; but the effort was checked by a counter-movement of a portion of the enemy's force that defended a march, which prevented the attack.

"Some of our companies were impatient on account of the loss we had suffered, and they commenced to get out of order, asking that I should give the command to advance at once, or retreat. At such a moment I ordered a column of cavalry, under command of Colonel Don Cayetano Montero, to charge, with the view that the parties thrown out of order should resume their position, and in all possible manner march on the enemy, who, owing to the great distance at which they stood, had time to fall back on reserve, and night approaching fast, the battle ended, and we remained master of the field.

"After this result every measure necessary to the circumstance was taken, and our division encamped on a more concentrated ground in the same battle-field.

"The combat was a long and bloody one, which may be better explained by the calculation of the Commander-in-Chief of Artillery, General Don Thomas Requena, who assures me that the enemy fired over 3,000 cannon shot from 2 to 7 o'clock p.m. (at which hour the battle terminated), and our artillery fired only about 650 shot.

"Our arms were supported with honour to the nation, as we did not yield an inch of ground. Notwithstanding the superiority of the enemy's artillery, they suffered great loss.

"Our troops had the misfortune of losing 252 men in this battle, among dead, wounded, and dispersed. Those that lost their lives in defence of the most just and holy of causes are worthy of a national remembrance of gratitude for their bravery and valour.

"Your Excellency will oblige me by giving notice, with the foregoing account, to his Excellency the President; stating that I will take care to give a full and detailed dispatch of this battle, and at the same time recommend the valiant conduct of all the generals, chiefs, officers, and men that are under my charge; for they sustained the bloody combat in a manner which honours our nation, and shows the discipline and fine order of our troops.

"Please admit the assurances of my consideration, &c.
"God and liberty! General quarters at Palo Alto, opposite the enemy's camp. May 8, 1846, at 11 o'clock p.m.
Mariano Arista.
"To his Excellency the Minister of War and Marine."
We have at length received the Mexican accounts of the late collision with the American forces on the Rio Grande, and it is satisfactory to find that no attempt has been made to disguise from the people of Mexico the fact that they have sustained a severe defeat, and that their armies are wholly unable to carry on the war with any hope of success. The blockade of Tampico, Vera Cruz, and the other Atlantic ports, appears to have been conducted with due consideration to neutral interests by the American Commodore Conner, and to be supported by a sufficient force. That officer has under his command the Cumberland, Raritan, Potomac, John Adams, Somers, St. Mary’s, and the steam-ships Mississippi and Princeton. It remains, however, to be seen whether he will venture to attack St. Juan d’Ulloa, which is at all times an operation of great difficulty and danger, from the sudden northern gales which expose a squadron to destruction on the reefs that protect the fortifications to the seaward. St. Juan de’Ulloa, moreover, now mounts 200 guns in the castle, and 50 in the two forts and walls of the city commanding the anchorage. All these guns are new and of heavy caliber, with a number of 8-inch and 10-inch Paixhan guns. There are said to be 2,000 men in the fortress, and about the same number in the town. Under these circumstances we doubt whether the American Commodore will risk an attack on the strongest...
For the protection of British interests in the Gulf of Mexico the Endymion frigate and the Alarm have been ordered down from Bermuda. Commodore Pring will probably be able to increase the squadron from Jamaica, where he hoists his broad pennant of the Imam; and the Albion has been sent out, we believe, from this country. In the Pacific, the British and American squadrons were both at Mazatlan; but no news has yet arrived of any operations on the western coast.

We trust, however, that without any further effusion of blood, and without a prolongation of those risks which are inseparable from active hostilities, we may look forward to the termination of this deplorable strife. It cannot be doubted that the extreme repugnance of the Mexican Government to come to terms with the United States upon the subject of the boundary of Texas, and the pertinacity with which these delicate questions have been kept open until they have led to positive hostilities, are attributable in great part to a vague expectation that the differences between England and the United States would eventually secure to Mexico a powerful diversion, if not a powerful ally. The intelligence of the settlement of the Oregon question, and the happy removal of the last of those subjects of discussion which have for so many years endangered the amicable relations of the American and British Governments, will, therefore, probably produce as much effect upon the present heads of the Mexican republic as the new of another victory gained by the Yankee rifles in the banks of the Rio Grande. We sincerely trust that the influence of the pacific termination of our own controversy will be felt in the speedy restoration of peace between Mexico and the United States; and at this time the mediation of British agents has been offered with peculiar propriety, to complete between other states the triumph of that policy which has been so successfully maintained by our own Government. Throughout the Texan question, the ill-timed delays and ridiculous scruples of the Mexican Government have invariably led to a condition of things a step worse than that which had preceded it. From Santa Anna to Paredes not one of the Mexican rulers has been disposed either to make the best of the past or to provide for the future. They were for ever protesting against former injuries and calamities, whilst some greater misfortune was stealing upon them. They might, by recognizing the independence of Texas, on certain conditions, have created a barrier, for some considerable time at least, between themselves and their northern neighbors. They might, by adopting an enlightened system of commercial policy, instead of a bigoted adherence to the worst traditions of old Spain, have established relations of such magnitude and importance with the trading and maritime Powers of Europe, that the independence and prosperity of Mexico would have found defenders in every state on this side of the Atlantic. But they refused to recognize the independence of Texas until annexation had transferred the quarrel from a revolted province to an ambition nation; and they have persevered in the abuses of their infernal administration to such an extent, that the allegiance of those classes who have anything to lose or to gain has been not a little affected by the consideration of the increased value and security of property when it exists under the control and protection of a regular a enlightened Government. The landowners of Mexico, occupying a soil rich in the precious metals and adapted for every species of cultivation, are beggars. The church lands include one-sixth of the whole surface of the country; and the whole region is of far less value to its present possessors than it was to that ingenious and unfortunate people who were fated to fall beneath the sword of Cortes. However galling may be the superiority of the Anglo-American race to the degenerate descendants of the Spaniard and the native Mexican, and however monstrous the pretences under which acts of violent aggression or convert hostility have been masked, it is impossible to doubt that a people will fall a prey to any conqueror rather than rot on the vices of its own political and social condition until its cities are depopulated and its fields abandoned.

If, therefore, it be possible that the mediation of England should be exerted with any effect, not only to restore peace at this time between the United States and Mexico, but to remove the causes of future discord and the pretexfs of future aggression, it can only be by endeavouring to encourage the Mexican Government to undertake, with rather more vigour and intelligence than it has yet displayed, the task of governing the country. British interests, arising out of the provinces, are directly involved in these questions; and that security is perfectly illusory if we are not prepared to assert the claims which will at no distant period accrue under it.

We do not believe that the United States’ Government will be disposed to prolong so unequal a contest as that which recently begun on the Rio Grande, if Mexico can be brought to terms, which her interest and her political position command her to accept. For Mr. Polk’s purposes a little war is very preferable to a great one; and military glory on a grander scale, instead of casting éclat upon his own presidency, would render inconveniently prominent the claims and expectations of his successor. As it is, we are much mistaken if this Mexican war does not determine the next election for the supreme magistracy of the Unites States in favour of a military candidate; for in America, as well as elsewhere, the first impulse of a democracy is to throw itself at the feet of a successful soldier; and the names of General Taylor and General Scott are already celebrated in the most heroic strains. The prosecution of the war would at once impose great burdens on the federal Government, which is bound to provide the means of carrying it on, and it would place a formidable amount of power and popularity within the grasp of the officers in command of the army. Mr. Polk has therefore a double interest in terminating the contest by a speedy peace, if that can be obtained; and the sincere co-operation and influence of England will not, we are persuaded, be wanting to assist in effecting so desirable an object.

[JTW]
The Mexican ports on the Atlantic were blockaded by the American squadron, and an attack on the castle of San Juan de Ulloa was expected immediately.

The port of Mazatlan and city of Guadalaxara had both declared against the Government. The republic seemed to fast verging on anarchy.

Arista's army in the north was understood to have dispersed in great confusion.

About half the members of the new Congress had been got together. They elected General Bustamante President of the body.

Senor Gorostiza had retired from the Ministry of Finance, and was succeeded by Senor Iturbe, who had seized all the funds in the ports, including the English dividends.

The light is removed from the castle of San Juan de Ulloa, at Vera Cruz, during the blockade.

LT July 6, 1846: 6a Blockade of Vera Cruz

VERA CRUZ.

The blockade of this port commenced the same day (May 20) with that of Tampico; Commodore Connor having dispatched the squadron one day earlier than the corvette appointed to watch the latter port. The squadron consists of the Raritan frigate, the Mississippi first class steam ship, the Falmouth corvette and Somers brig. The notification of the blockade was only sent to the neutral vessels of war anchored at Sacrificios, and not to the Consuls, as at Tampico, a circumstance which naturally gave umbrage to those gentlemen. Commander Pelly, of the Rose, whose indefatigable zeal for British interests is beyond all praise, and deserves the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, succeeded in obtaining permission for the packets to land specie, and negotiated for permission also for other merchandise; but the question is left pending until the arrival of Commodore Connor, expected about the 10th or 11th of this month (June). Passengers, of course, are to be landed, but no Mexicans permitted from port to port within the republic.

The American squadron, when united, will, it is said, consist of two sail of the line, one from Boston, the other from New York; three frigates, including the one already here, and the other two are at Pensacola, with the commodore, and of the largest size; two first-class steam ships, the Mississippi and Princeton; one or two corvettes, some brigs, and smaller steam-vessels to tow the ships into position. The inhabitants are apprehensive of an attack upon Fort San Juan de Ulloa and the town; in consequence, most of the families are removing to the interior. On the 29th of May, 600 men of the line arrived from Jalapa, and the day following about 200 Dragoons accompanied the specie from Mexico, making a total amount of troops in the town and fort of San Juan de Ulloa of about 2,200 men; but I am sorry to add that the military hospitals are full, and I am afraid to mention the number they are said to contain. Accounts vary, but I was assured by one of the most respectable English residents that there were not less than 600; and of the late reinforcement eight died on the march the day previous to their arrival, a Dragoon fell from his horse in the streets, and others were obliged to be carried to the hospital; in fact, never was Vera Cruz in a more deplorable state that at the present moment; what with an unusual season of sickness and the stagnation of trade, added to the blockade, those whose circumstances oblige them to remain there are truly to be pitied.

So sudden have been the events brought on by the affair at Matamoras, that for the protection of the British interests, there is only the Rose sloop-of-war at Sacrificios; the French have the Mercurie brig and La Perouse bark-of-war; the Spaniards the Christina frigate and the Habanero brig; and the Luisa Fernandez, first class corvette, has left Havana, and is expected soon to increase their squadron. Expecting three French barks, almost all the vessels have quitted the anchorage, and the American commander, in a visit to Captain Pelly, of the Rose, expressed his anxiety that the packet should take an early departure; as, were she by any accident detained beyond the 4th of June, he could not be accountable for the consequences. The value in specie and cargo on board the Tay cannot be estimated at less than 3,000,000, dollars.

The Mexican war steam-vessels Montezuma and Guadaloupe have been disposed of to the firm of Manning and Mackintosh, and sent to the Havannah, in the hope of their being purchased by the Spanish Government. The remainder of their squadron, consisting of a few brigs-of-war and some small schooners, have taken shelter in the port of Alvarado, about 40 or 50 miles south of Vera Cruz.

The courier from Mexico, who did not leave until a day beyond the time specified for the sailing of the packet, brought the following news, from a source in which every confidence may be placed: - The new Minister of Finance (Iturbe) suspended all payments in the Custom-house, including the dividend fund, as a temporary measure, before making an arrangement with the different creditors, and a committee, consisting of Rondero, Echevarria, and Dursina, was named to offer proposals to Government. Upon this Iturbe, the Minister of Finance, resigned. It is supposed the new Minister will be Antonio Garay, and Mora Minister at War. Paredes, the President, was to set out to the north with 10,000 men, to endeavour to effect some arrangement with the Americans.
On the morning of the 20th of May, at daylight, a corvette was seen at anchor about two miles beyond the shipping lying off the bar of Tampico, but without a flag to distinguish her nation.

Shortly afterwards an officer, fully armed, came aboard the mail-packet Tay, and stated that he was sent by Commander Saunders, of the United States corvette St. Mary’s, to declare that port in a state of blockade; and having obtained information as to the different nations to which there were at the time the unusual number of vessels there as usual, he took his leave, and visited them all in succession. Communications were then sent to the different Consuls residing at Tampico informing them of the blockade, and that 15 days (until the 5th of June) would be allowed to the vessels now in port to dispose of their cargoes, or ship those already in transit. Upon receiving the official notification the Consuls went in a body to wait upon the commander of the corvette (the English Consul excepted, who was detained by sickness) to solicit a prolongation of the time specified previous to commencing a rigid blockade, but their request could not be acceded to. The French Consul remarked to the American commander, "that when they blockaded these ports they were more liberal to the English, as they permitted both the silver to embark and the quicksilver to disembark." "True," was the reply, "but we know the influence that of England has over this country, and we are in hopes that this prohibition may be a means of inducing her to use her endeavours to persuade these people to hear reason." The mail-packet Tay has every reason to speak highly of the politeness and civility experienced from the commander of the American corvette, especially in trusting to the honour of Captain Sharp, the commander, to embark and disembark whatever was not prohibited by the blockading instructions.

In reply to a communication from the Admiralty agent, the commander of the corvette informed him that no opposition would be experienced on the part of the British Government in landing and receiving the mails during the existing state of affairs, and so long as the packets abstained from all commercial transactions, all passengers (military of the Mexican Government expected) would be permitted to embark and disembark as usual.

The Mexicans are, and have been for some time, employed in placing the town and mouth of the river in a better state of defence. On an eminence which commands the north-east side of the town, and the approach to it by the river, they have replace a dilapidated mud battery by a good substantial stone-built fort, in which the guns are mounted and the Mexican flag is flying. There is also a circular brick seat at the lower end of the town, which terminates the evening promenade; this has been converted into a battery a fleur d'eau, to guard the approach by the river, in which they have place three long guns of about 12 English pounds caliber, raising the parapet with bags of earth, and surrounding the whole by a fosse. The bar is defended by three small schooners, carrying one long gun each, and placed across the entrance of the river; on shore, on the left hand side, are the remains of a battery, with a sandy foundation part of which has lately been swept away by the river changing its course, but on which remains are place two small field pieces pointing seaward and protected by a detachment of soldiers. Most of the troops have been drawn off to increase the army, and General Parode, the commandant of Tampico, cannot at present command more than sufficient men in the town to relieve the different guards. The Mexican regiment name "Tampico" is noted for behaving well upon all occasions, and particularly distinguished itself in the late affair of Matamoras; many of the men are reported to have returned their foyers, having quitted General Arista and the retreating army. The bar of Tampico has for some time past become almost impassable, excepting for vessels in ballast, having but a few feet of water in the channel; in consequence, a sloop belonging to Mr. Jolly, the agent to the Mail Company, took the ground with 500 flasks of quicksilver on board; but all was saved excepting one flask, which fell overboard by accident, and was instantly buried in the sand. On Sunday, the 24th of May, a boat belonging to the Marie, French bark, was upset in crossing the bar, and of five men on board, three remained with the boat, and were saved; the other two, who were good swimmers, endeavoured to gain the shore, but were drowned.

The Aztec Eagle has fallen. Mexico has tried her strength with the children of the Anglo-Saxon, and has been beaten. From the United States you will doubtless receive ere this can reach you full accounts of the defeat of General Arista by General Taylor near Matamoras on the 8th and 9th instant. It is therefore unnecessary for me to give any details of these actions, which, moreover, the Government here does all in their power to suppress.
Mounted on their diminutive, but spirited horses, the Mexicans fancied they could ride down the world, but when the light cavalry was brought to face the well-served artillery of the north, the riders discovered the chief advantage of their steeds to consist in the velocity with which they escaped from the scene of danger. The Mexican have been playing this event, and the Americans are quite in earnest; hence the result. As an Englishman, I might be inclined to regret this event, but as a foreign resident of Mexico it has not occasioned me any very poignant grief. The present is not merely a territorial dispute between Mexico and a neighboring nation, it is felt to be a contest between Mexican bigotry and the world; and therefore, without palliating the aggression which the northern republic has committed, little sympathy is felt by foreigners here with Mexico her distress. Without the patient industry of the Chinese, these people possess the same exclusiveness, and in boasting are quite equal, if not superior to the Celestials. The despondency occasioned by the late rout having subsided, they now talk of it as a mere check, during which the enemy received new proofs of the indomitable valour of the Mexican soldier!

Notwithstanding these important events no declaration of war has yet been made here, nor, as far as we know, by the United States; but war in all forms exists, and the Mexican ports on the Atlantic are now regularly blockaded by the American squadron. Neutral mail packets (not commercial) will be allowed to come and go without obstruction, and 15 days have been granted for neutral merchant vessels in port to leave, with or without cargo. It is understood that the packets will be allowed to carry specie as before, but not cochineal; and it is doubtful whether they will be allowed to introduce quicksilver. If the introduction of an article so necessary to the working of the mines should be prevented, it is thought this Government will retaliate by prohibiting the exportation of specie. During the French blockade of the Mexican ports no objection was made to the importation of quicksilver in the British packets.

After the battle of the 9th, General Taylor remained encamped on the left bank of the Bravo, but Arista's army falling into a state of complete disorganization, abandoned Matamoros, and the American General was requested by the Prefect to send some troops across the river for the protection of the inhabitants. General Taylor has complied with this singular request, which certainly goes far to vindicate Mr. Polk's policy towards Mexico. We now look with interest for news from the Pacific, where an immense field is open to American aquisitive.

At Vera Cruz an attack on the castle is expected immediately and the merchants have applied for permission to remove bonded merchandise, for safety, to Jalapa. The castle of San Juan de Ulloa, built on an island surrounded by reefs in front of Vera Cruz, and deemed impregnable by the Spaniards, was taken in a few hours by the French under Admiral Baudin; but it was then in a very dilapidated condition, and the French were allowed to anchor their ships and open their fire before the castle replied. It has since been repaired and strengthened, and some very large pieces of modern artillery are now mounted in the batteries, the first discharge from which may do some damage; but the Mexicans are deficient in artillerists, and, as they would be greatly exposed while loading these enormous guns, they are not likely to fire many rounds from them.

The position of General Paredes, difficult from the first, has become doubly so since the disaster at Matamoros, to which he was impelled by the restless vanity of the Minister at War, who (himself in perfect safety here) insisted on Arista's crossing the river Bravo. The port of Mazatlan and the city of Guadalaxara are both in open revolt, their garrisons having seconded the cry of "Federation and Santa Anna" raised by Alvarez in the South. A more incongruous union than this can scarcely be imagined, for Santa Anna, when in power, was the scourg of the Federalists, and all their efforts were directed to the destruction of the army, with which he has ever been identified. But such is the spirit of faction by which Mexico is torn; and he were indeed a gifted seer who should predict with certainty what party or what principles may be uppermosts here three months hence.

Since my last letter Gorostiza has retired from the Ministry of Finance, having held office exactly 20 days. He has been succeeded by a person untried in office, and whose history is not calculated to increase public confidence in the Government. Don Francisco Iturbe's relations with the Financial Department hitherto have been those of a speculator in its embarrassments, through which he has succeeded in amassing a considerable fortune. His first measure has been to lay hands on all the funds in the ports, not excepting the dividends on the English debt, or those due to British subjects in consequence of diplomatic arrangements with Her Majesty's Government. Another act of his, alike indefensible, merit a detailed explanation: - The tariff imposes a duty of 3 per cent. On gold an 6 per cent. On silver coin exported from the republic, which it was the custom to collect in the ports where the shipment must necessarily take place; but Santa Anna, with his accustomed rapacity, chose to assume (and his successors have continued the abuse) that all specie remitted from the interior to the coast was destined for exportation (though a part is notoriously and necessarily sent there for the payment to Government of import and other duties on foreign merchandise), and to exact the payment, at once, in the interior, of export duty on the whole amount, this proceeding being unsupported by any Mexican law. Of course, on the arrival of each remittance of specie from the interior at the ports, a part only being exported, the Government was bound to refund the excess of export duty unduly exacted; but, instead of doing so, they adopted the plan of giving certificates for the amount, admissible in payment of future export duties, and these documents accumulating in the hands of houses on the coast, have fallen to a considerable discount. Thus fat the immediate predecessors of Senor Iturbe have acted both unjustly and illegally, and the complaints of the British Merchants on this subject have, I believe, been made known in the proper quarter. But it was reserved for Senor Iturbe to leave all competitors in the career of injustice at an immeasurable distance, by refusing to receive the export certificates when an opportunity presented of tendering them in payment of export duty paper, most of them British subjects, must be most serious.

By extraordinary efforts of Government, 81 members of the new Congress were collected yesterday, the minimum number fixed by the convocation. They commenced business by electing as president of the body
General Don Anastasio Bustamente, and this being quite work enough for one day, the deceased prelate, was an indulgent father of the church, and, if he has gone to his account with few claims to canonization, he has at least left no enemies behind him.

LT July 10, 1846: 5e Mr. Wyld's map of Mexico

MAP OF MEXICO, &C.- Mr. Wyld, of Charing-cross, a most indefatigable illustrator of the geography of all parts of the globe, has just published a new map of Mexico, the British possessions in North America and the United States. The map is of large dimensions, but folds up and becomes portable as a thin octavo volume; it describes with great accuracy, distinguishing the different and respective territories by different colours, a portion of the globe from below the 7th degree of south latitude to the 49th parallel of north, and from the 45th meridian of west longitude to the 140th. The whole of the country included in the immense extent are accurately laid down, the names of towns, rivers, lakes, &c. were engraved, and the various places marked with careful attention to modern improvements in map-making. The boundary lines are shown, and the relative positions of the territory of the three countries. This map is valuable as an illustrative picture of the Oregon and the Mexican questions, and claims to be, and should be, studied by all who wish to know the respective countries. It is remarkably well engraved, showing that this branch of science keeps pace with the increasing speed at which other sciences and other arts progress.

LT July 10, 1846: 6b US, Mexican war, damage to US merchandise

AMERICA AND MEXICO.
TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,-Perceiving from your journal of yesterday, and other newspapers of the day, that there exists generally a strong impression that the war between America and Mexico will be short duration, it affords me, as a lover of peace, sincere gratification to add another and important corroboration of your views, in calling to your notice the fact that the American merchant ships, in consequence of the present state of things, are lying in port idle; no one will freight them on account of the war risk, and as the American mercantile navy may be called the general conveyance company of at least one half of the globe, it is very evident that all American shipowners must most sincerely wish for peace, and will doubtless force upon the American Executive the necessity for a speedy termination of hostilities.

The honour of ratifying the recent treaty for the settlement of the Oregon boundaries now devolves upon the Minister who denounced in no measured terms the last “capitulation” entered into with the United States; and we have no doubt that Lord Palmerston and the new Administration will at once subscribe to the terms which the American Government has acceded to upon the proposal made by Lord Aberdeen. It is needless to inquire what reception this treaty might have met with from the more active members of the late Opposition at a less fortunate moment, or with what degree of candour Lord Ashburton’s treaty was stigmatized as a disgrace to the late Government, whilst the present convention is accepted with the strongest marks of satisfaction by its successors; for we cannot regard the arrangement by which this dispute has been terminated as more favourable to the rights of the British Crown than the terms upon which the north-eastern boundary question was settled in 1842. But it is fortunate for the true credit of English statesmen and the most solid interests of this country and of the United States, that no factious spirit or lust of political contention can interfere in this instance to impugn the wisdom and propriety of a compromise so necessary to the general peace of the world. The treaty signed by Mr. Pakenham, and brought over by General Armstrong, after it had received the ratification of three-fourths of the Senate of the United States, arrives under circumstances which originates in party motives. Each party in the State, and each of the leading statesmen who have been or now are engaged in the conduct of our affairs, has an equal interest in securing the fruits of this pacific termination of an awkward and threatening question; and although Lord Aberdeen has bequeathed to Lord Palmerston on many points the benefits of that temperate and dignified system of foreign policy which has been followed by this Government for the last five years, yet there is no part of this reversion more deservedly prized by the successors of the late Cabinet than the amicable arrangement of our controversy with the United States. That one fact makes an incalculable difference in the prospects of Lord John Russell and his colleagues. The nation looks forward with far greater confidence to the long continuance of peace; and the Oregon question, which has never excited a strong interest in this country, except for it might have had on our relations with America, will soon be as much forgotten by the public as Mr. Pitt’s quarrel with Spain in 1790 for the possession of Nootka Sound. Since it became evident that no party warfare would distort or exaggerate merits of the question, the Oregon territory sank in public estimation to the slender importance which really belongs to so remote and uninviting a portion of the globe, and there has been very little disposition to contend for the full amount of abstract right, which we
TO THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES. In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 3d. inst., I

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

The following Message has been sent to the Senate of the United States by the President, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of June 3, 1846, calling for information relative to the mode of raising funds for carrying on the war with Mexico:---

"TO THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES. In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 3d. inst., I communicate herewith estimates prepared by the War and Navy Departments, of the probable expenses of conducting the existing war with Mexico during the remainder of the present and the whole of the next fiscal year. I communicate, also, a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, based upon these estimates, containing recommendations of measures for raising the additional means required. It is probable that the actual expenses incurred during the period specified may fall considerably below the estimates submitted, which are for a larger number of troops than have yet been called to the field. As a precautionary measure, however, against any possible deficiency, the estimates have been made at the largest amount which any state of the service may require.

"It will be perceived, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that a considerable portion of the additional amount required may be raised by a modification of the rates of duty imposed by the existing tariff laws. The high duties at present levied on many articles totally exclude them from importation, whilst the quantity and amount of others which are imported are greatly diminished. By reducing these duties to a revenue standard, it is not doubted that a large amount of the articles on which they are imposed would be imported, and corresponding amount of revenue be received at the Treasury from this source. By imposing revenue duties on many articles on which they are imposed would be imported, and a corresponding amount of revenue be received at the Treasury from this source. By imposing revenue duties on many articles now permitted to be imported free of duty, and by regulating the rates within the revenue standard upon others, a large additional revenue will be collected. Independently of the high considerations which induced me, in my annual message, to recommend a modification and reduction of the rates of duty imposed by the act of 1842 as being not only proper in reference to a state of peace, but just to all the great interests of the country, the necessity of such modification and reduction as a war measure must now be manifest. The country requires additional revenue for the prosecution of the war. It may be obtained to a great extent by reducing the prohibitory and highly protective duties imposed by the existing laws to revenue rates, by imposing revenue duties on the free list, and by modifying the rates of duty on other articles.

"The modifications recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report in December last were adapted to a state of peace; and the additional duties now suggested by him are with a view strictly to raise revenue as a war measure. At the conclusion of the war these duties may and should be abolished, and reduced to lower rates.

"It is not apprehended that the existing war with Mexico will materially affect our trade and commerce with the rest of the world. On the contrary, the reductions proposed would increase that trade, and augment the revenue derived from it.

"When the country is in a state of war no contingency should be permitted to occur in which there would be a deficiency in the Treasury for the vigorous prosecution of the war; and to guard against such an event it is recommended that contingent authority be given to issue Treasury notes, or to contract a loan for a limited amount, reimbursable at an early day. Should no occasion arise to exercise the power, still it may be important that the authority should exist, should there be a necessity for it.

"It is not deemed necessary to resort to direct taxes or excises--the measures recommended being deemed preferable as a means of increasing the revenue. It is hoped that the war with Mexico, if vigorously prosecuted, as is contemplated, may be of short duration. I shall be at all times ready to conclude an honourable peace, whenever the Mexican Government shall manifest a like disposition. The existing war has been rendered necessary by the acts of Mexico; and whenever that Power shall be ready to do us justice, we shall be prepared to sheathe the sword, and tender to her the olive branch of peace."

"JAMES K. POLK. Washington, June 16"

LT 7/15/1846 4F US MEXICAN WAR

The last arrival from the United States brings us intelligence from New York down to the 30th of last month, and from the theatre of war on the Rio Grande down to the 3d ult. The armistice which had been proposed by the Mexican commander and rejected by General Taylor has, in fact, been imposed upon both armies by the circumstances in which they are respectively placed; for, as we had anticipated, the American forces were by no means in a condition to take advantage of their late successes by a rapid march into the interior of Mexico, and the Mexicans, in the other hand, had neither political authority nor military power to expel the invading army from their territory. The consequence has been that both the belligerents have remained in a state of inaction; and both are looking for reinforcements to sustain the war. These reinforcements will, it is needless to add, only increase the disproportion between the forces brought into the field by the two States; and it is not easy to account for the infatuation or the patriotic ardour which induces Paredes, who appeared to have just secured his own political position in the commonwealth, to risk everything by taking the actual command of an army which has so few chances of victory on its side.

If the accounts which reach us through the American papers are to be believed, the effect of the war has been far more disastrous to the political condition of Mexico than had been anticipated. The approach of an insolent and aggressive enemy, distinguished from the people of Mexico by all the characteristics of religion, of manners, and of blood, might reasonably have been expected to call forth the latent energy of the nation, and incite them to a vigorous and united effort in defence of their national existence. At one time it was believed that war with the United States would be popular in Mexico, and that, in spite of the danger from without, the internal government of the republic would be rather strengthened than weakened by it. These hopes were entirely fallacious. Several of the provinces of Mexico have already shown a disposition to avail themselves of this opportunity to throw off the Federal tie, and to assert a precarious independence. Some of the most influential classes of society appear to indicate their acquiescence in a species of conquest which they begin to think inevitable, and which may at least secure to them the rights of property more effectually than their present worthless and unstable Government. Yucatan has already declared her independence, and the United States have immediately acknowledged it by exempting the coast of that province, and the flag it has assumed, from the operation of the blockade; and opinions favourable to the advance of the Americans are said to be entertained in many parts of the northern provinces of the republic.

This state of things may, however, be changed to a considerable extent, as far as regards the internal dispositions of Mexico, by the restoration of Santa Anna to power—an event which we must now suppose to be by no means improbable.

It is easy to perceive that the operations of a protracted, unhealthy, expensive, and inglorious war will not long gratify the American democracy, or be popular in the United States. At no distant period the Cabinet of Washington will be as eager to make peace in the midst of its anticipated triumphs as the Cabinet of Mexico under the pressure of defeat; for, if the war be carried on by the United States with superior forces and superior success, it is at the same time far more onerous to the American population than to the ill-paid and irregular forces of the enemy. We may hope, therefore, that both parties will seize the first decent pretext for putting an end to this wanton and absurd quarrel.

ARRIVAL OF THE CALEDONIA

(the following appeared in a second edition of the Times of yesterday:--)

Liverpool, Tuesday Morning

The British and North American Royal Mail Steam-ship Caledonia, Captain Lott, arrived in the Mersey from Boston and Halifax shortly before midnight, bringing a large number of passengers and the usual mails of the 1st instant from Canada and the United States.

Our accounts from New York by this arrival extend to the 30th ultimo, inclusive. The contents are of great interest.

From the "Army of Invasion" we learn that Canales with a few men had surrendered Regnosa without resistance to the expedition under Colonel Wilson. Camargo, where General Taylor desired to establish a large military depot, had also capitulated in advance. The army, which according to official accounts amounted on the 3d ult. to nearly 8,000 men, was in good health, the main body being encamped on the right bank of the river Deshas. No authentic intelligence relative to the numbers and position of the Mexican forces in the vicinity had been received. A despatch from General Taylor, dated Matamoras, June 3, however, says--"Our last accounts of Arista represent his force to be halted at Coma, an extensive "hacienda" on the Monterey road, about 100 miles from this point. He has pickets covering the roads leading to Matamoros, with a view to cut off all communication with the interior. The departmental authorities have issued a decree denouncing as traitors all who hold intercourse with us, or with those who do so. I am, nevertheless, disposed to believe that in some quarters at least our presence is not unfavourably received." Ampudia is said to have left for the capital. The death of General Torresom is noted.

Important advices had been received from New Mexico. Armigo had been superseded as Governor of Sante Fe by General Urrea, who was taking the most vigorous measures to defend the place, as well as for offensive operations; 2,00 men were under arms; a requisition for 5,000 men had been made upon Chihuahua; a draught of every third man in Sante Fe had been ordered, and fortifications and military preparations of every kind were going on. The Indians were reported to be unfavourable to the Americans, and the Mexicans relied much on their aid. General Urrea had despatched 300 troops to march to Bent's Fort, and to meet Spier's company on the prieries and conduct it into Sante Fe. This company was said to have taken a quantity of arms and ammunition to Sante Fe, and Colonel Kearney had sent a party of Dragoons in pursuit of it. A large portion of the American expedition under Colonel Kearney had already started on its course.

The American journals very generally call for a speedy termination of the war. Some few advocate the policy of despatching an embassy to Mexico, to endeavour at once to restore peace. Public opinion appeared to have settled upon the possession of California in compensation. In some quarters hopes were entertained that the Northern States of Mexico would throw off the central yoke, and erect an independent republic, to be annexed in time to the American Union. According to the Philadelphia north American, indeed, a proposition has already been made at Washington in behalf of a number of the leading inhabitants of the states of Tamaulipas, Chihuahua, and Zacatecas, entreating a cessation of hostilities on the part of the United States, on the ground that being equally aggrieved by the Supreme Government of Mexico, the American Government should be the friends and allies rather than the devastators of the country north of the Tropic. All the educated classes (including many of the priests) are said to be in favour of coming under the government of the United States as a provisional territory.

The proceeding of Congress in the interim since the despatch of our last accounts had been of little importance. Another unsuccessful attempt had been made in the Senate to determine the adjournment of Congress; Messrs. Benton and Julee opposing the motion, on the ground that the period was about to arrive when Congress should legislate for the cities of the Union beyond the Rocky Mountains. The discussion upon the Tariff question continued to progress tamely in the Lower House.

It is stated that Mr. M'Kay had determined to strike at the section imposing duties upon tea and coffee, in consequence of the strong opposition offered to that section of the bill. The Warehousing Hill appeared to be received with general favour. Several military nominations had been made by the President--General Taylor to be Major-General of the Army; Colonels Twiggs and Kearney to be Brigadiers-General; and Colonel Butler to be Major-General of the volunteer forces. Rumours relative to changes in the Cabinet still continued to afloat; and it is said that letters were addressed to Mr. M'Lane by the Great Western re-inviting him to become Secretary of State; other rumours point to Mr. Calhoun. The Washington correspondent of a well-informed journal, the Baltimore Patriot, also states, that Mr. Buchanan's nomination to the Supreme bench had been communicated to the Senate by the President. Mr. King also, it is said, returns from the Parisian Embassy. Mr. Webster's speech of the 24th, upon the revenue question, and relative to the duty of the State to proffer terms of amity to Mexico, while pursuing the war with all due vigour, had produced a considerable sensation.

The organization of a corps of snappers, miners, and pontoniers, had been commenced.

Rumours of the appearance of privateers in the Atlantic, under the Mexican flag, similar to those received via Jamaica, were current.

The President is said to have ordered General Gaines to be tried by Court-martial.

The Mormons were still threatened with hostilities. Their enemies had collected in force, threatening to burn the temple at Nauvoo, and to expel the sect from Illinois. The State forces sided with the mob. The new German inhabitants of Nauvoo had organized a force 600 strong to resist the anti-Mormons.

Exchange on London is quoted to 1073/4 to 108.

Our advices from Canada by this mail are unimportant, and do not supply any further information relative to the melancholy catastrophe of the Theatre Royal, Quebec. The Canadian papers seem to be at fault as to the breaking up of the Ministry. Mr. Sherwood has resigned, Mr. Papineau goes out, and Sir Allan M'Nab is to be Adjutant-General. The bark Maria, from London, with 275 men, detachments for several of the regiments serving in Canada, had arrived at Quebec on the 20th ult., and on the following day, the bark Horatio, also arrived from Cork with nine officers and 154 men, detachments for the 46th, 52d, 60th, and 89th regiments.

Advices from Vera Cruz to the 4th of June, received via Pensacola, state that the blockading squadron were enjoying good health. The steam-frigate Princeton had arrived on the 1st. No further intelligence had reached the fleet from the interior. There appeared little doubt, however, but that Paredes designed to take the command of the army operating against General Taylor.

Intelligence had been received at Philadelphia from Tampico to the 18th ult. Official despatches had arrived at Tampico, announcing that General Arista had been removed from the command of the northern division of the army, and that General Mesia had superseded him. These advices further state that Paredes was to leave the city of Mexico for the Rio Grande, at the head of the army of reserve, on the 6th of June. Meanwhile the appearances of an approaching revolution were becoming more and more perceptible. Mazatlan had revolted on the 6th ult. Against the existing Administration, and had issued a pronunciamento in favour of Santa Anna. In Tampico the authorities formed two parties--one headed by General Parrodi, supported by the military, favouring Santa Anna and federalism, the other party supporting the federative principle simply.

The three-gun boats lately built in New York for the Mexican service were lying in the river, above Tampico.

Accounts had been received from Campeachy announcing that the Legislature of Yucatan had formally declared the independence of the department, and its disseverance from the Mexican republic. It was intended to appoint Senor Barbexeno the Acting President to the new state. It is hinted that in time the alliance of the United States will be sought. In consequence of the declaration of independence several Yucatan vessels had cleared for New Orleans and other ports of the American States. The United States brig Somers was at Campeachy on the 4th ult. [PTh]
THE STANDING ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES--In many parts of Europe, and particularly in England, the most erroneous ideas prevail in relation to the military strength of this country. An opinion is prevalent that our standing army being so small, for the first two or three years of a war with any powerful nation, we should suffer defeat after defeat; and that consequently it would be madness for us to engage in war, at least with any standing army being so small, for the first two or three years of a war with any powerful nation, we should suffer defeat after defeat; and that consequently it would be madness for us to engage in war, at least with any strong European power. The events of the last two months have shown conclusively that this opinion is, in fact, founded in ignorance of our real strength and resources, and that the first speck of war on our horizon is sufficient to call forth into full play all the latent energies of the American people. This erroneous impression arises from the fact that our standing army does not amount to over 8,000 men. The people of Europe are not aware that this force forms but the nucleus of an army of citizen soldiers, that could be numbered by the million; and how much soever we may regret the occasion of the Mexican war, yet it may be considered as not
When the requisition for troops was first made upon the Governor of Louisiana, it was imagined that it would be necessary to resort to a draught to procure the required number. At that time the people of Louisiana did not believe in the existence of war with the Mexicans. They had such a contemptuous opinion of their army, that they thought the handful of men in General Taylor’s camp amply sufficient to maintain the occupation of the Rio Grande, as they had no expectation that the Mexicans would attempt offensive measures. But no sooner was it known that it was no sham war, and that they would have an opportunity of meeting the enemy, than thousands volunteered their services, not only in Louisiana, but all over the country. The number required by the President from the several States is 50,000, and more than double that number, according to the best calculation, have already volunteered. In Louisiana nearly a thousand mounted gunmen, who had volunteered, have been disbanded, as there is no need of their services. The state has already sent six regiments to the seat of war, and those two regiments were mustered in two weeks. In Alabama several companies more than were necessary volunteered their services, and the order to remain at home caused a great deal of disappointment among them. That state will probably have sent between 2,000 and 3,000 men to the seat of war. In Mississippi more volunteer companies have been raised than can be mustered into service. It will probably send 2,000 men to the field. In Indiana double as many men have volunteered as were required to fill up the quota demanded of the state. In one division of the state 13 companies tendered their services when only three were wanted, and the choice had to be made by ballot; those who were so fortunate as to be chosen receiving the announcement with shouts of joy. In Kentucky the two regiments required by the Government, were filled up by the 26th of May, and the governor was obliged to issue his proclamation to put a stop to the volunteering. The greatest disappointment prevails among those who were not mustered into service. 10,000 men could have been mustered in Kentucky in a few days, if necessary, of troops that are not surpassed by any in the world. In Missouri the complement called for was in progress of formation, the only difficulty being to choose from the numbers offering themselves. One thousand mounted men were required for a descent on Sante Fe, and by the last accounts there was more than half that number mustered. This is the spirit that prevails over the entire Western country. Several members of Congress have left the seat of Government and started for the West, to enroll men and proceed to Mexico. Ohio, the greatest abolition state in the Union, was the first to fill up the complement called for by the President, and the same spirit prevails among the New England States, that were most violently to the annexation of Texas. New York and all the Atlantic States are pouring out thousands and tens of Thousands, and there are many companies that will not be restrained from going to the scene of action, whether their services are accepted by Government or not. The volunteers are fitted to make excellent soldiers. They are well drilled and disciplined, and they have, withal, a national and state pride that will make them as efficient troops as any in the world. When men in flourishing business, upon the first indication that their services are needed by their country, sell out their stock, equip themselves for a campaign, and enlist as common soldiers, as has happened in many instances, they must by actuated by some motives stronger than the desire to appear in regimentals. Such men, fighting for their country, are worth hundreds of mercenary troops. The citizens of foreign birth have not been at all inferior in ardour and patriotism to the natives of the soil. In Ohio there is an entire regiment of Germans, numbering 900 men, and in every State in the Union the Irish and German companies are among the first to offer their services. There is no doubt as to the efficiency of these foreign companies. Their national pride, as well as their devotion to their adopted country, will make them signalize themselves in the field, and indeed they have always done so. From present appearances, if the muster were to continue, we could, in six months, bring into the field an available force of 750,000 men, and of such troops, as for valour, discipline, and endurance, will compare with any in the world. This is an army greater than ever Eastern monarchs brought into the field, and one that could withstand the combined armies of all Europe. This force could be increased from time to time to any extent. Such an army actuated by feelings of patriotism and glory, and withal brave and intelligent, would be such a sight as the world has never seen. But we trust the occasion that would call together such a force is far distant. The best policy of every country is peace, and we hope that the harmonious relations that now exist between this country and all the nations of Europe will long remain undisturbed. Indeed, there is every indication at present of a lasting peace; but we deem it, nevertheless, well to show what the United States are capable of, should any occasion arise to call forth the latent energies of the nation. Our present brush with Mexico is a slight indication of what those energies are when called into play.--New York Herald.

[PTH]
One or two vessels, we learn, are about being sent to the same destination, freighted with stores, small arms, and ammunition, together with a very large number of heavy pieces of ordnance, more than half of which are 60 and 120 pound Paixhans guns.

It is stated that the United States' ship of the line Pennsylvania, 120 guns, and the North Carolina and Ohio, rated as 74's, but each carrying 100 guns, are ordered to be fitted immediately for sea; but what is to be their destination is as yet a secret of the Administration.

True it is, there never has been so much activity in our several navy yards as at this moment, where there are between 3,000 and 4,000 mechanics and labourers most actively engaged in putting things to rights. These movements, we had supposed, would cease after the settlement of the Oregon question; but the same secret energy and activity continues now that existed for some time previous to the profitable arrangement with us of that question. Mr. Benton asserted that the 49th parallel was the fighting line for us, and on that line the Government evidently intended to "drive stakes;" but what the move now is more than has been allowed to see the light. Something is evidently in the wind. The probability is, if we mistake not, that the President will make good his assertion in his annual message, that "no European Power would be permitted to interfere with the political affairs of this continent."

General Taylor is probably at this moment at the head of an army of 12,000 men, on his way to Monterey. Instead of opposition, the gates of Mexican towns are flung open for the reception of his forces. The enemy may concentrate and give him battle at Monterey, though the General himself thinks there will be no decided engagement until he reaches the city of Mexico.

Colonel Kearney is pushing on his western forces for Santa Fe, which is being strongly fortified by the Mexicans. The force concentrating there will number probably 8,000 or 10,000, under the command of General Wool, who, after overrunning New Mexico, will join his forces with those under General Taylor, and march for the Capital. Nothing can save the existence of the republic of Mexico but early proffers of peace, made in good faith.

Yucatan, one of the best states of the Republic, has declared herself independent, and is anxious to blend her stars with those of the "republic of the north." The voice of her people must decide. From all appearances this war cannot long continue. The well-timed and energetic action of the Administration, and the sagacity and bravery of General Taylor and his brave little army, have evidently carried dismay into the enemy's country, and we may say that Mexico is, in fact, at this moment in possession of the United States.

Where we would ask, is M. Guizot's balance of power? [PTH] in the Republic is to retrieve in person the honours lost at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma. He was to leave the capital on the 6th inst., at the head of 3,000 troops, but orders had been issued that large bodies should join him at the different points on the line of march, so that his entire force, including Arista's command, should not fall short of 16,000 men.

Although we have now received intelligence by way of Havannah and Tampico, and by the Falmouth, that Paredes would certainly take the command of the army in person, yet there was an impression prevalent among men of sagacity in Vera Cruz, when the Falmouth left, that he would not and could not venture to leave the city of Mexico during the session of congress. It is said that nearly one half of the country is in open revolt. The news received here a fortnight since of the revolt at Mazatlan is confirmed, and, as we then anticipated, Sonora is now in state of rebellion against the Central Government.

So ripe for revolution is the department of Vera Cruz, that upon the departure of the Falmouth it was said there were 1,500 men outside the city of Vera Cruz ready to attack it at any moment, upon the signal being given. Some of the guns had actually been removed from the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa, and placed around the city for its defence, and troops had been withdrawn from the castle for the same purpose.

The intelligence received from Tampico on Sunday shows how that city was rent by internal dissensions, and in considering the deplorable state of the country in every quarter and under every aspect, it would by no means surprise us were Paredes compelled to forego his cherished purpose of placing himself at the head of the Mexican Army. But suppose he carries his resolution into effect, what better fate awaits him at the hands of General Taylor and our troops? Truly his chances from every point of view appear desperate.

To illustrate the treachery of General Alvarez towards Paredes, the story is circulated at Vera Cruz that the former, who had the command of the forces at Mazatlan, was supplied with 1,500,000 dollars with which to act against the America squadron in the Pacific. No sooner had Alvarez obtained the funds than he pronounced against Paredes, kept all the money, and even sold the cannon in the forts.

The British brig Reliance, Captain Doane, arrived at this port yesterday from Tampico, having sailed on the 5th inst. The Reliance was chartered at Liverpool to proceed to Tampico, and thence to Tobasco, to take in a cargo of cork. She was prevented from performing her voyage by the blocking squadron, and left Tampico on the 5th inst. in company with several vessels previously reported at Tampico, the time allowed by the terms of the blockade for loading and departing having expired.

We received yesterday a copy of EL Locomotor, of Vera Cruz, of the 8th inst., which is four days later than any advices received by the Falmouth. The news is important.

A revolution had broken out in the department of Jalisco. It commenced on the morning of the 20th of May in the city of Guadalaxara. The battalion of Logos, followed by other bodies of military and by the enthusiastic populace, attacked the palace of the Governor.

The assault of the insurgents was so prompt, that the guard had only time to make one discharge, by which one man was killed and one wounded.

Some of the defenders recognized friends among the assailants, and refused to fire. The disaffection then became general, and some of the leaders of the Government troops were arrested to save them from the fury of the insurgents. Some skirmishing ensued, and preparations were making for a general engagemens, when General Dugue, who had taken command of the government troops, proposed a parley. This was agreed to, and the result of the deliberation was that the troops under General Dugue should be allowed to retire with the honours of war, by a route designed by them, directly to the city of Mexico. Provisions were given them, and they were allowed till the 22d to prepare for their departure.

Don Jose Maria Yanez was at the head of the insurrection. A formal declaration was drawn up by the insurgents, proclaiming Santa Anna their Chief, and declaring that a new Congress should be summoned to be elected by the people, according to the electoral laws of 1824, to form a new Constitution, in which the monarchical principle is to be excluded.

It also provides that the Congress should meet four months after the liberating army shall gain possession of the capital. Don Juan Camplido is recognized as Provisional Governor of the Department, and his oath includes the repulsing of the infamous usurpation of the Americans.

LT 7/31/1846 3C MEXICAN SOLDIERS, VOLUNTEERS

VOLUNTEERS FOR MEXICO--The volunteers in Mexico find army work no sport. One of them writing from Point Isabel, says:--"from Berita we were marched about 18 miles from 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning till 4 or 5 in the evening, under the hottest sun I ever felt. One of our men, Dreyfous, was sun struck, several left the ranks, and when at evening we halted we found only half of our company with the captain and lieutenants, and not one non-commissioned officer. Our men rested once more on the banks of the Rio Grande, and the next day we started for Matamoras, where we saw the American flag waving. We have crossed the river, and are now encamped near the garden of some rich Mexican, whose house has been destroyed by our artillery. The climate is very hot, but as yet healthy. In the garden grow thousands of pomegranates, and oranges, and lemons, &c. Marching through the Chaparral, we saw geraniums growing wild, an infinite variety of cactus in full bloom. The pepper cayenne grows wild in this luxuriant land. Lest I should seem only to see the favourable side of the picture, I must inform you that this country has a greater number and greater variety of insects, of all kinds, than I ever saw in all my life before,--ants, lizards, worms, and black spiders, said to be as poisonous as the rattle-snake. I killed one in my tent last night. But worst of all are the flies that swarm about us. For the first time in my life I have seen fresh meat fly blown in a few minutes. Our chaplain's horse was galled on his side yesterday morning; the poor creature was on the injured side a mass of maggots. A man of the camp went a hunting; he returned almost crazy, he was fly blown in the ear. Another soldier has suffered in the same way. Woollen blankets are fly blown. The wild horses in this part of the country always die when attacked by the flies.-- Lexington True American. [PTH]

The Royal mail steam-packet Clyde, William Symons commander, arrived at Southampton yesterday at 3 p.m., bringing 80 passengers, and mails of the following dates:--

From Tampico, June 21 and 29; San Juan Nicaragua, June 23; Chagres, June 25: Carthagena, June 29; Santa Martha, June 30; St. Jago de Cuba, July 5; Jamaica, July 9; Honduras, June 22; Jacmel, July 11; Martinique, Huly 12; Dominique, 12; Guadalupe, July 12; Antigua, July 13; Montserrat, July 13; Nevis, July 13; St. Kitt's, July 13; Tortola, July 14; St. Thomas's, July 16; and Bermuda, July 21.

She also brings on freight 349,106 dollars on merchants' account, 3,656 ounces gold dust, 175l. British coin, 221lb. Platina, 11,159 ounces silver, 2 serons cochineal, 102 bales tobacco, 53 bales sarsaparilla, 51 cases cigars, 76 packages sundries, 2,386 plata bruta.

By the most recent accounts of the Royal Mail Company's steamers--

The Avon arrived at Bermuda July 20.
The Dee left Havannah for Vera Cruz July 10.
The Medway arrived at Grenada from England July 10.
The Severn left Granada for Jamaica July 10.
The Teviot arrived at Jamaica July 9.
The Eagle left Barbadoes for Demerara July 9.
The Reindeer arrived at St. Thomas July 15.
The Clyde left at Vera Cruz on the 2d of July--

Her Majesty's frigate Endymion, 44, Captain G. R. Lambert; Her Majesty's sloop Rose, 18, Commander R.W. Pelly; Her Majesty's steam sloop Vesuvius, 8, Commander W.V. O'Callaghan.

Her Majesty's surveying ship Thunder sailed from Nassau for Bermuda July 14.

The schooner Lark had arrived at Nassau.

There were also at Vera Cruz--the United States frigates Cumberland, 60, Commodore Conner; Raritan, 54; Potomac, 54; corvette John Adams, 22; brig Somers, 16; steamers Mississippi, 8; Princeton, 7. French corvette La Perouse, 22; brig Mercure, 18. Spanish frigate Christina, corvette Louisa Fernanda, brig Habanero.

The corvette St. Marys, 22, off Tampico.

The brig Falmouth, 18, off Alvarado.

The brig Cuxton, 16, arrived at Havannah July 5, and sailed on the 9th in quest of Mexican privateers reported to be cruising off Cape Antonio.

At the time of the Clyde's leaving, the Fort St. Juan de Ulloa was well supplied with men, and the two forts adjoining were defended by 1,000 men. It was thought that if the Mexicans stood to their guns the present American force would produce no effect.

In addition to our usual Mexican correspondence, the following interesting news has reached us from another source:--
"The Mexican Congress was installed on the 6th of June. General Paredes was elected President, and General Bravo Vice President of the Republic, and powers were delegated to the President to effect an arrangement of the public debt, and to raise money to meet the pressing wants of the country; but the financial condition of Mexico was most lamentable—the ports blockaded, the revenues anticipated, the payment of the dividends suspended, the salaries of all public officers reduced one-fourth, and the Government compelled to adopt ruinous loans to meet the exigencies of the day; added to which, a great portion of Southern Mexico was in open revolt against the Government, which had been forced to despatch the troops destined for the frontiers to the disturbed districts.

"The Californias had declared their independence of Mexico, and orders, transmitted by the American Government to their senior officer off Vera Cruz, had been forwarded through Mexico to Commodore Smith, in command of the American squadron in the Pacific, to seize on every Mexican port that coast.

"The states of Durango and Chihuahua were about to form an independent republic, under the title of the Republic of the Rio Grande, to be protected by America. General Arista, who had been deprived of his command and ordered to repair to Mexico to account for the loss of the battle of Matamoras, but who had declined to obey the summons, was to be President.

"General Taylor had occupied the villages on the right bank of the Rio Grande, and was about to march on Saltillo, where he intended to wait instructions from his Government, preparatory to marching on Mexico.

"Vera Cruz was declared in a state of siege, and martial law proclaimed on the 30th of June, as it was reported that the American squadron would attack the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa on the 10th of July. The greater portion of the British, foreign, and Mexican residents had consequently left the city for the interior.

"The Clyde was permitted to enter the port of Vera Cruz, land quicksilver, and embark specie, under terms of an arrangement entered into by Captain Pelly, of Her Majesty's sloop Rose, and the senior officer of the blockading squadron. Captain Pelly deserves great credit for securing such exclusive privileges for the Royal Mail steamers. His services have been highly appreciated by the British Minister and merchants resident in Mexico. Contrary to the established rules of blockade, the captain of the United States corvette St. Mary, stationed off Tampico, refused to admit the arrangement of his senior officer, and prohibited the landing from the Clyde of 1,080 bottles of quicksilver, destined for that place. They were subsequently landed at Vera Cruz, and confirmed his senior officer's arrangements, extending the privilege of landing quicksilver and shipping specie to both ports.

"Her Majesty's steamer Vesuvius had gone with despatches to Tampico to bring away all money the property of British subjects. Ninety thousand dollars were shipped, and afterwards transferred to the Clyde at Vera Cruz.

"General Santa Anna remained at Havannah. His friends were active in exciting disunion amongst the Mexican troops, on the plea that he alone could save the country at this critical juncture; it was very generally believed that a portion of the soldiers would pronounce in favour of his recall."

The Clyde spoke the Prince Albert on the 11th of July, off Havannah, bound to Havannah; the Feliza, on the 1st of August, in lat. 46degrees 20', same day.

By this arrival we have our usual files of West Indian papers, containing, however, very little news. The Trinidad Standard speaks highly of the new Governor, Lord Harris. He had become the patron of the Trinidad Agricultural Society, and presided at the late general meeting. He has given much satisfaction in following the example of the Earl of Elgin in giving prizes for agricultural essays and improvements.

A very able report to the Kingston Chamber of Commerce on the sugar question is given in the Jamaica papers. The following are the conclusions at which the committee to whom the drawing up of the report was intrusted arrived:

"1. That the interests both of the mother country and of the colonists require that the sugar duties question be finally and equitably adjusted with as little delay as possible.

"2. That from the many important consequences it involves to the British nation, the maintaining of the cultivation of sugar in the British West Indies should be considered by them a political axiom.

"3. That the admission for home consumption of all foreign sugar and molasses might not be attended with injurious consequences to the cultivation of sugar in the British West Indies, provided effectual means be taken to enable the colonists to withstand the extensive competition to which the measure will subject them.

"4. The according to the colonists every facility for the procuring of additional labourers."

The following is from De Cordova's Mercantile Intelligencer:

"Our market is at this moment in a much more depressed condition than it was but two weeks ago; and, reeling as it is under the effects of over-trading to an extent which has, until this period, been unknown here--suffering from the confined and narrowed stated of the money market, which is producing prejudicial results on the stability of some dealers--and a continued want of confidence--reeling, we repeat, under all these adverse circumstances, we cannot picture to ourselves a worse position than that in which we are now placed.

"Unless shipments to this island shall entirely cease for at least three months, a great proportion of the goods now on hand must perish before they can be called into consumption. The supplies of all articles, but particularly of fish and breadstuffs, are enormous. The stock of flour is equal to six months' consumption, whilst that of pork, soap, lard, butter, meal, rice, and corn is for beyond the necessities of the place. Further arrivals to meet the present overstock must entail disastrous results on the shippers. The fine rains which have fallen within the last six or eight weeks will also cause a yet further decline in the demand for bread-stuffs, as there will be soon thrown into the market very large quantities of native ground provisions. We cannot too strongly impress upon shippers in general the absolute necessity which exists for refraining for some time to make further consignments to this market; and this is required not only as a means to revive the depressed and drooping condition of our trade, but also to enable their correspondents here to realize their accounts."

The Jamaica Despatch gives the following notice of the weather:

"Our correspondent from Manchester informs us they have had fine rains since Friday for the ground, but very little for the ponds, which are very low. The coffee crops, in consequence of the severe drought, will be very small, as the rain comes too late to expect any blossom of consequence. The cattle generally have suffered much, and in many pro parties great loss; this makes the third successive bad year for pens, which, like most other Jamaica properties, have become scarcely worth the anxiety of carrying them on." (From the Falmouth Post.)

Thanks to a merciful Providence, we have been blessed in this parish for the last week with several partial but refreshing showers of rain, and we are glad to learn from many of our agricultural friends, that the effect on the soil already begins to be perceived, as the pastures and fields of cane are assuming a green and healthy appearance. The May seasons may now be said to have set in, although they are rather late, we sincerely trust that they have come in sufficient time to secure a good yielding for the next year's crop. The late drought has nearly ruined many industrious planters, whose little capital was embarked either in the purchase or leasing of properties, and it will now require some years of prosperity to relieve them from the difficulties into which they have been unfortunately thrown.

On Sunday, the 26th ultimo, a melancholy accident occurred on board the Royal Mail ship Clyde, on her voyage home from Bermuda. A seaman, named Patrick Welch, was engaged very early that morning in furling the fore-top-gallant sail during a squall, when he missed his hold, and fell from the yard with such violence that the died in about an hour afterwards. The unfortunate man was a native of Dublin, and bore and excellent character among his shipmates. So far as is known he has left no one behind him dependent on him for support, but the passengers, to show their sympathy with men exposed to such perils in discharge of their duty, set on foot a subscription, and the sum of 16l. sterling having been collected, it was placed in the hands of Captain Symons, to be given by him to the "Shipwrecked Fisherman and Mariners' Benevolent Society."

Our letters from the city of Mexico are up to the 29th of June.

The Mexican Congress was installed on the 6th, and addressed by General Paredes, in explanation of his policy and the situation of the country.

The Californias had declared their independence of Mexico, it was supposed through American intrigues.

General Taylor, with the American army greatly augmented by volunteers, remained in possession of Matamoras, and had occupied the villages of Reynosa, Camargo, and Mier, on the right bank of the Bravo (or Rio Grande del Norte). He was expected to advance on Monterey and Saltillo, where no resistance could be offered.

General Paredes had been elected President, and General Bravo Vice-President of the Republic. With the exception of some privileged British credits, no arrangement of the public debt had been made; but the President had received powers to that effect, and to raise money. Commodore Conner had arrived at Vera Cruz in the United States frigate Cumberland, and was supposed to be the bearer of an ultimatum from his Government. [PTH]

The Affairs of Mexico (From our own correspondent)

General Paredes opened the new Congress on the 6th instant, with a speech replete with good sense and moderation. He commenced by reviewing the whole policy of his administration, declaring that the pronunciamiento of San Luis was imperiously called for, from the debility and want of prestige of the former government; that the measures he had taken for suppressing the liberty of the press were necessary, from the acrimonious feeling which was springing up from the polemical warfare of the Republican and Monarchical parties; that although, at first, he had wished for a free discussion on the future form of government to be adopted, he, however, himself being a friend to Republican principles, yet that eventually it was requisite to restrain that discussion with a strong hand. He then reverted to the revolutionized state of the country, the disturbances in the south, in Sinaloa, and Sonora, and other parts of the Republic, and stated that the Americans in their aggressive acts counted on and profited by their internal dissensions.

In allusion to the war with the United States, he remarked that on assuming the reins of power, he government, to receive a Minister from the United States to treat on the question of Texas, and however firmly resolved never to suffer the dismemberment of any part of the territory of the Republic, still he was willing to listen to the propositions of that Government; but he found, as was to be expected from the double policy of the United States, that the American Envoy, Mr. Slidell, was not named ad hoc, but regularly accredited as a resident Minister to this country, just as if friendly relations still existed between the two governments. This he looked upon as a fresh outrage, and consequently not only would he not receive him, but sent him his passports, and on the 21st of March declared the Mexican Republic at war with the United States.

He then communicated the results of the actions of the 8th and 9th of May, blaming General Arista for his subsequent abandonment of Matamoras; stating that in consequence he had deprived him of the command, and ordered him to Mexico, to answer for his conduct before a council of war.

With respect to financial measures, however much convinced that credit is the first element of power to a government and reliance on its good faith the greatest resource of its strength, he had been reluctantly compelled to suspend provisionally the payments of Government; an extreme measure, rendered however imperative to save the nation from ruin, a ruin that must equally have been shared by its self-same creditors; and, in conclusion, he urged Congress to adopt some method of Finance, capable of assisting him to carry on the war with vigour and support the honour of the country. These are the cardinal points of his speech which were re-echoed in the usual address by the President of the Senate.

The first step of the Congress was to declare General Paredes ad interim President, and General Bravo Vice-President. Subsequently the Congress somewhat superfluously declared this country at war with the United States, and gave the President the permission he had solicited, to command in person the army, Paredes having stated his determination personally to head the new campaign.

The news from Matamoras is to the 6th instant, the greatest activity reigns in that city; every day a steamboat arrives there from New Orleans with reinforcements for the army, and emigrants of all nations and classes, anxious to try their fortune in this new land of promise. The first number of a paper of the date of the 1st instant, under the title of the Republic of Rio Grande, has been published in that city, half in Spanish and half in English, and which requires to be rather more than cursorily noticed. This gazette calls on all the northern States of Mexico to form themselves into a republic under the title assumed, and to withdraw altogether their allegiance from Mexico, on the plea that Mexico, supported by England, purposes to establish a monarchy on the ruins of the republic. The policy of England is denounced in the grossest terms, but the embryo republicans of the republic of Rio Grande are consoled with the assurance that England's power is in a state of decadence, her throne tottering, and her sun set; that her people are themselves tired of monarchy, and will shortly adopt the republican institutions of the north. I am that General Taylor does not countenance this publication; still its sentiments, so much in unison with the declaration of President Polk in his message of December, denouncing European interference with the affairs of this continent, seem to me a sort of manifesto summons from head quarters.

I hear that the boundary now claimed by General Taylor is one league south of the Bravo, on the plea that to render the river navigable for large vessels it will be requisite to appropriate at least that portion of its margin. The fighting seems over; the remnant of the Mexican army has retreated to Linares, about 60 leagues from Matamoras, and are in complete state of demoralization, without provisions, munitions, or artillery.

The internal state of the country is most discouraging. Mazatlan, Guadalaxara, Acapulco, Sinaloa, and Sonora have declared against the Government. On the 26th inst. an express arrived from Topick, announcing that a convention had been held in Santa Barbara, on the Californian coast, in which the Californias declared themselves sovereign and independent states, renouncing their connexion with Mexico. In the south, although General Alvarez has received a temporary check, he is still roaming about with a disorganized band of lawless adventurers, committing excesses of the most horrible nature. To sum up the melancholy catalogue, the Indians alive to the general disorganization, are ravaging the northern provinces with fire and slaughter, and only so lately as the 7th instant Durango attacked and killed a company of cavalry, and filled the adjacent villages with well founded fears for their lives and property.

This picture is, I assure you, not at all exaggerated; we feel it so true here, that the wisest head can suggest no solution for these calamities, and for those still heavier ones threatened by the American invasion. The Government habitually apathetic, without resources, without credit, can do nothing. The Congress, after days of idle discussion, has at last suggested some sort of a plan on the basis of a general contribution, which nobody will pay and no one can enforce. The people, what we at home emphatically call the people, worn out with constant changes, take no interest whatsoever in a probable future change of masters. The army stripped of its prestige by its late disgraceful rout--a prestige which it only had acquired from the reiterated fulsome adulation of its leaders--has ceased to be looked upon as a bulwark. This standing army is, indeed, the fons malorum of this country. One of their own papers asks "in a country like ours, where the army consists of individuals, without the common rudiments of education, without the common principles of political knowledge, without the common principles of morality, how can it resist the more intelligent race of the north, who at least know for what they are fighting? Indeed the Mexican army is strangely constituted, its composition strongly resembles that of the whole community; consisting of half breeds of all shades and colours, without a even the animal quality of valour. Whenever this nation, tired of its worthlessness and its excesses, shall have energy sufficient to disband this host of vicious and degraded men, whose only military type is their dress, they will easily merge into bandits requiring neither further training nor experience. This army is, I say, the curse of this country, draining its energies, diverting its population from their natural agricultural pursuits, eating up five-sixths of its revenue, and so long as it continues to exercise any influence on public affairs I see little hope of the restoration of permanent tranquility or renewal of public confidence.

Foreign governments, especially the English Government, whose subjects have millions invested in their mines, their funds, and their import commerce, should insist on Mexico making peace with the Americans. However they may depredate intervention it must come; their capabilities for self-government have been tried and found wanting. Their ignorance is equaled only by their presumption; profoundly ignorant of their own weakness they view the forbearance of foreign powers as an homage to their strength. For so many centuries, penitus toto orbe divisos, processions, rockets, bells, military music, bulls, and friars, have so engrossed and absorbed their faculties, that they have remained in a state of non-progression, covering the rearguard of civilization. The Americans now, however, have discovered their weakness, and they will now owe their political existence more to the forbearance of the invaders than to their own means of averting its termination.

When the United States Government have driven them to terms, it will then be necessary that the claims of British subjects be properly represented here. Governments may be generous, but individuals cannot always afford to be so; and unless more zeal is adopted than what hitherto has been shown, the result will be that France by bombardment, and America by invasion, will get their claims settled, and England, the generous creditor (for which from the peculiar character of this people she gets neither respect nor gratitude) will be left unpaid, and possibly, in their papers, her forbearance attributed to astute and perfidious policy. In Spanish America gratitude is too painful a tax ever to be paid.

The local news is unimportant. Señores Lombardo, Trigueros, &c., are still in confinement, political arrests and trials are too frequent here to excited much attention. These gentlemen will probably remain in prison until a new revolution (not a probably remote event) will enable them to exchange places with their present jailors.

The Government have acceded to the wishes of the merchants, and allowed the goods that were in deposit in Vera Cruz, to be transmitted to Jalapa and Orizava.

The blockade has had a trifling favourable effect on British manufactured goods, and holders are asking higher prices, though but few sales are making.

The stocks of British manufactured goods are very limited, and perhaps not above 1,000 bales are in first hands.

Some very heavy failures here have cast a gloom over the city. Jose Maria Landa, Fost, Serment, and Co., Cécillon Berne and Co., have suspended their payments. The first are parties principally engaged in government transactions, and their engagements are for upwards of a million of dollars. The suspension is attributed to the law of May 2, suspending government payments.

Money is excessively scarce, and first-rate bills are difficult to discount at 2 and 3 per cent per month. The Guanaxuata Conducta is expected here in a few days with a million of dollars, which will relieve the pressure of the money market. Exchange on London 60 days, 44 1/2d., and very few takers of bills. [PTH]

AMERICA

ARRIVAL OF THE CAMBRIA.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday

The Royal mail steam ship Cambria, Captain Judkins, arrived in the Mersey at 1 o'clock this afternoon, from Boston and Halifax, having accomplished the run from the former city in the remarkably short space of 10 days and 18 hours. The Cambria brought a large number of passengers, including Lord Falkland, the late Governor of Nova Scotia, and announces the arrival of the steam ship Great Britain at New York on the night of the 20th ult., after a quick passage of 13 1/2 days. She had, however, encountered some trifling mishaps on the coast.

Our advices by this arrival extend to the close of the past month from New York, and are of a highly important nature.

From Washington we learn the gratifying intelligence that the liberal measure of commercial reform pending before the Senate at the date of our last accounts had finally triumphed in that assembly, and had received likewise the assent of the House of Representatives, no alteration of the slightest moment having been made in the bill. The contest upon its fate, we learn, was throughout close in the extreme.
further announce the gratifying fact, that the 10th of August had been fixed by the House refused to receive the resolutions by a vote of 95 to 54. Our letters day offered a series of resolutions proffering a formal mission of peace to Mexico. The terms of the levy were most remarkable. Not only are the men entitled to the pay and rations of the regular soldier, but protection to the Mormon emigration destined for California--is to become owner of the arms and supplies he possesses as

The accounts from south-east state, that Colonel Kearney, with the Santa Fe expedition, had made considerable progress in route; and that he had received levies from a Mormon emigrant camp in the Platte River, tot the extent of 500 men. The terms of the levy were most remarkable. Not only are the men entitled to the pay and rations of the regular soldier, but protection to the Mormon emigration movement is promised; and each man, at the termination of the movement--

The town having been quietly invested by the 7th Regiment, and the troops were being pushed forward as rapidly as possible. This, however, was work of extreme difficulty. The river, notwithstanding that there had not been a single fall of rain, being swollen in an extraordinary degree, in somuch so, indeed, as to cause serious damage in Camargo, and to destroy the previously plentiful and excellent harvests in its vicinity, upon which General Taylor had, in some degree, calculated for supplies. We have still to report the fact of authentic intelligence relative to the position of the Mexican forces. All accounts, however, represent that the Army of the North--as it is termed--had concentrated at Linares, to the extent of 4,000 men, under Messia. At Montenez, according to the report of a reconnaissance made by Captain Walker and party of Rangers, there was but little force. The inhabitants were much alarmed at the prospect of their city being invaded, and it is stated, were busily employed repairing the old and erecting new fortifications. Meanwhile, general Taylor had issued a proclamation, calculated to crush the power of the Administration of Paredes, by spreading disaffection in the northern department of the republic, and to extend through their territories the principle of independent government. The newspaper entitled the Republic of the Rio Grande had ceased, failing in its object. The accounts from south-east state, that Colonel Kearnay, with the Santa Fe expedition, had made considerable progress in route; and that he had received levies from a Mormon emigrant camp in the Platte River, tot the extent of 500 men. The terms of the levy were most remarkable. Not only are the men entitled to the pay and rations of the regular soldier, but protection to the Mormon emigration movement is promised; and each man, at the termination of the movement--

The reputed organ of the Administration reiterates former contradiction that Mr. Pakenham had made any offer of Mediation to the American Government relative to the Mexican war.
We learn that the expedition organized under Colonel Stevenson, for California, had departed for Governor's Island previous to embarkation. Each volunteer was enlisted with the stipulation that he should be discharged in California. From the Pacific coast we have no intelligence subsequent to the reception by our squadron there of the news of war existing between the United States and Mexico.

From Vera Cruz we have advices to the 25th ultimo, by the United States steam frigate Princeton, at Pensacola. These advices, in the opinion of the American journals, and in that of Mr. Webster also, lead to the impression that a determined effort is to be made by that country to repel the hostile attacks of the United States; and it is said that the Executive had received authentic information to that effect. Paredes, up to the 7th ult., had not left the capital, deterred by the fear of an immediate revolt. A slight attempt in the city had been successfully suppressed. The blockade of Vera Cruz was still maintained. A collision had taken place on the 8th. The Princeton, with the Cumberland and Potomac, having proceeded 12 miles up th coast from Vera Cruz to take in supplies, the enemy concentrated a force of 300 Mexicans, who fired on the boats and wounded one man. The Princeton, lying close by, opened her fire upon the chapparal and concealed breastworks, and soon silenced the battery. The Mexican account is, that the Mexicans had six or eight wounded and three killed, and on their own side only one man wounded. Arista had issued a proclamation to the troops of the division, declaring that his and their honour was affected by the disastrous action of the 9th of May, and he states that he has demanded an investigation, which the Government had granted. Late advices from Yucatan would seem to throw some slight doubts upon the entire separation of the department from Mexico. Accounts from Havannah to the 20th ult. State that Santa Anna and Almonte remained at that port.

From Canada we have advices to the 29th ult. The contents are unimportant. The free navigation of the St. Lawrence was the topic of much discussion in the public journals, the Free Trade Association of the province having addressed a memorial advocating that measure to the home government. The Montreal Gazette opposes this movement, backed by the Courier, and urges the propriety of Canada bearing without ill-temper the slight cost at which she receives the political protection of Great Britain. Rumours are mentioned that Earl Cathcart would shortly be removed from the Government. American wheat had been declared admissible into Canada, in bond, for the purpose of being ground and exported duty free. Despatches had been received from the Home Government, in reply to Mr. Wall's memorial, adopted by the Assembly, on the question of admitting from the United States supplies for Her Majesty's troops in the province, assenting, in effect at least, to the prayer. The subscriptions for the relief of the St. John's sufferers were progressing favourably. The ship Erin, from Liverpool to Montreal, had been lost by fire off the bay of Seven Island; crew saved.

Halifax papers announce the secession of Lord Falkland from the Government. His successor, Sir J. Harvey, was daily expected.

Jamaica accounts to the 13th ult. Are unimportant.

Advices from Chagres to the 13th June state that the United States frigates Savannah and Constitution were daily expected at Valparaiso, to take in provisions and sail for the United States. The recent disturbances at Santiago, Chili, had been completely suppressed. The republic enjoyed tranquillity. The Peruvian Government is in a very settled condition; much more so than it had been for some years.

Intelligence is published in the American journals from Oregon, to March 5, containing the speech of the Governor. The place was rapidly improving. [PTH] volunteers in the Mexican war, has been regarded with curious interest by thinking men, as an index of what would be the case should our country unfortunately be engaged in a war with any of the great Powers of Europe. In such a case, no drafting of men for soldiers would be tolerated or even necessary. The military enthusiasm natural to Republican would cause our citizens to volunteer by regiments and brigades, instead of squads and companies, as at present; and these forces collected and disciplined in every part of an immense country, would be ready to centralize themselves by our network of railroads upon any point of attacked, and to annihilate an invading force of any possible numerical strength.

But though all have viewed with pride and satisfaction this demonstration of our military resources; and the mass of the people seem to have forgotten the navy, which has as yet had no opportunity of winning its laurels, as of old; its interests have not been overlooked by those in power, nor forgotten by those who recollect the incidents of the last war with England, or who are directly engaged in foreign commerce. They have borne in mind the importance of being prepared to meet the foe where he will most probably seek us, on the ocean, and on our sea coasts.

The promptness with which very considerable forces have, at short notice, been thrown upon the two coasts of Mexico, are an evidence of this; and the alacrity observed in all the navy yards in the outfitting of our ships of war have convinced us, that the same energy and confidence which enabled our gallant little navy to measure strength in single actions with the "mistress of the seas, " would not be want amounting now, should it be necessary, to convert the immense of materiel at present accumulated at the arsenals and ship yards into as large a fleet of ships and war-steamers as might be required under any circumstances. Our resources in this respect are as inexhaustible as our forests, and the genius and skill of our machinists and artisans as unfathomable and boundless as the mines of the metals they work; and, with the thousand of brave and hardly seamen which an immense unemployed mercantile marine would supply to the service, we might defy the world afloat. While impressed men would work and fight the ships of the enemy, without any other interest in the event than the prize money, our cool and calculating tars would turn over their quid of "honey dew, " with a smile at the absurdity of a ship ever yielding when every man on board is one of the owners.

We furnish below a table, corrected to the latest dates, of the squadrons of the Gulf of Mexico and on the coasts of California. The former is now employed in blockading the several ports of the enemy, but is available, should it be decided to possess ourselves of the castle of St. Juan d'Ulloa, and the city of Vera Cruz. The latter squadron is employed in blockading the ports, and taking possession of the most important positions on the Californian and Western Mexican coasts. We daily expect interesting news from this squadron.

It must be remembered that the above are the number of guns rated on board each vessel. Their actual force is considerably greater. For example, the Pennsylvania, rated 120, carries 144 guns in her broadsides. All the 74’s are 90 gun ships, except the Columbia, 80; the 44-gun ships, except one, all carry from 54 to 62 guns. The sloops of war are generally heavier than they are rated. Thus it will be seen that our available naval force threatening Mexico at this time is about 1,500 guns. Of these, a proper proportion are Paixhan guns, of sizes suitable to the different ships that carry them. The frigates are of a size and force that would justify their taking a place in the line of battle in a fleet engagement, as they throw much greater weight of metal at a broadside than the old English and French line of battle ships.

Altogether this is a very formidable armament, and it can be increased very considerably, as several line of battle ships and large frigates are preserved in houses on the stocks, and might be launched and sent to sea in six weeks. [PTH]
the army, and of ladies and gentlemen. The gallant colonel who was honoured with this acceptable mission was himself engaged in these memorable scenes, and was wounded on the morning of the 9th, in his hip, by a musket ball, which has not yet been extracted from the vicinity of the spine. For the satisfaction of his relations in Virginia, and his numerous friends everywhere, we are happy to state that his general health is good, and that he flattered with the hope of recovering the full use of his limbs at no distant period. The following is his address to the President of the United States:--

"Mr. President, --Under the direction of my commanding general, I am the honoured instrument (and I here take occasion to express my thanks for the distinguished compliment) of presenting to your Excellency these trophies of victory won in the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma. It is not in the spirit of triumph over a defeated, and I must say, gallant enemy that they are presented on the part of the army, but rather in conformity with usage, to gratify popular curiosity, and as some evidence that the soldiers of the republic have done their duty."

The President received the flags, lances, &c., with the feeling which became him. They are almost all of them torn by cannon ball or musket bullets, and the staffs of some of them have not escaped the fortunes of war. --Washington Union. [PTH]

LT 8/17/1846 5D RAILWAY OVER ROCKIE MOUNTAINS PROPOSED

America
Arrival of the Great Britain
Liverpool, Saturday

The steam-ship Great Britain arrived in the Mersey at an early hour this morning from New York, whence she has made a remarkable run of 13 days 8 hours, including a detention of 18 hours to repair driving chain. This is an evil which will be immediately remedied. A large number of passengers arrived in the Great Britain.

The advices from New York by the arrival are one day later than those before given, and contain but few features of interest. The Tariff Bill had been signed by the President on the 31st ult., and will, therefore, come into operation on the 1st December. The stability of this change in the commercial policy of the republic, in a letter received from Washington, is held to be extremely doubtful, and several grounds are given for the belief--firstly, that already the Whigs have raised the hostile cry of "repeal;" secondly, that that party is, though almost imperceptibly, regaining its former strength and influence; thirdly, that the experiment of a more liberal tariff is instituted at a time when the expenses of the state are enormously increased by the existence of a war; and, fourthly, that the danger of a deficiency naturally arising from a state of change and transition will be materially increased by the delay which ensues before the measure comes into operation. Still another, though less powerful, argument is mentioned, the prospect that in a brief space of time the territories of American Oregon will require to be represented at the seat of Government. The session of Congress was rapidly drawing to a close, and up to the close of the 31st ult. The Senate had not decided upon the merits of the Sub-Treasury Bill, nor had the House of Representatives arrived at any decision upon the Warehousing Bill. The investigation into the publication of the secret Oregon correspondence had failed to elicit any information criminating those senators upon whom suspicion had fallen, and, the editor of the North American having affirmed that the documents were anonymously communicated to him, the inquiry was brought to a termination. A curious report was made to Congress on the 31st ult., relative to the absurd project of a person named Whitney to construct a railroad from the Atlantic shore, across the Rocky Mountains, to Oregon. It will scarcely be believed, yet is it nevertheless true, that the Senate Committee of Public Lands gravely recommended that a grant of land be granted for that purpose 60 miles in breadth along the whole length of the line--a strip of land some 2,000 miles long by 60 wide! And, notwithstanding an exposure of the jobbery by Mr. Benton, the Senate ordered that the report be printed! The oft-repeated rumours of Cabinet changes are again renewed. Mr. Bancroft, it is said, is to be removed from the Navy Department, to be succeeded by Mr. Slidell, a southern man. Of the secession of Mr. Buchanan there would seem to be little doubt.

No further intelligence has reached us from the army of invasion on the Rio del Norte, from the blockading squadron, or from the California expedition, by this arrival. Accounts from Illinois, however, state that the additional command under General Wool, numbering about 10,000 men, was fast concentrating, and would towards September set forth en route, its surmised object being to take on the flank any Mexican force which may oppose the march of General Taylor. The army under this commander, when fully concentrated, will amount to 20,000 men.

From Mexico we have no later advices. The New Orleans Picayune, however, publishes a minute and instructive account of the internal state of affairs in that country up to the close of June last. The election of Paredes as President, the proceedings of Congress, the formal recognition of the American war, and the melancholy spectacle presented by the Assembly weakly and ineffectually struggling to devise means by which the Treasury may be recruited and the State rescued, are all detailed with painful accuracy. One fact must not be overlooked, however, that apparently the idea of succumbing to its sister republic has never yet crossed the public mind of Mexico.

From Canada we have little news of interest. A full copy of the memorial of the Free Trade Association has reached us. The document is of considerable length, and, though rather inelegant in composition, yet argues with great force, primarily for the opening of the St. Lawrence to the vessels of all nations, secondly for the repeal of the duties discriminating in favour of British over foreign goods. The statistics of shipping at Quebec to the 27th ultimo exhibited a decrease of arrivals to the amount of 197 vessels and 334,1470 tons; 1846, 747 vessels and 273,473 tons.

From the River Plated important advices, dated Monte Video, June 14, had been received at Baltimore by the bark Creole, arrived from Corrientes. We extract the following from the Baltimore Patriot:--

"Monte Video, June 14.

"On the 4th inst., at 9 o'clock in the morning, the fleet weighed anchor about three miles above the Burancas of St. Lorenzo, in the river Parana, where there were placed 25 pieces of cannon, belonging to Buenos Ayres, to stop the expedition from passing. At half-past 9 the fort opened a fire on the five steamers, the English steamers Gorgon, Fire-brand, and Electra, the French steamers Gacende and Fulton, which took their position abreast of the batteries, whilst the English brig-of-war Dolphin led the van of the merchant vessels, amounting to 100 sail.

"From the time the Dolphin passed, being the first vessel, at half-past 10 o'clock, to the time the last vessel of the convoy passed, after sundown, made seven hours and a half firing. It appears very singular that in such a large fleet of vessels, passing so many pieces of cannon and within musket-shot of the infantry, which played their part, not a man was either killed or wounded; and still more strange, that no accident should have happened of either killed or wounded on board any of the vessels of war, amounting to 12 sail, especially the five steamers, which were under the fire from the batteries, which the English and French naval commanders set on fire to prevent them falling into Rosas's hand, one being the English bark Caledonia, of Hull, the other three being schooners from Corrientes; their cargoes consisted of amber, hides, wool, yerba, and tobacco.

"There are as yet but a few of the convoy arrived at Monte Video; only the large vessels. The weather being boisterous, all the smaller vessels were lying at the island of Martin Garcia.

"There is not such a large quantity of hides come down as was expected, but there is a larger quantity of yerba, tobacco, and wool. Salt hides none. Small quantity of tallow, packed beef, on cargo horse hair, a great deal of timber, &c." [PTH] the absence of the President.

This decree was passed on the 10th of June, and on the 12th the election was held. General Paredes was elected President, receiving 58 out of 83 votes. General Bravo received 13 votes, and General Herrera 7 votes. General Bravo was then elected Vice-President, receiving 48 out of 82 votes. The highest opposing candidate was D. Luis G. Cuevos, who received 17 votes.

General Paredes took the oaths of office on the 13th as provisional President, and at the same time pronounced another discourse, in the most notable passage of which he expresses his confidence that Congress will grant all the supplies and make every effort necessary to defend the national cause. He reviews at length the wrongs which Mexico has endured at the hands of the United States, and concludes with desiring permission to assume the command of the army in the field.

In the absence of Senor Bustamente, who was ill, Dr. D. Louis Gonzaga Gordoa presided over Congress. He replied to the President in substance, that every question of domestic policy shrunk into insignificance compared with the invasion of the country on the frontier of the Rio Bravo; that the Mexican who should think of aught else than the injustice and treachery with which their soil was trampled, and the necessity of avenging their outraged honour, had no right to claim a share in their patriotic devotion.

On the 18th permission was granted to Paredes to place himself at the head of troops, and proceed to join the army of the north. General Gonzalez Arevalo was to leave the capital on the 19th, in command of the advance of the forces of Paredes. General Mejia was in the actual command of the army of the north, Arista having been ordered to Mexico, and Ampudia to remain at San Luis Potosi. (A paper of the 27th ult., says that General Arevalo, instead of proceeding to the frontier, had marched for Guadalajara to put down the insurrection. )

The committees of Congress upon foreign relations and upon war made a joint report on the 16th on that part of the message of Paredes relating to the United States. The report recommends the passage of a bill declaring Mexico to be "in a state of war with the United States." We do not find that the bill will be found below.

The cannonade between St. Mary's and the three Mexican gun-boats Quereiana, Union, and Poblana, at Tampico, is mentioned in all the Mexican papers. They claim no great victory, but express themselves satisfied with the valour displayed by the Mexicans. We see no mention of any loss which was suffered. A report is mentioned in our correspondent's letter and in the papers before us, that the Americans had taken Altamira, a sea port lying directly north of Tampico, and only a few miles distant. There seems no improbability in the report.

The General left in command of Vera Cruz, on the 30th ult., formally declared that city to be in a state of siege, in order to prepare all the people for an anticipated attack upon it. The garrison of the castle had received orders to be on the alert, particularly at night, as the danger of a night attack was thought imminent. Our correspondent writes--"It is said" an attack was to be made on the 10th instant, but we know nothing more on the subject. The General to whom the command of Vera Cruz was intrusted is Rodriguez de Cela.

A report had reached Vera Cruz that the Californias had separated themselves from Mexico, but nothing is said to let us know whether Commodore Sloat had anything to do with the separation. The subject is mentioned by our Havannah correspondent.

A communication has been received in Mexico from the commander of the troops sent to put down the insurrection in Jalisco, in which he attributed little importance to the events which occurred there, and expressed the hope that he should be able promptly to chastise the authors of the movement.

The latest despatch from Guadalajara is dated June 18, at which date General Pacheco informs the Government that he has possession of a good portion of the public buildings of the city, and the insurgents numbered only 1,200 and were daily dispersing.

General Tornel has again assumed the functions of Minister of War.

A large quantity of ammunition has been sent to the city of Mexico from the Castle of Perote, together with some mounted cannon and Muskets.
The papers are full of individual tenders of money to aid in carrying on the war.

The Mexican Government has declared the ports of Mezatlan and Matamoros closed to foreign commerce.

The publication of El Tiempo, the Bourbonist paper, has been discontinued since Congress has commenced its session.

El Indicador, of Vera Cruz, of the 23d ult, states that the English war steamer Vesuvius (which arrive at Sacrificios on the 14th ) had left for Tampico to demand from the commander of the St. Mary's explanations as to his motives for not permitting the steamer Clyde to take on board specie, as the English steamers had hitherto done. It also says that the commander of the Vesuvius would take it on board his own vessel.

In this connexion we may mention, that beside the Vesuvius, another English war steamer, a 50 gun frigate, and a brig-of-war, arrived at Sacrificios on the 14th, from Jamaica. The Vera Cruz editor is at a loss to account for the concentration of such a force there by the English. A Spanish frigate and brig, and a French bark and brig, all vessels of war were lying there on the 18thult.

On the 21st news was received at Vera Cruz that an American brig-of-war was blockading the port of Alvarado. The next day intelligence reached there that some boats from the brig had pursued a Mexican boat across the bar. Some boats from the Mexican vessels of war went to the assistance of the boat, and the people were called to arms. The Mexican boat made its escape. Say the Mexicans, "The victory was ours; but there was none killed or wounded, as the Americans did not venture to measure strength with us." The American boats were by signal ordered back to the brig. Subsequently to this tremendous affair the brig went to sea. The whole is reported as a great outrage.

An American sloop-of-war arrived off the port of Vera Cruz on the 30th ult., and an American brig-of-war at the same date was seen sailing towards Isla Verde. On the 18thult., there was an American frigate at Sacrificios, and a brig-of-war. On the 20th, the Spanish ship Flar de Llanes spoke an American vessel-of-war 20 leagues from Vera Cruz, which he supposed to be the flag-ship Cumberland.

The Committee of the Mexican Congress to which was referred the report of the Minister of Finance, in relation to obtaining resources for the war, on the 20th of June, reported a law to the following effect:-

"1. During the existence of the war which the United States is making upon the Mexican nation, the Government is authorized to raise the sums necessary for the war in the manner most convenient and efficacious, (but without taking possession of the private of individuals or corporations) allotting to each class the amount of money which it should contribute to the public defence, in the order it should judge equitable.

"2. The Government is authorized to make use of all the national revenues, taking care to apply them in the best manner the circumstances will admit, to the fulfillment of the objects to which each of them is appropriated.

"3. The Government is authorized to regulate the payment of the national debt.

"4. To take measures for the regulation and improvement of the public revenues and their administration; consulting in everything relating to the organization of the bureaus and the administration of the revenues the superior junta of the treasury, which it will organize in the manner which it shall deem most suitable."

This report, signed by Senor Alaman among others, was objected to at once and in toto, as being too indefinite as to the powers with which it would invest the Government. Two members were then added to the committee, and the subject referred back to them.

On the 23d June, Paredes issued a decree for the organization, in the capital, of a battalion of infantry and two squadrons of cavalry from the commercial classes, which were to find their own equipments, and whose sole duties should be the preservation of order in the capital, and the protection of private property.
On the 20th a Committee of Congress upon the form of a constitution was appointed. Pena y Pena, Couto, Arrillaga, Bonilla, Tagle, Romero, and Valencia were appointed.

We annex a translation of the project de loi, or bell, reported in relation to the war, by the committee to which it was referred. Bocanegra and Valencia were among the members of this committee. After a short report upon the circumstances of the case, the committee proposed the following:--

"The extraordinary National Congress of the Mexican Republic considering:

"That the Republic of the United States of America, with notorious violation of all right, has instigated and protected openly and perseveringly the insurrection of the colonists of Texas against the nation which had admitted them upon its territory, and generously shielded them with the protection of its laws.

"That it has not maintained the solemn assurances and reservations in regard to the rights of the Mexican Republic, which by means of its agents it had made in conformity with those treaties.

"That in time of profound peace, and during established relations of amity between the two countries, it has invaded by land and sea the territories of the Californias.

"That it has authorized a levy of troop against Mexico.

"That it has declared war against the Republic, under the pretext that the said states had been invaded, when in fact they made the invasion.

"And lastly, considering that the nationality of the Mexicans is seriously compromised by the power and the spirit of usurpation, flagrantly manifested by the neighbouring nation of the United States--Decrees.

"1st. The Mexican nation, in the exercise of its natural defence, is actually in a state of war with the United States of America.

"2d. In consequence there of the Government will employ all its resources and powers to render the war effectual to the reparation of the injury done to the Mexican nation; it will complete the bodies of permanent militia, and levy new forces at once to the extent it shall deem necessary, to fill up the bodies at present on foot, and to created others of the same description; and if it shall need other special powers Congress will confer them."

This report bears date the 16th ult., but we find it in a paper of the 27th, and we know not at all what action was taken by Congress upon it.

The diplomatic corps paid their respects to the President upon the 21st, to felicitate him upon his election. The British Minister, Mr. Bankhead, addressed the President on the subject very briefly, and in very general terms. The reply of the President is of the same character--not a line in it possesses any interest.

Advices have been received from Durango, giving account of an action between a body of Mexicans and a band of savages, in which the Mexicans were utterly defeated, with the loss of their commander and others, left dead on the field. This occurred early in June.

The situation of Matamoros and the north-eastern department is represented in the Mexican papers as deplorable. Without the speedy arrival of aid they are lost irrecoverably, say the Mexicans. Copies of the Republic of Rio Grande had been received in Mexico. The papers say they are written in bad Spanish. Shocking!

At 4 o'clock on the morning of the 21st inst. there was a slight shock of an earthquake felt at Vera Cruz, which lasted some seconds. It was accompanied by great agitation and roaring of the sea. The papers pray heaven to spare them from the calamities of the elements, while they are suffering from the evils of a foreign war.

The people of Tlacotalpam, on learning of the blockade of Alvarado, enlisted to the number of several hundreds to defend the bar, and a few thousand dollars were raised by subscription to erect fortifications.
Both the departments of Chihuahua and Durango are suffering from the ravages of the Comanches and Lepans. Their outrages are partially attributed to the intrigues of the North Americans, some of whom have been seen with the Indians. [PTH]

LT 8/26/1846 5A MEXICO

No one can be surprised that the precarious condition of Mexico, and of British interests in Mexico, should have excited amongst a portion of our mercantile community that anxiety which was very naturally and forcibly expressed on Monday night by Lord George Bentinck in the House of Commons. We ourselves have been repeatedly solicited by anxious and injured correspondents to endeavour to rouse the public opinion of this country against the enormous wrong done to Mexico by this aggression of the United States, and the probable consequences of that wrong to British interests in the invaded country. But neither the English Government nor the English press postponed to the extreme hour of danger those warning counsels which the occasion required. Mexico was urged to recognize the independence of Texas upon conditions which would have secured the existence of that state as a barrier between herself and the United States. Mexico was told that she must openly and resolutely decide between a closer connexion with the European Powers or the prospect of subjugation and dissolution by American invasion and American intrigues. She would do neither, but seemed to view both alternatives with the same stupid and inert suspicin, alike incapable of grasping the hand of a friend or parrying the attacks of a foe. Last autumn, when the incessant changes of the Mexican Government under the republican form had demonstrated that such a republic was condemned to perpetual anarchy, a suggestion was thrown out in Europe that a return to the monarchical form of Government would most probably be found the only effectual means of restoring stability and dignity to the Stare of Mexico. This idea was not unfavourably entertained by several of the leading statesmen in Europe, provided it should appear that the Mexicans themselves were disposed to adopt it, for there is certainly no motive or encouragement for any European Power to contribute to the restoration of a Government which would not possess the essential condition of the respect and attachment of the Mexican nation. Shortly afterwards a revolution was effected by a man to whom these monarchical views were not new or unwelcome, and who had directly adverted to them in his proclamation. A convention was called to regenerate the institutions of the country. Every species of calamity, from internal bankruptcy and dissolution to foreign conquest, were impending over Mexico; but in the midst of this crises, even General Paredes seems to have, not a good policy or a bad policy, no policy whatever; and we do not believes that an attempt has been seriously made by the Mexican Government to improve their lamentable position, either abroad or at home. They will neither make peace nor wage war, for the same inertia and incapacity retrain them from making concessions, and from offering resistance; and they live on from day to day without a spark of political life or national vigour.

The contemptible weakness of this people, however, justifies no part of the arrogant and unjust dealings of the United States towards them; but, on the contrary, it gives a more odious character to unequal conflict now going on upon the Rio Grande. But as far as the interests of British capitalists who have private investments in Mexico, and as far also as the general mercantile interests of this country, are concerned, we do not believe that there are reasonable grounds of apprehension from the possibility of the progress of the American arms in the Mexican territory. No Government ever did less to protect foreign enterprise and encourage foreign trade than that of Mexico. Our mining companies and our merchants have had to contend there with all the obstacles belonging to a state of society relapsing into barbarism--personal insecurity, detestable laws corruptly administered, no roads, fiscal restrictions on the precious metals, and a prohibitive tariff. With extraordinary patience these evils have been endured; and the British adventures in Mexico have done their duty to the Government on their gratitude? Why should they seek to support its authority? They have submitted with patience to every vicissitude of domestic anarchy, and we are convinced they have now more to hope than to fear from the chances of foreign invasion. Belligerent Powers do not make war on private property. It is the interest and the duty of the American Government to respect British property in Mexico as much as the Mexicans would do; and in the event of any transfer of territory, all private property, but especially the property of neutrals, is clearly protected by the laws of the dominant Power. This opinion is so strongly entertained in Mexico, that many of the principal landowners and proprietors in Northern Mexico are better affected to the United States than to their own Government, on the express ground of the superior protection which the former would afford to private property, and the immediate increase which would take place in the value of land and the transactions of foreign trade.
There are political and territorial reasons of great weight which induce us to view with regret, though not with alarm, the progress of the United States towards the southern limits of North America. But if we look at this contest on the ground of British interests exclusively, it may be questioned whether the consequences of the utmost conditions Mr. Polk is likely to exact from Mexico would inflict any injury whatever on private British interests in that country. The public creditors of Mexico are indeed in a different position, but their misfortunes must be attributed to the absurd legislation, prodigality, and final bankruptcy of the Mexicans themselves; and the prospects of the foreign bondholder have, of course, sunk with those of the state to which he entrusted his money.

No case for the interference of this country, either alone or in conjunction with the other European Powers, has been made out: it has not been solicited in any definite form by Mexico; it has not been warranted by any act of the United States, since they have carried on the war with propriety towards neutrals. The only species of intervention which could be of use is, therefore, that which Lord Palmerston have both successively proffered--namely, an amicable mediation between the two countries. The Americans would, we have no doubt, be glad, if possible, to terminate this affair as soon as they can. The war is disgusting and unpopular to all the better classes of the American people, although they were unanimous in their resolution to extricate the army from the critical position in which Mr. Polk had dared to place it.
The volunteers are troublesome, and the expenses of the army enormous. The force collected in the Gulf of Mexico to attack St. Juan d'Ulloa is thrice as strong as that with which Admiral Baudin carried that fortress, and yet its success is doubtful, from the peculiar nature of the coast. To fail in such an enterprise would be an intolerable humiliation to the American navy; and yet to succeed in it is only to do what the French had done before with a smaller squadron. Upon the whole, then, the Cabinet of Washington must be aware that they have no reasonable prospect of termination this war by any action of extraordinary lustre; and if they are wise statesmen, they will put an end to hostilities in which so little credit is to be won. [PTH]

The following message had been sent to Congress by the President:--

"To the Senate and House of Representatives:--

"I invite your attention to the propriety of making an appropriation to provide for any expenditures which it may be necessary to make in advance for the purpose of settling all our difficulties with the Mexican Republic. It is my desire to terminate, as it originally was to avoid, the existing war with Mexico, with a peace just and honourable for both parties.

"It is probable that the chief obstacle to be surmounted in accomplishing this desirable object, will be the adjustment of the boundary between the two Republics, which shall prove satisfactory and convenient to both, and such as neither will hereafter repent. In the adjustment of this boundary we ought to pay a fair equivalent for any concessions which may be made by Mexico.

"Under the circumstances, and considering the other complicated questions to be settled by negotiation with the Mexican Republic, I deem it important that a sum of money should be put under the control of the Executive, to be advanced, if need be, to the Government of that Republic immediately after the ratification of a treaty. It might be inconvenient for the Mexican Government to wait for the whole sum, the payment of which may be stipulated by this treaty, until it could be ratified by our senate, and an appropriation to carry it into effect made by Congress.

"Indeed, the necessity for their delay might defeat the object altogether. The disbursement of this money would, of course, be accounted for not as secret service money, but like other expenditures. Two precedents for such a proceeding exist in past history during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, to which I would call your attention. On the 20th of February, 1803, an act was passed appropriating 2,000,000 dollars for the purpose of defraying any extraordinary expenditures which may be incurred in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations; to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, who shall cause an account thereof to be laid before Congress as soon as may be; and on the 13th of February, 1806, an appropriation may prove indispensable in accomplishing this object. I would therefore recommend the passage of a law appropriation may prove indispensable in accomplishing this object. I would therefore recommend the passage of a law appropriating 2,000,000 dollars to be placed at the disposal of the Executive for the purpose I have indicated. In order to prevent all misapprehension, it is my duty to state that, anxious as I am to terminate the existing war with the least possible delay, it will continue to be prosecuted with the utmost vigour until a treaty of peace shall be signed by the parties, and ratified by the Mexican Republic. "James K. Polk."

The following documents, transmitted confidence to the Senate, and by the body considered in executive session, have since been released from the bond of secrecy:

"Mr Buchanan to Commodore Connor.

"Department of State, Washington, July 27, 1846.

"Sir, --I have the honour to transmit herewith a sealed note addressed to the Minister of Foreign Relations of the Mexican Government determine to accept the offer, and enter upon negotiations, it may, and probably will, propose to you to conclude an armistice during their pendency. If such a proposition should be made, you will promptly, by kindly, reject it, giving, at the same time, every assurance that the President will do all in his power to bring the negotiations to a satisfactory termination with the least possible delay.

"If an armistice were concluded, the two parties would not stand on an equal footing. The United States, at a heavy expense, now have armies in the field, and navies upon the ocean, in successful progress to conquer an honourable peace. Should their operations be arrested by an armistice, and the negotiations for peace should finally fail, we would then lose nearly all the advantages of an entire campaign. Besides, this sacrifice, great as it might be, would scarcely equal the evils, in every form, which a season of inactivity could not fail to inflict upon our troops, the greater portion of whom consist of patriotic citizens who have volunteered to serve their country in the confidence that they would be actively employed. Whilst, therefore, the President sincerely desires, with the utmost promptitude, to restore our friendly relations with Mexico upon fair and liberal terms, the war must continue to be prosecuted with the utmost vigour, until a definite treaty of peace shall be signed and ratified by Mexico.

"You will not fail with all the despatch in your power to transmit the answer of the Mexican Government to this department.

"I have the honour to be, Sir, Very respectfully, you obedient servant,

"James Buchanan.

"To Commodore David Connor, Commanding the Naval Force of the United States in the Gulf of Mexico"

----------------------

"Department of State, Washington, July 27, 1846.

"To his excellency the Minister of Foreign Relations of the Mexican Republic

"Sir, --The President of the United States, no less anxious to terminate than he was to avoid the present unhappy war with the Mexican Republic, has determined to make an effort to accomplish this purpose. He has accordingly instructed the undersigned Secretary of State to propose, through your Excellency, to the Mexican Government, that negotiations shall forthwith commence for the conclusion of a peace just and honourable to both parties. Should this offer be received and responded to by the Mexican Government in the same frank and friendly spirit by which it has been dictated, he will immediately despatch an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the city of Mexico, with instructions and full powers to conclude a treaty of peace which shall adjust all the questions in dispute between the two republics. If the Mexican Government should prefer to send a Minister to Washington to conduct the negotiations here, he shall be received with kindness and respect, and every effort shall be made to accomplish the object of his mission with the least possible delay.

"In the present communication it is deemed useless, and might prove injurious, to discuss the causes of the existing war. This might tend to delay or defeat the restoration of peace. The past is already consigned to history--the future, under Providence, is within our own power.

"Commodore Conner will transmit this despatch for your Excellency to the Governor of Vera Cruz, under a flag of truce; and you are respectfully invited to adopt the same channel for communicating your answer.

"James Buchanan, Secretary of State,

"To Commodore David Connor, Commanding the Naval Force of the United States in the Gulf of Mexico"
"I avail myself of the occasion to offer your Excellency the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

"James Buchanan."

The papers were read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which, on the following day, reported two resolutions—one expressing a desire for peace, and the other resolving that the President’s desire for an appropriation should be gratified. After debate, Mr. Hannegan presented and amendment, resolving that the Senate, with their present information, declined giving any advice. These resolutions were debated and then referred back to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and on the next day--Thursday, the 6th instant--Mr. M’Duffie reported the following resolutions:--

"Resolved, that the Senate entertain a strong desire that the existing war with Mexico should be terminated by a treaty of peace, just and honourable to both nations, and that the President be advised to adopt all proper measures for the attainment of that object.

"Resolved further, that the Senate deem it advisable that Congress should appropriate a sum of money to enable the President to conclude a treaty of peace, limits and boundaries with the Republic of Mexico, and to be used by him in the event that such treaty should call for the expenditure of the money so appropriated, or any part thereof." [PTH]

The lassitude and the quiescence which mark the waning period of this eventful year seem to have extended from this country and the other states of Europe to the continent of America, and the Hibernia brings us the intelligence of a concluded session and a subsiding war. Since the declaration of their independence the United States of America have not passed through a more remarkable and momentous session of Congress. They have stood upon the brink of a war with the Power most formidable by land and by sea to the security of their territory and the interests of their commerce. They have been plunged into rash, wanton, and ineffective hostilities with their only other neighbor in the American hemisphere. They have set afoot a considerable army acting beyond their own frontiers, whilst the largest squadrons which ever sailed under the American flag are blockading the ports of Mexico in the Gulf and on the Pacific. They have appropriated vast sums of money to these military preparations, and by the Sub-Treasury Bill, which received the sanction of the Legislature at the close of the session, the Government has resumed the dangerous power of tampering with the public securities of the Union.

Meanwhile, whatever may have been the real intentions of Mr. Polk and his immediate advisors, the diplomatic prudence of the British Ministry and of the American Senate brought the Oregon controversy to a timely and fortunate termination. In all these transactions the Cabinet of Washington may have successfully promoted its own party ends, but the political conduct of the President with reference to the English negotiation and the Mexican war has done little to raise his own credit as a statesman, or to do honour to the American nation.

The Oregon correspondence, including the instructions transmitted from time to time by Mr. Buchanan to Mr. M’Iane at this Court, has now been communicated to the Senate and published by the American journals. It proves to demonstration how far the real views of Mr. Polk fell short of the claims he had thought fit to encourage and adopt in his public discourses; and it further proves, that in the final settlement the Americans gave up one of the points—namely, the navigation of the Columbia—to which Mr. Polk and Mr. Buchanan had repeatedly expressed an unalterable determination to adhere. On the 12th of July, 1845, Mr. Buchanan declared that, "with his present impressions, the President can never yield to Great Britain the free navigation of the Columbia." On the 26th of February, 1846, he added—"The President cannot, however, anticipate any possible change of circumstances which would induce him to submit to such a proposition (that of a temporary joint occupancy), if it should contain a surrender to Great Britain of the perpetual right to navigate the Columbia. A grant of the free navigation of St. Lawrence to the United States would be no equivalent for such a concession!"

Nevertheless this concession was made; and nothing can be more shallow than the attempt of Mr. Buchanan to loak this strong inconsistency by asserting that the Senate voted the treaty under the conviction that by the true construction of the second article of the project, the right of the Hudson’s Bay Company to navigate the Columbia would expire with the present license to trade with the Indians on the north west coast of America, on the 30th of May, 1859. Mr. Buchanan must have been perfectly aware that the Hudson’s Bay Company is a permanent corporation, nearly two centuries old; and the navigation of the Columbia is secured to it and to all British subjects trading with it in perpetuity.

In the conduct of the Mexican war the President has, if possible, displayed a still more marked falling off from the course he had proposed to himself and promised the country. The hostilities originated entirely with his own instructions to General Taylor, for it is clear that the Mexicans would never have marched a man beyond Matamoros, and the territory between the Nueces and Rio Grande might with perfect security have remained neutral, until the boundary treaty could be negotiated. Mr. Polk, however, required a war—he required military patronage and military expenditure, and he boldly drew a bill at sight on the folly and enthusiasm of the people. The drum turned their heads, and the object of the Administration was gained. We have all along foreseen that the conduct of this war would present almost insuperable military difficulties, and that the cry of marching to Mexico, investing the principal cities, and occupying the country, was the mere dream of an ignorant populace. Without roads, without local supplies, with little water and a great deal of disease, the march of an American army into the heart of Mexico would have led to its destruction. And so it has proved. General Taylor has shown himself a prudent as well as a gallant commander, and he has therefore not even advanced to Monterey. Nor has Commodore Connor been more enterprising. The American officers by sea and land deserve great credit for the resolution with which they have abstained from those inconsiderate, though sometimes brilliant, undertakings which the impetuosity of a popular Government is so apt to force upon a commander. Their discretion is praiseworthy; but what shall we say of the still more laudable and placable dispositions of President Polk? He has allowed the Congress to separate after having unsuccessfully proposed to them a contingent appropriation of two dollars, “providing for any expedition which it may be necessary to make in advance for the purpose of settling all our difficulties with the Mexican Republic.” The meaning of this peculiar phraseology appears to be, not that the army should make an expedition in advance for the subjugation of the Mexican territory, by that the Treasury should advance whatever may be needed “to pay a fair equivalent for any concessions which may be made by Mexico.” Mr. Buchanan has the pen of a pleasant writer, and he evidently thought the advances of the Treasury entitled to a preference over the advances of the troops. In short, after having held the most arrogant and uncompromising language to Mexico at the sword’s point, President Polk was anxious to present to the astonished descendants of Cortes and of Guatimozin the pleasing alternative of a well-filled purse. So considerate is the Cabinet of Washington become towards the sister Republic, that Mr. Buchanan suggests “it might be inconvenient for the Mexican Government to wait for the payment of the whole sum until the treaty could be ratified by the Senate and the appropriations made by Congress.” Congress, therefore, had it not been for the well-timed prosing of Mr. Davis, would have left a handsome balance in the Treasury, for the express purpose of relieving the necessities of their enemies and honouring the draughts of General Paredes. The Mexicans will regret Mr. Davis’s prolixity, for, upon such terms as these, they would willingly be conquered every morning. It reminds us of the ancient practice of administering a couple of guineas to cure a black eye somewhat lightly inflicted on a slender antagonist. Humanity approves; and Justice smiles: but what becomes of the just and necessary cause of the dispute? If it be fitting that Mexico receive two million dollars for a full release, how comes it that she has hitherto only been paid in knocks? Above all, what are we to think of Mr. Polk, who begins with steel and lead what he is so anxious to terminate with paper and gold? Such questions need no answers. Mr. Polk has discovered the difficulties and evils arising out of the state of war, even with Mexico; and we are not disposed to blame him for his fruitless, though novel, scheme of terminating it, even if it be at the expense of his own character as a politician and at some loss to the dignity of the United States. [PTH] getting into the shade whenever they can during the day, taking a nap at noon, or lying about under walls or in shady places, the upon the ground, to play at cards for reales or medios (and dollars, if they have any), they are so enervated that the climate during the sickly season is very apt to affect numbers of them, if much exposed during the fiercest hours of the day; to which, in fact, they have never been accustomed. They very often take the yellow fever, and even die of the vomito Negro (particularly at Vera Cruz, Tampico, and Alvarado), as well as the temeritious foreigners. They even fear it beforehand. A Mexican soldier who has been drunk over night with aquardiente, and has a sick headache next morning, will ask permission of his sergeant to leave the ranks during parade or guard duty, as he is very unwell, and will go and squat down under a wall or shed. If you ask him what is the matter he shakes his head with a melancholy, much injured, but resigned air, and answers, "Calentura, senor-calentura." I will answer for it that any moderately strong English grenadier--not a regular boxer, but who can only "hit straight"--would knock down 10 or a dozen Mexican soldiers, equally unarmed, one after the other, as fast as they presented themselves. Put a sword into their hands, and give a stout Highlander a claymore, or a raw-boned Irishman a good shillelah, and the 10 soldiers would be very likely to tumble to the right and left with broken blades and broken heads. The Mexicans are by no means deficient in courage. They have fiery spirits and fear of cold steel. They are "always ready to die." I have even heard them in hours of danger use that very expression. What they want is physical force; the power to justify their feelings. The Mexican officers are for the most part not good. They are valiant but have no judgment. They are far too excitable, and without self-government. Moreover they are very often much too young; many of their lieutnants, and even captains, being mere boys. I was once acquainted in Vera Cruz with a Mexican colonel of artillery who was not two-and-twenty. He was a very well informed, high-spirited, amiable young man, a good mathematicians, and a good swordsmen; but, of course, without any adequate experience for such a post. The Mexican cavalry is admirable--in respect of horsemanship. The artillery is food in all respects. In the recent battles (as well as in former wars) they seldom failed to throw their balls and shells directly into the works of the fortress attacked; and before General Vega's little fort was taken, his guns had destroyed one-third of the assailants; but when the strong-armed men got close in amongst the Mexican ranks it was all over in a minute. -American paper. [CCB]

LT September 2, 1846/7C THE AMERICAN NAVY.

--The New York Herald publishes a list of the American squadron in the Gulf of Mexico and for the attack of San Juan de Ulloa. As this list is running from the rounds of the press, we think it right to state that it is in some respects erroneous.
For instance, it sets out by enumerating among these vessels the United States ship of the line Pennsylvania, 120 guns; North Carolina, 74; Delaware, 74. Not one of these vessels is in commission, neither prepared for sea, nor in a state of preparation. At no period, perhaps, was our naval force in a more efficient state of equipment than it is at this time, under the auspices of the present secretary. It was early prepared for service in the Mexican war, and it was dispatched to every point where it was wanting in the Gulf of Mexico or the Pacific ocean, for operating against the enemy. We understand that its economy is equal to its efficiency. The great inconvenience which the department has to sustain arises at this time from the want of seaman to man the vessels; but every possible exertion is making to remedy this defect, and to give the ships that are getting ready for sea the utmost efficiency of which they are susceptible. -- Washington Union. [CCB]

LT September 5, 1846/5F "AMERICA."

[The following appeared in a third edition of The Times of yesterday:--]

LIVERPOOL, FRIDAY MORNING.

The steam-ship Great Western, Captain Mathews, which arrived in the Mersey shortly before midnight, has put us in possession of accounts from New York to the 20th ult., inclusive.

These advices are entirely unimportant, and even with regard to the naval and military operations on the frontiers of Mexico we have little intelligence worthy of note. From Vera Cruz we have advices one day later, and from these we learn that affairs at that port remained unchanged. From Matamoras we are advised that General Taylor was still employed in the work of preparation. A military depot was being formed at Camargo, and the troops were concentrating at that place with all possible speed. Fears of pestilence were entertained by those stationed at Matamoras. Of the position of the Mexicans we have still no authentic accounts. According to letters from the seat of operations, ten heavy pieces of artillery had been mounted at Monteroz for the defence of the city; according to other statements a call for 7,000 men made upon the department of Nueva Leon had failed to evoke from the citizens any measures to repel the projected invasion; and to these reports it is further added, that the Mexican General Mejia had concentrated at Lenaures his force of 3,000 men. These reports are, however, altogether too doubtful in their character to meet ready acceptance. General Taylor was expected to move forward about the middle of August. Of General Wool's expedition we have no late news. From Fort Leavenworth, however, we learn that the expedition under General Kearney had, by the latest accounts, advanced to within 130 miles of Bent's Fort, and that the General had determined to push on past that point without delay. The Mormon troops remained at Fort Leavenworth. Rumours were in circulation among the traders and the Mexicans to the effect that General Urrea was marching at the head of a large Mexican force for the protection of the Santa Fe.

From New York we are advised, that vessels had been chartered for the immediate conveyance of the California expedition. We learn, also, that the tow war-steamer purchased by the United States Government were almost completed, and would shortly proceed to the Gulf of Mexico. Rumours of a privateer having appeared off the Isle of Pines are mentioned in the journals.

Domestic affairs in the Union present few features of interest. The elections in North Carolina had resulted in a most complete Whig triumph, ensuring the return of two Whig members to the Senate. The Secretary of the Navy is stated to be actively introducing valuable reforms into that branch of the public service over which he presides. The emigration from Arkansas to Texas is said to have recommenced. The public journals continue to relate fresh instances of the reappearance of the potato rot. The commercial accounts by the Caledonia occasioned no change of importance in the markets. Exchange on the 19th, sterling bills 8 to 8 1/4 premium.

From Canada our accounts are to the 17th ultimo. The journals contain loose rumours of a re-constitution of the Ministry being in completion. [CCB]

LT September 5, 1846/6e "The Affairs of Mexico"

(From our own Correspondent. )
Mexico, July 30.

Matamoros remains in the hands of the Americans, and Vera Cruz and Tampico are blockaded by their ships; but the rains prevalent at this time of the year, and which have fallen with unusual violence in that part of the country, have paralyzed the further operations of the American army on the Bravo under General Taylor. Nor has any attack yet been made by Commodore Connor on Vera Cruz or the Castle. General Taylor has now under his command about 14,000 men, a force sufficient to penetrate to San Luis Potosi. A great proportion of these, however, are volunteers from Texas, and the western states of North America, men who spurn at all control, and whom it will be difficult to subject to military discipline. It is known that they intend to march to the interior as soon as the weather permits, and that the first point of attack will be Monterey, the capital of Nuevo Leon, distant about 85 leagues from Matamoros. Some preparations for defence are not growing on there, and Megia has led the wrecks of the army of the north to strengthen the garrison; but Monterey is an open town, and the result will no doubt be a capitulation as soon as the Americans appear. General Arista has frankly expressed his opinion that Mexican soldiers, in their present state of discipline, cannot be brought to face the North Americans. It might be thought that this Government would see the wisdom of negotiation for peace before the Americans penetrate further into the country; but the national vanity and a touch of obstinacy, which they inherit from the Spaniards, forbid them to take the initiative. A rumour which has reached this of the offered mediation of Great Britain in the contest, has however given much satisfaction. Intelligence has been received from New Mexico of the invasion of that province by 6,000 Americans. Armigo, the governor, has applied for assistance to the authorities of Chihuahua, Durango, and Zacatecas, all of whom promise aid, but in reality can give none.

Civil war continues to augment the woes of Mexico. The insurgents of Guadalaxara are besieged in the center of the city, from which the troops of the Government are unable to dislodge them. General Arevalo, commanding the Government forces, effected, by mining, an entrance to a convent within the line of the insurgents; but the building was retaken, Arevalo and several of his officers and men killed, and the remainder made prisoners. Pacheco, the second in command, is accused of not supporting his chief on this occasion. Arevalo was a good officer, a native of Spain-- and perhaps for that reason sacrificed.

Paredes has published a code of rules and regulations for issuing letters of marque against the Americans. Mexico has no marine, the few vessels sailing under her flag belonging to Yucatan; but the peninsula takes no part in this contest, and for the present considers itself an independent state. The only parties likely to solicit letters of marque here are slave-traders and other desperados from the Havannah, who make no very nice distinction between privateering and piracy.

A general amnesty to prisoners accused of political offences, was published a few days ago, by which means Senor Trigueros, ex-Minister of Finance, recovered his liberty after about two months' close confinement, on a charge of conspiring in favour of Santa Anna. The same clemency was extended to a British subject confined in the castle of Perote on the same grounds.

On the 28th inst. General Paredes surrendered the reins of Government to General Bravo, now Vice-President. Paredes goes to command the army, nominally against the Americans, but probably in the first instance against the pronunciados of Guadalaxara.

I send you a translation of Bravo's speech to Congress on taking possession of the Government. It has the merit of conciseness, and the rarer one of truth. The situation of the country is there faithfully depicted. No one attributes much ability to General Bravo; but he is considered a man of good intentions, although it is not forgotten that he forcibly dissolved the Congress of 1842 in obedience to the mandate of Santa Anna, and that he used that brief interval of power to confer the most extraordinary privileges on the port of Acapulco, near which his own property is situated, all which immunities Santa Anna immediately revoked.

All the Ministers of Paredes have resigned.

The blockade of the Atlantic ports, of course, renders arrangements for the payment of the public debt, the means for which must be derived from the maritime custom-houses, mere matters of theory. Before retiring from office, however, Senor Iturbe produced, and General Paredes decreed, a new financial scheme, the leading feature of which is the resumption by Government of one-half of the customs' revenue, while the other half is appropriated to the payment of the debt 20 per cent. of the Vera Cruz and Tampico custom-houses going to the English bondholders, and to the payment of British claims adjusted by diplomatic intervention, the quota assigned by those conventions. I do not observe, however, that any provision is made for the repayment of the sums seized in the violation of all agreements by Senor Iturbe. His answer, when applied to on this score, is a remarkable specimen of assurance. "If I had to repay those sums, " said the Minister, "I should gain nothing by having taken them." This logic may do in Mexico, but will hardly be considered satisfactory in Downing-street. The new scheme would place the future control of the custom-houses very much in the hands of Iturbe himself, and a few of the other large holders of the 26 per cent. fund, to the level of which it is proposed to reduce the copper certificates, and a variety of other credits against the Government. But the holders of these credits have demurred and protested, and it is thought that the next Minister will alter or repeal the decree. This is the great evil of Mexican legislation; nothing is permanent. On the formation of the 25 per cent. fund, they did their best to tie themselves down by printing the decree in the body of the bonds, but the terms of that decree have already undergone several modifications, and now a sweeping measure is attempted, giving the fun an entirely new character.

The list of the new Cabinet has not yet been published. It is said that the war department will be given to General Mora, and that of finance to Don Antonio Faray.
Both are men of experience and ability.

The arrival of a conducta, with about 800,000 from Zacatecas and Guanaxuato, has relieved in some degree the pressure in the money market; but a general want of confidence still prevails here, the result of recent failures and the unsettled state of the country. Robberies on the roads have multiplied in an extraordinary manner. In the short space of ten days nice diligences have been robbed. A muleteer, bringing goods from Vera Cruz, has sent to solicit assistance from this, finding himself surrounded by robbers at Rio Frio. Cotton wool has reached the extraordinary price of 32 per quintal; but scarcely any other article has advanced in price since the declaration of blockade. [CCB]
Speech of General Bravo to the Mexican Congress

I have taken an oath, the solemnity of which forbids me to forget that the obligations it imposes are closely united with the future destinies of the country. In its present struggling position, divided by the political opinions of its children, and threatened by the voracious ambition of the United States of the North, the task of governing it is difficult, and hard the lot of him who is called to the helm of the sinking vessel in the midst of such tempests. Eleven years of an obstinate and glorious struggle to emancipate the nation from its ancient rulers, left the people satisfied, although wearied. But the successive and almost continued disturbances of the last 25 years appear to have exhausted their patriotism. For who, gentlemen, does not observe (and painful it is to refer to the fact) that the critical situation of the republic, when our attention should be fixed on the melancholy picture it presents, does not excite the public spirit which should animate it? What true patriot, what honourable man, does no give way to the most melancholy reflections at seeing the country languid and spiritless, waiting for its enemies to come and gather the fruit of the discord which their crafty malignity has sown amongst us? To the wisdom of Congress it belongs to find a fitting remedy for so great an evil, a remedy so important and efficacious, as to create and reorganize every thing under the established system.

This is, indeed, a difficult task. To accomplish it, the collision of a thousand private interests is inevitable; but let us not forget that the chief object our labours should be the support of the war to defend the independence of the country--a war which is now a sacred duty to every one who bears the name of a Mexican, and desires to leave an honourable name to posterity.

Gentlemen! let us save the Republic; let us prepare the glorious trophies which, dyed with the blood of our progenitors, gave it a place amongst the distinguished nations of the universe. Let us save the country; all her sons burying for this object, in oblivion, the quarrels which divide them; and check with strong and energetic hand the disturbers of order and public tranquility.

I solemnly offer the sacrifice required of me for so laudable an object. The Congress may accept it with the confidence that my words have never been falsified, for they are the expression of my real sentiments.

Mexico, July 28, 1846.
NICOLAS BRAVO.

Address of the liberating republican army

"City of Mexico, August 4
"Liberating Republican Army.

"In the morning of this day almost the whole of the garrison of this capital, who are at this moment under the orders of the undersigned and of General Don Juan Morales, occupying the citadel, declared against the Government, and will soon be in possession of the whole city, as the troops who remain under the orders of Generals Bravo and Paredes are insignificant, and are extremely disaffected, and almost in union with us; for it cannot long be concealed from any good Mexican that the holy cause which we defend is the cause of the people and of national independence.

In the name of these, then, we invite your Excellency--and rely confidently on your sincere patriotism--immediately to second an enterprise so noble, and give thus a day of glory to the country to which you have rendered so many services. It is, beyond all doubt, certain that the cause which we defend will speedily triumph, not only because the Government (so called) may be said to be already overthrown, but because the whole nation is in commotion, and resolve to vanquish those who wish to sacrifice it. The triumphs obtained by our arms in Guadalaxara, and the pronunciamento of the whole department of Vera Cruz, attest this truth; and for the complete information of your Excellency, it only remains for me to state to you, that the valiant generals Landero and Perez declared themselves in the city of Vera Cruz on the 31st ultimo, inviting, through a commission, the illustrious General Santa Anna to come and place himself immediately at the head of the army sustaining the national independence and liberties, in conformity with the plan which we have proclaimed, and of which I herewith transmit copies to your Excellency. The enthusiasm among the united people are the army cannot be greater; chiefs, officers, and men of all classes of society are presenting themselves to us by hundreds.

We congratulate ourselves, in the name of the nation, which will soon be able to show its gratitude to its worthy servants.

"God and liberty,
"J. Mariano De Salas.
"Valentin Gomes Farias."

"To his excellency the Commandant-General of the Department of Vera Cruz." [CCB]

The intelligence just received from Mexico will increase the disgust with which the conduit of the people of that country has long been viewed, and will greatly diminish the sympathy hitherto felt for them on account of the ill-treatment they have experienced at the hands of the American Government. There is no possibility of helping those who are unwilling to help themselves, and such appears to be the conditions of the Mexicans. They are wasting upon internal discord the little energy and limited resources they possess, while standing almost in the presence of a powerful enemy. We might with justice cease to feel an interest in the fate of a country so perversely bent upon its own ruin, were it not that our own commerce is suffering severely from the present condition of the relations between the United States and Mexico. A squabble, however contemptible, which impedes the progress of trade on the part of neutrals, and renders private property liable to those dangers that are inseparable from a state of domestic anarchy---such a contention between two litigants who seem both unable to bring the quarrel to an end is a nuisance which a third party should be allowed to terminate. Friendly offers of mediation have already been made by our late as well as our present Minister for Foreign Affairs; but the United States and Mexico seen disposed to "fight it out"---a process which threatens to prove exceedingly tedious. On one side we find large resources injudiciously applied, and on the other internal discord dividing the force that needs the utmost concentration to give it the smallest chance of proving successful. We can scarcely hope for the triumph of the Mexican cause, after the specimens we have seen of the incapacity of the Mexican people to provide efficiently for their own government. Were they to retain their nominal independence, it is only too probable that they would continue to be the slaves of that spirit of vacillation which subjects them to a constant change of rulers, and dooms the country to a condition practically amounting to anarchy. No sooner does the last new President turn his back on the seat of Government, than, almost in a night, there springs up in his place some mushroom rival. He, in his turn, is superseded by another, equally rapid in growth and with as little hold on the ground he occupies. Santa Anna has by this time returned to such power as can be held by the nominal head of a body whose members cannot be brought to cooperate in any sustained effort for their general benefit. He is said to be determined on continuing the war; but it is not improbable that, with the fatal tendency to disunion which prevails among the people, their sentiments may take a pacific turn when the President is known to be bent on an opposite policy.

The downfall of Paredes cannot be deplored, for in the midst of the crisis to which Mexico has been exposed, with conquest threatening from abroad, and every social evil preying on the vitality of the country at home, the President who has just been replaced remained at least inactive, if not indifferent. His imbecility, which might have kept him harmless under ordinary circumstances, rendered him wholly unfit to retain the office of President in a country whose greatest evil is the want of a strong Government. If Santa Anna can supply such a desideratum, his restoration will be a happy event, of which not only Mexico itself, but all who are interested in its commerce, will speedily feel the benefit. Whether the war is to be continued or concluded, a strong Government is equally essential for the security of neutrals, who will naturally feel disposed to sympathize with that party which affords them most efficiently the protection to which they are entitled. The Cabinet of the United States is scarcely to be blamed for evincing an indisposition to negotiate with men who, though nominally rulers to-day, may be deposed and treated as traitors to-morrow.
A country must be itself untied before it can inspire the confidence of those who are disposed to become its allies, or obtain the respect of such as are in the position of its enemies. Mexico can neither make a honourable peace, nor prosecute a war with the chance of success, until its interests are placed under the protection of an efficient Executive. [CCB]

LT September 25, 1846/5a US and Mexico

Liverpool, Thursday.

By the packet-ship Columbia, Captain Rathbone, we have received New York accounts of the 1st instant.

The intelligence contained is important.

From Mexico we learn that Santa Anna had passed the blockade and landed at Vera Cruz. Paredes had been seized and imprisoned; and the once exiled chief would now appear to reign supreme chief over the unstable and degraded citizens of the "republic." We learn, also, on the authority of the American accounts, that the United States squadron in the Pacific had seized upon California. From the Rio del Norte we are advised that the town of China, situate about 60 miles about the central depot of Camargo, had been invested by a small American force. Gradual advances en route to Monterey were being made by the troops. In New Mexico Armijo was making vain efforts to induce the citizens to arrest the progress of General Kearney's army.

From Canada our accounts are of no moment.

Half-past 4 o'clock p.m.

A ship with several days' later intelligence is announced as off the port.

(Correspondence of the Express.)

The steamer of M'Kim arrived at New Orleans on the 23d, with dates from Point Isabel to the 17th, and from Camargo to the 13th. She brought 100 volunteers on the sick list. General William O. Butler was confined to his tent at Point Isabel by sickness. China, 60 miles above Camargo, was taken by M'Culloch and his 75 Rangers on the 5th of August. Seguin, with 100 mounted Mexicans, took flight from the town, which contains 700 inhabitants. There were 300 regular troops at Camargo on the 9th, ready to start for Monterey.

The volunteers were pouring in. General Taylor arrived on the 9th with his staff.
Baylie Peyton also arrived on the 9th. A grand review of the troops took place, and it is said General Taylor expressed himself in terms of admiration of their discipline.
Duncan's battery, and M'Culloch, with a portion of his men, left Camargo on the 12th in the direction of Monterey.

The steamer Arab arrived off Vera Cruz on the 15th inst., with Santa Anna on board.
He immediately placed himself at the head of the movement in that department. The departments of Puebla and Mexico have declared for Santa Anna, and Paredes has already been taken prisoner. The revolt at the Capital was headed by General Salas.
Before Santa Anna left Havannah, he took letters from General Campbell to Commodore Connor, and avowed himself, in reply to some inquiries as to his intentions, as follows:--If the people of my country are for war, then I am with them; but I would prefer peace.

News has been received in Mexico and Monterey and California had been taken by one of the vessels of the United States squadron. Another account says that all California has yielded to the Americans.

A letter dated at Vera Cruz on the 16th of August says that advices have been received by express of the formal annexation of California to the United States, that is, the United States forces have taken possession of California. This news came to the British Consulate at Vera Cruz.

Despatches were to be sent to England and to New Orleans by special express.

Later from Santa Fe.
Baltimore, Monday Evening.

The St. Louis Reveille publishes a letter from Santa Fe, dated July 17, from which we learn that Governor Armijo had ordered the people to be in readiness to march against the United States army. It is suggested that he makes this demonstration of resistance without really intending to execute it, although he intimates that he would rather fight than surrender the country. He assured the merchants and traders that they would all be protected.

Late from Pernambuco.

Liverpool, Thursday

The Swordfish, Captain Green, arrived from Pernambuco this morning, with advices to the 25th of August. She brings, however, no political advices of moment. Exchange is quoted at 261/2. [CCB]

LT September 28, 1846/4C California

here must be a limit to that tendency to absorption which a great historian has described as the great territorial law of modern times. An overbearing desire of aggrandizement, superseding for its own satisfaction the usages of public law and the dictates of common equity, is as dangerous to the peace of the world now, as it was when every century was characterized by the blood and treasure expended in checking it. New political terms do not change the realities of political conduct. It was observed after the peace of Westphalia, that the word secularization, with which the ecclesiastical negotiations at Munster had enriched the language of diplomacy, was destined to such notoriety as was hardly dreamt of at its first introduction. Such seems likely to be the fate of the term "annexation"--a simple and unobjectionable expression of a new world which will hereafter imply what in the old would be stigmatized as a treacherous and tyrannical invasion of the property of others. European history offers no parallel to the territorial condition of the North American continent, unless, indeed, a faint resemblance be traced in the consolidation of the Germanic empire after the dismemberment of the realms of CHARLEMAGNE. An enormous district, scarcely yet reclaimed from its aboriginal savages, possessed by a nation of Saxon settlers powerful enough to overrun any single portion, but not numerous enough to colonize all--a country in which the formation and consolidation of states is yet in progress--in which few boundaries have acquired the sanctity of a prescription, and not all even the advantages of certainty--in which many frontiers are as vague and as wild as the marches of the tenth century--and in which the revolutionary disorders of an empire's childhood appear not yet to have been passed through--such is America; offering to an observant eye a living and moving illustration of those peculiar chapters which open the history of every old country of Europe. What will be the result of a century's changes it would be hazardous to predict. Whether the magnificent aspiration will be realized of a new Saxon with its capital on the Potomac--whether states now united will be isolated into independent Governments--whether the hitherto neglected districts of the north-west will be absorbed in a central power, or revolt into a distinct maritime state giving law to the Pacific--all these questions will be resolved by time alone. But as the operations on which they depend differ in this form their European precedents, that they are carried on not in the night of ages but in the light of day, and before the eyes of intelligent nations, they can be exempted neither from strictures nor intervention, if they are attended with breaches of those eternal laws of justice which should rule both worlds alike.

If the tone of the American papers did not convey so unequivocally the sentiments of their countrymen, we should not for a moment have conceived that the seizure of California by the United States, announced in our paper of Friday, could have been possibly contemplated, as leading to a permanent occupation, even by the Americans themselves; nor are we now willing to believe that these barefaced avowals of the people can really represent the sentiments of the Government. That one nation at war with another in a most trivial cause should coolly seize upon its largest province upon no other plea than that it was "unnecessary to the enemy but of the greatest importance to themselves," or that the new line of demarcation would "square off the territories of both nations," is nothing but a most extravagant assertion of the right of the stronger. The province of California embraces in its extent nearly one-half of the territories of the Mexican republic, its splendid natural advantages have been barely touched, and a land, in many places as fertile as the plains of Champagne, with a climate compared to the suns and skies of Andalusia, lies still open to the settler. An immense line of sea coast contains one of the finest harbours in the world, within which it is stated that the whole navies of Europe and America might ride in security together. To the Power from which it thus coolly proposed to abstract it, this province is of such vital importance than its loss must almost inevitably entail the loss of all the national interdependence, and the absorption of all the remaining provinces, whenever it may seem fit to Congress to change the form of the southern boundary of their territory from the quadrilateral shape now preferred into some more graceful and irregular termination.

It happens, too, that the interest of England in this transaction is somewhat beyond that necessarily felt by every nation in whatever affects the validity and the influence of public law. That a stronger state should so gratuitously "annex a weaker, is a precedent dangerous enough to demand at least a protest, but the matter is graver still when the property seized is already charged with liabilities honestly and openly contracted towards a third party. For some of the numerous monies with which our capitalists have been induced to support and stimulate Mexican enterprise this province is, we believe, our only security, and the rights of mortgagees for which we exchanged our advances are not to be demolished by the unscrupulousness of the invaders of the imbecility of the sufferers. In the character which each nation sustains in the commonwealth of nations we may protest against a piratical infraction of the international code, but in our capacity of honourable creditors we are bound to demand that our lien upon a mortgaged territory be preserved in its full integrity and value. Republics are really more tyrannically aggressive than despotic monarchies. Within three years after the emancipation of the Helvetic cantons from Austrian rule they exhibited a true criterion of nationality by seizing the territories of their neighbours. The reunions of Louis XIV were equitable assertions of right compared with the "annexations" of the American President, nor does the outward show of decency which protracted the existence of Alsace and Lorraine appear to be in store for Mexico. Already are we sufferers by the lingering and useless squabble which gives opportunity to these outrages on justice. A country indebted to others for all the sinews of its strength foregoes the right of independent folly. Mexico is not entitled to the indulgence of a gasconade at the expense of English capital, whatever it might choose to do at the risk of its own security. Our arbitration was spoken of some time ago as likely to be in request, and certainly there have been very few instances in late times where we might give it with greater advantage, or impose it with greater reason. [CCB]

LT October 1, 1846/6A-B Mexican War

"UNITED STATES AND MEXICO; ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA."

[A portion of the following appeared in a second edition of The Times of yesterday:--]

We have received by express from Liverpool our dispatches from the United States by the Royal Mail Steamship Britannia, Captain Hewitt, arrived in the Mersey shortly after 4 o' clock on Wednesday morning, from Boston and Halifax, with the usual mails of the 16th of September.

The contents of these advices are not of striking importance. The operations and prospects of Mexican war continued, up to the dates of our letters, as indecisive as ever; and, beyond the general statement that further, though slight, advances had been made by the several columns of invasion marching against Mexico, we have little intelligence to communicate differing in tenour from that brought by the last steamers.

From Vera Cruz advices to the 29th of August are published in the American journals. The landing of Santa Anna had been attended with great demonstrations of joy, and that chief had taken his departure inland, but of his arrival in the capital we have no accounts. Despatches from the President had been received by the commander of the blockading squadron, and immediately afterwards a communication was had with the shore under a flag of truce. These dispatches are supposed to contain the proposition of the Cabinet to offer a resumption of negotiations with the Mexican Government.

The United States brig of war Truxton had been totally wrecked on the 15th, near the mouth of the river Tuppan. Two lieutenants and 19 men reached the squadron at Vera Cruz in boats: the remainder of the officers and crew, including also the captain, landed with the intention of surrendering themselves prisoners of war. The Princeton steam-frigate proceeded to the assistance of the brig on the arrival of the boats; but, finding her rescue to be impossible, set fire to the hull, and after ascertaining that the remainder of the crew had set out for Tampico, she returned to Vera Cruz. Tampico and Tobasco had joined in the revolution. The yellow fever is stated to have broken out on board the British vessels of war at Sacrificios. A portion of the United States squadron was suffering from scurvy.

From Camargo we learn that it was the intention of General Taylor to leave that place with the main body of the army about the 5th of September. 300 mules, 200 wagons, and 160,000 rations had been sent on in advance; and it is stated that the General intends, if unopposed by the Mexicans, to proceed at once to Saltillo. Other accounts state, however, that his means of transport were still deficient. Meanwhile, parties of rangers were actively scouring the country around the destined line of march, and had visited en route several of the small towns of the district without encountering resistance or discovering any signs of an opposing force. According to general report, however, the Mexicans had concentrated at Monterey, to the extent of some few thousand ill-paid and ill-clothed men. Disgraceful riots, we also learn, had taken place among the volunteers at Barita, arising from a feud existing between an Irish company and two of the Georgian corps. The affair took place on board of a steam-boat which was anchored near the shore. Guns, swords, and bayonets were used with reckless violence. The colonel of a regiment of Illinois volunteers, who, at the head of two of his companies, attempted to quell the disturbance, was wounded, and his men were driven back; and when at length the rioters submitted, a considerable number of men had been either killed or wounded.

Colonel Harney had marched from San Antonio (Texas), on the 23d, with 120 United States Dragoons, 500 mounted Texans, and 18 Delawares, for Monclovia, Mexico.

From St. Louis we learn that General Kearney's command had left Bent's Fort for Santa Fe on the 3d. Kearney had lost 100 horses, and the troops were on half ration.

The California expedition was on the point of leaving New York.

Rumours were current that an agent from the Mexican Government was at Washington.

The domestic affairs of the Union continue to be unimportant. Mr. Bancroft had been appointed Minister to London. Mr. Mason had received the vacant Navy Department, and the journals mention Mr. Pickers, of South Carolina, for the French mission. Mr. M'Lane had been addressed with congratulations by the merchants of New York, and had accepted an invitation to a public dinner, to take place at some future day. The Mormons of Nauvoo were apparently in a precarious position. The Anti-Mormons were encamped in large force in the immediate vicinity of that place, and a collision appeared imminent. Numerous disasters to the shipping had taken place on the coast, and amongst other losses we note that of the Olive Branch from Briston to Boston. The New York journals state that the people of Mercer's county, Ohio, had at a meeting resolved to expel from their boundaries, by force, if necessary, the coloured people then residing in the county. Major-General Gaines had been appointed to the command of the eastern division of the United States army. A great flood had occurred in Crooked Creek, near Madison, Indiana. Much damage was caused, and six lives were lost. Mr. Pakenham was on a visit to Mr. Webster. Mr. Webster was expected to make a great speech, reviewing the course of the Administration on the Mexican war, at the public dinner to be given to him in Philadelphia about the 1st of October. A case of yellow fever had at length occurred in New Orleans on the 1st ult.

Our accounts from Canada are unimportant. Her Majesty's ships Vindictive and Gulnare were at Quebec. The Quebec Gazette states that the late grain crops were generally secured. The potato crop was almost ripe, and had not sustained any material injury.

Advises from Yucatan state that a forcible attempt had been made to overturn the Presidency of General Barbachan. The effort was, however, unsuccessful.

The American journals publish advices from the River Plate, containing the credentials of Mr. Hood. With the exception of this document, the intelligence given has been anticipated.

Havannah papers to the 26th had reached Mobile. The Spanish flag had been hoisted upon the steamers Montezuma and Guadalupe, lately of the Mexican navy. The journals publish some interesting statistics relative to the commerce of Havannah, from which we glean that-- "The number of vessels arrived at Havannah from the 1st of January to the 22nd of August, 1846, was 439, measuring together 92, 570\(\frac{1}{2}\) tons. Out of this number 277 were American vessels, with 61,708\(\frac{1}{2}\) tons measurement, 84 were Spanish vessels, with 13, 840 tons, and 35 English vessels, with 5,003 tons. The 43 remaining vessels were divided among 13 different nations. The number of vessels that left the port of Havannah during the same period was 442. Out of these 291 were Americans, 77 Spanish, and 33 English; the other 41 were divided also among 13 different nations. The table of exports from Matanzas from the 1\(\text{st}\) of January to the 22\(\text{d}\) of August gives the following figures of the principal articles of exportation:--

219,111\(\frac{1}{2}\) boxes of sugar, 5,521 hogsheads ditto, 618 barrels ditto, 45,179 hogsheads of molasses, and 18,907 arrobas of coffee." [CCB]
General Worth. Three steam-boats arrived at Camargo on the 21st ult., with General Shields, M.M.O. Butler, and several colonels and majors.

Colonel Harney marched from St. Antonio (Texas), on the 23d, with 120 United States Dragoons, 500 mounted Texans, and 18 Delawares, for Monclova, Mexico. This astonished General Taylor very much, who does not like Colonel Harney's moving in advance of Wool.

General Twiggs, with the 2d Dragoons, Light Artillery, and the batteries of Captains Taylor and Ridgley, arrived at Camargo August 22.

The 1st and 2d Regiments of Ohio Volunteers, six companies of the Louisville Legion, and the Baltimore Battalion, arrived at Camargo on the 23d. They suffered much from the want of water, but stood the fatigues of the march pretty well. One of them died on the way up from Matamoras. General Worth establishes his first depot at Seralvo; he will then go on and establish another, half way between that place and Monterey.

The steamer Rough and Ready arrived at Camargo, with Colonel Croghan, Inspector-General, and other officers on board.

The news of the revolution in Santa Anna's favour reached General Taylor's camp on the 27th, and created a great sensation. No one knew what to think of it.

A letter dated Camargo, 20th ult., says General Taylor would leave on September 5 for Monterey. [CCB]

(From the Washington Union. )

We are indebted to the head of one of the bureaus for the following extracts of letters "from officers of General Taylor's command, which he thinks will be found full of interest":--

"EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM AN OFFICER OF THE ENGINEER STAFF (TOPOGRAPHICAL) WITH GENERAL TAYLOR'S ARMY."

"On the 4th of August I received verbal orders form General Taylor, with my assistants, to accompany Colonel Garland's command for the purpose of reconnoitering the road between Matamoras and Camargo.

General Worth having been ordered to advance and establish a depot at Seralvo, he was engaged on the 19th of August in passing the river St. Juan, as the best route is found to be by the vicinity of Mier. Lieutenants Meade and Pope have been ordered to report to him. They began their march on the 20th inst. The command consists of about 1,000 men, inclusive of Captain Duncan's artillery.

Seralvo is at a distance of 66 miles from Camargo, and about 70 from Monterey, and is generally regarded as the half-way point. It is in a direction from Camargo W.S.W. The last portion of the road, in approaching Seralvo, is through a hilly district, and passes many small mountain streams; the mountains are distinctly visible from Seralvo.

Seralvo is at a distance of 66 miles from Camargo, and about 70 from Monterey, and is generally regarded as the half-way point. It is in a direction from Camargo W.S.W. The last portion of the road, in approaching Seralvo, is through a hilly district, and passes many small mountain streams; the mountains are distinctly visible from Seralvo.

From Camargo to Mier the road lies in the valley of the Rio Grande; it then follows up the valley of the Alamo to Seralvo, either passing by Agua Loagua or Purito Aguda.

The road over which Lieutenant-Colonel Garland's command passed from Matamoras was that by Gaetano and Reynosa, as the river road was too wet and miry for heavy trains. It is called the 'upper road,' is 17 miles longer, and is very dry weather impracticable for troops, owing to the deficiency of water. In rainy weather, or when the snow melts at the head streams, the Rio Grande rises at a great elevation, and overflows the back country. It is a topographical feature of this region worthy of note that the rivers generally rise and fall through an unusual vertical space; and it is asserted that in some instances the fluctuation reaches as much as 90 feet.
In the late flood the water was two feet deep in the plaza at Camargo; this came from the St. Juan, but it was an unusual rise, as many of the houses were destroyed by the inundation. The rise at this point was not, however, more than 30 or 35 feet.

In my reconnaissance of the 'river road,' long after the flood was at its maximum, and had begun to subside, I found the water across the road, is various places, up to my saddle skirts. This was the back-water from the Rio Grande.

The army in the field between Seralvo and Point Isabel amounts to, volunteers and regulars, perhaps 16,000 men, the volunteers being portions of the quota from each state that has been called upon; the remainder, perhaps about 8,000 volunteers, are yet to arrive.

At Point Isabel there remains but one company, and the place is commanded by Major Gardner; it is the depot of ordnance, and the general hospital. In the vicinity of the Brazos and Barita are encamped two brigades of volunteers. At Matamoras and Fort Brown, three companies of regulars, and one regiment of volunteers.

Captain Vinton was expedited from Camargo to Mier with a small command about a fortnight since, in consequence of an irruption of the Indians, and for the protection of the inhabitants against their incursions. At Seralvo General Worth was about 1,000 strong, as before stated.

The brigade of Colonel Smith has crossed the river and is awaiting the means of transportation, to enable him to move towards Seralvo. The rest of the army are either en route towards this place, or are encamped here.

The transportation of troops from the Brazos is generally operated by steam-boats, after marching them across from the Brazos to near the mouth of the Rio Grande. The river is navigable for steamers of small class to a distance of about two miles above the mouth of the St. Juan, at which point they are arrested by rapids. A similar obstruction occurs in the St. Juan, about six miles above this place; but, overcoming it, it is said the river is navigable for 60 miles. It would almost be worth while, should the position of the army be permanent at Monterey, to take advantage of high water in the river to get a boat above rapids, which I presume might be effected; it would be a vast economy of transportation.

It is understood that it is the wish of General Taylor to advance upon Monterey, but that he is delayed by the necessary arrangements for depots of various kinds, and the throwing forward of the necessary munitions; or, in a work, in perfecting his line of communications. The difficulties encountered in operations of this nature seem to be very formidable, for very little reliance is placed upon the resources of the territory in which we are engaged; and it is difficult to procure any supplies from the inhabitants, who are utterly thriftless and lazy, and who require for the little they do supply the most extravagant prices. We pass through a country richly provided with grass, and covered with herds of thriving cattle, yet they supply the camp with fodder, beef, milk, &c., at a price far exceeding what it can be purchased for in the most populous cities of the United States.

Such a people can obviously never meet us in battle with success; they will abandon the field, though their numbers should triple our own.

From news received this morning, the force at Monterey consists of about 6,000 men, of whom about 2,000 are regulars, being the remains of the army defeated on the 8th and 9th of May. They have likewise a force in advance of Monterey of about 700 Cavalry (at Cadarna, 25 miles from Monterey). The informant represents them as well prepared for action, and states that the horses are in miserable condition.

They have at Monterey two pieces of artillery, 24 pounders, and four of small caliber; he states they are fortifying, but that their works and not in a state of completion.

General Taylor received the news last evening of the movement, without orders, of Lieutenant-Colonel Harney from San Antonio towards Monclova; it is now almost a month since he set out upon the expedition.

Under existing circumstances, it is believed that General Taylor will make the utmost exertion to reach Monterey, and it is believed that no resistance will be made of any moment to the entrance of his army. The person who brings this intelligence asserts that the people of Monterey and the country adjacent are anxious for the arrival of the Americans.
The station of my camp has been determined by me. I find it in latitude 26 degrees 20, 01.8; about one-third of a mile north of the Plaza. I regret extremely that I have not the means of determining longitudes; it would be one of the best means of verifying our reconnaissances, and establishing geographical points." [CCB]

LT October 7, 1846/5F "State of Affairs in Mexico."

(From our own correspondent. )
Mexico, August 29.

The political scene here has again changed. The outlawed Santa Anna has returned, and is called to the head of affairs; while Paredes, who so lately ruled the destinies of Mexico, is a prisoner in the castle of Perote. The alliance of Paredes with the monarchical party, and his persecution of the press (even here an engine of power) caused the formation of a strong coalition against him, and the misfortunes experienced in the campaign against the Americans deprived him of the little influence which, as a soldier, he still retained. The army (irregularly paid) shared the discontent of the people, while the friends of Santa Anna laboured incessantly to increase the embarrassments of Government. The military force concentrated here was, however, put in motion for the north, and General Paredes, with the rear guard, composed of troops on which he relied, was preparing to follow, leaving General Bravo, as Vice President, at the head of Government; when, on the morning of the 4th, General Salas, with about 1,000 men, chiefly cavalry, quartered in the citadel hoisted the standard of revolt, proclaiming the recall of Santa Anna, and the reconstitution of the Government on democratic principles. With the name of Salas (hitherto rather an obscure one) is associated, in this revolution, that of Valentin Gomez Farias, the man of the people, half whose life has been passed in prisons, in hiding places, and in exile, the result of his systematic opposition to almost every government which has existed here. In 1833 he was Vice President, and for a short time acting President of the Republic, of which he availed himself to carry his favourite theories into practice, and effected the abolition of the civil obligation to pay tithes, a measure which has naturally made the church his irreconcilable foe. Then it was that the Centralists, uniting the Santa Anna, overturned the Federal Republic, and compelled Gomez Farias to fly for safety in to the United States. He has since reappeared at intervals, like the messenger of the storm, whenever a popular insurrection was at hand, but with invariably bad success. Nothing daunted, he again enters the arena, and lays all personal feeling so completely aside to join the military in recalling Santa Anna, on the condition of return to the federal form of Government. In this alliance both parties probably set with, duplicity; the military, believing that with Santa Anna at their head there will be no necessity to keep faith with the Liberals; and Gomez Farias, confiding that the people, once more in the exercise of power, will use it to the destruction of the army, which he detests.

On the announcement of this revolution, General Bravo refused to surrender, though with inferior numbers and no artillery he could not hope to offer an effectual resistance. The days of the 4th and 5th were passed here in a gloomy uncertainty, of all the shops being closed, and anarchy apparently at hand. On the night of the 5th, Paredes left the city with a guard of 40 Lancers; but the revolters having timely notice of his movements immediately sent a larger body in pursuit, who effected his capture without resistance, and consigned him to a prison in the citadel, there to meditate on the instability of fortune. During the night Salas advanced his forces in all directions towards the palace, and in the morning it was announced that Bravo had submitted, without any stipulation in favour of Paredes; or, indeed, of any sort, except that of a guard of honour for himself. In this movement the moderate Liberals took no part, the breach between their leaders Gomez-Pedraza, and Santa Anna being still unhealed. Intelligence of the revolution being communicated to the army on their march to the north, it met their immediate concurrence. But the civil authorities in the departments have shown no haste to adopt it. Their recollection of Santa Anna's tyranny, venality, and profound hypocrisy is still too recent to permit their desiring his presence, or feeling any confidence in his promises. However, they offer no resistance, and appear inclined to wait the course of events, with the consolatory reflection that nothing in Mexico, good or bad, can, by any possibility, be lasting. On the 16th, Santa Anna landed at Vera Cruz, having come from the Havana in a private steamer (the Arab), hired from an enterprising Irishman, who seems always to have a steamer on sale or charter some where in the Gulf. His reception, except by the military, was cold, and he has since lingered at his estate, the Encero, in no hurry apparently to assume the reins of government. He has published a manifesto, in which he reviews his own political career, and takes credit for the most patriotic intentions, though he admits having entertained mistaken opinions. He now sees no safety for the country except in a return to the purest democracy. His oldest friends, the Conservatives, are dismissed with contempt, and he seizes the occasion to have a sneer at the church. "Habits of passive obedience," says he, "are no more, and if a religious feeling still exists time has mined the political power of the directors of consciences." He professes the utmost horror of a dictatorship, and at his suggestion the Federal Constitution of 1824 is declared in force, until a popular Congress shall reconstitute the country.

While "the great Mexican family," as they delight to call themselves, are performing this wretched farce, the Anglo-Americans are appropriating whole provinces of their territory without resistance. New Mexico is already invaded by a strong body of adventurers; Chihuahua, one of the richest districts of the north, will soon share the same fate; and at Monterey, on the Pacific, Commodore Sloat has "annexed" California to the United States by a simple proclamation. At Matamoros, General Taylor has found his most formidable enemy in the heavy rains, which have rendered the roads to the capital of Nuevo Leon impassable to his wagons and artillery. When the rains cease, Commodore Connor will probably attack Vera Cruz and Tampico. It has been ordered at Washington, that in the Mexican ports occupied by the forces of the United States, American manufactures only, or foreign goods which have been nationalized by the payment of duty in the United States, shall be admitted, the latter to be conveyed to this country in American bottoms. As a natural consequence of these disorders, commercial affairs here are wholly prostrated. The conductas of silver, appointed to leave Zacatecas and Guanajuato early in next month, will probably be deferred, both from the want of a sufficient escort, and from the uncertain position of Tampico, already threatened by an American corps detached from Matamoros. From the circumstance of Santa Anna's being allowed to enter Vera Cruz notwithstanding the blockade, it was supposed that an understanding existed between him and the Americans, which might lead to peace; but "his voice is still for war," and with matchless assurance he promises to present Congress with laurels gathered on the banks of the Sabine, thus pledging himself to the reconquest of all Texas. The United States' bring of war, Truxton, has been lost off the bar of Tuxpan. The officers and crew are prisoners in the hands of the Mexicans, and are said to be well treated. I subjoin the proclamation of the Commodore Sloat:

"Inhabitants of California, --The Central Government of Mexico having commenced hostilities against the United States of America, by invading their territory, and attacking their troops on the northern side of the Rio Grande, with a force composed of 7,000 men, under the command of General Arista, which army was totally destroyed, and all its artillery, baggage, &c., taken by 2,300 men under General Taylor on the 8th and 9th of May last, and the city of Matamoros occupied by the forces of the United States; the two nations being consequently at war, I shall immediately hoist the flag of the United States in Monterey, and carry it through the whole of California. I declare to the inhabitants, that though supported by a powerful force, I do not come amongst them as an enemy to California, on the contrary, as their best friend, for in future California will form part of the United States, and its peaceful inhabitants will enjoy the same rights and privileges as the citizens of any other portion of that nation, equally with those which they at present possess, including that of electing their own magistrates, and other officers for the administration of justice amongst themselves, and the same protection will be given to them as to any other state of the union. They will also possess a permanent government under which life, property, constitutional rights, and the legal privilege to adore the Creator in the mode most congenial to the belief of each will be secured--advantages which the Central Government of Mexico unfortunately cannot offer, destroyed as its resources are by internal factions and corrupt functionaries, who excite continual revolutions in order to advance their own interests, and oppress the people. Under the flag of the United States, California will be free from those sufferings and exactions, and will consequently advance rapidly both in agriculture and commerce, for the same fiscal laws will rule there as in other parts of the United States, allowing the introduction of the manufactures of the States free of duty, and foreign manufactures at one-fourth of what they now pay. A considerable rise will take place in the value of land, and of the productions of California, the country cannot fail to improve more rapidly than any other on the American continent. To those inhabitants of California, natives or foreigners, who may not be inclined to accept the high privilege of citizenship, and to live peaceably under the free government of the United States, time will be given to dispose of their property, and to leave the country, if they desire it, free from all restriction, or they may remain in it, observing a strict neutrality. With entire confidence in the honour and integrity of the inhabitants, I invite the judges, magistrates, and other civil officers to retain their appointments, and continue to perform their functions as hitherto for the maintenance of public tranquility, at least until the government of the territory shall be more exactly settled. All parties having titles to lands, or being in quite possession, of such land in a colour of rights, shall be guaranteed in the possession of those rights and titles. All the churches, and the property attached to them, in the hands of the clergy of California will retain the same rights as hitherto. All provisions and supplies furnished to the ships and troops of the United States will be paid for at fair prices, and no private property shall be applied to the public service without previous just compensation.

John Sloat
Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Pacific. On board the United States ship Savannah, in the port of Monterey, July 6, 1846." [CCB]

LT October 13, 1846/6C Money-Market and City Intelligence

Monday Evening.

The rumours that the Mexican Government had repudiated the bonds created by the new conversation, when more extensively spread, took the public completely by surprise, and they were unwilling to believe in a change so formidable. Hence, though there was a fall of nearly 1 per cent. in the course of the day, there was a constant disposition to rally, which might be looked upon as the measure of public incredulity.

On investigation, however, it turns out that the rumours in question are no idle fancies. Copies of the despatch addressed by the Mexican Government to Mr. Murphy, and brought to the latter by Senor Gomez Farias, the younger, are in the city, and these clearly show that all that has been said on the subject of Mexican repudiation has fallen short of, rather than exaggerated the truth. According to that document, the new Government has actually repudiated the new bonds, and does not contemplate any reparation to the bondholders, who have parted with their former securities. The despatch declares that the creditors had sufficient means to examine into the powers by which the conversion was made; and that if they did not use the facilities afforded them, they must put up with the consequences.

The Mexican bondholders will clearly remember that a plan for converting the debt was put forward before the one on which the present bonds are founded, and was rejected, on the ground that it was too disadvantageous to the holders of the deferred stock. Very shortly after this another plan was brought forward, which was accepted, and which was the plan now in operation. At the time when the matter was under discussion many cautious holders were unwilling to accept the new scheme, thinking that it had made its appearance too soon after the rejection of the preceding one, and that it was a strange proceeding on the part of the Mexican Government to have a succession of decrees at hand, so as to be ready with a second as soon as the first had failed.

This is the point taken up by the despatch, which describes the rejected plan as authorized by the Mexican Government, but the second plan as emanating from Mr. Murphy alone, without any authority from the republic. It is merely an affair of his own, with which Mexico has nothing to do.

The case then, after inspection of the despatch, looks infinitely worse for the bondholders than it did while the story was the subject of mere rumour. The repudiation by a Government of the acts of its predecessor was so utterly monstrous that it seemed an impossibility; but now it appears that the new Government does not repudiate the bonds because created under the overthrown Paredes, but because they were made by the act of an agent who had no authority to make them. What will be done in such a state of things it is impossible to conjecture.

It is to be repeated that copies of the despatch are in existence in the city, in spite of all assertions to the contrary, and in all probability its official publication in a day or two will open the eyes of those who utter doubts on the subject.

The English securities have fluctuated very little indeed, but the market left off a shade lower than at the commencement of business. The opening of bank Stock and Reduced Three per Cents. Increased dealings in the market, though quotations were not improve by the change. Bank Stock left off at 206 to 207 ex div. ; Three per Cents. Reduced, 94 1/2 to 1/4 ex div. ; Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents., 96 to 1/2 ex. div; Long Annuities, 9 ex div. ; India Bonds, 28s. pm. ; Consols, for money and the account, 95 to 1/2 and Exchequer-bills, 15s. to 18s. pm.

In foreign market there was not much done, excepting the operations in Mexican, which fluctuated between 22 1/2 and 24 1/4. The last bargain done was at 24. The other dealings of the day were--Granada, a 21 1/4; Portuguese Four per Cents., for The account, at 41\(\frac{1}{4}\); Russian, at 110\(\frac{1}{2}\); Spanish Fiver per Cents., for the account, at 26\(\frac{1}{2}\); the Deferred, at 17; the Three per Cents., for the account at 37\(\frac{1}{2}\); Belgian Two-and-a-Half per Cents., at 59; ditto Four per Cent. Certificates, at 92\(\frac{1}{4}\) for money, and at 92 for the account.

The general impression that the Bank of England would this day commence paying the October dividends to the public has proved erroneous, being founded on a wrong construction of an alternation lately made by the Bank of England. To understand this it is necessary to describe the general practice of that institution.

The dividends on the public securities are usually paid three days after they fall due--that is to say--

Those due on the 5th of January are paid on the 8th.
-- --5th of April -- --8th.
-- --5th of July -- --8th.
-- --10th of October -- --13th.

The two days following that on which the dividend becomes due are occupied in delivering the warrants to bankers and others, and on the third day the public receive their warrants, and their money also. If a Sunday intervened between the actual quarter-day and the third day, the two days occupied in delivering the warrants to the bankers, &c., caused the public day to fall one day later--that is to say, the payments were made on the 9th of January, April, and July, and on the 14th of October. It has, however, occasionally happened, that applications have been made in the October quarter to pay the dividends on the third day, notwithstanding the intervention of the Sunday, and in case of compliance the bankers receive their warrants one day earlier. This was the case in the present quarter, the bankers beginning to receive their warrants on the 10th, Saturday, on actual quarter day, and the public beginning to receive their money to morrow.

The papers from the Cape of Good Hope received to-day furnish no very important intelligence. The success of the English troops against the native tribes remains unquestioned, and the active exertion so Sir A. Stockenatrom and Colonel Somerset will, before long, bring hostilities to a termination. The recovery of several thousand head of cattle, carried away by the depredators, is one the most interesting items in the intelligence coming to hand by this opportunity. [CCB]

LT October 15, 1846/6A Money-Market And City Intelligence

Wednesday Evening.

The news of the rejection by Mexico of the proposals for peace by the United States, published in the second edition of The Times, came with considerable weight upon the Mexican market, already weakened by the strong doubts concerning the new conversion scheme. The fall in prices was about \(\frac{1}{2}\) per cent.

In attempting to impugn the validity of the despatch brought to this country by Senor Gomez Farias, the younger, some persons have remarked that Santa Anna not having actually assumed authority at the date of the last advices from Mexico, he could not have formed a Ministry, and consequently that Senor Gomez Farias, the elder, cannot legitimately hold the financial department.

These remarks, as far as we can collect information of the subject, evince a misunderstanding as to the present political state of Mexico. The Government of which Senor Gomez Farias is a member is a provisional one, not depending on Santa Anna for appointment; but, on the contrary, representing that party by whom he is recalled. From the date of Paredes's overthrow to that of Santa Anna's official assumption of power (of which latter event there are as yet no advices), this provisional Government is the only authority in Mexico. That authority may have been violently assumed, but so also was the power of Paredes, and it will be rather inconsistent for those who admit the one to reject the other without consideration.

The list of the provisional Government is as follows:--

General Salas, Head of the Executive.
Senor Rejon, Foreign Affairs.
Senor Gomez Farias, Finance.
Senor J. R. Pacheco, Justice.
Senor Almonte, War and Marine.

In all probability General Santa Anna entered on office on the 3d of September last, and from all that can be heard respecting his views, there is no reason to believe that he in any way dissent from the proceedings of the provisional Government.

In the dispatch which has created so much noise within the last few days, is a clause ordering Mr. Murphy to publish it immediately. The bondholders, who are in the greatest state of uncertainty, knowing the existence of the despatch, and seeing no official copy of it, are most anxious that Mr. Murphy should comply with this order of the provisional Government, or, at any rate, make some statement on the subject. The fact that Messrs. Schneider deny the receipt of any official information as to the mission of Senor Gomez Farias is not enough to counteract the effect of a document which is circulated in the city, and which announces the repudiation of the new bonds, and the removal of Mr. Murphy from office.

The settlement in the English market has turned out rather unfortunately for those speculating for the rise, a decline of about 1/2 per cent. having occurred in Console. This is a great contrast to the appearance of the market yesterday, when everything was looking firm, and is attributed to heavy sales made by a leading house, and to the failure of a party who is a principle member of what is called the "New Stock Exchange." Although this party has, of course, no connexion with the Stock Exchange properly so called, the large amount of 150,000, stock which, it is said, was thrown upon the market, could not fail to produce a depressing effect. The last quotation of Consols is 94 to 5 for money, and 95 to 1/4 for the account. Reduced are marked 94 ex div. ; new Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents., 95 ex div. ; Bank Stock, 205 1/2 to 6 1/2 ex div. ; Long Annuities, 9 5-16; India Bonds, 25s. pm ; and Exchequer-bills, 15s. to 17s. pm.

With the exception of the business in Mexican, there was very little passing in the foreign market. The last actual bargains were--Buenos Aires, 45; Portuguese, 41 3/4; Russian, 110 1/2; Spanish Five per Cents., for the account, 26 3/4; Venezuela, 42 1/4; and Dutch Four per Cents., certificates, 91 3/4. Mexican were quoted at the close of the day 22 3/4 to 23 1/4.

According to the Gazette of yesterday, the sum to be employed by the National Debt Commissioners during the quarter between the 12th inst. and the 5th of January next is 705,118, 3s, 4d. Of this sum 650,000 is to be appropriated to the redemption of the deficiency bills, and the rest to the purchase of stock.

The following memorial, which has been signed by upwards of 140 of the bankers, merchants, and manufacturers of Birmingham, is shortly to be presented to the Postmaster-General:--

"To the most noble the Marquis of Clanicarde, Postmaster-General."

"We, the undersigned bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and others, of Birmingham and its vicinity, beg leave respectfully to represent that, notwithstanding the alteration of the day mail, one post is still needlessly lost in their foreign correspondence, and therefore suggest, that instead of being despatched at 9 o'clock in the morning as at present, a bag may be forwarded from the Birmingham Post office by as late a train in the afternoon as possible, in order to be in time to go out by the foreign mails of the same night from London." [CCB]

LT October 16, 1846/5e The Mexican War

The New Orleans papers have accounts from Vera Cruz to the evening of Aug. 3, and from Anton Lizardo to the 6th, by the arrival of the British steam-brig Arab, which conveyed Santa Anna from Havannah to Vera Cruz. We extract principally from the Picayune and Delta:--

"The most important news by the Arab touches the arrival of Santa Anna at Vera Cruz. On this point we are able to speak with authority from Mr. O'Neil, one of the owners of the Arab, who made the voyage from Havannah with Santa Anna. The General had previously assured Mr. O'Neil that there would be no occasion to run the blockade; that the vessel would be allowed to enter without any difficulty. When the Arab arrived off Vera Cruz they descried he St. Mary, and the Arab immediately bore up for her. The St. Mary sent a boat to the Arab, with the First Lieutenant on board. Upon reaching her he encountered General Almonte, whom he recognized, and with whom he exchanged salutations. By General Almonte the Lieutenant was conducted to General Santa Anna, who was lying in his berth, quite ill. Then a short interview took place, and when he repaired on deck he gave to the owners permission to pass the blockade.

An account received by a commercial house represents that the suite of Santa Anna evinced much emotion and even alarm when boarded, but that the General himself was perfectly calm, and apparently expected the visit. It is added that the General delivered a letter to the officer who boarded the boat, which produced at one the desired effect.

Recurring again to Mr. O'Neil's communication to us, we learn, that when Santa Anna landed he was received by a few friends, that the reception was not public, and that it was not marked by much enthusiasm. Santa Anna himself was evidently disappointed by the reception given to him. His health continued infirm up to the time of the departure of the Arab. He was able, however, after his arrival to entertain at a public dinner at the palace in Vera Cruz a large number of civil dignitaries and military officers. At the dinner a more favourable disposition was manifested towards the General, and there was some appearance of enthusiasm. Subsequently, on his way to the capital, he stopped at his hacienda (El Encerro), in the vicinity of Jalapa, where he remained up to the latest accounts received from him. He would leave there for the city of Mexico at the very earliest moment his health would permit.

That his presence in the field may be urgently required is manifest from another important fact which we learn by this arrival. The army stationed at San Luis Potosi has declared again in favour of Paredes! Paredes, by the way, is a prisoner in the Castle of Perete, as was rumoured when the Daring left Vera Cruz. The declaration of the army at San Luis in favour of Paredes was generally believed in the city of Mexico when O'Neil left there, and we learn by a commercial letter from Vera Cruz that it was also fully credited there.

Mr. O'Neil represents that it is extremely difficult to arrive at any conclusion as to the state of popular feeling in regard to the different aspirants for power in Mexico. Among commercial men, and, in fact, among all classes not immediately connected with the military, the utmost apathy and indifference appear to reign.

Santa Anna is surrounded by a large military force strongly attached to his interests, and detached bodies of troops occupy positions on the route from Jalapa to the city of Mexico. General Almonte is at the capital, and is now Minister of War and Mexico. No further change had taken place in the state of affairs in the city of Mexico since our last advices, and things were apparently quiet, though pronunciamientos were daily issued from the different bureaus I rapid succession, as meaningless as such Mexican documents generally are. Santa Anna was daily expected at the capital, and preparations on a grand scale were making there, and all along the route to Jalapa, to receive him.

The war with the United States did not appear, so far as Mr. O'Neil had an opportunity of observing, to create that excitement among the people which one would naturally think would be the result of the presence of a powerful and victorious army marching into the very heart of their country.

The following is the proclamation issued by Santa Anna to the troops of San Juan de Ulloa, upon the first arrival:--

Brethren in Arms!--Your generous call having reached me in my exile, I could no longer be indifferent to it, seeing that it was but an echo of the solicitations made for my return from other departments. Your conduct, brethren in arms, has been noble--patriotic.

The joy which I feel, my friends, in finding myself once more among you is unbounded. Relying on your patriotism and virtue, I hurried to join you as soon as it was possible for me to do so; and I am now here for the purpose of co-operating with you in working out the salvation of the republic, and raising it from the ignominious position to which it has been reduced by treason and imbecility. Never, perhaps, before have we brandished our swords in a cause more noble. True, everything is destroyed; but we, with a proper spirit, and aided by the Mexican people, can everything create.

Soldiers of the Republic! a proud and noble sentiment animated me when the happiness was mine to lead you to the battle-field against the foreign enemies of our country. With feelings similar I appear again at this moment, to defend the sacred rights of nationality. We will cause our insulted eagles to rise victorious in the midst of the combat; the nation shall be tenfold vindicated for the numerous outrages she has sustained, and we shall exact for her that respect which of right she merits. In this enterprise, brother soldiers, the glory that awaits us is immense! Be then as you have always been brave, subordinate, patient. And, doubt it not, the mission which Providence has assigned us we will consummate with the happiest success.

Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna
Heroic Vera Cruz, August 16, 1846. San Juan de Ulloa.

An officer on board the United States schooner Petrel, off Vera Cruz, August 28, writes to the Philadelphia Ledger as follows:--

"If I can judge correctly I would say Mexico could not hold out long in a state of war.
Her coast is completely blockaded by our cruisers. Her commerce, and ever her coasting trade, entirely done up; consequently no revenue from Custom-house receipts. As to a squadron attacking the castle of Vera Cruz with any degree of success, it is out of the question. I had a talk the other day with an English officer who had been through the fortress. He says it is in the most complete state of defence. They have the means of heating 1,000 42-pound shot red hot in one hour and 15 minutes, which is about as fast as they could fire them. This officer thought if he had the command of the castle, with 1,500 British gunners, that he would defy the whole British navy. My opinion is, that they could cut ships in pieces as fast as they neared the castle. If this is its condition of strength and efficiency, it would cost very dear in the attempt to carry it. They were suffering with sickness--yellow fever in the castle and the city--and very much in consequence of the blockade.

Report comes from shore that an armistice is asked for by the Mexican Government.
Some of the crews of the vessels of the squadron are suffering the scurvy. They must soon return to Pensacola, or the vessels will be in a bad way with sickly crews, for the want of fresh provisions and vegetables." [CCB]
Maubert taking the chair. He read a letter which he had addressed to the chairman of the company, and in which he had stated his willingness to accept 15s. per share on his shares and give up all further claims, provided an inspection of the books and accounts were allowed, and a report made to the shareholders of the proceedings of the company. This letter, which yielded a most important point, for the shareholders insist that the directors, by their own agreement, are bound to give them far more than the 15s., was dated on the 12th inst., and no reply had yet been received. Mr. Maubert commenting on the conduct of the directors observed, that there could be no security in any transactions if men of high standing in society, after entering into engagements with the public, are allowed to come forward and repudiate them. Resolutions were passed reprobating the conduct of the directors and appointing a committee on behalf of the shareholders.

At last the long expected communication from Mr. Murphy, which was to set at rest all uneasiness created by Senor Gomez Farias’ despatch in the minds of the bondholders, has made its appearance. The second enclosed document, which is the most important one, is of formidable length, and we cannot abstain from a wish that brevity had been rather more consulted; but, so great is the anxiety of the creditors on this subject, and so curious is the position in which the Mexican debt has been placed since the arrival of Senor Gomez Farias; that we cannot do otherwise than give it entire. At present we publish it without comment, since it is of itself quite sufficient for our readers’ digestion, but we have no doubt, that when it has been considered over a little, it will e found a fruitful source of controversy. LT 10/31/1846 8b "The Military Capacity of the United States"

The brilliant victory has been achieved in the three days’ fighting at Monterey, by our regular and volunteer soldiers, in the face of a foe twice their number, and a foe, too, whose martial character has hitherto been misunderstood and underrated, is well calculated to warm the heart of the patriot at home, and produce respect and reverence for us among foreigners. In the first two battles that the United States has been engaged in since the last war with Great Britain, our little army of regulars, numbering only some 1,500, engaged with an enemy numbering 6,000, and in the face of such tremendous odds routed them at the point of the bayonet, and won a victory that will brighten the page of our country’s history. In the battle that has recently taken place, our army of regulars and volunteers, numbering under 6,000, marched to within 1,400 yards of the enemy’s stronghold, and after a succession of battles that were fought with the greatest bravery and fierceness on both sides, they completely defeated the enemy, that in numbers were double, and in bravery almost equal to themselves. When it is considered that the men who behaved themselves so gallantly on these occasions, were drawn promiscuously from all parts of our extended country—were strangers to each other till the time when they met at the rendezvous to take up arms in defence of their country’s honour, and never had heard the roar of cannon or the rattling of firearms except on the 4th of July, we have great reason to be proud of their prowess in time of danger, and the reliance we can place in our countrymen’s courage and ability to defend to the death the free institutions that their patriotic sires bequeathed to them, whenever endangered by foreign or domestic enemies. European nations, and even the Mexicans themselves, forgetful of the past deeds that were performed by our soldiers, and the battles that were won by them over the veterans of the old world, have nursed the idea, and expressed it on all occasions, that in time of danger we would be an easy conquest, because no reliance could be placed on citizens who were unaccustomed to the use of arms, and who, from the very nature of our institutions, would be unwilling to submit to the rigour and restraint of military discipline. Such reflections as these have been indulged in by foreigners, and the very name of militia and volunteer has been associated with mobs and ragged solders. Time, however, the great solver of all problems, has solved this, and proved to the world that American citizens, whether regulars or volunteers, when in the service of their country, make the best of soldiers—submit with hearty goodwill to the regulations of the profession they have temporarily adopted, and are on all occasions capable of maintaining and defending the national honour, and chastising its enemies, whether they be Mexicans or Europeans. What more triumphant proof could be had of the falsity of the predictions that have been promulgated by the English, regarding the materiel of our citizen soldiers, than the scenes that occurred in Monterey? There our volunteers covered themselves with glory. Invaders as they were, but in a just cause, they attacked the enemy by his fireside—by his own hearth, which the greatest coward living will defend to the last, and in spite of the disadvantages of their position they maintained a combat in the streets of that city, boldly resisted the destructive discharges of musketry from their unseen and protected foe, and finally, with the loss of many of their brave comrades, boldly carried the city, and obtained a decisive victory. The enemy, in this case, were not composed of half-civilized Sikhs, who knew nothing,

We have received by our ordinary express the Paris journals of Wednesday.

The Journal des Debats publishes a severe critique on the plan of the campaign adopted by President Polk against Mexico, which it regards as a revenge taken by the President for the concession which he was compelled to make to the British Government on the Oregon question. "He was persuaded," says the Journal des Debats, "that the invasion of California would be attended with no difficulty, that the first ship which should arrive before Monterey would take possession of it without firing a shot, and that the same consequence would follow at the harbour of San Francisco, which was destitute of fortifications. Those two positions being captured, it was supposed that the Mexican Government, which is incapable of recapturing them, and which, as to its finances, is at the last gasp, would yield what it had lost for a consideration of some million plasters paid into its empty treasury. The success was considered infallible. This proceeding was not honest, it was even an unjustifiable larceny; nevertheless it was useful, not to the prosperity of the United States, which have no need of an extension of territory, but to their influence on the Pacific Ocean, and still more to the popularity of Mr. Polk, for this was a magnificent application of the ideas of General Jackson, of whom Mr. Polk is the heir.
Unfortunately this fine plan which, if it had not justice with it, had the merit of infallible success had it been conducted with wisdom, was joined with two accessories, on one of which no person knows why Mr. Polk would insist, and it became the principal. First, he dispatched a body of troops against New Mexico, a widely extended but not well inhabited province. It was that which, commanded by General Kearsey, captured Santa Fe, the capital of the province, after a march through the desert, where he published a proclamation, announcing to the scanty population that they would become citizens of the United States. Of what utility could this region, placed in the middle of the continent, be to the United States? It contains a superficies of 27,000,000 acres, more than the fifth of France; but the United States possess twenty times a greater quantity of excellent land still uncultivated in the valley of the Mississippi, or the Missouri, or in Texas. Secondly, and this was Mr. Polk's great fault, he sent an invading army into Mexico on the side of the Rio Grande. To colour the violence offered to the tottering Government of Mexico, a grievance was imagined relative to a strip of land between the Rio Nueces and the Rio Grande, which had belonged to the insurgent Texians, which was manifestly false, and which it was said the Mexicans retained contrary to justice. But once Maramoros conquered, the Americans were in possession of the disputed territory. Why, then, advance an army, first to Camargo and subsequently to Monterey? Monterey is 300 leagues distant from Mexico by the high road. It is separated from it by a country without means of communication and without resources. This, therefore, is not the side at which Mexico is vulnerable. This campaign in the interior of the country, whatever valour may be displayed by General Taylor and his troops, is an unskillful operation, and must become extremely embarrassing. Mr. Polk and his counselors cannot but have perceived this, and they regret having advanced on that side; but to recall General Taylor, at present, would be to cover themselves with confusion in the eyes of their political adversaries and in the eyes of the multitude, whom they have inspired with a fatal passion for military glory. It would be a retreat which would be translated into a defeat. The Mexicans would be persuaded that they had beaten the Americans, and it would be no longer possible to induce them to cede California. Thus, the Cabinet of Washington can neither advance nor recede. Nevertheless the invading army costs dreadfully dear.
The American democracy when called upon to pay return to their natural good sense. The President is anxious therefore to conclude the war, and he relies upon an indemnity from the Congress, if he can offer them the definitive surrender by the Mexicans of California and the port of San Francisco. This explains the orders sent to General Taylor to give notice of the rupture of the armistice agreed to with the Mexican General Ampudia, although it is a violation of a convention which was fully executed by the Mexicans. "The Journal des Debats concludes by observing that

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)
MEXICO, Sept. 29.

The incapacity of this country to maintain the war with the United States is becoming daily more apparent, but still no disposition is shown to treat for peace. Immediately after the departure of the last packet mail it was known that the American Government, supposing that of Mexico sufficiently humbled, had offered to negotiate; but the only reply given was, that the communication would be laid before Congress, to assemble on the 6th of December next. It is understood that a similar answer has been returned to an offer of mediation between the belligerents on the part of Her Majesty's Government. General Salas, the creature of Santa Anna, continues at the head of the Government, and Gomez Farias, with the title of Minister of Finance, apparently shared the supreme power until Santa Anna, who had been watching the course of events from his estate near Jalapa, found it necessary to comply with the wishes of his adherents, and present himself here. He made his public entry while the rejoicings for the anniversary of the declaration of independence were in progress, this popular fete being thus ingeniously made to serve a double purpose, without giving his return the appearance of a personal triumph. He has declined to assume the presidency of the Executive, reserving to himself the command of the army, the true source of power in Mexico, and devotes himself to military preparations, nominally to oppose his own power. He is obliged, however, to proceed with caution. Obstacles which he would once have spurned with contempt are now formidable. The terror attached to his name is no more, and there probably are moments when he sees cause to regret his peaceful retreat at the Havannah. The want of money is of course his great difficulty; and, though he has contrived to get rid of an inconvenient Mentor by making Gomez Farias President of the Council, and substituting his own follower Don Antonio Haro y Tamariz, as Minister of Finance, the sinews of war are not forthcoming. The church has been appealed to for aid, and threats as well as supplications have been used, but with only partial effect, the clerical body protesting that their property cannot be alienated without the express consent of the Pope, and threatening, in their turn, to close the churches if violence should be used against them. The opinions of Gomez Farias (an enthusiast of the wildest description) are in favour of such extreme measures as were adopted during the French revolution; and an article actually appeared in the Government paper inciting the populace to the plunder of the wealthy classes; but the Government itself is weak, and as yet has not even attempted the expedient, common at former periods, of levying a forced loan. Overtures of a kind have been made to the foreign merchants. On condition of their advancing a loan of $500,000 to Government, it was proposed that at the conclusion of the blockade the cotton goods now prohibited should be admitted at a low duty, and the tariff generally reduced about 30 per cent., these advantages to be limited in the first instance to the parties lending the money, and on their being reimbursed to become general, the Government engaging not to augment the reduced tariff for eight years. This scheme shows the extreme necessities of the Government, but has not been accepted, chiefly from the conviction that with the Americans on the Rio Bravo the reduction of the present Mexican tariff will become inevitable. [WWF]

LT November 6, 1846/6c "New Mexico Annexed to US"

New Mexico has been annexed to the United States, without a shot being fired. 2,000 men, assembled by General Armijo for the defence of Santa Fe, the capital of the province, joined the invading force under General Butler, and the authorities, including the clergy, took the oath of allegiance to the United States without hesitation. Chihuahua is the next department menaced in that direction, and will probably share the same fate.

Accounts from Nuevo Leon represent General Taylor as besieging Monterey with 6,000 men. That city is defended by General Ampudia, with an equal number of soldiers, and about 2,000 irregulars. Some reports state Ampudia's retreat on Saltillo to be cut off, the Americans having already occupied the passes. If Ampudia should be obliged to surrender, the effect will be nearly fatal, as General Taylor can then advance to San Luis Potosi without opposition. Santa Anna has ordered every disposable soldier to march on the latter place, for which he himself left, with about 2,000 men, yesterday.

To induce the Mexicans to listen to reason another defeat is necessary, and the sooner they receive it the better. It will then be time for other Powers to lend their friendly mediation to terminate this war, and avert, at least for the present, the annihilation of Mexico as a nation. The acquisition of the line of the Bravo with New Mexico and Upper California may well satisfy the ambition of the Cabinet of Washington, and for the possession of so vast a territory they would probably be well disposed to pay an indemnity such as Mexico cannot afford to reject. If the Mexican people do indeed possess the elements of political regeneration, their development may be hoped for on the restoration of peace. A system of colonization producing the admixture of other races is already admitted to be necessary, and this cannot be accomplished without that religious toleration which is still absurdly withheld. A beneficial change in their commercial policy towards other nations may also be anticipated.

General Paredes has received his passport to leave the republic. He is undoubtedly a man of patriotic intentions, and superior to the vulgar corruption of money, but his mental capacity proved unequal to the task which he voluntarily assumed. He leaves his country a banished man, but without any reasonable ground of complaint. His power was founded on a military revolt, and the treachery of which he was guilty towards Herrera met a fitting retribution in the conduct of his own subordinates.

Don Jose Maria Tornel, who had steered his course with unerring skill through every revolution for a quarter of a century, miscalculated on the last. He believed Santa Anna's return to power impossible, and did not hesitate to declare himself his foe. In consequence he has been deprived of his office, as director of the Mineria College, and ordered to retire to Tehuacan, a village in the midst of a wilderness, where he will be much at a loss for employment unless inclined to botanical pursuits.

The conversion of the Mexican deferred bonds in London, which in the first instance was disapproved of here, has been referred to a committee, composed of Valentin Gomez Farias, Manuel Gomez Pedraza, Manuel Payno Bustamente, and Francisco Fagoaga. It is thought that their report (which this packet will probably convey) will be favourable to the ratification of the measure.

The following is a copy of the correspondence between the United States and Mexican Ministers as to the conclusion of a treaty of peace:--

LETTER FROM Mr. BUCHANAN TO THE MEXICAN MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS

"Department of State, Washington, July 27.

"Sir, --The President of the United States, no less anxious to terminate than he was to avoid the present unhappy war with the Mexican Republic, has determined to make an effort to accomplish this purpose. He has accordingly instructed the undersigned, Secretary of State, to propose through your Excellency to the Mexican Government that negotiations shall forthwith commence for the conclusion of a peace just and honourable for both parties. Should this offer be received and responded to by the Mexican Government in the same frank and friendly spirit by which it has been dictated, he will immediately dispatch an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the city of Mexico, with instructions and full powers to conclude a treaty of peace which shall adjust all the questions in dispute between the two republics. If the Mexican Government should prefer to send a Minister to Washington to conduct the negotiation here, he shall be made to accomplish the object of his mission with the least possible delay.

"In the present communication it is deemed useless, and might prove injurious, to discuss the causes of the existing war. This might tend to delay or defeat the restoration of peace. The past is already consigned to history; the future, under Providence, is within our own power.

"The occasion may, however, be embraced to state that the President has ever cherished the kindest feelings for Mexico, and that one of the first wishes of his heart is, that she may be a powerful and prosperous republic, in perpetual amity with the United States.

"Commodore Connor will transmit this dispatch for your Excellency to the Governor of Vera Cruz, under a flag of truce; and you are respectfully invited to adopt the same channel for communicating your answer.

"I avail myself of this occasion to offer your Excellency the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

"JAMES BUCHANAN.

"To his Excellency the Minister of Foreign Relations of the Mexican Republic."

ANSWER OF THE MEXICAN MINISTER

"National Palace, Mexico, Aug. 31.

"Sir, --The undersigned Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Mexican Republic has informed the General-in-Chief of the Liberating Army, provisionally charged with the supreme executive power, of your Excellency's note of the 27th of July last, in which you propose, on the part of your Government, the opening of negotiations which may lead to a lasting and honourable peace between the two countries. His Excellency being possessed of the contents of the said note could not but fix his attention on the fact, that while all discussion of the causes of the war between the two republics is declined, it is pretended to consider these merely as past events now belonging to history. For the Executive to listen to proposals on such a basis, when the subject to be treated of concerns the honour of the country, and the integrity of its territory, and compromises its nationality for the future, would be to depart from justice and thoroughly irritate public opinion, already much excited, as the discussions which have taken place prove by the apprehension of the question being terminated in the manner proposed. Hence it is that, the affairs of the republic with the United States having reached their present situation, it has become necessary to appeal to the nation in order that, by means of representatives elected with entire freedom, it may provide for its future security, honour, and prosperity. A Congress with this object has been summoned, and will open its session on the 6th of December next, when, with other grave matters, the subject of the war with the United States will be submitted to its deliberation, and your Excellency's note will be laid before it for the resolution which may be judged conducive to the interests of the nation. The Government of the undersigned consequently awaits the determination of that body in order to reply to the communication referred to, the relations of Mexico with the United States remaining in the interval in the position in which they were found by the General-in-Chief of the Liberating Army when he assumed the executive power.

"While remitting this answer from his Government, through the channel indicated by your Excellency, the undersigned avails himself of the occasion to assure your Excellency of his distinguished consideration.

"MANUEL CRESCENCIO REJON."

(EXTRACT OF A LETTER DATED TAMPICO, SEPTEMBER 22, 1846.)

As regards politics we are on the eve of a great crisis, but what the issue will be it is not easy to divine. The last news we have from the interior is that the Americans, with 2,000 men, have taken possession of Santa Fe without resistance, the Mexican General Armijo having retired before them. Taylor, with about 7,000 men, had advanced to Cadereita, a place in the neighbourhood of Monterey, where General Ampudia arrived on the 3d inst., at the head of an equal force, and speaks confidently of driving the former away, and fully revenging the injured honour of the country. He is a mountebank, and the same man who at Tabasco took General Sentmanat prisoner, and fried his head in oil. The Americans have declared themselves masters also of California, and are preparing to render their occupation effective. As the British bondholders have security on the public lands there, it is a questions how far England may acquiesce in this intention, though I imagine America will be glad to obviate all claim on that score by recognizing their lien. As regards this place, I am rather surprised they have made no attempt. A month or two ago they would have succeeded, as there were only 300 or 400 men here; but now there are at least 1,500, and if properly defended, it would not by an easy matter to take it.

It has been reported that they intend to make themselves masters of it now that the "norther" season has commenced, and it is neither agreeable nor safe to keep the sea, in which case it is to be supposed they will establish the same regulation which they have done in Matamoras with regard to foreign importations, viz., that only American goods and such other as have paid duty in the United States can be admitted, and this in American bottoms only. I do not think our Government, however, is likely to acquiesce in any arrangement of this nature. Either it is a blockade or it is not; if the former, how can American vessels be admitted? if the latter, how can foreign ones be excluded?
The intentions of the Americans are not very clear. They have sent an offer of accommodation; but as it appears to be based upon their remaining in possession of all they have acquired, it has been rejected, or, what is much the same thing, they have been told it will be submitted to the Congress, which is to meet in December. It is very likely they are only waiting for the reply to push matters with renewed activity. Hitherto Taylor has been making no particular movement, arising, probably, from the unprecedented rains which have flooded the whole of the country in his vicinity, and must have caused vast hardship and, no doubt, great mortality, though we rarely get any information of a recent date from that quarter. Possibly also the desire of obtaining the simultaneous co-operation of the expedition which has arrived at Santa Fe may also have had its weight with him. In the midst of all this it will be naturally supposed the Mexicans, forgetting their own eternal squabbles, will have joined to repel the common enemy. Nothing, however, is further from the fact; the broils of party have been incessant. Paredes and his Government have been overthrown, as you are aware; Santa Anna recalled (as they think nothing more is necessary to vanquish the Americans); the control system of Government abrogated, and the Federal form restored. Now, it must be remembered, that this very Santa Anna is the man who, eight or ten years ago, destroyed the Federation by force of arms (as it was incompatible with his views of supreme command); it is not therefore surprising that the Santannistas and Federalists, who have hitherto been bitter enemies, should still remain so, and be both determined to maintain the truce only as long as it suits their interests. Santa Anna will be anxious to maintain the army; the Federalists are resolved to do away with it, as it has never served any purpose but to maintain a despotism and tear the country to pieces, and is now found quite useless as a defence against an external enemy. They advocate free trade; Santa Anna has always been fond of high duties and prohibitions.

I believe many of the thinking part of the community begin to see clearly that the Mexicans are incapable of self-government, and that the best thing which could possibly happen for the country would be to be conquered by the Americans; but the thinking part constitute a very reduced minority; the mass are either indifferent or nourish the antipathy to the Americans which is felt against all foreigners by all of the Spanish descent. Commerce is quite suspended; and, though stocks are light and goods getting scarce, from the blockade, our buyers are too much alarmed at the prospect before them to be willing to purchase beyond what they immediately require. [WWF]

LT November 9, 1846/4a "State of Affairs in Mexico"

The war between the United States and Mexico reminds us of a strange combat between an eagle and a fish, which we remember to have read of in some work of fiction. The bird of prey struck the back of its defenceless victim, and its own talons were fixed and entangled in his scaly sides. The struggle was balanced, not by the equal force or ferocity of the combatants, but by the weight of the cumbrous booty; for, if we recollect the legend rightly, after a vast turmoil upon the surface of the water, the fish dived with its winged enemy, and the assailant perished in the depths of the lake.

Nothing can be more deplorable and ineffective than the preparations of the Mexicans for active defence; but when we predicted, several months since, that this campaign would not end as rapidly or as brilliantly as the Americans had anticipated, we had formed a just estimate of the passive resistance which Mexico opposes to an invading army. In reality, though all the success has been on the side of the United States, they are probably the greatest losers by the war. They must pay for it; they have to support an army at a vast distance from the center of their Government, exposed to all the hardships of an uncivilized country and a pernicious climate. They have equipped a considerable squadron and blockaded the coast, but the enemy affords no prizes to encourage the zeal or reward the courage of the American navy, and the interruption of foreign trade secures a close protection to certain Mexican interests and cuts off the competition of the free American markets. The attack upon St. Juan d'Ulloa was the only severe blow which could be struck upon the coast, and that the American Commodore has not attempted. In the present state of the defences of that fortress success is more than doubtful; the fleet would be placed in a situation of extreme danger, and a check would be disgraceful and disastrous to the American arms. It has therefore been resolved, as we understand, to leave St. Juan d'Ulloa alone.

The progress of the American forces on the coast of the Pacific, in Upper California, and in the heart of their enormous continent, is no doubt most extensive. But it may be questioned whether the loss of these provinces is a sensible blow to Mexico, or a sensible advantage to the American Confederation. Probably for more than a century to come the interior of the American continent will not contribute more to the social improvement or political strength of the American people, than the interior of New Holland does at this time to the British Empire. The Mexicans possessed it, as Spain had possessed it before them, in nominal rather than real sovereignty; and, if any considerable portion of these territories is now transferred to the United States, generations must pass away, and the greatest revolutions may have changed the whole aspect of the country, before these provinces can really boast of society and government. The only really valuable acquisitions of the United States are two harbours on the Pacific, and it remains to be seen upon what terms they will be allowed to retain them at the peace.

The inordinate spoliation of the Mexican territories renders it difficult for the Government of that country to listen to terms as inconsistent with their national rights and dignity as those offered by Mr. BUCHANAN, whilst in reality since the actions on the Rio Bravo nothing has been done to force them to submission. By the last accounts we are informed that General TAYLOR had at last attacked the town of Monterey with success. The Mexicans retired, but after three days' hard fighting, which cost the little American army 500 men. So little were the American officers prepared to follow up this success, that they immediately granted a virtual armistice of two months to the enemy; and the Cabinet of Washington seems to have had no small difficulty to force its victorious army to keep the field. Mr. POLK is very well aware that he has incurred a most formidable amount of responsibility, if he has to meet Congress with no decisive victory, no treaty of peace, very little military or naval glory, but an enormous amount of estimates to be provided for. His policy has certainly enlarged our conception of the real powers of an American President; for, in spite of all the restrictions of the constitution, he has found means to plunge the country into war for his own political and private purposes, and to provide extraordinary means of carrying on the contest. But, if the last accounts of the State elections are correct, the democratic party is losing ground in the country; and we are not without hopes that the unscrupulous means by which the PRESIDENT has endeavoured to extend his influence may prove fatal to his cause.

The Mexican war, therefore, presents the strange picture of a victorious army in a foreign country which is more nearly reduced to the necessity of effecting a peace than the State which it has conquered and subdued. The declaration of hostilities has been followed by no considerable change in the habitually disturbed and insecure condition of Mexico. In a populous, industrious, and flourishing community, war is an interruption of all the pursuits and pleasures of life; in small a country as Mexico, the presence of a hostile army, like that of General TAYLOR, is scarcely felt beyond the lines of his camp. When, therefore, the respective Legislatures of the two Republics meet, early in December, we expect to learn that the Americans loudly demand the conclusion of a treaty of peace, whilst the Mexicans will vote the continuance of the war. The war has, indeed, from first to last, been no more than an armed appropriation of territory. It was begun without a pretext by the precipitate occupation of a neutral district, and this occupation has now extended over an immense tract of the whole breadth of the continent. When we have said this we have said all; no hostile army has been really beaten, no conditions have been imposed, no Government has been coerced. The value of military operations lies, after all, in their political effect. A mere march across a wilderness, or the occupation of a town of log-huts, is an exploit followed by no results. We have yet to learn that the Americans have done anything to compel the Mexicans to accept such terms of peace as they may think fit to impose; and the Mexicans have the satisfaction of knowing, that the ineffective operations directed against themselves impose most inconvenient, onerous, and unpopular burdens on their antagonists. Nor are these burdens and inconveniences limited to the period of actual warfare. If the United States Government expects to hold and govern any considerable portion of the territory their troops or marauding parties have lately overrun, it must be prepared to maintain establishments of a novel and extensive character. The roving population of the woods and prairies, the Indians and Ranchos of the far west, must be kept down; the coast must be fortified and protected; and the principles of self-government will be found inadequate to maintain internal order and to resist foreign attacks in these infant states. We have already seen the defence of the frontiers of Texas draw the whole forces of the Union into the field, and occasion this costly and inglorious war. Similar difficulties and dangers will continually await the American authority in the former provinces of New Spain, and the Union must be supported in those regions, not by the unanimous consent of the people, but by armed force.

The incidents of this war, and the consideration of the political consequences of American aggrandizement, have convinced us, that however we may abhor the lawless and unjust spirit of these proceedings of the United States towards their weaker neighbours, there is nothing in these conquests which ought seriously to excite our jealousy or our apprehensions. In our own time they can only prove a source of embarrassment and a severe incumbrance to the American Government, hereafter, we may hope that the extension of our language an our race over the American continent will conduce, upon the whole, to the civilization and improvement of the world. Certainly, the conduct of the Mexicans towards England, since they were emancipated from the control of the mother country, has given us no cause to value their independence, or to respect their power of self-defence.

LT November 13, 1846/3f "The Battle of Monterey"

"Gentlemen, -I wrote you a few days since from the camp at Monterey, since when I have been despatched to this place on public business. As I return to-morrow, I have only time to say one word.

"The entire loss in our battalion (Baltimore) is eight killed, and, as I am informed, 16 wounded, all slightly but one. I have seen none of the killed or wounded; and therefore cannot give names.

"Colonel Watson was killed in the imprudent charge ordered by General Butler. He was at the head of battalion, and had ordered us to go into the charge with three cheers. He received a ball in the breast while in the act of cheering, and fell instantly. I tried to get to him, but was borne on in the rush. The charge was ineffectual. At this moment General Taylor rode up in great anger, and ordered us to retire. Old Rough came up under the most tremendous fire. It was here his horse was shot. It is said there were angry words passed between him and Butler.

"Captain Stewart now took command, and said, 'Boys, your Colonel is killed; don't run, show those d--d red skins that although you are ordered to retire, you intern to walk. 'With this, he shook his fist at them, and d--d them pretty considerable. Our entire loss will not be much short of 800 to 900 killed and wounded-the enemy the same. Ampudia has given up the main fort as per articles of capitulation, and the stars and stripes were floating over it when I left.

"He asked an interview with General Taylor to take place the day I left. I did not learn the answer.

"Mr. Giles made us a speech when at the Marine Barracks in Washington; askhim if he is satisfied with us.

"There is no doubt now but that Ampudia will be re-inforced in about one month by 12,000 men. They will be under Santa Anna.

"We must have 10,000 more volunteers, mark that.
"Yours, J. M."

The following is also from a Baltimore volunteer, and give some interesting details that we have not before met with.

(Correspondence of the Baltimore Sun. )

"Messrs. Editors, -I have but a few leisure moments to give you an account of our great battle at Monterey. On the morning of the 21st, General Taylor formed his line for battle, and marched up to the outskirts and fortifications of the town, keeping one bomb and his artillery battery going all the time. The Mexicans continued to fire on us all day, but with no effect.

"General Worth, on one side of the town, with Colonel Jack Hays, and Captain Walker and the Texan Rangers, and General Taylor and the volunteers on the other, we made our way into their streets over their breastworks, with a heavy loss on both sides. When we made the first charge we lost our gallant Colonel Watson. The Baltimoreans fought bravely, and did credit to their city. We lost a number of men, but I cannot give you their names at present.

"The Tennessee and Mississippi volunteers were cut up horribly. Kentucky did not stand the fire well, and Ohio got in a hot place, but soon backed out of it. Captain Barber and Colonel M'Cullough, of Mississippi, also fell mortally wounded, with a number of other officers whose names I cannot remember.

"The battle lasted three days and two nights, and we had a hot time of it, I assure you. General Worth distinguished himself beyond all praise. He is decidedly a great man for a fight. He took two batteries on the first day, and used them on the Mexicans with great effect.

"The greatest loss on the Americans was on the first day, but there is different reports as to the number of killed and wounded. Some of the staff say that our loss is 700 killed and wounded, but I think there must be at least 1,000.

"The Texan Rangers are the most desperate set of men in battle that I have ever heard of. They charged up to the breast works, dismounted, and rushed over on foot, with sword in hand. They were each armed with barreled rifles, and, as may be supposed, did great execution among the copper skins.

"The 31 and 5th Regiments of the Regulars were much cut up also, from the 40 pieces of artillery which we had to silence, as well as the musketry from the house tops.

"The grand castle is a powerful fort, and was mounted with a number of 18-pounders. It was there that General Ampudia's quarters were during the battle.

"I will relate to you a number of incidents that occurred during the three days:--

"Colonel M'Clung, of Mississippi, the great duelist, got upon the breastworks, waved his hat, and was in the act of giving three cheers, when a ball struck him, from the effects of which he has since died.

"Samuel W. Chambers, one of the Rangers, or 'the Delaware hero,' as they called him, got over the breastwork, obtained a foothold on the top of an 18-pounder, and deliberately took aim with his 'fire-shooter,' firing with great effect, and crushing the Mexicans; until the piece was taken by General Worth and turned on the city. Chambers escaped without a wound.

"Captain Gillespy, of the Texan Rangers, was killed whilst pouring water into the tube of a cannon, with the Mexicans all around him. But it is impossible for me to mention all the numerous incidents that occurred at the present time.

"We expect another battle at Saltillo so soon as the armistice expires, and as we have now got our hands in we will give them rougher usage next time.

"Our army was about 7,000 strong before the battle, but is now about 5,500. I miss many a noble fellow from the ranks. The Mexicans were nearly double our number. Their loss in killed and wounded is not less than 2,000. A great many were killed in their houses, as we had to rush in and shoot them down, to stop their destructive fire from windows and housetops.

"We bury our dead to-day, and you may judge of my feelings at the dreadful sight better than I can describe them. The whole field was like a slaughter house, and bodies were being buried in every direction. In short, I have had enough of the battle-field, although determined to stand up to the rack throughout the campaign. Some persons may and do like it, but between you and myself I would much rather be in Baltimore.

"Yours, &c.
"N.B.S.,
"Of the Baltimore Regiment Volunteers.

"P.S.--Since writing the above, I have been informed that not less than 60 of the Baltimore Regiment are killed or missing. Notwithstanding our losses, and the heart-rendering sight around us, the soldiers are in high spirits this morning on account of our brilliant victory; and well we may be, for when we commenced we never expected to gain it. The bristling fortifications looked almost impregnable. But I am called on by the sergeant to go to work and to bury the dead, so I must close for the present. "N.B.S."

(From the Richmond Whig, Oct. 20.)

"Lieutenant Colonel M'Clung, of Mississippi, who was severely wounded in the attack on Monterey, it will be seen, has died of his wounds. We take him to be Alexander K. M'Clung, of Jackson, Mississippi, who was marshal of the Eastern district, having received his appointment from General Harrison. If so, he was a nephew of the late Chief Justice Marshall, and fell heir to a large portion of the talent which has rendered that family one of the most remarkable we ever knew. He was a lawyer of full practice, and was widely known for his undaunted courage and open disposition. We learn from an officer in the army, that those officers who fell at Monterey were among the very flower of the service."

(From the Richmond Inquirer, Oct. 20.)

"We had the pleasure, yesterday, of meeting that gallant officer, Captain Thornton, of the United States Dragoons, and native of Virginia, who goes on to Washington this morning to obtain permission to be sent to the army in Mexico, in whose glorious achievements he ardently desires to participate. He came over from the Rio Grande with Captain Eaton, the bearer of despatches from General Taylor, and gave us some interesting details of the battles of Monterey. It seems that the Mexicans expected General Taylor by the road from China, but he changed his route, and approached Monterey by the road from Cerralvo. They had fortified the town in the former direction. This deceived General Taylor, and produced the great havoc among our troops in the streets of that portion of the town. We understand that the streets were barricaded with strong stone and mortar fortifications, forming almost a perfect defence, and giving the Mexicans an opportunity to assail our troops with murderous effect. Captain Thornton thinks that there will be yet considerable fighting, but that it will be principally of the guerrilla character. The Mexicans with their tough, shaggy ponies, and their havresacs, containing corn and salt, as their only provisions, can bear great hardships, and annoy us a good deal. Captain Thornton was a prisoner in the house of Ampudia, at Matamoras. He says that Ampudia was the first man he saw after the battle of the 9th of May. Ampudia pointed out to Captain Thornton his saddle, perforated with two bullet holes; but they were in the rear of the saddle, and it was very plain that they were fired when Ampudia was with his back, and not his 'face to the foe.' When Ampudia reached Matamoras, he publicly proclaimed that Arista had betrayed the Mexican army in the two engagements on the Rio Grande. We have only time to wish Captain Thornton success in his laudable mission to Washington city. Such men ought not to be allowed to remain idle, when their country needs their services so much."

(From the Baltimore Clipper, Oct. 20.)

The following letter from Colonel May, received by a gentlemen in this city, is the very latest from the army, and has been furnished to us for publication:

"Dragoon Camp, near Monterey, Mexico, Sept. 26.

"It is a sad and painful duty I have to perform, in announcing to you the death of your father's young friend, Mr. W. Thomas, of your State. We have had hard fighting for the last three days, and he was mortally wounded in a charge against the enemy's cavalry. He behaved most gallantly, and fell in the front of battle.

"Yesterday he died, but retained his senses until the last. He was a gallant fellow, and is much regretted. You can say this to his friends, that he had every attention. I was not present when he expired, but was absent on duty. He was buried with military honours. Many gallant spirits have gone out in the last three days.

"The flowers of our little army have fallen--peace be with them! The enemy yesterday surrendered the city, on condition that they should be allowed to march out with the honours of war.

"The gallant Watson fell at the head of his regiment, leading on the charge. I cannot tell you of our loss, but it is at least 500 killed or wounded.

"My men have not suffered any, as they have been exposed very little.

"I write this on my saddle, and am so tired I can't hold my pen any longer. I have not slept for the last three days or nights, so you must excuse this wretched scrawl. "Yours, CHARLES MAY."

The steam-ship Caledonia has just arrived with advices from the United States and Canada to the close of October.

The political news is not of striking importance. The armies of the right, left, and center were quietly advancing, or preparing to advance, further into the Mexican territories. No new conflict has taken place. From the Pacific intelligence had been received of the taking of Monterey. The operations of the Gulf Squadron remained unchanged. The neutrality of Yucatan had been withdrawn by the Cabinet of the United States.

From the interior of Mexico the advices received breathed a warlike spirit.

From Canada our advices communicate no important intelligence.

(From our own correspondent)

Our position with regard to Mexico and war is becoming more complicated. It is indeed difficult to see what course is left for our government to take other than to persevere in the war with all vigor possible, until the Mexicans shall accept the proffered overtures for negotiation. But perseverance in a war at a long distance, in a foreign and hostile country, where the people manifest no sympathy with our arms, although not averse to receive our dollars in payment of supplies, is not so easy a matter for a government constituted as ours, is and for a people having a very small regular army, and no organized system of taxation, in order to meet the extraordinary expenditure of a state of war.

The success of our army - and it has been everywhere successful - brings no substantial resources to our cause. We have advanced as conquerors into the heart of New Mexico and New Leon, on the Atlantic slope, and our flag is flying at all the strong points in California, on the Pacific; the bloody contest in assaulting Monterey, in New Leon, is the only feat of arms of recent occurrence; in California, and New Mexico no opposition whatever was offered to the American occupation. But these various conquests do not produce any perceptible effect upon the issue of the war. We hear no overtures for peace, no discouragement, on the part of the Mexican rulers or the Mexican people. The latest dates from Monterey are of the 29th ult. At that time it was believed that Santa Anna with a large force, was approaching Saltillo, with a determination to defend that important post to the last. Rumor places his force at 13,000 men, and his army, whatever it may be, will be reinforced by that with which Ampudia evacuated Monterey, - computed by our officers, who witnessed the marching forth of several divisions at near 7,000 men - this would make an effective force of 20,000 men at Saltillo, commanded by the ablest of the Mexican Generals, Santa Anna; to which at the latest dates from Monterey, of the 29th ult., General Taylor had not more that 5,000 effective men to oppose. But he will remain until he is strongly reinforced in men, ammunition, and provisions, and meantime can hold it against all Mexico. There is, however, no reason to suppose he will be attacked, not withstanding orders were immediately dispatched from Washington, on learning that an armistice of eight weeks had been agreed upon between Generals Taylor and Ampudia, subject to the ratification of each Government, to annul that agreement.

The rumor, however, of Santa Anna having reached Saltillo, with an army of 13,000 men, must be unfounded. That General only entered the city of Mexico on the 15th of September, when he was received in form and with much enthusiasm. He immediately occupied himself, as all the letters concur in saying, in urging and hurrying the equipment and departure of as large a force as he could gather together, to march against the advancing American Army under General Taylor; but that could not be accomplished in a few hours, not even in a few days, with a destitute treasury and a deficiency of military supplies and equipments. The distance from the city of Mexico to Saltillo is about 650 miles, which would not be traversed by an army in less than 5 weeks; and it is known that, up to the 20th of September, Santa Anna was still in the city of Mexico; of course, he and his forces could not be in the vicinity of Saltillo, as he is reported to have been, on the 27th hand 28th of September. But although I look upon this rumor as unfounded for the present, it is not to be doubted that Santa Anna will make a decisive effort to reach Saltillo and defend it, for it is a very defensible position; and that once carried the Americans, the road to San Luis do Potosi is comparatively easy. For some weeks to come, however, there is reason to believe there will be no more fighting in that quarter.

General Wood's corps is said to falling down towards that of Taylor, at Monterey, and General Kearney had left Santa Fe, with a portion of his army, on a reconnaissance of the region between him and General Wool. That part of the army left at Santa Fe is occupied in strengthening its defenses, and the whole territory of New Mexico is claimed as part of the United States. There is no faith, however, to be placed in the statement published in some of the papers, that General Kearney had organized the invaded country into a territorial government, and ordered an election of a delegate to represent the territory in the Congress of the United States. This is a proceeding which the Congress alone can organize or order, and however, under the exigencies of martial law, a military commander may assume sometimes to supersede the laws and functions of the country he is invading, no military commander of the United States is so ignorant of the limits of his authority, or of the extent of congress, as by an order of the day to constitute a foreign country into a territory of the Union, and direct an election to be held in it as such.

Meantime, from the western coast we have the official proclamation of Commodore Stockton, now commanding the United States fleet, instituting a blockade of all the Mexican ports on the Pacific; and the account of the capture of Monterey and other ports in California, without resistance. The British Admiral had visited Monterey after the American flag was flying there, and, as there was the most amicable intercourse between him and the American officers, the last hopes of the Mexican authorities, resting on an idea the England would interfere for Mexico, had vanished.

We have accounts by the telegraph from the south this morning of a very violent and destructive gale off the coast of Florida on the 11th inst. The little island of Key West, a bare sand-bar in the ocean, was literally devastated; the lighthouse was destroyed, almost all its habitations were overthrown, and 50 lives at least were, it is computed, lost. Many vessels were driven ashore, and among them the United States gun-brig Perry. We must await the arrival of the mail before we shall be made acquainted with all the details of the disaster.

The state of our commercial affairs is very satisfactory. Considerable losses have, indeed, been sustained on many of the importations from Europe, but our export trade, especially in bread stuffs, is very active. There will go forward large supplies of flour, wheat, corn, and cheese, and yet there will be a superabundance left behind, so bountiful have been our harvests this year.

The elections, which are in progress throughout the Union, indicate that the policy of the present Administration has not the sanction of the people. Several states have materially changed the political character of their representatives in Congress. At the head of these stands Pennsylvania, which, from being a stanch supporter of President Polk and his Administration, has wheeled round and sent a delegation to Congress of which the majority are opposed to the President. The chief grounds of dissatisfaction are the war with Mexico, undertaken in opposition to the views, and, as is thought, to the interests of the northern and middle states; and a repeal to the tariff, which was all-important to Pennsylvania, for the protection it afforded to the coal and iron.

The election in this state, the most numerously represented on the house of all the states, takes place next Tuesday, the 3d of November. If its results should at all coincide with those in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and elsewhere, the next House of Representatives with have a majority adverse to the President. The Congress, however, that is to meet next December, is not affected directly by these elections, as they are made a year in advance of the time at which the members chosen take their seats. But the moral effect upon the course and policy of the Administration of a defeat before the people cannot fall to be considerable.

Our latest dates from Europe are by the Caledonia, to the 4th inst. Commercially the news she brought enhanced the prices of all our staples--cotton, flour, cheese &c. Flour has since fallen back somewhat, but it is still half a dollar per barrel higher than before the arrival of the Caledonia. The best is now quoted at $6 per barrel. The cotton crop of this year will certainly fall short of that of last year, even if the picking season be prolonged by the absence of frost far into next month.

The rate of exchange upon Europe is steadily declining, and, if it go much lower, will turn the current of specie westward. Very good bills on London have been sold during the past week at from 6 to 6 1/2 per cent. Premium, though the rate for prime bills drawn to a point is firm at 7 1/2 per cent. Bills on France, 5f.32c. to 5f.35c.

Money is easy. [WWF]
If Mr. President Polk had thought to shape his conduct in strict conformity to our predictions, he could not have more entirely and accurately fulfilled them; and we are now not without hopes of seeing the just retribution which his rash and aggressive policy calls down upon his head eventually crush the democratic leaders and the present Cabinet of Washington under resentment of the American people. He found it an easy task to incite the country to embark in the war, which he had caused by his own instructions to the army, and declared upon his own responsibility. In fact, the critical position in which General Taylor found himself between Matamoras and the mouth of the Rio Bravo at the opening of the campaign left the Congress no option. Prompt support could alone prevent the utter ruin and probable capitulation of the army; so that, by a curious turn of affairs, it was a threatened disaster which in reality pledged the United States to this absurd, unjust, and unconstitutional war. We had long ago shown that the Democratic Party in America, and the successors of General Jackson, had their own especial reasons for regarding a war with none of that aversion and abhorrence which are entertained by most other civilized Governments, and professed by all. The exploits of a successful campaign are expected to have their usual effect on the populace; the army itself was likely to offer great attractions to the numerous body of loose adventurers in the new States, and military honours acquire an excessive value and importance in a country where other social distinctions do not exist; but, above all, the Government released itself by a bold declaration of war from the jealous precautions of the constitution and the votes of a popular assembly, and it could at once indulge in unbounded patronage and unlimited expenditure. No doubt, Mr. Polk and his advisers were sanguine enough to hope that the brilliant termination of the campaign and a treaty of peace, or rather a treaty of spoliation, dictated under the walls of Mexico, would prove an effectual answer to the attacks of the Opposition on the meeting of Congress. And it is not improbable that decided success would have obliterated from the memory of the United States the iniquity in which war originated, and the abuses by which it has been carried on. But, if such were the anticipations of the American Ministers, we must claim for ourselves the credit of a more correct appreciation of the state of their affairs than they had arrived at. We told them many months ago that they would find themselves at the close of the year, scarcely more advanced in the conquest coercion of Mexico than they were in April; we pointed out that the impossibility of making any rapid military movement in advance in a country destitute of roads and of water, whilst fever and dysentery were more certain to thin the ranks of the army that the assaults of the enemy; in short, we foresaw all the evils of an exhausted treasury, and of a war which cannot be carried on with such means as the United States possess, or abandoned without disgrace.

In one respect, Mr. Polk has been more fortunate than he deserved, in the strict forbearance and neutrality observed by this country. We believe that neutrality to be the line of policy most consonant to our honour and our interests; but, after the language Mr. Polk had used in the Oregon dispute, —which was still pending when Mexico was attacked on the Rio Bravo, —the American Government had certainly no right to reckon with implicit confidence on our standing entirely aloof; and our reserve is no excuse for their imprudence. We are happy to find that this truth is universally recognized in the United States, and nothing has raised the character of the English Government to a higher position in their estimation than the fact that we did not stoop to take advantage of the folly of their own Cabinet.

The main difficulty of Mr. Polk lies, however, in the financial embarrassments with which he is surrounded; and these must come under the full discussion and control of Congress. Somehow or another, we are assured by our correspondents that no less than forty millions of dollars have been spent upon this war in the last six months; and we can believe that this calculation is not excessive, when we remember that the army and fleet had not only to be supported in the field and at sea, and provided with pay and necessaries, but that these forces had in a great measure to be formed and equipped. A country in possession of an immense accumulation of stores and a considerable standing army may carry on a war on a limited scale without a very larger addition to its annual expenditure. But the very existence of a corps of 20,000 men, operating in a foreign country, and drawing its supplies entirely from home, is an unheard of novelty in the United States of America—a novelty in their estimates, and a novelty in their political condition. We venture to affirm that when Congress passed a precipitate bill to authorize the President to call out 50,000 volunteers, nobody but the Administration and the contractors had any idea of the enormous burden they were imposing on the country. Yet that act will be invoked by the Government as a formal recognition by Congress of a war which it had not declared, and as a sanction for all the expenses that war has occasioned.

These facts are so clear that we are not surprised to find that Mr. Polk's popularity and power are on the wane; that in many states the elections have turned in favour of the Whigs; and that here is a prospect of his having to render an account of all the proceedings of his Presidency to a hostile House of Representatives. If such be the event, the strongest measures which the American constitution provides, and which the manners of our time tolerate, will hardly be too strong to punish the errors and misdeeds of such and Administration.

We do not anticipate that any important intelligence from the seat of war will arrive to disarm the resentment of the American people, or to improve Mr. POLK's position. At Monterey the Mexicans have recently shown that they can fight with the ancient bravery of their Spanish progenitors behind walled fortifications; and, although the town was ultimately taken, the capture cost the Americans more than the loss of it did the Mexicans. In consequence of the refusal of the American Cabinet to ratify General TAYLOR's armistice, we shall probably shortly hear of a similar attack upon Saltillo, the result of which depends very much on the combinations by which the respective forces may be concentrated on that point. SANTA ANNA will not be able to bring his army up in time to defend the position; but it is not impossible that he may precede the main body of his troops, and that the resistance of the place may be prolonged till he arrives. At any rate, even the loss of Saltillo will not prove a decisive blow to Mexico, for it is more than 600 miles from the capital; whereas the failure of General TAYLOR's attempt upon it would compromise to the last degree the safety of his army and the credit of his arms. In a military point of view it was a mistake to weaken the small American force by allowing detachments to march off to California and Santa Fe, where there was no enemy whatever to encounter. The possession of those provinces depends not on a mere military occupation by a party of marauders and backwoodsmen, but on the terms of the peace eventually to be concluded by the belligerent parties. LT December 3, 1846/6f "DEFENCE OF THE CITY OF MEXICO"

While a forced contribution has been raised to fortify the city of Mexico, the Government has been making preparations to remove to a citadel in the mountains, surrounded by dangerous passes. The fact is, the city of Mexico cannot be securely fortified. It is in a peculiar position. It was once surrounded by the Lake Tezcoco, which formed in its depth and extent a natural defence, superior to everything artificial. But the rains from the neighbouring mountains so swelled the lake at periods as to subject the city to distressing overflows, and for a period of five years, from 1629 to 1634, the city was submerged for a foot or two, and the inhabitants were only released from their distress by an earthquake, which made an outlet for the overflowing waters. The viceroys of Spain were compelled to cut a canal by which the lake was drained, with the exception of a small pond at the north east of the city. Mexico is therefore surrounded by a meadow or marsh, with canals and bridges, but no walls or regular fortifications. All the houses have flat roofs and many lofty buildings on which defences may be erected, as in all Spanish towns of narrow streets and stone houses. We infer, therefore, from the proposed removal of the seat of Government, that no regular defence of Mexico will be made if assailed, as at Monterey, which was a remarkably strong place. But there are many towns and cities on the road to Mexico, admirably situate for defence, from which a powerful resistance may be made. We again repeat that Vera Cruz is the key to the whole country, and commands the capital. Tampico is the next important place, as opening a water communication to San Louis Potosi. --New York Sun. LT December 4, 1846/2d Mexico, military force of

We extract from the New York Courier and Enquirer a brief of interesting sketch of the military resources and capabilities of Mexico:-

"Mexico has always had larger army than any other American Republic. In 1827 it was 60,000 strong. At present, it numbers 40,000; 30,000 of whom are infantry, 8,000 cavalry and the remainder Artillery. These troops come under two categories-active and permanent. The permanent are only called out on emergencies; but their organization resembles that of the active, to whom, indeed, they are very little inferior in efficiency. A regiment of Mexican Infantry comprises 2 battalions, 16 companies and 1792 men, rank and file. A regiment of Mexican Cavalry is 676 strong. But these, though the number appears on the muster roll of a Mexican Regiment do not represent the real force. That force, from desertion and other causes is continually varying. A Mexican colonel may command 1,000 men one week and not half that the next. Nothing is stable in Mexico, except the climate. At an annual cost of $8,000,000, these 40,000 fighting men are maintained. A regiment of Mexican Infantry has a colonel, 2 lieutenant colonels, 16 captains, 32 lieutenants, and 64-second lieutenants. If we mistake not, an officer is attached to each battalion who is called a commandante, a grade equivalent to that of a major in our service. A French traveler, lately in Mexico, says there were 24,000 officers in the army of that country! He may be right; but in his estimate he has included persons who hold merely honorary commissions, and also the retirados, or half pays. The frequency of revolutions in Mexico is the cause of the vast number of retirados in that republic; for the leaders of a successful revolt, the moment they go into office, distribute among their friends a number of commissions, the recipients of which perform military duty and receive military pay for a year or two; when, another successful outbreak occurring, they are placed on the list of retirados. After the lapse of a year or two another revolution occurs, which has the results of the previous one. Here it is necessary to remark, that the retirados receive a portion of their due; so that the term 'half pay officers' is applied to them, something of a misnomer.

The commissioned officers of the Mexican army are mostly white men; but men of any color or caste may obtain commissions if they have the requisite influence with the Government. Few of the Mexican officers are highly educated, - which characterizes the officers of other armies. Within the last 10 years a military school, on the plan of the famed Polytechnic School in Paris, has been established in the city of Mexico. It is, or was till lately, under the charge of General Conde. Notwithstanding the assertion of the French writer we have already quoted from to the contrary, the school in question is a valuable institution, and has begun to realize the expectations of its founders nor could it well do otherwise. In the profession of arms, as in every other, 'knowledge is power' and the knowledge of the military man cannot be too profound or too extensive.

The pay of a General of Division in the Mexican service is 500 dollars per month; of a brigadier, 375. The subalterns are somewhat better paid than officers of the same rank in the British and French services; but on the other hand, their clothing and accoutrements cost them more. In the city of Mexico you cannot buy a military cloak for less that 100 dollars.

Let us now say something about the private soldiers of the Mexican army. Their pay (in the infantry) is 12 dollars per month-in the cavalry, 12. The soldiers, when in garrison, cater for themselves. Once a year they are supplied with a new suit of uniform, quite as well made as that of the California volunteers! The cloth of which their clothes are made is manufactured at Queretaro, a town in the department of that name.

The color of the uniform of the Mexican infantry is blue. Some of the cavalry wear blue, others red coats. One regiment of infantry, the 11th, and one or two of cavalry are clad in white. These are two kinds of horse soldiers in Mexico, Lancers and Dragoons. The Lancers are the most numerous. The cavalry are mounted on horses which, though small, ugly looking, and only half trained, are incredibly hardy. The sabers of the privates are not good, yet they cost the Mexican Government a good deal of money.

Mexican Infantry are drilled in the French fashion, and armed with English muskets.

They are anything but serviceable arms, still they are no better than those made in Birmingham for sale in Africa, which are apt, the first time they "go off" to go off altogether. If the muskets of the Mexican soldiers are bad, their powder is a thousand times worse. During the bombardment of San Juan de Ulloa by the French squadron, in 1839, many of the shots from the castle struck the ships, but it failed in piercing wood, Elihu Urritt, and the 'Universal Peace Society" would have reason to rejoice.

The mode of recruiting for the Mexican army has been often described by travelers. It is this:- A lazy recruiting party enters a town or village-they stop the first lazy looking man they meet, and if he can not give a good account of himself they handcuff him and take him to the barracks. There he is examined by the surgeon, handed over to the drill sergeant, and three weeks later he is a soldier.

About three-fourths of the Mexican troops are pure blood Indian - the rest Mestizos, or half-breeds. There are very few Negroes amongst them.

It is worthy to remark that, prior to the revolution, the Indians in Mexico were exempt from military service. And what was very singular, the Spanish military code then in vogue contained a clause forbidding the enlistment of butchers, whatever their color or birthplace. A great deal has been said in praise of Mexican valor, and a great deal in its disparagement. The truth lies between the two extremes. Mexico is not a nation of heroes, nor is it a nation of cowards.

There is a great diversity of character amongst the Mexicans. The inhabitants of the department of Puebla are much brave and energetic than those of the department of Mexico. But in the neighborhood of Tampico exists a tribe of Indians who surpass all others in point of courage, resolution, and strength of character. It is from these Indians that the "Battle of Tampico" (which is distinguished itself at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma) is chiefly recruited. They resemble the Welch in character - may they not be descendants of that people? There is a tradition in Wales, that about the 14th century one of their princes, accompanied by a number of countrymen, their wives and families, left Wales on a voyage to some distant land, whence they never returned.

The Mexican soldier has one or two useful qualities. He is obedient to his officers and he endures the greatest privations without a murmur. His stature is short - seldom exceeding 5 feet 5 inches, or 5 feet 6 inches, - and he is clumsily made. In the management of his weapons he evinces no dexterity. Wanting pliancy of body and activity of body and mind, he makes but an indifferent skirmisher. Deficient in height and strength of arm, he is not calculated for a grenadier. His strength is in his legs. He can march distances which even a Spanish soldier might fail to accomplish. During the revolution of 1841 Santa Anna made a forced march of 60 miles in 24 hours. Detachments of Mexican Infantry have been known to keep up with their mounted officers, though they (the officers) were going at a trot! Some travelers say that the cavalry of the Mexicans is much better than the infantry. This is not the case. Both are equally good, or, as some might say, equally bad. The cavalry, for the most part are recruited from the same class of men as the infantry. The irregular cavalry are composed of much finer men than the regular. They are chiefly Mestizos. Such is the army of Mexico. Thrice it has been defeated by the army of General Taylor and his companions in arms, and we have little doubt that every conflict yet to come, if it be equally fair and open, will witness a similar issue. LT December 4, 1846/5f "Santa Anna seizes 2 million dollars"

Mexico

Our Liverpool correspondent has forwarded to us the following important telegraphic communication, which was received in a private letter by the steamer Britannia, from Boston. We, of course, do not answer for its authenticity.

"Office of the Boston Times, Nov. 16, 10 o'clock.
"The Great Western not in."
"A Little Later From Mexico."

"Santa Anna seized 2,000,000 of dollars intended for English capitalists. The money was on its way to Tampico for shipment in two British steamers, when Santa Anna seized it. Another revolutionary attempt in the city of Mexico, by parties in favour of annexation to the United States. President Salas addressed the mob and quieted them. Dissension in the Cabinet. Secretly adjourned.

LT December 5, 1846 5E "Santa Anna seizes 2 million dollars"

Mexico

We published yesterday a communication, received, from our Liverpool correspondent, announcing, under date, New York, Nov. 16, the arrival of intelligence from Mexico, to the effect that Santa Anna had seized upon 2,000,000 dollars, then en route to Tampico for shipment to England; and that a revolutionary attempt to overturn the existing Government of Mexico had been made in the capital by parties favorable to the annexation of the republic.

The source whence this important intelligence was delivered was stated to be a private letter; but our despatches received from Liverpool last night announce that the document given in The Times of yesterday was received at Boston, by telegraph from New York, immediately before the departure of the mail steamer. The Government mail agent on board the Britannia alone brought a copy of the announcement to Liverpool. We think it right to state in detail this fact, in order that our readers may be enabled to judge of the true weight of the document.

Our Liverpool correspondent points out, also, the while telegraphic accounts from the Gulf squadron at Anton Lizardo to a late date in October were published in the New York journals of the 15th ult., no later than advices from the interior of Mexico were given. The lack of later accounts from this quarter, under such circumstances, excited some surprise in New York and in Liverpool. [WWF]

LT December 8, 1846 4c "Mexico and the US"

The Mexican generals appear to have adopted a Russian system of tactics, which is obviously likely to prove most embarrassing to the American army. The determination of Santa Anna to evacuate Saltillo and retreat upon San Luis Potosi is in Potosi is in perfect conformity with all the observations we have made on a singular war. The country furnishes no adequate supplies for an army, not because it is barren or unfertile, but because it is uncultivated and waste. Troops cannot be fed on wild plats or wild cattle - the homestead, the farm, the barn and the two are indispensable to the subsistence of an army. Add to this, that the interior of Mexico is singularly ill supplied with water, and that it will be easy for the guerilla parties to destroy the wells on the approach of the enemy. To effect a movement on the San Luis Potosi, General Taylor must stretch the outposts of his little army over 300 miles of the enemy's country, in addition to the 180 miles which already divide him from his base of operations. A Coup de main on Mexico itself is too bold and desperate an enterprise to be attempted with an army of raw troops, partly volunteers, surrounded by a hostile population, who because more formidable in proportion as the enemy approaches their own doors. A march to the south might be followed by a parallel to the retreat from Moscow. We have, therefore, no doubt that General Taylor will preserve in that slow and cautious policy, from which he has only been driven on one or two occasions by the absurd imprudence of the orders he has received from the American Government; and the present aspect of the affairs in Mexico fully justifies the views this sagacious offices seems from the first to have entertained of the war which he was directed to carry on.

Meanwhile, every fatal consequence which follows an unnecessary, unjust, and unsuccessful war seems to accumulate around the head of Mr. Polk. The functions of a Prime Minister of the United States, for such the President of the Union virtually is, are fixed in their duration; and the four years allotted by the constitution to his administration secure to him the full applause or censure due to his acts. No hostile majority mercifully removes him from the scene of action, or snatches from him the power he has abused. Until the fatal or the fortunate hour which again consigns him to obscurity, he is bound to stand the brunt of unpopularity - to see, perhaps, all the powers of the State leagued against him, - to view from his elevated position the disastrous consequences of his errors, - and to carry on the government when the majority which raised him to office in an hour of party delusion has long since discovered that their demigod is an idol of clay. Such is the melancholy position of Mr. Polk. If he has already ceased to be the President of the United States, we should willingly allow his name to sink to that humble place which it will hereafter occupy, among those who have proved themselves least equal to the station they have filled. But it is for the instruction of the world that such examples are given to it; and, if anything were needed to reconcile Europe to the occasional inconveniences of hereditary monarchy, it would be the absurd consequences we have witnessed under the elective republican system of America.

In the United States, however, the lesson will not go deeper than the distinction of the party; and the reaction produced in public opinion is confined to the returning ascendancy of Whig statesmen and the waning power of Democrats and Locofocos.
Setting aside the flourishes of Mr. Webster's speech to the men of Massachusetts, to which we have already adverted, the tone of that address is a most striking indication of the present state of political feeling in the United States. Two years ago the New Englanders, assembled in Faneuil Hall to listen to the eloquence of Mr.
Webster, could only raise an inefficual protest against the annexation of Texas, and against the violent course of policy upon which the American Cabinet was entering.
At the present moment the disastrous results of those measures have opened the eyes of the country, and restored the Whig party to the position they had lost. In democratic states the changes of public opinion are exceedingly rapid; and it would seem that on several important subjects they have been complete among the American public, especially with reference to their foreign relations. All the accounts we receive from the other side of the Atlantic concur in the assurance that at no time since the Declaration of Independence have Americans looked up to this country with more universal respect and regard. The conclusion of the Oregon controversy at the very moment when an English Minister might have taken advantage of the embarrassments into which the president had thrust himself into Mexico, has given an conspicuous and incontrovertible answer to those politicians of the school of General Jackson who made the intrigues and encroachments falsely imputed to England the basis and pretext of their own aggressive policy. For once, the true motives and spirit of the foreign policy of this country have been understood and acknowledged even by our captious descendants; and the conduct of Lord Aberdeen in the transactions to which we allude has earned for this country a higher degree of consideration than we could have won by the most signal triumphs of fleets and armies.

The ground of attack against the present American Government, and the questions upon which the Whigs have already recovered a majority in several important States, with the prospect of a majority in the House of Representatives, are the Mexican war with its disastrous financial consequences, and the low tariff of last year. The former question affects the whole Union alike; the latter is urged with far more force amongst the manufacturers of New England than it can be elsewhere. As the members of the House of Representatives are returned in numerical proportion to the population of their several states and districts, and densely-peopled cities and manufacturing communities of the north naturally constitute a majority in the Lower House of Congress. But in the Senate each state is represented by two members, without reference to its size or population. Hence the number of senators from the agricultural states of the south is equal, if not superior, to that of their Protectionist colleagues; and even the wilds of Texas send their representative to the Upper Chamber to counterbalance the voices of New York or Massachusetts on the question of free trade. The repeal of the late tariff is, therefore, by no means certain, especially when the south is entering into enjoyment of enlarged interchange with Great Britain; and the battle will be fought with ardor by the southern senators. But on the subject of war, and of the mode in which it was begun has been conducted, Mr. Polk's government will not have the advantage of such a division of opinion. The facts are now before the people of the United States. The expenditure of the last few months has been double the whole revenue of the State; and this enormous increase is already threefold the amount of 10 million dollars voted by congress for the campaign. It must be acknowledged that such a violation of a constitutional principle by a government which professes to be altogether dependant on the will of the people, and such profusion and extravagance by a State which carries the rules of economy to the verge of parsimony, are some of the strangest contradictions which the United States have exhibited to the world; and we are curious to learn whether that constitution which Mr. Webster regards as the ark for his country is provided with remedies for such abuses, or any means of self preservation against those who are bold enough to set its provisions in open defiance. THE AMERICAN NAVY AT MEXICO

Our private accounts from the Gulf of Mexico, commenting on the late proceedings of the American squadron in the late attack on Alvarado, speak of the affair in terms of supreme contempt. It has not at all advanced the character of the United States navy in the estimation of that of our own. The affair failed totally for want of pluck, and would be deemed a mark of disgrace on British naval officers if they had so conducted such an expedition. The United States ships are generally inferior, whilst their discipline is anything but what would be desirable on board her Majesty's squadron. One or two have been lost, two or three have the scurvy on board, and the only good-looking ship is the Commodore's, and she would be eclipsed by the 50-gun frigate Vindictive. The best man-of-war the Americans possessed in the Gulf was the Truxton, lost on the coast. A great number of British seamen are on board the ships of the United States, but they work not with the alacrity and good will which is observable on board a well-regulated British vessel of the Royal navy, and under American officers they show little relish for sharp services. A little more encouragement in the Royal navy would secure these men under our own flag. It is noticed by officers of our ships that in one respect we might take a hint from the Americans-namely, making our ships for fighting purposes. -- Standard. [WWF]

We are glad to find that our intelligence of yesterday morning, respecting the seizure of 2,000,000 dollars by Santa Anna, is not confirmed in the letters that the leading houses here have received by the steamer; and the following extracts will show that Santa Anna's object was not to seize the property, but to protect it, as he detained the conducta with the treasure for Tampico while he considered it necessary, and then allowed it to go on without molestation. The following are extracts from private letters :--

"MEXICO, OCT. 29.

"Our surmises of an intended attack on Tampico were well-founded, as became apparent by the Americans' intercepted despatches. Indeed, General Santa Anna refused at one time to let the conducta to go to Tampico at all, and when he did consent it was with the express understanding that the Mexican Government should not be held responsible for any danger arising to it from the Americans. The escort was to go only to within 15 leagues of Tampico, but the merchants themselves will no doubt go out of Tampico, which has been evacuated by the Mexican troops to fetch it in."

"MEXICO, OCT. 28.

"The conducta for Tampico was detained by Santa Anna in Sn Luis until the 6th inst., but he then allowed it to go on without molestation, It will of course be too late for this packet."

"TAMPICO, OCT. 23.

"The conductas for here had started towards the close of last month from Guanajuato and Zacatecas, but 2were detained in San Luis by Santa Anna, and, according to the latest accounts, were to leave that city on the 16th inst., and may therefore be expected to arrive here in the beginning of next month. No fears are entertained about its reaching this place in safety. Our garrison has received instructions from Santa Anna to evacuate this place forthwith, because he fears that it will soon be attacked by a large American force, which, however, it would appear to us, will not be the case before the enemy actually needs the occupation of Tampico—say, in about two months, when Taylor will be ready to operate against San Luis." LT Dec. 10 page 6 of MONEY-MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Wednesday Evening.

The English funds remain without variation, the only price of Consols during the entire day having been 95 1/4 to 3/5 for money, and 95 3/8 to 1 1/2 for the opening. The undue disparity between Consols and Reduced, which we noticed a few days back, has been diminished by large transfers from one stock to the other, but it still exists to the extent of a quarter per cent. Bank Stock left off 206 1/2; to 207 1/2; Reduced Three per Cents., 94 1/4 to 3/8; Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents., 96 1/8 to 1/4; Long Annuities, 9 7/8 to 15-16; India Bonds, 17s. premium; South Sea Stock, 105 1/4; ditto, Old Annuities, 94 3/8; ditto, New Annuities, 94 7/8; and Exchequer-bills, 9s. to 12s. premium.

Mexican securities were better this afternoon on speculative purchases, and prices for money and the account were quoted about 1/2 per cent. In advance of yesterday. The first price was 22 3/4, after which they were market at 23 1/2, but the last bargains were done at 23 1/4. Portuguese and Spanish were not firmly supported, and prices show a downward tendency. Portuguese and Spanish were not firmly supported, and prices show a downward tendency. Portuguese Four per Cents. For the account were last done at 38 1/2; Spanish Five per Cents. For money, at 26 1/2; and for the account, at 26 1/4; Passive, at 5 2/8; and the Three per Cents., at 37 3/4; Belgian Four-and-a-Half per Cents., at 95; and Dutch Four per Cents., Certificates, at 92 1/2.

The following letters and documents, received today by the chairman of the Committee of Spanish American Bondholders, have been handed to us for publication. It will be seen from the second letter that the uncertainties regarding the last Mexican conversion have at length been put to rest, and that the operation, as carried out by Messrs. Schneider and Co., is confirmed :--
FROM MANNING AND MACKINTOSH, MEXICO, TO G.R. ROBINSON, ESQ., CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE OF SPANISH AMERICAN BONDHOLDERS, LONDON.

"MEXICO, OCT. 30, 1846.

"We were in due course favoured with your communications of the 29th of June, 1st and 31st of August, and paid particular attention to their contents. We have been incessant in our applications to the Mexican Government about the restitution of the fifth of duties belonging to the holders of Mexican Bonds involved in the general suspension of all payments decreed by this Government, but, owing to the disturbed state of the country, the blockade of its ports, and the imperative calls for money upon and exhausted treasury, we have not been able to get any satisfactory reply from the several Ministers of Finance that have succeeded each other in office within the last three months. Under these circumstances we made another attempt in applying by letter (copy of which we enclose) to the present Minister, Don Antonio Haro Tamariz, who has verbally promised to attend to the business, and return us a decision by next packet.

"The unfortunate war with the United States is, in our opinion, at present the chief cause of the difficulties of the Mexican Government; and the worst of it is, that it is difficult to assign a term to the hostilities between the two countries.

"Hoping to have it in our power to transmit you further information by next steamer."

FROM THE SAME TO THE SAME.

"MEXICO, OCT. 30, 1846.

"We have the honour to enclose a certified copy of an official communication we have received from the Mexican Government just at the moment of the closing of the mail :--

" | MINISTRY OF FINANCE. - SECTION 1.

" | I have made known to his Excellency the General charged with the Supreme Executive power your note of this date, in which, referring to the previous ones which you have addressed to this Ministry, you desire to know what is the resolution of the Supreme Government with regard to the pending affair relative to the conversion of the foreign debt; and his Excellency commands me to inform you, that having again examined the matter with all the attention which its importance demands, he has come to the conclusion that the operation is consummated, and that the Government cannot now deliberate upon it, seeing that the conversion of the debt has been actually made; and that for the same reason it has been decreed that the corresponding orders be issued for the payment of the first dividend, which is to be made in London in the month of January, as well as of the amount which you claim in your communication of the day before yesterday, on account of the suspension ordered of the 2d of May last, and the other amounts relative to the affair, without prejudice to an account of the whole operation being rendered to the Sovereign General Congress, when it shall be assembled.

"I protest to you, gentlemen, the assurances of my consideration and esteem.

"God and liberty.

"HARO Y TAMARIZ.

"Mexico, Oct. 29.

"Messrs. Manning and Mackintosh.

"I, Ewen C. Mackintosh, Her Britannic Majesty's Consul in Mexico, do hereby certify unto all whom it doth or may concern, that the foregoing is a true and faithful copy of an original letter exhibited to me by Messrs. Manning and Mackintosh, to whom, after comparing, I have returned it for the uses that they may think proper, and in faith and testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal of office in Mexico this 30th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1846.

"EWEN C. MACKINTOSH."
In connexion with the above, it is understood that the present mail brings no communication to Messrs. Schneider and Co. regarding the removal of the agency, and as a notice of suspension pending an inquiry into the conversion is all that they have hitherto received direct upon the subject, an inference is drawn by their friends that the appointment may yet remain in their hands.

Private letters disagree with the paragraph in the Mexican news of to-day, that the report of the seizure of $2,000,000 by Santa Anna is confirmed. It is stated, that the conducta was stopped by him at San Luis Potosi, and that he recommended the merchants not to allow the treasure to proceed, on account of the danger to which it would be exposed; but that he never attempted to take possession of it. Indeed, these accounts affirm that it is now on its way to Tampico, at which place, according to the letters dated to-day, it was expected to arrive in about six or seven days after the sailing of the packet. If this should prove correct, the amount will, doubtless, be transmitted by the next mail, since, when it shall have reached Tampico, it will be under the protection of the British Consulate.

The following extracts are form private communications received by the Tay. The account of the imprisonment of the French and Spanish Consuls by the American Commodore in California seems obviously to have been manufactured to excite belief in the probability of European intervention:

"MEXICO, Oct. 28.

"Santa Anna is now at San Luis, where he has concentrated his forces, and which consist of about 20,000 men. The general belief here is that he has some understanding with the Americans. Be this as it may, I think the affair must be terminated before the close of the year. The Californias, as you will have heard, have been occupied by the Americans and the accounts by the post of to-day from that quarter say that the commander of the American naval forces there has divided the country into three states, and has given notice for the election of deputies to the General Congress to be made. The French and Spanish consuls there have protested against the occupation of the country by the Americans, and have been imprisoned by the commodore. The Americans have been repulsed on two attacks on Alvarado and one on Guaymas. I very much fear that the European Powers will, sooner or later, have to repent of the lukewarmness they have shown in this struggle."

OCT. 29.

"Here I regret much to say there does not appear to be the slightest disposition to make peace. During the present month the pugnacious spirit has, on the contrary, increased, and great efforts are making to get together a large force. If we can believe all that is written to us, within a very few days Santa Anna will have united at San Luis about 20,000 men; Ampudia, with his 'retreating' force, has already joined him. Valencia is on the way from Guanuxato, with, it is said, 7,000 men, and from Morelia 2,000 have left. What Santa Anna intends doing subsequent to getting all together, we do not yet know; whether we will go to attack Taylor, or allow Taylor to attack him, remains to be seen. The last report from Monterey is, that Taylor intended marching towards Tampico with 5,800 regular troops (the bulk of he volunteers being determined to return), which if he attempts, I think he runs a very good chance of being cut up. He will have to pass through a hostile country, and with such a superior force watching his movements and ready to take advantage of him, if he gets to Tampico at all, it will cost him a great many men."

We find also the following paragraph with regard to mining operations:

"In 'El Oro' they are hard at work, constructing a Haciendo de Beneficio, and shares are looking up. The 'Bote' continues to do wonders. The Luz Mine in Guanuxato is yielding $80,000 a week, and all the old haciendas in that quarter are in progress of being repaired. Next year out to give a large produce of silver."

As The Times of this morning contained a copious summary of the news from the West Indies, it is unnecessary to allude further the subject under this head.

The accounts from Havannah and Matanzas give the particulars of the exports of sugar and coffee from those places from the 1st of January to the 31st of October, 1846, compared with the same period of the previous year. The total exports of sugar from the Havannah was 449,340 boxes, against 231,713 boxes in 1845; and the total exports of coffee 144,608 arrobas, against 147,312 arrobas in 1845. The total exports of sugar from Mantanzas were 265,676 boxes against 93,325 boxes in 1845; and the total exports of coffee 22,189 arrobas, against 8,040 arrobas in 1845.
According to the returns published, England, America, and Spain were the three leading countries to which shipments had been made. The exports from the Havannah from the 1st of March, 1846, to the 6th of November were 457,801 boxes of sugar, 147,708 arrobas of coffee, 24,871 hhd's. Of molasses, 1,247 tiers of honey, 30,075 arrobas of wax, 135,377 mille of cigars, and 3,032,888 lb. of tobacco. The exports from Matanzas for the same date were 267,803 boxes of sugar, 22,389 arrobas of coffee and 50,516 hhd's. Of molasses.

From Port-au-Prince late advices have come to hand, which furnish a decree calling upon all State creditors in the island for an account of their respective claims, in order that the Government may become acquainted with the real condition of the public Treasury. Two months is the period allowed for claims to be received, after which date any that are presented will be refused recognition. A severe order has also been published against persons engaged in contraband trade, which it is expected will produce a beneficial effect. Marine prisons are being constructed of the old and unseaworthy Government vessels, and gangs of male criminals under sentence have been employed in the work. White sugar was quoted 58.60, and brown 40. Spanish doubloons were marked 65; Patriot, 63.50; Spanish gourde (or dollar), 4.06; and Mexican gourde (or dollar), 4.

The accounts from Rio de Janeiro extend to the 10th of Oct., at which date the rate of exchange upon England was steady at 28; Paris at 338; and Hamburgh at 630. The Six per Cent. Local Stock stood at 79 to 1/9. The latest advices received at Rio from Pernambuco were to the 29th Sept., but they contained nothing of public interest.

Private letters from Lima to the 12th of October have been received to-day. These state that the Finance Minister had resigned office on account of ill-health. It was not known by whom he would permanently be succeeded. Don Jose Fabio Melgar was at present acting for the Government in that capacity; but not being a public favourite, his removal was shortly expected. The country, according to these accounts, remains perfectly tranquil. New laws have been enforced for the better regulation of the colonies, for increasing the safety of the public, and for ameliorating the evils springing from successive revolutions; and such strict attention is said to be paid to the wants of the community, and to the regular discharge of the salaries of the military, that little fear is entertained respecting a change of dynasty during the current presidency. General Bulnes, the President of Chili, has been re-elected by a large majority of votes.

Letters were received this afternoon from New Zealand, via Valparaiso, dated Wellington, the 4th of August. An extract from one of these runs as follows:--

"Matters here are now at a crisis. The Governor is at this moment at work in the neighbourhood with all the force he can muster, reducing the strongholds of the rebel natives, who have been keeping this part of the country in a state of excitement for some time past, and this mail may yet bring you accounts of his success, of which little doubt is entertained, when the land question will be effectually settled. People are, therefore, looking forward to an improved state of things in every department with confidence and hope. Business is pretty brisk, and the market well supplied from Sydney by persons who rushed to take advantage of our present activity, and who have consequently imported to a considerable extent." LONDON, TUESDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1846.

The last accounts from the theatre of war in North America are less completely devoid of interest than those which have preceded them, although they still further demonstrate the impracticability of decisive operations against an enemy who will neither resist nor yield. The loss of a province like California, or the bombardment of a town like Tobasco, is of no more importance to Mexico than the separation of a limb from the body of one of the lower animals. The vital energy is so depressed, and the nervous sympathy of the several members so faint, that the mutilation of a part is scarcely felt by the centre; and if Mexico were severed into as many states as she has provinces, each of them would exhibit an equal pretence of political life, and an equal absence of that political union which constitutes the true force of a commonwealth or a kingdom.
We are therefore led to suppose that in directing their recent attacks against some weak outlying positions on the southern coast of the Mexican Gulf the Americans officers were actuated by a desire to give the fleet a little occupation, rather than by the anticipation of any important military results. These operations are, in fact, attended with more danger than glory, and more inhumanity than advantage. They produce no effective result whatever, and in the present temper of the American people they will not even furnish palatable ingredients for the PRESIDENT'S message. The mouth of the river Alvarado, which was intended to be the scene of the first of the American Commodore's exploits, lies about 50 miles south of Vera Cruz. We are not aware that the position is one of any great importance, either in a military or a mercantile point of view; but the American Commodore's exploits, lies about 50 miles south of Vera Cruz. We are not aware that the position is one of any great importance, either in a military or a mercantile point of view; but the Americans have made two ineffectual attempts to enter the river, though without any intention of remaining there. On the 15th of October, Commodore Gonner, with the steamers Mississippi, Maclane, and Vixen, and two schooners, endeavoured to force the passage. The Mississippi, which is a large steamer, carrying 10 guns, could not approach the shore near enough to destroy the battery at the entrance; the Maclane ran aground on the bar, and fouled with the other vessels' and the Vixen was obliged to return. The commanding officer relates these untoward circumstances with a manly frankness that does him credit, and adds a general observation which deserves to be borne in mind, though it is more remarkable for good sense than good English:--

"Except for a short time, from early in the spring to the commencement of the rainy season, no one not acquainted with them can have any conception of the difficulties attending naval operations on this coast. The north winds during the winter months are sudden and violent, accompanied by high seas and strong currents. No judgment can be formed as to what moment they may commence. Under such circumstances, an opinion may be easily formed of the difficulty of landing a body of men on the open coast, and also of the danger from the elements attending it."

Even in this little expedition a change of wind or a stray shot in the machinery of a steamer might have destroyed the squadron.

After this failure it was determined, however, to strike a blow in the river Tobasco, some 200 miles further to the south, and on the confines of those states of Central America whose allegiance to Mexico is extremely dubious. Commodore Perry was detached on this service on the evening of the 16th of October, the very day after the failure of the attack in the Alvarado, probably for the purpose of retrieving the credit of the squadron elsewhere. After some little delay occasioned by rough weather, the steamers and schooners were collected off the mouth of the river Tobasco. The town of Frontera, which appears to have been undefended, was soon passed; no resistance was offered by a fort in a strong position, which might have obliged the Americans to land a storming party; and on the following morning the squadron arrived opposite Tobasco, a trading town of some 4,000 inhabitants, about 74 miles from the mouth of the stream. The Governor behaved with spirit, though evidently unprovided with means of defence; and the injury done by the invaders naturally fell to the share of the merchants of his place. Half-a-dozen small Mexican trading vessels were captured, and two American vessels were seized in the course of his expedition for holding treasonable correspondence with the enemy. No contribution of war was levied, and no excess of wanton violence seems to have been committed; though we must observe that the whole expedition was wanton and unproductive, and such appears to be the judgment passed upon it in the United States.

In the mean time, whilst these abrasions of the extremities are inflicted on certain Mexican provinces by the fleet, there is something inexpressibly grotesque in the manner in which Mr. President Polk has grappled with the totum corpus imperii, and seized the entire continent of North America, from St. Francisco to the Rio Grande, with six or seven regiments of fencibles and the Kentucky volunteers. That concentration of power which successful war has sometimes conferred on the Alexanders and Napoleons of the old world is suddenly breathed into the President of the United States he has already doubled to territories of the United States, and doubled his revenue; he has diminished their revenue-and after having set on foot an army, it only remains for him to find public servants in sufficient numbers to administer his conquests. In the grandiloquent language of our American contemporaries, we are informed--

"That in view of the answer of the Mexican Government or rulers to our pacific proposition, the President has concluded to establish and garrison post along our Southern boundary, from Tampico to a point on the Pacific, several degrees south of latitude 42; that he will appoint territorial governors, judges, and other ministerial Large supplies of human happiness and virtue are no doubt, commodities of exotic growth in the wilds of North America; but we must entertain some doubts of the quality of the article which is to be imported by war and consumed under an invasion. No exaggeration, however, can go much beyond the powers which the President has actually usurped. His orders to General Taylor were the commencement of hostilities, and he virtually declared war, not by the voice of Congress, but by the authority of his office. He has carried on the war in the same manner, without any reference to the limited grant of $10,000,000 dollars made by the representatives of the people; and one of the commanding-officers reports in his despatches from the theatre of war, significantly enough, “Treasury-notes are of no use: the Mexicans will take nothing but gold and silver.” Gold and silver have therefore been found, but by what means and for what purposes it will astonish our republican friends on the other side of the Atlantic to learn. Lastly, having made the war his own by its origin and by his mode of conducting it, Mr. Polk lays claim to its whole results. With a few strokes of his pen he extends the North American Union into the heart of Mexico, and recognizes the existence of territories, as dependent on the United States, which it will require an army to occupy, a colonial Administration to govern, and a century to people. Meanwhile, the answer to these splendid schemes is, that Texas itself has not yet been relinquished by the Mexicans—that no progress has been made towards obtaining the treaty of peace which can alone render the possession of these conquered territories areas and permanent—and that the American army, by which these wonders are to be accomplished, is still in a position of extreme difficulty, which presents more chances of hardships and of destruction than of victory and peace. [ANP]
"There never was a nation so much mistaken as ours in regard to that of Mexico; I mean in respect to its military resources. The people are warlike and have abundant supply of munitions of war. Our battles with them improve them as soldiers. Our invasion is held by them in abhorrence, and has united all classes in determined resistance against us. The battles of Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, and of Monterey were battles with the frontier army. From this place onward, if we have to march on further in this direction, we shall meet their home army, made up of hardy mountaineers and a better class of soldiery. So far I consider we have not injured their nation, but done it a service, by defeating their old officers, thus causing their army to be placed under the direction of younger, more ambitious, braver, and more accomplished generals. In fact, so far from the war being ended, it has just commenced. Our position is critical. Our supplies at Camargo, 180 miles distant, must be waggoned to this place. This long line has no protection. The ranchero troops, numbering near 2,500, are behind us as guerrillas, and if they choose to act our trains must be cut off. Although this is a rich valley, its supplies are inadequate to our wants, except in beef, for any length of time. Our army, or the effective part of it, is too diminutive to meet a strong force. It is weak physically, for it has now been in campaign over 13 months, with scanty clothing and much hardship and exposure. The volunteers are numerous, but, with the exception of those regiments commanded by late officers of the army, without discipline. I suppose our whole army will muster, when all arrive from below, 9,000 men for duty, and we hear the Mexicans have one on the advance to meet us of 30,000 men. I am convinced, and so is every officer of the army, that we have done wrong and committed an irreparable error in leaving the Rio Grande to march in this direction. To end this war a more vital blow must be struck nearer the Mexican capital; that is, Vera Cruz should be taken by the way of Alvarado. We are now over 700 miles from the city of Mexico, with a vast desert to traverse. In a word, to make peace economically with Mexico, we should take possession and garrison the sea ports on both coasts. It has already been, or is being, done on the Pacific, and we would at once do the same thing with Vera Cruz, Tampico, Alvarado, and the ports of Yucatan. Garrison them in such a manner as to resist any attempts of the enemy to dispossess us, and, besides which, keep an disposable force of 3,000 or 5,000 men, with sufficient and efficient steam transportation for them always ready, to be rapidly removed from point to point, as might be rendered necessary by the movements of the enemy in collecting forces at any particular point; and we could thus transport this column of men much more rapidly than they could their army by land. In the ports thus held, establish regular custom-houses, with the full and regular organization, as in the sea ports of the United States, and put our tariff into operation, throwing open these ports to the commerce of all nations on precisely the same footing as our own ports, and admitting all our own productions free of duty; the importations would be large, the revenue collected would go far towards paying the expenses of the war, and would all come out of the enemy; we should exactly change places with them, by throwing on their shoulders all the burden and enormous expense of active operations, whilst we remained on the defensive, inactive and tranquil; and we should avoid all the contingencies of misfortune to which all invading armies are liable, and save thousands of valuable lives, which would otherwise fall sacrifices by battle, disease, exposure, and fatigue.

"We would say to the Mexicans, Here are our terms of peace, when you choose to accept of them we shall be ready to negotiate; until then we shall retain possession of all your sea ports, and continue to collect all the revenue from imports, allowing free access to trade to and from the interior; we shall not get tired first of the plan, as we are perfectly willing to continue one, or five, or ten years; we will keep you thus sealed up any length of time that may be necessary, until you come to terms."

It will be perceived from these various authorities that there does not appear any great prospect of the speedy termination of the war. The ill success of the navy also, in the two abortive attempts made to capture Alvarado, and the consequent opportunities which have been given to the Mexicans for boasting manifestoes to the prowess which they have displayed, has only been partially compensated by the attack upon Tampico, the destruction of the town, and capture of a number of vessels, of which accounts were brought by the Southern mail last night, and published in the paper this morning.

The meeting of Congress takes place on the 7th proximal. The recent elections to which I alluded at length in my last have given the Whig party such decided gains, that though a very small minority-only about one-third of the whole number-in the present house, it is expected that they will vigourosly attack the administration and its policy, and a very exciting session is expected, notwithstanding it will be a short session, and will terminate on the 3d of March, when the time for which the members were elected expires. There are causes of disaffection, also, at work in the democratic party, which will probably produce some curious results during the session, the proceeding of which will also have special reference to, and be designed to operate upon, the next presidential election, which takes place two years hence. The principal business of politicians here, after one presidential election is decided is to endeavour to operate upon the next election, and consequently the country is in a continual ferment on this question. LT December 18, 1846 p5cb Capture of Tampico

NOV. 28.

The mail to night from the south brings us intelligence of the capture of Tampico by the naval force of the United States, now in the Gulf, under command of Commodore Conner. There was not any fighting, the garrison having been withdrawn some days previous by Santa Anna, to strengthen his force at San Luis Potosi; the inhabitants, therefore, surrendered at discretion, and Commodore Perry was despatched forthwith in the steam-ship Mississippi to bring troops, ordnance, &c., from the United States to garrison the captured town, which is the next to Vera Cruz in point of importance on the Gulf. It will, doubtless, be retained by the Americans until peace is concluded.

It is reported in this city that Major-General Scott, the General Commanding in-Chief, is to proceed south for the purpose of assuming the command and directing the proceedings of all the forces there, and which are to be sent there.

Notwithstanding, however, all these preparations and calling out of volunteers, declarations of determinations made to prosecute the war vigorously, &c., it is still maintained here, by those who have good means of judging, that the war will not continue much longer, but that the Mexican Congress will accept the overtures made by President Polk some months ago; but nous verrons.

The members of Congress are arriving in the city from all directions, preparatory to the commencement of the session, a week hence. They all appear to anticipate a stormy session. [ANP]

NEW YORK, NOV. 30.

The "voice is still for war: in this region, and everything indicates that peace is still far from us. The Government has just determined to send to the scene of hostilities new troops, and the highest military officer in our service, General Winfield Scott. He received his orders on the 19th inst. At Washington, and on the 20th was on his way to the field. He has been detained here for a day or two for want of a vessel in which to embark for New Orleans; he finally sailed this morning, accompanied by this staff, in the packet ship Union. From New Orleans it is understood he will proceed immediately to Point Isabel, and there or therabouts await the arrival of the troops which he is to command. The nine regiments of volunteers recently called forth by the President, are now mustering, and will constitute a force of about 7,500 men. These, with detachments from the united corps of Generals Taylor and Wool, which will have formed a junction near Monterey, will constitute General Scott's command. What his line of operation is to be is of course a secret, nor has conjecture as yet hit apparently upon any probable solution of it. He will not, however, it is thought, operate upon the line of General Taylor's army. This officer will probably remain in Monterey, where he can defend himself against large odds, after sparing to General
Scott the detachments of regulars and volunteers he may require.

Meantime Santa Anna is concentrating at San Luis de Potosí all the troops he can muster, and promises to drive the invader from the soil of Mexico. Ampudia had joined him, and, on the 23d of October, it was rumoured that the whole force then embodied there under Santa Anna, was 20,000 men. He had obtained money, too, though how much is not stated. A general battle seems to be anticipated between the American and Mexican forces. We are not of this opinion, not expecting ever again to hear of a Mexican army meeting an American army in the field. Our accounts to day from Washington are that news had reached the Government of the breaking up of a Mexican administration, and that Almonte was going to England.

The Congress of Mexico and that of the United States both assemble in the beginning of next week, and upon their deliberation and decisions the question of peace or war should depend; but Mexico is so thoroughly demoralized so entirely without stability of administration or force of law, that, even if peace should be desired by Congress, it seems by means certain that either the army or the people would consent to it. National prejudice, if not national feeling, is now apparently at work among the Mexicans, to induce more united and vigorous resistance of the invaders; and the evil suffered by the country is so little, and its effects, as compared with those which the invaders are obliged to make, comparatively so little costly, that the war to them is less onerous than to us. Hence, even thought the Congress may desire to put end to the conflict, it seems not at all certain that the nation will sustain them.

On the other hand, the Congress of the United States, however desirous of peace, will not advise it on any terms that shall seem derogatory to the nation. A war undertaken, as this confessedly was, for the extension of frontier, cannot be terminated honourably unless that object be accomplished. But until absolutely compelled at the point of the sword, Mexico will not accede to any proposition to relinquish all the territory east of the Rio Grande and Upper California. No man of any party in Mexico could venture to propose such a surrender. If, therefore, Mexico will not yield these points, and we cannot honourably make peace except by carrying them, it seems clear that peace is far distant.

The President's message will probably be sent to Congress on the day of their assembling, Monday, Dec. 7, and will reach Europe by the steamer of the 16th. Its tone will be lofty, as is conjectured, towards Mexico, and full of self-gratification on the success of our arms. The revenue is the "pierre de touche" in present circumstances, and something must be done to increase it. Probably a duty will be recommended on tea and coffee, and possibly on some other articles now free. Those first named, however, at a moderate duty, would produce over 3,000,000 of dollars. There will be, too, a recommendation to increase both the army and navy; and strong appeals will be made to the pride and patriotism of the country to carry through the war with vigour and despatch. The tariff will not, in my judgment, be meddled with, except, as indicated above, in imposing duties upon some articles now free.

We have a rumour, under date of Oct. 30, from the city of Mexico, that the Government had issued and despatched to Havannah, and perhaps elsewhere, a large number of letters of marque to be used against American commerce and that these commissions were accompanied by letters of naturalization to other persons who should accept the commission. Whether this be a rumour or a fact, this at least is certain, that this Government has had correspondence both with the authorities of the island of Cuba and with those of the mother country, concerning the fitting out of the Mexican privateers in Spanish forts; and that the most explicit assurances have been received from the Spanish authorities that no such expeditions should be allowed, and that the express stipulation of the treaty of '98, between the United States and Spain, inhibiting to each the use of its ports and resources for the equipment of the privateer of a third power against the commerce of either, should be strictly carried out.

There does not seem to be any concern felt either by underwriters of ship owners about the rumoured appearance of letters of marque, and it will probably turn out a false alarm.

The capture of Tampico by our naval forces is officially announced. The garrison and armament had been previously withdrawn by Santa Anna, and the city surrendered unconditionally, without firing a gun, as soon as summoned, on the 14th inst. The city was held by a detachment of marines and sailors from the fleet, and the steamship Mississippi immediately despatched to New Orleans to communicate intelligence of the capture, and bring back men and materiel to garrison the town. The Mississippi reached the Balize on the 19th, and was to depart again for Tampico on the 21st or 22d. Meantime the Governor of Louisiana had placed at the service of the United States six or eight brass cannon 6 and 9-pounders, and a detachment of regular infantry, and some volunteers, were expected to embark in the Mississippi. A messenger had also been landed at Point Isabel to communicate to the commander of the troops in that neighbourhood the fall of Tampico, and the necessity of its being forthwith garrisoned by American troops. It will be immediately put in the best state of defence and held by our forces, and will be found all-important to ulterior operations either by sea or land. As, however, there is no good road into the interior from Tampico, no road at least fit for the march of an army with its artillery, the possession of this place will not facilitate in this sense a march upon Mexico, which now, it is thought, is determined upon. The only broad, well-made road is that which Cortez pointed out, and followed the line of, on his advance to Mexico, that from Vera Cruz; and by this road General Scott will, it can hardly be doubted, make his advance, after, perhaps, capturing the city of Vera Cruz and its protecting fortress, San Juan de Ulloa by land approaches.

In commercial matters there is generally less animation since the accounts by the Acadia. Flour had declined to $5.25c. per barrel. Wheat may be quoted at from 116c. to 120c. per bushel of 60lb; and Indian corn at from 60c. to 62c. per bushel of 56lb.

Exchange on London is dull at from 6 to 6 1/2 per cent., and we shall look ere long for specie to flow from Europe-as at these rates it will.

Our navigation is all fully employed, and freights are very high. The Government is in the market for transports, of which a large number will be required-and this gives additional stiffness to freights. [ANP]

LT December 29, page 7a

The following description of the scene of war with Mexico is taken from the Morning Telegraph of the 4th inst. :-

"The successive victories achieved by the American arms in Mexico naturally lead us to inquire somewhat into the topography of those places which are now in the possession of the army and navy. General Taylor, by the capture of Monterey, became master of the state of New Leon. So much has been said of this capital, that we do not doubt the American people, at least such as read the newspapers, know more about Monterey than the generality of the Mexicans themselves. New Leon has a territory of 20,000 square miles, and a population of 85,000. It lies eastwardly of the tableland, and has between it and the Gulf the state of Tamaulipas. The surface of the country, south of the Rio del Tigre, is rather level; while to the north lofty mountains elevate their peaks, some of them 10,000 feet above the level of the sea. The climate is warm but healthy. The cause of the flourishing condition of Monterey is said to be its proximity to the rich mines in the neighbourhood. It is very evident our invading army did not expect to find so much wealth and taste as were exhibited in the public and private buildings of the town. General Wool, at the last accounts, has communicated twice with General Taylor; but previously to the intended junction of the two armies, it was deemed best that the capital of the state of Cohuahua should be occupied by our troops. This territory touches that of New Leon, and lies to the north and east of it. Its length is 500 miles, and its width is 200. The surface of the country is rough and hilly. Humboldt says it produces excellent grain and wine. The capital, Monclava, or Montelovez, as it is sometimes called, is situated in 26 deg. 33 min. north latitude, and contains 3,500 inhabitants. It will be seen, by referring to the map, that the movements of Generals Taylor and Wool have, in a military point of view, been admirable throughout; and so, too, General Kearney has carried out his part of the campaign, with similar ability. The Secretary of War, acting with a sound judgment of his own, and under the best military advice to be obtained in this country, projected three armies on the east flank of Mexico, and between the 24th and 38th degrees of north latitude we have obtained possession of the country, and will be able to retain it. By this operation Mexico is completely broken in pieces, deprived of revenue and soldiers in a very large portion of her former territory, and already sees an indemnity in our hands for the unadjusted claims of our citizens and the expenses of the war. By the last accounts it was stated, that after the junction of the two armies of Generals Taylor and Wool, a movement was to be made upon San Luis Potosi, where, according to all accounts, Santa Anta was to take a final stand with his army. This would be a southerly movement, sweeping Saltillo, nearly upon the line of 100 degrees west longitude from Greenwich. We have particular accounts of the former condition of San Luis de Potosi, from Humboldt and Pike. At present it "comprehends the larger part of the southern portion of the great northern plain," and is traversed by the river Tamoin, a tributary of the Panuco. The latest and best description, however, is to be found in the work of Mr. Ward, who was a few years since the British Minister, resident in Mexico. The State of San Luis was then estimated to contain 250,000 souls, and the capital about 60,000. It is a handsome town, with spacious suburbs, wide streets, large and substantial buildings and churches, and is lighted at night. It is well supplied with water, and can boast of its fountains as well as Monterey. The country surrounding it is fertile, and it carries on an extensive commerce. The goods sold here are French brandies, wines, silks and cloths; English hardware and cotton prints, and American coarse cottons. Almost all these articles were formerly smuggled into San Luis, by the way of Tampico, and, it is said, in American bottoms.
The exports are chiefly to the neighbouring states of Leon and Cohahuila, consisting chiefly of home-made goods. It is in San Luis that the celebrated mine of Catorce is situated—one of the richest in Mexico, and long the object of desire with English capitalists. The possession of that mine for a few months would fill the military chest of General Taylor. We now come to the territories against which our naval operations have been directed with success. Tobasco, the capital of which was bombarded by Commander Perry, extends over the greater part of the low plain between Lake Terminos on the east, and the river Huascualco on the west. The river Tabasco passes through it. The state contains about 63 churches, 48 villages, about 600 haciendas, and 55,000 inhabitants. During the rainy season the country is liable to inundation, and the communication between the villages is kept up by canoes. Its principal exports are the native pepper, found in abundance on the banks of its rivers, indigo and vanilla, which grow wild, and cocoa, which is a staple of the country. The capital is the Villa Hermosa, about 50 miles from the sea, and a place of some commerce, containing about 8,000 inhabitants. The visit of Commander Perry deprived the town of its vessels and steamers. Tampico has also been visited by the navy, to which it surrendered at discretion. It is to be immediately occupied by American troops, and will be fortified. This is one of the best movements yet made on the gulf coast, for the commercial relations of Tampico and San Luis de Potosi are extremely intimate, and one important source of supply is cut off. Santa Anna will feel this sensibly in a very short time. Tampico is situated in the northern extremity of the state of Vera Cruz, on the border of a shallow lake, the Tamiagua. Two rivers, the Tampico, coming from the west, and the Tulas from the south, unite and debouche at the town. It appears that the Tula, or Panuco, as it is called, near the mouth is navigable for schooners of 80 tons burthen, for about 80 miles from the sea, and, with some slight difficulties to overcome for large boats, for a considerable distance above. Along one river lies the road to San Luis; along the north, the road to the capitol. Thus we see the objects of the campaign are succeeding, one after the other, and the numerous speculations and complaints put forth by newspaper writers, form time to time, have but little foundation. The Government has all along desired peace, and made every effort to obtain it. An avalanche of war could not well have been hurled upon the Mexicans at such a moment. It would have been, to say the least, extremely unkind. The Government has been disposed to impress, not to conquer the enemy, and, thus far, it has in our humble judgment, shown great ability in the management of its military affairs. If there has been a weak place, it was in the commissariat; and, unless that department is managed with consummate ability, no army can help being occasionally distressed for its supplies, and for the want of proper means of transportation.

"The possession of Tampico is highly important. It is, so far as the lines of operations are considered, a post in the rear of Santa Anna's force, and one from which we may pour in supplies for the approaching armies of Taylor and Wool with very great convenience. We should not be surprised if a large military force was placed as soon as possible at Tampico, which, by a simultaneous movement, will completely surround and cut off Santa Anna's army; that being done, the capital falls an easy prey. The position of Tampico, therefore, gives us the double power, of defeating Santa Anna to the north, and of moving southwardly along the Tula to the capital." [ANP]
The present accounts are not unimportant. The general aspect of the war had undergone no material change. The operations of the American forces had been chiefly continued to an advance against Saltillo, the investment of Monclova, and the garrisoning of Tampico; while in Mexico, if we may judge from the indistinct and almost incredible statements contained in the American journals, fresh disorders have broken forth, to prostrate the country still deeper before its enemy.

Our accounts from Washington extended to the close of 10th inst. The proceedings of the Senate since the opening of the session on the 7th had been almost or entirely confined to the transaction of business; and a resolution of instruction to the Military Committee to inquire into the propriety of granting 160 acres of land to each volunteer serving in the war, and of increasing the pay, had been adopted, and a bill had been introduced to organize a territorial government over the Oregon. The proceeding of the House of Representatives were more interesting, and a sharp discussion upon the Mexican war took place on the 9th inst. Upon a motion of Mr. Davis, calling upon the President for copies of all orders to generals and commodores relative to the establishment of civil governments in territories conquered during the war. The question upon the adoption of this resolution having come up, Mr. Harolson, of Georgia, presented, as an amendment, the words- "if not incompatible with the public interests, " as the publication of the official correspondence might prove detrimental to the national interests, by giving the enemy possession of the views and plans adopted in the prosecution of hostilities. Mr. Davis, disclaiming any such intention, then proceeded to speak at length, to the effect, that if it appeared the President had acted contrary to the constitution, he (Mr. Davis) was prepared for such ulterior measures as the integrity of the constitution and the safety of the Union might demand. Mr. Douglass, of Illinois, then rose, and invited a full investigation of the conduct of the Executive. If by "ulterior measures" Mr. Davis and the Opposition contemplated the impeachment of the President, they would have full latitude. In ordering the establishment of temporary governments in conquered territories the President had only performed his duty. Mr. Davis replied, that power to establish military regulations for governing possessions held by right of conquest was admitted, but there was not right to establish civil governments in such possessions, and he challenged the President to produce such a right. Mr. Rhett, of South Carolina, remarked that the occupation of California and New Mexico being merely military, the conduct of the Government was perfectly justifiable. Mr. Harolson withdrew his amendment. Mr. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, denounced that portion of the message in which the justice of the war is advocated, and the boundary of Texas defended. Mr. Vinton, of Ohio, moved to amend the resolution so as to inquire whether any part of the conquered territories belonged to Texas. Mr. Holmes, of South Carolina, followed in defence of the Government. Mr. Darragh, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor when the house adjourned. On the 10th the discussion was resumed, the motion being so modified as to make further demands of the President, calling on him to state, through the secretary at War, whether the present was with Mexico was waged with a view to conquest, or to what extent he designed to prosecute it. It was also added, that the information communicated should be received with closed doors. Mr. Darragh spoke in favor of the resolution. Mr. Stanton, of Tennessee, contended that the resolution had for its object designs much deeper than appeared on the face of it, and he defended the course of the President. The question under consideration was answered in the message. The war was not one of conquest; but was solely to enforce justice on Mexico.

Other speakers followed, and, finally, the question was informally passed over; and the house adjourned to the 14th instant. This attack upon the Executive was thought to be the prelude to a more serious onslaught at some future and not distant date.

The American forces, since the last advices, had gained some trifling advantages. Accounts from Tampico to the 28th ultimo, containing indistinct accounts from the interior of Mexico, had been received at New Orleans, by the St. Mary's. They are thus given in the New York journals :-

The St. Mary's sailed from Tampico on Saturday, the 28th ult., at 3p.m., arrived off the Rio Grande del Norte at 5 a.m. on the 30th; landed Adjutant Austin, 3rd Artillery, at Brazos, at 10 a.m., and sailed for the Belize, where she made the light at Southwest Pass at 1 p.m., December 1.

The steamer Neptune arrived at Tampico, November 22, with 450 regular troops, under the command of Colonel Gates.

The steamer Sea arrived with more troops on the 23d., when the town was handed over to the army.
Fort Orondaga was immediately garrisoned under the name of Fort Connor, and armed with two long 8-pounders.

A battery of two 42-pounder carronades was called Fort Ann, in honour of Mrs. Chase, lady of the late American Consul at Tampico. This lady behaved most nobly, showing to the world that she was a patriot under all circumstances. When our small vessels were about to approach the town of Tampico, she ran up our flag in defiance of the Alcalde and other officers. Some time before Mrs. Chase wrote to Commodore Connor, informing him the place could be taken, and gave drawings of the harbour.

Besides the cannon abovementioned, some field pieces are mounted on the house tops.

The Neptune sailed from Tampico on the 24th ult., and encountered a norther, was driven back, and wrecked on the bar. All hands were saved. The vessel is a total loss.

The town of Tampico is already in a state of defence. Reinforcements are arriving daily.

Saltillo has been abandoned, and there is no doubt that it is now in possession of the advanced guard of the army under General Worth.

The condition of Mexico is represented to be even worse than it ever has been.

Santa Anna lately made an address to his troops, apparently to extract from them an invitation to reinstate himself at the head of the Government. He was disappointed, however, at finding that his oration was received in profound silence; and immediately afterwards he started with his cavalry on a secret expedition. Some think it was to cut off one of the divisions of our army, which he will not be likely to find. The most probable conjecture is that he is gone to Mexico to control the action of the new Congress.

The St. Mary's left over the bar of Tampico the Potomac, the Princeton, and the John Adams, with some small vessels off the town of Tampico. She left the steamer Sea ashore abreast of the town on a mud bank. She passed the Mississippi 60 miles north of Tampico, bound out. The officers of the St. Mary's are all well.

A letter from Pensacola, of the 7th of December, to the Picayune, says, -that Captain Tatnall, with the steamer Spitfire, had gone up the river 60 or 70 miles from Tampico, and taken possession of two towns, at one of which he captured 10 large cannons and a heavy quantity of ammunition, which had been received from Tampico, when the Mexicans retreated from that city.

The two regiments which evacuated that palace revolted when they got to San Luis Potosi, and were disbanded. They were opposed to Santa Anna.

Great dissensions prevailed at San Luis Potosi.

The army, about 16,000 strong, were in a state of starvation. There were four different factions.

The United States brig Porpoise, Captain Hunt, -arrived at Pensacola on the 1st of December, about 7 o'clock in eight days from Tampico, -reports the squadron all well. There was not the shadow of a Mexican in arms to be seen; no opposition of any kind. Troops were arriving daily, and armaments of all kinds landing at Tampico. The inhabitants seemed perfectly satisfied with the change. There were a great many merchantmen with assorted cargoes in port. There was a severe gale on the 18th ult., and the John Adams, St. Mary's, and a British man-of-war brig, the Darien, were blown off the coast; they have, however, returned, without sustaining any damage. Captain Ingraham came passenger in the Porpoise, and is bearer of despatches to our Government at Washington. An attempt was made by the captain of the Darien to claim the gunboats and schooner of the Mexicans as British property, and he persisted in it until admonished by Commodore Connor, when he reluctantly yielded, and abandoned his absurd pretensions. The streets of Tampico were thronged with American citizens. All was bustle, and business brisk.

Accounts from the Army of the Left at Monterey have been received to the 11th of November. The orders of the Government disapproving the armistice reached there on the 3d, and immediately General Taylor despatched Major Graham to Saltillo, to confer with the Mexica camp, and inform them that each party was at liberty to act as it might think fit. Not an officer nor a soldier was to be seen at Saltillo. Major Graham had an interview with the Governor, and informed him that the armistice was at an end, and requested him to despatch the intelligence to the Mexican Commander-in-chief at San Luis Potosi. The Governor desired Major Graham to proceed to San Luis and deliver his message; but that officer’s instructions being peremptory, he returned to Monterey; and on the 13th General Taylor, with General Worth, 1,000 regulars, infantry, a battalion of artillery, and two squadrons of cavalry, left for Saltillo. No opposition was anticipated, and General Taylor was expected to return to Monterey, after ascertaining the prospects of an advance for the main force along that route to San Luis Potosi. Reports were current at Matamoras that a Mexican force had appeared at Victoria, and it is stated in some journals that an American force had been despatched against them. American settlers were commencing to locate on the northern bank of the Rio Grande.

From the Army of the Centre we learn that on the 30th the Mexican town of Monclova was quietly invested. The Governor and a number of the principal citizens formed an escort, and met General Wool about four miles from the city, welcomed him as a friend, and placed at his disposal for his headquarters one of the best houses in the town. The army was in excellent health. Reports had reached Monclova that the city of Chihuahua also had been invested by a detachment of the Army of the Right from Santa Fe, under Colonel Doneghan. The American journals throw doubts upon the last statement.

The latest accounts from the Army of the Right are dated Fra Christoval, 205 miles south of the capital of New Mexico. From Santa Fe we have advices to the 20th of October. The Mormon levy had arrived, and left on the 18th for California. The city was in a frightful state; scarcely a day passed without the perpetration of some outrage by the Americans, and signs of Mexican retribution were not unfrequent. Supplies were becoming extremely scarce; and, en route from Fort Leavenworth to Santa Fe, a train of 30 Government waggons had been totally plundered by the Indians. At Bent’s Fort there were, however, considerable quantities of stores.

From the Pacific, or the interior of California, there are no later accounts. [ANP]

ARRIVAL OF THE CALEDONIA.

LIVERPOOL, THURSDAY MORNING.

The Royal mail steam-ship Caledonia arrived at this port shortly before 10 o'clock last night from Boston. The Caledonia left that city on the 16 inst., but brings Halifax accounts of the 19th, one day later than our usual dates. The Cambria had arrived out at Halifax.

Our accounts from New York by this arrival extended to the close of the 15th inst. In the interim since the despatch of our last advices nothing had transpired of any great importance with regard to the war. Letters of the 12th from Washington published in the New York Journal of Commerce, state that Mr. Senator Bagby as Minister to the French Court. Mr. King was expected tot succeed Mr. Bagby in the senate. They also state that "the Mexican citizen who had been in correspondence with Mr. Buchanan in relation to the northern province of Mexico," Mr. Buchanan declining to enter into any negotiation, would leave Washington on the 14th. "M. Zeva," says the corespondent of the Journal, "did not propose that the Northern Provinces should be annexed to the United States, but hat they should declare their independence, and that the United States should guarantee their independence. The provinces for which he assumed to speak were Tamaulipas, New Leon, Cohahuila, Chihuahua, and Durango. He says that the people of these states are not fit to come into this Union."

The proceedings of Congress on the 14 were uninteresting.

From the south accounts had been received announcing the quiet investment of Saltillo by General Worth, and the return of General Taylor to Monterey; and it is stated by the American journals that it was the intention of the General to concentrate at Tampico the whole of the forces not employed in garrisoning the several ports on the line of communication, with at view to future land operations against Vera Cruz. General Wool, with the army of the centre from Monclova, was expected to effect a junction with the army of the left at Monterey.

From the mouth of the Rio Grande we have accounts stating that large forces were being shipped for Tampico including a company Sappers and Miners arrived at the Brazos from New York, and the 4th Regiment of Indiana volunteers. Some bold measures were fully anticipated.

From the Gulf squadron and other scenes of operations there are no later accounts. Many rumours were current in the southern American ports with regard to privateers; and in New Orleans the apprehensions entertained in consequence had acted favourably for British freights.
From the interior of Mexico we have yet no definite accounts.

In the domestic affairs of the Union there is nothing new. A discussion of the slavery question in Congress was expected.

The Payment of the Pennsylvania interest due in February next was beyond question.

Commercial affairs had been active. Cotton, since the last dates from Europe, by the Caledonia, to the 19th ult., had steadily advanced both in prices and in demand; while for bread-stuffs the prices had declined, but the demand was still great, and very considerable shipments had been made, and were making, to Europe.

Money was in demand, but not scarce. There was timidity among the banks, mainly because of he operations of the law which exacts coin in payment of all dues to the United States, and it locks it up while in the treasury. The exchange on England ranged from 6 to 6 ¼; though there had been transactions at 5 ¾. The expectation still was, that a considerable amount in coin must necessarily, in such a state of the exchanges, find its way hither from England.

From Canada we have no accounts of importance. From Havannah dates to the 2d inst. had been received. The English mail-steamer from England due at Havannah on the 29th ult. Had not arrived up to 123 o'clock on the 2d. Fears for the safety were beginning to be felt. The new crop of molasses was beginning to come in.

From our own correspondent.

MEXICO, Nov. 29.

Beaten in every encounter by their hostile neighbours, and wholly unable to support the expense of a protracted war, the Mexicans are still averse to peace. "Let us gain a battle," they say, "and then we will negotiate." They forget both the extreme improbability of their with being accomplished, and that its fulfilment would only lead to more vigorous reprisals by the Americans. The loss of Monterey is admitted to be a misfortune and disgrace, but blame is laid, as usual, on the commander. Santa Anna has collected about 20,000 men at San Luis Potosi, where it seems to be his intention to await the approach of the invaders. His ingenuity will be taxed to maintain this body of men together for any length of time, the ordinary resources of the Government being cut off by the blockade, and their credit wholly exhausted. To meet the most pressing necessities it has bee fond necessary by General Salas to decree a forced loan of 2,000,000 dollars, the repayment of which, at the expiration of two years, is to be guaranteed by the clergy' the heads of the church, according to the decree, accepting bills at that date, with interest at 5 per cent. Per annum. One third of the loan will be received by Government in their own recognized paper, bearing interest; and an immense discount is offered for the instantaneous payment of the remainder. This measure (which of course does not apply to foreigners) has excited the utmost indignation on the part of the Mexican capitalists, who seem determined on opposing it, and it may be questioned if the Government of Salas is strong enough to overcome their resistance, particularly as the clergy show no great alacrity to fulfil their portion of the arrangement. The difficulty in procuring the sinews of war affords the best ground for anticipating the return of peace to which Santa Anna, privately, is perhaps not averse, though in a late communication to General Taylor he asserted that no peace could be made while an American soldier remained in arms on Mexican ground. Of his dark and tortuous policy it is difficult to form an opinion. Collusion with the Americans is suspected, and the fact of his having been allowed to enter the harbour of Vera Cruz unchallenged by the blockading squadron is cited in support of the charge. He may have entered into some stipulations with the Government of the United States, but it does not by any means follow that he will now fulfil them. On the whole, the Americans would have acted more wisely in opposing his return. The Government of Bravo, with Garay as Minister, were anxious to treat for peace, and might have lasted long enough to accomplish it, if Santa Anna had been kept at a distance. Should the public voice or his own interest dictate a continuance of the war, Santa Anna is most formidable foe that the Americans could have found; in fact, the only one possessed of an ascendancy sufficient to organize and unite such means of resistance as Mexico contains. However, this may be the crisis of his fate. To fight a battle on the plains of San Luis, and lose it, would be utter ruin. On the other hand, to negotiate with out a struggle would confirm the suspicions already attached to his name. On the 15th inst. General Taylor’s advanced guard was within six leagues of Saltillo, the capital of the state of Coahuila, and the only town between Monterey and San Luis. General Wool was in Monclova with 3,000 men, and about 3,000 more had crossed the river at the Presidio de Rio Grande, to unite with him. Whether this division is destined to reinforce General Taylor or to co-operate with General Kearney in the invasion of Chihuahua is unknown. It seems probable that if the Congress to assemble here on the 6th of next month show no disposition to negotiate for peace with the United States, General Taylor will advance on San Luis, or Zacatecas, and ultimately, perhaps, to this city. To accomplish an undertaking of such magnitude (as respects the distance to be traversed), he will probably consider it necessary to assemble 20,000 men at Saltillo, a work of sometime; for by the latest accounts he had only 5,000 men at Monterey, and an equal number at Camargo. He will be supported, it is said, by a considerable force for Tampico, now in the hands of he Americans. The great object of the Cabinet of Washington in this war seems to be the acquisition of Upper California, to obtain which it is thought by well-informed persons, they might be induced to relinquish to territory between the Nueces and the Bravo, to which they now lay claim as a portion of Texas. How such an arrangement might be regarded in Europe I can form no opinion, but, if offered, the Mexicans would do well to accept it. Upper California is far too distant to be governed from Mexico, and will under any circumstances soon be populated from the United States, while the interposition of a barrier between Texas and Mexico, such as the district between the two rivers, is of vital importance to the latter.

The conversion of the deferred Mexican bonds I London is again a subject of discussion here. Last month it was supposed to be settled irrevocably by the order of the Minister, Senor Haro, to pay a dividend in London, and the natural conclusion was, that Santa Anna had sanctioned the operation. Without any great injustice to that personage, the same opinion may be still entertained, notwithstanding the extraordinary letter (of which I send you a translation) addressed by him to a confidential friend here, and published by his desire. He there disavows and disapproves the whole affair, and throws great blame on the ex-minister. It does not, however, necessarily follow that the arrangement can be unsettled, or that Santa Anna has any real objection to it.

Ministers of Finance succeed each other here with astonishing rapidity. The portfolio is now held by Don Lazaro Villamil, a devoted follower of Santa Anna.

Commercial affairs are stagnant. The consumption of all but articles of the first necessity has diminished, and the city wears a dull and gloomy aspet. No communication is allowed with the places occupied by the Americans, and, if Vera Cruz should fall into their hands, the last outlet for specie on the Atlantic will be closed. The result will be an extraordinary accumulation of the precious metals in the interior, and an injurious disturbance of the balance of exchange.

The town of San Juan Bautista, capital of he state of Tobasco, has been cannonaded by Commodore Perry. This severity seems to have been caused by the treachery of the Mexicans in firing on a flag of truce, and their absurd pertinacity in directing musketry against vessels armed with 42-pounders. The loss of life on this occasion is stated to be small, but the town is said to be greatly injured.

[ANP]
“Art. 2. The patent referred to in the foregoing article will only be granted to vessels of which the captain, officer, and other individuals appointed thereto, are Mexican citizens according to the laws of the Republic.

“Art. 3. Every individual who may wish to arm one or more privateers, shall deposit for each one a capital of net less than $4,000 should the vessel not exceed 100 tons, or $8,000 if of larger burden; or shall give security for like amount, to the satisfaction of the person who may furnish the patent.

“Art. 4. The requisition shall be addressed to the Supreme Government in the territory of the Republic, through the respective governors; and in foreign countries through the consuls, or authorized agents for this purpose.

“Art. 5. In the requisition shall be minutely expressed everything that may be necessary to give a circumstantial account of the vessel destined to cruise, its tonnage, force, equipment, and crew, on the understanding that it shall not be less than 60 tons.

“Art. 6. With letters of marque will also be given to the parties interested letters of commission for those in charge of the prizes, if they should solicit them, to the number which the functionary delivering the said patent may consider necessary, having in view the appointment of the vessel.

“ON THE PROTECTION WHICH HAS TO BE GIVEN TO THE OWNERS.

“Art. 9. The naval commanders, harbour masters, and other local authorities shall afford to the owners and captains of the privateers all the protection which they may need, and which may be in their power, in everything conducive to the quick armament of the vessels, permitting them to receive all he persons they may require, excepting those who may be in actual service on board the national vessels of war, coercing those who may resist to obey their orders, and prosecuting deserters, who shall be condemned to six years' service in the army or navy, if they should be apprehended after the privateer shall have made sail.

“Art. 10. Likewise they shall be furnished with arms of every description, powder, and shot, when they may be asked for and the service may not want them, giving out to them these last articles at the cost or costs, with a credit at the most of six months; if they should not be able to make immediate payment, to take sufficient security for it. That which they may not consume during the period they shall return, the value thereof being credited to them.

“Art. 11. In case of shipwreck, or the vessel being taken, they shall be freed from all responsibility, both themselves and their securities, the loss or seizure being fully proved.

“ON THE RIGHTS OF THOSE EMPLOYED IN CRUISING, AND THE PRIVILEGES GRANTED TO THEM.

“Art. 12. All those who may be employed on board of privateering vessels shall be subject, in their internal police and regulations, to the ordinances of the navy, and shall enjoy the rights of the navy in all that may not relate the prizes.

“Art. 15. The individuals out of their crews who may be disabled from wounds received in action, and without the necessary supplies for their subsistence, shall have the same privileges as invalids of the navy, each one according to his class, and in conformity with the reports made by captains and commanders of the privateers, also consulting thereon the respective commanders of the naval department.

“Art. 16. The widows of those who may die from like causes, and who should also be left without resources, shall enjoy pensions, which the Supreme Government may be pleased to grant them.

“ON THE ADJUDICATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES.

“Art. 17. The owners and other individuals who may be employed privateering shall have entirely adjudicated to them, and without any reserve whatsoever, the prizes which they make, under the following regulation :-
"Art. 18. Moreover, should the vessels taken be of war, a gratuity of $60 shall be given for every cannon that may exceed 12 inclusively, $40 if they should exceed four, also inclusively; and $20 for every prisoner of the enemy's forces; the amount of this gratuity exclusively belongs to the captain, subalterns, marines, and sailors of the privateering vessels, amongst whom it will be divided according to the wages which they may receive.

"WHAT VESSELS AND EFFECTS ARE TO BE CONSIDERED OF LAWFUL SEIZURE.

"Art. 24. Of lawful seizure are-

"1. Vessels of the enemy with all that they may carry on board belonging to them, whether or war, privateers, or merchant vessels.

"2. The cargo and effects of neutrals and Mexicans which may be found on board these said vessels, after sufficient time has elapsed for the declaration of war, proclaimed by the Government of the United States to the Mexican nation, being known.

"3. Vessels constructed by the enemy, or which may have belonged to the enemy, if the property be not sufficiently accredited or neutral.

"4. Those which may be navigated without patents or register that may prove their neutrality, their entire cargo, or part thereof, being, if they should be found in the same predicament, for want of the indispensable papers, the act alone of throwing papers into the sea, shall be sufficient motive for declaring them lawful seizure.

"5. Those which may be found without legal patent of sovereignty, state, or republic, having the authority for granting it.

"6. Those which may have it from one or more Powers.

"7. Those who may fight under other colours than the sovereign or state to whom their patent belongs. If these vessels, and those comprised in the foregoing paragraphs, should be armed for war, their captains and officers shall be reputed as pirates.

"8. Those which, after the national flag is hoisted, should refuse to lie to, and should provoke combat.

"9. Those which may navigate with the patent of the enemy in the terms expressed in the second paragraph.

"10. Those belonging to Mexicans and neutrals which may be armed for privateering under the Mexican flag, without having obtained permission from the Supreme Government, and accredited with the patent, their captains shall be treated as pirates.

"11. Those of pirates and mtineers returning to their owners should they appear within one year and a day, and those also who can prove not to have taken part, directly or indirectly, in piracy, separating a third part of their total value for the benefit of those making the seizure.

"12. Vessels abandoned by the enemy, or which may be adrift from tempest, or any other accident, before being brought to safety, if it should not be known to whom they belong, for want of documents, or if they should not have their proper crew, and if the owners of them should not appear within a year and a day; adjudicating, under any circumstances, the third part to those taking them, the two remaining parts shall belong to the public treasury.

"13. Merchandize known in war to the contraband, on board of whatsoever vessel it may be found, if it be going to the country of the enemy, or point occupied by it. By contraband effects of war are understood to be the following : Cannons, mortars, howitzers, swivel guns, blunderbusses, muskets, guns, carbines, rifles, pistols, pikes, swords, sabres, lances, harping-irons, battle-axes, grenades, shells, powder, matches, balls, and whatever other articles which may apply to arms; shields, helmets, breastplates, coats of mail, infantry and cavalry belts, uniforms of apparel for soldiers, horses with their trappings, and, lastly, every description of arms, or instruments of iron, steel, bronze, and copper, or other manufactured materials prepared and made for the purpose of waging war by sea or land.

"14. Provisions which maybe carried to the enemy's camp, blockaded or besieged by the forces of the nation.

"15. The effects and merchandise which may be found on board neutral vessels, whenever the power to which they belong should not recognize the principle of exemption.

"ON THE CONDUCT TO BE OBSERVED BY PRIVATEERS AND VESSELS OF WAR.

"Art. 28. If a vessel should refuse to lie to after the Mexican flag has been hoisted, it shall be compelled to do so by force.

"Art. 29. If a vessel flying enters the waters of another Power, it should no longer be pursued; the seizure made on these waters shall be unlawful.

"Article 30. Should the enemy not respect this principle, claims will be made of he Power whose jurisdiction has been violated; and if a reparation should not be obtained it will be acted against, according to the orders which the Government may find it convenient to dictate.

"Art. 49. It is prohibited, under the penalty of from two to 10 years' hard labour, to drove on shore, sink, or burn the vessel captured, unless without absolute necessity; and if, in consequence thereof, one or more of those on board should perish, then, and for such offence, shall the punishment of death be inflicted upon him who gave the order for the act, and, in default of such order, upon the actual perpetrators.

"Art. 50. It shall only be allowed to sink or burn the vessel when it shall be impossible in any other way to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy, releasing before all things every one there may be on board, and taking all the papers; any omission with respect to the first shall be punished as directed in the second part of the Article 49; and with respect to the second, with from two to 10 years' hard labour.

"Art. 51. The same penalty of death shall the captain incur who leaves the crew of he vessel to perish, if it should go to pieces in consequence of the action, and when he, being able to save the lives, does not do so.

"Art. 52. The same penalty shall be incurred if they are abandoned on the desert coasts or islands.

"Art. 53 Prisoners of war shall be treated with all humanity and moderation, paying to every one the consideration due to his rank, until they are delivered over to the military of political authority of the first part of the Republic where they shall arrive, taking the necessary certificate.

"ON THE PORTS WHERE THE PRIZES ARE TO BE TKEN.

"Art. 59. The prizes shall be conducted to the commercial ports of the Republic; but, if there should be any danger of falling into the enemy's hands, they may then take them to those of the coasting trade.

"Art. 60. When the prizes are made at places very distant form the coast of he Republic, and near ports of neutral Powers, they may be taken to the nearest where they may be permitted, having a consul or Mexican agent, and there be sold, should it undoubtedly belong to the enemy, in the judgment of the said consul. Excepting these cases, this measure shall only be taken when, without real danger, it cannot arrive at the ports of the Republic.”

[ANP]
Sir,—I am a faithful, though sometimes a laggard reader of your influential paper, and it is only now, in getting through arroars, that I have perceived the intelligence in your Friday's paper, headed, "Mexican Letters of Marque," with an announcement that "on Wednesday and office for granting Letters of Marque and Reprisals, according to the decree of he Mexican Government, was first opened in the vicinity of the Tower, being the first time that an occurrence of the kind has happened during the last 40 years in England."

You add extracts from the official ordinances of he Mexican Government, relating to the subject.

So announced in you columns, I trust the attention of the Government, and of the public, will be awakened to the inquiry, "are these things so?"

In this city, the centre of the civilization of the whole world, in the middle of the 19th century, "can these things be so?" and that a foreign consul sent here, and entertained here for purposes only of commerce and of peace, has dared publicly to open an office, where, on English ground, and in the bosom of this empire, for the base and filthy hope of gain, for the unmitigated lust of lucre, shall be publicly bartered for, the remaining virtue, honour, honesty, and good feeling of our merchants and ship-owners!

On the one hand, shall we be content to enforce at our police-courts our Foreign Enlistment Bill, and on the other hand, if he letter of the law, of that or any other statute, does not reach such a case as the traffic in letters of marque, shall an order of council be withheld to put down, and in a moment, this much more intolerable offence?

I am no friend to the Flores expedition to Ecuador, nor advocate for the North Americans in their unjust aggressions upon Mexico. I wish the Mexicans every success, and that they may become the instruments of Providence to teach to the North Americans humility. But I am an enthusiast in the desire to preserve my countrymen, and their principles, from pollution, and the temptation towards it.

"For 40 years (you say) has not an occurrence of he kind happened in England!"

For 32 years England has enjoyed, in Europe, the blessings of peace.

In this season of peace, when men's passions may be considered cool, and temptation at a distance, I have thought that reason might be appealed to against the sin and the evils of privateering.

So thinking, for nearly 25 years, as opportunities have been given to me, I have, sometimes in print, and sometimes by word of mouth, and by correspondence, invited men's minds to the consideration of the fitness of an international law for the extinction of privateering.

Why should war upon the sea be conducted on principles less humane than war upon the land?

Is such a thing heard of, in the most justifiable war, as the raising of a troop for independent action, and the licensed pillage of private property in an enemy's land?—a regiment of freebooters and robbers! Yet, why should private property be respected in general cases on land, and free license be given for its plunder upon the sea? Is the merchant less worthy of protection than the husbandman or the artisan?

Why should the delusive hope of "a profitable little war on private account" be allowed to corrupt our merchants, and form a school of piracy and disgrace?

Benjamin Franklin was the first, within my reading, who felt and wrote rightmindedly on this subject; and that, at a time when his countrymen were the people most likely to be tempted to avail themselves of a "buccaneering spirit" against our merchant vessels.

Prussia, as yet, has the honour to be the only European power that has consecrated the principle of repudiating privateering on the face of a public treaty.

How small is the demarcation between privateering and piracy! In the present case, a few inches of parchment—not from our own Sovereign, but from a foreign and factious republic—by the hands of a consul "accredited for trade and protection," but now abusing his office to corrupt and to seduce. I have said how small is the demarcation between privateering and piracy. I say, also, that the effect upon those employed in either way is identical—equally demoralizing and brutalizing’ nor has it ever been that, as a whole, the profit of privateering has reimbursed one-fifth of the expenses of these ungodly and ungracious enterprizes, whatever single instances may have been put forward of individual gain.

Even without the interdiction, by international law, of formal treaties to that end, one might reasonably have hoped that the progress of civilization, and the improved morality of nations, would have been sufficient to have put down the most odious enormity of barbarous times.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—As I believe my house is alluded to in your papers of this day as “an office for the sale of letters of marque and reprisal against the vessels of the United States,” I will endeavour to convince you that you have written upon wrong information.

On Monday, the 4th inst., I procured one of the first copies of the decree of the Mexican Government, and sent an advertisement to The Times, as follows:—“The decrees of the Mexican Government granting letters of marque against the United States may be seen at the factory of Frederic Barnes, gun-maker, Union-row, Tower-hill,” which your paper refused to insert.

The decrees have been read by many, for whose information I made the notice public, viz., owners and captains of ships. I have no power to grant letters of marque, and I am not aware they can be procured from anyone resident in this country.

I am, Sir, you obedient servant,

FREDERIC BARNES.

To those persons who are capable of appreciating the self-complacent modesty by which a grave Republic excuses a great aggression, and the specious names by which she describes it, the instructions issued by the Navy and War Departments of the United States to the officers of both services engaged in the Mexican expedition will suggest matter for reflection, not unmixed with diversion. To those who seek for an explanation of national conduct and character in national institutions, we do not think that they will supply any additional reasons for admiring the Government of the United States.

It is curious to notice the foregone conclusion of the American Government long before the war was begun. So far back as June, 1845, it had its eye on the opening chapter of accidents. The difficulty was how to force the initiative on Mexico.
But this once begun, the course of consequences was clearly chalked out. Tit is highly amusing to read the instructions sent from Washington, and to compare their avowed and ostensible desire of peace with their earnest preparation for and anticipation of war. In June, 1845, the Secretary for the Navy Department thus addresses the Commodore in the Pacific:—“It is the earnest desire of the President

“to pursue the policy of peace......Should Mexico, however, be resolutely bent on hostilities(!), you will be mindful to protect the persons and interests of citizens of the United States near your station.... The Mexican ports on the Pacific are said to be open and defenceless. If you ascertain with certainty that Mexico has declared war against the United States, you will at once possess yourself of the port of San Francisco, and blockade or occupy such other ports as your force may permit.’ It is true that the Commodore is here ordered to ascertain that Mexico has declared war against his country; but when was the commander of a hostile fleet at a loss to interpret a constructive declaration of war? He was to protect the persons and interest of American citizens. Of course; this was natural. But the presence of an American fleet might expose them to danger of to insult. They might be attacked, mobbed, or merely frightened. In any case they might claim the protection of their own ships; and who doubts but that a sharp officer would quickly light this up into a strong casus belli? There never will be wanting a good opportunity to a dexterous officer, who is ordered to prepare against the determined hostilities of a foe whom he wishes to attack, particularly when he is lying off “open and defenceless ports.”

But though San Francisco was to be taken and California annexed, these things were to be done as cheaply as possible. The model Republic is in her novicate of aggression. She has a strong appetite for conquest, but her sinews are not yet fully braced, and her powers of action do not equal her powers of conception. Men and money are the vulgar instruments of warfare; but men and money are not to be obtained for noting. As little shot and powder as possible—as much soft sawder as you please; this is the plan of American warfare, and a very economical one it is, particularly where you have to deal with an enemy of no very decided energies. “Even,” so proceed the instructions, “should you be compelled to occupy San Francisco and other Mexican ports, you will be careful to preserve, if possible, the most friendly relations with the inhabitants.” Again, You can readily conduct yourself in such a manner as will render you occupation of San Francisco, and other ports, a benefit to the inhabitants (!).” But the next passage contains a still cooler plan of annexation;—“In taking possession of the harbours, you will, if possible, endeavour to establish the supremacy of he American flag without any strife with the people of California.” Now, this is certainly the most economical mode of acquiring territory we ever heard of. Only the question naturally occurs, if all this can be done so cheaply—if harbours can be blockaded—if provinces can be subjugated, without striking a blow—why go through the form of equipping fleets and armaments? Why not send a drab deputation from Pennsylvania, or some bold adventurers form Michigan, or some members of the Universal Peace Association, bearing the “stars and stripes” in their hands, and soliciting all Mexico and California to fraternize? If all the Western Hemisphere is only panting for an opportunity to become part and parcel of the model Republic, what need of the New York volunteers and the 1,000 horsemen? If California has already adopted a sympathetic attachment to the States, why should the latter go to war with Mexico? “If California”—thus it is written in the despatch of June 8, 1846—“separates herself from our enemies, the central Mexican Government, and establishes a Government of its own, under the auspices of he American flag, you will take such measures as will best promote the attachment of the people of California to the United States, will advance their prosperity, and will make their vast region a desirable residence for emigrants from our soil.” Attachment! Convey, the wise it call.” It is curious to observe the facility which American Statesman have in detecting the latent affections of their neighbours. Texas, we presume, was similarly “attached;” and opened a “residence equally desirable for emigrants from their soil.” We should have imagined that after all these directions the following hint would be wholly superfluous, at least to so intelligent an officer as the American Commodore:—“You will bear in mind that this country desires to find in California a friend, not a foe; to e connected with it by near ties(!); to hold possession of it -at least during the war (!) and to hold that possession, if possible, with the consent of its inhabitants.” This may, to some, appear the very consummation of triumphant impudence. It bears a sort of rude approximation to the style of Henry V.-just as much as the Blueskin would to that of Achilles:—“It is not possible (illegible word) me you should love the enemy of France; but in loving me you will love the friend of France; for I love France so well that I will not part with a village of it. I will have it al mine.” But-tough they agree in their with to have it al theirs—the two invaders differ as to the means of achieving their conquest. Henry V. had not the oily demureness of President Polk; but then it is true he did not wage war with Californians. The President has had the advantage of a more profound education. He can utter cutting jokes with the gravest face. What a sarcastic commentary upon an expedition sent 3,000 miles off by land, and some multiples of that distance by sea, to tell the commanding officer that he hopes to get possession of the invaded country with the consent of its inhabitants! It is “keen, devilish keen.” They can relish a dry joke in the States.

But this is not the climax of impudence. W should have liked much to see the expression of Mr. Mason’s face while he dictated these words—after all the preparations of brigadiers, commodores, cannons and frigates:-
"The existing war with Mexico has been commenced by her. Every disposition was felt and manifested by the Unite States Government to procure redress for the injuries of which we complained, and to settle all complaints on her part in the spirit of peace and of justice which has ever characterized our intercourse with foreign nations."

Why are such comic powers wasted on red-tapery?"

The state papers of he New World” flog” those of the Old to tatters. There is no parallel between their plans and ours-their conquests and our conquests. We proceed on an old, trite, and costly path. They have a new, brazen Brummagem,"n cheap way of doing business. They get into collision with a weak State, blockade its ports, blarney its people, and, without the glory of contention or expense of corruption, quietly "attach" a new province, "impressed with their justice, grateful for their clemency, and prepared to love their institutions and honour their flag!"

LIVERPOOL, SATURDAY.

Accounts from Boston to the 5th inst. inclusive have been received by the arrival of he packet-ship Anglo-Saxon, after a short run of 18 days.

The accounts thus received add little to our previous information. From Washington we learn that on the 2d inst. the House of Representatives, by a vote of 115 to 48, resolved “that it is inexpedient to levy any duty on tea and coffee.” The decision of the house was given without the slightest debate.

The Sub-Treasury Bill had come into operation.

General Scott left New Orleans for Tampico on the 13th ult. Accounts from Tampico rumour that a large body of Mexican cavalry had been observed in the vicinity. The British ship-of-war Alarm, Lieutenant Mayo, had rrived in the port: the captain had been left indisposed at Vera Cruz. From the Rio Grande the accounts merely note the continuance of the movements consequent upon the changed plan of operations. The 3d and 4th Illinois Regiments, the Tennessee Regiment of Cavalry, and other troops, were either about the start of had started from Matamoras en route for Tampico via Moquete. The three regiments together amounted to 1,800 men. Great sickness existed at Matamoras. Several Americans had been murdered on the route to Camargo and Monterey. From the latter place we learn, that on the 12th of December General Taylor would start for Tampico, via Victoria, with one division of the army and a portion of a brigade. It was reported that General Urrea, with a troop of 6,000 Mexican cavalry, was at Victoria. It was reported, also, that Santa Anna had assembled a force of 28,000 men at San Luis. The Chief, it is said, had imprisoned Ampudia and other officers on a charge of cowardice. General Wool remained at Parras, and General Worth at Saltillo.

Mexico had been again the scene of intestine disturbances. The state of Tobasco, resenting the neglect with which the central Government treated the applications of the department for assistance at the time of Commodore Perry’s recent attack upon Tobasco, had issued a pronunciamento declaring independence.

Yucatan, also, was involved in disturbance. Campeachy had pronounced against the reunion of the department with the central Government.

Canadian journals to the 30th of December add nothing to our last accounts.

Havannah advices to the 20th of December had been received. They merely state, that a Yucatecos steamer had managed to enter the harbour, in the face of the United States vessel of war cruising on that ground, by hoisting the British flag.

MEXICAN GENERALS.-Not the least important items in the recent news from Mexico are those which relate to the distribution and organization of the Mexican army. That army numbers 41,000 men, of whom 25,000 are with Santa Anna, in the city of San Luis de Potosi, 8,000 in the fertile vale of San Francisco, and a like number at Tula, a town distant from San Luis 80 miles, and from Tampico 120. Of the 8,000 men at Tula, 2,500 have been formed into a corps of observation, and the command thereof given to General Jose Manuel Urrea. Very few military adventurers have experienced greater vicissitudes of fortune than this Urrea. He is a native of the department of Sonora y Sinaloa, and during the war of independence fought in the ranks of the patriots, at the age of 20. It is said he defeated, at that early age, a body of Spanish troops under circumstances highly creditable to himself. When Santa Anna invaded Texas in 1836, he gave to Urrea the command of a brigade; and throughout the campaign Urrea conducted himself to the perfect satisfaction of his chief, but scarcely to that of the friends of humanity—for it was he who presided at the execution of the prisoners taken at Goliad. Execution did we call it? It was a murder; and as foul a one as ever man perpetrated, or God avenged. Yet we will do Urrea the justice to say, that in conversation he often regrets the share he had in the massacre of the Texans, though he endeavours to exculpate himself in this manner; "What under the circumstances could I do? My orders to shoot the prisoners were explicitly and peremptory; and you know that it is a soldier's duty to obey the orders of his superior, not to question their propriety." This Urrea spent the 18 months that succeeded the battle of San Jacinta, in comparative obscurity. Soon after that battle he received from the President (Bustamente) the Governorship of Sonora y Sinaloa. But the Government of a remote district of Mexico—a district almost beyond the confines of civilization—and the population of which is not one-half of that of the city of New York, could not satisfy the ambitious and active-minded Urrea. So, in 1838 he "pronounced" for federalism, and commenced a war with the central government, which lasted four years. During that period Urrea must have fought 20 or 30 battles and skirmishes, of some of which the western coast of Mexico was the scene; of others the eastern. In some he was signally successful; in others he had the greatest difficulty in escaping with his life. Urrea is barely 50 years of age, though the hard life he has led has given him a somewhat older appearance. His manners are very polished, resembling those of a French general of the old regime. His administrative talents are good. It cannot be denied that he is an accomplished general; but at the same time it must be admitted that he is sometimes wanting in decision, when decision is most wanted. It is worthy of note, that the corps which Urrea now commands is composed of the very best infantry regiments in the Mexican service; these are the Cortagnardia, of Tampico, the Puebla regiment, and the corps of veterans. May we not infer from this circumstance that Santa Anna has assigned to Urrea an enterprise of "great pith and moment!"—New York Herald.

MEXICAN PRIVATEERS.-It is understood that three Mexican privateers have been fitted out and despatched. They sailed under Spanish names. The object is said to be to stop outward-bound American shipping which may have specie on board. The report, or the fact, is already creating a difficulty in insurances.—Sun.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Mexico, Dec. 30.

The proceedings of Mexican legislators are proverbially tardy; yet it was thought that the novel and alarming situation of the country, invaded by a powerful enemy, and suffering the severe effects of a blockade since May last, would induce the Congress, which was installed here on the 6th inst., to give its earnest and immediate attention to the American proposals to negotiate for peace, particularly as the reverses sustained by the Mexican arms have too clearly demonstrated their incapacity to bring the war to a successful termination. The result has not justified that expectation. True to the vain and frivolous character which has distinguished the Mexican people since the hour of their emancipation from the sway of Spain, the present Congress has devoted all its energies to the miserable intrigues of party, regardless of the danger which menaces their existence as a nation, or referring to it ardently desire the success of the United States in their present enterprise, and assumes the right of levying contributions, and the example will doubt be followed that state. This is one of he fruits of the Federal system, under which each state of Zacatecas has just added a tax of two per cent. On the extraction of specie from expense of conveyance to the coast, freight, insurance, &c. To these local legislature return in made, is burdened with a duty of no less than 10 per cent., exclusive of he to his prejudice. After the goods are sold, the exportation of specie, in which the which he is subject, and from the exceptional cases which are continually occurring enormous difficulties to contend with, from the heavy import and internal duties to circumstances by the west coast. The fair trader(in another sense) in Mexico has usual. Salesare stated to have bad, except of goods introduced under peculiar any other grounds. The annual fair of San Juan de los Lagos has taken place as here to confirm that suspicion, though it is difficult to account for the proceeding on his object was to open communications with the Americans, but nothing is yet known to Santa Anna. He has just returned from Europe, having shared his leader's exile in this. While the war lasts, Santa Anna will be excluded from Civil power, and the oftener the Mexicans are beaten, the easier will it be hereafter to get rid of the army, which all true Federalists hold in abhorrence. In the present Government of Mexico the sword is superseded by the gown. From the mines, those seemingly exhaustless deposits of treasure, the returns this year have been large. Guanajuato and Zacatecas are flourishing, and the produce of the Real del Monte has increased. The El Oro Company have also ver

The conversion of the Mexican bonds in London is still a subject of acrimonious controversy in the journals here, and will probably be discussed in Congress. In the

LT 1847 February 12, page 6c AMERICA.

Accounts from New York to the 23d ult. inclusive have been received at Liverpool, by the arrival of the packet-ship Queen of the West, Captain Woodhouse.
The Queen of the West left New York on the 23d ult., passed Holyhead at an early hour on Wednesday evening, and entered the Mersey yesterday morning, having accomplished the entire run in the space of little more than 18 days.

The accounts received by this arrival from the scene of war confirm our anticipations that the movement against Saltillo had been merely a feint, if even so much. The force observed in the vicinity of that post would now appear to have been simply a foraging or reconnoitring party. General Taylor had consequently continued his advance from Monterey for Victoria, where, it was understood, a Mexican force of 5,000 cavalry, under General Urrea, was stationed. The New Orleans journals now reduce their estimates of Santa Anna's force at San Luis to 10,000 men, and, more than this, now state that they are poorly provisioned, badly clothed, and scantily supplied with arms and ammunition. The official journal contains the following official account of General Taylor's movements during the apprehended crisis:-

"Despatches have been received from General Taylor, dated the 22d of December, near Monterey, representing that he had left that place on the 15th, for Victoria, having previously put in motion the troops destined for that point. At Montemorelos a junction was effected on the 17th with the 2d Infantry and 2d Tennessee Regiment of Foot from Camargo; and it was intended, with the whole force (3,500 men) to march, on the 19th, for Victoria. But on the evening of his arrival at Montemorelos, a despatch arrived from General Worth, commanding at Saltillo, with the intelligence that Santa Anna designed to take advantage of the division of force towards Victoria, and, by a rapid movement, to strike a heavy blow at Saltillo; and, if successful, then at General Wool's force at Parras. Under these circumstances, and with no means of judging how far this information might be well-founded, the General returned to Monterey with the regular force, in order to be in a position to reinforce Saltillo, if necessary. The volunteers under General Wuitman, reinforced by a field battery, were ordered to continue their march, and effect a junction with General Patterson at Victoria, while General Taylor returned to Monterey with General Twigg's division, now increased by the 2d Infantry.

"IN the meantime General Butler and General Wool, being advised by General Worth of a probable attack upon his position, moved rapidly to join him with all the available force at Parras and Monterey, while orders were despatched by General Butler to hasten up troops from the rear. The latter General proceeded in person to Saltillo, and assumed command agreeably to instructions which had been given by General Taylor before his departure to meet a case like this.

"General Taylor had proceeded beyond Monterey on his way to Saltillo, when he was met on the 20th, by a despatch from the post, announcing the early arrival of General Wool's column, and also that the expected concentration and movement of the Mexican troops upon that position had not taken place—indeed, that their advanced posts had rather been withdrawn. Deeming the force there and soon to be at Saltillo quite sufficient to repel any demonstration at this season from San Luis Potosí, General Taylor did not think it worth while to throw forward General Twigg's division to that place, and after resting it a day, designed putting it again in march for Victoria, to which point he was to proceed himself.
"General Patterson was supposed to be then well on his march from Matamoras to Victoria, when his division, except the Alabama rangers (in garrison at Tampico), will be brought together. With a force holding in observation the passes from Tula, the garrison at Tampico may be reduced with advantage to the service."

From the squadron in the Gulf at Anton Lizardo we have accounts up to the close of December. That portion of the crew of the unfortunate brig-of-war Somers which, on the occasion of her wreck, reached the shore had been released on parole by the Mexicans. A reconnaissance of the fortifications of San Juan de Ulloa had been made.

From Laguna we learn, that 900lb. of powder were captured, 50 soldiers disarmed, and 15 cannon destroyed at the capture of that town by Commander Perry. The following is the official account:

"United States ship Mississippi, Anton Lizardo, Dec. 27, 1846.

"Sir,-In conformity with your instructions of the 16th inst., I left this anchorage with the Mississippi on the 17th (having in tow the Vixen, Commander J. R. Sands; Bonita, Lieutenant-Commandant Bennham; and Petrel, Lieutenant-Commandant Shaw), and proceeded direct to Laguna de las Termines.

"Arriving off that port on the 20th, I placed myself on board the Vixen, and, with the Bonita, Petrel, and four barges, all in tow of the Vixen, I crossed the bar, and anchored after nightfall opposite the town without resistance from the enemy.

"In the morning I sent Commander J. R. Sands and Lieutenant James L. Parker to the Military Commandant and other authorities of the town, demanding its unconditional surrender, which demand, after some little demur, was submitted to.

"During the day I caused the arms of the few soldiers left the garrison to be delivered up, the powder found in the magazines to be embarked in a lighter ready to go on board the Mississippi; the two forts taken possession of, the American colours hoisted upon them, and the guns and carriages destroyed.

"After completing all these and other necessary arrangements, and leaving Commander Sands, with the Vixen and Petrel, in command of the place, I sailed on the morning of the 23d, in this ship, with the Bonita in tow, for the Tobasco.

"Arriving off that river, I directed Lieutenant-Commandant Benham, in the Bonita, to anchor inside the bar, and to assume command of the small blockading force stationed there.

"Having sent Commodore Adams ashore to collect information, the period of his absence was occupied in adding about 10,000 gallons to our stock of water.

"Leaving the bar of Tobasco on the evening of the 25th, I shaped my course to the westward, and traced the coast along, sufficiently near to discover the smallest boat, looking into the mouths of the principal rivers, and particularly those of Santa Anna, Goasacoalcos, and Alvarado.

"Off the latter named, I this morning captured and towed to this anchorage the Spanish schooner Isabel, a few hours from Alvarado, bound to Havannah, and the Mexican schooner Amerlia, from the same place, bound also to Havannah.

"The printed papers herewith sent will inform you that another of the political changes so frequent in Yucatan has recently taken place.

"With great respect, dear sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"M.C. PERRY.

"Commodore D. Conner, Commander naval forces, Gulf of Mexico."
The fortifications of Alvarado and Tobasco had been refortified.

From the Pacific we have no later advices.

Mexican accounts of a more minute character are published in the American journals, and communicate the speech of Mariano Salas on opening the Constituent Congress, the details regarding the capture of Los Angelos in California, &c. A long report, we learn, had been made by a select committee of the Congress, in which the monthly expenditures of the army under Santa Anna were estimated at $308,789, and those of the garrison at Vera Cruz at $80,00 peer month. The whole extraordinary expenses of the war for six months are estimated at $3,600,000. The deficit in the ordinary revenues for the six months was estimated at $884,496, which the committee proposed to supply by requiring payment in advance for a year of the direct contributions imposed by previous laws in 1841, 1842, and 1843. The first article of the bill submitted by them declared that the expenses of the war with the United States should be paid in preference to any other demands upon the Treasury. This report and bill were submitted on the 23d of December.

From Yucatan we have further indistinct accounts. They add nothing to our hopes that the department will extricate itself from the intestine struggles which now disturb and injure its commerce. Campeachy would appear to be fully alive to the damage inflicted upon the prospects of the department by the blockade instituted by the United States. The manifesto issued by the revolutionary chief, Barret, had reduced the tax on each Yucatecos to 1 ½ reals monthly. It is said, that a Commission was to be sent to the city of Washington to procure a recognition of the independence of Yucatan, and Commodore Connor had been requested not to attack their towns in the meantime. The manifesto is couched in language to the effect that the union with Mexico exposes Yucatan to "all the evils of war with a powerful nation, which heretofore has manifested the greatest consideration to the country, and which possesses the means of reducing it to the greatest misery by the simple prohibition of exporting its own productions, the sole resource of subsistence for the inhabitants;" and it calls upon all the inhabitants of Yucatan "to join this movement, professing that it is adopted in the spirit of self-preservation, and not with any unkind or hostile feelings towards the Mexican people, for whose happiness, prosperity, and growing strength, they put up the most fervent aspirations."

The proceedings of Congress since our accounts of the 15th ult. had been of an interesting but miscellaneous cast; the principal point of note being the refusal of the House of Representatives-ayes 50, nays 60-to receive a bill to appropriate the sum of $2,000,000 for the use of the Executive in regard to Mexico. A similar bill, but for an increased amount of $3,000,000, was introduced into the Senate on the 19th ult. by Mr. Sevier, of the Committee on Foreign Relations; but no "action" had been had on the bill up to our last accounts. Mr. Sevier premised the introduction of the bill, with the remark that "a speedy close of the war would result from the appropriation." On the same day a bitter dispute occurred between Colonel Benton and Mr. Calhoun upon a point of form; and, as a indication of the acrimonious feeling which prevails between the Cabinet and the hon. Senator, it is observed that the official journal had absolutely "dared" Mr. Calhoun to introduce the motion which, according to rumour, he contemplated—that the operations of he army and navy should be henceforth simply confined to the retention and defence of the present acquisitions of he republic. From a document published in the New York journals we learn that this policy is also advocated by General Taylor; and from the same source we learn, also, that Saltillo, according to that commander's views, is the extreme point to which, on that line, the American troops should advance. The General complains of the want of means of transport—views Vera Cruz as the point whence to reach the capital—and declares a levy of 15,000 volunteers necessary. The date of the letter is not given. The proceedings of Congress had also included a variety of measures for the increase of the pay and grant of lands to the volunteers in the Mexican war, and several resolutions had been adopted calculated to draw from the Executive information relative to the finances, the war, &c. In the House, also, on the Oregon Bill, the slavery question had been again touched upon, more especially in regard to the questioned power of he Central Government of he Union the prohibit slavery in newly acquired territories. In the House, on the 21st ult., on the Treasury Note Bill, amendments were offered to repeal the tariff of 1846, to impose an additional duty on articles not taxed, and to levy a duty on tea and coffee. The amendments were, however, either lost or declared to be out of order. In the Senate, on the 22d, a resolution was offered by Mr. Cilley, setting forth—

"That speedy and honourable peace with Mexico is exceedingly desirable; that the constitution does not provide for holding foreign territory, nor for incorporating foreign nations with the Union; and that the President be requested to withdraw our troops to some point in the United States on or near the boundary line."
On the same day, in debate on the Ten Regiments Bill from the Lower House, the Senate rejected—ayes 14, nays 48—a resolution offered by Mr. Houston to change the troops named in the bill from regulars to volunteers, and to make the officers elective.

Washington letters renew rumours previously current with regard to the retirement of Mr. Walker from the Treasury. The Washington Union remarks, with regard to a rumour to the effect—

“That General Taylor has been recalled from the army of Mexico, and that the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa is not to be attacked, and also that Commander Perry will not return to the Gulf of Mexico, that ‘Government is in possession of the ultimate conditions on which Mexico will consent to make a peace with the United States, and that it has determined to accede to them, if Congress will enable the Executive to meet the views of Mexico.’ We know not upon what authority these things have been reported, but certain it is we do not believe there is any adequate authority or foundation for either of these statements.”

Mr. Mason, the Secretary of the Navy, had been elected senator for Virginia.

A bill had been introduced into Congress to restrict the importation of foreign paupers and criminals into the United States.

Commercial reports are important. The Hibernia accounts had not arrived at New York up to our latest accounts; but the Quebec (late London) advices had been received, and had advanced the rates for cotton and given firmness to the market for breadstuffs. Exchange was quoted at 106 to 106 ½ per cent. Premium. Money had become more abundant. A large quantity of specie was expected by the steamer from Liverpool. Exports continue to be large’ imports were moderate. Shipping continued in great demand, and to London and different parts of Ireland there had been an increased request. The American Government had taken up a large number of vessels as transport ships for the Gulf of Mexico. The weather was rather more severe. The thermometer at New York, on the 23d, at noon, stood at 21 deg. The St. Lawrence, we learn, was frozen over at Ogdensburg, and teams could cross the stream. Philadelphia letters stated that the river was much obstructed by ice. New Orleans dates are to the 13th ult. W subjoin a detailed report.

The Pennsylvanian debt interest would be paid on the 1st inst., in due course. The sum necessary, however, was to be obtained on loan. The Georgian interest would be paid in advance, according to the New York Courier.

From the Indian territory we hear of a conflict between a band of Omahas and Sioux. 60 of he former were slain.

The Queen of the West spoke the steam-ship Cambria, hence to Boston, on the 7th inst.

The Hibernia may be expected in the Mersey, on her return, about the evening of Sunday next. Lest her non-arrival outward should create anxiety, in view of the large amount of specie taken out, we may mention that the Hibernia, at the date of our New York accounts, was then only 17 ½ days out. The voyage of he same vessel at the corresponding period of 1846 occupied 18 ½ days; and that of he Cambria, at the same period of 1845, occupied 19 ½ days.

Canadian accounts extend to the 16th ultimo. The contents are, generally, unimportant to our readers. Our journals contain the annual report of the Toronto Board of Trade for the year ended on the 30th of December last. It is extremely lengthy. An address was being prepared by the citizens of Montreal to greet the arrival of Lord Eldon in the province assigned to his care. The electric telegraph was about to be extended from Quebec to Halifax. [ANP] and weaknesses of that army under his orders to a friend, who of course follows the universal practice, and prints the letter the next morning. To contemporary journalists, and to future historians, these authentic materials spare an infinite deal of speculation and research. We ourselves are under an obligation to every man who commits one of these acts of folly and impropriety. But whilst these eminent persons contend with ourselves for the honour of instructing the public and diverting our readers, it were to be wished that they sometimes remembered that their peculiar duties are not identical with those which we endeavour to discharge.

General Taylor’s letter, which has called forth these remarks, and which we publish elsewhere, is beyond all comparison the most imprudent and absurd display of this kind of vanity which we have ever met with. It amounts to little short of treachery towards the Government which that officer serves; it demonstrates the extravagance of their policy, the inadequacy of their resources, the impossibility of bringing the Mexicans to sue for peace by any demonstration the American army can make in the field, and the hopeless aspect of the contest in which the Government of the United States has engaged itself. Mr. Polk’s bitterest enemy could have said nothing so fatal to his character as a statesman, or to the policy of his Administration, as these unparalleled disclosures of the General-in-Chief who is engaged in carrying that policy into effect. And the conduct of General Taylor is the more reprehensible, inasmuch as he appears to have been led to make this strange communication immediately after the receipt of a despatch from the Cabinet of Washington, blaming the terms he had granted to the enemy at the capitulation of Monterey.

Nothing can be more preposterous than the pretensions of he American Government, when we are made acquainted with the real amount of the forces they had placed at General Taylor’s disposal. A detachment of 6,250 men, of whom only 2,700 were regulars, and the rest volunteers, was all that could be brought to act against Monterey in October last. Their train of artillery was small and ineffective; their only mode of transport consisted of 1,700 pack mules, collected with the greatest difficulty in the enemy’s country. General Taylor, relying on the personal intrepidity of his little army, declares that he could have taken Monterey by storm; but he says that the evacuation of such a position “nearly as strong as Quebec”(?)—with a great superiority of numbers and of artillery on the part of the enemy, “is among the unaccountable occurrences “of the times.” It is evident that for he second time since the commencement of this war the American forces narrowly escaped a destructive repulse, or at least a most perilous and desperate operation. All this time, from the first declaration of war until the 2d of November, the army had received no supplies or waggons. Its movements had been completely crippled. The mounted regiments from Tennessee and Kentucky were nearly five months on their way to the headquarters of he army, and as they were only raised for a limited period of service, they were hardly arrived in the field when they might claim to be sent back to their homes. The volunteers had, as might be expected, been greatly thinned by sickness and casualties; and the General sums up this lamentable narrative of he campaign by a declaration that he will advance no further than Saltillo—that the distance of 360 miles from Saltillo to San Luis Potosi cannot be crossed by the army for want of roads and water—and that if operations are undertaken against the city of Mexico, they must be based on the line of Vera Cruz. There is not one of these difficulties which we had not anticipated from the commencement of the war, and we are by no means surprised that they should have paralyzed the American army. These reverses and failures, in which the enemy has had little or no part, are the natural consequences of proclaiming a war policy without having the foresight or the power to adopt all the measures of preparation which a state of war demands. The burdens already imposed by the war on the people of the United States, although they are onerous enough to have excited universal dissatisfaction are wholly inadequate to enable a nation upplied with any effective naval or military establishment to carry on vast aggressive operations. Mr. Polk’s war is ridiculous and contemptible. It is originated in injustice, it was justified by hypocrisy, it has been carried on with impotence. The only chance of a speedy termination or a successful issue is the treachery of he most influential leader of the Mexican people; but although various significant attempts have been made by the Cabinet of Washington to obtain from Congress the means of buying a peace, we trust Santa Anna will not incur the infamy of such a transaction.

These matters are of small importance in themselves, and can have no decisive influence on the history of our time; but they throw a clear and instructive light on the working of those democratic institutions which are the pride, or the peculiarity, of the United States of America. We see a war begun principally for party purposes by a President who evades the express provisions of he constitution for the declaration of war by Congress, and orders the troops of the United States to march into a neighbouring territory. We find the General who commands this army publicly complaining of the want of reinforcements and supplies, disclosing and denouncing the schemes of he Government, and discussing the policy of the war. We learn that the Congress, although pledged to carry on the war, refuses the most natural financial expedients proposed by the Executive Government, and that in this respect it fairly represents the determination of the people to submit to no fresh taxes. We know that the army and the fleet are in reality so ineffective that they can attempt no decisive operations even against a country which employs no active means of defence. Every one must foresee that the war will end in some compromise more humiliating to the United States than to Mexico, and fatal to the reputation of the Government which engaged in this shameful enterprise. Yet, notwithstanding all these facts, which are better known in America than in Europe, Mr. Polk continues to misdirect the policy of his country, and some years more must elapse before the United States will be relieved from the active influence of a policy whose evil consequences will outlive this generation.

Gen. Taylor letter to Gen. Gaines on Mexican affairs

*The letter is as follows, some unimportant portions being omitted. It is dated Monterey, Nov. 9, 1846 :-

"After considerable apparent delay on the part of the quarter-master's department in getting steam-boats into the Rio Grande adapted to its navigation, I succeeded, towards the latter part of August, in throwing forward to Camargo (a town situated on the San Juan river, three miles from its junction with Rio Grande, on the west side, nearly 500 miles from Brazos Island by water, and 200 by land, and 140 from this place) a considerable depot of provisions, ordnance, ammunition, and forage; and then, having brought together an important portion of my command, I determined on moving on this place. Accordingly, after collecting 1,700 pack mules, with their attendants and conductors, in the enemy's country (the principal means of transportation for our provisions, baggage, &c.), I left, on the 5th of September, to join my advance, which had preceded me a few days to Serralvo, a small village 75 miles on the route, which I did on the 9th; and, after waiting there a few days for some of the corps to get up, moved on, and reached here on the 19th, with 6,250 men, 2,700 regulars, the balance volunteers. For what took place afterwards I must refer you to my several reports, particularly to my detailed one of the 9th ult. I do not believe the authorities at Washington are at all satisfied with my conduct in regard to the terms of the capitulation entered into with the Mexican commander, which you no doubt have seen, as they have been made public through the official organ and copied into various other newspaper. I have this moment received an answer to my despatch, announcing the surrender of Monterey and the circumstances attending the same, from the Secretary of War, stating that 'It was regretted by the President that it was not deemed advisable to insist on the terms I had proposed in my first communication to the Mexican commander, in regard to giving up the city, adding that 'the circumstances which dictated, no doubt justified the change.'

"Although the terms of 'capitulation' may be considered too liberal on our part by the President and his advisers, as well as by many others at a distance, particularly by those who do not understand the position that we occupied (otherwise they might come to a different conclusion in regard to the matter), yet, on due reflection, I see nothing to induce me to regret the course I pursued. The proposition on the part of General Ampudia, which had much to do in determining my course in the matter, was based on the ground that our Government had proposed to him to settle the existing difficulties by negotiation, (which I knew was the case without knowing the result), which was then under consideration by the proper authorities, and which he (General Ampudia) had no doubt would result favourably, as the whole of his people were in favour of peace. If so, I considered the further effusion of blood not only unnecessary, but improper. Their force was also considerably larger than ours, and from the size and position of the place we could not completely invest it; so that the greater portion of their troops, if not the whole, had they been disposed to do so, could any night have abandoned the city, at once entered the mountain passes, and effected their retreat, do what we could. Had we been put to the alternative of taking the place by storm (which there is no doubt we should have succeeded in doing), we should, in all probability, have lost 50 or 100 men in killed, besides the wounded, which I wished to avoid, as there appeared to be a prospect of peace, even if a distant one. I also wished to avoid the destruction of women and children, which must have been very great had the storming process been resorted to. Besides, they had a very large and strong fortification a short distance from the city, which, if carried with the bayonet, must have been taken at great sacrifice of life, and, with our limited train of heavy or battering artillery, it would have required 20 or 25 days to take it by regular approaches.
"That they should have surrendered a place nearly as strong as Quebec, will fortified under the direction of skilful engineers, their works garnished with 42 pieces of artillery, abundantly supplied with ammunition, garrisoned by 7,000 regular and 2,000 irregular troops, in addition to some thousand citizens capable of (and no doubt actually) bearing arms, and aiding in its defence, to an opposing force of half their number, scantily supplied with provisions, and with a light train of artillery, is among the unaccountable occurrences of the times.

"I am decidedly opposed to carrying the war beyond Saltillo in this direction, which place has been entirely abandoned by the Mexican forces, all of whom have been concentrated at San Luis Potosi, and I shall lose no time in taking possession of the former, as soon as the cessation of hostilities referred to expires, which I have notified to the Mexican authorities will be the case on the 11th inst., by direction of the President of the United States.

"If we are (in the language of Mr. Polk and General Scott) under the necessity of 'conquering a peace,' and that by taking the capital of the country, we must go to Vera Cruz, take that place, and then march on to the city of Mexico. To do so in any other direction I consider out of the question. But admitting that we conquer a peace by doing so - say at the end of the next 12 months - will the amount of blood and treasure which must be expended in doing so be compensated by the same? I think not, especially if the country we subdue is to be given up; and I imagine there are but few individuals in our country who think of annexing Mexico to the United States.

"I do not intend to carry on my operations (as previously stated) beyond Saltillo - deeming it next to impracticable to do so. It then becomes a question as to what is best to be done. It seems to me the most judicious course to be pursued on our part would be, to take possession at once of the line we would accept by negotiation, extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific, and occupy the same, or keep what we already have possession of; and that, with Tampico (which I hope to take in the course of the next month, or as soon as I can get the means of transportation), will give us all on this side of the Sierra Madre, and, as soon as I occupy Saltillo, will include six or seven states or provinces, thus holding Tampico, Victoria, Monterey, Saltillo, Monclova, Chihuahua, and the Californias, and say to Mexico, 'Drive us from the country;' - throwing on her the responsibility and expense of carrying on an offensive war; at the same time closely blockading all her ports on the Pacific and the Gulf. A course of this kind, if persevered in for a short time, would soon bring her to her proper senses, and compel her to sue for peace, provided there is a Government in the country sufficiently stable for us to treat with, which, I fear, will hardly be the case for many years to come. Without large reinforcements of volunteers from the United States - say 10,000 or 15,000 (those previously sent out having already been greatly reduced by sickness and other casualties) - I do not believe it would be advisable to march beyond Saltillo, which is more than 200 miles beyond our depots on the Rio Grande - a very long line on which to keep up supplies (over a land route, in a country like this) for a large force, and certain to be attended with an expense which will be frightful to contemplate when closely looked into.

"From Saltillo to San Luis Potosi, the next place of importance on the road to Mexico, is 30 miles - 140 badly watered, where no supplies of any kind could be procured for men or horses. I have informed the War Department that 20,000 efficient men would be necessary to ensure success if we move on that place (a city containing a population of 60,000, where the enemy could bring together and sustain, besides the citizens, an army of 50,000), a force which I apprehend will hardly be collected by us with the train necessary to feed it, as well as to transport various other supplies, particularly ordnance and munitions of war.

"In regard to the armistice, which would have expired by limitation in a few days, we lost nothing by it, as we could not move even now had the enemy continued to occupy Saltillo; for, strange to say, the first waggon which has reached me since the declaration of war, was on the 2d inst., the same day on which I received only 125, so that I have been since May last completely crippled, and am still so, for want of transportation. I could bring here only 80,000 rations (15 days' supply), with a moderate supply of ordnance, ammunition, &c., to do which all the corps had to leave behind a portion of their camp equipage necessary for their comfort, and, in some instances, among the volunteers, their personal baggage. I moved in such a way, and with such limited means, that had I not succeeded, I should no doubt have been severely reprimanded, if nothing worse. I did so to sustain the administration.

"Of the two regiments of mounted men form Tennesse and Kentucky, who left their respective states to join me in June, the latter has just reached Camargo; the former had not got to Matamoras at the latest dates from thence. Admitting that they will be as long in returning as in getting there, to say nothing of the time necessary to recruit their horses, and were to be discharged in time to reach their homes, they could serve in Mexico but a very short time. The foregoing remarks are not made with the view of finding fault with any one, but to point out the difficulties with which I have had to contend.

"Monterey, the capital of New Leon, is situated on the San Juan river, where it comes out of the mountains, - the city (which contains a population of about 12,000) being in part surrounded by them, at the head of a large and beautiful valley. The houses are of stone, in the Moorish style, with flat roofs, which, with their strongly enclosed yards and gardens of high stone walls, all looped for musketry, make them each a fortress within itself. It is the most important place in Northern Mexico (or on the east side of the Sierra Madre), commanding the only pass or road for carriages form this side, between it and the Gulf of Mexico, to the table lands of the Sierra, by or through which the city of Mexico can be reached."

Blockade of Mexico

THE BLOCKADE OF MEXICO.-The following is the report of the British bark Columbine, Rose master, from Laguna, sailed on the 28th of December, 1846:-"The American fleet took possession of Laguna on the 21st of December without any resistance; the steamer Vixen and two war schooners came inside the harbour, leaving the Mississippi steam-frigate outside, with some sloops of war; Commodore Perry then declared the port under blockade, and gave my vessel, and also the Camoena notice and permission to leave, and endorsed my register, warning me not to attempt to enter any Mexican port, as the whole coast was under blockade from Rio del Norte to Cape Catouche. The port of Laguna is now strictly blockade by steamers and sailing-vessels. Left no other vessels at Laguna but the Camoena, and she was to sail the day after me.

"(Copy of Endorsation on the register of the vessel.)

"Laguna de Ternains, Dec. 20, 1846.

"I certify that I have boarded the British bark Columbine, and have warned her leave this port within 15 days.

"The whole coast of Mexico coast of Mexico and Yucatan, extending from the RD del Norte to Cape Catouche, has been declared by the Commander-in-Chief of the United States Naval Forces in the Gulf of Mexico under strict blockade, and all vessels are accordingly warned not to attempt entering any port of the said coast.

LT 1847-2-25-4e Mexican War

The accounts periodically received in this country of the Mexican war are so strange and perplexing as utterly to confuse the judgements of those who have only studied such matters in the prosaic history of the older world. We are informed in reiterated despatches that Mexican numbers have offered no mentionable obstacle to American valour, and we certainly hear of authenticated exploits which are astounding enough to warrant the most sweeping inferences of Saxon ascendency. A 16-gun sloop impounds a province; a regiment of volunteers annexes a quarter of a continent; and towns are taken by fifty men and garrisoned by five-and-twenty, in the midst of a numerous and exasperated population. The armies of the west and of the centre, of conquest and of occupation, are all represented by detachments which would hardly if concentrated make up one effective division. Congress has decreed a gold medal to the enterprising general who has covered his country's arms with such imperishable glory and the first magistrate of the republic appeals triumphantly to the war of his own creation, as the noblest action of the State, and the grand distinction of his reign.

Side by side with this striking intelligence we find it announced that the most energetic efforts of the victors are directed, hitherto unsuccessfully, to procure a peace. Their general writes a letter home, which, with the pleasing promiscuousness of American confidence, is of course published in a newspaper, stating the utter hopelessness of the position which the victorious troops have won, and the entire worthlessness of the conquests for which he is about to be rewarded. The parties best satisfied are the defeated and invaded people. As their country happily affords plenty of sea-room for the political storm, they can retire from one post to another, and extemporize a metropolis at a few hours' notice. Omne solum forti patria. Towns are politely evacuated for the use of the stranger, who is only embarrased by the ease with which he might march in any direction, if he were not so tired of his journey. The ingenuity of generals and commodores is taxed to the utmost to discover some means, in addition to repeated defeats, which may induce this perverse enemy to give up his decided "preference for war." One scheme suggests the continuation of a line of forts from Tampico to Mazatlan, which should cut off the northern moiety of the Mexican territory, so that a tract of some fifteen or twenty degrees in depth may be held in pawn till its proprietors choose to "attend to negotiation." Commodore PERRY advises the capture of all the ports both on the Gulf and on the Pacific, and the relinquishment of all the interior provinces, except such as they may "think "fit to keep," so that a thriving border of free and enlightened Americans may be planted all round Mexico, like a belt of young firs round a turnip-field, though for purposes less beneficial than those of shelter or ornament. This project of hermetically sealing up an entire people till they "ask to be let "out" has attracted great admiration, and the highest "qualities of true statesmanship." Mr. BENTON has a third plan, which has a t least the magnificence of obscurity, and we have to lament that we cannot give our readers its details, as they are, unfortunately, not yet disclosed. Mr. BENTON declines to release his country from the horrors of war except for a consideration. He sets his secret at no less a price than the Lieutenant-Generalship of the States - a price which the States, with a cautious economy of confidence have declined to pay. We can only conjecture at the character of this mysterious scheme from the enticing hints which its author threw out on the 25th of last month as he dangled a closed roll of paper containing the important plans before the eyes of the tantalized Senate. He alleged - of course as its peculiar and distinctive features - that it " was not "framed in total ignorance of Mexican resources," but promised "an issue and a result." Another striking novelty in its conception was "a diplomatic mission "nationally constituted both in a political and a geographical sense, to attend the head-quarters, and while the Minister stood ready to negotiate at every step, the army was to take an organization and an attitude to give emphasis to negotiation." It must be admitted that this provision strikes at the very root of the evil; for the proposed ambulance of plenipotentiaries being wheeled rapidly up to the critical part of the field, might perhaps surprise the defeated parties into that "honourable peace" which they would be sure to decline the next morning. When we add, that the scheme provided the "subsistence of the invaders by duties regularly paid, and contributions regularly collected," and concluded by promising "a death worthy of the soldier - the battle-storm his embrace - the field of honour his bed - and the lofty summits of the Cordilleras his monument and his grave," we are sure our readers must be astonished that their Transatlantic brethren did not at once take Mr. BENTON at his own appraisement, and make him a CROMWELL on the spot.

The point most perplexing to ordinary European minds is the object for which this much-desired peace is sought. If the provinces and ports, the people and property, the taxes and customs of a nation can be seized and distributed ad libitum already, it is hard to conceive what further advantages are to be gained by the most amicable negotiations. What does President POLK want to buy with 2,000,000 of dollars, when he can get so much for nothing? PHILIP of Macedon's receipt for taking a fort was sensible enough, but who ever drove an ass laden with silver into an unprotected town? The Mexicans have clearly the vantage-ground of their foes. Defeat and invasion may easily be put up with when they leave the conquerors beggars and the vanquished choosers. SANTA ANNA is flattered with compliments and beset with solicitations, and has the daily refusal of half-a-dozen overtures of the eternal amity of his enemies. He can hardly do better than strengthen himself by additional defeats and fresh repulses, and leave his adversaries to complete their humiliation and embarrassments by a protracted career of glory.

The following is the Decree for the appropriation of Mexican church property to national purposes.

The Vice-President of the United Mexican States, exercising the Supremo Executive Power, to the inhabitants of the Republic. Be it known that the General Congress has decreed as follows: --

1. Government is authorized to raise $15,000,000, in order to continue the war with the United States of the north, by the mortgage or sale at public auction of mortmain property.

2. From the preceding authorization are excepted the property of hospitals, charitable institutions, colleges, and establishments for the public instruction of both sexes, whose members are not bound by any monastic vow, and that dedicated to the maintenance of prisoners; the benefices and foundations transferred by inheritance, and to which the last appointments have been made in virtue of that right; the sacred vessels and ornaments and other objects necessary to the public worship; and sufficient of the property of convents nuns endow each existing member with $6,000.

3. The Government cannot exact the payment of capitals of mortmain property placed on real estate in towns, and overdue, except by 30th parts, payable monthly, making a reduction on the principal in favor of the debtor of one fourth part, and of all interest after the first payment, provided the subsequent ones are made with regularity.

4. In taking possession of mortmain capitals placed on rural estates, the Government will limit itself to the collection of the interest, without exacting the redemption of the principal, which the debtors may however pay if they think proper, with a reduction on one-half, if irredeemable; of a third, if for a period not yet expired; and of a fourth, if already due. If the debtor should not take the benefit of this decree within the period fixed by Government, and the credit should be sold, the purchaser shall not exact payment for six years from the publication of this law, in cases where a longer period has not been already stipulated.

5. In sales tenants will have a preference, as purchasers on equal terms, even though not paying the whole sum in money, provided their offer amounts to five-sixths of the estimated value, and a third pat of this is paid. The remaining capital may remain as a mortgage on the property in favour of the owner.

6. The purchasers of estates, rented for an indefinite period, shall not possess the right of ejecting the present tenants without two years' notice to rural tenants, and six months to those in towns. The purchasers must fulfil the conditions of leases for a limited period.

7. If the Government should negotiate a loan by virtue of this law, it will be indispensable to obtain at least 67 per cent. in money, placed in the republic free of all charge.

8. In no contract which may arise from this law, shall the Government accept, in lieu of the money stipulated in the preceding articles, paper, or credits of any description, except the bonds issued by virtue of the decree of the 19th of November last. Nor can the proceeds be applied to any other purpose than the maintenance of the troops appointed to defend the national territory.

9. Any contract which may infringe the previous article, or be calculated in any way to evade the law, is null; and the authority which approves or executes it shall be held responsible. The fraud being legally proved the purchaser will lose the price.

10. Any officer who, for any purpose or pretext, shall take possession of the funds created by the present law, without an express order from the Minister of Finance, shall be suspended from his employment, and punished as a defrauder of the public revenue.

11. The authorization conferred by the first article will cease at the
12. The Government will invest $1,000,000 in the purchase of arms, one half for the use of the states bordering on the nations with which the Republic may be at war, the other half for the remaining states.

13. The Government will inform Congress monthly of the sums derived from this measure, and of their inversion.

LT 1847-3-26-5f Attack on San Juan de Ulua

(From the New York Herald)

We have the pleasure of presenting to our readers this morning some important information connected with the contemplated attack on the city of Vera Cruz and the Castle of San Juan d’Ulloa by the United States army and navy. This information has been in our possession for several days past; but, inasmuch as its publication before to-day would have had a tendency to embarrass the Government, or perhaps frustrate to a certain extent their plan of operations, we withheld it from the public until a certain contingency should have occurred that would enable us to divulge it without prejudice to the public interests.

That contingency has occurred, and the sailing of the United States line-of-battle ship Ohio, and the sloop-of-war Decatur, from Norfolk, on the 1st inst., will make the intelligence clear to our readers.

It will be recollected by our readers that the plan of operations of the army and navy were first published in this journal. It may be necessary to recapitulate them here, so that the history of the matter will be complete. General Scott takes command of the army, and will rendezvous at the Island of Lobos. Thither the whole of the army, with the exception of that portion left under the command of General Taylor, for the purpose of garrisoning Saltillo, Monterey, Camargo, &c., which will be held by him, will be transported from Tampico by the several vessels, nearly 100 in number, which the Government has chartered here and in other cities for the purpose. That island affords an excellent harbour, and is only eight miles distant from the main shore, and from its abundance of water, &c., is admirably adapted for a rendezvous. From this island the troops will be conveyed to the shore, and it is for this duty that the great number of launches were ordered by the Government. From the point of landing, General Scott will march immediately to the city of Vera Cruz, and by a preconcerted arrangement between him and Commodore Perry, the city of Vera Cruz and the Castle of San Jan d’Ulloa will be simultaneously attacked by the army and navy.

Thus much we published on a former occasion.

The details of the great programme have been studiously concealed by General Scott and the Administration, as well as by all who were acquainted with them. Our army officers received orders from day to day, but their purport was never divulged. The line-of-battle ship Ohio underwent repairs recently, with the view, ostensibly, of proceeding to the Pacific and joining the blockading squadron on that side of Mexico, and sailed with sealed orders from Hampton-roads on the 1st inst. These orders are not to be opened until she gets into a certain latitude; but we will take the liberty of making our readers acquainted with their contents - probably, before Captain Striagham himself will know them.

This vessel has sailed ostensibly for the Pacific, but before she will have reached there she will have taken part in the grand demonstration about to be made on the enemy’s strongholds. She sailed in company with the sloop-of-war Decatur, but she will not go in sight of Vera Cruz until the morning of the day when General Scott will attack that city. The appearance of a vessel of her size and armament would reasonably induce the Mexicans to suppose that an attack was contemplated immediately, and it is to prevent this suspicion that she will remain out of sight until the eventful time shall have arrived The Decatur will act as an agent to convey from the squadron there to her, and inform her of the proper time to take her place.
Between General Scott and Commodore Perry, who will relieve Commodore Conner, signals have been arranged that will enable Commodore Perry to know the precise day or hour that he will commence the attack on the city. Commodore Perry will immediately communicate, by means of the Decatur, or one of the small steamers, to the Ohio, the commander of which will govern himself accordingly. The moment that General Scott commences to attack the city the whole fleet will play on the castle, for the purpose of preventing the garrison from acting in concert with the Mexicans in Vera Cruz. In this manner it is supposed that both the city and the castle will be taken in a short time.

The time appointed for this demonstration is the 26th of this month, if General Scott be ready by that time; if not, as soon after as possible. At all events the Ohio and Decatur, which sailed on the 1st, and the Mississippi, which will sail in a day or two with Commodore Perry, are directed to be in that neighbourhood by that time. The object of secrecy has been to put Santa Anna off his guard, and prevent him from cooperating with the troops in Vera Cruz. He must remain where he is; for fear that General Taylor might advance towards San Luis.

The Castle of San Juan d'Ulloa will be for a time occupied by our troops after its capture, for the purpose of testing the effect of the climate on them. If it prove unhealthy, it will probably be razed to the water, so that the enemy will not be able to avail himself of it hereafter. This ought to be done, if the Mexicans refuse to treat for peace after its capture.

If the attack be made on the 20th, and express will, we understand, be immediately sent to Washington, or to the nearest point to that city, and the news will reach us about the 1st of April. In the meantime, however, it is not improbable that a grand battle will be fought between the troops under Santa Anna and those under General Taylor. Two great battles at the same time would be a serious blow to Mexico.

The above particulars may be relied upon for accuracy. It will be soon, therefore, that we may very soon expect to hear important news from the seat of war.

LT 1847-4-5-5e US war with Mexico

By the Baltimore, Captain Johnson, arrived at Havre on the 3d inst., we have received American papers down to the 10th ult.

The close of the session of Congress had been succeeded by an entire dearth of political news, and the various members of that assembly were busy in retiring form the scene of their labours with all possible despatch.

With respect to the war in Mexico we publish the following extracts from the New York Journal of Commerce of March 10:

"There were upwards of 80 sail of vessels at Point Isabel on the 13th, including the two ships containing the N.Y. Regiment. This regiment was to proceed immediately to Lobos Island, the general rendezvous, preparatory to a descent upon Vera Cruz.

"The Georgia Regiment, which originally consisted of 910 men, has been reduced by deaths and discharges to 626.

"A letter from Saltillo states that when the 80 mounted men of the !Kentucky and Arkansas Regiments were captured, they were 93 miles from that city, in the direction of San Luis Potosi.

"The Matamoras Flag of February 17 states that the defences of that city are such as to enable the garrison to defend it against any force which the Mexicans can bring against it.

"It is now certain that the battle of Bracito, near El Paso, on the Upper Rio Grande, was fought by Colonel Doniphan's regiment of Missouri Volunteers, aided by a detachment of 100 men from other regiments under Lieutenant - Colonel Mitchell, making the whole American force 600. These whipped 1,100 Mexicans, killing 28 or 30, putting the rest to flight, and capturing one cannon, without themselves losing a man. They, however, had seven wounded, but none dangerously.
By the schooner Delta, arrived at New Orleans on the 1st inst., we have news from Tampico to the 20th ult. General Scott arrived at Tampico on the 19th, where it was reported that Vera Cruz had been evacuated by order of Santa Anna, and the enemy’s troops marched to the interior. Mr. Lumsden writes to the picayune from Tampico, 18th ult., that he has seen a letter from a Mexican officer to a friend, dated San Luis the 9th, which states that Santa Anna was to march on Saltillo preparatory to attacking Monterey. General Urrea, with 5,000 troops at Victoria, was to attack Matamoras, and that both expeditions must prove successful. The writer of this letter is Santa Anna’s private secretary, and he says they shall give the Yankees hot work in the north, while General Scott is marching on Vera Cruz. It is pretty certain that Santa Anna is now at Saltillo, and it is even reported that he had engaged in a conflict with General Taylor, but the latter is not believed at Tampico. General Scott had issued orders to punish all crimes committed by Mexicans or Americans not provided for by the army clause, after trial before a military commission, according to the laws of the United States.

"General Taylor, with Briggs's and Thomas's batteries, and the 2d of February, and had taken a position at Saltillo on the 2d of February, and had taken a position at Aqua Nueva. All the troops were to go there on the 10th, except a few to remain in town. There is little doubt but that General Minon will give General Taylor considerable trouble. It is stated that General Taylor wants light troops very much. A letter from Brazos, dated 22d of February, says, that Taylor was busy making water tanks, and collecting a large train of wagons and pack mules. The enemy had apparently left that part of the country for parts unknown - supposed towards Vera Cruz. General Worth’s division had all embarked except the dragoons and light batteries. General Worth would sail in a day or two in the Editb. The Atrevids, of New Orleans, from Campeachy, 19th February, brings news that the British Royal Mail steamer Tweed, was lost on the 12th of February, N.E. of Cardenas. 80 persons were drowned. An expedition was sent from Campeachy to her assistance."

LT 1847-4-8-5b2 US war with Mexico

[The following appeared in part only of our impression of yesterday:-]

LIVERPOOL, Tuesday Evening.

By the packet-ship Waterloo, Captain Allen, we have advices from New York to the 15th inclusive.

The intelligence by this arrival is not of much importance.

The American generals are still occupied in making preparations for an attack on Vera Cruz, the rumoured evacuation of which is not confirmed.

The New Orleans Delta publishes a letter, dated Tampico, which says:

"The rumour I sent you this evening, relative to a fight between Santa Anna and General Taylor, although Mexican news, is credited by almost every officer here. The advance of Santa Anna from San Luis to Saltillo had prepared every one for the receipt of the news of a battle, either at that place or at Monterey, and from that they more readily credited the report. The force of the Mexican commander must have been very large, judging from the notices of their departure from San Luis, and he had enough, in his own mind, to overcome the 4,000 or 5,000 - if that many - of General Taylor. Independent of this, the fact of the Mexicans reporting this news, which is against themselves, induces me to attach some credit to it, for, as I have said before, there is generally some fire from where this sort of smoke issues. The account, as I gathered it last evening, is a little more in detail than is set forth in my first letter.

"On the approach of Santa Anna to Saltillo, General and cut off his retreat, he extended his line too far, and so weakened his centre that the ready eye of Taylor immediately discovered the advantage, and wheeling his column to the right by a quick move, cut through their centre and made such work on the advanced half, that, before the rear could render them any essential service, they were cut up and dispersed. The number of killed on the part of the enemy is represented by the Mexicans to have been greater than at any other battle. Amongst the dangerously wounded, I hear the name of General Arista mentioned, but do not learn whether he is a prisoner. I could mention to you the names of several distinguished officers who place implicit confidence in this news, but it is unnecessary."

The New York Herald gives some further particulars of the loss of the Tweed; it says,

"We give some additional particulars, from the Picayune, of the reported loss of the Tweed. We have seen another letter written by a Spanish house at Campeachy, and dated the 18th ultimo. It confirms the above, and gives further particulars. There were fifty-five passengers on the Tweed, and the officers and crew made seventy-five more. About sixty in all were drowned, but the account does not designate to which class they belonged, nor are any names mentioned. This account was derived from the supercargo of the vessel, who, with nine men, was saved in a boat belonging to the Tweed, and had arrived at Sisal. The Tweed had 1,170 flasks of quicksilver on board, and other merchandise. The Spanish brig Emilio had sailed to render assistance, and they were taking up other vessels at Campeachy on the 18th ult. For the same purpose."

Mr. Davis, one of the officers of the Tweed, had arrived at Sisal with the letter-bag. The New York Journal gives, also, the particulars which appeared in The Times on Monday. Mr. Davis, alluded to as one of the officers of the ship, is no doubt the Admiralty agent, Lieutenant Davis.

LT April 13, 1847 US war with Mexico

[The following appeared in part only of our impression of yesterday : -]

LIVERPOOL, Sunday Evening.

By the packet-ship Fidelia, Captain Hackstaff, we have advices from New York to the 16th ult. inclusive.

We copy the following communication, dated Washington, March 14 from the New York Herald of the 16th ult. : -

"We have to-day a rumour of another battle between Santa Anna and General Taylor, at or near Saltillo, and that the information was communicated this morning to the War Department that the latter was defeated by a largely superior force of the enemy from a rapid concentration. The report being coupled with the statement of Taylor's defeat renders the whole story improbable; for that Old Rough-and-Ready can be defeated we hold to be impossible. We cannot contrive any arrangement by which it could be done. We cannot patch up an excuse for believing such a story. The mail has failed for several days, and when arrears come up we do expect some stirring intelligence of entirely a different character."

LT April 16, 1847 6a Battle of Buena Vista

(From the New Orleans Picayune of March 23.)

Dr. Turner, United States Army, who arrived at Matamoras on the 9th unst. from Monterey, brought the glorious intelligence of another brilliant victory over the Mexican army. The scene of action was at Buena Vista - a hacienda about six miles west of Saltillo. The fighting commenced on the 22d of February, and ended on the 23d. Santa Anna's Adjutant-General and many other officers and men are prisoners.

The loss on our part was 700 killed and wounded. Santa Anna's force amounted to at least 15,000 men; that of General Taylor to about 5,000, almost entirely volunteers. His army is composed of Washington's, Bragg's, and Thomas's batteries, one squadron of the 1st Mississippi and 2d Kentucky regiments, and one company of Texan Volunteers. Dr. Turner brought a list of 63 officers killed and wounded.

I felt in such haste, that I was unable to obtain a copy, but recollect among the killed Captain Lincoln, Assistant Adjutant-General, United States Army; Colonel Yell, of the Arkansas Cavalry; Captain Moore, Adjutant Vaughan, and three others (not named) of the Kentucky Cavalry; Colonel M'Kee; Lieutenant-Colonel Clay; Captain Willis, 2d Kentucky Infantry; Colonel Hardin and Major Gorman, Illinois Brigade, many of the Indiana Brigade; several of the Mississippi regiment, and two lieutenants of the Texan volunteers. --Among the wounded I remember General Lane, Colonel Jefferson Davis, 1st Mississippi Regiment, Captain Stein, 1st United States Dragoons, Captain Connor, Texan Volunteers, Lieutenant Barber, 2d Kentucky Infantry, Lieutenant Whiteside, of the Indiana Brigade.

The official depatches of General Taylor have been cut off. Colonel Morgan's regiment Ohio volunteers having been reinforced by a command from Monterey had reached that place in safety.

Colonel Curtis, of Ohio, with one company (Captain Hunter's) of the 2d United States Dragoons, his own regiment, one of Indiana volunteers, the Virginia regiment, and I think some Texan rangers, in all about 2,000 men, was about to leave Camargo to attack General Urrea, who is said to be about 30 miles south of that place, with an army of from 4,000 to 5,000 men, principally Rancheros. He is believed to have with him only 1,500 regular troops. A great many, if not all of these Rancheros, as soon as they hear of the discomfiture of Santa Anna's army, will disperse, and the gallant colonel will no doubt obtain the victory.

We annex Santa Anna's own account of the actions of Buena Vista, as translated for the Tampico Sentinel. We have the original Spanish account in our possession: -

Camp, near Buena Vista, Feb. 23.

Excellent Sir, - After two days of battle, in which the enemy, with a force of 8,000 to 9,000 men and 26 pieces of artillery, lost five of his positions, three pieces of artillery, and two flags, I have determined to go back to Agua Nueva to provide myself with provisions, not having a single biscuit or a grain of rice left. Thanks to the position occupied by the enemy, he has not been completely beaten, but he left on the field about 2,000 dead. Both armies have been cut to pieces, but the trophies of war will give you an idea on which side had been the advantage.

We have struggled with hunger and thirst during 40 hours, and if we can provide ourselves with provisions we will go again to charge the enemy. The soldiers under my command have done their duty and covered the honour of the Mexican nation with glory. The enemy has seen that neither his advantageous position, nor the broken nature of the ground, nor the rigour of the season (for it has been raining during the action) could prevent the terrible charge with the bayonet) which left him terrified.

LT April 17, 1847 sf The Battle of Saltillo

(From the New Orleans Delta of March 21.)

The schooner William C. Preston arrived yesterday from Brazos, from which place she sailed on the afternoon of the 10th inst. The news from General Taylor brought by this vessel is most cheering. The intense anxiety created among our citizens by the many alarming rumours which have circulated through the country relieved itself last evening in one universal expression of joy and proud confidence in the superiority of American valour. Although these reports are still vague and indefinite, enough can be gathered from them to give every assurances that General Taylor has whipped Santa Anna.

From Captain Brown, a passenger on the William C. Preston, we gather the following particulars of the reports most generally received at Brazos :-

General Taylor was attacked by Santa Anna at Agua Nueva, and after a sharp battle fell back in good order to the vicinity of Saltillo. Here he was again attacked by Santa Anna, and a sharp engagement ensued, in which General Taylor was victorious. Continuing his retreat in good order, General Taylor fell back to Monterey, where he arrived in safety. Safety intrenched here, and finding Santa Anna would not attack him, General Taylor sallied out against Santa Anna and gave him battle. A long and severe conflict ensued, which terminated in the total defeat of Santa Anna with a very heavy loss. The loss is reported to be between 4,000 and 5,000. This may be an exaggeration, but when it is considered that General Taylor had 20 pieces of flying artillery, splendidly officered and managed, we venture the opinion that the Mexican loss has been very heavy.

Captain Brown states that all the points on the Rio Grande are in hourly apprehension of being attacked by the Mexicans. At Camargo, especially, the number of Mexicans hanging about the outskirts of the town had created considerable anxiety and vigilance among our troops. There were about 1,200 troops at Camargo.

Captain Hicks, who commands the steam-boat Warren, in the Government employ on the Rio Grande, came passenger in the William C. Preston, and gives the following corroborative information. Captain Hicks brings intelligence from Camargo to the 5th inst., at which place information had been received from a Mexican who had just arrived from the interior, that a collision had taken place at Buena Vista, Saltillo, and Monterey, between the forces of Santa Anna (numbering some 23,000) and those of General Taylor, finding himself too hotly pressed on all sides by a force greatly outnumbering his, retired before the enemy in good order, and made good his retreat to Monterey, spiking six pieces of ordnance, and leaving at Saltillo some 30,000 rations, which have fallen into the enemy's hands.

The different engagements are said to have occupied the space of three days. The enemy followed closely upon General Taylor's retreat, until he arrived at Monterey, where the battle was renewed, our forces gaining a decided advantage over the enemy, forcing him to precipitately retire, when General Taylor, with a battery of flying artillery and a squadron of dragoons, pressed them warmly home, creating such immense havoc in their routed columns that the slain are represented to have been ridden over in piles “three deep.” The enemy was pursued for 18 miles on the Saltillo road, having suffered in all the engagements to the amount of 5,000 killed, wounded, and missing. General Taylor's loss is said to be 1,100.

At the last advices, Santa Anna is said to have been endeavouring to rally his forces for another desperate onslaught, while Urrea had fallen in General Taylor's rear, near Passa Victoria, with 8,000 cavalry and an irregular force of rancheros, for the purpose of impeding reinforcements and cutting off all communications between Monterey and Camargo. General Taylor is confident that he can maintain his position until adequate assistance may arrive.

(From the New York Sun, March 31.)

By an arrival at New Orleans on the evening of the 13th inst., intelligence has been received from passengers of a highly interesting, though bloody nature. An express rider had arrived at Monterey from General Taylor, at Riconada, bringing the startling information that Santa Anna, with a force of 20,000 men, had made his appearance within sight of the American camp. General Taylor's forces were stationed about 20 miles from Saltillo, on the 20th of February, where there was a skirmish with the enemy, and General Taylor with his little army of 5,000 men fell back upon Saltillo.

On the following day a severe and deadly conflict took place in the streets of the city. This is represented to have been one of the most desperate and sanguinary fights upon record, and the houses, thoroughfares, and almost everything appertaining to the city are said to have been literally deluged with blood. Among the officers reported to have been mortally wounded is Colonel Morgan, of the Ohio volunteers. General Taylor is further reported to have taken place at the Riconada pass, and the Mexicans were repulsed and compelled to draw off with great loss. In the two battles the loss of the Americans is estimated at 2,000, and the Mexicans from 4,000 to 5,000.

About 5,000 Mexicans had succeeded in cutting their way through the pass, and were in possession of the whole of the country of the Rio Grande. The Mexican citizens of Matamoras were much disappointed at the temporary success of Santa Anna, as they believed that he had been too much crippled hitherto for further operations. All communication between Saltillo and Matamoras had been cut off.

Slips and extras from the New Orleans Picayune, the Delta, and the Mobile Herald confirm the above. Accounts from the island of Lobos announce the departure on the 29th ult. of the expedition against Vera Cruz, consisting of 50 or 60 vessels laden with troops and munitions of war, for the bombardment of the Castle, which would commence on the 10th inst. The main body of Mexicans under Santa Anna was disappointed. The latter General is reported to have actually started on the sortie in hopes of making Scott’s expedition superfluous, he has at least been equally American detachment, though it must be admitted that if Taylor drew on the attack Anna, therefore, may be said to have failed in his scheme of cutting off this isolated Mexicans, at some point, did retire, and Taylor probably continued his route. Santa last day of the fighting - from Buena Vista. By their own confession, however, the question took place, but where the armies parted is not very clear. The story of Taylor’s sallying from Monterey, and driving Santa Anna back on the Saltillo road, is determined to anticipate the glory of a victory with the small force that was left him. It appears, however, to e pretty clear that two days’ hard fighting has taken place, during which Taylor continued on a line of retreat eastward, to his head-quarters; that he made a stand at two or three different points, one of which was Saltillo; that he fought gallantly and with at least success enough to beat off the enemy; and that, as far as we know at present, he is the better man of the two. But our information is by no means clear either as to the previous operations of Taylor, or as to his final position after the engagements. That he could have actually reached Monterey at the dates last given appears hardly credible, and yet it is upon this allegation that his last victorious onslaught upon his pursuers depends. Our accounts commence and terminate very abruptly. It will be remembered that by the whole tenour of our despatches three weeks back there seemed a very general impression that a collision would take place between Taylor and Santa Anna, though no reason was alleged for the expectation, and though the Mexican commander was then at San Luis, and had given no evidence of his intention to follow Taylor rather than Scott. It is possible that Taylor, knowing he was to be superseded, had shown symptoms of his resolution to deal a parting blow, and, like other commanders, had determined to anticipate the glory of a victory with the small force that was left him. He fought very well there is no doubt, but we suspect that Saltillo will not prove an Assaye. Either rely on some feints of Taylor, or in execution of his own designs, Santa Anna fell upon him, and evidently in a pretty good position. From this, if Taylor was not dislodged, he at all events thought it prudent to retire; and the first attack of Santa Anna seems to have convinced him that the Mexican were not going to fall into his hands, and that he had better secure the chances of war by retreating leisurely on his own head-quarters. The Mexicans, though roughly handled by the old warrior, followed him up for a couple of days, during which the engagements in question took place, but where the armies parted is not very clear. The story of Taylor’s sallying from Monterey, and driving Santa Anna back on the Saltillo road, is quite irreconcilable with the Mexican General’s despatch of the 23d of February - the last day of the fighting - from Buena Vista. By their own confession, however, the Mexicans, at some point, did retire, and Taylor probably continued his route. Santa Anna, therefore, may be said to have failed in his scheme of cutting off this isolated American detachment, though it must be admitted that if Taylor drew on the attack in the hopes of making Scott’s expedition superfluous, he has at least been equally disappointed. The latter General is reported to have actually started on the sortie.
from Lobos, but the "launches" which were to accomplish the magnanimous race from the island to Vera Cruz are now transformed into 50 or 60 sailing vessels. The point of landing is still unknown, but by Santa Anna's order for occupying the old Puente del Rey, it appears that the disembarkation was looked for to the north of the Antigua. It is difficult to comprehend the advantages of occupying the island at all instead of embarking from Tampico at once. However, our private advices coincide with the published intelligence in representing it as the general belief in well-informed circles at New York that both Vera Cruz and San Juan d'Ulloa had fallen to the Americans, and that without much resistance - a rumour which is confirmed by the evident resolution of Santa Anna to make all his play in the north.

The moral, however, of the whole story is this, - peace is farther off, and the Americans worse off, than ever. It is provable that Taylor retained the honours of every field, though his little army of some 5,000 or 6,000 men was at least trebled by that of Santa Anna. But the Mexicans have done enough to damage the American prestige and encourage their own people. They took the offensive, they attacked the enemy in one position after another, and they forced him to a kind of retreat. They fought with unusual spirit, charging him up to the very muzzles of his guns, and took a quantity of baggage, besides even a few pieces of cannon and some colours. The relative magnitude of their losses is utterly unimportant. Their levies are as cheap as those of Tlascala, while every man and horse that goes down on the other side costs Taylor almost as much as it cost Cortes. Already we see the effects of Santa Anna's movement. He has left the Gulf squadron with the bulk of the American army to amuse themselves with a grand representation of the Mogador battue, while in the mean time he has destroyed some 2,000 of their best troops, and surrounded one of their best Generals. Even if Taylor be actually in Monterey it is admitted on all hands that his communications are entirely cut off, even with Matamoras and Camargo. The whole country is swarming with light horsemen and rancheros, to whom he can hardly oppose a single dragoon, while every post on the line of the Grande is expecting an attack from forces utterly disproportioned to their means of defence. To improve this condition of affairs, it is known that there is no cordial concert between Scott and Taylor, nor between the supreme authority and either of them, and perhaps a new General or Major-General may presently make his appearance, to find that the favourite line of the Grande has been lost and the captured provinces sacrificed for the sake of winning a city which, by the best American authorities, will be utterly useless when won.

LT April 24, 1847 5f Battle of Buena Vista

THE BATTLE OF BUENA VISTA.

Official Despatches

"Head-quarters Army of Occupation,
Camp on the field of battle, Buena Vista, Mexico, Feb.24.

"Sir, - I have the honour to report that, having become assured on the 20th inst., that the enemy had assembled a heavy force at Encarnacion, 30 miles in front of Agua Nueva, with the evident design of attacking my position, I broke up my camp at the latter place on the 21st, and took up a strong line in front of Buena Vista, seven miles south of Saltillo. A cavalry force left at Agua Nueva for the purpose of covering the removal of supplies was driven in during the night, and on the morning of the 22d the Mexican army appeared immediately in front of our position. At 11 o'clock, a.m., a flag was sent, bearing form General Santa Anna a summons of unconditional surrender, to which I immediately returned a negative reply. The summons and my reply are herewith inclosed.

"The action was commenced late in the afternoon between the light troops on the left flank, but were not seriously engaged until the morning of the 23d, when the enemy made an effort to force the left flank of our position. An obstinate and sanguinary conflict was maintained, with short interval, throughout the day, the result being that the enemy was completely repulsed form our lines. An attack of cavalry upon the rancho of Buena Vista, and a demonstration upon the city of Saltillo itself, were likewise handsomely repelled. Early in the night the enemy withdrew from his camp and fell back upon Agua Nueva, a distance of 12 miles.

"Our own force, engaged at all points in this action fell somewhat short of 5,4000 men, while that of the enemy, from the statement of General Santa Anna, may be estimated at 20,000. Our success against such great odds is a sufficient encomium on the good conduct of our troops. In a more detailed official report I shall have the satisfaction of ringing to the notice of the Government the conspicuous gallantry of particular officers and corps. I may be permitted here, however, to acknowledge my great obligations to Brigadier-General Wool, the second in command, to whom I feel particularly indebted for his valuable services on this occasion.

"Our loss has been very severe, and will not probably fall short of 700 men. The Mexican loss has been immense. I shall take the earliest opportunity of forwarding a correct list of the casualties of the day.

"I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"Z. TAYLOR,
"Major-General U.S.A. commanding.

The Adjutant-General of the Army,
Washington, D.C."

"Translation.

"Summons of Santa Anna to General Taylor.

"You are surrounded by 20,000 men, and cannot, in any human probability, avoid suffering a rout, and being cut to pieces with your troops; but as you deserve consideration and particular esteem, I wish to save you from a catastrophe, and for that purpose give you notice, in order that you may surrender at discretion, under the assurance that you will be treated with the consideration belonging to the Mexican character; to which end you will be granted an hour's time to make up your mind, to commence for the moment when my flag of truce arrives in you camp.

"With this view, I assure you of my particular consideration.

"God and Liberty! Camp at Encantada, February 22.
"ANT. LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.

"To General Z. Taylor, commanding the forces of United States."

"Head-quarters Army of Occupation, near Buena Vista, Feb.23.

"Sir, - In reply to your note of this date, summoning me to surrender my forces at discretion, I beg leave to say that I decline acceding to your request.

"With high respect, I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"Z. Taylor
"Major-General U.S.A., Commanding.

"Senor General D. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, Commander-in-Chief, La Encantada."

"Head-quarters Army of Occupation, Saltillo, Feb.25.

"Sir, - I have respectfully to report that the main Mexican force is yet at Agua Nueva. Our troops hold the positions which they have so well defended, and are prepared to receive the enemy should he venture another attack.

"An arrangement has been made with General Santa Anna for an exchange of prisoners, by which we shall receive all, or nearly all, of those captured from us at different times, besides the few taken in the action of the 23d. Our wounded, as well as those of the Mexicans which have fallen into our hands, have been removed to this place and are rendered comfortable.

"Our loss in the recent actions, so far as ascertained, amounts to 264 killed, 450 wounded, and 26 missing. One company of the Kentucky Cavalry is not included in this statement, its casualties not being yet reported. I respectfully enclose a list of the commissioned officers killed and wounded, embracing many names of the highest merit."
"I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Z. Taylor,
Major-General U.S.A., Commanding.

The Adjutant-General of the army,
Washington, D.C.

Head-quarters, Army of Occupation, Agua Nueva, March 1.

Sir, - I have the honour to report that the troops of my command occupied their original camp at this place on the 27th of February, the last of the Mexican army leaving the morning of that day in the direction of San Luis. It is ascertained that the enemy is in full retreat and in a very disorganized condition, the men deserting and dying of starvation in great numbers. I despatch a command this day as far as Encarnacion to harass his rear and secure whatever military supplies may be found there.

From the statements of Mexican officers, particularly of the medical staff left to succour the wounded, there seems no doubt that their loss in the recent action is moderately estimated at 1,500, and may reach 2,000 men killed and wounded, besides 2,000 or 3,000 deserters. Many officers of rank were lost. I enclose a list of the names of our own killed and wounded, made as complete as practicable at this time. One regiment (Kentucky Cavalry) is not included, its return not being rendered.

The enemy had fully reckoned upon our total rout, and had made arrangements to intercept our retreat and cut off the army; stationing for that purpose corps of Cavalry, not only immediately in our rear but even below Monterey. I regret to report they succeeded, near the village of Marin, in destroying a train of supplies and killing a considerable number of the escort and teamsters. Colonel Morgan, 2d Ohio regiment, on his march from Cerralvo, was infested by the Mexican cavalry, with which he had several encounters, but finally dispersed them with small loss on his own part. Captain Graham, assistant quartermaster Volunteer Service, was mortally wounded in one of the affairs. I have no doubt that the defeat of the main army at Buena Vista will secure our line of communication from further interruption, but I still propose in a few days to change my head-quarters to Monterey, with a view to make such further arrangements as may be necessary in that quarter.

The dispositions made to harass our rear vindicate the policy and necessity of defending a position in front of Saltillo, where a defeat has thrown the enemy far back into the interior. No result so decisive could have been obtained by holding Monterey, and our communication would have been constantly in jeopardy.

I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Z. Taylor, Major-General U.S.A. commanding.

The Adjutant-General of the Army, Washington, D.C.

LT April 26, 1847 4e Mexican war

We published in our last impression some intelligence which has been rather anxiously looked for. The American mails arrived on Friday with authentic particulars of the late occurrences at the scene of war. Amongst them will be found the official despatches of General Taylor relative to the battle of Saltillo, the circumstances of which are narrated with some little variation from the previous reports, but with a result substantially the same. The "three battles" spoken of in the American papers are resolved into a pretty continuous engagement of nearly a day and a half, conducted with great obstinacy on both sides. Taylor was at Agua Nueva on the 21st of February, when he received information of Santa Anna's intended attack. Not thinking it prudent to receive the assault in this position, he retired upon Buena Vista, seven miles south of Saltillo, where he took up a strong line. He was here summoned to an unconditional surrender by Santa Anna, who had driven in the covering force left at Agua Nueva, and appeared on the 22d immediately in the American front with his whole army. The summons being of course declined, the attack commenced, and was continued with great vigour throughout the afternoon of the 22d and the whole day of the 23d. At its conclusion Santa Anna must have sent off his despatch of this date from Buena Vista, detailing the events of the day and announcing his intended retreat upon Agua Nueva, which he effected early that night. According to the American account, Taylor would seem to have sustained all the attacks of the Mexicans in his position at Buena Vista, whereas Santa Anna's despatch, as well as the reports previously in circulation, represented the Americans as falling back, though without disorder, from one post to another. Taylor certainly decamped from Agua Nueva at the first intelligence of Santa Anna's approach, and his cursory intimation that a "demonstration on Saltillo was handsomely repelled" shows that detachments, at least, of the two armies must have been engaged at some point beyond Buena Vista. Probably Santa Anna makes too much and Taylor too little of these movements. Our suspicions that the American General had not actually reached Monterey as reported, turn out to be correct. By the dates of his despatches, he appears to have been at Buena Vista on the 34th - the day after the battle, - at Saltillo on the 35th, and at Agua Nueva on the 1st of March. It is not improbable that detachments in or near Saltillo on the 23d, when Santa Anna was at Buena Vista, and that he successively occupied this General quitted them. His onslaught upon the retiring enemy proves to be mere romance. Two days after the fighting, Santa Anna was still at Agua Nueva, the post from which the Americans had originally decamped, and Taylor's despatch merely expresses a "preparation to receive him should he venture another attack" - words which certainly imply no great superiority of condition. Indeed, beyond the fact that the Americans undoubtedly beat off, though from a strong position, a force nearly quadrupling their own, they seem to have no reason to think them otherwise than voluntary. The debatable ground was between Saltillo and Agua Nueva. From the latter place Santa Anna is said to be moving on his original line of operations towards San Luis, and from the former place Taylor himself announces his resolution of retiring to his headquarters at Monterey. This disorganization which the American General attributes to the enemy's forces, and the composure which he ascribes to his own. Must of course be understood with considerable allowances.

The operations in the Gulf are more intelligible, as they have not yet proceeded beyond the preliminaries of taking up positions. The Lobos armada sailed on the 9th of March, and landed 12,000 men, without opposition, three miles above Vera Cruz. The following days were occupied in investing the city completely by land, while the squadron blockaded all the sea approaches to the castle and port. This unresisted investment of the place probably gave rise to the report mentioned in our last advices, that the town and castle had already fallen to the Americans. We have already quoted authourities in confirmation of our own surmises that the capture of Tampico towards concluding, or even advancing, the war, unless the effects of the Three Million Bill should begin to be simultaneously felt. It is at this point, however, that the real push is made. The movement in the north was purely Mexican, nor will the American force in that quarter have further orders probably than to maintain such a hold on California, and the line of the Grande, as will both suggest and facilitate the peaceable transfer of these coveted districts at the consummation of a peace. The American papers contain a long communication between the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 23d of last month, from which it clearly appears that the scheme broached some time ago of occupying all the Mexican seacoast, and blockading an entire empire into a capitulation, is to be seriously prosecuted, and that the investment of Vera Cruz is one step in the plan. The ports both in the Atlantic and the Pacific are to be seized, and the communication across the isthmus is to be secured. Mexican duties and prohibitions are to be everywhere abolished, and such a tariff devised as will best answer the ends of raising revenue and increasing commerce. By these means it is conceived that the United States treasury will be eased of some of the burden of the war; that the new duties collected by American officers will go far to support the troops engaged in the contest; that the goodwill of neutral nations will be secured by an arrangement so much more favourable to all their interests than the absurd restrictions of the old Mexican tariff; and that the Mexicans themselves will be at length circumvented into a honourable peace. We will not, at present, remark upon the long vista of blockades and sieges which this prospect discloses, or on the probable duration of a war which is to witness the capture of all the ports of an extensive country, and which, at the commencement of its second year, had only yet seen the occupation of one and the investment of another of them. Neither will we attempt to calculate how far the opinions of neutral nations upon the whole casus beli may be qualified by the bonus held out to them in the proposed arrangements for the campaign. We will only say, that even if all the three first expectations should be verified, but little advance will be made towards securing the fulfilment of the last. It is perfectly notorious to the Americans themselves that the Mexican nation can subsist in abundant comfort upon its own plateaux and leave the invaders to enjoy the seacoasts as long as they please. If they choose to indulge their obstinacy, there is nothing in this blockade to prevent them. They know perfectly well that the Americans can never fin men, money, or patience for the permanent occupation of any points they may seize, otherwise they would never display so much anxiety about the peaceable conveyance of the property. The appropriation of the Mexican customs may assist, but it can never reimburse, the American exchequer. There will still be a growing balance against the Treasury and a growing feeling against the war. Its novelty has already worn off; its injustice is daily more notorious; its expenses are hourly more serious, and its termination more invisible than ever. The States want part of California and the line of the Grande. They have already taken them; and if they knew the way to deep them, the business would be done. But their tenure is not worth a dollar without such consent of the Mexicans as will preclude the necessity and the cost of armed occupation. This consent they are now labouring to extort; but as they, even by their most promising scheme, have to conquer and occupy every port on either coast, while the Mexicans have nothing to do but to sit still and be sulky, it is not difficult to discover which party has the harder game.

LT April 29, 1847 7d Fortress of San Juan d'Ulloa

THE FORTRESS OF SAN JUAN D'ULLOA. - The following is an extract of a letter in the last number of the New York Tribune, from an officer on board the United States ship Albany. "As from the deck, with my glass, I swept over the city of Vera Cruz, its environs, and the stronghold which covers it - said to be impregnable to the combined fleets of the earth - it was with a rather serious feeling that my eyes rested upon this grim, grizzly pile, barbed and bristling with its hundreds of cannon. The question at once arises, can it be taken? Shall we ever see our fleet moving up over the expanse before me to attack it? I doubt it very much. Certainly not, with any force we have, or have had here. Let people prate as much at home as they please about it. If ever it is done, it will be by a tremendous array of cannon, and a most awful loss of life. The castle of Vera Cruz is no more what it was when the French carried it, than you are now to what your were when a nursling in your mother's arms. Then there were no guns above the caliber of 24-pounds, and but few of them most miserably served. The magazines, unarched, were not bomb proof. The powder was of such and inferior character that not a shot penetrated the side of a French ship, but at the close of the engagement were stuck about the sides of the shopping like so many balls of mud; and in addition to all this the commanding officer, having been instructed not to fire the first gun, permitted the French squadron to come up and take its position as quietly as though mooring to pass the winter season. Now let us see what a change time and a severe lesson have effected in this same castle. There are at present mounted within its periphery nearly 300 cannon, and these all 32's, 42's, and 8 and 10 inch Paixhans, there being a very large number of the latter; and wherever it has been possible to train a gun upon the channel of approach, they are planted en barbette, so that a fleet moving up to the attack, must be exposed to a concentrated fire of 70 cannon, over a distance of two miles, before it can get into position to return a single shot. The castle of San Juan fronts the city at a distance of about 3-8ths of an mile, and is supported by a water-battery, at the north west angle of the town, of 50 32 and 42-pound guns - all of which, would poor their volleys on the squadron passing up, bows on, form the moment it arrived with range of the shot until its anchors were down, with springs upon the cables, within the reach for any promise of success and at what an immense sacrifice it would be accomplished, if at all. The garrison at this moment is composed of 2,000 men. In the event of an attack they would, with the most perfect safety, retire within the casemates (which are as impervious to shot as the sides of Mount Orizaba) until the ammunition of the assailing force was expended, when they would return to their guns and sweep the waters before them with the most terrific, destructive effect. The officer commanding the castle lately sent official word 'that if the commodore would bring his fleet up, he might fire until there was not a shot left in the locker, and he would promise him not to return a gun until he was done firing.'"

Cutter Forward, Captain Nones 6

Total Number of guns 354

The whole number of guns, according to the ratings of the ships enumerated, is 254 - which is less, however, than the actual number. This enumeration does not include several small vessels captured from the enemy and taken into service by Commodore Connor. The brig Washington (one gun), Lieutenant Commander Barron, will sail as soon as a crew can be obtained for her. The steamer Alleghany (10 guns), Lieutenant W.W. Hunter, is completing her equipment at Memphis, and will soon be ready for sea. 14 of the vessels named have been purchased by the department since the commencement of the war. - New York Tribune.

LT May 1, 1847 8f THE SIEGE OF VERA CRUZ

"Admiralty, April 28"

"Sir, I am commanded by my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to send you herewith, for the information of the committee for the managing the affairs of Lloyd's copies of a letter and its enclosures from Commander Matson, of Her containing a correspondence which had taken place between himself and Commodore Conner, commanding the United States' naval forces off Vera Cruz, respecting the embarkation of British property from that place.

"I am, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,"
"Mr. W. Debson, Lloyd’s.

J.G. WARD"

Copy No. 2.

"Her Majesty's sloop Daring, Vera Cruz, March 10.

"Sir, -I have the honour to enclose copies of a correspondence that I have had with Commodore Conner, commanding the United States' blockading forces, respecting the embarkation of British property from Vera Cruz, and also extracts from private notes which passed between us on that occasion.

"I have ordered the Hermes to remain at anchor off the town for the purpose of embarking such British persons, with their valuable property, as might be desirous of seeking refuge on board.

"On the receipt of the Commodore's letter, I directed her to receive cochinal and she has now on board all that was bona fide British Property.

"The Consul for the Hanosoatic towns requested to be permitted to take refuge with his family on board one of Her Majesty's vessels, and which request I immediately seceded to, and also that of the Prussian Consul, to receive the subjects of his nation and their families.

"There are now on board the Daring and Hermes about 50 persons, principally women and children, who fled from Vera Cruz on the approach of the United States' besieging forces.

"H. Matson, Commander and Senior Officer.
"The Commodore commanding Her Majesty's ships at Jamaica."

Copy.)

Extract from the Commander Matson's note to Commodore Conner, dated February 27, 1847:

"We all know that according to the strict laws of war there is no such thing as neutral property in an enemy's country, but this severe law has in this more enlightened age of civilization undergone modifications and there surely can be no two nations whose interest it more is to modify that law than America and England, whose enterprising merchants are to be found in every quarter of the globe.

"This induces me to think that you will not hesitate to comply with my request; the more so as I know your own personal desire to act on the most liberal principles with respect to foreigners."

Extract from Commodore Conner's note to Commander Matson, dated March 1, 1847:

"Some matters that required my immediate attention prevested my replying to your official note of the 27th ult. Besides my desire to oblige you in any matter of this sort, the eloquent manner in which the question has been urged by you would alone secure its favourable consideration. In the course of tomorrow or next day I will return answer to you official note."

(Copy.)

"H.B. Majesty' Sloop Daring, Vera Cruz. Feb. 27.

"Sir, In the expectation of an attack on the town of Vera Cruz by the United States' forces, I have receive applications from a number of British subjects for permission to embark their property on board of Her Majesty's vessels under my orders; but, as part of that property consists of merchandise, I have not felt myself justified in complying with their request without having obtained your sanction.

"I believe that the only article of merchandise for which permission is requested to embark, and which in fact is the only one that under the present circumstances could be received on board one of Her Majesty's ships, is a quantity of cochineal, which, although small in bulk, is very valuable, and which during the late blockade by the French was allowed to exported in the same manner as specie.

"Many British subjects are now desirous of removing from Vera Cruz, but they are, of course, both to leave their most valuable property behind them, which in a besieged town, would necessarily be very insecure; indeed, if taken by bombardment or assault, it would in all probability be destroyed. The rabble of a besieged town, such as Vera Cruz, would seek any opportunity for plunder, and might in reigners. If taken by assault, or after a protracted siege, no private property would be safe. History too truly verifies this assertion.

"In now appealing to you in behalf of some of my countrymen at this place, I do not ask you to alter permanently any of the regulations or instructions that you have established respecting the blockade. I only ask you to allow them to remove their valuables from Vera Cruz, to same them from destruction by flames or otherwise.

"I do not, Sir, expect you to inform me whether their apprehensions of an immediate attack on this place are, or not well founded; but looking to the extensive preparations that are being made in the U.S. to prosecute the war, it is surely not unreasonable for them to suppose that Vera Cruz will ere long have to withstand the horrors of a siege.

"Henry Matson,
"Commander and Senior Officer.

"Commodore Conner, Commander-in-Chief United States' squadron."

(Copy.)

"Her Majesty's ship Raritan, Anton Lizarde, March 4.

"Sir, I have received your letter of the 27th ult., in which you request, in anticipation of an assault upon Vera Cruz, permission for the British merchants in that city to withdraw, and place on board the vessels of war under you command their most valuable effects, with the view of preserving them from destruction.

"As my Government is desirous of mitigating to neutrals, as far as possible, in the present war, the evils necessarily incidental to a state of hostilities, and as the humane disposition on the part of my Government is entirely in accordance with my own feelings, i accede willingly to your proposition. You are, therefore, hereby authorized to receive on board the vessels of war under you command such portion of the valuable effects of the merchants and others of Vera Cruz to whom you may give refuge, as you may deem proper.

"I must, however, at the same time request that you will apply this permission to no one who is not a bona fide subject, and that you will in each case exact a reasonable degree of proof of the ownership of the property sought to be protected.

"D. CONNER,
"Commander of the United States' Squadron."

LT May 5, 1847 6b Anglo Mexican Mint Company

At the annual meeting of the Anglo-Mexican Mint Company held today, it appeared by the report, that whatever mischief the war with the United States may have done to Mexico, the mining industry of the country has not suffered. The company holds two mints in the interior, those of Guanaxuato and Zacatecas, and the amount coined at these is the year ending December 31, 1845, was $8,788,278 dollars; and in 1846, $9,027,881 dollars. A half yearly dividend was declared of 15s. per share.

Further papers from Perth, Western Australia, have arrived, and these extend to the 7th of January. They, however, furnish little additional intelligence to that which we previously communicated, except the subjoined important announcement by the Governor respecting the recent geographical and mineral discoveries made by Lieutenant Helpman and his party during their cruise in the Champion. At the date of these advices the Unicorn, from England, had got safely into port. Working bullocks were fetching 7l. to 10l.; milk cows, 6l. to 8l.; horses, 10l. to 30l.; and wheat, oats and barley, 7a. per bushel.

LT May 6, 1847 5d Military Apppointments

(From the Washington Union)

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS

The President, as will be perceived in the announcement in this day's paper, has filled the vacancies occasioned by the declination of General Benton and General Cumming to accept the command of Major Generals in the army of the United States, by appointment of Brigadier-Generals Pillow and Quitman of the volunteers now serving in Mexico. They have both had the advantage of the experience of near a year's active service in Mexico, and we learn are esteemed in the army as among the most valuable officers in the service. General Pillow has performed valuable services in the field, and was among the conspicuous officers of the army in the recent bombardment and siege of the city of Vera Cruz and Castle of San Juan d'Ulloa. He was selected by General Scott as one of the three officers under his command to adjust with the enemy the terms of surrender. General Quitman acted most gallantly at the battle of Monterey. There is a peculiar propriety in making promotions to these important commands from the volunteer service. The promotion of Colonel Cushing, who now commands a regiment of volunteers in Mexico, to be a brigadier-general of volunteers, is also well deserved. He is a man of distinguished talents, and has exhibited great patriotism in his late exertions to raise the Massachusetts regiment of volunteers. Thus the country will perceive that the administration is organizing the army to its full complement of officers. It is not enough to gain a victory- we must fully profit by it. No man will complain of the want of energy in the administration. The war will be prosecuted with the utmost vigour until the object has been accomplished, by securing as honorable peace.

LT May 6, 1847 5d CAPTURE OF VERA CRUZ AND ST. JEAN D'ULLOA.

We have received a copy of the New York Journal of Commerce of the 16th ult., which was furnished to our correspondent at Plymouth by a pilot, who obtained it from an American packet bound to Havre.

The following extracts from the Journal of Commerce leave no doubt as to the capture of Vera Cruz and the Castle of St. Jean d'Ulloa by the American force under General Scott, though in the absence of the intermediate papers between the 7th, the latest previous date, and the 16 ult., we are unable to furnish our readers with any details of the operations in question:

"AN AVALANCHE OF VICTORIES.

"On the 1st day of the present month we published the authentic intelligence of the battle of Buena Vista, in which General Taylor with 5,000 men defeated Santa Anna with 20,000. Since that date, we have announced the recapture of Los Angeles, which had risen against the new authorities in California, and the re-establishment of American rule throughout that territory. Also the defeat and dispersion of the insurgents in New Mexico. Also the unconditional surrender of Vera Cruz and the Castle of San Juan d'Ulloa, with 4,000 troops, to the American forces under General Scott. And, lastly, the capture of Chihuahua, capital of the state of the same name, by a force under Colonel Doniphan. Such a succession of victories (two of them most important) is something new in our annals, and it is to be hoped may load the Mexican Government, if there be such a Government, to treat for peace. If, however, it should begot in the minds of our people a thirst for military glory, it will prove to be the greatest calamity which ever befell us. Peace is our element, and without it we cannot expect permanent or long continued prosperity. If Mexico should now be inclined to negotiate, we trust our Government will do itself the honor to offer liberal terms, such as will show to the world that as this war came upon us unexpectedly, and contrary to our most ardent wishes, so it has been prosecuted, not for territorial aggrandizement, nor to depress a weaker Power, but because there has not been a moment since it broke out when Mexico would listen to propositions for peace, although overtures for that object have been repeatedly tendered."

LT May 7, 1847 5f CAPTURE OF VERA CRUZ

Official Dispatches from General Scott

Head quarters of the Army,
Camp, Washington, before Vera Cruz,
March 23, 1847.

Sir, Yesterday seven of our 10-inch mortars being in batteries, and the labors for planting the remainder of our heavy metal being in progress, I addressed, at 2 o'clock p.m., a summons to the Governor of Vera Cruz, and within the two hours limited by the bearer of the flag received the Governor's answer. Copies of the two papers (marked respectively A and B) are herewith enclosed.

It will be perceived that the Governor, who, it turns out, is the commander of both places, chose, against the plain terms of the summons, to suppose me to have demanded the surrender of the castle and of the city, when, in fact, from the non-arrival of our heavy metal, principally mortars, I was in no condition to threaten the former.

On the return of the flag, with that reply, I at once ordered the seven mortars on the battery to open upon the city. In a short time the smaller vessels of Commodore Perry's squadron-two steamers and five schooners, according to previous arrangement with him, approached the city within about a mile and an eighth, whence, being partly covered from the castle; an essential condition to their safety; they also opened a brisk fire upon the city. This has been continued uninterruptedly by the mortars, and only with a few intermissions by the vessels, up to 9 o'clock this morning, when the Commodore very properly called them off from a position too daringly assumed.

Our three remaining mortars are now in battery, and the whole ten in activity. Tomorrow, early, if the city should continue obstinate, batteries No. 4 and 5 will be ready to add their fire, No. 4 consisting of four 24 pounders and 2 8-inch Paixhans guns, and No.5, of three 32 pounders and three 8 inch Paixhans; the guns, officers, and sailors landed from the squadron; our friends of the navy being unremitting in their zealous cooperation in every mode and form.

So far, we know that our fire upon the city has been highly effective, particularly from the batteries of 10 inch mortars, planted at about 800 yard from the city. Including the preparations and defense of the batteries, from the beginning, now many days, and notwithstanding the heavy fire of the enemy, from the city and castle, we have only had four of five men wounded, and one officer and one man killed, in or near the trenches. That officer was Captain J.R. Vinton, of the United States 3rd Artillery, one of the most gifted, accomplished, and effective members of the army, and who was highly distinguished in brilliant operations of Monterey. He fell last evening in the trenches, where he was on duty as field and commanding officer, universally regretted. I have just attended his honored remains to a soldier's grave, in full view of the enemy and with reach of his guns.

Thirteen of the long needed mortars, leaving 27, besides heavy guns, behind, have arrived, and two of them are landed. A heavy northern then set in, that stopped that operation, and also landing of shells. Hence the fire of our mortar batteries has been slackened since 2 o'clock today, and cannot be reinvigorated today until we have a smooth sea. In the meantime I shall leave this report open, for journalizing events that may occur up to the departure of the steam ship of war Princeton, with Commander Conner, who, I learn, expects to leave the anchorage off Sacrificios, for the United States, the 25th inst.

March 21- The storm having subsided in the night, we commenced this forenoon, as soon as the sea became a little smooth, to land shot, shells, and mortars.

The naval battery No. 5 was opened with great activity, under Captain Aulick, the second in rank of the squadron, at about 10 a.m. His fire was continued to 2 o'clock p.m.; a little before he was relieved by Captain Mayo, who landed with a fresh supply of ammunition, Captain Aulick having exhausted the supply he brought with him. He lost four sailors, killed, and had one officer, Lieutenant Baldwin, slightly hurt.
The mortar batteries Nos. 1, 2, and 3, have fired but languidly during the day for want of shells, which are now going cut from the beach.

The two reports of Colonel Bankhead, Chief of Artillery, both of this date, copies of which I enclose, give the incidents of those three batteries.

March 25.- The Princeton being about to start for Philadelphia, I have but a moment to continue this report.

All the batteries, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, are in awful activity this morning. The effect is, no doubt, very great, and I think the city cannot hold out beyond today. Tomorrow morning many of the new mortars will be in a position to add their fire, when, or after the delay of some twelve shall organize parties from carrying the city by assault. So far the defense has been spirited and obstinate.

I enclose a copy of a memorial received last night, signed by the consuls of Great Britain, France, Spain, and Prussia, within Vera Cruz, asking me to grant a truce to enable the neutrals, together with Mexican women and children, to withdraw from the scene of havoc about them. I shall reply, the moment that an opportunity may be taken, to say- 1. That a truce can only be granted on the application of Governor Morales, with a view to surrender. 2. That in sending safeguards to the different consuls, beginning as far back as the 13th inst., I distinctly admonish them; particularly the French and Spanish consuls; and of course, through the two, the other consuls, of the dangers that have followed. 3. That although at that date I had already refused to allow any person whatsoever to pass the line of investment either way, yet the blockade had been left open to the consuls and other neutrals to pass out to their respective ships of war up to the 22nd inst.; and , 4th, I shall enclose to the memorialists a copy of any summons to the Governor, to show that I had fully considered the impending hardships and distresses of the place, including those of women and children, before one gun had been fired in that direction. The intercourse between the neutral ships of war and the city was stopped at the last mentioned date by Commodore Perry, with my concurrence, which I placed on the ground that the intercourse could not fail to give to the enemy moral aid and comfort.

It will be seen from the memorial, that our batteries have already had a terrible effect on the city and hence the inference that a surrender must soon be proposed. In haste,

I have the honor to remain, Sir, with respect,

Your most obedient servant, WINFIELD SCOTT.

Hon. W.L. Marcy, Secretary at War.

LT May 8, 1847 6c US war against Mexico

By the packet ship Yorkshire, Captain Bailey, we have advices from New York to the 17th ult. inclusive.

The intelligence from the seat of is interesting. General Taylor was still in pursuit of Urrea.

The Mexican papers are full of details of the fighting, robberies, and murders committed in the capital by the opposing armies and the banditti. In fact, that beautiful city was literally converted into a battle field. Streets were barricaded by the belligerents, whose deadly fire rakes the principal thoroughfares, and killed many of the offending inhabitants and even women. Dwelling were plundered and stores robbed. Well dressed citizens were waylaid in open day, robbed of their watches and jewelry, and in many instances murdered by the lawless soldiers and banditti scouring the streets. For several days anarchy reigned supreme throughout the devoted city. All law was at an end, and 160, 000 persons were exposed to the brutal passions of the infuriated mob of soldiers and robbers. The robbers on the principal mail routes had poured into the city of Mexico in thousands, many no doubt to share in the excesses of the revolution, but more probably to escape from the American forces, who were expected to proceed by the Jalapa road.
Santa Anna was at Cedral when he heard of then revolutionary attempting the city of Mexico. He wrote thence on the third of March, avowing his opposition to the attempt, and then pushed into Matahuala. He wrote thence, on the 6th ult., to the Secretary at War, announcing that he would march on the capital with a large division of his forces, and put down the revolution.

The entrance of Santa Anna into San Luis Potosi, on the 8th ult., was a triumphal one. All classes went out to meet him two or three miles on the road. At night he was serenaded and the town illuminated.

The following day he wrote a dispatch to the Secretary of War, announcing that two brigades of infantry, composed of 4,000 men, with their corresponding batteries, were on their march to San Luis, and they were to be followed by two others of all arms, to the aid of the supreme powers of the nation traitorously attacked. This letter would lead one to suppose conclusively that he intended to put down the attempt against Gomez Farias's administration. He denounces in unqualified terms the attempt at a revolution at such a time.

But the day after, March 10, he wrote two other letters to Mexico; one to General Barragan, the head of the revolutionary party, the other to Gomez Farias. In these his tome is altered. He denounces civil dissension's, but is considerate in seeking terms of courtesy towards Barragan and Farias. He conjures them to desist from further hostilities in the capital, and announces his purpose of proceeding thither immediately. He tells Barragan not to fear for himself or others compromised by the revolutionary attempt; that he has but one desire, to unite all Mexicans. There followed from these letters, which were published on the 13th or 14th, a suspension of hostilities, though each party accused the other of violating the truce. Santa Anna had not arrived on the 17th, but would encounter no difficulty in assuming power. All parties were waiting for him impatiently, and each claiming that he will side with them. Representations had been made to him in abundance, and large delegations of influential men had gone on towards San Luis to meet and propitiate him.

It was reported that Santa Anna had arrived at the capital on the 19th of March, and was in full possession of power.

The New Orleans Whig journals mention General Taylor as a candidate for the Presidency.

The President has appointed two new major-generals; Generals Quitman and Pillow, of Mississippi and Tennessee respectively.

Mr. Pakenham, the English Minister at Washington, is, according to the Baltimore journals, about to return to England.

During the bombardment of Vera Cruz, the United States' army used the following number of shot:

Army Battery
- 3,000 ten-inch shells 90 lb. each
- 500 round shot 25 lb.
- 200 eight-inch howitzer shells 68 lb.

General Patterson's Navy Battery
- 1,000 Paizhan shot 68 lb.
- 800 round shot 32 lb.

Musquito Fleet, Captain Tatnall
- 1,200 shot and shell, averaging 62 lb.

Making in all 6,700 shot and shell, weighing 403,590 lb.

The destruction in the city is said to be most awful, one half of it is reported to be destroyed. Houses are blown to pieces and furniture scattered in every direction, the streets torn up, and the strongest buildings seriously damaged.

LT May 10, 1847 4c Capture of Vera Cruz
We have seldom had occasion to record an operation of war more revolting to every feeling of humanity and justice than the bombardment and capture of the city and castle of Vera Cruz by the American forces. In itself, indeed, the conquest of the strongest fortified position on the Mexican coast is the most important exploit of the campaign, and probably the most considerable enterprise ever attempted by the troops of the United States. But when we call to mind unprincipled aggression in which the war originated, and the purposes for which it has been carried on, the more signal these achievements are, the more sinister is the light they cast on the policy of the American Government. The luster of the arms of the United States is tarnished by the infamy of such a contest against an unoffending and impotent enemy; and the horrors of war, which can only be atoned for by a noble cause and a heroic bravery, have in this instance been aggravated by the detestable policy which sent forth the invading army, and by the miserable weakness of those against whom its prowess was directed. The American dispatches relate, with an air of unconscious simplicity, one of the most atrocious and barbarous acts committed in modern times by the forces of a civilized nation. The mode adopted by General Scott in conducting the siege was characteristic of the fierce and destructive spirit of a volunteer and unpracticed army. No attempt is made to disguise the fact, that the means taken by that officer to force the citadel of St. Juan d'Ulloa to surrender was the destruction of the city of Vera Cruz. Nearly 7,000 projectiles were thrown into this devoted town during the three days and a half that the bombardment lasted. One half of the buildings are said to be destroyed. In fact, the attack appears to have been exclusively directed on the city, in preference to the castle, for General Scott expressly states, that the heavy pieces of ordnance on which he relied for the reduction of the principal forts were not landed when the city was invested; and that he was surprised to find that the capitulation of the town and of the citadel was simultaneous. The thing itself is so extraordinary, and so contrary to all the usage's of modern war, unless under circumstances of peculiar necessity, that we could not have believed it on any lower authority than that of the officer in command. As for the Castle of St. Juan d'Ulloa, it is one of those places into which a hostile force would find it difficult to make its way, if there were not a garrison to open the gates of it, and a governor to sign a capitulation. It evidently surrendered to mere intimidation or corruption, or possibly to the desire of saving the city from total annihilation. The application of the foreign Consuls on the 24th of March for a truce to enable themselves and the subjects of the European Powers, together with Mexican women and children, to leave the city, was refused by General Scott. Probably when those gentlemen resolved to remain at their posts at the commencement of the siege, they did not anticipate that the city was to be the principal mark of the American batteries; or they might have consulted their own safety by retiring to those strong fortifications of the Castle, against which the enemy's artillery was not directed, or on which, at least, it made no impression.

The whole operation lasted 20 days from the disembarkation of the troops on the 9th of March to the evacuation of the city and castle by the Mexicans on the 29th. The negotiation for its capitulation began on the 26th. During the sixteen days of active hostilities there were five days of violent "northers," those hurricanes of the coast of Mexico which effectually interrupt all communication by sea, and must have placed the squadron in considerable peril. For two days and nights the wind was so violent, and the drifting sand so damaging, that it was almost impossible to clear the trenches or to man the batteries. Yet, in spite of all these untoward circumstances, we are informed that in the course of the whole series of operations, including the landing of 13,000 men and the storm of shot and shell from the works of the town and of St. Juan d'Ulloa, the combined forces of the United States lost but 17 men killed, or in all 65 killed and wounded.

On the side of the Mexicans the less of life and property is reported to have been frightful and that unhappy country seems to be a prey to the accumulated horrors of anarchy and war, of cowardice and corruption, of foreign violence and domestic pillage. In the city of Mexico itself all order and law are at an end. The Government is extinct' the army defeated and dissolved. If a nation could suddenly expire, this would be the supreme hour of the Mexican people; as it is, the horrors in flicted on the aboriginal inhabitants of the country by their Spanish conquerors have been faithfully revenged upon the abject descendants of these conquerors by a race of men animated by equal passions and armed with equal superiority. The standard of the Spanish race in Mexico has been trampled on as brutally and fiercely as the ensigns of the ingenious and unfortunate people which preceded them in the occupation of that magnificent region. The compassion which these calamities naturally excite in our minds is, indeed, considerably mitigated by the irresistible contempt the world must entertain for a people which has shown itself to be so thoroughly incapable of the first duties of existence, of government, and of self-defense. On both side the spectacle we have before our eyes is the opprobrium of the age which has been so disgrace to the people of the New World, who professed to have planted their institutions on a higher basis than the lust of bloodshed and aggrandizement which have so often devastated the elder continent.
The sanguinary spoliation which incites the armies of the United States is as degrading to the mankind as the poltroonery of their victims, for we cannot call them antagonists; and whilst we should blush to applaud the military triumphs of the United States, we can hardly deign to pity the woeful discomfiture of an emasculated people.

It is, however, as certain as the lessons of history and the justice of Providence can make it, that these great acts of political wrong lead straight to their own chastisement, and that every hour of success in this fatal war will be expiated by years of trouble and embarrassment to the aggressors. The annexation of Texas, the rapacious seizure of the province of a neighboring state which had long been plotted at Washington, was consummated by Mr. Tyler in the last hours of his pitable administration. The act was consummated, but its consequences only began. It has already cost the American people the revenue of years. Even now there is no reasonable prospect of terminating the war by a sound or stable peace, and the American armies may yet be decimated by disease on the coast or by the banditti of the interior. But grant they are successful. They coveted a province, and the entire mass of a territory and a population which they can neither govern nor abandon falls with all its responsibility upon their heads. Henceforward the influence of the late United States will be continually involved, or rather entangled, in the anarchy of her sister republic. A foreign dependency, incapable of self-government, yet detesting this northern rulers, will, under one form or another, be connected with the Union; for whatever Government it may be possible to re-establish in Mexico will only exist in servile fear of Anglo-American ascendancy. Nor will these consequences be confined to Mexico itself. The course of these events has materially affected the disposition of the American people. Their easy triumphs have inflated to the last degree their estimate of the military and naval power of their country. Military popularity will place one of the heroes of this war in the Presidential chair at the next election; and as the passions which are most fatal to the peace and welfare of mankind appear to extend their baneful influence over the mass of the democracy of the United States, we do not question but they will eventually impair the political institutions of the country whose political morality they have already extinguished.

LT May 10, 1847 6a STATE OF MEXICO

The revolution which was proclaimed here by the National Guard on the 27th of February had, in the first instance, very extensive objects. They demanded a new Congress and fresh elections of president and vice-president; Gomez Farias, who held the latter office, to be immediately removed, and the executive power to be confided provisionally to Senor Pena y Pena. Towards Santa Anna the dislike of a Moderado party, who attempted the revolution, is quite as great as to Gomez Farias, Dan their fears much greater, but they considered him to be engaged in a hopeless expedition against the Americans in Saltillo, from which he might possibly never return, and they therefore treated his claim to the Presidency with little ceremony, leaving him simply the title of Commander-in-Chief of the army. Santa Anna's ingenuity in converting his repulse at the Angostura into a victory soon convinced the Pronunciados, however, that he was not to be thus easily disposed of, and, as the Congress showed no disposition to dissolve itself at their bidding, while the regular troops under Rangel remained faithful to the Government, they found it prudent to lower their tone and, remodeling their plan, announced as its sole object the deposition Gomez Farias. Santa Anna, on his march to San Luis Potosi (to which place he found necessary to retreat after the battle of Angostura), received intelligence of these disturbances, and fully comprehending their tendency as affecting himself, wrote in the strongest terms to Gomez Farias, exhorting him to hold out until troops, which Santa Anna promised to dispatch immediately to his assistance, should arrive here. He protested further, that if the insurgents were not punished in the most exemplary manner, he would himself leave the country, considering it no longer habitable if the laws could be violated with impunity. There is something ludicrous in this language from a man whose whole life has been a series of insurrections, and the Pronunciados, estimation to at its proper worth, lost not time in communicating to him their modified plan, backed by those arguments to which he is known to be most open. The effect was immediately perceptible in a fresh series of communications from him, to the Government in cool, and to the Pronunciados in very friendly, terms. Complying with the intention of Congress, he announced his intention to assume the Presidency, by which the obnoxious individual (Gomez Farias) would be legally got rid of, and directed that hostilities should cease until his arrival. Many and anxious were the deliberations of Gomez Farias, and his party the ultra democrats, or, as they are now termed Puros, on the receipt of this unexpected intelligence; but they had no alternative but submission, as their military supporters acknowledged no orders except Santa Anna's. The young gentlemen of the National Guard, called by the mob "Polkas" (with reference to a well known dance, not to the President of the United States), on the other hand, were highly elated. Both parties maintained their position, and though the streets continued barricaded, dan business of every kind suspended, the firing ceased until Santa Anna arrived at Guadeloupe on the 22nd ult., and, having taken the oath as President before a committee deputed by Congress to wait on him, made his entry into this city and established himself at the Palace as the head of the Government. Thus the dissensions of Moderados and Puro (the Conservatives and Radicals of Mexico) have terminated for the present in the elevation of an individual towards whom both parties entertain feelings of dislike and distrust; dan it is one great proof of Santa Anna's superior energy that, in spite of those feelings, his presence seldom fails to produce submission. The clergy, whose money dan influence contributed largely to the recent change, have obtained from Santa Anna the repeal of the late law for the sale of church property. The church must, however, suffer. Santa Anna has obtained from Congress authority to raise 20,000,000 dollars, and from no other source than the ecclesiastical coffers can any efficient aid be obtained. Forced loans are prescribed as dangerous and inefficacious; taxes are slow in operation, and tend to exasperate the classes on whom the pressure of the war chiefly falls; Mexican credit in foreign countries is a jest. The clergy must, therefore, consent to sacrifice a portion of their property; and, this conceded, the question becomes merely an arithmetical one, Santa Anna endeavoring to extract as much, and the reverend body to give as little as possible. Changes of Ministry have become so common here, as to be scarcely worth recording. Latterly, Gomez Farias could find no one to accept those appointments, and was obliged to dispense with the assistance of a Cabinet.
Santa Anna has, however, succeeded in forming a Ministry of rather a respectable character. The War Department is given to General Ignacio Gutierrez, that of Foreign Affairs to Senor Barans, Justice to Senor Suarez Iriarte (a remnant of the Puros party), and Finance to Don Juan Rondero. The last appointment is the only one which will excite any interest in England. In peaceable times I should consider it favorable to the bondholders. Senor Rondero has never before been in office, but few men here are more deeply versed in the abstruse mysteries of Mexican finance.
Originally a military man, he retains few traces of that profession, and has long been closely connected with the monied interest, which he may be considered as representing in the present Cabinet. For a Mexican, he is unusually sensitive on the subject of credit, and on the whole I do not think Santa Anna could have made a better selection.

A note of woe is heard from Vera Cruz. That city, styled "the heroic," as well as the strong castle of San Juan de Ulloa, are said to have fallen into the hands of the Americans, after a few days' bombardment by General Scott arrived late in the season on the coast. The deadly scourge of the vomito appears generally in the present month; and he has now not a moment to lose in pushing his way to Jalapa, which he will perhaps not do without opposition. Peurto Nacional and Plan del Rio have to be passed, and both present natural obstacles to the march of an army. The former has some fortifications, which have been thought impregnable by the Mexicans, but fatal experience has shown that they are not likely to prove so to the Americans. Attacking or attacked, the Mexicans seem fated to be defeated. The battle of the Angostura was fought chiefly by American volunteers, who are described in a letter from Saltillo as a most undisciplined rabble; yet Santa Anna, at the head of his chosen troops, much more than double their number, was compelled to retreat before them. Already some indication of what is likely to occur have been shown at Santa Fe, near Vera Cruz, where General Romulo de la Vaya attempted immediately abandoned by his troops. This officer has acquired an inconvenient sort of reputation by his conduct at Resaca de Guerrero, where he allowed himself to be made a prisoner, instead of running away, like the rest, for which Congress voted him a gold medal, and the most extravagant expectations are entertained of his future exploits. Santa Anna has obtained permission from Congress to resume the command of the army, and now goes to undertake the most dangerous of his campaigns. Of the 25,000 men assembled at San Luis Potosi previous to the battle of the Angostura, probably not more than half are now in the ranks, and a part of those must be left to garrison San Luis. With national guards, militia, and volunteers.
Santa Anna may be able to oppose about 15,000 men to General Scott, in the neighborhood of Jalapa. Not withstanding the dislike Mexicans entertain towards all foreigners, and the tenacity with which every offer of peace from the Americans has been rejected, there is little show of warlike enthusiasm here. Every Mexican, indeed, asserts that the war must be continued; but few are inclined to take any personal share in the contest, and still fewer contribute to its expenses. A party, too, exists who desire the subjugation of the country, not from any love to a foreign yoke, but from disgust at their own internal dissension's, dan a conviction of the impossibility of their establishing a permanent government amongst themselves.
This party, under the mask of patriotism, will continue to augment the obstacles to peace, in order that the Americans may be forced to convert their invasion into a conquest. In the northern provinces the war has already taken the latter form. The capital of the state of Chihuahua has been occupied by 800 Americans. They were met by at least 3,000 Mexicans, who abandoned the field on receiving one volley of artillery. This little band of adventurers is now threatening the populous capital of Durango. A strong American squadron has arrived at Acapulco, and there can be no doubt that all the Mexican ports on the Pacific will fall, like those on the Atlantic, into the hands of the United States.

Santa Anna has been authorized by Congress to name a Deputy President during his absence, in order to exclude Gomez Farias from a return to power.

LT May 12, 1847 5c AMERICA AND MEXICO

The Zurich sailing-packet, Captain Thompson, arrived off Havre on Sunday, the 9th inst., with news from New York up to the 21st ult- the day on which she left that port.

The first in order of importance of the intelligence by this arrival is the conditions of peace submitted to the Mexicans by M. Atocha on the part of the American Government, but which, as will be seen by our Mexican correspondence, were summarily rejected.

These conditions, which first appeared in the journal of Guadalaxara, as a letter from M. Atocha to Gomez Farias and to Rejon, were afterwards copied into the Diario del Gobierno, a Mexican official journal, and reproduced by the journals of New York.

They are as follow:

"A commission shall be named to state the conditions. That commission shall be composed of Messrs. Benton and Buchanan, of a member of American Congress (belonging to the Opposition), and of two Mexican Commissioners. The commission shall assemble in a place to be pointed out by the Mexican Government.

"The United States demand the 26th degree of latitude, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific, as line of division.

"The United States will pay $15,000,000 for the territory so occupied, engaging themselves solemnly not to make any formal demand for the expenses of the war. These expenses are estimated at $13,000,000 and the United States consequently consider that they pay $28,000,000 for the territory in question.

"The United States guarantee that they will never give their consent for any territory of Mexico or Mexican state, to be annexed to the American Union; and they will equally guarantee the sovereignty of Mexico, more particularly that part of the country that is situated to the south of the 26th degree parallel.

"The United States will place 10,000 men, infantry and cavalry, on the frontier line, to prevent contraband and incursions from the Indians.

"The United States engage themselves to set aside all differences relative to their former demands, for ceded territory, foreign debt, etc.

"A alliance, offensive and defensive, shall be signed between the United States and Mexico, for the purpose of repelling all European intervention in the affairs of America.

"M. Atocha is authorized by the United States Government to agree to conditions of a treaty of peace."

The France Americaine, a French journal published in New York, under the date of the 21st ult., says, in reference to these conditions,-

"Such are, according to the journal of Guadalaxara, the terms laid down by M. Atocha, in a letter written to Gomez Farias and to Rejan. Two months ago the Mexican press would have refused such an insertion, or at least would have accompanied it by the most furious declamations; now the Diario del Gobierno reproduces it without commentary. Through these changes se see assuredly pacific symptoms. If the bases laid down in the communication made by M. Atocha are adopted by the Mexican Government, the line of division formed by the 26th degree of parallel will cut the Rio Grande almost at its mouth, leaving Point Isabella, Palo-Alto, Resalca de la Palma to the north, and Matameras to the south. Monterey, the pass of the Rinconada, and Saltillo, the field of battle of Buena Vista, would also be comprised within the Mexican limits, but the United States would acquire the superior part of Tamaulipas, and of Nuevo Leon, of Cohahuila, of Durango, and of Sinaloa, with the whole of Upper California, the Sonora and Lower California as far as Cape St. Domingo. Letters from Mexico received by several of our American confreres, announce an early consent to the renewal of negotiations; they affirm also that the victorious army of General Scott could not have reached Jalapa in its march on the capital before the propositions of arrangement were made by Santa Anna. If this be the case, peace is already concluded. The greatest difficulty, as we have said before, exists, not in the solution of territorial questions or indemnities between two countries, but in the prejudicial question of national amour propre, which, hitherto, has destroyed all attempts of pacification. This powerful obstacle once removed, all parties have too much interest in a cessation of hostilities not to make mutual sacrifices to bring about an honorable transaction. At present Mexico has a regular legal administration which may be treated with; but, unhappily, things change so rapidly in this country of revolutions, that we fear tranquility cannot last long; already even the overthrow of Santa Anna is spoken of. A letter Quartermaster Montgomery, written from Monterey to Camargo, reports that General Arista, irritated at the disgrace put upon him by Santa Anna, and, above all, hurt at the different treatment which General Ampudia is the object, has raised 7,000 men, and will march from Zacatecas on the city of Mexico, determined to overthrow the power of Santa Anna and to reinstall Herrera. Santa Anna, at the head of the remainder of his forces, has even marched to meet Arista. We know not what credit this important news merits, but for the interest of the country wish it to be inexact. Santa Anna wishes to finish; the present situation is favorable; a change would be dangerous. It is true that Herrera, Arista's candidate, has formally announced himself in favor of a cessation of hostilities, but a conflict would bring new complications, the least dangerous result of which would be useless and regrettable delays."

The same journal of the 21st ult. states that the Louisville, arrived at New Orleans on the 12th ult., brought recent news from Vera Cruz. The results of expedition to Alvarado was not known on the 2nd of April. There were rumors that General Quitman had met with opposition in his route, but they were not considered to have any foundation in truth. Colonel Hardney, of the 2nd Dragoons, left Vera Cruz on the 2nd of April, to take possession of Antigua, a town about eight miles northward. General Scott was to commence his march in a few days for Puente Nacional, he awaited only sufficient means of transport; he had seized upon all the roads right and left of the city, to insure to himself a free passage for provisions for his forces. General Worth is actively engaged in repressing disorders, and taking measures of police necessary under the circumstances in which the American troops are place. On the 1st of April General Scott issued an order inveighing much against the excesses committed by some soldiers, and calling on officers and soldiers to him in detecting those who so disgrace the American arms. Soldiers are confined to camp unless they have a written permission from their officers.

LT May 12, 1847 6b THE AFFAIRS OF MEXICO

We have receive from our correspondent in the city of Mexico the following letter, which, although somewhat overdue, is of much interest, as containing a history of the events in Mexico during the campaign of Santa Anna against General Taylor, of which we had previously no account:-

MEXICO, March 1.

The steamer (supposed Tweed) which left Havannah for Vera Cruz on the 9th of February has not arrived, and the most serious apprehensions for her safety are entertained here, particularly as she is known to have had on board no fewer than 80 passengers, many of them from Vera Cruz and this city, who had visited Havannah in consequence of the mercantile difficulties occasioned by the blockade. If she was so unfortunate as to get on the Colorado reef on the night of her departure, when it blew a gale from the north, her fate is probably sealed. Under these circumstances Mr. Bankhead has decided on dispatching an extra mail to Havannah by Her Majesty's steamer Hermes. I avil myself of this occasion to report another of those tumultuous scenes which have become so disgracefully common in the capital of ill-fated Mexico. The law for the appropriation of church property, so perseveringly carried by Gomez Farias, met with a strong opposition in several of the states. In Oaxaca it occasioned an insurrection, in which the troops were defeated by the people, and the authorities, who attempted to enforce the law, deposed. Even
About a fortnight since Senor Atocha, by birth a Spaniard, and by naturalization a citizen of the United States, arrived with dispatches from the Washington, which he was directed to deliver to this Government in person. The Vice-President, after receiving his dispatches, obliged him to leave the city immediately, under military escort, for an estate near Puebla, where he was detained some days. The substance of these communications has not been made public, and it is from rumor only I have learned that they contained proposals which would strip Mexico at once of half her territory, and reduce the remainder to a condition of permanent tutelage under the United States. If the report be well founded, it is not surprising that this Government, even in their present deplorable state, returned, as they are said to have done, a decided negative.

About the same time, the former Confederate general, A. J. Smith, arrived at this place with a large body of armed volunteers, with a view to the suppression of the revolutionary movement in Mexico, and the establishment of a government friendly to the United States. He was accompanied by a large number of American settlers, who had fled from the territory under the old government, and who were determined to establish a new state on the principles of the American Constitution. Smith was received with great enthusiasm by the inhabitants of the city, and was given a triumphal reception by the Mexican authorities. He was intended to act as a sort of protector, or as a military governor, and to exercise supreme authority in all the affairs of the state.

A report has reached this city of the capture of the village of Agua Nueva, eight leagues on this side of Saltillo. This village is situated on a mountain pass, naturally strong, and has been occupied for some time by a small detachment of American troops, who were there for the purpose of preventing the entrance of Mexican troops into the United States. The capture of Agua Nueva is said to have been effected by a force of American troops, who were marching toward Tampico, and who were directed to deliver to this Government in person. The Vice-President, after receiving his dispatches, obliged him to leave the city immediately, under military escort, for an estate near Puebla, where he was detained some days. The substance of these communications has not been made public, and it is from rumor only I have learned that they contained proposals which would strip Mexico at once of half her territory, and reduce the remainder to a condition of permanent tutelage under the United States. If the report be well founded, it is not surprising that this Government, even in their present deplorable state, returned, as they are said to have done, a decided negative.
Late intelligence from Tampico and Tuxpan announced most extensive preparations by the Americans at the "Isla de Lobos" to attack the city and castle of Vera Cruz. The approach of the warm and sickly season leaves them no time to lose in that operation. After the reduction of Vera Cruz they will doubtless push on to Jalapa, and at present there is no force between that place and this capable of seriously resisting their progress. The American forces, which are now closing round Mexico with hydra folds, are also expected to occupy immediately the port of Mazatlan, on the Pacific; and a body of 1,000 men has already marched from Paso del Norte against the capital of Chihuahua.

A few days before the present disturbances commenced, Gomez Farias rented the Mint of this city to a private company for the sum of $174,000 cash down, for a term of ten years. The arrangement, which was sharply contested at public auction, is favorable to the Government, who, through mismanagement and peculation, never gained anything by the Mint, and to the public, who have now a guarantee, which they did not before possess, for the security of their funds in that establishment. By a clause in the agreement the contractors are bound to pay for silver in five, and for gold in eight days after introduction at the Mint. A large part of the sum raised in this way was remitted to Santa Anna, but the Vice-President wisely retained a few thousand dollars, and on such trifles does the existence of Governments in Mexico depend, that without this paltry resource he would probably already have been driven from office.

LT May 12, 1847  6e TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES

Sir, I am persuaded you would not do an act of injustice intentionally, and, therefore, that you article of yesterday, on the capture of Vera Cruz, would have been tempered in respect to General Scott, had all his dispatches been before you.

You observe that "the means taken by General Scott to forces the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa to surrender was the destruction of the city of Vera Cruz." and that "the application of the foreign Consuls on the 24th of March for a truce to enable them and the subjects of European powers, together with the Mexican women and children, to leave the city was refused by General Scott."

Now, in respect to the first, so far from the destruction of the city being used as a means to compel the castle to surrender, General Scott, in his summons to the Governor to surrender the city, distinctly excluded the Castle, and even stipulated that "in the event of the surrender of the former he would solemnly engage that not a gun should be fired upon the castle from the city unless the city was first fired upon by the castle."

In respect to the second remark, General Scott, so early as the 13th, sent "safeguards" to all the foreign Consuls, to be used in case they remained in the city, but earnestly intreated them, as well as the Mexican women and children, to leave the city; and, although it was completely invested on all sides, the Consuls and their families had free intercourse with the ships of their respective nations up to the 23rd, and up to that time both they and the Mexican women and children had free permission from General Scott to depart. It does not appear even that he refused the application of the 24th, for he states in his official dispatch that the moment he could reply to it he should state that "a truce could only be granted on the application of Governor with a view to surrender," which application immediately after put a stop to further hostilities.

Whether courtesy in warfare required General Scott to reduce the stronger place first and not to summon or attack the weaker, although that weaker was playing upon his army with its 100 guns, and also affording succour to the stronger, I will leave for military men to determine.

It should be recollected that a general is required to be humane to his own troops as well as to the enemy, that delay would have exposed General Scott's army to "deadly scourge of the vomito," and that he accomplished this arduous and brilliant undertaking with the loss of but 25 men.

With magnanimous moderation General Scott, from the moment of his arrival until his cannon were landed and in position, an interval of many days, forbore from all partial attacks to avoid unnecessary wasted of life; and, although fired upon daily and nightly by the fort and city, did not return then fire until his means made victory certain, and of which he duly admonished the enemy. General Scott is by no means answerable for the justice of the war; with that he has nothing to do; he is under command, and has to perform the duties of a soldier; but that his character is conspicuous both for gallantry and humanity hundreds of British officers will testify.

Whether firing upon a city, even when strongly fortified, be justifiable, it is not my province to determine; but I will just call to your mind the fact that the first broadside from Lord Exmouth's squadron at Algeirs destroyed a greater number of unoffending, unarmed people, than the bombardment of Vera Cruz.

I am, Sir, your very obedient servant

                  A FRIEND TO GENERAL SCOTT AND AN ENEMY TO WAR.

EXPRESS FROM LIVERPOOL

THE TIMES OFFICE, Saturday Morning.

LIVERPOOL, Friday.

By and extra of the New York journals we have important advices from Mexico.

VERA CRUZ, April 13

An express has come down from General Twiggs to the effect that Santa Anna was before him at Cerro Gordo, with 15,000 men, as near as could be judged from a reconnaissance made by Captain Hardy and other officers of dragoons. Lieutenant-Colonel J. E. Johnson had been severely but not mortally wounded while examining Santa Anna's works, which appeared to be a succession of breastworks, on an eminence in the vicinity of Cerro Gordo. Everything would go to show that Santa Anna is determined to make a bold stand. A dragoon, who had been sent down expressly by General Twiggs, was yesterday found shot by the road side, just beyond this, his papers had not been touched. The Mexicans are playing a bloody and at the same time a bolder game than is usual for them, as it is thought they have killed no less than 50 of our men within the last three days on the road.

Major - General Patterson left here with two brigades of volunteers on Friday, and he has no doubt reached the advance before this hour. General Twiggs had between 2,500 and 2,700 men under his command, and I entertain little fear for his safety.

General Patterson marched with Shield's and Pillow's brigades, and all the force except the garrisons of the towns; and Quitman's brigades are either at the scene of action or on the road to it.

An intelligent Mexican told me tonight that there would be no fight, and that Santa Anna had with him four prominent members of the National Congress, with the aid of whom he hoped to negotiate a peace.

LT May 15, 1847 5e US war with Mexico

By advices from Vera Cruz we learn that the whole of the United States forces, under the command of General Scott, were advancing on Mexico. Although the opinion was quite current at Vera Cruz that the Mexicans would not make a stand between that city and the capital, yet there were some who regarded future collisions as certain.

Intelligence had reached Vera Cruz that the Puenta Nacional had been abandoned. This was the point at which, it was expected, the first resistance to the march of the American forces upon the city of Mexico would be made; but though the defense of this point was given up, it was not certain that the progress of the invading army into the interior would not be disputed at others. Indeed, it was asserted that the forces destined to defend the National Bridge (Puente Nacional) had fallen back a few leagues in the direction of Jalapa to a stronger position, where preparations were being made for a stout defense.

Rumors from Vera Cruz, which are, however, contradicted, state that over 2,000 of the United States troops had been attacked by yellow fever and dysentery. It was proposed to turn the Castle of San Juan d'Ulloa into a receptacle for the sick.

General Taylor was at Walnut Springs, four miles from Monterey. General Wool, with about 6,000 troops, was at Buena Vista. It was rumored that the Mexican General Urrea was at Linares with 2,000 and a corps of artillery.

 Commodore Perry had left Vera Cruz with fleet for the purpose of capturing every Mexican port in the Gulf. Several had already been taken, one south of Alvarado, a fine one, called Tlacotalpal, possessed of nobly sheltered harbors.

The capture of Alvarado without opposition is confirmed.

The New Orleans papers contain news from Mexico to the effect that "rumors from the city of Mexico represented Santa Anna as more intently bent upon war than ever." The reports are not the best authority, in so far as the wishes of Santa Anna are concerned; but they indicate the temper of the public mind, which is as good an index of his purposes as any other.

The adherents of Gomez Farias and of the priests in Mexico had had an engagement, in which the former were completely routed; the latter were aided by Santa Anna.

Other accounts state that Santa Anna was advancing from the capital towards Jalapa, breathing vengeance and refusing pacification.

Our Canadian advices announce that the Parliament had been convened to meet on the 2nd of June.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Consulate of the Republic of Mexico, 3, Winchester-buildings, May 20

Sir, I beg to accompany herewith a copy of a communication received from his Excellency

J. M. L. Mora, Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Her Britannic Majesty, which I shall feel greatly obliged if you can find space to publish in your influential journal, as it is of considerable interest to those engaged in commercial affairs with the republic.

I remain, Sir, your most obedient servant,

J. M. MENDOZA.

Mexican Legation at the Court of Her Britannic Majesty, London, May 19.

This Legation, in the fulfillment of a painful but severe duty, has determined that you should notify to the commercial community within the limits of your Consulate the following resolutions.

1. All foreign goods prohibited by the Mexican tariff, and introduce into the ports which the American forces at present occupy, shall be seized at the places where they may be stepped by the Mexican authorities.

2. All goods of free importation into the Mexican ports imported through those which the United States occupy run the risk of being confiscated by the Mexican authorities, or at least, they be made to pay the duties established by the Mexican tariff, although it may be proved that the same imposed by the Americans tariff may have been discharged.

In making this notification, you will endeavor to have it understood that this is one of the consequences of the war, which has not been in any manner provoked by the Mexican Republic, and that even while it has lasted its authorities have abstained from molesting in any way foreign commerce until the American Government, by the violation of her constitution and rights, which Mexico has not lost in her misfortunes, and which belong to every independent nation, has placed her authorities under the necessity of adopting measures against the violation of the said rights by the establishment of the American tariff.

Offering you the assurance of my consideration, &c.,

J.M.L. MORA

Senor General Don J. M. Mendoza, Mexican Consul in London.

FROM THE NEW ORLEANS DELTA

We are indebted to Captain Hughes, to the Topographical Corps, for much valuable and interesting information relating to the late glorious victory of Cerro Gordo.

On the arrival of the other divisions of the army at the encampment of General Twiggs, on the 16th of April, General Scott, after taking a reconnaissance of the enemy's works determined to storm them. The position occupied by the enemy was regarded by them as impregnable, and truly, to any other than American soldiers it must have appeared as insurmountable and impracticable undertaking to carry it by storm or turn it by strategy.

The road from Vera Cruz, as it passes the Plan del Rio which is a wide, rocky bed of a once large stream, is commanded by a series of high cliffs, rising one above the other, and extending several miles, and all well fortified. The road then debouches to the right, and curving around the ridge passes over a high cliff, which is completely enfiled by forts and batteries. This ridge is the commencement of the Terra Templada, the upper or mountainous country- the right flank of the position- and a series of most abrupt and apparently impassable mountains and ridges covered their left. Between these points, running a distance of two or three miles, a succession of strongly fortified forts bristled at every turn and seemed to defy all bravery and skill. The Cerro Gordo commanded the road on a gentle declination like a glacis for nearly a mile. An approach in that direction would have been the most entire annihilation of our army. But the enemy expected such as attack, calculating upon the desperate valor of our men, and believing that it was impossible to turn their position to the right or left. General Scott, however, with the eye of a skilful general, perceive the trap set for him and determined to avoid it. He therefore had a road cut to the right so as to escape the front fire from the Cerro and to turn his positions to the left flank. This movement was known to the enemy by a deserter from our camp, and consequently a large increase of force under General Vega was sent to the forts on their left. General Scott, to cover his flank movements, on the 17th of April ordered forward General Twiggs against the steep ascent in front and a little to the left of the Cerro. Colonel Harney commanded this expedition, and at the head of the rifles and some detachments of infantry and artillery carried this position in front and near the enemy's strongest fortifications; and having by incredible labor elevated one of our large guns to the top of the fort, General Scott prepared to follow up his advantages. A demonstration was made from this position against another strong fort in the rear and near the Cerro, but the enemy were considered too strong and the undertaking was abandoned. A like demonstration was made by the enemy.

On the next day, the 18th, General Twiggs was ordered forward from the position he had already captured against the fort which commanded the Cerro. Simultaneously an attack on attack on the fortifications on the enemy's left was to be made by Generals Shields's and Worth's division, who moved in separate columns, while General Pillow advanced against the strong forts and difficult ascents on the right of the enemy's position. The enemy, fully acquainted with General Scott's intended movement, had thrown large bodies of men into the various positions to be attacked. The most serious enterprise was that of Twiggs, who advanced against the main fort that commanded the Cerro. Nothing can be conceived more difficult than this undertaking. The steep and rough character of the ground, the constant fire of the enemy in front, and the crossfire of the forts and batteries which enfilrated our lines, made the duty assigned to General Twiggs on the surpassing difficulty. Nothing prevented our men from being utterly destroyed but the steepness of the ascent under which they could shelter. But they sought no shelter, and on ward rushed against a hailstorm of balls and musket shot, led by the gallant Harney, whose noble bearing elicited the applause of the whole army. His conspicuous and stalwart frame at the head of the brigade, he long arm waving his men on to the charge, his sturdy voice ringing above the clash of arms and din of conflict, attracted the attention and admiration alike of the enemy and the army. On, on the led the columns, whose front lines melted before the enemy's fire like snow flakes in a terrant, and stayed not their course until, leaping over the rocky barriers and bayonetting their gunners, they drove the enemy pell-mell from the front, delivering a deadly fire in to their ranks from their own guns as they hastily retired. This was truly a gallant deed, worthy of the Chevalier Bayard of our army, as the intrepid Harney is well styled. General Scott, between whom and Colonel Harney there had existed some coolness, rode up to the Colonel after this achievement and remarked to him, "Colonel Harney, I cannot now adequately express my admiration of your gallant achievement; but at the proper time I shall take great pleasure in thanking you in proper terms." Harney, with the modesty of true valor, claimed the praise as due to his officers and men. Thus did the division of the gallant veteran Twiggs carry the main position of the enemy and occupy the fort which commanded the road. It was here the enemy received their heaviest loss, and their general, Vasquez, was killed. A little after, General Worth having by great exertions passed the steep and craggy heights on the enemy's left, summoned a strong fort on the rear of the Cerro to surrender. This fort was manned by a large force under General Pinzou, a mulatto officer of considerable ability and courage, who, seeing the Cerro carried, thought prudent to surrender, which he did with all his force. General Shields was not so fortunate in the battery which he attacked, and which was commanded by General La Vega. A heavy fire was opened on him, under which the fort was carried with some loss by the gallant Illincisians, under Burnett. Among those who fell under this fire was the gallant general, who received a grape shot through his lungs, by which he was completely paralyzed, and at the last accounts was in a lingering state. On the enemy's right General Pillow commenced the attack against the strong forts near the river. The Tennesseans, under Haskill, led the column, and the other volunteer regiments followed. The column unexpectedly encountered a heavy fire from a masked battery, by which Haskill's regiment was nearly cut to pieces, and the other volunteer regiments were severely handled. General Pillow withdrew his men and was preparing for another attack when the operations at the other points having proved successful the enemy concluded to surrender.

Thus the victory was complete and four generals and about 6,000 were taken prisoners by our army, and one of their principal generals and a large number of other officers killed. The Mexican force on this occasion certainly exceeded our own. The Mexican officers admitted that Santa Anna had 8,000 men in the lines, and 6,000, including, 2,000 lancers, outside of the entrenchments. General Scott's force was about 8,000, General Quitman's brigade not having arrived in time to take part in the engagement. General Ampudia was second in command of the Mexicans and superintended the operations of the energy. When the Cerro was carried he was seen retreating on a fine white charger, his hat falling off as he galloped away. Many of the Mexicans escaped by a bye path which runs off from the main road between the Cerro and the fort carried by General Worth. As to Santa Anna and Canalizo, they retreated in time to escape by the main road. Their conduct is regarded as most cowardly. Some of the Mexican officers who were taken prisoners do not hesitate to attribute their defeat to the cowardice of Santa Anna. The force of the enemy was composed of their best soldiers. The infantry that fought so well at Buena Vista, all the regular artillerists of the Republic, including several able naval officers, were present. Some of the officers whom General Scott released at the capitulation of Vera Cruz, without extorting the parole on account of their gallantry, were found among the killed and wounded. A gallant young officer, named Halzinger, a German by birth, who extorted the admiration of our army in the bombardment of Vera Cruz by seizing a flag which was cut down by our balls and holding it up in his hands until a staff could be prepared, had been released by General Scott without parole. He was found among the desperately wounded at Cerro Gordo. The enemy's loss was about as large as our own; but in addition to this the loss of some 6,000 prisoners and some of their best officers. Our army captured about 30 pieces of beautiful brass cannon of large caliber and mostly manufactured at the Royal Foundry of Seville. A large quantity of fixed ammunition of very superior quality was also taken. The private baggage and money chest of Santa Anna, containing $20,000 was also captured. The latter was delivered over to the Pay department. The volunteers who were employed in carrying the specie into camp cracked many a joke over the prospect of being seen paid off in Mexican cola and free of expense to Uncle Sam.

When our forces had carried the various positions of the enemy and the road was cleared, General Twiggs started in hot pursuit of the fugitive Santa Anna and pressed close upon his heels. A strong position, five miles west of Cerro Gordo, fortified and defended by a battery of long brass guns, was abandoned by the enemy and occupied by our troops. General Twiggs bivouacked within three miles of the town of Jalapa.

In concluding our imperfect sketch of this brilliant achievement, we cannot sufficiently express our admiration of the extraordinary deeds of our gallant army and able general. Scarcely a month has elapsed since our troops under Scott landed on the enemy's shores. In that time a strong walled city has been captured, together with an impregnable fortress; a pitched battle has been fought under the most unfavorable circumstances and against the most formidable natural defenses; 12,000 prisoners have been taken, including some half a dozen general officers; 500 splendid cannon and an immense amount of munitions of war have been added to the national trophies. Truly, such results are glorious testimonials of the valor of our soldiers, and the perseverance of the accomplished general who led them.

LT May 31, 1847 5b Capture of Tuxpan

"Since the sailing of the last steamer, on the 1st of May, we have had late and highly important news from our invading Mexican army. From the northern part of Mexico, in the region of Chihuahua, we have learned that our small force of only 900 men, under Colonel Doniphan, had overrun an immense territory, and that on the 1st of March he took formal possession of Chihuahua, one of the most important Mexican cities. The war in that quarter seems to be closed by a treaty which the American commander has made with the Mexican authorities, by which the latter agree to protect the American traders and property, and to remain neutral until the close of the war.
"From General Scott's division of our army we have the most gratifying news. After placing Vera Cruz in the hands of a proper Government, General Scott left at once for the city of Mexico. A battle took place on the heights of Cerro Gordo, on the 18th of April, with an army commanded by General Santa Anna, in which the Mexicans were wholly cut to pieces. General Scott marched on to Perote, where he arrived on the last of April. The best opinion, in relation to the future movement of the American army is, that General Scott will now abandon his line of communication with Vera Cruz, and, pushing on to the capital, will depend, in a great measure, upon the resources of the country for support. As a large number of troops are now en route for Vera Cruz, this movement is not so dangerous as it appears at the first glance, for we shall soon have at Vera Cruz an army to reinforce him and render his position secure. When the news of the battle at Cerro Gordo reached the city of Mexico, the greatest excitement was created, but instead of a disposition for peace the reverse was the case, and at no time have the Mexican Congress, the press, or the people, been more warlike in their declarations than at the present. Mr. Bankhead, the British Minister at Mexico, is reported to have offered his mediation, and the Mexican Congress was said to be engaged in debating the expediency of accepting it at the last advices. The Mexican Government may soon be brought to think the case one in which mediation may be proper, and the Government of the United States will probably be more willing to hear of such mediation than they were a year ago. The war is unpopular and expensive, and all the glory of it goes to the Whig Generals, and not to the Administration, as was expected. General Scott, probably, by this time is at the capital of Mexico. General Taylor ( who was at Saltillo, on the 14th of April ) will join him, via San Luis Potosi, as soon as he is reinforced.

"The war, in all its departments is now carried on with vigor and efficiency, and while Mexico daily grows weaker, we each day are better able to contend with her. A large number of the one year volunteers are on the way home, their time having expired. This, however, does not materially affect the strength of the army, as the places of those leaving are easily supplied as soon as the vacancies occur. On all sides the most complete success has attended the American arms, but thus far no apparent effect has been in our possession it will then be seen what course the Mexicans will pursue. With an American squadron blockading its entire seacoast, an American garrison in its chief towns, and under a custom house of our making, it would seem impossible that much resistance can be made to a settlement of our claims upon the terms we the power to secure."

at the capital the defeat of the General had created the greatest alarm. Puebla was threatened. Santa Anna, with from 1,000 to 2,000 troops, was at Orazaba, and it is said, had written to the capital for money and reinforcements. His applications are said to have been unattended to. He contemplated the institution of a guerrilla warfare upon the enemy. At the capital no preparations for defense of any moment were being made. Gomez Farias had been deposed from the Vice-Presidency by a congressional ruse; the office he bore having been annihilated, and afterwards revived under another title and conferred upon Don Pedro Marie de Annaya. The dates from the capital extend to the 24th of April, and from Vera Cruz to the 29th.

Europe will be tired of a campaign in which conquests bring no particle of credit, and fighting no prospect of peace, and in which it is equally impossible to applaud the victors or commiserate the vanquished. The intelligence from America which we published yesterday corresponds so exactly with the information to be expected that it might all have been printed by prophesy a fortnight ago. After establishing a provisional Government in Vera Cruz, General Scott took the route to Mexico by the ordinary road, which slopes in a north westerly direction along the ascent from the low lands of the Gulf coast to the tierras templadas of the first plateau. He passed the Puente Nacional without opposition, though it has always been considered as one of the most defensible posts on the route. Santa Anna had not descended so far, but had taken up a position at Cerro Gordo, a mountain ridge about half way between the Antigua and Xalapa, the first respectable town on the road from Vera Cruz to the capital. Travelers have described this journey as an undertaking of no insignificant enterprise, even with the aid of the best diligencias of the country; but the American troops appear to have advanced pretty smoothly til they found themselves in front of their enemy on the 12th of April. Santa Anna was posted with about 14,000 men on some heights which commanded the main road like a glacie, and from which he could have poured a storm of balls into the advancing columns. After two reconnaissances, however, the "trails" of which are minutely laid down in the American journals, General Scott determined on the 18th to turn the left flank of the enemy; a service on which Generals Shield and Worth immediately proceeded, while General Pillow occupied his attention on the right. Simultaneously with these attacks General Twiggs was ordered against the main batteries in the center, a charge which proved more serious than the other two; but after some resistance and some loss he succeeded in carrying the position. Meantime Worth had experience no further difficulties than those presented by the nature of the ground and was favored with immediate surrender of his opponent as soon as he could get near enough for a summons; but Shield received a grape shot through the lungs from a battery in front, though the latest advices speak of his recovery as still possible. General Pillow on the right actually experienced a repulse, and was preparing a renewed attack after some serious losses, when the events on the left and center induced a general surrender. The killed and wounded are said to be about equal on either side, but the Mexicans lost 6,000 prisoners, including four generals.

Santa Anna is said to have decamped in good time, leaving his carriage, like Joseph's as Vittoria, to the spoil of his pursuers, who, in place of Murillos and Correggios, discovered the more appreciable treasure of some highly flavored Cubas and an excellent stock of preserved meats. Ampudia, the second in command, left the field early without his hat, on a splendid white charger, as conspicuous as that of Roderick the Goth. The Commander in Chief is reported to be at Orizaba, a town just under the great Peak of that name, whence he has issued a proclamation, stating that there is "another Thermopile" between Xalapa and Mexico. The Americans were politely received by the " corporation and civil authorities" at Xalapa, and have pushed on to Perote, from which town they will march on La Puebla and so to the capital; General Taylor, as is rumored, having been ordered to effect a junction with the main body by a southward march from San Luis.

There is not much doubt but that the Americans can march to Mexico, and could have done so some time ago. Santa Anna could certainly operate on their flank from his post at Orizaba, if he had the proper means or motives; and if, as is stated, the Mexicans are positively preparing for some real resistance at La Puebla, another affair might ensue. But we presume that few of our readers will put much faith in the determination or patriotism of the invaded nation. New Spain is as like Old Spain as ever a child was like a parent. If the Mexicans had but been blessed with a little Baylen, the whole scene would be a wonderful representation of the Peninsula in 1800. They vapor and brag, and boast and fume, without the smallest apparent sense of their daily discomfiture's. Their papers and proclamations are filled with predictions of future victories, to the utter exclusion of present defeats. As far as words, and perhaps, even as far as resolutions go, they are all daring and defiant, and yet they never adopt an ordinary precaution or abide in ordinary shock. At this moment, by as extempore revolution in the capital, they have displaced Gomez Farias and exalted Don Pedro Araya to a newly created office of "President substitute," with absolute power for everything except the conclusion of a peace. To read their various manifestoes, no person could possibly conceive that they were any other than the most warlike and unconquerable nation under Heaven. The confidence of Varro after Cannac altogether vanishes compared with the complacency of Santa Anna after eighteen settled defeats within thirteen months. De republic non desperasse, indeed! Why, if this is fortitude the Mexicans are infinitely more courageous than even those contagious islanders of the Caribbean, whose only historical fault is being "really too brave." And the extraordinary point of the story is, that these assertions of intrepidity and patriotism do actually appear both universal and sincere. There is no peace party at Mexico. The voice of all is for open war. There is no terrorism; people are not driven to patriotism by the guillotine and the gallows as at Saragossa and Barcelona. With one accord and one heart they proclaim their own invincible determination never to surrender, and yet they never face an enemy for a moment, and now, when he is at the gates of their capital, they are neither fortifying nor arming, and will probably be found without a cannon mounted or a battalion mustered. All this, however, but aggravates the difficulty of the Americans. They neither want to capture the towns nor chastise the population. They want the Mexican nation to ratify a bargain, pronounce a free consent, and resign a quiet possession; and the patriotic obstinacy which precludes this arrangement is precisely that to which the Mexicans are equal. The American journals admit that the most complete success of their arms have produced no visible effect on the temper of the invaded people, and it is but little further that these successes can now possibly go. The Americans have already got all the sea coast, the customs, the chief forts, and the chief towns, and, while we write, they have probably got the metropole, of their victims. They have dispersed their armies, captured their generals, and destroyed their material; but it is confessed that "the war seems about as far from its close as when it started;" and it is now to be seen what force will be brought to bear against a people whose self sufficiency suffers by no discomfiture, whose delusions are dispelled by no defeats, and who can dispense with a Government, a capital, or a coast, as easily as with character or credit.

LT June 15, 1847 4f The Conquest of Mexico

The conquest of Mexico is a familiar story, even to our childhood. The city of gold, of idols, and of human hecatombs, the reckless Cortez, the unfortunate Montezuma, and a rich and populous empire overthrown by a handful of foreign adventurers, excite by turns the wonder, the admiration, the sympathy, and the ambition of our nature. It will sometimes occur, "Would that we lived in those days! How did the world receive the successive reports of those incredible events?" We can scarcely expand our minds to the breadth of expectation which the discovery and the conquest of a new world must have universally raised. Perhaps, however, many who have indulged in these reflections are entirely unaware that after three centuries that history, to a wonderful coincidence, is acted over again. At this moment the very path of Cortez is trodden by men who, if they present some strange contrasts, are not less heroic, not less confident in the infallible fortune of their cause, than the famed Conquestador. The flag of republicanism supplies the place of the cross, whose reign the Spanish cavaliers chose to believe themselves divinely commissioned to enlarge. The prevailing destiny of the Union is an article of faith across the Atlantic, and one for which many a citizen would rejoice to be a martyr. Such is the spirit and such are the men who are making their way with only a shadow of opposition from Vera Cruz to Mexico. Such is the enterprise of which every three or four days now brings us fresh tidings.

Hitherto the Mexicans have represented rather the conquerors from whom they are really descended. On their side it has been all defiance, obstinacy, and rashness. The notes of preparation have been loud, and the threats sanguinary. At the moment when these promises should be realized the bubble seems to burst. After the stand at Monterey there has scarcely been anywhere a resistance worthy of an independent nation. The impregnable St. Juan d'Ulloa was no sooner known to be invested than tidings of his capture arrived. Even where courage was not wanting, Mexico could not give it the means of resistance. Since that, every fresh occasion has proved both the incapacity of the State and the degeneracy of its chiefs. The battles of Buena Vista and Cerro Gordo have proved that whatever the numbers, there is not the strength or the morale in the Mexican Republic to maintain an effectual war of defense. City after city, Tampico, Tuxpan, Matamoros, Monterey, Vera Cruz, and last of all Jalapa, are in the quiet occupation of the enemy. At the last date General Scott was advancing a portion of his army to Puebla, on the road to Mexico; while another division had occupied Perote on the parallel route. Judging from the past, and from the prudence which seems all along to have guided the invaders, nothing is more probable than that the few days’ march still intervening has long since been passed, and that Winfield Scott is now issuing his appeals to the peaceful tastes and republican sympathies of the Mexicans from the city of Montezuma.

As for the Mexicans, one is almost tempted to ask by what accident of birth or of circumstances they exhibit so grotesque a character in so serious a drama. Last year they were standing out for empire and for honor. This year they fight for nationality and independence. But how are they now meeting an occasion which usually brings out all the powers and all the virtues of man? Pomposity and weakness, truculence and cowardice, are the chief varieties of the scene. Armies disappear with a suddenness and completeness which make it doubtful whether they ever existed, except in the bombast of manifestos. The Commander in Chief is a man whose only power seems to be that of raising expectations which he is the last to fulfill. Himself a deceiver, he is deceived in return. The State which chose him for lack of a better, does not really trust him. While the war rages in the frontiers and shores, and penetrates into the provinces, over the outer circle of those vast natural barriers that surround the capital, that city is divided, harassed, and weakened by civil strife.
Battles and revolutions, the presence of an invading army, and the conflict of domestic factions are too much for any nation. Mexico bids fair to exhibit one of those tremendous catastrophes which stand out horribly distinct in the annals of human calamity. Santa Anna and his colleagues are not men to be deterred by any consideration of social consequences. His present object seems skin to that of the desperado who blows up his stronghold as the assailants enter. He wished to involve the conqueror and the conquered in a common ruin. The proclamation of a guerrilla warfare, giving authority to every score ruffians to concert their own plans, to make their own attacks, to compel the cooperation of the unwilling, to murder all the Americans they can find, of whatever age or condition, is the act of one who gives up honorable war, and would efface or eclipse the memory of his failures by a mutual and universal massacre. It is impossible to say how the plan of a guerrilla warfare will work; but Santa Anna is still near enough to his antagonist to cause him serious annoyance on his road to the capital.

There, as we are credibly informed, has just occurred one of the those acts of absurdity which can give an air of the ludicrous to the most gloomy conjuncture. The Mexican Congress has been gravely discussing whether it should now accept the mediation of the British Government proffered many months since, and then contemptuously declined. They who thought the matter could be so easily reopened realize as little the meaning of mediation as they appear to do the meaning of war.
This proposal was gravely discussed, and stoutly declined, not as being useless, but an attempt upon the sacred liberties of the Republic!

The prospects of the Americans are not without their gloom, both far and near. As they approach the capital, their army melts away. War even with Mexicans takes its quota. Garrisons and communications make heavy draughts. The summer must now begin to tell. Though the advancing columns have now passed the tier client, where the vomit is an annual scourge, and is now in the tier template among snow capped mountains and elevated plains, yet the reinforcements have to encounter all the perils of a summer's march through a tropical climate. Meanwhile a more serious cause is draining the army at the crisis when it most wants men. The volunteers are returning, as their period of service expires. As in the ancient wars between England and Scotland, victory appears to be more dangerous that defeat. In these good old days of amateur warfare, no sooner did the licensed marauder touch the spoil, than he sought occasion to return and enjoy it by his own fireside. In this way the largest armies and the most successful expeditions would suddenly melt away, and prizes do more harm than panic. Whether it be of glory or of spoil, the American volunteers are, it appears, soon satiated. This is no pleasant circumstance for a General plunging into the heart of a bitterly hostile country. But grant that he arrives at Mexico. That is only the beginning of troubles. What is he to do with his conquest?
How is he to render so light, so fickle, and disorderly a people faithful either as tributaries, or allies, or even as brethren and members of the Union?

LT June 15, 1847 6e THE AFFAIRS OF MEXICO

June 15, 1847
The easy reduction of Vera Cruz and the Castle of San Juan d'Ulloa by General Scott excited some alarm here, but it was remembered that the invaders could not long remain on the coast without feeling the effects of the climate, and should they attempt an advance to Jalapa, the natural obstacles of the country, defended by the Mexican valour, would, it was hoped, insure their destruction. With his usual activity Santa Anna hurried from San Luis Potosi a part of the troops who had so lately returned from Saltillo, and completing his force with levies here, in Puebla, and Jalapa, marched to the scene of action, his nativo spot, of which he possesses the most intimate knowledge, and where many of his campaigns have been fought. He placed General Morales under arrest for the surrender of Vera Cruz, and did not hesitate to proclaim that he was himself about to efface the stain on the Mexican arms caused by the loss of that city. Choosing his ground with judgment, he retired the troops from Puente Nacional, and concentrated his whole force, of from 10,000 to 12,000 men, at the stronger position of Cerro Gordo, nearer Jalapa. He there fortified himself with diligence, and in a few days communicated to this Government that his preparations for defense were complete. Considering his position impregnable, he stated that no more men or artillery were requisite, but, as usual, he strongly urged the Government to send him a fresh supply of money. On the 19th a courier arrived with news that the Americans had attacked Cerro Gordo on the 17th, and, according to Santa Anna's account, had been repulsed with severe loss. This was considered a good beginning, but Anaya, the acting President, refrained from celebrating it as a victory, and the result confirmed his prudence in this city that on the 18th the Mexican army had been driven at the point of bayonet from all their intrenchments, and totally routed. General Canalizo, who communicated the defeat to Government, fled from the field at the head of the cavalry, and the infantry was understood to be near all killed or prisoners. Of Santa Anna for some days nothing certain was known, except that he had escaped with life, and some parties began to entertain hopes that the country would be relieved from his presence. He has since addressed the Government from Orizaba, where he states that he is again levying men; but, General Scott having detached some troops in that direction, he is not said to have retired to Tehuacan, on the road to Oaxaca, and if affairs become wholly desperate, can withdraw to the neighboring republic of Guatemala. The American forces have since occupied the castle of Perote (which was abandoned by the Mexicans), about 12 leagues from Jalapa in this direction, and their advanced guard is at Tepeyahuacalco, 8 leagues farther. The important city of Puebla, the second of the Republic, and the only one between Perote and this capital, can now be taken whenever General Scott thinks proper. Puebla has been called "the unconquered," and in the civil contests of Mexico has generally maintained a high reputation. But the Poblanos, in common with other Mexicans, begin to find out that the present war is totally different from skirmishes which they were accustomed to dignify with that name. They perceive, also, that resistance to the superior arms and resolution of the invaders would only produce the destruction of the city, and they have, therefore, determined not to resist. Puebla will open her gates at the first summons.

At this awful crisis of the national affairs Congress act with their usual absurdity. They have given the Executive unlimited authority to carry on the war, but strictly deprived it of the power of making peace. It has been also decreed, that if this city should be taken by the Americans, the Government may establish itself elsewhere, and that Congress shall be represented by a committee in attendance on the wandering Executive. In the same vein, the Governor of the city (Trigueros) has published a proclamation, in which he reminds the populace that they are descendants of the Aztecs, and that their highest pleasure should be to present to their wives and children the bloody hands which have torn out the entrails of a Yankee! These documents serve to amuse the loungers at the corners of the streets, but fail to excite any spirit of resistance amongst the people. The lower orders listen with apathetic indifference, and in the houses of the higher preparations for a retreat to their distant estates are already observable. Ancient coaches are brought forth from their hiding places, and the ponderous accumulation of luggage with which a Mexican family travels may be seen piled in their court-yards, ready for immediate departure. Various schemes have been suggested for the defense of this city, but all impracticable, and it is evident that no resistance will be offered. General Scott has more to fear from his own followers than from the Mexicans. In all the northern districts the conduct of the American Volunteers has become insupportable to the inhabitants, who, it is whispered, have already taken bloody revenge in New Mexico. In Coahulia and Nuevo Leon, General Wool's force is bitterly complained of, and General Taylor has excited severe contributions in both those states and Tamaulipas, under the name of reprisals for the destruction of his convoys by General Urrea. Subdued as the Mexican peasantry now appear, and inefficient as they have proved in the field, they may yet be provoked by these acts of violence and oppression to a retaliation of which the invaders deem them incapable.

When their capital shall fall into the hands of the Americans, it will be seen whether the Mexican authorities retain their present obstinate aversion to negotiate for peace. Should they do so, no alternative will remain to General Scott but a military occupations of the country—a task by no means easy, in consequence of its immense extent. The mediation of Great Britain in this quarrel was offered to Mexico some five months ago, and allowed to remain unanswered. The desperate situation of affairs has now brought that offer to the tardy recollection of Congress, and there seems to be some disposition to accept it, thought reluctantly, as they cannot divest themselves of the idea that by doing so the national dignity would be compromised. If peace is to be obtained by any other means than an American conquest, a mediator will be necessary, for the demands of the United States will now be high, and the Mexicans are not yet prepared to yield anything. The fall of a nation by the fate of war is a spectacle to excite pity, but here that feeling is necessarily mixed with a large portion of contempt. The Mexicans have behaved worse in the field than the Chinese, to whom they are wholly inferior in political sagacity. Their last chance of success in a contest with the United States disappeared when the Oregon question was adjusted with Great Britain, and they should have seized that moment to remove every source of discord with their powerful and ambitious neighbor.

A new tariff for the Mexican ports and territories occupied by the United States has just been received here from Washington, and has given great satisfaction to the mercantile portion of the community. The existing Mexican tariff has been followed in some respects, but the duties are much reduced, and all monopolies, as well as the oppressive transit and internal duties, which weighed so heavily on commerce under the Mexican regulations, are abolished. All duties, however, are required to be paid in cash, and the privilege of bonding goods is not conceded.

In consequence of pulci events, exchange by this packet has been unsteady, opening at 42 ½d., then rising to 43d., at which the principal transactions were effected, and closing at 44d.

LT June 17, 1847 5b THE CITY OF MEXICO

June 16, 1847

Conspicuous among the beauty and magnificence of the city of Mexico is the Main Plaza. It covers an area of 12 acres, paved with marble, forming one of the most beautiful promenades in the world. On every side of this great square, magnificent and costly public buildings are situated. On one side is seen the spacious cathedral, which extends the whole length of another side. The cathedral is erected on the site of the great idol temple of the Aztecs, and the Government palace on the ground of the palace of the great Montezuma. The amount of wealth in the cathedral is incredible. The altar is covered with plates of massive silver, and beautified with ornaments of massive gold. The balustrade enclosing the altar extends a length of 100 feet, and is made of a massive composition of gold, silver and copper, the value of which is exceedingly great. Statues, vases, and candlesticks, of gigantic size are scattered throughout the building; and when we know that there, too, are made from precious metals, we can form an idea of the immense wealth of this cathedral. There are about 80 churches in addition to the cathedral, richly ornamented with gold, silver, and precious stones, and it is supposed that the wealth which is exhibited in this manner is nothing to the immense treasures that are kept in concealment by the priests. The city of Mexico can also boast of a splendid theatre or opera house, which was erected at an immense cost, and is capable of seating 10,000 persons comfortably. On the western side of the city is another square of 45 acres, with a fountain in the centre. It is laid out into pleasant walks, and much frequented in the evening as a promenade. The city of Mexico, like the city of New York, has its fashionable drive—its Third Avenue. We must, however, acknowledge that our Third Avenue cannot be compared to it for beauty and extent. Some idea of its extent may be formed from the fact that it is one mile wide, on which the most splendid carriages, in innumerable numbers, may be seen every evening. It is not unusual to see 7,000 or 8,000 horsemen and 2,000 carriages on it at the same time. This is a faint description of the city of Mexico, now probably in possession of the American troops. When we reflect on its beauty and magnificence, we are not at all surprised that the enemy preferred to allow our army to occupy it without making any resistance, for if it were bombarded in the same way as Vera Cruz was the damage could never be remedied. We are as much surprised, however, when we consider the wealth of the churches, that the priesthood who have a controlling influence on the public mind of that country, could have allowed our army to march into it, that they did not direct their influence towards peace. But so it is. Mexico, the capital of the republic, is probably now in our hand.—New York Herald.

LT June 17, 1847 6f PARTIZAN WARFARE IN MEXICO

June 17, 1847

There is too often much reason to apprehend that in the present posture of affairs in Mexico the war is about to assume a most sanguinary and vindictive character on both sides, unless prompt measures be adopted to arrest its present tendency. Should hostilities continue, they will consist on the one side, at least, of a series of barbarous and revolting murders. In the highways and byways our men will be cut off by the ranchero’s lasso and the assassin’s knife. It is essential to the honour of our country that this barbarous example be not imitated by us. We owe it to our own character and the position we hold in the rank of Christian nations, to witness our abhorrence for this murderous system, by abstaining from it practice. It is difficult to restrain our impetuous soldiery from avenging the blood of their comrades spilled treacherously and fouly, but that restraint must be exercised. In such a large army as we have now in Mexico, there must necessarily be a great number of men regardless of all restraint, save that exercised over them by the discipline of the service. It is vain to attempt to disguise that many atrocities have already been committed by such men attached to the army in Mexico, and that, notwithstanding the measures taken by the two commanding generals to control them. It is hard that the glory of our arms should be tarnished by such barbarities, which, however, it but just to add, are fewer than in any army, equal in number, ever engaged by any other nation in foreign service. But while the murderous system now pursued by the Mexicans is to be avoided on our part, it is nevertheless indispensable that a stop should be put to the butchery of our troops. For this purpose orders are about to be issued to our generals to give notice to the Mexicans, that for every soldier assassinated, a number of Mexican prisoners of war, say two or three, will be put to death by the sentence of a court-martial. This system of retaliation cannot be deemed unreasonable, and the mode of carrying it into execution will divest it of all appearance of haste or passion, and give it the character of dignified retribution. It is a most melancholy alternative, but is unavoidable. The letters from the captured cities in Mexico represent the soldiers as practicing many acts of gross licentiousness on the persons of unoffending Mexican citizens. I understand that it is intended to curb effectually this licentiousness, as far as there is a possibility of doing so, by the maintenance of strict discipline. We do not war with the unarmed population of Mexico, and, as far as the discipline of the service goes, it is intended to stretch it for the purpose of enforcing the observance of a proper respect for the rights of non-combatants and women, in all the cities coming under our rule. Complaints have already been made of some officers of inferior grade, not only countenancing in others, but themselves guilty of offering indignities of Mexican citizens. It is determined to degrade such officers from their rank, if convicted of the offence with which they stand charged.--New York Herald.

LT June 28, 1847 6b THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

The recent advices from Mexico have changed the whole face of relations of the two countries. It is reported that Herrera has been elected president of the Mexican republic. If so, he has been elected as a peace president by the peace party, aided silently by those who are openly advocates for a continuation of the war. If Herrera has been elected, as is reported, negotiations will, probably, be at once resumed, and a declaration of peace is not far off. We, however, have our doubts relative to the truth of the report. It is not impossible that such is the fact; but it is highly improbable. We fear it is too good to be true. The clergy of Mexico have for some time past, in fact since the commencement of the war, been very bitter in their denunciation of the Yankees, and very much opposed to peace, almost in any shape and upon any terms. The people of Mexico are ruled by the clergy, and it is, therefore, proper to infer that the masses were in favour of the war, because the priests were so. It is the Congress that elects the President of that Republic; that body, it by no means follows that the people will submit, or that it may not produce another revolution. The election of Santa Anna appeared to be, at the latest dates, entirely out of the question. From the efforts he was making to secure votes, we should judge that he was very doubtful of his success. There has been, for some time past, a class of citizens in Mexico anxious for peace, and we have no doubt the peace party has rapidly increased in strength and influence since the capture of the principal cities of the republic. This party has been for some time much stronger than appeared on its face, as there are no doubt many citizens of that republic secretly striving to establish peace between the two countries, who are openly advocating war to the death. Of all classes of citizens in Mexico whose interests would be increased and advanced by an immediate peace, we should think the clergy is the most important. Nearly all the resources of the Mexican Government to carry on the war must be derived from the church—the whole brunt of the contest falls upon the clergy; their property will be sacrificed without accomplishing the result required, and they are expending their treasure in vain. The best policy of the church is to use its influence to bring about a speedy peace. If there was the slightest chance of making a successful resistance at any point—if there was any possibility of preventing the progress of the Yankees by furnishing funds to raise troops, it would be proper and just; but the clergy are the most enlightened class of Mexicans, and they know very well that a continuation of war is only plunging their country deeper and deeper into misery, and exterminating as fast as possible their people. It is our most fervent wish that no report of Herrera's election may be confirmed.—New York Herald.

LT June 29, 1847 6b ARRIVAL OF THE HIBERNIA

The British and North American Royal mail steam ship Hibernia, Captain Ryrie, arrived in the Mersey, as anticipated, at 9 o'clock this morning, after a rapid run of less than 12 days from Boston, bringing the usual mails of the 16th and 18th inst., from Boston and Halifax respectively, and upwards of 120 passengers.

Our accounts from New York by this arrival extend to the 15th instant. Politically they are highly interesting. The aspect of the war remained unchanged. On the one hand the American forces were advancing successfully from Puebla on the capital; and on the other, the Mexicans were involved in ignominious intestine broils. Santa Anna had been pelted by the populace of the city of the Mexico, and the operations of the troops of the republic were confined to petty and contemptible attacks on small escorts and convoys. Commercially they exhibit a tendency to decline in the exchange on London.

Advices from Vera Cruz to the 1st of June had been received.

General Scott left Jalapa at the head of 6,000 troops. General Twiggs and his division entered Puebla on the 29th. It was believed that General Scott would advance on the capital without delay.

Authentic news had been received that Santa Anna had resigned the Presidency on the 28th ult. He is stated to have taken this step in consequence of opposition to his views as to the defense of the capital, and defamatory articles in the public prints. He had commenced fortifying Guadalupe in person, and a place near the suburbs; but unusual disapprobation was manifested, and his resignation followed. It was believed that his resignation would be accepted, and Herrera nominated. On his arrival in the capital the populace pelted him, and he narrowly escaped. About 3,000 troops were collected at the capital.

The American army was generally expected to reach Mexico on the 15th of June, and but slight resistance was anticipated.

Suspictions were entertained at Jalapa of an attempt to retake the place. Further robberies have been perpetrated between Vera Cruz and Jalapa, and the Ranchero force on route was estimated at 500 men.

Reinforcements were being rapidly sent forward to General Scott's support, to replace the 12 months' volunteers withdrawn from the army. "It is calculated," says the Union, "that nearly 7,000 regulars, old and new regiments, will soon reinforce the main army, via Vera Cruz, of which between 2,000 and 3,000, doubtless have arrived at Vera Cruz in April and May; and, of the residue, a large portion will reach that place, it is supposed, by the middle of June.

Tampico letters of the 27th May give a deplorable account of the state of affairs. Intercourse with the interior had been cut off, the roads being investing by small guerilla parties, detached from Urrea's battalion, consisting of some 20 men in each company, under the command of a petty officer.

From Saltillo we learn, that General Taylor's advance upon San Luis de Potosi was daily expected. His force would not amount to 2,000 men, and the journals of the United States, friendly to him, charge the Administration with sinister attempts to cloud the fame he has won in the war by thus cramping his energies.

From the Rio Grande we have intelligence of the arrival of the command under Colonel Doniphan, from Santa Fe, at Parras. The force consisted of 1,000 men and 16 pieces of artillery. The march was 1,500 miles, and en route they attained several trifling successes. The advances subsequently reached Saltillo, and the whole force was daily expected.

A letter from San Luis de Potosi, published in the New Orleans journals, states that the hospital there was crowded with the Mexican soldiers, who were dying by scores of starvation and neglect. Even the citizens were suffering from the want of the common necessaries of life. The troops had all left.

The general aspect of relations with Mexico had undergone no change of moment. The prospect of peace by negotiation, so far as any direct evidence is yet afforded to us, was as doubtful as ever. The spirit and hatred of the Mexican people appear to have been unchecked by their repeated defeats; and, unless we accept the reported elevation of Herrara to the Presidency is gaining strength, the arrival of peace would almost appear to be attainable only in conjunction with the final prostration of the weaker republic. At the same time, however, there are rumours current in the American journals, to the effect that negotiation is being actively attempted to arrange difficulties. These rumours strengthen with every arrival; and it is likewise stated, that one of the terms of peace will be the establishment of railway and water communication across the isthmus of Tehuantepec, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. General Scott is said to have expressed confident hopes of a happy result. A well informed Washington correspondent of the New York Courier and Inquirer writes thus:

Washington, June 14

"The proclamation issued by General Scott in conformity with the views and wishes of the Administration is producing most extraordinary effects for peace among the Mexican people. You will have seen the denunciation of it by Santa Anna; but you are probably not aware that the most extraordinary efforts were made by him to prevent its reaching the capital. He succeeded with the first edition; but a second was issued in Spanish by General Scott, and the sensation produced in our favour both in Puebla and in the city of Mexico surpassed even the most sanguine expectation. The prospect that the Mexican people will compel their military rulers to agree to a peace is now brighter than at any period since the war commenced. The project of the treaty, which was taken out by Mr. Trist, has been shown confidentially to several persons at Jalapa, an is in conformity with what I heretofore stated to you, and I even again assert most positively upon evidence from Jalapa and New Orleans, which admits of no mistake, that the treaty prepared to be signed by Mr. Trist, as Commissioner, has been at Jalapa, and that Mr. Trist is clothed with the fullest diplomatic powers to conclude a definite treaty of peace, upon the terms and articles set forth in the project as exhibited at Jalapa; and that he need not wait for any further instruction from Washington, but can also have the treaty as it is signed by him ratified at once by the Government of Mexico. I assert farther that General Scott is to cooperate in the negotiation and in carrying the treaty into effect."

Some important modifications of the tariff imposed upon Mexico by the United States Cabinet had been announced. They are to the following effect:

(Official)
Treasury Department, June 16.

"Sir, In compliance with your directions, I have examined the questions presented by the Secretary of War, in regard to the military contributions proposed to be levied in Mexico, under the tariff, and regulations sanctioned by you on the 31st of March last, and respectfully recommend the following modifications, viz.:

"1. On all manufactures of cotton, or of cotton mixed with any other material except wool, worsted, and silk, in the piece or in any other form, a duty, as a military contribution, of 30 percent. ad valorum.

"2. When goods on which the duties are levied by weight are imported into the said ports in the package duties shall be collected on the net weight only; and in all cases an allowance shall be made for all deficiencies, leakage, breakage, or damage, proved to have actually occurred during the voyage of importation, and made known before the goods are warehoused.

"3. The period named in the eighth of said regulations, during which the goods may remain in warehouse before the payments of duties, is extended from 30 to 90 days; and within the said period of 90 days any portion of the said goods on which the duties, as a military contribution, have been paid, may be taken, after such payments, from the port or ports of Mexico in our military possession; the fact of the case, with particular description of the said goods, and the statement that the duties thereon have been paid, being certified by the proper officer of the port or ports of reshipment.

"4. It is intended to provide by the treaty of peace that all goods imported during the war into any of the Mexican ports in our military possession shall be exempt from any new import duty or confiscation by Mexico, and in the same manner as it said goods had been imported, and paid the import duties prescribed by the Government of Mexico.

"Most respectively your obedient servant,
"R.J. WALKER, Secretary of the Treasury

"To the President."

"June 11, 1847.

"The modifications, as above recommended by the Secretary of Treasury, are approved by me; and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy will give the proper orders to carry them into effect.

"JAMES K. POLK"

The commercial accounts, the chief feature of which, the decline of exchange, has been alluded to above, will be found detailed below.

The New York journals continue to notice the arrival of fever-stricken emigrants from Europe. The Americans, however, were applying the labour thus placed within their grasp, to the formation of their railways, canals, &c.

Letters from New Orleans state that an American line of steamers to run thence to this port is about to be established. The first vessel of the line had been contracted for, and probably the first ship the line would make her start in October next.

Our Montreal accounts extend to the 12th ultimo. The Assembly had been occupied in discussion upon the Address; and the division thereon left Ministers with a majority of one only. The journals teem with notices of the spread of fever amongst the immigrants from Europe.

The commercial accounts, of the 11th state, that from the 28th of may to the morning of the 4th the market rules steady at 37s. to 37s. 6d. per barrel for the best shipping brands of "fine." On the 5th the English mad arrived, and sales occurred immediately afterwards at 42s. to 43s. 9d. per barrel for the best fine, and at 40s. and upwards for secondrate brands, including 2,000 barrels of a firstrate brand at 40s., for July delivery, but cash "now." In that state the market remained till about the 9th inst., when it gave way, and the best brands changed hands at 41s. with a dull sale. On the 11th the price opened at 40s. for the best brands, which resulted in operations which cleared the market of almost everything that offered at and under 41s. which may be noted as the closing price of the day for the best fine. Wheat had ranged during the fortnight from 8s. to 9s. 3d. per 60lb. for Upper Canada mixed, and about the same rates for Lower Canada red per minot. A small lot of Upper Canada white, of prime quality, was placed at 18s. per 60 lbs.

continent. By the intelligence which we publish to-day it will be seen that the Mexican war is approaching that stage of its operations which in any other war would be a conclusion, but which here imports as little finality as the first collision of the campaign. The capital of the state is probably now in undisturbed possession of the enemy, who in dictating their own terms will experience little difficulty beyond that of discovering a responsible contracting party.

The detached reports which have found their way to this country since the last authentic despatches informed us that a guerilla warfare had been proclaimed, and that it had been resolved to burn the capital before the approaching enemy, and to retreat into the wilds and fastnesses of the country. More by credible intelligence we learn that the exasperation of the people against the invaders was daily increasing, and that the priests had energetically adopted the popular sentiments. It is now, however, stated that Santa Anna's reported successor is known to be more pacifically disposed, and by a most extraordinary phraseology the “prospects of peace” are said to be “brightening” upon an unresisted host of invaders, who are marching at will through abandoned towns and unprotected territories. We admit that we cannot see the grounds for expecting any final or satisfactory arrangements. It is, indeed, altogether inconceivable that a hostile force in command of the capital should not be able to extort its own terms from such authorities as may be there extemporized, even if the negotiation will tell very little towards the ultimate object of the Americans. How far their demands may have been modified or stimulated by the events of the last three months, it is difficult to say; but it is probable that the chief article will still be the cession of some of the Californian territory, defined either by the 32d parallel, or some even more advantageous line. Nor do we think it unlikely that they may still repeat some of the terms contained in that grotesque caricature of an international negotiation exhibited by their last condition of peace, wherein an aggressive and victorious army offered pardon, purchase-money, acquittance, apology, and friendship, to an injured and helpless neighbour. For the sake of securing what they have along desired, what they are perfectly able to take, but, without a regular release and bargain, they well know it will be impossible to keep, they will probably not scruple to sacrifice a million or two of those dollars which the author of the war so prudently reserved for its requirements. They will specify the territory they covet, they will avow their honest disposition to purchase it, and the consideration agreed upon will be made up by a great deal of ingenuity and a little expenditure, their own claims for indemnification being set off against the chief portion, while the small remainder may be represented by the plausible and palatable equivalent of money down.

That upon the arrival of Scott in the capital a provisional Government may be found to give a nominal accession to some such terms as we have surmised, is probable enough. We do not even dispute the allegation which describes Herrera as a notoriously disposed to parley. But there is no evidence of any material change in the national disposition. We have before asserted our belief that no such body as a peace-partyexists in Mexico, and our conclusions have only been confirmed by the anxiety displayed to trace it in some quarters where it is said to disguised by unusual clamour for war. It is, indeed, abundantly obvious that there had been no great division in the Mexican councils. They have been at least unanimous in their universal acquiescence and recognition will alone convey to the United States the title and enjoyment they require. Unless they can get quiet and legal induction into their new domain, they will merely have bartered a bloodless campaign for an armed occupation, and will have marched to Mexico to exert only just such a right as they might have assumed on the Grande.

We cannot therefore conceive that the elevation of Herrera, or his accession to the terms proposed, can tend very influentially to terminate the quarrel, unless the proclamations of an armed stranger from the halls of Montezuma should operate after some miraculous fashion in neutralizing the effects of his bombs and bayonets, and reconciling antagonistic races exasperated foes. That General Scott has been endeavouring to invest himself with such pacificatory and harmonizing attractions, and that the ravager of Vera Cruz would fain be received as the deliverer of Mexico, is clear enough from all that we have heard by way of the United States. But there is little room here for the operation of such addresses. There is no great oppressed or disaffected population driven to war by a despotic Government. The Mexicans are free as anarchy can make them, they change their rulers at their will, nor can the most seductive appeal of the invader offer them any increase of political power. The war, such as it is, is emphatically a popular war. It was not excited by the priests or dictated by the President. The Mexicans hate the Americans clearly and intuitively enough, though they cannot resist them. They defy their addresses, though not their arms. They will not fight, but all the powers of the continent cannot make them shake hands. And thus, when a scared or subservient Congress may have signed a compulsory compact, there will still be the obstinacy and opposition of an entire people to reconcile or overcome.

LT July 9, 1847 6c THE AFFAIRS OF MEXICO

After the rout of Cerro Gordo, Santa Anna, collecting what men he could at Orizaba and from Oaxaca, pushed on to Puebla, where he arrived only two or three days before General Worth. The Poblanos have never been very well disposed towards Santa Anna, and in the hour of adversity they gave him clearly to understand that his presence was not desired. He was, therefore, obliged to evacuate the city, which was peaceably occupied by the forces of Worth on the 15th inst. When the Americans take possession of any of the Mexican towns, the post between them and this place ceases, by order of the Mexican Government. Therefore, though so near Puebla, we know little of what is passing there. It would appear, however, from the accounts of occasional travelers, that the Americans are on good terms with the townspeople, and that they have even succeeded in conciliating the religious orders—a step which, in a place so notoriously for fanaticism, would have been extremely difficult a few years ago. But latterly the Church has been so rudely assailed by each successive Government here, that the clergy are now well disposed to wave some antiquated prejudices in exchange for the secure and peaceable possession of their temporal goods.

Since General Scott's victory a large number of volunteers (it is said 3,000) have returned to the United States, heartily sick of the expedition. The plan of hiring a body of men, not soldiers by profession, by the job, to attack an enemy's fortress or to fight a battle, and then return, bears the American stamp of originality; and it is a conclusive proof of Mexican weakness that the system has so far proved successful. The Mexicans were much pleased when Lord Palmerston expressed his opinion in the House of Commons that their resistance would prove too strong for the United States; but their subsequent conduct has certainly done nothing to confirm it.

Puebla, with a population of 60,000, is held by five or six thousand undisciplined foreigners; and for the maintenance of the extensive line to the coast, including the garrisons of Perote, Jalapa, and Vera Cruz, General Scott has probably a not much larger force. It was announced from Vera Cruz that Scott's movement on this city would be supported by the march of General Taylor on San Luis Potosi, but old "Rough and Ready" seems to have been left by his Government with very slender means for such an expedition. The volunteers who held Chihuahua have marched to join him, and it is now said that, instead of advancing on San Luis, he will proceed to Tampico, and embark there for Vera Cruz (rather a dangerous experiment for unacclimated men at this season) to reinforce General Scott.

When Santa Anna abandoned Puebla, nothing remained for him but to retreat on this city, where he had reason to apprehend his reception would not be very cordial. In fact, his old political enemies seemed to think the occasion highly favourable for a pronunciamiento, and before he had reached. Ayotla (six leagues from this) an organized conspiracy existed to deprive him of all intervention in public affairs. General Valencia, with whom he had quarreled at San Luis, was proposed as his successor in the command of the army. At Ayotla he halted, and received the visits of some of the military and political leaders, whom, with his usual ability, he managed to gain over, and finally made his entry here, and assumed the Presidency, without much affectation of state indeed, but also without opposition, General Anaya, who held that post provisionally, retiring from office. But though so far successful, he soon found his position to be one of great danger. All parties new treat him as a lion whose teeth and claws are drawn. The journalists take a malicious pleasure in recurring to some of the most disgraceful passages of his life. One paper comments on the degrading avarice which induced him to sell a magnificent sword presented to him by Congress. Another reminds him that before the battle of Cerro Gordo he asserted that if this city should be occupied by the Americans, he would not survive to see it, and gravely expresses a hope, as that event is now not remote, that he will comply literally with his promise. Assailed on all sides, Santa Anna addressed a manifesto to the nation. It is couched in eloquent language, and contains some truth as respects his own recent exertions, but produced no effect.

Nor did he confine himself to words alone. Valencia was got rid of by appointing him to the command of the troops in San Luis. Ampudia, in whom Santa Anna formerly reposed confidence, is exiled to Cuemavaca, and Almonte, who came with him from the Havannah, is a close prisoner here. Yesterday, however, Santa Anna, apparently despairing of being able to sustain himself, sent in his resignation of the Presidency to Congress, and that body has named a committee to deliberate and report thereon.
General Scott is expected to appear here about the 15th of next month, and many people admit that it is now high time to think of treating for peace. A new paper, El Razonador, has been established expressly to advocate this principle, and though others still clamour for war, it is generally understood that they do so without much serious meaning, or merely for the purposes of party. The only mode proposed for continuing the war is by guerrilla parties, and experience has already shown that these would be nothing but organized bands of plunderers, living at free quarters on the country, and carefully avoiding a meeting with the enemy. Even if, by a species of miracle, the Mexicans could rouse themselves to expel the invaders from the interior of the country, the Americans have put the bit in the mouths by the capture of San Juan d’Ulloa, Tampico, and Matamoros—positions from which it is in vain to think of dislodging them. Peace, then, must soon be made, or the conquest of the country be decided on by the United States. The latter is a consummation much desired by all foreign residents here, and (privately) by not a few Mexicans. The prospects of Mexico, if the American armies were withdrawn, are indeed far from encouraging. The different political parties which have so long divided the country stand prepared to renew their contests with fresh bitterness, and none has a sufficient ascendency to afford a chance of stability. The emancipation of Mexico from the mother country was evidently premature.

A new constitution has just been published, being substantially that of 1824, with some alterations. Under this code the states have proceeded to elect a President. General Herrera and Don Angel Trias (ex-Governor of Chihuahua) have so far about an equal number of votes. Two states have voted for Almonte, not one for Santa Anna. Guadalajara declines voting at all, affecting constitutional scruples. Aguas Calientes loses the right by again merging in Zacatecas; and in Oaxaca two parties, each styling itself the legitimate one, have returned different individuals. The election of Herrera would be a guarantee for peace. When formerly in question with the United States; but his intentions were frustrated, and himself disposed by the insurrection of Paredes in San Luis. Trias is a man of provincial reputation only, and with a good deal of Indian blood in his veins. He has, however, traveled in Europe.

In consequence of existing circumstances, the great annual gambling feast at San Augustin de las Cueva (an event of the highest importance in Mexican society) did not take place this year. A minor performance was attempted at Tacubaya, but met with little encouragement.

Exchange on London by this packet has ranged from 44d. to 45d., and in a single instance was done at 46d.

LT July 10, 1847 8f THE AMERICAN ARMY IN MEXICO

The following interesting description of the American conquerors of Mexico is the translation of a letter from a native of Puebla:

Mr. Worth apparently did not wish to keep the public in suspense after official communications, and accordingly the head of his column appeared at an early hour opposite the gate of Amozoc. The townspeople seemed undisturbed. The whole city, with the exception of the dry shops, which remained closed, presented its ordinary aspect, and no one would have supposed that a hostile army was expected. About half-past 10 o’clock a party of 100 cavalry separated from the division, and entered by the streets of Alguacil Mayor, San Cristobal, &c., to the square, from which they withdrew by way of Santo Domingo to the barrack of San Jose. Curiosity to see the Yankees overcame the alarm so natural at the moment. The people crowded the streets, and nearly all the balconies in the line were filled with spectators. You will excuse this curiosity when you reflect that it was excited by the men of Vera Cruz and Cerro Gordo, who in the mouths of the vulgar passed for a diabolical prodigies, and in mustached lips for at least human prodigies. I myself yielded to the impulse, and breaking a vow of seclusion, sallied forth to become acquainted with our future masters. Imagine my surprise, and that of all the world, when, instead of the Contours which we expected, I saw a hundred gallows-faced men, uniformed (if the dress which most of them wore could be called much) with poverty and bad taste, many of them in their shirt sleeves, armed with sword, carbine, and pistols of a common kind, their horses large indeed, but heavy, and devoid of grace, like all their race, and with no other ornament than a plain saddle and bridle. Thus much for the accessories. With respect to the men, I shall only say that for ten good figures, there were as many sick, ricketty, and even deformed. Add to this disgusting want of cleanliness of all these men, and you have a picture the most unilitary possible, and which I should call revolting, were it not mixed with some grotesque figures at which it was impossible to help laughing. This is no exaggeration; I state sincerely my first impression and that all present. From some roofs hisses were heard, and, though not general, they truly expressed the contempt to which curiosity had given place. After an interval of an hour the main body entered. Of will find in the annexed note. All, that we had heard of Herculean frames, and elegant figures, has been the exaggeration of malice and cowardice. There are all sorts among them, but at the first glance it is apparent that the majority of the army is composed of Irish emigrants, attenuated by hunger. The uniform of all that have entered consists of a jacket and pantaloons of common light blue cloth, precisely the same as the recluses' of San Roque, and with no ornament but the military insignia. All, even the dragoons, wear flat cloth caps, though several have adopted the palm hats of the country, and we saw some enter with toppeates on their heads. If I were not in a hurry, I would substitute the pencil for the pen, in order to send you a sketch of an officer of the line who presented himself on an enormous cart-horse, with a frockcoat of most absurd cut, and an old common straw hat turned up as a three-cocked one. Altogether the general aspect of the army is all that ad taste and economy can produce of ridiculous, sordid, and filthy. Nor does their armament seem to me anything extraordinary. In a word, except the draught horses, which are very good, I assure you, without exaggeration, that these men bring nothing that we have not seen a thousand times. Even the immense number of their wagons is not a proof a large stores. The wagons are almost all empty, and I understand their principal use to be for the transport of the troops. How, then, have they done what they have? How have they continually beaten our army, which not only surpass them in appearance--for that is unquestionable--but in my opinion has a real and positive advantages over them? Every one asks this question, to which there is but one reply. Their leaders, and particularly the colonels of regiments, are old gray-haired men. Their gray hairs explain the phenomenon. This makes me still rely on our soldiers, and gives me for the future some hopes, which we require more than ever. For to us (above all the poets, or who aspire to be such)--to us, who cannot separate the idea of progress in civilization from a certain cordiality of manners, politeness, and external refinement, these coarse and clownish men, who in everything sacrifice elegance to economy, cannot be recognized as the Messiahs of our civilization. (The writer estimates the whole American force at 4,290 men and 13 pieces of artillery.) As soon as the division entered the artillery and infantry formed in the square, and the wagons extended from the street of Mercaderes to the bridge of Noche Buena. The soldiers piled their arms, and the greater part lay down to sleep with perfect confidence, being apparently half dead with fatigue. Our guard in the palace was put under arms. A great number of the people came and went amongst the soldiers, and the tired division in the square, off their guard, and without their arms, were surrounded by 5,000 or 6,000 men. They remain so till 3 o'clock in the afternoon, when the troops occupied the barracks and convents of Santo Domingo and San Luis, and the wagons were placed here and there, as they could find room. The troops remained in barracks all night. Generals Worth and Quitman occupied the palace, the guard of which was changed; and the officers were scattered through the taverns and coffeehouses. At the tavern in the lower part of our house a few of them, whose philharmonic dispositions had been excited by wine, gave me the most inharmonious concession of the hills of Loreto and Guadeloupe, and to-day of the convent of La Merced; and it seems that some troops and artillery have been sent to the hill of San Juan. The population, meanwhile have maintained their accustomed stoicism. They show no respect, nor much dislike to the invaders. If a few are excited at the picture which the city presents, the rest scarcely allude to it, as if nothing extraordinary had happened. There have been some squabbles, and one or two Yankees have been killed by the lepers of Analco, but the mass of the people show neither inclination nor aversion towards them, and require some provocation to rouse them from their apathy. Unluckily, these gentry are aware of this, and not only behave with circumspection, but do violence to their nature to the extent of being affable and deferential.

LT July 14, 1847 8a ARRIVAL OF THE CAMBRIA

The British and North American Royal mail steamship Cambria, Captain Judkins, arrived in the Mersey at 10 o'clock this morning, after a run of less than 12 days from Boston, bringing 130 passengers and the usual mails.

The Calendonia reached Halifax on the 2d. inst.

The political accounts by this arrival are not of great importance. An action had taken place near the Nation-bridge of Mexico, on the route from Vera Cruz to the capital, in which, with a loss of 50 men, the American troops defeated those of Mexico, the latter losing about 100. It is also announced that a proposition of peace had been made to General Scott, but rejected by him as inadequate. In the capital affairs were totally unsettled.

We subjoin the details:

From Vera Cruz late and important advices to the 10th of June had been received. "On the 8th instant," says the New Orleans Delta,

"A small reconnoitering party, together with some citizens and disbanded soldiers, in number about 150, with 75 armed men, and 30 mounted, left Puebla for Vera Cruz. This party was under the command of Captain Bainbridge, of the 3d. Artillery. On leaving Jalapa and getting near Cerra Gorda, this party was informed that it would not be prudent to go through the pass, as there were 4,000 Mexicans in the chapparal along the pass. The party was organized and marched through without meeting an enemy, and arrived at the bridge that evening. Whilst they were bivouacking on the other side of the bridge, being so fatigued that they were unable to furnish a guard, they were informed that some persons were barricading the bridge. A guard was then stationed below the bridge and the encampment, to prevent the party being surprised. At this time signal-lights on the ridges and cliffs were distinctly seen. Before daylight the scouting party was sent out, and also a party to clear the bridge, which was done without any opposition. The main body of the party then passed over the bridge. Everything then appeared to be safe; and, all danger being past, Lieutenant M'Williams and Mr. Frazer were sent back to bring on the train on the other side of the bridge. As they were entering the bridge a party of about 25 Mexicans appeared on the bridge, and fired several volleys on them. The wagon master and four others, who were passing the bridge, were fired on, and the whole five were killed and the wagons were captured. It was of no great value.

"After the fire had ceased, a party of Lancers appeared on the bridge, and seemed to be preparing to charge, but, seeing that Captain Bainbridge's party were preparing to receive them, they wheeled their horses and galloped off. Captain Bainbridge pursued his march in good order, followed by 400 or 500 Foot Lancers, who hung upon his rear and flanks for four or five miles, but at a respectful distance. Thus hemmed in, this little party pursued its way until it arrived where Colonel M'Intosh had encamped with his train. The Mexicans who had attacked Captain Bainbridge's party were the same who had compelled Colonel M'Intosh to halt and wait for reinforcements. The party remained that night in Colonel M'Intosh's camp, and during the whole time the Mexicans kept up a continued fire on the camp, approaching with the greatest boldness very near to our sentinels. On the next day Captain Bainbridge's party resumed its march to Vera Cruz, being joined by Captain Duperu's United States Dragoons, who were sent back to get their horses. This company, with its gallant captain, begaved very handsomely at the attack on Colonel M'Intosh's camp; indeed, it was generally admitted that Colonel M'Intosh's command was saved by the gallantry of Captain Duperu's party. Captain Bainbridge's party continued their march to Vera Cruz, where they arrived in safety. In the meantime, Captain Duperu's command having a long return train to guard, and being threatened by a large body of Lancers, halted at Santa Fe, where they were charged by a greatly superior force, which they gallantly repulsed, killing many of the enemy, and the drivers taken prisoners. Captain Duperu arrived safely in Vera Cruz, having lost in all three killed, and three wounded. On the day Captain Bainbridge's party left Colonel M'Intosh camp General Cadwallader arrived with a force of 800 men and two howitzers, and pushed on towards the National bridge. On approaching the bridge, General Cadwallader occupied the heights commanding the bridge, from which the enemy had fired on Captain Bainbridge's party, where he was attacked by a large force of the Mexicans posted on the ridges and in the chapparal, and some hard fighting was carried on for several hours--the Mexicans losing more than 100 men, and General Cadwellader losing some 15 killed and some 30 or 40 wounded; the Mexicans were repulsed.

"The bridge was successfully passed by General Cadwallader, who was on his way to Jalapa. The estimated loss of Colonel M'Intosh's party was about $4,000. The road for miles was strewn with empty boxes and bacon sides, which had been captured by the enemy. There was a great deal of dissatisfaction in the army respecting the command which had cargo of the train. There will be a Court of Inquiry into the matter.

"Since the above was written, we have learned that the affair between General Cadwellader and the Mexicans at the National-bridge, the company of Lieutenant Blakely, of the newly-raised Volunteers, with two howitzers, charged the barricades, and swept them with a few discharges from the howitzers. In passing through, however, Lieutenant Blakely received a heavy fire from the enemy on the ridge which commands the road, by which he sustained a loss of one killed and four wounded, the Lieutenant himself being wounded in the leg. They also lost several horses. The heights were then charged on the right and left of the road, and gallantly carried, the enemy flying from before them in great confusion. When General Cadwallader had passed the bridge, he was attacked by a large party of guerrillas, who kept up a continual fire on his men far a long distance. At Cerra Gorda, it was thought, from reports of heavy firing, that the enemy had made a stand in great numbers, though no apprehensions were entertained for the safety of General Cadwallader's command, who was moving in a bold and steady manner--the only way to deal with the Mexicans. Captain Gate's company of 3d Dragoons was sent by General Cadwallader to the rear, to reinforce the guards of the train, who were attacked by a large force of Lancers, which they repulsed with considerable loss. There is much sickness in Vera Cruz, but very little in the Castle. General Cadwallader is much praised for the energy and promptness of his movements to the rescue of Colonel M'Intosh, and for the bravery and skill with which he scattered the swarms of guerrillas, grown confident by the success of their previous enterprises. The garrison at Jalapa has been broken up by order of General Scott, and all the sick and Government stores have been sent to Perote Castle, so that this line of communication is entirely closed. General Scott has had a road opened from Perote to Tuspan, from which, in future, all our stores and men will be sent, in preference to the old road. There are about 1,000 men encamped at Vera Cruz. General Shields was at Jalapa, and was about to leave for the Untied States, when he received an order from General Scott to join him at Puebla. There are no preparations to defend any point between Puebla and the capital; all the odds and ends of the army are collected in the city, about 20,000 in number, but poorly armed, and are miserably provided for. There was a small pronunciamento at the city of Mexico. It was early put down by General Bustamonte; it was got up by factions of the popular party, and of the Gomez Faria's party. Their cry was "Down with Santa Anna," but the President ad interim still maintains his power and influence. Congress had refused to accept his resignation. We have about 6,000 men at Pueblo, under command of Generals Worth and Quitman. General Scott will remain at Puebla until he is reinforced. General Bravo is in command of the army at the capital. The success of the attack on Colonel M'Intosh's command has given great confidence to the guerrillas, who are swarming in great numbers through the country, and attacking all our parties, large and small. It was chiefly owing to the gallantry of Major Bennett, the paymaster, that the specie wagons in charge of the party were saved. He was in one of them himself when the wagon was attacked, and fought like a tiger. General Scott was at Puebla at the last accounts. The editors of El Arco Iris had received dates from the capital to the 21 of June. Santa Anna had a second time sent in his resignation of the Presidency. Congress had not, up to that time, accepted it. He had also made a formal resignation of his office as Commander-in-Chief of the army, which, like his resignation of the Presidency, remained in abeyance. Five Mexican generals, whose names are not given, have been arrested and sent to the different states for confinement. The gallant Captain Walker has commenced his work of retaliation on the guerrillas. On the morning of the 8th inst. he started with his command from Perote, on an expedition some sidtance into the interior. During the expedition he succeeded in capturing nine guerrillas and an alcade. He has employed them in clearing the streets and sinks. A letter had been received in Vera Cruz on the 15th inst., previous to the sailing of the Galveston, direct from the head-quarters of General Scott, stating the General Scott had issued orders for the removal of the prisoners from Vera Cruz to Tuspan. This change was said to be partly owing to the sickness in Vera Cruz, and because communications could be more easily up between Tuspan and Puebla, than between the latter place and Vera Cruz."

A speedy peace appears to be anticipated by some of the journals.

The expedition against Tobasco, under the Commodore Perry, sailed from Vera Cruz on the 9th ultimo.

President Polk had visited New York.

From Montreal we have interesting intelligence to the 28th of June. an excellent summary of which we annex from the Montreal Herald;

"Attempts have been made in both houses, by Her Majesty's Opposition, to throw Her Majesty's Canadian Cabinet into a minority, but with equal want of success. In connexion with this subject, we may mention that the Ministry have laid on the table of the house a translation of certain correspondence which passed between them and Mr. Caron, the late Speaker of the Legislative Council, relative to the reconstruction of the Ministry, so as to admit some gentlemen enjoying the confidence of the course of the negotiations, judging from this correspondence, seems to have been this: Lord Elgin first addressed a memorandum to Mr. Caron, requesting his advice as to the best means of forming a coalition Ministry, containing gentlemen who have the confidence of the French Canadians; saying that he desired no sacrifice of principle, but expressing his hope that personal and party differences would, if any such existed, give way to patriotism and the public good.— Upon this basis Mr. Caron entered upon the negotiation; and, in order to be quite sure of his ground, he proposed several questions to the Ministry, among which was this: Whether there was any person whom there would be no use to propose on his side? He was answered that there was no objection to any person. It was then arranged that, as the Cabinet is composed of seven members, three gentlemen from Upper Canada should be named, and three from Lower Canada; the seventh place being the Provincial Secretariatship, occupied by Mr. Daly, to be filled afterwards by the Governor-General, with advice of the six. This seems to have been understood as a bargain on both sides; but, suddenly, Mr. Caron signified to the Ministry that they must exclude Mr. Daly from any participation in the government, and that he had four persons who would then join the Government. As the whole affair was based upon the rejection of personal or party dislikes, and still further, as the seventh member of the Cabinet was to be the choice of the two parties, this, of course, ended the business. Since the commencement of the session, however, Mr.
Caron has stated that, in consenting to take office with the Conservatives of Upper Canada, he fully expected to pave the way for the return to power of their opponents, the Upper Canadian Liberals, with whom the French had all along acted.
So that, when he had got his majority of the four in the council of seven, the first thing would have been to oust the colleagues with whom he professed to co-operate.
Yet, though the declaration was made in the face of both houses of Parliament, for the Assembly had adjourned, and most of its members were below the bar of the upper house, Mr. Caron's friends still clamour about what they call the insincerity of Ministers. Beyond these occurrences little has been done of public interest in either branch of the Legislature; but a great number of private bills have been introduced and advanced one or more stages. Among these are several bills for allowing banks to increase their capital. The Inspector General has given a brief outline of his financial scheme. He proposes to take advantage of the British Possessions Act to discard all differential duties; to reduce several tonnage and other duties now levied upon vessels coming from sea to Montreal and Quebec, laying the charges which the produce is applicable to upon the Consolidated Fund; to extend the facilities now granted to importers of all kinds of goods to pass them through our waters for reshipment; and to reduce the tolls on the canals to the lowest point to which they can be brought, consistently with a proper regard to the revenues of the province. It is proposed, in addition to these reforms, to reduce all duties on raw materials to the uniform rate of one cent. ad valorem; and though this was not mentioned by the Inspector General we are informed that measures are to be taken to reciprocate the intercolonial trade, free of all duties, which the Legislature of Nova Scotia, by a recent act, has proposed to the sister provinces. Several German vessels have arrived in the river and at Montreal, under the provisions of recent British statutes and orders in council. These, we believe, are the first vessels bearing a foreign flag that have ascended the St. Lawrence since the Conquest. The emigrants, who daily arrive here, come in dreadful plight. The deaths at the emigrant sheds are fearfully numerous. 25 deaths a day have been about the average at the sheds. Great dissatisfaction prevails at this pouring out of paupers upon us, and however reasonable this feeling certainly is, it has given occasion for a great deal of nonsense to be talked about the cruelties of the English aristocracy, &c. However, the thing, to say the least of it, is most disgraceful. A [ . . . ] from the House of Assembly is to go

LT July 29, 1847 7e MONEY-MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE

The disposition to improvement consequent on the uninterrupted fineness of the weather still continues in the English funds, and Consols today have again advanced an eight per cent. The first price for money was 88 ½ to 5/8, and they went to 88 5/8 to ¼, at which they remained up to the close of business. For the account the last price was 89 1/8 to 1/8. Bank Stock left off 196 ½ to 197 ½; Reduced Three per Cents., 89 ¼; Three and a Quarter per Cents., 90 7/8; India Stock, 243 to 246, India Bonds, par to 5s. premium; Long Annuities, 9 1/8; and Exchequer bills, 8s. to
11s. premium. Throughout the day money was in full employment in the Stock Exchange at 5 per cent.

In the foreign stock market the business transacted was of the most limited description. The bargains merely included Austrian, at 108; Chilian, at 92; Mexican, at 19 ¼; Spanish Passive, at 4 ¾; Venezuela, at 39; Belgian Four and a Half per Cents., at 94 ½; Dutch Two and Havlf per Cents, at 57 3/8; and the Four per Cents., Certificates, at 90 7/8.

Advises from Paris received this morning attribute a tendency to decline which is manifested by the French funds to a variety of causes, amongst which are an increased demand for money, and a growing uneasiness regarding the position of Switzerland and the relations between Greece and Turkey. These, however, are subordinate in their effect to the oppressive anticipations which day by day become more deeply fixed in the minds of capitalists of the impending calls which will be necessary for the wants of the Government, and of the various railway companies, and which, according to the calculations of some parties, will form together an ultimate total of 120,000,000l. sterling.

No dividend was declared at the meeting of the United Mexican Mining Company today, the operations of the undertaking having been obstructed by the high price of quicksilver, and the danger of transit arising from the disturbed condition of the Republic. The general revenue amounted to $71,400, less expenses $29,850, or in sterling 7,444l. 3s. 11d. A surplus of nearly 5,000l. exists in hand, and it was stated that there was the prospect of a dividend, if affairs proceeded in satisfactory manner in the course of the next half year.

The defaulting American States require to be educated into integrity, and it is evident that a generation must pass before the feeling will become a habit. Even when intellectually convinced that honesty is the best policy, and at a time also when they find wealth pouring in upon them so as to render its exercise not inconvenient, they hardly contrive to take a step in the right path without showing that they are out of their natural track. In the midst of their proposals for a resumption of their obligations the resolve to make clean work of it seems always wanting, some evasion being usually introduced which indicates an almost inextinguishable bias, and not only prevents the applause they would otherwise receive, but actually renders the new "effort," as it is usually termed, to uphold the national honour a more complete proof that the leopard has not changed his spots than if they had suffered the matter to remain altogether unheeded. Thus, after many years of neglect, we have recently seen Indiana bestir herself, and in so doing absolutely fall into the disgrace which, at all events, she had avoided up to that time, of distinct repudiation; and advice from New York now bring us another instance larger in its meanness, because smaller in its contemplated results. In the step taken by Indiana, the object was to escape payment of more than half the arrears of interest, and to get rid of the liability upon half the principal of her debt, but in an arrangement just proposed by Illinois we have little bit of repudiation that would almost seem to have been introduced for no other end than to indicate the transatlantic origin of the proceeding. It appears that the State is about to make "a united and vigorous exertion" to pay its debts, and that at a convention at present assembled to amend the constitution measures are expected to be adopted for that purpose. In a joint resolution of both houses of the Legislature, the magnificent truisms has been formally declared "That the State of Illinois is bound by every principle of justice, and a regard to its honour and credit, to make provision for the payment of its debts," and the people, moreover, have intimated something like an unanimous disposition even to submit to taxation for the purpose. Thus far, therefore, all looks well. But the State politicians could not leave the matter in this form. It appears that through clumsy management the State, in issuing its bonds at various times, has sent forth a large amount of different classes bearing the same numbers, "thereby causing great confusion," and rendering it "impossible at the present time to determine the precise amount of indebtedness of the State, its character, and when payable." And an act has accordingly been passed calling in all outstanding bonds, in order that new ones may be substituted—a measure which is not essential to enable the State to correct its blunders, since a renumbering would answer the purpose, and creditors are usually averse to a change of documents. But to insure the desired end, a singular mode of compulsion has been resorted to, consisting of nothing less than the virtual repudiation of all such bonds as shall not be presented within a certain period from the date of notice. "All indebtedness," it is coolly declared "not surrendered within 18 months after notice given by the State to exchange, shall not be entitled to the benefit of any law which may be passed to pay interest on the State debt."

Thus Illinois, like Indiana, at the very moment when she seeks to regain her character, takes a step which, if persisted in, must render permanent the stain that might otherwise be regarded as only temporary. We apprehend, however, that considerations of expediency will yet interpose to promote a more creditable course, and that the offence is, as we have supposed, to be viewed only as one of those lapses into which people fall who are trying to be honest according to rule, and who, unaccustomed in some measure to the restraint, are apt in small matters to forget themselves, and to give way to nature without intending it.

The French commercial journals notice the receipt of late advices from the States of Central America, which are specially referred to the attention of their manufacturing interest. The announcement made is that the lengthened period of peace which has prevailed in that quarter of the globe, coupled with the disposition evinced by the local Governments to attract trading connexions in opening St. Jean de Nicaragua... and other ports, renders the present a most favourable opportunity for entering into competition with the English, who are said to possess a monopoly of the supply of these markets, with comparatively little or no interference from European Manufacturing countries. Our merchants are described by these writers as securing most profitable returns upon their shipments, and so warmly has the point been taken up by those who advocate the introduction of French goods, that the representatives of that Government in Central America, supported by their own traders, have been at the pains of entering at length into the subject, and detailing the particular articles best suited to the wants and conveniences of the inhabitants of the several states.

A statement appears in the Antwerp paper Le Precurseur of the imports of cotton and wool into Belgium during the last 16 years, beginning with 1831 and concluding with 1846. The return alluded to shows that whereas the value of these articles introduced into the country mentioned in the first-named period did not exceed 3,249,062£, it increased in the year 1833 to 10,426,265£. In 1834 the value again declined to 6,774,512£, but in 1838 it once more increased, and reached the high point of 11,699,945£. The year 1839 marked another period of depression, when the imports were estimated as worth only 6,920,840£. The next twelve months established an enormous change. From 6,920,840£ the improvements carried the amount to 15,455,693£ in 1840, but it again receded in 1842 to 10,452,004£. Once more, in 1845, the fluctuation was considerable, and for that year the return was 14,774,721£. The last period quoted, viz., the year 1846, establishes decline of about 4,200,000£ compared with the previous twelve months, the amount being 10,500,000£.

The following appeared in part only of our yesterday's empression:

We have received letters from our correspondent in the city of Mexico to the 29th of June. The delay of the Americans in advancing from Puebla had enabled the Mexicans to assemble an army estimated at 16,000 men for the defense of the capital. Santa Anna was again at the head of affairs, having withdrawn his resignation, and through the pressing nature of the danger recovered much of his former ascendancy. A forced contribution of $1,000,000 had been decreed, from which foreigners were not exempt. The America army under General Scott, 10,000 strong, was supposed to be on the eve of marching against the city, and that a battle would be fought at El Penon, three leagues distant. A communication from Mr. Buchanan, dated Washinton, April 15, had been received by the Mexican Government, informing them that Mr. Trist would accompany the army with full powers to treat for peace. The issue of the expected battle would, of course, materially influence the determination of the Mexicans on the subject of negotiations, and it seemed not improbable that its loss by them would lead to peace. The Cabinet had been remodelled by the appointment of General Alcorta as Minister at War; Don Domingo Ybarra to the department of Foreign Affairs, and Don Vicente Romero as Minister of Justice. Rondero remained at the head of the Finance Department.

The Royal mail steam packet Avon, R.S. Norton commander, arrived at Southampton on Wednesday evening at 9 o'clock, bringing the Mexican and West Indian mails, in charge of Lieutenant J. Fitz Brand, R.N., Admiralty agent, which left by the usual mail train at a quarter past 1 o'clock on Thursday morning.

The Avon brings 70 passengers, and her dates are--St. Juan Nicaragua, June 23, Charges the 25th, Carthagena the 28th, Santa Martha the 29th, Demerara, July 5, Puerto Bello the 6th, Tobago the 7th, Trinidad the 7th, Jamaica the 9th, Barbadoes the 9th, Jacmel the 11th, Grenada the 11th, St. Vincent the 11th, St. Lucia the 12th, Martinique the 12th, Dominique the 12th, Guadaloupe the 12th, Puerto Rico the 13th, Antigua the 13th, Nevis the 13th, St. Kitt's the 13th, Tortola the 14th, St. Thomas the 16th, and Bermuda the 20th.

The Avon Brings 286,016 dollars on merchants' of gold dust, 127 cases of cigars, 101 serons of cochineal, 69 cases of pines, 30 live turtle, &c.

The Avon has had an unusually quick passage home. She sighted the Experimental Squadron 14 miles off the Lizard, with two steamers ahead.

The accounts from the islands are rather contradictory as to the weather; on the whole, the rains appear to have generally visited the various localities, though far too scanty in some districts. Great complaints continued in consequence of the scarcity of shipping, and of course the colonists were suffering great losses from non-realization of produce. The want of money was severely felt.

On the departure of the Avon from the Gulf the following was the most recent intelligence:

The American army at Vera Cruz amounts to about 4,000 men of the 10 new regiments lately organized and the remainder were expected daily, when the whole army would amount to 10,000 men. On the night of the 16th of June, 1,600 mules were taken by a Mexican guerrilla party, which was supposed to amount to 200 men. General Scott was still at Puebla awaiting reinforcements, as in Mexico they are making preparations for a strong defense. Santa Anna had been declared Dictator, on condition that he will not, under any circumstances, treat for peace; and it is generally supposed by those who are best acquainted with the Mexican character that the Americans must conquer the whole country before there can be an end to the war. Almonte, the late Ambassador to the United States, was in prison at Mexico. The fever was raging dreadfully at Vera Cruz, especially in the American army; there were between 600 and 700 in the hospitals, or churches converted into hospitals. By the medical reports 20 died daily; however, rumour said between 25 and 30 daily. It is generally supposed that when the rainy season sets in the mortality amongst the American troops will be fearfully great.

There is no prospect of the Mexicans accepting the proposition lately made by the American Government for the termination of hostilities. At a place called Jago, about half way between Calapo and Parata, an affair took place between the Americans and Mexicans; about 400 of the latter, with their commander, had been killed.

Santa Anna was said to have 30,000 men organized in Mexico; the priests are distributing their money in a most lavish manner in aid of the war.
The following is a list of the cabin passengers by the Avon:

Mr. Fontevilla, from Mexico; Mr. Edney, lady, and family, from Belize; Mr. Puttfracken, Mr. Ramirez, Mr. Mantilla, and Mr. Barlas, from Havannah; Mr. Mackle, Mr. Perry and family, Mr. Boulanger and servant, Mr. Prada, Mr. Jullian, Mr. Portillo, Mr. Mainamillo and son, and Mr. Loayza, from Chagres; Mr. Wilson and Mr. Esculante, from Nicaragua; Mr. Nieto, Mr. Klein, Mr. Williamson, and Mr. Gaverra, from Sant Martha; Mr. Murray, lady, and family, Mr. Valugo, Mr. Heath, Mr. Heath, Mr. Duany, Mr. Menzies, Mr. W. Joseph, Mr. Douglas, Mr. Morrice and Mr. Lyons, from Jamaica; Mr. Millinet, from La Guayra; Mr. Johnstone, Mr. Stewart, and Mr. Bolie and lady, from Trinidad; Mr. Chariton, Mr. And MRS. Walsh, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Hurrell, and Mr. Callenden, from Barbadoes; Mr. And Mrs. Brown and family, from Grenada; Mr. Wicoud, from St. Lucia; Mr. Maynard, from Martinique; Mr. And Mrs. Railton and family, from Nevis; Mr. Udall, from St. Kitts; Mr. Ahrens and Mr. Viner, from Porto Rico; Mr. Van Schmidten, from St. Thomas; Miss Hawkins, from Bermuda.

At Havannah, June 6, her Majesty's ship Alarm, which sailed for Bermuda and Halifax on the 8th. On the 7th C.S.P Medway arrived from the Gulf.

At Vera Cruz, June 13, Her Majesty's ship Persian, At Bermuda, July 17, her Majesty's schooner Bermuda building; Commander, officers, and crew hulked on board the Royal Oak.

At Nassau, July 13, Her Majesty's surveying-vessels Thunder and Locke.

At Havannah, June 6, there were-French men of war, Andromeda, bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral La Place, and the Blonde corvette; Spanish men of war, Sobaron, 74 guns, bearing the flag of a Vice-Admiral, and the Maria Christina frigate.

At Vera Cruz, June 13--French men of war, Petrouse corvette and Pylades brig; Spanish men of war, the Heberno corvette; American men of war, the Potomac, 60 guns, and the Raritan, 60 guns. The Americans had also at Vera Cruz 31 transports laden with coals, &c., and 52 with provisions, ammunition, &c., for the use of the army.

Tampico, June 15.---The steamers Undine, the Mary Somers, and the Joseph Gage, taken up by the American Government, were constantly employed towing ships over the bar and up and down the river; one bark and three schooners were also used for conveying troops, stores, &c., along the coast. On the Avon’s return to Vera Cruz on the 17th, she found the same men of war and transports at anchor there as on the 13th, when she left for Tampico. She left Vera Cruz on the 3rd of July and arrived at Havannah on the 7th, and found the Spanish men of war already mentioned at anchor there. The Maria Christina sailed on the 9th on a cruise; the schooner Lee was waiting there for the mails, and the Company's steam-packet the Great Western arrived on the same day as the Avon did; the Great Western left on the 10th for Vera Cruz. The Avon sailed on the morning of the 11th for Naseau and arrived on the 18th; she found her Majesty's surveying vessels Thunder and Locke, moored in the harbour; they were to leave for Bermudá in a few days.

The Avon spoke at sea the bark Priscilla, July 29, 42°26 N. lat., 33°30 W. lon; the brig Helons, Irish, and the Brig Harvey, English, July 30, 43°50 N. lat., 29°3 W. lon., the bark M.H. Kendal, American, July 31, 45°17 N. lat., 24°21 W. lon.; an English bark, hoisted white burgee and St. George's cross, August 1, 46°40 N lat., 18 59 W. lon.

conducted with prudence, for the more we learn of the number and condition of his forces, the less adequate do they appear to the occupation of so extensive a line of country as that from this to Vera Cruz. By withdrawing the garrison of Jalapa, and leaving only a small force in possession of the heights which command Puebla, he can now muster 10,000 men, for the attack on this city. Considerable delay has been occasioned by the attacks of the guerilla parties on an American convey of money and ammunition between Vera Cruz and Jalapa. A Spanish priest, named Jarauta, has given unexpected energy to these bands, and distinguished himself personally on various occasions. The clerical and military characters do not seem to be considered incompatible either in Spain or here; indeed, the first Mexican insurgent, Hidalgo, was a village priest. One guerrilla intercepted a despatch from the American Secretary at War, Mr. Marcy, to General Scott, dated April 30, which contains the following passage:

"This Government has received hints that part of the state of Vera Cruz, as well as some others, is disposed to revolt against the central Government. If this be true, use every means in your power to excite this spirit, taking at the same time the utmost care that the United States should not appear to be implicated, as this would give rise to charges against our Government when negotiations for peace are commenced. If you think proper, you can promise some assistance or protection, after the termination of the war."

The American Government should be careful how they expose communications of this delicate nature to seizure.

It was reported yesterday that the American army had already left Puebla, which is probably premature, but "the cry is still they come," and the movements of the troops seem to indicate the approach of danger. The rocky hill of El Penon, about three leagues from this on the Puebla road, has been strongly fortified, and will, probably, soon be the scene of a decisive battle. All the approaches to the town trenches are dug and works thrown up, but no of a class likely to keep out the Americans, if victorious in the previous battle, and, though a city like, where every house is capable of being converted into a fortress, might be long defended by determined men, I see no reason to apprehend a contest in the streets.

While this imminent danger threatens the capital of the republic, the strife of political parties is as fierce as ever. The reflecting portion of both factions (Puros and Modernados) is, doubtless, aware of the necessity of negotiating for peace with the United States; but neither dare to propose it, from an apprehension of the bare suggestion giving an advantage to their opponents. Within the last few days a communication has been received by this Government from Mr. Buchanan, dated Washington, April 16, in which he announces the appointment of Mr. Nicholas P. Trist as commissioner, to accompany the army, with full powers to make peace whenever the Mexicans are disposed to come to terms. This communication was sent here undercover to the British Minister, and the answer (which, as far as is publicly known, merely states that the note would be laid before Congress) was taken to Puebla personally by Mr. Thornton, the Secretary of the Legation. There is, therefore, ground to infer that some friendly mediation is going on. Santa Anna has made some exertions (real or pretended) to get the Congress together; but that body, from mutual jealousies, carried to an inconceivable height, will neither meet in sufficient numbers to transact business, nor consent to be declared in recess, and leave the Executive unfettered. It is difficult to discover the clue to Mexican politics, which seem to be a compound of Spanish intrigue and Indian cunning. Santa Anna, who seems so desirous of assembling the Congress, may very possibly be engaged in fomenting their dissensions, is order to pave the way to his own dictatorship.

The pretensions of the American Government are now understood to be moderate; the same, or similar to those suggested in one of my letters: The line of the Bravo to Paso del Norte, or Santa Fe, and Upper California, to become American, each party to bear its own expenses in the war, and Mexico to receive a pecuniary compensation for the territory ceded, of course without reference to Texas Proper, which is condemned as a lawful prize. If peace should ultimately be made on these terms, the assumption of part of the Mexican debt by the United States, instead of their paying an indemnity to this country, might be a good arrangement for all parties.

General Almonte, who was closely imprisoned here on some unknown charge, and who had a majority of votes for the office of President, has been liberated under an amnesty granted by Santa Anna, on the anniversary of his birthday. Of the states which voted, one only (Chihuahua) gave its voice to Santa Anna, but, owing to the occupation of so large a portion of the country by the Americans, it was found that no legal election could be made, and he remains in possession of nearly absolute power, which he has, as usual, abused to the prejudice of the foreign residents. Forced loans, nominally on all the inhabitants, but really confined chiefly to foreigners, were an old expedient of his for raising money, and their injustice was so apparent that at the period of the French blockade Mr. Pakenham successfully interfered to obtain their perpetual abrogation as respected British subjects, which necessarily became the rule for other foreigners. Deprived of this resource Santa Anna now plays a bolder game. For a forced loan he has substituted a forced contribution of 1,000,000 dollars, the maximum to be paid by each person being 2,000 dollars, and the minimum 25 dollars. The Governor is the sole judge of who is to pay, and how much; and the penalty for non-payment within three days (in lieu of the bowstring and bastinado of Oriental despots) is the duplication of the contribution. I am sorry to say that our Minister, Mr. Bankhead (who has resided in the east), sees nothing wrong in this. He does not perceive that it is a revival in a more obnoxious form of the principle which his predecessor successfully combated, and all he will undertake to do in favour of British subjects is to obtain a reduction of the quota in cases of manifest injustice. No contribution of this description can be impartially collected in this country. The very nature of this corrupt society forbids it. Arbitrary in its origin, its operation must be attended with injustice, for the Mexican has a thousand means of evading payment, the foreigner none. It is to be lamented that Mr. Bankhead’s health is now so bad, that business of any kind must be a painful annoyance to him. The French, who are much more numerous than the English here, have refused, to a man, to pay this contribution, and have addressed their Government directly on the subject. If the principle be once conceded by foreign Powers, all foreign property in this country may be considered liable to confiscation at the pleasure of the Mexican Government!

The Mexican Cabinet has been again changed. General Alcorta is Minister at War, Don Domingo Ybarra for Foreign Affairs and the Interior, and Don Vicente Romero (a vestige of the Gomez Farias party) for Justice. Rondero retains possession of the Financial Department.

Prostrated by a blockade of more than a year’s duration, trade here is of course at the lowest ebb, nor is any immediate revival to be expected from the arrival of the Americans. Before they can derive any benefit from their tariff (in which some defects have been discovered), they must have a force sufficient to secure the safe transit of merchandise and specie throughout the country, for which their present numbers are wholly insufficient. Exchange by this packet opened at 44 ½ d., and closed at 44d.

The city has just been declared in a rigorous state of siege. No one can leave it without a passport, and martial law is proclaimed.

AMERICA
August 10, 1847

[The following appeared in part only of our yesterday’s impression:]

By the packet-ship John R. Skiddy, Captain Luoe, which arrived in the Mersey on Saturday morning, we have advices from New York to the 19th ult. Inclusive. The intelligence by this arrival is important.

Our accounts from Vera Cruz extend to the 2d ult. And from the city of Mexico to the 29th of June. The United States Government, it appears from these advices, at the opening of the present year renewed to the Mexican Government the overtures previously made and rejected for the renewal of negotiations and the re-establishment of peace. The propositions advanced were, that Mexico should send commissioners to Jalapa, Havannah, or any other port, for this purpose. The Mexican Government, on the 22d of February, declined to accede to the proposition, unless, as a preliminary, the United States Government withdrew its armies from the Mexican territories, and raised the instituted blockade of the Mexican ports. On the 15th of April these requirements were pronounced by the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Buchanan, in a lengthy despatch inadmissible, neither demanded by rational honour, nor sanctioned by the practice of nation, in proof of which he instanced the case of the last negotiation instituted at Ghent during the last war of the United States and Great Britain. For a nation which had sacrificed men and money to obtain a foothold in an enemy’s country so to abandon, as was proposed, the advantages it had won without the certainty that the negotiation contemplated would secure peace, would, he argued, be puerile and suicidal. The policy of the Mexican Government had throughout been most extraordinary. She had rejected proposition after proposition of peace, though the United States President had declared before all the world that he would exact no condition derogatory to the honour of both states. If Mexico persisted in such policy peace would never be re-established; and therefore until there was some reason to believe that the Mexican Government would be willing to enter upon a more enlightened course, the United States President would renew no further propositions.
Nevertheless, the Secretary announces that such is the President's desire for peace, and such his desire that the evils of war shall not be prolonged one day later than necessary, that he now sends as a Commissioner to Mexico, possessing his full confidence, and allotted with full powers to conclude a treaty, Mr. Trist, Chief Clerk of the State Department; and in conclusion, Mr. Buchanan expresses the strong desire of the President, that the United Mexican States may maintain hereafter an elevated position among the nations of the earth.

The Mexican Minister acknowledged on the 22d of April the receipt of the despatch, which contains no indication of the nature of the treaty authorized to be concluded by Mr. Trist, stating that the whole matter had been referred for immediate consideration to the Sovereign Congress; and from the Mexican journals we learn that the body had at once been convened. Up to the 29th of June, however, no quorum had been assembled, and it was anticipated that General Scott, who had assigned the 30th of that month as the limit of the space allowed for decision on Mr. Buchanan's letter, would, if the proposal remained unaccepted, at once march upon the capital.

Nothing further had been heard at Vera Cruz of the detachments under Generals Cadwallader and Pillow; but it was thought that they had arrived at the General Scott's head-quarters.

The intelligence from the Rio Grande, New Mexico, and California, with regard to the war, is unimportant. The American papers publish an interesting, and, indeed, important public document, illustrative of the working of the new and old tariff of the country. It appears that the actual augmentation of receipts for duties for seven months and ten day, from December 1, 1846, to June 10, 1847, under the tariff of 1846, compared with the same time under the tariff of 1842, exceeded one million of dollars; and that adding the duties on the warehoused goods, the total increase was nearly one million and a half of total increase was nearly one million and a half of dollars. It appears, also, from the returns of June and July, so far received, that the rate of augmentation was progressing, and that Mr. Walker's estimate will be more than realized by the result.

THE AMERICANS IN MEXICO
August 11, 1847

General Scott, the Commander in Chief of the American forces, has addressed the following manifesto to the Mexican nation:

(From El Monitor Republicano)

"Mexicans! The recent events of the war, and the provisions which have in consequence been dictated by your Government, render it my duty to address you, for the purpose of demonstrating truths of which you are ignorant, because they are maliciously concealed from you. I do not wish you to believe me on my word of honour, although he who has never swerved from the truth has a right to be believed; but I wish you to judge of these truths from the facts which are under the connivance and subject to the test of you all.

"Whatever may have been the origin of this war, which my country found itself compelled to undertake, from inevitable causes, of which, I understand, the greater part of the Mexican people are ignorant, we consider it as a fatality; for a war always is so to the two belligerent parties, and reason and justice are called into question, if they are not entirely unknown, on both sides, each one believing that it is in possession of them. The proof of this truth is held by Mexicans as well as ourselves, since, in Mexico, as in the United States, there have existed, and do exist, two opposite parties which are desirous, the one of peace, and the other of war. Governments, however, have sacred duties, from which they cannot swerve, and those duties frequently impose, from motives of national convenience, a silence and reserve which sometimes displeases the majority of those who offer opposition from purely personal and private views. And whom Governments, which suppose that the nation reposes in them the confidence merited by a magistrate by itself elected, out not to regard.

"Reasons of state and of American continental interest compromised events in spite of the circumspection of the Cabinet of Washington, which, ardently desiring to put a period to all the differences with Mexico, left no means untied, so far as they were compatible with its honour and dignity, to attain so desirable an end; and when it cherished the most flattering expectation of obtaining its object by means of its frank explanation and of arguments, submitted to the judgment and practical wisdom of the virtuous and patriotic Government of General Herrera, the misfortune, least looked for, dispelled that grateful hope, and at once obstructed all the paths which might have led to an arrangement honourable to both nations.

"The new Government mistook the national interests as well as those of the American continent, and chose, moreover, the influence most foreign to those interests and most fatal to the future prospects and the liberty of Mexico, and the republican system which the United States deem it their duty to preserve and protect.

"Duty, however, and a regard for our own dignity, impelled us to the necessity of not losing an opportunity which was being violated by the adherents of the monarchical party, such urgent contingencies thus to avoid the complication of interests which might render our situation more difficult and more serious.

"Again, in the course of the civil war, your Government, headed by General Paredes, was overthrown, and we ourselves could not but believe that it would prove a benefit, because, whatever other persons might represent, the Government would be less deluded, and at once more patriotic and prudent, if he attended to the public welfare. Considering and weighing all probabilities, their forces, and elements, and, above all, the most general opinion respecting the pristine results of the national war, we are mistaken, as perhaps the Mexicans themselves have been, in our judgement of the real intentions of General Santa Anna, whom they recalled and our Government permitted to return.

"In this state of things, the Mexican union has seen what have been the results which all lament and ourselves sincerely; because we duly appreciate the valour and the noble decision of the unfortunates who go to war badly led, worse directed, and almost always the victims of deceit and perfidy.

"We are witnesses; and, as interested parties, we shall not be accused of partially, when we have lamented, with admiration, that the heroic behaviour of the garrison of Vera Cruz, in the valiant defense which it made, was disgraced by the general who had just been routed and put to a shameful flight by a force very inferior to that which he commanded in Buena Vista; that this general rewarded the pronunciados in Mexico, the promoters of the civil war, and outraged those who had just singularly distinguished themselves by a resistance far beyond what could have been expected, and characterized by an admirable decision.

"Lastly, the sanguinary affair of Cerro Gordo has shown the Mexican nation what may be reasonably be expected if it continues to remain in ignorance of the real state of affairs to which it has been conducted by some of its generals whom it has most distinguished, and in whom it has reposed the most confidence.

"The most hardhearted man would be melted into grief and tears at the contemplation of the battle fields in Mexico a minute after the last shot had been fired. The generals, whom this nation has paid for so many years without deriving the slightest service from them (with a few honourable exceptions), served, on the very day when they were wanted, to prejudice the cause for which they contended, by their bad example and their unskilfulness. Amongst the dead and the wounded no proofs of military honour are discerned, because they are almost reduced to the sad fate of the soldier, and this has been on all occasions, from Pulo-Alto to Cerro Gordo, the cause of the dead remaining unburied, and their wounded being abandoned to the clemency and charity of the conquerors. And soldiers who went to battle with the knowledge that this recompense awaited them well deserve to be recognized as the best in the world, because they are neither stimulated by an ephemeral glory, a sigh, or a remembrance, but only a tomb.

"Contemplate, then, honoured Mexicans, the fate of the peaceful and laborious citizens in all classes of your society. The property of the church threatened and held out as an allurement to anarchy, the fortunes of the rich proprietors indicated as the prey of rebel rapine, the merchant and the artizan, the labourer and the manufacturer, loaded with contributions, imposts, duties on consumption, and surrounded by guards and officers of the odious internal custom-houses; the literary man and the jurist, the free man of knowledge who dares to speak, persecuted without being judged by any party, or by the very Governments which abuse their power; criminals set at liberty without punishment, like those in the fortress of Perote. What then, Mexicans, is the liberty which you enjoy?

"I do not believe that the Mexicans, sons of the present age, are wanting in courage to confess errors which do not dishonour them, and to adopt a system of true liberty, peace, and union with their neighbouring brothers of the north.

"Still less do I believe that they are ignorant of the infamy with which we are assailed in the periodicals for inciting the people to rebellion. No, public spirit is not created or reanimated by falsehoods. We have not profaned your temples, violated the persons of your wives, or taken possession of your property, as they would have you believe; and we say it with pride and attest it on the evidence of your own bishops, and the curates of Tampico, Tuzpan, Matamoras, Vera Cruz, and Jalapa, and all the ecclesiastics and civil authorities in the vicinity of those districts which we have occupied. We worship the same God, and a great party of our army, as well as the population of the United States, are Roman Catholics like yourselves. We chastise crime wherever we find it, and reward merit and virtue.

"The army of the United States respects and will always respect the private property of every class, and the property of the Mexican church; and wo to him who shall fail to do so wherever we may find ourselves!

"Mexicans, the past cannot be remedied; but future evils may nevertheless be prevented. I have repeatedly declared to you that the Government and people of the United States are desirous of peace and you sincere friendship. Abandon, then, rancorous prejudices, and cease to be the tools of private ambition; behave like a great American nation/ abandon for once these habits of colonists, and learn how to be truly free, truly republican, and very soon you may be very rich and very happy, since you possess all the elements of both; but reflect that you are Americans, and that your felicity is not to be derived from Europe.

"In conclusion, I desire to proclaim, and with equal Frankness, that if it should prove necessary, an army of 100,000 men would very promptly arrive, and that the United States would not terminate their differences with Mexico, having to do so by arms, either in a precarious, uncertain, or dishonourable manner; and I should insult the enlightened part of this country were I to doubt their knowledge of this truth.

"The authority to form guerillas to make war against us will, I assure you, only be productive of evils to the country, and none whatsoever to our army, which will be able to defend itself and to proceed against them; and if, far from calming the public mind and the national passions, you endeavour to irritate them, you will reduce us to the hard necessity of resorting to reprisals, and then you will only have to thank yourselves for the consequences.

"I am marching with my army to Puebla and Mexico. I make no secret of this; from those capitals I shall once more address you. I desire peace, amity, and union; it is for you to choose whether you prefer to continue the war. At all events, rest assured that I shall never fail to keep my word.

"WINFIELD SCOTT, General. Head-quarters, Jalapa, May 11."

THE WAR WITH MEXICO
August 14, 1847

The Washington correspondent of the New York Courier and Inquirer writes from that city on the 19th of July to the following effect:

"We must now be on the eve of the most important intelligence from Mexico; and the problem will soon be solved whether we are to have war or peace. My own opinion, formed upon the latest intelligence for Puebla, is still that it will be peace. It is quite certain there is a large party, even in the present Congress of Mexico, in favour of peace; but whether they number a majority or not of that body, must be speedily determined. In the mean time it is certain, notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary--first, that the mediation of Great Britain for peace, as proffered to Mexico, has not been rejected by the Congress of Mexico, neither has it, as yet, been accepted; second, the terms proposed by Mr. Trist have not yet been rejected by the congress of Mexico at the latest dates from the capital. If they are rejected, or their acceptance delayed, General Scott will advance and take the city. But if, on the other hand, as is extremely probable, these terms should be accepted, and the treaty ratified at once by the Congress of Mexico, General Scott, in that event, will not advance beyond Puebla, but will await orders from the Government here, which would, no doubt, convene the Senate at once, so as to have the ratification exchanged, and peace re-established. I do, however, undertake to say, by intelligence direct from Puebla, that if Mr. Trist had conducted the negotiation properly, and placed his despatch in the hands of General Scott, so as to transmitted to the Mexican Government immediately after the battle of Cerro Gordo, we should have had peace long before this period. I repeat that the proceedings of the Mexican Government, shortly after the battle of Cerro Gordo, and now well known at Puebla, wherever they are published, well demonstrate that at that time Mr. Trist's proposals, if he had sent them on as he ought to have done, would have been accepted by the Government of Mexico. I still think they will be accepted; but if they are not the rejection must be attributed to this fatal delay. Whatever may be said here to the contrary, by the Union or any one else. I undertake to say, upon unquestionable authority, from Puebla, that Mr. Trist did undertake to give a military order, although, according to my information from Mexico, Mr. Buchanan's despatch and instructions to Mr. Trist were perfectly right, and are considered by all who have seen them there as most judicious and proper; yet Mr. Trist, speaking in the name of the President, did give a military order to General Scott, which necessarily delayed negotiation. I say such an order from Mr. Trist has been seen at Puebla, and has produced the utmost astonishment in the mind of every military man there who is cognizant of the fact. It is unpleasant to censure any public functionary, especially a gentleman who is so amiable in private life as Mr. Trist, but where such great public interests are involved, and such weighty responsibilities resting upon all connected with these transactions, it is right and just that the truth should be told in order that the censure may fall upon those only by whom it is merited."

MEXICAN WAR
August 16, 1847

We publish today some fresh intelligence from American, which puts us in possession of the transactions at the scene of war up to the 18th of last month. General Scott is still at La Puebla, and General Pillow and his colleague still at Perote. It is reported that Mr. Trist's mission has been so far successful that the Mexicans have at length condescended to nominate commissioners empowered to negotiate with him; but this information is contradicted by other rumours, and nothing certain appears to be known even about this rudimentary overture to peace. The minor details reported by this mail are not in themselves very significant; and yet, taken in conjunction with the accounts which have lately reached us in rather rapid succession, they may perhaps be constructed into a view of affairs somewhat different from that represented by the Americans.

In a word, we think it highly probable that General Scott is halting at Puebla simply because he cannot advance and is ashamed to retire, and that the empressment with which the Americans are endeavouring to negotiate a peace is attributable not only to their hankerings after ceded territory, but to their anxiety to extricate their army from a very unpleasant and unpromising position. Their own story is, that the General remains at Puebla to try the effect of the parley between Mr. Trist and the Mexican authorities, and that if this should produce no results, he will then at once bring the whole affair to a conclusion by marching on the capital. But why, under such circumstances, should he ever have advanced so far? Why not have parleyed from Vera Cruz instead of La Puebla. If the matter was to be settled by argument or bargain, the march and battles between La Puebla and Vera Cruz were useless and nugatory; if by intimidation and menace the continued advance to the metropolis was absolutely necessary, and nothing could be more destructive to the prestige of invincibility than such a halt as has occurred. When Napoleon demanded the keys of a capital it was at the gates, not half way on his route. If the march upon Mexico would summarily settle the negotiations which two months of bribery and bullying have not even put in train, why is not such an obvious and decisive expedient at once adopted? After the bombardment of Vera Cruz, it would be idle to conceive that any respect for Mexican feelings can be operative with the invaders. There are but two very probable conclusions--either that General Scott is perfectly aware that would gain nothing by entering Mexico, or that he knows very well he is not strong enough to get there.

We rather prefer that latter supposition, which the few incidents detailed in our present advices appear to us to confirm. It is true that the Mexicans are reported (though not with entire concurrence of authorities) to have suffered one or two additional defeats. But this very ordinary result of their enterprises is by no means of such significance as the fact that they should have again exposed themselves to the chance. Whether General Peirce did or did not repulse a large Mexican force by a very weak sortie, is neither easily ascertainable from our present intelligence, nor very important to our present argument. What is both momentous and certain is, that the very base of American operations, in uninterrupted communication with the home Government, protected by powerful shipping and strong fortifications, and garrisoned by depots and reinforcements so as almost to outnumber the force at head-quarters, was actually attacked by a Mexican army which deliberately stood an engagement with the defile of the Puente Nacional in its rear. If 10,000 troops are neither secure nor formidable behind the ramparts of Vera Cruz, how are 5,000 of them to march to La Puebla? The same remark applies to the victories reported to have been gained by Pillow and Cadwallader at Perote. That the Mexicans should have been in plight to risk a battle is far more important than that they should once more have been defeated.
Though the American garrisons have, as yet, shown themselves superior to the enemy, yet it is evident that they have work enough prepared for them in keeping open the line of operation. So General Scott remains, as he has long remained, at the La Puebla, prudently reluctant to trust to the tremendous defiles between his quarters and Chalco, or to lose himself with some 4,000 followers in a hostile and anarchical metropolis, till some noche triste like that of Cortes should crown as wanton career.

Meantime, however, even Mexican intrepidity must be growing, and even American effrontery be sinking, under the influence of these reciprocal relations. The dullest of Santa Anna's constituents will at length conclude that an invader who halts half way cannot be invincible, and the most audacious gunner of Twiggs' battery will begin to share as is said, the immediate advance of Scott after Cerro Gordo was a coup de main to hazardous even under such tempting circumstances, and that General, as we are not prepared to deny, sagaciously shrank from a step which his countrymen chalked out for him, it is clear that the delay of every hour adds to the impracticability of the final enterprise. Unless very large reinforcements are despatched, or some unforeseen element should enter into calculation, things must gradually get worse and worse for the Americans. After a time it is possible that Mexican detachments may cease to be "defeated with a loss of 250 men." After a hundred fights they, as well as their betters, may become heroes. Tlascala may again perhaps turn out some sturdy tribe of warriors. At all events, the strength of the natives must tend to increase, for by delay they have everything to gain and nothing to lose; while the Americans, entangled in rugged defiles, isolated in a hostile country, surrounded by repeated conflicts, and decimated in their depots by the dreadful vomito of the coast, must sink both in strength and spirits by every week's protraction of the struggle.

These considerations will readily, and, as we suspect, accurately explain the extreme anxiety displayed by the "conquerors" to secure a peace. Their victories had no results. They can neither proceed with any probable advantage nor retreat with any decent credit; and their paradoxical offer to purchase terms from a prostrate foe many be a measure of the greatest prudence and the highest exigency, though, if bullying had borne its expected fruits, we may safely conclude that bribery would never have been called into play. The next mail will, probably, inform us how far this question, of such infinitely greater importance to the Americans than to the Mexicans, may have been found to admit of arbitration. It is possible that the latter people may consummate a discreditable campaign by a foolish compromise, and be overreached into a sacrifice of the best chance they have yet enjoyed. It is true that the very eagerness of their enemy and attractive character of the devotion required from themselves should recommend it to their favourable notice. Their duty to their country demands nothing but sulkiness and bluster. They are not even compelled to say "No"--they have only to avoid saying "Yes." If they will but decree themselves patriots and declare themselves unconquerable, they need neither arm nor fight, but may sit valorously at home till tempted by the plunder of a self-discomfited foe. But it is doubtful whether the professions of Scott and the payments of Trist may not do their work--whether the combined tender of affection and specie may not overcome, in the rulers at least, the sullen antipathy which has hitherto performed some of the parts of patriotism, and release the Americans from their disagreeable dilemma. A lurking wish to the contrary it is difficult to avoid, for though the Mexicans have hit upon the only fashion of resisting an unprovoked invasion which could fail in arousing some sort of European sympathy, yet the disgust excited by a tyrannical and shameless aggression upon the certain favour which secures them the good wishes of others in spite of themselves.

AMERICA
August 16, 1847

The following appeared in a second edition of The Times of Saturday:

By the Royal mailsteam ship Britannia, Captain Harrison, we have advices from New York to the 31st ult., Boston to the 1st, and Halifax to the 3d inst. respectively.

The American steam ship Washington arrived at New York on the 30th ult., and the Royal mail steam ship Hibernia reached Halifax on the 31st; would reach Boston on the 2d inst.

The commercial and political news are both important. The business in foreign exchange had not been large, the demand being moderate. The quotation in the Shipping List of the 31st ult. On London is 5 ½ to 6 1/8 per cent. premium; but other accounts state that bills were offering as low as 5 per cent.
The advices taken out by the steam ship Washington, which reached New York on the 30th, had the effect of running up prices of grain and bread-stuffs to the extent of 50 cents per barrel of flour.

Money was plentiful, and business generally was active, with some tendency to speculation.

On freights, flour had been taken to London at 3s. 10 ½ d. to 4s. 3d.

General Business was active.

The following are the political accounts, extracted from the New York Herald:

"Advices from Vera Cruz on the 18th inst. mention that General Pierce with 2,500 men, had a battle near National Bridge with 4,000 Mexicans and defeated them. The Mexicans about 150. General Pierce returned to Vera Cruz for reinforcements.

"Later accounts, however, do not confirm this statement. They say that General pierce had encamped 10 miles from the city, when scouts from his rear-guard came in and reported that a large force of Mexicans were at the National Bridge, marching towards Vera Cruz. Everything was got ready for an expected attack. The shipping removed from between the city and the Castle. General Pierce came in and took a reinforcement of 7,000 men, and again marched to meet the enemy.

"Colonel De Russy, who went out from Tampico to see what had become of the American prisoners on their way to Tampico, was attacked by 1,200 Mexicans at Huequetla. He was surrounded, and placed in great peril, but he cut his way through the enemy's lines, with the loss of 20 killed and 10 wounded.

"General Scott was still at Puebla. Generals Cadwallader and Pillow were at Perote. They had defeated the Mexicans at Lahoya. We learn of the appointment of Commissioners by the Mexican Government to confer with Mr. Trist, at San Martin Tesmalaucan, on the 8th, and through him the terms offered by the President. A letter from Mexico, dated the 2d, says there is no doubt but that the treaty will be concluded immediately by the Commissioners, the peace party is so strong, and that Santa Anna will probably pronounce for peace. The names of the Commissioners given are Garostise, Baronda, and Tornel."

Other accounts, however, throw doubts upon the reported appointment of Commissioners also.

From Canada we have accounts to the 29th ult. The Parliament had adjourned, after repealing all differential duties. An address to the Crown had been voted, praying the repeal of the Navigation Laws, so far as they bear upon the colony. The immigration from Ireland and the dreadful mortality among the emigrants attracted great attention, and excited much discussion.

On the 28th the Governor-General closed the session with the following speech:

Lion. Gentlemen of the Legislative Council and Gentlemen

Of the legislative Assembly

"In relieving you for the present from attendance in this place, I have to thank you for the zeal and assiduity in the discharge of you important duties which have enabled you, during the course of a session of comparatively short duration, to consider and perfect many measures which promise to be of great advantage to the community.

"I sincerely trust that the alterations which you have made in the provincial tariff, and the additional facilities afforded to trade by the extension of bonding and warehousing privileges, will be productive of benefit to the colony, and tend to the promotion of its commercial and agricultural interests.

"I have observed with satisfaction the attention which you have bestowed on the several projects which have been brought before you for developing the mineral resources of the province, and improving its means of internal communication.

"I trust that the measures which you have passed for the amendment of certain provisions of the criminal code, for the protection of mercantile interests, for rendering the common school act of Upper Canada more effective, and for placing the municipal institutions of Lower Canada on improved footing, will be attended with beneficial results.

"The prevalence of disease among the immigrants who have arrived from Europe this session has occasioned me much concern. I have not failed to bring this subject under the consideration of Her Majesty's Secretary of State, and to represent the necessity of adopting measures to place emigration to this colony under more efficient regulation. Meanwhile my warmest acknowledgements are due to you for the liberal provision which you have made for relieving the indigent and preventing disease from spreading in the province. The charitable exertions of the clergy, of the ladies attached to the religious communities, and of benevolent individuals among the laity, who have, at the hazard of their lives, ministered to the necessities of the sick, are beyond any praise which it is in my power to offer; but I cannot refrain on this occasion from paying a tribute to their devotedness and Christian zeal.

"Gentlemen of the House of Assembly,

"I thank you in the name of Her Majesty for the readiness with which you have voted the supplies necessary for the public service and for maintaining the credit of the province.

"Hon. Gentlemen and Gentlemen,

"The several addresses to the queen which you have transmitted through me have been duly forwarded to be laid at the fact of the throne.

"By exercising the influence which you possess in your respective districts to carry out local improvements and give full effect to the wise and salutary enactments of the Legislature, you may render services to the community hardly less important than those which you discharge while you are assembled here. I am confident that these duties will engage your attention on your return to your homes, and I earnestly pray that our exertions for the advancement of the various interests of this noble province, and for the benefit of all classes of the inhabitants, may be attended with the Divine blessing."

The Hon. the Speaker of the Legislative Council then declared that it was the pleasure of his Excellency the Governor-General that the Parliament should stand prorogued to Monday, the 6th of September.

US and Mexico
August 16, 1847

American Affairs
The Administration have discovered, that in regard to the Mexican affairs, they have been traveling rather too fast, and, preparatory to retracing some of their hasty steps, they are seeking "scape-goats," as an offering for their sins.

The St. Louis Republican of the 17th inst. mentions the reception of letters from Santa Fe to the 27th of May. One of the letters states that "on the 22nd of May Colonel Price discovered that there were instructions from the War Department, which had been received by the last mail, brought by Mr. Boggs, directed to the Colonel commanding in Santa Fe, in which it was announced that the President refused to sanction any of the acts of General Kearney, so far as they confer such rights. On the strength of these instructions, Colonel Price, officially demanded the release and remission of the sentence of Antonio Maria Trajillo, convicted of treason against the Government of the United States. The accused was thereupon set at liberty."

On this discovery, at this last day, I have no disposition to comment at present. Similar military usurpations were practiced in California, and other parts of the Mexican territory. A few weeks will, probably, bring forth something on the subject which may enlighten us all. Whether the orders which General Kearney received were, or were not, so loosely drawn as to be totally misunderstood by him, remains to be decided. If, however, he has thus acted without authority, he is in no great danger of suffering. He married a daughter of Colonel Brenton, the distinguished senator in Congress from Missouri.

Everything seems to indicate that the Administration batteries are preparing to assault General Scott, if it shall be deemed expedient. He is now charged by the subordinates with defeating the peace negotiation, in not forwarding, promptly, the overtures of Mr.
Buchanan, as presented by Mr. Trist, and referred to in my last letter. At the same time, it is said, by the same party, that the General has halted, and will not enter the city of Mexico until it is ascertained that Mr. Bankhead’s friendly mission has totally failed. It is positively asserted that General Scott was ordered to halt.

These statements and assertions are fabulous. The plain truth is, that General Scott has not been in a situation to advance. He was, at the last accounts (the 29th of June), so hemmed in, that he deemed it inexpedient to move until reinforced. He has been grossly deceived by the Administration at every step he has taken. Nor will he be commiserated, even by his friends. It is within my personal knowledge that they warned him of the danger of being embarrassed by the Administration when he should most want and need their support. But he was credulous. The consequence is, he has felt, and continues to feel, the direful effect of that credulity.

In my last letter I stated that General Scott was included with Mr. Trist in the same commission. This statement was incorrect; he was not named as a commissioner, and not being so named he committed a gross error in refusing to forward, as requested by Mr. Trist, a letter addressed to the Mexican Government. Having nothing to do with the negotiation, it was his duty to forward the dispatch presented to him, even by Mr. Trist, who was well known to the General as the representative of the American government.

Some anxiety pervades this community in relation to the present situation of General Scott. I am not among the number that entertain any apprehension for his safety. I feel perfectly confident, if attacked even in his weak state, he will put his assailants to flight. It may, however, cause him some hard fighting. But a triumphant victory us considered certain. It is somewhat extraordinary however, that neither Generals Cadwallader nor Pillow, who were on their march to join General Scott, have been heard from. It may be, but it is not probable, that a strong Mexican force has interrupted the progress of these detachments.

Yesterday the steamer Washington arrived in this port, after a passage of 14 days and some hours, from Southampton. An English paper of the 15th of July brought by the Washington, commences an article, "The Mexican war is evidently drawing to a close." I wish I could say I entertained a similar opinion, but I cannot. I can see no present prospect of peace, and yet it may take place in ten days. This Government is most heartily sick of the war, and none more so than Mr. Polk. It is a ridiculous false pride that induces him to continue it. An open, frank, and manly policy would secure a treaty of peace in one month. Such an elevated statesman as Henry Clay would soon accomplish that desirable object. I regret to add that I fear Mr. Polk is more anxious to terminate the war than Santa Anna or his adherents; but he knows not how.

The emigrant fever, as it is termed, has lost much of its terror in this city. It has not been extended to our settled population. Very few have been affected by it, and of those few proportion only have died.

In Canada it ravages have been, and continue to be, most appalling. The various public journals concur in representing it as of an alarming character. A Montreal paper, under date of July 24th, says, during the week ending at date were 235 deaths; during the same period last year 60; increase 175. On Saturday there were 1,712 sick in the emigrant sheds, and 32 deaths in the preceding 24 hours.

The St. Johns Herald states that of the emigrants who left Great Britain for Quebec alone, 4,095 never reached their destination, having died at sea or at quarantine. About 600 more perished at sea by shipwreck, making about 4,700 deaths up to the 30th June. The ship Avon, Johnston, of St. Johns was at Grosse Isle, with all the crew and passengers sick, and 136 out of 550 dead. Small-pox has again broken out on board her Majesty's troop ship Apollo. One of the Church of England ministers, Rev. W. Chatterton, Lieutenant Lloyd, R.N., Mr. Crispo, Captain Christian, of the ship Sisters, and several others are also dead.

It is now certain that there are sufficient funds in the treasury of Pennsylvania to meet the payment of their August interest due on Monday. Foreign stockholders naturally fell some anxiety on the subject. The money market remains easy. Sterling Exchange firm at ? to 6 per cent. Flour, moderate demanded, and at ? to 6 firm.

P.S. Since writing the proceeding, a telegraphic dispatch from Richmond furnishes the following. It is proper that I should add, my opinion in regard to the question of peace or war remains unchanged.

A Genevese Traveler
New York, July, 30, 2 PM
By early telegraphic dispatch from Richmond we have important advices from Mexico, including Vera Cruz, dates to the 18th inst. General Pierce, having marched from Vera Cruz with 2,500 to reinforce General Scott, had a collision near the National Bridge with a Mexican force, estimated that 4,000, who were defeated with a loss of about 150. General Pierce (the dispatch says) returned to Vera Cruz for reinforcements.

Second dispatch

General Scott still remained at Puebla at the last advices. Generals Cadwallader and Pillow were at Perote. There had been a collision at La Haya, in which the Mexicans were worsted as usual. The Mexican Government is said to have appointed two commissioners to confer with Commissioner Trist. Santa Anna is supposed to favor peace. Colonel De Russy was recently surrounded and attacked by 1,2000 Mexicans at Heujutla. His position was at first critical, even perilous, but he cut his way through the enemy with the loss of 60 killed and 20 wounded.

Later

The news of a battle between General Pierce and the Mexicans, which was a rumor by a passenger in the cars, is not confirmed. By the report of the captain of the steamer Orleans, as published in the Picayune, it appears that he left Vera Cruz on the 14th inst., at which time General Pierce had reached the National Bridge, with 2,500 men and 150 wagons, on the march towards Puebla. The Orleans arrived at Tampico on the 15th, where the captain was informed by Colonel Gates of the departure of Colonel De Russy up the river with 120 men, partly Baltimorean, in search of the Mexican prisoners lately released. He landed with 150 mules near Huejutla, and was surrounded by 1,200 or 1,400 Mexicans, and had to cut his way through and return toward the river, and was there awaiting for reinforcements. Colonel Yates dispatched the Orleans back to Vera Cruz with a requisition to Governor Wilson for four Companies of Infantry, and sent at the same time 150 men up the river to the relief of De Russy. The Orleans arrived at Vera Cruz on the 16th, and found the city in a state of great excitement. General Pierce had encamped 10 miles from the city, when scouts from his rear guard came in, and reported that large forces of Mexicans were at the National Bridge, marching towards Vera Cruz. Everything was get ready for an expected attack; the shipping removed from the city and castle. General Pierce came in and took a reinforcement of 700 men and again marched to meet the enemy. Colonel Gate's requisition could not be complied with, but the Orleans received 25 marines and returned to Tampico, when she arrived on the 28th, and learned that De Russy's detachment, in returning near Huejutla, in a narrow pass, surrounded by 1,200 or 1,400 Mexicans, who commenced a heavy fire from all directions, but fled though the chaparral after six or eight rounds of grape. De Russy continued at intervals for several days to fight his way back to the river, where he was received by Colonel Gate's reinforcements. He reached Tampico on the night of the 16th, with a loss of 20 killed, 10 wounded, 2 missing, and 20 horses were killed. De Russy received several balls through his clothes, and Captain Wyse had three horses shot under him. The Mexican loss is represented at 150. Lieutenant Whipple has been lassoed near Vera Cruz. Captain W. Dough died on the 16th, and Lieutenant Parker, of the navy, died on the 12th, on board of the Mississippi. The Sun of Anahuac on the 13th says, that by private express from Puebla, intelligence had been received that Cadwallader and Pillow, with the trains, had arrived at Perote, and had been attacked at Lahaya by a large Mexican force and completely routed the enemy with but little loss. This express left Puebla on the 3rd, and the news was received there the day previous, that three commissioners had been appointed to meet Mr. Trist at San Martin in the 8th, and learn through him the terms offered by the President. A letter from Mexico, dated the 2nd, says there is no doubt but that the treaty will be concluded immediately by the commissioners, the peace party is so strong, and that Santa Anna will probably pronounce for peace. The names of the commissioners given are Oarostiz, Baranda, and Tornel. News from General Scott from Puebla to Vera Cruz was murdered after a desperate resistance. The Picayune's express was attacked and robbed of his letters, and left for dead. But other letters reached Vera Cruz, and say that peace is the order of the day, but believe that Santa Anna only wishes to gain time.

Americans in Mexico

Eighteen months have not elapsed since the President of the United States communicated to the American Congress the intelligence that they were the motives which impelled Mr. Polk to the origination of so serious an incident in the annual register of a nation were so candidly discussed at the time. It was asserted that the war arose from a source little more
Mr. Polk looked for a short campaign and a summary surrender. He dreamt, like Napoleon in 1812, of deputation and offerings, of cessions and spoils. He thought to acquire a province at the cost of a parade, and to discover a new planet for his star-spangled banner without the mentionable expenditure of labor or time. Now, supposing that the next dispatches should bring the actual intelligence of a treaty on the specified basis, the account will run thus:- The Americans have been subjected to the drain of an eighteen months' war on a far more ruinous scale than any of their recent armaments. No very close approximation has yet been made to the precise amount of the penalty thus incurred, but it has gone far to postpone that revision of the American tariff, to which previous experience was leading, which was so emphatically called for by the reforms and prospects of other states, and which would have spoken so powerfully for transatlantic wisdom amongst the people of Europe. Instead of the conquest, Mr. Polk can only point to what by the most favorable appellation must be termed a compromise. Instead of enriching the Exchequer, or reducing the burdens of his country, he has retarded, it may be for years, its opportunities of sage experiment or enlightened reform. At an early period of the war, it was industriously set forth that Mexico would identify her conquerors for the expenses which they condescended to incur; but as this claim gradually became larger and larger, it was proportionally withdrawn from notice, and such impracticable arrangement no longer figures in any sketch of the preliminaries. Six months ago, before the battles of Vera Cruz, the advance of Puebla, or the dispatch of reinforcements, the costs of the war were stated in Congress by a calculating senator to approach 30,000,000 of dollars. By the same estimate the marketable value of California was set down at 15,000,000. Omitting therefore, the intermediate accumulations of expenditure, and stating the case in a form most familiar to transatlantic capacities, it may be said that America has exposed herself to the hazard of disgrace and the repudiation of Europe for the sake of purchasing an unnecessary commodity at twice its worth.

But this is not all. It is notorious that the United States can receive no considerable accession of territory without the agitation of a question which may involve the most mementos results. A large and powerful portion of the union is resolved that slavery, if it cannot be abolished in the states where it is at present legalized, shall least never be introduced into any newly annexed province; and the energy displayed in such matters on our own shores may lead to a pretty safe interference as to the obstinacy with which this not unreasonable point may be insisted on abroad. On the other hand, it is alleged and declared with equal violence that slave labour will be more than ever indispensable in bringing under cultivation a prolific but encumbered soil, promising abundant returns, but demanding extraordinary outlays of capital and labour. The best informed prophets of this dispute are unable to anticipate its decision, but it has been very palingly hinted that the eventual disruption of the Union and the formation of two separate and hostile powers on the North American continent, army be the consequence of so inveterate a dissenion. Other anticipations combine with this provisional suspicion. Instead of extinguishing opposition by the dazzling splendor of conquest and the emollient importation of plunder, he has raised up by the events of the war a formidable rival to his own fame. He has given his adversaries an inexhaustible topic of incentive, disheartened his friends by the falseness of his position, and determined the course of neutrals by the ill success of his speculation. That quite so mischievous a result was to be apprehended from the beginning, we do not say was probable. It was, perhaps, not easy to calculate on the operation of the several substitutes for patriotism and valor which have befriended the Mexicans. But very few persons will be found, we think, to lament the disappointment of such unholy hopes, from whatever cause arising.

A philosophical historian would hardly be dissatisfied with the moral of the chapter as it at present stands; but we do not conceal our suspicions that the catastrophe may possibly have yet to come. The arguments which are said to have reached Santa Anna must necessarily be listed to a narrow circle of converts. But a short time ago it was announced that the Mexican Congress had refused to assemble or to debate; that they had refused to delegate the power of the Executive to another, or to exert it themselves, and that Santa Anna would be left to a self-conferred Dictatorship or to utter incompetence. That he and his fellow proselytes may proclaim the termination of hostilities, is not unlikely, if his disposition has been fairly represented in the last reports; and, perhaps, such timely compact may enable general Scott decamp from La Puebla with the honors of peace. But there still remain the feelings of an invaded and exasperated nation to be cajoled or subdued, and this task, not always very practicable to more efficient administrations, may possibly be beyond the strength of that faction or coalition which is termed the Government of Mexico. "There are two things," says a noble historian, "which are generally popular in their beginning; the first is a war, and second is peace." Mr. Polk’s war certainly claimed its share of favour; but though his peace may undoubtedly demand the welcome which the lesser evil always deserves, we think it will pass even his ingenuity to represent it as an advantageous bargain or an honorable conclusion.

AMERICAN AFFAIRS.
August 30, 1847

NEW YORK, August 14.

During the last three of four days this city has been inundated with rumours in relation to General Scott and his command. It has been confidently stated that an action had taken place between his army and the troops of Mexico, near that city, in which the latter had been defeated and completely routed. It is further stated that General Scott, after the action had received Mexican commissioners, who in due form had surrendered the city to the conquering General, he pledging himself that the private property, &c., should be respected. He entered the city, it is said, on the 17th of July. Another account states that no opposition was made to his entry.

It is reduced to a certainty that the date cannot be correct. In fact, although the rumour is received from different quarters, yet, as no details are given, its accuracy is generally doubted. The account most direct is from a letter written by a lady in Mexico, dated the 17th of July, to a gentleman in New Orleans, in which she says--"General Scott, at the head of his army, is now marching into the city."

It would be a waste of time, if nothing worse, to attempt a repetition of all the rumours that are constantly received from Mexico; and perhaps my opinion on the question of peace or war is more frequently given than is necessary; but, witnessing as I do daily the anxiety that is evinced here to learn the opinions of those who are supposed to watch the movements of the hostile armies, I have thought that some of your readers might wish to know whether your correspondent had changed his view of the question, which for more than a year he had contended presented no aspect but that of unrelenting warfare. On the 31st of July, by the Richmond telegraph, we were informed that Mexico had appointed commissioners to negotiate a peace. I expressed to you my unbelief of this tale. The result had proved that I was correct.

In one particular, and in one only, all parties seem to concur, and that is--Mr. Trist’s mission has totally failed, notwithstanding the friendly interference of the British Minister, which was volunteered. In my letter to you of the 15th June I predicted that such would be its result. It is now said that General Scott will probably be authorized to negotiate, while another section of the party in power speak of Mr. Buchanan, the Secretary of State, as the individual who will be charged with the negotiation, so soon as Mexico is prepared to receive him as Envoy Extraordinary for the special purpose.

But, in judging of the prospects of peace, we must look back and inquire what are the difficulties to be overcome, and what the probability of success. I will only refer to two or three points, early assumed by the President and his followers, viz. :-

1st. That the boundary on the Rio Grande must and should be arranged according to the will and pleasure of Mr. Polk.

2. That California, New Mexico, &c, should be transferred to the United States for a mere nominal sum.

3. That the American claims for spoliation on their commerce should be paid.

4. That the Mexican Government should pay all the expenses incurred by the United States in prosecuting the present war.

5. That the American Government would hold, and continue to hold, until the preceding stipulations were complied with, all that district of country which their army might conquer.
Now, it is not my intention to enter into a discussion of these or any other points of difficulty. I present them merely to show that there are difficulties to adjust, and sacrifices to be made, before a treaty of peace can be concluded, and, permit me to add, not less important measures to be adopted before it can be ratified by the Senate. There is the preliminary question--is the territory, which may be acquired by conquest or by purchase, to be considered a slave-holding territory, or is it not? This question will be warmly debated, both in and out of Congress, and may convulse the Government to its centre.

Some time ago I referred to then existing difficulties in California. Since that period these difficulties have been greatly increased, insomuch that the present situation of the territory is a disgrace to the American Government, which has assumed the control of it, and appointed officers to manage its affairs, whose duty it is to execute the laws in such a way as best to promote the happiness and welfare of the people. The consequences have been of a most disgraceful character. Colonel Freemont has been arrested by General (now Governor) Kearney, and ordered to the United States to be tried by a court-martial. It is stated that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Walker, has made an arrangement with Messrs. Rothschild for all the specie the United States may require in Mexico. The specie is to be furnished when required, and drafts on the Treasury to be given for the amount supplied from time to time. Interest to commence when Messrs. Rothschild have notified to the American Government the amount supplied. This will probably prove a convenience to both parties, and will certainly relieve, to a limited extent, the heavy drafts upon our hands for specie to carry on the war with Mexico.

In a former letter I expressed an opinion that the Whig party would probably have in the next House of Representatives a majority of 10 or 12 members. Owing to the unexpected divisions in strong Whig districts in Kentucky, two Loofooos have succeeded, where large Whig majorities voted for different candidates, both of which were defeated. I yet believe, however, that there will be a Whig majority in the house of eight or ten.

A GENEVESE TRAVELLER

Mexico, affairs of September 6, 1847

Contrary to general expectation, another month has passed without any movement on the part of General Scott, whose army remains stationary at Puebla. This is the more surprising, as the convoy of stores and money, as long detained by the attacks of the guerrillas, entered Puebla, with a strong reinforcement of troops, early in this month, and thus placed the American General in a position to resume the offensive; for it was not supposed that the rains now falling would be any serious obstacle to his hardy followers, and letter were actually received here from General Worth, stating that if peace should not be made previously, the American cannon would be heard here at the latest on the 25th. It may be the policy of General Scott to keep the Mexicans in a state of alarm by these rumors, which have now been made by Santa Anna, who is apparently now anxious for peace. On the 13th inst. He succeeded in getting Congress together, and having laid Mr. Buchanan’s letter before them, required their opinion as to whether Mr. Trist should be received. Congress replied, evasively, that the faculty of negotiating with foreign powers belonged to the Executive by right, subject to their ratification, and that it was not for them to advise the President on a point not constitutionally before them, though it was well known that they were in favour of continuing the war. Dissatisfied with this ambiguous reply, Santa Anna again addressed Congress, through the Minister of Foreign Affairs, reminding them that the decree of the 20th of April, by which he was invested with extraordinary powers to carry on the war, absolutely prohibited him from making peace. This constitutional prerogative being thus curtailed, he insisted on a categorical answer from Congress. The consequence of this communication was the immediate departure of several member from town, in order to prevent the possibility of Congress again, meeting thus leaving the President to his own devices, and his question unanswered. Santa Anna perceived the snare laid for him by Congress, who desire to fix the whole odium of making peace on him, and hesitate how to act. Meantime, to free himself from the criticisms of the press, he has prohibited all publications, except the Diario del Gobierno. That paper has published, in a very good translation, the article in The Times of the 10th of May, in which Mexico is held up to the scorn of the world. A hundred copies have been ordered to be distributed amongst the army. The avowed object of this measure is to excite the soldiery, by showing them what other nations think of them; and probably some satisfaction is found in circulating the severe censure which the article contains on the United States. Latterly some articles of a decidedly peaceful character have appeared in the Diario, but though Santa Anna may be desirous of peace, it is not certain that the Americans will recognize in him, circumstances as he new is, an authority competent to negotiate with them. They consider themselves overreached by him already, and are extremely distrustful of any proposal emanating from him. To bring all parties to an understanding of their relative positions, and establish real negotiations, the capture of this city seems an indispensable preliminary. The Americans will gain nothing by their present system of inaction, for in the qualities of passive resistance and obstinacy the Mexicans may fairly compete with any people on the globe. General Valencia, who took the command of the garrison of San Luis Potosi in expectation of an attack from Taylor, has been recalled to assist at the defense of this city. He has brought with him 4,000 or 5,000 men, and 30 pieces of cannon. If the Mexicans had any spirit left, their numbers are amply sufficient to justify the hope of success. Valencia is opposed to peace. He is one of the few Generals whom Santa Anna cannot wholly control; a votary of Bacchus and a man of ordinary stamp, his influence is confined to the troops; yet amidst the changes constantly occurring here, there would be nothing extraordinary in his superseding Santa Anna in the Government. General Scott has adopted the net very defensible expedient of arming the criminals found in the goals of Puebla against the guerrillas, and apparently with success, for not a word has been heard lately of those bands. Even the bold priest Jaranta seems to have retired from field. General Pearce, with another convoy and 2,000 or 3,000 men, has reached Jalapa un molested. His arrival at Puebla will, perhaps, be the signal for the long delayed advance of General Scott. The latest accounts from Saltillo represent General Taylor as still at Monterey, occupied in drilling the new troops, which have joined him in considerable numbers. He sent a detachment lately into the state Zacatecas to liberate some carts of rice, from San Luis, destined for his army, which had been seized at Mazapil, and carried them off without opposition.

Public attention has been much occupied during the present month by General Santa Anna’s decrees for levying forced donations of money. The first of these exhibited a certain degree of caution. It was stated in the preamble to be for once only (por una vez); the maximum for each individual was fixed at 2,00 dollars, and the reparation was interested for the Governor and the mercantile tribunal. Growing bolder, Santa Anna immediately after issued another decree, raising the maximum to 3,000 dollars, and the parties who had been previously assessed at 2,000 found themselves called upon for another 1,000, all to be paid in three days under penalty of the amount being doubled. Still the scheme did not work to Santa Anna’s satisfaction, and he issued a third decree, relieving the Governor from the necessity of consulting the tribunal, and empowering the governor to make a corrected assessment by his sole authority. The Governor found this task rather difficult, so that a fourth decree became necessary, appointing a new consulting body to assist him, but at the same time exempting him from the necessity of following their advice. By this decree a wider range was given to the exaction, which was extended 60,000 dollars, the maximum of 3,000 dollars being retained, and the maximum reduced from 25 to 5. In all these schemes foreigners were included, but I have strong grounds for believing that this was done as an experiment, with little expectation that they would pay. The foreign ministers, however, silently acquiesced, except on the appearance of the fourth decree, when some efforts were made by the Spanish Minister to liberate his countrymen and the French (who are temporarily under his charge) from its effects. The English have addressed Lord Palmerson on the subject by his packet. A primary error was undoubtedly committed by Mr. Canning in treating with the insurgent colonies of Spain as settled Governments or civilized nations. Time has demonstrated the fact. In this portion of Spanish America the effect has soon seen in the decrees of its ephemeral Governments for levying forced loans, the bulk of which invariably fell upon foreigners. The reparation of these forced loans, as now as now of this forced donation, was made without reference to property. It was the result of caprice, of ignorance, and not unfrequently of malice; while private favoritism generally exempted the Mexican capitalist from payment. Indeed, the most wealthy of the latter class, as the most influential, have always the best chance of escape. Submitted to for a time, the injustice was at length felt to be intolerable, and at the period of the peace with France, Mr. Packenham obtained from the Mexican Government a formal relinquishment of the right to impose forced loans to foreigners. With the sole difference that nothing is said about returning the money, the principle now set up is precisely the same as that formerly abandoned; and the lists of contributors exhibit the same glaring inconsistencies, needy foreigners being in many cases rated higher than wealthy Mexicans. The English have paid under protest, and now apply their Government for redress. It is apparent that the appeal will not be made in vain, for so surely as the right of levying these forces donations is conceded to the rulers of Mexico will the cost of their endless revolutions be thrown on the foreign commercial body, and in an excessive proportion on the English.

It is understood that an arrangement has been come to between the agent of the English bondholders and Santa Anna respecting the late conversion of the debt. I will not call it final, as it would be an error to use to term in connexion with anything Mexican. Should peace now be made with the United States it is probable that civil disturbances will immediately be renewed, and that the country will ultimately be divided, like Columbia, into separate states. Already a civil contest on a small scale has commenced between Zacatecas and Aguas Calientes, the former desiring to "annex" the latter. The army of Zacatecas numbers 130 warriors, while that of her opponent is estimated at 100. Of course taxation will be necessary to support the expenses of the campaign.

I have just learnt that in a council of war Santa Anna declared that it was useless to think of opposing the Americans in the open field, and explained his plans to be the fortification and defense of all the approaches to the city, where he proposes to concentrate his forces. If this plan be acted on, the city will of course be bombarded. [Exchange on London, 43d. [KAS]

Mexican Affairs
September 9

When we closed our comments upon Mexican affairs the other day with a conjecture that very few people would be found taking any great interest in the finally result of the conflict we went, we fear, a little beyond the mark. SANTA ANNA has hit upon a device, which, if he can successfully prosecute it, will irresistibly attract the attention and sympathy of this country towards the fortunes of Central America. This is nothing less than making Englishmen pay the expenses of the war.

The letters which we published from our correspondent on the spot gave a summary detail of the measures by which the Mexican Dictator had arrived at this very satisfactory point. The first proclamation of a forced donation appeared at the beginning of July, shortly after that restoration to popularity, which alternated so rapidly with this ignominious expulsion from the capital. It commenced humbly and with deprecation. The resort to this source of revenue was alleged to be por una vez - "only for this once," and the subscription was modestly limited to 2,000 dollars. The governor of the city and the tribunal of commerce were intrusted with the discovery and assessment of each individual's ability, no foreigners being exempted from the impost. When no very desperate insurrection was found to follow upon this announcement, the General grew bolder, and by an explanatory decree raised the maximum to 3,000 dollars instead of 2,000 and graciously extended the minimum of admissible contributions from 25 dollars to 5, while the powers of the city warden for raising the rates were made more summary and absolute. No remonstrance from any foreign Minister seems to have been called forth, except that M. De. Castro, who is at present charged with the combined interests of France and Spain in Mexico, made some feeble efforts at the eleventh hour to liberate his own flock.

Now, the consequences of such a measure as this, if passed without protest, will obviously be somewhat derogatory to our position, and remarkably detrimental to our interests in that part of the globe. We are willing to admit, to the full, the amenability of British subjects, or the subjects of any other country, to the laws, ordinances, and fortunes of the state in which they have voluntarily taken up their abode. If they can benefit of foreign advantages, they become liable of foreign reverses. We will admit that it is only by the prescriptive courtesy of war that they are exempted from the liabilities attending a siege or a capture. But the very utmost that can be said is, that they should take their fair turn amongst the citizens with whom they have cast in their lot; and that this equitable rule will be most assuredly transgressed in Mexico it hardly needed the last month's experience to teach us. The repartition or allotment of this compulsory loan is never conducted on any principles of justice or impartiality. It is of course seldom resorted to but on those somewhat frequent occasions when the State is in desperation, and even ordinary laws suspended; and its arrangement is dictated alternately by caprice, malice, favoritism, or the rather more venial necessity of repairing to the only quarter where there is anything to be got. The consequence is, that the few native capitalists accessible employ their wealth and influence in procuring a comparative exemption from the imposts, and their names appear in the arbitrary list of the assessments as rated at a similar quota than the needy or defenseless foreigners from whose purses the required sum is made up. A native may allege his poverty, and find easy and reasonable credence, but a foreigner can hardly do so. His very residence and occupation in a strange city presupposes some more or less lucrative compensation for his exile, and his unacquaintance with the indigenous arts of eluding taxes leaves him exposed to the whole brunt of the levy. It is on these grounds that he so much demands protection. If there are ninety-nine Mexicans and one Englishman in the case, it is next to certain that he will be made paymaster for the hundred. It is to save him from paying all that he must be released from the necessity of paying any; or if he must needs to be taxed for the honor and indulgence of living in the climate of Vera Cruz or under the constitution of Mexico, his acknowledgments should be specifically commuted for a definite tribute.

This proceeding of Santa Anna's is the more sufferable from the impudent evasion of a compact by which it has been attempted. The consideration of the matter had so far impressed previous Governments with a sense of the steps necessary to be taken, that a correspondence was opened on the subject at the termination of the late hostilities between Mexico and France, and the British Minister obtained from the Government of the former State a formal abandonment of her real or supposed rights to impose forced loans upon foreigners within their dominions. Being thus excluded from borrowing, Santa Anna resorts to stealing. He demands a donation instead of a loan; he extorts with impunity as a free gift what he would be liable to punishment for taking upon terms, and removes his exaction of money from the forbidden category by quietly communicating his intention never to return it. This even surpasses the famous evasion of the Climbing-boys Act, by which, when it was forbidden to send the boy up the chimney the attenuated urchin was taken up to the tiles and sent down. The British residents have chosen the pacific part of paying their present contributions, but under protest, and they have addressed a memorial to Lord Palmerston on the subject which might set a less inflammable Minister in a blaze.

That the expenses of an English man should be pinned upon the politics of a Mexican is something terrifically outrageous. It is bad enough in any case to be liable for the indefinite bills to another, but in such a case as this it passes the bounds of possible patience. All the credit of the Rothschilds could hardly meet the demands which the political extravagances of these pugnacious provinces would find for it. Nothing probably could be more delightful to Mexican minds than the reflection that they were left to their own revolutions with somebody else to pay for them. There is actually now ever prospect that if the smart-money of the Americans should be accepted, ad the Mexicans should be left without any enemies but each other, the swords at present drawn and flourished in empty bravado would be instantaneously employed in an internecine war of massacres and assassinations. The wriggling and ravenous little creatures detected by the microscope in a turbid puddle do not prey upon each other with more incessant fury than these tadpole States. It is rumored that the separate independence of each individual province will be speedily proclaimed, some accepting the protection of the United States and some of the Republic of Yucatan; nor does it seem certain that the subdivision will cease even here, for at this very moment a murderous melodrame is in rehearsal on the borders of Guadalaxara, where the city of Zacatecas, with an army of one hundred and thirty fighting men is preparing to "annex" the neighboring town of Aguas Calientas, which can only bring one hundred to oppose them. Such is the programme for the revolutions of the ensuing winter, the expenses of which, if the present precedent be allowed, will inevitably, says our correspondent, "be thrown on the foreign commercial body, and in an excessive proportion on the English."

This Court resumed its sittings after vacation this morning.

IN RE WILLIAM SPARROW.

This insolvent was heard a few weeks since, and an adjournment had taken place to allow of some arrangement being come to with the opposing creditor.

To day the insolvent again appeared, and it being announced that a judgement was prayed by the opposing creditor.

The learned CHIEF COMMISSIONER said, that his opinion of the case was unaltered, and he had hoped that the case during the adjournment would have been adjusted. The brother and the sister of the insolvent have given testimony as to certain advances from them to the insolvent, and he (the learned Commissioner) must repeat an opinion before expressed, that their evidence was unsatisfactory, and should therefore apply the provisions of the 76th section to this case. Doubting the testimony of the brother, and disbelieving that of the sister, the judgment of the Court was, that the insolvent be discharged at the expiration of six months from the date of his visiting order.

IN RE ROBERT EVERITT.

This insolvent was opposed by Mr. Cooke on behalf of the trustees of the Summersham turnpike-road, Hunts.

The complaint was, that the insolvent had obtained a lease of the tolls of the above-mentioned road by means of fraudulently obtaining a false signature to the usual bond.
Mr. Applegath, clerk to the London agents of the trustees, swore that the insolvent and a person who signed the bond as Thomas Couling came to the office together and execute the deed.

Mr. Couling, an omnibus proprietor, was called, and swore that the signature on the bond was not his writing.

Evidence was given that the trustees had sued Mr. Couling for $736, arrears due by the insolvent, but had failed in consequence of the signature being proved to be false.

The insolvent said he signed the bond, but never saw any other person do so. A Mr. Bonns was with him at the time of signing the bond.

His HONOUR said, he would give the insolvent an opportunity of verifying his statement by calling Bonns, and therefore should adjourn the case for a week.

The new act for transferring the insolvency business from the Bankruptcy Court to this tribunal takes effect after this date, September 15.

Wholesale Annexation
September 17, 1847

The New Era, the Liberty party paper at Washington, of the 19th inst., contains an article nearly four columns in length, upon the war between this country and Mexico, and the relations which the two nations hold to each other. The article is ably written, but it is chiefly remarkable for a plan which it puts forth by which the war may be brought to an honorable close. This plan is to propose to each of the 23 departments or states of Mexico annexation to this country. Those states which have already a sufficient number of inhabitants are to be admitted as free and independent States. Those which have not, are to be annexed as territories, to be admitted as states as soon as they have the required number of inhabitants. The writer assumes to be a disciple of the State Rights school, "a Pharisee of the strictest sect." In relation to right or justice of which state making its own selection, there can, according to the writer be no doubt. And in regard to the constitutionality of admitting foreign states into our Union, that has been settled by president, in the purchase of Louisiana and Florida and the annexation of Texas. The writer devotes much space to the question of expediency. He says it will extend the principles of free trade, it will give Mexico the principles of religious toleration, it will establish free institutions within her borders, it will confer upon the people personal security, it will open the way for enterprising emigrants, it will bring the soil of Mexico under the better cultivation, stimulate the growth of manufactures [an] augment commerce. It will give us the control of the mines which furnace the currency of the world, it will establish peace upon the continent of America, and the prelude therein the establishment of monarchy; it will prevent the spread of slavery, and it will do a great many other things. The article is only noticeable from the novelty from its recommendations, the zeal with which they are urged, and the source from which they spring. In these views of wholesale union, the total absorption of a nation of 7,000,000 of people, made up of a mixture of the Old Spanish, Indian, and African bloods, differing from our own religion, language, manners, education, and habits of social intercourse, the writer contends that we must either pursue the course he has marked out, or else withdraw our armies within the Nueces. Although the writer talks very flippantly of the evils of war, and of the dangers which beset us in a career for foreign conquest, he evidently favors the scheme we have shadowed forth above. This is the latest invention we have seen for conquering a peace, and it comes from a quarter where we least expected it.

Mexico, war with the US
September 24, 1847

The Mexican war-The Liverpool Albion Monday last published the following statement, which announces a new and important feature in the struggle between Mexico and the Amongst the intelligence received by the Cambria it is stated, on the authority of the New Orleans La Patria, that the President of Honduras has issued a proclamation calling upon Central America to aid Mexico. Two Guatemala generals had issued similar documents. The steamer due at Liverpool on Tuesday next will, probably, bring accounts of General Scott's operations against the capital of Mexico, with details of the above intelligence.

Mexican War

It had been anticipated that the accounts from the United States and the seat of war in Mexico which have just reached us by the Caledonia steamer, would put an end to the long period of suspense and perilous inactivity in which General Scott's army has passed several weeks and would probably announce either the entry of that General into the Mexican capital, or the discomfiture of his scanty forces. The intelligence, which bears much more resemblance to the latter than to the former of these alternatives. Although the American journals record another victory, they acknowledge that the honors of the day were disputed with great resolution by the Mexican army. They publish a list of officers killed and wounded, which shows the extreme severity of the action; and above all, they announce an armistice proposed, not by the Mexicans, but by General Scott himself. This last circumstance demonstrates that, although the spirit and firmness of the little American army eventually prevailed over the numbers and the field fortifications of the enemy, they were not in a condition to take any political advantage of the contest, though they remained masters of the field. Indeed, considering their feeble numbers, the immense difficulties of transport, and the imperfect organization of their supplies, which have prevailed throughout the war, it is evident that 6,000 men, isolated in the heart of a hostile country, decimated by fatigue, fever, and actual fighting, and cut off from reinforcements by the conditions of the armistice re much more likely to capitulate to the enemy they have insulted and despised than to hoist the American flag on the towers of the city of Mexico. The moral effect of a decisive action and a tremendous defeat might, indeed, have paralyzed the Mexicans, and induced them to accept the terms they had hitherto rejected; but if the particulars are to be believed which reach us through American channels, the battles of Contreras and Cherubusco are more likely to rise the confidence of the Mexicans than to destroy all faith in their cause or their commanders.

The Mexican Generals are said to have taken up a very strong position, on which they had concentrated a large amount of artillery, within sight of the capital. These batteries of St. Augustine and St. Antonio were served with great activity and effect, and their fire was especially directed against the position which was occupied by General Worth and his corps. On the 19th of August an attack was made by the Americans on these points, which as may be inferred from our accounts was altogether unsuccessful. The American field batteries were soon silenced by the heavier guns of the enemy, and we observed that the loss of officers in the artillery corps was unusually great. For six hours this terrific cannonade lasted, and at the close of the day General Scott and General Twiggs retired, "completely exhausted, not anticipating the great strength of the works of the enemy." The troops were obliged to bivouac on a tempestuous night, which must ill have prepared them for a renewal of such a battle on the morrow.

On the morrow, however, the state of things seems suddenly to have changed. Early in the morning of the 20th, the position of Valencia, at Contreras, had been attacked by General Smith with complete success; and upon the precipitate retreat of the Mexicans from this point, General Worth fell back on San Antonio. A second most severe engagement took place, which lasted some hours, until the Mexican troops retreated in disorder upon the city, leaving their heavy guns and a large number of prisoners in the hands of the invading army. The forces of the Mexicans in those actions are stated to have been at least three times as numerous as those of General Scott's army; and although defeated to a certain extent, it is probable that the Mexican Generals have still a body of men under their command sufficient to repel any open attack on the city.

In fact, having arrived under the walls of Mexico by dint of extraordinary perseverance and hard fighting, it is by no means clear that General Scott is nearer the grand object of his gallant efforts than when he started from Vera Cruz; whilst, on the other hand, it is evident to the merest tyro in military affairs, that an army of 6,000 men, at such a distance from its base, and so inadequately supported from home, is, in reality, in a position of great peril. Conferences for the negotiation of peace, have, it is said, been opened, the alternative being another battle of a still more perilous character than the last; for it must be observed, that in General Scott's present position the least reverse must be annihilation. He has absolutely no retreat. We should, therefore, not be surprised to learn that he is willing to conclude a peace on terms by no means flattering to the vanity of the United States.

But the moment we arrive at this point, we are met by various political considerations, peculiar to the institutions of the United States, which render the solution of the question extremely complicated. Mr. Polk undertook this war on his own account, and it has proved to be the principal affair of his Presidency. The attractions of military adventure and the pride of military success have induced the people of the United States to endorse his bills and to recruit his armies; and we have accordingly seen the Chief Magistrate of what was once the model of pacific Governments including himself in the Royal luxury of a bloody war. All this may be some temporary advantage to Mr. Polk and his adherents; but they must be well aware that advantages so dearly bought by the nation will prove fatal to those who speculated in them, unless the burdens of the war can be terminated with this campaign, and unless this campaign can be closed with an amount of success sufficient to screen the enormous injustice of the invasion. In the present state of public opinion in the world, we should have thought it extraordinary if the most absolute of European Sovereigns had dared to embark in such a war; but that a man, temporarily invested with a limited power like that of the President of the United States, should, by his own will and pleasure, have plunged his country into such a series of embarrassments, is, without exception, the most extraordinary event which has ever occurred in the history of any modern republic. The sequel will show whether the more prestige of military achievements is sufficient to overthrow all the principles on which the constitution of the United States is professed to be founded; and even in this affair of the armistice and the alleged negotiation for peace, we shall be curious to learn how far General Scott's conduct will be approved and supported by his Government, which no doubt anticipated a more brilliant result from the march to Mexico.

US and Mexico

[The greater portion of the following appeared in a second edition of The Times of yesterday]

Liverpool, Wednesday morning

By the Royal mail steam-ship Caledonia, Captain Lott, which arrived in the Mersey at midnight, we have important advices from New York to the 15th, Boston to the 16th, and Halifax to the 18th inst., respectively.

The Caledonia was off Holyhead at 1 o'clock yesterday, but was not telegraphed, in consequence of fog.

The Britannia arrived in Halifax on the morning of the 18th inst., and proceeded to Boston.

The French mail steam-ship New York arrived at New York, after a run of 20 days, from Cherbourg. She sailed from the latter port on the 15th of August, and when 15 days at sea ran short of coals, which compelled her to put into Newport, Rhode Island. She left on the 1st inst., and arrived in New York in the 4th, whence she sailed on the 15th inst. For Havre.

Our advices by the Caledonia contain intelligence of the stoppage, on the 9th, of the important house of Prime, Ward, and Co., of New York, in consequence of the failure of some of their European correspondents.

Our advices from Mexico are exceedingly interesting. General Scott had at last reached the neighborhood of the capital, after some hard fighting, in which both sides suffered great loss; but, in consequence of armistice, he had not entered the city. The Mexicans were said to have lost, in killed and wounded, 13 generals and 5,000 men. Some American regiments were reported as nearly cut to pieces, and their loss in officers was very heavy. It is probable, therefore, should the Mexicans not accept terms, that he may yet have to fight another battle before he can take possession of the capital.

The Mexicans, who were strongly posted, fought much better than was anticipated.
We subjoin the official account:--

"WASHINGTON, SEPT. 14, 1847.

"Dispatches for the Government have this moment been received. The intelligence heretofore received is fully confirmed.

"On the 20th ult. The American forces, consisting of 7,000 men, met the enemy at Charbuses, three or four miles from the capital. The Mexicans were 32,000 strong, and posted behind an immense battery of heavy artillery. After two hours' bloody conflict, our gallant troops swept everything before them, mainly at the point of the bayonet.

"The American loss was less than 1,000, while that of the Mexicans estimated at 5,000 and amongst the killed are many distinguished men, both generals and civilians.

"The armistice was agree upon, and five commissioners appointed to the Mexican side, at the head of whom was Herrera. The commissioners had two meetings, and were to hold a third on Monday, the 30th.

"Valencia escaped with two companies to Falluca, and has since pronounced against Santa Anna and peace."

The following, from the New York Courier and Enquirer, will be read with gratification:--

"The general feeling of the non-paying States is manifestly in favor of efforts to resume, and the accession of wealth all have received from the late high prices of produce will add strength to this feeling, and means for its gratification.

"The State of Pennsylvania is assuming a strong financial position and it is probable the net income this year will exceed $1,000,000. As a considerable amount of the loans of that State is held in Europe, the following, from a highly respectable and well-informed source in Philadelphia, is communicated to us for publication:--

"After payment of the August interest, the State will have a surplus of about $4000,000; by next November they expect to have $1,000,000 on hand. This is three months in advance of the next interest term (Feb. 1), and does not include the taxes which are due and payable in December and January. Thus the state will have a permanent surplus, and by a judicious arrangement of it they expect to relieve themselves of the necessity of paying out relief notes next February; for instance the $1,000,000 deposited with our banks by these notes on the 1st of February, the interest being equal to the discount. Besides this, we look with confidence for the repeal of the tax this coming session; then our State credit will be permanently redeemed, never again, we hope, to be assailed from any quarter."

Fever was still raging frightfully at New Orleans. The return of Paredes to Mexico by means of the British mail steamer has given rise to much animadversion on the part of American press against England. Commodore Perry had issued the following notice:--

"NOTICE
"Collector's-office, Vera Cruz, Aug. 25
"Passengers arriving at this port without passports from the American Consul resident at the port them embark from will not be allowed to leave the vessel, and the master of any vessel permitting such passenger so landed, and the vessel held responsible for the same."

"F.M. DIAMOND, Collector."

General Order, No. 11.
"United States Flag-ship Germantown, Anton Lizardo, Aug. 18.

"All vessels, excepting army steamers and transports, arriving at ports in Mexico held by the United States forces are to be visited by a boat from the general ship of the day, or any single vessel of the squadron that may be in port, for the purpose of tendering the usual compliment of services to foreign vessels of war, and of detecting any irregularities in foreign mail-steamers or merchant vessels, whether foreign or American.

"It is desirable, when it be practicable, that the boarding officer should be a lieutenant.

"M.S. PERRY, "Commanding Home Squadron."
Paredes since his escape from Vera Cruz has not been heard of.

The following account of the battles before Mexico is taken from the correspondence of the New York Herald of September 15:

Baltimore, Sept. 14, Night.
The overland express for your office has just arrived, and I hasten to telegraph the news to you. It is the greatest importance.

According to the Picayune of the 8th instant, the Mary Kingsland arrived at New Orleans on the 7th from Vera Cruz. She brings the much desired and anxiously expected intelligence from General Scott.

The two battles between the Americans and Mexicans victorious for the former, were fought at Contreras, or Coyoacan, and Churubusco, so called from the fieldworks of the enemy.

The proposition for an armistice was made by General Scott, and is supposed to have been at the instance of the British Embassy.

The report hitherto given, that the city of Mexico was at the mercy of the American army, seems to be unfounded, and, should peace to follow from negotiations then pending, another battle would have to be fought.

According to letter from Mr. Kendall, dated Tucubaya, August 22, the Archbishop's palace of that place was occupied by General Scott and a portion of the American army, after defeating the enemy in two of the hardest fought battles of the war.

Annexed are the particulars of the maneuvers and brilliant fights, together with an incomplete list of the American officers killed and wounded.

On the 14th of August a reconnaissance made by Colonel Duncan having satisfied General Scott that a road for artillery could be cut from Chalco to San Augustin, General Worth's division moved in that direction on the 15th, followed by Generals Quitman, Pillow, and Twiggs. By this movement a new line of operations was taken on the southern and northwestern sides of the city of Mexico, and the strong works of El Penon and Mexicalcingo, on which Santa Anna had bestowed such immense labor, were completely turned.

On the 16th General Worth marched as far as the Pacienza of San Gregorio, when a halt was ordered by General Scott, as General Twiggs had met a large force of the enemy near Chalco. Twiggs promptly ordered the heaviest trains (guns probably) to be unlimbered, and after a few discharges the enemy was dispersed, with a loss of six killed.

On the 17th General Worth resumed his march over a terribly bad road, but by 8 o'clock in the morning he was in sight of the domes and spires of the capital, without opposition except that rocks had been rolled on to the road, and ditches dug, evidently showing that General Scott had stolen a march on Santa Anna.

On reaching this point, however, a scattering fire was opened on the head of his column by the enemy, stationed in an advantageous position, which was soon silenced by Colonel Smith's Light Battalion of the 2d Artillery under Major Galb. Another attack was shortly after made; but again the enemy's pickets were driven in without loss.

At 7 o'clock on the 18th General Scott arrived at San Augustin. At 10 o'clock General Worth was in full march for the city of Mexico by the main road. Majors Smith and Trumbull, Captain Mason, and other engineer officers, were sent in advance, supported by Captain Blake's squadron of Dragoons, to reconnoitre, when a masked battery opened upon them, and killed Captain Thorton, of the 2d Dragoons, besides seriously wounding a guide.

Colonel Garland's brigade was then ordered to occupy a position in the plain in sight of the enemy's batteries at San Augustin, whilst Colonel Stark's brigade and Duncan's battery took their station in the rear close by. A party was then sent out to reconnoitre to ascertain the practicality of finding a road by which the village of San Angel could be reached, and the stronghold of San Antonio turned.

This party had a skirmish with the enemy, killing five or six, and taking as many prisoners, without losing a man.

The result of the reconnaissance was favorable, and it was ascertained that a road could be made. The Mexicans were plainly seen in force near Bronteras, and at a council held that night it was determined to attack them in the morning.

Whilst this reconnaissance was going on, General Worth had established himself at the hacienda of Bunera, from the window of which countless numbers of the enemy could be seen at work upon the hacienda with both round shot and shell. Nearly every shot took effect, but did no damage except to the buildings.

Late in the evening they were again opened, but were silent during the night. Had the fire been kept up, the hacienda might have been torn to pieces, and the entire command compelled to retire.

At 8 o'clock on the morning of the 19th the battalion again opened on General Worth's position. So hot was the fire, that the troops were compelled to gain shelter being the buildings, but did not give up their position.

About 9 o'clock, the divisions of General Twiggs and Pillow were ordered to march in the direction of Brontera and by 1 o'clock in the afternoon, when in plain sight of the enemy's batteries, and within the range of the heavier guns, the brigade of Colonel P.W Smith was ordered to advance towards a small village to the right and this cut off reinforcements which might be sent to Valencia from the city.

An incessant fire was opened on Colonel Smith's command and soon the Rifles were engaged with the picket of the enemy, driving them in.

The 12-pounder batteries of Captain Magruder and the mountain howitzer batteries, now commanded by Lieutenant Callender, of the Ordnance Department, were pressed forward and opened on the enemy, but were so much silenced. Lieutenants Johnson and Callender were seriously wounded.

At 3 o'clock General Cadwallader was ordered out to support Colonel Riley, reinforcements being seen on their way out from the city, whilst General Pearce was sent to sustain General (Colonel) Smith.

The firing from the enemy's batteries was incessant.

About 4 o'clock General Scott arrived, and seeing the immense strength of the Mexicans, at once ordered General Shield's brigade to support Riley and Cadwallader, and prevent, if possible, a junction of the force coming out from the city with those of Valencia; but few of the movements of our own troops could be seen, though every motion of the enemy was visible.

The order of battle of Valencia was most imposing. The infantry were seen drawn up to support the batteries, whilst long lines of the enemy's calvary were stationed in the rear, as if waiting the shock of battle. Two separate charges of the latter were distinctly seen to be repulsed by Colonel Riley. Until night had fairly closed in the firing from the enemy's batteries had not slackened. It had been a continuous roar for nearly six hours.

General Scott retired to San Augustin about 8 o'clock, in the midst of a hard rain, and General Twiggs and General Pillow came in about 11 o'clock, completely exhausted, not anticipating the great strength of the works of the enemy.

It was thought that the batteries could be taken at a dash and that the troops would all be comfortably quartered at San Angel for the night. Instead of this, a large a portion of them were compelled to bivouac, without blankets, in the midst of a pitiless storm.

On the 20th, Worth was ordered to move with a part of his division (Garland's brigade) to aid in the attack on Valencia; as to force his position was deemed indispensable. At 7 o'clock a few discharges of cannon were heard, a rattling of musketry, and some even said, that in the distance horses of the enemy could be seen flying towards the city; yet few deemed that the batteries had been stormed and carried.

Yet it was so. General Scott himself accompanied General Worth, and started for the scene of the action, when they were met by Captain Mason with the joyful intelligence that Valencia had been completely routed, after a terrible struggle. The attack upon his works was planned by General Smith, and resulted in the capture of 15 pieces or artillery and some 1,500 prisoners, among them Generals Blanco, Garcia, Mendosa, and the notorious Salas. He also captured all the ammunition and camp equipage, whilst the road over which those who escaped fled was strewn with muskets.
No less than 700 of the enemy, among them many officers, were left dead on the field, whilst the number of wounded was far greater, and the works of Contreras completely in the power of the American army.

General Scott at once ordered General Worth to fall back to San Antonio, to turn and capture that work, and then push on towards the capital by the main road, whilst the main body of the army moved on towards San Angel and Coyoacan.

General Twiggs had scarcely moved half a mile beyond the latter village, when a rattling fire of a musketry announced that it was actively engaged with the outposts of the enemy, and the heavy booming of cannon now gave token that the noted second division had fallen on another strong works of San Antonio, but with the loss of three heavy guns, and had fallen back on a stronger line of works.

It was now 1 o'clock in the afternoon, and about the commencement of the battle, and such a rattling of forearms has seldom or never been heard on the continent of America, accompanied with such booming of artillery; and this was continued over two hours, when the enemy was completely routed from every point, and until those who were not killed or taken prisoners were in full flight for the city.

The strength of the enemy at this place was known to have been at least 15,000, and many say 20,000, all fresh troops, and in a position of uncommon strength. Opposed to them were about 6,000 Americans, jaded and broken down by marches, countermarches, and incessant toil.

At Churubusco the Mexicans say Santa Anna commanded in person, but that he retired early.

The young man of the capital, from whom so much was expected, nearly all fled, without firing a gun. The loss on our side has fallen most heavily upon the South Carolina and New York volunteers, the 6th infantry, and Smith's Battalion, and the batteries of Captains Magruder and Taylor. The South Carolina regiment was nearly cut to pieces.

13 Mexican Generals were killed and wounded.

More ammunition was captured the General Scott has used since he has been in the country.

The following are the terms of the armistice agreed upon whilst the commissioners of the two Governments shall negotiate terms of peace:-

"Neither army is to be reinforced nor build new defenses during the armistice, nor go beyond its present line; in short, the two armies are in no way to interfere with each other without 48 hours' notice."

¼. The other transactions in the foreign market were not of much importance. They included Brazilian, small, at 76 ½; the new, at 76; Portuguese Four per cents, at 22 ¼ Russian Five per cents, at 105; Spanish Five per cents, at 18; Passive, at 3 7/8; Spanish Three per cents, for the account, at 27,; Dutch Two-and-a-half per cents, at 53 ¾; and the Four per cent Certificates at 84.

In the foreign exchanges to day there was a general further advance in the rates, and, as on the preceding post days, a large amount of bills remained unsold.

In the corn-market to-day there was little doing, and prices remained without alteration.

Advices from Hamburgh of the 5th inst. mention a gradually increasing demand for money. The rate of discount had risen to 5 ½ per cent. Mention is also made of the suspension of Messers. Pehmoller and Tollens, a young house in the exchange and general business. Their liabilities are supposed to be below 30,000l., and it is not considered that any one in London is likely to suffer.

A report was circulated in the course of the morning that a small marine insurance company had been unable to meet its engagements, but they statement was without foundations. It is said, however, that winding up of it affairs is contemplated.

The committee of Spanish American bondholders have received the following from their agents in Mexico, under date 29th of August:-

"With reference to our respects of last packet, we have the honor to inform you that we have remitted to Messers. John Schneider and Co., as agents for the Mexican bondholders, 56,950l. 2s. 6d., to be appropriated to the payment of the dividends, of which be pleased to take note.

"As regards the permits for the importation of raw cotton, which we mentioned in out last, we now beg leave to inform you that we have received such permits for the introduction of 100,726 quintals of cotton, representing at the rate of $6.6 per quintal a capital of $679,912 in duties. We shall be happy to receive your instructions regarding disposal of these licenses, though we should consider it the interest of the bondholders to sell any part of them for which we might meet with purchasers at the price at which they have been granted by the Government. The proceeds of the aforesaid permits will be applicable to the reimbursement of certain sures, the property of the bondholders, and which had been abstracted from the Custom-houses of Vera Cruz and Tampico, by order of the Mexican authorities."

The weather in the West India islands, it would appear by the letters and papers received this morning, was in general favorable for the growing crops. From Barbados, Jamaica, Trinidad, and Antigua, the whole of the advices concur in representing that the supply of rain was fully adequate to the wants of the planters. The planting of provisions necessary for native food had been carried out to a great extent, the deficiency of these during the late time of scarcity having been severely felt. At Dominica more seasonable weather had not been experienced for years. Tobago is the sole instance where the least complaint was made of drought. However, in this case there was a change for the better just previous to the departure of the packet, "showery weather having at length set in."

Letters from Port-au-Prince of the 5th of September allude to the more pacific aspect of affairs in the city. Although it is asserted that "discontent and ill-feeling" continue to be displayed in certain quarters, still "the public peace" is no respects likely to be disturbed, as "all good and loyal citizens" see, it is said, that permanent tranquility can alone insure a successful government. An address, published by M. Troy, the Secretary of State and Minister of the Interior, in the absence of Solouque, seemed, according to these accounts, to have produced a satisfactory impression upon the populace. Spanish doubloons, 71 50; Spanish gourde (or dollar), 4 56; and Mexican gourde (or dollar), 4 50.

The Honduras accounts received to-day come down to the 14th of August. Between the 24th of July and that date there had left for London the Clarendon, with 156,352 feet of mahogany, 55 tons of logwood, and a quantity of coca-nuts; the Calista, with 3,967 feet of mahogany, 27 tons of logwood, 10,250 coca-nuts, and 386 serons or cochineal; and the Ann, with 103,198 feet of mahogany, 72 ½ tons of logwood, 16,500 coca-nuts, and 590 serons of cochineal; the Kingston, for Liverpool, had a cargo of 119,307 feet of mahogany, 30 tons of logwood, 20,000 cocoa-nuts and 49 pieces of sappodilla.

At Honduras intelligence from Guatemala to the 28th of July had arrived. Treaties of commerce and navigation had then been concluded between the Government and the representatives of Great Britain and the Hanseatic Towns, eight months being named as the period stipulated for their ratification. The country was tranquil, and the progress established in the effective administration of affairs had secured the President considerable popularity. Among a variety of changes noticed in fiscal regulations were two which appeared to be considered as of great importance in their respective bearings. One involved a reduction of taxes payable by the license authorizing the cultivation of tobacco in Zacapa, on the banks of the Montagua, in Esquipulas, Jocatan, and in Gualan, with the view of increasing that branch of public revenue.

Advices from Valparaiso, dated the 27th of July, report the markets as in a steady condition. In manufactured goods the transactions latterly had not been of much importance. Complaints are made in the Valparaiso papers of the inattention of the Custom-house officials, to whose negligence is imputed the damage too frequently sustained by merchandise when landed from the streamers in unfavorable weather.

The report of the colonial markets for the week shows unabated heaviness, and almost every class of produce has seriously declined. This depreciation, however, might naturally have been expected, and importers who, a few weeks since, were holding off their stocks in consequence of flat markets, now find it expedient, owing to the continuance of the extreme pressure for money, to take every possible opportunity of realizing. In addition to the effect caused by the greater disposition to press sales, the tendency towards reduction of rates has been increased by some parcels of produce lately in the hands of suspended houses having been forced upon the market.

The price of sugar generally shows a feline of fully 1s. per cwt., but in the private contract market some transactions have taken place at a still greater reduction. Good strong refining sugar has been sold as low as 35 s. per cwt. duty paid. The importers of Mauritius continue free sellers, and about 14,000 bags have passed auction. Low Madras, which was worth in April last about 43s., is now with great difficulty saleable at 30s., per cwt., duty paid, or 16 s. per cwt. in bond, which low price has for some time Ist led to its being taken for export to the continent.

The coffee market exhibits still greater heaviness, as sales have been brought forward to a large extent, and prices have consequently given way materially. "Native " Ceylon has been sold as low as 34s., per cwt., and privately a parcel, it is understood, has changed hands at 33s. 6d. per cwt. In the plantation kinds a fall of 2s. per cwt. ahs again occurred; “fine ordinary” quality will only bring 45s. to 46s. per cwt. The foreign descriptions are about 2s. per cwt. lower.

White Bengal rice has been sold at 13s. 6d., which was worth about three weeks since 16s. 6d. per cwt.

The tea market has been exceedingly flat, and business only effected to a very limited extent. A public auction took place on Tuesday, and a decline occurred in nearly every instance where a sale was made. Flowery pekoe was sold as low as 10d. per lb.

The returns from the Bank of England for ht weekending the 2d. of October gives the following results when compared with the previous week:-

General Santa Anna, in his capacity as Provisional President and Commander-in-Chief of the Mexican army, published, shortly after the engagements the following manifesto in explanation of his defeat:

"In moments so critical and solemn, it becomes the duty of him who presides over the destiny of the Republic to give publicity to the recent events, and I comply with pleasure, as candour has at all times been the character of my administration. The incidents of the 19th and 20th are too notorious, having been disastrous; but I am bound to present a review of them, lest they should be misrepresented as much by the spirit of detraction and malevolence as by errors which may result from a false analysis of such grave and transcendent affairs.

"The nation has witnessed the great and extraordinary efforts with which, in the space of three months, I prepared for the defense of the capital, which was on the point of being surrendered to the enemy without resistance. I have formed, armed, and equipped an army of more than 20,000 men; I have provided a vast materiel for this army; I have fortified various lines in order to remove from Mexico the ravages of war; I have created resources in spite of the isolated position to which the Government was reduced, and I have spared no time and no labour in order to make my country appear with dignity and firmness in the contest to which it was unjustly provoked.

"In war, an accident, a thing that appears trifling, overthrows the best formed combinations. A glance at the defenses which I established round the city is sufficient to discover the plan which I had proposed to myself. The forces which I had advanced on one of the flanks, supported by others stationed at convenient distances, and a point to fall back upon, well known to them, and of which I gave notice at the proper moment. To one general who had command of a strong division of 5,000 men, with 24 pieces of artillery and whose headquarters were at the village of San Angel, I sent orders at 11 o'clock on the morning of the 18th to fall back upon the town of Coyoacan, in order to form a concentration of forces, following the movements of the enemy, which were already evident, and particularly to unfold my plan of operations. But this general, forgetting that for the execution of a plan no observation which may annul or retard it can be admitted, took upon himself to object to the orders which had been received; and as we had banished from among us obedience and discipline, so indispensable in military matters, I had to be tolerant in order to avoid greater evils, and let him, to my own regret, act, throwing upon him the responsibility of whatever might happen.

"The result was a fatal as I had foreseen. He advanced of his own accord more than a league, and selected a position to meet the enemy without giving me notice of his movement or of his intentions. The refusal which he gave to my advice was the first news I had of his temerity, and soon after the roar of cannon showed me this position, and gave me notice that an action had commenced. Although overwhelmed with a presentiment of what was to happen, I put myself immediately at the head of a brilliant division of 4,000 men and five pieces of artillery. I arrived at the moment when the enemy had cut off by the rear the position of the ill-fated general with a respectable force, and I was hardly able to check his operations as the night was already setting in.

"But I perceived with sorrow that the position was isolated; a deep-ravine, and a wood occupied by the enemy, being interposed between is, it was impossible for the troops under my immediate command to advance by the only road there was, without exposing themselves, as were already the other\', and only one battery, which arrived late, could do any injury. The firing having ceased, our bridge took up cause, as it rained in torrents, it would have been equal to a defeat to have kept the troops in the open field.

"Previous to this, however, I had ordered my aide decamp, Colonel Ramiro, to pass the terrible ravine which was in our front, and guided by Don Jose Maria del Rio, well acquainted with the country, to reach the camp of the general, and to advise him to withdraw that very night to San Angel with his infantry and calvary, by the only road which was left to him, spiking previously the artillery which it was not possible to save. My aide-de-camp succeeded, and communicated my orders between 10 and 12 o'clock that night; but instead of being obeyed with punctuality, the above named general hardly allowed my aide-de-camp to speak, interrupted him by stating that he wanted 6,000 men and ammunition, and sent him off with two dispatches, already signed and sealed, in one of which he gives a report of the action of the evening, stating that he had been beaten and put the enemy to a shameful flight, and that in consequence he conferred promotions on the generals, chief, and officers.

"Early the next morning I presented myself again in the same camp, reinforced by a brigade which I had drawn from the capital, and with the intention of forcing the bridge at any cost; but when I was about to commence, the enemy made his attack, which lasted 10 minutes, and I witnessed, overwhelmed with despair, the defeat of those soldiers, worthy of better fate, because the general, who unfortunately commanded them had cut himself off. The consequence of this success appeared terrible to any sight. The enemy could arrive by a rapid move at the capital before it would be in my power to render assistance; the enemy could by a flank movement cut off my detached forces; the enemy had obtained fruit of this victory the power of bringing the whole of his forces against only a part of mine; and, finally, the enemy, owing to the insubordination and want of skill of one general, could turn to his profit the advantages of my position.

"The advanced fort of San Antonio could not be maintained, because our line had been cut, and I gave orders for its garrison to withdraw whilst I protected the fort and tete de pont of Churubusco. The enemy advanced and cut off part of the troops that were retreating, and appeared in front of our nearest defenses. There again I placed myself at the head of our troops, and my efforts cost the enemy a good deal of blood. The losses, although much to be lamented, naturally proceeded from the retreat, which was hasty, unexpected, and confused, owing to the trains that had to pass through a narrow lane, flanked in its whole extent. The defense was made from line to line until we came to the third, where I personally restrained the enemy and saved the capital, which had been so unexpectedly placed in danger.

"When I was occupied on the 22d in reorganizing the forces and manning the batteries, having placed myself again at the head of a column which should offer resistance to the 1st extremity, I received a communication from the general-in-chief of the enemy, proposing an armistice that might give time to listen to the propositions which may be made by the Commissioner of the Government of the United States, to put an end to the contest between the two nations. I accepted the armistice, and, after having had a meeting with the Ministers, I resolved to listen to the above propositions.

"The suspension of hostilities is always a blessing, because war is always an evil, particularly after the failure of grand combinations. To free the capital of its horrors, or at least to retard them, was an emergency which I could not resist, and the more so when it presented the means of arriving at an honorable peace.

"When two nations are in a state of war they enjoy the right of reciprocity, making propositions, which presupposes the obligation to listen. A perpetual war is an absurdity, because it is a calamity, and the instinct of self-preservation, which is stronger in nations than in private individuals, counsel us not to refuse any means which may lead to an advantageous settlement. To adopt this stop the constitution confers ample powers on me.

"Devoted to interests so noble and exalted, I must at all hazards maintain the prestige and respect of the supreme authority, particularly at present, when, if the factions should molest the Government, they would deprive it of the liberty of deliberating, and it would fall into utter insignificance in the presence of our enemies. I will still be more explicit. Attempts at subversive sedition will be punished in an exemplary manner.

"I have still a respectable body of troops, and the nation will assist me to maintain its dignity and vindicate its glory. I consider myself as free as if I had just obtained a distinguished victory, and there is no danger that the negotiations of the enemy will impose upon me what their troops difficulties amicably, if above all things our honor is saved, and we will again appeal to the sword if force should be proposed to withhold from us justice and the acknowledgment of the rights of the nation.

"ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.
"Mexico, August 23, 1847."

THE ARMISTICE.
To the proper elucidation of the spirit with which the recent armistice was entered into between Generals Scott and Santa Anna, we annex several important documents.

The following was the letter addressed by General Scott to Santa Anna, tendering an armistice:-

"TO HIS EXCELLENCY THE PRESIDENT AND GENERAL-IN-CHIEF OF THE REPUBLIC OF MEXICO.
Head-quarters of the Army of the United States of America, Coyoacan, Aug. 21, 1847.

Sir,-Too much blood has already been shed in this unnatural war between two great republics of this continent. It is time that the difference between them should be amicably and honorable settled, and it is known to you Excellency that a commissioner on the part of the United States, clothed with full powers to that end, is with this army. To enable the two republics to enter on negotiations I am willing to sign, on reasonable terms, a short armistice.

"I shall wait with impatience until to-morrow morning for a direct answer to this communication; but shall in the meantime seize and occupy such positions outside of the capital as I may deem necessary to the shelter and comfort of this army.

"I have the honor to remain, with high consideration and respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant,
"W. SCOTT."

To this letter a reply was returned by the Mexican Secretary of War, of which the following is a hasty version:-

"TO HIS EXCELLENCY GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT, COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.
"Ministry of War and Marine, Mexico,
August 21.
"Sir,-The undersigned, Minister at War and Marine of the Government of the United States of Mexico, is instructed by his Excellency the President, Commander-in-Chief, to reply to your communication, in which you propose to enter into an armistice, with a view to avoid the further shedding of blood between the great republics of this continent, for the purpose of hearing the propositions which may be made for this purpose but the commissioner of his Excellency the President of the United States of America, who is at the head-quarters of the American army.

"It is certainly lamentable that, in consequence of the disregard of the rights of the Mexican republic, the shedding of blood has become inevitable between the first republics of the American continent; and your Excellency with great propriety qualifies this as unnatural, as well on account of its relations and their interests. The proposition of an armistice to terminate this scandal has been received with pleasure by his Excellency the President, Commander-in-Chief, as it will enable the propositions to be entertained which the commissioner of his Excellency the President of the United States may make for the honorable termination of the war.

"Accordingly the President, Commander-in-Chief, directs me to say to your Excellency that he accepts these propositions to enter into an armistice and for this object he has appointed the Brigadier-general Don Ignacio Mora y Villamil and Don Benito Quijano, who will be present at the time and place which may be designated.

"His Excellency also instructs me to command his satisfaction that the army of the United States should occupy convenient and fitting quarters, trusting and hoping that they will be out of reach of the fire of the Mexican fortifications.

" I have the honor to be, with high consideration and respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant.

 "ALCORTA."

The same day Señor Pacheco, the Secretary of States, issued the following summons for the assembling of the Congress:-

"Ministry of Internal and Foreign Relations, Mexico Aug. 21.

"Most Excellent Sir,- All Mexicans, but especially the inhabitants of this capital, have been witnesses to the extraordinary exertions which have been made by his Excellency the Provisional President to collect an army capable of meeting that of the United States, arid restoring the lustre of the arms of the republic. They are witnessed, also, that he has fought with intrepidity, exposing his own life until the moment when the victory was lost and the enemy was at the gates of the capital.

"In these circumstances, and when the numerous inhabitants of Mexico have made every kind of sacrifice to carry on the war, it is one of the most imperious duties of the first magistrate to prevent the calamities inseparable from an assault, and to avoid all the consequences of a violent constitutional power, and in conformity with the wishes of Congress, communicated to him on the 16th of July last, he has determined to hear the propositions which Mr. Nicholas Trist has to make on the part of the United States, and to consent that in the meantime there shall be a suspension of hostilities.

"As this question is of the utmost interest to the republic, his Excellency desires that the National Congress should take their appropriate part, and accordingly he directs me to notify your Excellency that you may take measures diligently to summon the Deputies to assemble at 12 o'clock today.

"I reiterate the assurances of my distinguished consideration. God and Liberty!

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA.

We have received from Liverpool our advices from the United States and Canada, by the Royal mail steam-ship Britannia, Captain Harrison, which entered the Mersey at 2 o'clock this morning.

The Britannia concluded her repairs at New York on the 28th ult., and left on that day for Boston, whence she sailed, with 76 passengers, on the 1st instant. Severe easterly winds were encountered during the passage.

The steam-ship Hibernia was spoken between Halifax and Boston on the 2d instant.

The French steamer Union left New York for Havre on the 30th ult.

The Sara Sands, screw line-of-packet ship, would leave about the 6th instant. Her commander had been publicly entertained by his passengers on the outward run.

The commercial accounts by this steam-ship are alone of importance. From Mexico no later intelligence had been received. The result of the armistice, and the question of peace or war, are consequently still uncertain.

Our New York letters extend from the 24th to the 30th ult. inclusive. Since the departure of the Washington, on the 23d, no later accounts had been received from Europe; and commercial affairs consequently remained without any change of moment. The Britannia has brought a fair amount of bills. The demand, however, was principally upon the banks, at 108 3/1 to 109. Private bills were dull at 108-108 3/1; and so far as we can learn, no exportation of specie to this country was probable for some time; a large amount destined for shipment had been withdrawn, but to France, by the mail steamer of the 30th ult.; and packet-ship of the 29th, silver to the amount of 200,000 dollars, in five-franc pieces and Mexican dollars, had been sent. Treasury notes were in good demand at 3 ½ to 4 per cent. premium. The banks were in a sound condition, and no further failures had been reported, to shake the confidence given by the intelligence that Prime, Ward, and Co.'s bills had been protected. In the grain-market prices were fully sustained. Supplies and stock were still extremely light, and on Indian corn an advance had been realized. The prospects of the cotton crop are represented as somewhat more favourable; the market, consequently, was less firm, with an increase of sales towards the close of the month, and prices, in the face of a good demand for France and the continent, had declined 3/1c. per pound. The sales on the 30th ult. were moderate, with more firmness. Freights were extremely low. Flour was taken for London at 2s. 6d. to 7d. per bushel. To Havre (nominally),--cotton, ¾ per lb.; flour, 70c.; ashes, 8d. to 10d; rice, 10d. Foreign iron was in request, and sales of English and Scotch, to arrive, had been made. English bars were held at $65 to $66 50c. Foreign coal was scarce, and in request. Ashes had again advanced. The tobacco market was active and firm. Provisions had advanced, and the mess pork, under a brisk speculative demand, was quoted at $14 25c. Lard, steady, with a fair demand. Cheese was in request, with large sales, for exportation, at 7c. to 7¾c. From New Orleans our latest advices are the 22d ult. The cotton-market continues firm, and sales of 1,000 bales were on that date made at previous prices. Flour was dull, with few sales, Ohio being quoted at $4 25c. to $4 75 c. In exchange sterling bills were quoted at 7 to 7½.

The political intelligence is unimportant. No late advices had been received from the interior of Mexico, and consequently the question in regard to the negotiations for peace remained still as doubtful as ever. Rumours alone reach us, to the effect, first that Paredes had arrived at the capital and arrested Santa Anna; second, that Valencia had surrendered; and, thirdly, that the attainment of a peace was highly probable. These rumours, however, obtained no confidence; and until the receipt of the Government dispatches from Vera Cruz by the steamer transmission to the United States, we are unlikely official journal at Washington announces a letter from an officer at Vera Cruz, of the 4th ult., reports that it was the "opinion of the most intelligent writers from Mexico that General Santa Anna will conclude a peace; that his present position seems to urge him to such a measure," as his "only alternative" against any attempt to put him down on the part of Paredes or Valencia, "both of whom he had declared outlawed." The following account, by Salas, of the recent engagements appears in the journals:-
"Department of War and Navy, Section of Operations, Army of the North, Second General-in-Chief.

"Most Excellent Sir,—On the 19th instant, about 12 or 1 o'clock p.m., the enemy appeared as if with the intention of attacking the position occupied by this army on the heights of Contreras. At the moment we began a very steady fire of artillery and musketry, successively, as the enemy presented himself on the various points sustained by our troops, and we succeeded in stopping him at several places, until night put an end to the fighting, in which all ranks of this army gave proof of their gallantry and the decision with which they sacrificed their lives in the defence of our nationality; but on the morning of the 20th—thanks to the bad position we occupied, and the carelessness paid to the movements of the enemy to surround us—we were routed that were placed in one point being surrounded. When I observed the dispersion of our forces, I tried all I could to stop it, and, crying 'Victory for Mexico,' at the same time that the bugle sounded for slaughter, I succeeded in stopping it for a moment, and ordered General Don Anastasio Torrejon to charge with his command; but this chief, instead of obeying my order, fled cowardly, and the cavalry following his example trampled on the infantry and contributed to the complete rout of it.

"It would appear ridiculous to make any recommendations of those who have been present in an unfortunate battle; however, I cannot help mentioning to your Excellency with which the chiefs and officers of the several corps tried, even in the midst of disorder, to reunite their force to resist the enemy, who was hotly pursuing us. The conduct observed by them, preferring being made prisoners to abandoning their soldiers, will always do them honour; and for this I think they are entitled to the consideration of the supreme Government, and the gratitude of their fellow-citizens.

"His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, Don Gabriel Valencia, disappeared from us at the commencement of the action of the 20th; and I, not knowing his whereabouts, have thought it my duty to address your Excellency, accompanying a list of the chiefs and officers who are prisoners in the city; another, of those who were wounded in San Angel and of those who are known to have been killed; another list of those made prisoners in the action of Charubusco; all of whom I have the honour of manifesting to your Excellency for your intelligence, praying that on communicating the above to his Excellency the President you will please manifest to him the total indigence in which the prisoners find themselves as having lost everything; and, the American General having given orders that they may be maintained by the inhabitants of this city which is destroyed, they must perish in misery, if their Government does not supply them with what they are entitled to, and which their actual situation and the well-deserving conduct that has distinguished them energetically claim.

"I reiterate to your Excellency my respects and particular esteem. God and Liberty!

"JOSE MARIANO SALAS.
"Tlalpam, August 23, 1847.
"To his Excellency the Minister of War.
"It is a copy.--Mexico, Aug. 24, 1847.
"MANUEL MARIA DE SANDOVAL."

Letters had been received in St. Louis from Chihuahua, stating that a very satisfactory state of things existed between the American traders and the citizens and Government of Chihuahua. The Mexicans adhered rigidly to the terms of the treaty made with the traders after the departure of Colonel Doniphan's command.

Official letters had been received from the camp of General Taylor at Monterey. A mixed force of Dragoons and Texans was employed in clearing the country between Camargo and Monterey of the roving guerrillas. Reports were received that it was the General's intention to visit the United States; but he does not yet mention such an intention in his recent dispatches.

In domestic affairs we have few interesting features. The Whigs of the Michigan State Convention had adopted resolutions declaring the purpose of the Whigs of that state to "resist, by all constitutional means, the introduction of slavery into any territory now or hereafter to be acquired by the United States by conquest, purchase, or otherwise;" and resolutions declaring the unconstitutionality of the Mexican war and the impolicy of its origin. Several additional meetings in favour of the elevation of General Taylor to the presidency had been held in various portions of the Union. The epidemic in New Orleans had considerably abated. The steam-ship Hermann, 2,000 tons burden, the third ship of the Southampton and Bremen line, had been launched at New York.

A heavy gale had been experienced on the seacoast on the 25th ult., in which the New Orleans packet-ship Auburn went ashore on Long Reach, Barnegat Inlet, and went to pieces. The captain, mate, and 16 persons, embracing the crew and come five or six passengers, were lost, with the cargo.

The Canadian advices are unimportant.

The Port-au-Prince journals to the 29th of August had been received. A decree had been issued by the President, Faustin Souloaque, convoking the Legislature for the 7th of November next. A revolutionary attempt had recently been made at Port-au-Prince, but it was crushed in its inception. The revenue of the republic during the year 1846 was $3,502,779, and the expenditure $6,001,599. The revenue of 1847 shows an increase of about 10 per cent. upon that of 1846. The expenses of that year were greatly increased by the war.

Mexico, war in

The following dispatches from the United States' army in Mexico were received by the Britannia, which arrived in Liverpool on Saturday last-

Colonel Dickinson's report
Headquarters, South Carolina Regiment, Volunteers
San Augustine, Aug. 23, 1847

"General, --Early on the morning of the 20th inst., Colonel Butler, in pursuance of your orders, marched his command from the road running to the south of his quarters, by which it was reported many Mexicans were retreating from the field of Contreras to the city of Mexico. Owing to the thick patches of "maguey" and a rugged ravine, he could not reach his position until several hundreds of the enemy had passed. As the regiment emerged from the ravine into the field, extending to the road, [which field was flanked on our right by a stone wall, extending to the road and enclosing an orchard,] we discovered large masses of the enemy in the road before us; and although they perceived us at the same time, they were unable to escape beyond our reach until every gun in the battalion had been brought to bear upon them; most, however, had broken into an open field opposite, which only the more exposed them to our tire. Through this field, in musket range of our position, mingled groups of their Calvary and infantry continued to pass.

"Shortly, however, we perceived large masses forming in line of battle, under cover of the stone wall already mentioned, and that a large body was advancing from the orchard on our right flank and rear. Colonel Butler immediately changed front to the right by a flank movement; and brought the enemy, in both their positions, as they advanced from and then retreated. Colonel Butler, perceiving that other of the enemy were passing through the field in our front, left a few files to guard our rear-formed again on the road, and maintained a steady fire upon the enemy, who continued to pass forward and surrendered themselves to Colonel Butler, who, seeing their bodies still coming, remained upon the road with three companies, while the rest of the regiment, in pursuance of an order from the general, retired beyond the ravine to oppose a very large body of Calvary, appearing in our rear.

"Of the enemy 127 were killed and wounded, and 217 taken prisoners. Among the latter were the following officers of rank to wit:-One general officer, two staff officers, two colonels, two lieutenant-colonels, four commandants, three captains, and four lieutenants. Our own loss in the action, from the random fire of the enemy, was one sergeant, several wounded and one private slightly.

"Captain Marshall with his company (E) was left as a guard over the prisoners, who were placed in a church, and the regiment soon after took up its line of march on the road to Mexico. About noon the regiment was ordered to make a detour to the left, and strike upon the same road a short distance beyond the enemy's works at Cheraposa, to cut off their retreat, as it was reported that the works had been their retreat, as it was reported that the works had been carried by our troops. On arriving on the field after the subsequent action, we found that the New York regiment, in consequence of numbers if horsemen and a small corps of the howitzer battery having intruded themselves betwixt us. Were some 300 yards in advance of us, and the 9th infantry, attached for the time being out brigade, nearly the same distance in our rear; at the proper point we proceeded to form the line of battle, and as soon as the two right flank companies were in line, we were ordered to advance-dispatch in reaching the road to cut off retreat being considered of more importance than a regular advance.

"Before, however, one-half of the companies were in line we found the New York regiment retiring under cover of the hacienda, to our right, and as soon as our line was unmasked from the road, which appeared to be densely filled with Mexican troops, as also the hacienda to the left of the field we occupied, and immediately on the road. As we had attempted, for the reason stated, very imperfect order in our line of battle was obtained; and as that appeared now indispensable, we were ordered to march by the right flank, as we reached the left flank of the New York regiment.

"As the hacienda did not possess sufficient breadth to protect the flanks in forming line of battle in its rear, the battalion was ordered to form by companies, and to march in column to the left, in advance of the hacienda, and a little to its left, upon which the general in person had placed himself; there they were ordered to deploy upon the colour company. The companies of the left wing formed in regular order, but some companies of the right wing were thrown into confused masses by the obstruction of miscellaneous troops belonging to different arms of the service; this was mostly remedied and advance was ordered. The line continued to advance, under a heavy fire, some 30 paces in rear of the general about 150 yards, when they were halted.

"The general had cautioned the men not to open their fire until he gave the orders; but directly they halted, the general took his position in line of battle, and at this time the squad of mixed troops upon our extreme right, already mentioned, commenced firing, and the battalion, supposing the orders given, opened its fire. It was understood by the field officers to have been the general's intention to make our brigade, and that as soon as the whole was in line they were to advance to within easy musket range of the road, or to charge as he should deem best. As the firing had already commenced, and did not interfere with the formation of the other battalion, it was permitted to continue. As soon, however, as one or two companies of the New York regiment appeared marching up to our right, the order was given to charge, and the battalion was gallantly led forward by Major Gladden, then in command of the regiment.

"The colonel had been killed directly after our fire had been opened, and the lieutenant-colonel severely wounded a few minutes after the charge. Our line of battle numbered, before the commencement, three field officers, two staff officers, seven captains, 24 lieutenants, 12 sergeants, 273 rank and file; after the battle, the number who were unwounded for duty was one field officer (major), three captains, 18 lieutenants, 12 sergeants, 169 rank and file. The total of our losses in the engagement in killed and wounded was 136. The major informed me that, upon reaching the position of the enemy, he found that they had abandoned it, and were in full retreat for the city; several companies were in pursuit, and the others formed as a reserve in the road. The whole were shortly ordered to advance by the general, but in consequence of the large number of killed and wounded reported to him, the battalion was soon ordered back to the hacienda, now converted into a hospital. The three companies sent in pursuit were overtaken by a piece of artillery, which they supported nearly to the suburbs of the city, until they were recalled.

"Captain Marshall, who rejoined the regiment with his command at this place, reports to me that soon after the battalion had left the church where the prisoners were placed under his charge, finding himself destitute of provisions, he sent a detachment of his company to forage for fruit and green corn; this detachment surprised a party of Mexican soldiers engaged in the same pursuit. They killed one and captured 43, whom they brought back and delivered to their captain. This makes the total number taken at the place 260, which, with 127 killed and wounded, makes a total of 387.

"I should be unjust to the officers of this regiment and to my own feelings were I to close this report without acknowledging the gallant manner in which all the grades of officers performed their duty and sustained the honour of their flag. Until the engagement of the evening, our regiment had been in no very dangerous position, and the troops in that regard were raw and inexperienced; upon that occasion each officer had to lead his command, and their number in killed and wounded shows how faithfully they met the necessity. Our noble and unfortunate commander had his horse shot under him, at the head of his command, in the first of the engagement; a short time after he received a wound in the leg, ad yielded the command to his next rank.

"Finding however, that the wound, although serious, had not broken his leg, he accompanied the regiment in its subsequent advance upon the field. Here he had scarcely taken his position on the line of battle near the colours, when he received a wound to the left side of this head, which instantaneously terminated his life. As you witnessed his gallant bearing, I will only add that he was not only a brave officer, but a guardian father to his regiment.
"I have already stated that the occasion required of every officer a fearless example to his command, and that it was fully met by all. A few instances of gallantry falling accidentally under my immediate notice I will not mention; not as making invidious distinctions, but as conduct characteristic of the whole corps of officers. Major Gladden attracted my attention by his usual regard for regularity-disorder, however, partial, seemed to give him concern. He was at the post and duty. Captains Sumter and Dunovant, of the flank companies, exhibited that promptness and order so necessary on the flank; never once did I see either corps in broken order, or behind its time, upon the line or in the advance; the first lost its flower in the fight, and ended the engagement without enough to bury its dead and bear its wounded to the hospital.

"In the development upon the colour company (Captain Walker's), that and Captain De Saussure's, which formed the first upon it, were nearly annihilated; the first, after the line was formed, having but four men left, and the other (the largest company in the regiment), having but 24. I was near Captain De Saussure and saw his clothing literally riddled with bullets. He stood on the right and front during the firing, exhibiting such cool courage and that not one of his men wavered, though the foot of each was bathed in the blood of his next comrade. Captain William Blanding, of company F, and Lieutenant William C. Moragne, commanding company D, bore their companies' flags in the right flanks of their companies during the heaviest of the fire; the latter received his from the dying hands of his gallant subaltern, Lieutenant D. L. Adams, who fell with it in his hands, and the former from his colour-sergeant (Hicks), who also fell wounded.

"Captain Moffat, of company C, received a severe wound in the leg, but remained on duty till a rapid advance left him behind. Lieutenant J. R. Clark, commanding company G, was attracting my attention by giving orders in his usual quiet and temperate manner when he received what I fear will prove a mortal wound. Captain J.D. Blanding, of the staff, being unmounted, and the command small, attached himself to the company to which he originally belonged, and was wounded while sharing his fortune in the honour and danger of the fight. Adjutant James Cantry, in the latter part of the action, was severely wounded in the face, while extending the orders of the commander of the regiment.

"Lieutenant Shubrick, of the brigade staff, having lost his horse, attached himself to the company E, where he did duty throughout the engagement. The field and staff officers being all dismounted, Captain Hammond of the brigade staff, at my request, communicated the orders of the brigade directly to the captains of companies whenever the noise of the engagement prevented them being heard. I beg leave to acknowledge my obligations to him, and my admiration for his very gallant bearing during the engagement.

"Very respectfully yours &c.

"J.P. Dickinson,
"Lieutenant-Colonel, Commanding South Carolina Regiment,

"To Brigadier General Shields, commanding
"Brigade Volunteer Division."

"Head.Quarters, 1st Brigade, San Augustine, Mexico, August 24, 1847.

"Sir-On the 19th inst., about 3 o'clock in the afternoon pursuant to the orders of the general commanding this division, I marched from this place with the New York and South Carolina regiments of volunteers towards the battlefield of Contreras. On reporting to the Commander in Chief, who occupied on my arrival a position which overlooked the field, he described to me in a few words the position of the contending forces, pointed out the route of my command and briefly instructed me as to the dispositions which would render my force the most serviceable. Directing my march upon the village near Contreras, the troops had to pass over ground covered with rocks and crags, and filled with chasms, which rendered the route almost impassable.

"A deep ravine, along the bed which rolled a rapid stream, was passed after dark with great difficulty and exertion; and to rest the wearied troops after crossing I directed them to lie upon their arms until midnight, and while occupying this position, two strong pickets, thrown out by my orders, discovered and fired upon and drove back a body of Mexican infantry moving through the fields in the direction that an attempt had, in like manner, been made by the enemy to pass the position on the main road, occupied by the first regiment of artillery, and with a like want of success, thus being foiled in his effort to retire during the night. About midnight I again resumed the march, and joined Brigadier General Smith in the village already alluded to.

"General Smith previous to my arrival had made the most judicious arrangements for turning and surprising the Mexican position about daybreak, and with which I could not wish to interfere. This cast upon my command the necessity of holding the position evacuated by General Scott, on the right, and a large force of Calvary on the left.

"About daybreak the enemy opened a brisk fire of grape and round shot upon the church and the village in which my brigade was posted, and also upon a part of our own troops, displayed to divert him on his right and front, evidently unaware of the movement in progress to turn his position by the left and rear. This continued until Colonel Riley's brigade opened its fire from the rear, which was delivered with such terrible effect that the whole Mexican force was thrown into the utmost consternation. At this juncture I ordered the regiments of my command to throw themselves on the main road, by which the enemy must retire, to intercept and cut off his retreat, and although officers and men had suffered severely during the march of the night, and from exposure without rest or cover to the incessant rain until daybreak, this movement was executed with good order and rapidity.

"The Palmetto regiment crossing a deep ravine deployed on both sides the road, and opened a most destructive fire upon the mingled masses of the infantry and cavalry, and the New York regiment, brought in lower down and on the road side, delivered its fire with like effect. At this point many of the enemy were killed and wounded, and some 365 captured, of which 25 were officers, and among the latter was General Nicholas Mendoza.

"In the meantime the enemy's cavalry, about 3,000 strong which had been threatening our position during the morning, moved down towards us in good order as if to attack. I immediately recalled the infantry to place in position to meet the threatening movement, but soon the cavalry changed its direction, and retired toward the capital. I know received the order from General Twiggs to advance by the main road towards Mexico, and having posted Captain Marshall's company of South Carolina volunteers, and Captain Taylor's company New York volunteers, in charge of the prisoners and wounded, I moved off with the remainder of my force, and joined the positions of the 2d and 3d divisions already en route on the main road. On this march we were joined by General-in-Chief, who assumed the command of the whole, and the march continued uninterrupted until we arrived before Cheribousho.

"Here the enemy was found strongly fortified and posted with his main force, probably near 25,000. The engagement was commenced by the first division under Twiggs, soon joined by the first under Worth, and was becoming general, when I was directed by the Commander-in-Chief with my two regiments and Pierce's brigade, the 9th, 12th, and the 15th, with the mounted howitzer battery, to gain a position, if possible, to attack the enemy's rear and intercept his retreat.

"Leaving Loonco, by a left-hand road, and moving about a mile upon it, I moved thence with my command toward the right through a heavy corn-field, and gained an open, but swampy field, in which is situated the hacienda de las potales; on the edge of this field, beyond the hacienda I discovered the road by which the enemy must retire from Cheribousho, and found his reserve of about 4,000 infantry occupied it, just in the rear of the town.

"As my command arrived I established the right upon a point recommended by Captain Lee, engineer officer, in whose skill and management I had the utmost confidence, and commenced a movement to the left, to flank the enemy on his right and throw my troops between him and the city. But finding his right supported by a heavy body of cavalry of some 3,000 strong, seeing that with I had to operate, I withdrew the men to the cover of the hacienda, determined to attack him upon his front.

"I selected the Palmetto regiment as the base of my line and this gallant regiment moved forward firmly and rapidly under a fire of musketry as terrible, perhaps, as any which soldiers were faced. The New York 12th and 15th deployed gallantly on the right, and on the 9th on the left, and the whole advance opening their fire as they came up, and moving steadily forward, the enemy began to waver, and when my order to charge was given the men rushed upon and scattered his broken ranks.

"As we reached the road, the advance of Worth's command appeared, driving the enemy from the stronghold of Cheribousho. I took command of the front, and continued in pursuit until I passed by Harney with his cavalry, who followed the routed foe into the very gates of the city.

"In this terrible battle, in which a strongly fortified enemy fought behind his works, under the walls of his capital, our loss is necessarily severe; the loss, I regret to say, has fallen most severely upon my command. In the two regiments of my own brigade, numbering about 600 in the fight, the loss is reported 240 killed and wounded. Pierce's brigade, under my command in this action, lost a considerable number in killed and wounded; among the latter was the gallant Colonel Morgan, of the 15th. His command having rejoined its division immediately after the action, I have as yet received no official report of its loss. A particular and detailed report of the loss, as also of the prisoners captured by this command, accompanies this report.

"In this last engagement my command captured 380 prisoners, including 60 officers; of this number 41 had deserted from the American army during the war, and at their head was found the notorious O'Reilly, who had fought against the troops at Monterey and elsewhere. In closing this report I beg to offer my thanks to the many gallant officers of my command of their gallant and fearless support during the combat. To Colonel Burnett of the New York volunteers, to Lieutenant-Colonel Dickinson and Major Gladden of the South Carolina volunteers; as many of their gallant subordinates, every praise is due.

"Colonel Burnett was severely wounded at the head of his regiment, and Lieutenant-Colonel Dickinson also severely wounded while in the command of his regiment, and bearing gallantly forward the colours of his corps. My thanks are due to the medical staff on command, Drs. Halstead and M'Kebbin, of the New York regiment, and Drs. Clark and Blane of the South Carolina regiment, as also to Dr. Swift, United States' army, for their attention to the wounded.

"It affords me pleasure (and I but perform my duties too) in acknowledging my great obligation to Captain R.E. Lee, as also to my particular staff, captain F. N. Page, Lieutenant R.P. Hammond, 3d artillery, aide-de-camp, and Lieutenant T. Davis, of Illinois, acting as aid, for their gallant services and fearless exposure I encouraging the troops and conveying my orders during the different engagements. Lieutenant Bone, commanding howitzer battery, deserves great credit for the handsome manner in which he brought his guns into action and continued to serve them.

"I beg respectively, though the general of division, to ask for these gentlemen the favorable notice of the Commander-in-Chief, and to recommend them to the President. Lieutenant Shubrick of the navy, who accompanied me, attached himself to the Palmetto regiment of his native state, and fought in its ranks, and is spoken of handsomely in the report of its commander.

"While thus enjoying the pleasure of bestowing my commendation upon the living, I turn with feelings of sorrow, through my pride, to recollect the gallant dead. Lieutenants Adams and Williams, of the South Carolina regiments, and Lieutenant Chandler, of the New York regiment, are of these gallant dead. By yielding their lives to achieve this glorious victory, they have won the soldier's fame with a soldier's death.

"The noble and gallant colonel of the South Carolina regiment has risen from his sick bed to share the hardships of the field and the dangers of the combat with his devoted regiment; he survived the conflict of the morning to lead his command; victory again awaited it; although wounded himself, and having his horse shot under him, he still continued to press onward near the colours of his regiment until the fatal ball terminated his life.

"The gallant soldier in his youth has won, on his death upon the field of battle, fame for himself and his regiment and added another name to the roll of South Carolina's departed heroes.

"J.A. SHIELDS
"Brigadier-General, Commanding 1st Brigade, Volunteer Division."

US and Mexico

The effect produced at Liverpool on Saturday by the intelligence of America was a singular indication of the extent to which the best interest of the two civilized and commercial countries are, in these times, identified. Information of renewed hostilities in India could hardly have excited more lively dissatisfaction than the tidings that a Mexican peace was apparently as far off as ever. If any citizen of the United States should be perversely persuaded that England desires either the discomfiture or embarrassment of his country, he need only observe how the arrival of each successive mal affects out great commercial communities. Calculations of exchange and exports leave very little room for considerations of jealously, and political conclusions altogether vanish compared with the prospects of trade.

It cannot be denied that the apprehensions of interminable hostilities excited by the late dispatches are fully warranted by the intelligence they bring. Indeed, it is not easy to discover a single point in which the position of the Americans is materially mended. The armistice, under the terms of which we lately left both armies snatching a brief repose, has been summarily terminated, if not abruptly broken; and the renewal of the war appears to have been signalized by two engagements of unusual severity, in one of which the Americans suffered a decided but not dishonorable repulse. It seems that they broke up on the 18th ult. From Tacubaya, and assaulted a strong post at Chapultepec, situate about midway between Tacubaya and Mexico; but that they met with a resistance so determined, or a force so overpowering, that they were compelled to retire. Intelligence, purporting to be of six days' later date, then states that Chapultepec had been just carried by storm, and that the American army had entered Mexico, Santa Anna retiring before them to Guadalupe. The conduct of the Americans troops throughout the whole war, which, as far as regards their behavior in the field, does honour to the race from which they spring, will lead us at once to the conclusion that the last reports are highly probable, and that the previous reverse, if it ever happened as is related, was brought about by some prodigious disparity of numbers or position. Still this mends matters but little, for neither the capture of the city of Mexico nor the display of national superiority is the object of Mr. Polk or his General. What they want is the submission of the enemy and the conciliatory termination of hostilities, and so far are these ends from being attained that the exasperation and pertinacity of each defeat, and they have never made a nearer approach to the masculine or creditable deportment than at this very moment, when according to all calculations they ought to have been beaten into sure subserviency. The abortive negotiations which preceded the renewal of the war, and which will be found in a detailed form elsewhere, are in a high degree instructive, as indicating more conclusively than any other evidence could do the intentions and confidence of the respective parties. On the side of the United States it is proposed that the boundary line of the two republics should run up the middle of the Grande, strike off westward on reaching the limit of New Mexico, take the course of the Gila and the lower Colorado, and so through the mouth of the latter river down the middle of the Californian Gulf into the Pacific. In other words, this would bring the south-western boundary line of the United States about ten degrees further south, would deprive Mexico of all Upper and Lower California as well as of the districts on the Grande, and would leave her with the Gila for her northern boundary, but just above the present frontier of Sonora which marks her settle territories. Enormous as was this claim, it was not he point upon which the negotiations broke off, for the Americans phrased their requirements considerately, and offered a liberal price for the cession they desired. Santa Anna, it is true, was for reserving a certain portion of California for Mexican expansion, and he suggested the 37th in place of the 32nd parallel as the boundary of the two countries. Yes it is hardly disguised that on he point of cession and sale in this quarter the Mexican commissioners were amenable to the reasons which Mr. Polk brought, by millions, against them, and the transfer might have been completed but for a comparatively insignificant slice of debatable land. The old Texan boundary line was again brought under discussion, the one party insisting on the Grande, and the other, as in honour bound, upon the Nueces; and this little difference proved incapable of adjustment between parties who had just been judiciously chaffering about ten degrees of territory!

It is thus clear that from the great object which has been so unhappily sought by a war the Americans are now only separated by an obstacle which that very war was raised. We have before expressed our persuasion that, looking at the natural destinies and necessities of men and states, the vast province of New California would much more reasonably fall to the lot of an expensive and enterprising people who might reclaim its wastes and colonize its shores, than remain the nominal and desert appanage of a stationary or retrograding race which could never have either the motives or the means to improve its advantages for commerce, or explore the resources of its soil. It is not the demand itself, but the manner in which it has been made, which has proved at once so discreditable and disastrous to the aggressors. It can scarcely be doubted that if the United States had quietly and sagaciously made the same offer before the war which they make now, the bargain might have been amicably arranged, and the costs of the intervening hostilities, which independently of blood wasted and credit sunk, amount to more than the whole purchase money of the desired territory, might all have been saved. This, however, then appeared too costly a policy, and bullying was substituted for barter by a Cabinet willing to acquire a province without paying its just price. Advantage was taken of two flimsy pretexts to proclaim a war. With a signal forgetfulness of her own indebtedness to foreign states, and of the outcry with which she had received a monitory imitation that compulsion on the part of a despairing creditor was strictly justifiable by international law, America announced her intention of enforcing at the sword's point the demands of her own citizens upon the citizens of Mexico. The preference to be given to one of two contiguous rivers as a boundary supplied an immediate opportunity of action, and from the debatable strip between the Grande and the Nueces the American forces marched into Mexico, thinking to fix the terms and the period of their own retreat, and to win, by a glorious and agreeable campaign, the land for which they were reluctant to pay down a more equitable consideration. The proverbial fruits of such policy are now before the world. Instead of the campaign, the land for which they were reluctant to pay down a more equitable cession they desired. Santa Anna, it is true, was for reserving a certain portion of California for Mexican expansion, and he suggested the 37th in place of the 32nd parallel as the boundary of the two countries. convincing or compressing their enemy into the desired docility. They have won a score of fights without getting any nearer to their mark, and now, at last, after reaching the hostile capital by force of arms, after descending to mollifying memorials and deprecatory correspondence, after undertaking to satisfy from the national exchequer those very private demands which had made a cause of war, and after Tendering for the coveted territory the very monies which they embarked in the war to save, they find their proposals deliberately rejected by an emboldened enemy, and themselves reduced to straight from which they can only escape by concessions which would convict at once their first policy and their present perplexity, or by redoubling efforts of sanguinary violence which may end no better than before.

[The following appeared in part only of our impression of Saturday:-]

Liverpool, Friday Evening

The screw steam-ship Sarah Sands, Captain Thompson, has just arrived in the Mersey, after a passage of 16 days, from New York, having left that port on the 6th inst. She brings 40,000 specie on freight.

The ship Henry Clay, packet of the 6inst., was detained, in order to bring a freight of about 200,000l.

Our advices from Mexico are important. Letters had been received from Mexico, under date to the 9th of September, stating that on the 7th the Mexican commissioners declared that the propositions made by Mr. Trist were inadmissible; in consequence of which General Santa Anna convoked a council of generals, who decided that notice should be given to General Scott that the armistice was at an end, and appointed the 9th for the recommencement of hostilities.

On the 6th of September, General Scott addressed a letter to Santa Anna from Tacubaya, accusing him of having violated several articles of the armistice and one of the charges was that he had not allowed the American army to obtain supplies from the city of Mexico. General Scott demanded an explanation, and concludes as follows:-

"I hereby formally notify you, that if I do not receive the most complete satisfaction on all these points before 12 o'clock to-morrow, I shall consider the armistice as terminated from that hour."

To this letter General Santa Anna replied at considerable length, and with great severity. He accused General Scott of having violated the terms of the armistice in refusing to allow flour from the mills in the vicinity to be brought into the city, and says that the American wagons were driven out of the objectionable conduct of the officers accompanying them. Santa Anna also charges General Scott with having sacked the Mexican towns in the vicinity of the capital, and robbed and desecrated the churches, and stealing and destroying articles held sacred by every Mexican. He concludes as follows:-

"I flatter myself that your Excellency will be convinced, on calm reflection upon the weight of my reasons; but if by misfortune you should seek only a pretext to deprive the first city of the American continent of an opportunity to free the unarmed population of the horrors of war, there will be left me no other means of salvation but no repel to force by force, with the decision and energy which my high obligations impose upon me."

On the 7th General Herrera, as commandant of the city of Mexico, addressed the clergy, exhorting them to exert all their influence to incite the people to arm themselves, and prepare to resist the American army.

General Scott, it seems, did not wait for the time fixed upon by Santa Anna (the 9th), but, on the 8th attacked the Mill de Rey, or King's Mill, in the immediate vicinity of Chapultepec, and, according to the Diario del Gobierno, and the Boletin, published at Alisco, near Puebla, the Mexican army was repulsed, after a short conflict, in which it lost about 400 men killed, and from 600 to 700 in wounded, and fell back upon Tacubaya.
The account given by Boletin represents the battle to have been the most bloody and severely contested of the whole war. It concludes as follows: -

"At 10 o'clock the enemy commenced a retrograde movement, and by 2 o'clock in the afternoon he withdrew all his forces to Tacubaya, abandoned the two points he had occupied, and blew up the house of Mata, although some say it was set on fire by a bomb from Chapultepec.

"It is believed that Generals Twiggs and Pierce directed the attack, and that they put in motion about 8,000 men. It is certain that the fire was more intense and brisk than at Churubusco.

"It is impossible to ascertain the loss on either side. Ours does not amount to 100 killed and 250 wounded. There are a few missing-nearly all not killed or wounded retiring to Chapultepec.

"The enemy, according to the confession of an Irishman, who came over to us in the evening, carried off 500 dead and 600 or 700 wounded.

"We have to lament the loss of General Leon, since dead; that of Colonel Balderas, of the valiant Colonels Huerta and Gelati, and of the determined Captain Mateos, of Puebla."

A Mexican letter announces that Riley and his legion of St. Patrick, 70 in number, were ordered by the court-martial to be hung. The sentence was approved by General Scott, and on the 8th of September the whole legion were hung in presence of the army, as also of the enemy. This, of course, is a thoroughly Mexican account, and so far as its details are concerned, deserves, probably, but little credit.

The following account of the same attack is from the Diario del Gobierno, also Mexican authority: -

"At half-past 4 o'clock in the morning on the 5th the Americans attacked the position of the mill of El Rey, close to the fortress of Chapultepec. Their numerous and brave columns were, however, repulsed three times by the valiant soldiers, who this day gave brilliant proofs of their patriotism and bravery; more than 1,000 of the enemy remained on the field of battle, and on our side the loss has been less than one half that number, we having to lament the death of the gallant Colonel John Lucas, Baldras and General Don Antonio de Leon, being wounded, together with several other distinguished chiefs and officers. The traitor Santa Anna commanded in person the column which forced the Americans to retreat, taking with them, without doubt, the conviction that it is only through rivers of blood that they penetrate the city of Mexico, and that at all events they will there find their sepulchre."

The following paragraph is translated from a Jalapa letter in the Arco Iris, at Vera Cruz, but its statements are not credited: -

"When General Perez abandoned the mill El Rey, a bomb discharged from Chapultepec fell among the ammunition waggons of the enemy, in the yard of the mill, causing four of them to explode, by which 300 Americans are said to have been blown up, including General Worth, who, according to the accounts, had not been seen or heard from the following day at Tacubaya."

This is the latest of the Mexican accounts from the capital. It renders it certain that General Scott had opened his batteries upon the city. The only authentic report of the result is contained in the following letter, addressed to Mr. Dimond, at Vera Cruz: -

"Orizaba, Sept. 19,

"I have the honour to inform you that an express arrived here this evening from Mexico, which brings intelligence that General Scott was in the city of Mexico. That on the 14th the American troops took Chapultepec and the citadel and went into the city that night. General Bravo was killed and General Santa Anna was wounded in the arm, and has retired with the remainder of his troops, which have suffered much, to Guadaloupe."

From this it seems that the attack upon Chapultepec was renewed, which renders credible the first statement that in the attack of the 8th on that town General Scott was repulsed. With reference to the attack upon the capital, the Picayune adds: -

"A letter, from a credible source, confirms all that is said in the above, and only disagrees with it in stating that the city was carried by assault on the 14th. The Sum of Anahuac has it on the 13th, the heights and works of Chapultepec were carried; on the 14th and 15th the city was bombarded, and that a part of our army entered it on the morning on the 16th, the rest remaining at Chapultepec."

Additional accounts by the steamer Day give hopes that the reported disaster to General Worth and others is false. There was a Mexican force near Puebla determined to intercept all communication from General Scott.

General Lane had reached Vera Cruz on the 10th with 2,000 men, and started for Mexico; and General Cushing was expected.

Paredes is stated to be in the state of Puebla with 6,000 mean, prepared to prevent reinforcements reaching General Scott.

Government had made no attempt to arrest his proceedings. He had been appointed Inspector General of the Puebla National Guards.

It will be remembered that the Deputies of Congress, when summoned by the President to confer upon the question of peace with the United States, did not attend in sufficient numbers to form quorum, and the Executive Government in the emergency took upon itself the conduct of the negotiations. The members of Congress, however, have now protested against this assumption of power, and in an address to the President, dated from Toluca, declare that any arrangement concluded without their sanction will be null and void, and demand to be called together at Queretaro, as it is impossible for them to deliberate with sufficient freedom of discussion at Mexico.

This address had been communicated to the President by the Governor of the state of Mexico, who vigorously advocates the continuance of the war.

General Valencia has issued a proclamation, rehearsing the history of the battles of Contreras and Churubusco, in which he accuses Santa Anna of cowardice, in order to screen himself. It contains nothing new or important.

The State of Zacatecas, taking advantage of the distracted condition of Mexico, has sent a force against the state of Aguas Calientes, which has sometimes acted independently of Zacatecas, and been recognised as an independent state, to reduce it to submission.

An account of the negotiation with the United States' Commissioner is given elsewhere in full detail. The following letter is published in some of the American papers, but it is in all probability an invention:-

"City of Mexico, Sept. 19, 1847.

'Respected Friends,--I have an opportunity to send by the courier who leaves to-night this letter, in which I shall briefly attempt to describe to you the horrors we have just experienced. On the 7th inst. Our commissioners rejected the treaty propositions of the American Government, and decided on resuming the war, General Herrera inviting and urging the clergy to rouse the citizens to the utmost resistance. On the same day General Scott, the American chief, charged Santa Anna with breaking the armistice by forbidding his commissioners to obtain food in the city, and threatened, unless reparation was made, to commence hostilities and bombarded the city. Santa Anna replied, severely charging Scott with breaking the armistice by sacking our villages, and expressed his perfect readiness to renew the war. On the 13th instant Americans made a demonstration on Chapultepec and the mill of El Rey, but our generals were prepared for them. Anticipating a breach of armistice, Santa Anna for several days had caused to be conveyed, in every possible manner so as not to excited suspicion, arms, munitions, and food to the fortress of Chapultepec. Our citizens carried under their mantles and on mules a great quantity of powder, balls, and provisions, without being once discovered, so great as the feeling of security and confidence among the Americans. General Scott was not a little surprised to find on attacking Chapultepec such obstinate resistance. Chapultepec, you know, is situated between Tacubaya and the city, within cannon-shot of the former and some three miles form the latter. It is a bold hill overlooking a vast range of country, which enabled our soldiers to watch every maneuver of the enemy. It also commands the road from Tacubaya to the city, which runs close to its base, and it can only be ascended by a circuitous paved way, which, after turning a certain angle, is exposed to the full range of the fortress guns. As the Americans ascended the hill a perfect storm of musket balls and grape shot drove them back with a heavy loss. They recovered and advanced again, but were repulsed. Our troops fought with desperate valour, worthy the character of Mexicans. The enemy also fought bravely, his men seemed like so many devils, whim it was impossible to defeat without annihilation. He made a third and last charge with fresh force and heavy guns, and our gallant troops having exhausted their grape-shot, were forced, very unwillingly, to retreat and yield up the fortress, of which the enemy took possession."
Our soldiers retreated towards the city, but were unfortunately cut off by a detachment of the enemy's cavalry, and about 1,000 were made prisoners, but were soon released, as the enemy had no men to guard them. The enemy then opened his batteries on the Mill El Rey (King's Mill) close upon Chapultepec, which, after obstinate fighting and great loss to the Americans, we were obliged to abandon.

"The two actions continues over nine hours, and were the severest, considering our small number of soldiers and the enemy's large force, that have been fought. Our loss in killed and wounded was not more than 300, while the enemy lost over 400, or at least such was the report of deserters from the American camp who came to us in the evening. Seeing that the city would inevitably be attacked, General Santa Anna, during the actions, caused a number of trenches to be cut across the road leading to the city, which were flooded with water. On the morning of the 14th, before daylight, the enemy, with a part of his force, commenced his march upon the city. Our soldiers, posted behind the arches of the aqueducts and several breast-works which had been hastily thrown up, annoyed him so severely, together with the trenches which he had to bridge over, that he did not arrive at the gates till late in the afternoon. Here he halted, and attempted to bombard the city, which he did during the balance of the day and the day following, doing immense damage. In some cases whole blocks were destroyed and a great number of men, women, and children killed and wounded. The picture was awful. One deafening roar filled our ears, one cloud of smoke met our eyes, now and then mixed with flame, and amid it all we could hear the various shrieks of the wounded and dying. But the city bravely resisted the hundreds of flying shells. It hurled back defiance to the bloodthirsty Yankee, and convinced him that his bombs could not reduce the Mexican capital. The enemy then changed his plan, and determined to enter the city, where we were prepared to meet him, having barricaded the streets with sand bags, and provided on the tops and at the windows all who could bear arms or missiles, stones, bricks, &c., to throw on the heads of the enemy. Before General Scott had fairly passed the gates he found the difficulty of his position. A perfect torrent of balls and stones rained upon our troops. Many were killed and more wounded. Still he kept advancing until he gained the entrance of two streets leading direct to the Plaza. Finding that he could not oppose himself to our soldiers, who were all posted out of sight, and that he was losing his men rapidly, General Scott took possession of the convent of San Isidoro, which extends back to the centre of a block, and at once set his sappers and miners to cutting a way directly through the blocks of buildings. In some instances whole houses were blown up to facilitate his progress; but after several hours he again emerged into the street, and finally regained the Plaza with great loss. On entering the Plaza a heavy fire was opened on him from the Palace and cathedral, which were filled and covered with our patriotic troops. Finding himself thus assaulted, the enemy drew out his forces in the Plaza and opened a cannonade on the Palace and cathedral, firing over 100 shots, which did immense damage to the buildings and caused a severe loss of killed and wounded. Seeing further resistance useless, our soldiers ceased firing, and on the 15th of September (sad day!) the enemy was in possession of the Mexican capital. Though we inflicted havoc and death upon the Yankees, we suffered greatly ourselves. Many were killed by the blowing up of the houses, many by the bombardment, but more by the confusion which prevailed in the city, altogether we cannot count our killed, wounded, and missing since the action commenced yesterday, at less than 4,000, among whom are women and children. The enemy confessed a loss over 1,000, it is no doubt much greater. What a calamity! But Mexico will yet have vengeance. God will avenge us for our sufferings. Alas, that I should write this letter within sight of a proud enemy, who has succeeded by his ferocity in trampling on our capital and our country—an enemy who only prides himself upon shooting well with his rifle and cannon. But thus it is—we are prostrated, not humbled. We may be forced to silence, but the first moment that presents us a chance will be devoted to terrible revenge. Santa Anna has gone with his generals and all the troops he could draw off to Guadalupe. He is said to be wounded severely. Santa Anna has gone with his generals and all the troops he could draw off to Guadalupe. He is said to be wounded severely. We have lost heroic officers and brave men in these two days. I cannot foresee what is to come. Thousands are gathering upon the hills around the city, determined to cut off all supplies and starve the enemy who has so audaciously entered it. General Scott may yet find our lakes bursting their barriers and filling this beautiful valley to annihilate the infamous Americans. We scarcely hope, yet do not quite despair. Our brave generals may recover what is lost, and Mexico, with her ten millions of people, arise to sweep the invader from the land he has desecrated. Be sure that whatever we do in the way of submission is only for the moment. No Mexican will respect beyond the hour that forces him to it, any bond dictated by the sword of an enemy. My heart is too full of grief and indignation to write more.

The following appeared in part only of our impression of Saturday:-]

LIVERPOOL, Friday Evening.

The screw steam-ship Sarah Sands, Captain Thompson, has just arrived in the Mersey, after a passage if 16 days, from New York, having left that port on the 6th inst. She brings 40,000l. specie on freight.

The ship Henry Clay, packet of the 6th inst., was detained, in order to bring a fright of about 200,000l.

Our advices from Mexico are important. Letters had been received from Mexico, under date to the 9th of September, stating that on the 7th the Mexican commissioners declared that the propositions made by Mr. Trist were inadmissible; in consequence of which General Santa Anna convoked a council of generals, who decided that notice should be given to General Scott that the armistice was at an end, and appointed the 9th for the recommencement of hostilities.

On the 6th September, General Scott addressed a letter to Santa Anna from Tacubaya, accusing him of having violated several articles of the armistice and one of the charges was that he had not allowed the American army to obtain supplies from the city of Mexico. General Scott demanded an explanation, and concludes as follows:-

"I hereby formally notify you, that if I do not receive the most complete satisfaction on all these points before 12 o'clock to-morrow, I shall consider the armistice as terminated from that hour."

To this letter General Santa Anna replied at considerable length, and with great severity. He accused General Scott of having violated the terms of the armistice in refusing to allow flour from the mills in the vicinity to be brought into the city, and says that the American waggons were driven out of the city on account of the objectionable conduct of the officers accompanying them. Santa Anna also charges General Scott with having sacked the Mexican towns in the vicinity of the capital, and robbed and desecrated the churches, and stealing and destroying articles held sacred by every Mexican. He concludes as follows:-

"I flatter myself that your Excellency will be convinced, on calm reflection upon the weight of my reasons; but if by misfortune you should seek only a pretext to deprive the first city of the American continent of an opportunity to free the unarmed population of the horrors of war, there will be left me no other means of salvation but to repel force by force, with the decision and energy which my high obligations impose upon me."

On the 7th General Herrera, as commandant of the city of Mexico, addressed the clergy, exhorting them to exert all their influence to incite the people to arm themselves, and prepare to resist the American army.

General Scott, it seems, did not wait for the time fixed upon by Santa Anna (the 9th), but on the 8th attacked the Mill del Rey, or King's Mill, in the immediate vicinity of Chapultepec, and, according to the Diario del Gobierno, and the Boletin, published at Alisco, near Puebla, the Mexican army was repulsed, after a short conflict, in which it lost about 400 men killed and from 600 to 700 wounded, and fell back upon Tacubaya.

The account given by the Boletin represents the battle to have been the most bloody and severely contested of the whole war. It concludes as follows:-

"At 10 o'clock the enemy commenced a retrograde movement, and by 2 o'clock in the afternoon he withdrew all his forces to Tacubaya, abandoned the two points he had occupied, and blew up the house of Mata, although some say it was set on fire by a bomb from Chapultepec.

"It is believed that Generals Twiggs and Pierce directed the attack, ad that they put in motion about 8,000 men. It is certain that the fire was more intense and brisk than at Churubusco.

"It is impossible to ascertain the loss on either side. Ours does not amount to 100 killed and 250 wounded. There are a few missing—nearly all not killed or wounded retiring to Chapultetec.

"The enemy, according to the confession of an Irishman, who came over to us in the evening, carried off 500 dead and 600 or 700 wounded.
"We have to lament the loss of General Leon, since dead; that of Colonel Balberas, of the valiant Colonels Huerla and Geleati, and of the determined Captain Mateos, of Puebla."

A Mexican letter announces that Riley and his legion of St. Patrick, 70 in number, were ordered by the court-martial to be hung. The sentence was approved by General Scott, and on the 8th of September the whole legion were hung in presence of the army, as also of the enemy. This of course, is a thoroughly Mexican account, and so far as its details are concerned, deserves, probably, but little credit.

The following account of the same attack is from the Diario del Gobierno, also Mexican authority:

"At half-past 4 o'clock in the morning on the 5th the American attacked the position of the mill of El Rey, close to the fortress of Chapultepec. Their numerous and brave columns were, however, repulsed three times by valiant soldiers, who this day gave brilliant proofs of their patriotism and bravery; more than 1,000 of the enemy remained on the field of battle, and on out side the loss has been less than one half that number, we having to lament the death of the gallant Colonel John Lucas, Baldras and General Don Antonio de Leon, being wounded, together with several other distinguished chiefs and officers. The traitor Santa Anna commanded in person the column which forced the Americans to retreat, taking with them, without doubt, the conviction that it is only though rivers of blood that they penetrate the city of Mexico, and that all events they will find their sepulchre."

The following paragraph is translated from a Jalapa letter in the Arco Iris, at Vera Cruz, but its statements are not credited:

"When General Perez abandoned the Mill El Rey, a bomb discharged from Chapultepec fell among the ammunition waggons of the enemy, in the yard of the mill, causing four of them to explode, by which 300 Americans are said to have blown up, including General Worth, so according to the accounts, had not been seen or heard from the following day at Tacubaya."

This is the latest of the Mexican accounts from the capital. It renders it certain that General Scott had opened his batteries upon the city. The only authentic report of the result is contained in the following letter, addressed to Mr. Dimond, at Vera Cruz:

"Orizaba, Sept. 19.

"I have the honor to inform you that an express arrived here this evening for Mexico, which brings intelligence that General Scott was in the city of Mexico. That on the 14th the American troops took Chapultepec and the citadel, and went into the city that night. General Bravo was killed, and General Santa Anna was wounded in the arm, and has retired with the remainder of his troops, which have suffered much, to Guadaloupe."

From this it seems that the attack upon Chapultepec was renewed, which renders credible that first statement that in the attack of the 8th on that town General Scott was repulsed. With reference to the attack upon the capital, the Picayune adds:

"A letter, from the credible source, confirms all that is said in the above, and only disagrees with it in stating that the city was carried by assault in the 14th. The Sun of Anahuac has it in the 13th, the heights and works of Chapultepec were carried; on the 14th and 15th the city was bombarded, and that a part of out army entered it on the morning of the 16th, the rest remaining at Chapultepec."

Additional accounts by the steamer Day give hopes that the reported disaster to General Worth and others is false. There was a Mexican force near Puebla determined to intercept all communication from General Scott.

General Lane had reached Vera Cruz on the 10th with 2,000 men, and started for Mexico, and General Cushng was expected.

Parades is stated to be in the state of Puebla with 6,000 men prepared to prevent reinforcements reaching General Scott.

Government had made no attempt to arrest his proceedings. He had been appointed Inspector-General of the National Guards.

It will be remembered that the Deputies of Congress, when summoned by the President to confer upon the question of peace with the United States, did not attend in sufficient numbers to form a quorum, and the Executive Government in the emergency took upon itself the conduct of the negotiations. The members of Congress, however, have now protested against this assumption of power, and in an address to the President, dated from Toluca, declare that any arrangement concluded without their sanction will be null and void, and demand to be called together at Querétaro, as it is impossible for them to deliberate with sufficient freedom of discussion at Mexico.

This address had been communicated to the President by the Governor of the state of Mexico, who vigorously advocates the continuance of war.

General Valencia has issued a proclamation, rehearsing the history of the battles of Contreras and Churubusco, in which he accuses Santa Anna of cowardice, in order to screen himself. It contains nothing new or important.

The state of Zacatecas, taking advantage of the distracted condition of Mexico, has sent a force against the state of Aguas Calientes, which has sometimes acted independently of Zacatecas, and been recognized as an independent state, to reduce it to submission.

An account of the negotiation with the United States' Commissioner is given elsewhere in full detail.

The following letter is published in some of the American papers, but it is all probably an invention:--

"City of Mexico, Sept. 19, 1847.

Respected Friends,-I have an opportunity to send by the courier who leaves to-night this letter, in which I shall briefly attempt to describe to you the horrors we have just experienced. On the 7th instant our commissioners rejected the treaty propositions of the American Government and decided on resuming the war, General Herrera inviting and urging the clergy to rouse the citizens to the utmost resistance. On the same day General Scott, the American chief, charged Santa Anna with breaking he armistice by forbidding his commissioners to obtain food in the city, and threatened, unless reparations were made, to commence hostilities and bombard the city. Santa Anna replied, severely charging Scott with breaking the armistice by sacking our villages, and expressed his perfect readiness to renew the war. On the 13th instant the Americans made a demonstration on Chapultepec and the mill of El Rey, but our generals were prepared for them. Anticipating a breach of the armistice, Santa Anna for several days had caused to be conveyed, in every possible manner so as not to excite suspicion, arms, munitions, and food to the fortress of Chapultepec. Our citizens carried under their mantles and on mules a great quantity of powder, balls, and provisions, without being once discovered, so great was the feeling of security and confidence among the Americans. General Scott was not a little surprised to find on attacking Chapultepec such obstinate resistance. Chapultepec, you know, is situated between Tacubaya and the city within cannon-shot of the former and some three miles from the latter. It is a bold hill overlooking a vast range of country, which enabled our soldiers to watch every maneuver of the enemy. It also commands the road from Tacubaya to the city, which runs close to its base and it can only be ascend by a circuitous paved way, which after turning to a certain angle, is exposed to the full range of the fortress guns. As the Americans ascended the hill a perfect storm of musket balls and grape shot drove them back with heavy loss. They recovered and advanced again, but were repulsed. Our troops fought with desperate valour, worthy the character of Mexicans. The enemy also fought bravely, his men seemed like so many devils, whom it was impossible to defeat without annihilation. He made third and last charge with fresh force and heavy guns, and our gallant troops having exhausted their grape-shot, were forced, very unwillingly, to retreat and yield up the fortress, of which the enemy took possession. Our soldiers retreated towards the city, but were unfortunately cut off by a detachment of the enemy's calvary, and about 1,000 were made prisoners, but were soon released, as the enemy had no men to guard them. The enemy then opened his batteries on the Mill El Rey (King's Mill) close upon Chapultepec, which, after obstinate fighting and great loss to the Americans, were obliged to abandon.

"The two actions continued over nine hours, and were the severest, considering our small number of soldiers and the enemy's large force, that have been fought. Our loss in killed and wounded was not more than 300, while the enemy lost over 400, or at least such was the report of deserters from the American camp who came to us in the evening. Seeing that the city would inevitably be attacked, General Santa Anna, during the actions, caused a number of trenches to be cut across the road leading to the city, which were flooded with water. On the morning of the 14th, before daylight, the enemy, with a part of his force, commenced his march upon the city. Our soldiers, posted behind the arches of the aqueducts and several breast-works which had been hastily thrown up, annoyed him so severely, together with the trenches which he had to bridge over, that he did not arrive at the gates till late in the afternoon. Here he halted, and attempted to bombard the city, which he did during the balance of the day and the day following, doing immense damage. In some cases whole blocks were destroyed and a great number of men, women, and children killed and wounded. The picture was awful. One deafening roar filled our ears, one cloud of smoke met our eyes, now and then mixed with flame, and amid it all we could hear the various shrieks of the wounded and dying. But the city bravely resisted the hundreds of flying shells. It hurled back defiance to the bloodthirsty Yankee, and convinced him that his bombs could not reduce the Mexican capital. The enemy then changed his plan, and determined to enter they city, where we were prepared to meet him, having barricaded the streets with sand bags and provided on the house tops and at the windows all who cold bear arms and missiles, stones, bricks, &c., throw on the heads of the enemy. Before General Scott had fairly passed the gates he found the difficulty of his position. A perfect torrent of balls and stones rained upon our troops. Many were killed and more wounded. Still he kept advancing until he gained the entrance of two streets leading direct to the Plaza. Finding that he could not oppose himself to our soldiers, who were all posted out of sight, and that he was losing his men rapidly, General Scott took possession of the convent of San Isador, which extends back to the centre of a block, and at once set his sappers and miners to cutting away directly through the blocks of buildings. In some instances whole houses were blown up to facilitate his progress; but after several hours he again emerged into the street, and finally regained the Plaza with great loss. On entering the Plaza a heavy fire was opened on him from the Palace and cathedral, which were filled and covered with out patriotic troops. Finding himself thus assaulted, the enemy drew out his forces in the Plaza and opened a cannonade on the Palace and cathedral, firing over 100 shots, which did immense damage to the buildings and caused sever loss of killed and wounded. Seeing further resistance useless, our soldiers ceased firing, and on the 15th of September (sad day!) the enemy was in procession of the Mexican capital. Though we inflicted havoc and death upon the Yankees, we have suffered greatly ourselves. Many were killed by the blowing up of the houses, many by the bombardment, but more by the confusion which prevailed in the city, and altogether we cannot count our killed, wounded, and missing since the action commenced yesterday, at less than 4,000, among whom many are women and children. The enemy confessed of loss of over 1,000, it is not doubt much greater. What a calamity! But Mexico will yet have vengeance. God will avenge us for our sufferings. Alas, that I should write this letter within sight of a proud enemy who has succeeded by his ferocity in trampling our capital and our country-an enemy who only prides himself upon shooting well through his rifles and cannon. But thus it is-we are prostrated, not humbles. We may be forced to silence, but the first moment that presents us a chance will be devoted to terrible revenge. Santa Anna has gone with his generals and all the troops he could draw off to Gaudalupe. He is said to be wounded severely. We have lost heroic officers and brave men in these two days. I cannot foresee what is to come. Thousands are gathering upon the hills around the city, determined to cut off all supplies and starve the enemy who has so audaciously entered it. General Scott may yet find that Mexico is not vanquished. He may find our lakes bursting their barriers filling this beautiful valley to annihilate them infamous Americans. We scarcely hope, yet do not quite despair. Our brave generals may recover what it slot, and Mexico, with her ten millions of people, arise to sweep the invader from the land he has desecrated. Be sure that whatever we do in the way of submission is only for the moment. No Mexican will respect beyond the hour that forces him to it, any bond dictated by the sword of an enemy. Conversation Between the United States and Mexican Governments: US, Negotiations With Mexico

The Washington Union of the 10th inst. publishes at length the correspondence, which has taken place between the supreme Government of Mexico, the General-in-Chief of the American Army, and the Commissioner of the United States, Mr. Trist.

The first in the series is a letter from General Scott, dated August 21, announcing the presence of a commissioner, with full powers to treat for peace, and proposing a short armistice.

Senor Aloorta, the Minister at War, replies to this letter by accepting the proposed armistice, and the next document is an official letter, addressed by Senor L'acheco to the President of the Sovereign Congress, requesting him to summon the deputies, and to submit to them Mr. Tirst's proposals for consideration.

The President replies, that a sufficient number of deputies cannot be found.

Letters from Glasgow, received this afternoon, state that the National Exchange Company is about winding up its affairs. Its capital was 200,000l. And its deposits were 119,000l. Some failures are both announced in that city and Edinburgh.

A meeting of the Ayrshire Iron Company was held on Wednesday, at which a report of the affairs of the company was submitted. The debts due amounted to 221,719l., and the liabilities were estimated at 15,000l., making a total of 236,719.

U.S. and Mexico

October 26, 1847

International negotiations do not usually wear a very attractive form, nor can we say that the three columns which we yesterday published of the projects exchanged between the United States and Mexico were invested with more than the ordinary superficial embellishments of such records. Yet it would be a pity if many of our readers were deterred by the apparent complexity of the documents from giving them an attentive perusal, for they tell the real history of the war and disclose the true prospects of peace.
with great perspicuity and most amusing force. It is but doing the Mexicans justice to say that, if their swords had been half as sharp as their pens, the conferences at Atzapoza would never have taken place. The most eloquent and practised advocate could not state a strong case more irresistibly than the authorities of this republic have done; and, if words could overwhelm an American army with confusion, the siege of the city of Mexico would have been raised on the spot. Unfortunately, the declarations which would have come with decorous propriety from the unsubdued skeleton of a patriot corps are only grotesque as proceeding from the lucky survivors of a score of flights.

Santa Anna, or his secretary, takes what would be a most unanswerable tone of argument, if it did but become the speaker. He quietly asks, in the first place, what has brought the Americans in arms to the gates of Mexico? He assumes (and Mr. Trist confesses the impeachment) that the motive has been the desire to enlarge the territory of the United States by the acquisition of an extensive province. To this not unnatural ambition he takes no exception, but he demands to be told on what grounds the Americans have desired to conduct the transfer; if by peaceable contract and fair ratification, then must they in a consistent spirit abstain from all that is not thus willingly ceded; if by forcible seizure and violent confiscation, then are negotiations unnecessary, and the aggressions of the one side and the resistance of the other must continue as before. This adroit and unimpeachable argument is directed against the forced sale and compulsory friendship which the Americans would willingly bring about, and leaves them with no alternative but that of taking what the Mexicans may please to dispose of, or avowing the title of conquest for what they choose themselves to keep. In the same spirit the Mexican Commissioners are instructed to ask, as a necessary preliminary to any negotiation whatever, a frank acknowledgment of the motives and purposes of the war—what is the character in which the American plenipotentiaries appear—and by what pretensions they treat for a purchase of territory, through the medium of a hostile force, before the capital of the state to which the territory in question rightfully belongs? By what right is any demand made for New Mexico and the Californias except in the way of a peaceful purchase? If the Americans are, indeed, so anxious to get sole possession of the western marches of their country, the Mexicans may not be averse to treat for the sale; but, in this case, the barest justice would demand that the applicants should bear the costs of the extraordinary application they have chosen to make, and indemnify all those who have suffered by their extravagant proceedings, "since it is concerning the territory that they have come to negotiate, and have brought the war to the capital." With equal consideration for the doctrines of morality and the rights of man, the vendors stipulate that no slaves shall ever be introduced into the territory they are requested to alienate, and that all care shall be bestowed upon the inhabitants whose allegiance they are about to transfer.

Preposterous as these presumptions may appear in the relative positions of the two parties, they become perfectly warrantable if measured only by those pretensions which each party dares advance. In their anxiety to save the appearances of right the Americans are compelled to sink the advantages of might. They are loth that the treaty of Mexico should seem to be based on the battle of Churubusco, and, by assuming the attitude of honourable dealers, they forego the opportunities of successful invaders. The result of these anomalous impersonations was a scene fit for a pantomine. SANTA ANNA caught with unrivalled acuteness at the amiable weakness of his adversary, and donned the dress of a victorious arbiter with a grace that did him infinite credit. No lordly landholder of the eastern counties ever received the overtures of an embryo company with more distant dignity or more exalted demands than the Mexican General met the tenders for a province which he had already lost twenty times over. His commissioners were first to exact a categorical declaration of the "intentions" of the strangers and then a confession of their crimes to all which no reply of any kind was then or there to be vouchsafed. Should this preliminary expiation be deemed sufficient, they were then to propound their conditions of sale, each of which was to be held as an ultimatum, admitting of no dispute, and, should and doubts arise, they were to remember, "as a general basis, to treat for peace in the manner of one who had triumphed!" And all this when the army had run away, the Senate absconded, and every city, port, and custom-house in the country was in immediate command or actual possession of the enemy!

It is not surprising that such negotiations were inconclusive, although, as we yesterday remarked, they did not in point of fact break off on the cardinal point of the conference, but were terminated by the reciprocal obstinacy of the disputants on a point of honour.
America might have purchased her provinces, and at a fair price, had she but consented to surrender the strip between the Bravo and the Nueces, which had never been so much a cause as a pretext of war. As it is, the negotiations have been unfortunately brought to a dead-lock, and, what is worse, therethere are likely to remain. That the Mexicans are better able to fight than ever has been undeniably proved, and that they are likely to miss their lost capital no one acquainted with their temperament will ever have been surmised. Two courses only are now open to the Americans—condescension or conquest. The Government papers are already broaching the latter plan, and expatiating, reasonably enough, on the uselessness of further "forbearance." It is no doubt evident that if the Mexicans are not to be led they can only be driven by even more desolating and destructive violence than that hitherto employed. If the Americans are to take their own choice on their own terms, it is clear that some compulsion must be used more forcible than the impounding of all the customs and the storm and capture of all the towns from the coast to the capital. But, even if the infernal columns of La Vendee could be marched along the plateaux of Anahuac, the end of such a measure would be as uncertain as its adoption would detestable. The other alternative would be by far the more magnanimous. They can only get possession of California by incurring the odium of invasion, or submitting to the humiliation of concession. They must humour or exterminate the obstinate braggarts opposed to them. The latter course would be a crime bringing its own wages; the former a very moderate penalty for a political sin. SANTA ANNA would no doubt demand the line of the Grande up trophies, artillery, and flags, and perhaps a written testimonial that the Mexicans were not to be matched for valour by any nations under heaven. But all this the Americans might graciously grant, and they would then get their new estates, and might turn to some better purpose the 2,000,000 of sovereigns with which England has purchased their corn, and which she grieves to see sunk in the profitless folly on an unbecoming war.

Irishmen in Mexican Army Captured and Executed By General Scott
October 29, 1847

The execution, by order of General Scott, of the Irishmen in the Mexican service, had called forth the following address, published in a supplementary number of the Diario del Gobierno, the official organ of the Mexican Government:--

"Mexicans!-Among the European volunteers whom the American army has hired to kill us, there are many unfortunate who are convinced of the injustice of this war, who profess the same Roman Catholic religion we profess, but who, being harassed by the misery which prevails in crops, have consented to enlist. Some of these men, abjuring their errors, and following the noble impulses of their hearts, have passed over to our army to defend our just cause. From these his Excellency the President formed the Foreign Legion, known under the name of the Company of St. Patrick. At LaAngosturs and at Cherubusco they bore themselves with the highest intrepidity, and after the enemy possession of this last point, which was only after its defenders had exhausted their last cartridge, they were made prisoners.

"The generals of the American army, who cannot count upon their soldiers in a war so iniquitous save through the influence of acts of ferocity, were determined to shoot these Irishmen. Scarcely was this known to the city, before every breast was filled with horror at the thought. His Excellency, the Minister of Relations, in a touching letter to the English Consul, the estimable lady of her Britannic Majesty's Minister, various private individuals, both Mexicans and foreigners, we ourselves, and even the ladies of families residing at Tacubaya, interceded for these brave men; and we expected this if they could not be pardoned, they would at least be spared capital punishment.

"It would have been deemed base and repugnant to the laws of civilization as practised in modern wars to offer the bloody spectacle of the execution of these; and yet could have been palliated to a certain extent by the part which those men took in the defence of Cherubusco, but they had no share whatever in the slaughter which was made the day before yesterday upon the heights of the King's Mill. Well, then, will you believe it, countrymen this day, in cold blood, these Caribs, from an impulse of super-stition, and after the manner of savages, and as practised in the days of Homer, have hung up these as a holocaust they have themselves said it- to the manes of the general or generals who there fell! And in what manner did they hang generals who there fell! And in what manner did they hang them? Noosing them by the neck as they stood upon the ground, and so suspending them that they died by 'inches' strangled by their own weight, the mode adopted being such that their horrible agony lasted more than one hour-a spectaclet worthy of such men, or rather of demons escaped from hell. This they did with 18 of those unhappy men, and among them the brave Captain Reilli, whose head they struck upon a pike, and planted at Cherubusco. To six others, who proved that they had not volunteered but been impressed, they gave 200 lashes each, and compelled them to dig the graves of their companions.

"Mexicans! These are the men who call us barbarians, and say they come to civilize us. These are the men who have plundered the houses of the surrounding villages-who have stolen children from their families-who have slept in the niches devoted to the sacred dead-who have, with blasphemous revelry, clothed themselves with the ornaments of the altars-who have thrown upon the ground the body of Jesus Christ, and have made themselves drunk in drinking out of the sacred vessels! Accursed may they be of all Christians as they are of God!
"Countrymen,—the Supreme Government commanded its commissioners, as you have seen it already published, that they should inquire of their commissioners, first of all, why they had brought war upon our republic, with blood and fire? What injuries we have done to them, that they should thus seek to revenge themselves? Their mode of concealing their confusion at not being able to reply to these inquiries, and of satisfying their displeasure because we would not consent to ignominious peace, has been to light up anew the flames of war, to send us from the King's Mill the day before yesterday our assasinated countrymen who had in no manner offended them, and to glut their diabolical rage upon the defenceless men whom they hand in their power.

"Mexicans! The Supreme Government conjures us in the name of the honour of our race-in the name of our dignity as men, and of God himself, that we should all unite by one unanimous and continued effort, to and continued effort, to revenge these great outrages, to yield never to dismay, and to wage this war without truce and without relenting. May remorse seize upon every selfish or cowardly Mexican who cannot say to himself that he has fulfilled every duty as a public officer and a good citizen; who has not contributed by every means in his power towards this war—wth his person, with the influence of his position, with a part of his fortune, by maintaining a number of soldiers—by aiding every way those who fight, and who has not so employed the means which God has given him for his service and that of the country in which God has placed him, that His images shall not be cut down nor His holy name blasphemed.

"Mexico, Sept. 10.1817."

The loss suffered by the United States' troops, from the 8th to the 13th September, is stated to be 25 officers killed and 47 wounded, and 490 men killed and wounded in the last battle.

Our Canadian accounts are uninteresting.

[ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA]
Mexico, Mexican Accounts of Battles
October 29, 1847

The following is the official Mexican account of the capture of the city;-

"To the Generals of the Several Departments.

"Most excellent Sir,—After the important and great events that have yesterday taken place, there remains no other alternative to the Government of the Union, than that of abandoning the capital, in order that other means be adopted and pursued for the harassing of the enemy. Accordingly, his Excellency orders me to inform you, in order that through you the hon. Congress of the State over which you preside may know it, that his Excellency is firmly resolved to prosecute military operations against the invaders; and that, whatever be the consequences resulting from the war, his Excellency is determined to wage it in every possible manner and by every attainable means.

"A heroic resistance was made in the capital for the space of six days, but at length the enemy established himself in places and positions from which his missiles and projectiles could reach the peaceful thousands of the city; then the Supreme Government, seeing the state of affairs to be such as warranted their departure, changed their abode; and very soon I shall have the pleasure of announcing to your Excellency the site upon which it will fix, which at present is impossible for me to do, as it accompanies the army, and as yet is not agreed upon the residence of the supreme power of the nation. But as soon as the latter is known, I will give your Excellency a detailed account of everything that has occurred, but now I shall confine myself to the single following statement:--

"The American army charged yesterday at daylight with all its force, upon Chapultepec, which, after a spirited defence of six hours, yielded at last to the attack of the enemy, who immediately marched to take possession of a fortification situated between the sentry-box of Belen and St. Thomas, St. Como and the Citadel. The first advance was checked by the troops his Excellency the President led up, disputing the ground inch by inch, till finally the invader was routed from the citadel, after nine hours hard fighting. The capital being in this situation, his Excellency was anxious to avoid a bombardment and to spare the tumult and confusion attendant upon an assault, which would have given room for a thousand calamities, and a repetition of those acts in which the army of the foe has manifested so instinctive a spirit of extermination.

"His Excellency the President of the republic hopes that your Excellency will endeavour to preserve and reanimate the public spirit, in order that the war may be carried on with that vigour and energy which the national honour the rights of the republic so imperiously demand."

America : U.S. and Mexico
October 29, 1847

LIVERPOOL, Thursday Morning.

By the Royal mail steam-ship Hibernia, Captain Ryrie, we have advices from New York to the 15th, Boston to the 16th, and Halifax to the 18th inst. Respectively. She brings 90 passengers, and 12,000l. in specie.

The Hibernia spoke the Cambria on the mourning of the 18th between Halifax and Boston, where she would arrive on the evening of the 18th.

Our accounts from Mexico, though mere rumours are interesting. Santa Anna was stated to be at Guadaloupe, whence it was expected he would re-treat to Oaxaca. This, however, is contradicted by rumours which report that the American troops, after taking the city of Mexico, had numerous sever conflicts with the almost innumerable swarm of Leperos who inhabited and surrounded the capital, and that the latter finally became so annoying the destructive that they obtained the advantage over the American troops, who were finally under the necessity of retiring from the city. It is further said that Santa Anna had left his quarters at Guadaloupe, and returned to the capital at the head of an army of 10,000 regular troops, and that fighting had been resumed and was still going on desperately at the least accounts.

It was further stated that in consequence of the above report the Mexicans had become inspired, and were flying to arms throughout the country. 3,000 were reported to have gathered at Victoria.

In consequence of these reports, great anxiety was felt for the troops under General Scott.

A rumour, which is confirmed, states that Santa Anna had resigned the Presidency, and that the instrument of resignation was dated from Guadaloupe the 16th September; but that the Mexican people were not disposed to receive it, and had again placed him at the head of the army.

There is no confirmation of the report that Santa Anna had been wounded.

Among other improbable rumours, it is stated that General Herrera is now in command of the army, and will proceed with 14,000 men to station himself at Queretaro, where it is intended that the Mexican Congress shall reassemble. It is also said, that Santa Anna has moved towards Puebla with 2,000 horse, and that Paredea is raising troops with some success in the state of Jalisco.

The New York Express says:-

"There was a report by the last arrival from Vera Cruz, that General Quitman, with 4,000 men, had left the Mexican capital for the purpose of opening communications with the coast. But we hardly think General Scott would deem it advisable to weaken his force in the capital so much as would be necessary to carry out this movement. Obviously the communications ought to be opened from below."

General Rea is said to have gotten full possession of Puebla, but the Americans were pouring a deadly fire upon his troops from the surrounding heights commanding the town.

Large reinforcements of American troops were on their way from Vera Cruz to the Mexican capital. By the last accounts from Vera Cruz, September 25, there there was an American force of 2,500 men at the National-bridge, under General Lane; another about 1,000 men...
At Jalapa, under Major Lally; a garrison of a few hundred men at the fortress of Perote; and another of about 1,000 men at Puebla, under Colonel Childs. The greater part of the force at the National-bridge was immediately to march for Jalapa, where it would be joined by Major Lally’s command, or a part of it, and proceed to Perote, and thence to Puebla and Mexico, to reinforce the main army under General Scott. General Cushing’s division will encounter opposition from the guerrillas, particularly at Cerro Gordo, where considerable fortifications are said to have been erected, it is probable that by the time he reaches Perote, General Cushing will come up, which will swell the advancing column to 5,000 men.

Previous to the storming of the capital Santa Anna issued the following address:-

"The President Provisional of the Republic and Commander-in-Chief of the Army to the Nation:—

"Countrymen,—The enemy, availing himself of idle pre-texts, has determined to commence hostilities upon your beautiful city. Presuming us to be disheartened and humiliated by the reverses of fortune, he expected that I should subscribe a treaty by which the territory of the republic would have been essentially reduced, and the republic covered with shame and ignominy. Mexicans do not deserve a fate so ignominious, and, having been called upon spontaneously to direct their destinies, I have felt it my duty to respond with all loyalty to their signal mark of confidence, preserving those precious rights which cannot be alienated, and thus affording an example of energy and firmness which are the glory of nations.

"The enemy has proclaimed that they would propose to us a peace honourable for both nations, and it might became our duty to listen to them, that their treachery might be made known. Their propositions, and all the sequel of the negotiations, are to be published, so that the civilized world may see that we were ready to sacrifice all that our honour would permit us to sacrifice; and that on the other hand our enemies set up measureless pretensions, which would have destroyed the republic and converted it into a miserable colony of the United States. To such audacity we could oppose nothing but our firmness and our valour.

"Mexicans! You will find me, as ever, leading in your defence, striving to free you from a heavy yoke, and to preserve your altars from infamous violation, and your daughters and your wives from the extremity of insult. The enemy raises the sword to wound your noble fronts; do you draw it likewise to chastise the rancorous pride of the invader.

"Mexicans!! For ever live the independence of the of the country!"

[DCK]
Messrs J. Schnelder and Company, are for account and risk of the bondholders, and not on that of the Mexican Government, for the following reasons:—1. That Messrs. J. Schneider and Company have been removed from the agency on the 28th of November of last year, and have not been re-appointed by any subsequent order. 2. That the said Messrs. J. Schneider and Company, as well as their correspondents in Mexico, have received, here and there, the said funds as agents of the bondholders, and as such they have been delivered, as stated in their communications published in The Times of the 7th of September last and the 9th inst. In consequence, the Mexican Government will not be responsible in any manner for the diversion that has or may be made of the said funds deposited in the hands of agents that are not theirs; and even if they were, they resist the accomplishment of the measures dictated for its distribution amongst the parties interested or its deposit in the Bank of England."

And I transmit it to you for your information, and that you may give it all the necessary publicity.

I offer to you the considerations, &c.

The United States and Mexico: US and Mexico
November 8, 1847

The following is a translation of the last communication made by the Mexican commissioners to Mr. Trist previous to the renewal of hostilities. It has not before been published in this country:-

"To His Excellency Mr. Nicholas P. Trist, Commissioner with full powers from the Government of the United States to the Government of the Republic of Mexico.

"Chapultepec, Sept. 6, 1847.

"The undersigned, commissioned by the Government of the republic of Mexico to concert with your Excellency a treaty of peace, think it convenient in the same time as they present you the counter project which they have formed in accordance with the last instructions of their Government, to accompany the said project with the observations which are contained in this communication, which will serve to explain more clearly the pacific dispositions of Mexico in the war which unfortunately divides both countries.

"The fourth article of the project which your Excellency was pleased to deliver over to us on the evening of the 27th of August last, and which has been the subject of our last interviews, imports the cession, on the part of Mexico, first, of the state of Texas; second, of the territory situated out of the limits of that state, which extends from the left bank of the Bravo River to the southern frontier of New Mexico; third, of the whole of New Mexico; fourth, of both Californias.

"The war which now exists has been caused solely on account of the territory of the state of Texas, over which the republic of North America presents as a title the act of said state by which it annexed itself to the North American confederation, after having proclaimed its independence of Mexico.

"The republic of Mexico agreeing (as we previously informed your Excellency), with due indemnity, in the pretensions of the Cabinet of Washington over the territory of Texas, the cause of the war has thereby disappeared, and therefore the war ought to cease, as there is no cause whatever to continue it. Over the other territories contained in the 4th article of your proposal, no right has been alleged as yet by the republic of North America, nor do we think that it can allege any. It can only therefore acquire them by the right of conquest, or by that which may result from the cession and sale which Mexico may make to it; but, as we are certain that the republic of Washington will not only absolutely repel, but will also abhor the first of these rights, and as also it would be a new thing, contrary to all ideas of justice, that war should be waged against a country by reason only of its refusal to sell the territory which one of its neighbours desires to purchase from it, we hope of the justice of the Government and people of North America, that the considerable modifications which we have to propose to the cession of territory (out of the state of Texas) which are demanded in the before-mentioned fourth article, will not be a motive to continue a war which the worthy General of the North American troops has already qualified to be denaturalized.

"In our conferences, we have informed your Excellency that Mexico cannot cede the zone which exists between the left bank of the Bravo and the right of the Nueces. The reason for it is not only the complete certainty that such territory has never belonged to the state of Texas, nor because it is held in much estimation, considered by itself alone; it is because that zone with the Bravo at its back forms the natural frontier of Mexico, both in a military and commercial point of view; and it cannot be required from any nation whatever, nor can any nation consent, to abandon its frontier. But, in order to avoid every motive of conflict for the future, the Government of Mexico promises not to found any new towns, nor to establish any colonies, in the space of land between the two rivers; so that, by preserving it in a state of depopulation, as it is actually, it will afford equal security to both republics. The conservation of that territory is, according to our instructions, a condition sine quan non of peace. Sentiments of honour and delicacy (which the noble character of your Excellency will worthily esteem), more than any consideration of interest, forbid our Government to consent to the dismemberment of New Mexico. On this subject we think it superfluous to add anything to that which we have already had the honour to explain to you in our conferences.

"The cession of Lower California (of little advantage to the republic of North America) presents great embarrassment to Mexico, considering the position of that peninsula, opposite the shores of Sonora, from which it is only divided by the narrow Gulf of Cortes. Your Excellency has given all its value to our remarks on this point, and we have seen you with satisfaction yield to them.

"The fact of Mexico preserving Lower California would be sufficient to render it indispensable to keep also a part of Upper California; as otherwise that peninsula would remain without any communication by land with the rest of the republic—a thing which is always of great embarrassment, especially to a Power which is not maritime, like Mexico. The certain which our Government offers (with the due compensation) of that part of Upper California north of the 37th degree of latitude does not only afford to the United States the acquisition of an excellent littoral, of fertile lands, and perhaps of unworked mines, but presents all the advantage of continuing by it, without interruption, its possessions in Oregon. The wisdom of the Government of Washington, and the laudable application of the North American people, will derive most abundant fruits from the important acquisition which we now offer.

"In the 8th article of the proposal of your Excellency, the concession of a free passage through the isthmus of Tehuantepee to the Pacific Ocean is required in favour of the North American citizens. We have verbally informed your Excellency that a privilege on this matter was granted some years ago by the Government of the republic to a private person, which privilege was afterwards transferred, with the authorization of the same Government, to some British subjects, of whose rights Mexico cannot dispose. Your Excellency will not, therefore, be astonished that we do not accede in this point to the wishes of your Government.

"We have entered into this simple explanation of the motives which the republic has for not transferring to the United States all the Territory which is demanded by them out of the limits of the state of Texas, because it is our desire that the North American Government and people be persuaded that our partial refusal does not proceed from feelings of aversion created by the antecedents of this war, or on account of the loss suffered by Mexico in it, but because it rests on considerations dictated by reason and justice which would militate at all times as regards the most friendly power in the midst of the relations of the most intimate friendship.

"The other alterations which your Excellency will find in our counter project are of less importance, and we think that there will not be against them any important objection. On the subject of the alteration contained in the 12th article, it has already been spoken of in your Excellency's country and we flatter ourselves that the loyalty of your Government will not refuse to contract an agreement so in accordance with the probity and good understanding which ought to exist between two neighbouring nations.

"The peace between the two countries will be more firmly established, if a friendly Power (England) who has so nobly offered her good offices to both Mexico and the United States in the present war would lend herself to give her guarantee for the faithful observance of the treaty which may be concluded. The Government of Mexico thinks that it would be very convenient to solicit that guarantee.
"Our Government has ordered us to recommend to your judgement Excellency to communicate to us your resolution on the counter project, which we have the honour to present to you, in the space of three days.

"The good and salutary work of peace cannot, in our judgement, be brought to a happy conclusion, unless each of the contending parties resolves to abandon some of its original pretensions. This has always happened, and every nation has not hesitated, in similar cases to make great sacrifices to appease the desolating flame of war. Mexico and the United States have particular reasons to act thus. It is not without shame that we are obliged to confess that we are giving to the world the scandal of two Christian nations, of two republics, in the sight of all the monarchies, who are mutually doing to each other all the evil in their power for disputes on limits, when we have more land than is necessary to populate and cultivate in the beautiful hemisphere in which Providence first made us see the light. We venture to recommend these considerations to your Excellency before you take a definitive resolution on our proposals.

"We have the honour to offer on this occasion to your Excellency the considerations of attention and respect.

"JOSE I. DE HERRERA.
"BERNARDO COUTO.

United States and Mexico
November 10, 1847

The great secret of American cupidity and Mexican tenacity is receiving a remarkable solution. No wonder that Santa Anna and Mr. Trist should fight so desperately of a strip of Texas, seeing that a mile of it's sacred frontage is clearly more valuable than all the seaboard of the isthmus. We admit that until we saw the prospectus and testimonials to which we shall presently refer, we had a less exalted opinion of this happy province. We remembered that its attractions and capabilities, emblazoned in the very largest types and the very brightest colours, had periodically lent their splendour to the "external paper-hanging establishments" of this metropolis, without altogether deriving an adequate return of emigration and investment. And though we recollected that there had really been a kind of scramble for its charms, yet the impression on our minds was, that it had rather been got off by the adroit manoeuvring of a male chaperon that commended to competition by unadorned or intrinsic beauty. We are now undeceived. Testimonials, with real name and address, to the miraculous performances of this famous climate are lying before us, which demonstrate with all the force of such depositions that there is no such place under Heaven. The advertisement occupies nearly two columns of a weekly paper, and lest such documentary evidence should be insufficient, we have been favoured with a still more solemn and authentic appeal. The PENN of this Pennsylvania is forthcoming. Mr. WILLIAM SNELLING PETERS, "founder of the colony," has characteristically bespoken our influence in behalf of its claims in an autograph address, and he still, we believe, is sojourning in London to disseminate the knowledge of its advantages.

Even upon the map, MARTI CRUZZLEWIT'S Eden was an incapable swamp compared with this transatlantic Beulah. It has the most productive lands, the most invigorating air, and the purest water in the world. The rich and flourishing farms are scattered over the face of the country "like apples of gold in pictures of silver." Such is the continuous geniality of the seasons that no cotton is ever spoilt for want of picking or packing, but rather improves by being left in contact with so wonderful a soil. The rivers never evaporate into mud, nor stagnate into ponds, but flow on over gravelly bottoms, and in suitable depths for the convenience of settlers. The application of manure would be a gratuitous outrage upon the qualities of earth which may itself be exported at the price of guano, nor do the necessities of agricultural life in these surpassing districts appear to include either seeds or plants. A yearly average of 150 bushels of corn per acre is the result of a little amateur coquetry with a soil of so inflammable a temperament, which, in two-thirds its extent, has already spontaneously adjusted itself to the reception of the spade. "Here at least the original curse of our race has been PARTIALLY removed, and man is no longer compelled to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow." Two precautions only are mildly suggested as expedient in this recovered paradise. Emigrants are recommended to avoid the sun by day and the air y night; nor can it be denied that if the practice may be difficult, the directions
It has occurred to the "founder" that certain misgivings may possibly arise in the minds of the uninformed respecting this glad announcement, and with the energy of a hero he labours to demolish them. The first springs from the involuntary inquiry as to why these good things were not appropriated earlier, especially in a country where convertible properties have seldom failed in securing claimants. How is it that these fertile plains remained so long unexplored in the midst of a restless population, and still remain unsettled and uninquired for in the crowded migration-markets of the world? The answer to not unnatural question question appeals rather to our faith than our reason, and we are received with a reference instead of a reply. It has been "satisfactorily explained by Mrs. HOLLY" in her Muniments of Infant Texas, and with this knowledge that a solution has been given we are compelled at present to be content. The next misgiving is one which would hardly be anticipated except in those peculiarly conscientious specimens of "Nature's aristocracy" for whose exclusive possession this Eden, like that of Mr. ZEPHANIAH SCADDER, is carefully reserved. It is presumed that a noble-minded emigrant would be unable to enter upon such a magnificent property without a painful reflection that he must be displacing some weaker fellow-creature from his more ancient rights. "The friends of humanity," however, "may rejoice to learn that this last question has been happily solved. Some of the tribes, as the Choctaws, Chicasaws, &c., having been enabled to discover the cause of their inferiority in the scale of being, have applied themselves manfully and successfully to gain educational habits. Those who do not apply the remedy must melt away before the march of civilization." The peculiar secret of this mental vaccination we are not favoured with, but the Texan ranger may now convince himself that he is trampling upon no original proprietor who is not either a reprobate dunce or an irreclaimable fool.

The terms of this splendid establishment are undeniably moderate. There is really no amari aliquid bubbling up at the bottom of the prospectus. Any family going out will be immediately presented with 320 acres of land in fee, and every single man above the age of 17 with 100 acres of the like mirific soil. Should he be enterprising enough to marry before the 1st of July, 1848, his wife will also receive a like estate as her marriage portion. He had better, however, secure the requisite party to this ceremony before going out, or he may be reduced to the despairing query which the instinctive convictions of infancy have embalmed in nursery song. There is actually but one fee on these excellent appointments. Each party on his arrival is "expected to take" a map of his newly-acquired domain at 5l. for the large and 2l. 10s. for the smaller farms. This, and an incidental gratuity of three postage stamps to the "founder," is positively all the demand we have been able to discover? As snug farm in a ring fence for 2l. 10s. Od.-and in a country which is averred by the Hon. LUTHER GRAPES to be, both morally and politically, the most profoundly interesting on the face of the globe. A people established in 1839 cannot, of course, point to a long roll of ancestral honours, but when future Texans shall one day praise famous men at a national commemoration the name of SAM HOUSTON will nobly head the list of heroic chiefs and patriarchal sages.

It has been our duty on more than one occasion to expose the snares which are set for the suffering or sanguine emigrant, and to warn him against perils and miseries even greater than those which he leaves behind. They who imagine that no man could be really persuaded that there existed anywhere a country where the authorities were intolerably anxious to give away the best land in the world in lots of 320 acres, are not sufficiently aware of the effects which the pressure of pauperism acting on the national gullibility is capable of producing. What may be the peculiar expectations which induce a person to expend so much of his labour, and risk so much of his money in collecting together a cargo of emigrants for this particular spot, we cannot say; but, perhaps, after this publication of the circumstances, some former adventurer or traveler may offer his sanguine neighbours the corrective of his experience. As it stands, we have no doubt that the precious advertisement we have described is actually not pitched above the simple credulity of certain of its readers; nor, until we bring our system of national colonization to a much higher point of excellence than it has yet attained, can we reasonably wonder that this natural relief of overburdened population should be sought under empirical guides, or through irregular and fallacious channels.

present horrible war, scarelyh an incident has occurred which has not been foreseen and predicted by every dispassionate European spectator of these events, and at the same time denied by the Americans until its actual accomplishment rendered all further power of negation unavailing. Never was the sequence of events more uninterruptedly pursued by the policy of a nation; and the deepest scheme which has ever been devised for territorial aggrandizement and military aggression by the Cabinet of an absolute Power, at the head of a great army, could not have been more systematically carried on than the subjugation of Mexico has been by the successive Presidents of the most democratic republic in the world. We do not, indeed, suppose that this extraordinary enterprise which may now be said to have been in course of execution for more than 12 years, was deliberately contemplated and contrived at that distant period by American statesmen or by the American statesman or by the American people. It is by no means improbable that if the leading members of the American Senate had foreseen all the consequences of the annexation of Texas, and had believed that the year 1847 would see an American army struggling to maintain itself within the very city of Mexico, they would have recoiled from this long series of rapacious and sanguinary actions. It is not unlikely that if the American people had formed a more accurate estimate of the cost of the province which they were so eager to filch from neighbouring state, even their unreflecting ambition might have been checked by so lavish and wanton an expenditure of their resources and their blood. But the solemn prediction of these dreadful scenes, which have sullied the character of the united states by the revival of the passions and evils of offensive war, was disregarded, though it proceeded from the most eminent writers and statesman of America, and though it was reechoed by the convictions of every observer in Europe. Ten years ago the Americana affected to deny the charge of territorial rapacity, yet they were abetting the conversion of a Mexican province to their own uses, and they eventually incorporated it with their own possessions. Three years ago they affected to deny the possibility of a war with Mexico, yet the President ordered the troops of the Union to march into the disputed territory on the frontier, with a perfect knowledge that such an act was an unprovoked declaration of war. Last year the war was to be terminated by a few combats on the Rio Grande, and a cerain measure was to be observed towards the Mexican Government by their formidable adversaries; but this summer all the horrors of war have been inflicted by the American army, the city of Vera Cruz has been bombarded, the whole country overrun, and Mexico itself occupied. The Mexican Republic is completely prostrate, and General Scorr is as much the master of the capital as of Texas itself. But what then? Butchery and pillage cannot be the main objects of any army in our day: some political purpose must at least serve for a pretext, and the accomplishment of that political purpose is that which determines the success of a campaign. But in Mexico there is no Power with which a lasting agreement can be made; there are no institutions which give what may be termed personality to the nation: the whole community is, as it were, resolved into a mass of private persons, who are, of course, animated by the strongest detestation of their invaders which race, religion, and wrongs can inspire. Under these circumstances, General Scorr's position in Mexico reminds us of nothing more than that of a landlord who has just succeeded to an outlying portion of the family estate in Roscommon or Tipperary ' and, as the American Government will find it a more difficult task to break off their fatal connexion with Mexico than it has been to march into the country, we shall not be surprised to find them permanently engaged in work about as difficult as the administration of Ireland.

About five years ago an american diplomatist of character, who had recently been employed in Mexico, published his recollections of that country. It is not un instructive to turn back to these pages, for the facts they record have been as much confirmed as his anticipations of peace have been stultified by subsequent experience. After stating as his opinion that the Mexican men have not much more physical strength than the women of the united States, this writer relates the easy triumphs of the Texan adventures over the Mexican forces at Bexar and Mier, where the latter were defeated in fifteen minutes; and he adds, with the virtuous indignation of 1842, "Shall we go to war with such a people?" "which has been thus reaped?" The result has proved that Mt. Polk has not been equally disposed to respect the rights of the feeble, and that these identical officers have found something "to glean" between Vera Cruz and the capital.

Our object, however, in adverting to this work is to point out one particular in this war with which the American accounts leave us wholly unacquainted. However difficult it may be to handle the Mexican people and territory, or to dictate the terms of a peace, it is well known that the country contains an enormous quantity of the precious metals, partly the property of the Church, and partly the remains of the former splendour of the Vice-Royalty of New Spain. Mr. Thompson gives the following account of the wealth of the Cathedral of Mexico:--

"The clergy do not, for obvious reasons, desire that their wealth should be known to its full extent, but quite enough is exhibited to strike the beholder with wonder. The first object that presents itself on entering the cathedral is the altar near the centre of the building; it is made of highly wrought and polished silver, and covered with a profusion of ornaments of pure gold. On each side of this altar runs a balustrade, enclosing a space about 8 feet wide and 100 feet long. The balusters are about 4 feet high and 4 inches thick in the largest part; the handrail from 6 to 8 inches wide. Upon the top of this handrail, at the disance of 6 or 8 feet apart, are human images, beautifully wrought, and about 2 feet high. All of these -- the balustrade, handrail, and images -- are made of a compound of gold, silver, and copper, more valuable than silver. I was told that an offer had been made to take this balustrade, and replace it with another, of exactly the same size and workmanship, of pure silver, and give half a million of dollars besides. There is much more of the same balustrade in other parts of the church: I should think in all of it not less than 300 feet. As you walk through the building, on either side there are different apartments all filled from the floor to the ceiling with paintings, statues, vases, huge candlesticks, waiters, and a thousand other articles, made of gold and silver. This, too, is only the every-day display of articles of least value; the more costly are stowed away in the chests and closets. What must it be when all these are brought out, with the immense quantities of precious stones which the church is known to possess? And this is only one of the churches of the city of Mexico, where there are between 60 and 80 others, some of them possessing little less wealth than the cathedral.

We do not impute to the officers in command of the American forces a base intention of plundering the enemy' on the contrary, General Scott's orders of the day have uniformly prescribed respect for the private property and the religious edifices of the Mexicans. But, considering the character of the American army, the lawless independence of the adventurers who have joined it, and the usages of war, we shall certainly consider it as an unprecedented event if this enormous booty escapes from pillage; and it is not unlikely that, to avoid the horrors and losses of private captures, the wealth of these public edifices may be regularly appropriated as a prize of war. Such a mass of the precious metals, probably, not fallen into the control of any conqueror since the soldiers of Pizarro occupied the gorgeous temples of the Peruvian deities.

We have yet to learn the American accounts of the capture of Mexico, though we publish in another place a narrative, drawn up by an eye-witness, of the attack. But it is by no means improbable that this campaign will end like a great raid into the enemy's country and that the Americans, indignant at the rejection of their terms, and alarmed by the isolation of their army, will have recourse to measures of violence which they would have been ashamed to employ in the earlier stages of the war. So true it is that every successive step in these transactions has been more guilty and disgraceful than that which preceded it.

Siege of Chapultepec: Siege of Chapultepec and Capitulation
November 13, 1847

We have been favoured by the following interesting description of the siege and capitulation. It is written by a gentleman who was an eye-witness of much that he describes:

The negotiations of the commissioners did not last long, as neither on the negotiating parties went about it earnestly, both knowing that it would be impossible for the Mexican Government to accept the conditions proposed by the American envoy. In consequence, Santa Anna had resolved from the very beginning to disregard the conditions agreed upon in the armistice, and went on fortifying all the western points of the town with the utmost speed, and perfecting the existing bastions, in order to prepare himself for a desperate struggle for life or death. The propositions made by the American envoy, Mr. Trist, for the conclusion of peace, were the following:--Mexico was to cede to the United States all the territory north of a line beginning three leagues south from the mouth of the river Bravo, then running along the course of this river upwards to Paso del Norte, and thence due west through the country to the mouth of the river Colorado, which flows into the bay of California, by which Mexico would lose Texas, Coahuila, Nuevo Mexico, Altaybaja, California, and a part of Nuevo Leon, chihuahuia, and Sinaloa; moreover, Mexico was to give to the United States, for the space of 12 years, the usufruct of the isthmus of Tebuantepec, in order to make experiments, and open, if possible, a canal, connecting the two oceans, and other minor conditions; in considerations of which Mr. Trist declared himself empowered to pay in the city of Mexico a certain sum of money, not specified; to regulate all claims of American subjects against the Mexican Government, and to admit them as an American debt; to deliver up all the cannon and ammunition taken away by conquest from the Mexican army, and to make no further claims for the expenses of the war.

Santa Anna declared hereupon, that disregarding all the other conditions he would never consent to give up new Mexico, as this province had, by its heroical rising, clearly shown its determination to abide by, and remain in a part of the great Mexican family, which was the more laudable and affecting, as all the former governments had for a long time continued to neglect and disregard it, leaving it to be invaded and plundered by the savages.

On the 5th of September General Scott sent an official communication to Santa Anna, in which he informed him that he would consider the armistice as broken, if within 24 hours after receipt of this document satisfactory explanations had not been given for the repeated disregard of the conditions stipulated in the same.

Santa Anna sent him in answer a very talented exposition, in which he tried to throw all the blame on the Americans.

Scott did not deign to answer it, and in consequence the armistice was over on the 7th of September, at 12 o'clock a.m.

Everybody expected that the hostilities would commence the same day, but not a shot was fired. At 4 o'clock the next morning, however, the roar of the cannon awakened the inhabitants of Mexico, and called them on to their azoteas.

Behind the castle of Chapultepec, which is situated on a high porphyry rock placed on the plain at the foot of an even sloping rise towards the mountains, called in Spanish, loma, the night commenced. Santa Anna had displayed his lines on the gentle slope behind, and there the Americans attacked them.

From 5 to 9 in the morning the firing was very heavy, and the Americans took by storm a fortified powder magazine which stood higher up on the loma, and also a fortified watermill, situated upon the low ground on the outskirts of the castle park, and between this and the ascending slope. Here they destroyed the cannon foundry, but were then obliged to retire, as the point was completely commanded by the fire of the fort.

This battle, named, from the mill, the battle of Molino del Rey, was very bloody on both sides. At 10 o'clock the Americans blew up the powder magazine and retired to their original quarters or positions, higher up on the sloping plain, south-west from Chapultepec. Here they formed in battle, defying their enemy, and as none appeared they quietly returned to their quarters at Tacubaya, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

In Mexico the bells were triumphantly rung as for a great victory, and in fact, the Mexicans though beaten, were justified in regarding the fight as a victory, as the enemy found himself obliged to give up his conquered positions, and had suffered a serious and irreparable loss for his small numbers. If Santa Anna had renewed the battle on the same day it is very probable that affairs would have turned out very differently for the Americans, as the discontent at the signing of the armistice, combined with the dejection produced by the heavy loss of blood in the morning, had had a very demoralizing effect upon the army.

But Santa Anna did not attack, as his army had likewise suffered a severe loss, and had lost two able and courageous generals—Antonio Leon, from Oajaca, and Lucas Balderas, from the city of Mexico; in consequence of which he did not think it prudent to leave his entrenchments and stake everything upon one die, as he would have done by venturing another pitched battle.

The 9th and 10th day of September passed quietly over, the belligerent parties only saluting each other at daybreak two or three times with cannon shot and grenades, each party occupying itself in repairing the damages received and preparing for new and more terrible struggles.

On the 11th of September the cavalry was ordered to make a movement on the lomas or sloping plains of Chapultepec and Tacubaya, and attack, if possible, the latter place.

However, the enemy kept a very good look out, and no sooner did the cavalry begin to move out of town than their scouts appeared upon the lomas, and soon after a small force appeared to defend the plains.

The Mexicans attacked the advanced United States cavalry, and a short skirmish ensued, in which these were made to retreat by the overwhelming force of the former, and in their hot chase they incautiously advanced too near a hollow in advance on one side, where an American batter was lying hid. This at once opened a destructive fire upon them and drove the squadrons back in the most precipitate flight.

On the 12th the cannon began to roar again, south and west, at the garita of San Antonio and at Chapultepec, but it very soon became evident where the real attack was intended, for on the south side the fire was slackened, and after a time it left off altogether; while on the west it grew more and more violent, and about 8 o'clock, a.m., the enemy opened his battery of mortars upon the castle and began to throw shells with a most uncomfortable precision. This fire was kept up by three batteries, each of one large mortar, situated in a small segment of a circle to the south of the fort, the whole day until 7 o'clock at night, and a strong division of their army was drawn out in line of battle on the loma behind as simple spectators awaiting an attack.

The Mexican army was formed along the two aqueducts which join at the foot of Chapultepec, but not a man stirred and only the castle answered the enemy's fire out of its heavy guns until near 2 o'clock, when they had all been dismounted or disabled. From 2 to 6 o'clock the castle silently received the enemy's fire, and from then till dark it answered again with the newly mounted pieces.

The night passed over without disturbances, but early on the 13th the bombardment began again with renewed force, and by the unusual movement between the enemy's troops we could see that a very important stroke was about to take place.

At half-past 7 o'clock a column came hastily descending from the loinas towards the castle, and soon after a heavy firing opened upon all sides, and Chapultepec wrapped itself up in a dense cloud of smoke. In the meantime the mortars continued playing upon the castle until a quarter past 9 o'clock, when they ceased. During this time the firing in and about the castle had three times apparently reached its climax, and then suddenly slackened, so that we believed the assault had been beaten off but at 25 minutes past 9 o'clock, the Mexican flag suddenly disappeared, a blue flag was shown, and directly after the stars and stripes arose and waved over the conquered fortress.

The garrison of Chapultepec, commanded by General Bravo, had been about 850 strong, and along the aqueducts, at the foot of its hill, were stationed about 8,000 men (infantry) the flower of the Mexican army while the cavalry (about 5,000 strong) was hovering about on the lomas, a league to the north-west, waiting for an opportunity to pounce down upon the enemy. However, it did no such thing, but remained a quiet spectator till all was over, and then precipitately retired into the town.

Santa Anna's plan seems to have been to leave as few men as possible in and about the castle, in order not to expose them unnecessarily to the shells, and then at the proper moment, when the forlorn hope was advancing to the assault, to throw strong reinforcements into the park and beat them off. The plan was not bad, and he remained himself close by Chapultepec, in a house, to direct it but it turned out to have been misplaced confidence, for at the decisive moment, when succour was most needed, it failed, -- why, has not yet been explained; most likely because disorder prevailed among the officers, and most certainly because the Mexican troops could not muster up sufficient valour to face the fire of the enemy.

Directly after having taken the place the Americans hauled down the light fieldpieces from the castle, and fired them upon the retreating enemy, upon whose heels they closely followed. The firing came nearer and nearer, and about 2 o'clock, p.m., the innermost intrenchments began to open their fire, and balls to whistle in the town.

In the evening, about oracion, the suburb of San Cosme, to the north-west, had already been taken and in the west the Pasco, so that only the fortified tobacco manufactory, christened with the pompous name of Citadelle, hindered the Americans from marching into the town. Towards evening the firing squad and already the inhabitants were hoping to pass a quiet light, when suddenly the dull roar of a large mortar sesounded close by the town, and shells with fiery tails came on whistling over the azoteas. Fortunately, only 10 or 12 shells and grenades were thrown, probably to measure distances, and give the inhabitants a foretaste of what awaited them in case of any further resistance.

Happily these projectiles did not occasion great damage, but they attained their purpose of hindering any further resistance and striking terror into the inhabitants, while they induced Santa Anna to break up in the middle of the night and retreat with all his force, leaving the city to the mercy of the victors. He turned northward to the villa of Guadalupe, and after short rest retreated on to San Juan de Teotihuacan.

On Tuesday, the 14th of September, in the morning at 6 o'clock, the first American column made its appearance through the principal streets of Mexico, Calle San Fransisco, del Correo, dela Professa, and the two Plaberos, in a straight line from the Alameda up to the palace and Plata Mayor.

At half-past 6 the Mexican colours disappeared from the palace, a regimental flag took their place and directly afterwards the stars and stripes arose and waved over the palace of Montezuma, as the Americans call it.

A loud hurrah welcomed their appearances. In the meantime several shot began to sesound from several houses around, and in a short time the fire became general all over the town, and the whole American brigade dispersed itself in order to conquer this last resistance.

At 9 o'clock a.m., the cannons began to roar in all the streets and before noon the Americans were in possession of all the chief points, churches, and convents, which commanded the surrounding house and streets.

The firing receded towards the suburbs, but lasted nevertheless the whole day with intermitting violence 7 o'clock at night. On the 15th it continued again, particularly in the northern suburbs, towards Guadalupe where the troops of Santa Anna, recalled by the firing, tried to force an entrance.

However, they did not succeed and were driven back with severe loss. On the 16th only partial shots kept falling, and gradually everything returned to order.

From the 14th to the 16th, during the resistance in the streets, much blood was split to no purpose on both sides, and the property and life of the peaceable citizens were exposed to the spoliations, depredations, and arbitrariness of a victorious and rude soldiery; for the small number of the patriots made any effective resistance hopeless. Happily the Americans behaved on the whole, exemplarily, and very few citizens had to deplore the loss of their property.

Little by little the Americans drew their whole army into the town, leaving only small garrisons in Tacubays and Chapultepec. They also transported all their wounded into the town and established their hospitals in all the public buildings. General Scott took up his quarters at a private house, and General Quitman was named governor of the city. The Ayuntamiento was charged with the administration of the civil affairs, and empowered to raise a force of 600 men, in order to enforce its orders and preserve public order and security.

All matters of dispute concerning the American army were ordered to be submitted to martial law.

On the 21st of September the shops were re-opened, and ordinary business began again to take its regular course. On the 20th the first number of the new American newspaper, called the American Star, made its appearance, half English and half Spanish.

In the meantime the rest of the Mexican army had taken its way northward to Queretaro, where Congress was to assemble in order to deliberate on the fate of the nation.

Santa Anna tendered his demission of the Presidency, accepted it himself, and left General Herrera, with General Alcorta as coadjutor, to be his successors. He himself retired towards the coast, as it is said, in order to embark.

The siege of the town lasted from the 13th of August to the 14th of September, just a month; three great battles were fought, at Contreras, at Cherubusco, and at Molino del Rey; a cavalry engagement took place on the Iomas of Tacubaya; Chapultepec was bombarded and taken by storm and all the entrenchments on the west side of the town likewise; about 80 cannon captured, and 6,000 prisoners taken.

Mexicans, comprehending their real interest, had thrown themselves into the arms of the old mother country, and placed themselves into the arms of the old mother country, and places, themselves under the shelter of its friendly protection? We answer, certainly not!

Meanwhile, one feat of arms after another is successively placing the most important places in Mexico at the disposal of the American army; yet the united states cannot congratulate themselves on the victory. Why—if it be true that they are advancing from conquest to conquest—is the work of victory found less easy of accomplishment than there was at first reason to believe? Those who before yielded their posts without a struggle are now defending themselves, and fighting with ferocity of despair. An entire people are not easily subjugated, nor are they to be erased from the list of nation by two or three victories

The proud and potent Federal Republic will doubtless triumph over the disunited and exhausted Mexicans, if not by force of arms, at all events by protocols; but we repeat that, apart from the vain glory of satisfied pride, the annexation of this new state to those of the Union will be found more prejudicial than useful. The territory of the United States is already too extensive to allow this new acquisition to serve otherwise than as an obstacle in the way of the government: and either all probabilities will be falsified, or the eventual result will be the splitting up of that powerful republic into an infinite number of others, without the possibility of preventing this forcible, dismemberment, which the times will enforce. And, if to this reason be added the natural antipathy which must necessarily prevail between the conquerors and the conquered, and the distinct habits, the difference of religion, language, and customs, it is not doubtful that the North-Americans will not enjoy a single moment of tranquillity in their new sovereignty.

But even if this disquiet, and perhaps ill-omened-future somewhat soften to us the madness of the event which we deplore, it is no less certain that the last fragment of the Spanish race will disappear from those countries, and that with it will vanish the remotest hope of the eventual recovery by the mother country of the legitimate influence which it was called upon to exercise in those colonies, formerly the brightest diadem in its crown of the two worlds.

We do not wish directly to inculpate any Government whatsoever; but there has been much blindness, inattention, and neglect in so acting as to allow our ancient transmarine colonies to become an easy prize to the naughty rival of England, instead of having received them beneath the aegis of its ancient national flag.

And if the cupidity of the American Colossus should be satiated with its conquests already secured, these evils would be less deploitable, but its tendency is strikingly marked. The preponderating Republic of the New world cannot complacently contemplate the existence in those seas of a single point in which homage is paid to the old monarchial principle; it fears and with reason, that, maintained in her present possessions, Spain may some day wake from her extraordinary lethargy, and, either by supporting the monarchical idea or declaring herself the frank protectress of her ancient provinces in their actual republican state, may cement with them fraternal connexions, and close against the Union those immense markets for its commerce and industry.

For this reason the Government of the United States pushes forward its plans of aggrandisement and for this reason it will not desist until all those separate states are formed into one single state, under the name, the laws, and the flag of the United States; because Cuba and Puerto Rico will then be theirs; and the Union will attempt to play the same game in the Atlantic Ocean as Russia in the Black Sea, by converting that immense sheet of water into one large lake under its exclusive monopoly and arbitrary dominion.

But in the badly calculated politics of the United states, the very thing which they imagine the most likely to contribute to their aggrandisement tends to debilitate and diminish their power. The acquisition of Texas and Mexico, should the latter be realized, enfeebles the action of the Government and lessens its influence at the same time that it expands its territories: both acts particularly the latter, entail upon the Union a colossal debt, if hitherto free from pecuniary responsibilities, and will be productive of material losses; not will the war terminate, but continue in its most destructive form — that of guerrillas, skirmishes and conspiracies. Both acts, moreover, will increase the already immense number of enemies exited again the United States in consequence of their preponderating power, presenting an easy breach and sure instruments for the formation of parties by intrigue and disunion; added to which they will never attain the presence of a moral force in the conquered cities, and will continue to lose it in their own. Lastly, both acts will serve as a lesson to other independent republics, which, for their own convenience, will unite in defense of their independence against the common enemy” and, moreover, our own possessions will be more than ever recure from the attacks of the colossal usurper.

And here is presented a new and favourable opportunity for Spain to render her ancient children sensible of her value, and, by offering them her protection, to gain for herself those commercial advantages of all kinds which are now the object of the greedy cupidity of the Union. For the sake, therefore, of unfortunate Mexico, and for the sake of all our former colonies, it is, from very point of view, indispensable that something should be done, --that negotiations should be opened, --that our antecedent advantages should be made of deorum, no other influence than that of the Spanish Government should be tolerated in those distant parts of the world.

Mexico, Court Martial on Deserter
November 15, 1847

In another order he adds-

"There is every reason to believe that a very large distribution of knives and dirks has recently been made to liberated convicts (thieves and murderers) for the purpose of assassinating American soldiers found drunk or otherwise of their guard.

"Measures are in progress to search out and seize for execution the instigators and leaders of those assassins. In the mean time guards and patrols will search all suspicious persons, disarm, and, if necessary, confine them for trial and punishment."

Advices of a later date, however, state that confidence was rapidly being established; that the shops were being re-opened, and that the markets were well supplied.

The Mexican army, at the latest accounts, was slowly wending its way towards Queretaro. They numbered less than 3,000 men, under the command of General Herrera. Santa Anna, it was very generally believed, was making his way to the seaboard, for the purpose of embarking to a foreign country. Other accounts describe him as making another stand at Puebla, where, however, the American army was said to be so securely posted as to defy attack.

According to the New York Herald, there was no prospect of peace. The Congress would meet at Queretaro, with Pena y Pena as President, and it is said that no single member of it would vote in favour of acceding to the terms proposed by Mr. Trist. The cession of New Mexico at any rate was out of the question; while, on the other hand, the determination of the United States Government was said to be equally decided, not only to make no abatement on the terms offered by Mr. Trist and rejected by Mexico, but to insist on more favourable conditions in consequence of the immense loss its army has undergone.

In a Cabinet Council held at Washington on the 23d, it is said that Mr. Walker "goes for all of Mexico-Mr. Buchanan for a part." It was expected that Mr. Polk would submit the subject to Congress.

The United States and Mexico: US and Mexico
November 15, 1847

We have received by the Missouri steam-ship, of the French line of pockets, intelligence from New York to the 25th ult, and full details of the capture of Mexico by the American army. They do not materially differ from the accounts which we published on Saturday. The papers contain innumerable descriptions of the several battles in front of Mexico, and a full list of the killed and wounded. The total return of loss, including the missing, is as follows:-

Killed Wounded Missing

1. General Worth's Division 140 766 27
2. General Twigg's Division 35 194 10
3. General Pillow's Division 21 111 10
4. General Quiltman's Division 41 267 -

The Mexican loss is said to have been immense. Five generals, three colonels, seven lieutenant-colonels, and above 100 other officers, with 800 men, had been taken prisoners. The accounts previously received of the execution of deserters are fully confirmed. Fifty are said to have been put to death. The sentence of the court-martial upon one batch of these unhappy men, consisting of 29, is as follows:—

"The Court found the abovenamed prisoners severally guilty as charged, and sentenced each (two-thirds of the members of the Court in every case concurring in the sentence) 'to be hanged by the neck until he is dead.'"

"The General-in-Chief approves the foregoing proceedings and sentences, with the following exceptions:—The cases of Thomas Riley, company 1, 34 infantry; James Mills, company H, same regiment; and John Reilly, company K, 5th infantry.

"These three prisoners severally committed the crime of desertion as charged in the early part of April, 1846. At that date the United States were at peace with Mexico and all the world; for the present war did not break out, in all the world; for the present war did not break out, in fact, till a later date, and was not recognised to exist by the Congress of the United States till the 13th of the following month.

"No higher punishment can, therefore, be legally inflicted upon those atrocious offenders, T. Riley, J. Mills, and J. Reilly, than that prescribed for a state of peace, viz., 50 lashed with a raw hide whip, well laid on the bare back of each, and their punishment is commuted accordingly, with the addition that each be branded on a cheek with the letter D, kept a close prisoner as long as the army remains in Mexico, and then be drummed out of the service.

"So much of the punishment in the case of Henry Newer, company D, 4th artillery, as relates to hanging is, on the recommendation of many members of the Court, remitted; and a like remission is made in the case of Edward M'Herron, company G, same regiment, out of consideration for a son, private in the same company, who has remained faithful to his colours.

"There being some slight circumstance of mitigation in the several cases of Hezekiah Akles, John Bartley, Alexander M'Kee, and John Bowers, all of company H, 3d artillery their sentences are commuted as in the cases of T. Riley, J. Mills, and J. Reilly above."

General Quitman has been appointed Governor of Mexico, and had received the contribution of 150,000 dollars levied upon the city. He is thus described by a correspondent of the New York Herald:—

"To gallant Mississippi belongs the honour of giving to Mexico her first American Governor, and we may also add, her first wise Governer. General Scott displayed equal judgment and magnanimity in this appointment. General Quitman had had the misfortune to be ex-cluded from the battle of Cerro Gordo and of Centreras met with disappointments, which no doubt grieved his gallant soul. But in the closing scenes he availed himself of the long-delayed opportunity, and covered himself with glory in the various difficult operations which preceded the occupation of the city. His admirable fitness for the Governership of Mexico will occur to all who are acquainted with General Quitman. He is a profound jurist and elegant scholar, well read in history, and familiar with several of the modern languages, including, we believe, Spanish. He is too, a cool, deliberative, firm, and most rigidly honest man. We predict that his administration will be more effective and successful than that of any other ruler Mexico has ever had."

The new Governer occupied the palace of the late President.

It seems, however, that the possession of their capital by the United States army was not quietly acquiesced in by the Mexicans, even after their army under Santa Anna had deserted it, and their own undisciplined efforts were found insufficient to resist their formidable invaders. The following general order by General Scott points to a system of covert assassination, by which we are assured that he had already lost many of his best men:—

"Head-quarters of the Army, Mexico, Sept 22.

"The General-in-Chief has received through many kind sources, Mexican and others, undoubted information that an extensive conspiracy is on foot about us, to surprise (by means of an insurrection) our guards and quarters and to murder our officers and men.
"Mexican officers and soldiers in disguise, who had not the courage to defend their capital, are the leaders of this conspiracy, aided by some 1,500 thieves and murderers, who were turned loose for that purpose, and to prey upon the peaceable inhabitants, the night before the triumphal entry of the American army into this city. The conspirators have also the services of several false priests, who dishonour the holy religion which they only profess for the special occasion.

"Until ready for the insurrection, the disguised villains hope to do us much harm in detail. Their plan is to assassinate stragglers, particularly drunken men; to entice individuals or small parties into shops to drink, and to stab them when in their cups; to entice our gallant Roman Catholic soldiers who have done so much honour to our colours to desert, under a promise of lands in California, which our arms have already conquered, and which for ever will remain a part of the United States.

"Let all our soldiers, Protestant and Catholic, remember the fate of the deserters taken at Churubusco. These deluded wretches were also promised money and land; but the Mexican Government, by every sort of ill-usage, drove them to take up arms against the country and flag they had voluntarily sworn to support, and next placed them in front of the battle-in positions from which they could not possibly escape the conquering valour of our glorious ranks. After every effort of the General-in-Chief to save, by judicious discrimination, as many of those miserable convicts as possible, 50 of them have paid for their treachery by as ignominious death on the gallows.

"Again the General-in-Chief calls on his brethren in arms, of all grades, to be constantly on the alerts, by day as by night; never to appear in the streets without side-arms; to walk out only in parties of twos, threes, or more, and to avoid all obscure places, particularly treacherous dram-shops and liquor-stores.

"By command of Major-General Scott.
"H.L. SCOTT, A.A.A. G."

US and Mexico
November 16, 1847

It is very difficult to imagine that there can be any class of persons who could read with satisfaction the intelligence which was yesterday published from the seat of war in Mexico. They who only wish to see such bootless carnage brought to a termination will find no kind of substantial encouragement for their hopes. They who involuntarily sympathize with an aggrieved and invaded nation, of what character soever it may be, will meet with additional grounds for disappointment and concern; while all who are interested in the national credit of a people sprung from the same stock with ourselves must lament that it has been sullied by such atrocities as those into which the Americans have been drawn by the consequences of their first unjust aggression.

The inevitable horrors of a city taken by storm have been almost eclipsed, on this occasion, by the spectacle of fifty miserable Irishmen hanged in a body, for deserting the colours to which they had attached themselves. We have no wish to disguise the fact, that, over and above the undue and for-tuitous aggravation lent to every incident of war in a season of profound and general peace, this act of General Scott's may assume a deeper dye from want of proper consideration of the circumstances which might be alleged to justify it. No doubt desertion, the most emphatic of all military crimes, becomes a more formidable contingency and demands more severe treatment in an army or on an expedition where the temptations are unusually great and the restraints unusually small. The American army, o this occasion, has been described as a heterogeneous aggregate of half the nations of Europe, and it is certain, from the constitution of the population, that such must, to a large extent, be the case with every considerable expedition sent out by the United States. Excepting amongst the descendants of our 20,000 Puritans who cluster about the states of New England, it would be difficult to define the breed or the locality of a real 'Statesman. The broad distinctions already subsisting between the northern and southern, eastern and western states, are still further increased by an average influx of 200,000 emigrants yearly from all parts of Europe. Beyond the circle of a local militia there can be but little spontaneity of union; and, under such conditions, it may be incumbent on a commander to secure, by the terror of example, that fidelity which he can hardly expect from suggestions of patriotism. Yet, after all such considera-tions, we must avow our conviction that this act, which for wholesale and exterminating cruelty may match the most barbarous rigours of past wars, does brand the general, the army, and the expedition with a deeper stigma than any it wore before. A party of miserable creatures, dispossessed of a home or country of their own, took their services to a colonel, as they might have done to a contractor, and leased their sinews to the work of a war as they would have done to that of a railroad. We do not say that their constitutional instability deserved the indulgence they might perhaps have claimed for it themselves, but we do think that the sternest demands of the occasion might have been satisfied with less than such wanton and unremitting butchery. Even in the rude barbarism of a new world we do not look for the judicial atrocities of Galicia or Catalonia. The poor wretches had been placed in front of the Mexican lines, partly as men whose desperation might be reckoned on, partly as men whose fidelity it was desirable thus to secure. They were, of course, seized as the battle went against them, tried, and condemned. No lots were cast, no forlorn commutation or expedient of decimation allowed. Four were allowed the benefit of extenuating circumstances. Three were grudgingly permitted to escape through a loophole in the law, and were punished only with such inflicting short of death as could be devised by a disappointed court. The rest were taken in a heap to the gallows, under which "they were kept standing" for an hour or two till the flag they had de-"serted was flying from the walls of Chepultepec,"when they were all swung off together as the" stars and stripes rose into the air." After this revolting example of melodramatic massacre by su-preme authority, the reader will not be surprised to learn that the execution of such resolves has since been taken, with characteristic promptitude, into the hands of the troops themselves. One of our papers states that "a comrade recognizing a deserter, to save the trouble of a court-martial, pitched him at once into a mill-flume, where he was crushed to pieces by the wheel."

If the accountability for such abominations as these falls to one side or the other, according to the justice of the war, some parties must have an ugly reckoning before them, and one which is yet far from closed. If there is any conclusion in which all sides are now agreed, it is that neither blood-shed nor conquest have won a step towards peace. Of this fact the Cabinet of Washington now appears fully cognisant, and General Scorr, after all his efforts, has only arrived at that precise predica-ment which we portrayed two months ago. He is now Mexico with a force which numbered about 9,000 disposable men before the late battles, in which it was perhaps reduced by a fourth. In the city he is encompassed by a swarm of savage leperos, who, if they do not murder at their ordinary rate of practice, would assassinate his whole army in a twelvemonth. His communications are so far safe, that no garrisoned post is likely to be forced; but it cannot be said that there is free intercourse be-tween any two of them. The American intelligence itself sates, that the road from Vera Cruz to Jalapa or Mexico could only be kept open "by a solid column of infantry from the gates of one city to "those of the other." Nothing but the want of enterprise amongst the Mexicans permits the garrisons a single yard's patrol beyond their posts. Even at Vera Cruz-the base of operations-the immediate neighbourhood of the city is only kept free by strong detachments, and so suspicious is the aspect of things within the walls, that Coloel CHILDS the other day, sent GC bombs, facetiously described as "native Americans," amongst the habitations of the citizens to recall the late infictions to their minds. Meantime, the Mexican Congress is assembling at Queretaro, and, with a laudable resolve of adding no faults of commis-sion to those of omission, has proclaimed its unani-mity in favour of prosecuting the war; so that nothing has been effected beyond a change of posi-tions, with this advantage for the Mexicans,-that they are somewhat more impalpable even than before. General Scorr may advance to Queretaro as he as advanced to Mexico, but his phantom foe will find a fresh metropolis in every province, till the invader has neither forces sufficient to keep his conquests, nor strength remaining to pursue them.

there any Irishman present? ("Yes") Fifty Irishmen were found to have deserted—no uncommon thing; but they had not deserted for drink of women, or good quarters, or dislike of service, or from ordinary motives; they had deserted be-cause they felt they were led on against the religion of their fathers. They were all executed. When in European wars a town surrendered, why were six covered carriages stipulated for? Because into those carriages European humanity conveyed away men who had deserted. The prestige was gone which made Republicanism be regarded as a guarantee for public honesty. In a guide book printed in Philadelphia, he found some singular remarks. The author said, that when going through St. James's-park he considered the signs of the times whether the child was not born in the United States who should hear or see that an army of 50,000 men from that country was encamped in Hyde-park, while the American banner floated from the Horse Guards, the headquarters of the American general? (Laughter) At Windso the author, when he saw the standard of England floating from the walls, reflected that probably the child was born who should see that standard give place to the stars and stripes of America. The object of the United States was to spread personal slavery all over America. Under such circumstances ought not the consumption of cotton from in lia to be encouraged rather that Manchester should be involved in the slaveholder’s policy?

The Secretary then read a letter from Mr. Douglas Jerrold, who was to have seconded the resolution, expressing his regret that at the eleventh hour he had been prevented from attending the meeting, of whose objects he entirely approved.

Mr. P. A. TAYLOR seconded the resolution, and did The Times the honour of abusing and misrepresenting it on every subject of public discussion throughout a rather long speech.
He especially contended for the right of the Swiss Radicals to oppress and destroy their countrymen, and concluded by a high eulogy upon Joseph Mazzini.

Mr. I. Wilson asked how they could speak of themselves as a "free" nation in the resolution, while they were struggling for freedom? The expression was inconsistent with the condition of the working classes. If a man was disfranchised he was a slave to all intents and purposes. The aristocracy of all countries were leagued together to keep down the working classes.

Colonel Thompson approved the omission, and the resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. G. Thompson, M.O. moved the second resolution:—

"That in order to bring to bear upon the foreign policy of this country the beneficial influence of public opinion, it is of the greatest importance to obtain and circulate accurate and systematic information concerning the political condition and relations of foreign countries, to disseminate the principles of national independence and progress and to promote a good understanding between the people of this and all other countries; and that these being the people of this and all other countries; and that these being the objects of the People's international League; that association is entitled to our warmest approval and support."

He had joined the association to obtain information, and had their observations been confined on the present occasion to something like a statement of the benevolent and universal objects at which they aimed, and the means they proposed to take for the attainment of those ends, he would have much preferred it. He must express his own individual dissent from certain observations which would have been better dis-pensed with.
(Hear.) Such an association was a desideration at present. He sympathized with Colonel Thompson's remarks as to that most flagitious war now waging was not the real cause, that the object was to extend slavery from the Frozen Ocean to the Gulf of Panama, he denounced that war as one of the most dishonest and unprovoked that ever occurred—as one of the most stupendous crimes ever committed by a civilized country. (Cheers)

Mr. Linton, in absence of Mr. Williams, M.P., seconded the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.
Thanks having been voted to the chairman, the meeting separated.

of correspondents which has taken place respectively between the Mexican Minister in London and Messrs. Schneider and Co., and between the latter parties and the committee. This correspondence may be divided into two portions, the first relating to the custody of certain bonds issued for special purposes at the time of the last conversion, and the second relating to the money held by Schneider and Co., applicable as far as it will go to the purposes of a dividend, and which it has long been contended should forthwith be distributed. To make room for the whole of these documents would be out of the question, and as the matter of the first and most tedious portion may advantageously be condensed, we shall content ourselves by giving an abstract of it, subjoining, however, the whole of the second portion, which relates to a point of immediate importance.

Under date of the 19th October last, the Mexican Minister in London wrote to Messrs Schneider and Co., as the agents in the last conversion of Mexican stock, stating that he had been required by Messrs. Sheppard and son to direct Schneider to receive for conversion 95 bonds of 500 l. each (letter d2, 106 to 2,200) for 47,500 l., which they had hitherto refused to do; and the Minister in conveying this direction requested Schneider to "have the complacency no to enter into discussion of the merits of the case, the responsibility of which rests exclusively with himself." To this, on the 22nd of October, Schneiders replied that their only ground for refusing to convert the bonds in question is that they have reason to think they form part of a set of deferred bonds, amounting to 784,350 l., "in respect of which a distinct class of new bonds were created (lettered E and for 470,610 l.) and deposited in the bank of England." The deposit thus alluded to was made to provide against the contingency of certain bonds which were known to have held by Lizzardi and Co. in connexion with a former conversion having "contrary to the intentions of the government of Mexico" by any possibility found their way into circulation and Schneiders therefore suggested to the Minister that there were two ways of throwing light upon the matter and of removing the difficulty.

"The one is for Messrs. Lizardi to furnish either your Excellency or ourselves with the classes and numbers of the bonds constituting the said sum of 784,350 l.; or, if they still decline to do this, then to furnish us with the following particular evidence, which, as your Excellency is aware, we have required from the parties from the beginning, viz.

"The particulars of the old stock for which the bonds held by Messrs. Sheppard and Son were given in exchange.

"The name of the party who presented that old stock to Messrs. Lizardi for conversion, and to whom the bonds in question were issued in exchange, with the date of such issue.

"To adopt one or the other of these modes," the add, "is so simple, and at the same time to reasonable and proper, that to decline doing so only tends to confirm us in the belief that the bonds held by Messrs. Sheppard and Son ought no to be admitted to the conversion."

On the day following the dispatch of this reply to the Minister, Schneiders received another communication from that personage, requiring them to consent to, and assist at, the delivery up, to certain persons nominated by the Mexican Government, of the bonds aforementioned as deposited in boxes at the Bank of England, and of which boxes they hold one of the keys. To this a reply was immediately sent, that the "bonds in question were created for a special purpose, and that they were deposited in the Bank of England in the joint names of the Mexican Minister and of themselves (Schneider) as security that they should be applied to that purpose, if necessary, and no other," and that under these circumstances compliance was impossible.

In due course the whole of the foregoing correspondence was laid by Schneiders before the committee of bondholders, which committee, through their chairman, Mr. Robinson, expressed their entire approbation of the course which the firm had pursued.

Subsequently, another letter was received by Schneiders form the Mexican Minister, dated the 25th of October, enclosing an order from the Mexican Government of the 28th of August last, that the bonds deposited in the Bank of England should be "held at the disposition" of that Government, and announcing that-

"The primitive object of that deposit was to exchange therewith the bonds not converted which might remain in circulation after the general operation of the conversion recently effected. But the Government having reserved to itself the right of disposing of the said deposited sum at the time of granting its definitive approbation of the adjustment of the debt, it not being unnatural to suppose that no bonds existed that should be exchanged according to the understanding in which the deposit was made, and the Government having occasion to dispose thereof for very urgent purposes of the public service as been pleased to resolve, in the exercise of the right reserved to itself in granting its approbation to the conversion of the debt, that the bonds for the value of 470, 61 l. sterling deposited into the Bank Of England be immediately withdrawn and delivered to Messrs. Aguirre Bengos and sons, in order that they may dispose of them in conformity with the instructions which are transmitted to them under this date. But as it may happen that, not withstanding the contrary convictions of the Government, some old bonds do exist which ought to be changed for the converted according to agreement, the Government provides for the solution of this difficulty by disposing that in the case supposed new bonds shall be issued for the sum that may be necessary to effect the exchange, on the understanding that for the amount thereof the quota shall be increased by one per cent., which the maritime custom-houses have to supply for the payment of interest until the amount is made up which the new bonds will incur."

To which Messrs. Schneiders replied as follows

"After a careful perusal of the dispatch transmitted to us by your Excellency, we beg to acquaint your Excellency that we see nothing in its contents calculated to remove the difficulties existing to the fulfillment of the wishes of the Mexican Government with regard to the bonds deposited in the Bank of England, such difficulties consisting of facts, and not of opinions. We conceive that the Mexican Government could not have been sufficiently acquainted with the circumstances attending the creation of the bonds in question; it is the object of the long explanatory letter we had the honor of addressing to your Excellency on the 23rd inst. To bring those circumstances under it's notice, and we have nothing further to add thereto on the present occasion."

Here ends the first branch of the correspondence, and thus far Messrs. Shneider appear to have acted in accordance with sound principle and of the benefit of the bondholders, the attempt of the Mexican Government to get hold of a sum of 470,610l. Of reserved bonds in order to throw them upon the market "for very urgent purposes of the public service" being perfectly of a character with its past proceedings. Of the next portion of the correspondence, however, we are sorry that we cannot see any ground of congratulation for the parties interested. The question is complicated, and the only course for the bondholders would appear to be to bring it to a decision by means of an action (not necessarily an unfriendly one) in a court of law.

Another arrival from the Cape of Good Hope furnishes files of papers to the 28th September. The news form the frontier is not important. Sir Henry Pottinger was on the spot ready to direct the movement of the troops against the Caffres, so soon as a favourable opportunity should be presented. The weather in most of the districts was favourable for agricultural operations. The latest intelligence received at the Cape from England communicated the result of a great number of the elections.

It appears by accounts from Martinique and Guadeloupe, that those islands have entirely escaped the bad weather experienced at Tobago and Trinidad and it is stated that affairs were progressing quietly. The alteration in the administration of the criminal law, which had been brought into operation in Guadeloupe on the 1st of October, is the only fact of interest mentioned in these advices.

The Bankers' Magazine furnishes the returns of circulation of the English private and joint stock banks for the four weeks ending the 16th, 23rd, and 30th of October, and the 6th of November inst., and gives the following as the average circulation of these banks during the past month, viz.

Pena y Pena was still at Queretaro, where he had succeeded in assembling 71 of the deputies of the Mexican Congress, who had decided that they would positively resume their sittings on the 20th ult. It was said that a majority of the deputies had decided in favor of an amicable adjustment of the difficulties between the two governments.

Pena y Pena had also directed circulars to the six governors of the Central Mexican States, requesting them to repair instantly to Queretaro, for the purpose of holding a special council, to consult upon what amount of men and munitions of war could be raised, with the view of continuing hostilities, and also at the same time to calmly deliberate upon the propriety of the said continuance of the war.

The Mexican Government has superseded Santa Anna's command of the army, and General Rincon has been appointed to fill that command.

Santa Anna loudly protested against this violation of his rights as the first magistrate of the nation, as he styles himself. He refuses obedience to the orders of the Government, and in the mean time has retired to Tehuacan.

Atlexco had been taken possession of by the United States troops. It was stated, also, that Orizaba had surrendered.

The health of the United States army is far from being good. The climate of the valley of Mexico is not, it appear, congenial to the constitutions of the south. It is just as enervating and fatal to the southern as is that of Vera Cruz to the northern constitutions.

The French mail steamer New York put into Newport on the 12th inst. Short of coal. She arrived at New York on the 14th inst.

At a Public meeting at Lexington the following resolutions, offered by Henry Clay, on Saturday, the 13th of November, were unanimously adopted:

"1. That the primary cause of the present unhappy war existing between the United States of America and the united states of the republic of Mexico, was the annexation of Texas to the former; and the immediate occasion of hostilities between the two republics arose out of the order of the President of the United States for the removal of the army under the command of General Taylor from its position at Corpus Christi to a point opposite Matamoras, on the east band of the Río Bravo, within the territory claimed by both republics, but then under the jurisdiction of Mexico, and inhabited by its citizens. That the order of the President of the removal of the army to that point, was improvident and unconstitutional, it being without the concurrence of Congress, or even consultation with it, although it was in session; but that Congress having, by its subsequent acts, recognized the war thus brought into existence without its previous authority or consent, the prosecution of it became thereby national.

"2. That in the absence of any formal and public declaration by Congress of the objects for which the war ought to be prosecuted, the President of the united States, as chief magistrate, as Commander in Chief of the army and navy of the United States, is left to the guidance of his own judgment to prosecute it for such purposes and objects as he may deem the honor and interest of the nation to require.

"3. That, by the consent of the United States, Congress being invested with power to declare war and grant letters of marque and reprisal, to make rules concerning captures by land and water, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, and to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces, has the fullest and most complete war making power of the people of the United States; and so possessing it has a right to determine upon the motives, causes, and objects of wars when once commenced, or at any time during the progress of their existence.

"4. As the further opinion of the meeting that it is the duty of Congress to declare, by some authentic act, for what purpose and object the existing war ought to be further prosecuted/ that it is the duty of the President, in his official capacity, to conform to such a declaration of Congress; and if after such a declaration the President should decline or refuse to endeavor by all the means, civil, diplomatic, and military, in his power to execute the announced will of Congress, and in defiance of its authority, should continue and prosecute the war for purposes and objects other than those declared by that body, it would become the right and duty of Congress to adopt the most efficacious measure to arrest the further progress of the war, taking care to make ample provisions for the honour, the safety, and security of our armies in Mexico in every contingency/ and if Mexico should decline or refuse to conclude a treaty with us, stipulating for the purposes and objects so declared by Congress, it would be the duty of the Government to prosecute the war with the utmost vigilance until they were attained by a treaty of peace.
"5. That we view with serious alarm, and are utterly opposed to any purpose like the annexation of Mexico to the United States in any mode, and especially by conquest; that we believe the two nations could not be happily governed by one common authority, owing to their great difference of race, laws, language, and religion, and the vast extent their respective territories, and the large amount of their respective populations; that such a union against the consent of the exasperated Mexican people, could only be effected and preserved by large standing armies and the constant application of military force; in other words, by despotic sway exercised over the Mexican people in the first instance but which there would be just cause to apprehend might in process of time be extended of their people of the United States; that we depurate, therefore, such a union as wholly incompatible with the genius of our Government, and with the character of our free and liberal institutions; an we anxiously hope that each nation may be left in the undisturbed possession of its own laws, language, cherished religion, and territory, to pursue its own happiness according to what it may deem best for itself.

"6. That, considering the series of splendid and brilliant victories achieved by our brave armies and their gallant commanders, during the war with Mexico, unattended by a single reverse, the United States, without any danger of their honor suffering the slightest tarnish, can practice the virtues of moderation and magnanimity towards their discomfited foe; we have no desire for the dismemberment of the republic of Mexico, but wish only a just and proper fixation of the limits of Texas.

"7. That we do positively and emphatically disclaim and disavow any wish or desire on our party to acquire any foreign territory whatever for the purpose of propagating slavery or of introducing slavery from the United States into any such foreign territory.

"8. That we invite our fellow citizens of the United States who are anxious for the restoration of the blessings of peace, or if the existing war shall continue to be prosecuted are desirous that its purpose and object shall be defined and known; who are anxious to avert present and further perils and dangers with which it may be fraught; and who are also anxious to produce contentment and satisfaction at home, and to elevate the national character abroad to assemble together in their respective communities and to express their views, feelings and opinions on the subject.

US War in Mexico
December 2, 1847

If nations do not avail themselves of the lessons now read to them by the people of the United States, they will be neglecting one of the most salutary examples ever afforded by one country for the benefit of all. Unjust war and dishonest intrigues have already produced their fruits of popular embarrassments and Ministerial perplexities, and they are not rapidly tending to national confession and exposure. By the resolutions which we published yesterday, unanimously adopted at a numerous meeting of American citizen, upon the address of one of their most respected countrymen, it will be seen with what spirit the measures of the Washington Cabinet are likely to be canvassed; and the correspondents given in another of this days columns may supply some means of judging Mr. Polk's policy will promote that personal success with a view to which it was apparently calculated.

Matters are perplexing enough as they stand, for the Americans have played out their last card and are still as far as ever from the game. Mexico is conquered, as far as a country can be conquered by arms, but it still bears no kind of semblance to the conquest the Americans would make of it. Now, however, Mr. Polk has to justify his war, a task considerably more difficult than even that of directing it; and it will be seen by the report we referred to how very little disposition there is on the part of his judges to blink the question or curtail the trial. In a few days Congress will assemble, and the President will then be called upon to explain upon what grounds, and for what objects, the war has been carried from Matamoras to Mexico, what is sought by its further prosecution, and what reasonable hope there is that the end thus sought can be obtained. Hither to it has been a private speculation of his own. By orders dispatched on his own authority he commenced active hostilities on the Texan border, and though Congress was induced, for the safety of the national troops, to lend a conditional ratification to his act, yet it did not surrender in perpetuity the powers of irresponsible peace and war. Now, accordingly, Mr. Polk must render an account of his deeds; and, failing his justification of the late campaigns, he will be compelled to terminate, not without dishonour, the war he has so recklessly prosecuted.

The trial occurs at an unfortunate season. Success might have covered a multitude of faults, and though it would probably have sown seeds of discord in the Union more radically calamitous than the costs of a war, yet it would have been enveloped the authors of the mischief in a protective cloud, and would have diverted public scrutiny from the policy of the Administration till a time when it would have been too late to revive it. But Mr. Polk will have to explain, in the session which commences next Monday, not only his measures, but his misfortunes. He has to account not only for a crime, but a blunder. We can commiserate his fate perhaps to some extent, for he could hardly have been expected to calculate on those peculiar elements of resistance which have destroyed his project. He, doubtless, never conceived that it would be requisite to fight for 18 months, still less than the exertion would be attended with so few results. He had formed his own ideas of certain acquisitions, at the expense of an imbecile neighbour, to signalize and glorify his reign, nor did he imagine that the cost would ever rise to an amount comparable with the returns. Could he have presented himself to Congress with the prize in his hands, he might have perhaps have sagedically counted on swamping all considerations of policy in calculations of produce, though the resolutions of Mr. Clay and his friends show that there would still have remained in some quarters integrity proof against the dazzling delusion. But, unhappily, his first throw was an unfortunate one, and like many a speculator he proceeded to another and another, still confident that each successive investment would enable him to recover his losses and realize his gains. The result has been that his total expenditure has at length reached such a height as irremediably to exceed the value of the recoverable stake, and now, when his predicament is such that he cannot possibly be a winner, he is summarily called upon to account for the funds entrusted to his care.

It will be an edifying thing to see, subjected to the ordeal of a Parliamentary debate, a case which would not bear the discussion on an extempore convention. The arguments to which, in the mouth of a Mexican Commissioner, General Scott, with all the might of conquest on his side, found it impossible to reply, must now be met by the ingenuity of a Cabinet in the fair field of a Congress. Mr. Polk will have to defend the policy of an expensive war, commenced on principles essentially unjust, and prosecuted for an object, the intrinsic desirability of which is denied by many, and the value of which is admitted by all to be below that of the cost incurred. He will have to frame a reply, in plain words, to a question which he has hithered to blinked, and which he hoped ultimately to have escaped. He will have to confess publicy to motives, which are very easy to understand but very hard to acknowledge; and all this he must do in the face of opponents who have very clearly shown both their information and resolution, and with the aid only of supporters disheartened and diminished by ill success.

What does he in Mexico? Is he there to assert the legitimate boundary of Texas? Why then claim the whole expanse of California? Is he there to demand California and New Mexico? How then does he demand them—by purchase or surrender? If by surrender, why does he employ the mockery of negotiation? If by purchase, why open the bargain by massacring the vendors? A trial which is now pending at Washington, amongst various instructive disclosures has developed the fact, that an officer of the States was informed in an official dispatch only two months after the commencement of the war, that it was "The object of the United States, under its rights as a belligerent nation, to possess itself entirely of Upper California." We have very little inclination to doubt the assertion herein contained, but will Mr. Polk actually confess it? Or, if he does so, what will he do with the alleged casus belli on the Texas border?

No explanations are so perplexing as those which are asked for to convict the speaker rather than to inform the querist, which are demanded as confessions rather than communications, and on subjects where every single hearer is prepared for every possible evasion. There is hardly a decently informed person in Europe or America who is not as precisely acquainted with Mr. Polk's policy as if he had been a party to its construction; and there are few, perhaps, without some malicious satisfaction at the predicament to which it has brought him. If he could prove, against the law of nature, that his schemes were justifiable, he would yet have to prove that they were feasible, and again, that they were expedient, two propositions which are contradicted by his more sagacious countrymen as flatly as they are refuted by the suggestions of common honesty. One-half of America still remains unoccupied and unsettled at a time when all this cost is incurred for an increase of territory, and it has now been shown by experience that no Mexican territory can be ever retained but by such a force as would altogether demolish the profit of the tenure. To all this long indictment of injustice, incapacity, and ill success, Mr. Polk has now to plead, and in so far as the condemnation of his policy may redeem that of the States at large, it will be impossible to repine at his conviction.
It is one of the most serious evils of war that, in addition to the burdens and calamities which hostilities impose and inflict on the nations engaged in them, the whole policy of a state is materially affected by the bent of the public mind in this direction, and all the natural resources of the country, its leading men, and its political institutions, are diverted from their natural course by the exigencies of the public service, or by the passions which aggressive warfare is apt to excite. A few years ago when the United States still held fast to the pacific principles of the illustrious fathers of the commonwealth, no one could have believed it possible that ere long the single question of war would predominated over all the acts and deliberations of the American people; yet at this moment such is the undisputed fact. For many months past, our own attention has been involuntarily drawn away from the ordinary occurrences in American affairs to discuss the miserable incidents of the invasion of Mexico, and to narrate the progress of what might be more aptly described as a hunt than as a campaign. What meanwhile has become of the United States? The political life of that great and enterprising people has not been suspended by the irruption of a few thousand sharpshooters across the Rio Grande, and the proportions which the Mexican war has assumed are not in reality very much beyond those of our own annoyances in Caffraria. If Popocatapet were to open and swallow General Scott and all his army, they would hardly be missed; JONATHAN would still go ahead; another wave would break along the coast; and, probably, Mexico would again be conquered. But the effect of this war on the nation, which engaged in it, on the men who prompted it, and on the parties, which must now defend it, is matter of far more serious consideration than the achievement of a triumph over an unresisting foe. Accordingly, we find, that the Mexican war is the one political question, which is the test of parties and the standard of Government at this time in the United States. Finances, tariffs, public improvements, and all the other topics which have figured at various times in the announcements of a candidate or the controversies of an election are all engulfed in the sole consideration of a state of war, which it is equally difficult to terminate and to protract. Under these circumstances, the annual session of Congress is about to commence. At the time we write the PRESIDENT'S message, containing probably no announcement of the much-desired peace, has already been delivered; and, moreover, the note of preparation has already sounded for the presidential election of next year, which is to place a successor to Mr. Polk in the chair of the state.

The experience of the last few years has certainly demonstrated to an extent which had not been anticipated the extraordinary and overwhelming importance of the choice of a PRESIDENT. Be he child of accident or of faction, known or unknown, distrusted or adored, the power of the President of the United States for the time being has proved to be well-nigh unlimited, at lest by any constitutional checks, as long as he takes care to command the support of the multitude. He is possessed of infinitely more than the power of a constitutional King, and he holds that power by tenure far more certain in its duration than that of any constitutional Minister. In deciding upon the men who are to fill the offices of President and Vice-president of the Union, the people of the United States do practically submit the destinies of their country for four years to the control of certain individuals; and experiences has shown that this control may be so judiciously exercised as to accomplish all the objects of absolute power, with a very distant risk of the penalty of impeachment. It becomes, therefore, of paramount importance, not only to the American Union, but to the world at large, to know whether the next President of the United States is to pursue the policy of Mr. Tyler and Mr. Polk, whether he is to flatter the passions of the people by aggressive war, and to extend his political connections by the patronage of the army and the commissariat—or whether the choice of the people will be on the next occasion sufficiently enlightened and deliberate to arrest a course of policy which is injurious to the true welfare of America and to peace of the world.

The cause which is identified with the true principles of Government in America and the sound and honourable portion of the institutions of the Union is represented in its old and eloquent defender, Mr. Clay. It is melancholy to think that a few hundred votes of an ignorant populace give for a different name should have saved Mexico from invasion, bloodshed, and spoliation, and the United States from the burden and disgrace of this war. For so little was this contest provoked or called for by any national cause, that it cannot be doubted that if Mr. Clay had been President of the United States in the room of Mr. Polk, no such occurrence would ever have taken place. Nothing can be more obvious and certain than that this war is as much the result of Mr. Polk's own choice and will as he himself in his office the result of the choice and will of the Democratic Party. Had its termination been as rapid as its territorial success, it is probable that all the moral and political considerations which are suggested by this war—the loss of life, the waste of treasure, and the abuse of authority—would have been lost in the acclamations of a people rejoicing to welcome a victorious army; and even now, if within the few months which elapse before the great election of 1848, a peace is concluded on terms which cannot but be advantageous to the United States, it is to be feared that military influence will prevail, and General C. Scott or General Taylor will pass from their Mexican camp to the head of Government. Very likely they will prove to be men of more sobriety of judgment and moderation of policy than the party which brings them forward or the men who have employed them on their present enterprises; but the fatal lesson will be taught and not forgotten that military services are the shortest path to civil distinction, and that the Presidency of the nation belongs to the first soldier who is employed on active service.

We apprehend, on the other hand, that personal dignity of Mr. Clay, the truth and wisdom of his principles, and even the experience of the last few months, will not prevail with the majority of the American people, unless any unforeseen reverses or an indefinite prolongation of these hostilities should exasperate them against the party with which the war originated. So that in reality the election for the next President is quite as likely to be decided on some Mexican field of battle, or in some Mexican conference on the preliminaries of peace, as in Fanouil-hall or the Capitol at Washington. It would require something more than the virtue of modern republics to punish the men who have increased its power, because they have impaired its principles; and from the commencement of these transactions Mr. Polk has evidently speculated on the war as the best use he could make of power for his part and for himself. Mr. Clay offers no bribes to the vanity or ambition of the people; on the contrary, he repudiates and denounces the schemes which are entertained by others for the acquisition of territory and the extension of slaver; but we fear he is speaking a language known only to a generation of nobler and wiser men, an that he like others who shared his opinions, will spend their latest breath in denouncing evils which they cannot avert.

The conquest of Mexico will remain the conspicuous mark of Mr. Polk's administration; but it will prove a no less conspicuous mark in the internal history of his country; and we cannot venture to entertain hopes that the Whig party will have the strength to subdue tendencies at once so seductive to a democracy and so fatal to the purity of its Government.

AMERICA: US and Mexico
December 18, 1847

[The following appeared in part only of our yesterday's impression:-]

LIVERPOOL, Thursday, Half-Past 8 P.M.

By the Royal mail steam-ship Acadia, Captain N. Shannon, we have advices from New York to the 30th ult., Boston to the 1st inst., and Halifax to the 5th inst., respectively.

The Acadia did not leave Halifax until the 5th inst., having been detained between that port and Boston by dense fogs.

The Acadia has brought a large number of passengers, and 90,000l. in specie on freight.

The Hottinguer, Captain Bursley, from New York, arrived today with 30,000l. in specie on freight.

The packet ship Roscius, which would leave New York on the 1st inst., was expected to take 22,000l. In specie on freight for England.

Our advices from Mexico are unimportant. The capital was quiet. The Mexican Congress was assembling at Queretaro. The election of a President would be the first proceeding, for which post Pena y Pena, Almonte, and Herrera were spoken of.

Santa Anna was at Tebuacan, whence he intended to defend himself for the charges brought against him. What these charges are is set forth in the following letter from Mexico:

MEXICO, Oct. 17
"A most strange state of things exists in regard to Santa Anna. He has been ordered for trial before a court martial upon charges of the most heinous character. It is not only alleged against him that he abandoned the city on the night of the 13th of September last, with his army, in a most cowardly manner, leaving the city without protection, but that previous to his leaving he robbed the Treasury department of all bonds and every other species of available means; and to cast off all suspicion from himself, he then ordered that the prison of the Accordada be opened, and it's convicts be let loose upon this community. This was done."
A new party is said to have been formed in Mexico with the designee of forming it into two great states, and annexing them to the United States.

It was rumoured there that the states of San Luis, Zacatecas, Durango, and one other, had declared in favour of Paredes's monarchial scheme, and proffered him 18,000 troops.

The United States troops were rapidly advancing towards the Mexican capital, and garrisoning the intermediate posts.

It is stated that Padre Jarauta, the chief leader of the guerrilla forces, had applied to General Patterson with peace negotiations.

A frightful steamboat collision had taken place on the Missouri. Forty passengers were drowned.

The following orders had been published by General Scott:

"Head-quarters of the Army, Mexico, Dec. 15.
(General Orders, No. 376.)

"1. This army is about to spread itself over and to occupy the republic of Mexico, until the latter shall sue for peace on terms acceptable to the Government of the United States.

"2. On the occupation of the principal point or points in any state, the payment to the Federal Government of this republic of all taxes or dues, of whatever name or kind, heretofore--say in the year 1844--payable to or collected by that Government, is absolutely prohibited, as all such taxes or dues will be demanded or the proper civil authorities for the support of the army of occupation.

"3. The state and federal district of Mexico being already so occupied, as well as the states of Vera Cruz, Puebla and Tamulipas, the usual taxes or dues, heretofore contributed by the same to the Federal Government, will be considered as due and payable to this army from the beginning of the present month, and will early be demanded of the civil authorities of the said states and district under rules and penalties which shall be duly announced and enforced.

"4. Other states of the republic, as the Californias, New Mexico, Chihuahua, Coahulla, New Leon, &c., already occupied by the forces of the United States, though not under the immediate orders of the General-in-Chief, will conform to the prescriptions of this order, except in such state or states where a different system has been adopted with the sanction of the Government at Washington.

"5. The internal taxes or dues referred to are--1, direct taxes; 2, duties on the production of gold and silver; 3, melting and essaying dues; 4, the tobacco rent; 5, the rent of sampled paper; 6, the rent on the manufacture of playing cards; and 7, the rent of post-offices.

"6. The rent of national lotteries is abolished--lotteries being hereby prohibited.

"7. Import and export duties at the ports of the republic will remain as fixed by the Government of the United States, except that the exportation of gold and silver in bars or ingots (plata y ora en pasta) is prohibited until the further instructions of the Government on the subject.

"8. All imported articles, goods, or commodities, which have once paid, or given sufficient security for the payment of duties to the United States at any port of entry of the republic, shall not again be burdened with any tax or duty in any part of this republic occupied by the forces of the United States.

"9. The levying of duties on the transit of animals, goods, or commodities, whether of foreign or domestic growth, from one state of this republic to another, or on entering or leaving the gate of any city within the republic, will, from and after beginning of the ensuing year, be prohibited as far as the United States' forces may have the power to enforce the prohibition. Other and equitable means, to a moderate extent, must be resorted to by the several state and city authorities for the necessary support of their respective Governments.

"10. The tobacco, playing card, and stamped paper, rents will be placed for three, six or twelve months, under contract with the highest bidders respectively for the several states, the state and federal district of Mexico being considered as one. Accordingly, offers or bids for these rents, within each state or any one of them, are invited. They will be sent in as early as possible, sealed, to the head-quarters of commanders of departments, except for the federal district and state of Mexico. For the two latter the offers or bids will be addressed to the General-in-Chief.

"11. Further details for the execution of the foregoing system of government and revenue will soon be given in general orders.

"By command of Major-General Scott

THE QUARRELS OF AMERICAN GENERALS--The last accounts from Washington state that General Pillow and Colonel Duncan have to submit to be tried by a court-martial or a court of inquiry. The charges against General Worth have been dismissed, and instead of his being tried, it appears that General Scott himself is to be brought before a court of inquiry--all those trials to be held at Perote, or somewhere else. These things will produce a great sensation throughout the country, and create a great deal of bad blood in the army, and among the friends of the various distinguished leaders. We are very much afraid that the difficulties giving rise to all these court-martials have been contributed to in equal quantities by all the various distinguished individuals concerned. General Scott is great as a military man; he is an admirable fighter, a distinguished tactician; but with these exceptions he is in every other respect as meek as a child and understands little beyond mere fighting. General Worth is like him in this respect. It was well known that he comported himself with similar indiscretion in like circumstances. He picked a quarrel with General Twiggs at the commencement of the war, threw up his commission, abandoned his post and the army, and hurried on to Washington. Then, on second thoughts, he changed his mind and returned to the army again. As to General Pillow, he, too, seems to be a vain, giddy man, though a capital fighter. His military reports are written in bad taste, and are the worst of all these that have been published. Colonel Duncan, on the other hand, is a man of great good sense and how he came to be involved in these difficulties remains to be seen. But while we lament all these untoward movements, we have reason to be thankful that General Taylor never got himself into any difficulties with his officers; and when he was at the head of the army, all was quiet, orderly, and sober under his management. He must be a man of wonderful tact, great discretion, and remarkable prudence, to have passed through a long military career as he has done without creating jealousies or heart burnings among his brethren in arms. In fact, they all appear to respect, and seem to idolize, him more and more. In these difficulties and courts-martial we much fear that Mr. Polk and the Administration have committed some great mistakes, but we will wait and become acquainted with the facts before we condemn them.--New York Herald.

"We have received authentic intelligence of a treaty of peace with Mexico having been negotiated and accepted by the Mexican Government, at Queretaro, by General Scott, on the basis of the instructions sent out by the Government last year.

"By art. 1, Senors Cuevas, Cuooto, and Atristain are appointed commissioners on the part of the Mexican Government to adjust the terms of a lasting treaty of peace between the United States of the north and the United Mexican States, with Mr. Trist, Commissioner of the United States, &c.

"Art. 2 stipulates that there shall be an immediate suspension of hostilities between the armies of the two republics.

"Art. 3 defines the future boundary of the United States. The line commences in the Gulf of Mexico, three leagues from land; thence runs up the middle of the Rio Grande to its intersection with the southern boundary of New Mexico; thence along that southern boundary to the western boundary of same; thence north to the first branch of the Gila, which it intersects; thence down the middle of that branch of the river to the Colorado; thence it runs across westwardly, and strikes the Pacific at a point one league south of San Diego.
"Art. 4 stipulates that it shall be optional with citizens of Mexico now residing in the territory to be ceded, either to leave, taking with them or otherwise disposing of their property; or else, upon taking the oaths of allegiance to this Government, to be protected in the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States.

"Grants of land in the territory to be ceded made by the Mexican Government before the war, are by the next article to be respected by the United States.

"The next article provides that grants of land in Texas made by the Mexican Government prior to the year 1836, are also to be respected by the United States.

"The next article provides that the United States' Government shall take prompt and effectual measures for the defence of the border from Indian incursions. To this end both nations are to use their best endeavours.

"In consideration of the extension of the boundary of the United States made by this treaty, the United States' Government stipulates to pay to Mexico the sum of $15,000,000. In this sum are included the three millions appropriated last session for the furtherance of peace, and now subjected to Mr. Trist's order. This sum is to be paid to the Mexican Government immediately on the ratification of the treaty. The remaining 12,000,000 are to be paid either by instalments or in 6 per cent. stock, redeemable by the United States. This Government has the option of either mode of payment.

"By the next article the United States' Government undertakes all claims of American citizens against Mexico, both those already decided, amounting to $2,000,000—and those still undecided, amounting to about $3,000,000.

"The treaty of commerce of 1831 between the two republics is to be revived for the period of eight years, and may afterwards be renewed at the option of both Governments.

"The Custom-houses are to be restored to the Mexican authorities as soon as the treaty shall have been ratified. Means are to be adopted for settling the accounts.

"The troops of the United States are to leave Mexico in three months after the ratification of the treaty, unless the sickly season should come on, in which event they are to retire to some healthy situation, and are to be furnished with supplies by the Mexican Government on amicable terms.

"The treaty is to be ratified by the President and Senate, and to be exchanged within four months after its ratification.

"The boundary of New Mexico is to be defined as laid down in Disturnell's Map of Mexico, published at New York in 1847.

"Since the character of the treaty has become known to the Senate the hostility to its ratification has signally increased, and although there is every reason to believe that it will be ratified, yet it will meet on several of its provisions a determined opposition.

"There is information here, of the most reliable character, that Santa Anna has expressed a cordial approval of the treaty, and a willingness to support it if ratified." [JNA]
It is but a short time since that our Government had not a single ship-of-war to protect our extensive commerce in the Mediterranean, and it is only within a year that a frigate, sloop-of-war, and one or two third-class war steamers, have been ordered there. This might prove sufficient on common occasions, but is we should have there at this moment, when there is much cause to fear a general war among the maritime nations, and, more than all, civil wars or revolutions in many of the countries with which we have great commercial connexions? Are we, while waging successful war, to leave our merchants and their interests in the ports of the Mediterranean to the tender mercies of foreign Governments for protection? How different is it with other nations! Old England is ever on the spot to protect her merchants and their interests at any risk. By the last accounts from Europe we learn that all Sicily was in a state of revolution, and that the insurgents had driven the Royal troops from the city of Messina to the fortress across the harbour from which they were about to bombard the city, but at the moment the British frigate Thetis, of 36 guns, Captain H.J. Codrington, entered the harbour and took a position between the fort and the town, so that every shot fired from the fort must hit her or go over her. This prevented the Royal troops from firing, and there the frigate was to remain until all English persons with their property were saved, or they chose to fire into the frigate from the fort.

We are apt in this country from ignorance to underrate the naval forces of some of the nations bordering on the Mediterranean, but Commodore Read, with the small force at present under his command, might find himself awkwardly placed if he came in collision with the naval forces of some of these Powers. Naples has 18 fine steamers of war, some of them of the first class, and well appointed in every respect, besides other men-of-war. Austria and Sardinia have also numbers of fine steamers of war besides other vessels, and might handle very roughly any small force sent against them. At all events, it seems very important at this moment that our naval force in that quarter should be at once increased, both in sailing vessels and steamers, if we have any of the latter worthy the name of sea-steamers, or particularly of war-steamers, the Mississippi excepted.

Our crack ship, the Pennsylvania, has lain up so long and so long been considered by us the largest ship in the world, it would be well to have her shown, and let us see how she compares with ships-of-war of other nations built and in service since she has been rotting at the dock. Perhaps some of our members of Congress would be surprised to learn that there are ships of 110 or even 90 guns of as great, if not greater tonnage, and probably more efficiently armed than our 100-gun ship. The British ship Queen, of 110 guns, is 3,083; the Albion, of 90 guns, is 3,083, and the armament of this latter ship is most perfect in every respect. The frigate Thetis, of 36 guns, above-named, is over 1,700 tons, with a most complete armament of very heavy guns. Should the Pennsylvania be sent to the Mediterranean, she might meet some of these fine specimens of naval architecture, and the officers could compare notes. The English force in this sea is already very large, and to be increased immediately. The heaviest steamers and sailing vessels are now ordered there. The steamer Avenger, of the first class, was on her way to join the fleet of Admiral Parker, when lost off Cape Bon--and our commerce in that quarter, as well as the lives of our countrymen, is, or may be, much exposed; and we at home should call upon the Government to look to this, and place a larger force there; and if our force is increased, an Admiral should be sent to command it. There has not been such a state of things in that sea since 1814. The naval forces of all nations will be collected there, and those of the smallest Powers will be commanded by Admirals of some grade; and are we, one of the most powerful nations, only to be represented there by a Post-Captain, with the temporary courtesy title of Commodore? This should not be. Let us have Admirals, and give our brave and meritorious officers a fair chance among those of other nations. It has been suggested that our Government should create none but full Admirals; but it seems better that there should be other grades than the mere distinction of date of commission.

[JNA]
By the Ivanhoe, Captain Edwards, we have New York advices to the 4th inst. The doubts as to the confirmation of the treaty with Mexico continued to increase at Washington.

A Whig caucus had been held, at which it was determined to oppose the treaty on the ground of its informality. It was proposed at the same time to provide for a legitimate, immediate, and satisfactory treaty, by sending with the document refused a commissioner with full discretion to compromise relations with Mexico upon the line suggested as the basis of negotiations.

The prospect of an early adjustment of difficulties with Mexico had had a favourable influence in enabling the Government to negotiate the Treasury-note loan upon advantageous terms. The Treasury department had received proposals, nearly sufficient to cover the amount solicited, at one quarter above par, and the rate was advancing.

The business in Congress was not of a very important character. In the Senate, Mr. Houston presented resolutions from the Legislature of Texas, protesting against the relinquishment of any territory which may have been captured from Mexico during the war, and against the principle of the Wilmot proviso.

Rosa, the Mexican Minister of Relations, had issued a circular to the governors of states, informing them that a treaty of peace had been signed at Guadaloupe. He also states that the treaty would be submitted to the deliberation of the National Congress.

THE MEXICAN DEBT

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,--As it appears highly probable that the negotiations for peace between America and Mexico are progressing rapidly, I would suggest to the Committee of Mexican bond-holders the propriety of bringing their claims under the notice of all parties concerned, by the assistance of our own Government.

Mr. Polk has already declared his intention of taking a large slice of Mexican territory without even waiting for the final settlement. The Californias are no longer the subject of negotiation.

Now, as the whole of the Mexican States are pledged for the payment of their debt, I apprehend that in equity, at least, the portion taken away by another Power ought to remain subject to all existing claims upon it, and ought therefore to be liable to some share of the debt.

It would be an advantage to the Americans to make themselves responsible for the interest of 5,000,000 dollars rather than pay the money over to the Mexican; and such an arrangement would be better for the English bondholders.

In some of the southern States, where debts had been incurred previous to separation into distinct Governments, these debts have been arranged according to the extent of each country, as in Granada and Venezuela; and surely the same principle ought to apply more strongly when a severance is made by force.

I am surprised, too, that no attempt has been made to obtain that portion of the duties at Vera Cruz and Tampico which are especially appropriated for the payment of the interest on the Mexican Bonds. If the Americans have seized these duties, it ought to be without prejudice to existing claims.

I shall be obliged if you will insert this in your valuable paper.

March 27.

A MEXICAN BONDHOLDER
THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

Liverpool, Thursday Morning.

We have news from New York to the 11th inst. The Mexican Treaty, the conclusion of which we announced several weeks since, is confirmed in Senate by a vote of 58 to 16.

The injunction of secrecy has not been removed.

AMERICA

LIVERPOOL, Monday.

The John R. Skiddy, Captain Luce, arrived to-day with advices from New York to the 15th ult.

The New York papers contain the details of the treaty. It consists of 22 articles.

The preamble states that N.P. Trist, on behalf of the United States of America, and Don Miguel Atristan, on behalf of the United Mexican States, are the plenipotentiaries who have agreed upon and signed the treaty. Article 1 provides for a "firm and universal peace" between the United States and the Mexican Republic. Article 2 provides for a provisional suspension of hostilities, and the re-establishment of constitutional order in the places occupie3d by the forces of the United States. Article 3 provides for the evacuation of the interior of Mexico and the capital by the forces of the United States, and for a strict account being given to the Mexican authorities of all Custom's duties collected or about to fall due in ports occupied by the said forces. Article 4 requires that on the ratification of the treaty, all "castles, forts, territories, &c.," occupied by the United States forces shall be restored to the Mexicans in the same state as when captured, that the evacuation of the Mexican territory be completed within three months, and if not completed before the sickly season, that a friendly arrangement be entered into to meet that emergency. The article also provides for the release of prisoners of war on either side. Article 5 defines the boundaries of the two Republics, commencing in the Gulf of Mexico, three leagues from land, opposite the mouth of the Rio Grande, following the course of that river to where it strikes the southern boundary of New Mexico, thence westwardly along the southern boundary of New Mexico, northward along the western line of New Mexico until I intersects the first branch of the Gila and along that branch into the Rio Colorado, thence across the Rio Colorado, following the division line between Upper and Lower California to the Pacific Ocean. Article 6 secures to the vessels of the United States the free navigation of the Gulf of California and the River Colorado; also the permission to construct a canal or railway upon either side of the River Gila, for the advantage of both countries. By article 7 the navigation of the Gila and the Del Norte below the southern boundary of New Mexico is declared free to both counties. Article 8 secures the rights of Mexican citizens in territories added by the treaty to the United States. Articles 9 and 10 are expunged. By article 11 the United States undertake to repress the incursions of the savage tribes who inhabit a great portion of the territories ceded to them by the treaty. Article 12 provides that the United States, in consideration for the extension of its boundaries, shall pay to the Mexican Republic the sum of $15,000,000--$3,000,000 to be paid at Mexico in gold or silver coin, and the rest in annual instalments of the same amount, with interest at the rate of six per cent. By article 13, the United States agreed to pay the liquidated claims against Mexico under the conventions between the two republics, dated the 11th of April, 1839, and the 30th of January, 1843. Articles 14 and 15 provide that the United States shall meet all claims and yet undecided made by its citizens on Mexico not exceeding 750,000 dollars. These articles also define the means for determining the amount and validity... of such claims. By article 16, each country reserves the right of fortifying any point within its own territory. The treaty of the 5th of April, 1831, between the republics is, by article 17, revived for eight years, terminable, however, on one year's notice. Articles 18, 19, and 20, relate to the mode in which the troops of the United States shall evacuate the territories of Mexico, and the manner in which the import duties shall be levied, under contingencies specified therein. By article 21, in the event of questions arising between the two countries, pacific negotiations, "in the spirit of peace and good neighbourhood," are to be resorted to, or the arbitration of commissioners, or that of some friendly nation. By article 22, in case of war between the republics, merchants are to be protected and prisoners of war to be humanely treated. The 23d and last article in the treaty provides for its due ratification by both republics. The signatures attached to the document are those of N.P. Trist, Luis G. Cuevas, Bernardo Couto, and Miguel Atristan.

Expresses had been dispatched to Mexico with the ratification of the treaty. It was expected that they would reach the capital on the 25th ult.

We learn from the city of Mexico that an armistice of two months had been agreed upon between General Butler and the Mexican Commissioners.

A rumour prevailed at Washington, to the effect that the Cabinet had decided against favouring the passage of the Ten Regiments Bill.

Some severe fighting had taken place between the United States troops and the Mexican guerillas.

Property to the amount of $100,00 had been destroyed at Boston by fire. [JNA]

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

SOUTHAMPTON, May 10

The Ocean Steam Navigation Company's ship Washington, Captain Johnston, arrived off Cowes this morning at 11a.m., bringing the United States' mails for Great Britain, France, and Germany, in charge of Mr. W.W. Hincken.

We have a few days later news from Mexico, and our dates from Vera Cruz are to the 9th of April. General Santa Anna had been escorted by Colonel Hughes to the Hacienda of El Encero, where he remained till the 2d of April, when he left for Antigua, just north of Vera Cruz, where he embarked on the 4th in a Spanish brig for Jamaica or Havanna. His exact destination was unknown. Just previous to his departure Santa Anna published a long farewell address to his countrymen, reviewing his public life, complaining of the injustice that has been done him, excerciting the peace which the Mexicans have consented to make, and declaring his intention to exile himself from his country. Some desertions from the American forces had taken place. Mr. Clifford, one of the Commissioners to Mexico, arrived at Vera Cruz on the 2d of April, and was attacked en route by the guerillas, who succeeded in capturing seven of the mules and their burdens. It was reported that Mr. Trist would be sent out of the country under arrest, by orders of the Cabinet at Washington. Mr. Freairer arrived at Mexico on the 16th of March with instructions for General Butler to send Mr. Trist home as a prisoner as soon as he had given his evidence before the Court of Inquiry. General Butler immediately communicated to Mr. Trist the orders of the Government, and his intention to execute them. Mr. Trist then addressed a long letter to the General, denying his right to arrest or remove from the country an American citizen; but General Butler briefly replied that he should enforce his orders to the letter. Mr. Trist will therefore make a very inglorious exit from the scene of his diplomacy and negotiations.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday.

The America, Captain Judkins, arrived to-day with advices from New York to the 16th and Halifax to the 10th inst.

We have also late dates from the River Plate, the Brazils, and Venezuela.

The America experienced strong head winds during the first four or five days after leaving Halifax.

The Cambria, Captian Harrison, arrived at Halifax on the 17th, and proceeded for New York.

Congress adjourned on the 15th inst.

Among the last acts of legislation, and one which has received the President's signature, was a bill providing for the government of Oregon. The peculiar circumstance which gives interest to this bill is, that it embodies, in respect to that territory, the provision of the famous ordinance of 1787--which forbids slavery for ever in the territories north-west of the Ohio--and the wise foresight of which prohibition has been proved by the growing up already in that territory of six great and prosperous states, within which slavery can find no foothold. There was a strenuous contest in the Senate especially to exclude this provision, but it was found, after two or three successive trials, that on each occasion the House of Representatives became more and more determined to let Oregon remain without a Government, rather than consent to any compromise adverse to freedom; and finally the Senate yielded, and the bill was passed and is now a law, with the clause prohibiting slavery within the borders of Oregon. The other new territories acquired by the treaty of peace with Mexico remain unprovided with any Government, and are in a sufficiently anomalous position, for they are American by treaty and of course no longer subject to laws which attached to them when belonging to another country--and yet not provided with any new form of government by their new country. Slavery is here again the stumbling-block--for portions of both these territories lying within parallels of latitude where slave labour may be with most advantage employed, the senators and representatives from the slave-holding States would not consent to any bill that looked to the exclusion of slavery from these countries. On the other hand the representatives from the non-slave-holding States would not sanction any bill that might lead to the introduction of slaves and slavery into regions now free. The difference is irreconcilable, and the territories are left without any settled form of government.

The President, in returning this bill to Congress with his signature, accompanied it with a message, in which he declares that he signed the bill because Oregon lies north of the line of the Missouri Compromise, but would not do the same for any bill, excluding slavery, having relation to the government of the territory of California, or the newly acquired provinces in Mexico, because he evidently thinks the slave limits little enough, and that the Missouri Compromise having been adopted and made a rule of action, it is unwise and unjust to the south to seek to impose conditions excluding slavery upon territory south of that line. In conclusion, he quotes from the farewell address of Washington a portion which deprecates sectional influences and the admission of any feeling tending to weaken the union..

"By the Oregon treaty certain possessory rights are reserved to the company south of the parallel of 49 degrees; the free navigation of the Columbia river is also reserved; the British Government, in the name of the company, has, through Mr.
Crampton, the British Charge, proposed to sell this Government their possessory rights south of 49 degrees, and also to dispose of the free navigation of the Columbia, for the sum of $1,000,000.

"Some of the Senators hearing of the proposition, the Senate passed a resolution calling for information. The Secretary of State, in a communication, laid before them the whole matter, but did not, as has been said, advise the acceptance of the proposition. He declared that, as adviser of the President, he could not counsel its acceptance without first ascertaining the value of the property of the property the British Government proposes to transfer; declaring, however, that if he were in the Senate he should vote for the purchase, as it would prevent the trouble and annoyance likely to arise from the joint navigation of the Columbia. The agents of the Hudson's Bay Company represent the property south of 49 as very valuable. The truth appears to be, however, that it is of little account compared with the other right proposed to be transferred."

Congress passed this proposition over for want of time. The President, however, has still the power in the recess of negotiating a treaty upon this subject, through the British Government, subject to the ratification of Congress. The Courier and Enquirer writing upon this subject, says--

"It is certainly desirable, as likely to do away with too pregnant causes of dispute between English and American settlers in Oregon, that all the property and rights of the English company should be conveyed to the American Government, even although the price to be paid should be larger than the actual money value of the property acquired. Harmony and good understanding among the settlers of this new territory can hardly be bought too dear." [JNA]

The policy pursued by the Government of the United States with regard to territorial aggrandizement is particularly deserving of attention. Prussia, in her vital struggles through the middle of the last century, was not more desperately bent upon consolidation and enlargement than is America at present, and a state which still retains in its original possessions sufficient unoccupied land to maintain double the amount of its population is impressing into its service all the expedients of annexation, conquest, and purchase, with as much determination and energy as if it were actually gasping in those extremities of political existence which necessitated the seizure of Silesia and almost palliated the first partition of Poland. This policy may be, perhaps, to some extent, the manifestation of that high national purpose occasionally proclaimed by American statesmen, of reducing the uttermost parts of the continent under their rule upon the faith and sanction of scriptural donations; or it may be simply the natural development of ambition and activity in a thriving, uncontrolled, and unquiet people. But with either or both of these motives we have no doubt there is compounded, on the part of forecasting statesmen, a strong desire to multiply and extend as far as possible those outlets for discontent and restlessness which are the very lungs of the American body politic, and to postpone to the remotest practicable period that moment when the rushing stream of expansive population must at length be checked, and with a sudden and terrible recoil. What emigration is, or ought to be, to Great Britain, migration is to the United States. Their colonies are in their western provinces. All opinions concur in stating that the facilities afforded by the wilderness of the far-west to the spirit of adventure or change have proved the salvation of the Government, and have been the chief means of preserving intact for seventy years a constitution which, by the side of more recent incarnations of democracy, seems to wear not a few of the features of a steady and consolidated monarchy.
The efforts of the American Government to perpetuate the existence and secure the free action of this political safety-valve have been commensurate, in success not less than in spirit, with the necessities of the case. Taken with the previously vacant territories of the United States proper, we may say that the annexation of Texas, the acquisitions from the disposal of the authorities at Washington a tract of land at least twice as spacious as the whole presently inhabited portion of their possessions. In fact, taking the whole breadth of the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific, between the 50th and 30th parallels, as representing the present dominions of the United States of America, it would be substantially correct to say that the whole space west of the Missouri, or, in other words, two-thirds of the entire territory, is yet untenanted, and lies in reserve for the caprices of necessities of generations to come. It is particularly instructive to observe with what summary and business-like promptitude every acre of this accumulated property is secured in the Government stores, and stamped, as it were with the national mark, for the undetermined purposes of the nation. Already that coast, to the capabilities of which we seem to pay such little heed, has been brought within call of Washington, and the ports of the Pacific will be kept well in hand by a Cabinet sitting on the shores of the opposite ocean. A line of mail steamers is forthwith to run between New York and New Orleans; at New Orleans it will join a second line from that port to Chagres, on the Isthmus of Panama; from the Isthmus a third line of steamers will traverse the Pacific to and from the Columbia River. The ink of the treaties is scarcely dry, and yet in January next thye direct and regular communication between New York and Oregon will be such as at this time last year, had not been established between London and Ascension. The Americans want no sharesmen in their operations. The terms of the convention left certain possessory rights to the Hudson's Bay Company within the frontier assigned to the United States. These rights the States are anxious to purchase immediately, and it is probable that the President, without waiting for the re-assembling of congress, will negotiate during the recess, at no illiberal valuation, his bargain for the whole of these possessions. How much of the price paid for Louisiana of California would the Government of Washington give for an island which seems to have gone begging for twelve months in London?

There is this peculiar interest attached to these transactions on the American continent,—that we there see in actual operation the course of those events of which in our own world we can only read. We may look at the North America of 1848 as at the Northern Europe of a thousand years before, and may watch with our own eyes the territorial settlement of a continent. There are the Spaniards of the Isthmus, the rival Saxons in the center, the Slavonians in the north-western angle, and a powerful element of Celts interspersed. We may imagine a new race of Franks establishing itself in a Transatlantic Gaul, a new colony of Slaves struggling up to a new Pomerania, or a new swarm of Huns settling upon a new Danube. We have civilized instead of barbarous races to deal with, and therein consists the whole difference. With this variation we may fix our speculative eyes upon a continent of which the distribution and occupation is as uncertain and fortuitous as that of Europe in the days of Charlemagne. There may be one empire or two, of one or two races, or there may be kingdoms or republics innumerable. Nobody can yet calculate the members of the American family when the partition and tenancy of the continent shall be at length complete.

The interest felt in such a prospect as this is not diminished by the consideration of the extent to which our own national credit is involved. Over half of this vast territory we have at least manorial rights, and it is indeed fitting that the institutions of the company to which we delegate so important a tenancy should be introduced to general notice. It should not be overlooked that our remaining portion in these possessions is mainly deficient in those very advantages which we have recently proposed to bargain away. The immense tract of British North America has on the Pacific but a very inadequate proportion of seaboard. The Russian territories straggle half-way down our western coast from the north, and south to the Columbia River all will soon be subject to American rule. Vancouver’s Island is not only the most promising harbour and position in these parts, but it is literally nearly one half of the western seaboard of our whole dominion. And yet this is the settlement on which we set so little store!
Sir,—I beg to accompany herewith a translation of a document received from his Excellency J.M.L. Mora, which I shall feel obliged by your publishing in your valuable journal.

I remain, Sir, yours most obediently,

Jose M. Mendoza.
Mexican Consulate, 3, Winchester-buildings, Sept. 11.

MEXICAN LEGATION AT THE COURT OF HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY.

Under date of the 12th of July his Excellency the Minister of Foreign Affairs writes me as follows:—

"Excellent Sir.—The Supreme Government, considering how important to every nation is its good public credit, occupies itself before all things in the re-establishment of that of the Republic by arranging the payment of its creditors; the more so as this requires time and consideration, and there are, besides, creditors that have such preference that they cannot be put off until that time without prejudice to the national credit. His Excellency the President has therefore resolved, that from the duties which belong to the maritime Custom-houses, from the cargoes of the vessels which may arrive at the ports from this time, and from those which have arrived in those ports of which the Americans had possession, after the return of these Custom-houses to the Mexican functionaries, the respective administrators proceed to separate the portions that have been designed for the fund of the 26 per cent of the internal legal debt, for the exterior (foreign) debt, and for that of creditors acknowledged by diplomatic conventions in favour of subjects of other nations, and which were in course of payment at the time of the cessation of the Custom-houses, remitting the proceeds of these funds to the respective representatives in the same terms as formerly established.

"Notwithstanding that the funding of the 26 per cent was considered in the consolidation which was arranged by the decree of the 10th of July, 1846, as this on account of the war has not been carried into effect, nor can be now, principally on account of the decree of the 14th of last month, the Supreme Government has desired to continued the separation of the said stock, because it considers it more advantageous to those interested, who will avoid the losses they would have to sustain until such time as some definite arrangement could be made on this subject; in this they have the greatest advantages, considering the present state of the National Treasury.

"As the principal aim of the Government in taking this resolution is that of re-establishing the public credit, which it desires to consolidate, his Excellency the President desires that your Excellency will give the substance of this determination the greatest publicity, to which end I communicate it, assuring you at the same time of my consideration.

"OTERO."

And I communicate the same to you for the like purpose, renewing the assurances, &c.,

J.M.L. Mora.

To the Mexican Consul in London.

There is really a great deal of interest to be acquired in the seizing of California, just taken by the United States. We mean that there is something very amusing in the spectacle of the most inquisitive and tenacious people in the world turned loose into a huge, mysterious, unexplored region. It is something beyond DENON and his brother savants in Egypt, and is almost equivalent to a meeting of the British Association in Japan, with the free run of the islands. It is certain that at this moment no human being of Caucasian extraction has any conception of what may be

Pacific, was founded in 1769, before which year there was no European settlement upon the coast. Between this period and 1800 were founded the others, all on the same model, and all running the same course. The aspect of the presidios was not materially varied under the rule of the emancipated Republic. When Captain Wilkes landed at San Francisco, he founded, at the chief anchorage of this noble port, a
"town," of which the constituent elements are thus enumerated:---"A large frame house occupied by and agent of the Hudson's Bay Company; a store kept by an Anglo-American captain; a blacksmith's shop, and some outbuildings." As this is decidedly the most famous colony on the coast it would be rather perverting the proverb to say "Ex pede Herculem," but we may probably save ourselves the trouble of describing San Carlos, or Santa Barbara, or La Purissima Concepcion. In these delightful settlements resides the present white population of the province, numbering perhaps about 3,000 souls, and some 9,000 or 10,000 Indians, as it is calculated, roam abroad in the mysterious wilds of the interior. The whites are true sons of Old Spain, with everything of a Castilian but his bravery. But for the presence of certain English and Americans the Indians would infallibly drive them into the sea. After calm observation and mature reflection, Captain Wilkes is compelled to pronounce that "they may be termed cruel to their wives, in a greater degree still to their slaves and cattle, and exceedingly ignorant of everything but extortion, riding horses, and catching bullocks."

Perhaps our readers would like to learn something of the known state of California, as a print de depart from which to venture into those interesting details which will no doubt reach us by every American mail. Under the old Spanish monarchy, Upper, of New California, was one of the three provinces composing the Viceroyalty of New Spain. Its settlement, however, was limited to the establishment of some eighteen to twenty "missions" along the coast, which were dedicated to the various saints whose titles till survive between Francisco and Diego, and which were calculated, with a precision and certainty attainable by none but Spaniards, to render the colonization of the country altogether an impossibility. San Diego, the southernmost of these, and the point where the new American frontier will debouch upon the Pacific, was founded in 1769, before which year there was no European settlement upon the coast. Between this period and 1800 were founded the others, all on the same model, and all running the same course. The aspect of the presidios was not materially varied under the rule of the emancipated Republic. When Captain Wilkes landed at San Francisco, he founded, at the chief anchorage of this noble port, a
"town," of which the constituent elements are thus enumerated:---"A large frame house occupied by and agent of the Hudson's Bay Company; a store kept by an Anglo-American captain; a blacksmith's shop, and some outbuildings." As this is decidedly the most famous colony on the coast it would be rather perverting the proverb to say "Ex pede Herculem," but we may probably save ourselves the trouble of describing San Carlos, or Santa Barbara, or La Purissima Concepcion. In these delightful settlements resides the present white population of the province, numbering perhaps about 3,000 souls, and some 9,000 or 10,000 Indians, as it is calculated, roam abroad in the mysterious wilds of the interior. The whites are true sons of Old Spain, with everything of a Castilian but his bravery. But for the presence of certain English and Americans the Indians would infallibly drive them into the sea. After calm observation and mature reflection, Captain Wilkes is compelled to pronounce that "they may be termed cruel to their wives, in a greater degree still to their slaves and cattle, and exceedingly ignorant of everything but extortion, riding horses, and catching bullocks."

A true Yankee graft upon this valuable stock must yield a wonderful result, and we shall not be long before we see it. We described lately the precautions which have been so promptly taken to bring the new territory safely under hand, and it appears that the work of discovery has already commenced. At present the great attraction seems rather in the bowels of the earth than on its surface, and hundreds of independent citizens are at work with their pickaxes, like treasure-seekers in the Hartz Mountains. Quicksilver in the main object of search, and we are told, in a semi-official and perfectly serious report, of one mine, about 13 miles from San Francisco,
"so rich that the gentleman who surveyed it under the directions of the Government was so much affected by salivation, that his mouth was sore for a period of ten days after he had concluded the survey." It is anticipated that quicksilver will thus be an article of as regular exportation from the western, as breadstuffs from the eastern coasts of the States; several mining companies are already established, and California is even now spoken of by Transatlantic journalists in that phrase which so attracted Mr. Martin Chuzzlewit, as "one of the most remarkable provinces of our country, Sir."

We should rather conceive doubts, from the configuration of this part of the continent, whether the mineral wealth so characteristic of the great spinal plateau of Anahuac did in reality extend so far beyond its termination as to be met with in North California. But, like the young farmers in the fable, who dug for a treasure and discovered it in the enrichment of their farm, which had followed upon the labour bestowed, the Americans will no doubt find their account in the improvement and civilization of this hitherto unproductive country. With a territory, at least in places, highly fruitful, a climate free from the noxiousness of the opposite coasts, and a temperature not otherwise than equable, they can hardly fail of a return for their labour, and, if they do not discover any New Peru, or any fresh variety of the human race, they will at least make a vast tract of the earth’s surface subservient to the increasing wants of man.

MONEY-MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The firmness of the English funds continues, and there has to-day been a further advance of a quarter per cent. Consols opened at 85⅛ to ¼, and after some slight fluctuations closed at 85⅝ to 85⅞; to ½ for money and account; Bank Stock left off 185 to 187; Reduced Three per Cents., 84¼ to 85; Long Annuities, 8⅜ to 8⅞; to 7-16; India Stock, 23 to 23¾; India Bonds, 39s. to 42s. premium; and Exchequer Bills, March, 39s. to 42s., June, 37s. to 40s. premium.

The Mexican accounts by the West India mail had some effect upon that stock, and the bargains, the whole of which were for money, were done at 19¾, 20⅛, 20, and 20¼. The other business in the foreign market was confined to Danish, at 65½; Grenada, at 12½; Peruvian, at 30½; Portuguese Four per Cents., at 23; Russian Five per Cents., at 98 and 98½; Spanish Three per Cents., at 44⅝, and the Four per Cent. Certificates, at 68¼.

Subjoined are the communications brought by the present mail to the Committee of Spanish American Bondholders regarding the Mexican Debt. On the whole they will be found more satisfactory than has been expected, although extremely meager as to details. It would appear that the sum of about $90,000 is now in hand on account of the bondholders, of which $29,138 has been remitted, the latter sum consisting of the one-fifth of the Customs' dues collected at Vera Cruz from the 11th of July, the date of the American evacuation, to the 11th of September. This, however, being merely the proportion of the dues actually collected, that is to say, one-fifth of $145,690, while the total, according to Messrs. Manning and Co.'s estimate, to be paid by the importers, is $308,000, it seems that a further sum of $32,462 will be realizable for the bond-holders for the period in question when the collections shall have been all completed. The progressive increase of revenue at Vera Cruz from $108,000 in July, to $200,000 in August, is also a favourable feature. With regard to the $60,000 still held for remittance by Messrs. Manning and Mackintosh at Mexico, and Mr. Glass at Tampico, it will be understood that this is entirely composed of the proportion of one-fifth set apart for the bondholders by the Mexican Government, from the total handed them by the Americans for collections made at the ports of Vera Cruz and Tampico during the interval between the peace and its consummation, so that the good faith thus shown is also, as far as it goes, satisfactory. The system under which these remittances are made, however, and the general want of definite information concerning the contemplated arrangements of the Government, show the urgent necessity of the decision lately come to for the dispatch of an agent to put matters, in behalf of the bondholders, on a clear and final footing.

(From Messrs. Manning and Mackintosh.)

"Mexico, Sept. 12, 1848.

"Sir,—We beg to hand you herewith duplicates of our last respects, since when we are deprived of your favours, the steamer with the mails of the 1st of August not having yet arrived.

We now beg to inform you that on the 2d instant we received from the Mexican Government, and forwarded to Mr. Glass of Tampico for shipment by the present steamer, a bill of $22,400, being the 20 per cent. belonging to the bondholders, proceeding from the duties returned by the Americans in Tampico under the treaty of peace.
In addition to this amount you will receive from our Vera Cruz house, we believe by this packet, a remittance for the 20 per cent of the duties, carried by the conducta of specie which lately left this for that port; and the united amount of these remittances we should think will exceed $50,000.

We shall have to remit also a further sum of $40,208. 0. 4., received from the Mexican Government, on account of the dividends, respecting which you will be duly advised.

As yet the Congress has not come to any decision as to what proportion of the 12 millions of American indemnity is to be appropriated to the dividends."

MONEY-MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Friday Evening.

There have been some fluctuations in the English funds today, but the recent advance has been maintained. Consols opened at an improvement of an eighth, the first price being 85½ to &n#8541; A further rise, however, to 85&n#8542; caused some sellers to enter the market, and a reaction took place to 85&n#8540; to ½, both for money and account, at which they closed. Bank Stock left off 186 to 188; Reduced Three per Cents., 84¾ to &n#8542;; Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents., 84¾ to &n#8542;; Long Annuities, 8&n#8542; to 7-16; India Stock, 234 to 237; India Bonds, 42s. to 45s.; June, 40s. to 43s. premium.

The market for foreign securities was comparatively quiet, and not much business was done in any description. Mexican, however, continues to support the late advanced quotation. The bargains in this stock were at 20¼, &n#8542;; and ½ for money, and at 20½ for the account.

We have received the following, signed "A Bondholder," in relation to the Mexican remittances, mentioned yesterday:--

"Sir,--The Mexican bondholders cannot fail duly to appreciate the clear analysis which you have given this morning of Messrs. Manning and Mackintosh's letter relative to the forthcoming remittances for dividend account. Your general view of the subject also is shared by the parties most deeply interested in this important business.

Permit me to explain one point which, not being touched on by Messrs. Manning and Mackintosh, could not come within your summary. The Vera Cruz Custom-house gives credits on duties levied for the State, so that the greater part, if not the entire amount, of the $29,000 now received must arise from the Custom-house revenue for May and June, leaving the whole, or nearly the whole, of the quota for July and August (about $60,000) still to be remitted to the bondholders. What portion of it may actually be recovered and transmitted by the September packet, we cannot at present ascertain.

You have made no allusion to Messrs. Manning and Mackintosh's remark that the Congress had not come to any decision as to what proportion of the 12 millions of indemnity money was to be appropriated to dividends. But it is most important to gather from this observation that the appropriation is no longer a question of principle, but one of degree; and it is to be hoped that this point will be duly enforced in the future communications between the bondholders and the Government."

Liverpool, Dec.12.

The Royal mail steam ship Acadia, Captain Stone, which left Boston on the 29th ult., and Halifax on the 1st inst., arrived in the Mersey this morning. The steam ship Cambria, Captain Harrison, hence, arrived at New York on the 25th ult., in 13 days and three-quarters. There is literally no political intelligence to communicate.

The advices from Mexico represent the country to be in a very restless condition, although we have no outbreaks to record. Robberies upon the highways and in the streets are frequent; the police of the towns are inefficient; the insurgents of Sierra were unsubdued; the Indians were desolating the frontier stations; and to crown all the Government was without funds, and consequently inactive.

The papers give a deplorable picture of the state of affairs at Tampico. The most frightful disorder is said to reign there, and brawls were continually occurring between the partisans of annexation and those who oppose it. A portion of the populace in favour of it is said to traverse the streets at all hours with arms in their hands shooting and committing ravages.
