The revolution passed of very quietly, no blood having been shed-the former revolution having been carried on by one party of military against another, resulting in much loss of life, but this movement, coming from the people as well as from the soldiery, makes the thing general and hence the little commotion of disagreeable nature. Santa Anna has but little chance of overcoming this movement, and it was a matter of conjecture, whether he would attempt to escape or deliver himself up. He will very probably endeavor to gain over the opposite General by bribery or similar means; but in this it is thought he will not succeed. In case that he is taken prisoner, the people will probably demand his execution, as they deem his liberty dangerous to the public safety.

Arrival of Mr. Crushing

Hon C. Cushing, late Minister [...] of the United States to China, who arrived in town this morning, in the [...] Eugenia, has communicated to us the following information-In passing through Mexico, Mr. Cushing was robbed of nearly all his private papers, but fortunately, the public papers were left [...] .

Mr. Fletcher Webster is expected to arrive by way of England in about a fortnight.

Santa Anna was proclaimed Dictator, and all seemed to go on well, but about midstream the troops barricaded in the [...] St. Francis and the citadel pronounced against Santa Anna and Canalizo. At the head of the movement was General Done Jose J. Herrera, President of the Council, who addressed the proclamation to the city, and the whole Congress immediately threw itself into his arms, who immediately took possession of the National palace without [...] shed.

The Congress constituted its session’s permanent. The Ex-Minister fled. Canalizo is in [...] rest at his own house.

The new authorities maintained perfect quiet.

The Chambers are occupied in [...] means to remedy the injury the country has [...].

On the 1st of November, 1811, the Departmental Assembly of Jalisco adopted and published what is called an Initiative, being an act published what is called an Initiative, being an act [...] for by the constitution, in virtue of which the Assembly submitted the proposition following.

“The National Congress will make [...] the responsibility of the Provisional Government to which it was subjected by the 6th of the [...] of Tacubaya, which it swore to and caused to be sworn to by the nation.” The four departments of Zacatecas, Aguascalientes, Sinaloa and Sonora [...] at once in the pronunciamento of Jalisco, and thus the [...] Northwestern departments were in arms at [...] against Santa Anna. Between these and Mexico, there intervene the two departments of [...] and Queretaro.

Paredes advanced to Lagos, on the Frontier of Jalisco, and the established his head-quarters, with an army of 1400 men, to await the progress of events. In the contiguous department of Guanajuato was General Cortazar, with 2000 men, on whom Paredes depended for support; but the rapid movements of Santa Anna himself prevented Cortazar from joining Paredes, if he had the intention, and compelled him, for the present, at least to declare for Santa Anna.

The Mexican Constitution provides expressly that the President cannot command in person the military force either by land or sea, without the previous permission of Congress. Santa Anna would have taken the command without even pretending to ask the counsel of Congress [...] in so doing, had himself performed a revolution an act quite as positive and serious as that of Paredes.

Nevertheless, on the 22nd he proceeded on his march to Queretaro, and on the same day, the Chamber of Deputies voted the impeachment of the Minister of War, Gen. Reyes. For signing the order under which Santa Anna held the command of the troops. Congress also voted to receive and print the procurements of the revolutionized department; in all this indicating a disposition, not to be mistaken, of hostility of Santa Anna.

On arriving at Queretaro, Santa Anna found that, although the military authorities were [...] in power, yet the junta department had pronounced for the institution of Jalisco. There fore he made known to the members, that if they did not re-pronounce in his favor, he would send them prisoners to Perote.

His position is now extremely critical, therefore. Everything he depends on whether his troops adhere to him against the Congress and the constitutional government. If they do, he becomes military Dictator of the country.

They refused, and three of them were immediately arrested by his order, and sent off under a strong guard in the direction of Mexico and Perote. When the report of these proceedings reached Mexico, the Congress summoned before it the Minister of War and of Government to [...] whether they had authorized General Santa Anna to imprison the members of the junta department of Secretary.

This subject occupied the Chambers on the 29th and 30th of November, and their attitude had now become so menacing that the [...] interino, Canalize, (after consultation with Santa Anna) took the high-handed step of deciding to close the session of Congress by force, and declaring Santa Anna Dictator of the Republic.

Accordingly, on repairing to the palace on the 1st of December the members found the doors shut against them and granted by soldiers and on the 2nd appeared the proclamation of Canalizo, the Presidente[...] declaring the Chambers dissolved indefinitely, and conferring all the powers of Government, legislative as well as executive, on Santa Anna, as [...] the same to be exercised by Canalize Presidente interino, until otherwise ordered for Santa Anna.

For some days this forcible demolition of the constitutional Government by the creatures of Santa Anna, [...] without producing any apparent effect in Mexico. But on the very day when the news reached Puebla, Gen. [...] commandant-general of that department, in concert with the civil authority, pronounced against the Government, imprisoned Canalizo and his ministers-Congress re-assembled-the President, according to the Constitution, and new ministers were appointed the next day, whose authority was immediately acknowledged in Vera Cruz.

At the latest dates there from Vera Cruz [...] a departments of Sonora, Sinaloa, Jalisco, revolution and Aguascalientes were in a state of Paredes. [...] in the military possession of Gen Santa Anna. Santa Anna’s President [...] Congress had re-assembled, and a temporary [...] Government was installed there, composed as follows viz:

General Jose Joaquin de Herrera, President of the Council of Government, charged temporarily with the supreme executive authority.
D. Luis G. Cuevas, Minister of Foreign Relations, State and Police.
D. Mariano Riva Palacios, Minister of Justice Public Instructions and Industry.
D. Pedro J. Echeverria, Minister of Finance.
D. Pedro Garcia Conde, Minister of War.

And it was already known that the Departments of Puebla and Vera Cruz had declared their adhesion to the provisional Government, and there is no doubt that most of the other Departments will also support the Congress.

Meanwhile, Santa Anna, constitutional President of the Republic, but unconstitutionally in the command of the troops, is employed against Paredes. The new Minister of War has ordered him to give up his command.

Reports were current at Vera Cruz, that a part of his troops had already proclaimed him Dictator; that another part had declared against him: but, upon this point, no information in authentic form had reached the public ear.

If any [...] portion of troops adheres to him, to enable him to continue the war, still he is surrounded with difficulties, being in the very heart of the republic, with Jalisco and its concurrent departments to the Pacific against him [...] and Mexico, with its [...] Gulf against him on the [...].

To the Editors of the Enquirer

Gentlemen: The enclosed letter from Mr. Bowden to me, has been approved by such of our friends as have seen it, and they think it best to have it published. If you can find space in your columns, be good enough to give it an early insertion. Yours, respectfully,

ED. S. RUSSELL.

Williamsburg, 28th Dec., 1844

My dear Sir: I observe in the country Whig, which came to hand this morning, that a writer, signing himself "Poquisin," has advanced the idea, that "neither any good Whig, nor any Republican who values the Right of Instruction, can consistently vote for Mr. Bowden." I have not the advantage of knowing who "Poquisin" is, nor would I venture to say whether his residence is in York, James City, or Williamsburg; but one thing I desire you to do for me, and that is to assure any of my constituents, with whom you may meet, that I fully acknowledge the right of the constituent body to instruct their delegate, and the duty of the delegate to obey or to resign; and I wish you to make this known as early and as widely as possible, and especially to the Whigs-- that they may [...] to be instructed, if the people desire to here and [...] I shall have it fully understood.

The Senatorias City.

The writer in the [...] is the subject on which [...] of instructions. [...] I design a [...] is not yet fixed: it will not [...] of that election sooner than the 20th of January; [...] take place remediate time, full opportunity will be the [...] my opponents to remove all doubts as to the [...] that my district entertains relative to the election of Senator, by obtaining from the people a direct and unequivocal declaration on the subject.

That the people whom I represent desire me to vote for an anti-Texas Senator-placed in Congress to thwart the measures of the Administration which the nation's will has so recently advanced to power, and to nullify the voice of Virginia, pronounced by a majority of about 6,000 in opposition to the principles and policy which a Whig Senator would maintain—is what I shall never believe, until by some clear and manifest declaration from them all shadow of doubt shall be removed. Virginia, you must admit; is entitled to a Republican Senator—no matter in what aspect the subject may be viewed.—If you look to numbers alone, she is Republican by about six thousand majority. If you regard representation alone, and look to the compound basis, so as to give Eastern Virginia her constitutional weight in the election of Senator, how then stands the case taking the Presidential Election as a test? (and you will bear in mind, it is from that election my instruction to vote for a Whig is deduced.) Taking the Presidential Election as a test, the Whigs sustain a clear loss of eight or ten votes in the Legislature, which ensures the election of a Republican Senator. With this statement of facts staring them in the face, and ringing in their ears, if any people wish me to vote for a Senator to misrepresent Virginia, and to make this old Commonwealth support in the Federal Legislature the very measure which, in fact, she abhors and detests; if any people wish me to act in this manner, let them say so at once. I know full well what I shall do the instant such a request is authoritatively made. But, that my constituents—who were rocked in the cradle of Republicanism—who dwell on a soil consecrated by the earliest and most glorious achievements of Freedom’s votaries—who have ever regarded as a fundamental principle of our institutions, the right of the majority, when fairly expressed, to control the action of the Government, and to declare, within the limits of the Constitutions, what shall be the law of the land—that these constituents desire me to stifle the voice of the state, and to saddle her with a Senator who would oppose the wishes and misrepresent the interests of a legislative majority, backed by a popular majority of 6,000, would be to suppose them actuated by feelings and opinions which I believe have no place but with a lean and scanty minority—a minority which may fancy itself to speak as with the voice of the people, and which has caused its clamor so to resound through the press as to make the distant public believe that the whole district was in an uproar!

If the Whig party deem the Presidential vote a test—‘tis all well enough. If the members of that party, in the House, whose counties voted for Polk, regarding the Presidential Election as instructions, will vote for a Republican, I will follow their lead and vote for a Whig—not that I deem myself instructed. Many, who voted for Clay, want Texas; and some have told me to act as I please. But if the Whigs situated as above, will vote for a Republican, the Republicans will be perfectly willing that I should, by adopting such a principle, gain eight or ten legislative votes to the party—and the Whigs could not complain of my voting for their man.

You will find out, however, that whilst the Presidential Election is viewed as instructions to Democrats, the idea of its being considered instructions to the Whigs will be treated as perfectly absurd and ridiculous; though, on every fair principle, a rule the direct reverse of this should prevail—for every Republican must wish the administration supported—but every Whig does not wish it opposed. Many desire it to have a fair trial, and are unwilling to throw embarrassments and difficulties in its way—preferring rather to see the country prosper, by wise measures, successfully pursued, than to witness the triumph of their party, secured by the distress and ruin which a factious opposition might visit on the land, under the wisest and best administrations.

Do not fail to let my position be clearly understood—for, whilst the Senatorial, and all the other elections, belong to the people, it belongs to me, and to my friends, to see to it, that no charge of violated instructions should be urged against me, without arming myself with testimony wherewith to stop the mouths of my adversaries.

Remember me most respectfully and kindly to the family, and tender my respects and good wishes to such as consider me worthy of inquiry.

Yours, L. J. BOWDEN.

Letter to the Editor

We invite attention to the powerful letter of Mr. Bowden and to the highly important news from Mexico, which seem to portend the downfall of Santa Anna. Will the Whigs of the Senate still persist, that we should ask the "consent" of Mexico to the annexation of Texas—when it is clear, that the former doomed country, a prey to intestine dissenions, cannot command her own ambitious and discordant spirits? At the present moment, Texas occupies a vastly higher moral position in the scale of nations, than her would-be mistress. In every sense, Texas is more independent than Mexico.

Missouri Right Side Up, Action Reversed - Col. Benton Instructed by Legislature [from the St. Louis Reporter, Dec. 23]

We announce with great pleasure the final passage of the Resolutions of Instruction, through the House of Representatives, on the 18th [...] by a vote of 55 to 25. They had previously passed the Senate by a vote of 3 to 1, except the 6th, which was opposed by five Democrats, under the apprehension that it would be seized on, as justifying efforts to embarrass the friends of [...], and might lend to the defeat of the [...], at the present session. The opposition to immediate annexation was confined to the Whigs-The five first resolutions received the unanimous vote of the Democrats in the Senate and on the question as to the passage of the entire series, every Democrat, present in the House, voted in the affirmative.

These resolutions clearly express the will of the people of Missouri. They instruct our Senators to vote for annexation at the earliest practicable period-by which the debate shows that the Democrats mean now, immediately, or at the present recession of Congress. They declare the Missouri regards Texas, as free and independent-capable of maintaining that independence-and possessing the indisputable right to transfer herself to this country; and that the right of the U. States to accept Texas, without that consent of Mexico or any other power, is equally unquestionable-They also declare that Missouri approves the arrangement as to the boundary agreed on in the treaty, and is opposed to the division of Texas into slave-holding and non-slaveholding States for territory. Thus, every objection urged by Col. Benton against the treaty, has been pronounced unfounded by the Legislature, representing the sovereign people of Missouri.

The Colonel, if he means to act as a Democrat, and with the Democratic Party, will cheerfully obey the foregoing instruction-drop his bill, and vote for the annexation of Texas, by joint resolution, in accordance with the views of the party and the State of Missouri.

We sincerely congratulate the Democratic Members of the Legislature on the result of their deliberations on the great issue of annexation. Though the 6th resolution shows that many of them naturally continued to repose confluence in the opinions and assertions of Colonel Benton, and, therefore, supposed Texas would offer more favorable conditions, and Mexico yield her consent to annexation-still, the five preceding resolutions are very explicit, and clearly instruct our Senators to vote for annexation on the terms and embraced in the treaty. The friends of Colonel Benton declare that he will most cheerfully obey the instructions given, and we hope their confidence may not be misplaced. For the sake of the country, to say nothing of the harmony of the party, we trust Colonel Benton will renounce his heresies at once, and faithfully co-operate with Judge Atchison in favor of immediate annexation.

Again we congratulate the Democrats in the Legislature. [...] have they proclaimed the sovereign will of the State, and thus shown that they understand our national interests, and [...] defend them. They are now with the party in other quarters of the Union-and if they cannot carry Col. Benton with them, it will be his fault, not theirs. They have shown that they will only follow when they believe they are correctly led, and that they adhere to the Democratic doctrine, that they representatives should obey the will of his constituents.

There is now an opportunity for the party to harmonize. On State issues there seems to be but little difference of opinion, as all now agree that we were right in advocating equal representation and the district system, and opposing bills of pains and penalties. On national questions, we are now united, and may remain united, in spite of the efforts of any one man.

The members of the Legislature have acted as Democrats should always act. The will of the people-of the party, has been boldly proclaimed, and should be obeyed. We can continue to agree on all great questions and, by resolving that we will not quarrel about non-essential, harmony may be restored and preserved!

The Dangers of Procrastination - Again!

If we were to believe most of the thousand and one rumors which reach us from Washington, we should not entertain a very sanguine hope of the results of the present session of Congress. Most of the Whig scribblers even ridicule the prospect of Annexation, or the reduction of the Tariff. But the strongest considerations are opposed to this miserable policy of delay. The country demands relief from the present oppressive Tariff. The manufacturers themselves demand stability in the imposition of duties. The present Tariff cannot continue. The South will never acquiesce in it. Is it not wiser, then, to regulate it at once, and thus avoid those agitations which we are otherwise destined to witness? Let some liberal system be adopted at once, which shall certainly but gradually relieve us from the oppressions of the Tariff, and we are willing to meet our Republican brethren in other quarters in the most conciliatory spirit.? We equally deprecate all procrastination in the acquisition of Texas. We are only satisfied by longer time and greater reflection that Immediate Annexation is our true policy. (Our last accounts from Washington are of the most cheering character. We understand, upon good authority, that the Republican Caucus have agreed upon the question of Annexation by a majority of 30 odd-and that, in case it passes the House by a respectable majority, there is a favorable prospect of its passing the Senate. It is said, Col. Benton will obey the instructions of the Legislature of Missouri.) - But why is not all the Republican press doing its duty on these great questions? Why are they not all making their boldest appeals to Congress? We earnestly request them all to speak out, and urge an immediate settlement of these two important subjects.

Texas

The best policy of the government, too, forbids any procrastination upon this subject. Everything shows that Great Britain is attempting to tamper both with Texas and Mexico to defeat any annexation with the U. States. Why incur the danger of losing this country? The people of the U. States have just decided in favor of the measure. Why run the risk and danger of any delay? Some of the Republican presses are not speaking out as boldly and as energetically as the country has a right to demand. They cant about delay.?They affect to say, that Congress will do nothing at the present session: and we must submit. - Shame upon this hesitating and equivocating language! Why do they not speak out-and call upon the members to act at once? If these presses and politicians were to speak out without any reserve, and instead of encouraging the lagging members to violate their duties, were to shame them into the fulfillment of them, then might the will of the people be respected, Texas be acquired, without war and without disturbance. It must be confessed, too, that some of our politicians are shivering in the wind. They are either slumbering at their posts, or sacrificing the interests of their country to the gratification of their own passions. But there are many other politicians and presses, who deserve the people's thanks for the energy with which they throw themselves into the cause of immediate annexation. We shall quote a few specimens of this class, as well to do honor to themselves, as that we may avail ourselves of the arguments which they are urging. - The first of these is Mr. Foster, one of the United States Senators of New York. The following is an extract of a letter which he addressed on the 25th December, to the Editor of the N.Y. Plebeian, in reply to certain questions of its Editor:

"I am in favor of the immediate annexation of Texas, and placing over the territory of Oregon the shield of our government. I believe that the resolution adopted at the recent Democratic National Convention, held at Baltimore:-"That out title to the whole of the territory of Oregon is clear and unquestioned; that no portion thereof ought to be ceded to England or to any other power, and that the re-occupation of Oregon and the re-annexation of Texas, at the earliest practicable period, are great American measures,' should be accomplished as soon as is compatible with national honor. That the re-annexation of Texas will not increase the evils of slavery, but will hasten its extinction in the slaveholding States; will in an especial manner, promote the agriculture, manufacturing and commercial interests of the Northern and Eastern States; will add to the security of the whole Union; and extend and perpetuate the benefits of our form of Government over one of the richest portions of the earth. I cannot present you with the details of a plan of annexation; but I hold that it can rightfully be annexed without the consent of Mexico. She has no right to interfere. Texas is really, as well as nominally, independent. She has maintained her independence for several years, and not a hostile force has entered her territory, without being compelled to retreat with more rapidity than it had advanced.

"The leading powers of Europe, as well as our own Government, have acknowledged the independence of Texas, and some of them have treated with her as an independent nation; and even the Congress of Mexico has recently refused to vote the supplies necessary to a further prosecution of her war with Texas. The only question, therefore, in regard to which Mexico is interested, is one of boundary; and that can as well be settled by negotiation with our Government after the annexation shall take place as with Texas, if she remains separate from us.

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
On the motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to this House such [ . . . ] as he may possess, or may be able to [ . . . ], of the whole amount of the debt of Texas the amount for which bond or scrip has been issued; and the present market value of [ . . . ] scrip or bond in Texas, in the United States, and in Europe; the amount in value of the exports from, and the imports into, Texas for the years 1843 and 1844, with the amount of revenue [ . . . ] and collected for the same years, with [ . . . ] expenditures for the same time; also, the present population of Texas, distinguishing in numbers between free and slaves; also, the quantity of acres of land, which it is supposed is covered in valid grants from the present and former Governments of that country; and the estimated quantity in acres of good and [ . . . ] land [ . . . ] for cultivation which remains [ . . . ] [ . . . ] the disputed and acknowledged limits of [ . . . ] as same existed prior to the year [ . . . ].

RE-ANNEXATION OF TEXAS

Mr. HAMMETT moved that the rules be suspended, that the House might resolve [ . . . ] into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to and the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Hopkins in the Chair,) assumed the consideration of the resolutions to annex Texas to this Union.

Mr. Holmes, who had the floor from yesterday, commenced with some remarks [ . . . ] importance of the question which now [ . . . ] the attention of the committee. He contended that this was not a sectional, but a great [ . . . ] question; and to this complexion it has [ . . . ] at last; annexation or rejection now and [ . . . ]. And on this he based the proposition, and [ . . . ] to it the attention, not of a section, nor of a [ . . . ] but of every man who had in his [ . . . ] the [ . . . ] union and confederation,[ . . . ] Annexation[ . . . ] [ . . . ] was salvation or destruction to the [ . . . ] Atlantic States, to New England and to the manufacturing community, and be admitted, [ . . . ] the inevitable destruction of the South, and sustained his position by showing the [ . . . ] effect which would be produced on the producers and manufactures of the various sections of [ . . . ] country by Texas remaining independent and [ . . . ] commercial league with England, and in [ . . . ] of the guarantees promised to her [ . . . ] [ . . . ] A [ . . . ] on condition of her [ . . . ] government separate from ours. Her [ . . . ] [ . . . ] Great Britain would preclude exportation [ . . . ] our country to that republic, and under the restrictive policy our entire Union would be injured to [ . . . ] degree now not to be determined.

Mr. WM. J. BROWN was wedded to no particular plan. He was like the young man in his own native West with stout arms and [ . . . ] principles, who, when first sets out from his maternal home, gets himself a wife. When [ . . . ] to one whose smile serves the purpose [ . . . ] rainbow of hope and promise, he begins to [ . . . ] his cabin, and lay out his fields, until his horn of plenty is filled to overflowing. Just so with [ . . . ] he was first for his country, and next for Texas and, having obtained her, all things else [ . . . ] be added thereto. Let us then have Texas [ . . . ] and hereafter all the details could be settled. [ . . . ] as this question was decided in the late election, he called upon gentlemen to obey the will of the people.

Mr. GARRET DAVIS would not be displeased; on the contrary, he would be glad if Texas could be annexed without a violation of the Constitution, and our neutral rights, and with the general assent of the people. It was with a [ . . . ] to the distant future that he should desire the [ . . . ] of this measure. The natural [ . . . ] cities of Texas for the production of cotton and sugar rendered it of immense importance [ . . . ] Inhabitants of the United States. But his [ . . . ] to see Texas annexed was subordinate to other considerations. His attachment to the Union [ . . . ] existed, rather than endanger its [ . . . ] led him, nevertheless, to oppose annexation [ . . . ] every possible form. He spoke of the question as one of power-contending the legislature was not, by the Constitution, empowered to require foreign territory, &c.

Mr. BOWLIN next obtained the floor but The Committee rose, and reported progress, [ . . . ] The House then adjourned. Extract of a letter from Madison County,

"Mr. Goggin has declined becoming a candidate for re-election, as you have seen. The Whigs are awfully troubled about it here. [ . . . ] do not think there is the least doubt about the election of a Democratic member of Congress [ . . . ] this district, unless there be some discord in [ . . . ] Convention proposed to be held in Charlottesville to nominate a candidate."

[We will listen to no such apprehension. [ . . . ] take it for granted, that the Convention will be well attended, as it ought to be- fairly organized as it ought also to be- and that its [ . . . ] will meet the immediate and cordial [ . . . ] every Republican in the District.] [ . . . ]

Resolutions of New Hampshire

Missouri has adopted Resolutions instructing her Senators to vote for the annexation of Texas as early as practicable. The Granite State is also coming up to the rescue. The following Resolutions have just been passed by the House of Representatives of New Hampshire, by a vote of 136 to 61. Upon which, the N. York Plebeian says, "The Democracy of New England are unanimous on this great American question. There is no backing out, or denying the issue in that quarter."

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court convened, That the result of the Presidential election demonstrates that the people of this State and the U. States are in favor of the immediate re-annexation of Texas to the Union.

Resolved, That the usurpation of Santa Anna and his subversion by the sword of the compact under which Texas became one of the States of the Mexican Confederacy; the subsequent acknowledgement of her independence by the usurper, and by the great powers of both continents the maintenance of that independence for a long succession of years against every foe-all combine to absolve Texas from all further allegiance to Mexico, and to establish her independence in law and act and her prefect freedom to negotiate treaties and contract alliances with other sovereignties of the globe.

Resolved, That we regard it as an insult to the people of Texas, who have gallantly achieved their liberties by the sword of revolution, to make the consent of Mexico a pre-requisite to their annexation to the United States, and that an attempt to procure the assent of Mexico now convulsed with insurrection and torn with contending factions, each claiming to wield the rightful powers of Government, would be as fruitless as unnecessary, and uncalled for by the justice and law of the case.

Resolved, That the annexation of Texas is as constitutional and expedient as was the purchase of Louisiana by Mr. Jefferson, of which purchased territory, we believe the present territory of Texas constitutes a part.

Resolved, That the re-annexation of Texas, aside from its restoring to the Southwest its mutilated territory bargained a way by the treachery or folly of our diplomats, is found in the interest of every section of our country-the agriculture of the South and West, and the commerce and manufactures of the North.

Resolved, That we do not recognize the right of foreign nations to interfere in the negotiations upon this subject, and that the two countries consenting, and as against foreign nations, Texas should be re-annexed to the U. S., if need be, by armed occupation.

Resolved, That national honor and national policy alike forbid all further aggression upon American soil.

Resolved, That we believe with Mr. Clay, ‘that the re-annexation of Texas will add more free than slave States to the Union, and that it would be unwise to refuse a permanent acquisition, which will exist as long as the globe remains on account of a temporary institution.’

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to use their exertions to procure the adoption of such measures by the General Government, as in their opinion shall be best calculated to effect the re-annexation of Texas to the United States, and to assert and maintain our rights to the territory of Oregon.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to furnish a copy of the foregoing resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and to the Governors of the several States and Territories of the Union."

We understand, that Representatives of New Hampshire in Congress are unanimous for annexation-and that the cause, in fact, gaining ground in both Houses. It is hoped, that the measure will not fall through the multiplicity of projects-but that some scheme may be adopted in a wise and conciliatory spirit, during the present session. Let us seize upon the present golden opportunity, while it is in our power. We are much more indifferent to the details than to the great object itself. Strike whilst the iron is hot, and all will be well.

And shall Virginia slumber at her post? Shall Missouri and New Hampshire instruct their Senators, and shall she refuse to mingle her voice with theirs? Shall the largest State in the South shrink from her duty? No man, as far as we are advised, knows whether her two Senators will vote for the annexation. Their course at the late session of
In connection with this subject, with subjoin some very important information, which was give by Mr. C. Ingersoll to the House of Representatives, and to the world, on Friday last, and no doubt upon the highest authority.

"But now to speak a word with respect to these foreign superintendents of our affairs. On this point he should be very grief. And, first, in regard to Mexico: her right to interfere in this question had been too much urged in various quarters to require him to touch that question; but he was authorized by those who, he felt very sure, had not deceived him, (and he would assure the House and the country that in this declaration he was not deceiving them.) to declare here, in his place, and on his responsibility, that, whatever angry feelings might now prevail between us and Mexico, there was no reason to believe that any rupture with that Power would be consequence of annexation. On this point he had asked for information where he believed he was not deceived. There was a sinew of war, and the best and strongest sinew of it—he meant money—which would heal all our breaches in that quarter.

"And, in the next place, with regard to Great Britain. Some gentlemen might be surprised perhaps to hear him say, that in regard to her—"

["At this point Mr. I. was interrupted by a query from a member near him, which the Reporter did not distinctly hear, but which he understood to have reference to Mr. I.'s authority for making these declarations. Mr. I., speaking in reply, said he was not, he believed, authorized by the committee to go further in the way of exploration; but it must, he thought, be pretty obvious where his authority came from.]

"He was saying that with respect to Great Britain (and there might, perhaps, be those present who thought he regretted to make such a statement,) there was [...] as little reason to apprehend any rupture in that quarter.

"A voice. 'And respecting Oregon too?'

"As to Oregon that question was under negotiation, and he did not know what the exact state of it was; but in regard to Texas, he was authorized to state, that however, Great Britain might desire a more intimate connection with that power—however she would be pleased at seeing all the slaves in that territory emancipated—and how little, so ever she might wish that Texas should be annexed to the U. States, yet, there was every reason to believe that annexation, if effected, would be productive of no rupture.

"And, then, in regard to France—though there had been a suspicion, at one time, that she might take umbrage at it, the contrary had since officially been made known to both branches of Congress. The re-annexation, therefore, none proposed would be a peaceable re-annexation. Meantime, all we had to do was, to preserve peace at home, there was no danger of any quarrel or any coolness with any foreign power.

"As the South, he believed, was upon this subject nearly unanimous, he would now address himself to the Northern Democracy, or rather to the Northern States altogether.

"Well, be was willing to repeat the term, and he would now, then, address himself to the Northern Democracy, and would here recall one or two things to their recollection. Mr. I. understood that, in the commencement of our National Revolution, two of the distinguished leaders among the friends of freedom at that day—he meant John and Samuel Adams—were one day conversing together on the question who should be appointed Commander-in-Chief of the American forces, and, on comparison of views, they agreed in sentiment that it was most expedient he should not be an Eastern, but a Southern man; and they fixed upon Col. Washington, then comparatively young, and who had not yet displayed those magnificent attributes of character which afterwards rendered him so illustrious, as the suitable man, mainly because he was a Southern man. Again, the war of 1812 had begun with the complaints of the Eastern States, and it was entered into expressly with a view of vindicating Eastern rights and interests; and all must recollect with what a ready and devoted zeal the South and the West rushed forward to that vindication. Mr. I. insisted that all ought to now to imitate that patriotic example. To which he might add yet another; when, on a more recent occasion, an army of fifty thousand men, and the sum of ten millions of dollars, were by a vote of that House, put at the disposal of the Executive for the maintenance of our rights, then supposed to be a threatened by another Power. All we wanted was a display of the same national spirit now. Why were gentlemen sitting in the Hall? To make laws? No; he denied it; and always had denied it. They were there to prevent war, they were there to preserve peace, they were there, that all parts of the country might become acquainted with each other, that we

That Cuba will ever peaceably be England's knowing the people as we think we do, we can never believe."
From Washington

Our last letter (4th January) says: "The opinion to-day seems to be, that the Annexation question will pass the House by a large majority, and the Senate by a small one. All the Democrats are now relied on, in voting in the affirmative in obedience to their own convictions, or the expressed wishes of their constituents. Several of the Whigs are spoken of as intending to vote for the annexation.

"On the other hand, it is said that the question of acquiring by law a foreign territory, could not pass the Senate; and it is even added, that the heads of the Report of the Committee of Foreign Relations are already written- and that the ground taken is, that it was unconstitutional. - Mr. Tibbats', (of Ky.) plan in the House of Representatives is, to provide for the admission of Texas as a state. It may yet become the favorite scheme, in order to meet the Whigs in their professions of constitutional scruples."

Extract from the New Orleans Bulletin (Whig) of the 28th December

The New Orleans Bulletin (Whig) of the 28th December says: "There is good reason to believe that an opportunity for peaceful Annexation is now presented for the last time-that an opportunity to restore the fair domain of Texas to this Confederation of States, with the good will and thankfulness of the Texian people accompanying the surrender of their sovereignty; and without giving even the color of excuse for the interference of European powers, is now for the last time offered to the acceptance of this country. Shall a mere factious spirit serve to thwart this master stroke of national-of American-policy?"

Richmond Grays

At a meeting of the Richmond Grays, held at Military Hall on Friday evening, January 3d, 1815, Lieut. Scott in the Chair, the following Preamble and Resolutions were adopted.

The Company of Richmond Grays having seen with gratification, that the Common Council, on the 30th day of last month, by Resolution of that body, appropriated the sum of 300 dollars for the repair of Military Hall, and hailing this evidence of liberality on the part of the representatives of the people of this city, as going far to remove the vulgar prejudice entertained by many, that there is nothing good in Volunteer Companies, and believing now that they take some interest in the prosperity and success of the Volunteer Corps of this city, we think it due to them and to ourselves to manifest our sense of the obligation and gratitude for the kindness they have shown. Therefore, 1st Resolved unanimously, That we tender our sincere and grateful thanks to the Common Council of the city of Richmond for the liberal donation which they have presented to the volunteer Companies of this city for the repair of Military Hall.

2nd Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing Preamble and Resolution, signed by the Chairman and Secretary, be delivered to the President of the Council.

3rd Resolved, That the city papers be requested to publish the foregoing Preamble and Resolutions. ROBT. G. SCOTT, Jr., Chairman.

S.T. Barclay, Secretary.

Proceedings on the Texas Question

The House of Representatives is in full blast on the great question of the day. No one can predict the length of the debate, nor the variety of [ . . . ] which may be submitted, nor the results to which they are ultimately arrive. We presume the annexation may pass the House in some form or other-and, if the Whig Senators from the South and West discharge their solemn duty to their country, strict of all insurable party ties, the measure will prevail, at the present session, in some form or other. If it cannot succeed in one form, it should be carried in another. In such a case, private preferences ought to yield to the high considerations of public good. No dogged adherence to a particular mode ought to defeat the great object which we ought all to have in view. Conciliation ought to be consulted. The friends of the measure, in both Houses should compare notes with each other, and fall upon some fair and honorable course, which can command the majority of both Houses. If Messrs. Ingersoll and McDullie cannot carry their resolutions, following out the form of the late rejected treaty, some other more available formula should be pursued. If Messrs. Weller and Douglass cannot carry their resolutions, for acquiring Texas in the territorial form, we see no reason at all why we should not fall back upon the propositions of Messrs. Tibbatts and Niles- bring her in as a State, subject to fair conditions, which will prevent Texas from being larger than the present largest State in the Union, and will permit the extra territory to be carved up into as many other States as the wisdom of Congress in the course of time may consider best for the whole Union. With this conciliatory spirit among the friends of Annexation, we can see no insurmountable difficulty in the way. As for those, who love Henry Clay more than their country-and would sacrifice her great interests to their party idol; nothing can be expected from them. They will pursue Mr. Winthrop's course, and do nothing. They will trample upon the precedents of Louisiana and Florida, and the negotiations of Adams and Jackson for the annexation of Texas. They are opposed to the measure in every form in which it may be presented. No argument can convince them—no appeals can overrule their idolatriy to Mr. Clay, or their idle and dangerous antipathy to the South. No conciliation can reconcile them to any measure. We must act without them, or not act at all. It remains to be seen, whether the two Senators from Virginia are so infatuated as to sacrifice themselves and their country to their prejudices—or, whether (as we have some reasons to hope) they can rise superior to the [ . . . ] of party, and strike boldly for their glorious country.

It is impossible for us to publish the whole of this interesting debate; but we shall give as many speeches as we can.
We begin this day with Mr. C.J. Ingersoll's speech—and shall follow it up to-morrow with Mr. Belser's.

The Globe of Tuesday night sketches the debate of that day in the House of Representatives. It notices the severe castigation which Mr. Yancey of Alabama, has administered to Clingman of North Carolina. It says, that "Mr.
Yancey, from Alabama, in his first speech in the House, distinguished himself by his severe sarcasm and fervid eloquence. We did not hear his introductory remarks, but learn that they were made up of caustic for Mr. Clingman.
It is certainly a good maxim which teaches to take the beam out of our own eyes before we attempt to spy the mote in another's, and this couching of the eyes of a Southern man, by a Southern man, was quite appropriate. We must confess that we have seen with some regret, that a portion of our Southern friends have, for years, shown a disposition to find fault with their distant political allies as not feeling that intense sympathy with them on political matters which affected them locally, while they were inclined to spare their own men of the South, who sacrificed the great interests of that region to its selfish Northern enemies. The Tariff discussion, the vital measure in regard to which, at the last Congress, almost every Whig in the South gave up his often avowed principles—the known will of the people he represented—their rights and interests, to foster a remote privileged class, and support its candidate for the Presidency, furnishes an example of this. And yet the vials of wrath of the opponents of the Tariff in the South were not poured out on these betrayers at home of the domestic cause; but on a few Northern Democrats, who believed they represented the wishes of their constituents faithfully in opposing a change in the Tariff. Now this mode of dealing with the [ . . . ] in our party conflicts does not evidence a feeling of political justice. Charity should not begin at home for the betrayers of a cause; nor should vindictive persecution be attempted towards those who, differing with political friends on a question of policy in regard to the interests of their constituents, resolve to maintain the fundamental principle of our Government, of fidelity to the constituents, rather than the [ . . . ] of a majority of their own party. We are led to these reflections from the reform which Mr. Yancey seems disposed to introduce in the mode of treating the Southern enemies of the new Southern topic at present under discussion—the re-annexation of Texas. If the shafts of invective are to be hurled against any in this new controversy, let it be against the neighbors and kindred of the heroic men of Texas, who would surrender them to the tender mercies of military government in Mexico, forgetful alike to the perfidy and atrocity under which Fanning and his brave men perished, and of the magnanimity of Houston, through which Santa Anna and his army survive the wrongs which they had perpetrated. Mr. Yancey did well to-day in [ . . . ] his spear at Mr. Clingman as among the first of the Southerners to appear in the tournament against the South; and he did well, too, in the conclusion of his speech, to deal his blows upon those in the North, who, from their hostility to the South and Southern institutions, would immolate the Union.
The Hartford Convention conspirators, and those who now harbor that infamous treason in their bosoms, deserve the indignant animadversion with which he visited them," &c.

The Globe adds: "We heard the speech of Mr. Bayly of Virginia with great pleasure. It was a profound view of the question debated, sustained at every step by an able constitutional argument. Mr. Bayly is a strong man; and if the early promise holds, Virginia has gained much by his transit from the judicial bench to the floor of the H. of Representatives."

"Such is the sentiment which every liberal and enlightened man expresses for Thos. H. Bayly. He is indeed "a strong man"—and does honor to the District which he has the honor of serving in Congress."

The "Constitution," too, notices the argument of General Bayly in the following terms: "He proceeded, then, most powerfully and ably to illustrate his views of the question. He demonstrated most conclusively that Congress had the power under the Constitution to acquire territory by bill of joint resolution, as well as by treaty. He proceeded by numerous and authoritative historical illustrations, to show the sinister, the aggressive and insincere policy of England in regard to slavery and the slave trade. He also showed that her diplomacy had been brought to bear upon this question, the result of which, if successful, would be to embarrass, if not to defeat annexation altogether. The whole scope of his argument was most dignified, able and conclusive. When fully reported, as it will be with all its illustrations, it will be found to be an argument fully sustaining our policy and purposes in regard to Texas. Posted up to this point of time, we are happy to say to the friends of Texas, that the sum of the argument is immensely in favor of annexation."

(General Bayly will prove himself, by his talents, worthy of filling the space of Wise.)

In the Senate, the debate upon Texas has not commenced. But they are not altogether standing still. On the same day, Mr. Niles of Connecticut submitted the following bill, which is intended to introduce Texas as a State, (by the vote of Congress,) rather than directly in the form of a Treaty:

Mr. Niles, pursuant to notice heretofore given, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following joint Joint resolutions for the admission of Texas into the Union as a State, on certain conditions, and for certain purposes: "Whereas the Government and people of Texas have manifested a desire to unite their country with the United States of America, to constitute one or more States of this Confederacy; and whereas there are reasons to believe that a decided majority of the people of the United States are in favor of such union, and the same being regarded as highly conducive to the peace and best interests of both countries: therefore-

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Texas, with such territory and limits as rightfully belong to it, and with the restriction hereinafter provided, shall be admitted into the Union, upon an equal footing with the original States, to be called the State of Texas; and which admission shall be subject to the following conditions, and shall take effect when the said conditions shall have been complied with to the approval and acceptance of Congress:

"First. The citizens of Texas in such way and form as the Government may direct, to express their assent to this union, and according to the terms of these resolutions; said assent to be given before the first Monday of December, 1845.

"Second. The citizens of Texas, before the said first Monday of December, 1845, so to alter or modify their Constitution, as to make it in all respects confirm to the requirements of the Constitution of the U. States.

"Third. That the citizens of Texas prescribe the limits and boundaries of the State of Texas, Northernly and Westerly, so as not to embrace a greater extent of territory than that of the largest State in the union, and as one of the conditions of this Union, that the State of Texas, within one year from its admission in the Union, will cede to the United States all the right of sovereignty and jurisdiction belonging to, or claimed by it, over its whole territory, not included in the State of Texas; and the limits and boundaries of such territory, so far as the same may be in dispute with any foreign power; and also those of the State of Texas shall be settled and adjusted by the United States, with the foreign nation, or nations, interested therein: Provided, That if any portion of the territory so ceded shall, at the time of such cession, be in the occupation and under the actual jurisdiction and government of any foreign power; the cession, in respect to such portion of the territory which it may include, shall be held to be void, and the United States will not claim, or assert, any right or jurisdiction over the same. The several acts herein require to be performed, as conditions of the admission of Texas into the Union, shall be officially certified by the proper authorities of Texas, to the President of the United States, with a copy of the Constitution of Texas, as altered or modified, to be by him communicated to Congress as its next session, so that Congress may decide whether the conditions herein contained have been complied with, so as to entitle Texas to an admission into the Union, upon an equal footing with the original States.

"And be it further Resolved, That nothing contained in these resolutions, nor the admission of Texas as a State into the Union, nor the cession of its jurisdiction over the territory not included in the State of Texas, shall in any way impair or affect the private rights of the citizens of Texas, or those of the citizens of the United States having claims against Texas or the citizens thereof; nor in any way impair or affect the title or claims of individuals to lands, whether within, the State of Texas, or the territory ceded to the United States; nor in any way impair or affect the right which Texas may have at the time of her admission into the Union; in the soil in the public or unsold lands, whether the State of Texas, or the territory so ceded by her.

"And be it further Resolved, That, should it be desired by Texas, the United States will advance to her a sum not exceeding three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to discharge the debt due from Texas to the executors of Frederick Dawson, late of Baltimore, and for the redemption of exchequer bills, which may be in circulation at the time of her admission into the Union, and which shall be reimbursed to the United States, by the State of Texas, from the proceeds of the sales of her public lands.

"And be it further Resolved, That, on the admission of Texas, as a State, into the Union, it shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, until the next general census shall be taken by the authority of the United States.

"And be it further enacted, That the territory which may be ceded by Texas to the United States, shall be united to some existing Territory, or formed into a district territorial Government; and that the inhabitants who are, or may become residents therein, shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States in other Territories West of the Mississippi; and that they shall be admitted into the Union as one or more States, as soon as, from their population and other considerations, Congress may deem it just and reasonable.

"And whereas, by the ordinance of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, adopted in a spirit of compromise, it was ordained and established as a fundamental law, that slavery or involuntary servitude should not exist in the territory Northwest of the Ohio; and whereas, subsequently, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty, the restriction of the aforesaid ordinance was extended and applied to the territory (excepting that embraced in the State of Missouri) which was ceded by France to the United States, under the name of Louisiana, which lies North of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes North latitude; therefore

"Be it further Resolved, That the eighth section of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the people of Missouri Territory to form a Constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories,' approved the sixth day of March, 1820, shall be applicable to the territory which may be ceded by Texas to the United States, and so modified as that the restriction and prohibition contained therein shall extend to, and be in force in and over the whole of that part of the territory which may be so ceded, which lies west of one hundred degrees of west longitude, so long as the same may remain a territory of the United States."
On motion by Mr. Archer, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Upon a subject so deeply interesting to the whole U. States, it becomes proper for the press to speak out. We shall not enter into the comparative merits of the various forms of annexation by bill, resolution or acts of Congress—whether it be best to admit her as a Territory, or first as a State. We see no objection to the great State principle of Mr. Niles's bill; and if it be most acceptable to a majority of the friends of Texas, we see no reason why it should not be adopted. In this spirit, we hope all its friends will approach the subject. Where there is such a variety of opinions, and so many projects, there must be some conciliation shown, and some compromise effected. Nothing but the want of this spirit can defeat one of the most important measures of modern times.

"The Constitution," after reciting the substance of Mr. Niles's bill, adds: "We hail this proposition, coming from the quarter it does, with great pleasure. It is intrinsically valuable, and is entitled to the most favorable consideration. We have no fears from the multiplicity of propositions. It is by a candid discussion and comparison of the whole, that the best features of all [ . . . ] and unite all the friends of the great measure in its final support."

New Orleans, Dec. 13, Later From Texas

The schooner William Bryan [ . . . ] are [ . . . ] to Captain Moss for the Galveston News of the 24th inst., three days later than received by the New York. The News contains a message from President Jones to Congress, conveying his views and opinions in regard to such measures connected with the public interests, as he deems proper to engage their attention. We have not space to give a synopsis of this document to-day, but will endeavor to do so to-morrow. The Valedictory message of President Houston, and the Inaugural Address of Vice President Anderson, are also published in the News. Of the latter of these documents, we have nothing to say. General Houston's Valedictory is well written, and suited to the occasion. He refers to the prosperous condition of Texas, to her rise and progress as an independent nation, and speaks with confidence of her future prospects. The following extract is interesting:

"When I look around me, my fellow-citizens, and see and know that the prospects of the Republic are brightening, its resources developing, its commerce extending, and its moral influence in the community of nations increasing, my heart is filled with sensations of joy and pride. A poor and despised people a few years ago, borne down by depressing influences at home and abroad, we have risen in defiance of all obstacles, to a respectable place in the eye of the world. One great nation is inviting us to a full participancy in all its privileges, and to a full community of its laws and interests. Others desire our separate and independent national existence, and are ready to throw into our lap the richest gifts and favors.

"The attitude of Texas now, to my apprehension, is one of peculiar interest. The United States have spurned her twice already. Let her therefore maintain her position firmly, as it is, and work out her own political salvation. Let her legislation precede upon the supposition, that we are to be, and remain, an independent people. If Texas goes begging again for admission into the United States, she will only degrade herself. They will spurn her again from their threshold, and other nations will look upon her with unmingled pity.

"Let Texas, therefore, maintain her position. If the United States shall open the door and ask her to come into the great family of States, you will than have other conductors, better than myself, to lead you into a union with the beloved land from which we have sprung—the land of the broad Stripes and bright Stars. But let us be as we are, until the opportunity is presented: and then let us go in, if at all, united in one phalanx, and sustained by the opinion of the world.

"If we remain an independent nation, our territory will be extensive, unlimited. The Pacific alone will bound the mighty march of our race and our empire. From Europe and America her soil is to be peopled. In regions where the savage and the buffalo now roam uncontrolled, the enterprise and industry of the Anglo-American are yet to find an extended field of development. With union, industry and virtue, we have nothing to apprehend. If left alone, we have our destiny in our own hands, and many become a nation distinguished for its wealth and power."

Intelligence has been received at Galveston, that John R. Kemper, of Victoria county, was lately murdered by a party of Caronkawa Indians, near his residence, some 10 or 15 miles below Victoria, on the West bank of the Guadeloupe River. The News says:

"The Indians afterwards made an attack upon his house, but the inmates, consisting of his wife, children and mother-in-law, saved themselves by escaping to the forest. The house was burnt, and much property destroyed or taken away by the savages. Captain K. was an old citizen of the West, and his death will be much regretted."
The Lagrange Intelligencer says that an engagement took place between some Lipan Indians and the citizens of Sequim, a few days since, which resulted in the death of two of the Indians. The citizens came off uninjured, having re-taken the property, stolen from Sequim, the evening before the fight.

Revolution in Mexico [from the N.O. Picayune, 29th]

The New Orleans Picayune of the 29th ult. brings one day's later news from Mexico. The baroque Eugenia, with Mr. Cushing on board, brought accounts from Vera Cruz to the 12th December. The schr. Fortuna, which brings the news to New Orleans, left Vera Cruz the next day, (13th.) The additional accounts are not decisive of the fate of Santa Anna. We shall content ourselves with giving a few paragraphs from the Picayune, showing the then desperate state of Santa Anna's fortunes. The Picayune infers from the various intelligence it has collected, "that Santa Anna's career is drawing to a tragic close. Unless some lucky chance has befallen him, his doom, ere this, has been as terrible as well deserved. The new Cabinet has not had time to develop its policy in relation to foreign matters. The disturbances are so violent in their nature, and important in their results, as to leave the authorities little time to attend to any other concerns than such as relate to the crisis wrought in the domestic affairs of the country."

Important From Mexico

By the arrival yesterday of the schooner Fortuna, from Vera Cruz, whence she sailed on the 13th December we have the important information that the revolution, started in Jalisco by Gen. Paredes, has finally extended almost entirely over the country, and that the complete overthrow of the tyrant Santa Anna is certain, although he is still in command of a few troops at Queretaro. In the city of Mexico the revolution broke out on the 3rd instant, and by the 7th all was quiet.-General Jose Joaquin de Herrera was in command at the last dates, with the title of Provisional President, while Canalizo and some of the chief minions of Santa Anna were in arrest.

On the 1st of December, fifty-five members of the House of Deputies issued a manifesto, protesting against the orders promulgated by President Santa Anna, and denouncing Government for not having had him removed from office. The next day, ten others, who were not able to get into the hall on the 1st, signed it. The Senate likewise adopted the same proceeding on the 2d of December-every member, save four, of that body signing the [ . . . ] of [ . . . ]. This action giving great offence to the Dictator, it seems that, on the 3d December, General Canalizo, by the express order of Santa Anna, issued a decree for the dissolution of Congress. The dictator was at that time at Queretaro, at the head of some 8,000 men, on his march against the revolutionists in Jalisco. No sooner was it known in Mexico, that the arbitrary decree had been promulgated, than an immense excitement was created among all classes. The Chamber at once made three protests, besides a proclamation to the citizens; but before they could have them printed, Canalizo issued a peremptory order that all printing offices, with the single exception of that of El Diario del Gobierno, Santa Anna's own paid organ, should be closed, and that publications of every description were expressly forbidden. When these tyrannical decrees transpired, the excitement rose to such a pitch, that all business was suspended, and groups of men collected in all quarters to talk over the obnoxious measures, and prepared to act as circumstances might dictate. Canalizo, in the mean time, seeing the affairs were coming to a crisis, and deeming himself unsafe, collected at the palace all the troops he could gather, (some 2,000 in number,) and shut himself up with them. Baranda, Rejon (the latter a name become familiar to the people of the United States) and Salas, three Santa Anna's minions, also took refuge in the palace at the same time.

During the 4th and 5th of December the excitement continued, with little or no abatement at any time. Early on the 6th large numbers of the inhabitants; comprising not only the lepers and middling classes, but all the most wealthy and respectable citizens gathered, with arms in their hands, at the Convent of San Francisco. Here the members of Congress, having been driven from Chambers, had assembled, amongst them being Generals Herrera, Garcia, Conde, and Cespedes. Previous to this the greater part of the troops in the garrison and in la Ciudadela had really pronounced in favor of the revolution. Generals Conde and Cespedes had come from the Ex-Acordada, where the movement was going on, and reunited themselves with the deputies in the Convent.

From this place, as we learn by some of the accounts, the entire body-members of Congress, citizens leperos and all- marched to the principal plaza in front of the palace, and ordered Canalizo to surrender-giving him two hours to reflect and no more. Thinking that his officers and soldiers would stand by him, Canalizo prepared to attack the citizens, and called upon his troops to make a sortie. At this crisis, one of his officers exclaimed that he was the soldier of no tyrant but of the nation, and then shouted, "Long live the Congress." This cry was taken up by the ranks stationed at the palace, when Canalizo at once fled in consternation to his apartments.
Here he was commanded to surrender, and in reply, he assented, on condition that his safety was guaranteed, and passports to leave the country were given to him, the four Ministers and the Commandant-General. What disposition was made of this demand, our accounts do not say; but it is certain that he was detained a prisoner in the palace, together with Salas, the Commandante General, as he is called. The Ministers of War, and of the Home Department, had been set at liberty upon giving security, while Rejon and Baranda had made their escape.

On the 7th of December, Gen. Herrera was appointed Provisional President of the Republic with a Cabinet, as follows; Don Luis G. Cuevas; Minister of Foreign Relations; Don Mariano Riva Palacios, of Justice and Public Instruction; Don Pedro Echeverria, of Internal Affairs; Gen. Pedro Garcia Conde, of War and Marine.

On the evening of the 6th and during the whole of the 7th of December the greatest rejoicings took place in the city of Mexico, accompanied by many acts which show the deep detestation in which Santa Anna was held. A number of his portraits in the public places were dragged through the streets, torn into fragments, and every lepero preserved a piece as a memento of their oppressor's downfall. The statue of Santa Anna in the plaza was tumbled down, broken in pieces, and the head borne in triumph through the city. It is also stated that the crowd, intoxicated with joy and frantic with revenge, afterwards proceeded to the monument where the leg of their Dictator had been buried with so much pomp a year or two since, broke it into atoms, and then kicked and dragged the embalmed limb through the plazas and principal thoroughfares. While all this was being enacted by the mob, the more prominent citizens were rejoicing heartily in the change of Government. Messages of congratulation between the triumphant Senate and House were interchanged, and the new President, Herrera, was waited upon by the crowds, who appeared most joyous in obtaining relief from the despotic ruler under which they have groaned since the downfall of Bustamente. Such were the scenes enacted in Mexico—great were the rejoicings all over the country.

The revolution against Santa Anna appears to be general, yet we hear of little bloodshed except at Jalapa, where a few persons were killed. At Puebla, the inhabitants rose as with one voice, tumbled down the statue of the obnoxious Tyrant, and tore his portrait into a thousand tatters.

Here we will insert an extract of a letter to a gentleman in this city, showing the completeness of the revolution. It is dated, "Vera Cruz, Dec. 11, 1844.

"As far as I can learn, no place holds out for Santa Anna. Jalapa, Perote, [Girzala], and [...] have pronounced, and the great man's fall appears to me inevitable. I do not see a loophole for him to creep out of, and I shall be glad if I am the first to give you this decisive news.

"This has been a revolution of public opinion. Not a sword has been drawn nor a drop of blood spilt; and, amidst all the apparent disorder of a revolution, and with no military to restrain the populace, no excess has been committed.

"Here Santa Anna's portrait was taken out of the Municipal Rooms and thrown to the populace, who tore it into a thousand pieces. The greatest enthusiasm prevailed; and, as I said before, in the midst of all this confusion, there is not a single instance of any excess having been committed. This is the triumphs of popular opinion over the force of arms, and is the commitment of a new era in the existence of the Mexican Republic.

"It is asserted, that the new government offers Santa Anna no terms short of his paying up the twelve millions of dollars of the public money he is charged with having uselessly squandered or appropriated to his own private purposes. This condition it can scarcely be possible to execute, and in default of complying with it, the disposed tyrant is threatened with death."

By Mr. Ramey, of sundry citizens of London for a special road law for said country;

By Mr. Stephenson, of citizens of Tyler county for the right of way to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

The House resumed the consideration of the Southwestern Turnpike Road bill - Mr. Garnett's motion for indefinite postponement still pending.

Mr. Lee sustained and Mr. Witcher opposed the bill.

Mr. Preston replied at length to [...] of Halifax, and Witcher, and in support of the bill.

Mr. Rice opposed the bill.

The vote was then taken and the bill indefinitely postponed by the following vote:

On motion of Mr. Anderson, the House adjourned.
Wingfield appointed Secretary; and the following [ . . . ] and Resolutions were {...} adopted:

Whereas, it is believed that the Militia System of Virginia is radically defective, and not [ . . . ] to answer the purposes for which it was intended; and whereas, it is the sincere desire of the members of this meeting to see the system place, upon a better footing throughout the Senate, and also have an opportunity afforded them[ . . . ] no training the regiment in which they [ . . . ] commissions, as to render it an efficient and valuable force to the country, in time of danger; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we cordially approve of the resolutions recently adopted by our brother officers of the 87th regiment in the county or King William, and that we go heart and hand with them and all others who have pursued a similar course in their laudable efforts to reform the Military system of Virginia.

Resolved, That we heartily approve and [ . . . ] earnestly second their recommendation to the officers of the different Regiments throughout the State to hold meetings and to appoint delegates to the Military Convention proposed to be [ . . . ] in the city of Richmond on the first Monday in January next.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the Richmond Whig and Enquirer.

And, thereupon, on motion, the meeting was adjourned. THOS. M. WHITE, President [ . . . ] M. Wingfield, Secretary

At a meeting of the [illegible] consider the reorganization of the militia is the State, Col. Spencer A. Mann was called to the Chair, and Lieut. Thomas E. Bottom appointed Secretary.

The object of the meeting having been explained, the following Resolutions were unanimously adopted:

1. Resolved. That a well regulated militia begin essential to the security of a free State, and the present militia system in Virginia being extremely defective, we conceive it to be of paramount importance that it should undergo a material reformation.

2. Resolved. That we cordially approve the resolutions adopted by the officers of the 87th Regiment Virginia Militia, recommending to all the officers of the militia in the Commonwealth, [ . . . ] hold a Convention in the city of Richmond on the third Monday in January next for the purpose of devising some plan for the better organization and discipline of the militia of the State, by which military spirit, at present depressed and withering, may be revived and encouraged."

nation through her initiatory struggles, by exhibitions of favor and protection, not less obvious in the course of events, and in the connection of cause and effect, than the pillar and the flame, which absently proceeded and led his chosen people in their journey to the promised land.

"The fears of our friends touching the permanency of our institutions, and the misrepresentations of our enemies abroad, have no doubt heretofore had an effect greatly to lessen—the amount of emigration from other countries to this; but within the past year the [ . . . ] influence of these causes has been greatly mitigated, through doubtless not completely removed—This is apparent, from the tide of emigration, consisting of thousands of families, which, during the last few months, has flowed into the Northern, Eastern and other portions of our territory—so that the rich harvests and plenteous crops, which in those sections crowned the labors of the cultivator of the soil, have not sufficed to prevent a temporary scarcity of provisions, in a land hitherto overflowing with abundance."

General Houston notices the subject in very dignified and eloquent terms, as the reader will perceive, from the following extract which is contained in the New Orleans Tropic of the 31st ultimo.

The election of Mr. Polk over the ill-starred Clay seems to have been hailed with great pleasure in Texas. It has cheered the people, and encouraged them in the hope of annexation. A public meeting at Matagorda was held on the 7th, for the purpose of exchanging congratulations upon the result of the Presidential election in the United States. The "Texas National Register" (printed at the town of Washington, on the 21st) denies, that the new President has yet given any grounds to suspect him of any opposition to annexation.

Texas, Part of Louisiana

The National Intelligencer, true to its instincts, where the interests of a foreign State clash with those of the United States, comes forward in its last No. with an article under the head of a "Legal Definition of the bounds of Louisiana as by us purchased of France." The object is to prove that Texas was no part of Louisiana-that "we ourselves voluntarily adopted, on the side of Texas, the line of the Sabine-then and now the line of possession-as the real extent of our purchase from France, as the true Louisiana. All the rest, then—the subsequent claim to Texas—was but a diplomatic after-thought, skillfully employed to make Spain yield to us what we really then wanted-Florida." It also professes to quote the acts of Congress of October 1803, authorizing the President to take possession of the territory—and the act of March, 1804, erecting Louisiana into two territories—and the act of 1811, to enable the people of the territory of Orleans to form a State Government—as evidences, on part of Congress, "and the administration that made and sanctioned the Treaty," to show that they did not claim beyond the Sabine. "What, then, (says the Intelligencer,) becomes now of the proposed re-annexation, or of the proposition to admit the State of Texas into the Union?

This is indeed a desperate effort to cut us off from Texas. It professes to lay down a boundary to the territory acquired by Mr. Jefferson, which neither he nor any of his successors ever sanctioned. He, as well as the rest of them, in fact, contended for a line West of the Sabine—and the very act of cession of the territory West of the Sabine, to Spain, in lieu of Florida, shows that, in the opinion of Messrs. Monroe and Adams, at the time (in 1819) they were ceding what did belong to us, (West of the Sabine.) And the efforts of Messrs. Adams and Clay afterwards show, that they were anxious to reclaim what had been so improvidently ceded. We have rarely seen, indeed, a bolder effort made to deny the concurrent evidence of our historical documents, or to cloak a grosser effort to defeat the interests of our country by a misrepresentation of our records.

We shall first notice the facts upon which it relies—and then introduce other facts which it has carefully suppressed.

The Intelligencer confesses, that the act of 1803 furnishes no evidence on the point of issue. It is a simple authority to take possession of the newly-acquired Territory.

The act of 1804 divides the Territory into two portions—one which was called the Territory of Orleans—and the residue into another, called by the general name "District of Louisiana." The former is run West "to the Western boundary of the said cession."

The act of 1811 erects the territory of Orleans into a State, under the name of the State of Louisiana. Its Western boundary is here specified to be "the river Sabine" and, therefore, the Intelligencer argues, that the Sabine was regarded in the act of 1804 as the "Western boundary of the said cession." This is clearly a non \ldots~

But to show how completely the Intelligencer misrepresents the whole subject of the Western boundary, we subjoin the following interesting extracts from Mr. Walker's able letter, to show that Mr. Jefferson, who acquired the Territory, and the succeeding Presidents, never did confine themselves to the Sabine; but that they claimed beyond it to the Rio del Norte. These historical records are conclusive—and now we ask the N. Intelligencer whether we have
"Is it expedient (says Mr. Walker,) to reannex Texas to the American Union?-This is the greatest question, since the adoption of the Constitution, ever presented for the decision of the American people. Texas was once our own: and, although surrendered by treaty to Spain, the surrender was long resisted by the American government, and was conceded to be a great sacrifice. This being the case, is it not clear that, when the territory which we have most reluctantly surrendered, can be re-acquired, that object should be accomplished? Under such circumstances, to refuse the re-annexation is to deny the wisdom of the original purchase; and to reflect upon the judgment of those who maintained, even at the period of surrender, that it was a great sacrifice of national interest.

(illegible) as New Orleans itself: that it was a part of that region, is demonstrated by the discovery, by the great Basalle, of the source and mouth of the Mississippi, and his occupancy for France West of the Colorado. Our right to Texas, as a part of Louisiana, was asserted and demonstrated by Presidents Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and John Q. Adams. No one of our Presidents has ever doubted our title; and Mr. Clay has ever maintained it as clear and unquestionable. Louisiana was acquired by a treaty with France, in 1803, by Mr. Jefferson; and in the letter of Mr. Madison, the Secretary of State, dated March 31, 1804, he says, expressing his own views and those of Mr. Jefferson that Louisiana "extended westwardly to the Rio Bravo, otherwise called Rio del Norte. Orders were accordingly obtained from the Spanish authorities for the delivery of all the posts on the West side of the Mississippi." And in his letter of the 31st January, 1804, Mr. Madison declares that Mr. Laussat, the French commissioner who delivered the possession of Louisiana to us, announced the "Del Norte as its true boundary." Here, then, in the delivery of the possession of Louisiana by Spain to France, and France to us, Texas is included. In the letter of Mr. Madison of the 8th July, 1804, he declares the opposition of Mr. Jefferson to the "relinquishment of any territory whatever Eastward of the Rio Bravo." In the letter of James Monroe of the 8th November, 1803, he encloses documents which he says "prove incontestably" that the boundary of Louisiana is "the Rio Bravo to the West;" and Mr. Pinckney unites with him in a similar declaration. In a subsequent letter-not to a foreign government, but to Mr. Madison-of the 30th April, 1805, they assert our title as unquestionable. In Mr. Monroe's letters, as Secretary of State, dated Jan. 19, 1816, and June 10, 1816, he says none could question "our title to Texas," and he expresses his concurrence in opinion with Jefferson and Madison: "that our title to the Del Norte was as near as to the island of New Orleans." In his letter, as Secretary of State, to Don Onis, of the 12th March, 1818, John Quincy Adams says: "The claim of France always did extend westward to the Rio Bravo;" "she always claimed the territory which you call Texas as being within the limits, and forming a part of Louisiana." After demonstrating our title to Texas in this letter, Mr. Adams says: "well might Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe write to M. Cavallias, in 1805, that the claim of the United States to the boundary of the Rio Bravo was as clear as their right to the island of New Orleans." Again, in his letter of the 31st October, 1818, Mr. Adams says our title to Texas is 'established beyond the power of further controversy.'

"Here, then, by the discovery and occupation of Texas, as part of Louisiana, by LaSalle, for France in 1685; by the delivery of possession to us in 1803, by Spain and France; by the action of our government from the date of the treaty of acquisition to the date of the treaty of surrender, (avowedly so on its face;) by the opinion of all our Presidents and ministers connected in any way with the acquisition, our title to Texas was undoubted. It was surrendered to Spain by the treaty of 1819; but Mr. Clay maintained in his speech of the third April, 1820, that territory could not be alienated merely by a treaty; and consequently that, not withholding the treaty, Texas was still our own. In the cession of a portion of Maine, it was asserted, in legislative resolutions, by Massachusetts and Maine, and conceded by this government, that no portion of Maine could be ceded by treaty without the consent of Maine. Did Texas assent to this treaty, or can we cede part of a territory, but not of a State? These are grave questions; they raise the point whether Texas is not now a part of out territory, and whether her people may not now rightfully claim the protection of our government and laws. Recollect this was not a question of settlement, under the powers of this Government of a disputed boundary.-The treaty declares, as respects Texas, that we cede to his Catholic majesty.1 Commenting on this in his speech before referred to, Mr. Clay says it was not a question of the power in case of dispute 'of fixing a boundary previously existing.' It was on the contrary, the case of an avowed cession of territory from the United States to Spain."- Although, then, the government may be competent to fix a disputed boundary, by ascertaining as near as practicable where it is; although, also, a State, with the consent of this government, as in the case of Maine, may cede a portion of her territory-yet it by no means follows that this government, by treaty, could cede a territory of the Union. Could we by treaty cede Florida to Spain, especially without consulting the people of Florida? and if not, the treaty by which Texas was surrendered was, as Mr. Clay contended, inoperative.

"By the treaty of 1803, by which, we have seen Texas was acquired by us from France, we pledged our faith to France, and to the people of Texas, never to surrender that territory. The 3d article of that treaty declares: "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property and the religion which they profess." Such was our pledge to France and to the people of Texas, by the treaty of cession to Spain was not unconstitutional and invalid, it was a gross infraction of a previous treaty, and of one of the fundamental conditions under which Texas was acquired.

"Here, then, are many grave questions of constitutional power. Could the solemn guaranty to France, and to the people of Texas, be rescinded by a Treaty with Spain? Can this Government, by its own mere power, surrender any portion of its territory? Can it cut off a territory without the consent of its people, and surrender them and the territory to a foreign power? Can it expatriate and expel from the Union its own citizens, who occupy that territory, and change an American citizen into a citizen of Spain or Mexico?-These are momentous questions, which it is not necessary now to determine, and in regard to which I advance at this time no opinion. Certain, however, it is, that with the consent of the people of Texas, Congress can carry out the solemn pledges of the Treaty of 1803, and admit one or more States from Texas into the Union.

"The question as to Texas is, in any aspect, a question of the re-establishment of our ancient boundaries, and the re-possession of a territory moat reluctantly surrendered. The surrender of territory, even if constitutional, is almost universally inexpedient and unwise, and in any event, when circumstances may seem to demand such a surrender, the territory thus abandoned should always be re-acquired whenever it may be done with justice and propriety. Independent of these views, we have the recorded opinion of John Quincy Adams as President, and Henry Clay as Secretary of State, and also of General Andrew Jackson as President, and Martin Van Buren as Secretary of State, that Texas ought to be re-annexed to the Union. On the 26th of March, 1825, Mr. Clay, in conformity with his own views, and the express directions of Mr. Adams as President, directed a letter to Mr. Poinsett, our Minister at Mexico, instructing him to endeavor to procure from Mexico a transfer to us of Texas and the Del Norte. In this letter Mr. Clay says, "the President wishes you to effect that object." Mr. Clay adds: "The line of the Sabine approaches our great Western mart nearer than could be wished. Perhaps the Mexican Government may not be unwilling to establish that of the Rio Bravos de Dios, or the Rio Colorado, or the Snow Mountains, or the Rio del Norte, in lieu of it." Mr. Clay urges, also, the importance of having entirely within our limits the Red river and Arkansas, and their respective tributary streams."

"On the 15th of March, 1827, Mr. Clay again renewed the effort to procure the cession of Texas in his letter of instruction, of that date, to our minister at Mexico, he says: "The President has thought the present might be an auspicious period for urging a negotiation at Mexico, to settle the boundary of the two republics." If we could obtain such a boundary as we desire, the government of the United States might be disposed to pay a reasonable pecuniary compensation. The boundary we prefer is that which, beginning at the mouth of the Rio del Norte in the sea shall ascend that river to the mouth of the Rio Puerco [sic]. thence ascending this river to its source, and from its source by a line due north to strike the Arkansas; thence following the southern bank of the Arkansas to its source, in latitude 42 degrees north; and thence by that parallel of latitude to the South sea. And he adds, the treaty may provide "for the incorporation of the inhabitants into there Union."

"Mr. Van Buren, in his letter, as Secretary of State, to our Minister at Mexico, dated August 25, 1829, says: "It is the wish of the President that you should, without delay, open a negotiation with the Mexican Government for the purchase of so much of the province of Texas as is hereinafter described." "He is induced, by a deep conviction of the real necessity of the proposed acquisition, not only as a guard for our Western frontier, and the protection of New Orleans, but also to secure forever to the inhabitants of the valley of the Mississippi the undisputed and undisturbed possession of the navigation of that river." "The territory, of which a cession is desired by the United States, is all that part of the province of Texas which lies East of a line beginning at the Gulf of Mexico, in the center of the desert, or grand prairie, which lies West of the Rio Nueces."

"On the 20th of March, 1833, Gen. Jackson' through Mr. Livingston as Secretary of State, renews to our minister at Mexico the former "instructions on the subject of the proposed cession. On the 2d of July, 1835, Gen. Jackson, through Mr. Forsyth as Secretary of State, renews the instructions to obtain the cession of Texas, and expresses "an anxious desire to secure the very desirable alteration in our boundary with Mexico." [Illegible] minister at Mexico endeavor to procure us, from that Government, the following boundary, 'beginning at the Gulf of Mexico, proceeding along the eastern bank of the river Rio Bravo del Norte, to the 37th parallel of latitude; and thence along that parallel to the Pacific.' This noble and glorious proposition of Gen. Jackson would have secured to us, not only the whole of Texas, but also the largest and most valuable portion of upper California, together with the bay and harbor of San Francisco, the best on the western coast of America, and equal to any in the world. If, then, it was deemed, as it is clearly proved, most desirable to obtain the re-annexation of Texas, down to a period as late as August, 1835, is it less important at this period?"

The Legislature of Massachusetts is now in session, and the new Governor has sent in his Message. The Boston Morning Post analyzes its positions with its usual acumen, and remarks, among other things, that ""His Excellency say not a word of South Carolina, and has disapproved many in not declaring war against that State; but his is probably reserved for a special message.

"The main theme of the address is Texas, and on this the Governor revises the stale arguments which the people voted down in the last election, and shows that Massachusetts is now just as wise and just as liberal as she was when she opposed the annexation of Louisiana. We trust that the Democratic members of the Legislature will not be led from the only true position of the National Democratic Party by his Excellency’s twattle on this topic which he treats like a small caucus lecturer, rather than like a statesman. It seems to be small pickings for a Governor in a State paper to make as much as he attempts to do of Mr. Murphy’s Texas letters."
"His Excellency end his homily on Texas with a right solemn warning, that if we annex Texas, our Republic will turn out just like Rome, and that Texas will bring the barbarians to our gates, as love of conquest did to the gates of the eternal city; which proves satisfactorily, that his Excellency has read Goldsmith's History of Rome! You can find any quantity of the same sort of prophecy in the old Federal papers and messages about Louisiana."

Letter to the Editor, The Question of Annexation [written by Mr. Dromgoole]

We lay before our readers the following letter, received by yesterday's mail. It presents a new proposition from Mr. Dromgoole, which is entitled to serious attention, not only on account of the high source from which it proceeds, but from the character of its provisions.

The provision in Mr. Niles's bill, which adopts the line of the Missouri Compromise, excites much observation and some objection. It is said, at Washington, that Texas might reject the offer of Annexation, if it were coupled with such a condition, as to any part of her territory, which is cut off by 36 degrees, 20 minutes, by the Missouri Compromise line.

We cannot but confidently indulge the hope, that some wise and conciliatory compromise may be pursued by the friends of Annexation, before the expiration of the present session. The Globe, of Monday last, cheers us in this expectation. It says, that "It is well ascertained now that majority exists in the House, and probably in the [...] also, in favor of re-annexing Texas to the Union. The conditions alone remain to be adjusted."

The Globe further says:

"The Treaty scheme of last session, as presented in joint resolutions, it is understood will not pass in either branch. The proposition of recognising our obligations to Texas, under the Treaty of Mr. Jefferson in 1803, and entitling it to admission as a State at once, or as a Territory, with a view to subdivision, for admission in several States, with the principle of the Missouri Compromise engrafted, seems to meet with most favor. It is possible, however, that the act of the present Congress may take the shape of that under which Mr. Jefferson secured Louisiana, being an appropriation to enable the President elect to effect at once what he may be instructed to accomplish in some form or other; submitting the alternatives to his discretion, and the confirmation of the next Congress."

Washington City, Jan. 8, 1845

To-day, another plan for the admission of Texas into the Union was submitted to the House. It was introduced by Mr. Dromgoole, the Representative from the Petersburg District. It was more brief and simple than any yet offered. It is not encumbered or embarrassed by questions of doubtful powers, and difficult constructions. Without complication, it rest plainly upon a single provision of the Constitution--"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." It gives in advance he consent of Congress to the formation of the new State, with the approbation of the existing Government and authorities of Texas, and with a Constitution to be framed and adopted by a Convention of People. It provides, that on a day certain hereafter (not immediately) the new State shall be received and admitted into this Union. It is understood, that Mr. Dromgoole relies for precedent and authority for this provision, admitting the State on a future named day, upon the act of Congress approved February 4, 1791, enacting and declaring that Kentucky should be received and admitted into this Union on the first day of June, 1792, more than one year after the passage of the act; and also upon the act, approved February 18, 1791, enacting and declaring that, on the 4th day of March, 1791, the State of Vermont shall be received and admitted into this Union, less than one month after the passage of the act. (See Laws of Congress, vol. 2, pages 191, 2, 3.)

The acts referred to are very short and simple; and it might perhaps be well to publish them in the Enquirer, for the information of your readers. It is worthy of remark, that all the States except Vermont, had ratified the Constitution, had thus adopted "this Union," and had thereby superseded the previously [...] articles of Confederation. Vermont was out of the Union. It is believed, that the Judicial system of the U. States adopted under Constitution, did not embrace Vermont. And the act of Congress of taking the census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United State, approved March 1, 1790, did not embrace the inhabitants of Vermont. In this condition, Vermont applied for admission as a new State, and was so admitted by the act of February 18, 1790, and then, by an act approved March 2, 1791, effect was given to the laws of the United States within the State of Vermont, by extending the judicial system to the same, providing for taking the census, and for the application and enforcement of the act providing for the collection of duties.
Below I give you a copy of the bill introduced by Mr. Dromgoole. Your's respectfully.

A Bill declaring that consent of Congress that a new State be formed within the jurisdiction of the Republic of Texas, and admitted into this Union.

Be it [...] by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, and it is hereby enacted and declared, That the Congress both consent that a new State may be erected with the jurisdiction of the Republic of Texas, adjoining the States of Louisiana and Arkansas, and bounded also by the Gulf of Mexico, with a Republican form of Government, to be adopted by the inhabitants of said Republic, assembled, by deputies, in Convention, with the consent of the existing Government, in order that said new State may be admitted into this Union.

And be it further enacted and declared, That the foregoing consent of the Congress is given upon the following conditions, to wit: That the new State shall be formed, and its Government adopted, prior to the fourth day of July in the present year; and that the boundaries of the said new States, conforming to the outlines before stated, and containing an area not exceeding-thousand square miles, shall be defined by the Convention of deputies, and inserted in the Constitution or form of Government; and that the assent of the State shall also be inserted, to such boundaries of the remaining territory, property pertaining to Texas, and to be claimed and held by said new State on superseding the present Government, as may be settled and defined by the Government, as may be settled and defined by the Government of the United States by negotiation and treaty, or otherwise.

And be it further enacted and declared, That on the said fourth day of July, in the present year, the said new State, having been thus formed and defined by the name and style of the State of Texas shall be revived and admitted into this Union, as a new and entire member of the U. States of America.

The Richmond Whig [...] is most [...] Northern Federal allies, in its bitter opposition to the annexation of Texas. It stigmatizes certain resolutions submitted to the Virginia Senate by General Wallace of Fauquier as "reprehensible, detestable and revolting," and full of "atrocity." Speaking of the proposed admission of Texas under the Treaty of Louisiana, the Whig thus grossly winds up its Article:

"Such a proposition is now unblushingly advanced, under the influence of Texas pecuniary interests, (not that we mean that Gen. Wallace is anything more than the cats-paw!) to the Senate of Virginia itself. We hope that honorable body, without the least regard to party, and in defiance of party influence, will spurn the proposition out of their hall, never before debased by a proposal so unjust."

It is a pity that this pure and disinterested Editor, whose sole weapon consists in attacking the motives of others, could not find other arguments against the great measure, than the pecuniary interests. Which he has so long and so childishly harped upon, and which some of the leading men of his own party have so scathingly refuted. The people are sick of such puerile attacks-without the least foundation, and unworthy of a manly discussion of important principles. The Whig has grossly misrepresented General Wallace. He is no "cat's paw" of any man or set of men. The able report and resolutions, (which he has submitted on the Distribution Resolutions,) as well as the report on the subject of Texas, are the fruits of his own vigorous mind and unbiased freedom of thought and of action. They speak the sentiments of Virginia and of the Union-and we are yet to see, if the representatives of the people will be bold enough to "spurn out of" either Legislative Hall, the popular will most clearly and undeniable expressed at the late election. The Whig is counting without its host, when it violates all decency and denounces in such gross language-a proposition which a great many independent men of its own party will glory in seeing achieved.

Hermitage, January 1, 1845 [written by Andrew Jackson]

My Dear Mr. Blair:-I cannot forbear, on this first day of the year 1815, to let you know that I am still in the land of the living, although, greatly afflicted and debilitated. My whole family join me in kind salutations to you and yours, wishing you the joys of the season. May you all live to see many happy New Years.

I observe that you have before Congress too many joint resolutions for the reannexation of Texas.-This argues want of unanimity in the Democracy upon this great national and most important subject. I have just received from Maj. Donnellson, a letter dated at Washington, in Texas, from which I would infer, that if Congress expects to annex Texas to the U.S., they must act speedily, or it will be found to be beyond our grasp. The rejection of the advances of Texas has given offence to some, and a handle to others to press the liberal propositions of England upon the Texians, together with the splendid view of Texas independent, growing into a vast Republic, in time to embrace not only the limits of Texas, but all the domain once Montezuma’s. This view, to ambitious aspirants added to the guaranties of England of her independence, and the loan of large sums for ten years, based upon a Treaty that English manufactures shall be free of duty, is gaining a party in Texas. General Houston is still the leading star; and his influence alone can be counted upon to resist the present influence of England and its increasing power. How long this influence of England can be successfully withstood in Texas, is becoming a very questionable matter. I have taken a view of the whole ground giving to all information it due weight, and I say to you, that, unless Congress acts upon this subject promptly, Texas will be beyond our grasp, and [...] to the United States forever, unless regained by the sword. What will be the situation of our country, with a British manufactures introduced duty free into Texas? Comment is unnecessary.

I hazard nothing in saying that, if the present Congress does not act promptly upon this subject, the next will not
I am exhausted; but, from Major Donnellson’s letter, and other sources of information, the danger of losing Texas seemed so imminent, that altho’ feeble, I could not forbear to say this much to you, that you might communicate it to my friends. May God bless you and yours.

To the Editors of the Enquirer, Washington City, Jan. 10, 1845

Up to 4 P.M., nothing definite had been heard in this city, relative to the affair between [...] and [...]. At nine o’clock, A.M., one or both the parties were at Barnum’s Hotel, Baltimore.

I send you the following extract from the Houston City Telegraph, received here by the last mail:

“...it is probably known to many of our readers, that a proposition is now, and has been for some time, before this Government, to the effect that England and France conjointly, or England alone, [...] Mexico, and guarantee our independence, upon condition that we forever renounce annexation to the American Union. The proposition so naturally results from that trans-Atlantic policy which has been long avowed, both officially and by Government journals, that it now appears to be considered as a matter of course, by our best informed citizens. Our information on this subject is [...] from those in the confidence of that government.”

I can assure you that from a personal knowledge of the Editor of the Telegraph, as well as the standing of the Journal, (the first in Texas) that the paragraph is entitled to confidence. Thus it appears, that England has moved in the matter. Up to this day I had not feared that the failure to consummate re-annexation during the present session of Congress would endanger the chance session of Congress would endanger the chance session of Congress would endanger the chance session of Congress would endanger the chance of effecting it at the next, so far as Texas herself is concerned, because it seemed improbable that England would run the risks consequent upon a direct interference with our concerns. But as Texas has now the alternative of choosing between the chances of annexation on the one hand, and the certainty of absolute and unconditional freedom from Mexico on the other, with the almost certain prospect too, of advantageous commercial treaties with England and France, no rational man can doubt that she will choose “the bird in the hand” rather than the “two in the bush” that she will embrace the liberal offer of those European powers who see in re-annexation nought but additional strength for the institution [...] commercial resources of the United States, rather than take the alternative of a fourth of next March goes by without the consummation of the project, argues very little knowledge of human nature.

The lending politician of Texas is both [...] and skillful for, he has learned the diplomats art in a hard but sound school—that of adversity. I doubt if Houston’s superior as a diplomatist now lives. You may be surprised at this section, but one unacquainted with the numerous and carried difficulties though which he has guided the Texian bark of State for the last ten years, cannot imagine the trouble by which he has been surrounded. At this moment, [...] not President of the little Republic, he holds in his hands, not only its destinies, but to a certain extent those of the United States; and when he advises his Government that the chances of re-annexation are doubtful, it must move in the only line of policy left to secure certain and absolute independence of Mexico. As an Independent Government, its policy to arrive at national importance is too plain to be mistaken. It must form (as it how can at any moment,) a commercial treaty with England, reviving her manufactures either duty free or at the nominal Tariff, and securing in return the advantage resulting from a market in England, duty free, for her [...]. It must strive to make Galveston the depot for at least one half the manufactured goods consumed in the Mississippi Valley; to be transshipped and smuggled into the South-western States through the tributaries of the Mississippi river. One who can doubt that such will can be inevitable result of a failure to annex Texas this Winter, as her present relations with Britain stand, has neither eyes to see, ears to hear, nor mind to understand the simples and most natural consequences of national rivalry. A treaty which shall tender the provisions of the Tariff of 1842 inoperative against England, in the consuming half of the United States on the one side, while it makes the cotton of Texas worth per pound the amount of the English duty more than American cotton of like quality on the other hand, offers too great is temptation, both to England and Texas, to allow me a least to believe, that it will not be formed the instant the latter Government finds herself obliged to look out for her own interests, and for them alone. It is into this hazard that the spirit of Federalism is now driving our country.

A communication was received from the Senate, by their Clerk, stating that they had passed acts "Changing the times of holding the County Courts of Jackson County."

Barbour, Marion, and Taylor;"

"Allowing Cromwell Orrick further time to establish his Ferry;" and "Authorizing a Ferry from the lands of William Jones, in the county of Brooke, across the Ohio River."

Petitions, &c., were presented and referred:

By Mr. FRAZIER, of Thomas Clarke and other citizens of August, for an increase of the Capital Stock of the Staunton and James River Turnpike Company, to enable them to McAdamize their road; also, of R.D. Hill and others to the same effect; also, another to the same effect; - also, of George Baylor, jr., and J.H. Evans, for the refunding of a sum of money to them;

By Mr. MARSHALL of F., of the President, &c., of the Fauquier and Alexandria Turnpike Company, for a suspension of the act of 1834, with regard to domestic lotteries;

By Mr. O'FERRALL, of sundry millers and farmers of Morgan county, and of mechanics, doctors, merchants, and farmers of Washington county, Maryland, against the right of way to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, except upon certain conditions.

By Mr. CAMPBELL, of citizens of Bedford and Campbell, for authority to religious and benevolent Societies to receive and hold requests;

By Mr. STURM, proceeding of the County Court of Barbour [illegible]

By Mr. VAN BUREN, proceedings of the Bath County Court, for a change of Court day;

By Mr. RAMEY, petition of citizens of Loudoun, for the call of a Convention;

By Mr. POULSON, of Thomas Underhill, for payment for services rendered during the late war;

By Mr. BOLLING, of J.C. Swann, John Pollard, and eight-two other citizens of Petersburg, asking an appropriation for him erection of a public depository of arms in said town;

By Mr. TOLER, documents relative to the petition of Amanda Crow, for a divorce; - also a petition of Sidney S. Baxter and Thomas H. Ellis, Committee of the Stockholders of the James River & Kanawha Company, for aid for certain specified objects;

By Mr. MOSELEY, a remonstrance of sundry citizens of Buckingham against the removal of the precinct election from Goodwyn’s Church, in said county?

By Mr. Fulton of August, a communication from the Superintend of the Western Asylum, for a geographical division of the State in relation to the Eastern and Western Lunatic Asylums;

By Mr. COOTES, a remonstrance of citizens of August against having the Staunton and James River Turnpike Road McAdamized; and

By Mr. TAYLOR of Norfolk Borough, a petition of citizens of Norfolk Borough for an amendment of their character.

By Mr. HOBSON, that the Committee of Propositions, &c., enquire into the expediency of establishing a warehouse for he inspection of tobacco, on the land of Edward W. Sims, in the town of Car Jar, in Cumberland county;

Also, that the Committee of Courts, &c., report a bill requiring the same forms in the transfer of personal estate, held by females before marriage, as are now required in the transfer of real estate;

By Mr. TAYLOR of Loudoun, that the Committee on Finance enquire into the expediency of abolishing the tax on writs.

A message from the Senate by Mr. BONDURANT, that they had agreed to the resolution of this House, for the election of the officers of the Capitol and Penitentiary Institution, with an amendment, changing the day from the 13th to the 22nd January, and including also the election of a Councillor [sic] of State.

The House resumed the discussion of the contested election from Bath—and continued the canvassing of the votes on Van Buren’s poll objected to by Cameron, the contestant.

Mr. STOLVALL moved to reserve the decision of the Committee, and declare legal the vote of James N. McGuffin, who voted upon a title-bond, executed him on the 22nd of October, 1842, for which he paid the money at the time. By the terms of the title-bond, a deed for the land was to be made by the 1st January, 1844, or at anytime he should call for it—“according to his best recollection.” Cameron admits that he has seen said title-bond, and that the deed was to be made on or before the 1st January, 1844.

This motion was sustained by Messrs., STOVALL, BANKS, LEAKE, and BOWDEN, and opposed by Messrs. STOTHER, WITCHER, FULTON of Wythe, EDMUNDS of Halifax, and LEE, and was lost, ayes 57 to noes 67—Mr. Fulton of Wythe having called the ayes and noes.

The vote of said McGuffin was then declared to be illegal.

Mr. BANKS moved to reverse the decision of the committee, and to declare the vote of Thomas Smith legal. That vote was declared illegal by the committee, as there was no evidence that said Smith was twenty-one years of age, it being objected by the contestant that he was not of age. Mr. B. thought the contestant should prove the objections raised by the contestant, viz: that the voter was not of age.

Messrs. STOVALL, DAVIS of Orange and CARSON sustained and Messrs. GARNETT, BROADDUS of Caroline, Taylor of N.B., BROADUS of Culpepper and STROTHER opposed Mr. Bank’s motion, which was lost, ayes 51, noes 71, Mr. B. living called the ayes and noes—and the vote of said Smith declared illegal.

At this stage of the proceedings, on motion,

The House adjourned.

House of Representatives

Mr. CHOATE presented a petition from Chas. T. Page and other citizens of Boston, against the annexation of Texas.

Mr. HUNTINGTON presented a petition against the annexation of Texas, (place not heard.) Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

One also, from the same place against the existence of slavery in the District of Columbia. - Laid on the table.

Mr. ARCHER presented a memorial from citizens of Pennsylvania, asking for an alteration in the naturalization laws. Also, one from Madison county New York for the same purpose. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EVANS asked leave to introduce a bill providing for evidences of the public debt. Granted.

Mr. Johnson’s resolution in relation to the claims of persons residing on Homas’ grant, noticed yesterday, and asking the Judiciary Committee to inquire whether the Secretary of the Treasury acted in accordance with law in issuing patents to persons having no right to those lands, was taken up. Mr. Johnson spoke at considerable length in defense of his resolution in the competency of the Judiciary Committee to take cognizance of it.

Mr. DAYTON dissented from such a power being vested in the Committee, and offered an amendment giving the Judiciary Committee the right to report on the subject or not; if they should find, on examination, that the power to investigate the action of another department of the Government belonged exclusively to Congress, Mr. Johnson’s resolution should be adopted.

SMITHSONIAN LEGACY

Mr. CHOATE asked leave to withdraw a part of his amendment offered yesterday, by striking out the words beginning with the 24th line, in the first section, and after the word “provided.” It appeared, upon reconsideration of that proviso, that it made it peremptory on the board of managers of the institution to confine themselves to the purchase of a given description or kind of books. He did not wish to confine them to such narrow limits, but wished to give them a wider field for their operations. In lieu of the proviso was substituted the words “for the purchase of books on the arts, sciences and works in general,” but not to confine the purchase to books of this description exclusively.

Mr. CHOATE then asked to strike out the 7th section, and insert an amendment, to the effect that the managers of the institution should be empowered to employ a competent agent from time to time, to deliver lectures on the arts and sciences, and to pay him an adequate salary therefore; which was adopted. He also moved that the 8th section be struck out, which referred to the duties of professorships, which no longer existed in the bill, and substitute therefore a clause authorizing the purchase of a general assortment of books.

Mr. CRITTENDEN offered an amendment to this, designating such books to consist of those relating to the arts and sciences; which was negative.

Mr. NILES offered an amendment limiting the sum to $5,000 for such purpose.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked the Senate if by such an amendment, it was intended to make a library worthy of the age and nation in which we live? If so, he would oppose it on the ground of its inadequacy.

The amendment of Mr. Niles was also lost.

Mr. TAPPAN proposed the sum to be $91,000; which gave rise to a considerable debate, in which Messrs. Choate, Rives, Crittenden, Morehead, Bagby, Breese, and Niles participated. A compromise was effected finally, by an amendment of

Mr. MOREHEAD, adding $50,000 to the sum proposed by Mr. Tappan; and

On motion of Mr. PIERCE,

The Senate adjourned over till Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. McKay, from the committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriation for the support of the army for the year ending June 30, 1816.

Also, a bill making an appropriation for the support of the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1816;

Which were severally read a first and second time, referred to the committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

ANNEXATION OF TEXAS

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Hopkins in the Chair) and resumed the consideration of the resolution for the annexation of Texas in the United States.

Mr. E.S. HAMLIN expressed his opinion that never had there been brought before Congress a question of such general interest as the one now before them. The question was, whether our ship of State, our ship of Zion, which had been preserved for many tears, should now be moved from her moorings, and started on a voyage on an unknown sea; but he desired to have wanted no change in any one of them. The first question which stared them in the face was, not has the President and the Senate the power to annex Texas, but had Congress? If so, where was it to be found? He cared not in what form it was presented—whether it stood on the Treaty or on the principles of the treaty of 1819—whether in the bills and resolutions for this purpose—no matter in what form, it amounted to this: a proposition on our part, to be accepted by Texas—which would amount to a contract with a foreign nation. It was in vain to say that Texas was a part of ourselves, "bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh"—for had we no acknowledged her independence—did we not acknowledge it every day, but keeping our Charge d’ Affaires located near that Government. Texas, he again asserted, was an independent nation—and he saw no where in the Constitution the power to make a contract, as annexation would be, between nations acknowledged to e sovereign and independent. He referred to the Alpha of this question, and quoted from the correspondence of Messrs Upshur and Calhoun to our Ministers to Great Britain, Spain, &c., to show that the measure had its origin in the endeavor to prevent the abolition of slavery in Texas, and to demonstrate that, it was alleged emancipation would be advantageous to Great Britain and injurious to all other nations of the earth. This stood forth on official papers, in the correspondence with foreign Governments, by speeches made in and out of Congress, in this House, and in the other end of the Capitol. But what if money had been appropriated in England to set the slaves free in Texas? Would to God, that money was heaped up, not only to set the slaves free in Texas, but in all lands! Why should this alarm us? He then stated his views in detail.
Mr. WELLER contended that this question was not one affecting the people of any particular section of our country, but was of a national character, affecting all the commercial, agricultural, and navigating interests. It was one, on which the Representatives from every section were called to deliberate and judge for themselves. For himself, he would be unwilling to vote for the measure, had not the people, in the late Presidential Election, declared in favor of Annexation. The consummation of this object would open for the West a market for her cattle and breadstuffs, and afford to the North, likewise, a market for her manufactures. If any section of the country should be injured, it was the South, for the rich lands of Texas would thereby be brought into active competition with her own. They were bound not, only to guarantee undisturbed security to the South, but to preserve the compromises and assurances of the Constitution. If it were even necessary to annex the Northern portion of Great Britain bordering on the United States, to give to Maine or Vermont their constitutional rights he would not legislate to give to such a proposition his support. He insisted, and argues, that the extension of our territory would not result in war with any foreign power, and he replied to several gentlemen in the opposition who had preceded him; and, in conclusion, he expressed himself as not wedded to the resolutions for annexation, heretofore submitted by him; but, on the contrary, he did not believe that any of the propositions would violate the Constitution which he, in common with others, had sworn to support, and, therefore, he could vote for any of the measure before the committee.

Mr. BRENGLE opposed the resolutions; and called upon gentlemen who were in favor of them to point to that part of the Constitution which conferred on Congress the power to acquire foreign territory. There was no provision in that instrument which would justify it. That Congress had power to admit new States was clear, but there was no example, no precedent, that would warrant the annexation of Texas in the manner proposed. The Constitution had power not found in it was now sought to be exercised for the first time.

He argued against the admission, ad labium, of new States, by a mere majority of Congress, as calculated to open the way for increasing the number of the representative body, without regard to population, and in violation of the wholesome, just, and constitutional principle, that representation and taxation should go together. If it had been intended to admit foreign territory into the Union, there would have stood in the Constitution a provision palpable and indisputable. So far as regarded Texas, she did not ask us to protect her, but we were exhorted to woo her, that she might protect us.

Mr. CAREY, of Maine, addressed the Committee in favor of annexation, and when he concluded his remarks,

The SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and the House adjourned.

IN SENATE

Friday, January 10, 1845

The Senate did not sit to-day, having adjourned over to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. HALE asked leave to submit a proviso, which he said he intended to urge when the House should come to a vote on the various propositions for the annexation of Texas. He desired that it should take the usual course—be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. [Cries of "Read, read."]

The Speaker informed the gentlemen that it could be received only by general consent.

It was however read for information, and provides in substance that immediately after the boundary between the United States and Mexico shall be definitively settled by the two Governments and before any State shall be equally divided and in that portion lying south and west of the line, there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude. This arrangement to be considered as a compact, and binding, and forever remain unalterable, unless by the consent of two-thirds of the States of the Union.

Messrs, McCONNELL, BURKE, and SLIDELL objected to the reception of the proposition; whereupon,

Mr. HALE moved a suspension of the rules prescribing the order of business, and asked for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER said, that the motion could not now be made, in consequence of other business having precedence.

HOUR OF MEETING

The House proceeded to the consideration of resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Thompson, to change the daily meeting of the House to eleven o'clock, A.M., to which Mr. D. L. Seymour had proposed an amendment, as a substitute, that there be a daily evening session of the House, to commence at seven o'clock, P.M.

Mr. HOLMES moved that the resolution be laid upon the table, and
Mr. DUNCAN asked for the yeas and nays—which were taken, and the result was—yeas 78, nays 93.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The previous question was moved and seconded; and on the question, Shall the main question be now put?—being on the amendment—the yeas and nays were ordered and taken, and resulted in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 86.

The amendment was then rejected; and, on agreeing to the resolution the yeas and nays were asked, but not ordered; and

The question was taken by tellers—ayes 72, noes 79. So the resolution also was rejected.

TEXAS AGAIN

Mr. HALE moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to introduce the proviso above referred to, that it might be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and he asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The proviso being again real, at the request of several gentlemen,

Mr. HALE repeated his object in moving for a suspension of the rules. [A voice: "No speech now;" and another, "We understand it very well." "Go on, go on with the call."]

The yeas and nays were taken, and the House by a vote of yeas 92, nays 82, refused to suspend the rules—not being two-thirds.

On motion of Mr. J.W. Davis, of Indiana, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. Hopkins in the Chair) and resumed the consideration of the resolutions for the annexation of Texas to the United States.

Mr. SAMPLE opposed the measure, and especially the manner in which it was sought to be effected. Contracts and agreements between this and foreign nations could not constitutionally be made by the Legislature, but by the Executive or treaty making power. Suppose that were should now agree to admit Texas on certain terms, and those were acceded to and accepted by that Republic, and hereafter there should be a majority in both Houses adverse to the act, and should appeal it—what then would become of Texas? What cement would hold us to our contract or agreement? If, then, there was a power in the Constitution to annex Texas, or any other government similarly situated, the manner proposed in the resolution, there was certainly the same power to undo the act: and to what unfortunate results was the exercise of such an assumed power, in either case, likely to lead, should it be exercised! And in a country like ours, where public opinion was unstable, it was not improbably that a law passed by one Congress might be repealed by another. It was not designed by the framers of the Constitution, that any other territory than that acknowledged by the treaty with Great Britain in 1783, should be erected into States and admitted into the Union and he read various extracts from debates in Convention, etc., in support of his argument.

He argued that the position of the country, in its relations to the residue of the North American coast, would be infinitely safer without Texas than with it. In a military point of view, and every other, so far as the protection of the frontier was concerned, that nation, being independent, was a greater protection, than if she belonged to us—without subjecting us to the expense and trouble of fortifying the coast. He opposed the measure, further, that it was calculated to administer to the spirit of aggrandizement and conquest; for, it was observed by a gentleman from Alabama, the other day, that the "lone star" would, at some future time, float from the palace of the Montezuma's—and that, while it would "extend the area of freedom," as contended, it would, at the same time, extend the boundaries of slavery.

Mr. DEAN regarded this as the most important measure ever brought before Congress for deliberation. The question was had they the power, by the Constitution, to annex a sovereign State to the Union?—and this was, properly, the inquiry involved in the discussion. Gentlemen had insisted that the Constitution did not justify the acquisition of territory, but they had forgotten that in many of the States the Indian had receded before the force of the white man, and his hunting grounds converted into cities and fertile fields. Our march had been onward, and history demonstrated that our people had not rested contented with the narrow limits to which we were confined at the termination of the war of the Revolution. If this argument of the opposition were correct, how would we acquire Oregon? But he had no doubt whatever, that Congress had the power to admit Texas either as a Territory or as a State. The Federalists, under the cognomen of Whigs, denied it; for they were always on the wrong side, and never drew lessons of wisdom from the experience of the past, but they pressed on in the errors of their ways, with the tenacity of life, and with the same vigor that the miser clung to his gold.

The Speaker laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th of June last, requesting the President to cause to be communicated to the House a copy of the instructions of George W. Irving upon his appointment as minister plenipotentiary to Spain, in the year 1814, and afterwards during his mission to that court, which have not even heretofore made public. The report and the accompanying papers were very voluminous.
Mr. ADAMS moved that they be laid on the table, and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. JENKS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a joint resolution authorizing and directing the accounting officer of the Post Office Department to inquire into, audit, and settle the claims of Alexander M. Cumming, late mail contractor. It was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill making an appropriation for furnishing, painting, and repairing the Executive mansion, and for other purposes. It was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and was ordered to be printed.

The House then adjourned.

A letter from a Correspondent

The letter of our regular Correspondent form Washington, to whom we are indebted for so many valuable favors, is very able in the views which it takes, and interesting from the facts which it reveals. The quotation which it gives from the Houston Telegraph confirms the last, strong letter which Gen. Jackson has addressed to Mr. Blair. We must act- act, now-or we may lose Texas forever. NOW is the accepted time. We call upon our friends in Washington to hearken to these repeated counsels-to act with decision-and to adopt a conciliatory spirit, which must lead to success.

The signs are more cheering from Washington, in defiance of Hal[ . . . ] from New Hampshire. We are happy to hear that Col. Benton will give up his bill. Instructions are confidently expected from the Legislature of Maine to her Senators. The cause of annexation is gaining ground even in Massachusetts. It is thought that in a few days the members of Congress friendly to the measure will go into caucus, and adopt some available plan.

The Correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot thinks that Mr. Dromgoole’s scheme is the most popular. The correspondent of the New York News thinks it will prevail, perhaps with some modifications. The correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer (Whig) has changed his opinion, and is now fully convinced that an annexation proposition, in, some shape or other, will pass the House at this session. It is not at all improbable but that the measure may succeed in the Senate. I have this from the best authority. The chances now are that Texas will be annexed at this session of Congress." So be it.

We are sure it is unnecessary to call the public attention to the following manly and thrilling appeal from the Old Hero.

"It Is My Thunder!"

Mr. J P. Kennedy the Novelist of Swallow Barn and Horse Shoe took the floor on Saturday last, in the House of Representatives, in opposition to "annexation in any shape or form in which it may be presented.” He cut and slashed in every direction around him – just as boldly as if he had not written a very confident letter before the election, the predictions of which had all passed off in smoke. No Whig follows the footsteps of Mr. Clay more faithfully than the Representative of Baltimore. The moment the oracle pronounced the fiat from his tripod at Raleigh, Mr. K. determined to go against Texas, and he is now opposed to annexation in any form or phasis [sic] whatever. In his Saturday’s argument, he makes an allusion to a letter “he had recently seen from Washington to the Richmond Enquirer, which furnished evidence of the unanimity which prevailed in the Democratic party in relation to the question of annexation. The letter seemed to come from one who had become, by some means or other, well versed in the consultations on this subject. That letter was written before the holidays, and it announced the perplexities which prevailed at that time. It gave the names of parties to whom they had been referred for adjustment, and then prophesied that, by new year’s day, they would be brought into a state of harmony, and then they were to have some ‘thunder’ – Democratic thunder,” &c., &c.

If the anticipated harmony has not yet arrived, it is no reason why it may not yet take place. It is true, that many propositions have been made, (and Mr. K. notices most, and opposes all of them.) They have called forth much discussion among the friends of annexation; but in a spirit of harmony which promises the ultimate selection of some measure of annexation. There has been no want of “harmony” then, as our correspondent predicted – though as yet there has not been any unanimity of purpose. Our friends agree upon annexation – but not yet upon the best mode of affecting it. Every day’s discussion, however, is shedding new light upon the merits of the subject and the opinions of the members – and we confidently trust, that a new consultation among its friends may, in the course of this week, strike out some plan of compromise, which may reconcile its provisions to the Constitution, as well as to a majority of House.

Mr. K. will confess that our Correspondent is fight in one of his predictions. They have “thunder” – and they are likely to have enough of it – not “Democratic thunder” alone, but the mock thunder of the Theatre – not only the explosion of the Jupiter Tonans of the Democratic party, but the mimic thunder of the Whig Salmoneus, who “used to drive his chariot over a brazen bridge, and to dart his burning torches on every side, as if to imitate the lightening.” But Mr. K. may depend upon it, that it will require more than his thunder and lightening to defeat a measure, which the best interests of the country so earnestly recommend to one adoption.

Speech of Mr. Belser, of Alabama.

1. The House of Representatives, Jan. 3, 1845.

On the joint resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, proposing to annex the republic of Texas to the United States, and to the amendments offered thereto by Mr. Weller of Ohio and Mr. Douglas of Illinois.

Mr. BELSER having obtained the floor, rose and said that, in his opinion, a great error had accompanied most of our recent discussions. – He had scarcely heard an argument during the session, on any subject in which the speaker had failed to mention some incident connected with the late presidential election. Believing this to be the wrong, he had prescribed a rule for his guidance in future which was, that, whatever might be the topic finder consideration, he would endeavor to keep his vision bounded by the record. Arguments addressed to the popular ear were usually of a peculiar kind, well enough in then place, but when reiterated here they unfit the representative for correct thinking and were a waste of the public time.

The subject on which the House was now called to act had been before the people of the States in their primary assemblies; and without undertaking to say what had, or had not, been decided by them, he would say this: that a sufficient expression of opinion had been given throughout the United States to entitle this people, and the government of Texas, to action on this question. For some time past he had made up his mind in favor of it; and it on any occasion he had evinced an unnecessary zeal for its early consumation, be hoped that the fact would not be attributed to unjust motives. He was an American in feeling – a native of the sunny South – early taught to admire her institutions – to love her people; and under such circumstances; it was but natural that he should have the warmest, [ . . . ] for her prosperity. Having said this much in the way of introduction, he would next proceed to the examination of the interesting question before the committee.

The constitutional right of annexing a foreign republic to this Government, by a concurrence of the legislative power of both countries, presents for our consideration no common matter; and before such legislation is attempted, the ground on which we stand ought to be fully viewed Candor compelled him to admit, that, so far as his research had been extended, he had discovered no precedent embracing the exact point. Since the commencement of the present century, the Louisiana and Florida Territories had become portions of the United States, and out of the former several new States had been admitted into the Union; but these acquisitions to our national domain had, in the first instance, been obtained by the treaty-making power. There then being no legislative explosion which fully meets the question, we must, at a proper time, look into the character of our Government for its solution.

Some there are who contend that Texas cannot be constitutionally annexed to this Government, either by treaty, bill, or joint resolution. They assimilate the Union to a political firm, of which the States are members, and say that any contract of annexation made with Texas, without their entire assent, would be void. They entrench themselves behind the treaty of 1783, fixing the limits of the United States, and publish it as their opinion, that the power to admit new States vested in congress is to be confined to those limits. – They further declare, that slavery is a strain on our national escutcheon [sic], and that the authorities of the Federal Government have no right to increase it by the annexation of new slave territory to the Union: that, by virtue of the compact, it is limited to those States where it existed when the instrument was framed: that, under that compact, a single slave cannot be constitutionally brought into that Union; and yet, by the proposed annexation of Texas, all the slaves in that Republic are to be made to form a part of our population.

Those who hold these doctrines, with a few exceptions, are the abolitionists of the country – the men whose daily vocation is to slander and vilify, as far as they are able, the present administration. They hate the President and his Secretary. (Mr. Calhoun,) because these statesmen have foresight and firmness enough to counteract Great Britain – in a word, to be Americans. They are the same who once desired to see Louisiana remain a desert for howling where wolves to roam over, sooner than it should become a part of this Government. – Their direct influence in the councils of the nation is limited; but still they hold the balance of power several of the largest States. They are never found in any political conventions except their own; and, by strategy in, are endeavoring to circumscribe our institutions. They have their friends on this floor – men of great talent – whose exertions should be reserved for a better cause; for if slavery be the evil of which they speak, they should recollect that Great Britain, with the aid of New England, entailed it on us; and, further, that not only our prosperity, but likewise our personal security is involved in the keeping of the two races separate and distinct.

There are others who, to a certain extent, disagree with those whom he had just adverted to. – They acknowledge the right of the Treaty making power to admit foreign territory into the Union, but deny that it can be done by the legislation of this Government and Texas. They maintain that the Treaty-making power must first incorporate the territory, before Congress can [. . . ] the new States. They say that, by the Constitution, the power of making treaties is vested in the President and two-thirds of the Senate, and, being thus conferred, that Congress had no authority over the subject; that such legislation, if permitted would supersede the written Constitution and substitute for it the omnipotent [sic] of the British Parliament. They further contend, that the United States, having recognized the independence of Texas, by the act made her a perfect nation that every compact between independent nations is a Treaty; and that every Treaty must be made by the President, and afterwards be adhered to the Senate for ratification.

If the views of either of these parties are correct, then the question is concluded; for neither the consent of all the members of the Confederacy, nor that of two-thirds of the senate, can be obtained for the measure; and hence it becomes our duty to examine, with care, their positions.

In the settlement of these difficulties, which have been so eagerly presented by the opponents of Annexation, there are three clauses in the Constitution of the United States to which a fair interpretation must be given.

1st. The legislative power of the Union, vested in congress, and to consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

2d. The Treaty-making power, vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring in any Treaty which he may submit.

3d. The power of Congress to admit new States into the Union, under certain restrictions, intended to guard and protect the States.

From the reading of these several provisions, he interred that there could be but little difficulty in coming to a correct conclusion, provided the character of our government is kept clearly in view. All sovereignties of which history informs us are said to be based on three fundamental provisions executive, legislative and judicial. That mole in which these several powers are to be exercised, focus the main distinction between governments. In those which are unlimited, they are concentrated in a single individual. Sometimes they are lodged in a few select persons, and, when such is the case, it is denominated, an uncontrolled aristocracy. Our Government is unlike either of the foregoing. Sovereignty with us originally existed in the people of the State Governments. For the purpose of forming a more perfect union, a portion of it has been transferred by the Constitution to the Federal head. Congress, then, is the best exponent of the public will; for it is chosen by those who are, to a great extent, the original fountain of all legitimate authority.

The right of every nation to take care of itself, and to provide every thing which may be necessary for its preservation, is a principle too plain to be questions. The authority to incorporate foreign territory with our own is not expressly delegated to the President and Senate, but it attaches as an incident to sovereignty; and this sovereignty is more perfect in the law-making power, than in ay other department mentioned in the Constitution. It, then, sovereignty gives the right to acquire foreign territory, either by conquest or by purchase that right can be most properly exercised by that branch of the Government in which it most clearly exists. The language of the Constitution is, “new States may be admitted by Congress into the Union.” How can new States be admitted into the Union by Congress, composed of foreign territory? If to admit new States be a power expressly given to Congress, then all the means which are appropriate may constitutionally by employed to carry the same into effect; and the degree of its necessity is a question of legislative discretion. In such cases, the legislature can mould and model the exercise of its powers as its own wisdom and the public interests shall require. This power to admit new States is not to be found in the Articles of Confederation. Its origin is but coeval with the Constitution; still the debates on the adoption of that instrument clearly indicate, that those who made it a part of our national compact, did not intend to limit its operation to what was then considered the territory of the Union. They were for supplying the defects which manifested themselves during the existence of that confederation; and the task before them was a perilous and difficult one! They did not intend to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years, but they intended to act for posterity. Their design was not to confer an expanded territory on the Federal Government to be used entirely for its own purposes; but they intended to create a counterpoise to it in the number and independence of the States. Territory, according to their ideas, was made for mankind; and when incorporated into the Union, it was to be guarded by those needful rules and regulations which Congress might prescribe; and as soon as possible this right of guardianship was to cease, States were to be framed out of it, and then to be admitted into the American family. Every Government, then, in his opinion, which possessed the power of interesting its population, had also the inherent right to provide territory for its use.

Another ground, he said, had also been assumed, which was, as he had before stated, that every compact between independent nations is a treaty; and that, for this reason, Texas could not be annexed without the intervention of the treaty-making power. He observed that, since the adoption of the Constitution of the U. States, many compacts by acts of legislation had been entered into between the Federal and State Governments, and also between the former and foreign nations.

On the 4th of March, 1789, Congress assembled under the Constitution which, but a little while before, had been ratified by eleven States. In November of the same year, North Carolina also acceded to it; and in May, 1790, the assent of Rhode Island was likewise obtained. On the 2nd of April following, Congress passed an act accepting from the State of North Carolina a deed of cession of he claims of said State to a certain district of western territory therein named. This compact contained many weighty provisions, and was performed by joint legislation. – (See 21
vol. U.S. Laws, p.85.)

On the 24th April, 1802, a similar compact was formed between the General Government and the State of Georgia, for an amiable settlement of the limits of said State, and for the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi territory. But it Georgia ceded to the Government the country west of the Chattahoochie river. – (See 1st
vol. U.S. Laws, p. 488.)

He would here inquire whether these were contracts entered into by sovereigns for the incorporation of a territory into the Union? After the ratification of the Constitution by eleven of the States, and while North Carolina and Rhode Island were deliberating as to whether or not they would come into the Union. Congress taxed their trade the same as it they had been foreign nations. – This early legislative exposition seemed to settle the character of the States while out of the Union; and then admission into it afterwards, with, entitled them, in his opinion, to be considered independent nations, while ceding their territory to the Government by acts of concurrent legislation.

After briefly examining these cases of legislative compacts between the Government and the States, be now advert to certain legislative compacts with foreign nations; and whether they be for territory, trade, or anything else, this cannot alter the principle, unless in cases where the object is controlled by the Constitution. He observed that all of our intercourse with foreign patrons, to a certain extent, partook of this kind of legislation. From time to time we had said to Great Britain, France, and other countries, if you will move certain restrictions on one branch of trade, we will, upon the principle of reciprocity, do the same on another equally important. And what, he asked, were these, but legislative compacts between independent nations? But a case more directly in point was the establishment of the boundary between this Government and Texas a few years since – one of the highest acts of sovereignty that could be performed by nations; a legislative compact of the greatest import, which, as soon as it was agreed on, vested rights in the citizen of which he could not afterwards be deprived. He was assured that the Senate passed this law of the House unanimously; but still it was not submitted to that body as a treaty, nor legislated on as such by it.

And in his humble opinion, there was another ground on which the legislative power of this Union, with the concurrency of Texas, or without it, could incorporate that country into our own. All writers on national law agree that a weaker power, for the sake of protection, may verge its existence in a greater, and further, that the greater power, to perfect itself, or to guard against danger, may lawfully receive the weaker, or, in certain contingencies, take it by force. It was in pursuance, partly, of this last principle, that Congress, on the 31st of October, 1803, authorized Mr. Jefferson to take possession of and occupy the ceded territory from France to the U. States, embraced in the treaty of Paris; Mr. Madison, on the 15th January, 1811, to take possession of the country, East of the river Perdido, and South of the State of Georgia and Mississippi territory; and again on the 12th of February, 1833, to take possession of another tract lying South of the Mississippi territory, and West of the Perdido. In his opinion, the several classes of easies to which he had referred, settled the right of the legislative power of this Government to annex Texas to the United States as a territory.

Mr. B. would here proceed to examine the various propositions before the Committee. He was prepared to support any one of them; still he had a preference. He would take up that one which had been submitted by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Douglass]. He desired to inform the gentleman wherein he thought that his plan was not the proper one. He objected, in the first place, to the preamble. He admitted that, in 1819, Texas had been improperly par tee with. – What had induced our negotiators to violate the obligation given to that people in 1803, we should perhaps never know. He presumed, however, that it was to obtain Florida, which, from her [ . . . ] position, controlled in a degree the commerce of the Gulf, and the trade of the Mississippi. – This was the charitable view of the matter. He further admitted that, according to the law of nations, there was but one case, in which this Government would part with any position of its citizens, and that was a case of actual necessity; they could not be traded away, like cattle, or other property. He also was advised that, wherein subsequent treaty is in conflict with a prior one, the latter is void. But we had, by our own act, incorporated the people of Texas with those of a foreign nation, afterwards recognized them as her own in our intercourse with her and with Mexico, while they are united to the latter under the compact of 1821. He conceived that, on this point, we were estopped by our own act, so far as that doctrine can apply to a Government.

Mr. Douglass, here asked leave to explain. – The resolutions he had offered did not proceed on the principle of denying the validity of the treaty, as far as we were concerned the position he took was, that, though the treaty was void in itself as it respected us, we were bound by it. We could not claim Texas under the treaty of 1803; but he contended that Texas had a right, under that treaty, to demand admission at our hands.

Mr. Belser resumed. He was pleased to learn from the honorable gentleman that there was so little difference in their views as to the treaty alluded to. He agreed with him, that we were still; he thought that the gentleman’s preamble had a tendency to perplex the question.
He further contended, that when, by the treaty of 1819, the inhabitants of Texas were bargained away, it was at their option whether or not they would become citizens of Spain; and if they chose not to incorporate themselves with that government, and had been able to stand alone, they were as independent as any people on earth. These inhabitants of Texas never did become incorporated with any other form of Government, save the Mexican Constitution of 1824. When that Constitution was overturned by the strong arm of the military, and a central despotism, under Santa Anna, was erected in its stead, Texas was not bound by the new Government, and well did she refuse to submit to it. He then put the question on the ground of conquest. Texas had done, with respect to Santa Anna and his government, just as we had done, in the days of the revolution to England and her government; and she had achieved her independence and maintained it just as we did ours. This, he conceived, was the true basis on which the matter stood; and it was one established by the law of nations and maintained by common sense.

He had heard a great deal about an alleged violation of our Treaty with Mexico in 1832, as the inevitable consequence of Annexation. Now, what had been our stipulation with Mexico in that Treaty? It was this: that we would maintain perpetual amity and friendship with Mexico, and with all her territories. Very well; but Texas was now no territory of hers and, therefore, the stipulation of that Treaty did not in the least interfere with our exercising dominion over it. Further, the language of that Treaty was that there should be peace between the United States and the united Mexican States. Texas, at the time it was made, was one of those united Mexican States, and hence the guaranty extended also to her. Again: in that Treaty with Mexico, this Government did not say to her that, if the preservation of the Federal Union should require such a Treaty to be departed from, its authorities would not consult their own safety. No, that was a natural right inherent in nations that could not be surrendered by negotiation.

But he also objected to that position of the honorable gentleman’s proposition which introduced into this discussion the Missouri compromise. In his belief, that act had done more to unsettle American institutions than any other in the history of the Government. It had introduced into our councils a dangerous principle – to writ: that Congress had the right to legislate the subject of slavery. Abolition petitions, tracts, &c., were its fruits, and he feared that they were but the harbinger of worse measures. It was true, that there was but little said here on the subject of abolition now; but the silence which prevailed in regard to it; might prove to be like that which precedes the earthquake.

Mr. B. would next direct his attention to the resolutions of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Weller]. He preferred them to those of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Douglass;] still he thought that they were deficient in some things.

He believed that, as soon as Texas shall consent to become a member of our family, her government should cease; and further, that we should evince to Mexico a disposition to settle the question of boundary on just terms, and to cultivate a friendly intercourse in every other particular.

The original report, emanating from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, he thought also subject to the same objections which he had just urged against the plan of the gentleman from Ohio. – There were reasons, however, why it should be preferred, and a weighty one was that it had once been sanctioned by the representatives of both governments. We are not alone to be consulted about this compact. Texas is to have a voice in it, and, therefore, she should at this time be heard. To those who object to this report because the Senate has already rejected it in the form of a treaty, he had but little to say. If any were to be governed by such motives while a great national negotiation, involving agricultural, commercial, manufacturing, and mechanical interest was pending, those he would remind that the argus eyed people are watching our deliberations with intensity, and will no fail to discover our errors.

He had likewise read the bill and resolutions of his friend from Kentucky, [Mr. Tibbatts,] published in several of the papers, of proposing to annex as a State. He confessed he had more doubt as to the constitutionality of this scheme for annexation than of any other, but even if called on to vote for it, he would pursue the judicial rule, and when, in doubt, give effect to the legislative will.

Mr. B. had a proposition of his own, see appendix No. 1, which, like unto that of his friend from Kentucky, (Mr. Tibbatts,) was not yet before the committee, although it had been printed. He knew very well that men were apt to be fond of the children of their own creation, and he did not plead an exemption from the feeling; but this he could say, if he had ever given to any subject his earnest and undivided attention, it was this. His first resolution was for the annexation of the territory; the second authorized the President (as soon as jurisdiction was obtained by the consent of Texas) to erect therein a temporary government; the third was to settle the difficulties as to boundary, which might arise with Mexico; and the fourth guaranteed to Texas protection during the negotiation. It seemed to him that any true friend of annexation ought not to hesitate to vote for his, proposition. There were precedents to justify it – one of them to be found in the 3rd volume of the United States laws, page 502, [see appendix No. 2;] and another in the 6th volume of the said work, page 593, [see appendix No. 3.] He again declared that he was not wedded to any plan which had been submitted. He meant to vote for Texas, it he could. And if gentlemen are in doubt, he would say to them, with Hoyle in his treatise on whist, “When you are in doubt, take the trick.” [Great laughter.]

But, (said Mr. B.,) we are told by the opponents of Annexation, that our citizens settled in Texas; that the United States encouraged them in it; and that it is through their influence that the country has been wrested from Mexico, and consequently it would subject us to improper suspicions if we annex the Republic at this time. – Here arises a home view of this question. How was it that this Government had removed the Indians West of the Mississippi? When the first navigators from the Old World discovered this Continent, it was in the possession of independent nations or tribes. European powers were anxious to annex it to their own dominions, and nautical adventurers were found sailing along the coast, claiming for their rulers certain countries between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans. –
Since then, in the arrangements of Providence, Indian possession had gradually given way before the advances of civilization. And so it must ever be. Gentlemen might talk as they pleased about their devotion to the thirteen original States - about prescribing limits to the American people. There were none - there could be none! They would go, and go, and still continue to go, until they reached the ultimate boundary which the God of Nature had set to the progress of the human race. He, for one, hoped that the day was not far distant when they would go a little farther. [A laugh.] He meant farther than the point at which his friend from Pennsylvania had fixed their ultimate boundary, when he had so eloquently described it as being marked “in the configuration of this Continent by an Almighty hand;” he was not, he hoped, so impious as to throw out the idea that they could transcend a point fixed for them, by the decrees of God.

After this continent had been discovered, we succeeded to the rights of Great Britain. We inherited the soil by the sword. The country was still ours. We could [. . . ] trade, in the neighborhoods of Jamestown and of Plymouth, the ancient track of the post boy, as we could, in the great West, the footsteps of the Catholic missionary and of the French soldier. The land was ours but where were the people? Where was that brave aboriginal race which once chased the deer and conquered the bear in its mountains, and valleys? They were gone, and we were in their places. And how had we obtained their country? Talk of cessions and Indian treaties; it was a farce. We had got their possessions by the strong arm of power. We removed these tribes from their hunting grounds, who did not cultivate the land, in order that we might accomplish the greatest amount of good to the human race. And has Texas done anything more than we did before her? No, sir! - no sir!

Let gentlemen look on those two figures which have so recently been erected in the eastern portico of this Capitol, (great laughter,) and learn an instructive lesson. Gentlemen might laugh at the nudity of one of them; but the artist, when he made Columbus the superior of the Indian princess in every respect, knew what he was doing. And when he likewise placed the ball in his hand, he intended further to represent the power of civilization and what were to be the effects of the discovery of that wonderful man.

And does the history of the past furnish no sight into the future? What is to become of our population in a half century or a century hence? According to a calculation derived from the best of sources, in fifty years it will number one hundred millions; and in double that period three hundred millions. Talk to him about confining the area of liberty! - it could not be done. Freedom's pure and heavenly, light was here, and it would continue to burn, with increasing brightness, till it had illumined this entire continent.

Why, what did gentlemen suppose was to become of the rising generation to the West? Did they think it was to stay there to vegetate like a plant and die on the spot where it grew? No, you had as well attempted to arrest Niagara. It would go onward and onward; it would fill Oregon; it would fill Texas; it would pour like a cataract over the Rocky Mountains, and, passing to the great lakes of the West, it would open the forests of that far distant wilderness to the light of the rising sun. And whoever should live and visit this continent at that day, might hear the voice of the American reaper on the far shores of the Pacific. The idea thrown out by President Houston, in one of his messages, that the lone star of Texas would yet one day float in triumph over the ancient place of the Montezuma, had been much ridiculed [sic]; but, in his apprehension, it was likely to be converted into somber fact.

Mr. B. then did not believe in limiting the spread of liberty, or in checking the migration of our people. Extension, in his opinion was the antagonistical principle of centralization. Our duration as a nation consists in our inestimable institutions, in our expansive territory, in the virtue of the people; and, combined with these, were our noble rivers, our internal communications, the abundance which we raise, and the certainty of bringing into requisition in the hour of need our physical force. On this branch of the subject he agreed with Gen. Jackson. That great man had been misrepresented by his enemies. They had charged him with a want of polish, with a lack of learning. It might be true, that he had not so much knowledge of books as many others less prominent in life; but he knew men, he read human nature, and had that kind of information which was worth more than that of all the bookworms in the country.

The inhabitants of the new States had entered Texas in large numbers with the hope of bettering their condition, and with an honest ambition to occupy elevated stations in the new Republic. This was the genius and spirit of the popular system which distinguished our country. And are we prepared to reject Texas again? In the language of one of her sons. - “What! Reject a proffered territory as extensive as four or five of our largest States, equal in fertility to the most favored, superior to most them in natural advantages; with a thousand miles of sea coast; from its position constituting an unseemly interference with our territory? What [. . . ] reject a compact which secures to Texas no advantages – save the solitary isolated one of nestling in the folks of the star-spangled banner.”

In conclusion, Mr. B. observed, that he had recently been reading a historical legend which afforded an exemplification of what he thought ought to be our national condition and character. When the city of Corinth was taken, sacked and burnt by the Roman consul Manlius, in the fusion of metals produced by the intensity of the heat, a mixed and compounded one was produced of far greater brilliancy and beauty than any of the materials of which it was composed. It was called Corinthian brass, and was held more precious than gold. He desired to see the day speedily come when our country will, so far as a spirit of brotherhood can exist, resemble just such a metal as was formed at Corinth. And that that Government, whose independence was first proclaimed by the Henrys, the Thompsons, the Adamses, the Middletones, the Rutledges and the Lees, will survive the ghastly glare of an unbridled fanaticism; and that some interceding spirit will yet rise up to check the now wide-spread flames. Long may our country prove itself the asylum of the oppressed. Let its institutions and its people be extended far and wide, and when the waters of despotism shall have inundated other portions of the globe, and the votary of liberty be compelled to betake himself to his ark, let this Government be the Ararat on which it shall rest.
Mr. Belser asked leave to introduce a series of joint resolutions for the annexation of Texas to the United States, in the following form:

Preamble and joint resolutions for the Annexation of the Republic of Texas to the United States of America.

In view of the present peculiar situation of the Republic of Texas, and the influence which she is destined, from her immediate location upon our Western borders, and her intimate connection with the territory, population, and resources of the United States, to have upon our national security, tranquility, and commerce, we, the supreme legislative authority of the American Union, in order to secure the blessings of peace and prosperity to ourselves, and safety, good Government, and liberty to the inhabitants of Texas, do hereby adopt the following resolutions, annexing the said Republic to the United States:

1. Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, with the consent of the authorities of Texas, so much of the territory as rightfully belongs to the said Republic be and the same is hereby annexed to the United States, and made one of the territories of the same, under the name of “the Territory of Texas.”

2. And be it further resolved, That as soon as jurisdiction over the territory of Texas shall be obtained by the United States, as herein provided, the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to take immediate possession of the same; and until other provision be made by Congress to establish therein a temporary Government upon the principles regulating other territories of the U. States, so far as the same may be applicable; and the military, civil and judicial powers are hereby vested in such authorities as he may establish in pursuance of this resolution for the protection and maintenance of the inhabitants of the said territory in the full enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

3. And be it further resolved, That these resolutions are hereby declared to be the fundamental law of annexation between the United States and Texas, so soon as they shall be concurred in by both Governments; and that if any dispute shall thereafter arise with any foreign power respecting any boundary of Texas, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to open all necessary negotiations for the settlement of the same upon just and honorable terms, subject to the ratification of this Government.

4. And be it further Resolved, That if, during the pendency of these propositions, any attempt shall be made by any foreign power to occupy by Republic of Texas, or to harass or destroy her commerce, the President of the U. States is hereby authorized and directed to afford protection to the same; and for that end may employ such parts of the military and naval power of the United States as may be necessary.

5. And be it further Resolved, That as soon as these resolutions shall have passed the Congress of the United States, and been approved by the President, he shall forthwith transmit a copy of the same to the Government of the republic of Texas for its concurrence.

An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the thirtieth of April last; and for the temporary government thereof.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized to take possession of, and occupy, the territory ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the thirtieth day of April last, between the two nations; and that he may, for that purpose, and in order to maintain in the said territories the authority of the United States, employ any part of the army and navy of the United States, and of the force authorized by an act passed the third day of March last, entitled “An act directing a detachment from the militia of the United States, and for erecting certain arsenals,” which he may deem necessary, and so much of the sum appropriated by the said act as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purpose of carrying this act into effect; to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States.

SECT. 2. And be it further enacted, That, until the expiration of the present session of Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of the said territories be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil and judicial powers, exercised by the others of the existing government of the same, shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion. Approved, Oct. 31, 1803.

APPENDIX – No. 3.

Taking into view the peculiar situation of Spain, and of her American provinces; and considering the influence which the destiny of the territory adjourning the Southern border of the United States may have upon their security, tranquility and commerce. Therefore,

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, under the peculiar circumstances of the existing crisis, cannot, without serious inquietude, see any part of the said territory pass into the hands of any foreign power; and that a due regard to their own safety compels them to provide, under certain contingencies, for the temporary occupation of the said territory; they, at the same time, declare that the said territory shall, in their hands, remain subject to future negotiation. Approved, 15th Jan., 1811.

An act to enable the President of the U. States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying East of the river Perdido, and South of the State of Georgia, and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the U. States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized to take possession of, and occupy, all or any part of the territory lying East of the river Perdido, and South of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, in case an arrangement has been, or shall be, made with the local authority of the said territory, for delivering up the possession of the same, or any part thereof, by any foreign Government; and he may, for the purpose of taking possession, and occupying the territory aforesaid, and in order to maintain therein the authority of the United States, employ any part of the army and many of the U. States which he may deem necessary.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That one hundred thousand dollars be appropriated for defraying such expenses as the President may deem necessary for obtaining possession as aforesaid, and the security of the said territory to be applied under the direction of the President, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That in case possession of the territory aforesaid shall be obtained by the United States as aforesaid, until other provision be made by Congress, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish, within the territory aforesaid a temporary Government, and the military, civil, and judicial powers thereof, shall be vested in such person and persons, and be exercised in such manner as he may direct, for the protection and maintenance of the inhabitants of the said territory in the full employment of their liberty, property, and religion

An act concerning an act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying East of the river Perdido, and South of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes, and the declaration accompanying the same.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this act, and the act passed during the present session of Congress, entitled "an act to enable the President of the U. States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying East of the river Perdido; and South of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes" and the declaration accompanying the same, be not printed or published until the end of the next session of Congress, unless directed by the President of the United States, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

An act authorizing the President of the United States to take possession of a tract of country lying South of the Mississippi Territory and West of the River Perdido.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President b, and he is hereby, authorized to occupy and hold all that tract of country called West Florida, which lies West of the river Perdido, not now in possession of the U. States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of occupying and holding the country aforesaid, and of affording protection to the inhabitants thereof under the authority of the U. States, the President may employ such parts of the military and naval force of the U. States as he may deem necessary.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, for defraying the necessary expenses, twenty thousand dollars are hereby appropriated to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise, appropriated, and to be applied, for the purposes aforesaid, under the direction of the President.

Approved, February 12, 1813.
New York Views of Annexation

Mr. "Horse Shoe Robinson" sneeringly points to Governor Wright's Message, as throwing a cold blanket upon the Annexation of Texas. – Mr. W. does not introduce the annexation by name – and Mr. Kennedy concludes that the Governor is dodging the subject. The New York Herald also relies upon his silence, and upon Mr. Stetson's speech as conclusive evidences of a disposition which the Herald is pleased to hatch from its own brains, on the part of the New York Democrats to cut the South – to unite the Northern Democracy upon Northern principles – and even to strike up something like a coalition between the Democrats and the Whigs. The whole appears to us to be a gratuitous suggestion – unworthy of the sagacity of its Editor – and scarcely less ridiculous than the fiction of the Richmond Whig, in its most novel and ingenious supposition, that Mr. Polk means to conduct his administration upon Whig principles. We must caution our friends in both sections of the country, against the unfounded visions of the press. We scout the idea of any movement on the part of Mr. Silas Wright, or of any of our Democratic friends in New York, or in the North against the broad interests of the Democratic party. We have an unshaken confidence in the principles and sagacity of Silas Wright – not as warm a friend to the Annexation, perhaps, as some in the South; but as true a friend of the Republican party as any one – and in the ability to serve cause, he is inferior, perhaps, to no man. One slight shade may have come over the brilliant disc of his superior mind – but it will be as slight and as evanescent as the cloud which comes over the sun, if he will only listen to the assurances of men, who were in April last almost as warm friends to Martin Van Buren's nomination as himself – and men, moreover, who would scorn to deceive him for any consideration upon the face of the earth. Let the political speculators, then, who view those events only through the medium of their prejudices, and count upon a division in the Democratic Party, banish such idle phantoms from their imaginations. The South will listen to no such voice. They will cherish heir long-living and deep-seated sentiment of union with their "natural allies, the Democracy of the North." In this region of the sunny South, we have no ambitious aspirations to indulge; no narrow and sectional purposes to promote. We go for a New York Democrat as ardently as a Southern – And we claim to have in the South as great and admirable statesman, as any of whom the North can boast. The one to whom the New York Herald alludes, under the name of "the Southern Statesman," is of this description. – We proved our feelings for a great Northern Statesman in 1836 and in 1840 – and when the Baltimore Convention nominated Mr. Polk, it was not under the intrigues, of the influence of any man. If Mr. P. did come from the South, it was because he was first nominated by the North. It was as in the case of Gen. Washington, when the motion to place him at the head of the army came from Massachusetts.

But we recommend to Mr. Kennedy's notice the following more emphatic article from the Albany Argus:

"OREGON AND TEXAS." – The subject of the occupation of Oregon and the re-annexation of Texas was brought before the Senate yesterday, by Gen. Clark, in a serious of resolutions, which will be found in our legislative report.

"It will be seen that they go for Annexation, 'at the earliest practicable period,' stripped of all embarrassing questions, direct or incidental. We do not doubt that they express the pervading popular sentiment of the State."

Yet if Mr. Kennedy is pleased to lay such stress upon the silence of the Governor's Message, will he turn to the Albany Argus of Saturday last? – He will find its accomplished Editor, (the State Printer,) and the friend of Governor Wright and Mr. Van Buren, calling the attention of its readers to "an interesting article (on the subject of Texas and Annexation) from the pen of an able writer and much respected citizen" – which originally appeared in "The Utica Observer."

It bears the title of "The Annexation of Texas, considered with reference to the justice of the measure, as respects foreign nations, and it effects on the U. States – by A. B. Johnson."

We have room only for the conclusion of the article – and it evidently bespeaks a master-spirit:

"Who that has a mind to comprehend these facts, and a heart to feel them, would wish to check this progression by suspicious fears? And especially while now, if such fears are well founded, we are sufficiently extended in territory and numbers, to fall a victim to these elements of destruction, if such they truly are. Nay, if imagination, must govern us, may we not rather suppose that diversities of local interests will be harmonized by the augmentation of our confederacy; just as the turbidness [sic] of separate streams is neutralized in proportion to the magnitude of the recipient river. Some statesman, men of no little acuteness and consideration in public affairs, maintain as the best policy, a species of free trade that would seem to require for its consummation that all the nations of the earth should constitute a single Government.

"But, aside from all geographical jealousies, many persons on principles of abstract moral repugnancy to slavery, oppose the annexation of Texas to our Union, for, if Texas be not annexed, she may be physically coerced by Mexico, or morally by Great Britain, to relinquish slavery. – I admit the contingency. A like result by means of a servile war or foreign interposition might follow the ejection from our Union of the existing slave States. To a man morbidly absorbed by one idea, the above contingencies may be sufficient to make him both reject Texas and repudiate Louisiana, though some persons believe that Texas will be instrumental in suppressing slavery in all our old States, by supplying a more profitable field of operation for the slaves; and that free labor flowing into fill up the vacuum, a state of society will be engendered destructive of slavery; and further, that slavery, thus concentrated in Texas, will, by the proximity of races in Mexico, kindred to the slaves, be gradually allured from Texas, and lost irreclaimably in
But abandoning hypothesis, I would invite such of our citizens as are disposed to balance the good and evil of any measure, and to be governed in their preferences by the preponderance of the good, to look at the certain benefits that must result from the acquisition of Texas. It is in size about equal to six times the dimensions of our Empire State, with a climate said to be salubrious, and giving us the monopoly of the finest cotton land, and of the finest cotton that the world produces an article which is yet in a condition of giant infancy, as relates to its commercial importance to our country and the world, and its many ministrations to the comforts of the poor, and the gratification of all classes. – Under the auspices of our Union, this immense country will become the home of millions of human beings; not drawn from other regions to depopulate them, but by the laws of nature a new growth of immortal, accountable, intelligent beings. In the birth of such an empire, with its ramified consequences to the end of time, land through eternity, can we see nothing but the naked, and perhaps temporary question of slavery? Is the addition nothing of such a territory to our home, such a member of our family circle, with whom we may interchange productions without the obstructions of conflicting nationally? The acquisition of these benefits seem to expand each one of us into something more than our present stature; and to give to every mechanic, manufacturer, merchant and cultivator of the soil, some source of additional activity and prosperity.

I know, however, that many persons believe our Union is already sufficiently large for strength; and that additional extent will only encumber us. If we examine this notion, we shall find it is founded on analogies that are not applicable to our condition. When an empire is composed of conquered nations, that are continually struggling to regain their lost independence, every new acquisition but divides the strength of the conqueror, and he becomes exhausted by the division. But our union is voluntary, and like an arch, constitutes a reciprocation of strength which all the members yield to each, and each yields to all. Such at least is the result of our system thus far; and the experience of half a century of peace and war is a safer indication of its nature, than the conjectures of any theory.

But are we willing that annexation shall be obtained at the expense of a war with Mexico, and perhaps with England? This question is best answered by ascertaining whether annexation is compatible with our duty as a moral and Christian people; for no nation is required to avert war, by any other means than to act justly.

Next April nine years will have elapsed since the capture of Santa Ann and his army, by the Texans, at the battle of San Jacinto. Mexico has ever since refrained from the subjugation of Texas, from a want of power or an abandonment of its exercise. In the war of our Revolution, the capture of Burgoyne by our troops, was alone deemed so vital a seal of Independence, that France forthwith treated us as an independent nation; though her obligations towards G. Britain, with reference to us, were doubtless as great as our obligations to Mexico with reference to Texas.

In the recent struggle between the provinces of Greece and the empire of Turkey, nothing occurred that will compare in decisiveness with the battle of San Jacinto, or the acquiescence of Mexico; still England and the other principal Governments of Europe decided that Greece had virtually freed itself from the authority of Turkey, and they assisted in consolidating her provinces into a separate kingdom. The same sovereigns at the subsequent revolt of Belgium from the authority of Holland, allowed the king of Holland a brief period to reduce to obedience his rebellious province, but prohibited him from continuing in vengeance efforts that were seen to be ineffectual for the purposes of subjugation; and Belgium was organized into an independent kingdom. These results differ from the incidents of remote history, but the difference is claimed by the Government of Europe as a triumph of justice over physical power, whose reign terminated with the overthrow of Napoleon. England, therefore, is mortally estopped by her own practices, from any exceptions against the independent volitions of Texas; and in the judgment of all Europe, as evinced by the foregoing cases; Mexico has no just cause of offense against us our disregard of her latent sovereignty.

We are apt to estimate the right of Mexico to Texas as identical with a man’s ownership of a chattel. The proprietary right in both cases is founded in resulting social benefits; but I deny that social benefits require that the rules of ownership which apply to the sovereignty of one nation over another. In the spirit of our Declaration of Independence, and nearly in its language, all Governments are instituted for the happiness of the governed; hence, the right of Mexico in a mere chattel is for the benefit not of the chattel, but of Mexico. We have the authority of the word of God for a still more restricted estimate of the proprietary right of all nations. The division of the earth into district sovereign ownership is a contrivance of man, instituted for his social benefits; but revelation declares that the earth is the Lord’s, and the use thereof is for man in common. In this enlarged sense, Texas, so far from being property of Mexico, is not exclusively the property of the Texans, except as their use of it quadrates with its usefulness to all men in common. On this Christian principle, and on this alone was justified the recent successful attempt by Great Britain to constrain the people of China to relinquish the exclusive monopoly which they have usurped for ages over the regions which they inhabit. On this principle alone, we can justify our forcible obstruction on the aborigines of America; and our compelling them to abandon to us such lands as they could not use themselves beneficially to the common rights of all – in thus acting, instead of being wrong doers, we are but fulfilling the command of Providence to multiply and replenish the earth, and subdue it.

Having thus shown that the natural right of Mexico to Texas is not inconsistent with the right of the Texians to change their allegiance, and that the conventional laws which regulate the intercourse of nations will not under existing circumstances be outraged by the exercise of this right in favor of the United States; I have accomplished all that I intended, having preliminarily shown, that the consequences of the act will produce results grateful to philanthropy every where, and profitable is particular to us, in all our great social interests; and finally all to be attained “without money and without price,” for even in a pecuniary view, (the lowest rational view that can be taken of such a question,) what are the millions more or less, that Texas will cost us, in comparison not with its civil advantages to us, or its military advantages, not with the extent of national domain that may be acquired with the

POLITICAL DEBATE ON THE TEXAS QUESTION

In the House of Representatives, Tuesday, Jan. 7.

The house being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the joint resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs for the annexation of Texas to the United States.

Mr. BAYLY having obtained the floor, spoke as follows. The fate of the annexation of Texas will depend upon the decision of Congress as to its power to accomplish it by bill or joint resolution for it Texas is not annexed in this manner it will not be in any other. No one now hopes for a majority of two-thirds of the Senate in its favor. The great question, therefore, is can foreign territory be acquired by bill or joint [...] [unreadable word] of the two Houses of Congress? And I agreed at once (said Mr. B.) to the discussion of it.

Under our political system, there are two leading houses of powers conferred upon the General [...] [unreadable word] comment the one relating to our foreign, the other to our domestic relations. In all questions rising out of the former, the interests of the different sections of the country are inseparable. In our domestic affairs, they are as variant as the [...] [unreadable word] climate, productions, and pursuits of the people of the several States. In all that relates to the former, the statesmen of every part of the country are equally well informed. The latter are only understood by the people they immediately concern. In reference to the first, the National Legislature can legislate wisely. To the first it cannot, without certain mischief. Hence, in our wise system there is a plenary delegation of power to the General Government in all that concerns our external affairs, and a specified delegation in what relates to our domestic. A different mode of construction, therefore, ought to proceed as the power sought to be exercised belongs to the class or the other—strict construction as the rule in the latter case, and a liberal construction in the former. This distinction grows out of the character of the Constitution itself; was recognized by Jefferson and Madison, and the propriety of it will not, I fancy, be questioned by any one. Bearing this in mind, I proceed to point out the clauses of the Constitution in which the authority of Congress to pass the resolution before the Committee may be found. In my opinion it may be found in two—in the clause authorizing Congress to declare war, and in the one permitting the admission of new States into the Union, and also in the general power which I shall show to exist, to make alliances and confederations. Let it not be said that, in referring the power to two clauses of the Constitution, I make it ragrant and disprove its existence in either; for in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Gibbons and Ogden, "the idea that the time measure might, according to circumstances, be arranged with different classes of powers, was to novelty to the framers of our Constitution. All experience shows that the same measure or measurey, scarcely distinguishable from each other, may flow from distant powers.

It has always been admitted, in the administration of the Government, that the power to declare war carries with it the power of doing whatever [...] [unreadable word] directly to prevent it. In the language of Chief Justice Taney, in the Supreme Court, "Everything that concerns our foreign relations, that may be used to preserve peace or wage war, has been committed to the hands of Congress." I do not say it carries with it the power to do everything which a visionary might fancy would tend to prevent it; but it certainly does everything which immediately and directly tends that way. It was in this manner the constitutionality of the embargo and non-intercourse laws, adopted in advance of the late war, was defended. And the power is derived "in time of peace to prepare for war". Our Southwestern frontier is exceedingly expected, as I shall hereafter show; and as far as our constitutional authority goes, we might erect fortifications upon its whole extent. This no one will question. Such being the case, cannot be with he consent of the people to whom the intervening territory belongs, extend our boundary to the Rio Grande, which, "in connection with the mountainous desert which skirts it, forms the first class of military obstacles, and which would affect us better protection from invasion in that quarter than a cordon of fortifications from the mouth of the Sabine to our utmost Northern summits." The importance of Texas, as a means of military defense, and its consequent intimate connection with the war power, I shall show [...] [unreadable word].

From the days of the Roman eagle, indeed as before them, to this time, the leading object of war has been to acquire or defend territory. When the power was conferred upon Congress, all general terms, to declare war, it carried with it all of its usual incidents; and it is impossible to believe that the framers of the Constitution meant to withhold from the Government the power to accomplish by it what had been the great object for which most of the wars with which the world [...] [unreadable word] been scourged, has been waged. I infer, therefore, that we can unquestionably acquire territory by conquest. If this be true, the whole question is settled; for, if we may take the territory of the Texans from them by force, surely we may do it peaceably, with their consent. If we can rob them of it, surely we can take it as a gift. If we should march an army [tomorrow] to Texas for the purpose of capturing their country, presume there would be no occasion for fighting, provided the Texans were willing that we should accomplish our purposes without bloodshed.

Mr. Clay, in his celebrated letter from Raleigh, upon the subject of Texas, says:

"If any European nation entertain any ambitious designs upon Texas, such as that of colonizing, or in any way subjugating her, I should regard it as the imperative duty of the Government of the United States to oppose to such designs the most firm and determined resistance, to the extent, if necessary, of appealing to arms, to prevent the accomplishment of any such designs."

If we might go to war to prevent Texas from falling into the hands of a foreign government, may we not still more effectually provide against it, by her peaceable acquisition?

But the power of Congress to annex Texas by joint resolution may also be derived from the authority given to Congress to admit new States into the Union. The power is general, without any other limitation than that "no new State shall be formed or created within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned as well as of Congress." The imposition of this limitation, upon the most familiar rules of construction, excludes the idea of the intention to imply any other. I know an attempt is made to impose another by implication, and to continue the power to admit new States to such as might be carved out of the territory within the limits of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. But such a construction is contradicted by the plain import and obvious meaning of the Constitution itself, and also by the history of its passage through the Convention which framed it.

"In the resolutions offered by Mr. Edmund Randolph, as a basis for the new Constitution, and which contained the first propositions of that character which were submitted to it, the power in question was described as follows, viz: "that provision ought to be made for the admission of States lawfully arising within the limits of the United States, whether arising from a voluntary junction of Government or otherwise, with the consent of a number of voices in the Legislature; less than the whole. In Mr. Charles Pinckney’s draught, it was proposed that "the legislature shall have power to admit new States into the Union on the same terms with the original States, provided two-thirds of the members present in both houses agree, leaving out the clause in respect to the character of the territory. Mr. Randolph’s proposition, containing the restriction confining the power to States lawfully arising within the limits of the United States, was at one time adopted in Committee of the Whole, and in that state referred with others to the Committee of Detail, the article upon this subject contained the following propositions: 1st. That new, States lawfully constituted or established within the limits of the United States, might be admitted by the Legislature in this Government. 2d. That to such admission, the consent of two-thirds of the members present in each House should be necessary. 3d. That if a new State should arise within the limits of any of the present states, the consent of the Legislature of such State should also be necessary to its admission. 4th. That, if the admission was consented to, the new States should be admitted on the same terms with the original States; and 5th. That the Legislature might make conditions with the new States concerning the public debt then subsisting. The 2d, 4th and 5th clauses were stricken out by the votes of the Convention; and after that had been done, the following was adopted as a substitute for the whole viz: ‘New States may be admitted by the Legislature into the Union; but no new State shall be erected within the limits of any of the present states, without the consent of the Legislature of such States, as well as of the General Legislature’ leaving out that part of the first clause which related to the domestic character of the territory; and this substitute was consequently revised and amended so as to make it conform in its phraseology to the section as it now stands in the Constitution. These proceedings show that the proposition to restrict the power to admit new States to the territory within the original limits of the United States, was distinctly before the Convention, once adopted by it, and finally rejected in favor of a clause making the power in this respect general.”

But it is unnecessary to dwell farther on this point. Mr. Clay, who embodies in himself, according to their own admission, the opinions of the Whig party, admits no such fanciful limitation. The President elect of the Democratic party scouts it. Mr. Van Buren’s argument against it makes a clear education of its absurdity impossible. And the repeated action of every department of the Government, in the most solemn form, settles the question forever.

It is insisted, however, that the power is to admit “new States,” and that it does not authorize Congress to acquire territory. That, it is said, can only be done by a national compact, which is a treaty, the power to make which is confided exclusively to the President and the Senate.

The first answer to this argument is, that authority for the admission of new States carries with it every thing which is necessary and proper to accomplish it; and Congress may take such initiatory steps as may be necessary, preparatory to the admission of the new State into the Union upon equal footing with the rest. There is nothing in the Constitution which shows that the framers of it supposed that it was indispensable that the new State should spring into the Union full armed, like Minerva from the brain of Jove. If they had they would have found no analogy for such proceeding except in heathen mythology. They certainly would not in the natural world, where everything progresses gradually from infancy to age. If we bring Texas under our jurisdiction as a territory by the passage of a bill, in which provision shall be made for its future admission into the Union as a State, what hereafter shall be done, each step in the proceeding, must be part and parcel of the same transaction and constitute but one act. Those who agree that we may admit a foreign State into the Union as a State, but deny that we may bring it in as a territory, involve themselves in an absurdity of maintaining that the lesser power is not included in the greater; and that, although we may exercise the last, we cannot the first.

If it be true that, under the power to admit new States, you may not first in the case of a foreign State, bring such State under our jurisdiction as a territory, then the whole clause authorizing Congress to admit them in practice would be nugatory. The Constitution of any foreign State, suited for its Government as an independent power, would, for that very reason, be unsuited for its Government as a member of this Confederacy; and with it unchanged, such State could not be admitted into this Union. And it is exceedingly improbable that an independent State would consent- as it is very certain Texas will not – to break up her form of Government and adopt a Constitution not suited for her Government as an independent State, upon the uncertainty which always attends all future legislation of her admission into the Union.

But it may be said, admitting this argument to be sound, yet it only proves that the foreign State must, of necessity, be brought under our jurisdiction as a territory preparatory to its admission into the Union; but it does not prove that this may be done by a joint resolution. On the contrary, it is insisted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Winthrop,) that this can only be effected, if at all, by an international arrangement, which is a treaty, the power to make which is exclusively vested in the President and Senate.

This argument is founded upon the assumption, that an agreement or arrangement can only be made between nations by treaty. If this shall turn out to be untrue, and we shall find that compacts and agreements are constantly made by legislation, the whole argument falls to the ground.

The idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that every agreement between nations is technically a treaty, is contradicted by the highest authority, and, in our case, by the Constitution itself.

The subject of international compacts is referred to in three distinct clauses of the Constitution. In the first clause of the 10th section of article 1st, it is declared that “no State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation.” In the last clause of the same section, it is also declared that “no State shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign Power.” In the second clause of second section of second article, the President is empowered, “by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.”

It must always be borne in mind, in construing the Constitution that it is almost as remarkable for the literary execution as for the profound political statesmanship displayed in it. The meaning of every word seems to have been deliberately weighed: every word, therefore, must have its due weight and appropriate meaning, and not one can be rejected as superfluous. In the language of the Chief Justice of the United States, (in the case of Holmes vs. Jennison et al., 14th Peters, 571) concurred in by Messrs. Justices Wayne, McLean, and Story- the last two of whom, I presume, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Winthrop) will admit as authority:
"No word in the instrument, (the Constitution,) under consideration, after it has been adopted by us, would continue it an alliance, or confederation, or agreement, or compact. And surely it would be doing no violence even to technical language to call it either.

If it were necessary to fortify by precedent, what seems so plain, that Congress may make agreements and compacts with foreign nations, it could be done from every part of our commercial code. We have been constantly saying in our legislation, since the formation of the Government to foreign nations, if you will do particular things, we will do others. Examples may be found of this in the law regulating our intercourse with the British West Indies, and in our embargo and non-intercourse laws.

It is thus shown that, as far as our constitution authority is concerned, there is no obstacle to the annexation of Texas to this Union.

I proceed at once (said Mr. B.) to the next question which presents itself: Is Texas competent to assent to a union with this country by her own act, without consulting that of any other nation? When I can refer to the unquestioned and unquestionable fact, that she is a free independent and sovereign State, it does seem to me, that all argument upon the point is at an end. The independence of Texas has been acknowledged by England, France, and Holland — all the great Powers of Europe and ourselves. And all of these nations are clearly estopped from questioning her right to do whatever any sovereign State may of right do. But, it is said, this acknowledgment is of her independence "de facto," and not de jure." The conclusive answer to this is, the distinction between a Government "de facto" and a Government "de jure," in the sense in which it was originally used, is obsolete. In this nineteenth century there is practically no such distinction. It originated in the monstrous dogma that Kings rein by divine right and the expression "de jure" is but a contraction of "de jure divine." Since our Revolution, the will of the governed has ever been regarded as the only legitimate foundation of Government. And when, therefore, foreign nations find in any country an organized Government, in possession of the administration, with such evidences of stability and order as exclude the idea that it is the result of a mere temporary revolutionary eruption, such as would authorize them, according to the old notions, to treat with it as a Government "de facto," they are compelled to admit that it has the will of the people, the only rightful foundation of Government, as its basis, and it becomes at once a Government "de jure." And even where this distinction prevailed between a Government "de jure" and "de facto," I defy gentlemen to produce an instance where, under the law of nations all the contracts and engagements of the government "de facto" were not held binding upon all subsequent administrations of the same country. But in truth, sir, the doctrine in which this distinction between a government "de jure" and "defacto" originated was exploded long before our revolution. At the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, the legitimacy of the English revolution of 1683 and the cause of the Stuarts was finally abandoned by France, and with it the principle of hereditary indefeasible right on which it was founded. When, therefore, we find such evidence, of stability in the Texan Government as authorizes foreign nations to treat with it as the Government "de facto" of he country, we find such as shows that it is founded in the will of the governed, and it becomes at once a Government "de jure." No one supposed that engagements entered into by Cromwell were not binding upon the English nation, because his was not, according to the notion I have referred to, a Government "de jure." Nor that France was not bound by those made by Napoleon, even after the Bourbons regained possession of the French throne. It is in this way only that our title to Louisiana is sustained. I could illustrate this argument but it would only consume my time, without perhaps making my position stronger. It is shown, therefore, that the Texan Government is independent "de facto" as well as "de jure," and that it may do whatever independent nations of right may do, and of course unite its destinies with ours.

It might be shown further, if necessary, that the present Government of Mexico never had any authority in Texas, and that if it had, it has acknowledged her independence in a manner obligatory upon it. But my time will not allow me to press this view of the subject. I state the position, and I shall adduce the proof of it in the full report of my remarks.

It is thus shown, that we are capable of acquiring Texas, and Texas of uniting with us. Is it desirable that we shall do so? This is the next question. Texas is a fine country, as everybody admits; it is as large as France, and is peopled by our race—by bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. Prima facie, its acquisition is desirable. Let us therefore, look to the objections to it. But, before I do that, I must be excused for interrupting the course of my argument for a moment to notice a remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Winthrop.) I consider this due to the duties of private friendship and the memory of the dead. The gentleman was pleased to say:

"He could not help feeling some sympathy with the people of Texas under the precise circumstances in which they were now placed, betrayed, as they had been in so humiliating a posture by false pretences and false promises. Where has been the fulfillment of that promise which a President of the United States, speaking through his Secretary of State had dared to hold out to them: 'Measures have been taken to ascertain the opinions and views of Senators upon the subject, and it is found that a clear constitutional majority of two-thirds are in favor of the measure.' Mr. W. began to entertain some hope that the people of Texas would awake to some respect for themselves under the treatment they had received, and would no longer suffer themselves to be duped and trifled with either by Presidents or Congress.

Sir, said Mr. B., I knew the late Judge Upshur well. He was my neighbor, my friend. He was a man of honor, who, in the most immaterial transaction of life, would not have lightly given assurances which should regulate the conduct of others. And in so important a transaction as an official negotiation, to say nothing about the solemn dignity of the one in question, I am perfectly certain that he would not have given such an assurance as is referred to by the gentleman, unless he felt fully authorized by such information as would satisfy the most cautious man that he might with propriety do it. Indeed, he expressly says in the dispatch referred to, that every necessary step had been taken to procure accurate information of the disposition of the Senate. And, Mr. Chairman, if departed spirits could be permitted to revisit this world, and the lamented Gilmer, by whom the duty of sounding the senate was undertaken, as I am told, could appear among us again—if Upshur were here to explain a memorandum found among his papers too meager to be understood by others, in which a list is given of Senators “certain for” and “certain against” the former comprising two-thirds, perhaps it would be found that the small politicians of the country were not the only persons who suddenly changed their position upon the Texas question after the appearance of the Raleigh letter. The memorandum may not have referred to the Texas negotiation; but it is known that at the time, the subject was uppermost in his mind, and absorbed all his thoughts. It was, I believe, the only negotiation he was conducting at the time, and I do not know to what else it could refer. But, be that as it may, of one thing I am certain, that however he or the President might have been deceived, I am certain both of them are incapable of betraying others by “false promises and false pretences.” But to return from this digression from the regular course of my argument, which I felt it due, as well to the living as the dead, to make.

It is said Texas is still at war with Mexico; and that by annexation we instantly adopt that war and make it our own; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. J. R. Ingersoll) to excite the alarm of navigating interest of the North, said, that in that event our commerce will be destroyed by the depredations of privateers commissioned by the Mexican Government. The ready answer to this is, that, according to the law of nations, two-thirds of the crew of a privateer must be citizens of the country which commissions it, or it becomes a pirate, and, in the event of capture, liable to be treated as such. Now, I ask (said Mr. B.) where is the Mexican marine from which two-thirds of the crews of enough privateers are to be found to harass seriously our commerce? Gentlemen know that there is none such.

I deny, however, that by annexation, we adopt the war with Mexico, if any such exists. I deny that, in that event, we will take our law from Texas. On the contrary, I insist she will take her’s from us. The United states are not to be merged in Texas, but Texas in them. The United States are at peace: after annexation, Texas will be at peace too. When we purchased Louisiana of France, France being at war, we did not assume the French war: on the contrary, Louisiana, which was a part of the French territory, and as such at war with England, was at once placed at peace. It is true, Mexico may regard, if she choose, annexation as an act of such unfriendliness as to make it the pretext for [missing page].

on its passage, Mr. BOWDEN moved its indefinite postponement; which motion prevailed, ayes 68, noes not counted; and the bill was rejected. Afterwards the bill was reconsidered, on motion of MR. POULSON, who moved a ryder, providing that it should not apply to the county of Accomack. Mr. WITCHER moved to amend the ryder by striking out "Accomack," and inserting "the citizens of this Commonwealth."

Mr. YERBY opposed Mr. WITCHER'S amendment, as it was the law now, and was a dead letter; Mr. PITTS seconded the views of MR. YERBY. Mr. WITCHER'S amendment was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. YERBY, the bill was then recommitted.

The act providing for the payment of the interest upon certain lands guaranteed by the Commonwealth, and the semi-annual annuity due to the old James River Company, with the amendments proposed by the Senate, was taken up, and the said amendments agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. GARNETT, a Resolution from the Committee of Rads, &c., against the petition of Robert Faver for authority to erect a wharf on the Rappahannock river in Essex county, was laid on the table, not be called up this session.

The followed engrossed bills were read a third time and passed:

"To incorporate the Augusta Female Seminary;"

"Authorizing the County Court of Morgan county to re-build the Courthouse of said county, and for other purposes;"

"To incorporate the Virginia Collegiate Institute;"

"Incorporating the Good Spur Turnpike Company;"

"Incorporating the Buchanan and Clover Dale Turnpike Company;"

"Amending the act passed March 23d, 1843, concerning roads and bridges in Brooke county;"

"Concerning the commissions of sheriffs and other officers upon executions;" (Mr. HALL moved its indefinite postponement, which was lost, 43 to 67, Mr. STOVALL having called the ayes and noes- and the bill was passed;)

"Concerning the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company."

Many bills were read a first and second time,

On motion of Mr. NEWLON,

The House adjourned.

SENATORIAL ELECTION!

Snap Judgement!

In compliance, most probably, with the mandates of a Whig caucus, held in the Capitol on Wednesday night, a motion was made in the House, yesterday, to go into the election of U. S. Senator, on Wednesday, the 22nd of the present month. The Republican party opposed this resolution, for the very satisfactory reasons, that, 1st, there was no sort of reason for hastening the election, because some thirty or forty days, of the session would remain after the 22d, within which period, the election could be fixed on some more satisfactory day: 2d, Because some of the members were absent, and could not possibly receive notice in time to be here on the day of election. Though some of the absentees were Whigs, yet the Whigs stood in a different situation from the Democrats; for, the Whigs, being in the majority, and of course, taking the lead in the subject, knew beforehand that the movement would take place about this time, and could have sent notice to their members days ago, so as to insure their attendance by the time of the election: 3d. The day mentioned in the resolution was strenuously opposed on the following ground: The contested election from the county of Bath had been hastened to a decision by the Whig House, and the only Democrat whose seat had been contested had been ejected. The seats of two Whigs were contested- and the House had not only not decided the claims of the contestants, but the rights of all were still pending before the committee.
of Privileges and Elections. Should the election take place on the 22nd, the Whigs would enter the contest with the certainty of having every member to whom they laid any claim, and possibly two more than they were entitled to; whilst, on the other hand, the Democrats would be forced to join battle under the disadvantage of having the claims on their side unsettled— and, when settled, it might result in a decision, that two Whigs, whose votes had given Virginia a Senator, were not properly entitled to a voice in the election – and that one, and probably two, or more, Democrats had been denied the exercise of their rights by the haste with which the House seemed determined to have a Senator elected.

But these reasons produced no effect on the trained majority in the House, and the 22d was fixed as the day. Thus has it been decided by the Whig Party, that they would not only palm on the State a Senator to oppose, rather than to accomplish her will; but they have further decided, that in the perpetration of the deed, they would afford no opportunity to the representatives of the people, necessarily absent, from the city, to return and give a full expression of legislative Sentiment on this vital question; and they have proceeded further, to declare that this election shall be held without deciding the preliminary question, Who are the representatives of the people, and, as such, entitled to cast the votes which are to decide the momentous result? We are yet to see whether the people of Virginia will permit their rights to be thus trampled under foot by a party wielding the powers of an accidental majority, and exercising their little “brief authority” to advance the petty schemes of party, rather than the great interests and recorded will of the State.

Twenty-Eighth Congress-2nd Ses. Wednesday, Jan. 15, 1845,

IN SENATE

Wednesday, January 15.

Eight bills were received from the House of Delegates, which were committed to their proper Committees.

Mr. McMULLEN, from the Committee of Internal Improvements, reported the bill concerning the Valley Turnpike Company.

Mr. McMULLEN explained the provisions of the bill.

Mr. STANDARD withdrew his opposition, and was in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. GALLAHER also spoke in favor of the bill. It passed –ayes 21, noes 8.

Mr. WALLACE moved to proceed to the election of Printer to the Senate, which had been delayed. Mr. W. nominated John Warrock, who received the unanimous vote of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. WILLIE, the bill incorporating the Broadmeadow Mining Company was taken up.

Mr. McMullen moved an amendment, which was opposed by Messrs. WALLACE, STANARD, COX and SHINN. Lost-ayes 12, noes 17.

Mr. POULSON brought a message from the House by Mr. Garnett, communicating the passage of a Joint Resolution

A message was received from the House by Mr. Garnett, communicating the passage of a Joint Resolution
Mr. STANDARD presented a memorial of the James River and Kanawha Company to the Legislature, asking for a re-investigation of its affairs, &c. Laid on the table.

TEXAS

The resolutions of Mr. THOMPSON of Kanawha, concerning the annexation of Texas, were taken up, on motion of Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. THOMPSON of K. sustained the resolutions.

Mr. SHINN opposed them.

Mr. STANARD offered the following amendment:

"Having a due regard to the obligations of the Constitution, the internal peace and tranquility of the country, and the national faith and honor."

Messrs. WALLACE and McMullen opposed the amendment- and Messrs. STANARD and GALLAHER advocated it.

The amendment was lost – ayes 10, noes 19- as follows:

Mr. BONDURANT moved to lay the resolutions on the table. Lost-ayes 12, noes 17.

After some further discussion, Mr. BONDURANT moved an adjournment, which was carried.

HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

Wednesday, Jan. 15.

Mr. Henry Frantz, the newly elected delegate from Roanoke county, took his seat.

On motion of Mr. TOLER,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Militia Laws enquire into the expediency of authorizing a majority of the officers of the three regiments in Campbell county to designate the places of training in said county.

Mr. TAYLOR of Loudoun moved a resolution, which was lost, instructing the committee on the Militia Laws to enquire into the expediency of dispensing with all music or military Paredes, except for the volunteer companies, and also of reducing their pay.

Mr. BOWDEN presented the Report of the Superintendent and Directors of the eastern Lunatic Asylum for the year 1841 watch, on his motion, was laid on the table, and 1000 copies ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the 17th Annual Report of the President and directors of the Western Asylum, which was laid on the table- and, on motion of Mr. FULTON of Augusta, 1000 copies were ordered to be printed.

Petitions, &c., were presented and referred:

By Mr. PARRIOTT, of citizens of Marshall county, for the right of way to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

By M. FULTON of Augusta, memorial of Robert Wade and other citizens of Augusta county against any change in the location of the contemplated McAdamized road from Staunton to James River, on that part of the road which lies between Staunton and Waynesborough.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Loudoun a petition of the officers of the 56th Regiment of militia, for the restoration of the office of Brigade Inspector;
By Mr. CAMERON, of citizens of Bath county for authority to James Paine to erect a dam across the Cow pasture river at McDonnell’s falls in said county.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, a joint resolution from the Committee on Courts, &c., was agreed to, for the protection of Virginia inspected salt against the inspection laws of other States.

On motion of Mr. FULTON of Wythe, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the consideration of the petition of Andrew Crolley, which was ordered to be laid on the table.

The House then proceeded to execute the joint order of the day, being the election of a Judge of the General Court and of the Circuit Court for the 3d Circuit and 2nd district to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Thomas H. Bayly.

There being no other candidate, Mr. Scarburgh received in the House 103, Edward P. Pitts 12, and George W. Southall 1.

The joint vote with the Senate stood, Scarburgh 128, scattering 15. So Mr. Scarburgh was declared duly elected judge, &c.

On motion of Mr. TOLER,

Resolved, That the Board of Public Works report to this House as early as practicable, whether any, and if any, what contract, conditional or unconditional, has been entered into, or proposed to be entered into between the Winchester and Potomac Rail Road Company, and the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company, for the sale by the former to the latter, of their corporate rights and interests in their said improvement, and the terms and conditions of such contract or proposed contract: also, that said Board report at the same time to this, House a copy, or copies of any such contract, or other communication, made to them by said Winchester and Potomac Rail Road Company, touching the same, if any such has been made; also, whether the assent of said Board has been given, or promised to any such contract now made, or hereafter to be made; also, that said Board in like manner report the amount of the several debts now due from said Winchester and Potomac Rail Road Company to what person or persons, or body or bodies corporate, said debts are severally due, when they became due, and how and by whom, other than said Company, the same are secured to be paid.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENSON, the engrossed bill “Providing for taking the sense of the people upon the propriety of calling a Convention to amend the Constitution of the State,” was laid on the table, and made the order of the day for Thursday, 23d January.

The following engrossed bills were read a third time and passed:

“Establishing the county of Gilmer of parts of the counties of Lewis and Kanawha.” (Opposed by Mr. EDGINGTON, and sustained by Messrs. HAYS, SMITH, JACKSON, and NEWLON.)

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the President and Directors of the James River and Kanawha Company, enclosing a memorial; which was, on motion of Mr. ANDERSON, laid on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON then moved the following resolutions:

The President and Directors of the James River and Kanawha Company having presented a memorial to the General Assembly, requesting an investigation of the affairs of the said Company by a joint committee of the two Houses of Assembly.

Resolved, That a joint Committee be appointed, in conformity to the prayer of the said memorial, and that said Committee be charged with the duty of visiting the line of works, of examining the books and papers in the office, and of investigating the affairs and management of the Company, from the commencement of its operations to the present time; and that the said committee have full power and authority to send for persons and papers.

Resolved, That the said committee shall consist of --members from the House of Delegates, and -- members from the Senate.

After some conversation between Messrs. STEPHENSON and STROTHER, the resolutions were adopted; the first resolution having been amended, on motion of Mr. STROTHER, by striking out the words “of visiting the line of works;” and, on motion of Mr. GOODSON, by adding thereto, “and that said Committee report on or before the 25th instant;” and the blanks in the second resolution having been filled respectively, on motion of Mr. GARNETT, with “five” and “four.”
The following resolutions we adopted:

By Mr. FARLEY, that the Committee on Courts, &c., enquire into the propriety of allowing to witnesses, who travel more than ten miles within their county to the place of attendance, mileage.

By Mr. MARTZ, that the Committee on Privileges and Elections enquire into the expediency of so amending the election laws, in regard to the duties of commissioners or superintendents of elections, as to make it illegal for them to sub-duct or erase from the polls any vote or votes after they shall have been recorded.

By Mr. BLACKWELL, that the Committee on Courts, &c., enquire into the expediency of passing a law authorizing Orlando M. Smith, Committee of John N. Bell, of Lunenburg county, to sell certain lands belonging to said Bell.

By Mr. BOLLING, that the Committee on Courts, &c., enquire into the expediency of exempting from jury service, for a limited time, the jury now engaged in the Randolph will ease, pending in the Circuit Court for the town of Petersburg.

On motion of Mr. WITCHER,

The House adjourned.'

PLANS FOR ANNEXATION

We published in our Wednesday's paper the plan of Mr. Foster, a Whig Senator from Tennessee. We hail the spirit which he displays, with great pleasure- and we concur with the Madisonian, in regarding it "as more just and practicable than some others which have been proposed- and if the regular propositions should not succeed, we should joyfully hail its adoption."

The bill of Mr. Dromgoole in the House of Representative is calculated to command great attention. It admits Texas, in the words of the Constitution, as a "new State" - allowing it certain dimensions not disproportionately large; and the residuary territory would, of course, belong to the "new State" until ceded by it to the U. States, in pursuance of the words of the Constitution: We are disposed to think, upon high and very respectable authority, that admission as a State is the only form in which it can pass Congress-and that if we are distracted by a diversity of views as to a compromise about slavery in this residuary territory, we may fail in the annexation- if not, that we shall succeed. "All (a correspondent writes us) depends upon this."

If this be the case, who can hesitate about it? What politician, who regards the great interests of his country, can pause for one moment amid the multitude of counselors, and the multiplicity of projects? Give us, then, Texas as a State, according to Dromgoole's plan. Let us have admission in its simplest form, and in conformity with precedents. We would not hesitate a moment about the measure. The views upon this matter are so strongly presented in the N. York Morning News of the 13th inst., that we lay them at once before our readers:

"ANNEXATION AT THIS SESSION.- We earnestly trust that the present Congress will not adjourn without settling this question. Constitutional obstacles are now out of the way, which stood before like a lion in the path, against the earlier forms which were proposed for the action of Congress. The admission of Texas as a "new State" into the Union, with stipulations as to her surplus territory, solves all that difficulty. This is the fundamental idea common to the three several plans of Mr. Niles in the Senate, and General Dromgoole and Mr. Tibbatts in the House of Representatives. We take it as pretty well settled now, that the action of Congress on the subject, in one form or another, must and will take this direction. Dromgoole's is the briefest and simplest of the three, and so far the most desirable- independently of the question of slavery. It makes no stipulation, indeed, in regard to the surplus territory of the new State to be admitted, though it proposes to fix certain limits to the dimensions of that State; leaving that surplus territory, of course, to the continued ownership of the State, precisely as some of our own original States, at the time of the formation of the Union, held vast tracts of Western territory, which they afterwards ceded to the Federal Government. It also leaves untouched the whole debt question. The United States assume no more liability for the debts of Texas than they now have for those of Pennsylvania or N. York. This feature is a capital recommendation of Dromgoole's plan. After the admission of the new State is consummated, it will be time enough to negotiate with her simultaneously about her lands, and the debt chargeable on them. Niles's plan is defective in this respect, that it provides for the cession of the lands without a corresponding assumption of the debt. Both, or neither, is but fair play. With General Dromgoole, we prefer the latter, decidedly. It simplifies the measure. It removes from it all semblance of that stock-jobbing character which is fastened upon it in the prejudices of many of its opponents. And it will leave time for a more deliberate survey of the whole ground of the questions we so often hear blindly mooted in the dark- How much is the debt? and, what is the extent and value of the unappropriated lands? There remains, then, but one serious difficulty in the way- the question of slavery. Mr. Niles's plan compromises that at once, like Col. Benton's, by making the 100th meridian of longitude a dividing line, on the East side of which slavery may be allowed, and on the West side prohibited. This is about an equal division of the territory, though slavery gets all the coast. Corresponding to the natural laws of the climate and soil, this appropriates to Free Labor the portion less adapted to the negro race, and leaves to slavery the portion suitable for cotton and sugar culture. General Dromgoole’s bill leaves this question, like that of the debt, open for future adjustment.”

SENATE

James River and Kanawha Company

The resolution for the appointment of a Joint Committee to examine the affairs of the James River and Kanawha Company came up for consideration, upon which arose a lengthy and warm discussion, in which Messrs. McMULLEN, COX, NEWMAN and SHINN, in opposition, and Messrs. STANARD, CAPERTON, BONDURANT, WALLACE and GALLAHER, in favor, took part and passed, ayes 18, noes 11, as follows:

Noes- Messrs, Cox, Crawford, Willey, Spark, Baptist, Garrett, Piper, Penn, McMullen, Taylor, and Newman-11.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the committee on the part of the Senate, viz: Messrs, Stanard, Guerrant, Thompson of A., and McCauley.

A message was received from the House, by Mr. Broaddus, of Culpepper, announcing the passage of a resolution, fixing Wednesday, the 23d instant, for the election of a Senator of the United States from the 4th of March next.

Laid on the table, on motion of Mr. NEWMAN.

Mr. PEYTON reported a bill for the incorporation of the Virginia Collegiate Institute. Laid on the table.

Also, to incorporate the Augusta Female Seminary. Laid on the table.

Mr. SLOAN reported a bill authorizing the County Court of Morgan to re-build the Court-house. Passed.

Mr. CARTER moved an adjournment, Lost- ayes 12, noes 13.

TEXAS.

On motion of Mr. NEWMAN, Mr. THOMPSON’S – of Kanawha – resolutions in regard to Texas came up.

Mr. STANARD delivered an argument against the constitutional power of the Senate to originate the resolutions, concluding with the following substitute for the first resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate, That the annexation of Texas to the United States ought to be effected at the earliest period that may be practicable, consistently with the obligations of the Constitution, the internal peace and tranquility of the country, and the faith and honor of he nation.

Mr. THOMPSON of Kanawha replied.

Mr. McMULLEN also made some remarks.

After some further discussion, in which Mr. GALLAHER participated. Mr. STANARD moved to lay the whole subject on the table.—Lost –ayes 10, noes 19.

Mr. STANARD’S substitute was lost by the following vote:

NOES—Messrs. Scott, (Speaker,)

The original resolutions were then passed—ayes 18, noes 7—as follows:

On motion of Mr. GARRETT.

The Senate adjourned at 5 ½ o’clock.

Thursday, January, 16, 1845

A communication from the Senate by their Clerk, that they had passed the acts, "Amending the act passed January 29, 1844, appropriating a sum of money to the Price’s Turnpike and Cumberland Gap Road;” and “To change the place of training of the Officers of the 165th Regiment of Virginia Militia;” and also the act “concerning Mary Battle of the county of Brunswick,” with amendments, in which the House concurred.

Petitions, &c., were presented and referred:

By Mr. FRAZIER, of Peter Moore’s administrator, (with accompanying documents,) for an appropriation to satisfy his judgment for half pay as a Captain in the Revolutionary war;

By Mr. TYREE, of Geo. Hughart of Fayette county, asking compensation for service as a private soldier of Virginia, in 1793;

By Mr. DENISON, two memorials of certain citizens of Shenandoah, against the formation of a new county out of parts of Rockingham and Shenandoah;

By Mr. POWELL, a petition of sundry citizens of Bedford and Amherst counties, that James River may be made a lawful fence from the upper end of Roach’s Island to the mouth of Otter Creek.

On motion of Mr. WATTS,

Resolved, That the Committee of Roads, &c., enquire into the expediency of authorizing all the creditors of the Portsmouth and Roanoke Rail Road Company to convert the debts due them from said Company into stock, and of making such further legislative provisions upon the subject as may be deemed necessary.

Mr. BROADUS of Culpepper offered a resolution, that this House will, by joint vote with the Senate, proceed on Wednesday, 22d instant, to the election of a Senator of the United States, to supply the vacancy to occur on the 4th March next, by the expiration of the term of service of Wm. C. Rives, Esq.:

Mr. LEAKE moved to lay it upon the table.

Mr. BROADUS of Culpepper asked for reasons for so doing.

Mr. LEAKE said, he made the motion to lay the resolution upon the table, so that notice might be given to all the members of this House, who felt any interest in the election. Some members were absent, and if the 22nd of this month was fixed on as the day for the election, they could not be here to represent their constituents. There was a plenty of business before the House for them to act upon, and much more than could be attended to between this time and the day selected by the gentleman from Culpepper. If there were not important matters before them claiming their attention, and some absentees, who would not be here at as early a day, he would not desire the delay of action on this subject. The gentleman supposing himself and party ready to proceed with the election, was for dispatch, whilst the Democrats had heretofore received no intimation of the necessity of getting ready speedily for the contest.
Mr. GOODSON hoped the gentleman would not force us into the election until we were ready. The Whigs had had their meeting last night and came here organized. It was known a meeting of the Democrats was to be held tomorrow night. He thought it reasonable to allow them to get ready in the same way - that was all he asked.

Mr. DANIEL of Prince George said, he would assign some additional reasons why the resolution should be laid upon the table at this time. He believed that it had been usual for the House to decide all the contests about elections of members, before they proceeded to such an important election as that of Senator of the United States. This had been the practice heretofore, and from which he saw no good reasons for a departure. There was now pending before this House a contest from Caroline county, which had not been disposed of; and also a memorial against the eligibility of the gentleman from Fairfax concerning which there had been no final action by this House. Until, therefore, this House had decided who were, and who were not, entitled to seats in this body, he thought the all-important election of Senator should be deferred.

Mr. BOWDEN enquired of the Chairman of the Committee of Privileges and Elections, whether the Committee had taken action upon the case from Fairfax.

Mr. WITCHER said they had not had a meeting since the last papers were sent to the Committee; but he believed, and the Committee also believed, that it was the business of the Attorney for the Commonwealth, in Fairfax, to proceed against persons violating the anti-dueling act. He believed that was the proper forum, and not this house. He thought the Committee would not change their opinion relative to this contest. He intended yet to look into that matter; - other business, and his own health, had, heretofore prevented the investigation: but, after examination, from what he understood, he thought the opinion of the Committee would be, that the delegate from Fairfax should retain his seat.

Mr. BOWDEN said he referred to the condition of the gentleman from Fairfax with pain; but he thought, until the House had decided his right, that he held at least a doubtful tenure - and he did not believe the election ought to be gone into until all the members had undisputed rights to their seats. All he asked was fairness; and he did not believe his opponents here would force us into the election until it was apparent that fairness could be attained.

Mr. EDMUNDS of Halifax said the member from Franklin was absent, and there was not time to write a letter to him and have it answered in time, or to get here after hearing of the election. He did not know that other members were in the same situation; but he knew the case of the member from Franklin, and he knew the distance to that county was such as to forbid the member's return in time.

Mr. WITCHER said he had not a shadow of doubt of the result in the Caroline case - he believed the member now in his seat would retain it. He explained why the Committee had not reported sooner. He knew, also, that there were two members on his side of the question absent; but there was time for all to be here. Perhaps if you postpone the election longer, some members who are now here may be absent forever. He knew that the members who had the seats, had all the rights of members until they were evicted, but he did not believe it possible to change the result by evicting those members.

Mr. EDMUNDS of Halifax said there was not the slightest probability of the member from Franklin getting here in time - he had gone home without expecting this election to be brought on so soon, and it would be wrong to hurry the election before information could reach him. The other members who were absent might get here.

The motion to lay on the table was [negative] [unreadable word?].

Mr. GOODSON moved to amend to Wednesday, the 29th inst.

Mr. BOWDEN called the ayes and noes.

Mr. McPHERSON of Page, asked the gentleman to withdraw his amendment. He saw the predicament in which his party would be placed. It would pledge the party to go into the election. He thought this House ought to strengthen the majority in the other House.

Mr. GOODSON withdrew.

Mr. STOVALL moved to amend, and go into the election on to-morrow, the 17th inst.

Mr. McPHERSON of Page, could not vote for the amendment. He would not indicate any disposition to go into the election at all. He was opposed to it entirely. The State of Virginia was decidedly Democratic, and if we went into the election, it was evident that we should be beaten.

Mr. GOODSON hoped the amendment would be withdrawn. And he would tell the gentleman from Page, that he thought him a very good General, but he did not see the necessity of telling the enemy exactly what he would do.

Mr. McP. said he only told what he was aware the enemy already fully knew.

The Resolution was then adopted by the following vote, Mr. EDMUNDS of Halifax having called the ayes and noes:

A bill "Concerning bail in civil cases was taken up on motion of Mr. STEPHENSON, and being amended on his motion, Mr. JACKSON moved its indefinite postponement.

Messrs. JACKSON and TAYLOR sustained and Messrs. LEE and STEPHENSON opposed the motion.

The bill was indefinitely postponed, ayes 62 to noes 52; Mr. JACKSON having called the ayes and noes.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Governor, enclosing resolutions of the Legislature of New Hampshire, to the immediate re-annexation of Texas – also protesting against the imprisonment of Thomas Wilson Dorr of Rhode Island.

Mr. STEPHENSON moved to lay the communication on the table.

Mr. LEAKE moved to amend the motion and ordering it to be printed.

Mr. STEPHENSON hoped no member would agree to the printing of at least a portion of the resolutions – especially, if it was not expressly declared, that the House did not thereby meanly endorse them.

Mr. LEAKE said, that the printing would to amount a sanction by this House. At the commencement; of the session, the House had without objection, ordered the printing of resolutions from Massachusetts, protesting against the annexation of Texas, as being tantamount to a Resolution of the Union. The same course should be pursued now.

Mr. STEPHENSON meant no disrespect to a sovereign State. All that he desired was that the House might not be understood as endorsing, the course of New Hampshire.

Mr. PRESTON hoped all the resolutions would be printed; so that the House and the [c...][unreadable word] might understand them.

Mr. GOODSON thought a large number these of resolutions, as well as those from Massachusetts, should be printed for the information the people of Virginia.

Mr. Leake’s amendment was adopted and the papers ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. LANIER, the House adjourned.

ANOTHER VOICE FROM THE GRANITE STATE!

We lay before our readers another proposition on the annexation of Texas. It is offered by Mr. Burke of New Hampshire to the House of Representatives. It breathes a fine spirit, and we thank him for it. It breathes a spirit, which becomes the man, the State, and an American statesman.

Whilst on this subject, it is impossible for us to pass over another gentleman from New Hampshire, whose noble devotion to principle and to his country is on a par with his distinguished talents. The Tariff—Texas—all the great questions of the day, have been met by him like a man and like a statesman. Whom can we mean but Levi Woodbury, Senator of the United States? If the thanks of one humble Virginian—(one? – let us rather say of every Republican in Virginia,) be of any account in his eyes, they are justly his. He does not fritter away his strength in struggling with imaginary monsters. He does not higgle about little or factitious difficulties, but marches up to his object with the wisdom of a statesman, and the firmness of a man. He declares himself openly and boldly for Texas, because he believes its acquisition necessary for the good of his whole country. He considers her independent, and is willing to receive her into our bosom, without asking the consent of any other power. If Mr. Woodbury had done no more, than stand up for the immediate annexation of Texas, he would have been entitled to the gratitude of the people; but combined with this question his luminous views and efficient services on the other great problem of the day, the Tariff, and we for one are willing to say, "Good and faithful servant, go on and do your duty."

But, to return from this digression to Mr. Burke's proposition. We have not the pleasure of his acquaintance; but we learn from those who know him best, that he is a Republican after our own heart. The Washington "Constitution of yesterday morning calls attention to his bill- the admirable "bill offered by Mr. Burke of New Hampshire. If we are not, greatly mistaken, this bill will be found to contain almost every good feature of each bill and resolution which has heretofore been presented. This is the point to be attained, and which we probably shall attain at last. This day's debate shows that the spirit of conciliation and harmony is rather increased than diminished; and, as we have said elsewhere, augurs the best results."

Mr. YANCEY commenced by expressing his regret that between the great political parties which divided our people, and which must ever exist under a free and popular Government, and animosities become so deeply seated, that what might otherwise have proved a blessing to the Government, by tending to guard and preserve its purity, had in fact proved its bane. Instead of estimating measures according to their bearings upon the best interests of the country at large, there were but too many who judged of them simply according to their probable effects on the party to which each belonged. That spirit, he lamented to see, had crept into this Hall, and he could not but give expression to his deep and unfeigned regret that the gentleman from Ohio over the way, (Mr. Vinton,) distinguished as he was in the possession of such keen and searching intellect, enlightened by so brilliant a wit, and graced by every accomplishment which could give lustre to a public station, should have lent himself to lower the character of an American Representative, which he was so well qualified to adorn. – The consequence of the prevalence of the spirit to which he had alluded was, that we were fast becoming, if we had not already become, a nation of partisans. It was under the influence of convictions like these that he had rejoiced at the fact, that now, at length, a great question had presented itself, a question of such momentous magnitude, and of such pure and noble associations, as were calculated to elevate the soul, to warm every patriot heart, and to crush beneath its unparalleled importance all the contemptible machinations of partisans – of men capable of knowing, of feeling, and appreciating nothing but the mere bubbles which were ever found to float in the wake of party. Such a question was this of the annexation of Texas; a question so purely American, and addressing itself so directly to the honor and to the interests of the entire Republic, that all party feuds shrunk at its approach. Like that mysterious star which led the shepherds of old to the birth-place of the Savior of the world, this question was now culmination over the Republic, calling on all who loved their country to lay aside their wranglings, and arise and abet a cause whose spirit and whose tendencies were "peace on earth and good will to men." Mr. Y. thanked God, that there were still among us men whose hearts leaped and fluttered at the waving of a banner on which their country's honor was inscribed, and who like the ancient Jews, when their sacred trumpet sounded to arms, arose, and forgetting all party distinctions and party interests, girded themselves for their country's cause. Not so the member from North Carolina. With him the momentous associations of this question; its bearing on the interests of our entire country, on its commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing prosperity; its effects, for weal or for woe, on the present and on the future—effects which were now agitating patriot hearts upon two continents—had not in them sufficient worth or dignity to draw his mind from the question whether he did not dine with a distinguished politician in N. Y., and whether the sailors of the ship North Carolina voted in the city of New York, and not in Brooklyn. Such were the gentleman's views of a question which was agitating this entire Union, and which, more than any question which had been started among us for half a century, was calculated to string the nerves and agitate the bosom of every honest man.

We were all, said Mr. Y., in the habit of estimating the character of a person whom we had never seen, by reading his productions and by hearing from others what he said and did. Mr. Y., on such grounds, had formed an estimate of this gentleman; and he must confess that, for himself, he was not much surprised at the dimensions of intellect and qualities of heart which he now found the gentleman to posses. In that part of the Union which Mr. Y. had the honor to represent, that Representative was everywhere viewed as the betrayer of his country. He was looked on by every one as a renegade, recreant to the principles and the interest of that portion of the Union. With this estimate of him beforehand, even Mr. Y. himself was astonished when that gentleman got up to taunt his brothers of the South because their strenuous efforts and earnest and continued exertions had not been able to prevent the repeal of that rule of this House which prohibited the presentation of abolition petitions. The motives which he attributed to their conduct on that subject were such as could have been found only in the heart of him and going over to the ranks of the enemy, turned and flouted the colors of that enemy in the face of his own friends. Mr. Y. knew that such had been the estimate entertained by nineteen-twentieths of the men of the South respecting this gentleman; but he must confess his surprise when he rose in this House and bragged of what he termed the dishonesty and rascality of the State he had the honor to represent.

Mr. CLINGMAN here rose and wished to explain.

Mr. YANCEY: No, Sir; I want no explanations. Explanations elsewhere.

It was not for Mr. Y. to decide on the true character of such conduct: the people of North Carolina would decide that question. But surely it might have been supposed that every honorable heart would have paused and would have shrunken back within itself before it could consent to drag the disgrace of his own native State before the world. The unwelcome task, if it must be performed, should at least have been left for other hands. And well might North Carolina, thus wounded and gored by her native son, exclaim with the falling Caesar, "Et tu Brute!" Mr. Y. should pass no sentence on the gentleman; he should not undertake to pronounce what conduct like this deserved, but the Bible, [if the gentleman ever read that book] might teach him the fate of the man who forgot what was due to himself and his family. Let him look at the Patriarch Noah, betrayed in an unguarded hour and lying exposed in his tent. One of his sons saw his parent's shame, and went forth and ridiculed the spectacle before his brothers; but those brothers took a mantle and without daring to turn their eyes or to look for so much as a moment on a father so exposed, walked up backwards and cast the mantle—the broad mantle of filial charity—to cover his indignity from his wine and heard what his younger son had done, and, gifted with the spirit of prophecy by God himself, pronounced upon him a curse which had come down upon him, and upon his seed, and upon his seed's seed, to this every hour, witnessing and proving to all men the truth of the scriptures, "A servant of servants shall he be, and shall dwell in the tents of Japheth on his western shore. Oh, had the departing spirit of the pure, the wise, the patriotic Macon been hovering in these Halls and among these stately pillars, and here had heard a son of North Carolina utter language such as had fallen from that Representative, he might have stopped an instant to gaze in astonishment, but full quickiy would have descended in sorrow to the sepulcher:

Mr. Y. said he should be pardoned if, in taking these views of the subject which the Representative from North Carolina had discussed, or rather had avoided, and of the character which he had attempted to give to a debate otherwise eminently dignified and worthy of that Hall, he should not follow him into the dark purlieus of party with which that gentleman seemed so disgracefully familiar; but should now address himself to the great question before the House.

The first question to be settled was this: are the several propositions which have been presented for the annexation of Texas to this Union constitutional in their character? For himself, Mr. Y. preferred one of them which was not now immediately before the committee. He referred to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Tibbatts) because it more exactly met Mr. Y.'s view of the Constitution. The reasons of his preference were these: that proposition confined itself to the very letter, as well as to the spirit of that sacred instrument. It would be remembered that, under the Confederation which held the States together previously to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, it was found in practice that too few powers were conferred on the General Government, and that those which were given were too limited and restricted to allow sufficient scope for the just action of the Government of so large a Confederacy. Remembering this state of things, (which had then become a subject of general complaint) if gentlemen would turn to the Articles of Confederation, they would find that the 11th article was in these words:

"Canada, acceding to this confederation, and joining in the measures of the U. States, shall be admitted into and entitled to all the advantages of this Union; but no other colony shall be admitted into the same, unless such admission be agreed to by nine States.”

In this was found the origin of the present article in the Constitution, conferring on Congress the power to admit new States into the Union. — The article, it would be perceived, was specific in its terms, and yet it had compass enough to allow the Confederation to admit a foreign State by act of Congress. The spirit of that enactment of the patriot fathers had been preserved in the Constitution which they afterwards adopted, and was founded in the 4th article of the 3d section: “New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union.”

Now, what was the history of the transformation of this article? And how could it be shown that the general power then given was preserved in its new form? If gentlemen would turn to the 4th volume of Elliott’s Debates on the Constitution; they would find that, in the Convention which sat for the formation of the new Constitution, Mr. Randolph offered the following proposition:

“That provision ought to be made for the admission of States lawfully arising within the limits of the United States, whether from a voluntary junction of Government and territory. Or otherwise with the consent of a number of voices in the National Legislature less the whole.”

This proposition directly contravened the spirit of the previous article in the Confederation. — That allowed the admission of foreign States, this did not. And moreover, it was equally opposed to the whole view and purpose of the people, in calling the Convention and demanding a new Constitution, which was to augment the powers, and enlarge the scope of the Federal Government. And what was the fate of this proposition? Did the Convention approve of and adopt it? No. It was voted down. But, further, in page 163, it would be found that, in the draught of a constitution by a committee of five, which was reported on the 6th of August, 1787, the 17th article declared that —

“New States, lawfully constituted or established within the limits of the U. States, may be admitted by the Legislature into this Government,” &c.

This, too, was voted down, and in its stead the existing provision of the Constitution was adopted by a vote of six States to five. Now, when gentlemen went to the root of the matter, they would perceive that the original article, which specifically provided for the admission of one foreign State and left an open door for the admission of others, was in the Constitution finally adopted, so enlarged [...] to provide for the admission of new States generally. The phrase was indefinite, and who was he that had the authority to declare what were its limits? None could point them out; it had none but such as might be found in the good sense of the people, and in the guaranty, elsewhere given, that every new State should have a Republican form of Government. If this article was, as some gentlemen contended, confined to the reception of new States formed within the boundary of the Union, why was the proposition of Mr. Randolph voted down in the Convention? And why did that Convention adopt in its place a different article, more enlarged in its terms? Obviously it was intended that the power of congress to admit new States should be left an unlimited power.

The proposition therefore, of the gentleman from Kentucky, came up, as he had said to the very letter, and, what was better, to the very spirit of the Constitution. This prevision was inserted as one great means of providing for the common defence and the general warfare. And Mr. Y. preferred the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, because on that plan we could get possession of Texas by Texas ceding to us territory, just as Virginia and many of the other States had ceded theirs. This resolution provided for her doing the same thing, and that strictly within the purview of the Constitution. Mr. Y. would say to the friends of the measure on that floor that, however their partialities might incline towards some other of the several projects which had been presented, and however well convinced some gentlemen might be that congress now possessed the power to receive foreign territory into the Union, (and Mr. Y. entertained no doubt that by a long process of reasoning that position might be logically established,) they had still better adopt this proposition, because it effected the same purpose in a more direct manner, and more in conformity with the letter of the Constitution. Other plans might perhaps be plausibly objected to, but no man could so cut down the power contained in the words of the Constitution, that it would not apply to States lying confessedly without the existing boundaries of the Union.

Considering the cultivated mind, clear understanding, and enlarged views of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Winthrop,) Mr. Y. had been astonished to hear him say that the constitution adopted by our patriot fathers was by them intended to apply only to the territory then within the United States. This, surely, was too narrow-minded a view of things to be worthy of the mind of any true friend of our American liberty. The Constitution applicable only to what were the bounds of the Union when it was framed? Why were, then, must Louisiana, and Arkansas, and Missouri stand? At the adoption of the constitution, these were not within the limits of the United States. And would the gentleman from Massachusetts maintain that these three States were now unconstitutionally within the limits of the United States? Had the people of Louisiana and the people of Arkansas and Missouri not share in the guarantees of the Constitution? Did they possess no rights by it and under it? The gentleman would not say so. Yet these were States which lay, without and beyond the territory of the United States when the article was framed which empowered Congress to receive new States into the Union. They had come into the Union — they had received a cheerful welcome. And what Republican freeman would close the doors of this, our fellowship of freedom, to any who in a proper spirit came and knocked for admission?

It appeared very singular to Mr. Y. that there were only two instances in our history where treaties had been made by which foreign countries were allowed to diminish the extent of our territory. And the negotiators of both happened to come from the State of Massachusetts. Where ever our territory had been clipped, and privileges enjoyed by our citizens had been taken from them it had been done under the auspices of two gentlemen from Statistics of Texas

On the motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to this House such information as he may possess, or may be able to procure, of the whole amount of the debt of Texas the amount for which bond or scrip has been issued: and the present market value of subscript or bond in Texas, in the United States, as in Europe; the amount in value of the exports from, and the imports into, Texas, for the year 1813 and 1814, with the amount of revenue accruing and collected for the same years, with the expenditures for the same time; also, the present population of Texas, distinguishing in number between free and slaves; also, the quantity, acres of land, which it is supposed is covered by valid grants from the present and former Governments of that country; and the estimated quality in acres of good and arable land suitable for cultivation which remains ungranted with the undisputed and acknowledged limits of Texas as the same existed prior to the year 1831.

RE-ANNEXATION OF TEXAS.

Mr. HAMMETT moved that the rules be suspended, that the House might resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to; and the House went into Committee of the Whole on the State the Union, (Mr. Hopkins in the Chair, ) and assumed the consideration of the resolutions to re-annex Texas to this Union.

Mr. HOLMES, who had the floor from yesterday, commenced with some remarks on the importance of the question which now occupies the attention of the committee. He contends that this was not a sectional, but a great national question; and to this complexion it had [...] [unreadable] last; annexation, or rejection now and forever. And on this he based the proposition, and calls to it the attention, not of a section, nor of a part but of every man who had in his heart the loved union and confederation, viz: Annexation objection was salvation or destruction to the New Atlantic States, to New England and to the manufacturing community, and he admitted, [...] [unreadable word] the inevitable destruction of the South, and he sustained his position by showing the deleterious effect which would be produced on the productivity and manufactures of the various sections of the country by Texas remaining independent and commercial league with England, and in possession of the guarantees promised to her by [...] [unreadable word] Aberdeen on condition of her preserving her government separate from ours. Her treaty with Great Britain would preclude exportations [...] [unreadable word] our country to that republic, and under the [...] [unreadable word] policy our entire Union would be injured [...] [unreadable word] degree now not to be determined.

Mr. WM. J. BROWN was wedded to no particular plan. He was like the young man in his own native West, with stout arm and high principles, who, when he first sets out from the maternal home, gets himself a wife. When united to one whose smile serves the purpose of the rainbow of hope and promise, he begins to build his cabin, and lay out his fields, until his barn of plenty is filled to overflowing. Just so with him he was first for his country, and next for Texas and, having obtained her, all things else will be added thereto. Let us then have Texas [...] [unreadable] and hereafter all the details could be settled At as this question was decided in the late election he called upon gentlemen to obey the will of the people.

Mr. GARRET DAVIS would not be displeased; on the contrary, he would be glad if Texas could be annexed without a violation of our Constitution, and our neutral rights, and with the general assent of the people. It was with a view to the distant future that he should desire the consummation of this measure. The natural [...] [unreadable word] cities of Texas for the production of cotton and sugar, rendered it of immense importance to the inhabitants of the United States. But his wish to see Texas annexed was subordinate to other considerations. His attachment to the Union as it existed, rather than endanger its continuance led him, nevertheless, to oppose annexation in every possible form. He spoke of the question as one of power- contending that the legislature was not, by the Constitution, empowered to acquire foreign territory, &c.

Mr. BOWLIN next obtained the floor; but

The Committee rose, and reported progress; and

The House then adjourned.

EXTRACT of a letter from Madison county, Jan.

“Mr. Goggin has declined becoming a candidate for re-election, as you have seen. The Whigs are AWFULLY troubled about it here. I do not think there is the least doubt about the election of a Democratic member of Congress from this district, unless there be some discord in the convention proposed to be held in Charlottesville to nominate a candidate.”

[We will listen to no such apprehension. We take it for granted, that the Convention will be well attended, as it ought to be- fairly organized as it ought also to be- and that its nominate will meet the immediate and cordial support of every Republican in the District.] – Enquirer.

LATER FROM MEXICO

By the arrival last evening of the steam ship New York, Capt. J. T. Wright, 42 hours from Galveston, we are in possession of later intelligence from Mexico. The progress of the revolution seems to be onward, and the star of Santa Anna appears to pale before his victorious foes.

We copy the following interesting particulars from the Galveston News, of the 7th inst.

By the arrival on Saturday last of the sloop H. L. Kinney, Capt. Lewis, direct from Corpus Christi, through the politeness of her commander, we have been furnished with letters from which we have gleaned the following, later and important news, in relation to the movements among the revolutionists.

From the latest official news at Matamoras, from the interior of Mexico, it appears that Gen. Paredes at the head of 8,000 men, marched against Santa Anna, who at that time had under his command 13,000 troops. On the approach of Paredes, Santa Anna immediately retired, great numbers of his soldiers deserting his cause. This retreat extended to the city of Puebla, where he was attacked by Paredes and defeated.
Gen. Santa Anna, who made his escape, was compelled to disguise himself and take conveyance in a common coach of the country. The particulars of this battle are not given, but we presume the victory was achieved by Gen. Paredes at great expense of life, as is usually the case in Mexican warfare.

In Northern Mexico the revolution has been general throughout the country. At the last accounts, Gen. Canales in conjunction with Gen. Arista, were marching at the head of a large force against Gen. Wool, who still held out in favor of centralism.

The revolution broke out in the city of Matamoras on the 19th ult. On the reception of the news in Matamoras, of the success of the Federal party, the citizens opposed to centralism and in favor of Federalism, assembled at the most public places and immediately denounced the Tyrant, and publicly proclaimed for the Federal cause. Great excitement prevailed in the city during the outbreak- Gen. Celia was seized, and imprisoned- the shout for liberty and down with centralism became general in all quarters, until the revolution became triumphant.

In Monterey the same scenes were enacted as in other cities, but of a more sanguinary character. The particulars we have not received, further than an account of the death of Gen. Jose Maria Ortega, Governor of the city of Monterey, who was publicly butchered for his faithful adherence to the cause of Santa Anna.

We are informed, says the same paper of the 7th inst., that on the 27th ult, upwards of fifty horses were stolen from Corpus Christi. It is not known by whom the theft was committed; but an expedition had been fitted out and sent in pursuit, who had not returned at last accounts. We also learn that the Caronkawa Indians have collected a large body and are committing depredations upon the property of the inhabitants surrounding Aransas Fay.

When the H. L. Kinney left, trade was considered at Corpus Christi, brisk. Several Mexicans were in from Mexico, but there was a great scarcity of goods, not an assortment sufficient to meet their demands.

From the seat of Government we received no papers, and the following from the News comprises all the information received:

The steamer Dayton arrived on Monday the 6th inst., but brought no mail from Washington; this is more to be regretted on account of several rumors which have reached us in relation to the movements at the seat of government.

The most important rumor afloat is in reference to Gen. Duff Green, the U. S. Consul at this place, who it is reported, has been harshly treated by the Executive. If so, Uncle Sam will have more difficulties to arrange besides those of a Mexican character.

We know nothing of the particulars thereof and shall calmly wait for further developments.

From what we can glean from private sources, we are led to believe that Dr. Jones is going to renounce Houstonism and come out strong in favor of western measures, provided the west will sustain him. The western people have never asked more than their rights – these have been denied them – protect them from the predatory incursion of Mexicans, and the repeated depredations of Indians – refit the navy and restore her noble commander, and Dr. Jones would soon become the most popular President in Western Texas.

Capt. Jacques of the brig Rover, arrived at Galveston on the 3d inst. From Havana, reported that when he sailed; a rumor had reached that city of the capture and imprisonment of Santa Ana at Vera Cruz.

THE TEXAS QUESTION

We trust that a majority of the House of Delegates will yet be found in favor of the Texas resolutions? As a party, the Whigs in Virginia and in the South have a deep interest in its adjustment. They have more to lose by it than we have. Indeed, they must lose by its suspension. We must gain by it. They lost by it considerably at the last Fall Election, and they will lose more by it in the Spring Elections. It is impossible to exclude it from the canvass, if it still be kept open. It will, indeed, be the prominent issue in the canvass, and will override every other. Every Republican candidate will take it in his hand, and will appeal to the people of Virginia for their support. It is in vain to deny the fact – but many able and honest Whigs are in favor of annexation – and if they do not assist the Republican Party, they can lend but a feeble assistance to their own party on such a question. Let us then unite, and strike it out at once from the party issues of the day. Every one for sees, that if the question be not settled at the present Congress, the question is only adjourned. It must come up again, unless Texas should slam the door directly in our faces. It will continue to mingle in our political struggles – rising every day into more gigantic consequence, so long as any hope exists of its permanent adjustment. We will not abandon the scheme, unless Texas does. But it is obvious, that delay only increases the danger – that Great Britain will multiply her intrigues, present more and more seductive offers to obtain her independence, and form an advantageous commercial connection with our greatest commercial rival – and that there is a serious danger lest her people should become dissatisfied with our obstinate refusal, and turn to Great Britain for co-operation and succor. In that event, with Texas lost to us, except at a great sacrifice of blood and of treasure, whom will the Southern people hold responsible for its loss? The bolt will fall upon the Whig Party, and it must inevitably strike them down in the South.

Will some member of Congress be kind enough to send us a copy of the map of Texas lately published? We wish to see the boundaries of the territory, &c., &c.

Meantime, we must frankly confess, that Mr. Haywood’s speech, ingenious as it is, has failed to convince us of the propriety of establishing the 34th degree of latitude as the new Compromise line between the slave and non-slaveholding States. The line of the Missouri Compromise was the 36 ½ degree. Even that line, we recollect, was very seriously resisted by many of the Southern people. They contended that such a restriction was contrary to the spirit of the Constitution - which permitted States to come into the Union without any restriction relative to slavery. They contend, too, that the line is unequal – because it allows the non-slaveholding States a much greater scope of territory, extending to the Pacific, and embracing Oregon, than what lays to the South of the line. It was also the established line of Texas at the time when the Florida Treaty was ratified, and when we exchanged that country for Florida. We humbly conceive, therefore, that we have a right to call upon our Northern brethren, if we are to abide by the Missouri Compromise in all future time, to respect its boundaries now when we are attempting to regain the territory which we possessed at the time of the ratified cession. For one, therefore, with all respect to the Senator from North Carolina, we object to his bill, because it relinquishes 2 ½ degrees of latitude which ought to belong to the weakest portion of the Union. We prefer Mr. Foster’s bill to Mr. Haywood’s which preserves the principle of the Missouri Compromise, which takes in Texas as a State without any delay – and which presents the proposition of annexation in a simpler form, and [stripped] of a variety of details which may perplex the judgment, distract the vote, and perhaps defeat the measure.

EDITORIAL “ANNEXATION – MR. RIVES”

The Richmond Whig thinks that Mr. Rives will still oppose the annexation of Texas; that it is not to be imagined, that he so lightly made up his mind six or eight months ago, as to be prepared to change it. Who doubts if the question was put directly to the people of this Commonwealth, that an overwhelming majority of them would be for immediate annexation? Should not our Senators then vote for what they have every reason to believe the people of Virginia would instruct them to do?

Charlottesville Jeffersonian.

There is great force in the remark of the Jeffersonian. Will the senator carry out the acknowledged will of the people of Virginia? There was a majority of near 6,000, (and if the bona fide voters only had been counted, of at least 8,000, ) Republican voters in favor of Annexation. Will Virginia then, appeal to her Senator in vain? Why does the Whig talk about Mr. Rives changing his mind? He voted against the Treaty, it is true, and now the question will be about admitting a new State into the Union. He does not change his argument at all upon the general question of annexation. That argument still remains as a monument of his talents in favor of the Truth. He ought never to vote against Texas, until he is prepared to answer his own argument.

We cannot yet reconcile ourselves to the idea, that Mr. Rives will vote against the bill. We hope yet, that he will strike one blow for his country. He has complied with the supposed obligations of the letter in which he unfortunately pledged himself to go for H. Clay. He spoke and he voted for that candidate – and the deed is done. The scene has now shifted. Texas comes forward now under different auspices. The voice of party ought to be hushed – that of the country alone should be heard. Will Mr. Rives turn a deaf ear to her demands; and spurn Texas once more from that door, through which he has so irresistibly proved she ought to be admitted into the Union? Far better be in honorable retirement at Castle Hill, than strike such a blow against his own country. But if his retirement should be turned into banishment, by the Whig party, what consolation will soothe an exile which is preceded by a vote fatal to the South, mischievous to Virginia, and injurious to the whole Union? Congressional, Debate on the Annexation of Texas

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Winthrop) informs us that a hope is entertained by the Republican party, that the Northern Whigs would exhibit, on this occasion, their anti-slavery feelings to such an excess as to embarrass their Whig friends at the South in the coming elections; and from a remark he made at the opening of his speech, he seemed to think that such was my wish. I assure the honorable member, said Mr. B., that, as far as I am concerned, he is mistaken. But although he told us that such a hope would be disappointed, yet he could not refrain from saying that, upon the ground of slavery alone, he would oppose the admission of Texas now and always. It will remain to be seen whether the tender mercy shown for the Whig friends of the gentleman from the South – which is so great as to cause him at abstain from pressing a leading head of his argument, and the one which is known to constitute the principal objection to annexation with Northern men – will not be as injurious to those friends and allies, as if free vent had been given their anti-slavery feelings; whether the embrace of friendship will not be as fatal as the blows of hostility?

The honorable gentleman informs us, that the South, before the Revolution, remonstrated against slavery being forced upon them by Great Britain, and he expressed his surprise that we should now complain that she should express a desire to see slavery abolished among us. Does not the honorable gentleman know that the very fact he mentions is, in part, the ground of our complaint? When we were colonies of England, and she had an interest in the matter, she forced slavery upon us; but now, when we are no longer so – when we are rival of hers, and she is interested in our downfall – according to her own official declaration, she is constantly exerting herself to destroy the very institution which her cupidity forced upon us. Is it possible that there could be a stronger ground of complaint?

The honorable gentleman is mistaken in supposing, that Great Britain has gone no further than to express a wish “to see” slavery abolished in Texas. In the very despatch from which he quotes, Lord Aberdeen says: “It is well known, both to the United States and the whole world, that Great Britain desires, and the whole world, that Great Britain desires, and is constantly exerting herself to procure, the general abolition of slavery throughout the world; but the means which she has adopted, and will continue to adopt, for this humane and virtuous purpose, are open and undisguised. With regard to Texas, we avow that we wish to see slavery abolished there as elsewhere. But, although we earnestly desire, and feel it our duty to promote such a consummation, we shall not interfere unduly, or with an improper assumption of authority, with either party, in order to ensure the adoption of such a course.” Here is something more than the expression of a wish to see slavery abolished by the Government itself, that it is constantly exerting all of its tremendous power to compass this end.

But gentleman answer, although she is thus exerting herself, she does not mean to interfere unduly and by an improper assumption of authority. Now, sir, the meaning of these words depends upon the character of the person by whom they are used. What one might consider very proper another would think very improper. Paul Clifford, designated as a sarcastic portrait of a British statesman, drawn by one of themselves, thought it not improper to rob upon the highway, and doubtless would have assured, with cold impudence, an unfortunate traveller [sic], in the very act of rifling with him unduly or by an improper assumption of authority. The probability is, the traveller [sic] would have looked upon his conduct in a very different light. But we are not left to conjecture as to what England will regard as proper means to effect the end she has in view. She did not consider it an undue means of effecting a dissolution of this Union, an object which has ever been near her heart as the effectual means of destroying our prosperity and power, to burn, in a vandal-like spirit, the Capitol of this nation. The heathenish act was not understood at the accomplished by it, and the motive of it was not understood, until since the war. A publication made since, by an English officer engaged in the expedition, explains it.

It was vainly hoped, at a moment when there was so much discontent between the different sections of the country, that, if the Capitol were destroyed, when the proposition was made to rebuild it, a movement would be set on foot to remove the seat of Government, and that, adding to the discontent already existing, would lead to a dissolution of the Union. We shall thereafter see that, for the purpose of abolishing the slave-trade, with motives of aggrandizement similar to those, which actuates her now, she did not hesitate to expend millions of money and cede away important colonies. She does not consider it as an improper means of effecting her object to invite the Abolitionists at the North to an agitation of the subject of slavery, with a view of its abolition here; nor in her World’s Convention, as it was ambitiously called, held in her metropolis, to lay down the plan for their operation. In 1832, prior to which time there was no agitation upon the subject of slavery in this Hall, no hue and cry about the right of petition, there was raised in the British Parliament a committee to Mr. Ogden, the American Consul at Liverpool:

“To Mr. OGDEN: If you could suppose that the slaves of Louisiana were generally able to read, and that angry discussions perpetually took place in Congress on the subject of their liberation, which discussions, by means of reading, were made known to the slaves of Louisiana, do you think that with safety the state of slavery could endure there?”

The result of the answer to this question was seen in the World’s Convention. The Benefits as they were pleased to call it, of the agitation of the subject of slavery on this floor, is thus explained:

“The interest which they themselves will take in the discussion. In spite of all precautions, the slaves will become acquainted with what so deeply interests them; and so far as they do, self-respect will be generated – an excellent and profitable sentiment for a free laborer, but ruinous to the slave. It was the testimony of the planters of Jamaica before the British Parliament that their slaves became acquainted with all that passed in respect to them in the mother country, and were thereby too much excited to [ . . . ] the places of slaves with slavish obedience.”

“The knowledge of the slave that a portion of the white are exerting themselves for his emancipation, upon the ground that he is illegally held in bondage, will make him, they say impatient in his servitude. It will make him sullen and moody. It will incite him to indulge dreams of freedom in another land which he can never enjoy in his own. He will be reduced to a condition in which his master cannot rely upon his labor. He will be disposed to run away, and at a time when his services can be least spared. – The master will be subjected to constant and heavy expense recapturing him. He will thus become to his owner a source of vexation rather than comfort, of trouble and expense rather than profit.”

Another means which England will not consider as undue to effect her object, is to take advantage of the present demand of the guaranty of her independence. At this time, when Texas is weak and threatened with invasion by inhuman barbarians. England does not hesitate to take advantage of this sort of duress to force Texas to consent to abolish slavery. As proof of this, I refer to a late article which I cut from a late number before the British Parliament that their slaves became acquainted with all that passed in respect to them in the mother country, and were thereby too much excited to [ . . . ] the places of slaves with slavish obedience."

“It is possible, that the intelligence of Mr. Polk’s election may suggest a more guarded course to the Mexican General; but on the other hand, the vehement threats of annexation with which the Democratic party have brought in their candidate, may induce the Mexicans to strike a blow in the next few months, before the new Government is installed at Washington.

Under these critical circumstances, it is not unreasonable to contend, that the European powers which have recognized the independence of Texas, are bound in good policy, as well as in good faith, to demand of Mexico, as well as of every other Power, that this new State be acknowledged and un molested. If we had a sufficient interest in this question to recognize Texas at all – if we, in common with other States of Europe, are prepared to resist the annexation of Texas to the United States as an act of rapine, calculated to deprive us of a useful ally, to perpetuate slavery, and to create a rival maritime Power in the Gulf of Mexico, it would appear to be no more than just to maintain the independence of Texas against Mexico itself, and, above all, by a declaration of the principal States of Europe to terminate this state of uncertainty and menace. Had Texas consented to abolish slavery, all her political difficulties would long since have been terminated; and, instead of being an object of mingled contempt and desire to the population of the U. S., she would have placed her whole social condition on a higher and more secure basis than theirs, and would be prepared to play a conspicuous part in the history of the new world.”

Here it is distinctly enough admitted, that “had Texas consented to abolish slavery,” England would have guaranteed her independence; for, how otherwise can we understand that that event would have terminated all of her political difficulties, and placed her social condition on a higher and more secure basis than ours? And the zeal of England for the abolition of slavery in Texas so great, she is willing to risk to attain it as is shown by her insisting upon that condition, the loss of “a useful ally,” and the creation in the United States of “a rival maritime power in the Gulf of Mexico!” The country will judge who probably understands the purposes of the British Government best – the Whigs of this House, or the English Ministerial press.

But the honorable gentleman’s own argument impliedly admits that the institution of slavery is in danger, from the machinations of the British Government. He assures us, it is true, in the teeth of the fact, as is shown by the agitation of the subject on this floor by Northern men, and by none more than by members from his own State – he assures us, that Northern Statesmen do not desire to interfere with this institution in the States as it is, and that we have nothing to fear from them. If this be the case, and foreign nations let us alone, slavery is secure; for I assure him it is in no danger from ourselves. How, then, will the annexation tend to perpetuate it? It can only be by securing us against Great Britain, the only one of all the foreign nations which is agitating this question.

Having thus shown that England is exerting all her energies to abolish slavery in Texas, and that she will stop at no means to accomplish it, let me ask what is her object? Lord Brongham, one of her leading statesman in the House of Lords answers the question:

“The markets from whence they obtained their supply of slaves were Georgia, the Carolinas and Virginia, which States constantly sent their slave population, which would otherwise be a burden to them, to the Texan market. No doubt it was true, as has been stated, that they treated their slaves tolerably well, because they knew that it was for their interest to rear them, as they had such a profitable market for them in Texas. This made him irresistibly anxious for the abolition of slavery in Texas; for it were abolished there, not only would that country be cultivated by free and white labor, but it would put a stop to the habit of breeding slaves for the Texan market. – The consequence would be, that they would solve this great question in the history of the United States, for it must ultimately end in the abolition of slavery throughout the whole of America.”

And why does England desire the abolition of slavery in the United States? Sir, it is to cripple our prosperity; and the blow is aimed as much at the North as the South; as mush at that portion of the country which is her most formidable rival in commerce and manufactures, as at us, who are profitable consumers of her productions, and her rivals in but little.

If there are any here, who may be deluded by the idea that England is actuated by philanthropic motives, if he will attend for a few moments. I will show him that, so far from that, her purposes are the most selfish and heartless. A short recital of authentic historical facts, will establish this position.

We all know, that for more than two centuries, that African slave trade was carried on by the British nation under the patronage of the Government, and was protected by charters of monopoly and public treaties. Under the Stuart Kings, charters were granted endowed with exclusive privileges for carrying on the African slave trade, and they were sustained by all the power and patronage of the British Government.

At the celebrated treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, by which the Spanish succession war was terminated, the British nation obtained, by what was called the Asiento contract, the exclusive privilege of carrying on the slave trade for thirty years, at the rate of 4,800 slaves yearly; and Lord Brougham said in the House of Commons in 1815, the English nation had obtained “the whole price of the victories of Ramillies and Blenheim, in an additional share of the slave trade” and Mr. C. Grant, in 1818, informed us, that “she higgled at Aix la Chapelle for four years longer of this exclusive trade, and at the treaty of Madrid clung to the last remains of the Asiento contract.”

In consequence of the activity of the marine of England, and her own colonies. Desiring the monopoly of the securing it, and to prevent the supply of labor for the Southern colonies of other nations, she commenced agitation in favor of the abolition of the African slave trade. But it was only the African slave trade. It was necessary that the subject of it should have a black skin and a wholly head to enlist English sympathies. It is notorious, that slave fairs are regularly held in the regencies of Tripoli and Morocco, and they are transported thence up the Levant, where they are again in exposed to sale like cattle in the market. But these people did not come into competition with English colonies in the production of the rest articles of commerce, and of course they do not enjoy her disinterested philanthropy, which had its beginning and end in the profits of trade.

In the abortive attempt at negotiation for peace by Mr. Fox, in 1806, an effort was made to induce France to join in the abolition of the slave trade. The French Minister replied, “that England, with her colonies well stocked with negroes, and affording a large produce, might abolish the trade without inconvenience; but that France, with colonies ill stocked, and deficient in produce, could not abolish it without conceding to England the greatest advantages, and sustaining a proportionable loss.”

Upon the restoration of Louis XVIII to the French throne, (who acknowledged that he owed it to Great Britain,) his gratitude was appealed to abolish the slave trade; and that being ineffectual offers of sums of money and the cession of a West India Island were made but without success; the same answer being given substantially which had been given before. In August, 1815, England restored to the Dutch Government their colonies, excepting the Cape of Good Hope and Dutch Guiana, in consideration of the entire abolition of the slave trade by the latter.

During the negotiation of the treaty concluded at Madrid on the 5th of July, 1814, Great Britain attempted to prevail on Spain to prohibit to her subjects both the general slave trade and their importation into the Spanish colonies, and went so far as to offer to continue the pecuniary subsidies which the deplorable condition of the Spanish financiers made so necessary. But she failed, the Duke of San Carlos remarking that when the trade was abolished by Great Britain the proportion of negroes to the whites in the British colonies was as twenty to one, while in the Spanish colonies there were not more blacks than whites.” And he refused to take a step which “he considered
In January, 1815, Great Britain obtained from Portugal, for pecuniary equivalents, the prohibition to its subjects of the slave trade on the Western coast of Africa, North of the equator. Further than this Portugal would not go.

The island of Guadeloupe, conquered from France, was ceded by Great Britain to the Swedish Crown, upon condition of abolishing the slave trade; and at the treaty of Madrid, of the 22d of September, 1817, she purchased from Spain the immediate abolition of the slave trade North of the equator, and a promise to abolish it altogether, after 1820, for the sum of $400,000.

Up to this time, we had not heard a word about the abolition of slavery. Indeed, as late as 1824, Mr. Canning said in the British Parliament, "that, if he were asked which he would prefer, permanent slavery to immediate emancipation =, the incapacity of the negro to enjoy, from the want of mental and moral cultivation, the sweets of liberty; and "his duty to guard the interests of those who, by no fault of their own – by inheritance – by accident =, by encouragement of repeated acts of the legislature, find their property invested in a concern exposed to innumerable hazards and difficulties which do not belong to property of another character = such as, if they had their option, as their ancestors had, they doubtless would have preferred."

But, while these events were transpiring, a great change was taking place in the British empire. There was found in the counting house of the East India Company an obscure boy (afterwards Lord Clive) who turned out on of Britannia's gods of war. By the power of his genius, a small English trading post in India was expanded until it comprehended an empire of one hundred millions of souls.

In the mean time, great changes were going on in England. From being an agricultural produce by the inventions of the power loom and spinning jenny, the improvements in science and the introduction of the steam engine, she was converted into a great manufacturing nation. To sustain her great manufactures, a secure market was necessary for the productions of them. The same causes which had stimulated manufactures in England had also done the same thing in the United States and upon the continent of Europe. Besides, those markets, even if they were open, were not within the exclusive control of Great Britain. This was indispensable, and the desideration was found in India, if her people could be raised up to the condition of consumers. To do this it was only necessary to destroy all her rivals in the productions of the growth of the tropics. These rivals were the United States, the West Indies and Brazil. The staples of each of these countries were cotton, rice, tobacco, sugar and coffee. These were the staples of British India. England had seen the island of San Domingo converted, by the single act of the negro emancipation, from the most flourishing of all the West India Islands into the most unproductive; and the culture of the indigo plant, which was its staple, transplanted to the banks of the Ganges and Barrampooter. And it was at once inferred, that if African slavery could be abolished, British India would possess a monopoly in the production of the plants of the tropics, and her prosperity be established upon a secure basis. – England considered the sacrifice of her West India colonies but a small price for so great a good. The $20,000,000 which was appropriated for the indemnity of the planters amounted to nothing, as scarcely a dollar of it left London, it being received by British mortgages of West India plantations. And an agitation was at once commenced, in the hypocritical name of philanthropy, in favor of the abolition of slavery. And as soon as it was accomplished in the West Indies, the theatre of operations was transferred to this country in the manner I have very briefly noticed. – The fact that philanthropy had nothing to do in the matter is shown, if other proof were wanting, by the emancipation act of the British Parliament itself. By the 44th section of that act, it is declared that "it shall not extend to any of the territory in the possession of the East India Company, or the Islands of Ceylon or St. Helena." And yet this is precisely the country where slavery exists in its most horrid form, and where the British Government is itself the greatest slaveholder in the world, and hires out its slaves for profit.

"GOVERNMENT OF SLAVES IN MALABAR. – We know that there is not a servant of Government in the South of India, who is not intimately acquainted with the alarming fact, that hundreds of hundreds of his fellow-creatures are fettered down for life to the degraded destiny of slavery. We know that these unfortunate beings are not, as in other countries, serfs of the soil, and incapable of being transferred, and the pleasure of their owners, from one estate to another; No; they are daily sold like cattle by one proprietor to another; the husband is separate from the wife, the parent from the child; they are loaded with every indignity; the utmost quantity of labor is exacted from them, and the most meager fare that human nature can possibly subsist on is doled out of them. The slave population is considered without the pale of ordinary castes; and others who have been smuggled in from the coast of Africa, torn from their country and their kindred; and destined to amore wretched lot, and; as will be seen, to a more enduring captivity than their brethren of the Western world. Will it be believed that Government itself participates in this description of property; that it actually holds possession of slaves, and lets them out for hire to the cultivators of the country, the rent of a whole family being two farms, or half a rupee, (about $3.50, the hire of a slave and his whole family) per annum?

"But why dwell on these comparatively free slaves? The whole of Hindoston [sic], with the adjacent possessions, is one magnificent plantation, people by more than one hundred millions of slaves, belonging to a company of gentlemen in England, called the East India Company, whose power is far more unlimited and despotic than that of any Southern planter over his slaves; a power upheld by the sword and bayonet, exacting more and leaving less of the product of their labor to the subject race than is left under our own system, with much less regard to their comfort in sickness and age."

As startling as these disclosures are, the whole story is not yet told. England has not only engaged in a hypocrical crusade against slavery at the time she is herself the greatest slaveholder in the world, but she has absolutely made the act of her Parliament for the abolition of the slave trade the means of converting her national navy into slaves, as I shall show. For the following facts I am indebted to an article on the Southern Literary Messenger, written by Lieut. Maury, of the U. States Navy:

“We have the authority of Mr. Barreyer, of he French Chamber, who stated it in a recent speech, that in June of last year, the British Government issued an 'Order in Council' to authorise [sic] the importation into Demarara of one hundred thousand hired negroes from Africa. And, in confirmation of this statement, late arrivals bring us in the 'Semaphore de Marseilles,' the report of the master of the French merchantman who, not four months ago, saw in the river Gambia an English vessel of 500 tons take in a cargo of 500 Africans for the English colonies. – These poor ignorant creatures engage for they know not what, and ship for they know not where. Charmed with a hawk's bell, and dazzles with a string of glass beads, they are enticed away beyond the seas; and the ties which bind them to kindred and to country are as effectually severed, though, perhaps, not as rudely broken, as if they had fallen in the hands of the kidnapper. Being ignorant of their rights in a civilized land, they are liable to the most cruel wrongs; as slaves of the kinner won't have the self-interest to preserve them, his property, from wanton injury; nay more, with the master, who, in his conduct to his slaves, is governed by no higher motive, there are inducements of a pecuniary nature to secure that consideration in the treatment of slaves which will preserve their health so as not to impair their efficiency as laborers. But as bondmen and apprentices, the object of such an one, and there are many such, obedient to the mercenary disposition of man, is to get out of them all he can. What then is the condition of the hired savage during his long and cruel apprenticeship, many times worse than that of the slave? And, when he has cancelled his indenture, wherein is he better off? He has then but just made the last payment for the privilege of being brought over for hire in a ship crowded to suffocation. Our laws will not allow a ship to bring into the country more passengers than two to every five tons of measurement. But the humane 'Orders in Council' can find in a vessel of 500 tons, with more than half her room monopolized by her officers and crew, ample accommodation for five hundred wild Africans who have never known restraint. Tell us not that it is 'man's inhumanity to man' that moves that Government to action.

“To show that the motives which operate with the officers are no better than those ascribed to their Government, we subjoin an extract from a paper published in the last Maryland Colonization Journal. It is from the pen of Dr. Hall, an eminent philanthropist, who has been much on the African coast in connexion [sic] with the business of the Colonization Societies of this country. He tells what he saw:

“The late commandant of the station, Lord George Russell, was most of the time in a state of intoxication, consequently unfit for the transaction of any business; and with such a head it cannot be supposed that the under officers would deport themselves over correctly. The prize money received by the officers and crew, in case of a successful capture, operated as a strong inducement to seize whatever came in their way. The apparent object of all the officers of the squadron under Lord Russell was the making successful and rich captures, rather than suppression of the slave trade. An instance in proof came under our own observation. The commander of a cruiser (either the Forester or the Wanderer,) boarded a small schooner which lay at anchor near our vessel, and afterwards boarded us. He stated that the schooner had enough on board to condemn her, but she was old and would not pay him for taking her to Sierra Leone; he would wait and watch her until she had taken on board her slaves, which would much increase their prize money, and then capture her. She lay off for a day or two for that purpose, but in the night the schooner took on board her slaves, and went to sea. Our brig., the Trafalgar of this port, was boarded by a boat from the Forester, our papers examined, and a permit demanded for having on board oil casks. - We informed him, that our port regulations required no such permit. He disputed, and said, when the Forester came up, the brig. Should be captured and taken to Sierra Leone. It was thought best to leave the cruising ground of the Forester before she came up, and we accordingly put out. A few weeks after, on visiting that section of the coast again we discovered a vessel early in the morning, close in shore, getting under way. She soon made sail, headed for us and fired a gun. There being many vessels in sight, we were not sure the gun was for us, and being within three miles of our anchorage ground, and the light land breeze gradually dying away, thought best to keep under weigh, having hoisted our ensign. The vessel then passed an 18-pound shot directly under our main yard, within a few feet of the man at the helm. We then laid too until the officer boarded us. He again examined our papers, demanded the same permit for the casks which he had before informed him we were not required to obtain. He examined the hold, found one hundred bushels of rice, and declared the brig. a prize, the rice a sufficient evidence of her character as a slaver. The Forester came up, and the commander came on board, examined papers and hold likewise, and a council was held whether or not to declare the whole a prize. We stated to them the abundant evidence before them that we were the owners of the vessel, that we were well known as regular American trader, that we had been in an important public station on the coast to their knowledge, and they well knew from many sources other than the papers of the vessel that she was bonafide [sic] American property and engaged in lawful traffic. The answer was, we well know that; but the only question is, cannot we get her condemned on account of the rice?”

Now, (said Mr. B.) I assert, with a perfect knowledge of the subject upon which I am speaking, that this species of the slave trade, introduced by the English Government, in the form of apprenticeship, is the more profitable to the master, and more galling to the slave, than any which can possibly be imagined. Let us look at the operation of it. It has been seen from the publication made by Dr. Hall, that the English, in carrying on their slave trade, do not purchase the negroes, as other slavers do, but they capture them. Under the English act abolishing the slave trade, $7 is given to the captors for every slave taken. They are taken in and condemned, and then carried to Brazil and the West Indies, and sold as apprentices, for a term of seven years. These poor creatures are taken to a country whose laws they do not understand, and whose language they do not speak, and for a long time will be incapable of learning. Who is to see, during their apprenticeship, that they are treated well, and care taken of them in sickness? The master has no interest in them, but for seven years, and his object will be to get as much out of them as possible, in the mean time, and incur as little expense as possible in taking care of them. And, when the

PLAN TO DEFEND TEXAS, AND TO DIVIDE THE REPUBLICAN PARTY OF NEW YORK

The election of two senators of the United States from the State of New York is to take place this day. The contest among the candidates produces great excitement at Albany. The result is everywhere anticipated with great anxiety. The fate of Texas materially, perhaps essentially, depends upon the selection.

It is impossible to shut our eyes also to the fact, that the Whigs are busily engaged in an intrigue, to employ this question to divide the Republicans of New York. The following letter speaks for itself. We extract it from one of the rankest. Federal papers in the Union – and the reader will see with what anxiety a Coalition is pressed between the Whigs of the New York Legislature, and a portion of the Democrats, (whom he calls by the cant term of barn burners,) for the purpose of electing “two Anti-Texas Loco” Senators. The objects of this movement are, 1st, to defeat Texas in the Senate altogether, by substituting two Anti-Texas Senators instead of two friends of Texas; 2d, to defeat Texas in the House, by encouraging the trimmers and Doctor Doubters in that body to go against it; and, 3d, and not the least desirable object to the Whigs, is to sow dissension and division in the Republican Party, and prepare the way for their defeat in New York – and next in the Union, and usher in the thrice defeated, but only “postponed,” Harry of the West, four years hence. But here is the significant letter – let it speak for itself:

[Correspondence of the New York American.]

“My dear Sir: -- I have seen no occasion thus far this winter to trouble you with any of my excogitations about Texas. All those channels of information are now open to you, and I know you think and write rightly on this subject. My only purpose now is to throw out a few hints which I took the liberty to communicate to a friend, now a member of your House of Assembly, and which have occurred to me from observing what has passed here during two or three days.

“We are now at the great crisis in this controversy. It is not enough that the Senate is sure to block any game of annexation that may be played in the House. That they are certain to do. But two things are necessary to ensure us a permanent triumph.

1st, the defeat of the measure in the present House; and 2d, the election of Young and Barker, or two men of kindred opinions, for Senators from your State. The first I am most happy to believe will be accomplished; and perhaps that will be enough. The Locofoco majority in the present House is said to be 65. I may over-estimate the moral effect of a victory of the right against such a party preponderance as this, but I cannot but believe its effect on the next Congress as well as on the party in the country will be tremendous,- most especially if the Legislature of your State shall throw its weight in the manner I have indicated. The conclusion from these suggestions is, that the

Twenty-Eighth Congressional, Thursday, Jan. 16, 1845, In Senate

THE SENATE

Mr. ALLEN presented resolutions from the General Assembly of Ohio, requesting the Government of the United States to take entire and immediate control over the territory of Oregon, and protesting against the surrender of any portion of that territory, by treaty or otherwise, to any foreign government; also one from the same body, against the annexation of Texas, which were read and ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The bill for improving the Cumberland road, in the State of Ohio, came up from a third reading, which, on its passage, the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows: yeas 25, nay 14.

The bill making compensation to the State of Massachusetts for military services during the last war with Great Britain also passed: yeas 25, nays 18.

The bill for the relief of Joshua Shaw, granting him $25,000 for certain improvements in percussion caps, came up for decision, and was advocated by Messrs. CRITTENDEN and BUCHANANA, and opposed by Messrs. HENDERSON, BAGBY, and TAPPAN.

Mr. BAGBY moved that it be recommitted to the Committee on Patents, with instructions that they report it.

"Is there no such thing as a coalition between the Whigs and Barn Burners, by which two anti-Texas Locos can be chosen? If I were a member of the New York Legislature, it seems to me I would coalesce to elect the ---- himself, if he would go against annexation. The great thing is to cut the party cord which it has been feared would bind this issue to a Locofoco reign. The Locofocos from your State in the House are going to behave well with; at most I understand, some 5 or 6 exceptions – 18 at least are relied on. Will not this state of things here, when it comes to be understood at Albany; encourage the anti-Texans men of the party there, in standing out against the system of caucus dictation? Can it be, that there is any question of State policy that can weigh a feather, with the Whigs, in deterring them from any sort of affiliation for the time being, which may have the effect to throw rightly the weight of New York on this great national issue?

"I am uninstructed in regard to the state of feeling in your State, and these notions may seem very raw to you. Rely on it, however, that the crisis is at hand, and that New York is the great arbiter."

We shall not repeat the statements which are published in the New York Herald, in its letters from Albany. These too speak of intrigues which we cannot believe to exist. These profess to name distinguished men, who are to be open-mouthed in their hostility to the annexation of Texas, &c., &c., &c. We scout all such scandalous reports against some of the Democrats of New York. We will not believe that any of them will engage in any intrigues against Polk, or Texas, or the South. But that the Whigs are engaged in fanning the flame, as far as they are able, we have the evidence in the above letter from one of themselves at Washington, through one of their own accepted organs at New York.

We will not believe either, that the annexation can fall through this Winter by any intrigue or disaffection at Washington. But if it should fail, with a Democratic majority of more than 60 in the House of Representatives, what can the Southern Democrats think of such desertion? We have as much liberality for our brethren, as any man. We have as much confidence in the Northern Democrats, including those of New York, "the natural allies of the South," according to Mr. Jefferson, as any one can have. But if the present Congress should dissolve in empty air, nothing done for the annexation of Texas, nothing done for the modification of the Tariff of '42 we shall look to the future with some fear and suspicion. The South will then be reluctantly called on to ask herself, Is there no efficient union, between the Democrats of the South and the North? Have we nothing to expect from them at the next session? Is it thus that the solemn pledges of the Baltimore Convention are to be rendered naught? Are the grounds on which Mr. Polk was elected to be thus washed away by a halting and hesitating majority in Congress? Have we nothing to expect from the majority of our brethren of the North? Is it possible, that the mandate of a Legislature caucus is to be obeyed? Look at it. Your House has 128 members, I believe. Thirty-five is a majority of the party in caucus. These 35 nominate in caucus two Senators, and by the rule of that body they control the whole 128! Can it be that Silas Wright will permit the Legislature of your State thus to speak on the Texas question, if he has the power to prevent it?

whole matter now rests with New York. On her alone depends the great question of Texas or no Texas. Is it possible, that on a question of this magnitude, the mandate of a Legislature caucus is to be obeyed? Look at it. Your House has 128 members, I believe. Thirty-five is a majority of the party in caucus. These 35 nominate in caucus two Senators, and by the rule of that body they control the whole 128! back reducing the sum from $25,000 to 10,000.

The question was taken on referring it by ayes and nays, when it was decided in the negative by yeas 20, nays 23.

The question then recurring on its final passage, the both by ayes and nays stood as follows:-ayes 26, nays 16.

A message was received from the President of the United States by his private Secretary, John Tyler Jr., communicating certain information respecting the late treaty with China, and asking Congress for the adoption of such measures as may be calculated to cultivate future friendly relations between that country and the United States.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

The general orders were then taken up, the unfinished business of which was the further consideration of the bill for the establishment of the Smithsonian Institution. The question was, whether the bill, as amended in Committee of the Whole, should be further amended, having been reported back to the Senate, and the committee’s amendments having been confirmed.

Mr. TAPPAN submitted the following amendment; which was read and adopted:

At the end of the 4th section to add.

And all laws for the protection of public property in the city of Washington shall apply to, and be in force for, the protection of the lands, buildings and other property of said institution; and all prosecutions for trespass upon said property and all civil suits on behalf of said institution, shall be prosecuted in the name of the United States in any court having competent jurisdiction of the same.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Other business came up, after which, the Senate adjourned.

Mr. WENTWORTH submitted the following resolution, which was laid upon the table:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War furnish to this House the proceeding and opinion of a court of inquiry convened by direction of the Secretary of War, in March 1841, at Fort Gibson, to investigate the conduct and character of Surgeon P. Maxwell, upon charges and imputations made against him by the Surgeon General in certain official papers, and all the correspondence and papers connected therewith.

Mr. DOUGLASS asked leave, in pursuance of notice given yesterday, to introduce a bill to establish a line of military posts through the territories of Nebraska and Oregon.

At the request of Mr. Adams, the bill was read. It authorizes the President of the United States to cause to be established such military posts in Nebraska and Oregon as shall be necessary to protect the commerce of the United States with New Mexico, and California, and afford protection to emigrants to Oregon from depredation; the troops of the United States to be employed wherever, in the opinion of the President, this can be done with a just regard to their other duties, and in such manner as he shall direct; one hundred thousand dollars are to be applied to accomplish the object of the bill.

It was read a second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TEXAS AGAIN

Mr. ROBINSON asked leave to introduce a bill providing for the annexation of Texas to the U. States.

Mr. McCONNELL and Mr. PAYNE(as the reporter understood) objected to the reception of the bill.

Mr. DROMGOOLE hoped the bill would be received, and to take the same course as other bills on this subject has taken-viz: to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. PRESTON KING moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of receiving and referring this bill.

A BILL to provide for the annexation of Texas.

to the United States
Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America as Congress assembled, That so much of Texas as may be embraced in an area not exceeding that of the largest State in the Union, and as shall be described in the Constitution to be adopted as hereinafter provided, shall, on the adoption of a Constitution by the people thereof as a State, be, in accordance with the Constitution of the United States and of the provisions of this act, and on the transmission of such constitution to the President of the United States, on or before the 4th day of July next, be and the same is hereby, upon the proclamation thereof, admitted as one of the States of this Union.

Sec. 2. And be further enacted, That such Constitution shall contain a provision ceding to the United States, the jurisdiction of the residence of the Territory of Texas, in which slavery shall not exist, unless Congress shall hereafter determine by law; and this act of admission shall not be construed to imply any assumption of or intention on the part of the United States to assume now or hereafter the debts or any portion thereof, of Texas, or to impair the right of said State to the soil of the territory so to be ceded, or he right of the State of Texas to determine whether slavery shall or shall not exist in said State.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, Until the next appointment of representatives among the States, the said State of Texas shall be entitled to two Senators and two Representatives in Congress.

Mr. STUART interposed his opposition.

And, according to the 116th rule, in such cases, the question was, "Shall this bill be rejected?"

A conversation ensued between Messrs DROMGOOLE and PAYNE, and the SPEAKER at the termination of which

Mr. GARRET DAVIS inquired whether it would be in order to introduce an amendment for the annexation of the United States to Texas?

The SPEAKER informed the gentlemen that it would not.

A motion was made to lay the bill on the table, but it was subsequently withdrawn.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired if the bill be not rejected, would it not be in order to follow up the second reading with a motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER responded, that should the bill not be rejected, it would go to a second reading, and a motion would be in order.

The question being on the rejection of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON expressed his opinion that the bill was wrong in its material provisions and important features.

Mr. PAYNE coincided in the views expressed by his colleague; and he took the occasion to say that he was hot only opposed to this, but to any other similar bill for the annexation of Texas, and hoped that it might be rejected. Nearly every proposition on this subject had for its object an interference with the institutions of the South-the direct abolition of slavery; and for that reason he objected to it. Considering the quarter from which the motion came, he would consider the vote to be taken as a test question.

Mr. SAUNDERS of North Carolina could not so regard it. He was disposed to receive all propositions which may be presented, and refer them with those herefore submitted to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that consultation might take place on their relative merits.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said, that by voting against the rejection of the bill, he would by no means commit himself to the details of any one of the measures. He would do so, because he wished them all examined, discussed and moulded to such shape as the majority of the friends of annexation should desire.

Mr. STUART admitted that his object in opposing the bill, was to bring the House to vote on the question-and to see who were in favor, not of extending the cause of freedom, but slavery.

Mr. SEYMOUR, in the course of his remarks, although he did not believe that Congress had the power, by legislative action, to acquire foreign territory, said that he was willing that the bill introduced by his colleague should take the usual course, by being referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PAYNE made a personal explanation in the regard to an observation which had been applied to him. He said that the bill was designed to demolish the Texas question, and, being friendly to annexation, he opposed the proposition before them, coming as it did from an unfriendly quarter. And he renewed the motion for the previous question (which had been withdrawn several times, to enable gentlemen to address the House.)
Mr. ATKINSON thought that his was rather unkind, for it cut him off from making personal explanation; and he was proceeding with his remarks when

Mr. PAYNE arose, and made an inquiry whether the gentleman had made a speech with required explanation?

Mr. ATKINSON said that he had made no speech, but it was important for him to explain his views for the information of his constituents.

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman that he was not in order, a motion having been made for the previous question.

Mr. ATKINSON asked to be excused from voting. [Several voices, "Now give your reasons."] And he was about to do so, but was prevented by the SPEAKER, who again reminded the gentleman that he could not, for the reason already stated.

The question was taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, but it was not sustained—ayes 71, noes 91.

Mr. ATKINSON now obtained the floor, and said that he was happy to find himself in possession of it by Parliamentary usage, without being indebted for it to the courtesy of any one man—He did not desire to inflict a speech on the House, but merely to set himself right before the people he had the honor to represent, respecting the question now pending.

Mr. A. had not troubled the House on this subject; not because he did not feel as lively an interest in it as those who had spoken, but because he found here that those who were highest one particular, stood the best chance. [A laugh. A voice: “What is the particular?” Increased laughter.] Mr. A. was poor at a scramble, especially at his time of life. He was opposed to this and to all bills and resolutions which declared that Texas should not come into the Union (as he hoped she would do before the present Congress adjourned) perfectly free as to her municipal regulations. He did not desire that when the question of Oregon should be raised here, the question of slavery should be raised also as a bugbear; he was for admitting all new States, with perfect liberty to adopt slavery, or prefer white labor, just as they pleased. He did live in a slaveholding State, but he should not raise the issue here whether slavery was a curse or a blessing: it was enough for him to know, that his people were guilty of no moral turpitude, or of any course which made slavery other than consistent with the happiness of the people; for them he should not argue the question here.

But, while he was opposed to the bill of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Tobinson) because it proposed to restrict the admission of Texas, he would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Stuart) ‘Temo Danas, etdoma ferentes:’ he should not seek or take advice from an enemy; if he took any, it must be from those entertaining the same general views with himself. Now, suppose Mr. A. had been compelled to vote without any remarks in explanation? What might have been said of his course in his own district? If he voted for the rejection, he would be abused for refusing to the mover and friends of this bill the same courtesy which had been extended to her in the like circumstances; and if he voted against it, then he might be considered as in favor of imposing restrictions on Texas on the subject of slavery. Hence it was that he had desired the floor.

He agreed with his colleague (Mr. Dromgoole) in desiring that this proposition should have a fair opportunity of being made as acceptable as possible, and then he could judge whether he would go for or against it. After some remarks on the constitutionality of admitting Texas and other foreign States, he concluded with saying that, if it should turn out that they could not get Texas in without some restrictions, he hoped they would be as few as possible.

The bill was then read a second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

TEXAS AND OREGON

Mr. TILDEN presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio, in opposition to the annexation of Texas, and in favor of the Territory of Oregon; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

TREATY BETWEEN CHINA AND THE UNITED STATES

A message was received from the President of the United States as follows;

To the House of Representatives

I communicate, herewith an abstract of the Treaty between the United States of America and the Chinese empire, concluded at Wang Hiya on the 3rd of July last and ratified by the Senate on the 10th instant; and which having also been ratified by the Emperor of China, now awaits only the exchange of ratifications in China; from which it will be seen that the special mission authorized by Congress for this purpose, has fully succeeded in the accomplishment, so far, of the great objects for which it was appointed, and in placing our relations with China on a new founding eminently favorable to the commerce and other interests of the United States.

In view of the magnitude and importance of our national concerns, actual and prospective, in China, I submit to the consideration of Congress the expediency of providing for the preservation and cultivation of the subsisting relations of amity between the United States and the Chinese Government, either by means of a permanent Minister or Commissioner, with diplomatic functions as in the case of certain of the Mahomet an States. It appears by one of the extracts annexed, that the establishment of the British Government in China, consists both of Plenipotentiary, and also of paid Consuls for all the five ports on of whom has the title and exercises and functions of Consul General; and France has also a salaried Consul General; and the interests of the some representative in China of a higher class than an ordinary commercial Consulate.

I also submit to the consideration of Congress the expediency of making some special provision by law, for the security of the independent and honorable position, which the treaty of Wang Hiya confers on citizens of the U. States residing or doing business in China. By the twenty first and twenty-fifth articles of the treaty(copies of which are subjoined in [...]) citizens of the U. States in China are wholly exempted as well in criminal as in civil matters from the local jurisdiction of the Chinese Government, and made amenable to the laws and subject to the jurisdiction of the appropriate authorities of the U.S. alone. Some action on the part of Congress seems desirable, in order to give full effect to these important concessions of the Chinese Government.

Washington, January 22, 1845

ANNEXATION OF TEXAS

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union(Mr. Hopkins in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the joint resolutions for the annexation of Texas to the U.S.

Messrs. RATHBUN and POLLOCK spoke in opposition to the measure, and Mr. COBB, in its favor.

Mr. POLLOCK was the last to address the committee. When he concluded-

Mr. HARALSON was successful above many competitors in obtaining the floor; and, it being at a late hour, he moved that the committee rise.

The question was taken, and the vote stood-ayes 25, noes 42; no quorum voting.

Mr. ADAMS demanded that the committee rise and report hat fact to the House, which was accordingly done.

Mr. VINTON moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. D.L. SEYMOUR called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative yeas 46, nays 41, So the House adjourned.

Texas

Our latest date from New Orleans is Monday, the 13th, on which day the Legislature of Louisiana was to have taken up the Texas resolutions. Every press in the city seems to have its attention directed to the result of its proceedings. "The Tropic" (a decided Whig paper) deprecates any unnecessary discussion – says, that "every man has formed his opinion," and comes out frankly with the declaration, that, "If the people of Louisiana are opposed to annexation, let the legislature say so without further ado, and reject the resolution of Mr. Gayarre; but if, on the contrary, they are, as we believe, in favor of annexation, whenever it can be brought about in a constitutional manner, and without injustice to any one, the sooner it is adopted, the better. It is very clear to our minds, that a large majority of the people are in favor of annexation in some form, provided the measure can be consummated "without dishonor," and we see no reason in any portion of the Legislature thwarting that wish. At all events, let what is to be done be done at once, without useless and unnecessary procrastination. Action, and not speech-making, is what the people want."

This is precisely the case with our own General Assembly – and we respectfully recommend the advice of the "Tropic" to their consideration. If there cannot be the slightest doubt, that "a large majority of the people of Virginia, are in favor of annexation," why does not the House of Delegates declare it openly, frankly and promptly? Why all this idle delay – this "unnecessary procrastination." "Again, we repeat with the Whig Tropic," "Action, and not speech-making, is what the people want."
The “New Orleans Jeffersonian Republican” of Monday morning also calls for immediate action. It proclaims, that “The popular will has been sufficiently expressed. No man can mistake it. An overwhelming majority of the people, without distinction of party, demand from their Representatives an affirmative opinion in favor of immediate Annexation. (Just so in Virginia!) Our Senators in Congress expect it, and we feel satisfied they will act upon the expression of the opinion of the Legislature. (We understand that one, if not both the Senators of Virginia would act upon the instructions of our Legislature.) Such is the sentiment of many distinguished Whig gentlemen, with whom we have conversed. We repeat what we have heretofore urged, that there is no disposition to treat this any longer as a party question. Let both parties equally share the honor of accomplishing a measure essential to the whole Union, but especially to Louisiana. If these resolutions pass, our Senators will respect them, and their change of position will influence other Senators, and Texas will be annexed. But should be the Legislature of Louisiana refuse to act, the responsibility of the defeat of this great measure must rest here.”

In the name of the people, therefore, we call upon the House of Delegates to act, and to act at once. We call upon the Republican members to move the measure without delay – and to call up the resolutions of the Senate. If they are laid upon the table, then originate a new and strong resolution, and put it at once to the lest – who goes for Annexation? Who goes for his own country against Great Britain? Who goes for re-annexing to our Union that extensive and beautiful territory, which was acquired by our illustrious Jefferson as a part of Louisiana – which was unwittingly ceded away to Spain, not Mexico, in 1819 – which H. Clay declared at the time could not be ceded away – which every President and secretary of State, as Mr. Haywood proves, has since attempted to re-acquire – which now offers to throw itself into our arms – which is almost as essential to our military defence and general welfare, as the possession of the mouth of the Mississippi once was – which opens a field for the manufactures and shipping of the North – a market for the iron and other fabrics of the Middle States – and which is intimately connected with our own peculiar institutions, without adding one more slave to the Union, and which gives us simply the same opportunity of removing them from the James River to the Sabine, according to the terms of the Missouri Compromise, as applied to Texas at the period of the ratification of the Treaty of Florida, whilst the immense area from the Mississippi to the Pacific is spread out to the “free States,” to be carved up into as many States as will secure their preponderance in the Government of the Republic? Whilst annexation thus presents so many advantages to every section of our Union, why do we hesitate to admit her into the Union, and spread out so extensive and noble a theatre for the expansion of our free institutions? Why should we pause on this subject? Why should not the Delegates in the General Assembly, be they Delegates or be they Whigs, come forward at once, and proclaim their determination to stand by their country, and instruct our Senators to vote for annexation? We trust in Heaven, that all party spirit may be exercised for once, and that all party distinctions. But if not; it the Whigs will sacrifice their country to faction, why, “let the responsibility of the defeat of the resolutions rest here” – here upon them- and let the people of Virginia know the men to whom they are to be indebted for this enormous sacrifice of their interests.

But, as we trace these rapid remarks upon the paper, the Northern Mail arrives, and brings us the following cheering letters from Washington of Monday night – along with the newspapers, containing the interesting proceedings of that day in the House of Representatives. We congratulate the country on these signs, and trust that all will yet be well. But shall the other States act upon this great subject, and not we? Shall Virginia, the great Southern State, who is so deeply interested in this question, be found wanting in this crisis? Shall her Legislature now flinch, and dodge the question, because the Whigs have happened to carry a majority of the House of Delegates last Spring? – and now 6,000 majority declare in our favor!) – Shall Virginia, who has always been the first to speak out on all great questions, shrink from the office, which courts her responsibility? Shall she yield the palm to others? Shall she, who has hitherto yielded to none in firmness of purpose and integrity of principle, pause now – NOW, when the other States are coming forward to meet the question, with the dignity which suits the occasion? Pride – principle – patriotism – our ancient renown – every consideration of the most solemn and stirring character, alike forbid it!

TEXAS AGAIN.

Mr. ROBINSON asked leave to introduce a bill providing for the annexation of Texas to the U. States.

Mr. McCONNELL and Mr. PAYNE (as the reporter understood) objected to the reception of the bill.

Mr. DROMGOOLE hoped the bill would be received, and to take the same course as other bills on this subject has taken – viz: to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.
Mr. PRESTON KING moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of receiving and referring this bill.

The bill was read for information, as follows:

A BILL to provide for the annexation of Texas to the United States.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of Texas as may be embraced in an area not exceeding that of the largest State in the Union, and as shall be described in the Constitution to be adopted as hereinafter provided, shall, on the adoption of a Constitution by the people thereof as a State, in accordance with the Constitution of the United States and of the provisions of this act, and on the transmission of such constitution to the President of the United States, on or before the 4th day of July next, be and the same is hereby, upon the proclamation thereof, admitted as one of the States of this Union.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That such Constitution shall contain a provision ceding to the United States, the jurisdiction of the residue of the territory of Texas, in which slavery shall not exist, unless Congress shall hereafter so determine by law; and this act of admission shall not be construed to imply any assumption of or intention of the part of the United States to assume now or hereafter the debts, or any portion thereof, of Texas, or to impair the right of said State to the soil of the territory so to be ceded, for the right of the State of Texas, or to impair the right of said State to the soil of the territory so to be ceded, for the right of the State of Texas to determine whether slavery shall or shall not exist in said State.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, Until the next apportionment representatives among the States, the said State of Texas shall be entitled to two Senators, the said State of Texas shall be entitled to two Senators and two Representatives in Congress.

Mr. STUART interposed his opposition:
And, according to the 116th rule, in such cases, the question was, "Shall this bill be rejected?"

A conversation ensued between Messrs. DROMGOOLE and PAYNE, and the SPEAKER: at the termination of which

Mr. GARRET DAVIS inquired whether it would be in order to introduce an amendment for the annexation of the United States to Texas?

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman that [ . . . ] would not.

A motion was made to lay the bill on the table, but it was subsequently withdrawn.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired if the bill be not rejected, would it not be in order to follow up the second reading with a motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The Speaker responded, that should the bill not be rejected, it would go to a second reading, and a motion would be in order.

The question being on the rejection of the bill,

Mr. HOUSTON expressed his opinion that the bill was wrong in its material provisions and important features.

Mr. PAYNE coincided in the views expressed by his colleague and he took the occasion to say that he was not only opposed to this, but to any other similar bill for annexation of Texas, and hoped that it might be rejected. Nearly every proposition on this subject had for its object an interference with the institutions of the South – the direct abolition of slavery; and for that reason the objected to it. Considering the quarter from which the motion came, he would consider the vote to be taken as a test question.

Mr. SAUNDERS of North Carolina could not so regard it. He was disposed to receive all propositions which may be presented, and refer them with those heretofore submitted to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that consultation might take place on their relative merits.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said, that by voting against the rejection of the bill, he would by no means commit himself to the details of any one of the measures. He would do so, because he wished them all examined, discussed and moulded to such shape as the majority of the friends of annexation should desire.

Mr. STUART admitted that his object in opposing the bill, was to bring the House to vote on the question – and to see who were in favor, not of extending the cause of freedom, but slavery.

Mr. SEYMOUR, in the course of his remarks, although he did not believe that Congress had the although he did not believe that Congress had the power, by legislature action, to acquire foreign territory, said that he was willing that the bill introduced by his colleague should take the usual course, by being referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PAYNE made a personal explanation in regard to an observation which had been applied to him. He said that the bill was designed to demolish the Texas question, and being friendly to annexation, he opposed the proposition before them, coming as it did from an unfriendly quarter. And he renewed the motion for the previous question, (which had been withdrawn several times, to enable gentlemen to address the House.)

Mr. ATKINSON thought that this was rather unkind for it cut him off from making a personal explanation; and he was proceeding with his remarks, when

Mr. PAYNE arose, and made an inquiry, whether the gentleman had made a speech which required explanation?

Mr. ATKINSON said that he had made no speech, but it was important for him to explain his views for the information of his constituents.

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman that he was not in order, a motion having been made for the previous question.

Mr. ATKINSON asked to be excused from voting. [Several voices, "Now give your reasons."] And he was about to do so, but was prevented by

The SPEAKER, who again reminded the gentleman that he could not for the reason already stated.

The question was taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, but it was not sustain – ayes 71, noes 91.

Mr. ATKINSON now obtained the floor, and said that he was happy to find himself in possession of it by Parliamentary usage, without being indebted for it to the courtesy of any one man. – He did not desire to inflict a speech on the House, but merely to set himself right before the people he had the honor to represent, respecting the question now pending.

Mr. A. had not troubled the House on this subject not because he did not feel as lively an interest in it as those who had spoken, but because he found here that those who were lightest in one particular, stood the best chance. [A laugh. A voice: "What is the particular?" Increased laughter.] Mr. A. was poor at a scramble, especially at his time of life. He was opposed to this, and to all bills and resolutions which declared that Texas should not come into the Union (as he hoped she would do before the present Congress adjourned) perfectly free as to her municipal regulations. He did not desire that when the question of Oregon should be raised here the question of slavery should be raised also as a bugbear; he was for admitting all new States, with perfect liberty to adopt slavery, or prefer white labor, just as the pleased. He did live in a slaveholding State, but he should not raise the issue here whether slavery was a curse or a blessing; it was enough for him to know that his people were guilty of no moral turpitude, or of any course which made slavery other than consistent with the happiness of the people; for them he should not argue the question here.

But, while he was opposed to the bill of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Robinson) because, it proposed to restrict the admission of Texas, he would sat to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Stuart) Times Danaus, et dona fetentes [ . . . ] he should not seek or take advice from an enemy, if he took any, it must be from those entertaining the same general views with himself. Now, suppose Mr. A. had been compelled to vote without any remarks in explanation? What might have been said of his course in his own district? If he voted for the rejection he would be abused for refusing to the mover and friends of this bill the same courtesy which had been extended to others in the like circumstances; and if he voted against it, then he might be considered as in favor of imposing restrictions on Texas on the subject of slavery. Hence it was that he had desired the floor.

He agreed with his colleague (Mr. Dromgoole) in desiring that this proposition should have a fair opportunity of being made as acceptable as possible, and then he could judge whether he would go for or against it. After some remarks on the constitutionality of admitting Texas and other foreign States, he concluded with saying that, if it should turn out that they could no get Texas in without some restrictions, he hoped they would be as few as possible.

The bill was then read a second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

TEXAS AND OREGON.

Mr. TILDEN presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio, in opposition to the annexation of Texas, and in favor of the Territory of Oregon; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

TREATY BETWEEN CHINA AND THE UNITED STATES.

A message was received from the President of the United States as follows,
To the House of Representatives:

I communicate, herewith, an abstract of the Treaty between the United States of America and the Chinese Empire, concluded at Wang Hiya on the 3d of July last, and ratified by the Senate on the 10th instant; and which having also been ratified by the Emperor of China, now awaits, only the exchange of ratifications in China; from which it will be seen that the special mission authorized by Congress for this purpose, has fully succeeded in the accomplishment, so far, of the great objects for which it was appointed, and in placing our relations with China on a new footing eminently favorable to the commerce and other interests of the United States.

In view of the magnitude and importance of our national concerns, actual and prospective, in China, I submit to the consideration of Congress the expediency of providing for the preservation and cultivation of the subsisting relations of amity between the United States and the Chinese Government, either by means of a permanent Minister or commissioner, with diplomatic functions as in the case of certain of the Mahometan States. It appears by one of the extracts annexed, that the establishment of the British Government in China, consists both of a Plenipotentiary, and also a paid Consuls for all the five ports one of which has the title and exercises the functions of Consul General; and France has also a salaried Consul General; and the interests of the United States, seem, in like manner, to call for some representative in China of a higher class than an ordinary commercial Consulate.

I also submit to the consideration of Congress, the expediency of making some special provision by law, for the security of the independent and honorable position, which the treaty of Wang-hiya confers on citizens of the U. States residing or doing business in China. By the twenty first and twenty-fifth articles of the treaty (copies of which are subjoined in extenso) citizens of the U. States in China are wholly exempted as well in criminal as in civil matters from the local jurisdiction of the Chinese Government, and made amenable to the laws and subject to the jurisdiction of the appropriate authorities of the U. S. alone. Some action on the part of Congress seems desirable, in order to give full effect to see important concessions of the Chinese Government.

JOHN TYLER.

ANNEXATION OF TEXAS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Hopkins in the chair,) and, resumed the consideration of the joint resolutions for the annexation of Texas to the U.S.

Messrs. RATHBUN and POLLOCK spoke in opposition to the measure, and Mr. COBB in its favor.

Mr. POLLOCK was the last to address the committee. When he concluded –

Mr. HARALSON was successful above many competitors in obtaining the floor; and, it being at a late hour, he moved that the committee rise.

The question was taken, and the vote stood – ayes 25, noes 42; no quorum voting,

Mr. ADAMS demanded that the committee rise and report that fact to the House; which was accordingly done.

Mr. VINTON moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. D. L. SEYMOUR called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered. The question was then taken and decided in the affirmative, yeas 46, nays 44. So

The House adjourned.

Yesterday's Proceedings on Texas

Yesterday's vote in the House of Delegates was a close one. The resolutions on Texas were laid on the table by a majority of three only-This is no test of the final decision of the House. For some of the members said they wanted time for examination. Some declared that they would take them up before the end of the session. For our own part, we cannot see why they should be delayed one moment. To get some light [...] Washington, as our friends Strother says. Mr. Bowden truly replied, that it was our duty to send light to Washington, and communicate our wishes to the Senators of Virginia. How long would Mr. Strother delay action? The bill may be acted on at Washington before we can speak at all-and then the Whigs will say, [...] speak at all? Then, let us speak now-act NOW. Now is the accepted time-now is the only time to speak out if we wish to instruct our agents about the wishes of Virginia.
Two other Whigs took a still more extraordinary position—one, that he was opposed to instructing our Senators on Federal questions—the other made a still more sweeping declaration, that the House had no right to meddle with Federal politics. These are strange doctrines. It is contrary to the whole practice of Virginia, as well as to the course of many of the States on this very question. It conflicts, too, with the true theory of the rights of the State Legislatures. “The Federalist” holds, that “the State Governments may be regarded as constituent and essential parts of the Federal Government,” and even maintains that, in some case, the State Legislature may not only be the voice of the people, but “the arm of the public discontent.” When a question of transcendant importance to the whole Union, and especially to the South, comes up, the State Legislatures are bound to speak. On this very question, Massachusetts and Connecticut have spoken. They threaten dissolution, if the Federal Government acts in behalf of great national interests. Their resolutions are before the House. The Governor has placed them there officially. The Legislature is bound to notice their contents and to repel their threats.

We are happy to see the friends of this great question yesterday voting to take up the Resolutions in order to act upon them. We cannot doubt that the House will yet act upon them, and pass them. If they do not, the friends of Texas and the Resolutions must appeal to the People.

Letter to the Editor, Washington City, Jan. 20, 1845

The Senate were engaged to-day in the transaction of business uninteresting to your readers. In the House, ere the Texas question was taken up in Committee, Mr. Douglass of Illinois introduced his bill to establish military posts in Nebraska and Oregon. It directs the President to cause to be established such military posts as shall be necessary to protect our commerce with New Mexico and California, and the trade and immigration to Oregon. It further provides for the appropriation of $100,000 for the object, the work to be done by the United States soldiers, as in other cases.

Mr. Robinson of New York next introduced a series of resolutions relative to there-annexation of Texas. They provide, that she shall be admitted as a slave-holding or non-slave-holding State, as the inhabitants thereof may choose with prescribed limits, (not to exceed the State of New York in dimensions) that her public domain shall remain her own property, as a fund for paying her debts—that the rest of the territory shall be divided into States, of convenient size; and admitted into the Union, with or without slaves, as Congress may determine, whenever they shall have the requisite population to entitle them to admission.

The reception and reference of these resolutions were immediately objected to by Mr. A. Stewart, of Pennsylvania, and other ultra Federalists, avowedly with the purpose of distracting the friends of the measure, on the one hand; and on the other by Mr. Payne of Alabama, and other of our friends, who felt indignant, that a proposition so utterly inadmissible should originate with any portion of Democratic party. It created great confusing, and an hour’s debate-in which Messrs. Stewart of Pennsylvania, Payne of Alabama, Saunders of North Carolina, Garret Davis of Kentucky, Dromgoole of Virginia, Hopkins of Virginia, and Atkinson of Virginia took part. Finally upon Mr. Dromgoole’s suggestion—that though so exceedingly objectionable, no true friend of re-annexation could vote for it, yet it was no less the duty of the House to treat it with the respect accorded to all other propositions on the subject, by a reference to the Committee of the Whole. It was referred by a vote of 119 to 63. By reference to the list of yeas and nays on the question, you will perceive that it was no test vote—some of the friends and opponents of the annexation voting on either side.

Immediately on deciding this question, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, and Mr. Rathbun spoke his hour in steady opposition to Texas. He devoted the greater part of his time to an attempt to prove it unconstitutional to acquire Texas in any other manner than by treaty; yet, singularly enough, expressed his perfect readiness to swallow his long array of constitutional objections, provided Mr. Robinson’s project, which goes to divide the territory into one slaveholding and four or five non-slaveholding States, be accepted. In the course of his remarks, he stepped, as it appeared to me, rather out of his way, to administer you a rap or two over the knuckles, for the manner in which you have commented on the position and prospects of those Democratic members who refuse to sustain the party on the question. Nothing but the peculiar turn of the gentleman’s mind could have induced him to torture your comments into a threat about spoils, &c., as he did. His speech was a queer one, and will be read, as though the gentleman regarded the patronage to be distributed by Mr. Polk as the end and aim of the Democratic party in the contest.

Mr. Rathbun was followed by Mr. Cobb of Georgia, in favor of re-annexation; and the later, by Mr. Pollock of Pennsylvania, against it.

Letter to the Editor, Washington City, Jan. 18, 1845

Dear Sirs: "One more blow for Texas in the Enquirer," say its friends, and with your good leave, and with all my heart, one more blow say I; but God bless the Whigs! A heap of their rubbish so cumbereth my way, that I fear it will take days of initiative toil, before I can lay the main subject bear to the axe's edge. - Without farther ceremony, then, I shall at once grapple with two of the most notable bugbears of the Federalists, with which they essay to enlist men's sympathies or arouse their alarm at every angle of the debate now in progress in the House of Representatives. Be their removal, therefore, my task for to-day - They are, the one, Mr. Jefferson's opinions upon the constitutional power to acquire foreign territory - the other, whether the "consent of Mexico" be needed as a condition of annexation.

1. The Federalists in the present debate seem to deem it quite a poser, and altogether the thing, in this debate, to confront the Democracy with the private doubts of Mr. Jefferson upon the constitutional power of acquiring Louisiana. It is altogether refreshing, I own, to find in these our days the very "kith and kin" of those who reviled Mr. Jefferson through life for his imputed errors of judgment upon notable points of constitutional law, now opposing the weight of his single name, against the mightiest mass of authority, that ever was arrayed in support of any one controverted point in the Constitution. - Whatever may be the motive of this distinguished compliment, of this just mortem praise, I acknowledge at once, that there is none among the living or the dead, whose single authority, when he was possessed of all the opportunities to guide him to right judgment, is entitled to more weight than that of Mr. Jefferson.

2. In the present case, however, there are several things to be said: 1st. We have Mr. Jefferson's act of acquisition, standing out in opposition to his private doubts about his authority to make it. 2d. We have his example of acquiring territory, to justify its acquisition subsequently, in a similar emergency. 3d. Mr. Jefferson was never so persuaded of his want of authority, as to give his doubts the form of official notice, and recommending to Congress to take initiative measures for amending the Constitution and conferring the power. 4th. Mr. Jefferson's absence as Minister to France, from 1785 until 1789 [when he was recalled by President Washington to preside over the Department of State,] deprived him of all that personal, practical knowledge of circumstances precedent, attendant upon, and subsequent to, the adoption of important clauses of the Constitution - so useful as a help to just judgment, and which the general knowledge, which usually survives interesting events, but rarely and then very imperfectly supplies. 5th. There is no trace of any proofs, that Mr. Jefferson's scruples about the constitutional power, out-lived the year 1803 - his last letter mentioning the subject being that to W.C. Nicholas, (dated 17th September, 1803) - and it surely is not too strained an inference to conclude, that those discussions which wrought so through a conviction upon the national mind in admiration of the power of acquisition, was not without its effect upon the mind of great author who originated that measure. And 6th and lastly: Mr. Jefferson had not seen that graphic and secret conviction upon the national mind in admiration of the power of acquisition, was not without its effect upon the mind of great author who originated that measure. And 6th and lastly: Mr. Jefferson had not seen that graphic and secret history of the clause in relation to the admission of "New States" - so luminously set forth in the pages of the Madison Papers, and so plenary of the proofs of the purpose to confer the power in question, that one would think that even skepticism itself might be proselytized by that alone. That Mr. Jefferson knew of the existence of Mr. Madison's "Notes of the Debates of the Convention." I am aware, for he mentions them in one of his letters to Mr. John Adams; but, then, we know that Mr. Madison was so scrupulously nice of observance of his original purpose of never revealing those Debates to any one, (taken in Convention, while all its members were under injunctions of secrecy,) during his life-time, that we can hardly believe that Mr. Jefferson ever saw the MS., for, even in his great speech against the constitutionality of a Bank of the United States, during the administration of General Washington, he refrained altogether from a reference to his own racy sketch of the debates upon the subject, and purported to give mere traces of a recollection he had, that application had been made for such a power, and had been rejected by the Convention. So much for Mr. Jefferson's opinions. The full answer to his early objections belongs to another stage of the discussion, under my arrangement of the topics.

Let us now then proceed to the other bugbear of the Federalists.

2nd. Croakers there are yet remaining in the House, who, with their Crocodile lamentations, and in histrionic seeming, bewail this projected junction of these nations, without our first procuring the "consent of Mexico." But since the flood of light, which investigation in the course of the last 12 months has cast upon the nature of the connection and relations between Mexico and Texas, these objections are now urged but by few. "Consent of Mexico" indeed! Why, since the facts have been fully elicited, we all see, that Mexico has no more to do with it, and has no more right to be consulted, than has the Kingdom of Brazil, the Republic of Venezuela, or any other of the revolutionized Spanish-American Colonies. That the negotiations with Mexico for the acquisition of Texas, originating with Mr. Adams' administration, and followed up through that and the succeeding administration of Gen. Jackson, took their rise in true patriotism, and without a purpose or an expectation of giving umbrage to any other nation, cannot be doubted; but I do implicitly believe that the fact, that both administrations should have opened negotiations with a power who had never acquired the least title to Texas, will be regarded hereafter [ . . . ] one of the most remarkable events chronicled in the archives of diplomacy. In making this statement, so sure am I of my facts, and of their potency to silence, for aye, all this senseless jargon and factitious clam or about "national honor" and the "faith of treaties," that I have been tempted to marshal and epitomize them now; and so, without more ado, here they are:

1. In all time, Mexico and Texas were never under the dominion of the same European Government, for more than thirty-eight years. The Government referred to, was Old Spain - but she acquired those provinces or colonies by very different titles, to wit: Mexico by discovery and conquest - and Texas from France, by the Secret Treaty of Fontainebleau, on the 3rd of November, 1762. So distinctive were the limits of each, both before and after that treaty, that they preserved throughout the last century those descriptive designations which pointed to the sources of their original titles – the one being called a part of New Spain, the other of New France. Spain sundered her joint dominion of them, by ceding Texas as part of Louisiana, (or New France,) to France, in 1800 – nor have they ever been united since, except by a Federation which I shall presently refer to.

2. Some date the Revolution of Mexico as far as 1810. Little was done, however, in the way of accomplishment, earlier than 1816 - when [the rest is illegible].

U.S. Senators [from the Albany Argus of Monday.]

On Saturday, pursuant to concurrent resolution, the Legislature of this State, in their respective branches and finally in joint Convention, appointed John A. Dix of the city of Albany and Daniel S. Dickinson of the county of Broome, U.S. Senators, to supply the vacancies occasioned by the resignations of Silas Wright and Nathaniel P. Tallmadge.

Gen. Dix is an able and clear-headed politician, and an accomplished and estimable citizen. He has been long known to the Democracy of the State, and has held various and high offices under the State government, the duties of which he has discharged with equal ability and approval. He takes the place filled so long and with such eminent distinction by Gov. Wright, and temporarily by one so well fitted for it, by high abilities and legislative experience, as Mr. Foster.

Lieutenant Governor Dickinson is not less, no less favorably known to the Democracy than his colleague. In his Senatorial character, as a Representative of the Sixth Senate District, and in the discharge of the duties of the second office under the State Government, he obtained a deserving eminence as an able Legislator, a courteous and impartial presiding officer, and as an inflexible and ready champion of the Democratic interests. Springing from the people, his sympathies and feelings are with the masses, and they have nowhere a truer friend or a more efficient advocate. As a leading member in the Baltimore Convention, he performed his duty to his State and its candidate with approved fidelity and effective zeal; and as a State Elector, he was not less prominent in the discharge of his duty to the Democracy of the Union. Indeed, in all the labors of the recent great campaign, he as well as Messrs. Foster and Dix, was among the foremost in valuable service.

Upon all the questions of national and public importance, which divide the Democracy from the Federalism of the day, the views of both are no doubt identical. Mr. Dickinson’s views of Annexation are before the public, and are explicitly in favor of the measure, and in accordance with those of the President Elect. The distinctive opinions of General Dix upon this question, have not as yet, we believe, been publicly avowed.-[Albany Argus]

(We understand, through a letter from a distinguished and respected source in New York, that Mr. Dix goes for Texas-[Enquirer].

Editorial

The Washington Correspondent of the Baltimore American notices Col. Benton’s remarks in the Senate on Monday-and says that he “disappointed all who heard it, on account of its brevity.” We confess, too, we are agreeably disappointed, by the tone of them-if we may trust the sketches in the National Intelligencer and Madisonian.-They are calm, unimpassioned, conciliatory –what they ought to have been. We regard them too as decided in their character-going for annexation, in a spirit of compromise, which must ensure it success in the Senate-not “carefully non-committal,”(as the Baltimore Correspondent intimates,) though they may “prove much more perplexing to his enemies than his friends.”-This, of course, is no objection to us-and we say once for all, that, though we did not approve Col. B.’s bill, nor the character of his speeches, yet, if he will carry out he calm and compromising spirit of his last Monday’s speech, and assist to secure us Texas, we will be the first to honor him.

Texas as a State of the Union

Be it Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress doth consent that the Territory rightfully included within the limits of Texas be erected into a new State, to be called the State of Texas, with a Republican form of Government, to be adopted by the people of Texas, with the consent of the existing Government, upon the following conditions and guaranties, which, when adopted as aforesaid, shall be obligatory as well upon the people of Texas as upon the United States.

First. That said State be formed, subject to the adjustment by the Government of the United States of all questions of boundary that may arise with other Governments.

Second. That the Constitution of said State of Texas, with the proper evidence of its adoption by the people thereof, be transmitted to the President of the United States, that the same may be laid before Congress at its next session.

Third. That Texas shall retain her public lands and other public property, and remain, as at present, responsible for her debts.

Fourth. That it, hereafter, with the consent of the Legislature of the State now proposed to be admitted, new States be formed within the jurisdiction of said State, said new States shall not exceed three in number, in addition to the said State; and such new States shall be admitted into the Union with or without the institution of slavery, as the people, in each one of said States respectively may, at the time of their application to Congress for admission determine.

Mr. DANIEL made a constitutional argument in favor of the power of Congress to annex.

Mr. STONE of Ohio, made a speech in favor of free trade and in strenuous opposition to a protective Tariff, which he considered as the root of all the opposition to Texas annexation.

Mr. MORSE of Maine, spoke in opposition both to the power and the expediency, and replied to several assaults which had been made on the character of New England.

Mr. ELLIS read a very finished speech on the policy of annexation generally, which he advocated with great warmth.

Mr. NORRIS next took the floor, and made a speech in favor of annexation. Mr. N. having concluded, the floor was assigned to

Mr. STEPHENS, but not being prepared to go on at this late hour, (half-past 7 o’clock.) A motion was made that the committee rise – which the Committee refused to do.

Mr. STEPHENS then yielded the floor, as he was unable to make his speech to-night.

Mr. DARRAGH obtained the floor, and spoke until 20 minutes past eight in opposition to annexation. When he concluded and took his seat,

Mr. STEPHENS again took the floor.

A motion was made that the committee rise; on this question a quorum did not vote. Whereupon

The committee rose and reported that fact.

And the House adjourned until to-morrow at 11 o’clock.

[Our own excellent correspondent gives us a sketch of Gen. Dromgoole’s argument, which will be found very clear and interesting.] redeemed by generosity, and the kindness, hitherto withheld be paid with usury.

“There is nothing, in our opinion, to object to in the proposal voted by the House to-day, except that it is come back on the United States, asking the redemption of the pledge in the treaty under which the country was first faith, proclaimed their freedom, and, having maintained their independence against both Spain and Mexico, now into the Union to the despotism of Spain. But the people of Texas instantly put in a protest against this breach of treaty of 1819 was an abortion. It ceded the country and the people we were bound by solemn covenants to bring along and will secure for it a much higher sanction than that of diplomats and executives—the sanction of the disadvantage which resulted from this twice-condemned course of management, the force of the question has borne the policy which they held in their own hand. Rejection was its fate at the last session and at this; but in spite of the motives and its fate from the management, of those who were supposed to have personal views associated with looked own pretty sectional attempts to destroy the fraternal ties that hold it together as a nation. The spasmodic affections which may sometimes seize upon a particular State, will no more disturb the great body politic than the interests staked on the inviolability of its peace and security and the greater the mess of influence embodied to additional strength to the will of the existing confederacy to sustain. And it is thus that the expansion of the Union agitation, and establishes peace and good will between the different sections of our Union o firmly to be shaken by admission of Texas into the Union, is a preliminary step of vast importance to the Union. It is an extinguisher of the State, that a storm will not gather around their heads to sweep them into the retirement, which an enlightened people will pronounce to be their just reward? But we forbear for the present. The general results of this measure are forcibly explained in the following article from the Saturday’s Globe.-Yet we are almost tempted to strike out the second paragraph of the article. We regret that our friend of the Globe had not himself stricken it out of his brilliant article. We cannot sympathize with the positions which it takes. Our soul is too full of joy to indulge in censure or rebuke upon any one. But, called up, as we feel ourselves, by the republication of this paragraph, we feel bound to express our thanks to John Tyler, for the vigorous efforts he has made to secure the great object which he has so anxiously sought. His setting sun is about to sink beneath the horizon, amid the brightness which such a measure is calculated to she around it:

"Vote Reannexing Texas as a State-The vote in the House of Representatives to-day, providing for the re-admission of Texas into the Union, is a preliminary step of vast importance to the Union. It is an extinguisher of agitation, and establishes peace and good will between the different sections of our Union o firmly to be shaken by religious fanaticism or political phrenzy [sic]. It is the potent voice of the people calling in a new people to give additional strength to the will of the existing confederacy to sustain. And it is thus that the expansion of the Union will ever contribute to its power and perpetuity. The greater the number of States embraced in it, the greater will be interests staked on the inviolability of its peace and security and the greater the mess of influence embodied to sound our own pretty sectional attempts to destroy the fraternal ties that hold it together as a nation. The spasmodic affections which may sometimes seize upon a particular State, will no more disturb the great body politic than the turbulence of a little nil, swollen by a sudden gust, the great ocean into whose bosom it falls.

"The joint resolution which passed, is the legislative action which we suggested in the first article we wrote upon the subject of Texas before the Treaty was submitted to the Senate. If this measure had been carried at the last session of Congress, Texas would have been prepared at this time to enter the Union with Iowa. Mr. Walker, on of the most zealous and efficient advocates of re-annexation, urged the propriety of making it the work of the open and entire legislative councils of the country, instead of a hugger-mugger executive act, taking its complexion, from the motives and its fate from the management, of those who were supposed to have personal views associated with the policy which they held in their own hand. Rejection was its fate at the last session and at this; but in spite of the disadvantage which resulted from this twice-condemned course of management, the force of the question has borne it along and will secure for it a much higher sanction than that of diplomats and executives—the sanction of the people and their Representatives, the States and their delegations in the Senate of the United States. Texas will have something more than the faith of executive promises to rely upon. It will have the act of a representative body; which can grind the power of the Government and all its constituents to make it good.

"The act authorizes Texas to come in as a State, and this realizes at once the stipulations of the treaty of 1803, which bound the United States by France to perform this very act. The resolution of this day is, in fact, nothing more than the execution of Mr. Jefferson’s treaty, by which the territory of Texas was acquired. Mr. Adams’s treaty of 1819 was an abortion. It ceded the country and the people we were bound by solemn covenants to bring into the Union to the despotism of Spain. But the people of Texas instantly put in a protest against this breach of faith, proclaimed their freedom, and, having maintained their independence against both Spain and Mexico, now come back on the United States, asking the redemption of the pledge in the treaty under which the country was first settled by our citizens when all the world must admit the abrogation of the treaty through which intriguing diplomacy sought to exonerate the nation from its honest obligations, revives them in full force.

"There is nothing, in our opinion, to object to in the proposal voted by the House to-day, except that it is loaded with conditions which may form an obstacle to the acceptance of the overture by Texas. But this can, and we trust will be obviated by future legislation. If Texas come prepared to enter the Union, the next Congress will be just, and more than just to her. Wronged at first by a heartless repudiation, she will find that the injustice will be redeemed by generosity, and the kindness, hitherto withheld be paid with usury.
"The vote on the resolution carried to-day does not show the strength of the question of re-annexation. There is, we have no doubt, a majority of fifty in the House in favor of restoring Texas to the Union. Many members thought that the territory ought to be equally divided to provide for the introduction of two slave and two no-slaveholding States. This, we have little doubt, will be the effect of the act as it passed. -More than half the country is mountainous, or at least elevated, cold, and of a pastoral character. -If this country is ever to be settled, it must be by a white population exclusively. It will be the interest of the earlier admitted State to make it so; and it is left to the election of the States which hare to grow up in this high grain growing and grazing region to decide, on presenting themselves for admission, whether they will prohibit slavery or not. As this will be in the choice of the majority, who can doubt as to the result? -North of latitude 36 degrees 30 minutes slavery is absolutely prohibited.

"Upon the whole, we congratulate the Democracy on the vote of the popular branch of Congress. It is auspicious to the peace, prosperity and happiness of the whole continent."

Dear Sirs: On yesterday my attention was called to the speech of Mr. Kennedy of Maryland in the Intelligencer, which I had not read before, and finding that he too has striven to cumber our journey's way, and clog our progress with some apt and ingenious sophistries, all manliness prompts that I should cast them out of our path if I can, rather than to make a fresh path among them, and thus increase the length of travel for those, who may come after us. His most imposing objection, relates to the qualification of terms of nine and seven years of American citizenship, prescribed by the Constitution for the Senators and Representatives in Congress &c. But I shall let Mr. Kennedy state his objection in his own way, and keep my skirts clear of all imputation of robbing the objection of one atom of its strength, if it has any, by any dexterous abbreviations of mine. He thus puts forth his objection:

"The Constitution requires of every member of the House of Representatives, that he shall have been seven years a citizen of the United States, and of every Senator to have been nine years a citizen. It is manifest, that these conditions cannot exist amongst the inhabitants of a Foreign State. Every citizen of Texas is at this moment a foreigner to the United States, even although he may have recently emigrated from this country. We avow the right of expatriation. Our citizens lose their citizenship when they change their allegiance. This is one of our cardinal principles. Now, it is true, that an act of Congress may convert the inhabitants of Texas into citizens of the United States, but it cannot make them citizens of seven and nine years standing. In contemplations of law, there can be no persons in Texas having these qualifications, &c. The deduction from this is, that Congress cannot make a new State from a foreign nation, without first acquiring the territory of the foreign nation, and holding it long enough for its citizens to become endowed with the requisites to make them a State-that is to say, with qualifications essential to give them a representation of Congress. This shows conclusively, if other arguments were wanting that the two powers of acquiring territory, and admitting a State, are separate and distinct."

This solemn gravity of style, which so strongly contrasts with other parts of the speech, indicates the author's estimate of the important aid he had thus contributed against the cause of annexation, and it is said, that his manner in its delivery very solemnly indicated that the annunciation of such a point was fully worthy of one of those "sensations," with which the French Chamber of Deputies sometimes reward commanding novelties and brilliant sentiment. Be this as it may, the expected "sensation," if it existed actually, only existed in the mind, and was altogether too shy and prudish to display itself in the manner; and though I may not commend this dogged discourtesy in the House, still the ungracious task devolves upon me to show, if I can, that its application, yet, that after all, "there was nothing in it." This reminds me of a band once occurring between Lord Avorimore and Mr. Curran. Lord A.'s only infirmity as a Judge was a provoking anticipation of what counsel meant to say, and "giving item" of its effect upon him. This annoyed Curran very much; and on one occasion, when addressing a jury before his Lordship, perceived that his Lordship attracted the jury's attention, by shaking his head in dissent, he gave him a ken home thrust of sudden, which his Lordship never forgot, by simply observing to this jury, "Don't be at all concerned, gentlemen, at what his Lordship had done. I know him much better than you do, and you may rest quite assured, that when his Lordship shakes his head, there's nothing in it."

Federal scepticism itself will hardly dispute but that the term "United States", wherever it occurs in the Federal Constitution, refers especially and exclusively to those States and those States only, who became and were united by that very Constitution into one and the same federative Government at the time it was ratified, with a capacity besides to be applied to any other States which should become united with them, under the same Constitution. The terms, as there used, apply to this Union and to none other, not to any Union that either preceded this Union, , nor to any Union which may be formed hereafter. When we speak therefore of a "a citizen of the United States," we have exclusive reference to the States thus united under that Constitution; and a fortiori, that Constitution itself, in using the terms "a citizen of the United States" must mean these United States, thus federated into one for National purposes, by that very fact of Union. The Constitution was formed in 1787, ratified in 1788, and went into full operation on the 4th day of March 1789, by the assembling of the President and both Houses of Congress on that day at the city of New York, their taking the oaths prescribed and entering upon their several duties.
Be our thanks evermore then, the dues of Providence, that Mr. Kennedy’s manhood and destinies were not cast with our fathers of that day and generation! What incalculable mischiefs, embarrassments, anarchies, (it may be) revolutions and civil wars, have we not thereby been spared! How so? How can this be? How can it be?—why, if Mr. Kennedy's position be good [...], it was always good, and of consequence was good, when the first Congress was assembled—What a bomb-shell then would have been this of Mr. Kennedy, to have been cast and exploded in their midst,还没 the Congress, bowing the Government to atoms, and as the Confederation had been dissolved, leaving the States without any common government to prosper, bind or protect them—leaving a perfect Constitution and a perfect Union, but without a man in States or Union, qualified for its administration! The convention who framed the constitution, and the States who ratified it, idiots that they were! Disfranchised and incapacitated themselves and every one from putting it in operation during the nuncupatur in annum. But could this have been so? I tell you it was inevitable; provided, mind ye, provided Mr. Kennedy is right—for, if the terms “a citizen of the U. States” applies exclusively to these United States formed by the Constitution under which we now live—and the term "citizen" there applies to equally to those who are native and to those who are adopted—what other possible consequence could have resulted? Not Senator or Representative in the first Congress could have had the constitutional qualifications, under this construction. Not one of them. Not one! For none of them had been citizens of these United States either nine years or seven—nine years, and for the very plain and irrefutable reason, that these United States themselves were not that old; nay, were in the very first year of their federative birth! No, no, Mr. Kennedy—this won't do. The Constitution was established in perpetuum. It was made for the unborn as well as for he living— and generations, rather than mere frail man or his fleeting measures, are profoundly interested in its meaning. Interpretations of it, that are true, are true in all times—its infancy, its manhood, and its old age—circumstances must be fashioned for it, and not for it for circumstances. An interpretation, therefore, which borne back to its early years, would have disfranchised from all functions of administration one every one of those it was framed for, during nine long years, we know cannot be true; because we know, from the Constitution itself, that it was impossible that such could have been the intention.

For the want of a patriotic observance of this safe and golden rule of interpretation, behold what meddling, fanatic Massachusetts is attempting at this very moment: to disturb the domestic tranquility of South Carolina and Louisiana, by foisting her colored inhabitants into their midst—and, under the pretense that they are citizens of Massachusetts, and as such “entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States”—to coerce them to submit to this revolting and revolutionizing admixture! Massachusetts well knows—none knew better—that at the time the Constitution was formed, there was no, (nor for 50 years afterwards, not do I know that there is none,) in any one State in the Union, a single inhabitant of the African race who was, in any just sense of the word, a citizen. By citizen, I mean one who is capacitated in exercise and enjoy all the rights and privileges of which all other citizens in the same community exercise and enjoy; to have the right to choose and be chosen to any office; of intersuccession; seeing [sic] and being sued; witnesses for and against the other races, &c., &c. What then? Is it to be said, in this our day, that a class of persons, why, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, could not procure citizenship in any one State in the Union—who were a degraded caste, and inferior race in all white men’s appreciation, in all the States—who, for a century before, and from the first moment they and their ancestor set foot any where upon these shores, had been laboring under fixed and degrading disabilities; and when there was not one of the States whose laws did not only tolerate the slavery of that race, but held them as slaves—what are these the persons on whom the Convention designed to confer those full rights of citizenship, which would make them the white man’s equal in all the States? There is not one man in the nation who believes it. There is not a State in the Union who either had the desire, or could have summoned the effrontery to desire, or could have summoned the effrontery, to make such a proposal to the Convention. Not a Southern Representative would have wished or dared to have remarked an hour there, after such a proposal had been received. There would have been no Constitution—there could have been none—least none that was common to the States who made and adopted it. No, sirs, no! The Constitution then made, was the type of the sentiments common to all the States at that day—and under their sovereign behests, the African race was then and there and evermore exorcised from all the rights and privileges it conferred and secured. We intend to stand for aye, by that citizenship which was privileged by the Constitution, and for no broader or other citizenship. It is not given to Massachusetts alone nor conjointly, with other, in this mode, to change either the Constitution or terms or their meaning. We insist upon the Constitution then, as it is written—as it was understood by those who framed it—those who adopted it—and by those who administrated it in its earlier days, ere fanaticism had tarnished it, with its vile characters abominations. But I forget—I keep Mr. Kennedy waiting—so a truce with episodes and "once more unto the breach,"—if, as yet, there be a breach!

It must be more gratefully remembered by every American, that persons of foreign birth largely contributed to the success of our great struggle for liberty and independence throughout the Revolution. Our gratitude was manifested in various ways in the early times. The power to pass uniform laws of naturalization was made one of the enumerated powers of the Constitution; and it Gen. Washington’s time, only two years residence was required to conferred and secured. We intend to stand for aye, by that citizenship which was privileged by the Constitution, and to acquire eligibility to the Senate and House of Representatives.

These marked favors would never have been bestowed, had we been left alone and unaided in our struggle, to fall or triumph as our fortunes should betide. In that case, it is quite probably, that all the higher offices would have been closed against adopted citizens—and then instead of the clauses of 9 and 7 years citizenship, as they now stand, we should have had a clause to this effect; "None but native-born citizens shall be eligible to membership in either House of Congress." If none but natives were eligible, it would have been quite preposterous to have assigned the 9 and 7 years limits to them—and most surely it would not have been done. Hence, the inference is irresistible, that the limitations referred to were intended to apply, and are to be applied exclusively, to the adopted citizens.
There was no necessity for it—nor has it any fitness of application to natives, who in the eye of the Constitution, are not merely citizens for 9 and 7 years, but citizens all their lives. I think Mr. Kennedy might have spared himself considerable pains, as I should have been spared this presented reply, if he would have given but a slight attention to this distinction; and the pages of either Judge Story or the Federalist, if consulted, would have afforded him quite a clear conception of the occasion of introducing that clause into the Constitution in the guise we find them. They were designed for cases of adoption, not for cases of nativity.

In the 52nd No. of the Federalist, Mr. Madison, speaking of the "Senatorial Trust," says that:

"Participating immediately in transactions of Foreign nations, it ought to be exercised by none, who are not thoroughly waned from the prepossessions and habits incident to Foreign birth and education. The firm of nine years seems to be a prudent mediocrity between a total exclusion of adopted citizens, and an indiscriminate and hasty admission of them, which might create a channel for Foreign influence on the National Councils."

It is thus evident, that he did not consider the clause, any more than the objections, applicable at all to Natives. He does not even mention them or allude to them. What "prepossessions and habits incident to Foreign birth" could operate upon Natives—or, how could they be supposed to "create a channel for Foreign influence on the National Councils?"

And Judge Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution takes precisely the same view of the object and application of the clause. He says:

Section 728—"The propriety of some limitations upon admission to office, after naturalization, cannot well be doubted. The Senate is to participate, largely in transactions with Foreign Governments, and it seems indispensable, that time should have adapted sufficient to wear a Senator from all prejudices, resentments and partialities, in relation to the land of his nativity, before he should be entrusted with such high and delicate functions. Besides, it can scarcely be presumed that any foreigner can have acquired a thorough knowledge of the institutions and interests of a country, until he has been permanently [...] into its society, and has acquired by the habits and intercourse of life, the feelings and duties of a citizen.

Not the first reference, nor an allusion is made to native citizens; but this matter in truth has been long ago, and repeatedly adjudicated by Congress. In my last Epistle, I think I made it pretty plain, that Rhode Island, North Carolina, &c., were Foreign States to the Union, until they were incorporated therein; for, if these were not—neither were England, France, India nor China. Neither the Constitution, nor any one of the laws of the Federal Government, had any force or authority in either of those States—not did any one of its officers exercise any functions, Executive, Legislative or Judicial thither; the shipments of either into any of the ports of the United States were subject to the like duties, as goods of the like kinds, imported from any foreign state, Kingdom or county are made subject to."

With acts of Congress like these staring us in the face, how is it possible for us to doubt, but that these States thus treated as Foreign States, were in fact Foreign States? If they were not, how dare the Congress of the United States, to withhold from them the protection vouchsafed in the 9th section of the 1st Article of the Constitution, which provides:

"That no tax or duty shall be [...] on articles exported from any State. No preference shall be given by an regulations of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels round to or from the State be obligated to enter, clear or pay duties in another."

Surely the State or country which is out of the protection of the Constitution of another—out of its jurisdiction-exempt from its own jurisdiction—subject to its imports at the ports of the other—its citizens not sharing in or subject to the administration of the other—and its citizens exempt from all allegiance thereto—with a perfect freedom to wage war or make peace, without and against the consent of the other—must be, to all intents and purposes, Foreign to each other. The man who would deny that is not to be reasoned with; he must be regarded as gone "clean daft," and the best that can be done for him is, to turn him over, forthwith, to "the tender mercies" of Mr. John Randolph's prescription: "A strait jacked, close confinement, water fuel and depletion."

Well, these Foreign States of North Carolina and Rhode Island, with all their Foreign citizens, afterwards entered the Union—the former in November, 1780, and the latter in May 1790—and their citizens thus, and then, became citizens of these United State for the first time; and according to Mr. Kennedy's argument, neither of hem Surely, then, Texas cannot be more foreign than were those States; and, besides, these United States, as such, once owned every foot of the soil of Texas, and forty-nine fiftieths of her citizens "have been" citizens of the United States for more than nine years; and be it specially noted that the very language of the qualification clause refers in terms to those who "have been"—without a word in relation to when they were so. And be it specially noted also, that in the early times of the Constitution, we had not emerged from the thraldom of English jurisprudence and principles (nor have we yet) and that one of the principles that Government has ever maintained, and does yet, is, that the allegiance of its subjects is inalienable; and that too, has been the doctrine of some of our most eminent jurists—such as Judge Story, Chancellor Kent, &c.; though, (if I might say so) with Mr. Kennedy, I protest; that I do not all concur with them. But, then, the Convention most probably maintained the English doctrine of once a citizen, always a citizen, and in that event, it must have considered that native citizens once qualified by citizenship for Senatorial and Representative function, they could never destroy the qualification by voluntary expatriation, the abjuration of alliance to the U. States, and the plighting of fealty and allegiance to any other Government.

A number of additional answers to Mr. Kennedy’s argument on this point, throng upon me here; but this Epistle has already so far exceeded the bounds I had prescribed to it, that I must bring it rapidly to a close, and take but a passing glance at a few of them.

1st His objection does not extend at all to the acquiring of foreign territory, for the distinctly admits, that the territory can be acquired, and when held "long enough," may be admitted into a State, &c.

2nd His objection don’t apply to the admission of a new State—Not at all. But the apprehends that when admitted, she will be puzzled to find qualified citizens to represent her in Congress.—Don’t be at all alarmed; Mr. Kennedy, just bring her into the Union, and I’ll guarantee that Texas finds citizens to represent her, just as well qualified as you are to represent the Baltimore District.

3rd Congress may "admit new States." When? Nothing informs us. Is Congress bound to wait nine years? The Constitution does not say so. The power is unlimited. Discretion alone is the boundary of its exercise. When the State is admitted, for which the authority is undoubted, the Constitution further provides what the new State is further to do, to send Senators and Representatives, &c. She must be a State, and in the Union, before she can choose her Senators and Representatives.

4th Then, the power to admit being undoubted, and being admitted, the obligation to be represented being equally undoubted, supposed that she has no citizens of the requisite qualifications—Here is a conflict. Which is to prevail in such a conjuncture? If the clause that exacts the full citizenship—then, is Texas to be bound by laws which she has no share in making, and, in despite of the great principle which originated the Revolution, be taxed without representation; but if the clause that exacts representation prevails, no inconvenience whatever arises, for Texas will take good care to send natives of the United States in whom she can confide, &c.

5th But there is no conflict, nor need be any. Citizens of the United States residing abroad do not change their citizenship without adjuring their allegiance. There are thousands of our citizens residing in Texas in this predicament—inhabitants certainly, but not citizens of Texas. If Texas is admitted, what forbids any of hem from representing her in Congress? There are but three qualifications for a Representative in Congress. 1st. He shall be "25 years of age." 2nd. "Have been 7 years a citizen of the U. States." And 3rd. He shall be "when elected and inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen." Why these are a thousand American citizens who are inhabitants of Texas, who are fully eligible; for when Texas is admitted as a State, they will be inhabitants of the State in which they are chosen. But all her citizens are eligible, who, in the language of the clause, are 25 years of age—"Have been seven years citizens of the United States, and are inhabitants" of the State of Texas. So [...] Senators.

6th Why Mr. Kennedy himself could be qualified in a few weeks for that matter—He's of age—being seven years a citizen of the United States—and could in a week's time (for no residence is presorted) by his presence there [...]—or claiming his domicile, become—if not a citizen of Texas—Its inhabitant, and that is all which is required. Neither the citizenship of the State—nor even residence, beyond what is needed for inhabitancy—which implies domiciled rather than residence. The President is the only officer of worth residence is exacted, and even there it refers to the past; "he shall have been 14 years a resident within the United States."

But [...] I’ve scrawled you this harem sacrum epistle; written literally current calamo [sic] leisure nor patience—Besides, old Time with his noiseless tread has stolen a march on me and the I’ve not read it over—nor shall I—I’ve neither brought on his "small hours," and never was I better inclined than now, to yawn out, with Sancho Panza—"Blessed be the man who first invented sleep! It covereth one all over like a dunk."

The anti-Texas Whigs have been terribly dumbfounded by the majority of 22 in the House of Representatives. They had indulged the flattering hope, that the Whigs and the doe-face Democrats would constitute a decided majority in the House, and give the coup de grace to the measure. The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot denied, on Thursday last, that the Texas men could come up to their count, viz.: “105 out and out for the measure and then upon some 13 who will be somewhere in the skirmish.” But, instead of 118, the resolutions passed with 120. The Richmond Whig is quite chap fallen upon the matter-seeing how its confident calculations of defeat have been blown to the winds by the votes of the House, precisely as its certainty of Mr. Clay’s election was blown sky high by the voice of the people.

But of all the presses which are thrown most aback, is the National Intelligencer. In its yesterday’s No., it gives us its usual chapter on the transactions of the preceding week—this last gloomy chapter being on “The eighth week of the session.” It dwells on the vote of Saturday in the most melancholy style—objects to the acquisition of Texas, except by the forms of a Treaty—urges a new constitutional objection, “that Congress cannot make a contract with a foreign nation—that the legislative power never can do that which can be done by Treaty—and that what ever requires the consent of another nation, belongs to the Treaty power, and can only be regulated by it.” It then appeals to the Senate for protection against this gross outrage—tells “that august body, which has so often thrown its shield over the Constitution of the country, that to them is now presented the issue, whether they will give their consent to do that, by legislation, which can only be done by Treaty, and which they themselves have declared to be unwise and inadmissible in that more solemn form? Whether they will permit their constitutional rights to be stricken down, the public peace and the public faith to be compromised and the Union itself—this happy Union of the Old Thirteen, and their legitimate offspring—ultimately and surely, though it may be distant, rent asunder and those who are now brothers and members of the same glorious family, to become aliens and strangers by this ill starred vote of the Representatives of the People”—and winds up its melancholy diatribe, “We have not the heart at present to go any further into the particulars of last week’s doings.” “Death’s doings” they may be to the late sanguine hopes of the National Intelligencer!

It is strange, but yet most amusing, that like the poor Irishman’s back, you can never whip these men to their own satisfaction. Now they cry out for a Treaty. It can only the done by treaty. Like the currier, leather is now the only thing that is good for fortification—the Intelligencer, well knowing of course, that it has been tried, and cannot be acquired by Treaty—and that, according to his advice, of course, Texas would be forever lost to us. But it is most amusing to see, that in 1803, when Mr. Jefferson obtained Louisiana, the Federalists, and Mr. Ross at their head, maintained that the territory could be acquired by Legislative action alone—and not by treaty. Now, the wind blows the other way. Thus, the Federalists are consistent only in their inconsistency, by recommending that mode precisely which would not fail to defeat the great object in view. Surely the Intelligencer cannot have forgotten, that the Federal party tried to exclude Louisiana, by all the means in their power. They denied the power to admit her, and even threatened force to prevent it. They too, talked just as glibly of dissolution then, and war and blood, as the more modern disciples of the Federal School can do at the present time about Texas.

The N. Intelligencer, however, is so much occupied by its own notions about treaties, compacts, and “the joint action of the Senate with the Executive power,” to the exclusion of the power of the House of Representatives, that it entirely strikes out of the Constitution the clause which says that “New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union”—(not by the joint action of the Senate with the Executive power,” mark ye! But by “the Congress”); Does the Intelligencer deny, that it does not require and understanding a contract, call it what you will, between the United States and the new States, before it is admitted? Why, that proposition would be absurd. Does it contend that none but “New States” can be admitted, which are carved out of the then existing territory of the U. States? Then, we ask the Intelligencer what becomes of that remarkable opinion of Mr. Madison (in the 14th No. of “The Federalist?”) “A second objection to be made is (on the objections drawn from the extent of country) that the immediate object of the Federal Constitution is to secure the Union of the thirteen primitive States, which we know to be practical; and to add to them such states as may arise in their […] bosoms, or in their neighborhoods which we cannot doubt to be equally practical.” And what becomes too, of the precedents of the news States of Louisiana, Missouri and Arkansas, West of the Mississippi, which have been carved out of newly acquired territory, not then in “our own bosoms, but lying in our “neighborhood?”

Pshaw! The argument cannot hold water. The whole article of the Intelligencer is a last and desperate effort to prevail upon the Senate to trample the interest of the whole Union under their feet, and lay the interest, the rights and he feeling of the South at the feet of the abolition spirit. If the Senate should be now so infatuated as to despise the will of the people and disregard the majority of 22 of their Representatives, God save the Whig party, say we!

Another Example
Resolutions in favor of the annexation of Texas have passed the House of Representatives of Louisiana, by a vote of 38 to 16. They will probably pass the Senate. Thus, Louisiana can act upon the question of Texas. She can meddle with our Federal Relations. She can express her wishes to her Senators – but Virginia cannot, ought not. So say the Federal Whig Orators of our House of Delegates. Louisiana can freely express her wishes – but Virginia, the great Southern State, who has always spoken her wishes and declared her principles, must be tabooed – shorn of a portion of her sovereign power – because Mr. H. Clay was once infatuated enough to write very absurd letter at Raleigh. Freemen of Virginia, what do you think of the position, to which some of your Whig Representatives would degrade [sic] this “unterrified Old Dominion?”

A Feather in their Caps

We have always contended, that Texas should never have become a party question. It is really an issue between the U. States and Great Britain, much more than between the North and the South, (for, both an interested in it) – or between the Whigs and the Democrats, (for, both these parties are also deeply interested in the result.) We carried this feeling so far, that when it was proposed during the last Summer in the Shockoe Association to call a general meeting of the citizens friendly to Texas, we objected to it, lest it might be supposed to assume a party tinge, from the source from which it emanated. In the course of the campaign indeed, did become involved in the general melts. The Whigs, with some splendid exceptions, generally opposed it. The Democrats advocated it. But the campaign is over – the result known – and Texas, like Hope, remains at the bottom of Pandora's cup.

Can we not, then return to the position which this question should have originally assumed? Let the Whigs rest assured, that as this issue contributed more to their defeat than any other, so will it still shed its malign influence over their political prospects. If they do not bury the dispute about Texas, Texas will bury them, beyond the possibility of redemption. The issue will be again made before the people, under circumstances of more tremendous import against the Whigs. – The indignation of an insulted people will carry the measure and overwhelm its opponents.

But we are proud to see that some of the Southern Whigs are alive to the interests of the Union. With them, it is country first, and party afterwards. We are indebted to a Whig (Milton Brown) for the resolutions which have passed the House of Representatives of Congress. We are indebted to another Whig (Campbell) for the resolutions which have passed the House of Representatives of Louisiana. We are confident, from what we understand, that there are Browns and Campbells in the House of Delegates. Let them only come forth and take the lead as patriots superior to their party. If they will not, the Democrats must do their duty – call the question every day – appeal to the Legislature, and appeal to the people. This great question cannot, must not, will not, sleep.

We would address one word respectfully to the Senate of the United States. Let not the opponents of Texas, deceive themselves. Let not Crittenden play too deep. He knows the indomitable spirit of the Southern men – and he must know if he has the sagacity which usually marks his character (certainly not always) that if they reject the resolution of Milton Brown, or rather of 120 Representatives of the People, the question is not dead. It is of a character to stir up the feelings of every Southern and Western man, and it will rise like Artaeus from its temporary fall with renovated power. The whole Southern country will soon be in a flame, and the conflagration will spread over the prairies of the West. Reject it, and we return with fresh vigor to the charge – overturning all enemies, despising all obstacles. The spirit is irresistible. It will fill the North and the South, and it will upset the political demagogues and fanatical abolitionists who oppose its progress. The only danger is from the delay – lest Texas herself should become wearied and sick and disgusted with our equivocation and suspense – and yielding to the insidious and seductive overtures of our greatest commercial rival, seek out her own destination, and part with us, perhaps, forever.

Editorial

The Madisonian quotes a very strong article in favor of annexation from the "New Orleans Commercial Bulletin," a Whig Paper, and does justice to the ability and principles of that paper. The Bulletin appeals to the Legislature of Louisiana for the immediate passage of decided resolutions in favor of Texas. It tells them that the fate of the measure in Congress "depends on the course which may be taken by the Senators from Louisiana. With their suffrages in its behalf there is scarce a doubt that the measure will succeed; with their voices against it, there is as little doubt that it will be definitely, irretrievably lost."

The Madisonian says that, "with the two Whig Senators from Louisiana in its favor, there can be no doubt of the success of the measure during the present session."

The fate of the measure will equally depend upon the two Senators from Virginia. Will the Legislature of Virginia refuse to instruct them? We trust there will be no evasion, no dodging, no laying upon the table; but that the issue may be met directly, and that we may know who is for Texas, and who against – who is, to all intents and purposes, (in effect we mean, not in design,) for Great Britain, and who for his own country.

Mr. Rowden pledged himself to call up the Texas Resolutions every morning, and why not ACT upon them, while the House have so little business upon their tables – and, in fact, when this question may be decided without interfering with any other business, and without wasting any portion of the time of the House. Surely no subject is so important as this – none so pressing – none, on which the voice of Virginia is more anxiously expected – none, on which the People themselves more imperatively demand the action of their servants – none, on which the public time and public treasure could be more usefully employed. Let us have Action, then, Action.

Twenty-Eighth Congress-2d Ses. Monday, Jan. 20, 1845, In Senate.

Mr. EVANS presented the credentials of the Hon. John Fairfield, elected a Senator from the State of Maine for six years from the fourth of March next.

Mr. BENTON presented a series of resolutions from the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of the annexation of Texas.

In presenting these resolutions, Mr. BENTON remarked, that no State in the Union was more interested in the question of annexation than was the State of Missouri; and that interest was both special and general. It was undoubtedly the wish of that State, and of its Legislature, that Texas should be admitted Constitutionally, and upon such principles as should conduce to the peace and harmony of the Union. He hoped that, to accomplish this desirable object, all parties would unite in a spirit which was recommended by General Washington at the close of his public career, and which had conduced so much to the promotion of all the best interests of the country. In December, 1836, when the Texan Revolution was young, he (Mr. B.) had noted the causes which led to that event, and he had found that they ran a close parallel with those which induced our own. There was a similar long endurance of oppression; a similar indifference to remonstrance; a similar refusal of redress; and there was fortunately, a similar establishment of independence.

The sentiments expressed in these resolutions were not merely those of a large majority, but expressed the opinion of nearly all the people of Missouri. The sentiments, properly founded, and strongly felt ought to be successful in the result which they desired to accomplish. He concurred most fully in the desire expressed in the resolutions, that their object should be accomplished as soon as practicable. The General Assembly of Missouri (said he) view this question in its most enlarged aspect. It is regarded as a great, a most important national question; and he (Mr. B.) had no doubt that through the operation of a spirit of compromise and mutual concession, the great object could not only be accomplished, but accomplished most auspiciously.

Mr. ATCHISON acknowledged, to the fullest extent, the right of the constituent to instruct, and the duty of the representative to obey. He admitted the great necessity for the exercise of a spirit of compromise, and agreed with the views expressed by his honorable colleague. The fourth resolution declared that no power on earth had a right to control, no power on earth had a right to be consulted on this question, except the Government of Texas and that of the United States. The sixth resolution states that the question of slavery need not now be stirred, but that it had better be left for settlement and adjustment when the different portions of the territory to be annexed applied for admission as independent States. He would leave this question to be settled in that spirit of compromise which he trusted would then, as well as now, govern the councils of the General Legislature of the Union. He concurred most fully in the spirit and the object of all the resolutions.

The resolutions were then referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

MEMORIALS AND PETITIONS.

The following were presented and referred, viz:

By Mr. BERRIEN: A memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of Savannah, asking all appropriation for the erection of a custom-house.

By Mr. UPHAM: A memorial from Vermont, numerously signed, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas.

By Mr. STURGEON: A petition from Pennsylvania, for a reduction of postage.

By Mr. BUCHANAN: A memorial from citizens of Spring Garden, Philadelphia, asking for a change in the naturalization laws, and praying that twenty-one years may be the time of residence for foreigners to be entitled to the rights of citizenship.

By Mr. CHOATE: A memorial from Middlesex, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas.

By Mr. EVANS: A memorial from Windham, in the State of Maine, protesting against the annexation of Texas.

By Mr. ARCHER: A petition from citizens of Pennsylvania for a change in the naturalization laws.

By Mr. PORTER: Two memorials from Bedford, Ohio, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas.

By Mr. ALLEN: A memorial from the inhabitants of Pickaway and Ross counties, Ohio, for the immediate organization of the Oregon Territory.

On Presenting this petition, Mr. ALLEN observed that much of the phraseology of this was nearly the same as that of the petition from Fairfield county, which he had the honor of presenting a few days ago. This petition was signed by some hundreds of citizens, the greater part of whom were farmers but the desire expressed by [the rest is illegible]. [AMB]

The Empire Club of New York

During a meeting of the Empire Club, Mr. Rynders read General Jackson's letter declaring that U.S. should annex Texas as soon as possible.

A great meeting of the Club took place on Thursday evening last, 16th instant. Mr. Rynders in Chair. He introduced the Annexation of Texas as the subject for their consideration. He read to the meeting the last letter of Gen Jackson, (to Mr. Blair,) and declared, that "The great anxiety expressed in his letter, written, as it were, on the very verge of the grave, by this great unerring friend of our country, is evidence that annexation is a subject of vital importance to the interest of our country. General Jackson recommends immediate Annexation, ere it is too late, and the United States lose the opportunity, of making a valuable and important acquisition to the land of Freedom. By annexing Texas, we gain a territory of rich, fertile, and productive soil—a country of abundant and almost inexhaustible resources, It is of immense importance, as a suitable and necessary location for a military or naval depot, which, if properly established, would have naturally the entire control of the Gulf of Mexico, our Southwestern Cost and Frontier, affording a constant and mercantile interests of our country. We shall extend the bounds of freedom, and add one more State to the Union, wherein the oppressed of all lands may find a home, and a country, the Native American doctrine to the contrary not withstanding; and I regret exceedingly that the people find it necessary to give another expression to their will upon the subject of re-annexation, which was so clearly and unequivocally decided by the election of James K. Polk, who was the strenuous advocate of annexation, over H. Clay, who was said to be opposed to it. The question of annexation was one of the most important and legitimate issues in the late Presidential election. Jas. K. Polk was emphatically the Texas candidate, H. Clay its opponent. On that ground we battled with the Whig party for supremacy; with Texas for our rallying word, we raised an enthusiasm which very materially assisted us in achieving a great political triumph in the state of New York. Our friends in the South joined with us on the annexation question in the late bitter political contest. They have proved true to their professions and faith; they have done as we expected, and are justly entitled to their full proportion, of influence in our nation's councils; and shall the Democracy of the North prove recreant to our friends of the South? Shall we prove false to the confidence and trust reposed in us? I trust in God, that when properly weighed in the balance we shall not be found wanting. In the name of truth, justice, and honor, let us prove true to the cause we so warmly advocated, and to which may be mainly attributed our success in the late political struggle; for, it was well known, that there was not a political meeting or gathering during the Fall electioneering campaign, but what the lone star of Texas was the prominent feature either displayed as a banner or among the principal devices. Not a speech was made, but the annexation of Texas was the most effectual appeal that could be made to the feelings of the people. I am astonished that there should be found one Democratic member of Congress from this State who would oppose the re-annexation of Texas, after such decided expression of the will of the people of this State in favor of that measure. The people of the United States have decided in favor of annexation, by giving a large and decisive majority of their electoral votes to James K. Polk, the avowed Texas candidate—and, since the people are in favor of annexation, I really trust that one members of Congress will speedily conform to the wishes of their constituents.”

The resolutions reported by a select committee and unanimously adopted by the Club, are of the strongest character. Among them are the following:

1. Resolved, That the Empire Club, on its first Existence, and previous to the recent election, pledged itself to forward in every manner, honorably, the proposition for the immediate annexation or Texas; that it was advocated in the Democratic journals of the city, and deemed by this Club to have been the essential test question in the recent election; that the issue was fairly placed before the people, and the result of their verdict was in favor of immediate annexation; and that, if any doubt yet remain, it is the duty of the people to avail themselves of every opportunity again to repeat their opinion in favor of the measure.

2. That in the opinion of the Empire Club, the immediate annexation of Texas is essentially necessary to the interests of the country, and all portions of it, not only to preserve the States from British aggression, but also to protect a most important portion of our common country; that to pause in the course of demanding annexation, would be to break a solemn and well understood contract with the South—would be the violation of a pledge, and the abandonment of a principle, for which we strenuously contended.

3. That in the opinion of this Club, the question of slavery ought to have no consideration in the question of annexation of Texas; that, when admitted in the Union, her internal regulations should be guarantied all the rights of Government and policy now enjoyed by the sovereign States.

4. That the interests of the South imperatively demand, not only the measure itself, but its immediate passage; the people having voted for it, there can be no doubt of the duty of our Representatives at once to express the wish of their constituents; and this Club will endeavor still, as they have done all along, to obtain the immediate passage of a bill for the union of Texas with these States.”

The Club adjourned over till next Friday evening, then to unite with the Democracy of New York at Tammany Hall, in a full and bold expression of their sentiments in favor of annexation.

Letter to the Editor, A Warning to the Whig Party!

Our intelligent Correspondent (Agricola) writes from the North of Germany , four weeks ago, precisely as if he were at this moment at our elbow, with the yesterday's proceedings of the House of Delegates, and Saturday's proceedings of the H. of Representatives immediately under his eye. – Never was coincidence more striking – Never, was a solemn lesson more appropriately addressed to the Whigs. Hear him:

"Partisan feeling, which I entertained to a limited extent at home, has utterly expired in my bosom; and I no longer look upon "every difference of opinion" as 'a difference of principle.' – We must save the United States. This is a duty – an imperative duty – one above all others; - and closely identified with it, in fact having an immediate bearing upon the result, stands the annexation of Texas. If ever there was a question which should be decided purely upon its own merits, it assuredly is this. In its adjustment, a party voice should not be raised, nor a party vote recorded. – The Treaty should be regarded, as I am sure it will prove, if ratified, as one making the American Republic the most independent and permanent of all the States and nations on the face of the globe."
For "Treaty" read the resolutions of Congress, (and "Randolph of Roanoke" dissipates in this day's paper all the trashy and hair-breadth stuff about treaties, compacts, &c,) and the lesson which "Agricola" reads in our ears is deeply impressive. But we beg the Whigs (at Washington and in Richmond) to read his whole letter in this morning's Enquirer.

(Correspondence) Huntington, Suffolk Co. 21st Jan. 1845

Gentlemen: - I have your esteemed letter, inviting me to attend a meeting of our Democratic friends at Tammany Hall on the 24th inst., to promote the annexation of Texas. Concurring as I do in the object of his meeting, it would give me great pleasure to be with you; but an indispensable engagement will prevent my leaving home at that time.

I consider the annexation of Texas, in its permanent effects upon our national destiny, as the most important question which has been discussed since the adoption of our constitutional Union in 1787. Independent of the immense advantages of unrestricted commerce between the two countries, their political union is necessary for the common defence of our liberal institutions and to preserve the international peace of the continent. The existence of two rival republics would not only be injurious to both but dangerous to popular government. Frequent wars would check their growth and prosperity, and bring upon both countries the evils of monarchy. Had the Union of the old thirteen States been resisted upon the ground of the local institutions of some, our confederacy would never have been formed; and by this time we should have been a divided and powerless people. Our ancestors, actuated by a spirit of patriotism, and with a wise foresight, determined not to sacrifice the permanent interests of the whole, and formed our constitutional confederacy upon the basis of a compromise, which it is to be hoped will remain undisturbed. May those who represent us be animated with the spirit of the framers of the Constitution in 1788; for the same motives which induced them to bind the old thirteen States in one confederacy, should actuate us in extending our bond of Union to embrace our countrymen in Texas.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. C. CAMBRELING.

There was a long debate yesterday in the House of Delegates on the Texas Resolutions, for which see our necessarily meagre sketch. We presume the whole subject will be decided to-day, and we have strong hopes that a majority of the House of Delegates will be found expressing the voice of Virginia in favor of the immediate annexation of Texas. We sincerely trust, that the Whigs will not stave off a direct vote upon the question, by clogging it with useless amendments. Let us have a direct vote upon Mr. Bowden's proposition, and let the people know, that if the measure be now defeated, in the language of the Democratic speakers on yesterday, the responsibility will rest upon the House of Delegates.

What the New York Plebeian states as the report in New York, is the report here, as brought to us from Washington – that an influence was exerted from Albany to defeat the annexation of Texas. But with the Plebeian we trust believe that the report is exaggerated – perhaps altogether unfounded. It will be recollected, that Mr. Robinson of New York submitted resolutions to the House of Representatives altogether repulsive to the South. The report now runs, that this Mr. Robinson wrote on to Albany, that unless they sent entire anti-Texas men to the Senate of the United States, Texas would be annexed, and its enemies defeated. Other reports are in Washington, in political collection with this movement, bearing upon Mr. Polk which are too extravagant to be believed. True or not, Mr.
Polk knows what is due to himself – and so does the South know what is due to herself. If Mr. Robinson has written any such letters, and his advice should gain credence, no good can come of it. The friends of Texas are not thus to be it. The friends of Texas are not thus to baffled; nor do we believe that Mr. Dix or any of his friends can be made an instrument to baffle the South, and to defeat a great national measure. He is a Republican of too lofty a character, to countenance any intrigues which may be set on foot at Washington or elsewhere. The times never did require more harmony and union among all the friends of the country – than now. The country have uniformly looked to J. A. Dix with confidence – and they look to him NOW.

The Texas Resolutions in the House of Representatives

We have stated, that the Resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives, on Saturday, were proposed by Mr. Milton Brown, a Whig member from Tennessee. They are precisely the same with those which had been on a former day submitted to the Senate by Mr. Foster, one of the Whig Senators from Tennessee. The whole representation from Tennessee voted for them in the House, and, we trust, both the Senators from Tennessee (Messrs, Jarnagin and Foster) will vote for them in the Senate. This would be a feather in the cap of Tennessee, which would gracefully adorn her brow.

We have republished the jubilant article of the Globe upon the passage of the Resolutions. – We subjoin the following extracts from the long article of the Madisonian on the same subject:

"But we bai with an unspeakable pleasure, the passage through the House of Representatives, for the annexation of Texas to the Union, by the commanding majority of 22, of a measure the terms of which we hope will be entirely acceptable to our sister Republic. It is none the less acceptable to us, because the ground-work of the measure has been proposed by Mr. Milton Brown, a firm and determined Whig from the State of Tennessee. He and those of his party who have acted with him, entitle themselves to the proud appellation of patriots. They have on a great national question risen superior to the low and petty restraints of party, and have with eyes of statesmen, looked to the lasting and enduring honor and glory of the American name. – There are some questions which are too high and too noble and too lofty for party; or if there be a party in connection, it should be the American party – the party of the whole country. We cannot but rejoice, however, in the fact, that a majority of the Democratic party, maugre [sic] the sickly whinnings of a small minority, have come up nobly to the task, and responded heartily to the universal call of the country. For our own part, we repeat, while we have deemed it best in every point of view, that the resolutions of annexation should have passed in the very words of the Treaty, yet we respond heartily to the language employed by the President in his message to the House of Representatives at the close of the last session. We care not for the words or the form of the thing – give us the substance – annexation now, upon terms that will be acceptable to the United States and Texas, and we are content.

"What will the Senate now do?" is on the lips of all. We answer that they will follow the example of the House.
The conscript fathers of the land – the Representatives of the Sovereign States, will add another bright and glorious star to the galaxy. 'When was it since the great flood' that the Senate would lend itself for any length of time to faction? When was it that Senators would long continue blind to the interests of America, or could fail to raise themselves on tiptoe to espy in the future the great glory of the country? Let our fellow countrymen, then, prepare to rejoice. They have already spoken forth in a voice of thunder from Tammany Hall, and the echoes will be caught up by every hill and valley, until one universal shout of Welcome to Texas will resound over the land."

The Madisonian has some fear that Texas may not accept the terms, because not so favorable to her as the treaty was; but in one respect, we regard it as more favorable. She pays her own debts, it is true, and thus removes the scruples of some of our own politicians; but she keeps her lands, and at the additional valuation which they will acquire by the annexation, she will have more than enough to pay her debt; and she will be able to devote a large surplus, probably, to her own uses, to her schools, internal improvements, &c. &c. We know this was an object, which her citizens had much at heart. The Madisonian, however, is "willing to run the risk, with others, of her acquiescence in the terms thus tendered her, since it is apparent that those mutually agreed upon cannot be ratified." And so are we.

We hail with great pleasure the following from yesterday's Compiler, (Whig.) We are sorry that we cannot give yesterday. Attended its agitation at the North, and its passage through the House of Representatives on the day before. The peace, prosperity and constitutional rights of the South are directly involved. Nor do I doubt but that the Whig majority of Southern Whigs voted for it. It therefore appeals to the House of Delegates as an issue, in which the peace, prosperity and constitutional rights of the South are directly involved. Considered, as is proved by the fact that forty Northern Democrats voted against it, while three-fourths of the Southern Whigs voted for it. We see, then, with what rapid strides the spirit of abolition is becoming the paramount influence at the North. Indeed, the result of the late election teaches us that abolition is becoming the paramount influence at the North. – Is it not time, then, for the majority of the great State of New York, in Vermont, Connecticut and Ohio, and that in two or three short years they will be in the same position in Pennsylvania, Indiana, Massachusetts and Maine. – Is it not time, then, for the majority of the House of Delegates to act on this question, as the Whig members of Congress from Georgia and Tennessee have advanced to stop short of nothing less than a change of the Constitution, which shall deprive the South of the present system of representation in the House of Representatives, shall abolish slavery in Texas, and though it does not throw the balance of power in favor of either candidate of the two great parties. We see, then, with what rapid strides the spirit of abolition is becoming the paramount influence at the North. – Indeed, the result of the late election teaches us that great State of New York, in Vermont, Connecticut and Ohio, and that in two or three short years they will be in the same position in Pennsylvania, Indiana, Massachusetts and Maine. – Is it not time, then, for the majority of the House of Delegates to act on this question, as the Whig members of Congress from Georgia and Tennessee have unanimously acted on it? To strike for, the preservation of the constitutional rights of the South, which shall deprive the South of the present system of representation in the House of Representatives, shall abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and, indeed, destroy each and every obstacle to the abolition of slavery in the South, whenever a controlling majority of the people of the North are ready to carry out that object.

In 1810, the Abolitionists voted 2,000 strong – in ‘44, 61,000 – aye, with double that number of sympathizers, too, who voted for either candidate of the two great parties. We see, then, with what rapid strides the spirit of abolition is becoming the paramount influence at the North. – Indeed, the result of the late election teaches us that great State of New York, in Vermont, Connecticut and Ohio, and that in two or three short years they will be in the same position in Pennsylvania, Indiana, Massachusetts and Maine. – Is it not time, then, for the majority of the House of Delegates to act on this question, as the Whig members of Congress from Georgia and Tennessee have unanimously acted on it? I cannot and will not treat this as a party question. In the House of Representatives it has not been so considered, as is proved by the fact that forty Northern Democrats voted against it, while three-fourths of the Southern Whigs voted for it. It therefore appeals to the House of Delegates as an issue, in which the peace, prosperity and constitutional rights of the South are directly involved. Nor do I doubt but that the Whig majority of that body will so consider it, and act accordingly, when they maturely reflect on the circumstances which have attended its agitation at the North, and its passage through the House of Representatives on the day before yesterday.
Yours truly,

He will be fortunate indeed, to escape from the resentments of the wronged and invaded Texans.

Joy! Joy! The Last Stroke Struck!

The die is cast—The House of Representatives have passed the resolutions, as amended by the Senate, by a majority of 56—and President Tyler has promptly signed them. Thanks be to him and his Administration for the services they have rendered to his country on this glorious event.—It shall never be said, that on this, the last day of his power, there was “none so poor” as to pay him respect. His Administration will hereafter be associated—his name and Calhoun’s, and the memories of Upshur and of Gilmer, with the brilliant name of the no longer “Lone Star!” Let others censure and abuse Mr. Tyler as they may. We will never refuse him this honorable but humble tribute—an in our “flowing cups” let “Texas and Tyler be freshly remembered.” Errors he has committed—gross errors perhaps—but, to say nothing of his vetoes, this is an act for which he deserves the gratitude of all his countrymen.

Is it not melancholy to reflect upon the cursed consequences of this party spirit? Wonderful to tell there was but one Whig who voted in favor of the amended resolutions, (Dellett of Ala..) whilst six of the others (Stephens of Georgia not in the House) who originally voted for Brown’s resolutions in the House, were mad enough, party-mad to vote against them in their amended form—a form, certainly, which neither affected their constitutional nor practical character. And among these six who ultimately turned their backs upon these six who ultimately turned their backs upon Texas, were Milton Brown himself! Of Tennessee, Gen. Clinch of Georgia, and Willoughby Newton of Virginia. They voted against it, and three others. Newton! Aye, our old friend Newton, whose forcible letter was, but the other day, so much admired by the Democrats, and condemned by the Whigs. These men, it appears, could not withstand the screws of party operation, or the lash of the Whig press; and after a brilliant effort, they have returned to the vile affinities of party spirit.

But in spite of them, Texas is ours—with all its beauties—with all the glories of the achievement—with its new and splendid area spread open for the reception of our noble civil institutions. But we must forbear. We have no space this morning to devote to Editorial effusions. We have given this morning’s paper to the details of the measure, as they are exhibited in the proceedings of Congress, and in our very interesting letters. We will find room, however, for the following jubilant article, which we copy form the last Madisonian—as much for the admirable sentiments which it conveys, as in compliment to a journal which has done so much for Texas!

"TEXAS ANNEXED—The glorious victory in the House may be regarded as the consummation of this great measure, so far as the United States are concerned. We now see that the Democracy were in earnest in placing it on their banner in the late election; that consequently the charge of its being a humbug was equally futile and ungenerous. It, indeed, it were a humbug its adversaries acted with a Quixotic aberration of intellect in waging against it so fierce and persevering a war. Yet as such the Intelligencer treated it during the election; and even after it, exclaimed that it "had exploded and injured nobody but Mr. Van Buren." A measure exploded, which has passed the Senate, after the most untiring efforts to defeat it, and the House of Representatives by a majority of 561 This ever memorable vote stood—132 to 76. This vote is not greater, it so great, as the proportion of numerical support among the people.

"The United States have now obtained a boundary suited to their position and interests; the country a great security which it did not possess before; our commerce safety form machinations which might have very seriously injured it; our manufactures a market which, under the fostering operation of this act, will prove a very important addition to the great marts already accessible; the agriculture and cotton-growing, and sugar-raising States, extensive benefits.

"The idea that our possessing it will be severely adverse to British interests, is fallacious. It may serve, and will serve, as a new guarantee of peace with Great Britain; which can be no disservice to her, but precisely the reverse. It will extend our commerce with her; and it we be but true to ourselves, and exert ourselves to pay our debts to the extent of our means, it will invite additional capital from her to our shores. Her interests and ours are so entirely coincident, if each country views the matter rationally, that nothing as, between the two, can result from annexation but an augmentation of benefits to both. [MLD] the passage of the joint resolution was taken, and proclaimed without the ayes and noes.

The crowd was immense—I never saw the like—yet not a whisper was heard—breathless silence prevailed throughout—and the remarks of Mr. Crittenden had such an effect, that not a feeling of triumph was evinced, nor word spoken aloud altho’nine-tenths of the spectators seemed to be delighted at the result. The amendments are all improvements to the House Resolution, provided they be concurred in; and the universal impression is, that no difficulty will be presented in the House.

Bagby excused himself by saying, the Joint Resolutions presented a constitutional mode of acquiring Texas. If it should be adopted, he would confirm the act; but if an unconstitutional mode should be adopted, he would oppose the confirmation hereafter. Of course, he will be required to give way to a less scrupulous man, if it be necessary hereafter.

The cannon from Capitol Hill is pealing its notes of rejoicing, and the streaming banners and merry music of the streets proclaim the cheering news throughout the city. [MLD]

High Authority

In Thursday's Whig there appears a letter from Il Secretario, the accredited organ of that anti-Texas paper, in which he describes the Annexation of Texas as an "infamous foundling of Tylerism, and bantling of Polkism appointed with public perfidy, private corruption, fraud, cowardice, shame, assumption, repudiation, the scorn of all policy, the abrogation of all law!"—The Whigs of the last Legislature were bound to admit that a large majority of the people of Virginia were in favor of this measure. On this fact, the Richmond Whig joins issue with his Federal friends in the General Assembly, and produces the high-toned and reliable Il Secretario, to aid that anti-Virginia paper in damning this vital and popular measure. The People of Virginia will see from the above extract in what light the great question of Annexation, admitted by all but the genius of the Whig to be an object of affection with a large majority of this State is treated by the especial organ of the Virginia Whig Party in this City. Twenty-seven Guns were fired on Friday (by Whigs and Democrats) in this City, upon the tidings being received from Washington of the Annexation Resolutions having passed the Senate. It is a great national question—and its friends thought it was due to its importance to celebrate it in this manner. The twenty-seventh gun was a compliment to the sister Star, which, it is to be hoped, is about to enter the Union. [MLD]

The Past And The Present

With all his sagacity, the ablest man is a very blind animal. "Lands he can measure—terms and tides presage"—but in most other respects, he is as blind as a mole. He can calculate the motions of the largest bodies in the Heavens. He can foresee Eclipses of the Sun and Moon. He can even sometimes prognosticate the courses of the erratic Comet—but he cannot foresee the political movements of his own species in most of their most important elements. Upon the results of the late election, for instance, the wisest of us has been unable to see scarce beyond his nose.

View the landscape, as it appears this time twelve months ago. The Whigs were sure of the election of Mr. Clay. He had just been to New Orleans where he had addressed his sanguine followers, and assured them that the signs were bright and almost decisive in every quarter of the Heavens. He was about to commence his grand Southern electioneering tour, to make assurance doubly sure. All his friends sympathized with his feelings. They believed the election was decided, and that he only wanted the forms of the Constitution, to declare him the President of the United States. On the other side of the picture, behold the Democrats divided among various candidates.—
Buchanan, Cass, Johnson, all had warm decided friends. In Virginia, the struggle was going on with great spirit between the friends of Van Buren and Calhoun. But look aloft, and you see a little "Lone Star" glimmering feebly on the verge of the horizon. Many regard it—but no one is able to estimate the irresistible influence, which, as it wheels on its solitary course, it is destined to exert upon the election, and, in fact, almost to control it.

Trace Mr. Clay on his mad and electioneering career. He arrives at Raleigh in April. He has reached an important point in his journey, which, as Rousseau says of Pyrrhus, was only conducting him to that unfortunate tile, which destroyed his life. Beware, Sir, of that ill-starred question, which is to be your ruin. Take not the advice of the unfortunate counselors, who are thronging around you from Virginia and Washington. He listens not to the warning of truth! He writes that ominous letter, which is to prove his ruin. He has, in an evil hour, and contrary to his own solemn professions in his speech of 1820, touched the spring, which puts into motion the tremendous machinery, that is to crush all his prospects. The mercury, (Green,) bears his celebrated anti-Texas Raleigh letter to his anxious friends at Washington. They, as blind as himself, send it forth, and it returns, like curses, upon his own devoted head. In vain, he struggles against it. In vain, he has sought to propitiate the Abolition vote. In vain, does he then write letter after letter, first to remove the impressions in the South, and then to revive them in the North—the mischief is done—and the rising hurricane drives his barque to pieces upon the shores of Texas.

On the other hand, a far more eminent and cooler statesman writes one of the ablest documents of the age.
He demonstrates in letters of light the constitutionality of the acquisition of Texas; but unfortunately hesitates about the practicability of its immediate annexation. The same irresistible influence operates upon his destiny—and at Baltimore, where Mr. Clay was but a few days before taken up amid the acclamations of the Whig Convention as their candidate, only to be defeated—he, (Mr. Van Buren,) worthy of a better fate is superseded by another individual, taken up without his knowledge, without even expecting it, and as it were, from the bosom of the people.
We shall not paint the violent struggles which ensued; and the shock of the extending hosts—We shall not describe the blindness, and idolatry, and infatuation of the Whigs, who had not the courage to change their leader, but followed him like a Will-o-the-Wisp, through all his blunders. We shall not pursue them through all their arts, through all their follies, through all their humbugs-through all the infamous tricks, and amid all the thick darkness which obscured their vision. Nor shall we describe the glorious struggles of the Republican party-their attachment to principle, their contempt of humbugs, and their unflinching devotion to the fortunes of the Lone Star.

The results of the last twelve months' events are written in the proceedings of this day. Who could have foreseen them twelve months ago?—Who among he sons of men was so highly gifted as a prophet, as to predict on the 4th March, 1844, what should take place on this 4th day of March, 1845; and who is this day to be honored by the first American constellation. On the very next day, (Saturday, the 1st of March,) two other new States, Iowa and Florida, only on Friday last, the "Lone Star" of Texas has ascended to the zenith, and unites in all her glory with the office in the world? Memorable day! Shift the scene to Washington on this remarkable occasion. What do we see?—
We are happy to see Mr. Tyler's Administration go out in a blaze of glory. Erroneous as his policy may have been in
People of Virginia! We call upon you to read these past records. Read the signs of the present times. Look to the triumph over you, and the Federalists would triumph over you, and the Federalists who attempted to intimidate you were to be churlishly told by this same Mr. Clay, and by his now deluded followers, “No, you shall not have it, when she would bring back into our bosom her ‘noble crew, consisting of our children, and our children’s children,’” her own free accord, with as full a right to contract alliances, as we or any independent nation can possibly possess—

And now, we repeat, when Texas would come back to us, with her valuable and fertile soil, her delicious climate, her harbors and her productions, her sacred temples, and hear independent people—now, when she would come back of her own free accord, with as full a right to contract alliances, as we or any independent nation can possibly possess—when she would bring back into our bosom her “noble crew, consisting of our children, and our children’s children,” we were to be churlishly told by this same Mr. Clay, and by his now deluded followers, “No, you shall not have it, She is not worth the having. And as for you, Southrons, you shall not have it, although the abolitionists would triumph over you, and the Federalists would triumph over you, and the Federalists who attempted to intimidate you about Louisiana, are now seeking to drive you from your purpose, by idle threats of dissolution.”

People of Virginia! We call upon you to read these past records. Read the signs of the present times. Look to the future, and then act like men, like freemen, and like patriots. Stand up like the sons of the “unterrified Old Dominion,” despite of the fanatic abolitionists and the deluded Whigs.

But, all is well. The friends of Texas have adhered to their deliberate purpose. We have battled the fanatic Abolitionists, beaten the deluded Whig, (with some honorable exceptions in their ranks,) and Texas is ours. And now what confidence can we place in Mr. Clay or his followers, who would have stript us of Texas—although, in 1820, he had proclaimed a resolution to stand by “Louisiana unimpaired?” Now we have re-acquired it in spite of him—and now let us swear, and let us keep the vow sacred, to “preserve this sacred inheritance of posterity unimpaired.”

Thanks be to Tyler—thanks to Upshur and Gilmer—thanks to Calhoun—thanks to her friends in both Houses of Congress—thanks to her friends everywhere—we have recovered our "sacred inheritance"—and let us now faithfully “preserve” it. [MLD]

Will the Whigs keep their word to-day?

"Explanation.—The Whigs of Howard Grove, near Richmond, Virginia, held a meeting before the late election, and having deluded themselves into the belief that Henry Clay would be chosen President, adjourned to meet in Washington on the fourth of March. Since then, we believe, they have explained their meaning to have been something like that of Mr. Webster, when in ‘an after dinner speech.’ He recommended the occupation of the disputed North-East Territory on the fourth of July. He said he did not mean any particular forth of July; and they do not mean any particular fourth of March.”—N.Y. Morning News.

Such is the effect of “counting your chickens before they are hatched”—or, to use another adage, of “Counting without their host.” We remember this Howard Grove ceremony well.—We remember the live coon that we meant—and the multitude who assembled in that beautiful grove in the vicinity of our city—and the bold and arrogant tone of Mr. Rives, of which we heard—and the other humbug paraphernalia of the “swelling scene.” Where now is it all? Where are the living emblems of their idolatry? Where the boasting orator? Where the arrogant Idol of their faith? Where the adjourned meeting which the Convention was this day to have held in Washington? All gone—all vanished before the fiat of a free People—all, all dissolved—

Clinging to the Last Straw!

We beg the Baltimore American to put itself entirely at ease. Texas will be satisfied with the terms of the Resolutions, and the whole work will be accomplished.

When the amended Resolutions passed the Senate on Thursday night, the National Intelligencer caught at a straw. It indulged a visionary hope, that the Whigs of the House of Representatives might still defeat the measure—that some rule of the House might cut them off from consideration—or, if they were taken up, that the Whigs might send them to a committee, where they might be smothered—or that outspeaking time in the Committee of the Whole, or by piling motion upon motion, and ayes and noes without end upon each other, they might contrive to vast the time and wear out the patience of the House. Unfortunate Whigs! Scarcely had the House met on Friday, when the Resolutions were taken up, all the maneuvers of the Whigs were defeated, every scheme was baffled, and the Resolutions were triumphantly passed by a thundering majority of 56.

The poor Whigs have still another straw to clutch at, in order to keep themselves from drowning. The “Baltimore American” catches up “one further contingency.” It is possible that Texas may decline the proffered annexation.” Yes, and we are sometimes told, that “the skies may fall,” and then, you know, according to the proverb, “we may catch larks.” “The bill as it passed the Senate (says the ‘American’) leaves the terms and conditions of annexation to be settled hereafter—that is to say, commissioners on both sides are to agree upon the terms of admission and cession which agreement is to be afterwards submitted to the Senate in the form of a treaty, or to both Houses of Congress in the shape of Articles of Agreement. In the former case, the sanction of two-thirds of the Senators will be necessary to perfect the arrangement; in the latter, it may be confirmed by joint resolution, requiring a majority of each House. It is left to the President to determine which of the two modes of confirmation shall be adopted. This is the first time, we believe, that President assumed to himself to enforce the Constitution as he understood it.—There is a possibility that the terms of agreement fixed upon by the commissioners may not receive the sanction of the Senate, or of the Congress, as the case may be. This, however, is a contingency upon which but little stress is to be laid.”

We beg the Baltimore American not to flatter itself with any hope from having so many strings to its bow. The terms and conditions of annexation are already settled by the resolutions. The House Resolutions have settled that question—for, as Col. Benton’s bill as a proviso, and proposed for the sake of compromise by Mr. Walker, it will be all

Mr. Merrick meets with no mercy or charity from the dis-contenteded, dis-appointed, dis-confited, (another epithet might send them to the region of Dis) Whigs. He has saved the magnificent territory of Texas, "with her fertile soil and delicious climate" (as Mr. Clay says,) from the death-struggle of party spirit—and if the Whigs curse him, why we must thank him. But I was reserved fro the most illiberal of the Whigish clan to suspect his motives. That most worthy and dignified scribbler, the "II Secretario" of the North American, says of him: "In the Senate, we have lost Merrick, whom all set down as simply bought, either with Texas scrip or with the promise of office." Does II Secretario draw from his own conscience? Does he suspect Mr. M. of doing what he would have done in a similar situation? Will Mr. Cost Johnson also coming for a share of Mr. Merrick's honors? friends in this city, at the prenon on Capitol Hill have announced it. The glad faces of every Democrat announce it. Two nights since, at this moment, every mind was anxious and fearful for the success of the measure; and the meandering speech of Mr. Bagby was listened to with more attention, than the ablest man of the nation could have commanded at the moment. Last night, the scene in the Senate was worth a visit to Washington. It required the intervention of the President to check the applause that was ready to burst out at Col. Benton's declaration against the enemies of Texas. To-day, the scenes in the houses were marked with a degree of interest rarely known. But how glorious the finale!—139 to 76. If you do not carry Virginia in April, after this, you had better surrender at discretion.

You will see the yeas and nays in the papers, or I would send you a copy. I have not time to write you more. Many inquiries are made after you, and surprise expressed about your not coming on.*

But I must conclude. No leakings out about the Cabinet. It is said the names will go into the Senate in a sealed paper, and not known till it is opened.

Even as I write, I fancy I hear the Texas guns going off in Richmond.

*We ought to be thankful to any of our friends for thinking of us, amid the very interesting scenes—the "high matters" (as Edward Burke would call them) by which they are surrounded. But as we wrote to Washington on Saturday, "It is no great matter whether I go or not. You will have great men enough—(we are sure enough, our good natured readers will excuse the jocular tone of the expression.)—to grace the ceremonial—much greater than I can pretend to be, men who have much served the country more efficiently, certainly not more zealously, perhaps not more honestly than I have done.—Be their's the pleasure—their's the pride. I will be content to send two—who naturally have some curiosity to witness the splendid scene, " &c., &c. But this is drawing the curtain too much of domestic life—and to use a favorite, diplomatic epithet of our late Whig friends of the Virginia Legislature, we “forbear.” One suggestion we beg leave most respectfully to submit to our friends in Washington, in this form, instead of presenting it in person;--The agitating question of Texas now settled, we have only one other great difficulty in our way. Of course, we mean the Tariff—and upon that great question the South will never "forbear"—never flinch—never desert the duty she owes to herself and to her country. Upon that question, we hope Mr. Polk will be true to the pledges, under which he was elected—pledges, as solemnly made at the Baltimore Convention, as they were made in regard to Texas. On this subject, we renew now, at this most important and accepted time, the pledge, and in the same spirit which was breathed in the sixth resolution of the Legislative Convention, "to raise the consecrated banner, and battle under it until we succeed." “Texas and the Tariff well settled,—to go on with expressions of our Washington letter)—with an honest and virtuous and able Statesman at the head of our affairs—surrounded by an accomplished Cabinet—who will not burn incense to the vanity of the office, but will boldly tell him the truth, and we shall have smooth seas for two years or more to come, until at least the question of the succession may come up. For one, I solemnly vow, that I will keep aloof from it as long as I can— as I earnestly advise you to do. Our country calls upon us to serve her now—not mere men.” These are the truths, the only truths which we would have expressed to our friends in Washington, if we were there, and if we could have ventured to interweave such grave reflections with the gay spectacle which is now exhibited among the thousands who throng the Capitol.

To the Editors of the Enquirer

I write you this evening from within a few feet of the Hall of the House of Representatives, where the scene I anticipated in my letter of last evening is going on.

When the Senate re-assembled last night, they immediately took up the Texas Resolutions as amended, and the minority tried all possible plans to defeat them by motions for adjournment—yeas and noes on frivolous amendments, &c.

Among others, Mr. Miller of New Jersey proposed Mr. Benton's bill, by itself, as a substitute; when Mr. B. asked him "if he fancied he was out catching snow birds?" Mr. Miller then made a pathetic appeal to the Senator from Missouri not to kill his own child. Whereupon Mr. Benton with great warmth exclaimed aye, that "I will—kill it stone dead!—stone dead!"

The Federalists, seeing the futility of further attempts to defeat the wish of the majority, then submitted, and the Texas resolutions were carried by a majority of two votes. Every Republican, and three Whigs voting in favor of the measure.

In the House, when the morning hour had expired, all sorts of subterfuges were resorted to by our opponents to prevent action on this question, but without avail. It was taken up in spite of them; and for the last two hours, Messrs. Barnard and Winthrop, backed by the elegant Mr. Washington Hunt of New York, and his "babashilie" Schenk of Ohio, are moving heaven and earth to stave off action on the question. Appeals from the decision of the Chair—motions to adjourn and calls of the House, on all of which yeas and nays are demanded, are the weapons applied by Federalism to defeat the will of the people on the question of annexation. I feel well satisfied that by midnight the resolutions as amended will have passed the House; for, at every succeeding call, the factionists are losing strength.

Our Democratic friends, to a man, are voting together. The are no divisions now. The party stand, as they should, shoulder to shoulder, under the broad banner of annexation. What a blow is this re-union to the hopes of Federalism!—"Like the last rose of summer," there prospects of breaking down Col. Polk’s administration "are faded and gone;" for they based those prospects on the probability of a split in our ranks.

HALF-PAST 6, P.M.

The Resolutions, as amended, have passed by fifty-six majority. What think you of that?—“Dick” Davis and Mr. Hale were the only men elected as Democrats who voted against them.—Davis is the person whose barber shop prophecies last winter (that Col. Polk could not get the vote of New York,) made such a noise. He has been consistently against us ever since. Mr. Hale has made so much noise in the House that all the world knows who he is. The Whigs voting with us on Brown’s Resolutions alone flew the track. Stephens of Georgia, however, was absent. Federalism had too strong a hold on them.

Guns are firing—Republicans are rejoicing—and those who secretly wished Britain success during the last war—who now would rather see her institutions than our’s the law of this land—alone mourn the consummation of annexation. Yours truly. –

Washington City, March 1st

To the Editors of the Enquirer

I wrote you last night in a very hurried manner, giving a brief account of the proceeding son the Texas question up to the final triumph of the Republican party on its great measure of state—the House sat very late and passed the naval appropriation bill, on feature of which gives great offence to the very many junior officers of that branch of the service, who are daily to be found in the lobbies of Congress. It provides, that no promotion shall be made to the rank of Commodore, until the number in service shall be reduced to sixty-five—they now number ninety-five—and the candidates fear that twenty years will elapse ere the overplus die off. The House also worked half way through the army appropriation bill. The Senate sat late and were principally engaged on House bills. They concurred in the amendments made by the House to the Post Office bill. I have paid very little attention to-day to the proceedings of either branch of Congress, as, with the exception of a bill in the Senate “in regard to the claims of American citizens on Mexico,” little was done of interest to your readers.

The President of the United States has, in all probability, already signed the joint resolutions for the annexation of Texas; and, if Almonte has not asked his passports, it is generally believed he will do so on Monday. Where will he go? Not to Mexico, you may rest assured; for, the party in power there would ask no better fun than to put their hands on him. He is as odious at home as Rejon himself; for Santa Anna had no more reliable man than Senor Almonte. If he stays in Washington until after the 4th, and then travels that road, he will have to be the bearer of news to his Government even more unpalatable than those announcing the consummation of annexation; I mean of the passage of the bill before the Senate, to which I refer above; or of another, to the same effect, more prompt in its requirements, and decided in its character, if possible. This bill, after setting forth the delays and subterfuges to which Mexico has resorted to avoid paying claims acknowledged as just, demands that she shall at once come to a settlement as per her former agreement; and provides, that if she delays, the President of the United States shall appoint a Board of three Commissioners, to hold their sessions in Washington, for the adjudication of the claims; and then our Government hall forthwith proceed to force payment.

Both parties in the Senate will stand up to this bill, which the conduct of Mexico renders so necessary; you have doubtless seen a paragraph going the rounds of the Whig papers, upon the subject of payment of the last enstalment ($275,000) due from Mexico to our Government.—They say, that it was repaid to Santa Anna by our agent, as a bribe form this Government, to smother his opposition to annexation! Even the Intelligencer, with all its claims to propriety, truthfulness and fair dealing, copied it in such a manner as to impress its readers with a belief of the truth of the statement. Mind ye this was to work as spoke in Federalism’s wheel of opposition to Texas. The Editors of the Intelligencer can plead no fair excuse for their semi-endorsement of this their last, slander upon the Government of the United States; for in five minutes they could have obtained any information upon the subject form the State department, necessary to refute this story.
Here are the circumstances of the case, as they were told me to-day, by a gentleman upon whom I can rely. The firm of Harzons & Co., in Vera Cruz and New York, and Vosa & Co., in Mexico, are agents of our Government for receiving the money already stipulated to be paid by Mexico to the United States. Trigoeros, Santa Anna’s late Secretary of the Treasury, is a principal partner of these firms. With one hand, as Santa Anna’s fiscal agent he paid the last installment ($275,000) into the other, with which he wrote the receipt as agent of the U.S. Government. The money found its way into his own pocket, and he has absquatulated along with the rest of his master’s Ministers, whose heads are not safe on their own shoulders if caught within the Republic of Mexico. Santa Anna’s robberies of the Treasury of his own Government, furnished him with an illustrious precedent for this robbery of ours. Our Treasury suffers by this financial “operation” for you will remember he was sufficiently patriotic to give his own Government a receipt for the money as U.S. agent. This Congress will be forced to appropriate the sum stolen, the United States being responsible for it to the claimants.

The Federalists stared aghast, at the late vote, in both branches of Congress, on the Texas question. Notwithstanding the failure of all their previous attempts to produce disunion in the Republican ranks, they had fondly hoped that those who differed somewhat from the main body of the party, (as to the best terms for annexation,) would stand off, and become permanently estranged from their old political friends. They had hoped to profit by the “split,” to every great extent; and at this moment are not half so much distressed at the passage of the resolutions as at the “re-union,” which permits the President elect to begin the exercise of his functions with a party to sustain him, who stand most firmly knit together by a common devotion to the great principles inscribed on the banner of Democracy. At no time during the administration of Jefferson and Jackson were their supporters more of one mind on each and every important measure of State in issue between the parties—Nor were they ever more keenly alive to the importance of presenting an unbroken front to the enemies of the cause of liberal principles. This the Federalists here, see, know, and feel most deeply; for, they may be heard, in all public places about town, cursing roundly at the adhereness so natural to those who fight for great principles, and for these alone.

It is but due to Judge Bayly of Virginia to say, that to no man more than to himself, belongs the credit of having carried through this important measure in such a manner as not only to harmonize all bitterness and jealousy among our friends, but at the same time to guard and protect the momentous interests of the South therein. His bearing during the entire time the question was before Congress, now that it is so happily settled, receives much praise from almost every Republican of the Senate and House. His industry, caution, self-possession, firmness, and withal, his frank conciliatory spirit, as displayed during the late trying times, were the subject of conversation to-day among seven of the most distinguished of our friends in the House—with whom I chanced to be for the moment.

These gentlemen were from different sections of the country—no two from the same State. And in roaming over the attempts to distract the party, the heart-burnings arising from misconceptions of views and feelings, and the efforts once or twice made to drag our friends into submission, to the views of first one and then another—his prompt exposure of the tricks of our adversaries—his efforts to reconcile estranged political friends, and his manly resistance to distraction, form any and every quarter, were referred to, as having most happily contributed to the final settlement of the question, upon terms uniting the whole party in its support.

A lithographed picture—a beautiful thing—was received this morning at the Post Office of the H. of Representatives for distribution among those members who voted against the Annexation of Texas, on the ever memorable 25th of January, 1845. It was an abolition offering of praise and gratitude to those gentlemen who thereby had rendered such important services to the cause of Loyd Garrison & Co. Ishal not describe it minutely; but will mention that among the names of heroes, statesmen, and philanthropists, inscribed on the wreath, Santa Anna’s stood out boldly such important services to the cause of Loyd Garrison & Co. Ishal not describe it minutely; but will mention that among the names of heroes, statesmen, and philanthropists, inscribed on the wreath, Santa Anna’s stood out boldly. It was an abolition offering of praise and gratitude to those gentlemen who thereby had rendered such important services to the cause of Loyd Garrison & Co. It was an abolition offering of praise and gratitude to those gentlemen who thereby had rendered such important services to the cause of Loyd Garrison & Co.

When I came to the names of the Federalist of Virginia—Summers, Goggin and Chilton, and of those of North Carolina, Rayner, Clingman, Deberry and Barringer, my blood ran cold within me. It was too much to bear with any degree of patience. When these men return to their constituents, and attempt, with their lawyer cuteness at special pleading, to convince them that they have discharge their duties on this questions, as Representatives from the south, let this picture be held up before them, dedicated by the abolitionists as a testimony of their gratitude and respect, won by the course of these Southern men on a question of more vital importance to the South than any that has agitated the country since the admission of Missouri as a State.

Commend the Poisoned Chalice to their own Lips!

The people of Virginia will remember, among the other numerous shameless humbugs of the Whigs, during the last Presidential Campaign, the Disunion Humbug. They attempted to ring as many changes upon it as the six bellringers, with their 42 bells. They attempted to intimidate the people with their panic notes, that South Carolina was bent upon the dissolution of the Union—that the Republicans of the Sough were embarked in the same conspiracy—that Colonel Polk was the selected leader of the traitors—and that his election would seal the fate of the Union. The have quoted, however, deserves more than ordinary condemnation. If there is one thing more than another that bitter language of opposition, if not zealously engaged in promoting their old plans of disunion. Such language as we
"The Federal leaders of to-day, on account of the expected annexation of a splendid territory, are using their old combination, first to rule the whole, and if that should prove impracticable, to separate from the rest—has been so ready to rally about such a banner? Are they ready to embark in open resistance to the LAWS OF THE LAND?
"But take the words as they stand, and what do they mean? They invite the people of Massachusetts to resist a law made until the leaders think the pear shall be ripe?
"Does it mean that the people of Massachusetts, acting in their inherent right, shall throw off the Federal Government? In other words, do what the Declaration of Independence declares a people have a right to do. That they have the right to alter and abolish government whenever and wherever they please, is, unquestionably, the doctrine of the revolution. If the Legislature mean to take this ground, or, is other words, to plant themselves on the great national right of revolution, then another question comes up, whether the causes are sufficient to justify such a movement. But this ground is disclaimer by the Whig party. While its every movement appears upon its face to have been designed to effect a dissolution of the Union, it still repudiates such an intention. Is the disclaimer only made until the leaders think the pear shall be ripe?
"But in all this the federalism of to-day but imitates the federalism of a former period. If it has been inconsistent in argument, advocating and opposing one and the same doctrine, as the expediency of the time seemed to dictate, it has been consistent in its purposes. These have been to gain political power at any end every hazard—to rule or ruin. In 1798 it declared that if Jefferson was made President, the constitution, the country and the bible would share the same fate. Facts show that all through hi administration, "certain leaders" did what they could to make this prediction true. They declared the Louisiana purchase of no binding force, and negotiated to establish a new confederacy. They declared the embargo laws of no binding force, and practiced open resistance to them—the federal legislature even going so far as to pass an act making the enforcement of some of the provisions of this law criminal, and attaching penalties to a violation of this State act. They declared the requisition of the Congress pass an act admitting Texas into this Union, such act "WILL HAVE NO BINDING FORCE WHATEVER ON THE PEOPLE OF MASSACHUSETTS."
"Words are said to be things. The Whig majority of the Massachusetts Legislature have solemnly resolved, that if Congress pass an act admitting Texas into this Union, such act "WILL HAVE NO BINDING FORCE WHATEVER ON THE PEOPLE OF MASSACHUSETTS."

"THE TEXAS RESOLVES: ANCIENT AND MODERN FEDERALISM.

"Resolved, That there has hitherto been no precedent of an admission of a foreign State or foreign Territory into the Union by legislation. And as the powers of legislation granted in the Constitution of the United States, to Congress, do not embrace a case of the admission of a foreign State or foreign Territory, by legislation, into the Union, SUCH AN ACT OF ADMISSION WILL HAVE NO BINDING FORCE WHATSOEVER ON THE PEOPLE OF MASSECHUSETTS."

"Does it mean that the Whig majority of the Massachusetts Legislature have solemnly resolved, that if Congress pass an act admitting Texas into this Union, such act "WILL HAVE NO BINDING FORCE WHATEVER ON THE PEOPLE OF MASSACHUSETTS." This language is either trifling, or it is disorganizing. But first, it is not to be supposed that the men who compose the majority of this Legislature would pass a series of resolves to merely trifle with their time or with the money of the people. If not trifling, then, secondly, these legislators have here done what they could, and all they could, to raise a spirit of opposition to government that, hereafter, may not "down at their bidding." Here the legally constituted authorities of Massachusetts have deliberately and solemnly declared, that if the similarly constituted legal authorities of the Union shall enact a certain law, this law "will have no binding force whatever on the people!" What does this mean?

"But take the words as they stand, and what do they mean? They invite the people of Massachusetts to resist a law of Congress. Here men priding themselves on their conservative principles—men who have law and order eternally upon their lips—men who are daily charging their political opponents with promoting anarchy; these men unfurl the banner of resistance to a contemplated act of the supreme authority of the country. Are the people of Massachusetts ready to rally about such a banner? Are they ready to embark in open resistance to the LAWS OF THE LAND?

"But in all this the federalism of to-day but imitates the federalism of a former period. If it has been inconsistent in
has been consistent in its purposes. These have been to gain political power at any end every hazard—to rule or ruin. In 1798 it declared that if Jefferson was made President, the constitution, the country and the bible would share the same fate. Facts show that all through hi administration, "certain leaders" did what they could to make this prediction true. They declared the Louisiana purchase of no binding force, and negotiated to establish a new confederacy. They declared the embargo laws of no binding force, and practiced open resistance to them—the federal legislature even going so far as to pass an act making the enforcement of some of the provisions of this law criminal, and attaching penalties to a violation of this State act. They declared the requisition of the United States for its militia to defend the country of no binding force; and not only refused compliance with it, but to embarrass the Democratic administration, endeavored to engage Connecticut and Rhode Island in a similar course of disorganization—and, with shame be it said, the federal Judges even supported the federal Governor, (Strong) and his factious legislature. Does anyone with to see the key to all this open opposition? John Adams has got it among his papers. It was the aim of the federal leaders, he says, first to rule and if they failed, then to dissolve the Union.—
In a letter to Gov. Plumer, of New Hampshire, dated August 16, 1809, written on the banks of Newfoundland, Mr.
Adams says—

"The plan of a New England combination, more closely cemented than by the ties of the Federal Government—a combination, first to rule the whole, and if that should prove impracticable, to separate from the rest—has been so far matured, and has engaged the studies, the intrigues and ambition of so many leading men in our part of the country, that I think it will produce mischievous consequences unless seasonably and effectually discountenanced by men of more influence and comprehensive views."

"The Federal leaders of to-day, on account of the expected annexation of a splendid territory, are using their old bitter language of opposition, if not zealously engaged in promoting their old plans of disunion. Such language as we
distinguishes a good citizen, it is obedience to law. If there is one thing more than another that deserves the severest condemnation, it is the inflammatory language that not only invites but commands disobedience to law. Such is the terrible language of these violent resolves.—They receive the most hearty welcome from the most fanatic abolitionists. They should receive the withering rebuke of every good citizen and true patriot.”

Now, people of Virginia, mark! Not a syllable have we seen escape any Whig Press, in reprobation of this disorganizing resolution from Massachusetts. If we attempt to defeat the Whigs in their unholy office of cramming an anti-Texas, a Tariff Whig, for six years down the thoughts of 6,000 majority of the people of Virginia, then it is we hear from their fiery lips the cry of our being “disorganizing, ” “revolutionary,” &c., &c.—But whenever their own cronies in Massachusetts threaten to withdraw from the Union, if Texas be annexed to it, why then, they are as “dumb as oysters.” Such are the humbugging Whigs!

Another Whig Humbug!

Our readers have not forgotten, of course, the British Gold Humbug—how it was circulated in every form—proclaimed in every Whig newspaper—announced by every Whig slangwhanger from the stump—thrown into an Election handbill, just before the election, by the “Sole Author,” (now honored by a seat in the Executive Council, from which John Rutherford was removed in compliment to his (Mr. Daniels) pretensions.) Well, what has become of that humbug? Dead as King Harry the 8th—almost hissed off the stage, after it had stalked its busy hour upon it. We proclaimed at the moment, that the statement form the London Times, on which it was erected, was a forgery and a fraud; but the true history of the transaction has just leaked out, to stamp its authors with additional infamy. One, who was then connected with “The Republic,” a New York newspaper, has come forward to certify that it was forged by one of the officers of a Clay Club in the city of New York, to humbug an enlightened people. Thanks be to a gracious Providence, and thanks be to a “sober, second though” people, all these humbugs were of no avail—and James K. Polk, instead of Henry Clay, was yesterday sworn into office as the President of the United States, by the voice of an enlightened people. Had Harry of the West been yesterday carried into power, we might well have trembled for the very liberties of the country. Power thus obtained, by a desperate party, and wielded by a bold and arrogant man, would have been certainly most grossly abused. The party, which acquires power by such abuses, is sure to abuse the power thus acquired. Never had the American people more cause for gratulation, than they have for the glorious events of yesterday. [MLD] are devoted to the interests of the Republican party—and we trust, they will assiduously devote themselves to the support of its principles, and the best service of their country. They have our cordial wishes for their success—and Mr. Polk, our anxious hopes for the glory of his Administration.

The Washington Correspondent of the "Philadelphia United States Gazette," (Oliver Old school) refers in his letter of the 2nd instant to the difficulties which Mr. Polk must have had in organizing his Cabinet—and portrays some of the heart burnings, which it is pleased to imagine, among the friends of Messrs. Calhoun and Van Buren. E know not how this may be. We all have our favorites—and they (the Whigs) have been pleased to say, that we have ours. We are not ashamed to "own the soft impeachment." We were desirious to see one gentleman in that Cabinet, whose name we do not see there, because we believed him eminently calculated for the Executive service. But it has pleased Mr. Polk to select other distinguished men. But this we will undertake to say, that no man has been more efficient than he has proved to be in every service to which he has been called.—He would have adorned the highest possible post in the Cabinet—as he is a man of business, acquainted with both men and things, prompt in decision, energetic in action—who would scorn to burn incense to the vanity of the highest office, whilst he would dare to speak, what men in power, generally, so much want, the truth, even when it is the most unpleasant—As he proved himself the frank, enlightened, and efficient friend of General Jackson, so we had hoped that Mr. Polk would have found it consistent with his public duties to call him to his side. He has deemed it best, however, to make another disposition of the seals of office,—and we do not hesitate to say, that the gentleman in question will do his duty to himself, to his party, and to his country. ANTI-TEXAS WHIGS

The Whig presses of New York are taken all aback by the news of the annexation of Texas—It is impossible for them to conceal, or for us to describe, the agony of their disappointment. If, as the New York Express says, we "have been lifted out of the very cave of despair, into the perfect fruition of Paradise," we can only return the compliment by saying, that the Express has sunk into that cave from which we have been lifted—and that there is scarcely a "deeper Hell" into which it could possibly descend.

The New York Tribune adopts a still more reprehensible and disgraceful tone. It denounces one of its recent favorites, Merrick of Maryland, as "the purchased traitor of Maryland!" It has the folly to exclaim:

"Yes, the mischief is done, and we are now involved in war! We have adopted a war ready made, and taken upon ourselves its prosecution to the end. We are to furnish the bodies to fill trenches and the cash to defray its enormous expense."

With almost a traitor's spirit, it appears to egg on Great Britain to war with us, on account of Texas. Hear the maniac:

"If, therefore, Great Britain should see fit to stand up for the feeble and unoffending people on whom we are making war, she will be but obeying the instinct of self-preservation. By our proceedings in getting possession of Texas, we have declared ourselves the enemies of the civilized world, or only restrained from becoming such by the lowest considerations of self-interest. Surely, there must come a reckoning for this. If those who are driving us on to untold expenditure and carnage were themselves to pay the taxes and stop the bullets, it would be a different matter."

We leave such a journalist to the scorn and indignation of the country.

For the Enquirer

Having seen two articles in the Richmond Whig, in reference to the correspondence between Dr. John R. Taylor and Col. Billups, I was somewhat surprised at the non-committal course pursued by Colonel Billups relating to the instructions received by that gentlemen from a majority of the legally qualified voters of the election district of Mathews and Middlesex, which [...] has the honor to represent, by the accidental [...]prise that I felt, was considerably heightened [...] the fact, that Col. B. last Spring expressed himself as believing in the right of instructions [...] as a matter of course, I concluded that he th[...], it the duty of the representative to obey, when [...] could do so without a violation of his constitutional oath, and, should his obedience conflict his mind with that oath, that then it was his duty to resign.

Until towards the latter part of the session of the Legislature, I was pleased with the vote given by our representative, and concluded that he would continue to carry out the wishes of both the Whigs and Democrats of Mathews and Middlesex, and regretted very much, that when the vote was taken upon the Senate's amendment of the resolution of the House, expressing the constitutionality of annexing Texas by a joint resolution of Congress,
Colonel Billups should have voted against the amendment, and thus by his vote, showing us he was opposed to the annexation of Texas, notwithstanding, before his election, he had declared himself in favor of Texas, and went so far as to pledge himself to vote against Henry Clay, should he come out against the annexation of that delightful country. After Mr. Clay's letters m[...] their appearance, Col. An answer from Col. Billups, stating that he was willing to obey the voice of a large majority of his constituents, would have ensured us a Senator to carry out the wishes of the people of Virginia, as expressed last Fall by a majority [...] 6,000 freemen. But no; rather than throw an obstacle in the way of those two traitors to the South—Rives and Archer—the annexation of Texas must be defeated—although John Quincy Adams, and his Abolition friends of the Nor[...] were willing to go for it, but for strengthen[...] the Southern States—and thus give them a be[...] change to crush the institution of slavery, guaranteed to us by the Constitution—and then [...] glorious Union, whose flag ought to be waving over every sea, with the addition of the lone star of the sunny South, will be rent asunder by the chilling gales of Northern abolitionists, and [...] proud eagle of America will be trampled under the feet of the British lion, whose ambition is as insatiable as the ravenous vulture.

With these facts before us will it be believed that Col. John R. Billups would suffer party feeling, notwithstanding his previous pledges in favor of Texas, to cause him to do aught to defend the glorious consummation of the happy union that have ever existed form the creation of the world—whose stars, if united, would form a constellation whose refugene would illuminate the world, and guide mankind on to freedom[...] should they be hurled from the firmament, when they now shine so brightly, then will darkness and blood cover the face of the earth. We have dissensions now in our ranks, in [...] thews: two Democratic candidates in the field [...] This will never do. Let us try and harmonize and unite upon one man. The Whigs have but one candidate, and why should we have tow! We have 37 majority in the two counties; and shall we again be misrepresented by a Whig, [...] who has shown himself opposed to Texas? The Oregon Negotiation

The following information, copied from the New York Courier and Enquirer of Thursday last, is highly interesting at the present juncture in public affairs—Nat. Int.

"We referred yesterday to the favorable account given in a recent message of the President of the amicable spirit in which this negotiation has been conducted.

"Since then we learn, upon authority entitled to the most implicit reliance, that, in the event of a failure on the part of the negotiators at Washington to agree upon the respective rights of the parties, the British Government have suggested the reference of the whole question to the arbitration of any European Sovereign, to be designated by the Government of the United States, agreeing to abide by his award.

"With such an offer this nation must close, unless we be prepared to assert our extremist claims at every hazard, without regard to the claims of others, and in utter contempt of the moral sense of the world."
"It must therefore be assumed as certain, that the Oregon question will be amicably adjusted, and that in no event, therefore, can any misunderstanding occur with England in relation to it."

Dispatches to Texas

Floyd Wagaman, Esq., will leave the city this afternoon to deliver to Maj. Donelson, temporarily at Nashville, the Joint Resolution for the admission of Texas into the Union, which was signed by the President of the United States on Saturday. Should it be found that our Charge has left Nashville, the bearer of dispatches has been directed to proceed immediately himself to Texas—Madisonian, March, 3.

At Baltimore on Saturday last, one hundred guns were fired from Federal Hill, in honor of the passage, by Congress, of the resolutions uniting the "Lone Star" to the glorious constellation of our happy Union.

Mr. Baptist's Speech, on the election of Senator, has been crowed out by more pressing engagements. The Legislature and Congress being now dispersed, and Texas, the all-engrossing question of the day, begin as we hope, settled, we shall have more sea-room for other communications, as soon as we have published two or three speeches, connected with that important subject. Mr. B's speech will receive the earliest attention. [MLD]

Mr. Merrick of Maryland

For yielding to the impulse of duty, above all party considerations, Mr. Merrick has been denounced by the Whig press as a traitor, bought and sold, to vote for Texas. It is unnecessary for us to defend him. He must despise the empty denunciation. Every one sees that it is the spiteful spirit of the baffled Whigs, which is attempting to wreak its vengeance upon him.—But there is at least one Whig press, which can do Mr. Merrick justice—and that is, the "New Orleans Bulletin," which holds the following language on the 3d inst.:

"Mr. Merrick, Whig Senator in Congress from the State of Maryland, on the 21st ult., made a bold and full declaration of his sentiments with regard to the annexation of Texas. Spurning all minor considerations, he came out like a true man and a patriot in support of the measure, as of national and paramount concern. We hail this noble and manly movement as an auspicious sign. Does it not warrant the hope that other Senators, whose votes have been thought to be doubtful, have been moved by the magnanimous example of Mr. Merrick, and that the country will be spared the anxiety and agitation of further deylay? Of course we cannot count on the Riveses, the Archers, the Berriens, or the Barrows, who have committed themselves irrevocably; but Judge Johnson surely will not follow the stupid lead of his colleague. We believe his vote may be reckoned on."

The Mexican Minister
Signor Almonte, it is said, will demand his passports the moment the Texas Bill is signed, and Mexico will declare war. That the Signor would return home was anticipated. His friend, Santa Anna, has involved all his faithful followers in his troubles, but we doubt the war portion of the rumor; unless, indeed, the invitation of our own citizens or journalists to Mexico go to war with us I deemed a sufficient warrant. If, without the shade of a shadow of cause, Mexico is induced to take that rash step, annexation with Mexico, Texas and the United States extends our republic over nearly the Whole of North America. A United States squadron will made its appearance in the Gulf in a few days, and every privateer under the Mexican flag cruising against our, commerce, the crew of which does not contain two-thirds of native born Mexican seamen, will be deemed pirates according to the law of nations and suffer accordingly. So we may safely say to all interested, “stand form under.”

Amusing

Besides abusing Mr. Merrick for voting for Annexation, the newspapers opposed to the measure, are also hurling their denunciations against Mr. Bagby, of Alabama, for giving his vote in its favor, though the people of his State decidedly approve of it, and made annexation one of the issues at the last election. The most amusing thing, however, is that fact, that those who, a year or two ago, argued strongly for the abolition of he veto power, as a most arbitrary and dangerous prerogative, have suddenly discovered that it is decidedly conservative, and urge President Tyler to apply it in the Texas business. Nothing is so likely to make men inconsistent as the abandonment of fixed principles, and suffering their views of Governmental policy and public affairs to be determined by their feelings.

For the Enquirer.

To Robert J. Walker, Esq, Secretary of the Treasury

Sir—I am your political, and I dare to add your personal friend, although I have scarcely the honor of your private acquaintance. In yesterday’s Enquirer, there is a rapid sketch on your life and your services, which is calculated to make a very favorable impression upon the public mind. I recognize in you one of the first champions, who brought Gen. Jackson to the public notice, as a candidate for the Presidential chair. I admire you especially for your devotion to the cause of Texas. Upon that subject, you have the highest claim upon the gratitude of the U. States as well as of Texas. If the Republic of the “Lone Star” voted you a statue in 1837, for your services in her cause, no man will dispute your pretensions as the present time. NO man has done more for her than Ro. J. Walker; no man has done more to bring her back into the Union, not even excepting the Hero of the Hermitage himself—no man better deserves your reward—and lo, you have it, in part, in the distinguished office which you have received in the Cabinet of Mr. Polk.

You are now the Secretary of the Treasury, and that important office calls you to the highest duties which falls within the scope of the Executive power. You have assisted in settling the question of Texas. But there is one of their important measure to adjust, and if you are equally successful in disposing of the Tariff, as you have been on the subject of Texas, you will again receive the thanks of your country. Mr. Polk will have, then, it is to be hoped, a smooth sea to navigate. The Republican Party will be better united, and the country more tranquil than it has been for several years past. But I will not disguise from you the fact, that the measurer is as difficult in itself, as the result may be glorious ot yourself. You must bring to its consideration as much firmness as discretion—as much correct theory as copious details—as profound a sense of what is due to the obligations of public faith, as to the interests of a suffering people. Are you prepared to do your duteies in this spirit, or to temporize away our rights, and fritter way your own character? As your friends and still more the friend of our country, I sincerely wish you every success and every qualification which could belong to a Gallatin or a McLane.

I would warn you against too much confidence in present appearances. The South is now seemingly quiet. But it is like Vesuvius, before the volcano bursts forth. She is indignant at the oppressions under which she is now laboring. She will never rest satisfied with the act of ’42.—She has it held her wrath, because she has been plunged in all the excitement of a Presidential Election. She has been struggling to elect a President, who would assist her in obtaining justice and relief. No sooner did she succeed in this object, than the great controversy about Texas came on—and though many of her sons demanded immediate action upon both these questions, yet it soon became obvious, that there was no time to carry both objects at the late session of Congress. The Tariff admitted of more delay than Texas—and to this last question, therefore, they ultimately concentrated all their exertions. But Texas now carried, you may expect the Tariff cause to be called up from the docket—and the ablest advocates devoted to its prosecution. Even South Carolina consented to waive its rights, until the Presidency first, and then Texas, were decided. South Carolina, oppressed as she has been, betrayed by a violation of the public faith, as pledged in the Compromise act, was willing to pause for a time. But you cannot expect her to slumber forever. Virginia, and all the South, will unite with her in demanding justice at the hands of the next Congress.

I need not remind you, Mr. Walker, that the present "bill of abominations" was the illegitimate offspring of necessity. The Treasury was impoverished and in debt, and the friends of Mr. Clay refused to give any relief to the Government without severely taxing the South for the benefit of the Northern manufactures. You recollect the whole history of the odious transaction, and you manfully stood up on your place in the Senate, and voted against the bill of 1842. It was carried, you know, by a majority of one only. You heard Mr. Rives denouncing it as worse in many respects than the abominable act of '28, and as completely prostrating the Compromise Act of '33. In what spirit it was received by the Republican Party of the South, it is scarcely necessary for me to say. The following extracts from the Richmond Enquirer of August 26, and September 2d, 1842, may not, however, be altogether out of place:

"But this bill, this new 'Bill of Abominations,' is too oppressive to be borne. It is not a Revenue bill, but a Protective bill, and it therefore violates the spirit and intention of the compromise act of '33. It disturbs the 'public faith.' It infringes the 'treaty of amity and peace.' It cuts off many of the articles of importation on which duties ought to be laid, and revenue collected. It prohibits them for the benefit of the domestic monopolist, and revives the odious system of protection, in one of its most oppressive forms. It is, therefore, contrary to the spirit and principle of the compromise act; and, therefore, the whole South, the whole agricultural and commercial interest, should make war upon it, the moment it shall be thrust upon the Statute Book. The South must be roused, and Virginia will be the first to raise the standard of opposition to this fraudulent and iniquitous measure. We appeal to the Senate for assistance. We appeal even to the moderate Whigs for co-operation. Surely, the Southern Senators have not entirely forgotten the great lessons they have learned in days of yore. Surely they have not abandoned every principle which they once professed. Surely, they have their own consistency as much at heart, as the ambitious interests of their Federal leader."

"The Globe gives us a very copious Report of the very interesting Debate, which took place in the Senate on Saturday last on the Tariff bill—It occupies nearly one broadside of the Journal—but, extensive as it is, we shall attempt to lay it all before our readers, as giving the views of different Senators, and the reasons which compelled them to vote for the obnoxious measure, and as shedding some light on their future course.—The Tariff bill received the votes of four Democrats, viz: Messrs. Buchanan, Sturgeon, Wright, and Williams, (of Maine.) Without their vote, one or more of the Whigs, who voted against the bill, would have been compelled to show their true colors, and vote on the others die, to save the bill. If the vote of the Democrats had been withheld, and the bill had failed, we understand, that the bill would have enlisted more of the Whig votes on its behalf.

"The four Democrats voted for the bill with great reluctance—Three of them, (Buchanan, Williams and Wright,) with a protestando. The full report in the Globe gives us their speeches.—They will be found extremely interesting. Mr. Buchanan assigns the alternatives between which he had to choose—(the saving of the public lands the securing of a revenue to the Treasury with out litigation with the merchants, and the saving of certain manufacturing interests—and the voting for a bill which he does not approve, for which he says, he 'would not vote, were it not for the unparalleled condition of the existing law, the treasury and the country'—a bill, which he pronounces to be 'extravagant in the protection it affords and, in some instances, is all together prohibitory.' He 'accepts it now, as much the least of two evils, and looks forward with hope to better times for an adjustment of the Tariff, on a scale more consonant with the all great and various interests of the Union, without sections.'

"With every disposition in the world to threat with every liberality gentlemen who have hitherto distinguished themselves in the Democratic ranks, yet we beg leave most respectfully to say, that we shall hold them to the letter and spirit of their averments—that we shall never rest satisfied until this 'bill of abominations' is expunged from the Statute Book, or completely changed in its enactments—and that we shall count upon Messrs. Buchanan, Sturgeon, Wright, and Williams, to co-operate with us, and take the cross upon their own shoulders. Repeat! Repeat!! is now the word. We must get back to the spirit and the principle of the Compromise Act—to which the public faith is pledged—and which was in '33 the 'treaty of Amity and Peace'—or the South never will be satisfied—NEVER! It is in vain that Senator White, on the 27th August, congratulates the Whig Committee of Philadelphia 'on the passage by both Houses of a permanent Tariff bill.' Permanent it cannot be. Permanent, the revenues of the country will not permit it to be—Permanent, the interests of the manufacturers themselves will not permit it to be—Permanent, the interests for the agricultural and commercial interests—the rights of the whole South will not suffer it to be. Everything forbids it, except the factious purposes of he Clay Clique."

You, Sir, voted against the bill. It was understood, on all hands, during the last campaign, that Mr. Polk was vehemently opposed to its iniquities. He disclaimed it in his speech to the people of Madison and adjoining counties in April, 1843, and declared that “the difference between the Federal and the Republican parties is whilst they are the advocates of Distribution and a Protective Tariff—measures which we consider ruinous to the interests of the country, and especially to the interests of the Planting, States we have steadily and at all times opposed both.” I have no fear that Mr. Polk will not carry out the pledges under which he was elected. I cannot permit myself to doubt, that you will discharge your duties with an eye to these considerations.

The subject, however, is as complicated in some of its aspects, as it is important in others. May I then respectfully suggest, sir, the propriety of collecting information, as soon as possible, to assist you in guiding your course? Mr. McLane, your collect, was the Secretary of Treasury in 1832. The excitement was rising to its height in S. Carolina. Every body saw that something must be done to appease the public discontent. Gen. Jackson was the first to see it, and determined as far as he could to relieve the people. Congress was about to take up the subject.
A call was made upon the Secretary for a Tariff bill. He replied at once, Give me time, and you shall have one.

The delay being granted, Mr. McLane addressed a Circular to gentlemen in the most important points of the country, to obtain information on the trade and manufactures of all—to ascertain what articles would admit of reduction—what duties should be imposed. The mass of information he received in reply was extensive and valuable. Upon this species of statistics, he founded the bill, afterwards called Verplanek’s bill—Mr. V. being Chairman of the Committee on Finance. It was the prospect of passing this bill, by the force of Gen. Jackson’s name, that alarmed Mr. Clay into his celebrated Compromise Act—celebrated not more for the solemn pledges, which Mr. Clay gave at the time, than the shameless treachery with which he has subsequently violated them.

But I submit a similar course for your imitation. The mass of answers to Mr. McLane’s Circular is now in your Department. May I suggest to your consideration, that you hunt them up, examine them carefully, and send forth a similar Circular, to collect the same information—to direct your own course: and to enable you to report a similar bill, with the mass of statistics on which it is founded, to the next Congress?—Thus you will proceed with full information before you; and Congress will act with more promptitude decision and wisdom.

MR. CALHOUN

This distinguished gentleman reached Richmond in yesterday’s cars. He dined with some of his friends at the Exchange Hotel, and present the evening with one of his acquaintances. He leaves the city to-day in the mid-day cars for his home in South Carolina.

We were happy to see Mr. Calhoun in better health, with excellent spirits, and blessed with great equanimity of temper—and retiring with the most courteous feeling towards Mr. Polk and his administration. We rejoice to have met at the same table with Gen. Lamar, the Ex-President of Texas, who is on his way to that Republic—with the kindliest feelings towards the annexation of Texas. We can entertain little doubt, that Texas will come into the Union under the Resolution of the House of Representatives, and thus the Pandora’s box will be closed forever.

We understand that Mr. Almonte’s letter demanding his passports, had been received by our Government, and that probably the first letter which Mr. Buchanan had written, as Secretary of State, was in reply to Mr. Almonte—and that this letter does great credit to him in the new honors which he wears.

FROM MEXICO

By the arrival at a late hour last night of the brig Abiona, Captain Doane, we have intelligence from Vera Cruz up to the 18th inst., four days later.

Verbally we learn that there was no news of importance stirring. Santa Anna was still in prison at Perote. Letters from the tyrant to different merchants at Vera Cruz, directing them not to give up any money of his in their hands, had been intercepted.

It is stated that the 24th of February had been fixed upon as the time of bringing on the trial of Santa Anna, and he is to send on his defense in writing instead of appearing in person before the Grand Jury.—Courier.

To the Senior Editor

I send you an extract of a letter you addressed me on the 13th of June, 1836. Amongst other things of interest is the following passage, giving a curious anecdote, and showing that your predilection for the annexation of Texas is not of this day only: "I wrote to Mr. V. B. on Thursday about Texas. I gave him a long extract form a letter of T-------- ------ to--------. T. had just dined with Santa Anna on board the independence, and after dinner was left alone with Almonte. The Mexican Secretary had expressed a preference for an intermediate Republic between Mexico and the United States rather than an incorporation of Texas with the United States. But T. showed him, and very justly, too, that Mexico would be in less danger from us, with Texas t our heels, than from the Republic of Texas settling up for herself. The former was not ambitious of conquest; and the good sense of the whole American people would check completely the spirit of acquisition among the Texians themselves—whereas, if they were left to themselves, that active, and restless, and enterprising people would be invited by the mines and treasures of Mexico to new attacks, and would not rest satisfied until they had planted their own standard upon the Capitol of Montezuma. Almonte is said to have been shaken—and it was said, that a Commissioner would be sent to the United States to ask their aid as an umpire in the quarrel. I go for the annexation of Texas. Do not you? I consider it as but getting back the country which Jefferson claimed, and which Adams gave way."

Here is evidence that in 1836 you saw ahead, and made up your opinion—and it is now no after-thought to suit the times.

In the same letter you give Congress also a touch. You say, "Congress will adjourn about the 4th of July. The Surplus Revenue will haunt their last moments with a fearful struggle."—Pretty much as the Harbor and River Bill did the Senate and House, the week before last. Is it not time that this system of legislation should be arrested?

The Danger Averted!

We have received the "Texas National Register," the official paper printed at Washington, the seat of Government in Texas, of the 8th of February. It contains a copy of the documents which were recently submitted to the Senate of Texas, by Mr. Anson Jones, the President of the Republic—embracing the correspondence which has passed between Messrs. Elliot (the British Charge d’Affaires,) and Jones, in March and April last—and also copies of letters which passed between Messrs. Jones and Howard, (Charge of the U.S.,) in August, 1844.—The same No. of this Journal contains some very interesting views of its Editor, upon "The Prospect" before them. We lay these remarks, and the first letter of Mr. Elliott before our readers to show the great responsibility which the Whigs would have assumed, by rejecting the resolutions for annexation. They would have incurred a risk, which might have entirely endangered the acquisition of Texas by the U.S. It appears form these and other document, as the Mobile Register truly remarks, that we were in serious danger of losing the country if the recent Congress of the United States had not acted as promptly as the inters of our country required. Suppose the Whigs had succeeded in defeating the resolutions, how then should we have stood? The Government of Texas would have been exposed to all the intrigues of the British Cabinet. Elliott was plying every argument and the commercial interests of Texas, to persuade them to decline Annexation, to secure their own independence, and pledging the powerful interference of Great Britain with Mexico to accomplish that object. He tells Mr. Jones, in his letter of April last, that it is "the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, that the preservation of his independence is the best security of the people of Texas for the ultimate prosperity, both political and commercial"—that never were there "better founded hopes of an early and honorable adjustment, than at the moment when, as Mr. Jones observes, the door to annexation to the Unites States was unexpectedly opened to the people of this country"—and that Texas need not look to the eminent and practical statesmen in that country for the annexation of Texas to that Union, either at all, or at least under any other condition than the consent of Mexico, peacefully obtained; neither does it seem doubtful judging form the same sources, that these opinions are shared by a large part of the people of that Confederacy."

There is no doubt, if our late Congress had adjourned without adopting the resolutions, we should have left Texas exposed to all the wiles and intrigues of British diplomacy—with her people partially soured by disappointment—and her leading men disposed to listen to the overtures of England. The "Mobile Register" refers to the Editorial article of "The National Register" as "a very significant exposition of the real wishes of President Jones, and hardly less of those of his predecessor, Gen. Houston, whose influences he represents. That Gen. Houston and Mr. Jones were originally opposed to the renewal of negotiations with the United States for annexation, and gave assurances to the British Minister in March of last year—Houston being President and Jones Secretary of States—of their hostility to annexation, is sufficiently apparent from the letter of Mr. Elliott of that date, which is now, for the first time made public. We find it copied into the Galveston News, from the Register, and republish it as an important item in the political history of the times. It will be seen that Capt. Elliott reminds General Houston, of satisfactory personal assurances for hostility to annexation, which have, by Houston's wish, been communicated to the British Ministry. It further appears, that Houston and Jones, both gave Mr. Elliott to understand, that the sending of a Texas Minister to the United States was dictated by a desire to avoid causes of irritation, and to explain that Texas would not entertain the subject of annexation at all.—This letter of Elliott defines what were the disposition of the late and present Presidents of Texas, at that time; and there is no roof that there has since been any real change in their desires.—Indeed the Galveston News, which is in possession of other official letters which we have not seen, says that in answer to Captain Elliott's enquiries about Gen. Henderson's mission to the United States—Houston excuses himself, by saying that he "only acted in obedience to the requirements of Congress." These proofs of the inclination of those in authority in Texas, to reject annexation, for separate independence, under the protection of the British, give to the pointed declarations of their newspaper organ.—The position is taken broadly, that unless annexation takes place at the present session of Congress, it must be considered as finally defeated, and it will be necessary for Texas to take immediate steps to secure her independence, and settle her relations with European powers. What these relations will be, is indicated with sufficient distinctness. The 'Register' confirms plainly the rumors transmitted to us from Galveston and published in this paper a couple of weeks ago.—France an England 'demand no concessions or equivalents from Texas, but merely that she remains independent,' says the organ of the Government of Texas. 'It is further understood that they will terminate the hostile attitude of Mexico forthwith, and compulsively, if it remains independent. We have no doubt of these facts that Great Britain will yield every condition, and withdraw every pretension, if Texas will but repudiate annexation and consent to owe the acknowledgement of her sovereignty by Mexico to British interference. Neither do we doubt that if her government could devise any means of defending itself against the real fanaticism at home, it would guarantee the existence of slavery, it required, as the condition for keeping Texas form re-union with the United States."

(From the Washington, Texas, National Register.)

THE PROSPECT.—We believe it may be set down as certain, that annexation will not take place during the present session of the American Congress thought prospect was becoming perceptibly less unfavorable. In consequence of the apprehension created there, lest the people of Texas, wearied and disgusted with the dilatory and trifling course pursued towards them, should contract other relations incompatible with annexation to the Union. Unless the American Congress, foreseeing this consequence, shall act decisively, there is now good reason to believe that they will, at their next session, re-enact the farce of the present and last sessions, and so continue to do for years, until the admission of Texas shall no longer be a matter subject to their decision.—Since the election of Mr. Polk, they can no longer allege that public opinion has not been made up and expressed, in that country. The proposed annexation has been in point of fact before the American people for their consideration since 1836; though not at all times submitted to the action of their Congress. Have we not now a right to demand respectfully, but authoritatively, prompt and final action in regard to it? It is positively states, that no extra session of Congress will be called by Mr.
Polk. Is not this state of suspense, of all others, the most prejudicial to our interests? Does not this uncertainty arrest European emigration of the best character, as well as that from our Northern neighbor? The fear of annexation prevents the coming of those who would unite with us, were we certainly to remain independent. Others abstain from emigrating to Texas, being unwilling to change their allegiance temporarily. Furthermore, are we not grossly deluding ourselves in imagining that we have only to continue in the humor for annexation, in order ultimately to attain it? We have been somewhat cajoled. Let us, therefore, examine carefully our position and prospects.

Our relations with France and England are on the most friendly basis. These Governments clearly perceive the great interests they have in our permanent independence, and are willing, it is understood, to lase our commercial intercourse with them upon the most liberal footing.—They have, however, deferred taking any decisive steps herein, pending the present measures for annexation. Should these measures fail, France and England will then act. They ask no concessions or equivalents from Texas, but merely that we remain independent. For free and equal competition for the commerce of Texas, unshackled by the American tariff, and from the advantages arising from an independent country interposed between the U.States and Mexico, they can well afford to grant all that Texas would ask; for it is further understood, that they will terminate the hostile attitude of Mexico forthwith, and compulsively, if we agree to remain independent. The course of these Governments will be open. The United States have been openly negotiating and attempting to legislate about annexation.—France and England will openly submit to the consideration of our Government and people inducement. And we are assured that, in relation to Texas, as well as on other subjects, the most cordial understanding subsists between the two cabinets, and that they will act, in fulfilling our wishes, in perfect concert. The Government of Louis Phillippe, will also efficiently promote the speedy negotiation of a treaty with Old Spain; the only obstacle to which has been the unsettled condition of Texas in relation to annexation. A treaty with Spain opens to us Cuba, whose commerce will be highly advantageous.

We see it stated in the London papers received in this country since the return of the Hon. Ashbel Smith, that he had a long interview with Lord Aberdeen previously to leaving London—What subjects were discussed at this interview, or whether any of importance, has not yet transpired. [MLD]

The Congress of Texas, however, has met and separated since the date of the communication to Her Majesty’s Government, to which the undersigned has referred, and the President will fell with force, that it is just and necessary, in the present appearance of circumstances, that there should be no room for the least uncertainty on the part of the Governments engaged on the behalf of Texas at Mexico; for, it is not to be supposed that they could continue to press the Government of Mexico to settle upon one basis whilst there was any reason to surmise that negotiations were either in actual existence, or in contemplation, proposing a combination of a totally different nature. It is manifest, on the other hand, that a distinct disavowal on the part of the Government of Texas, of any intention to consent to such a scheme, either now or prospectively, could not fail to strengthen the hands of the Ministers of their Majesties the Queen and the King of the French, at Mexico.

Confiding in the steadfastness of the people of Texas, to the pledges in the fundamental acts of their national existence, several of the great Powers have acknowledged the Independence of their Republic, and entered into treaties with it.—Whilst that confidence subsists, it may be depended upon, that the Government of Her Majesty will never relax in its friendly efforts to induce the Government of Mexico to adjust, on the policy so forcibly pressed on the attention of Her Majesty’s Government by the Government of Texas, not adopted without mature deliberation by Her Majesty’s Government, and in their judgment equally necessary for the security of Mexico, and the strength and prosperity of Texas. The undersigned takes this occasion to renew to Mr. Jones, the expression of the sentiment of regard and distinguished consideration with which he has the honor to remain,

Are these the politicians you would trust? Is this the party worthy of your confidence? [MLD]
In your leading editorial of yesterday, I find the following remarks:

"Is it not melancholy to reflect upon the cursed consequences of this party spirit? Wonderful to tell, there was but on Whig who voted in favor of the amended resolutions, (Dellet of Alabama) whilst six of the others, (Stephens of Georgia not in the House,) who originally voted for Brown’s resolutions in the House, were mad enough, party-mad, to vote against them in their amended form—a from, certainly, which neither affected their constitutional nor practical character. And among these six who ultimately turned their backs upon Texas, were Milton Brown himself, of Tennessee, General Clinch of Georgia, and Willoughby Newton of Virginia. They voted against it, and three others. Newton! Aye, our old friend Newton, whose forcible letter was, but the other day, so much admired by the Democrats, and condemned by the Whigs.—These men, it appears, could not withstand the screws of party operation, r the lash of the Whig press; and after a brilliant effort, they have returned to the vile affinities of party spirit."

These remarks, if not designed to do myself, and my noble Whig associates in the House of Representatives, through whose agency Texas has been permitted to come into the Union, willful injustice, by misrepresenting our conduct, and motives, are well calculated to do us an injury. How have we abandoned our position? In what have we turned our backs upon Texas? I challenge you to the proofs. Was it our duty to vote with Brinkerhoff and other Abolitionists of your party, for Benton’s amendment to our resolutions, which you yourselves have repeatedly denounced? (1.) Because your party in the House, for the purpose of consolidating itself must bow to the spirit of Abolitionism; and leave the question of slavery open, for future agitation, must we too follow their example, and vote for an amendment which we deemed very far from an improvement of our plan, and which a large number of the most intelligent of your party loudly condemned, even on the very night of its adoption in the Senate, and declared they would not vote for in the House. I speak advisedly; I know that a number of the wisest and best of your party looked with contempt upon the amendment of the Senate, as a paltry trick, designed to delude the country, and to bring to the support of the measure the "dough-faces" of the North. (2.) I hope we may not live to rue this concession; for Mr. Brinkerhoff, and others entertaining similar opinions, boldly avow that hey regard the slavery question as now open, and mean to make another desperate struggle for an equal division of the territory of Texas. (3.)

But what is the extent of our offence? Not that we voted against the proposition as amended but that we did not vote for the amendment, which was distasteful to us, and must be exceptionable to every true friend o the South. (4.) Notwithstanding my objections to the amendment, I am free to say, that if the question had been on the resolutions as amended, I should have voted in the affirmative, rather than a measure I had so much at heart should have failed. I knew full well, however, that the Democrats of the House had been whipped in by the lash of party, and that the amendment would be carried by a large majority; and even if rejected by the House, I had no fear that the measure would thereby be defeated; for, either the Senate would have receded from the amendment and failed back on the original resolutions; or, if the amendment was adhered to by the Senate, the House would have receded. So that our votes against the amendment, which we disapproved, could in no event endanger the main proposition.

I had hoped that my course in public life had satisfied all who have deemed it worthy of their attention—that I always endeavored to be governed by principle, and that I am not to be turned from the path of duty by the denunciations of a reckless press of my own party, or by the seductive influence of the flattery of my political opponents. I did not advocate the admission of Texas from any selfish considerations. I was well aware that I should incur the displeasure of some of my party friends, by doing what I deemed a duty; and on that account, if no other, I have a right to claim justice, at least, at your hands. I ask no more. And as that is denied to myself and my associates, by the men who, by our aid, have been enabled to achieve a great measure, I may be pardoned the seeming vanity of declaring, that without us, and, indexed, I may say, without my own humble efforts in the cause, the measure could not have been accomplished, at least, during the late session of Congress. In proof of this assertion, I might cite the evidence of distinguished and liberal men of your party, who are too magnanimous to deny their obligations to Whigs, in the accomplishment of a great national object, merely because it may serve to lessen the apparent triumph of their own party. (5.)

I do not deem it necessary or proper to reply to ordinary newspaper articles, but your notice of me upon this measure is so pointed, and your views so mistaken, if not designed to do me injustice, that my declining to notice them might be improperly construed. I have, therefore, to request, that you will do me the justice to assure you and the public, that my support of the proposition to admit Texas had its origin in a spirit of pure patriotism, which is not likely to be influenced by a desire to conciliate the favor of party hacks, on the one side, or to deprecate their wrath, on the other.

Yours, very respectfully,
WILLOUGHBY NEWTON

(1.) We preferred the original resolutions of the House, that is certain—as Mr. N. did. Bu we would always have taken Benton’s bill, as a proviso to the Resolutions, rather than lose the whole. When, however, we were advised, upon the best information, that the bill was only calculated to endanger the fate of the resolution, we washed our hands of it. It turns out, however, contrary to previous calculation, that there were more in the Senate, who would have voted for the amended resolutions, than for the original ones; and if we had to choose between the former, or none at all, as we verily believe, we should not have hesitated for one moment to vote for them. What is it to us, whether some few men like Brinkerhoff would have voted for them—under erroneous calculations? The great body of Abolitionists are wholly dissatisfied with the passage of the resolutions. They do not see out of Mr.
Brinkerhoff’s spectacles. What says the Boston "Liberator," edited by W.L. Garrison—which the New York Tribune says, is “the oldest anti-slavery paper in the country?” “In the last No. of his journal Mr. Garrison gives his views of the relative position and conduct of the Locofoco and Whigs parties on the Texas question, in the following emphatic and unequivocal terms:”

“In the name of Democracy has this frightful outrage been perpetrated. The Democratic party as such, has sold itself, body and soul, to the Demon of slavery, and with cannibal appetite is fattening upon human flesh and blood. All its professions of regard for the rights of man, of hostility to oppression, of attachment to the cause of liberty, are mendacious and hypocritical to an infernal degree, and indisputably shown by its acts. It is a party, from which escape by the virtuous and honest is to be made with the celerity that righteous Lot fled from Sodom. The friends of God and man are now called upon to unite their forces for it is overthrow—to put the brand of profligacy on the brow of every man who shall venture to uphold it—to unmask it as a monster of iniquity—and thus vindicate genuine Democracy, and peradventure save the country from ruin.

“To those members of Congress, whether Whigs or Democrats, who were ‘faithful among the faithless found’ in the trial hour, let the thanks of the friends of freedom be proffered for themselves, and is behalf of the three millions of our fellow-countrymen in chains. ‘Credit to whom credit—honor to whom honor.’ This impartial justice and genius magnanimity demands—Recreant to their duty in many other instances, in presenting an almost unbroken front to this scheme of annexation, the Whig party have done a noble work, and stood their ground with a firmness and fidelity far beyond our expectations. Teat of all the Southern Whig Senators, only three were found willing to go for the measure, surprises us. By their defection from the position assumed by the Whig party, the deed has been consummated; but the party itself stands nobly exhonorated from all responsibility in the case.”

Now, who is the best judge of the views of the abolitionists?—Brinkerhoff or Garrison? The latter does not consider the question to be left open—but the fate of it sealed, “the deed as consummated!” And Mr. Newton’s “Abolition Whig” friends are welcome to all the thanks of the abolition crew, which they have won by their votes.

(2.) Mr. N. has the charity to suspect, that this course was adopted for the “purpose of consolidating itself.” Why not equally suppose, that he and the other five Whigs in the House voted against the Senate resolutions for the purpose of consolidating themselves with their own party? The one supposition is as liberal, and not more extravagant than the other.

But is it true, that he question of slavery is “kept open,” and that we have “bowed to the spirit of Abolitionism”? We view that in a very different light. We are aware, that this is the only straw which the dough-face Whigs, and a handful of Abolitionists will seize upon; but they will find themselves mistaken notwithstanding. The addition made to the House Resolutions in the Senate will prove to be surplasive. Now, we have no idea that Mr. Polk will appoint Commissioners and open a new negotiation with Texas—Messrs. Newton, Brinkerhoff, or the N.Y. Evening Post, to the contrary notwithstanding. Mr. Polk has not recalled the instructions dispatched by Mr. Calhoun immediately on the passage of the Resolutions. They authorized Maj. Donelson to propose an immediate an admission of Texas, upon the terms of Brown’s Resolutions. Whether Mr. Tyler should have taken it upon himself to act, on the heel of the session, is one thing—but that he has taken the best alternative course under the resolutions, is another thing. We understand, that Mr. Polk will not probably adopt the other expedient. He will scarcely raise against he question between the Treaty and the Legislative powers—much less, keep open the battle between the Abolitionists and the South. We had the pleasure of conversing with Gen. Lamar, on his way to Texas, on this subject—and he has no doubt, that Texas will accept the terms, and that those terms will be adopted. We have not yet met with a Democrat, who does not approve this course, and who does not believe the whole question to be closed, and the last straw stricken from the hands both of the Whigs and the Abolitionists.

(3.) Mr. Brinkerhoff, like other wise men of his caliber, may be counting without his host.—He will scarcely have the opportunity of making “another desperate struggle” upon this field.

(4.) Pretty much like splitting a hair, between the North and the North-west side he, Mr. N. did not vote against the amended resolutions, but against amending the resolutions. By rejecting the amendment, what would have been the consequence? In the first place, the original resolutions would have been sent back to the Senate—There, it was understood, Mr. Bagby and others would not have voted for them. Indeed, it appeared from the very face of the transaction, that with the steady and dogged phalanx of the Anti-Texas Whigs, and the dissentients of the Democratic party, the resolutions would not have passed.—Why, then, send them back to the Senate? By this course, they were to run again the gauntlet in that body. One of the three Whigs might have flow the way. One of the Democrats might have been sick, or absent, or one of the "dough-faces" might have changed his position. The whole question might have been thrown overboard, in the enthusiasm of excited parties, and in the agonis of an expiring session, when so many other subjects were demanding attention, and some flimsy pretext might have been seized upon by the dough-faces on either side, to shuffle off the whole question. There was, at least, evident risk in throwing the question as a shuttle-cock, to be toast to and fro between the two Houses—at the very heels of the session—And why run the risk of voting down an amendment, and losing the whole question under such circumstances, when Mr. M. confesses, that, as amended, he should at last have voted for them? We need not say, we are sure, by the resolutions as they have passed, nor how much they would have exulted, if they had failed in the struggle between the two Houses.

Mr. N. has seen, that no one was more willing to do him justice for the course he originally pursued, than we were. Indeed, we carried our feelings further than many of our friends. It was only when he baulked at the last pinch of the hill, and with five of his Whig colleagues, pursued a course which might have kicked over the whole pail of milk, that we rebuke their apparent derelictions.—Whether this was to act the part of a wise statesman, or of a "party

"Of the numbers who attended the inauguration, we have seen none on whose brow there did not sit, as it appeared to our perception, weariness, disappointment, and, in some cases, disgust!"

"Exultation for the defeat of Mr. Clay had spent itself before, and Patriotism, we dare avouch, whispered in the ear of man y a one of them the question, 'What have you, what has your country gained by discarding that experienced statesman, that old public servant, that gallant spirit who, in her darkest hours, was ever that country's safest councilor and ablest defender, to elevate one who has rendered no service beyond a thousand others?' Tell us frankly, visitors to the Inauguration, did not such thoughts cross your minds sometimes, and did not conscience, in the flagging of party spirit, give an answer which you will not avow?"

Thus speaks the R. Whig, the leading Federal organ in Virginia. It was amusing to have seen this sapient Editor, and modern pupil of Lavater, craning his graceful neck and peering with a critic's eye, into the countenances of all who had returned from the Inauguration! With his keen "perception," doubtless, the wo-be-gone faces of the "numbers who attended the Inauguration," must have inspired his looks with the beams of pleasure and of pride. It were "sweet revenge" for this piteous mourner over the prostrate fortunes of Mr. Henry Clay, to witness the "weariness, disappointment and disgust" betrayed in the very looks of those who had contributed to bring about the overthrow of the "country's ablest defender," to use the language of Whig adulation! This clearly explains the distorted vision with which the Whig regards every thing connected with the solemn installation of a Republican President, and arrives at such remarkable conclusions. We (at least one of us) have just returned from a visit to Washington, and we have neither felt or witnessed such effects, as the piercing eyes of this watchful Editor have detected and portrayed to his gaping readers.—We, too, appeal to the consciences of those, who have recently visited Washington, for an indignant response to the question propounded to them by the Whig organ. Is there a single Republican who has left the City of Washington with regret for the honorable part which he took in raising aloft the Banner of the Constitution? The ceremonies of the Inauguration were simple, but imposing. There was a moral beauty in the spectacle, which should have touched the heart even of the most rabid Whig. A private citizen had been summoned from the bosom of retirement, and after an unprecedented struggle, had been raised to eh highest honor in the world. Many thousands, form all portions of the country, assembled to see their victorious champion, invested with the robes of office, and solemnly entrusted with the power to administer the affairs of twenty millions of People. In spite of the inclement weather, every avenue was filled with gay and happy crowds, and the moving mass of umbrellas brought o mind "Burnam wood come to Dunsinane." The immense multitude was not inspired by gaudy banners, nor martial music, nor bristling amour. It was deeper and purer feeling They felt that the Constitution, had been saved, the union preserved and the destinies of the nation pushed onward. How nobly does this imply installation of a Republican President contrast with the pomp and prestige of a similar ceremony in the old world!—There we see cohorts of armed men, arrayed around the titled tyrant, to guard his person against popular outbreaks. All is glitter, and form, and fear; and happy is the nation that escapes from apprehended violence from the oppressed and grumbling masses. In our own free and happy land, one President goes out of office, and his successor is invested with power. Thee transition is calm, and smooth, and secure. Our institutions are firmly stamped on the hearts of the people, and the true patriot who has received this free gift of great nation, enters upon his high duties, with a confiding trust in the affections of the people, and with a virtuous resolution to do all he can to guard the Constitution, and to push on the destinies of the country to the highest point.—Such a man we take Jas. K. Polk to be—and we have an abiding trust that he will not disappoint the hopes of the nation. We look confidently to his honesty of purpose, his public and private virtues, and his devotion to the country's good, and to his own fame, to carry out those great constitutional principles of which he is the selected and responsible agent. Let him but be true to his principles and to himself, and the difficulties that beset his path will banish before him, and his name will b enrolled high on the list of his country's benefactors.

But the "Whig" arrogantly asks, what we or the country have gained by discarding Mr. Clay and electing Mr. Polk? The answer is easily made, and cannot but be conclusive. The moral triumph in November has already achieved a momentous result. We allude to the annexation of Texas, with all its benefits to the South gained to the Union. Had Mr. Clay been elected, who will deny that a death-blow would have been given to that great measure, and the safety of the Union seriously periled? It was the Republican victory in November, and the election of Mr. Polk, the consistent friend of the "Lone Star, " that secured the annexation of Texas a the present time, and diffused joy through every portion of the Union. By this great measure, the fell sprit of Abolitionism has been stilled, and the Constitution, had been saved, the union preserved and the destinies of the nation pushed onward. How nobly does this imply installation of a Republican President contrast with the pomp and prestige of a similar ceremony in the old world!—There we see cohorts of armed men, arrayed around the titled tyrant, to guard his person against popular outbreaks. All is glitter, and form, and fear; and happy is the nation that escapes from apprehended violence from the oppressed and grumbling masses. In our own free and happy land, one President goes out of office, and his successor is invested with power. Thee transition is calm, and smooth, and secure. Our institutions are firmly stamped on the hearts of the people, and the true patriot who has received this free gift of great nation, enters upon his high duties, with a confiding trust in the affections of the people, and with a virtuous resolution to do all he can to guard the Constitution, and to push on the destinies of the country to the highest point.—Such a man we take Jas. While in the District, we seized an opportunity to quit the bustle and excitement of Washington, and pay a rapid visit to Alexandria, in whose prosperity an interesting portion of our own State is interested. We arrived at an auspicious moment. By one of those energetic moves which often secure the fortunes of nations, as well as individuals.

Alexandria has achieve an object peculiarly calculated to promote her interests, in the opinion of her most intelligent citizens.—This was to obtain form the State of Maryland a bill to relieve the lien on the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. The lower House ha passed the bill by a single vote, and the Senate's action would make it a law. At once, the enterprising Alexandrians' despatched a boat for the Senator of St. Mary's, who reached Anapolis just in time, on the last day of the session, to complete the law, as it passed the Senate by one vote only. The joyous news reached Alexandria during our visit, and the whole town openly demonstrated their cordial satisfaction. It secures the completion of the canal to Cumberland, and will pour, as it is confidently believed, rich treasures into the lap of Alexandria.

This fine canal seems to be well constructed. THE basin and four locks, forming the outlet at the Alexandria, are admirably built, and afford room for a vast business. The aqueduct across the Potomac at Georgetown, is one of the finest structures I the country. It is supported by four broad and solid stone piers, extending sixty feet through the water, and resting on a foundation of rock. The superstructure is of wood, galvanized by a solution of corrosive sublimate, so as protect it from decay. This noble canal will, it is through, soon be completed, and that result will restore this old town, once so thriving, and connected with so many agreeable associates of the past, to its pristine commercial prosperity.—IT is still the seat of elegant hospitality; the manners of its citizens are of the true Virginia stamp, and we hope, ere long, to see it enjoying the commercial advantages of "the most favored" city. In some of the mechanic acts, she vies with the largest towns. The epicure still looks to her famous wine-cellar for this choicest libations; and, why should not she regain her former high standing as a place of commercial importance? Ere we made our adieu, we thought we discovered a new spirit infusing itself into her people. If this be kept alive, and properly directed, the destinies of Alexandria may yet be as bright as her most zealous citizen may desire. [MLD]

THE RIVAL NATIONS.

Carthage never-looked upon the growth and power of the Roman people with more envy and apprehension than England does on the progress of the American people. It is true, there is an ocean between the Old and the New World, where the modern rivals have the base of their Mediterranean did between Carthage and Rome Modern improvements in navigation bring England and the United States into close neighborhood. The growing commerce and power of the two people have literally made the home of both upon the deep. It is fear of the competition of this vast and rich continent with her island workshop, and of the danger that the new race of her own breed may obtain the ascendancy in agriculture, manufacture, commerce, and, consequently, in power upon the ocean, which has constantly actuated England in her encroachments upon this continent and the islands of the surrounding seas. The Court of Lilliput did not take great pains to pin down Capt. Lemuel Gulliver to the spot which his limbs covered in his sleep, than England has to confine the United States to the straights in which the royal charters bound them. The acquisition of Louisiana, of the Floridas, of Texas, all in turn have encountered opposition from England, not only as far as her foreign diplomacy could counteract, but as far as the active, daring treasonable agency of the party under her influence here could go in defeating it. Efforts to dissolve the Union were tried, which, if not successful in preventing the increase of the Confederacy on one hand, might, it was hoped, curtail it on another, or, at least, by civil war, bring on the decrepitude of he south American Republics—the victims of internal disension.

The Union has, however, outlived two wars with Great Britain, and grown beyond the limits assigned by the jealousy of its ambitious rival.—It is now only by environing the U. States by entrenched strength on both flanks—in front and in the rear—that the giant, whose power it is feared will invade English supremacy on the seas, is to be held in check. England on our front, Canada and the West Indies on our right and left, with to command the whole Western coast of our Continent, may be said to have placed the commercial power of the Union in a state of siege.— Whenever it threatens the British dominion of the seas—narrows British commerce or British conquests, then it will be assailed from all these points of vantage at once, which in time will be rendered impregnable to attack.

The people of the U.S. should comprehend fully the position they occupy. The view should not be confined to the attitude of things at the present moment, nor to an internal policy suited to the genius of a people like the Chinese, who have sought to live in the shell made by the coast and wall by which they are surrounded. The destiny of the people of this Union is not confined to this Continent. Their genius broods over every ocean and region of the earth; and influences deeply affecting the fate of the great Republic will every where exist requiring its vigilance. At this moment, England brings home to us the policy which is to be watched and repelled. The articles we annex from a New Orleans paper suggest the observations we have made. They will be found to contain facts worthy of meditation. [MLD]
Important Disclosure

The New York Journal of Commerce of the 20th ult., publishes a letter from Washington, which states, upon what the writer declares to be un questionable authority, that, at the time of Santa Ann’s fall a treaty was in progress, and nearly consummated, for the entire cession of California and New Mexico, to Great Britain, it only being defeated by the fall of Santa Anna.

It is further stated, that the United States Government has been informed that papers were found upon Santa Anna’s person, at the time of his capture, confirmatory of the suspicions which had been entertained from some time before, of the designs of England up on that section of the country. It is not astonishing, that Asana Anna should have kept about his person such documents as related to this astounding negotiation, as no one had greater cause than he to dread the exposure of such a purpose before its completion. Nor was he a man to place much reliance upon the fidelity of his cabinet; and hence the probability that, when he left the city of Mexico, he took with him the papers relating to this affair.

If this intelligence prove well-founded, (and there seems to be no good reason for doubting the main point it develops) Great Britain was securing for herself a more extensive and important acquisition whilst affecting a holy horror of American rapacity in seeking the annexation of Texas. She was for dismembering the Mexican empire by intriguing with a corrupt and falling dynasty, and against the consent of the people who inhabit the territory sought to be acquired, whilst the annexation of Texas can only be accomplished through the wishes of the people both of Texas and the United States, and its completion can do no wrong to any other power or people.

There would be more reason for questioning the disclosures now made, were it not known that Great Britain has cast a covetous eye towards that country for a considerable length of time.—More than twenty years ago, Mr. Ward, then British Charge to Mexico, pointed out to his Government the value of this territory, and the importance of her taking possession of it; and from that time till now, British Cabinets have looked amorously upon it. The possession of the bay of San Francisco, one of the finest harbors in the world, would give her the control of the commerce of the whole coast of the Pacific ocean, and enable her to hem in the Oregon as completely as her islands, the Canadas and New Brunswick do the Atlantic seaboard of the U. States.

In connection with this matter, there have been mercantile movements in Great Britain that have an awful squinting towards the issue involved.—Let those who think slightly of the influence of British merchants in coercing Government measures remember the China catastrophe; and such as would disparage their power in what concerns the acquisition of empire, ponder upon the fate of East India. We would call attention to the following extract of a Liverpool cotton circular which travels out of the legitimate province of such a writing to dabble in politics:

"If the United States be allowed to usurp (they call it annex) the Territory of Texas, the control of the cotton trade will fall into their hands. No cotton, save that produced in Texas, will stand in competition with Bowed and Orleans. The United States do not depend, in the same degree, on Great Britain for the disposal of their cotton, which Great Britain does on them for the necessary supply. Let any man make and try to sell fustians, or, indeed, almost any article of extensive sale, out of any cotton grown in Asia, Africa or South America, instead of Bowed and Orleans, and he will soon be made sensible of his error. In the tow last years, with every temptation, the British spinners have not dared to use more than one pound weight of East India against nine pounds of North American cotton; and they only used so much through being forced by the outrageous advance of the last kind. Cotton has been skillfully cultivated in Asia for thousands of years; and the result of all the exertions made by an ingenious and laborious people is, that they cannot produce cotton of the quality which is required.” [MLD]

Mexico

By the arrival of the brig Leopold, Captain Donnell, we have received Vera Cruz papers of the 17th February—they contain no news of a very important character.

Santa Anna was still detained in the prison of Perote, contrary to the intelligence received by way of Yucatan. It was the general opinion that he would not be put to death.

Mr. Gomez Farias left Vera Cruz for the city of Mexico on the 25th February: a favorable reception awaited him.

A circular from the minister of finance, Mr. Echeveria, dated at Mexico, February 14, announces that the conducta would leave the city of Mexico March 1, for Vera Cruz. It would be strongly guarded to protect it from the depredations of banditti on the route.

We find in the Gazette of Tampico of February 12, the following paragraphs:
The Junta of protection addressed on the 10th February, an appeal to the assembly of the department, praying the passage of a law of this tenor:

1. To make Tampico de Tamaulipas a port of entrepot like that of Vera Cruz, in conformity to the decree of April 11, 1837.
2. To reform the tariff now in force by adopting the principles of that of 1842, retaining whatever that tariff may contain in relation to the quantity and quality of goods.
3. To permit the free circulation of specie in the interior.
4. When foreign goods have once paid duties in one port they may be carried to any part of the Republic without being liable to the payment of further duties.

A proclamation dated Vera Cruz, Feb. 8, signed Jose de Amperan, prolongs to the 1st March the time fixed for foreigners to obtain their certificates of protection.

Generals Basadre and Canalizo have been transferred to the fortress of Chapultepec. It was believed that many persons attached to the army were ordered to confine themselves within the limits of certain districts in the interior of the Republic. [MLD]

Texas Money

We have been informed, by one of our most estimable and distinguished fellow-citizens, that Major Andrews Jackson Donelson, our Charge d’Affairs to Texas, assured him, that he had taken the necessary steps to ascertain the amount of Texas bonds and notes unredeemed at this time. The Major was satisfied that the amount now in circulation is not more than between five and six millions of dollars. For the correctness of this statement, ex-President Houston, than whom no one has better means of being accurately informed on the subject, gave the strongest assurance and vouched in positive terms. We presume, from this statement, that a great quantity of the Texas bonds and notes has been received by the Government in payment for lands—and hence the reduction of the debt of the Republic.

We have thought it an act of mere justice to make known the facts above mentioned, as we are informed interested persons, stock-jobbers and speculators are very busily engaged in propagating reports, that the public debt of Texas, including her paper money in circulation, amounts to thirty millions of dollars. The object of these people, manifestly, is to depreciate the current value of Texas bonds and notes, in order that they themselves may buy them up at the lowest prices. We venture to predict, that in six months from this day, Texas lands, now selling at fifty cents, will fine willing purchasers at five dollars an acre—and, that Texas Government paper will rise to eighty cents in the dollar, probably to par.—Ib. MORE STRAWS!

The "Baltimore American" still clings to the hope of defeating the annexation of Texas. Its last straw, to save itself from drowning, is the letter of Mr. Elliott, the British Charge, to Mr. Jones, Secretary of State, of March last, which we published last week, for the purpose of showing the danger which the Whigs would have incurred, from the seductive intrigues of Great Britain. The Baltimore American says: "It is evident that difficulties, which the urgent friends of annexation have thought lightly of, are threatening to defeat the consummation of that measure after all. The Texans Executive will have it in his power, if he chooses, to throw obstacles in the way of negotiations at every step, and if he continues resolutely bent on preserving Texas separate and independent, his means of attaining that object will be abundant." But the Texas Executive dare not now throw any obstacles in the way—since the Congress of the United States have opened their arms to the reception of Texas. The people of that country are too much attaché dot eh Union, especially since they have witness ed our anxiety to welcome her to our bosom, to permit her Executive to forbid the banns. The case would have been materially different, indeed, if the Whigs had succeeded in defeating the resolutions of the last session. Then, the pride of her people would have been touched—then, Messrs. Elliott & C. would have had another opportunity of playing their diplomatic game—then, the delay might have bred serious danger. As it is, we shall scarcely dread the interference of Great Britain—either her secret intrigues, or he open opposition—though we admit, that the sooner the question be settled, by closing in with the propositions of Brown's resolutions, the better for Texas, and the better for ourselves.

The "American" seems impatient to hear form Texas," and so are we. It says truly, and there, too, we agree with the Whig Editor of Baltimore that "If Texas should accede to the proposed terms, and consent to become a portion of the Union, the confirmation of the arrangement on the part of our Government would not be long withheld, we presume, notwithstanding the intimations to the contrary hear and there given out." Say, rather that if Texas should accede to our offered terms, (under the resolutions of the two houses,) we have nothing more to do than to agree to the Constitution proposed to our next Congress by Texas herself; and as these resolutions disembarrrass her movements entirely in regard to the slavery question—as in fact, they pledge the faith of our own Congress to adopt her Constitution, whether with or without slavery, the confirmation on our part would be promptly and smoothly effected. [MLD]

Still Catching at the Straw!

The following warning comes up form the “Baltimore American,” (Whig:)

"Will Annexation Be Consummated?—The ardent advocates of the annexation measure treat with ridicule the supposition, that Texas may, by any contingency, fail to become a portion of the Union. We are not disposed to speculate about it; but if the supporters of Mr. Polk’s administration choose to differ on the point, we may listen to their reasonings.

"The New York Evening Post of Monday alludes to the conditions yet to be settled before annexation can take place, and says:

"now it is possible—indeed, we do not hazard much in saying that it is probable—that many of those Democrats who voted for the bill as recently carried, and who belong to the next Congress, will not vote for the final admission of the new territory until the terms are adjusted to the satisfaction of all parts of the country.—We confess that we are surprised to see this class of men consent to the passage of the bill, even as a preliminary measure; but our surprise is somewhat diminished, yet not forgotten, when we reflect that they may have reserved an intention to act with more boldness and decision when the proper time shall come.—how men who though the bill of Mr. Brown unconstitutional, of who, to say the least, were anxious that some portion of the new territory should be rescued from slave domination, could vote even with a mental reservation, to enter upon the President the right to enforce that bill, we did not understand; it is possible, therefore, we repeat, that the question has yet to be determined."

"This has its significance. Mr. Polk’s Cabinet is now formed—not to the satisfaction, it would seem, of all his party.
Before the next meeting of Congress, the appointments will be mostly made, and the wielder of Executive patronage will have parted with one strong means of control over the ranks of his partisans. If it should so turn out that Mr.
Polk does not satisfy the leaders of the party—if he should displease them, in fact, by declining to follow their dictation, it is possible that the Texan bomb may be made again to explode. But we leave the whole matter to the consideration of the Richmond Enquirer, which has taken the Texas business into its particular keeping."

And we cheerfully leave this "whole matter to the consideration" of Mr. Polk and his Cabinet.—He has now "the Texas business in his particular keeping." He will see what the Whigs are counting upon as the last card they are to play.—
But Mr. Polk will ut them off from this last hope—for he will consummate annexation now, under the terms of Brown’s resolutions. [MLD]

THE TONE OF THE WHIG PRESS!

The Philadelphia "U.S. Gazette" refers to certain signs in the North, and says that “the Texas question is not settled; even though annexation should be regarded as accomplished, still Texas is to be rallying word, as effective in some campaign, as was the shout of ‘Remember Paoli’ in another.”

It refers, as one evidence of the signs of the times, to the revelations of the "Boston Mercantile Journal, a staid, respectable paper, of true Whig principles.” The Journal says, “the North has been betrayed”—

"Let us, then, trusting only to our own resources, and to the moral and religious character of the free States, prepare ourselves seriously for the contest, now inevitable, and involving graver consequences than any in which we have been engaged since our national Constitution was first formed. But, though, as we advance, we may not feel that we can depend upon any part of the South for support, we still shall not feel that we want a safe foundation whereon to plant ourselves, or faithful allies to cheer us on. We have the old principles of the Constitution of the country, and whatever is true and venerable in justice and religion; to stand upon; and we have the voice of humanity, and the sympathies of all Christendom to go with us, and bid us God speed. Nor shall we fail of success. For a body of people, like that which fills the free States of this Union, contending earnestly in such a cause, was never yet brought into a base subjection to the spirit of slavery, and never can be.”

Another sign!—The New York Tribune is volcanic upon the occasion. It asks: "What remains to be done? We say, resist the consummation for the Annexation scheme to the last.—Let Connecticu, Rhode island, and other Free States, do their duty in their Congressional Elections, and the mischief may be arrested in the next Congress; but if not, we shall not yet give it up. We shall try, on one hand, to induce Texas to abolish Slavery, gradually, if not immediately; and if Freedom is allowed to discuss the matter, we shall have great hopes of early success. Failing or pending this, if any person in a Free State shall be claimed as a fugitive Slave from Texas, let his seizure be legally resisted, and the case carried up to the United States Supreme Court," &c. Pretty much in the Quincy style, this, upon the admission of Louisiana, "Peacably if we can, forcibly if we must!" Try to arrest the mischief in the next Congress! Will they indeed? It is easy enough to see what the Whigs and Abolitionists are after. They wish to keep the question open till the net session. For what purpose? To profit by the chapter of accidents—either to defeat the annexation altogether, or so to shape the annexation at the next session, as to obtain the largest proportion of Southern Texas, in fee simple, for the non-slaveholding States. And how do they expect to keep it open? By discarding the terms of Brown’s resolutions, and opening a new negotiation, under the alternative resolutions, so as to send a new compact to the Senate under the treaty-making power—or even to both Houses under the legislative power. All the anti-Texas Whigs go for this scheme.—All the abolitionists go for it. The Southern and Western friends of Texas see the game that these madcaps would play, and therefore they go for the scheme which is best calculated to close the Pandora box at once. [MLD]

THE TEXAS QUESTION IN INDIANA

Extract from a letter, dated Indianapolis, March 6.

"Speaking of the Hoosiers, I must tell you what one said on the Texas question the other day, as a good specimen of Hoosier eloquence:—Said one ------ "Colquitt, of Georgia, has made a Texas speech; and the way he skinned Barrow, of Louisiana, was awful.’ ’Sarved him right,’ said another—’a Southern man who would go against annexation, ought to be skinned, and have the wound dressed with Spanish flies and vitriol.” [MLD]

FROM TEXAS

Galveston newspapers to the 2nd […]mo have been received in New Orleans.

The only item of news of any interest is comprised in the following official publication:

By the President of the Republic of Texas.

A PROCLAMATION

Whereas letters of marque and reprisal have been issued by the Government of the Republic of Texas, to authorize individuals to fit out vessels of war, and to wage hostility by sea against the republic of Mexico; and whereas it is deemed expedient to revoke all such letters of marque and reprisal, and all other commissions of like character heretofore issued by this Government:

Now, therefore, be it known, that I, Ansen Jones, President of the Republic of Texas, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and Laws, do, by these presents, revoke and recall, and declare henceforth null and void, all letters of marque and reprisal, and all commissions of what nature so ever, authorizing individuals, under the sanction of this Government to fit out and arm vessels of war or privateers, for the purpose of waging hostilities by sea against Mexico.’

In testimony whereof, I have caused the great seal of the Republic to be hereunto affixed.

Done at Washington, the eighth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-five, and of the Independence of the Republic, the sixth.

WHIG TROUBLES

It is far from our intention to meddle with the family quarrels of the Whigs; but it will certainly not be considered intrusive to quote Whig authority, in order to exhibit to our Republican friends the state of the game in some of the Whig Districts. S to the Essex District, the situation of our poor friend Newton is truly pitiable. A Whig candidate for Congress, he is assailed by both Whig and Enquirer—and he must be a man o more than usual influence to stand up against this accidently conjoined attack. Whig as he was and is, of the most ultra Bank, Distribution and Tariff stamp, he had no favors to expect from this paper. True, we did honor his early course on the Texas question, when he boldly segregrated himself from the great mass of his party, and, by sustaining Milton Brown’s resolutions, gave evidence that he desired to attain a great national object, irrespective of the tyrannous behests of party. But when afterwards he relapsed into his party affinities, and, upon grounds the most flimsy and untenable, voted against the same resolutions, modified by an amendment which did not seriously affect the great object of annexation—satisfied, as he should have been, that if the amended resolutions had failed in the House, the question would have been lost forever, and his vote in the negative might have produced that fatal result; when he, at a most inauspicious hour, took this most unfortunate and ill-advised “back-track,” we felt that the credit which he had received for his former independence of party rule, had been entirely cancelled, and that he stood on the same platform with the rest of his anti-Texas Whig brethren, and should be treated in like manner. So much for our course towards Mr. Newton. We leave him in the hands of his Whig friends, and beseech for him a “safe deliverance” from their loving affection!

All the strictures of the Enquirer upon Mr. Newton’s course are light as a feather, compared with the loving comments of our neighbor of the R. Whig. We give a few extracts from the Whig again. Speaking of N’s course on the Texas question, the Whig says: [MLD]

“This gentleman finds himself in no enviable position: He has mortified his true and steadfast friends, or a very large portion of them; they who had stood by him at the crisis and placed him upon the summit he desired to reach, without conciliating his opponents! He went too far for the first, and not far enough for the last! He in his rabid support of the extremist Texas movement, without consulting the opinions of the vast and incalculable majority of the party with which he acted, from the Arostook to the Sabine, sinned against the first canons of party propriety, for in doing so, he made the great interests of this country, indissolubly united with the success of Whig principles, as he himself said a thousand time, and measures, subsidiary and subordinate to the immediate annexation of Texas, a measure which could be accomplished at any time whatever! He displayed in this course, an arrogant and concealed self reliance and self sufficiency over the assembled wisdom of the Whig party at Washington, and Whig opinion throughout the Union, which mark him for an unsafe politician – for one upon whose judgment little reliance can be placed in contingent and collateral questions, and who on such questions, is like a dollar pitched up, as likely to fall heads as fall tails.* *

“Without, that we have heard, any consultation with his District, or with the great body of the Whigs in it at least, Mr. Newton undertook to give THEIR vote for a measure of unconstitutional violence – we mean annexation of a foreign empire by joint resolutions of Congress, the very lowest grade of Legislation. That IT IS a measure of lawless and unconstitutional VIOLENCE we affirm, and we appeal to the CONSTITUTION itself, to sustain us in the assertion: We appeal particularly, to STATE RIGHT MEN! We ask them to show us and the People, the power of annexing old and foreign empires! As our neighbors of the Enquirer are wont to say, let them put their finger on the CLAUSE! And it is a sad reflection that this stab at the heart of the Constitution – this abrogation of all Constitution – is the work of vaunting, self proclaimed, exclusive, State Right men! [JS LLS]

The Whig thus sketches Mr. N’s course in voting against the amended Resolutions, quotes his explanatory letter to the Enquirer, and thus comments upon it: [MLD]

“The commentary of the Enquirer upon this cringing appeal, is such as it deserved. It by no means pardons the offender against Texas, and shows off, with force, the weakness of voting against Benton’s amendment, after Mr. Newton and the Texas Whigs had swallowed Brown’s resolutions. Its reasoning upon this point, is conclusive: It gives Mr. Newton no credit for changing his voted, on the score of principle, but intimates that it was quite as probably caused by a disposition to attend to his own interest in returning to his party.

“This letter of Mr. Newton we never read until yesterday (Monday): We read it under PROMISE to a friend, and with the sincere wish of being pleased with it. We lay it down with feelings of entire disgust, and with the conviction of the truth of what a distinguished, a most distinguished Virginian said, a year ago – he “will not be a Whig a year hence!” [JS LLS]

This is sharp enough, truly, from a Whig organ upon a Whig candidate for Congress; and there are stronger passages, which we omit. We come now to the concluding paragraph of the Whig’s biting comments. No one can read it without a thorough conviction that the Whig organ has given Mr. Newton’s claims to the winds. It substantially says to the Whigs of the District: “Let the Congressional canvass fall to the ground. Do nothing to sustain this Whig, who has been stained with the plague spot of Texas. We care nothing for his success—but we earnestly desire to see Whig Delegates to the General Assembly from the different counties of the District. Put Texas behind you, as a foul and polluting spirit, and, reckless of the Congressional contest, look alone to the counties.” But is the Whig sure that Texas will not “once cross the mind” of the voters, and will not “influence” their votes?” Our word for it, this great national question cannot thus summarily be disposed of.—It will, by its overwhelming importance, force itself into the canvass, and exert a commanding influence upon the next elections. It has been fatal to Federal supremacy in the last great canvass—and it will, at the present trial, go on conquering and to conquer. No candidate can stand before its triumphant march—and we appeal to the people to make it a test question in the next elections. We have the authority of the Whig candidate for Congress from this district, and the

Can Whigs forget this so readily, and Whigs be expected to aid the election of one like Mr. Morton, who makes this the sole issue, and hopes, by its means, and Democratic votes, to ride down the Whig party itself? We hope no Whig will consent to such suicide.

THE ANNEXATION OF TEXAS

This important question, the ruling measure of its day, which has done more to shape the election of President, to affect the interests of the country, and the condition of parties, than any other, has not yet exhausted the influence which it was destined to exert.

Every section of the Union was interested in it—the shipping and manufactures of the North—the manufactures and productions of the Middle States—the property and institutions of the south—every portion of the West had a stake in its acquisition. It was necessary to the defense of the whole Union—to round off our territory—to baffle the intrigues of our most formidable rival—and to bind the whole Confederacy together by the strong chain of mutual interests and feelings. When we recollect the physical advantages with which it is endowed, its rich soil, its delicious climate, its diversified and precious productions with the free trade markets which it throws open to all the citizens of the Union, we are astonished at the fatuity which has misled the Whig party. We wonder at the infatuation which has eclipsed the judgment of Mr. Clay, in refusing to receive so magnificent a domain into our bosom, which he once contended (in 1820) we had no right to cede away. We are surprised at the obsequious servility and dogged devotion of his followers, in pursuing his wandering footsteps. Above all, we wonder how it is, that any American, particularly in the South, should resist the re-possession of a country, which Mr. Jefferson acquired with Louisiana.

In fact, who is not astonished, that any man should have been so led away by blind party spirit, as to object to the restoration of our ancient limits? Let us be where we were in 1803, would naturally seem to be the wish of every patriot.

Some sections of the country, however, have objected to the re-annexation. These have been actuated partly by Abolition fanatics, and partly by Whig infatuation. Garrison and John Q. Adams H. Clay and his deluded followers have united in opposition—but thanks to the energies of the Republican Party, we have succeeded in carrying resolutions, which will secure the measure. Will the threats of the Northern fanatics and of Whig Legislatures be now carried into execution? We cannot believe it possible. Independently of the rashness of the attempt, of the dangers which would attend it, and the disgrace which would be stamped upon the authors of this new Hartford Convention Plot, we see in the very facts of the ease, the strongest evidence to believe that the popular sentiment will scotch down the infamous proposition. There are some curious statistics presented in the following article from the New Orleans Picayune, which is calculated to expose the folly of its perpetrators:

"THE TEXAS VOTE.—An analysis of the vote of the U.S. Senate upon the Texas resolutions will present some singular facts, which derive importance from the inflammatory manner in which the subject has been discussed in many portions of the country. Some of the more violent politicians and presses went the length of declaring that the consummation of annexation would be equivalent to a dissolution of the Union, and others avowed a willingness to see the Union broken to pieces rather than witness the failure of that measure. The principal topic employed to ferment popular excitement was the slavery question, which was infused with artfulness into the hustings upon too many occasions. It is in the respect to what has been urged upon this branch of the objection to annexation that the analysis of the final vote reveals important results—results, which show how idle it is to attempt to bias the opinions of men by threatening the stability of the Union, and which likewise prove the error of supposing that the slave question was the principal, much less the exclusive ground upon which the proposition was sustained.

"Of the 27 Senators who voted in favor of annexation, 13 (to wit: Fairfield of Maine, Atherton and Woodbury of New Hampshire, Niles of Connecticut, Dix and Dickinson of New York, Tappan and Allen of Ohio, Hannegan of Indiana, Semple and Breese of Illinois, and Buchanan and Sturgeon of Pennsylvania) were from the "free States;" and 14 (to wit: Merrick of Maryland, Haywood of North Carolina, McDuffie and Huger of South Carolina, Colquitt of Georgia, Lewis and Bagby of Alabama, Johnson of Louisiana, Henderson and Walker of Mississippi, Sevier and Ashley of Arkansas, and Benton and Atchison of Missouri,) were from the slave holding States.

"Of the 25 senators who voted against annexation, 15 (to wit: Evans of Maine, Choate and Bates of Massachusetts, Huntington of Connecticut, Upham and Phelps of Vermont, Porter and Woodbridge of Michigan, White of Indiana, Clayton and Bayard of Delaware, Dayton and Miller of New Jersey, and Francis and Simmons of Rhode Island) were from free States; and 10 (to wit: Pearce of Maryland, Archer and Rives of Virginia, Morehead and Crittenden of Kentucky, Jarnagin and Foster of Tennessee, Mangum of North Carolina, Berrien of Georgia, and Barrow of Louisiana) were from slaveholding States.

"Upon the final vote it will be seen, therefore, that in so far as the question of Southern institutions was at issue, it had no effect at all—the vote being as nearly divided, both in the North and South, as upon any other question of public interest.

"Again, of the 14 free States, 5 of them (New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Illinois and Pennsylvania) voted for annexation; 6 of them (Vermont, Massachusetts, Michigan, Delaware, New Jersey and Rhode Island) voted against it; and 3 (Maine, Connecticut and Indiana) gave a divided vote; whilst of the 12 slaveholding States, 5 (to wit: South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas and Missouri) voted in the affirmative; 3 of them (Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee) in the negative, and 4 (Maryland, North Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana) gave a divided vote.—Upon what other question has there been so equal a division?

"There is another aspect of this analysis that exhibits a yet more striking result.

"By referring to the Census of 1840 it will be seen that the 5 free States which voted for annexation contain the following population:

New Hampshire 284,574; New York 2,428,921; Pennsylvania 1,724,033;

Ohio 1,519,467; Illinois 476,183 souls, making a total of 6,433,178

The 6 free States that voted against annexation, are populated as follows:

Massachusetts 737,699; Vermont 291,498; Delaware 78,085; R. Island 108,830; Michigan 212,267; and N. Jersey 373,306 souls, making a total of 1,802,135

And the 3 free states that gave a divided vote, contain:
Maine 501,793; Connecticut 307,798;
Indiana 685,866 souls in all

On the other hand, the 5 slaveholding States which voted for annexation contain:

South Carolina 594,398; Alabama 590,756;
Mississippi 375,651; Arkansas
97,574; Missouri 383,702 souls, in all  2,012,041

The 3 slaveholding States that voted against it, contain:

Virginia 1,239,797; Kentucky 779,828;
Tennessee 829,210 souls, in all  2,848,835

And the 4 slaveholding States which gave a divided vote, contain:

Maryland 470,019; N.Carolina 753,419; Georgia 691,392; Louisiana 352,411

souls, in all  2,267,241

If we divide the population of those States which gave a split vote upon annexation, the result will be:

Those Senators from the free States that voted for annexation represented a population of 7,231,996

Those Senators from the free States that voted against annexation, represented a population of 2,748,835

Those Senators from the slave States that voted for annexation, represented a population of 3,175,620

Whilst those Senators from the slave states that voted against annexation, represented a population of 3,982,455

If we add up the hole together, the following result is elicited:

The Senators who voted for annexation represented a total population of 10,407,657

Those who voted against it represented a total population of 6,583,408

In this calculation the population of the territories is of course left out, and in the slaveholding States the gross number is taken instead of the federal number. Were the first added, and the latter reduced according to the federal ratio, the difference would e yet greater on the side of annexation.

"To recapitulate:--The final vote in the Senate, upon the Texas resolutions, stood—yeas 27, nays 25.

"Of the 27 yeas, 13 were Senators from the free States and 14 from the slave States. Of the 25 nays, 15 were from the free States and 10 from the slaveholding States.

The thirteen Senators from the free states who voted for annexation represented a population greater than that represented by the fifteen Senators from the free states who voted against annexation by 4,631,043

And the ten Senators from the slaveholding States who voted against annexation represent a population greater than the fourteen Senators from the slaveholding States who voted for it represented, by 806,794

And the twenty-seven Senators who voted for annexation represented a majority of the whole people of the United States, of 3,824,249
"It would appear also that this majority is all from the free States—that in point of fact the slaveholding population opposed it. How absurd, then, do those people who talk of a dissolution of the Union in connection with this subject appear! When they try it, they will find their hands full at home. We have been minute in this analysis, as it proves that the great measure of the day has not been decided upon local or sectional grounds;--it has acquired a national character and this determined its fate."

The New Orleans Bulletin justly remarks, on the preceding statistics from the Picayune, that "Emphatically as the measure is there shown to have assumed an aspect essentially national and popular, those characteristics would have been apparent to a much greater degree, had the votes of all the States been cast according to the known sentiments of their citizens. The States of Maine, Michigan, Virginia, Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana and Louisiana gave but three votes in the senate in favor of the resolutions; whereas, had the public sentiment been represented, those States would have cast sixteen votes for the measure. It will be seen, therefore, that the popular majority, which ought actually to be set down in favor of the measure, is immense and in no respect sectional. Had it not been for the unhappy circumstances which brought the topic into the arena of party strife, there would probably have been no serious opposition to the measure, except in two or three of the New England States. True wisdom, and a regard for the public quiet would now dictate that the vindictive passions that have arisen in the struggle should be sought on all hands to be appeased and reconciled."

Were we even disposed to pursue these counsels, a large portion of the Whig press would not permit us to bury this question in oblivion. The rabidness as well as absurdity of the Richmond Whig on this subject shows still the spirit of the Whig party. Their presses are constantly harping upon the alleged mischiefs of the measure, abusing its friends, and still idly speculating upon some prospect of defeating it. They are in favor of keeping the question open, with a hope, that at the next session of Congress they may still be able to crush it. But is it right to throw entirely a veil over the conduct of the great body of the Whig Party? Must we forget the history of the Hartford Convention, because it has blown by? Must we cease to recollect the opposition of the Whigs to Texas? Is it not a material element in any calculation, which we are to form of the political character of that party? Were they statesmen in their course? Were they patriots? Must we send back to the councils of Virginia a party, who refused to act decisively in favor of annexation—a party, who would re-elect Mr. Rives to the senate of the United States?—a party, who effectually cheered on the two Senators of Virginia, in resisting the wishes of her people?

Extend the views of the "Picayune" and the "Bulletin," to this aspect of the case—change the statistics from sectional to party calculations, and statistics from sectional to party calculations, and how will the case stand? Out of the 28 Whig Senators, every one voted against the Resolutions, except three. Every Democrat in the Senate voted for them. A single Whig only in the House of Representatives voted ultimately for the amended Resolutions (Dillett of Alabama.)—And two Democrats only (Davis of N.York, and Hale of N. Hampshire.) voted against them. Now, analyze these Whig votes in the Senate, on the principle of the "N.O. Picayune," and it will appear, that in the slaveholding States, 1 Whig from Maryland—2 Whig Senators of Virginia, (aye! from Old Virginia, both Senators went against the great question of the South and of the day—both Messrs. Rives and Archer)—the Whig Senator of N. Carolina—the Whig Senator from Georgia—the two Whig senators form Tennessee (flying ultimately the true track)—one of the Whig senators of Louisiana—and both the Whig Senators from Kentucky;--thus, ten Whig Senators from the slaveholding States voted against us—and to the annoyance of old Virginia, let it never be forgotten that her tow Whig Senators voted against her wishes and her interests—and that the Whigs in her Legislature refused to express the wishes of Virginia, and support the principles of her General Assembly, lest it might "embarrass their Senators," and carry the great question of the times in favor of the United States, and especially of the South. Then mark! Citizens of Virginia, this other thing—that the Whigs are now moving heaven and earth to reelect their party to the next General Assembly for the express purpose of re-electing Mr. Rives, one of the anti-Texas Senators, to our public councils. And the Whigs now complain, that the Republicans of our State Senate would not permit them the other day to trample upon 6,000 majority of the Republicans of Virginia, and to thwart the wishes of the State, by fastening Mr. Rives around your necks for six years to come. What say ye, People of Virginia? Will you trust these politicians again? And will you subscribe to the outrage which they would have perpetrated at the last session, and they are now seeking to renew at the next, against your principles, against your rights, and against your wishes?

The Whigs are deceiving themselves and deceiving others. They would have us believe, that there is imbecility, incapacity, indecision in the present Cabinet. The Whigs are grossly deceived. "Mine is a working Cabinet," says Mr. Polk—and we have no doubt, they will prove themselves to be such. They are all setting in to the study of their respective duties. Mr. Buchanan is at home in our Foreign Relations. Mr. Walker is putting the best foot foremost, by collecting light form all quarters on the revenue and Tariff. Mr. C. Johnson is adjusting his arrangements and anticipating his contracts, as far as he can, to the new Post-Office law of next July. His Department requires energy and economy—and he is the man who will display both these qualities. Bancroft drops the Historian’s pen, for a time, to compass the condition and penetrate the recesses of the Navy. Messrs. Marcy and Mason are preparing for the new and important offices to which they have been called. Success to them all.

The Whigs even flatter themselves will the hope of distraction in the Cabinet. The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot affects to believe, that "there is already a division in Mr. Polk’s Cabinet—each party striving for the mastership in swaying and controlling the President." What wretched humbugs! We are advised upon good authority, that the Cabinet is now a unit—and that the President has rather too much pride to be controlled by any Secretary. They all tell him the truth; that is their duty.—They will give him advice; that is his right. Bu the will decide and act for himself. [MLD]
THE WHIGS STILL AGAINST ANNEXATION

The Whigs die hard. We had supposed that the annexation might have been consummated without much difficulty under the resolutions of Congress. The Whigs say, No. They mean to struggle to the last. They are determined, it would seem, to stir the embers of strife again next Winter, whenever the Constitution of Texas comes in under the House Resolutions, and much more, if the new compact is submitted under the resolutions of the Senate. Mr. Botts said on Monday last, in Goochland, that the question was not settled—that he was glad of it—and that he would fight to the last against the annexation. (See the two communications in to-day’s paper about the discussion in Goochland.) Mr. Winthrop, of the House of Representatives, told a Virginian the other day that they intended to make battle against the Constitution of Texas, when it came before the next Congress. If we believe these Whigs, therefore, the battle is not over, and they mean to oppose Texas again at the next session.

But there is another fact of much importance, which shows the desperate spirit in which they are acting. We request the reader’s attention to the following extraordinary move, made by the Whigs of the Senate of the United States, on the 10th instant:

From the National Intelligencer

In EXECUTIVE SESSION, March 10 1845

Mr. Berrien submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That in executing the authority conferred by the joint resolution of Congress entitled “a joint resolution for the annexation of Texas to the United States,” the President of the United States will best conform to the provision of the Constitution by resorting to the treaty-making power, for the purpose of accomplishing the objects of that resolution.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to lay before the President of the U.S. a copy of this resolution.

March 11, 1845

Mr. McDuffie moved to lay the above resolution on the table, which passed in the affirmative by the following vote:

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Berrien, Thomas Clayton, John M. Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Greene, Huntington, Jarnagin, Johnson of Maryland, Mangum, Morehead, Phelps, Simmons, pham, Webster, Woodbridge—20.

Here, too, we see the desperation of the Whigs. Every man of them but one, votes for the resolution of Mr. Berrien. They were put to sleep by the Democrats of the Senate. Here we see the Whigs attempting to place the annexation at the mercy of the treaty-making power, where two-thirds are necessary to carry it through the next session. That is to say, they sought to kill Texas by a side-blow. But what shows their desperation is this: that they attempt to direct the President, in virtue of their Executive (or treaty-making) character, how to construe a joint resolution of both Houses, adopted in their legislative capacity. How can these men pretend to talk of what “best conforms to the provisions of the Constitution,” when this very resolution of Mr. Berrien does not itself conform to the constitution, but flies in the face of the most obvious constitutional distinction, between the treaty-making and the legislative powers?—It is indeed a curious position which the Whigs occupy. After Congress have passed a joint resolution, one branch (the Senate) would assume the power of advising the President what it means, or rather, that it means something, which violates the Constitution! Such, however, is their eagerness to defeat Texas, that they will resort to any expedient, however desperate. People of Virginia, you see what you are to expect from these Whigs at the next session. We will baffle their designs, however, and secure Texas to the Union. [MLD]
but one candidate and concentrate the whole vote upon him is unworthy of the concentrate the whole vote upon him is unworthy of the confidence of the people

Away with him! “let no such man be hereafter trusted!”

"SPRING ELECTIONS.—The Spring Elections are rapidly approaching, and it behooves the Democracy of the State to be preparing for the contest. Important issues are at stake—questions vitally affecting the rights and interests of the people are to be passed upon. Our motto has ever been, “Principles, not men,” and we wish to see the Republicans standing up to the mark at the next Election. The success of Republican measures, and not the mere triumph of man over man, are we to fight for. We are to seek for the extension of correct principles and not the elevation of certain individuals, however valuable their services may have been heretofore. We are to strive for the triumph of measures, not men—the success of Republicanism over Whiggery—Democracy over Federalism, and the principles of Jefferson over the high-toned Federal notions of Hamilton. Will our friends throughout the State drown all minor difficulties, discard personal preferences, and make a united and determined effort to secure the triumph of our long cherished Republican principles? What will our friends in Harrison do? Will they suffer themselves to be distracted by commotions in our ranks, and thus fall an easy victim to our political enemies? We hope not. What will our friends to in the Scott Senatorial District? Will they not heal the apparent breach in our ranks, and rally to the support of our cause on principle, overlooking the claims of particular men, and the wishes of political aspirants? In every county and district in the State where dissensions exist where aspirants wish to gratify personal feelings at the sacrifice of our principles, or jeopardize the success of the party, we hope the people will take the matter into their own hands, and ‘rule off’ all such stubborn and headstrong partisans, and teach them wisdom by experience.—The man who will endanger the success of our party by pressing his personal claims, should be looked upon as a traitor to the best interests of his country, and receive the censure of all honest men. By such conduct he shows that ‘self,’ dear, precious self, is his first consideration, and all things else must bend to his desires. Mark such men—let them be known and treated as our enemies, enemies more dangerous because they nestle in our midst. We say, in conclusion, Republicans, arm for the conflict! Put on the whole Democratic armor and prepare for the contest! Let us have a majority of men good and true in the next Legislature, so that we may secure the election of a Democratic Governor, and be able to place a fair exponent of the wishes of our people in the U.S. Senate.”

"Democratic Meeting.—We have been requested by a number of our Democratic friends to give notice that there will be a meeting of the Republican party at the August a court-house, on the 4th Monday of this month, (court day.) A full attendance requested."

"Col. Hiner is a candidate for re-election to the House of Delegates from the county of Pendleton."

Such are the staunch men whom the people of Virginia ought to send into their next Legislature. [MLD]

MESSRS. BOTTS AND SEDDON IN GOOCHLAND

To the Editors of the Enquirer:

Goochland, Monday Night, March 17

The first encounter in this Congressional campaign was here to-day. The judgment, as to which champion had the better, will depend entirely upon what rule of judging a person adopts. Those with whom loudness of voice, confident and unconsidered assertion, and more than kingly loftiness (not to say arrogance) of look and manner, pass for strength of mind and correctness of though, must give the palm to Mr. Botts. Such as like sound, clear reasoning, carefully ascertained facts, all clothed in chaste and forcible words, uttered with becoming modesty,—will award the victory, beyond measure, to Mr. Seddon.

Never did I see a face, which assumes so much the appearance of absolute infallibility, as the face of Mr. Botts does in speaking. It swells and glistens with indignation, at the bare idea that nay one should be audacious enough to differ with him. Every feature, and every tone says, with all the eloquence of a Salt-river roarer, that he would chaw up, if he could, the man who dares to think differently form Mr.Botts. Pity but you could have heard his argument (as he would call it,) to prove that the annexation of Teas in the way that Congress has taken, is against the constitution! It consisted, almost entirely, of a whole thunder-storm of abusive epithets against the measure. You may have a pretty good notion of it, by turning to Swift’s Tale of a Tub, and reading the “argument,” by which Lord Peter proves a piece of dry bread to be good, fat mutton: “I say, this is Mutton! And if you were not a parcel of d—d fools, you would see that it is. And if you don’t take it and eat it as mutton, may G—d everlastingly d—n and confound you all!” (I quote only from memory)

To mention but one of Mr. B’s reckless assertions: He said, that the repeal of the 21st rule had produced no harm, nay, rather good to the Sough; for, that, since the repeal, he believed, not a single Abolition petition had been presented. Now, if you will look into last Saturday’s National Intelligencer, (for the country,) you will find a list of the petitions presented by Mr.B.’s particular friend, J. Q. Adams, during the session, regularly numbered, amounting to largely over 200; and of the four or five that I examined in the list, nearly all were Abolition petitions.
THE TEXAS QUESTION IS YET OPEN!—Its NOT YET SETTLED!

This was affirmed, and proved, by Mr. Seddon; and admitted, or I should rather say most positively asserted, by Mr. Botts.

Mr. S. said, that it was important to have in the cause in various ways the question might again come up from there, for the action of that body. Texas might accept our offer of union, but with some qualification, which of course have to be decided upon by our Congress. Or, a motion might be made there next winter, to repeal the joint resolutions, by which she is proposed to be annexed. In either of these cases, a member who believed the annexation unconstitutional, would be obliged to vote against it. Or, Mr. S. said, that when Texas, in pursuance of the joint resolutions, should frame her constitution as a State and offer it for the approval of Congress, some such embarrassing and exciting question might be raised about it, as was raised about the constitution of Missouri in 1819: when the Union trembled on the verge of dissolution. In such a juncture, all those who thought annexation itself unconstitutional, would, of course, vote for anything that would frustrate annexation. And in any of those cases, where would Mr. Botts be found? He who is opposed to our annexing Texas in any manner, but especially by legislative action, as being against both expediency and the constitution? The Texas question, therefore, is deeply involved in this contest.

Mr. Botts, in his reply, burst into that tempest of hard words, which I before attempted faintly to give you some idea of; denouncing annexation as every way monstrous—as unconstitutional, unwise, and un-everything. In short, I wonder he did not say with Dr. Syntax, that it “upset the categories, and overturned the predicaments.” He concluded that the Texas question was by no means settled: that if it should come before Congress in any form, (as come it must,) he, if a member, would oppose annexation.

My language is very tame, compared with Mr. B’s. I should vainly attempt a rivalry of his thunder-and-lightning style. For most of his epithets, however, see the R. Whig, passim; and especially the letters of Il Secretario—who, as I heard a Whig of high standing say the other day, is a very clever fellow; "but," added, he, "to talk of making him a Professor in the University, is the best joke that ever happened, except that of a man’s bequeathing five pounds to pay off the national debt of England.” The fluency with which Mr. Botts pours out his plentiful streams of invective, reminds me of that noisy and passionate blade in the Odyssey, who is sarcastically asked,

"What God to thy untutored youth affords Such headlong torrent of amazing words? May Heaven delay thy reign, and cumber late So bright a genius with the cares of State!” [MLD]

From Another Correspondent.

For the Enquirer,

Seddon and Botts met yesterday. Seddon, at Botts’ request, leading off in a speech of two hours. Seddon first touched on the Bank question, which he considered as for the present lifeless; but if there were any power which should hereafter revive it, he was ready to aid in again destroying its existence. He next took up the Tariff question, advocating a tariff for revenue only; and as to protection, such as was only a necessary consequence of a tariff, and equally apportioned among all the great interests of the country. He considered this to be the view presented in Polk’s Inaugural, and as such commended it. The Texas question he considered unsettled, either in he event of Texas acceding to Milton Brown’s resolutions, or preferring the plan of the Senate’s amendment. In the other, of course the whole matter still depended on negotiation.

In this connection, he spoke of the impropriety of sending to Congress a man, form whose associations in Congress such inferences might be drawn, as from Botts’. He spoke of Botts’ peculiar attachment to John Q. Adams—his selecting that gentleman to present his contesting petition—his invitation to the dinner given to Botts, &c.—Botts rose, as you may imagine, in a great rage. He said he had rather keep Adams’s company than such as Seddon kept, for which remark Seddon at once stopped him, when Botts declared he meant no personal indignity, &c.—He thought that a remark of dams’ which Seddon had quoted, was not only as Seddon called it, “fiendish,” but hellish—nevertheless, it arose from the old Puritan spirit, which could not brook finance. Adams was no Abolitionist—he knew him better than any body else—he would have considered it the highest honor for Adams to attend the dinner give to himself. He had requested Adams to attend the dinner given to himself. He had requested Adams to present his petition, because he thought the Whig members of Congress from Virginia were too young to manage it well. He could not trust the Democratic members, and Massachusetts was called long before Virginia in calling the States for Petitions. On the Bank and Tariff, he was ultra Federal, in his usual style of violent and empty declarations. He agreed with Seddon, as to the fact, that the Texas question was unsettled—he was very glad of it. He then went on in a sort of half-mad half-scared style of scolding against Texas and all its friends. Calhoun and McDuffie were disunionists; Tyler was every thing that was villainous. Seddon admired Calhoun, and therefore Seddon was a disunionist, too. Polk was the best of the whole set; he had driven Calhoun and his friends from the councils of the nation. The Northern Abolitionists were better States Rights men than they were: he was a States Rights man himself. When he had finished his tow hours, you may very well imagine, from your knowledge of Seddon, the scorching rejoinder poor Botts received. His defense of Adams, and his attack up on the friends of Texas, as well as his absurdities in regard to the Tariff, were most glaringly exposed. Botts went on for another half an hour, with an attack on Mr. Calhoun, and then the meeting adjourned. Seddon is determined to vote every hour of his time to the canvass, and as soon as he has head form the different counties, will announce the places at which he may be expected." [MLD]

To the Editors of the Enquirer.

THE 8th CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT.

It has been said that Republics are ungrateful—as amended by gallant Mr. Newton, Republicans are ungrateful—very! Because they have dared to question his infallibility, and dared to offer any opposition to him—dared to say that they do not entirely approve of his course. Vain and ungrateful men—How could you venture to doubt that he, "Honest W. Newton," is the wisest, the best, the greatest statesman whom this District ever gave birth to? Who, that listened to his great speech, yesterday, at Tappahannock, has the temerity to say, that Mr. Newton is not one of the "shining lights of the sunny South?" Of how I envied the man, when I heard him proclaim to his people, that, but for him, Texas—Texas would have been lost—lost forever to us—lost beyond the hope of recovery. The eight Whigs saved Texas—and he—honest and gallant Newton—influenced the eight Whigs; ergo, without his aid, Texas could never have been ours. Then let the glad tidings go forth—let the shouts of gratitude, from the Sabine to the Rio Del Norte, be heard—let Virginia and the whole South echo the shouts: Yes, "let the winds tell the tale"—the Representative of the eighth Congressional District has saved the country—saved the Union.—Now he might "die content;"—the measure of his country’s glory is filled by him—happy man.

Messrs. Editors: Newton and Hunter were here yesterday: each addressed the people. Need I comment? Would that you could have been here, in your native county—your native town—(God bless the old village!) Newton spoke first. I will not trust myself to give you a sketch of what he said, and how it was said. No—the Whigs may do that. But I will say, that a more arrogant, unsatisfactory and presumptuous effort, it has never fallen to my lot to listen to. He did not, however, forget to pay his respects to "Old Tom Ritchie."* Why is it, that the Federalists, in Virginia, always feel it necessary to attack "Old Tom Ritchie?"* I ask the question—but I can answer it: "Old Tom Ritchie" and the Federalists cannot live in peace and harmony in Virginia; hence the efforts of the latter to prostrate the former.

Gallant Mr. Newton addressed his peers about one and a half hours; but for the last half hour we (the Democrats) found it difficult to keep order; the Whigs seemed wearied. He, gallant man, had crossed the "Rocky Mountains;" he had gone to Oregon; and had gotten fairly in a fog on the Columbia river. He commenced under a cloud, and he ended in a fog, and in a fog let him stay.

Hunter arose bout five o’clock. When he appeared on the hustings, the old court-house seemed to shiver from top to bottom. The winds from the Heavens were howling loud and deep; but the people, the mighty people, proclaimed with one united voice, "We too must speak; we must be heard." Yes, and they were heard!

Again, Messrs. Editors, I must decline giving any description of Hunter’s speech. I could not do justice to his noble and eloquent effort. I will not attempt that. But never before did I so much envy (yes, envy) any man. When Hunter closed his speech, by an appeal to the South, I felt (and others, no doubt, felt it too) that I would sooner have been R.M.T. Hunter of Essex, than the "Emperor of all the Russias." This is no fancy sketch.

The mail is about to close, and I have only time to say that we shall do our duty to the cause, to the country, and to the "SOUTH"

Tappahannock, March 18.

*T.Ritchie is old enough to distinguish a "hawk from a hand-saw"—an ambitious Federalist from an honest Patriot—a politician who has changed his coat once or twice in the course of his mortal career, from a statesman who is true to Virginia and her interests. He is young enough, too, to feel sufficient energies in his nerves to defend his own principles, and to defy the whole Federal party, with "honest Willoughby Newton" at their head. [MLD]

For the Enquirer.
TO THE DEMOCRATS OF THE ALBEMARLE DISTRICT.

We are now at crisis in this district, which threatens a complete discomfiture in the Congressional contest. The apathy that pervades our ranks, arises from personal predilections, and the seeming injustice done to the counties of Orange and Greene, from the mode of voting in the Convention which nominated Shelton F. Leake. I regret much to say, that this spirit of discord is not confined to the rank and file of the party, but some of distinction, who heretofore have been faithful sentinels on the watchtower, announcing the approach of the enemy, have sheathed their swords, and retired to their tents. Among these, are some of my friends, and it renders it more mortifying to me, that I believe them to be enemies of their own political family. Yes, retired to their tents, when “the Philistines are down upon us,” and we, at such a time, are to be short of our strength by the compatriots of our Democracy. But let us inquire, is this a part of our duty, to become inactive, because the mode of voting in a Convention does not fill exactly our measure of justice? As one, I denounce the mode of voting in the convention as unjust. Further, I believe the delegates appointed by some of the counties were for the purpose of sustaining a nominee without a full exposition of the people’s preference.

But the die is cast, the enemy is fully arrayed against us; and it is wise, is it just, is it patriotic, to throw down our weapons, halt and inquire, how came we to be organized, or how were the officers appointed, or, like Cato before the Roman tribunal, when inquiring why he revolted, the bold exclamation was, “That the Romans, and not he, were the aggressors, since they had sent, instead of dogs and shepherds to secure their flocks, only wolves and bears to devour them.” This is not the language of a patriot, either political or military. But if we are desirous of a defeat, such a course will infallibly insure it. We all have our predilections for men and for modes. But is it not our duty to lay tem down on the altar of our country? And so long as the Democrats will assemble around that shrine, victory will rejoice to perch on her standard.

The Texas question is one that should awaken us to all our energy, independent of the decisive frown which should ever mark the Democratic brow towards the unhallowed waywardness of Federal croakers. But suppose we consider the Texas question as settled, should the Democracy, by their own act and deed, place the wreath of victory around the brow of J.K. Irving, who, in the last Presidential campaign, and in the contest now waging, opposed it upon the grounds of expediency? Inquire of yourselves, voters of the District, are you willing, by your apathy, to produce such a result? Are you willing, by your apathy, to reward by remaining at home, on the 4th Thursday in April next, J. K. Irving, for opposing and, along with them, the Lone Star, with its incalculable wealth?—Or, with the gratitude we owe to Shelton F. Leake, for the zeal, energy and ability employed in the last Presidential election, rally to his support? Is it not our duty to rise from our slumbers, shake off the discord that hangs about our skirts, call up the soul-stirring spirits and to sound the parting knell of disaffection? Let energy and conciliation be our watchword, and the eagle emblem of a Republican victory will perch on our banner, whilst the enemy’s will draggle in the dust, as a strict administration of justice.

SPRING ELECTIONS—Organization

The Democratic Central Committee will public their Address, in the course of this week or early in the next, to the People of Virginia.—They will pay their respects, of course, to the late Address of the Whigs.

We lay before our readers, in this morning’s paper, the names of the country Committees, who were appointed by the Democratic Legislative Convention. They are earnestly and respectfully advised to meet forthwith, to organize themselves, to extend their number, and to spread their members in every part of their county. They are requested to exert themselves for the success of our Republican candidates—to rouse the people—to spare no efforts to carry their districts or counties—to concentrate the votes upon one candidate only, where there is but on Representative—and wherever there should unfortunately prevail too great a competition among the candidates, or nay schism in our ranks, to strain every nerve to rule off superfluous candidates, and restore the union, harmony and energy of our party. No time is to be lost, and we earnestly recommend it to our committeemen everywhere to be up and adoing.

We have some snarls in our party—some candidates too many for the demand, and too dogged to accommodate themselves to the true interests of the party. We respectfully recommend all such cases immediately to the consideration of our Country Committees. One of the cases to which we lately alluded, is the strong Republican county of Monongalia. Upon that subject, the Margantown Mountaineer of the 15th has the two following articles.

“A short time since, we borrowed the Richmond Enquirer, (as Father Ritchie has forgotten to exchange with us,) and observed a lecture to the candidates of this county especially, after a few faltering remarks upon us “in particular.” We intend to publish it for the benefit of the Republican party, but he paper has been mislaid, but we remember the substance of the appeal which was. “hold a convention, rule off all the candidates but tone, and if any man would dare to raise his voice against the nomination, throw him over the fence and let it be a lesson to all refractory spirits hereafter.”
"This is sound doctrine, and we most heartily endorse it; and coming as it does from Thomas Ritchie, the father of the press in the Union, the people of the county will en masse approve it.—They are already pursuing that course, n there will not be a dissenting voice to the nomination. The plan is not yet agreed upon, and thee is a general feeling to postpone the matter until March Court, when we can all meet, and in two weeks the nomination will be made, and Monongalia will be where she has been and always will be, leading the van. We will then bring out our chicken. It is a beautiful bird and Chapman shall crow."

Again—"It affords us pleasure to say to our friends at a distance, that everything is right in Monongalia. Discord has been banished, and all the candidates have but one feeling, and that is submission to a Convention. We heard tow of them say this week, that they would rather be defeated a thousand times by Convention than have a Whig elected. We pride ourselves in the ‘Old Vanguard’ on our stern Republicans; and when Monongalia is named in any part of the Commonwealth, she is classed with the ‘Tenth Legion;’ and shall our ancient character be lost? Not if all the candidates act in accordance with their pledges. We have confidence in them, one and all; we would be proud to battle for anyone in the thickest of the fight; if it would be necessary, we would traverse the whole country, and urge the people to the polls. But to be nominated, is to be elected without opposition; and we will support the nominee, whether he is our choice or not—and this is the feeling of ninety nine hundredths of the Democracy of the county."

(Our friend of the “Mountaineer” might very well have saved us the hit of “Father Ritchie,” or the complement of “the Father of the Press,” &c. But he shall no longer have to borrow our paper. It will be put upon our exchange list, as we supposed it had been done before. We shall be amply rewarded for any little service we may do him, by his telling us in the next Mountaineer, that all is peace and well in Monongalia.)

There is still some snarl in Harrison county. At least, the “Scion of Democracy” says, “we expect the Democracy of Harrison will do something on Monday with reference to their county candidate, and we hope also that the number of candidates for the Senate will be diminished. If it is not done, we shall endeavor to show that some gentlemen are more anxious for office than the success of the party to which they attach themselves. With regard to this Congressional canvass, we have only now to say, that if the Democratic party mean to carry the district, they must display more zeal, activity and energy than they seem disposed to do. May we tell them, emphatically, that the district is in danger? We will strive for success in the person of our candidate, and after the battle is fought, if we have any complaints to make about that candidate, we will make them then. If every member of the party will pursue that course, he will have the gratification of knowing that he was superior to the personal objections and differences.”

Organize, then, is the word! Organize everywhere. Let us beat the Whigs, and save the State from their misrule.

The New York Express, as most of the other Whig prints, which have spoken upon this question, is anxious to see the administration open the negotiation with Texas, under the amendment of the Senate. We confess, we prefer the other mode, if it be agreeable to Texas—and it seems to us sufficiently easy to ascertain that fact. We concur with the Glove, that President Tyler and his Cabinet ought not to have taken any action under those resolutions, on the very eve of its dissolution. The whole matter ought to have been turned over to the new President, who would have ample time to consider the subject, and to frame the instructions in whatever form and at whatever time he though the public interests require. We are free to say, that this was the course, which it was expected things would take. But it does not, therefore, follow, that Mr. Tyler had adopted the wrong alternative.

From the information which we have received, we incline towards the immediate settlement of the question, under the House Resolutions, if it be agreeable to Texas. We had understood that Maj. Donelson approved this mode of adjustment, and expressed the opinion that it would be acceptable to Texas. The N.Y. Morning News seems to state the fact differently. There is no difficulty, however, in consulting Texas upon the subject, in such a manner as not to cut off Mr. Polk from either horn of the alternative, which he and the Republic of Texas may prefer. A little frankness alone is necessary to ascertain that fact. It requires no diplomatic subtlety, no finesse, no double dealing in the matter. We have no advantages to gain over Texas. All that we want is to promote the interests of the two countries, which are fortunately not in collision with each other; but it is very desirable for us, to close the matter as quick and as easily as possible; to avoid all further agitation in our own country, and nay renewal of the controversy at the next session of Congress.

The N. York Express is offended with Mr. Yler’s course; and, moreover, informs its readers “that the Senate have passed a resolution calling upon the President for information as to the condition of our relations with Mexico. Mr. Allen wished the resolution modified, so as to leave the communication of the information asked for, to the discretion of the President; but she was defeated, his proposition obtaining only six votes.

“It is further proposed, we are told, to direct the President to take immediate measures for the revocation and nullifying of all proceedings in the premises, assumed by John Tyler, and now in the process of consummation; directing, also, that the President shall submit to the Government of the Republic of Texas the amendment of the Senate, to the Joint Resolutions of he House, as the plan for the Annexation of Texas.”

We should doubt the accuracy of this last piece of information, because we very much doubt, whether the Senate (through the Treaty making power) could understand to direct the President in carrying out a proposition, which did not emanate from the treaty making power, but was a Joint Legislative Resolution of both Houses of Congress. We should suspect, therefore, that the Express has probably made some mistake in the matter.
For our own part, we repeat, that we cheerfully leave this whole question with Mr. Polk. He has no inducements to swerve his judgment, and we cannot doubt that he will take the wisest course which circumstances require. The public creditors of Texas may not like the House Resolutions so well, because they would prefer their debts to be immediately paid; but, as was remarked to us the other day by a citizen of Texas, “let her come in now, and if it be found best hereafter for both parties, (for Texas and the United States,) that Texas make over her lands to the United States, and the United States to pay her debts (by founding them,) nothing would be easier to do it subsequently by a fair and honorable compact between them.” [MLD]

OUR RELATIONS WITH MEXICO

The New York Herald says: “we have seen a long letter published in some of the papers, written by Caleb Cushing, probably with a view to its publication, giving his views on the present position of the United States and Mexico, growing out of the annexation question. According to this gentleman’s opinion it is improbably that any difficulties will spring from the resolutions passed by the last Congress. He thinks that Mexico is in no position to make war against the United States when she was unable to carry on an offensive war with Texas alone. This is quite probable. He also states that there is no probability of Mexico issuing letters of marque and reprisal, because such a movement would be condemned by the European Governments as an act of piracy. He is probably right also in this opinion.” Right also for another reason—that, as the French Admiral did, we should feel ourselves authorized and compelled to do, viz: to hold every such vessel to be a pirate, which had not the greater portion of her crew of Mexican seamen—which, of course, she would be unable to supply. A few English crews, tucked up at the yard arm, would effectually end the letters of marque.

We need not be alarmed by this bugaboo humbug, which the Whigs are attempting to get up, of a war with Mexico. Great Britain, too, will not risk any interposition, at the hazard of involving herself in a war with the United States.

True, she is anxious enough to defeat the annexation of Texas. We hear it as a well-authenticated fact, that Mr. Packenham intended to have a great fete at Washington, in case the Resolutions were defeated—and, of course, his Whig guests would have been there, to chuckle over the defeat, and congratulate his Britannic Majesty’s Plenipotentiary on the success of tier opposition. But the firing of the one hundred triumphant guns on Capitol Hill apprized him of his disappointment, and dissipated his magnificent fete into thin air.

The Washington correspondent of the N.Y. Courier and Enquirer is probably behind the curtain in the secrets of the Green Room. He writes or the 9th as follows:

"Gen. Almonte, the Mexican Minister, at 3 o'clock yesterday, P.M., addressed a note to the State Department, complaining of the late act of congress, resolving to annex Texas, which he considered an act of hostility to the Mexican Government; and in conclusion demanded his passports. In the course of the Day, Gen. Almonte sent a formal letter, addressed to all the Foreign Ministers near our Government, remonstrate in the name of Mexico, against he resolutions of Congress for the admission of Texas.—the letter is written with some poignancy, and displays no little shrewdness. It is the intention of Gen. Almonte to sail from New York for his own country in the course of ten days.

"Last evening at a concourse of the Foreign Ministers, this subject was discussed. Though in some respects their opinions varied, in one they all agreed—that the men who now ruled the affairs of the Mexican nation had characters for intelligence and respectability. They are men of discretion and of experience; and though among the people of Mexico, there would be much exasperation and no little complaint of the conduct of our Government, still they thought that the administration would not recommend any hostile measure towards our nation. The most it would insist on, would be an indemnification from our Treasury for the loss of Texas. Satisfied with this, it would abandon any belligerent intention towards our Government. It may be taken for certain that the Mexican Government will grant no letters of marque—no licenses to afflict our embroiled with her in a naval warfare, with out implicating England, whose navigation would suffer as much as the American from such a state of things."

A Subsequent letter from Washington, to the N.Y. Courier and Enquirer says:

"It is understood that a reply has been made by our Government to the protest of General Almonte, and that it has been framed upon the precept that ‘a soft answer turneth away wrath.’ The Mexican Minister spoke of the annexation of a province of Mexico as ‘an unparalleled outrage;’ our Government passes by this harsh language, and seeks to smooth over the wrong, which no argument can justify."

"No argument can justify!” So says the Whig press—although Texas is as independent as Mexico is—as free to contract alliances—as “free, sovereign and independent,” as we were after the battle of York Town. [MLD]

The last New Orleans mail continues to express some doubts about the course of the Republic of Texas. "The Tropic," (a Whig press, which has feebly inclined, and only now and then, in favor of the measure,) comes forward on the 15th to state, that "The jubilations of some of the rampant annexationists may yet be dashed to the ground, and, what is worse, the blow may come from an unexpected quarter. If the outpourings of some of the Texas papers afford any indication of public sentiment in that Republic, the question of annexation is by no means settled."—If by "rampant," be meant ardent and devoted friends Texas, we cannot include "The Tropic" in that category. We should rather think it is now expressing its hopes, more than its fears.

But now so, with the New Orleans Bulletin of the same date, which, though Whig in its general principles, has always been true, like the needle to the pole, to the great cause of annexation. It has been ardent and devoted to the measure—firm in its purposes—just and enlightened in the means which it adopts. That respectable journal addresses the following manly letter to "The People of Texas." It is not only honest in its views, but what it says is enforced by the soundest reasons of State Policy. It breathes hopes, but is not destitute of fears. We cordially concur in its representations. We, too, claim to be the ardent friends of Texas—her friends, when immediately on the commencement of General Jackson's Administration, we pressed the re-acquisition of her country by the American Union—her friends, when she raised the Banner of her Independence—her joyful admirers, when she won the brilliant victory of San Jacinto—her friends, when at the instance of Mr. Memucan Hunt, her Charge d'Affaires, and others, we waited upon Gen. Jackson, on the morning of the 3rd of March, 1837, to beg him to grace the last day of his administration by recognizing the independence of Texas; and when the petitions of the other friends of Texas, concurring with his own enlightened views, induced him to nominate La Brance as Charge to Texas, within one hour of his close of his power—the friend of Texas, her unaltering, her anxious friend, when we urged the adoption of Mr. Tyler's Treaty, and form that day to this, have never ceased to devote our energies to her service. And now, when we were on the eve of annexation, as we all supposed, here come new signs of the times upon us, creating doubt and some uneasiness respecting the movements of her government. The official "Register" has urged grounds against an acceptance of our propositions, which, if they are allowed to prevail, are calculated to defeat annexation forever. The New Orleans Bulletin has answered these objections by irresistible arguments, in the following article. We adopt its positions. We respectfully urge its due consideration on the people of Texas. Let them be assured, that the United States do not mean to take any advantage of her. Let her accede to the terms which have been offered, and we pledge ourselves to co-operate with her in obtaining, by future compacts, any liberal or honorable terms, which may be compatible with the justice and character of the United States. Nothing will be easier, than to adjust, by such compact, any question which may arise about her boundaries, her division into her States, her Indians, her public debts, and her public lands. We give her citizens welcome to all the rights and privileges, to a full participation of the great power and the high character of American citizens. Let her be bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. The name of Virginia is as proud a one as that of Texas—yet, Virginia has become, and will continue to be, a proud sovereign member of the Confederacy of American States. To the same relation, we cordially invite the people of Texas: [MLD]

From the N.O. Bulletin.

TO THE PEOPLE OF TEXAS

This journal having so long been regarded among you as your steadfast friend and advocate, in every vicissitude of your fortunes, and having suffered what, probably, no other journal in the United States has been subjected to, no little obloquy and reproach, on account of its unremitting efforts I support of your claims to admission into the Federal compact, and of the general policy, expediency and propriety of that measure; we trust it will not be considered officious or immodest, if we venture to address ourselves thus directly to you at a crisis so interesting and important as the present moment.

By the same conveyance that this will reach you, you will receive authentic intelligence, that the combination of adverse influences and circumstances which has so long operated to prevent your admission into the Union, has been at last overcome, the Legislative and Executive branches of our Government having united in a measure to give expression to the desire of the country, and provide for your restoration to the Republic.—Now it is anxiously feared by many of your friends, and exultingly hoped by your enemies, that the terms of this measure of Union will not be acceptable to you, but will be rejected by you, and thus the proposed measure of union, instead of being immediately consummated, be placed at greater hazard than before, if not forever defeated. We do no profess to share in those apprehensions, though the tone of your Government press is well calculated to awaken anxiety, and especially to grieve those who have relied on your attachment to your native country, and to the Federal Constitution, as the basis of their efforts to obtain your admission to the privileges and protection which the Union guaranties.

It is sure, that the bill which has passed through the forms of our Constitution, and acquired, as far as the assent of this country is concerned, the force at once of a law and a compact, is not without its points of objection. It may be true, that full justice is not without its point of objection. It may be true, that full justice is not done by it to Texas; and that it is not, in all respects, the magnanimous and liberal offer which it would become this great country is concerned, the force at once of a law and a compact, is not without its points of objection. It may be true, that full justice is not done by it to Texas; and that it is not, in all respects, the magnanimous and liberal offer which it would become this great country, under all the circumstances, to make you.—Let us grant all this. Let us grant, that more is required of, and less guaranteed to you, than ought to have been proposed. Will that warrant you in declining the position which you have sought, and which you have sought, and which has been gained with so much labor and difficulty, through so much contumely, and with so sincere a desire for your welfare, in connection with that of our common and beloved country? We venture to respond to this query, most emphatically, No. If a participation in the advantages of this Union is desirable to you at all, it is desirable under the bill which has been adopted in Congress for your admission. Under that bill, you will attain an exact equality with the other States, and that is all you could reach under any circumstances. As to denuding your selves of your nationality, and sinking your separate existence, against which such earnest appeals are made to your pride, it is, of course, indispensable to a connection with this Government—and, indeed, is no more than every one of the original States of this Union did for itself, rightly considering that the advantages to be derived from a common and united government were infinitely above those fanciful considerations that were then held out to them and are now held out to you, and that, in fact, the greatness which would spring out of the union of the States would reflect more real dignity and character on its several members, than they could by any means attain to as petty sovereignties. The States of Virginia, with a territory as large as your own, and which now contain a population, numbered by millions, and divided into several distinct States, did not disdain to part with a portion of her sovereignty for the sake of the security and character to be gained by mean of the confederation. Neither did Massachusetts, nor New York, nor Pennsylvania, nor Connecticut, nor the Carolinas, nor Georgia, all having sufficient territorial limits, and existing as well formed and solid communities. Would any one of those States derive additional importance in the estimation of the world, or in any way consult its prosperity or dignity, could it withdraw, even in the advance and improved conditions to which they have all attained, and become a distinct sovereignty? No, no, there is no State in the Union, as familiarly as a dissolution of the sacred bond is sometimes talked of, which the other twenty-seven could drive from its portals, or which, being out, would not sin to a deplorable insignificance, and sue for re-admission.

The same circumstances that make it desirable for Louisiana or any other State of the Union to rest beneath its shadow, render it also desirable to you. We will not say that your country does not possess the elements of a distinct and commanding nationality; we will not say, that in the conflict for political power and for commercial and territorial superiority, which are springing up, you will find it impossible to maintain your independence. But we will say, that you cannot attain to the one, nor maintain the other, except through a painful and protracted effort; that you put at hazard all your political and social systems by the irritation of a population, which, whatever its merits, has habits, inclinations and interests incompatible with your present relations; that you cannot, as a distinct power, enjoy either the repose or the security necessary to a speedy development of the resources of your country, or of a realization of the hopes which led you to emigrate thither; that you cannot participate to nearly the same extent if the great changes which are now prosecuting and in anticipation, for the amelioration of commercial and social intercourse, and the general advancement of mankind, as if you were co-workers in this confederacy, and shared in its triumphant progress; that, as the population of your country and the opening up of your resources will certainly not be as rapid, so neither will your welfare be well secured, or be settled on as enduring a foundation; in short, that, in no imaginable contingency, can you attain, as Texians, the same prosperity at home, or the same estimation abroad, as you will at once reach, under that name of pride, of honor and renown, that is now offered you, and at the sound of which your bosoms has been wont to exult—that of AMERICAN CITIZENS. Let us not to be misunderstood. We mean no reflection on the Texian name. We have too often rebuked the revilers of your country, and called to mind the recollections of bravery and patriotism, and the unequalled act of magnanimity, which distinguish your annals, to be suspected of such a thought. But it is not undervaluing that name to say, that it cannot become an appellation of the same significance and estimation as belongs to the citizens of this Republic.

We need not remind you, the greater part of whom were so long familiar with the practical workings of our system of government, of the inherent difficulties that impede the consummation of such a measure as that of extending the confederacy in a particular direction of the prejudices the passions, the apprehensions, the jealousies which, under the most favorable circumstances, must be met and overcome. If you add to these the peculiarly unfortunate position which the question of your admission was made to assume in the conflict of parties, and the factious and vindictive opposition that was thus necessarily engendered, you may form an idea of the difficulties in the way of the friends which the incorporation of your country into the Union have contended and prevailed. Can you be surprised or chagrined, then, if, in the progress of the question, the friends of the measure found it expedient to yield some points which they had been glad on account of the United States as well as of Texas, to incorporate into the act of admission? The act which finally prevailed, to make way for your reception, was agreed upon in the same spirit as that in which our Union was framed, cemented and is maintained—the spirit which animates all our important movements, maintains the equipoise of the States, settles all internal disputes, and in which, if you would enter our great family, you must share—the spirit of compromise and conciliation. In that spirit you are invited to embrace the offer that is held out to you; and if it be not all that could be asked, not to take cautious exceptions to its terms, but to trust in the generosity and sense of justice of the people of the U. States after you are entitled to participate in their councils, and to address them by the endearing title of countrymen. Your confidence will not be misplaced. If you come into the Union under the resolutions which have been adopted, you will undoubtedly receive more favor and consideration at the hands of the country than in any treaty or bargain you could drive.

It has been represented in your public prints, that even after having complied with the terms of the act of Congress, disrobed yourselves of your nationality and dissolved your existing Government, you are still subject to the mortifying alternative of a rejection at the threshold of the union. This is not so. The act of union is complete when you signify your assent to its provisions—The formal acceptance by Congress of the Constitution your may adopt as a State, is indeed requisite under the Federal Constitution; but you become to all intents a part of the country—"annexed," since the term has become popular—the moment you have complied with the proposals moment you have complied with the proposals that have been sent to you. You are more secure in your position than a territory of the Union: because, in your case, the time is fixed for your admission, and the preliminaries settled; whereas the pleasure of Congress is the only law that is known to our territorial organizations, in regard to their admission as States.
We have not written this hasty and crude appeal to you, because we have any doubt of your disposition to come into the Union, or that you will cordially embrace the invitation that is held out to you, but because we know that the most powerful arts of persuasion and menace will be employed to induce you to throw away the opportunity, and we would assure you of the interest with which the course of events in your country is watched. We have advocated your incorporation into the Union, for the reason, that we believe your claim to admission to be founded in justice, and also that he welfare and renown of our common country will be advanced by the measure. The advantages, as we think, will be mutual, else we had never contended for the project.—Were your country assuming a place of less dignity and consequence, in exchanging its position as an inferior member of the family of nations, to become and important member of this overshadowing commonwealth of States, it would be with a poor grace that the invitation would be sent to you. Were our country, on the other hand, acquiring but a barren scepter, yielding no substantial benefits, and subject to be wrenched away by discord and discontent, what American so base as to endeavor to persuade his countrymen to so hazardous an enterprise? But the change will impart consequence, security and prosperity to Texas; while it will increase the prowess, give defense to the frontiers, extend the dominions, consolidate the interests, and, if there be any virtue in experiments fully tried, promote the harmony and strengthen the bonds of the Union. IMPORTANT MOVEMENTS IN ENGLAND

Duties of our own Government

The Globe shows, by the late news form England, how that power is softening down in their policy towards the United States—in regard to our commerce, as well as on the claim of the right of search. The Globe says: "The reduction of the duties on cotton, and the discrimination in favor of the sugar raised in the United States over that produced elsewhere by slave labor, imports much; and the speeches in and out of Parliament, urging still further reductions in the duties on the agricultural products of this country, which, even under the existing Tariff, flow into England in vast quantities, promise, at an early day, the adoption, as the settled system of England, of that which the Democracy of the United States has urged as the only true financial and commercial principles, viz: trade unfettered by any other than a strictly revenue Tariff. The doctrine of protection for monopoly is alike abhorrent to the masses of both countries; and the effect of this feeling is evidently reaching both Governments."

"Even the London "Times," commenting on the Prime Minister's speech, admits, that "the present reductions are only the steps to a more comprehensive plan now under contemplation." And it concludes by stating, that "The freest possible exchange of commodities, and the imposition of taxes only for revenue, are made the basis of a scheme which we think it due to the financial acts of the ministry to publish even in its present imperfect shape." (These are indeed important revelations!)

"There is another national point, (says the Globe,) in which the policy of the Democracy has had a triumph over the diplomacy of Europe, aided by the treachery of some who, thank God, no longer hold power in this Government. We allude to England's pretension to the right of search, which she attempted to bolster by a Christian league of all Europe. This league was preached like a crusade against the United States, in the name of a war against the slave trade.—One of the last acts of Mr. Stevenson, while minister in London, representing he administration of Mr. Van Buren, was his bold, powerful, eloquent letter, exposing the design, and refuting the principle on which it was attempted to assert, under a new name, the usurpation of the right of search. General Cass, our minister in France and Great Britain. The last arrival brings us the result of the bold and patriotic resistance of which were betrayed at home by the Anglo-American power, installed in our Government by the unfortunate elections of 1840.

" Wilmer & Smith's European Times, of the 4th of March, has this notice of the changed aspect of this question:

"The right of search—that irritating surveillance of the high seas, which has proved of late years an endless source of annoyance to American shipping—is virtually at an end. The commission which has been appointed on the part of evil, may throw dust in the eyes of the Exeter Hall saints, but it will assuredly deceive no one else. For all practical purposes, the power is against the principle, that no ministry can withstand it; and some of the most clear-headed of English statesmen think, that not only does this obnoxious right of search constantly keep us on the confines of a collision with the U. States, but that, so far from mitigating the horrors of the slave trade, it has actually increased it."

The change in the tone of the British Cabinet on this subject, is justly supposed to have arisen from the late language of Mr. Guizot, the French Premier, to the British Government. He speaks of the "powerful ad formidable national sentiment" (in France) against this pretended right of search—and Lord Cowley, the British Minister in Paris, writes thus to Lord Aberdeen, on the 18th January last (1845):

"A great change had taken place in the opinions of the Chambers, as well as of the public generally, upon the question of the right of search. It would be useless, he said, to enter into any examination of the causes which had led to that change; he would only say, that the prejudice existing throughout France against he exercise of that right was unconquerable, and was daily increasing.”

Whilst these changes are going on in England in favor of liberty of commerce and the immunities of our navy, it becomes us to do our own part. Our new Secretary of State is placed in a condition to distinguish himself. Not only is he called on to keep down Mexico and admit Texas into the Union, but to meet the overtures of England for free trade. If we are invited to adopt towards England “the freest possible exchange of commodities, and the imposition of taxes only for revenue,” then it will well become our Secretary to meet them more than half way. The present Administration has indeed most important duties before it. It will be in its power to give freer and more vigorous wings to our commerce, and to open new and more liberal markets for our productions. Look also to the North of Germany, to the Brazils, and to China for theatres of great and expansive development to our commerce and home industry. For example:

“The Washington Constitution regrets the non-confirmation of the Zollverein treaty, and the more, because ‘it is understood here,’ it adds, ‘that Mr. Pakenham has been invested with power for negotiating, upon reciprocal and equal terms, a treaty, by which there may be an exchange of the surplus products of both countries to the mutual advantage of each.’ The Baltimore American says: ‘If such a disposition to treat has been manifested by the British Government, the probability is that the Ministry begin to perceive the necessity of a reduction or the removal of the duty on American cotton; and for this measure of necessity, forced upon them by the demands of their own manufacturers, they would be happy to obtain concessions on our part, as though they were about to proffer us voluntarily a favor.’” (This remark was made by the “Baltimore American,” in anticipation of the news by the Cambria.)

But the suspension of the Zollverein gives our Secretary of State an opportunity of collecting the best information from the most intelligent agents we have in Germany, as to the best means to regulating that trade. Our commerce with the North of Germany, is susceptible of a vast augmentation, under proper regulations, and with a proper spirit on the part of our merchants.—An intelligent Correspondent wrote us the other day, that if we had a representative in Berlin from the South, who understood our tobacco interests, we might make arrangements for introducing 25,000 hhds. Of tobacco more per annum, than we now carry. The trade in that article alone (one of the staples of old Virginia,) has been on the increase for several years. For instance, we only shipped to Bremen in 1833, 75 hhds. Of stems; this increased in 1840, to 1,158 hhds. Of tobacco, and 876 stems; in 1842, to 4,573 tobacco, and 2,294 stems; in 1843, it fell off to 3,013 hhds. Tobacco and 1,534 stems. Judicious arrangements on our part, to collect the best information, in order to assist the next Congress in making the best regulations and laying revenue duties, would enlarge our commerce considerably in that important commercial region.

The Brazils, too, with her coffee, sugar and other productions, given in exchange for our flour and domestics, open another important field for the secretary of State to act in. And who shall set bounds to our commercial relations with China—with her teas and silks in exchange for our manufactured fabrics, and all sorts of notions?

Mr. Polk says, his is “a working Cabinet”—and we congratulate our friend, Mr. Buchanan, on the vast field which lies before him, for enlarging his won fame, and for extending the commerce, manufactures and agriculture of his country. Scarcely was there ever a more brilliant opportunity presented to any secretary to effect those objects.

The great movement of the age seems to be in favor of free trade. It becomes our duty, placed as we are in a young and free country, to set and example of this principle; and especially to encourage it, whenever other nations relax their restrictions and strike for greater freedom of trade. [MLD] wool is unavailable, for the purposes of manufacture, and is necessarily waste, the duty, of course, presses with increased severity upon that portion of the whole amount, which is capable of being used for manufactures. It is estimated, and I believe the estimate to be a reasonable one, that we ought to add one-sixteenth more to the five-sixteenths, in order to calculate the full amount of duty paid upon the whole of the cotton wool that is actually manufactured in this country. Six-sixteenths, or three-eighths of a penny per lb. weight would, therefore, be the total amount of duty paid on cotton wool. Now, when the price of cotton wool is four pence per pound, on the average, three-eighths of a penny per pound, is a duty of nine per cent on the value of the raw material. If the price of cotton wool be as a duty amounting to not less than 12 ½ per cent. On the value of the raw material. This duty so levied falls with peculiar severity on the coarsest description of cotton—(hear, hear)—upon the fine muslins you can hardly estimate the amount of duty, it is so small; the coarser the fabric and the more it is in common wear, the higher is the amount of duty. It is in respect to the manufacturers of this country are exposed to the most formidable competition in South America and China, and even in our own colonies—(hear, hear.) Of course, in respect of the manufactured cotton of the United States, we labor already under great disadvantage from the ready access which the people of that country possess in the raw material, and they are formidable competitors of ours in all the coarser descriptions of cotton goods. * * * I know it will be said that this trade is now in a flourishing condition, but we must not disregard the formidable competition to which it is exposed, (hear, hear;) we must consider how materially this cotton manufacture has contributed to the strength of the country, (loud cheers)—how materially it aided in enabling us to go through successfully that great conflict in which we were some thirty years ago engaged, (cheers)—what thousands and tens of thousands of persons there are who are indebted to it for their occupation and subsistence. Seeing and considering these things—seeing the amount of duty imposed upon the coarser fabrics—seeing the extent of competition to which they are exposed—seeing the importance of this manufacture to the commercial greatness of this country, we are prepared to advise the abolition of duty on Cotton Wool—(loud and long-continued cheering.) The estimated loss to the revenue by the abolition of the duty on cotton wool—taking as a guide the amount received last year—will not be less than $680,000." A member asked how soon it was intended that this change should take effect. Sir Robert Peel replied, immediately.

Thus our great staple is a once, and voluntarily, to be relieved of the burden which it has been bearing in England; amounting recently to a no less sum than $3,400,000 per annum. This will, I am persuaded, be joyful tidings not only to the cotton planter, but to the entire agricultural interest in the United States. The stock of cotton in Great Britain, which is but little below 900,000 bales, is to receive no benefit whatever from this abolition of duty; and, therefore, prices must slightly improve in our markets. The producers of the article, in the present condition of the world, cannot reasonably expect what were heretofore regarded as high rates for their crops; but they may expect living and uniform ones. Let them continue to cultivate their fields faithfully, and they will assuredly, in a few years, drive their feeble competitors—Brazil, India, Egypt, &c.—entirely form the European markets. This advice I have repeatedly given them through the columns of the Enquirer, an time has tested its soundness.

The financial movement of Sir Robert Peel will fall with peculiar severity upon the manufacturing interest of the "German Commercial League." The manufacturers in the states composing it, could not sustain themselves against the competition of England, while they had no duty to pay; and what is to become of them, under the removal of the weight of duty with which the English manufacturer had to contend, amounting, as is show, form 9 to 12 ½ per cent., cannot be readily foreseen! Even while they were favored by such advantages, they never were able to make their own twist, or to enter into the first stage, successfully, of manufacturing from the raw material. In speaking of the absurdity of the provisions of the Wheaton Treaty, in my letter of 31st of March last, I said, "The chief object of the Germanic Association, at least, as far as expressed, is to foster the manufacturing establishment embraced within its boundaries. It would, then, be a suicidal policy for it to tax the raw material, which is to build them up, and give them permanent duration. It is, therefore, an absurd belief, to suppose that the Zollverein, either now or 'in future,' will lay an impost on raw cotton. The United States, on that score, have not the slightest favor to ask," &c., &c. Yet, strange as it may now appear, it was heralded over the country, in all directions, that the American Diplomat had achieved a mighty triumph in getting the Zollverein to concede that "no duty should be laid upon cotton." As I am speaking of the German Customs Union, I will take occasion to remark, that the United States have but one concession to ask of it in its Tariff of duties, and that is, to admit tobacco on the same terms as Hanover does—say at 69 cents on the 100lbs.—In return for this, under a general revenue act—to a differential treaty—I should be happy to see the duty on its various manufactures modified to 15 per cent. Ad valorem.

What will New England think? What will the world think now of British philanthropy?—Will it not henceforth be regarded in its true and proper meaning, which signifies, British interest? No one, however charitable in his feelings, can bestow upon it any other definition. Slave grown cotton, and slave grown sugar, have diametrically opposite meanings in John Bull's vocabulary, because, forsooth, "thousands and tens of thousands of persons" are indebted to the former for occupation and subsistence," and the "country for its commercial greatness," while the latter interferes with his West India plantations, &c., &c. The Abolitionists and manufacturers of the North must be incurably blind, if their eyes are not now opened. All Europe is shocked at the brazen effrontery of Great Britain, in urging the abolition of slavery as a measure of philanthropy, after this new development of her selfish policy.

The annexation vote has created no sensation on this side of the water. The British Press is unusually silent, both in relation to Texas and Oregon. The "London Chronicle," which was so fierce for a war on these questions a year ago, in a recent editorial dolorously remarks, among other things:

"Colonel Benton, on whose rivalry with Calhoun and whose opposition to slavery people counted, in order to divide the Democrats, and defer, if not defeat, annexation, has, on the contrary, declared for it, on the proviso, that Texas is to be divided into slave States and non-slave States. Such has been the compromise proposed by Missouri. And such is the nature of the resolution, which passed by 120 to 98." Speaking of Oregon, the same journal says: "The veteran Quincy Adams declared, with his wonted impetuosity, that the American claim was too manifest to be longer postponed, and consequently he would recommend his country to fly on, Macduff."
Let the people of the United States be true to themselves—Whig and Democrat uniting on questions concerning the durability and safety of Union—and they have nothing to apprehend from abroad. I am encouraged to believe, by my accounts per the Cambria, that measures were adopted by Congress, which would give us jurisdiction, or will at an early period, over Oregon and Texas. If this has been done, rely upon it, the nation will enjoy repose, hereafter, and be on better terms with G. Britain than it has since it had existence.

Yours truly,

AGRICOLA.

America Rivalling France!

Gaynor, Wood & Co., Druggists, have supplied our Toilette with soap and shaving cream, as white as snow, and delightfully flavored with bitter almonds. Our Barber, who is a thorough adept in the mysteries of his important profession, pronounces a high eulogy upon these beautiful compounds. They are manufactured in Philadelphia by Roussel, whose name indicates his French origin, and proves that, with all the evils that, in Whig assertion, flow from our liberal naturalization laws, the country receives much benefit from the accession of European talents and industry. We are glad to see, that in New York the Whigs are coming to their senses on this subject. What will now be the course of a certain Whig organ in this neighborhood, whose rabid attacks upon the poor foreigners almost equaled its bitter denunciations of the annexation of Texas? With Mr. Roussel’s fine soap, we shall keep our hands clear of all contact with such a monster as Nativism. [MLD]

Which is the true version?

A few days since, the Richmond Whig said that Texas had had “the effect of defeating Mr. Clay, and overwhelming the Whig party.” In its leading article of yesterday, it “devoutly wishes Texas was the other side of Cape Horn!” But, strange to say, in another article of yesterday’s Whig, the Editor professes to rejoice at the assumed gain of the Whigs of New York in their town elections, and adopts the language of the N.Y. Tribune, a most rabid anti-Southern journal. The Whig says: “The Texas iniquity (listen, people of Virginia!) has done it, and it is going to produce yet more extraordinary results!—They who compassed that national disgrace, if they live long enough, will live to repent it in sackcloth and ashes.” The Whig is right—but the “extraordinary results,” so far from ensuring to the benefit of the anti-Texas party in Virginia, will act with redoubled force against them; and will, again, in the language of the Whig, “overwhelm the Whig party,” that oppose a measure so heartily desired by a “large majority of the people of Virginia.” The Whig may rest assured, that, so long as Texas continues in the Gulf of Mexico, and be not removed, by some magic influence, to “the other side of Cape Horn,” it will be the fixed fulcrum whence to move the great American nation. This prominent question will work out its own end, and will crush the puny whiglings who may resist its powerful momentum. [MLD]

ADDRESS OF THE DEMOCRATIC CENTRAL COMMITTEE, To the People of Virginia!

Another political campaign has commenced. The important considerations involved in the contest, make it the duty of the Democratic Central Committee appointed by the Legislative Convention, to address such remarks to its political friends in the states as may serve to explain the principles and conduct of the two great parties which divide the country. The course pursued by the Whigs of Virginia and the majority of the last Virginia Legislature, should also be placed in its true light before the people. When that is done, we hope that he Democratic party will require nothing more to stimulate its zeal, and lead to the adoption of such an organization as will make its action united, harmonious and efficient.

The victory of 1844 leaves much to be done before we are freed from the control and influence of misguided men. We still have foes to encounter, dangers to meet, and obstacles to avoid. Not only in our own State, but throughout the Union, we see a party formidable in numbers, and strengthened by the vast influence of incorporated wealth, directing all its energies against those rules of constitutional construction and principles of public policy, on which the freedom, happiness and prosperity of the country depend. However much the different portions of that party may vary, in the arguments by which they endeavor to justify their measures in the different portions of the country, it should be remembered that they strive for the attainment of a common object, and, that their successes to give a character to our Government in its practical operations, which the framers of the constitution could not have anticipated.
To avoid this consummation, the Democratic party has directed its whole energies. From an early period in our history to the present time, it has contended, that, from the nature of the compact which unites the American States, the General Government, created as an agent, and entrusted with prescribed powers, must confine itself strictly within the commission conferred by those who called it into existence. In every attempt to carry out this principle in the practical operations of the Government, it has met with formidable opposition. A considerable portion of the people acting at different times, under different party names, have contended for such a construction of the Constitution, as would empower the Federal Government to sit in judgment on the Constitution itself, to destroy its guarantees by implication, and perpetuate injustice by giving abiding force to precedent established by itself. This construction, predicated on the supposition that the people of the States of this confederacy were consolidated, by the adoption of our federative system, into one body politic, with a government acting as the representative of its sovereignty, is fraught with the most dangerous consequences. The doctrine, if fully established and carried out in practice, would convert our State into a mere district or department of the United States with its reserved rights under the control of the very Government to which it refused to surrender them, and all its domestic interests at the mercy of men responsible to a distant constituency for their public conduct.

The principles were once so alarming to the great body of our people, that the very name of the party which professed them became an epithet of reproach. But since the defeat of the younger Adams, which was thought a final overthrow, the principles of his party, aided by fortuitous circumstances, have been made more acceptable to the nation. All the elements of opposition to the administrations of Gen. Jackson and Mr. Van Buren were forced to act in concert with those who had supported Mr. Adams. Although the party thus formed was composed of such discordant elements that it could agree on no homogeneous system of policy, it found a powerful ally in the extreme distress and consequent desire for change produced by the derangement of our monetary affairs; and succeeded in electing Gen. Harrison to the Chief Magistracy of the Union; who had declared a National Bank to be unconstitutional, and stood pledged to regard the compromise of the Tariff as sacred and inviolable. The Whig party, which united its forces and gained the control of the government by professing the leading principles of the Republican faith, as soon as practicable, carried through Congress a Bank bill more objectionable than any which had preceded it—distributed the proceeds of the sales of the public lands from an exhausted treasury—violated the compromise of the tariff, and framed a scale of duties at war with those which both parties had solemnly pledged themselves before the country to support, as the permanent policy of the Government.

A common name and the labors of an arduous contest, had the usual effect of uniting those who had co-operated with each other. Party discipline and the well-known necessity of supporting a particular candidate for the Presidency, completed this consolidation, as far as it was practicable.—But, happily there were many over whom party names had no force and party discipline no control, who saw the tendency of the measures forced upon the Whig party by those who represented the incorporated wealth of the country, and resolutely opposed the party which had duped and deceived them. The Whig forces, consolidated by the process which we have endeavored to explain, were compelled to adopt the principles of a majority, sanctioned as they were by the concurrence of the man who stood most prominent as their leader.

The effective majority of the party being at the North, determined the course of the Whigs, not only on the Bank, Tariff, and Distribution questions; but, at a later period, succeeded in arraying it against the most important question which has agitated the country since the formation of the Government. The non-Slaveholding States, did not leave the reasons of their opposition to the annexation of Texas in doubt or obscurity. Hostility to the slave institutions of the south, and a determination not to allow their further extension, were boldly and unequivocally proclaimed to the world as the basis of their action; and the Abolitionists were distinctly invited, in the name of the whole Whig party to lend their aid in a common cause. It was not pretended, to our knowledge, that the rights of the North would be endangered, its interests compromised, or its prosperity impeded. The Whigs of the non-Slaveholding States thought themselves privileged to sit in judgment on the character of the South, and of making it the duty of the Federal Government to take, under its supervision, the domestic institutions of the high contracting parties who created it, as a mere agent, for other and far different purposes.

This issue was distinctly made, and it was to be hoped, that no Southerner would be induced by party consideration, however strong, to be wanting in his duty, when our rights were thus endangered, and our honor likely to be compromised. This hope was not fulfilled. The Whigs of the South, true in party discipline, co-operated with the Whigs of the North upon this vital measure. They endeavored to justify their conduct by such shallow arguments, that we were compelled to believe nothing, except party discipline, could have placed them in a position which they could but so impotently defend. Although Texas had maintained her independence for a number of years, and had been received into the family of nations by the leading powers of Christendom—although she was confessedly independent by the forcible destruction, by Mexico, of the only instrument which united her with that Republic—although she had been victorious in resisting a conquest, and not in effecting a revolution, it was contended that the U. States could not treat with her for territory, without committing an act of spoliation on a friendly power—a power which had attempted forcibly to subdue the country that we wished peaceably to annex to our confederacy. An ordinary treaty of peace and amity, was, contrary to the law of nations, made an insurmountable barrier to such a proceeding, while ideas of national honor, before unknown, were heard on every side form lips which uttered no word of reproach to Great Britain, though it was generally conceded that her Majesty’s Government was ready to perpetrate the alleged wrong on Mexico, by guaranteeing the independence of Texas against he world.

When opposition to a great measure is so badly defended, we must believe that some cause, not apparent on the surface, is at work. And when we see so many members of that opposition railing against the measure because of the influence it was calculated to have over the result of a political contest, all doubt vanishes. We are then convinced that party policy and party discipline have usurped that position which belongs to reason and judgment. The motives which regulated the course of the Northern Whigs, on the question of annexation, are
The necessity of uniting the party on a great question, if it would triumph, is equally plain; and the line of policy adopted by the Whigs, in consequence, as we believe, of that necessity, should be remembered by the people long after all agitation on this subject has finally ceased.

Before dismissing the question of annexation, we must call the attention of the people of Virginia to the action of the Whig members of the last Legislature. It becomes our duty to do this, since the resolution of the Legislative Convention, imputing to them a covert design to defeat the joint resolution brought forward by the Hon. Milton Brown, has been made the pretext of explaining their course on that and other occasions. The task of proving that the Whig members of the Legislature desired to defeat a Democratic measure, is indeed novel, and may serve to throw light on the character of the Whig party of our State.

It is well known, that the members of the last Legislature were elected without reference to this question. The elections took place before the Democratic party had selected its candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency of the U. States, and resulted in returning a decided Whig majority to the House of Delegates; the Democratic party maintaining its ascendancy in the Senate. The Legislature, thus elected, convened after the defeat of the Whig party in November, and then when the Texas question, in despite of the most strenuous exertions, was carrying every thing before it. During the whole canvass it was viewed as a purely party question, and had triumphed in Virginia by the election of Mr. Polk. We will not stop to discuss what course the Whig majority in the Legislature should have pursued. It is plain that they should have either considered the popular vote given in the State as instructions, and endeavored to obey them, opposing the annexation of Texas, should have used their best efforts to defeat the measure. They contend that they did not take the latter course. It only remains to be seen whether they endeavored in good faith to effect it, or endeavored to place obstacles in the way of proceedings which they did not wish to take the responsibility of defeating.

The first move in this question was made by the Senate. That body passed a resolution declaring, "That the annexation of Texas to the United States should be effected with no further delay than may be necessary for the accomplishment of that object by the constituted authorities of the two countries." Not a Whig member voted for it. This resolution simply says, that the sense of the Senate was in favor of immediate annexation by the constituted authorities of the United States and Texas. No constitutional question as to the mode of proceeding is either raised or decided. And, consequently, the Whig party of the senate were committed, by their party votes on that occasion, against the measure, independent of constitutional scruples. Of this fact the Whig Address makes no mention. The Whigs in the lower House laid this resolution on the table, and none of them made any effort to call them up. Two-thirds of the session of Congress had expired, and there was an ascertained desire on the part of the Whig members in our Federal Legislature to defeat the measure if possible. Three days afterwards, a member of the Democratic party moved to take up the Senate's resolution, when every Whig but there voted against it. Of this fact the Whig Address makes no mention. The three days after this unsuccessful attempt, another motion was made by a Democrat to take up the resolution, when every Whig but two voted against it; one of whom had received positive instructions—of this fact the Whig address makes no mention. Notice was then given that similar motions would be made daily until the end of the session, unless the Senate's resolution was acted upon. Then a Whig member brought forward a substitute to the resolution in these words:

"Resolved, That the annexation of Texas to the United States ought to be effected at the earliest period that may be practicable, consistently with the welfare of the State and the obligations of peace of the Union, and the faith and honor of the country; and, that this General Assembly, reposing entire confidence in the ability and patriotism of the Senators of Virginia, rely upon them faithfully to discharge all their obligations to the State and to the Union upon this question." The Senate's resolution simply sanctioned the annexation of Texas. The substitute, it will be perceived, does not—except upon certain contingencies, of which our Senators in Congress were to be the judges. Men are not swayed by doubts when their minds are determined—and hence the conditions indirectly destroyed the effect of the resolution; for they intimate, without asserting, that he General Assembly did not feel assured that annexation could be effected consistently with the welfare of the State or the obligations of the Constitution—consistently with the peace of the Union or the faith and honor of the country. In fact, solemnly enacting, that it was doubted by the General Assembly, whether it was expedient or constitutional, safe or honorable, to annex Texas to the United States. Would same men adopt such a course, in order to accomplish a desirable object? Was not this plan of mooting many questions and deciding none, equivalent to declining all action, and calculated to defeat annexation, without meeting the question presented in the Senate's resolution, fairly and candidly?

On the motion of a Democratic member, the resolution above recited was amended by an addition, stating that the conditions mentioned would be performed by the joint resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 25th of January. Pending the debate on the substitute and amendment, they were referred to a select joint committee. That committee could effect nothing, and was discharged. Both the resolution and amendment were withdrawn, and the senate's resolution was carried; thirty-four Whig members voting in favor of it, and thirty-one against it. That resolution, it will be borne in mind, mooted no constitutional question, but simply declared the sense of the Senate to be in favor of annexation. If the Whig members were originally in favor of that resolution, why did all those in the Senate vote against that body? If he members of the House of Delegates were in favor of it, why did they encumber it with implied doubts as to whether the interests of Virginia would be injured, the peace of the Union, the good faith and honor of the country be compromised? These questions cannot be answered on the hypothesis that the Whig members acted openly and in good faith, either to carry out or destroy the measure. And yet, in the face of these facts, we find that the authors of this Whig Address claim credit to their party for the motives which actuated them in referring the resolution to the House, and its amendment to a select committee, because it might lead to "the suggestion of a resolution which might receive a vote approaching as nearly as possible to unanimity, and which it was assumed, would for that reason carry with it greater moral public sentiment, as well as upon our Senators upon whom it was designed more directly to operate, than could possibly attach to a resolution, adopted, if adopted at all, by a strictly party vote, and by a bare majority." We will examine further into the history of this matter to see if the members of the Whig party desired to give moral weight to, and influence public sentiment in favor of, a measure which had been so unanimously opposed in the Senate, and clogged with such remarkable conditions is in the lower House, by men who insisted on pretermittting the constitutional question by expressly raising it, for the purpose, it seems, of making known their doubts to the Senators.

After the adoption of the first resolution on this subject by the Senate, and before the action on it by the House of Delegates, information of the passage of the Hon. Milton Brown's joint resolution had been received; and it is but fair to presume, that the Whig members of the Virginia Legislature were informed of the position occupied by our Senators in Congress. Here, then, was some definite proposition to be acted on. No one could fear to commit himself to any particular mode of annexation, lest it should be the mode adopted by Congress; whilst the constitutional scruples of our Senators (Mr. Rives and MR. Archer) must have been known to their political friends in Richmond. Immediately we find the Senate's resolution, which the Whigs had twice voted against taking up, by a strict party vote, showing concert and arrangement, brought to the consideration of the House. After the proceeding the Senate's resolution was adopted. Before this period, no expression of opinion could be obtained for or against the constitutionality of annexation, in any manner. The information arrives, that Mr. Brown's resolution is the manner determined on in Washington, and immediately the opposition assumes a definite shape. The expediency of the measure could now be admitted, though denied previously by the Whig Senators. Hence forward, the joint resolution is the thing to be opposed.

As the next move, Mr. Gordon offered the following resolution: "That the admission of Texas on the conditions and guaranties set forth in the joint resolution passed by the House of Representatives on the 25th of January, 1845, and sent to the Senate for its concurrence, in the opinion of the General Assembly, is just and proper, and will be approved by the people."

This resolution which, like that of the Senate which had been adopted, made no mention of the constitutional question, would not suite the Whigs, although they had insisted on pretermittting that question and made that desire the basis of their opposition to the Democratic party. Accordingly, a leading Whig ember brought forward a substitute covering the whole ground of Mr. Gordon's resolution, with this addition: "This General Assembly, however, forbearing to express any opinion as to the constitutionality of annexation by the mode of a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress."—This substitute, suggesting again the constitutional doubt, for the express purpose, it seems, of not deciding it, was adopted by a strictly party, vote; too Whig members only voting against it the one instructed, and the other virtually instructed. Does this look like a desire to influence public sentiment in favor of the measure, or a wish to make known to our Senators the fact than the General Assembly had doubts as to the constitutionality of the joint resolution, and wished to throw those doubts against the resolution? We will presently show that those doubts did not exist in the minds of those who wished to parade them before the world.

The substitute above recited was passed by a party vote, and a resolution was offered instructing our Senators to vote for the joint resolution which passed the House of Representatives on the 25th of January. This resolution was rejected by the Whig majority. The substitute which had passed the House with the constitutional doubt attached to it, was amended in the Senate: 1st, by declaring the joint resolution "lawful and constitutional;" and 2dly, by striking out the last clause which brought forward the constitutional question. The House refused to concur in those amendments. A committee of conference was then appointed by the two bodies. The committee of the Senate proposed to withdraw the first amendment, if the House committee would agree to the second. This course it will be seen would have led to the adoption of that resolution which would have made no mention of the constitutional question. But even this would not satisfy those who did not wish to commit themselves. They would only consent to it themselves. They would only consent to sanction this arrangement on condition that the fact that the General Assembly forbore to express any opinion, on the constitutionality of the joint resolution, should be stated in the report of the committees to their respective Houses—thus against in forming the country in terms that our Legislature was not prepared to sanction the annexation of Texas. This Senate's committee very properly rejected this proposition, which ended all action on the subject. It has generally been thought that legislative action was based upon the convictions of legislators. It was reserved for the Whig Legislature to encloud their functions by enacting what they did not believe.

It will be seen, from the sketch we have given of the legislative proceedings on this matter, that up to the time of the passage of the joint resolution by Congress, the Whig party in the Legislature had not given any opinion, even ads to the expediency of annexation. Every effort to bring up the question had failed. In the Senate, they were committed against it, even on that ground. But when the joint resolution was passed, the could safely yield the ground of expediency, and by reserving the constitutional question, allow the Virginia Senators in Congress to oppose the very measure, which, in their new born zeal, they pretended to admire so much.—But why reserve this constitutional question?—One would be led to suppose from the Whig Address, that the majority of the Legislature entertained some doubt on this head; yet the gentlemen to whom eth action o the Whigs on this subject was entrusted, has informed the public, through the public prints, that many members of his party in the Legislature agreed with the Democrats. Indeed, from his communication, he seems to doubt but they constituted a majority of his party. Be it remembered, that four Whigs, in addition to the two who voted with the Democratic party on the resolution instructed our Senators to vote for the joint resolution, would have been sufficient. What, then, but party drill, acting upon party subserviency, could have thus defeated the known wishes of a large majority of the members of the Legislature?—And why was this party drill used, if the Whigs really desired the annexation of Texas to the Union, and acted in good faith in voting unanimously in favor of the "conditions and guaranties" of the joint resolution? It taxes ingenuity beyond its power, to imagine any but "a covert design to defeat eth measure"—a design which was no where avowed, and which led to the rejection f the only effective action by a party vote, when many of that party were known to have no constitutional scruples whatever. The Whigs seem to have been driven, by political necessity, to oppose before the people a measure they wished to advocate, and were compelled, by public opinion, to end, by seeming to advocate a measure they wished to defeat.
The Whig Address, to which we have frequently alluded, after defending its party action on the resolutions touching the annexation of Texas, contains an attack on the Democratic members of the State Senate for not voting for a joint order for the election of an U. S. Senator on the 13th February. The Federal Constitution contains the following words: "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote."—Thus much of the Constitution the Whig address quotes in order to show that it was the imperative duty of he last Legislature to fill the vacancy that would be occasioned on the 4th of March by the expiration of the term of service of the Hon. Wm. C. Rives. "For," says that Address, "if this Legislature should refuse to make such election, then it is very clear that from and after the 4th of March next, the Senate will not be composed of two Senators from each State, for their will be but one Senator from Virginia; and that the successor to Mr. Rives will not be chosen as the Constitution requires he should be, for six years; but for such portion of the six years (counting from the 4th of March next) as may remain unexpired at the time when the election shall actually be made." These are the words which convey the whole argument of the Whig Address on this subject. The clause of the Constitution immediately following the one above recited, and which has a direct and important bearing upon the question, is omitted through accident or design. It is in these words "and if vacancies happen, by resignation or OTHERWISE, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

This clause of the Constitution provides a mode by which its requirements can be fulfilled by the Executive, when the vacancy occurs, as the present vacancy did occur, during the recess of the Legislature. It was known that the General Assembly would adjourn before a vacancy occurred in our senatorial representation, and that an Executive appointment would fulfill there requirements of the Constitution, no matter how imperative they might be as to the number of Senators or their terms of service. Had the vacancy occurred during the session of that body, we contend, the Executive could not have made an appointment, the terms of the Constitution could not have been complied with, and our representation would have been, deficient according to the Constitution. Those who produced such a state of things might have been held responsible to the people for a dereliction of duty. But this is not the case; perhaps the vacancy was anticipated during the recess of the Legislature when the Executive was empowered to fill; the words by "resignation or otherwise" comprehending every possible mode by which a vacancy could occur. It was known to every member of the Legislature worthy of his seat in that body, that a case would happen which the framers of the Constitution had foreseen and expressly provided for. And we contend, that the mere fact that this event, thus foreseen and thus provided for, was allowed to happen, cannot be considered as contrary to the spirit and meaning of the Constitution, which had taken care of such an event, and expressly sanctioned the proceedings it might make necessary. The Whigs consider the first clause of the Constitution, touching this subject, to be imperative, making it the duty of each State to have TWO representatives in the Senate elected for six years. If this be so, then the second clause which recognizes the validity of Executive appointments to fill vacancies which may "happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the Legislature of any State," leads to the irresistible conclusion, that the command is obeyed, and the requirements of the Constitution complied with, both as to the number of Senators and their terms of service, if no contingency is made to happen, not provided for by the Constitution. Unless the second clause of the Constitution, cited above, is thus construed, and allowed to explain the first, then Mr. Rives had no right to a seat in the Senate, for he was not elected for six years; and, according to Whig doctrine, the Constitution was violated when he took his oath of office.

We frankly admit, that it is advisable to fill vacancies in the Senate of the United States by a joint vote of each Legislature, instead of an Executive appointment, even in those cases in which the Executive is empowered to act, and that nothing but grave considerations of public policy should lead to a different course. But we earnestly contend, that grave and adequate considerations of public policy sanctioned the course of the Senate. The Presidential election of November last had shown that the State of Virginia approved the principles of the Democratic party. A majority of the counties in the State had voted for the Democratic nominees; and it was a measure of the last importance that so decided a majority should not be misrepresented for six years in our national councils, when great measures were at stake. It was anticipated that all the leading questions which have agitated the country would be permanently affected the legislation adopted during those six years. An administration sanctioned by the people of Virginia, and of the Union, because it entertained certain principles, was about to take the reins of power. The Senate was nearly equally divided; and the election of a Whig Senator from this State might give the opposition the entire control of one branch of Congress, and thereby negative the expression of popular will in November, and endanger all those measures that popular will had so distinctly demanded.

Under this view of the position of the last Virginia Legislature, and under the true constriction of the Federal Constitution, we contend, that the action of the Democratic party was right and proper, and called for by the best interests of the country. Had the conduct of the Whig party been equally defensible, the Senatorial election would have caused but little difficulty. We believe, notwithstanding the views which the Whig Address promulgates, that party was willing to make the election of a Senator depend on party considerations, by showing a disposition to defeat an election, unless it was certain of success. It had selected the 22d of January as a fit and proper time to hold an election; and when he day arrived, the joint order agreed o both by the House and by the Senate, was evaded by an adjournment—thus leaving the performance of what they considered a high constitutional obligation to depend on future contingencies. True, this happened at an early period in the session; but it happened at an early period in the session; but it should be remembered, that the Whig party had determined that this was fit and proper time for the election. Yet, these men arraign the Democratic party for not contracting to do, the very thing which the Whig party would not do, when pledged by the concurrent vote of every one of its members on both branches of the Legislature. The matter of time being left out of consideration, they justify themselves for not performing what they conceived to be an imperative command of the Constitution, and arraign the Democratic party for taking a course sanctioned by that instrument. They justify themselves for thwarting the wishes of an ascertained majority of the people, by the strange plea that they wished the state to be fully represented, and arraign the Democratic party for taking a course which was calculated to place the whole matter before the people themselves at our Spring elections.
We will now examine the whole history of this matter. It should be remembered that at the commencement of the session neither party could command a majority on joint ballot in a senatorial election. At this period there were three contested elections—one from each of the counties of Bath, Caroline and Fairfax. In the contest from one of those counties a Democrat, and in the town last Whigs, had been returned. In the first case, the Whig Committee of Privileges and Elections reported in favor of the Whig contestant. This gave the Whigs a majority of tow on joint ballot. Having performed thus much, the committee rested from their labors for a reason.

In the contest from the country of Caroline, no report was made by the Committee, until after the attempt to make the senatorial election, and a few days before the termination of the session. The report then made, giving the seat to the Whig member, was never acted upon by the House, and the contest was never terminated. In the case from Fairfax, although the eligibility of the sitting member had been contested though te petitioning member had been contested: thought e petitioner had sworn to his belief of the charge submitted, and adduced testimony to prove it, the committee asked to be discharged from its consideration. Subsequently, another petition was presented, new testimony adduced, and the whole matter again placed before the committee. Notwithstanding this, without giving notice to the Democratic party of any intention to fix a day for the election of a Senator, on the 16th day of January a resolution was offered to proceed with the election in six days thereafter. This was more than six weeks before the expiration of the term of the present incumbent and when it was known that the contested elections, which might alter the character of the majority on joint ballot, could not possibly be decided, before the day fixed on for the Senatorial election. In addition to this, the Whig majority was distinctly informed that one of the Democratic members was absent, and that he could not be notified of the proposed proceeding in time to return to his post. The Whig party, knowing what day they would select, could have informed their absentees thereof, before any move in the House was made to notify their opponents of their intentions. The fact that members were absent, was held not to be a sufficient reason for delay in an important matter. Yet we will presently see that his is the only excuse made by the Whig address for the course of its party in breaking the joint order for holding the election.

Two days after this resolution was sent to the Senate, a motion was made by a Whig member of the lower House, to discharge the Committee of Privileges and Elections form the consideration of the case from Fairfax; and a motion was made to instruct the Committee to report either for or against the member. Even this reasonable request was rejected: every Whig but two voting against it. This saviors of injustice, and accords badly with the vaunted desire of the Whig Address to see the State fully and fairly represented. On the same day on which this unfair course was adopted, a motion was made by a Democrat, to enquire into the eligibility of the Whig member form the District of Wood and Ritchie counties, on the ground that he was the Commonwealth’s Attorney in the Circuit Superior Courts of those counties, and that he held lucrative office within the meaning of the Constitution, which provides that “all persons holding lucrative offices, and ministers of the Gospel, and priests of every denomination, shall be incapable of being elected members of either House of the Assembly.” A certificate was exhibited form the Auditor of Public Accounts, proving that the member referred to had received his compensation as Attorney long after his election to the Legislature. Although the law was thus plain, and although the current of decisions pronounced that and similar offices lucrative offices within the meaning of the Constitution, and persons holding them ineligible; and although sufficient evidence was adduced to sustain the fact alleged, the Whig majority would not allow the matter to be enquired into, without coupling with the motion an amendment, directing the Committee to enquire into the eligibility of every member in the House. This solemn trifling was not only unworthy the representatives of an intelligent constituency, but had the direct effect of a refusal to allow the inquiry to proceed, by rendering any report from the Committee impossible. As might have been foreseen, no report was made, and a few days before the close of the session the Committee asked to be discharged.

Notwithstanding these disadvantages produced by the utter disregard, by the Whig members of the dignity and responsibility of Legislators the dignity and responsibility of Legislators, the Democratic Senate concurred in the resolution for the election of senator on the day fixed by the Lower House. It is objected, that the Senate pursued an unusual course, by retaining the resolution, with out acting upon it, until the very day fixed for holding the election. But it should be remembered, that the same course has been pursued in other elections, and that there is nothing improper in such action. The House had suggested a day for an election. The members, it was to be supposed, had so fixed the day because it suited their convenience, and to have been aware that such would be the day, unless some other was suggested. The Senate, very properly, did not act upon the resolution at once. For, had it done so, the day fixed upon could not have been altered without the concurrence of the other branch of the Legislature, however desirable such an alteration might become. If the Whig party suffered any thing form this course, it only proves that its members did not believe that the Senate would going to the election at that time, and had not provided for an election when they fixed the day: the only rational motive for such conduct being a desire to entrap the Senate in an unpopular proceeding, while pretending to discharge a high constitutional duty. But, as we have before stated, the Senate agreed to go into the election on the day fixed by the House. In that body, not a Whig uttered his voice against it. Thus both Houses agreed to go into an election. But, the Whig party in the House of Delegates, finding that a Democrat would be elected, in accordance with the wishes of the people of the Commonwealth, determined to defeat the election, even after it was commenced by putting a Democrat in nomination; and, displaying a discourtesy to the senate, adjourned without giving that body any intimidation of its intention. And now we feel justified by the facts, in contending, that the failure to elect a Senator is properly chargeable to the disorganizing course of the Whig party, in breaking up a joint order, originated by the Whig party itself under circumstances which destroy the validity of c[...ly] pled they have urged in their behalf. Believing, as they contend, that they had to obey the command of the Constitution, they made their obedience depend upon contingencies unknown to that instrument. They pretend that the State was not fully and fairly represented, yet they wished to elect a Whig Senator for a Democratic State; and had refused, in effect, to decide the contested elections, which might have changed the majority on joint ballot. The Whig Address admits that the Whig party wished to avoid an election by adjourning, and endeavors to justify that course. Why, then, did not their members in the senate vote against going into an election? Did they wish to avoid the responsibility of opposing openly a Having disposed of the Whig address, so far as it relates to the course pursued in the Virginia Legislature on the Texas Resolutions, and the election of a Senator to fill the vacancy in the Congress of the United States; we will give but a few words to the course of the Whig Party in receiving the land fund, and electing a Councilor, the other matters treated of in their address.

The question involved in the reception of the land fund, has long been familiar to the People of Virginia. In the last contest it was made a political question, and was decided by the voice of the State. The Democratic Party everywhere contended, that the act of Congress distributing the proceeds of the slaves of the public lands among the States, was in violation of the Constitution inasmuch as no sanction could be found in that instrument for such a proceeding; and the public domain was intended as a common fund, ceded originally to avoid the necessity of taxing the different States. The practical operation of the Distribution act, as well as the violence done to the Constitution, was a source of complaint. The Democratic Party could never consent to see Virginia, a stipendiary of the General Government looking with anxious eyes to the action that Government, to determine by its contribution what schemes of domestic policy the Common wealth might carry out. When the Distribution Law was passed, the Treasury of the Union was extinguished. The subject of revenue was of great importance; while the manner of raising that revenue had convulsed the whole country. The public domain was yielding a fund to the Government, which all parties agreed might properly to used to defray its expenses. With this fund at its control, about the use of which there could be no question, it was highly inexpedient in Congress to adopt such a line of policy as would deprive the Treasury of this source of revenue, and thereby create the necessity of raising an additional amount from a system of unjust and unequal taxation.

The consistency of the Democratic members of the last Virginia Legislature in sustaining in our Halls of Legislation the doctrines they advocated before the people, has been made a subject of complaint by the Whigs—indeed it is intimated that their action on this subject savors of a disposition to meddle with, and thwart the action of the General government in the legitimate exercise of its functions. T is utterly untrue. The Democratic party wishes at all times to see the Federal Government exercising, without [...] or hindrance, its legitimate powers, and eve[...] should that action be contrary to the Constitution and at war with the interests of the country with endeavor to seek redress in the constitutional modes. But, when an unconstitutional and impressive enactment is made, it will in no event tend its assistance, and give validity to a proceeding which, without that aid, would be inoperative.

Its proper to lay before the people an act of the Whigs on this subject, which their Address omits to mention. It is well known, that there have, throughout the country, endeavored to enlist the credulity of the people in favour of reciting the Land Fund. They have portrayed it glowing colors the benefits which it could effect the improvements it could create, and the blessings of education it could confer. The fund was represented as a Fortunatus’ purse, which would enlighten the ignorance of the State remove the barriers to the internal communication and which no public exigency could exhaust.—Knowing that this course had been adopted, the Senate called upon the Auditor of Public Accounts for an estimate of the amount which would be received by every white male over twenty-one years, if Virginia’s quota of the fund was distributed among them. The Auditor, in obedience to this call, stated that the sum received by each would be twenty-five cents and thirty-five one hundredths of a cent. After the adoption of the resolution to receive this fund by the House, a resolution to receive this fund by the House, a resolution similar to the call of the Senate was proposed by a member of the Democratic party, and was adopted. But the Whig party soon saw the fund on which they had declaimed so much would appear contemptible in the eyes of the people; while it was not prudent to oppose it directly. It remains to be seen whether the people will trust a party which seems to place so little confidence in them.

The next point to be touched on is the fact connected with the election of Councillor for the State. On this point we shall be brief. The character of the Democratic member who was ejected, requires no defense, for it has never been attacked. In his public and private relations even party hostility has never pretended that there was an assignable point. One would have supposed, that under these circumstances the Whig party, that under these circumstances the Whig party would not have adopted any doubtful little of policy, and that it would have declared open either for or against proscription, and, like me abide the consequences. Bu they did neither though they adopted very efficient action. They ascertained, that while the great bulk of the party wished to vote for a Whig, in the General government, a few would not consent; and without those few they could not succeed in the wishes. Hence they determined to withdraw their candidate, and reap the credit a course which they did not wish to pursue is useless to notice the objections to the re-election of Colonel Rutherfoord. The Whigs withdrawing their candidate and claiming [...] for forbearance, have declared to the world that they were not actuated by them. They have themselves declared they were not influenced by the dj[...]jy considerations which their ingenuity could discover, to justify their actions, while they contested they wee actuated by a motive which no enlightened body should for a member recognize. Indeed, throughout the whole of the session of the Legislature the professions and the conduct of the Whig party seem to have been utterly at variance—there seems to be some hidden spell upon them. Desiring to annex Texas, they defeated all effective action, though that action was sanctioned by a majority of the Legislature. In the efforts to elect a Senator, in receiving the land fund, in ejecting a Democrat from the office of Councillor, in their conduct on the contested elections—in short, in every matter of political concern, we find that indirect action which characterizes men who, with all the bitter feelings of partisans, do not wish to make a direct issue with tier opponents.

We have finished the examination of the course of the Whig party. All the facts are now before the people. It is for them to decide upon the conduct of their public functionaries. Important issues are still before the country. The victory of 1844 has not destroyed the Whig party.—It must be followed up and sustained, before it effects...

That contest was decided in favor of the Democratic principles.  The voice of the people, in elevating Mr. Polk to the Chief Magistracy of the United State, condemned a Protective Tariff, a National Bank, the Distribution of the Proceeds of the Sales of the Public Lands among the Sates, and that latitudinous construction of the Constitution on which those measures depend.  We have received the joint resolution for that annexation of Texas, as the fruit of the at victory; and the Tariff remains as the all-absorbing question now to be decided.  That resolution having been compromised, and the compromise having been violated, must continue to agitate the country until one of th great parties shall be utterly vanquished.  One ‘Treaty of Peace’ having been destroyed, without scruple or hesitation, we can see no guarantee that any other will be observed, longer than policy might require.  Firmly resolved therefore to make hostility to protection a test of political faith, the Democratic Party must look with anxiety, and yet with confidence, to the action of Congress on this subject.  We look with reason to a Democratic president, sustained by a majority not only on the floor of Congress but throughout the country, for ample redress of our long sustained grievances.

The people of the agricultural and expecting States have suffered sufficiently long under a system, which forces them to bear an undue share of the burthens of Government, whilst they see their sister States enriched, because the Government is burthensome.  That duties on importations operate as a tax on consumption, was never, to our knowledge, denied, until a necessity existed to make a line of policy palatable to our people, which had been forced upon them against their earnest remonstrances.  That being conceded, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that the labor invested in any unprotected employment must pay whatever duties may be levied and collected on the articles which it consumes, whilst he domestic producer of those articles not only avoids the payment of the impost, but is enabled by those duties, to sell a portion of his products at higher rates than if no revenue as needed by the Government.  The exigencies of the nation are thus made a source of profits to the manufacturers; for protection not only shifts the burden of Government from the shoulders, but makes her trade more profitable than it would be, if there was no burthen to be sustained by the people.  This we hold to be so unjust and oppressive—so contrary to the legitimate functions of a good government—that nothing but an express recognition in the fundamental law could give such power to our Congress.  This recognition cannot be found in the Constitution.

We admit the power “to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States;” but deny it for any other purpose whatsoever.  To provide a fund to be thus expended, being the only object recognized by the Constitution, or consistent with justice, we hold it be evident that a Tariff should not be levied for any but revenue purposes; a principle which should be made to apply in levying every item of duty.  Although revenue and protection are incidental to each other, within certain limits, yet they are hostile in their natures.  Revenue depends upon the amount of importations which comes into the country;--while protection can only be afforded by excluding a part or the whole product of foreign industry.  If a desire to discriminate, with a design to afford protection, be allowed to fix and determine any item of duty, it gives, to that extent, a protective character to any scale of duties which contains such a discrimination.  If the degree of the protection thus afforded should not amount o prohibition, the mere fact, that revenue is incidentally produced, does not prevent its being a fraud on the Constitution, as well as an act of oppression towards the people.  A principle is thereby smuggled into the government, and allowed to prescribe and control the course of legislation, though hostile in its nature to the power form which it is implied, and destructive in its operation, to the pretext by which it is admitted.  Should this point be yielded, the whole question is surrendered.  Under the power to discriminate for purposes of protection, the revenue may be destroyed by prohibitory duties.  And if the interests of the country require that the power should be exercised in one instance, and to a certain degree, we can see no reason that it should not be exercised in every instance, and to any degree, which would not force the government to resort to direct taxation, as the only means of defraying its expenses.

experience proves, that low duties, by increasing importations, afford the greatest amount of revenue, and, although protection to most articles of domestic manufacture be the necessary and unavoidable incident to any system of duties, yet we deny that this consequence is one co the Constitutional purposes for the accomplishment of which a Tariff should be framed.  It therefore becomes the duty of Congress to fulfill the expectations of the people by enacting a revenue bill, and, in framing the Tariff of duties, to make its purpose unequivocal by adopting the limit of the Compromise as the maximum duty.  The Democratic party having been once betrayed should not consent to further concession or longer delay, but ask all its energies to carry out the doctrine of free trade, sanctioned as it is by justice, and demanded by the people in the election of our chief Magistrate.  The convention which made him the candidate of the party in the late contest, by the same authority pronounced for the party against a protective system.  Having recently appointed the nation to his past history to make clear his present position, and enable us to foresee his future course, we feel assured that the president will obtain to the end that zealous support we have heretofore given him, by sustaining those views which made him the candidate of his party, and the Chief Magistrate of the Union.

With this vital question before the country—with the Joint Resolution for the annexation of Texas, not finally determined—we call upon our friends every where to exert themselves in favor of the democratic principles—principles which have been sanctioned not only by the State, but by the Union.  Every where to the North, we see the Whig and Abolition parties contending that it is lawful and desirable yet to defeat the annexation of Texas to the U.S. —and this unheard-of doctrine is sanctioned by many members of the Whig party of the South.  Under these circumstances, we earnestly recommend to our friends throughout the country, to discharge their whole duty to The Compiler adds, that it “indulged the hope, the success of the measure, during the winter, would put the matter to rest, and allow the parties to fall back again upon the old issues which marked the lines between them. Our desire that the recent Congress should settle the question, has been gratified. But the end of the agitation of it, which we had anticipated would be a consequence, we have reason to fear, ‘is not yet.’ And why should we longer discuss annexation? The Democrats desire that we should; but shall Whigs gratify them? Are they united? Certainly not. They number among their ranks, and among their distinguished leaders, those who are for annexation by treaty, (the larger division)—those we thought joint resolution of Congress the proper mode—an those who were against Texas in any form and shape, and who though that the Constitution had no where vested the power of admitting a foreign State into the U. States. Of the last named is our own candidate for Congress, in whose election there is so much involved the interest of this District, this city, and the Whig party. Is it not apparent, then, that what ever issue is made, strikes at some portion of the Whig party?”

"With what reason or propriety can we, therefore, draw the question into the spring canvass? Have we men to lose? We were beaten upon Texas in the fall, and shall the largest or either of the smaller divisions attempt to read any one of the others out of the Whig church? Shall Newton be read out? Shall Botts be read our? Shall Lyons, and Witcher, and Strother? Or shall any Whig be read out? No!—say we!—not one. The Whig party cannot afford to make issues on Texas. If they could afford to do so; if they had the men to spare, it would be neither just nor wise to make any issue; for any that may be made strikes down Whigs—as gallant and true as ever breathed the breath of life. Let all issues, therefore, upon this vexed question be frowned down, here and elsewhere. Let us save all the Whigs we can, of whatever complexion of Texas views. In this city, by a badgering process, opinions on the subject have been extorted from candidates.—While a proper self-respect and manly candor would not allow a candidate to seem to avoid, from improper motives, an answer to questions propounded—the Whig public of this city can judge whether it is proper that questions so foreign to the canvass as that of annexation shall be dragged into it. The good and true Whigs who will calmly reflect on the consequences, will unanimously frown down any such agitation. Let not Whigs play into the hands of the Enquirer and its party—Let them bury Texas so far as they are concerned. Let them go with one voice to the polls to save all the Whigs they can. Let none assume to set up Whig opinions about Texas; for in the South there is not unanimity among the Whigs; and he is mad who thinks so. ANNEXATION IS COMPLETE—the Democratic papers (the Enquirer among them) have said so—and let the Whigs so regard it. Let them war for Whig measures and Whig men Forgetting personalities and minor divisions, and going heart and had for the ‘THE UNION OF THE WHIGS FOR THE SAKE OF THE UNION’

We cheerfully let he Compiler speak for itself—and we respectfully ask, if this question is again to be agitated, whose fault is it? Talk to us about our tact! Why, we never showed so little of it, if that were the quality to guide a statesman. If it had been our object to make capital of Texas for our Spring elections, we would never have said, as the Compiler has said, that the deed was done—the annexation consummated—the whole question settled. We said so, because we honestly believed so at the time. We had hoped, indeed, that the question would be buried. We supposed there was scarcely any doubt, that Texas would accept the terms of Brown’s resolutions—would then frame her Constitution, and that the Whigs of the next Congress would conceive themselves bound, by public faith itself, to accept her Constitution, whether with or without slavery. But when new facts are developed, which we did not then anticipate—when there seems to be some, even the slightest doubt about the consummation of this measure—we should show very little tact as a statesman, or very little public spirit as a patriot, if we did not say, upon the faith of these new revelations, that the danger is not yet quite over. As at present advised, we believe that Texas will be saved—that she will probably accept the terms of the House Resolutions—and that the efforts of the Whigs, at the next session to defeat her Constitution, will probably be themselves defeated. But on a question of such momentous importance, where the weal or woe of the whole Union is concerned—where such element as have been developed within the last few days are at work—where there may be many a slip between the cup and the lip, we should conceive ourselves wholly destitute of political tact or of common candor, if we did not say there is rather more doubt about this matter that we originally entertained. We cannot be certain o the ultimate result, and like

"I partook, in a high degree, of the joy felt at the passage of the resolutions for the annexation of Texas. The South has now, or will have when annexation be effected, a front which will shake abolition to its center, and quiet the abolition spirit for a long time, and in the general progress of events, the proposition of Texas will be, 'tis for the great God, who has directed the minds and hearts of the people on that subject, only to tell. From the first moment it was sprung upon public attention, I said, and often to you, that it must succeed. God drives it onward by a law of His Providence. Nothing else could have stupefied sagacious England, who had better have expended her millions on millions and her blood, to prevent it, then wage her war with Bonaparte. From the consummation of the act of annexation, we may date her decline. She is great in all the materials of a truly great nation, and her decline must be gradual, and for some time may be imperceptible, but decline under its influence, she must. It will double the richest staples which agriculture has ever produced; it will more than double our navigation, commerce, manufactures and navy, in all of which we are to exceed England. I must stop on this topic, for a sheet would not hold one-half of what ought to be said on it. You must, however, nurse it more, I will not say better, for that could not be. We may, and I fear will, have trouble yet in Congress, on the law for the introduction of Texas, although the United States are pledged.—On this account, we shall have an accession to our strength in the Southern vote; but as we are to ave a new Congress, we may lose in the North, although the anti-slavery feeling is pretty well stunned by what has been done. But it is never safe to trust the mere passions of men, and especially the passion for dominion or domination."

"We must nurse it more," says our sagacious correspondent. We ask the Compiler, does he, too, show a want of tact? We beg our neighbor to look around him, and see some of the signs of the times which are now glimmering upon the horizon. There are "Anti-Annexionists," unfortunately, on both sides of the house—in the United States, as well as Texas. There is no doubt of it. We hope and trust and believe, that we shall be able to carry Texas, in spite of all of them; but it is not the part of a wise statesman to fold his arms and repose in overweening confidence, so long as there is any doubt of success. We had supposed the last stroke was struck; but, although it is but a poor compliment to our own sagacity to admit it, yet new developments have turned up, which cast some doubt upon the consummation. Who was it said only on Monday last, that the question was not settled—that he was glad of it—and that if he were returned to Congress, he would continue an undying war upon Texas? It was Mr. Botts, the Whig candidate for the Metropolitan District. Who was it that declared the other day to an intelligent Virginian that "the enemies of Texas would make a desperate struggle against her admission, when her Constitution should be submitted to the consideration of Congress?" It was Mr. Winthrop of House of Representatives from Massachusetts. What said Mr. Wm. C. Rives in his speech of the 15th ult.?—that the Whigs of the next Congress might attempt to repeal the joint resolution, even though Texas had accepted the proposition. This assertion, startling as it is, was not known to us until yesterday, when we read the revise of our correspondent's communication in this day's paper. Do we find any disposition to acquiesce, in the resolutions of Congress, in that factious spirit, which appears in the denunciations of the N.York Tribune, and Boston Atlas? Are not these and similar organs of the Whig party determined to seize upon every inch of ground, every possible pretext on which to make battle against the annexation? Do we not read the same dogged determination in Berien's resolution before similar organs of the Whig party determined to seize upon every inch of ground, every possible pretext on which to settle it—the treaty or the Legislative power?—This is one knotty question. How shall the Southern Territory of Texas be disposed of—how much will the South receive for its proportion—and how much the North? Upon these two questions, the late battle may be fought over again—and the whole country once more agitated by the struggles of the Whigs and the abolitionists against Texas and against the South—and the true interests of the whole Union. In fact, we are not sure but that the importance of the subject, and the tone recently adopted by the official organs of Texas, and perhaps more or less countenanced by the President of that Republic, do not call for a graver negotiation—and, whether Mr. Polk would not find it to be our best interest to associate the ablest Minister he can obtain with Major Donelson—charged as he would be with the most deliberate views of the administration, as to the wisest course of proceeding under the Resolution s of the tow Houses. We have seen, that we have decided Annexationists at home, who have not yet grounded their arms—Now, let us look at the other side of the medal, and see whether there may not be a similar spirit in Texas herself.—Yesterday's Southern mail brings us some intelligence from Texas, that creates more doubt, than we had originally entertained, about there accepting the conditions which the House Resolutions may offer. General Lamar told us, that the terms would be acceptable, and would be accepted by Texas. But yesterday's accounts do not exhibit so certain a prospect. The New Orleans Bulletin of the 14th says: "By the arrival of the steamship New York, we have papers from Galveston to the 8th instant, and form other parts of Texas to corresponding dates. The bill of Annexation as it passed the House of Representatives, and Mr. Benton's bill in the Senate, formed the chief topic of discussion in the press. Neither project separately seems to suit our Texian contemporaries; by the next arrival we shall learn whether the two together are relied any better."

But the "New Orleans Jeffersonian" of the same date gives us some important extracts from the Texas papers. We think it our duty to lay them before our readers, whether it may subject us to the suspicion of showing "a great deal of tact," or not. At all events, we will give the facts, and let our readers judge for themselves, whether it be wise in our people to send to the next Congress, any member who is not friendly to Texas: [MLD]

"The news received last night form Texas, is rather of an unpleasant character, it must e admitted. We have neither space nor time at the moment to make those remarks, which suggest themselves upon the unexpected tone of the Texas press, regarding the annexation resolutions. We trust, however, that much of the hostility evinced against these resolutions, by the papers of Texas, will disappear, upon the arrival of the intelligence of their final passage in their present form. We believe further, that the opinions and views the Texas press, if preserved in, will not find the countenance or support of the Texan people.

TEXAS

"Papers from Galveston to the 8th instant, and from Washington (the Capital) to the 1st instant, have reached us by the steamship New York. It appears that some of the Texans are not at all pleased with the terms of annexation contained in the resolutions just passed. They look at the measure as a one-sided affair altogether, and that they would be sadly shortened by their big sister Republic, in their acquiescing in the sacrifice of their customs, dues, public property, &c., &c., as the price of their admission into the Union. The 'National Register' is really savage at 'the actual pit and grave of insignificance and infamy,' which these resolutions, as it states, would plunge the Texan Nation. The 'Register,' however, is the organ of the anti-annexationists, who are but an insignificant fraction of the people.

"The 'Galveston News' still advocates the cause of annexation.

"The general appropriation act of the last Congress authorizes the payment of $137,340, annual charge of the Republic.

"The export of provisions is becoming a leading feature in the commerce of Texas. [MLD]

From the Texas National Register

"If the people of Texas choose to revolutionize their government, and institute some new and different republican organization, they may do so without the leave of a foreign Government, first had and obtained.' But the United States have acknowledged our title to be recognized as an independent nation, both de facto and de jure.—Should we adopt the course designated by their resolutions, we at once lose the benefit of that acknowledgment. We pass into a state of imbecile and hopeless dependence upon that power—to be annexed?—certainly never until their aspiring partisans shall cease to need the material we now furnish them for the manufacture of political capital. Our relations with other governments dissolved, and our own nationality renounced, the United States may consent to hold—as they shall have consented to place us—in a state of penultimate but unaccomplished annexation.

"But even this consent of the American Congress, meager and valueless as it is to the people of Texas, but for which we are required to give to the United State a lien upon our country's sovereignty—this worthless consent, as if begrudged to Texas, is eked out to her at a miser's usury, and is shackled with what lawyers call 'conditions precedent.' Passing by the required sacrifice of our right to adjust the boundaries of our territory, the consent of that Congress, even once more to entertain the Texas question, is coupled with the cold assurance, that if we are ever admitted into the Union at all, we must cede to the U. States, 'all our mines, minerals, salt lakes and springs, also all our public edifices, fortifications, barracks, ports and harbors, navy and navy yards, docks, magazines, arms, armaments, and all other property and means pertaining to the public defense.' We must also yield up our revenue and our capacity to raise one—which single item, under the financial regulations of our fostering step-mother, would bring into her treasury at least three hundred thousand dollars per annum; for which we have her kind permission to retain our public debts, and keep our public domain; subject, however to the payment of the debt, and circumscribed within such limits as she may, hereafter, be pleased to assign to our territory, in the exercise of her characteristic and far-stretching diplomacy, which once reached even to the western banks of the Sabine! We must, moreover, trounce to her pet Abolitionists, by obligating ourselves to prohibit slavery north of the parallel of 36 degrees 30 minutes, known as the Missouri Compromise line.
We have always been a warm and hearty advocate of the cause of annexation; but never did we dream that the approval of the people of Texas would be required to a proposition so absurd—so degrading as the one propounded by this resolution. Our space does not now admit of present elevated position, as a people secure in the respect and amity of the great enlightened nations of the earth; secure in the enjoyment of peace, and in the speedy acquisition of acknowledged independence; secure in the wealth which the commerce of Europe is about to our into our lap, and in the increasing value our lands, arising from extended occupation, and the investment of foreign capital; secure of becoming “the most favored” by those powerful and wealthy sovereignties, whom both interest and growth, that their markets may be supplied with merce will speedily render no less consistent than desirable, a great diminution of the present tariff, with the alternative presented by this resolution, of Texas divested of all these high privileges and advantages shorn of her attributes as a nation; crippled in her commerce, in her prosperity, in her domestic resources; depressed by the burdens of public debt and direct taxation; her land in consequence depreciated in value; and in the event of final annexation up on the proposed basis, our public domain not only razzed and mortgaged to secure the payment of our debt, but even eviscerated of its mineral wealth, to swell the federal treasury.

“This is, indeed, but a dim and totally inadequate view of the actual pit and grave of insignificance and infamy into which the House of Representatives of the American Congress have proposed to plunge this nation.

“‘Since he, miscalled he Morning Star,

Nor man nor fiend hath fail’n so far!’”

The following is from the Civilian and Galveston Gazette, in comment upon the foregoing:

“The article which we copy to-day from the National Register, affords gratifying evidence of a return, on the part of the friends of annexation in this country, to a proper sense of self-respect, and an understanding of the position which Texas may and out to assume in relation to the question. Our friends beyond the Sabine have lost sight of the homely adage that it takes two to make a bargain, and only studied how to shape measures so as to make the "reciprocity all on one side," until at length their utter selfishness and disregard of the respect due to Texas as an independent nation, which has thus far maintained her nationality, rights, and liberties, begins to produce the natural fruits of disappointment and aversion in those of our citizens who had looked to that quarter for a magnanimous and disinterested regard for our welfare and happiness. The helpless and perishing beggar may, without hesitation, accept the most humiliating conditions for, and agree to become the menial of, him from whom he receives the means of averting famine and death; but the sturdy yeoman, whose honest industry and strong arm afford him all the means of subsistence and protection requisite to his condition and habits in life, may well shun the banquet and the association, if invited into the society of the more wealthy and presuming, when his acceptance is to be coupled with acknowledgments of vassalage and inferiority." From the Galveston Weekly News.

"THE PROSPECT.—We have already furnished incontestable evidence, that the British policy, in opposition to annexation, has so far succeeded, that Her Britannic Majesty’s Minister has obtained the pledge of President Houston, to use his best endeavor to defeat that measure.

"We are told, that upon condition of our renouncing the American Union forever, the monarchical powers of Europe will then terminate our formidable war with Mexico, ‘forthwith and compulsively.’ The same friendly promise has been made, from time to time, for the last seven or eight years, and its repetition just at this particular crisis, when the speedy success of annexation is beyond all reasonable doubt, is exceedingly well timed, in order to create a reaction in the public feeling of this country. We are not told whether the friendly mediation is again to be attended by another ‘Armistice’ as a necessary preliminary step, to be afterwards ‘improved into one of more convenient duration.’ We are, however, assured, that ‘France and England will openly submit to the consideration of our Government and people inducements for us to remain independent.’

Such information as this is usually confined to the chief agents of Government as a matter of State secrecy, and is rarely furnished to the public journals, except for the purpose of political influence and foreign counteraction. This announcement is made in the positive and unqualified terms of a negotiator, who has participated in all the Cabinet secrets and intrigues of both hemispheres.

“The public need not be surprised should this singular manifesto prove to be the harbinger of party organization, and f great exertions in this country, to counteract the labors of our friends in the United States, and to defeat this great measure here, after it has triumphed there. ‘We shall see.’”

We too have received “The Galveston Weekly News,” of the 8th inst., which ridicules all the positions of the "National Register.” It says:

“Just as we predicted! The National Register of the 22d ult., comes freighted with more than two columns of maledictions against the joint resolutions of Mr. Brown of Tennessee for annexation, which passed the lower House of Congress. Annexation is now spoken of as a ‘prescribed revolution’—as depriving us of ‘every feature and lineament of nationality’—as ‘annihilating our identity and repudiating even our name.’ And ‘all these sacrifices and degradation, it is said, will not secure us annexation to the American Union.’ This seems to be an original view of these resolutions. The people of the United States in their simplicity, though those resolutions would, accomplish the measure, and the members of Congress voted for, or against, them accordingly. The Register professes to be a ‘warm and hearty advocate in the cause of annexation.’ We would like to see a ill for this purpose on his own plan. He would not certainly surrender any of our sovereignty, for that would deprive us of the ‘features and lineaments of nationality.’ He would not relinquish our style and title of ‘Republic of Texas,’ for that would ‘annihilate our identity, and repudiate our name.’ He would not permit our President and heads of Departments to retire from their dignities and resign their emoluments of office; for that would be humiliating and an act of self degradation. He would not allow our constitution to be superseded by that of the United States; for that would be voluntary submission to a ‘prescribed revolution.’ He certainly would not yield up the treaty-making power; for by doing so Texas would be ‘shorn of her attributes as a nation.” Would the Register consent, in his “warm and hearty advocacy of the cause of annexation,” to allow the Congress of the United States a control over our commercial relations? Certainly not; for this would possibly “cripple our commerce.” Would he allow the government of the U.S. to regulate our tariff and control our revenue, and appoint our custom house officers? By no means; for this would deprive our own government of a large amount of patronage and personal influence; and thus she would be “shorn of another important attribute of sovereignty.”—What plan of annexation can the Register, who is so “warm and hearty an advocate of this measure,” possibly devise, that may not impair “our present elevated position as a people,” and shut out “the wealth, which, he says, the commerce of Europe is about to pour into our lap,” if we remain independent. We have heard of lawyers arguing against the cause they were employed to advocate. The Register is certainly arguing against the cause he proposes to advocate, but it does not therefore follow that he betrays the cause he is employed to support.”

The New Orleans Tropic, (same date,) with the other New Orleans papers, says: “From the tenor of the articles (in the National Register) we should judge that the plan of procedure suggested by Col. Benton would be the most acceptable in Texas.” And if it be the only one accepted, then will it still become us to send no man to Congress, who is not thoroughly with the South on the annexation of this country. The question will then again be of this country. The question will then again be at sea—and nothing but the wisest and firmest counsels can secure her admission in to the Union. “We will not (to employ the just and elegant language of General Hamilton) reiterate in detail those estimates of the value of this vast national acquisition, on which we have so often dwelt. We will forbear to speak of it as a country which unites to the magnificence of the valley of our own august river, a pastoral region where the most luxuriant Pampas of Southern America are surpassed in beauty, fertility and health. We will not speak of it as a climate where the fecundity of the tropics is blended with the milder blessings that belong to the temperate zone. We will not dwell on the wide outlet and sphere which such a land, replete with all that can contribute to the subsistence, comfort, and civilization of man, offers to the invincible enterprise of our race: a country, destined in future ages to diffuse over solitudes now lost in moral darkness, our literature, philosophy, religion and laws; where Shakespeare, Milton, Newton, Sidney and Locke are to have new shrines erected to their mighty names! If we refrain from speaking with a becoming fullness of these things, it is because we are hurried on to the pressing consideration, that Texas may be lost to this country forever, if the new administration does not act with an energy the crisis imperiously demands.

“Recent advices make it eminently probable that Great Britain, in case Texas be not annexed at this session of Congress, stands ready, without requiring a single concession from Texas on the slave question, or a single discrimination at present in favor of her commerce, on the conditions alone that the mediated union between herself and the United States shall be abandoned, and her Tariff be reduced to a duty of ten percent. ad valorem, to guarantee the independence of Texas by Mexico, together with a firm and lasting peace between the two countries. This information may be relied on.

“The protection of Great Britain, thus given, places Texas unavoidably in the position on this side of the Atlantic that Portugal occupies in the circle of European powers—a condition almost of absolute dependence. To counterbalance the exclusion of the sugar of Texas from our markets, England will doubtless, hereafter, make discriminations against the introduction of slave sugars in her favor, and on the plausible pretext that much of this staple grown in Western Texas will be the product of free labor. This will lead, after a time, to the total abrogation of the duty on the import of Texian cotton into Great Britain, and, under the inevitable facile progress of the principle of reciprocity, terminate in the admission of British goods into Texas duty free. A gigantic free trade Republic will be thus built up on the frontiers of Louisiana, into which such amass of European emigrants will be thrown, that the political power of the slave holders in the alluvial portions of Texas must, of necessity, be transferred to the free laborers of the upper prairies, and slavery will be abolished in the country in less than twenty-years—a mere span in the life-time of a nation. We will not foreshadow the condition of this State with such a neighbor, or how long our won institutions of industry, founded on slave labor, could be sustained. Nor shall we dwell on the influence that such a free port as Galveston, would, under such circumstances, exert to the detriment of this great empire of the West, (New Orleans,) which, in the event of annexation, will be unquestionably, in ten years, the second commercial city in the world.”

The President of the U.S., of course, is advised of facts, of which we have no knowledge—and it may show very little “tact” in us to throw out such a suggestion—but unless he has much better information than the above extracts furnish, we should suppose that a new Commissioner might be immediately and advantageously associated with our present able Charge in Texas—to co-operate with him in one of the most important measures which has never engaged the attention of our Government. We simply throw out the suggestion for what it is worth. We are still persuaded that we shall succeed in the great object we have in view—but the problem may be more difficult of solution than we supposed three weeks ago.—The public creditors may interpose their claims, and complain of their not being paid. It may be proper to remove their objections by adequate arguments. We may satisfactorily

For the Enquirer,

TEXAS—John M. Botts

The late Whig Convention which nominated Mr. Botts as a candidate for Congress, appointed a Committee to address the voters of the District. The address of this committee signed by John H. Pleasants and eleven others, appeared in Wednesday’s Compiler. In their labored efforts to show that objection to Mr. Botts, on account of his opposition to the annexation of Texas, is “rather speculative than real,” they say:

“We enter into no discussion here of the question of annexation. The prescribed limits of this address forbid; moreover, the Whig party is not agreed in sentiment upon it. No position that could be taken with reference to it, could command the concurrence of this Convention. Upon it, we agree to differ—to merge its consideration in the more important questions of policy, which we regard as vitally affecting the interest and stability of our own country. But the remark is pertinent, that this question will, in all probability, cease to be a practical one before the successful candidates in the approaching election will take their seats in Congress. Or, if it does not, that the vote of our representative will be powerless to defeat the measure. No Whig, it is presumed, however anxious of the annexation of Texas in a proper mode, is willing to see that end attained, by any means unauthorized by the Constitution. The Whigs, if not entirely unanimous, are very nearly so, in believing, that to annex Texas by joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, would be a palpable and gross violation of the Constitution. Should it be attempted in this mode, Mr. Botts being in Congress, he would most faithfully reflect your wishes by opposing it. And if attempted in any constitutional mode, he as a member of the House of Representatives, would not be required to cast a vote upon it at all. This objection to Mr. Botts, then, is rather speculative than real.”

Now, if I am correctly informed, Mr. Botts himself does not believe “that this question will cease to be a practical one” before the next Congress will convene. William C. Rives, and the anti-Texas party generally, do not so believe, and to this fact. I wish to call the attention of the Voters of the District. Mr. Rives, in his Texas speech, in the Senate, on the 15th of February last, published in the R. Whig of the 10th inst., holds the following language on this subject:

“Let us now, Mr. President, attempt to follow out in the vision of the future what was likely to occur, if, in the face of remonstrances of those who took their stand upon the plighted faith of the Constitution, this measure should be consummated by a mere majority of the two Houses of Congress. When the next Congress met, supposing the people of Texas to have accepted the terms proposed, what might happen? His friend from Pennsylvania had spoken of this joint resolution as pledging the faith of the nation. Mr. R. would ask, could an act of the Legislature so pledge the faith of this nation to a foreign power as to tie up the hands of a succeeding Legislature? Mr. R. did not so read the Constitution.—The same legislative majority which passed the joint resolution might repeal it. Who could answer for the changes that might take place in the great deep of public opinion? Who could say how future elections might turn out? What security had gentlemen that the next Congress, by their majority power, might not repeal the act of the present Congress, and, when Texas came for admission, the door be slammed in her face—what then?

“But suppose Texas to be admitted. The honorable Senator says he likes this joint resolution, because the slavery question is settled by it, and finally put on the basis of the Missouri compromise. Could the honorable Senator say, that there was any peculiar sanctity in this joint resolution that must exempt it from the power of future legislation? Might not a future Legislature, under the excitement produced by what they deemed a wanton invitation of the Constitution, rise up and declare that it had the same right to act upon this question as its predecessor; that a former Congress had no right to bind them; and, though a previous body had undertaken to stipulate the observance of the Missouri compromise in Texas, yet when a new State formed out of its territory should come knocking for admittance, it had the same right to prescribe conditions as those who had gone before them, and that it would not admit the new Texas States but upon condition of the perpetual prohibition of slavery? Could they not do so? Would they not have the power? And would not this Congress have furnished them a provocation, if not a justification, by their example in violating the Constitution!”

This is the language of Mr. Rives, and generally concurred in by the anti-Texas Whigs. Let no voter, therefore, cast his vote under the impression that this great and vital question to the south has “ceased to be a practical one.”

Gen. Almonte.—A letter from Washington says that the French Minter has interposed his good offices between this Government and the Mexican Minister, and advised him to remain here, until he receives advices and instructions from his Government. [MLD]
A KEY TO THE ENIGMA

When Mr. Archer’s report on the subject of the admission of Texas first appeared, as was our duty, we attempted to master it. The first column entirely foiled the attempt. The truth is, we never had a genius for riddles or conundrums, much less the deeper mysteries of oracles which employ language to render meaning inscrutable. —in such cases, we leave to time, or the happier ingenuity of some acute contemporary, the elucidation which we find beyond our Boeotian intellect. This was our course as to Mr. Archer’s report; and lo! The happy Picayune has made a discovery which should immortalize it. It came at a time to clear our vision, which greatly enhances its value. A drying, searching wind, of several days’ continuance, has filled our atmosphere with the clouds it seeps from the avenues, and glued our eyes with dust. The Picayune’s article has drawn tears to wash them clean, and enabled us to read and understand what before, without physical incapacitation, had proved too much for our faculties: [MLD]

From the New Orleans Picayune

"What may this mean?"—Hamlet.

The necessity under which editors of newspapers live of reading public documents, gives them some right to ask the manufacturers of this species of literature that they spin their lucubrations of a texture more palpable than the woof of a phantom’s ball-dress. We have had occasion, before now, to speak of Senator Archers’ report on annexation as rather a specimen of nebulous composition than a State paper; yet the subject matter of it demanded the plainest phraseology that the dictionaries could furnish. In perusing this document, we confess that we forgot all about Texas, annexation, war, treaties and protests, in getting at the philosophy embedded in such expressions as—

"Institutions have no exemption from this law of dispensation of inflexible rigor in all the possible modifications of contingency."

This sentence, read backwards, is quite as intelligible as when read forwards; for example:

"Contingency of modifications possible, the all in rigor inflexible of dispensation of law, this from exemption no have institutions."

Barring the Gallicism of the negation, the expression is quite as forcible and correct read either way. After a deal of examination into the hidden meaning of the author, it occurred to us to read it backwards, and we think we have discovered thereby the object of our researches. The Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations wished to inculcate the idea that, by a law of nature, "what goes up must come down;" and that if "institutions" are brought within the "rigor" of this "dispensation," that circumstance or "contingency" will not "modify" the "inflexibility" of the rule. The mode of enforcing this law, by laying it down in terms that read both ways, was ingenious in the extreme, as the return of "what goes up" through the very space before traveled, when it "must come down," is happily illustrated by turning "backward," and reading the same law of nature that is contained in the same sentence when read "forward." The perpendicular action of gravity is thus beautifully exemplified by horizontal exercises in reading.

After giving Mr. Archer all due credit for the admirable conceit of suiting "the action to the word," or rather of arranging his words so as to display the action of the great law of nature cited, we yet object to the propriety of his introducing such ingenious verbal exercises into a report of the character under consideration. We much question if one man in a hundred has found the key which opens the intent of the passage quoted; and documents of this sort are designed to impress public opinion and illuminate the masses. This style of composition is especially hard upon editors, as it is as much as they can do to read public documents forward, so voluminous have they become of late. To put a double labor upon them, and compel them to read them backwards, too, is a cruelty. It is a tyranny to force us to read such terribly long reports two ways.

"Insatiate Archer! Will not one suffice?"

The discovery of the Editor of the Picayune, that Mr. Archer’s report must be read two ways to be understood—backwards and forwards—not only does credit to the penetration of the interpreter, but redounds to the immortal honor of the author of this remarkable production. The learned diplomat—who, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, had held all Congress and the country, with suspended breath, awaiting, for months together, the report on the greatest and most interesting question of the times—who had worn himself to a tenacity in the effort, which made him look, on his return to the Senate, like the ghost of some metaphysical idea—was observed with somewhat of the suspicion which attended the knight of La Mancha, when the volume he heralded was found to be incomprehensible. —But what injustice was done to Mr. Archer on this first impression, is now seen; no man had ever a more difficult task to perform, and no man ever accomplished one with such a perfection of difficulty. Mr. Archer had, at the preceding session, laid down and established, with the most absolute logic, that the admission of Texas into the Union. By treaty, was, under the constitution, impossible—The purpose of his report to which he gave his Again, Mr. Clay, whom it was Mr. Archer’s aim to vindicate and support, had declared, in one set of letters, his utter repugnance to the admission of Texas on any grounds of expediency; and in others, uncertain very possible contingencies, Mr. Clay declared that he would be glad to see Texas annexed upon the ground of expediency. These direct contradictions of Mr. Archer and the GREAT PROPHET of his party, it was the business of the report to reconcile; and how was this possible, but by a report which could not be understood if read in the ordinary way, but which, read backwards and forwards, brings out two negatives make a affirmative; and Mr. Archer, by his marvelous tissue of words, leading; when construed backwards and forwards, to a negative result, kills off the double contradictions in which he and his party and involved themselves, by the annihilation of all sense.

But there is another point of great importance to the Federal party, which Mr. Archer attains by his extraordinary document. IT is settled policy with them to have “no principles for the public ye.” Still, it is indispensable for a party which talks so much about principles to have principles, but to have them wrapped up, like the religion of Egypt, in hieroglyphics. All this is accomplished by Mr. Archer’s report. It is full of principles, but so high that no man can understand them.

We were astonished when twenty thousand copies of this book—which still remained a sealed book to the mind, though open to the eye—was ordered by the Senate to be printed for circulation among the people. We supposed it was only to put some $20,000 in the pocket of the Senates’ printer. But now that the key to the mystery is found, the country will think this money well appropriated to perpetuate the principles of Coonery. It is destined to become the wonder of this and all future ages—the most remarkable philological paradox that ever the press gave birth to—solving all contradictions with which it details, by its won contrary readings; and promulgating all the principles of a great party, and the leading—one that has no principles for the public eye—by rendering its whole creed incomprehensible.

Let no man hereafter say, that Mr. Archer is not the great oracle of Whiggery—the sphinx of modern times—a type of the enigmatical nature of coonite politics, as the ancient sphinx of the olden time was of the Egyptian theology.

THE CITY CANVASS

As we gave yesterday a bird’s eye view of the Whig camp in this city, we feel it incumbent upon us to follow up the narrative, and give a true history of the fruits of one day’s fermentation in the minds of the two wings of the Whig party here.

Yesterday we published copious extracts from the Richmond Whig, developing its strong opposition to the meeting last night, called to hear Mr. Lyons speak, and to which all the Whig candidates were invited. What we then predicted has been literally verified. The “Dictator” of the Richmond Whig published his edict, and, straightway, the “faithful”—those Whigs “who stand up to the rack, fodder or no fodder”—bow their humble head to the imperial behests. The candidates, with one accord, see the scepter of power, “air drawn,” in the Whig’s editorial, and, probably to keep on the strong side, firmly resist the meeting last night, the only effect of which they contend, with the Whig, will be to produce “uproar and confusion, and a row.” And this in a meeting composed entirely of Whigs, and in a city yclept “the Gibraltar of Whiggery!”

Mr. Brooke, who has written almost as many letters as “Old Harry” himself, comes out in the Whig under his name, and in a courteous card thus lays down his position:

“I can conceive of no good that can arise from such a discussion, (on Texas,) while I think I foresee much harm. If, unfortunately, there exist differences of opinion on this subject among the Whigs; and if, as is said, these differences are so indiscreetly referred to, as to be likely “to produce incurable discord” in our party, is it at all probable, that these differences can be reconciled, or this discord harmonized by a public discussion, in which Whig shall be arrayed against Whig, the passions of the speakers become excited, as is too likely to be the case, and that excitement by a natural sympathy communicated to the friends of each? I cannot think so. If anything could be devised better calculated than another to produce still greater dissensions among us, and to give to these dissensions a distinct organization, and a form and feeling of hostility, it is in my judgment the proposed discussion.”

The Whig speaks for the other candidates, and thus hits away at “the little clique:”

“We are authorized to say for Mr. Lancaster, that he too, entirely disapproves of that meeting, as calculated to do ham and not good. Mr. James, we feel convinced, and indeed we know, is of the same opinion; and, in sincerity, we have no seen or heard of the first Whig (except the little clique who got the thing up) who did not unqualifiedly reprehend the course proposed, of a Texas wrangle among the Whigs, in order to settle differences and promote peace, as entirely absurd and farcical! These discussions, when they take place between hostile parties, and the collective people being the auditory and the judges, are well enough; but when they are invoked to heal family jars, are ridiculous. It is not by such means—means calculated to exasperate, and not to conciliate—that the desired harmony can be restored, and we feel convinced as in point of fact the Whigs of Richmond know, that they have been appealed to as a dernier and desperate resort by those who, having detached themselves from the great Whig host, hope somewhere where they can lose nothing!" * * * * *

“These gentlemen, it seems, who, in the face of public opinion, as all but themselves think, are attempting to force the election of Mr. Lyons—denounce us for what? For opposing him—for taking even any part? No—but for simply opposing a meeting called to hear Whig denounce Whig, and a Texas Whig show up another Whig who is opposed to annexing the U. States to Texas!

"This is dictation in us! It is most dreadfully wrong! But when these same persons day after day electioneer through the streets for Mr. Lyons—THAT is no dictation! O, by no means! They may steal a coarse, but we must not look over the hedge!

"Had we supported Mr. Lyons, no matter how warmly and zealously—were we to d it now, it would be no dictation then. It is only dictation when we happen to think differently from those who would themselves dictate, if they could. They (the people of Richmond) have known us for twenty years, and they have never known us in that long tract of years, to try to dictate; NOR HAVE THEY EVER KNOWN US TO TRY TO PREFER AN DPROMOTE OURSELVES AT HE EXPENSE OF THE PUBLIC CAUSE. If they trust us at all, as we hope they do, it is because they know that we were candid and plain-sailing, and have no private schemes to serve by party.

"This is our shield and defense, and here we know we are impregnable, and defy the assaults of all. The People—the Whigs of Richmond—must and will stand by us, because we have stood by them."

In the same paper we find a counter invitation from detachment of the “true” Whigs, as follows:

"PROPOSED PUBLIC MEETING OF WHIGS,

"For Wednesday, 8 o’clock, P.M.

"The Whigs of Richmond are invited sex to attend the proposed meeting of this evening, at 8 o’clock, at the ‘Odd Fellows’ Hall.’

"The meeting is announced, in order to enable one of the candidates to address the people upon a certain subject. Now, as I do not think it proper to make any subject at this time an issue, calculated to produce discord in the Whig ranks, I take upon myself the responsibility of inviting ‘the other candidates for the city’ nor to take part in said discussion.

"AT LEAST ONE WHIG VOTER."

So much for one wing of the great Whig army: let us now give some of the views of the other branch. In the first place, we find in the Whig the following additional trumpet call to the meeting of last night:

"The Whigs of Richmond are invited to attend a public meeting to-night at 8 o’clock, at the Odd Fellows’ Hall, to hear the city candidates upon their merit, and not upon Texas, as the Editors of the Whig suppose.

"Come one, come all, as it is hoped every independent voter will attend, and judge for himself.

"MIDDLE WARD"

Again, in both Whig and Compiler there appears an article from some of the "Many Whig Voters" who called the meeting, urging the Whigs to permit the editorial of the Whig to have no influence on their minds, and thus warmly appealing to them:

"Come to that meeting. Hear the parties fairly, and judge for yourselves dispassionately.—There are great interests at stake in the action of the next Legislature; interests of vital importance to the city of Richmond, as affecting its general prosperity; interests which do not hinge upon any branch of political creed not common to all the candidates, and to advance which you need a Representative who possesses that weight of character, and personal popularity among the members of the Legislature, necessary to render him an efficient agent in carrying them out. It is these things which render the election to be made an important one, and upon the Hustings alone can we have these things properly discussed and set before you. Political differences have, properly, little to do with this matter, and these issues, which it has been attempted to make, are prompted only as the means, which some have thought the best, to carry out their own ends and advance their own purposes: They are none of our making, and we regret that they have been made. Could we have selected the grounds of distinction in this canvass, political creeds would have had little or nothing to do with it—though, even upon those grounds, we believe we can compare favorably with any who may be opposed to us.”
They then hit back at the Editors of the Whig, who “find themselves reduced to such necessities to prop a falling cause and lengthen out an already decaying existence for a few days more.” Speaking of the R. Whig, they take this bold ground:

“It’s proscription will not render us the less able to maintain our position; and no community so intelligent and liberal as that of Richmond will seat themselves calmly at home when their best interests are to be discussed freely, because the Editor of a newspaper tells them they must not attend. Unused to dictation as they have ever been, there is little danger that they will submit to it now; and, following their own intuitive sense of what is right, they will act as citizens of a free country should.”

The Compiler, in a cool and sensible article, views the whole ground of interference of the Press in cases of party divisions, and, though no name is mentioned or particular fact referred to, it is evident that the Editor strongly disapproves of the course of the Whig organ. We subjoin an extract, and ask our readers to draw their own deductions:

“In such cases, the press, by the temperate exercise of its power, by remonstrance and argument, in general terms, may be efficacious; but when it attempts to drive and force men, they become determined and obstinate, and had consequences ensue. Suppose the denunciations of the press are sufficiently efficacious to leave ether denounced party in so meager a minority as to secure the election of the press endorsed candidate—why, even then, effects to be regretted often follow. The denounced gentleman and his friends are often dissatisfied and sore, they become sometimes indifferent bad party men, and again are driven over to the enemy; which last is sometimes fatal to a party in a closely contested district; for a vote transferred counts double. It is much the safest and best to leave the aspirant to their friends, who by proper conciliatory measures, can oftener heal divisions than can the press, with all its power.”

So much for this “strange, eventful history,” thus far! The meeting last night will throw new light on the movements of the contending fragments. We doubt not that it was numerously attended. The friends of free discussion and the opponents of an evident design to stifle deliberation and to muzzle thought and action, must have composed a large portion of the assembly. Then, again, many voters, who had not committed themselves to any candidate, must have gone, to listen to the views of MR. Lyons on the Texas, and on other questions which concern the internal interests of the city—in order to arrive at the proper selection of a candidate—though, from the course the other candidates have thought proper to pursue, the argument would be on one side—and the views of three named candidates will be left in the dark. Add to these the peculiar friends of Mr. Lyons, and a host of individuals, who will attend from mere curiosity; upon these supposed data we predict a numerous meeting.—We shall keep our readers advised, taking care, however, to furnish the facts and arguments of the different Whig sections themselves in support of their separate positions. In a squabble amongst the Whigs, where no Democrat is in the field, we shall not give our advice, and not venture our deductions from the premises. The Democrats of Richmond will watch the passing events, and every man decide for himself, as to the least objectionable Whig, upon whom to cast his vote.—The Whigs of the city have the power to choose whom they like, and it is unfair in the Richmond Whig to draw arguments against any candidate, from the assumed position of our party on this question. [MLD] which may be open to Whig force or cunning.

It is all important that we should carry the Legislature this Spring. The eyes of the Union are upon us. Would it not be a lasting disgrace upon Virginia, that in November she should, by 6,000 majority, aid in the elevation of a Republican President, and, in April afterwards, should choose a Whig Assembly, and virtually elect a Whig U.S. Senator, to oppose and pull-down that administration?

Committee, do your duty? Aspirants, to your posts in the ranks, until the people, in their majority, summon you to the command! [MLD]

The Serfs of Angus McDonald

The Whigs of Hampshire county, after all, may be counting without their host. Their only chance of carrying the two Delegates and the Senator of the district, is by the aid of Angus McDonald’s spurious voter. We shall notice them again in due season—and especially an impudent correspondent of the Richmond Whig upon this subject. In the mean time, we are happy to see the Romney Gazette fighting manfully against this manufacture of McDonald. The following are extracts from the last No. of that paper:

“‘The Serfs of Angus McDonald.’—We observe in the last Intelligencer a communication, copied in that print from the Richmond Whig, dated ‘Winchester, Feb.27 1845,’ over the anonymous signature of ‘T,’ abusing in no measured terms the Richmond Enquirer’s article, headed with the above caption, (which we laid before our readers some weeks since,) and says, after giving a quotation from the Enquirer’s article, hat it was ‘on the authority of a little dirt dauber called the Virginia Gazette.

“We are not in the habit of noticing such contemptible and anonymous scribbler as ‘T;’ but when a write attempts, under an assumed veil to convey the idea that we have not stated the faces connected with the making of the McDonald deeds, we deem it necessary to give him a passing notice—and would say, that what has been set forth by us defies contradiction; as we have published a copy (certified by the clerk of this county) of the deeds, and therefore did not misrepresent them, as the above quotation was intended (to convey the idea) for, and make good the retreat of, Angus McDonald, and cover up the fraud which has been committed in the making of these deeds.

“Will ‘T.’ dare, in defiance of the constitution and laws of Virginia, to call the 297 voters made by Angus W. McDonald, ‘legal voters?’—If so, we brand him with the 297 ‘serfs.’ And a friend at our side knows this Mr. ‘T.,’ and says he was always a mere sycophant, ‘willing to crook the pregnant hinges of his knees, to lick the feet of absurd pomp, where thrift would follow fawning.’

“This writer then goes on to say, that those deeds are as good and lawful as those made by BOB HETERICK. Here is falsehood number one.—‘So much for the brand.’ ‘Take it!—Take it!—and BRAND YOUR FOREHEAD! For ho can the McDonald deeds be good and bona fide deeds, when everything that is valuable on the land is reserved to the grantor, and the land itself to revert back to the original owner after the death of James Gibson and John B. White?

“How dare this writer presume to blind the intelligence of an enlightened people with such false statements? The Heterick deeds were made without reserve or reversion—and we challenge proof to the contrary.

“As to the constitutionality of those deeds, which Mr. ‘T.’ dwells upon with much emphasis, we shall hereafter speak. In the mean time, will he or McDonald point out to us the place wherein this right is contained, to vote upon fifty acres of land, reversionary, reservedly and fraudulently deeded? We say, will they do it?

“The following is the oath the McDonald ‘serfs’ will have to take before they will be permitted to vote:

“‘I, A.B., do swear, that I do in my CONSCIENCE believe myself to be DULY QUALIFIED to vote for a delegate or delegates for the county of Hampshire, or for a Senator for the district of which the county of Hampshire is a part, to serve in the General Assembly of this Commonwealth: SO HELP ME GOD.’

“Query.—Can any of those fraudulent made voters, with a good conscience, and without perjuring themselves, ‘make oath on the Holy Evangely of Almighty God,’ that they believe that they are duly qualified (according to the Constitution of Virginia) to vote for delegates for the country of Hampshire, or for a Senator for the district of which the county of Hampshire is a part, to serve in the General Assembly of this Commonwealth, when it is expressly declared (by an act of the Legislature) to be in derogation of the Constitution and laws, and a misdemeanor and fraud upon the election laws.” [MLD]
The following letter, from a gentleman of intelligence and high standing, has given us no little uneasiness as to the stand which Texas may take upon the terms of admission tendered her by the United States. Most deeply do we regret to hear that Houston, the gallant victor at San Jacinto, is now “heading the English party” and tarnishing his laurels by such an affiliation. Has he lost all sympathy for the free institutions and noble associations of his native land, and is he, from rampant ambition, or some other sinister motive, about to destroy his fair fame, by turning his back upon his native and his adopted country, and surrendering the “Lone Star” to the intrigues and cupidity of Great Britain? What a short sighted policy does he pursue, if he hopes, by such a suicidal course, to push forward his own schemes of aggrandizement! Let him but take a retrospective glance at the vanity of Texas, by the plausible show if “independence,” and its consequent blessings; but a few years will demonstrate the treacherous nature of British possessions. When the public mind is flattered by rich promises, and, in the security of apparent prosperity, is blinded to the machinations of the wily mistress of diplomacy, England will stealthily introduce her subtle poison and her faithful agents into every corner of Texas, and by her intrigues and bribes and imported voters, will subject the country to her cunning policy, and reduce the people to the vilest subserviency. With her anaconda coils of treachery and artifice, she will enfold the young Southern Giant, and, when the proper season arrives, will crush the last vestige of liberty and national pride. The “Lone Star” will be lost from the grand constellation of independent nations; her glorious struggle with Mexican tyranny will be shrouded in oblivion, and her noble origin and valiant deeds will be forgotten, in the disgraceful event of being merged, as an humble and oppressed colony, in the overshadowing power of Great Britain. Is not this a true outline of what will necessarily ensue upon the success of the machinations of the “English party”? We appeal to Houston, not to sacrifice his own reputation, and the destinies of Texas, so gallantly rescued by his courage from Mexican oppression, to the still more fatal, though more insidious and cunning, tyranny of British diplomacy. We appeal to the people of Texas, “bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh,” to stand up for themselves, and hurl back upon Great Britain the insult which she offers to American born freemen. Upon the present experiment much depends. The grand question is to be decide, whether the gold and cunning of Great Britain are to succeed in spreading her indefinite dominion over he American continent, and gradually break in upon the sovereignty and safety of the States of the Union. What American can think of the fatal consequences of such an event, and not feel his blood boil with indignation? And yet the Richmond Whig “ardently hopes” that the annexation of Texas will be defeated by her own opposition, stirred up, as it appears, by British agents!

But admit that Texas is not enslaved by England, (a most unnatural supposition, in view of the glaring facts of her past history,) and continues an independent nation, who can rationally doubt the withering influence of that condition of affairs upon which the agricultural products of the latter, her cotton, sugar, indigo, and perhaps tobacco, will be introduced into England free of duty; and, in return, the manufactured goods of England will be brought into Texas also without duty. Can there be a reasonable doubt, that with these facts in view—and also the further fact, that smuggling will be successfully and fully carried on along our South Western frontier—a deadly blow will be given to our agricultural and industrial pursuits—the products of our soil will become drugs in the market—and the work shops of our manufacturers cease their hum of business? Mr. Lyons, in his speech at “the little clique” meeting on Wednesday night, portrayed all these consequences in an eloquent and logical manner. We hope he will excuse our “insidious and treacherous praise”—(see Richmond Whig of last year, passim)—when we add, that h placed in the clearest light the constitutionality of annexation by joint resolution of Congress.

Does it then become us, under the threatening aspect of affairs, to lie upon our oars and let the poison of British intrigue be infused into the heart of Texas, without the slightest objection on our part? Is it proper that we should, without remonstrance, allow Great Britain to defeat a measure which has been resolved upon by the American people, which has been solemnly sanctioned by an American Congress, and with which the best destinies of the nation are wrapped up? Some days since we ventured to throw our a few respectful suggestions to the President and Secretary of State on this subject. We advised, if there was no constitutional objection, the appointment of a new constitutional objection, the appointment of a new commissioner, who should carry the latest wishes of our Government, and should assist Major Donelson in urging and persuading the Government of Texas to accept our offer. Much good might be done by such a mission in explaining the views of our Government and our people, in setting forth the advantages to Texas of accepting the terms of admission specified in the joint resolution and looking to the justice and liberality of the United States in adjusting, hereafter, many questions of interest to Texas. We beg leave, again, respectfully to renew the suggestions, and invite the attention of the President to the new light furnished by the following letter:

“Gentlemen: Letters received by this evening’s mail, direct from Texas, and from those fully acquainted with the state of things there, leave not the least doubt, that an extraordinary struggle is going on in Texas, between the friends of annexation and the English party, headed by General Houston. Every possible inducement is held out by the English Minister and Agents, to the people of Texas, to reject the proffered terms. Magnificent offers are made, a reaction has taken place, and I feel warranted in saying that the issue is doubtful. I trust the President will heed your suggestion, or we may yet lose the country; and, if lost now, it will be lost forever. Mark it!”

The New Orleans papers contain no important news on this interesting question. We cut the following from the New Orleans Republican of yesterday week:

“We understand that Maj. Donelson, our Charge d’Affaires to Texas, will sail in the next packet for Galveston, by which time he supposes that the instructions, said to have been forwarded to him by the way of Nashville, will have arrived.

“We trust that the bill which has passed our Congress, in regard to annexation, will be ratified by the people of Texas; and that the inferences to the contrary, derived from the tone of some of the newspaper publications in that Republic, will prove to be unfounded. If injustice has been done to Texas by the provisions of the bill, so far as they relate to the cession of her public property, salt lakes, minerals, &c., we have but little doubt that her citizens had much rather rely on the future legislation of the United States to restore what is proper and right, than hazard the loss of the measure by further delay. In no event can we anticipate that the advantages of union with us can be thrown away, in order to embrace an alliance with Great Britain, whose fixed policy is now declared to be the abolition of slavery, and whose interests, in other respects, will turn out to be adverse to those of Texas."

The Democrats, thus far, have nobly done their duty towards completing this grand acquisition. But circumstances may yet arise which will require all their energy and zeal. It is, therefore, highly important, that every effort be made to elect a Democratic Legislature this Spring, and to secure a Texas United States Senator next Winter. Let not our own dissensions, or lukewarmness, throw the State into the hands of the Whigs, and "glut the vengeance" of the Richmond Whig and J.M. Botts, the rapid enemies of Texas Annexation! [MLD]

FROM TAMPICO

An extract from a letter published in the Mobile Advertiser, dated Tampico, 23d February, says: "The revolution in this country is far from being at an end; in fact, we consider it as not yet fairly commenced. In a short time you may expect to hear of bloody work. We have merely got rid of one tyrant to make room for legions." [MLD]

PARTY DICTATION

The Whigs of this "Gibraltar of Whiggery" are blessed with a slashing, magnificent, imperious organ. Whatever policy may be marked out by others, it must finally yield to the overshadowing influence of the master-spirit of the Richmond Whig. Who can forget the course of that paper last Spring, when its peculiar favorite, Mr. Stanard, was a candidate for Senator, and when all other aspirants were put down, at the command of the Whig, because they dared to cross the path of the Whig's candidate? Who has forgotten its insidious attacks upon Mr. Lyons, last year, because he refused to join in with the Whig and the Richmond Clique, in denouncing their fellow-citizens as "Disunionists and avaricious speculators," because they favored the annexation of Texas, which the Whigs of the last Legislature pronounced to be acceptable to a large majority of the people of Virginia? The bold stand taken by the Whig, last Spring, on the subject of a Convention to nominate a Whig candidate for Congress from this District, is familiar to all. It hooted at the idea; and when it had succeeded in frightening off opposition, it comes forward with a great show of forbearance and concession to the popular will, and graciously allows a Convention, whose feelings were known to be all on one side, and whose solemn mockery of deliberation consisted in the casting of the vote, for form's sake, for the Whig's favorite, Mr. J. M. Botts. Look, too, at its open warfare upon Mr. Morton, a thorough and consistent Whig, who is unfortunately tinged with Texas annexation. In the Essex District, with Texas annexation. In the Essex District, Mr. Newton is the sole Whig candidate—and yet, because he, claiming to represent the Texas feelings of his constituents, makes one step towards achieving the great measure, (though, afterwards, he lost all the credit by undoing what he had boasted of having achieved, almost as a "sole author,"") the Whig pounces upon him, and cruelly strips him of his feathers. One fierce attack is not sufficient, and he promises to redouble his blows upon the Whig who dares to avow himself in favor of immediate annexation. Through all these assaults, it is not difficult, even for an unpracticed eye, to discern insidious side-blows at the pretensions of certain Whigs in this vicinity, who are guilty of a Texas leaning. Yesterday's Whig throws the veil still further back and exhibits its true designs:

In the Whig and Compiler of yesterday there appears the following card:

"PUBLIC MEETING,
"On Wednesday, 8 o'clock, P.M.

"The Whigs of Richmond are invited to attend a Public Meeting, which will take place on Wednesday evening, at 8 o'clock, at the 'Odd Fellows' Hall.'

"The Meeting will be addressed by Mr. Lyons—and the other candidates for the city are invited to do so likewise.

MANY WHIG VOTERS.

"Monday, March 24th, 1845. [MLD]"
This call has been hitherto suspended by the absence of Mr. Fleming James. He is expected to return by Wednesday, and circumstances preclude a further delay."

This announcement is followed by a dispassionate communication, signed "Many Whig Voters," from which we make a few extracts, to show the object of the called meeting:

"We believe that every shade of opinion, which can be entertained on this subject, is consistent with entire fidelity and devotion to the Whig party. We believe, likewise, that a full and free toleration of our mutual differences of opinion on this subject, is indispensably necessary to prevent an incurable division in the Whig party."

"We moreover believe, that the most direct and positive—the clearest as well as the harshest—mode of making this separation, is by making any opinion on the "annexation" question, a test of eligibility to such offices of trust or honour, as may be at the disposal of the Whig Party. We, therefore, earnestly protest against the application of this test; and, differing greatly amongst ourselves upon the "Annexation" question, but agreeing in preferring Mr. Lyons, as the representative of this city in the next Legislature, to any gentleman hitherto named, we deeply regret to have seen his opinions upon that subject, treated, buy many Whigs opposed to his election, in a manner tending to produce incurable discord in the Whig party. We are also satisfied, that the whole question of "Annexation," as well as Mr. Lyon's opinion upon every branch of that question, and his more of treating it during the late Presidential canvas, is by many wholly misunderstood."

"For the purpose, therefore, of promoting harmony in the Whig party, in Richmond—the want of which, we are convinced, arises in a great measure, from misunderstanding each other,—we have joined in the above invitation to a public meeting on Wednesday night."

And how does the organ of Wiggery meet this appeal for harmony? Does he come forward in a spirit of justice towards those who are in favor of immediate annexation, though on every other question as good Whigs as the modest Editor for himself? Does he express a wish to sink the question of Texas, and to allow the Whigs to select who my best promote the interests of the city of Richmond? Far from it. He is of the city of Richmond? Far from it. He is more rabid than ever. He strikes down every Whig that has the independence to disobey his arrogant demands, to think for himself, and to favor the annexation of Texas, without the vile and slavish condition of obtaining the consent of Mexico, which every free-born American should indignantly repubrate. As well might the freemen of America ask the consent of Great Britain for permission to carry out any policy—for, Texas, on the fields of San Jacinto, acquired her independence as we achieved our own at the battle of Texas has been fully recognized by this county and all this great nations of Europe—and yet all Whig would have us slavishly to ask the "consent" of Mexico! But he comments of the Whig will speak for themselves. We make copious extracts, not only to show the high hand with which the Whig organ rules in the fiery spirits of the independent members of its own party—but as a beacon light to the friends of Texas in this District and throughout the State. They will see that the Whig has sworn eternal hostility to this great American question—for the conditions which it points out, never can be reasonably fulfilled, and consequently Texas never can be annexed. Of course, Mexico will always resist the annexation of Texas—and still the Whig makes this a grand condition and precedent to the achievement of this great measure. Can party madness go farther? Will Virginia, will this District, sustain the anti-American policy, pointed out by the Richmond Whig? Will party spirit throw its baleful influence over this question, and destroy all independence of thought and action? This experiment will shortly be decided.

But to the comments of the Whig, which in some cases we have italicized, for the benefit of the independent voters of both parties:

"How many authorize this call of 'Many Whig Voters,' we do not know, that part of the secret being kept secret."

"If we understand the position of things correctly, it is very different form that which the author of this communication seems willing to imply. No Whig that we know of objects to any other Whig that he is in favor of annexing Texas—at the right time—in a constitutional manner—and by the consent of the American, the Mexican and the Texan People! Present it in that shape, and few would be found, comparatively, (though some still would,) to dissent from it. —The vehement and indignant opposition to the immediate annexation of Texas, which animates the bosoms of thousands and hundreds of thousands of the purest patriots in the land, springs form the loftiest motives."

"This writer intimates that immediate and Joint Resolution Annexation Whigs are unacceptable to the Whig party, and opposed by them because they ARE such! Can it be at all wonderful that it should be so? Here is by far the most immense American question of the age—a question which, before it is ended may well change the whole frame work of American Society, and stain American soil with civil gore-decided against the solemn judgment of the Whig party, by the aid of a few self-willed Whigs, numbering among them Tyler and Merrick, and every other Whig traitor of the day! Can it, we ask, be wonderful, that the Whig masses look with coldness and distrust, upon these "immediate Annexation, Joint Resolution" Whigs, who, whether they intended it or no (as we know many of them did not) helped by that detestable question and the support they gave it, to overthrow Henry Clay and prostrate the Whig party in November? IS IT WONDERFUL—that startling under the effects of this odious Tyler and Speculator invention to ruin them—defeated by it, and deprived of that command of the Government to which they were entitled from their numbers, and defeated too by the indirect assistance of Whigs—the masses of the Whig party should for the present feel extremely lukewarm towards such Whigs, as in this great national and vital question, took part against them, and Henry Clay, and with "Polk, Dallas, and Texas"! We for our part, think that nothing can be more natural, reasonable, and proper! Let Polk, Dallas, and Texas elect them if they can, to the offices they want: Let them, like our friend Jeremiah Morton, appeal at once to that "Democracy" with whom they concur on this great
The Whig catches at the idea, and gives its "consent" to such a meeting, with the following conditions thus royally set forth:

"But in attempting to restore harmony, great discretion is indispensable, or it might result in widening the breach, instead of closing it. Every true Whig ought to resist and frown down any attempt to convene the people to hear the candidates spout. It cannot by possibility result in any practical good. * * * * * It will proceed in uproar and confusion, and it may very well end in a row—a row, which if it is congenial to the tastes of the white Eagle or Empire Clubs, is abhorrent to the conservative principles, and the law and order-loving spirit of the great Whig Party.

"For these reasons, we are opposed utterly to any spouting meeting, where Whig is to be arrayed against Whig, and brother against brother; and pledged as we are to neutrality—a neutrality, which we have endeavored strictly to preserve!!! We will depart from it, so far as to warn the Whigs of Richmond, (if it be a departure at all!) against a course which will create the nucleus of a permanent and dangerous split! We speak neither for nor against any candidate! We speak alone for the Whig Party, and its continued ascendancy in the Metropolis, so important as that is, to the ultimate and certain redemption of Virginia.

"There can be no objection to a voting meeting of the Whigs of Richmond. That will not inflame the feelings or exasperate the passions.—That can be attempted safely; and if it result, as it very probably may, in making no choice, it at least will not expose the Whigs to the hazard of more injury than they are now suffering."

Here the Whig publishes its "general orders" as to the terms of the meeting. It must be a voting meeting, and the ballots must be deposited "under the eye of a committee appointed for the purpose of seeing that no person deposits more than one ballot," intimating a fear, that the Texas Whigs might, in their "unconstitutional" haste, smuggle in more votes than they are entitled to—There must be no debate, no discussion. The proceedings must be as still as death—as dark as the Inquisition—and this is the kind of meeting, that the Whig allows to the independent, prudent, wise, intelligent and patriotic Whig voters of the Metropolis.

There must be no discussion, however calm and enlightened; not a single word spoken, for fear that "uproar and confusion and a row," may ensue! What a compliment to the prudence and the good manners of this Whig metropolis! The Texas and all other questions must be kept as dark as Erebus. The voters must "prepare" their ballots in advance, deposit them (and them only,) and leave the house, like so many ghosts! And all this, for fear that one word spoken or "spouted" might light up a blaze, that could not be extinguished!

Could a more appropriate plan be devised to stifle free deliberation and to muzzle thought ad action? It is for the Whigs themselves to agree to such tyranny. The Democrats will have no candidate in the field and will take no part in the contest; save that each man, we presume, will vote, if he votes at all, for that Whig, whom he may think best able to promote the public interests and the good of the City. [MLD] and press it upon the people. Yesterday’s Whig thus warmly chimes in which the two Texas anti-annexation papers:

“It really would look, from the language of the Galveston Civilian, and the Texas National Register—the leading and most influential Journals of that Republic—as if Annexation, on the terms proposed, was going to be scorned and spurned by Texas!

“How ardently we hope this may prove true, we need not say, for it would in a great measure correct the dire mischief of the rash and unconstitutional legislation of the late Congress—a Congress destined to be opprobrious remembered in the annals of this country.”

The Whig, then, goes on to point out the selfish motives which have originated the “iniquity,” (bringing in, most stupidly, for the thousandish time, its stale list of “Texas speculators,” &c., for which its won party have so often and so sinfully rebuked it!) and winds up with the unwilling confession, that Texas, moved by “mercenary considerations, will be Whipped in.” The Whig will have to swallow the dose. We “ardently hope” and believe, that the movements of the politicians in Texas against annexation will be frowned down by the people, an Texas will soon assume her place in the American Union.

But what ought the friends of Texas in Virginia to think of the Richmond Whig, who has violently opposed the action of our Congress, and now “ardently hopes” that he measure will be utterly defeated by the politicians of Texas herself, and throw his influence (?) into the anti-Texas scale? It ought to teach us one lesson—that, as Mr. Botts admits, the Texas question is still unsettled, and the friends of Texas should take up the gauntlet boldly thrown down to them, and labor zealously to confirm the glorious action of the last Congress. The voice of Virginia, this Spring, will have much weight. Let us pres on the opponents of Texas the issue which they themselves have raised!

PUBLIC DEMONSTRATIONS

The Democrats of Philadelphia had two meetings on Thursday afternoon; a split and confusion having ensued, in attempts to organize by the selection of presiding officers, the favorites of the two sections. Both meetings, however, adopted strong resolutions, “approving and endorsing the patriotic declaration” of the President’s Inaugural, on the subject of Oregon. One of the meetings also passed a resolution complimenting Mr. Buchanan, as “a true exponent of his (Mr. Polk’s) sentiments, and a firm and determined supporter of all his patriotic measures to promote and extend our national prosperity and preserve our national honor.”

In Wilmington, Delaware, the Democrats passed a number of resolutions, from which we extract the following:

“That as Republicans it becomes us to sustain the Executive in the position which he has assumed; and believing that position to be correct, we trust he will adhere to the letter and spirit of his Inaugural Address.

“That if Great Britain determines, as her Prime Minister has already declared, ‘to maintain her (pretended) claims to Oregon;’ upon her own head be the consequences. She will find that the American Eagle has but commenced its flight. - That a triumph more brilliant and glorious than that of Yorktown awaits it; and, finally, that it will rest in peace upon the shores of the Pacific - the emblem of the greatest nation of the modern world.”

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS

The Washington Union, late the Globe, and now the official paper, has an article upon our foreign relations, in which it expresses surprise at the tone assume in the British Parliament on the Oregon question, and says: “One thing is certain - we cannot abandon the great interests of our country to their blunders, or even to their menaces. We shall have no anti-Oregon party. The North, as well as the South, will unite with the West on this subject. Let Great Britain

HUGH A. GARLAND’S LETTER

[From the Petersburg Republican.]

To the Editors of the Enquirer:

I was surprised at seeing an article in your paper over the signature of a Republican of the Old School, containing a criticism and objections against the letter of Hugh A. Garland, lately published in the Whig. Surprised that your correspondent should so totally misapprehend the plain and legitimate meaning of that letter. As your correspondent admits that he only gave it a "hasty perusal," some apology must be given for his over zeal for the principles of our party. I can assure him, that they will find no warmer and more zealous supporter than in the person of Hugh A. Garland. Mr. Garland’s political consistency, his ardent attachment to the principles of our party, his ability and firmness in their defence, should have made your correspondent a little more cautious in attacking his letter, after giving it only a "hasty perusal." He is clearly at default, when he imagines that Mr. Garland is willing to sacrifice his political opinions, and to unite with our opponents. No such construction can be put upon that letter. No where in that letter can be found, either expressly or impliedly, that he is for a Bank, a Protective Tariff, or the Distribution of the Public Lands - such a construction (to use a trite expression) would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer.

Your correspondent is "amazed," (he must be very timid,) at the following passage from Mr. Garland’s latter. "His (Mr. Polk’s) views on the Tariff are generally approved by both parties - that vexed question therefore, so far as principles are concerned, may be considered as settled. - When the present Tariff shall come to be remodeled as it unquestionably must be for the sake of revenue, now falling below the wants of the Government, there will be a scramble over its details; but the grounds upon which a Tariff of duty should be adjusted, taking care of all the great interests of the country, are now tolerably well agreed upon. The Tariff, therefore, constitutes no subject of party division."

How can this passage, by any and every ingenious sophistical twisting, be made to prove that Mr. Garland is an advocate of the "grinding Tariff of 1842?" I think the ancient problem, of how many angles could dance on the point of a needle, is not more difficult to be solved. This passage, instead of proving him an advocate of the "resent Tariff" shows clearly that he is its opponent; for his letter states, that "Mr. Polk's views are generally approved by both parties" - Mr. Polk is opposed to the "present Tariff" - Mr. Garland’s are the same - hence, he is likewise its opponent. And, therefore, when is letter states that the present Tariff, as far as "principles are concerned," is settled, he could only mean that it was settled by the Whigs, who through their different organs, have repeatedly declared, that Mr. Polk’s Tariff views, as set forth in his Inaugural, are the same as their own, and those of Mr. Clay. Settled, not by Mr. Garland, or his party defending the present onerous Tariff, not by "substantially surrendering one of the great issues between the parties," but "settled" by the Whigs' own confessions throughout the South, by their adopting Mr. Polk’s views as their own.

Certainly, Mr. Garland cannot be censured for stating that the Whigs are now advocating the principles of our party on this question. I trust that your correspondent will no longer "protest" against this small sin!

Your correspondent has fallen into another error, and is "amazed" at a part of the passage referred to. As the principles of the Tariff are settled by the Whigs’ own declarations, the "resent Tariff, unquestionably MUST be remodeled for the sake of revenue, now falling below the wants of the Government." Yes, your correspondent feels "amazed" to learn that the present Tariff falls below the wants of the Government. I am now myself amazed at his amazement. If he will just refer to the last number of the Democratic Review, page 404, he will find that the fact is no less strange to him than true. Among many passages proving the same fact, I only select the following: [fold] make good the estimates, 12,372,000 dollars must be received between November and July, exceeding the receipts of last year by over 2,000,000 dollars, whereas they are now running about 25 percent below last year. The result will be a deficit up to July of at least 4,500,000 dollars diminished customs, showing incontestably that the weight of the present duties is too heavy for a healthy state of trade. The deficit in the revenue will, in all probability, absorb the whole surplus - 7,857,379 dollars, which existed July, 1841 - before Congress again meets, when a modification of the Tariff will become imperative for purposes of revenue. This view of the case is already beginning to exert an influence upon the markets, and in the Fall will probably exercise a restrictive influence upon imports." In 1842, our entire party, on every occasion, declared and argued that the protective feature in the Tariff was so high on many commodities, that prohibition would be the sad result; that in proportion as the Tariff was restrictive, our revenue would be diminished - those opinions were defended by those of the most celebrated political economists, and the most distinguished statesmen. It is useless for me to enter into the causes of the late surplus in our revenue, for they are known to us all - not by the present Tariff.
As regards the Bank being "settled" question, I will only make an extract from Mr. Garland's letter to show the he is not its advocate. "The question whether the Bank of the United States should be established is also for the present an adjourned question, as a practical question indeed we may say indefinitely postponed. When our monetary affairs are in a tolerably sound and prosperous condition as at present - when all the great interests of Trade are gradually recovering from their[?] prostration, and steadily advancing in improvement, it would be folly to disturb so agitating a theme, and to throw all the departments of business into confusion, by a discussion which could only excite the fears of the capitalists, and cause the man of business to dread another commercial revolution. No practical and wise statesman, who tempers his abstractions by experience, could attempt such a thing without justly forfeiting public confidence by his rashness. - Besides, the President is known to be adverse to a Bank, and would for the next four years veto any such measure." No one can now say, but the "Distribution of the proceeds of the Public Lands is a mere temporary question, that cannot be made the basis of a permanent party question."

Hence, in the language of Mr. Garland, there is, therefore, only on subject before the people on which parties can divide, and that is the annexation of Texas. Therefore, Mr. Garland considered this the absorbing question of the day - other questions little and overshadowed by that vital one of the South. You, sirs have made it the burden of your editorials, the great and almost the only question of the day. Who, then, can censure Mr. Garland, when he says that he might vote for a Texas Whig for United States Senator? Such was Mr. Garland's obvious meaning, when he remarks that "he might vote for a Texas Whig."

In conclusion, I must express my surprise that your correspondent could have fallen into such errors even after a "hasty perusal of Mr. Garland's letter." Although Mr. Garland is the man and statesman to rise above the petty questions of party, when the interest of his country calls for its defence; yet, he holds as dearly and sacredly the doctrines of the Republican party as your correspondent, who has unfortunately entirely misapprehended the context and spirit of that letter. As the article of your correspondent has gone forth through the columns of the Enquirer, (through Mr. Garland's letter has not been so honored,) I ask, as an "antidote," that this article may find a place in your paper, from KEITH. [MSH] man. He was called the "Little Hickory" during the late campaign; and he deserves the distinction, for he has the spirit of the "Old Hickory" in him. He will never sacrifice the honor of his country to any idle apprehensions of war, or, we beg leave to say, to the still more idle declarations of the statesmen of England, in the midst of the Imperial Parliament! Let not then, the peace of two great people, like those of England and the United States, be disturbed by any factious declarations of any of the Whig presses. - As the "Easter Argus" truly says, in its commentaries upon the effusions of the "Advertiser":

"Its chief delight just now seems to be that of picking flaws in our title to Oregon, denouncing the annexation of Texas, and ridiculing the idea of maintaining our right at any and every hazard. England may bully and swagger to her heart's content about her title to Oregon; may put forth her meddlesome hand to stay the annexation of Texas; and may strive by ever means in her power to retard the growth of her Western rival; but for her, our Federal editors have no sneer, no censure, no threats; while they are quick to find an earnest to denounce the least show of mainly opposition to her claims on the part of our people or our own Government. [fold] the war with her, the Advertiser might find subscribers, we doubt not in the British fleet.

"We agree with the Advertiser that President Polk will not be 'kicked into a war,' but we are equally certain that he will not be kicked into any surrender of American rights, or any neglect of American honor. Neither Great Britain nor her Federal allies will probably turn him aside a single hair's breadth from the straightforward path of firm and fair dealing which he has marked out for himself in reference to the foreign relations of our Government; and while he never intends, we are sure, to ask anything that is not clearly right, he is misnamed 'Young Hickory' if he will submit to any thing which is clearly wrong." IDLE SPECULATIONS

The question of Oregon is grave enough to excite some serious reflections in the country, without overloading it with absurd panics, or contemptible chimeras. We have already been long enough in Washington to know that it is pretty much like Athens in the days of Demosthenes, where, as the orator said, the controlling question was, "What is the news?" and where this extravagant curiosity was productive of still more extravagant curiosity was productive of still more extravagant reports in the metropolis. The atmosphere itself seems loaded with rumors. - These are caught up by the greedy letter-writers, who show a good deal of ingenuity in circulating them at a distance. But he cave of Cyclops is not confined to Washington. We have laboratories of artificial thunder and the idle panics established in other cities of the Union. It is amusing to see how many rumors this question of Oregon has already produced. It will be legion before it will be settled. For example, it was stated the other day, that Mr. Vice President Dallas has been called to Washington to consult with the Cabinet on our foreign relations. This was a mistake. Mr. Dallas was certainly in Washington the other day; but he was not invited hither by any cabinet consultation.

Again, we see the following paragraph in the Baltimore American of this morning:

"RUMORS FROM WASHINGTON - It is well known that previous to the fulfillment of any important measure by the Government of Washington, the annunciation of such intention is frequently made by letter writers to New York - somewhat after the fashion of feelers, to see how the matter is relished by the capitalists and politicians there - and thus the first intimations are given in that city long before the people of the District of Columbia are aware of the contemplated movement. A rumor, important in its character, is mentioned in the New York Commercial as having been quietly circulated in Wall street on Tuesday and Wednesday; but whether true or false, that paper does not pretend to say. It is that the result of the President's deliberations with his cabinet on the Oregon question, was determination to follow the example of the British Government on the Maine boundary affair, and send a special Minister to London. The special Minister mentioned is Mr. Van Buren."

We have a brief answer to all this. We understand that the mission to London has been offered to Mr. Pickens, of South Carolina; and this is the first time we ever heard the high name of Mr. Van Buren associated with such an appointment. We are satisfied that the report is unfounded, and that it can only tend to make improper impressions on the public mind. [Washington Union] [MSH]

IN PEACE PREPARE FOR WAR

From the New Orleans Republican, April 28

The New York Courier and Enquirer of the 16th, has a very judicious article upon the very unprotected state of the country in the event of a war, and of the perfect confidence entertained by the people, the no harm can come from our existing relations with Mexico. We think it proper at this moment to place before our readers our opinions upon this subject. They may be erroneous, but they were based upon information of such a character as to compel us to give public expression to them. The war with Mexico - if any there be - will be a war of privateering; and it becomes
OUR RIGHTS TO OREGON

It is most extraordinary that the lynx-eyed Whigs could discern in the President's Inaugural no spec of war, until it had been to England and returned. The Inaugural was delivered on the 4th of March. The Whig press gave vent to their joy at it Whig character. They boasted that a Democratic President has yielded to the wisdom of Whig policy - and particularly that his Tariff notions quadrated exactly with Whig doctrines. They said nothing of his views on Oregon - they despaired in his declarations on that point no rash assumptions, calculated to produce war - and, by their very silence, sanctioned the language and the spirit of Mr. Polk's Inaugural. In the meantime, this excellent document, approved by Whigs and Democrats, receives the commentaries of British Lords, is by them declared to be full of "sound and fury," the bolts of war are contained in its fiery declarations - and straightway the Federal press of this country catch up the strain, denounce the recklessness of the President and stigmatize his declarations as "braggart and blustering" - (see Richmond Whig of yesterday.) We shall not enter into an analysis of these contradictory movements. We simply refer to the fact that the Whig press, with remarkable unanimity, now give to
As this is one of the great questions of the day, it may not be uninteresting to give a condensed and hasty view of the titles of the United States and Great Britain to the Oregon Territory, drawn from the imperfect sources of information to which we can have access. The British Lords in Parliament claim, by a "clear and indisputable title," a greater portion of the territory in dispute, than is allowed by our Government, and base their claims upon the discoveries of Drake and Vancouver, and on prior settlement by British subjects. Now, let us look at our title by treaties between the United States and other nations. By a Treaty entered into in 1819 between the United States and Spain, and ratified in 1821, at the time of Mr. Forsyth's Ministry at the Court of Madrid, the Southern boundary between our possessions and those of Spain, was a line drawn from the source of the Arkansas to the forty-second parallel of latitude, and thence along said parallel, westward to the Pacific, near Cape St. Sebastian, his Spanish Majesty surrendering all his rights and claims to any territories North of said line. In 1828, the same boundary was confirmed by a Treaty with the new State of Mexico. In 1824, it was agreed between Russia and our Government, that no establishment should be formed by ourselves North of the parallel of 54 degrees 40 minutes, and none under the authority of Russia South of that latitude. The Treaty of 1825, between Russia and Great Britain, also recognizes this line. The territorial claims of Great Britain extend southward from this parallel of 54 degrees 40 minutes, and those of the United States run northward from the parallel of 42 degrees - but no dividing line has been agreed upon - through a convention exists for the common occupation of the territory until twelve months notice is given by one of the parties to the other. Is it not clear, that if Spain had nay right to the territory conveyed to us by Treaty, we have an unquestionable title to the country, as far North as latitude 54 degrees 40 minutes?

But the British Lords claim a prior discovery by Drake in 1578-'80. The Washington Union examines this point, and thoroughly destroys all the deductions which the English may make from it, as calculated to give them even a pretended title, and brings forward the evidence of the Spanish navigators, Cibrillo and Ferrelo, having explored these coasts in 1542-'3, as far North as the 42d degree of latitude, and having landed in many places, "having erected crosses bearing inscriptions, and performed various acts, asserting the right of their sovereign to the country." In 1592, Juan de Fuca coasted along the Western side of America, Northward from Mexico, and found a passage between the 48th and 49th parallels, called the Strait of Fuca. In 1602-'3, the Spaniards, under Sebastian Viscaino again examined the Northwest coasts to the 43d degree North, as far as Cape / Blanco, which [fold] and European discovery. Nothing farther was done till 1770, when the Spaniards founded Monterey and other towns on the Western side of California. That nation then for the five succeeding years explored the whole coast of Oregon on the Pacific, including the mouth of the Columbia and examined the Western coast as far as the 58th degree, performing the ceremonies of taking possession.

In 1778 only did the English Captain Cook visit these shores, near the 43d degree of latitude - thence running along it to the Nootka Sound, in 49 degrees.

We extract from the Augusta (Ga.) Constitutionalist the following sketch of subsequent events, forming a complete chain of title on our part:

"So far the mouth of the Columbia river was not discovered. It was reserved for an American to make the discovery. The first voyages from the United States were those of the ship Columbia, Captain Kendrick, and sloop Washington, Capt. Robert Gray. Both vessels sailed from Boston, in Massachusetts, on the 30th of September, 1788; visited Nootka Sound (49 deg.) in Sept., 1788, and returned to Boston in August, 1790. - But, on the 27th September, 1798, Captain Gray, in command of the ship Columbia, sailed for the Pacific. He reached the coast a little to the Northward of Cape Mendoceino (40 deg.) Coasting along towards Nootka, he observed an opening in latitude 46 deg. 16 mins., discharging a current so strong as to prevent an entrance, although he remained nine days at hand in order to effect it. He sailed towards Nootka, fully convinced that he had discovered the mouth of a great river. In September, 1791, he made Clyoquot his Winton station, and build a house of strength off the shore, which he named Fort Defiance. Here, also, he build and launched a schooner called the Enterprise.

"Capt. Vancouver, with Lieut. Broughton, in the British ships of war the Discovery and the Chatham, were despatched from England in 1791, in order to receive from the Spanish authorities the surrender of a port at Nootka Sound, under the stipulation of a convention (averting an impending war) made between the two courts in 1790. As Vancouver was sailing along the coast towards his port of destination, on the 27th April, 1792, he passed by, with but a careless glance, the cape and seeming bay, so emphatically named by Meares Disappointment and Deception, and puts down, "not considering this opening worthy of more attention, I continued our course to the northwest," &c. Two days after, he met the Columbia, Capt. Gray, who informed him, among other matters, "of his having," in the words of Vancouver, "been off the mouth of a river, in latitude 46 degrees 10 minutes, when the onset or reflux was so strong to prevent his entering for nine days." Vancouver proceeded northward strong in his incredulity, while Capt. Gary again sought the mouth of the river. On his way he found and entered a harbor near the 47th degree, to which he gave the name of Bulfinch's Harbor, in compliment to one of the owners. Leaving Bulfinch's Harbor on the 11th of May after a few hours' sail he reached the mouth of the river, crossed the bar, and found his ship on a broad and rapid stream, the waters of which were so perfectly fresh that the casks of the ship were filled within ten miles of the Pacific. On leaving the river, Capt. Gary bestowed on it the name of his vessel; the Southern point of land he called Cape Adams, and substituted the name of Cape Hancock for that of Cape Disappointment. Neither Cape Hancock nor Cape Adams, have taken an assured place in the maps; and the name of Cape Disappointment remains, to preserve in remembrance for a time, probably short, the sagacity of the sponsor. The name of the good ship Columbia, it is not hard to believe, will flow with the waters of the bold river as long as grass grows or waters runs in the valleys of the Rocky Mountains.

"Sir Robert Peel, in his speech on the subject, calls frequently that river the Columbia, and very seldom the Oregon."
"Besides the above brief statement of the title of the United States by treaty and prior discovery of the Columbia river, we must state that Mr. John Jacob Astor, of New York, in 1810, made a settlement on the Columbia River, for a trade with the Indians for peltries. But during the war with Great Britain, this settlement which was named Astoria, was taken by the British, and called by them Fort George. After the return of peace in 1815, a demand was made by Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, of the surrender of Astoria, at the mouth of the Columbia; but the surrender was effected only in 1818, but for reasons not well known, the American Government did not countenance the re-occupation of the place by its founder."

From the rapid outline, for the facts of which we are indebted to the Augusta, Constitutionalist and Washington Union, and which we thought well calculated to interest public curiosity, it will be seen, that the title of the United States to the most important portion of Oregon, whether directly, or derived by Treaty from another nation, is "clear and unquestionable." We sincerely hope, that the light of truth and experiences may dispel the gloom hanging over this subject, and that peace may be preserved. If England, however, still persists in her grasping claims, and will not compromise, without a sacrifice of our rights and honor, we hope that the whole people of the Union, of all parties, will stand ready to meet their responsible duties. MISCELLANEOUS

(From the N. O. Bulletin, April 26)

TEXAS - The steamship John S. McKim, Captain Lewis, arrived from Galveston last evening, whence she sailed on the 21st. President Jones has issued a Proclamation appointing the Congress to meet on the Sixteenth day of June, to consider the resolutions of the United States Congress for the annexation of Texas; previous to which, judging from the alacrity with which the British war vessels sail with despatches from Vera Cruz to Galveston and vice versa, it is expected the propositions of the Mexican Government and its ally or allies will appear in some tangible shape. The sentiments of the Texian nation can be best gleaned by a perusal of the resolutions passed at a meeting held at the town of Brenham, in Washington county - which were carried, although the Hon. Ebenezer Allen, Attorney-General of the Republic and acting Secretary of State, spoke in disapprobation of the same:

"Be it Resolved, That this meeting approves the Annexation of Texas to the United States on the basis of the joint resolutions passed by the Congress of that country.

Be it Resolved, That the Executive be requested to use all means within his power to effect the annexation of Texas to the United States, upon the basis of the join resolutions aforesaid, with the utmost promptness.

Be it Resolved, That inasmuch as the Government of the United States has given its ultimatum on this subject, secrecy on the part of the Executive tends only to embarrass this subject, without producing any beneficial effect.

Be it Resolved, That if the President of the Republic does not convene the Congress on or before the fourth Monday in June next, we, a portion of the people of Texas, recommend to the counties throughout the Republic, to meet as soon as practicable, at any point that may be designated, in Convention, to ratify said Joint Resolution, and for a State Constitution.

Be it Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting, it is the duty of the President of this Republic to consummate the measure of Annexation to the United States, without reference to the wishes or concurrence of any Foreign or European Power?"

The Houston Morning Star has the following intelligence, which is significantly hinted at in the above resolutions:

"We learn that our Government has recently received communications from General Arista, by way of Corpus Christi and Bexar, conveying assurances, that the new Government of Mexico is disposed to treat with Texas upon the basis of Independence. Similar dispatches, we learn, were received from Vera Cruz by the Eurydice about a fortnight since, and it is rumored, that the British Minister in Mexico will soon induce the Mexican Government to present definite propositions for the adjustment of all difficulties between the two countries. It is rumored, also, that our Government

PROCLAMATION

By the President of the Republic of Texas

Whereas, since the close of the last session of Congress, a Joint Resolution respecting the Annexation of Texas to the United States has, by their Congress, been adopted, authorizing the President of the U. States to select the alternative of two certain propositions contained in the said Joint Resolution, as the basis for consummating the proposed annexation:

And, whereas, the President of the U. States has selected the first and second sections of the Resolutions as such basis, and notified this Government thereof.

[Here follow the Resolutions passed by the U. States Congress for the Annexation of Texas.]

And, whereas, the premises, requiring the solemn deliberation and action of the Representatives of the people, form an extraordinary occasion for convening the Congress of the Republic;

Therefore, be it known, that I, Anson Jones, President of the Republic of Texas, by virtue of the power vested in me by the Constitution, do by these presents, require that the Senators and Representatives to Congress of this Republic, shall assemble in special session, at the Town of Washington, in the County of Washington, on Monday, the sixteenth day of June next ensuing, then and there to receive such communications as may be made to them, and to consult and determine on such measures as in their wisdom may be deemed meet for the welfare of Texas.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the Great Seal of the Republic to be hereunto affixed. Done at the Town of Washington, this fifteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-five, and of the Independence of the Republic the tenth. ANSON JONES

THE OREGON QUESTION

Many of the Whig presses pour out piteous lamentations, that Mr. Clay, instead of Mr. Polk, does not now fill the Presidential Chair. They argue, that the country will be inevitably thrown into a war with England, because of the rashness and incapacity of Mr. Polk - that Mr. Polk is so utterly ignorant in matters of State negotiation, so reckless in his positions, so weak-minded and inefficient, that war must ensue, and with it a rain of horrors. Now, what is the heinous offence committed by Mr. Polk, which has called forth the bullying menaces of John Bull, and rendered Mr. Polk the target of Federal attacks? In February, the House of Representatives asserted our "clear and unquestionable title" to Oregon. The news reaches England, and we hear of no unusual excitement produced in the British Court. But when Mr. Polk, in his Inaugural on the 4th March, re-echoes the sentiments of an overwhelming majority of the people's Representatives, and, indeed, repeats the very words "clear and unquestionable title" employed by the lower House of Congress, at once the British Lion utters a roar of defiance, and thinks to frighten us from our rights. Do we not see in this sudden effort to shake our firmness, an indication of the effects produced on the British mind by the course of the Whig press last summer? Did not that press lavish every deprecating epithet upon the head of Mr. Polk? Was he not universally denounced as a coward, a cipher, a disgrace to the Presidential honors? Is it not natural that the British ministry, who look to the Whig press of this country as their authority, should be influenced by the incessant misrepresentations of that press, and should, at the very outset of the new administration, attempt to take advantage of the supposed weakness and vacillation of the President, to alarm him into a recognition of British claims, or at least to a less zealous advocacy of the rights of the U. States? We doubt not that the course of the Federal press in the late canvass, induced the learned yet unprincipled Brongham to represent Mr. Polk as an "obscure individual," whom this country had the folly to elevate to the Presidency, though he was the popular choice. - This same changeling Lord, further, denounced the United States, because a portion of them "tolerate domestic slavery," and have no "paid their debts." Upon these considerations, he bases his violent and insolent philippic, and bravely appeals to British patriotism to stand more taxes, and to add new millions to the navy estimates. - But Mr. Polk will disappoint all these deluded gentlemen. He will prove himself worthy of the confidence of a nation of twenty millions of freemen. He will act upon the wise and saving principle - "Ask nothing but what is right, submit to nothing that is wrong." We look to his coolness sagacity, firmness and sound sense, to conduct this troublesome question in the proper manner. While he will leave nothing undone to secure an honorable settlement of the difficulty, we feel satisfied that he will, in no event, sacrifice the rights or the honor of the Union. - If Great Britain, in her unquenchable thirst for new territory and unlimited power, should force us into a war, in which, according to the London Times, “no usages, however barbarous, are to be deemed unwarrantable, which is to expose our commerce to the privateers and adventurers of all nations,” in which great Britain is “to raise the standard of freedom among a population of slaves,” and to subsidize the savage Indians and the cruel Mexicans, however “repugnant it may be to the interests of civilization” - we trust that our whole people, or every shade of party, will be prepared to defend our rights, and, however “obscure” the President may be, to sustain him in his support of the country’s honor. Such a war will be repudiated by all civilized nations, and we confidently hope that their frowns may cause England to hesitate, and may avert the calamities of a bloody struggle. We most anxiously pray for a continued peace - but if hostilities are forced upon us, the people will be as zealous and united in resisting foreign insolence as in our past glorious struggles.

But suppose Mr. Clay were now President - would he not pursue a similar course to the “obscure” Mr. Polk’s? Would his friends or the country expect or desire a different tone? He could not do so without a violation of his public pledges, without a disgraceful surrender of American rights, and independence of action. Let our Whig friends read the following extracts from a letter of the intelligent Washington correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, and then, in their consciences condemn, if they can, the conduct of Mr. Polk, or desire that the declaration of the Inaugural had been witheld, or, in the slightest degree, modified:

"His (Mr. Clay’s) course during the late war, as the old Federalists well remember, did not savor much of the anti-American spirit of the present day; and, were he now President, it is my opinion, that he would disappoint his friends on this subject, and become almost as odious to John Bull as this terrible James K. Polk.

But Mr. Polk has never yet gone quite so far as Mr. Clay has in opposition to British pretensions to Oregon! Mr. Clay, in 1838, declared in the Senate that he considered the occupation of the mouth of Columbia river by the British as a contravention of the Treaty of Ghent!! This declaration appeared extravagant at the time, because, in virtue of the convention made afterwards a joint occupancy was stipulated for, and the country was open to the enterprise of both nations. - But the assertions lately made in the British Parliament prove that Mr. Clay was correct, and that the joint occupancy was a one-sided affair - It was Mr. Clay himself who introduced, in the Treaty of Ghent, the apt word "possession," which, as you have seen, now so much embarrasses the pretensions of Great Britain. He introduced that word as properly descriptive of the sort of hold we had upon the mouth of Columbia river prior to the late war. The mutual restoration of all possessions held before the war, stipulated for by the Treaty, was not affected by the sale and transfer to the British Company of the private establishment of Astoria.

The manner in which Great Britain has occupied the Territory of Oregon, whether in contravention of the Treaty of Ghent and the Convention of 1827, or not, has given much anxiety to our statesmen, and not without reason, as it now appears, for, as it was predicted in 1838, it is made a pretext of a title to the territory.

In 1838, Dr. Linn declared that, unless we asserted our title to the territory, the right to it would, in five years, pass from us forever, and he more than once gave it as his opinion, that Great Britain would never surrender it, without a struggle. It now seems that she never will." [MSH]
Since the above was penned, we have seen in the New York Journal of Commerce a positive contradiction of the report, that the Government of Texas is disposed to defeat the measure of Annexation. The editor of that paper has received his information from a gentleman from Washington, the capital of Texas, and on his authority remarks:

"It is not true that our Charge d’Affaires, May Donelson, on his arrival at the Texan seat of government, was treated with discourtesy or neglect. Information of his approach reached President Jones, (whose residence is about four miles out of town,) on Saturday afternoon. He accordingly remained in town during the evening and night, in order to receive him. Maj. Donelson, however, did not arrive until near noon on Sunday. He was soon after waited upon by the Secretary of State, who offered to present him to the President on that day, if such was his pleasure notwithstanding it was Sunday, and the President was unwell. It was finally agreed with the entire acquiescence of Major D., that the interview should take place on the following morning. Accordingly, as early as half past 10 o’clock A.M., on Monday, he was courteously received by the President. Everything went on pleasantly, and, so far as is known, to Major D.’s entire satisfaction.

The Journal says, that the duties of Mr. Smith the Texan Secretary of State, are performed by Ebenezer Allen, Esq., during his absence; and his visit to England, it is contended, may relate to objects entirely distinct from the subject of annexation. It denies, also, all that has been said in the New Orleans papers respecting the movements of the British and French Ministers, thus:

"It is not true that Messrs. Elliot and Saligny, the British and French Ministers, left Texas for the purpose of visiting Washington city. Mr. Elliot had no special object in going to the U. States, other than recreation. Mr. Saligny went only to New Orleans, where he is accustomed to spend the greater part of his time, making occasional visits to Texas, as circumstances require. - It is not true that Messrs. Elliot and Saligny visited the Texan capital (Washington) immediately on the arrival of the British frigate Euridice, with despatches from Vera Cruz. The despatches which induced them to visit Washington, were not brought by the Euridice, but came from England and France, by way of the West Indies. the despatches by the Euridice met them on their return from Washington to Galveston, and after opening them and partially reading them, they continued their course to Galveston, and had not again visited Washington when our informant left."

OREGON AND ENGLAND

The Northern papers are filled with speculations in regard to the decided tone of the British Ministry on Mr. Polk’s Inaugural, which speaks of our right to Oregon being “clear and indisputable.” Many of the journals, especially of the Whig class, predict war. Now, we are not at all alarmed. England may bluster for a while - she may take advantage of our supposed collision with Mexico to embarrass the steady march of her powerful rival, the United States, and to push on her own fanatical crusade against our domestic institutions - she may desire to extend her grasping ambition, and snatch another portion of the American continent - but there is a strong hand at home, which will hold back her growling Lion. her Ministry know too well, that a war with this country will cut off her supply of cotton - and produce starvation, suffering and rebellion among her countless manufacturing classes. The first blow aimed at us will arouse, within the limits of Great Britain, a fierce and resistless opposition. The restless elements of discord and rebellion will, at once, assume a regular and alarming form - and her political fabric will be shaken from its foundations. The New York Herald presents the following new and interesting views:

"The ministerial organs in England, therefore, greatly misrepresent the popular sentiment of that country, when they declare that the anti-American feeling is universal. It is not so by any means. The Irish papers received by the 'Caledonia' are full of the most enthusiastic rejoicings at the passage of the Texas Annexation resolutions in our Congress, and express their most fervent wishes that Oregon also may be soon annexed to this republic. They are in ecstasies at the probable collision of the two countries, and anticipate, in the event, the most signal triumph of Democratic principles. And such is the feeling of thousands and thousands of the masses in England. But they have no organs. We do not hear any distinct and public expression of their opinions and aspirations. But, for all that, deep, strong and irrepressible in England is the swelling popular tide in favor of republican America - so strong; that it will sweep the tory Ministry from power before they could engage in any war with this country."

Whilst we would most earnestly deprecate a war with England, of which we see no prospect - we would not recede an inch from our national rights. If Oregon be ours, let us maintain it at all costs. Let, however, no rash proceedings mark the course of our Government. Let a wise, prudent, dignified and enlightened policy be pursued. Let all fair and honorable measures be resorted to, which, while they will maintain our rights will settle the controversy to the satisfaction of both nations, if it be possible. The world will no sustain England in an unjust and unrighteous war with the United States. Her own people will rebel against a Government that would shed the blood and waste the treasures of millions, to gratify the rampant ambition of their proud rulers.

While on this subject, it gives us sincere pleasure to render to a distinguished son of Virginia, the honor justly due for having advocated, at so early a period, our claims to Oregon. That sterling Democratic journal, the Wytheville Republican, contains the following interesting article:

CLAIM EVERY JUST HONOR
OREGON AND ITS EARLY ADVOCATES

"It is now many years since the Congress of the United States first deemed Oregon worthy of its special notice. The champion of that interesting question was the late Governor Floyd, of Virginia, then a very distinguished member of Congress from that State. He gathered an immense body of facts together, in support of our claim, and yearly pressed the subject upon the consideration of the House of Representatives of the United States. After he became Governor of Virginia, the late Dr. Linn, one of the Missouri Senators, was the ardent and able advocate of the Oregon question till his death.

The nation is deeply indebted to both of these gentlemen. Governor Floyd received a party of his education in this State. Perhaps on that account we feel a deeper interest in his fame. We learn that he had left a son behind him a young gentleman of high promise, who is now Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin, appointed about a year since by President Tyler. Perhaps this gentleman may yet be settled in Oregon - a territory that the far reaching hand of his father was so anxious to keep a firm hold upon, for the benefit of our growing Republic."

The lamented John Floyd, late Governor of Virginia, resided within twenty miles of this village. He represented the adjoining district in the Congress of the United States for many years. It was at the Thorn Spring, in Montgomery county, now Pulaski, that his sagacious mind, far-reaching thought, and ardent love of country and her institutions - fiery zeal for liberty and its spread, philanthropic desire for the unlimited enlargement of the area of freedom, led him to look through the vista of time, and the far off future, and proudly to contemplate the grandeur, and glory, and power and magnitude of these United States - led him to imagine the swell of her territory the multitudes of her sons, the honor of her citizenship. At the Thorn Spring, by his own fireside, with forethought and right, he resolved to maintain and assert the right of these States to possess and occupy the far distant Oregon, the plains of the Columbia, the shores and harbors of the Pacific. Passing over thousands of miles of mountains of desert, and unexplored region, he would dwell on Oregon and the value of it - he would occupy and possess the country, bring it into the Union, grant to it the benefits of our Government and make it parcel of our dominion.

So indomitable was his temper, so ardent his hope, so fixed his judgment of the importance of action, and the utility of possession, that session after session he would bring his favorite project before the American public in Congress assembled. Such was his perseverance on the subject of Oregon, that he acquired to himself in this District, in his own District, and among many friends scattered through the States, the familiar title of “Old Oregon.”

What Gov. Floyd then saw at hand, but what the representatives of the nation looked upon as visions of the future, too distant to be worthy of present consideration, has, within eight years from his death, and within ten years of his last urging it upon the consideration of the Congress of the country, became a reality. - And now, Oregon! Oregon! Oregon! is the cry from the Atlantic in the Rocky Mountains; and thousands are wending their way to the Oregon, despite the want of governmental action and aid to comfort them in the enterprise.

As we said in the outset, “Claim every just honor,” so we claim for Virginia, ever generous, ever adventurous, ever dirining liberty to the nations, the honor of first understanding and asserting the value of the acquisition and the magnitude of the mighty question and empire just ahead - the Oregon question, the Oregon Territory. We narrow the claim - we come over the Alleghanies, and in their heartsome, life and liberty breathing bosom, we locate the claim of “FIRST ADVOCATE OF OREGON.” We go farther - we claim for Col. John Floyd, of Montgomery, within twenty miles of Wytheville, the honor, as foremost of all the men of all the Union, to start press, and forward into motion, the project of the “Occupation of Oregon.” The “Occupation of Oregon,” now one of the mightiest questions of the day. A question fraught with mighty consequences, for good or for evil, to the Republic, and the world. Hail for Oregon! Sacred be the memory of John Floyd. Hurrah for Polk, Dallas, Texas and OREGON!" THE OREGON NEGOTIATION

The National Intelligencer of this morning, might very well have saved itself the necessity of reading its long homily to the administration and the people. We do not understand that the Executive of the United States has any intention of closing the door to any negotiation with Great Britain upon the Oregon question, and therefore, we might suppose that all the inferences which the National Intelligencer draws from the supposed "violent ground" that the United States (for instance) "will negotiate" upon such a course, leaving us the "alternative of submission or war" - and all the denunciations which it so gratuitously pours forth upon the "shocking absurdity," and the barbarous doctrine that we "ought not to negotiate," (which the National Intelligencer attributes to some of the Republicans,) and that thus we revive "that old umpirage of private rights - the wager of battle" - are entirely misplaced.

We certainly do not understand, that the negotiation about Oregon is at an end; or that our administration about Oregon is at an end; or that our administration is determined or willing to determined or willing to terminate it, or that there is no prospect of amicably adjusting the dispute, or that it must necessarily end in breaking up the peace of two great countries. We see no necessity, therefore, or analyzing the triple alternative, which the National Intelligencer is please to make out in its elaborate article of near one column and a half. We yet trust that "the case
Instead of giving its gratuitous and superfluous advice to our cabinet, we should have been better pleased to see the National Intelligencer coming out with the expression of its own opinions on the question itself. We should have been much better satisfied to have seen the National Intelligencer vindicating the just claims of our own country against the assaults and arguments of British tongues and British pens; and we still hope to see that journal thus employed, and not again, as in the case of Texas, counteracting the rights and the interests of our own country. ARRIVAL OF THE HIBERNIA

From the N.Y. Express, Extra, May 7

Fourteen days Later from Europe

The Steamship Hibernia, Capt. Kyrie, arrived early yesterday morning. She left Liverpool on the 19th ult. and her passage has been delayed by ice, by which she was so much obstructed, that, as we learn, on one day, she only made nine miles. She brings one hundred and five passengers.

In commercial matters there was not much change. Trade was dull in the manufacturing districts, and raw cotton had felt the influence of the dullness. The money market had been agitated by war rumors and the position of the ministry, but had acquired more firmness at a later period. The rate of discount was still between two and tree per cent.

The summary of Wilmer & Smith’s European Times alludes to the rumors that Texas had repudiated the annexation with this country, and observes:

“This intelligence has not proved unpalatable to the popular taste on this side of the water. It has excited some surprise, because it was unlooked for. Every one regarded the question as virtually settled when Congress adopted the annexation, and people had resigned themselves calmly to what they could not prevent. This hiatus has awakened fresh hope in the public mind that Texas will continue independent and that, by repudiating the alliance with the leviathan Republic, it may afford, irrespective of the United States a supply of cotton for the English manufacturer. The cotton-spinner and abolitionist took alike with hope to Texas, and they fix their faith in President Jones.”

The Times, however, does not put much faith in the rumors, and it foretells the consummation of annexation. We copy its remarks on the Oregon question and other matters:

“Another American topic - the Oregon - has attracted much attention since it was mooted in Parliament by Sir Robert Peel and the Earl of Aberdeen. The language of President Polk has, of course, been unsparingly condemned, and, in the same breath, the merits of the English, in contradistinction to the American claims, have been set forth and insisted upon. But this is not all - the dernier resort - war - has been pointed at unmistakeably in some of the most prominent and respectable journals, as a thing that is to be, that must be, unless the Americans lower their pretensions. When the public begins to dwell upon the hostile alternative for a length of time, war looses its horrors in the excitement which such a frame of mind produces, and thus is created a restless, morbid desire for the ‘fray’, in anticipation of the tortuous negotiations for diplomacy. By such means national antipathies are engendered, and the repose of the great family of nations is disturbed; first, by a bloody association of ideas, and next by the actual conflict itself. Surely, a great responsibility rests upon the heads of those, who, though indiscretion, or a passion for temporary popularity, risk the peace and happiness of nations. Whether wisely or not, English pride is always taking offence at what is regarded as American bombast, and the pugnacious feeling thus grows, like jealousy, by what it feeds on. - Americans are naturally and becomingly proud of the country, its institutions, its greatness, and its amazing strides in prosperity. This praiseworthy feeling, becomingly entertained or judiciously enunciated, would command, and its entitiled to respect. But when it is put toward offensively, as is too often the case, with, ‘We thashed you when we were three millions, we can the more readily do so now that we are nineteen millions’ - neither, the boast nor the inference is calculated to produce very pacific retorts. As to the Oregon itself, that appears to be the last matter regarded in the controversy. It is the manner, not the matter in dispute, that is offensive, and sheers are provoked neither pleasant nor complimentary. Let us hope that the storm will blow over; a hostile conflict between the countries would inflict deadly injuries on both. England would, probably, suffer most; for, at the outset, her manufacturing population would become paupers by the cotton trade being out off; and the commerce of America would be literally swept from the ocean. Fortunately, the papers which provide mental food for the public mind have had their attention distracted, during the last week of two, from this painful topic, by the events in Parliament and out of doors, connected with the great agitation respecting the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth.

The agitation is daily increasing. Meetings are everywhere called, strong denunciations are made and fierce resolutions are passed, respecting the increased grant to that seminary for the priests of Ireland, which Sir Robert Peel has announced his intention of carrying. Since the Reform Bill has passed, the public mind has never been so excited. It is strange to see parties of the most dissimilar views agreeing and coalescing in opposition to the grant. The Dissenters, who advocate the voluntary principle, and the Episcopalians, who cling to an endowed establishment, are busily engaged in fighting side by side, against the proposed measure. What the upshot will turn, a few days will show. At present, the crusade is proceeding at railroad pace. The whole country, through its length and breadth, is stirring; and the discordant materials to which we have alluded, sinking their differences, work hand in hand in the common cause. Never did leader make followers 'knuckle under' as Peel does. His tergiversation is as palpable as it is offensive, and many of his followers are determined no long to 'march through Coventry' with him. But he will weather the storm, and triumph over it. He is a man of the most fixed and determined courage. Nothing daunts him, sustained as he is by the conviction that he is of more use to his party than his party is to him. If his friends and adherents discard him, they will be handed over to the tender mercies of the Whigs: 'out of the frying pan,' as the adage has it 'into the first.' He knows this, and acts accordingly.

Mr. O'Connell, anxious that the increased grant should pass, has come forward to express his hearty approval of it; but he has done this in a way the best calculated to embarrass Peel, not to assist him. What he gates is undeniably true, but it is not always discreet to speak the truth. If his object be to facilitate the passing of the measure, his tactics are the most likely to prevent that result. He says, in substance, that agitation has produced the ministerial measure, and that agitation will do more - it will cause Peel to introduce a bill for the Repeal of the Union! A fine handle this - and it has been adroitly seized - for fighting against a concession which is received in such a spirit. For Mr. O'Connell to crack his jokes and sustain the dropping spirit of his followers by such means, is more creditable to his sense of drollery than to his better judgement."

The sugar duties have been debated in the upper branch of the legislature, and the Lord Stanly figures amongst the orators; but all interest in the subject is at an end, as the object of the bill is attained - and for the rest all is "leather and prunella."

The other topics in Parliament may be briefly summed up. Another Post-office discussion, arising out of Mr. Duncomb's efforts to have the power taken from the Home-office of opening letters; a debate on the state of the Universities, introduced, with some telling truths, by Mr. Christie; and interment in large towns - all of which provoked talk, but led to nothing practical.

Mr. Everett, the American Minister, entertained a distinguished party of the nobility on Thursday. Amongst the number was Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Mrs. S. Rogers, Lord and Lady Denman, Lord Brougham, and Dowager Lady Holland.

The stock of American cheese on hand, in London, is equal to the whole stock of English cheese of every kind.

Mr. Templeton is about to embark for America where he intends giving a series of lectures on Scottish music.

In the Nisi Prius court, at the Hereford assize, there were thrity barristers and two cases.

We learn that Thomas Hood is seriously, if not mortally ill. The amount of money coined at the mint in twenty years, ending 1836, was upwards of sixty-seven million sterling, the cost of coinage £421,000.

Messrs. Alsopp, the great brewers of ale for the East Indies, whose place of business is at Burton, have failed, it is said, in the sum of £300,000.

John Benjamin Health, Esq., was elected Governor, and William R. Robinson, Esq., Deputy Governor, of the Bank of England, for the ensuing year, on the 15th. [MSH]

GOVERNOR OF OREGON

The Halifax Herald says: "We have it upon good authority, that Sir. George Simpson, a passenger in the Caledonia, for Boston, goes out as Governor of the Oregon Territory - if so, the question of right and possession will be brought to a speedy issue.

[Baltimore Sun.]

We suspect there is some mistake in the above. Sir George Simpson has been acting as deputy, (or resident) Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, the (Governor himself being in London,) and we doubt very much whether the Deputy Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company has not been mistaken for a Governor of Oregon. It is also a questionable problem, whether the Crown would, or perhaps could appoint, under present circumstances, a Governor of Oregon. But, if the above paragraph should prove to be correct, there remains to be shown how far this overt act of appointing a Governor of the Oregon Territory does not amount to a sort of livery of seisin; whether Great Britain is not claiming, of right, the territory over which she appoint an acting Governor; and whether the British ministry can property reconcile the objections which they making to the President's simple declaration in his Inaugural, to an
Later from Mexico

From the New Orleans Tropic, April 29th

By the arrival last evening, of the schooner Yucatan, from Vera Cruz, we learn that Gen. Almonte had arrived at that port, where he still remained when the Yucatan left. We also learn, that four American, two Spanish, one English, and one French, men of war were lying at Vera Cruz. We did not receive any letters or papers by this arrival, but thanks to the courtesy of our neighbors of the Bee, who received full files of Vera Cruz papers to the 21st and city of Mexico papers to the 17th April, we are enabled to lay before our readers the following particulars.

The Joint Committee of the Mexican Congress, to which had been referred the subject of Texas, reported at length on the 7th April. We have no space to devote to a description of the bombastic phraseology of this document, but at once proceed to give the concluding part, as furnished to us by the Bee. It recommends two projects, as follows:

The first, is preceded by a preamble, declaring that, whereas, the United States have resolved to annex the territory of Texas, and, whereas, such a mode of appropriating foreign Territory to which other nations lay claim, is a monstrous innovation upon the peace of the world and the sovereignty of other powers; and whereas, this act had long been in preparation, even while the U. States were professing peace and friendship for Mexico; and while the latter respected and observed scrupulously the terms of existing treaties between the two countries; and whereas, the said annexation is a violation of every conservative principle of society, an assault upon the rights of Mexico, an insult to her dignity as a sovereign nation, and menace her independence and political existence. Therefore, the Congress of the Mexican Republic solemnly declare, that the law of the United States for the annexation of Texas to the American Union, in no respect impairs the rights which Mexico possesses, and will maintain, to that department:

Furthermore, that the United States having disregarded the principles upon which are based treaties of amity, commerce and navigation, and more especially of boundary, Congress considers them violated by the U. States.

And finally, that the unjust usurpation of which it is sought to make Mexico the victim, makes it her duty to take up arms in her defence, to oppose such usurpation, and with the full and rightful determination to use all her resources and power to prevent the annexation decreed by the United States.

The second project consists of four articles, as follows:

First - The Mexican nation calls upon her sons to defend their national independence, threatened by the usurpation of the territory of Texas, which is sought to be consummated by a decree passed by Congress and sanctioned by the President of the United States.

Second - Therefore the Government will consider itself at liberty (prodra poner) to call forth its entire, permanent and active military force, agreeably to the authority given to it by existing laws.

Third - For the preservation of public order and the maintenance of her institutions, and, if necessary, as a reserve for the army, the Government, in virtue of the power granted to it on the 8th of December, 1844, may levy the troops to which said decree refers, under the name of defenders of independence and the laws.

Fourth - With a view to the efficient maintenance of the rights of the Republic the Government is authorized to procure all extraordinary resources which may be deemed necessary, making known to Congress the necessary steps to be taken, conformably to the Constitution.

We do not find any account of any action by the Mexican Congress on the foregoing projects. They have been laid before that body, and that is all we learn respecting them. It is clearly evident, that the Government and people of Mexico are decidedly indisposed to surrender Texas, and the tone of the public journals is exceedingly warlike; still, as long as the Mexicans confine themselves to making reports in Congress, and firing boring broadsides in their newspapers, there does not seem any immediate prospect of hard knocks. To be sure, it has been suggested that Mexico may undertake to annoy us by crippling our commerce in the Gulf, but while there are some of our floating batteries well manned and equipped, in the immediate vicinity of Vera Cruz, there appears to be but a slender chance for the Mexican flag to become distinguished on the high seas.

The agency for the payment of the Mexican debt to Great Britain, has been taken from the house of Lizardi, in London, and given to Schneider & Co.

We copy from the slip furnished to us by the "Bee," the following account of another earthquake in the city of Mexico on the 10th April. three days after the former one, and which appears to have been very destructive:

act of this description. - Union. [MSH]
ANOTHER EARTHQUAKE. - Our readers doubtless remember the details we published a few days since, of a frightfully destructive earthquake which was experienced at Mexico on the 7th inst. We have now to add a repetition of this awful disaster in the Capital on the 10th inst. An examination of the papers has failed to enable us to discover many details of the amount of ruin and desolation occasioned by this convulsion, but from the fact that the journals unite in describing its effects as terrific, we presume the destruction must have been great. The Diario of the 11th states, that the earthquake occurred about 10 o’clock, A. M., and lasted forty seconds; that it overthrew many new buildings and many other that had escaped the former visitation: that most of the inhabitants, stricken with terror, left their houses, and took refuge in the open fields and public squares, passing the night without shelter, and in the utmost consternation. The “Veracuzano,” of the 14th instant, states that private letters furnish a gloomy picture of the desolation that has fallen upon Mexico. The “Hesperia” of the 12th states, that the earthquake of the 10th completed the destruction of the cupola of Santa Teresa, and increased the damage done to the churches of Santo Domingo and San Francisco. But for the shortness of its duration, the entire city would have been laid in ruins. Mexico did not suffer alone. The shock was felt in a number of towns and villages within a radius of several hundred miles. At Puebla the earthquake was experience on the 7th about 4 o’clock, P.M., but its effects were comparatively slight. Several churches were injured, and many private edifices greatly damaged, though none were absolutely destroyed. At Acuartillo and Toluca the effects of the shock were more considerable. At Guadalajara, Morelia, and Vera Cruz, the earthquake was experienced both on the 7th and 10th, but on neither occasion was the business very serious.

The press of Mexico continue their philippies against the United States, the journals of the Departments being even more violent than those of the capital. Many journals of the Departments being even more violent than those of the capital. Many journals of influence are also, very server upon the temper of Senor Cuevas’s memorial to the Chamber of Deputies, the fault alleged against it being, that it does not call loud enough for war. If the tone of these journals is to be taken as a manifestation of the public feeling, the whole country is panting for war, with an ardor that the most prudent Government could not resist. We apprehend, however, that a great part of the censure that is dealt out to the Secretary many be traced to party hostility, and that the martial spirit which makes so much display, is rather an effort of those who are opposed to the existing Government to raise a popular clamor, than an indication of any real desire for war. - The Government paper, we observe, maintains amidst the structures of the opposition, a guarded silence on the whole subject. LATE FROM TEXAS

We yesterday received the Galveston News of April 26th. It is filled with notices of large and enthusiastic popular meetings, in favor of immediate annexation, on the terms of the joint resolutions. At a numerous meeting in Galveston, our worthy friend Dr. Levi Jones (in whose mirth-producing company we endured some of the hardships, and enjoyed the various pleasures, or a prairie lite in Texas, a few winters ago) brought forward a preamble, which, after regretting the call of an extra session for so late a day, winds up with a series of resolutions, some of which, unanimously adopted, we extract as follows:

Resolved, That in our most deliberated and fixed opinion, the Government of the United States has practically demonstrated itself to the world, after an experience of more than half a century, as a system emphatically the most perfect ever yet devised by the wisdom of men, in any age or country, for securing the largest share of benefits to the largest number of those whole live under it; and, consequently, that the unreserved tender of the right of equal participation in all its advantages, constitutes the highest earthly boon which could be offered to the acceptance of any people. Therefore,

Resolved, That, even with the unqualified recognition of our independence by Mexico, with the fullest boundaries ever claimed by the Republic, we should deem it equally desirable for us and our children, that annexation to the United States should be effectuated.

Resolved, That if any of the Governments of Europe have heretofore, during the long period of our manifold calamities, interested or exerted themselves in kind offices for Texas, with even an ostensible showing, in good faith, or a liberal and generous disinterestedness, we shall, upon the slightest proof of it, hold ourselves bound to award to them our most grateful acknowledgement; but at the present crisis we should be most grateful for an entire suspension of their agency in fixing our political destiny.
Resolved, That the general terms of annexation as tendered by the Government of the United State to Texas, we consider, in the main, just, and if not quite so definite and favorable as might be asked, yet when consummated, will place that Government rather in our power in relation to any details of arrangement which may afterwards become necessary, and, in voting upon which, we shall ourselves have a voice. And so far as our intercourse in this Republic has extended since their promulgation, it has been clearly apparent, that those men only who are in heart opposed to great measure, pretend to want further negotiations, & c., but that the wisdom of Solomon did not more unerringly ascertain the true friends of annexation, by the simple inquiry, "do you want any more, or any new negotiations?"

The News gives the following summary of public sentiment:

"Hitherto our primary assemblies have simply given an expression of public opinion upon the measure of annexation, in which they all so completely concur, that the various resolutions are in fact nearly identical. We have already seen the proceedings of nearly twenty meetings in as many counties; and at this moment there is probably not a county in the Republic which has not had its meeting, and expressed it concurrence in the overtures of the United States. They all (as far as heard from) not only desire annexation on the terms proposed, but they desire it immediately. They all deprecate delay as extremely dangerous, if not fatal, to the best interests of this country. They all express an earnest desire for action - for speedy and immediate action - and nearly all express a disapprobation of any further negotiations with foreign powers." [MSH]

COTTON FOR CHINA.

"The ship Farewell cleared from Mobile to Canton on the 23d ult., with 2784 bales of cotton on board - the first that has been shipped from that place to China. It is a Boston adventure." [N.Y. Evening Mirror.]

What a rich and magnificent market the China trade is about to open to our country! Give us Oregon and a speedy and commodious transportation across the Rocky mountains - and authentic travelers inform us that there is a natural Pass of a very slight elevation - and we shall distance all nations in developing the plentiful commercial treasures of the East Indies and China. Why do we want Oregon? is the cry of many timid reasoners. The answer is plain: We wish it, because it will carve our new opening for our commerce, agriculture and manufactures. The delusive "Home Market" is too confined for the impulsive energies of this great nation. If possible, we would have the whole world for our market - and we look, with confidence, to the enlightened action of our Government, to unfetter commerce and add a new impetus to all the industrial pursuits of our people. [MSH]

THE RIGHT SPIRIT OREGON!

We are glad to see the Lexington (Ky) Observer, (whig) published at Mr. Clay’s door, dropping its party character for the time, and though grumbling a little at Mr. Polk’s course, avowing its firm resolution to maintain the rights and honor of the nation, if unfortunately, all negotiations should fail. The Observer declares, that our right to Oregon "rests upon an indestructible basis." Mr. Polk conceives the same opinion, and why should he not express that opinion, in behalf of our rights?

"Whatever nay by thought of the propriety of the course pursued by Mr. Polk in his Inaugural Address, upon this subject, whilst it was still under negotiation, we are wholly at a loss to know how it is that Lord Aberdeen, Lord John Russell and Sir Robert Peel can state which such unqualified boldness, that their title to the Oregon is clear and indisputable. We do not profess to understand in full the various grounds of title as set up by both Governments; but so far as our examination goes, we have come to the conclusion, in which we believe we are fortified by every American statesman, of every party, that the claim of the U.S. is, beyond the reach of doubt or equivocation, paramount to that of Great Britain. Whether the claim is made to rest on ancient or modern discovery and settlement, or whether it rests upon treaty, we believe that it is susceptible of demonstration that the American title rests upon an indestructible basis. We will not at present, enter upon that examination. We still hope that an honorable adjustment may be effected, although from the tone of the debate in the British Parliament, so enthusiastically cheered and acquiesced in by the whole Parliament, it must be apparent to all that the peace of the country hangs upon a most precarious foundation.

We cannot say that we were unprepared for this, since the Great Western brought out the news as to the manner in which the annexation of Texas was received in England. How far that measure has operated to produce this warlike demonstration by the British Parliament, we know not; but unquestionably it has had its due weight in blackening with clouds the horizon of our Foreign Affairs. This, as we have before said, constituted with us one of the first objections to the mad and precipitate course of John Tyler, in the getting up and presentation of the question at the time he did. It was the doing of what no wise people ever permit - the making of a mere party question out of a grave foreign international subject.
But be the cause what it may, that has brought down upon us the united threats and denunciations of both Great Britain and Mexico, we very much fear acting in concert and co-operation; and be our confidence in those who are not at the head of affairs ever so limited, we deem it the duty of us all to imitate that policy which England has always pursued, and which is so strikingly developed in this very debate upon Oregon, and that is, to present an unbroken front as one people.

When the rights of the Nation are invaded, its territory attacked, or its honor violated, should all negotiation fail, (as we trust it will not,) and the sword be made to settle the dispute, we doubt not the present race will prove true to their revolutionary blood, and be found fully able to defend an maintain American soil and American honor, either by land or sea, against Great Britain and her almost unbounded resources.

Although we should have been glad to be spared this cup, and have had no hand in it, and although it now devolves upon those who sowed the whirlwind to direct the storm, yet upon questions like these and upon occasions like this, we must forget, if possible, the partisan, in that broad and ennobling patriotism, without which it makes but little odds where a man lives - in Europe or America - under a crowned head, or the stars and stripes of freedom." THE ENGLISH MISSION - OREGON

Under this head the Charleston Mercury of Thursday gives the following seyere, though just, rap over the knuckles of the New England Federalists:

"The Boston Courier, copies the statement of the New York Herald’s correspondent, that the Mission to England had been offered to Mr. Pickens, and that if he declined, it would again be pressed on Mr. Calhoun. The Courier adds: 'If a South Carolina man is sent to England, there will be very little trouble about Oregon. The sovereignty of that almighty State care very little about adding any more free territory to the American Union.'

The Boston Courier, thought it could condense into a look the acerbity of half a century of New England Federalism, is not likely to trouble the conscience of the South, or even the 'almighty State' it holds in such honor. The acquisitions which the Courier's party have made to the free territory of the Union - where are they? We never heard of them. It is the acquisition of territory that has always trouble that body of patriots. They went into spasms about Louisiana, and the fit was repeated in the case of Texas. But these had an order of slavery. Well, what have they done for their own peculiar province of free territory? Mr. Webster was thought by many to have given away a good slice even of the sacred soil of New England, and Mr. Benton charged him on voluminous evidence, with yielding not a few swamps, &c., beyond Lake Superior. However that may be, it is certain that he never crossed the Rocky Mountains. He had perhaps the best opportunity that was ever presented of settling the Oregon question advantageously for the whole country, and he shrank from touching it. And what has Mr. Everett done for the acquisition of 'free territory?' We have not heard that our rights to the Oregon have received either new light or increased strength from him. We have reason to believe that his mission in England has been one of marked and especial imbecility - a few years of elegant idling, deserving rather to be chronicled as the travels of a Cambridge Professor, than the labors of an American Statesman."

The Mercury then takes a brief and rapid view of the Oregon question, and thus expresses its convictions as to the terms upon which the difficulty might properly be arranged:

"The claim of the United States attaches especially to the Southern part of the territory: - that of England to the Northern part. The 49th parallel would give us about there fifths of the whole country, - it would secure to us the whole valley of the Columbia river and its two great branches, and would carry through to the Pacific, the boundary of our territory this side of the Mountains. We have always believed that this boundary could be gained, and that we ought to be satisfied with it."

The next step is to determine the mode in which the negotiation is to be conducted. While there is more force in the following views of the Mercury, we are not satisfied of the correctness of the opinion, that no Southern mad should undertake the delicate duty. In a question, which vitally concerns the rights, honor, and welfare of the whole Union, nothing of a sectional character should be allowed to operate on our diplomatic arrangements. No fear of losing caste should, for one moment, deter any statesman, North or South, from lending his talents and his influence, at the call of his country, to an amicable and honorable adjustment of a contested point, on which the eyes of the whole nation are now eagerly bent. It is the part of a statesman and a patriot, to do his duty under all circumstances, and to leave it to the justice of a generous and enlightened people to award him the fame which his services truly merit. We know of no sounder umpire, no fairer or safer tribunal, than the moral engine of Public Opinion. Should, however, a special mission be resolved upon, and Mr. Van Buren be invested with the high trust which we consider not at all probably, we concur with the Mercury, as to his peculiar fitness for the honorable office - for it must be regarded by all as a source of honor and pleasure, to aid in securing the peace and defending the rights of twenty millions of freemen:

"But we did not set out to discuss the Oregon question, but to say, that we hoped no Southern man would undertake the negotiation of it. Let it be settled at Washington. Let Mr. Buchanan have whatever of glory or run is to be made out of it. No Southern man can manage this matter without either involving the country in a war, or loading himself and his section with accusations, that will be multiplied and embittered just in proportion as they are undeserved. We trust, therefore, that if Mr. Pickens accepts the Mission to England, he will stipulate, that the Oregon kettle of fish shall be stewed at home. It is more than his or any Southern man’s reputation is worth, to carry it to London. If, indeed, it is to be dealt with elsewhere than at Washington, the proper step, in the present crisis of dispute, is to send an Extraordinary Ambassador, and we know of no man so fit for that office as the one already named by the newspapers - ex-President Van Buren. - The whole country would be satisfied with his moderation and address, and he is a proper representative of that section of the country which assumes to be alone interested in the acquisition of Oregon.” [MSH]

OUTRAGE UPON PROPRIETY

Far be it from our wish or intention to evoke the spirit of party, when the condition of a national question, like Oregon, requires prudent and united councils and action, to adjust it satisfactorily. But many of the violent Whig journals have pursued such a hair-brained, improper course, in their attempts to pull down the new Administration, that justice and patriotism make it necessary to expose them to public censure. The most glaring instance we have met with, is in the Mobile Advertiser. Admit that the President committed a blunder in his Inaugural - a violent construction of his language, we maintain - does it become any editor or any party to raise a storm of public discontent against the Executive, with whom is entrusted the management of a delicate question, and especially by the unwarrantable and vulgar slang which characterizes the following extract from the Mobile Advertiser? Is it not the duty of every patriot, who has at heart the interests, the peace, and the honor of his country, to rally to the selected Executive agents the whole confidence of the people, in sustaining the action of the Government? Does not the Advertiser, substantially, give aid and encouragement to the enemies of our liberal institutions, and to those foreign nations, who, upon supposed claims, should think fit to originate offensive measures against the United States? Further comments are useless upon this wanton attempt to drag the President into the mire, by personal abuse. The article bears in itself its own condemnation. Its violence develops the improper spirit with which it was written, and rids the monster of its fangs. Let every one, Whig or Democrat, Greek or Trojan, read and reprobate it:

"Whatever may be the termination of this affair, the existence of the present difficulty is attributable to the imprudence, ignorance, asinine stupidity, or something worse, of Mr. James K. Polk. In his Inaugural, he stepped out of the way to make a thrust at England, and, in doing so, made a statement that cannot be sustained by facts. Such things might do on a stump, in the far west, but are disgraceful alike to himself and his country, when uttered in his Inaugural Address, as President of the United States. It was Polk’s Inaugural Message, then, we insist, that gave rise to this whole difficulty; and now how will he get out of it? Is there no way but to fight out? We shall see."

But mark the spirit of the concluding passage of the Advertiser’s article. See the parallel which he "draws between Mr. Polk and the British rulers - so disparaging to the President of our free people, who have selected him as the exponent of their wishes - so revolting to the patriotic sentiment, "Our country, right or wrong." This, too; we leave to the severe rebuke of public indignation:

"Should the Oregon question be amicably settled, no share of the merit will be due to Mr. Polk. He has done all in his power gratuitously, to throw obstacles in the way of such settlement. - He went out of his way to bully England, and it is well for the blood and treasure of both that country and this, there is not a Polk at the head of affairs on both sides of the water."

But the Advertiser will be forced to do justice to the motives and efforts of Mr. Polk, on this question. That journal seems to be so steeped in ignorance and fierce party spirit, that we take pleasure in enlightening the one and in mollifying the other. The last Union contains, at the end of a long article, the following passage, which is just what it ought to be:

"We thoroughly agree with the Cincinnati Commercial in the views which it takes about the interests of Britain, though the Minister might civilly inquire of us, what is that to us? But we may be permitted to judge of our own rights and interests; and we know that they point to peace, if it be perfectly compatible with the honor of the nation - otherwise, not. We are induced to hope that they may be fairly reconciled. We are inclined to think, too, that the Commercial leaps rather too much to the sombre view of the result. We cannot doubt, that the negotiations between the Secretary of State and the British Minister have been, or are about to be, resumed in this city, in some form or other; and we sincerely trust, that the negotiation will settle the differences, and secure the peace of these two great countries. As to the idea about the Extra Session of Congress, we have no hesitation in saying, that we have heard nothing of it here.” [MSH]

LATER FROM TEXAS.

From the New Orleans Tropic, April 30.
The steamship New York, Captain Wright, arrived here yesterday morning from Galveston, bringing papers to the 28th instant, inclusive. - There is very little news. Col. John A. Scott, of Woodville, Mississippi, Dr. F. A. Cunningham, member of Congress from the Second Congressional District of Ohio, and Mr. Herndon, United States Consul at Galveston, arrived at that port in the New York on her last trip.

In reference to the statement which has been industriously circulated by some newspapers, both in Texas and in the United States, calculated to create the impression that Major Donelson had not been received on his recent arrival at Washington, (Texas,) which the courtesy due to him, the National Register, says that it is authorized by Major D. to say that such statement is erroneous.

"He informs us," says the Register, "that he was presented by the Honorable Ashbel Smith, Secretary of State, the morning after his arrival, to his Excellency the President, who, although confined to his bed, received him kindly, and interchanged the civilities which are usual on such occasions. In that interview, we are also informed, that to a statement from Maj. Donelson of the proposals respecting annexation, which he was authorized to submit to this Government, he was frankly told by the President, that early steps would be taken to submit the whole subject to the people. The only doubt them in the President’s mind was as to the property of calling Congress; he stating, however, his impression that this step was necessary and proper."

That National Register notices a paragraph in the Houston Telegraph, in which it is stated, that Mr. Ashbel Smith, late Secretary of State, "has yielded his opinion on the subject of annexation, to the resistless current of popular enthusiasm now sweeping from one side of the Republic to the other." "We should be glad (says the Register) to be furnished with the evidence from which the conclusion is drawn, that he ever was opposed to annexation. Perhaps the editor of the Telegraph is in possession of it. The titles of the State Department will furnish none, but on the contrary, much to show that as our Minister in Europe he was ever faithful and true to American principles, and interests, and feelings, and more recently as our Secretary of State, the Friend of Annexation."

In reference to Gen. Houston's supposed opposition to annexation, the Galveston Civilian has the following:

"What despatch, document or letter informed the British Government of the facts, that he was pledged to oppose it? What were the words, or where are the facts to be found? We grieve to say, that the letter of Gen. Houston, to Gen. Jackson for instance, in favor of annexation, and assurances from high authorities - Maj. Donelson for example - that he is so, have been published; but for aught that we could ever hear or read, nothing of an opposite character from his tongue or pen has ever come before the public. We are sorry for it; but we are nevertheless confident that such is the fact. The influence of General Houston might have wrung from the U. States better terms than are now proposed, or have defeated annexation altogether; but he has not chosen to exercise it in such a way; and, so far as Texas is concerned, we fear that there is no impediment to the success of the measure under the 'conditions' and 'garanties' originating in the U. States House of Representatives."

The steamship New York brings accounts from Galveston to Saturday last. The papers contain little else than proceedings of large and enthusiastic public meetings held in the different countries in favor of Annexation. No public movement whatever has been made in opposition, while nearly every county in the Republic has either moved in behalf of the measure, or appointed a day for a public demonstration. In a number of counties, the Senators and Representatives are unconditionally instructed, immediately on the meeting of Congress, to take steps for signifying the acquiescence of Texas in the resolutions of Annexation, and for calling a convention to adapt the Constitution to the people. The only doubt them in the President’s mind was as to the property of calling Congress; he stating, however, his impression that this step was necessary and proper."

THE WAR QUESTION

Speaking on the war question, the New York Herald shrewdly observes, that in the late "English papers there is a decided change of tone in the articles referring to the Oregon question, and the relations of Great Britain and the United States. The journalists speak in a much lower key than they did immediately after the declarations of Sir Robert Peel were made in the House of Commons." “The Morning Chronicle, the organ of the Whigs, and the Times, which speaks the sentiments of the popular masses, are now equally earnest in depreciating the idea of a war between England and this country, and they insist upon it, that the difficulty respecting Oregon will be amicably settled. Indeed, it is only in the movements of the government itself, that we can discover decided tokens of an apprehension of serious difficulty arising out of the Oregon question. It is very evident that the idea of war is not altogether scouted in that quarter. The bold and unexpected change in Peel’s Irish policy has been avowedly made in consequence of the anxiety of the minister to unite the energies of the empire against this country in case of the collision that is feared." We want peace with Great Britain - peace with all the world; but it must be an honorable peace. We hope that the present administration will continue the negotiation: which was unfinished by the last. We trust that they will calmly discuss the subject with the British Minister - hear what he has to say - and adjust the difference, if it be possible, compatible with our rights and honor. - But it must be with a due regard to those categories. Such are our own opinions: and such were our opinions when, in 1811, we hoped that peace might be preserved with Great Britain by her doing us justice; and in 1812, when we presented and defended, to all a full meeting of the citizens of Richmond, decided resolutions calling up on Congress for war measures. These resolutions were adopted by the meeting - a fact which most of our friends in Richmond may have forgotten, but which is on record in the journals of that day.

BRITISH MOVEMENTS

Just as our paper is going to press, we find the following as the concluding words to an article in the London Times of the 10th of April, which, coming from that source, may be considered as meeting attention:

"When we reflect on the difficulty of transporting even a party of settlers across the whole continent of America, on the impracticability of operating beyond the frontiers of the Union, either to the South or the West, and on the impossibility of reaching the Columbia by sea, except in time of peace, we are disposed to regard the actual anger of an attack on our settlements on the Oregon as purely illusory; and we have no doubt that, long before this intelligence reaches the forts on the coast of the Pacific, they will have been placed by Sir G. Sumner, and the squadron under his command, in an efficient state of defence."

We may add, that other intimations of the same nature are thrown out, though more obscurely, in other numbers of the Times, for the past month.

UNTITLED

The late foreign arrival proves that the fierce war-fever in England about Oregon had nearly passed off - and that the whole nation, both people and nobility, were in a terrible ferment at the success of a proposition of Sir Robert Peel to increase the grant for the education of Roman Catholic students in the College of Maynooth, Ireland. O'Connell boasts that the measure was produced by agitations, and avers his purpose to force the Premier to introduce a bill for the Repeal of the Union. As we predicted some days since, there is no danger of a war with England, because she has too many exciting interest and inflammatory questions at home, to engage her whole attention - and she cannot with a foreign nation, in the face of justice and right and the jealous frowns of the powerful nations around her.

WHIG OPINION IN VIRGINIA

The Cincinnati Gazette, a few days since, refers to our election as follows:

"Last night's mail brought nothing additional from Virginia. Owing to the almost total absence of railways and other facilities, in this benighted State, the returns come in very slowly. The few that have been received, are so very imperfect, and unsatisfactory, that it is almost useless to publish them."

Virginia may not boast, as Ohio, of her copious "railway and other facilities," but at all events, she can well compare with her "Buck-eye" neighbor, in a sound and honest system of banking; and her finances are in quite as flourishing a condition. She may not teem with public schools, (of which Ohio, and Cincinnati in particular, has a right to boast,) and, as far as a general system of Education is concerned, she may be "benighted;" but, even with all her disadvantages, she may run the gauntlet with Ohio, in the virtue, moral condition and strong natural sense of her citizens. There is one point on which she cannot be said to be "benighted," and on which she is immeasurably before the Buck-eye State. She has always been upright in her political course. She has never swerved from the line of duty, marked out by the written Constitution of the United States. She has never lent her aid to the oppression of her sister States, in order to reap the benefits for herself. On the great political questions of the day, she has shown an enlightened and firm policy, and her influence has been felt throughout the Union. Can Ohio boast as much?
The Gazette of the next day gives the following information. It seems that the mails from "benighted" Virginia had received a few impulse - as a single had cleared up the "very imperfect and unsatisfactory returns" of the day before. That journal is right about the effect of the Texas question; but why did not the wise prophet, so learned after the news of the election had reached him, rid his mind of all doubt about the result which he so confidently, and upon such good reasons, "anticipated?" He gently raps the knuckles of the Virginia anti-Texas Whigs - always so inconsiderable in number, but now entirely swept away, like chaff before the wind. The Whig leaders of the last Virginia Legislature, such violent friends of annexation in profession, but by their acts using all their influence to embarrass and defeat its consummation, must have been amazed at the response of the people to their quibbling defence and fine-spun distinctions. They were willing to admit the propriety of the terms of admission of Texas, embraced in the joint resolution; but they insisted upon making a verbal declaration, that they would not touch the constitutional question - leaving it to the superior minds and statesmanship of Messrs. Rives and Archer, to manage the whole matter without regard to the wishes of "all parties in Virginia!" it would be a source of great amusement, to interrogate the quondam leaders of the last Assembly as to their present opinion of the Texas question. Do they still quibble and split hairs about the made, when the nation has swept their flimsy footing from beneath them? On this and many other subjects, they have been taught a lesson, which for their own good and the honor of the State, we hope they will never un-learn:

"As was anticipated, the election in Virginia has resulted in the defeat of the Whigs. It is known that all parties in Virginia are in factor of the project of Annexation, which will so much strengthen the representation of the slave power in Congress. Annexation is, as a matter of course, generally popular in Virginia - and we are surprised that the Richmond Whig should change their defeat to a split of the party in Richmond." [MSH]

THE ENGLISH MISSION - MR. PICKENS

"It is known that the Hon. F. W. Pickens has declined the mission to London. We are not sorry, under the circumstances, to see the public men of the State avoiding the entanglement of Federal office, and are persuaded that they thus act more in accordance with the wishes of the people, than by accepting office. We wish well to Mr. Polk's administration, and desire to be able to give it a hearty support; but it is much better for us that the leading politicians of the State should be free." - Charleston Mercury.

We confess that we do not see the force of the above reasoning, especially as the Mercury, in a previous No., had said that it "saw no reason why Mr. Pickens should decline the Mission." As the State of South Carolina wishes to give a hearty support to the new Administration, we had hoped that her distinguished sons would have lent their talents and influence towards carrying out the principles on which Mr. Polk is pledged to conduct the Government. What better means can be adopted to secure the success of Republican measure, than by introducing into the active business of the nation men of ability and influence, and of true principles?

Mr. Pickens having thus positively declined, there is much interest to know upon whom the English mission will be conferred. We have not heard any new names mentioned. But we could, if our opinion was worth any thing, put our finger upon a man in every way qualified for the delicate and responsible trust - and Virginia would rejoice, if the office were conferred upon him.

If a special mission be rendered necessary by the turn up of events, we know of no man who could better discharge its high duties, than ex-President Van Buren; and many of our most intelligent friends here accord with us in opinion. While we are utterly opposed, on many grounds, to a repetition of the melancholy picture exhibited in the case of ex-President J. Q. Adams, leaving the dignified quiet of private life, and indulging warmly and rashly in the political fight - still there are some extraordinary occasions on which the rule may be wisely departed from, and the Oregon difficulty we look upon in that light. No American citizen, even though he may have attained the highest eminence on earth, could weaken his elevated position, or detract from the dignity and propriety of his conduct, by Yielding to the call of his country and accepting the commission, with the sole object of securing the national honor and peace, temporarily threatened by danger. One thing there can be no doubt about: the South will hail with pleasure the appointment of Mr. Van Buren. [MSH]

MEXICAN AFFAIRS

Last Wednesday there was a rumor in Mobile, that Mexico had actually declared war against the United States, to take effect on the 15th June. The extracts below refute the story. Indeed, it appears that there is, at least, one man in the Mexican Congress who has the good sense and the firmness to express him views of the justice of the Texas cause.

Foolish and unsteady as we know the Government of Mexico to be, we cannot believe that she has reached such a point of folly and madness, as o declare war, because the United States have agreed to admit Texas, an independent nation, into our Union, upon certain conditions. How absurd would it be for Mexico to commence hostilities, before any obligation is assumed by the United States, as possessors of the territory of Texas, or partners in the same Government, and while Texas is still employed in deliberating whether she will or will not accede to the terms of annexation! No positive engagement has been concluded - the whole matter is still under discussion - and Mexico has not the most meager ground, upon which to array her valiant troops against us. The whole civilized world would set their faces against such an impudent and ridiculous violation of propriety, justice and national law. The story is, then, absurd in its very propositions - and is, moreover, contradicted by the last news from Mexico, as follows:

[From the N. O. Bulletin, May 7.]

By the schooner Creole, we have papers from Vera Cruz to the 23d ult., and private advices to the 23d inclusive.
There is, however, no intelligence of interest as the accounts from the capital are no later than before received. A correspondent writes, that the arrival of the American squadron (consisting of the Potomac, the Falmouth, the Somers, and the Lawrence,) off the port of Vera Cruz, created much excitement. - The sole topic of the day, he adds continues to be "war with the United States. The people seem eager for it; but the Government hesitates."

[From the Crescent City, same date.]

A member of the Chamber of Deputies, Don Crescencio Boves, had raised a strong excitement and irritation by a speech, in which he treated the Mexican Government with bitterness, and commented on their conduct in relation to Texas, with energy. He declared they were unable to conquer Texas, and it was no longer theirs. A motion was made to expel the plain speaking member. [MSH]

THE STATES - CONNECTICUT

The Governor next touches upon that abominable measure of "iniquity," the Texas question. - Mark the serious and savage tone in which he utters his views. The Federal State of Connecticut may do her worst to defeat a solemn act of Congress, and violate our national faith, so fully and deliberately pledged, but the measure is in a state of rapid consummation, and will son defy all opposition. We ask the particular attention of our readers to the misstatements of facts and false reasoning in the following extracts, almost identical with the views presented by the anti-Texas Whig orators of Virginia, and which were scattered to the winds by the popular whirlwind, on the 4th Thursday of April. Save on the slavery question, opposition to Texas in Republican Virginia and Federal Connecticut is one and the same thing. We have just shown what Virginia's views are on the question - and the next Congress will perfect the will of a large majority of the nation, in spite of the threats and blustering of Connecticut:

"The subject of the proposed annexation of Texas to the Union, has acquired a deeper and more fearful interest since the last session of the General Assembly, by the passage of a joint resolution of the two houses of Congress, with a view to its accomplishment, and to the future admission of five new States from its territory, to extend and perpetuate the system of human slavery, and add to its already predominant influence in the national councils. The resolution has been passed not only in utter disregard of the remonstrances of Mexico, and of her earnest appeals to the national honor for the faithful observance of our treaty stipulations, but in opposition to the clearly expressed will of a large portion of the people of the United States, and for an object which they deem incompatible alike with the spirit of the declaration of independence, with the compromises of the federal constitution, and with the great purposes for which it is declared by the people to have been ordained and established. It has been passed, as I firmly believe, by an usurpation of power never delegated by the people, but denied by the solemn resolutions, at different periods, of nine of the thirteen original States.

"The object, however, is not yet consummated. - And I recommend to the General Assembly to guard against any inference which their silence at this time might seem to justify, that a measure so unfounded in principle, so dangerous as a precedent, and so destructive in its tendency, to the peace and prosperity of the country, and the objects of our Union, can ever receive the sanction of the people of Connecticut." [MSH]

LAST NEWS FROM MEXICO.

Letters have been received from the Home Squadron, dated at Vera Cruz, April 22. It appears that, on the 15th April, Commodore Conner made the city of La Vera Cruz, but, owing to light and contrary winds, was not able to anchor before the place until the 18th. At the same time, the barque Anahuac, from New York, with General Almonte on board, anchored in the port.

The squadron communicated with the authorities at La Vera Cruz. The officer on shore was courteously received, and the usual offers were made, of granting every facility to the squadron for attaining whatever it might be in want of. The Mexican flag was saluted, and an equal number of guns were returned by the fortress. Our minister has been informed that no further diplomatic intercourse can be allowed between the government of Mexico and the United States. With this exception, our relations with Mexico remains as before. [MSH]

THE JUSTICE OF OUR CLAIM TO ENGLAND ACKNOWLEDGED ABROAD

The following is the concluding passage of a long article from the Dublin Nation, in which justice is done to our rights in Oregon, our capacity to vindicate them properly set forth, and England plainly told, that she “cannot occupy Oregon, without the consent of the United States.” In defiance of O’Connell and his fiendish machinations, it will be a difficult work for Sir Robert Peel to obtain the hearty co-operation of the gallant Irish, the compatriots of Montgomery, in an unrighteous war upon the United States:

"We do trust that Sir Robert Peel will reconsider his unjust and imprudent declaration; or that some sewer councilor will save the monarch from asserting by arms a claim so ill founded at a time so inopportune.” [MSH]

WAR FEVER IN BRITISH COLONIES

Alluding to a war for Oregon, the Toronto (Canada) Globe says: - This is not the age when “Loyalty” goes by blind superstition; it is guided by discrimination. Nations are not to be ruled with a rod of iron; - but swayed by a wise and liberal policy. Let the Home Government reflect on the position of Canada, should a war unhappily arise between Britain and the United States." [MSH]

INTERESTING FROM TEXAS

We are indebted to the Editors of the New Orleans Jeffersonian Republican for an Extra, issued on the 10th inst., from which we copy the following interesting intelligence from Texas: -

By the New York which arrived this evening, having left Galveston on the 3d, we learn that the progress of the annexation question, is steady and uninterrupted. All doubt, as to the decision of the Texan Congress upon the propositions submitted by the American Minister, Mr. Donelson, is at an end. The only hope of those opposed to annexation, was through the action of President Jones, who, it was at one time conjectured, would refuse to negotiate on the basis proposed by the resolutions of our House of Representatives, under the expectations that, in that event the President of the United States would resort to the Senate amendment offered by Mr. Walker. But the public will of Texas in favor of annexation on the terms proposed by our Minister, has been so strongly manifested, that the Executive does not hesitate to carry it out, and it may soon be said, that there is no opposition to the measure in Texas!

Great credit is due to our accomplished minister, for the successful consummation of this great event. His able correspondence with the Texian authorities - his personal exertions - and his great moral influence were sensibly felt, and his name must always be associated with this great movement.

Many contradictory rumors have been put afloat, relative to the views of Gen. Sam Houston, the most powerful man in the republic, who, it was known, had been strongly urged to support Mr. Walker’s amendment, for the purpose of obtaining terms held to be more satisfactory to Texas, than those offered by our Minister. But the old friend of Andrew Jackson was not to be caught in the same thus artfully spread by men in the British interest. He fully concedes the necessity of accepting the proposals just as they are, and relies on the United States, hereafter, to correct whatever injustice may have been done to Texas by the act of Congress. This is a decision worthy of the hero of Dan Jacinto, and highly complimentary to the magnanimity of our nation.

We may the congratulate our country upon the incorporation of Texas into the Union, as soon as the forms usual in the admission of new States can be compiled with. Texas herself has nobly resolved that nothing on her part shall be done to re-open the question in the U. States. - She will take the proposals offered by our Minister, as they are, without dotting an i or crossing a t. She will disregard the suggestions of false friends at home and abroad, and silence, by a more unanimous vote than has eve yet been given on a debated political question, all doubts of her attachment to the American Union. Thanks to the people of Texas - thanks to the people of the United States - for this glorious result! A result worthy of both countries, and affording another brilliant proof of the wisdom of that sovereignty which in our system has been carefully withheld from both our Federal and State Governments.

We have seen the people of the United States take the annexation question our of party shackles, and demand its consummation in a voice which neither the Congress nor the President of the United States could disregard. We see, too, the people of Texas, by a movement equally decisive, telling their President and Congress, to give the finishing stroke to the great work, and no longer to enquire into what light it may be received by Mexico, or England, or France. What can be more sublime than such a spectacle! When was there ever before the union of two sovereignties, accompanied by a process so honorable to human nature? And yet there are those amongst us who would have changed the character of this spectacle, and denied to our glorious Union this evidence of its capacity to extend its blessings. But thanks again to the sovereign people of both the United States and Texas; neither the fanaticism of the abolitionists, nor the contracted views of the old Federal party, nor the wily diplomacy of Great Britain and France, have availed anything in defeating a result so essential to the fame; honor and security of our country.

We are gratified to find from the Galveston papers, that ex-President Houston is about to visit his native land, and spend the ensuing summer with his relations in the United States. It is said that he will proceed, soon after his arrival in this city, up the river to Nashville, to visit his old friend, the tenant of the Hermitage. Gen. Houston will find a cordial reception in the United States. His conduct at San Jacinto, and his successful administration of the government of Texas, but above all, his noble determination to restore Texas to the bosom of the republican family, entitle him to rank among the benefactors of the age.

Mr. Donelson and Gov. Yell of Arkansas - one of the most distinguished democrats of the West - arrived on the New York, and are now at Howlett's. [MSH] kind friends, who have honored us with their confidence. But the Herald intimates, that, in proposing Mr. Van Buren as the depository of the high and responsible special mission to England, we have evinced a feeling of hostility towards Mr. Calhoun, and a desire to proscribe him from the public councils. Can anything be more unfounded? The history of our brief editorship disproves such an insinuation. There is not a public man in the Union whom we would sooner see honored than Mr. Calhoun, for his brilliant talents, pure character, lofty bearing and distinguished services. Even now, we should rejoice to see him invested with the high honor of negotiating the delicate Oregon question. But did not the Charleston Mercury, in explaining the refusal of Mr. Pickens to go to England, explicitly take the ground; which we deeply regretted, that none of the public men of South Carolina thought it expedient, under existing circumstances, to accept any office from the administration, or mingle in its councils? Could, then, Mr. Calhoun, after this avowal, be expected to accept the special mission? And did not the Charleston Mercury itself recommend the selection of ex-President Van Buren, as well fitted for the special mission, should it be resolved upon? Our course, therefore, sustained by the strong fact set forth, cannot be tortured into a disposition to "proscribe" Mr. Calhoun, and it must, strike the simplest observer with astonishment, that the Herald, out of such limited materials, has been able to make even a plausible defence of its position.

In common with the Charleston Mercury, we looked upon Mr. Van Buren as in every way qualified to discharge the difficult duties of a special mission, and to maintain the peace and honor of the nation. Moreover, we have the pleasure to know, that our recommendation of Mr. Van Buren meets with the sanction of some of the warmest and most intelligent friends of Mr. Calhoun in this city.

We know not whether Mr. Van Buren will have the honor of negotiating on behalf of the important interests of the United States; but we repeat our convictions, that his appointment will be an admirable one, and will be hailed with satisfaction by the whole country. [MSH]

UNTITLED

Another Revolution in Mexico is said to be in contemplation. The "Morning Star" has information by a gentleman from Vera Cruz that Arista is dissatisfied with the new government, and that his partisans, especially the Northern Federalists, have evinced a desire to throw off the present government, under his lead, and establish a separate confederacy. This disposition for revolt is said to have been inflamed greatly by the severity exercised by Herrera's government towards the officers of Santa Anna. Gen. Reves, his late commander-in-chief, has been cashiered and sentenced to imprisonment; and General Woll is now in the city of Mexico, and expected to share the same fate. [N. O. Republican] [MSH]

OREGON

The "New York Courier" suggests arbitration. We understand that Mr. Calhoun declined this proposition when made by the British minister - and declined it, it is said, upon grounds of the strongest character. We are content to wait for the publication of that document, with the general remark, that it is seldom, if ever, that the umpirage of a third power has been able to settle satisfactorily the controversy between two States in relation to disputed territory. TITLE TO OREGON

England lays claim to a part of the Oregon territory, predicated upon the alleged discovery of the country by Sir Francis Drake, in 1579, and upon the cession by Spain, in 1790, to England concurrent jurisdiction with herself over the territory, to be made available only by actual occupation and settlement. The Albany Argus gives the following summary of the American title:

1. Discover of the mouth of the Columbia river by Capitan Gray of Boston, giving the name of his vessel to the river.

2. This discovery of the head of the same river by Lewis and Clark, under the authority of the United States.

3. The settlement of Astoria, under the auspices of Mr. Astor, an American naturalized citizen.
4. The Treaty of 1803 with the French Republic.

5. The Treaty of Spain of 1819, acquiring all rights of Spain to land North 42 degrees beyond the Rocky Mountains.

6. The Nootka Sound contest (1789) between England and Spain.

7. The Treaty of Utrecht (1763) between France and England, settling boundaries - this settlement becoming ours, as the successor of France in that part of her dominions.

8. The Treaty of Ghent 91815) restoring Astoria to the United States as American property.

9. American citizens were once in sole possession of the Columbia river region.

The same paper remarks, that “this question is evidently surrounded with complicated difficulties and embarrassments, growing too, in no small degree, out of the joint occupancy” by the United States and Great Britain. [MSH]

ACCUMULATED EVIDENCE

We have already presented to our readers public and private information, sufficient to satisfy the most sceptical, of the almost certain admission of Texas into our Union. Yesterday’s mail, however, brought us a letter from a most reliable source, which so plainly and so strongly marks out the course that things will take in Texas, that we cannot forbear to publish a few extracts. Moreover, it is pleasant to dwell upon this glorious winding up of a question, which has excited such an intense interest, and which, at one time, were we to believe the croakings of the Federal press, threatened the Union itself with dissolution. It were an instructive study, to look back at the mutilorm and vital effects developed in a single year of our national history. The Whig party were in the highest spirits - their leader, flushed with the hopes of an easy and brilliant triumph, waited only for the forms of the Constitution to be complied with, to ascend the Chair of State and promulge his lofty edicts. The Democratic party, on the contrary, were agitated by divisions, and a gloom hung over their councils, preparatory to the National Convention. At this critical moment the "Texas bomb" was thrown into the political battlefield. How different the effects produced upon the rival camps!

Mr. Clay, hitherto the warm advocate of annexation, saw danger to his prospects from the Northern Whigs, should he carry out his former opinions, and he issued a manifesto, substantially resisting all schemes for the achievement of the vital measure. Many of his friends, true to their past pledges, and true to the South, abandoned him instantly; but the large mass of the Whig Party blindly followed his tortuous course. - However conflicting the sentiments of his never ending letters, he was proclaimed to be consistent and manly. The enemies of annexation sustained his elevation, because his written views made it as clear as noon-day, that his triumph would be a death-blow to this "iniquity." The Texas Whigs on the contrary, and for exactly opposite reasons, foresaw in his success the crowning of their favor to measure. But could elements so contradictory, satisfy the American people? Could they heartily unite in raising to the highest honors a man who, however brilliant his oratory, and distinguished his talents, was found to be on both sides of the great issues of the day?

The result proved that the people were too intelligent, virtuous and immovable, to be hoodwinked by the most specious professions. The Democratic Party made Texas their prominent issue. In the North and in the South, alike, it was their watchword. There was no dodging or equivocation about them. Forced to set aside the superior claims of Mr. Van Buren, the eminent Statesman and wise President, because his views did not come up to the Democratic standard upon this question, they sacrificed all sectional feelings, and called from the quiet scenes of Tennessee the "obscure" and "unknown" James K. Polk; according to Whig logic, to represent their cause. On all the political issues, he was a true impersonation of the Jeffersonian creed. On the Texas question, he was unequivocal, firm and zealous. The line was at once distinctly drawn. The struggle waxed warm, but the Republican Party overcame all difficulties, and planted their standard upon the walks of the Constitution. The “Duck River Colonel” was promoted by the suffrages of a free people, to the position almost attained by the towering "Dictator." But, above all, the Lone Start was made to shine with new light - though it was far from certain, that political prejudices and anti-American feelings would so soon yield to the moral influence of the Republican triumph, or that we should now anticipate, with joy the early accession of so fair a member to our political family. The enthusiastic feeling for Texas, which had swept the popular masses, penetrated into the national council chambers, and a Whig Senate was compelled to record the voice of public sentiment.

In Texas itself, for a short time, some apprehension was felt for the efforts of foreign intrigue to defeat the wishes of the two countries. But, now, all fear is dissipated, and that gallant people eagerly await the moment of return to an association with their kindred and friends.

And how has all this been achieved? Calmly and peacefully, save here and there a discordant note of opposition from Northern fanatics or doomed politicians. The successful and glorious termination of this delicate question, furnishes the most striking proof, that the bands of our blessed Union are not easily to be burst asunder - that the people of the United States are not yet to be swayed by sectional feelings or by insidious traitors to the Constitution.

The annexation of Texas, fraught as it is with blessings to the whole Union; presents another feature of surpassing beauty and value. It develops the fact, that an American feeling is still predominant with our people - that, when our policy or our institutions are threatened by foreign intrigue and ambition, we are all our people, resolved to defend our national honor and welfare.

We have received from our kind friends in Texas three copies of the National Register. Its leading articles sustain the position advanced by our intelligent and valued correspondent:

To the Editors of the Enquirer:

WASHINGTON, TEXAS, April 23, 1845.

"Knowing your solicitude for the ratification by Texas of the conditions contained in the join resolution for her annexation to the Union, and seeing that you have been led to express some apprehension of the result, I have thought it not improper to state to you what may be expected.

President Jones having called Congress to meet on the 16th of June, has, of course, settled the question, so far as the 'consent of the existing Government' was necessary. That body, known to be almost unanimous in favor of annexation, will have nothing to do but to apportion the Districts for the election of deputies to a Convention, and to fix a day for the meeting of these deputies who can make a Constitution and frame a provisional government in time to elect Senators to our Congress, to take their seats as soon as the act is passed, declaring Texas a State.

The people of Texas have already, in public meetings throughout the State, expressed their approbation of the provisions contained in the first and second sections of the joint resolutions, and would have been greatly disappointed, had President Polk resorted to new negotiation, as contemplated under the third section, offered by Walker, as an amendment.

You will see from the copy of the 'National Register,' herewith enclosed, that no opposition to the measure now presented, as the basis of annexation, can be maintained. This was the only public journal relied upon to rally an opposition; and he pulls down the flag with grace and kindness.

It was supposed, that the British and French Ministers here, obtaining from Mexico an unconditional recognition of the independence of Texas, could weaken the popularity of the measure of annexation. They could doubtless obtain this, and are now operating for this purpose, - but I have no idea they will present it, when they see it will be ineffectual. If Mexico were now to do this, it would remove many difficulties that are in the way of a satisfactory adjustment of the Western boundary: and it is not likely that Great Britain will wish to place us under obligations for so great a favor.

Give yourself, therefore, no uneasiness about the decision to which Texas will come on this great and important measure. She will ratify the terms of the joint resolution with a unanimity which has never been witnessed before on any political question. The truth is, her citizens, brave, hardy, and intelligent, appreciate better than your own the necessity which exists for the addition of Texas to the Union. They have been in closer contact with the foreign influence which has sought to gain a foothold on their soil, and they have seen, that, if not resisted, it would acquire not only a dangerous ascendency over Mexico, but wrest from the United States all use of Oregon and the Californias on the Pacific. Proud may you be, therefore, of such a State, that has nursed, under so many adverse circumstances, the love of liberty, and voluntarily brings the rich fruits of her success into the common treasury of free institutions - that tells England, France and Mexico, that she wants no guarantees from them - that her highest ambition is to be one of the sovereign members of the Federal Union, and to cultivate with them the means of securing to man the highest amount of independence.

The great excitement which has prevailed here, grew out of the fear among the people that President Jones was disposed to obstruct the measure. His call of Congress quiets this fear; and all therefore is calm." [MSH]

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE

[From the New York Sun, May 20.]

Arrival of the Steamer Britannia

By the Steamer Britannia, at Boston, we have London and Liverpool files to 4th inst. inclusive.

The Steamer arrived yesterday morning, making the passage in 15 1\2 days.
The news may be summed up in brief: - Restoration of peace in Switzerland; Ireland asking for "more", and refusing to be satisfied with anything short of Repeal; a slight advance in Cotton, and feverish sensation in the London Money Market, both caused by apprehensions of a war for Oregon; English statesmen, declare that England will not give cause for war - she will act on the defensive - and as the United States Government say the same, we have a fair prospect of peace at least at present.

The Cotton market has been buoyant of late, and, in some descriptions, the improvement has reached a farthing a pound. The threatened rupture with America has cause this advance.

The ministerial measure for the endowment of the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth, has hitherto passed safely - we may almost say triumphantly - through its ever stage in the House of Commons; and its progress in the House of Lords, there can be little doubt, will be equally rapid and successful.

Trade continues to be exceedingly brisk in every department in England, and from the appearance of the weather there is a fair prospect that the crops of every description will be abundant.

Every account from the United States is most anxiously looked for, and will continue to increase until it is seen whether the little cloud in the West has grown bigger, or has disappeared.

Money is not dear, being called 2 3/8 to 3 1/4 per cent., and the Bank of England is tolerably liberal in its discounts.

Their is said to be soliciting favor at the French Court, and his absence of that hostility of England, which has been a primary stock in trade of the French journals lately, has almost disappeared - to the great comfort of the expectant Minister.

From the manufacturing districts accounts are generally favorable.

By the endowment of Maynooth, it is said the sovereign of England forfeits her title of "Defender of the Protestant Faith."

The serious illness of M. Guizot, whose life was said at one time to be in peril, has afforded food for the quidnuncs; and the anxiety of Louis Philippe about the safety of his able and accomplished Minister shows the danger to which he has been exposed.

On Friday, May 2d, there was a special meeting of the corporation of Dublin, for the purpose of proposing an address to her Majesty, inviting her to visit her loyal and faithful Irish subjects.

Rumors prevail that the Swiss federation is about to be divided into the Catholic and Protestant Cantons.

The Rev. Dr. Machale, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam has written a long letter to the Premier, which is published in the papers. He compliments Sir Robert’s principles.

Some allusions have been made in Conciliation Hall to the probable effect upon the Repeal agitation of the state of the relations with France and America; and the Texas annexation and Oregon invasion have excited something like a feverish feeling, but the general impression seems to be that there will be no war.

Affairs in Switzerland are in state quo. The terms of the amnesty have been arranged, and Lucerne has promised to discharge her prisoners.

The excitement in England, Ireland, and Scotland, on the Maynooth question, is intense.

A meeting of the principal silk manufacturers of Lyons took place a few days ago in the city, to petition the Chamber of Peers against the introduction of Chinese silks into France.

The English stocks were very heavy on Friday May 2d, and the business transacted was not of a character to assist the market and give it support. The speculators still act upon the condition of politics in America.

Advices from the various ports of the United Kingdom from which emigrants depart, state that emigration to Canada and the United States is going on to a larger extent than ever before known. From Germany, also, it is equally large. The European Times says: "It is to be regretted that the authorities of New York, Boston, &c., do not establish protective societies, not in name, but in spirit, and secure the poor emigrant from the robbery and plunder to which he is subjected by the sharks who are allowed to board the ships on their arrival at their destined port."

Lord John Russell, leader of the Whig party, has presented a series of resolutions in the House of Commons, to test the strength of Sir Robert Peel’s Ministry. the resolutions are nine: - 1. To improve the condition of the laboring classes. 2. That protective duties impose unnecessary taxation. 3. That the present corn laws tend to check improvement, produce uncertainty, and hold out delusive prospects of special advantages to the farmer. 4. That the House will take said laws into consideration, and legislate there on as may be most beneficial to all classes. 5.

IMPORTANT, IF TRUE

Should the following be true, there is no doubt that the proposition will come too late. The enthusiasm and union of the people of Texas are too decided in favor of annexation to the United States, to allow them for one moment to listen to the tendered bribe. News from the South will be looked for with intense interest:

LATE FROM MEXICO. - We learn, says the New York Journal of Commerce, from Captain Baker, of the bank Falmouth, which left Matanzas May 9th, that the English mail steamer from Vera Cruz arrived at Havana 7th instant, with despatches from Mr. Crawford, the British Consul, advising him that the boundary line of Texas had been defined and settled, and her independence guarantied by a Convention between England, France and Mexico. Accounts by the same arrival, state that Santa Anna has been reduced to the alternative of ten years’ banishment, or a trial for maladministration.

The above intelligence must have left Vera Cruz on the 2nd or 3d instant, which is ten days later than our previous advices. [MSH]

A WORD IN EAR OF MR. POLK

From the Punch.

Hearken, Mr. Polk, President of the United States of America, to a friendly whisper of advice from Punch. You have been lately expressing an intention of seizing on the Oregon territory; and, in defiance of the British Lion, appropriating the lion’s share. You have thereby caused the said lion to wag his tail - be warned, and beware! Run not your head into the lion’s mouth. In other words, do not engage yourself in an contest with Great Britain.

In the first place, you want money to buy powder and shot, you have no national uncle, nor any body else to lend a sixpence, for those who lend sixpence to see them again.

Secondly, Mr. Polk, there is a circumstance on which it behooves you well to ponder. Among your glorious institutions, that of slavery is very conspicuous. You have a large negro population. That’s a fact, sir, as your countrymen say, a great fact. You will hardly venture to arm your negroes. You dare not trust your slaves with arms. It would not be against the friends of freedom that they would direct those weapons. Would you expect them to fight for their chains and drivers, and to defend the law of Lynch? Do you calculate they would rally round the shipping posts, and be faithful to their colors - the stripes?

On the contrary, does it no occur to you that England might present them with their freedom in cartouch boxes? We should need to send few men to Kentucky, if we sent plenty of muskets. Liberty, remember, is inscribed on the British flag; it would be awkward for you were we to hoist that flag in America.

You are yourself a slave owner Mr. Polk. What would be the effect of a proclamation of the O’Connell species, addressed to your “hereditary niggers?” Things of that, Master Polk. Nor sir; vapour, hector, bully, bluster, swagger, as much as please. Shake your fist, cock your chin, make faces, take sights across the Atlantic at the “Britishers,” and welcome. You will only diver us ourselves especially - by affording us subjects for jokes and caricatures. In a word, talk as long and as big as you like about going to war, but don’t do it. If you do, depend upon it; as Richard the Third says, “a black day will be for somebody,” and who that somebody will be, you may pretty particularly considerably well guess. [MSH]

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE NO. XLII.

"OUR OWN COUNTRY" - "ARM, BROTHERS, ARM!"

To the Editors of the Enquirer:
Dear Sirs: - In my numerous letters to you, whenever I have touched upon the subject, either directly or incidentally, I have expressed my belief, that under no conceivable circumstances would Great Britain wage a war with the United States. That opinion remains unchanged, notwithstanding the belligerent demonstration in Parliament on the evening of the 4th inst.

Mr. Polk, in his Inaugural Address, before he was President of the United States, remarked: - "Our title to the country of the Oregon is 'clear and unquestionable'" - quoting the latter words as used, if I remember right, by John Quincy Adams, in his "Lay on Macduff" speech in the House, a short time previous. This sentence is regarded of sufficient importance in England to demand special legislative action - and the steamer is detained beyond her regular day of sailing, expressly for the purpose of carrying out "the emphatic declaration of the Government," which was received with unanimous satisfaction in the House of Lords, as well as Commons, "that Great Britain has rights in Oregon, and is prepared to maintain them."

The glove has thus been thrown down, and the most intense solicitude prevails on the continent, to see whether our government will take it up - or whether it will continue the negotiations commenced with Mr. Pakenham - or begin them anew upon the question. As relates to the honor of our country, no alternative is left us: The period of diplomatizing has gone by. Indeed, we have trifled with our national character, in having postponed the occupation of Oregon so long, for every person who has investigated the matter, is decidedly of opinion, that our title to the whole country is "clear and unquestionable." We should waste no more words: "Our voice should be in our swords!"

For the sake of peace - and for the sake of PEACE alone - we have delayed from time to time the extension of our laws over the country beyond the Rocky Mountains. The claim of G. Britain never has been, and never can be, I fee very certain, recognized as just to any portion of it between the 42d and 54th degrees. If we had even been disposed to yield what was clearly our own, we cannot now do so, without derogating from our fame throughout the civilized world. I wholly mistake my countrymen if there is not universal indignation among them, regardless of party, at the spectacle to me, to behold the train of evils which will ensue to her from an attack upon the United States, and she for strength in the world's estimation. - As much as I despise her avarice and insincerity, it will be no pleasing the contrary, she would lose Canada, and possibly her other North American colonies, and forfeit her high position in the world's estimation.

While I am confident, Great Britain will "show the white feather," notwithstanding her vaunted power and greatness, it is the duty of the United States to prepare for the worst. If she should attack us, let us be in a position to defend ourselves as becomes freemen - as becomes Washington's sons. The God of battles will stand by us as he did during the revolution; for we have a just cause. We are actuated by no selfishness in securing Oregon: we want it only as a means of imparting liberty and happiness to the human family - of extending our political and religious institutions to the verge of the Western horizon. - If these are of that worth at which I estimate them, they are destined, like the light of Heaven, to cover the whole universe in coming time.

How proud I feel of such a country, (and who would not fight for it?) when I see the oppressed of Europe casting their eyes towards it as their last hope; when I see the industrious husbandman economizing in every imaginable way, in order to realize sufficient means to procure a home there for his wife and children! Ah! what blessings will not Oregon bestow, under our liberal system of government, on thousands of honest German peasants, who carry with them the most valuable of all treasure - an ability and disposition to develop the latent resources of the earth!

The impression is very general, that if hostilities commence between England and the United States, all Europe will ultimately be involved in war. France, it is thought, would not consent to see our ports blockaded, (a measure which would assuredly be attempted,) in the state of her commerce with us. She consumes as much of our cotton along, as we exported to Great Britain in 1825; and she would endeavor to extend the consumption of it, and thereby build up a rival interest in manufactures, to that of England. Germany, Russia, Spain, Austria, Holland, Belgium, Sweden, Denmark, each have large commercial intercourse with us, and would not permit it to be suspended by the interference of any power. Under no state of the case, could Great Britain come out of a war triumphantly; but, on the contrary, she would lose Canada, and possibly her other North American colonies, and forfeit her high position for strength in the world’s estimation. - As much as I despise her avarice and insincerity, it will be no pleasing spectacle to me, to behold the train of evils which will ensue to her from an attack upon the United States, and she cannot, without great want of foresight, seriously meditate a step so utterly suicidal.

If there is any thing calculated to mortify a genuine American abroad, it is the marvelous ignorance of person hailing from his country, relative to its true moral and physical condition. - Most of those I meet, with have been absentees from home for many years, and probably never will return - making their citizenship a mere convenience. They have imbibed, generally, British notions, and do us more injury than the subjects of Kings, who have been taught from infancy to detest our character. There are others, foreigners by birth and education, who have gone to the United States, made large fortunes, been naturalized, and return to Europe to pass the remainder of their lives. Some of them, particularly, in Germany, have sought and obtained Consul ships under our Government, without perhaps understanding our laws, or even having read the Constitution. The desire office for the consequence which it bestows, without receiving any fees, or performing any duties. One of these contemptible fellows ventured to remark to me, a day or two since, as though the thought was father to the wish: "Well, John Bull is going to give us a d - i of a licking." Another one, who had been in a very important consulate, and who had been forty years from the U. States, said to me: "I used to pride myself upon my country; but it has become so justly disreputable, that I am ashamed to hail from it any longer." I would sooner part with my right arm, than extend it to such creatures in a spirit of brotherly regard. It is imperative upon Congress to enact a law, when it convenes, to compel absentees, who have been out of the country longer than five years, to return immediately, on pain of forfeiting their citizenship. Silly, blabbing magpies, should not be permitted to appear in the plumage of the noble bird of Jove.

None but bona fide citizens, and only those who are natives, should be appointed to offices, however important or however insignificant, abroad. At home no distinction should be made, when the qualifications are equal, between naturalized foreigners and natives, because they are under the immediate superintendence of the government: but abroad, the former assume airs wholly unbecoming Americans, and fail to command that respect which should attach to their position. Every day I see more and more to convince me that there should be a limited period for our Ministers, Secretaries of Legation and Consuls to serve - and that they should be ineligible to re-appointment to any post abroad. The term of a Minister should be four years, (unless recalled for satisfactory reasons, which should be made to appear,) but should not be permitted to extend beyond eight; Secretaries of Legation should continue in office the same length of time. Consuls, inasmuch as they are not salaried, and get no outfit, should be appointed for eight years, and made ineligible after twelve. We have Ministers in Europe who have been absent from home eighteen and twenty years - and Consuls who have been abroad thirty. They can have no more correct idea of what America is at present than the Emperor of Russia, who has never been there - and they have, consequently, no sentiments in common with the great body of the nation. Their feelings are alienated, and they cannot appreciate our true interests. Talk of Oregon and Texas to them, and they hold up their hands and exclaim, "We shall be involved in war! What use have we for so much territory? Great Britain won't suffer such things!" Send individuals fresh from the people, who have the firmness to take the bull by the horns, and the time is not distant when the slanderers of our fame would be effectually broken down in Europe.

You will see by the papers that the cotton market is somewhat agitated, with slightly advanced prices, and consols rather flat. This is occasioned by a belief, that the Great Western will bring any thing but pacific accounts from Washington. It is well to be prepared for the worst; but in closing this letter, I will not concern my conviction, that the proceedings in Parliament were nothing more than a display of words, to silence the clamor of the Whigs, and that the Ministry, by having manifested some spirit, will be enabled the more readily to reconcile the opposition to the relinquishment of all claims upon Oregon. Let the United States, more than at any period of their history, present an undivided front, and bear a steady hand, and they will dispel, without the loss of a drop of blood, the last speck of war which will probably ever be seen upon the horizon. It will be recollected, that Great Britain assumed high ground in relation to Texas; yet, as soon as the resolutions pass for its annexation, she lowers her pretensions, and says it is a question over which she has no control.

Yours truly, AGRICOLA

AGREEABLE INTELLIGENCE

Ex-Governor Yell of Arkansas passed through this city on Monday, directly from Texas. He reports that every newspaper in Texas is now friendly to annexation - and that there is no doubt of the acceptance of the terms of admission into our Union, specified in the joint resolution. The "Union" of Monday night repeats the same convictions. Our readers, we know, will thank us for extracting from the Union, the following pleasant details furnished by the correspondence of that paper. This vital question, which has occupied so large a space of public attention, which has so potently wielded the destinies of our great Republic, is now about to attain a glorious consummation, and the people of the United States will watch with interest every thing connected with a neighbor, soon to become our fair sister.

"A private letter is received, from a high quarter at Galveston, May 6th, which uses the following language: 'There is now no division upon this question. In my future communications I may confine myself more to a statement of facts in relation to the physical and other resources and advantages of this country, under a belief that, when I tell you that Texas will accept the terms, and that promptly, and that she will have, on the 1st Monday in December next, knocking at the doors of Congress, two Senators and two Representatives with a good Constitution in their hands, I have told you all on this subject which you desire to hear.'"

Another letter from New Orleans of the 11th, states that Major Donelson and Gov. Yell had arrived the evening before, in the New York, from Texas. It announces the very agreeable intelligence, that General Houston had assured Major Donelson, by letter, that he shall interpose no obstacle to the union, nor does he believe that any impediment to the effectuation of the measure will arise 'on the part of the government of people of Texas.' He compliments Major Donelson in the most frank and friendly terms on the success of his mission, and says to him, that there is no gentleman in the United States, under whose auspices, or by the force of whose talents, he would rather see the measure successfully accomplished, than the American Charge's. With this brilliant prospect of success, and under a sense of the most delicate feelings with regard to General Houston and President Jones, Major Donelson had thought it his duty to retire for the time from the scene of action. His conduct will be duly appreciated by every man of sensibility.

Another letter from Galveston, of the same date, enters into a variety of particulars, all of them interesting, but over which, under present and probably circumstances, it is best to throw a veil. Whatever may have been the views of Captain Elliot or Mr. Satigny, or the plans of Mr. Ashbel Smith when he left Texas, or even our own country, they are now all dissipated by the voice of the people, and by the action of the Government and the concurrence of General Houston. - The public sentiment had been aroused by some suspicions as to the course of the President; and the writer is convinced that, had not the President ordered a convocation of Congress, revolution and violence might have usurped the place of the 'sober, determined purpose which he is please to see now manifest on the part of the people to await the meeting of Congress on the 16th of June, when they will have their will in favor of annexation expressed by that body, and the mode and manner of calling a Convention to ratify the same, and to form a Constitution, prescribed. The subject of the terms of annexation, or of the result of the measure when Congress meets, no longer constitute the topics of conversation among the people. They speak of it as a subject settled. The all-engrossing topic among them is the provisions of their Constitution to be accepted.' Upon this subject, the writer expresses himself 'gratified to listen to the views and opinions of many intelligent men. The deep interest they feel in the result of such a constitution, which shall secure to Texas and her citizens the blessings of a good Government and social order, gives high hopes of their future destiny. I undertake to predict, that you yourself will be surprised, when you shall see their constitution emanating from a people of whose disorder so much has been idly said.' The writer says, that 'he finds the terms of the resolutions, as they passed the House of Representatives, to be entirely acceptable to the people; and he has no hesitation in saying, that they will be agreed to by Congress, and by the convention of Texas, without any amendment, addition or alteration. The language of every intelligent man with whom he had conversed - of every public meeting, (and they have been held in every country in the Republic,) is, that 'these terms are good enough; and if they are not, or if objections should afterwards be discovered,' we will trust to the justice and liberality of the States to remedy any defects and to do their brethren of Texas full, ample, and complete justice. We want to be citizens of the United States again." [MSH]

SHALL WE HAVE WAR?

We think there is no danger of it. Great Britain has too many domestic troubles to muster energy and power to attack a formidable rival. The bait thrown out by Sir Robert Peel to Catholic Ireland in the shape of the Maynooth grant has served only to arouse the Irish blood and to encourage her bold spirits to wring more and more from the unwilling grasp of England. O'Connell, like a tiger, is only infuriated by the few drops of blood which he has tasted, and will "agitate" with new zeal and violence. The concession made by Pell to Irish demands, has raised a storm among the Protestants of England and Scotland, that it will require all his firmness and vigor to resist. A war with the United States would, by stopping the supply of cotton, throw out of employment thousands of operative, and no one can expect that, disappointed as they would be, they could join heartily in a crusade against a people, who has supplied them with the means of earning their daily bread. These and other potent causes will throw embarrassments into the movements of British rulers at the very outset. But the following vigorous passage from and English Journal, the "Non-Conformist," the organ of the dissenters, is full of truth and meaning. Its view cannot escape the keen eye of British Diplomacy. The "fixed facts" therein presented, will prove resistless stumbling blocks in the path of British ambition and territorial aggrandizement:

"We have Ireland not well affected, and she is one-third of our physical force; but doubtless Sir Robert, by mounting their priesthood on our shoulders, giving us both Sinbad and his mother to carry, thinks he has quieted them, choked off O'Connell, and satisfied the English by requiring them to carry double, because he has taken the duty off divi dixi, and allowed butter to come in when it has been tarred and turned into grease, that the people may not eat it. We will not enter into this hallucination, it would lead to too wide a departure from our present point - the impolicy, not to say wickedness, of war with America, for a territory which we could not manage if we had it.

We have a national debt six times that amount of that which our glorious rulers had incurred for us before the commencement of the American revolutionary war. It was one hundred and twenty-eight millions in 1775 - it is eight hundred millions now; and that people have an organised government, are free from national debt, and only need such a war to induce them to submit to the taxation necessary to raise largely the munitions of war; and, whatever danger they may be threatened with from our raising their black population against them, they will discern the absolute necessity of a seaboard: they see the value of it now. Our seamen, managed by severity and flogging; will not fight with the spirit of old; for the spirit has been changed, and cannot be aroused in the same degree by such means, and the means have not been changed. Temptations will be held out to our soldiers to desert, and the balance of evil will be largely against us. If successful, what should we gain? A country we could not people with the rapidity necessary to maintain it; whilst the Americans have an advancing population suited to the climate, and ready of choice, to struggle with difficulties of settlers. If we would give freedom to commerce, that country would be a good customer as a nation, but as colonists they would be an almost inexhaustible drain upon our resources. A war on the subject would involve a waste of blood and of life, to win a millstone; besides that, such a collision would lead to blockades, and blockades produce a European war." [MSH]

FRUITS OF TEXAS ANNEXATION
In advocating, with our whole zeal and power, the re-union of Texas to the United States, we have always looked at the question in a national point of view. It is true, that we endeavored to do our first duty to the South. We contended, that annexation was vitally necessary to the South, as a barrier against foreign intrigue and assaults upon our peculiar domestic institutions. Had Texas consented to yield to the bribes of England, and exist as an independent State in name, she would have been over-run by hordes of Europeans, who, in a few years, would have controlled her policy, enslaved her to foreign powers, and raised up a legion of fanatics, to assist our own intestine enemies, in their fiendish operations against the slave States. This was an essential element of Southern advocacy of annexation. - But there was another important motive at work. Had annexation, so leniently sanctioned as it was by the voice of the people last November, been defeated, that defeat would have been clearly traceable to the efforts of Northern plotters against Southern institutions and traitors to the Union. had, then, the people’s Representatives been swayed by this fierce anti-slavery spirit and dashed to the ground the hopes of the friends of the Union, the most fatal consequences to the peace and safety. By yielding to the dark influence of Abolitionism in this clearly defined issue, the South would have made a complete surrender of their rights and property to the misguided fanatics. - Here, then, an important principle was to be settled. Most fortunately for the Union, it was settled in favor of the Union secured. Upon these high considerations, we warmly sustained the annexation of Texas, which is now on the eve of accomplishment, peaceably and honorably, and with the sanction of the whole people of the United States and of Texas - for the disaffected in both countries are powerless, and their disorganizing efforts dead for ever.

But it was not alone as affecting the interests of the South, that we assisted in giving an impulse to the question. We looked at its beneficial effects upon the people of the West and of the North. A new and growing market would at once be thrown open for the staple products of the great West, and for the expansive operations of Northern commerce and manufactures. Texas, independent, could have made a treaty with Great Britain, by which the manufactures of the latter could be admitted free into the ports of the former, and the cotton of Texas received by Great Britain free of duty. This would have been fatal to the manufacturers of the North, as well as the planters of the South. It would, moreover, have materially cut off our commerce. The following extract from the Boston correspondence of the New York Herald shows how the gratifying news of the speedy annexation of Texas was received by the Boston merchants, so well known for their intelligence and devotion to their true interests. When it was proposed to purchase Louisiana, the same cry of opposition was raised from the same quarter, as at present. But when the glorious deed was consummated, and the teeming staples of the South offered rich rewards for commercial enterprise - when the heavy exports of cotton threw into the hands of Northern commerce a vast carrying trade, and new markets were opened for the manufactures of the North - then the voice of disaffection was hushed, for it was too clear, that the interests of the whole country were essentially advanced by this noble fruit of Mr. Jefferson’s statemanship. So will it be with Texas. Her admission into the Union will abound in rich blessings to all parts of the country - and, in a short time, the bitter opposition to its achievement, will be universally regarded as most futile and unpatriotic.

Many contend that this extension of our territorial limits will be fatal to our Union and prosperity. We can see no such dark prospect ahead. Under our confederative system, the different sections and different interests will check each other in their attempted invasions of the Constitution - and, like a well-balanced machine, our beautiful system will move on successfully - save, now and then, a few jars, which will serve to show the solid materials of which it is composed. Unless our memory betray us into error, Montesquieu, in his “Spirit of Laws” ably contends that a Confederative Republic, like our own, will admit of any extension - and becomes stronger and more durable, the wider the territory. At all events we augur no bad effect from the extension of our limits, where we have territorial rights. We must do our duty to ourselves and the world, and leave the rest to Providence.

Some apprehend hostile movements on the part of Mexico. The history of her imbecile and contradictory policy should banish all such fears. Even now we have rumors of revolution among her disaffected leaders. She will have her hands full of her own domestic troubles, and can not spare the time, the men or the money, to make an ineffectual grasp at the fair prairies of Texas:

“The late news from New Orleans concerning Texas, puts our merchants in fine glee, for they see before them long vistas of rich markets, fat frigates, and so on, all to be realized by the annexation of the lone star republic, and the securing of its trade and commerce to this country. - Mexico is in a queer position about Texas, anyway. In the first place she cuts off all diplomatic intercourse with the United States, and threatens to declare war, because we purpose to annex Texas to this country; and in the second place, she agrees, in conjunction with France and England, to guarantee the independence of Texas. With one hand she hurls the gauntlet of defiance at the United States for treating with Texas and with the other she signs a guarantee of Texan independence. Truly, she obeys the Scripture in practice, and lets not the right hand know what the left hand doeth, but after a most original fashion. Don’t you think so?” [MSH] according to Whig prophecy, would shake our government to its centre, produce a revolution in Texas, and raise up the world in arms against our plundering policy and cowardly avarice; it was monstrous, they said, that such a momentous question should be decided by a simple ipse dixit of a nisi prius Judge of Alabama!

The Alabama papers gave full rope to the play of the monster, and quietly enjoyed the fun. The Mobile Register, however, thoroughly satisfied with the laughable results of the mistake, comes forward in the following article, and, by a single stroke of its spear, breaks up the magic. It will be amusing to see this reversal of the decision of Judge Bragg traveling its slow and tortuous path through the newspapers. Though we never published the original, either as a fact or as a joke, we set this ball in motion today:

"We thought our contemporaries of the press a little too sagacious to circulate the report, that Judge Bragg, of our Circuit, had decided that Texas is a part of the United States, and required a Texas citizen to do duty here. It is all a joke. No such decision was ever made by Judge Bragg.

The fact is, we understand, to be, that 'an old resident of this city asked to be excused from serving on a jury, because he had been in Texas and taken the oath of allegiance there. His excuse was disallowed, and he was ordered to take his seat in the box. The Judge merely remarked to a by-stander jocosely, that it could make no difference any how - Texas was annexed! Out of this casual remark has grown the story, that the Judge had formally made the decision reported.” [MSH]

THE WEST - THE OREGON

The sentiment in the West with regard to the Oregon controversy seems strongly bent upon immediate and decisive measure to make good our rights to that territory. In Missouri, all distinctions of party appear to be forgotten in the overpowering comprehensiveness of this question.

It was to be supposed, that the impulses of the West would tend as above stated. The sympathies of the Western people are with the Oregon settlers; their eyes are turned towards the Pacific, to which they look as to the termination of their progress.

We copy two extracts below - one from an Administration paper, the other from a Whig journal. The first, the Missouri Reporter says:

"The language of the different speakers in the British Parliament, on the Oregon question proves that we have nothing to expect from negotiation. There is but one step now for our Government to take, and that is, to pass a bill for the immediate occupation of that Territory, and provide the means of defending the occupants from all aggression. This course should have been adopted long ago. Some papers speak of leaving the settlement of this question to an arbitration. Such a step would be unwise in the extreme. We know our rights, and must maintain them. The declaration of President Polk was correct; its spirit and boldness were in accordance with popular sentiment. The high position taken by him must not be relinquished. If England is determined to make another struggle to prevent the ascendancy of free principles on this Continent, it will be as well to fight her on the Oregon as on any other question. We do not believe, however, that she will voluntarily engage in a contest by which the Canadas will be endangered.

Since the British Parliamentary orators have taken exception to President Polk’s Inaugural, it is his duty to reiterate the sentiments contained in it, in his message to Congress next winter, accompanied with a recommendation that the Oregon bill he passed immediately, and such additional measures adopted, as will place us in a position to carry out our policy at all hazards. We look to him for continued boldness, zeal and energy. No half-way measures will answer in the present crisis.”

The extract which follows is from the St. Louis Republican, a Whig paper. It alludes to the suggestion made in several quarters, that it would be best to leave the settlement of the question to time and to the process of emigration, and declares that such advice is unjust towards the settlers, and evinces an ignorance of the actual condition of affairs in the Oregon territory. “It is true,” says the Republican, “that thousands of the citizens of the West have and are removing to Oregon. - They go there, believing that they are simply removing from one portion of the U. States territory to another - that they are still under the laws and protection of the U. S., and that any grievances they may be forced to submit to will be repaired by their Government. Those who have gone, and those who go out this season start with the firm conviction that a territorial government, will all the requisite officers and functions, and with ample powers to secure them in their settlement rights, will be established at an early period of the next session of Congress.”

The Republican then proceeds to comment upon the dangers to which American settlers would be exposed from the Hudson Bay Company, if left unprotected by their Government. [Baltimore American] [MSH]
MINISTER TO ENGLAND

We notice that the New Hampshire Democratic prints, very unanimously are recommending the appointment of Hon. Levi Woodbury, as resident minister of the Court of St. James. We cut the following from the Coos County Democrat, one of the ablest papers in the State:

"HON. LEVI WOODBURY - It has been for sometime rumored, that this gentleman would be the successor of Mr. Everett, as Minister to England. That his appointment, would give general satisfaction, we have no doubt. We want a statesman of heavy caliber at the Court of St. James, at this time, and Mr. Woodbury is just the man."

If this appointment be on that is not to be confined to the South, we know of no better selection that could be made, or one more gratifying to the North. He is our own “rock of New England Democracy,” able in council, firm and self-possessed of mind, neither to be moved from his country’s position by threats, intimidation of flattery; knowing his duty, he would ever maintain his position, and no one could better sustain it by enlightened experience, profound intellect and great ability. Such an appointment would redound to the honor of the Administration and be acceptable to the whole country. [Boston Times.] [MSH]

EXCITING NEWS FROM THE SOUTH.

The information contained in the New Orleans papers received yesterday morning, which we should have received a day earlier, is of so interesting a character, that we make most copious extracts. It will be seen that the Government of Texas have been playing a deep and unworthy game. The reason, why the Congress of Texas was summoned at so late a period as the 16th June, seems now to be fully explained. President Jones must have desired to hear from Mexico, whether the recognition of Texas would be agreed to, and the intrigue to defeat annexation prove successful. We submit the news without comment. When it reaches Texas, it must produce a great ferment. We are still most firmly convinced, that Texas will reject the bribe, whether it come from Mexico or England. She will reunite herself to the American Union. Her people are stirred to the centre, and will insist upon Annexation to the United States.

IMPORTANT NEWS.

MEXICO - HAVANA. - By the brig Titi, Captain Brown, arrived here yesterday morning, 8 days from the Havana, we have dates from that city to the 10th inst., inclusive.

The British steamer Thames, from Vera Cruz and Tampico, in 5 days, had brought dates from Mexico to the 28th, and from Vera Cruz to the 30th ult.

The Mexican journals inform us that overtures had been made lately by the Texas government to the President ad interim of Mexico, for the entering into negotiations, whose object should be the recognition by the latter of Texan independence, on a basis honorable to the two republics. The proposition had immediately been submitted to the Mexican Congress by Herrera, through Cuevas, the Foreign Secretary, whose remarkable communication we publish below.

This gave rise to a debate on the 21st ult., - Cuevas urging on Congress the good policy of authorizing the President ad interim of Mexico, for the entering into negotiations, whose object should be the recognition by the latter of Texan independence, on a basis honorable to the two republics. The proposition had immediately been submitted to the Mexican Congress by Herrera, through Cuevas, the Foreign Secretary, whose remarkable communication we publish below.

This gave rise to a debate on the 21st ult., - Cuevas urging on Congress the good policy of authorizing the President to open the negotiation requested by Texas, in order to learn what were the terms of the project, and if such as to satisfy the honor and credit of the nation to place them before the Texan Legislature for their approval:

Mexico, April 21, 1845

"Gentlemen: The affairs of Texas are so important, and so imperatively claim the consideration of Congress and the Executive, that we can not without incurring heave responsibility, postpone the resolution we have taken, to prepare for a denouement which shall reconcile at once the honor and interests of Mexico. The Executive having assembled a considerable number of troops on the frontier, and made use of all the resources in its power to accomplish the desired object, and being occupied with the business to be laid before Congress, for its part sees no other course but that of persisting in maintaining the Republic in the position becoming her power and sovereignty."
But circumstances have arisen which render in not only proper, but necessary, to enter upon negotiations, which may prevent the annexation of Texas to the United States. Think, in the first place, of war, which must inevitably break out between Mexico and the American Republic, for which Mexico is not prepared, and reflect on the evils which such a rupture would bring upon us. Texas has made the first advance, and his Eminence the President, 'ad-interim,' deeply penetrated with the importance of his duty, and the weight of a unanimous resolution on this subject, is of opinion that the executive should adopt no final determination without the concurrence first obtained of the Congress - he is of opinion, that under these circumstances he cannot exercise the powers conferred by the constitution for conducting negotiations with foreign nations.

The government always faithful to its duties and anxious to submit its acts to free discussion, convinced also that these national questions ought to be treated with a pure patriotism and a conscience that spurns all assaults and all prejudices, is of opinion that in the present situation of affairs he cannot decline the offer of negotiation, without violating his obligation to avoid the deciding on so delicate a point without submitting it to Congress. If he could make the arrangement that would satisfy the national honor, he would with pleasure submit it to Congress; and if that object could not be attained, the same executive, anxious for peace, would be the first to decide upon war, which would be the more just as all our exertions had been used to avoid it.

The preliminary proposals of Texas are of a character honorable and advantageous to Mexico, and the Executive, without deciding upon them, has not hesitated to receive them as the commencement of the arrangement desired by Texas. To refuse them peremptorily, would inevitably annex Texas to the United States, and Congress will perceive at once that so ill-considered a measure would lay a terrible weight of responsibility upon the Executive.

To refuse to hear proposals which may lead to a satisfactory conclusion, advantageous to Mexico, would be part of a fanciful patriotism. But, when we are compelled to foresee and consider the evils of a frightful and ruinous war, let us try to avoid such misfortunes, and not brave them, except in a crisis which involves our honor.

If, in view of the act for annexation of Texas to the United States, the Executive had followed the impulse of its own sentiments, Congress would have understood the importance of its conduct, in adopting a course which would have been gloriously sustained by the patriotism of all Mexicans. It is a great sacrifice for the President ad interim and his Ministers, to solicit the authorization at the end of this communication, but he owes this sacrifice to his ardent devotion to the Republic, and to the certainty that in making all honorable concessions for peace, if war would follow, it will terminate in a manner worthy of the national arms and of the claims of justice against the power that provoked it.

Wherefore His Eminence, the President ad interim, in full council of his Ministers, and with their unanimous concurrence, had charged me to submit to Congress the following resolution:

'The Executive is authorized to receive the proposals of Texas, to form arrangements, and to conclude such a Treaty as they may deem honorable to the Republic, the same to be submitted for the examination and approbation of Congress.'

With the highest consideration, I am, gentlemen,

LUIS C. GUEVAS.

God and Liberty

To the Secretaries of the Chamber of Deputies."

It is stated in one of the Mexican prints, that Cuevas, the Foreign Minister, had published a memorial advocating the acknowledgment by Mexico of the independence of Texas, declaring that such might be done without shame or disgrace. England, it is surmised, has dictated this course to the Executive and the Foreign Secretary, with a view to prevent annexation.

General Almonte is in the city of Mexico.

In one of the Havana prints, "the Diario de la Marina," we find it stated that an amnesty bill has been passed, and would be approved on the 16th instant, allowing Generals Santa Anna and Canalizo to quit the Mexican Republic - eight days are allowed them to move off the soil. - They are to be banished for ten years. Their pecuniary liabilities are excepted.

The Mexican Congress has thought proper to accept Santa Anna’s abdication of the Presidency.

There are two bills before the Mexican Congress, relative in Texas, consequent on Senor Cuevas’ communication. First - The resolutions of the United States Congress regarding the annexation of Texas, do not, invalidate the rights of Mexico over that portion of her dominions, it simply breaks the treaty relative to boundaries between the United States and Mexico - the latter will meet the attempted usurpation by an appeal to arms. Second - The whole of the Mexican male population are called to arms, and the President is directed to call out the militia, to array the army, and to pursue other measure that may be necessary at this critical juncture.

The late earthquake on the 7th and 10th ult., have done considerable damage throughout Mexico; in the city, terrible devastations have been caused by them, and the thieves in the metropolis have taken advantage of the confusion to plunder. The village of Rio Blanco, as is stated in a letter from Guanajato was engulfed during one of these concussions. The earth opened, and swallowed up a great number of the inhabitants. A cavern was seen there 400 feet long by 13 wide. One individual who had lost two children by the awful phenomenon of nature, says that upwards of 60 persons were destroyed at the same time, at Rio Blanco. There were two chocks felt on the 10th, in the city of Mexico, which lasted two seconds. Prayers and processions of the clergy had taken place to avert the anger and to propitiate the favor of Heaven, since these earthquakes.

In the roads at Vera Cruz, there was a squadron of United States vessels of war, consisting of a trigate, a sloop of war, and two brigs.

MEXICO - MORE IMPORTANT INTELLIGENCE.

The Mexican schooner Relampago arrived at this port yesterday, in ballast, from Vera Cruz, whence she sailed on the 10th inst. The vessel, it appears, was chartered for the sum of $1,000, to carry despatches from the Mexican government to their Consul in this city, and to take as passenger Mr. Frederick Johnson, bearer of despatches from the British Minister at Washington. Mr. Johnson forthwith proceeded on his way to the North by the Mobile mail boat.

The few letters and papers brought by the Relampago were intended for private hands, and delivered accordingly. We have, nevertheless, been enabled to obtain some information of an important nature, brought by this vessel, the correctness of which may be relied upon.

A short time after the arrival of this vessel, the rumor became current, that Mexico had declared war against the United States. The quarter in which this report originated, together with the circumstances which were stated as attending this hostile demonstration, strengthened for a time the general impression of its correctness. The information which we have since received, induces us to believe that Mexico has not declared war, and that the authors of the report inferred such a result as the cause for the sudden despatch of letters and messengers, by extraordinary means. The reason for this was, that both branches of the Mexican Congress have authorized the President to enter into treaty negotiations with the Texans. In other words, that the measure, having for its object the acknowledgement of Texas independence by Mexico, which, as stated in our paper yesterday, was recommended to the favorable consideration of the Mexican Congress by Minister Cuevas, has been adopted. Of this, we have positive information. The enemies of annexation are making the most of their time in the desire to promulgate the news. Capt. Elliott, it is said, was waiting at Vera Cruz, for his despatches from Mexico, prior to his departure for Texas in the frigate Eurydice.

It is also stated, that commissioners on the part of Texas had subsequently left Vera Cruz in company with Capt. Elliott, bearing with them an acknowledgement by Mexico of the independence of Texas, providing the latter rejected the measure of annexation.

A favorable report, upon the request of the Mexican Government, for permission from Congress to open negotiations with Texas, had been adopted by a vote of 41 to 11, a day or two previous to the passage of the bill having that object in view.

An act of amnesty to Santa Anna, which we alluded to yesterday had been really passed. It is stated on grounds less reliable, that he had been released from prison, and placed at the head of the Mexican army.

Some alterations have been projected in the Mexican tariff, the question being in debate in the Congress now sitting.

Some time ago we mentioned that trouble had broken out in California. It appears, by a communication in the Constitutional Monitor, received from Mazatlan, that California had become independent, the insurrection there against the Mexican General, Michael Torenn, having been crowned with complete success. No particulars are given of the cause, or the progress of the outbreak.

On this subject, the New Orleans Bulletin of the 21st makes the following sensible remarks:

We have carefully inquired after all that is to be learned, and we can assure our readers that the aspect of affairs has not materially changed since the date of the advices published yesterday, which came to hand via Havana. A committee of the Chamber of Representatives have reported favorably on the application of the President to be invested with authority to receive the overtures of Texas. The bill of amnesty for Santa Anna and his Ministers, as proposed by the Government, has been adopted in the Chamber of Representatives. Beyond this, we do not learn that there is an item of intelligence worth repeating. The despatches brought, relate (all but those for our own Government,) we venture to say, to but a single object, namely, to forestall the action of Texas on the resolutions of Annexation. To this object the functionaries of Great Britain and Mexico are bending their entire attention, and, we are sorry to add, to all appearance aided and abetted by the functionaries of Texas. But these efforts, whether with or without the assistance of the Texian Administration, must totally fail. The people of Texas have already entered their judgment in favor of annexation, and they will carry out the measure without regard to opposition. - The information which will reach them in a few days, that they have been presented by their Government as suppliants before the unstable and imbecile Government of Mexico, will but tend further to arouse their indignation at the miserable chicane which is attempted to be played upon them." [MSH]

PROPOSITIONS

The Washington Union gives to the public the subjoined information concerning the propositions heretofore made by the Government of the United States to that of Great Britain, for the adjustment of the Western boundary dispute:

"The proposition first made by the U. States was, that the 49th parallel of latitude, which had been adopted as the dividing line between their territories and those of Great Britain, from the vicinity of the Lake of the Woods to the Rocky Mountains, should be continue Westward as far as the possessions of the two nations extended in that direction - thus offering to resign their right to what lay farther North. This being rejected, it was agreed, that, as neither party claimed a perfect title to any portion of the country, the whole should be left free and open to the people of both for ten years.

Within those ten years, the title of Spain to all North of the 42d parallel was surrendered to the United States; and Russia engaged to make no settlements South of the latitude of 54 degrees 40 minutes. The American government thereupon proposed an agreement, by which Great Britain should make no settlements South of the 51st parallel, and the United States should make more North of that line, substituting afterward the 49th parallel for the 51st; and then, in 1824, came the first definite proposition from Great Britain for a partition of the territory. The line of separation was to run along the 49th parallel from the Rocky Mountains to a large branch of the Columbia, down which, and down the main stream, it was to be continued to the sea. Great Britain was to have all North and West of this line, except that the United States should possess a small detached territory in the angle formed between the Pacific shore and the Southern side of the Strait of Fuca, comprising one harbor for small vessels on the ocean, and one for large vessels on the strait. Upon this the negotiation ended.

In 1826, the United States, for the first time, proposed the 49th parallel, as the definite line of boundary, from the Rocky Mountains to the open Pacific; to which the British replied by repeating their proposition as above stated. Neither party would yield more; and so, after formally withdrawing their respective offers, by which each declared that it was in no wise to be considered bound thereafter, they renewed the agreement, to leave the country open to the people of both, for an indefinite period, subject, however, to be terminated after a year's notice of such Intention by either to the other. That agreement still subsists.” [MSH]

UNTITLED

The regular correspondent in New Orleans, of the National Intelligencer, in his late letter, says he was informed by a member of the Texian Congress, that the public debt of that State amounts to about sixteen millions of dollars. The same member of Congress, according to the letter writer, admitted there are no authentic records that show positively how much the debt it, but only after a long investigation, and getting every possible kind of information on the subject, he made it out at the sum just mentioned. The truth is, speculators are very busy in this vicinity to deprecate Texas funds and stock as much as they can in order to profit by the artificial ab?sement. If they can make the world believe that Texas owes sixteen millions dollars, when, in reality she only owes six, her stocks and evidences of debt may be purchased for a song. - Here we see a member of the Texian Congress conjured up to say, what nobody in Texas or in N. Orleans believes, that she owes about three times as much as she really does owe. Who in this member of Congress, quoted anonymously by an anonymous letter writer - anonymous but well known? The authority may be good, or it may not; and we trust our fellow citizens both in this State and in the State of Texas, will give no attention to his surmises and fancied and fanciful calculations, until his name shall be made known. What! sixteen millions of dollars owed by Texas? The assertion bears improbability on its face - and it is in fact unworthy of belief; it is discredited by official statements to our Government last Winter, which made the public debt of Texas amount to something like six millions of dollars, if our memory be accurate.

W know individuals in New Orleans who own large amounts of Texas paper money, and countless acres of Texas land, who are so anxious to get more money and more land, that they are eternally decrying the one and the other in order to render them dog cheap. We are far from meaning to intimate that the writer of the letter in the Intelligencer is one of these; but perhaps he has some friend who does belong to the tribe of speculators, and who may have deceived the letter writer into a belief that the State of Texas, like Hob in the will, is up to the neck in embarrassments; when, in truth, her public lands, so soon as the measure of annexation goes into effect, will suffice to redeem all her debts and liabilities if they were ten times greater than they are.

THE OREGON QUESTION

In some remarks offered in a previous communication, it was observed that, in all probability, if Mr. Calhoun had closed the Oregon negotiation, he would have accepted the British proposition, in 1826, to make the Columbia the boundary from where the 49th parallel strikes that river. This on our own part, was entirely inferential. It was a conclusion drawn after the perusal of his speech in the Senate, during the Oregon debate in 1843. We have since understood that his correspondence with the British Minister will show, if ever published, that Mr. Calhoun contended for the whole of our claim to 50 deg. 40 min., according to the line adopted in the convention with Russia. How much less he would have finally consented to receive, is, of course, entirely conjectural. It is supposed, in well-informed quarters, on what data we are unable to determine, that the British Government will admit our claim to the 49th parallel, but that the chief matter in controversy is the South end of Vancouver's island, which that parallel would intersect, the island lying between 48 and 51 north latitude. In this island, which is divided from the main land by the magnificent strait De Fuca, is Nootka Sound, so celebrated in diplomatic history. The island contains a number of fine harbors, objects, of course, very attractive to a maritime power like that of Great Britain. A line at the 49th parallel, if carried from the Rocky mountains to Vancouver's island, if it leaves that island, must consequently pass round it about one degree to the south of 49. We know not the foundation of the presumed British concession. It is, however, contrary to the uniform tenor of their communications with our Government. - [Charleston Courier.] [MSH]

MEXICO AND TEXAS

The new aspect of affairs occasioned by the extraordinary scenes in Mexico, which we yesterday laid before our readers, presents a rich field for a speculation as to the effects likely to ensue to Texas, and to ourselves. We have before us the strange spectacle of a President of a constitutional Republic, the creature of a free people, at one time exerting his influence against the admission of the people of his country into an intimate union with their old friends and brethren - At another time, we see him forced, by the sweeping torrent of public opinion, to convene the Congress in order to deliberate upon so vital a subject; deferring, however, popular action until a period so late as to justify fears of intrigue or sinister motives on his part. Finally, the scene shifts from Texas to the Palace of the Montezumas - the mystery is solved - the world is informed by the high authorities of Mexico, that this same President has appealed to Mexico for a recognition of Texas independence, on condition that the overtures of the United States he rejected. his duplicity is exposed - his intriguing policy, under the influence of British cunning and avarice, is laid bare to his own people, and to the civilized world. - But will this unworthy attempt to defeat a measure, so dear to the hearts of the United States' succeed? We have no fear - though we are surprised to see in the "Mobile Herald & Tribune" different sentiments entertained. That paper says:

"The Mexican news this morning is both important and interesting. It appears from this that the President of Texas (doubtless in a covert manner,) has been making propositions to Mexico for the acknowledgement of the independence of Texas. What the condition of these propositions is does not appear, but we know of none that would be entertained by Mexico, unless based on a rejection by Texas of the recent overtures of our own Government.

The diplomatic style of the Mexican Minister for foreign affairs betrays, through its coyness, a most eager desire to accept the proposition of President Jones, and no doubt his Government will snatch at it, as the only means of saving itself from national degradation.

The question now is - will Texas approve of the action of its Executive officer? We, indeed, think there is much probability of it. Unquestionably, inasmuch as the ministers of thare of the great powers of Europe have interfered to bring about this consummation, other advantages have been offered to Texas. England alone has the power to make her a great country; and these advantages, represented with skill to her Congress, are likely to effect the end they are intended to accomplish.

If we were a citizen of Texas, we should oppose annexation. Her interest, with independence and commercial immunities, lies directly hostile to ours. She produces what we produce, and for this produce England is the great market. We may be injured immeasurably by the jealousy of foreign powers, and all this injury would inure to the benefit of Texas. Here is a temptation irresistible to a rejection of the proposition for annexation, and this temptation, doubtless, will be arrayed in its most plausible and seductive garb."

"The Mobile Herald & Tribune” different sentiments entertained. That paper says:

If we were a citizen of Texas, we should oppose annexation. Her interest, with independence and commercial immunities, lies directly hostile to ours. She produces what we produce, and for this produce England is the great market. We may be injured immeasurably by the jealousy of foreign powers, and all this injury would inure to the benefit of Texas. Here is a temptation irresistible to a rejection of the proposition for annexation, and this temptation, doubtless, will be arrayed in its most plausible and seductive garb."

We are as strongly persuaded as ever, that there is no force in the views presented by the Mobile Herald. We are thoroughly convinced, that no inducements, however great of plausible, with France, England and Mexico can hold out to Texas, will make her doubt or waver in the least about embracing our offer. Natives of the same soil, breathing from their childhood the same pure air of freedom, cheered on by the same associations of past glory and the same broad flag with their brethren of the United States, from whom they have been temporarily estranged. - We regard as utterly delusive the argument, that "England alone can make Texas a great country." With the examples of British oppression and tyranny before her eyes, Texas will scarcely understand the weight of this position. She will dread the fatal embrace of British diplomacy and ambition. She will shake off the intrigues, by which foreign influence will seek to infuse itself into her bosom, and ultimately enslave her to the worst political, social and commercial systems. Let the present intrigue of President Jones and Great Britain be successful, and Texas necessarily becomes a mere colony of Great Britain swayed by her rulers and oppressed by her artificial policy. - She will be over-run by foreign settlers, imported expressly to control her American sentiments and she will fall to the rank of the humblest vassal of British power. She sees and feels all these inevitable consequences. She has watched with an unwinking eye the glorious progress of the American States; she has seen and loved to observe, the high position which our Republic has, in so few years, assumed by the side of the greatest nations of the Earth - marching on with a firm and rapid step to the highest eminence, both political and commercial. Experience has proved conclusively, that under our liberal institutions, under the protection of our flag, her resources would be amply developed and the rights and safety of her people thoroughly protected - Could she desire more? Will she accept less? - When she has presented to her a certain prospect of honor and prosperity, under our shield, will she rush to the embrace of foreign intrigue and diplomacy, which history has demonstrated to be so fatal to the happiness and liberty of its misguided victims. But it is almost idle to argue on such a question.

The American blood of the citizens of Texas has already been aroused, and circulates with new warmth and rapidity. Her people have, in a clear and thrilling voice, spoken defiance of foreign and domestic intrigue. Her numerous public meetings, marked by all the enthusiasm and fire of a young and vigorous people, eager for the blessings of liberty, attest the united wishes of the whole country. We fear not in her the least hesitation or doubt, as to embracing our overtures. There is a deep and fixed sentiment in favor of annexation, which cannot be shaken by any bribes, however plausible or tempting. She has solemnly resolved to be a portion of our glorious Confederacy, and nothing can prevent it. All that we dread, is the excitement against her constituted government, which the double-dealing course of President Jones may engender, on the arrival of the news from Mexico. Badly as he has acted, we trust that all violent feelings will be subdued, all symptoms of disaffection be quelled. Let the people prepare for the consummation of this glorious measure of annexation, and they may, thereby, most powerfully rebuke their own treacherous rulers, and the cunning intrigue and grasping ambition of foreign nations.

The New York Journal of commerce, in the following brief but cogent article, expresses our sentiments most thoroughly:

"DISSOLUTION OF THE UNION. - The U. Sates are now exhibiting the most wonderful spirit of conquest which ever appeared in the world. - They conquer, not as other nations have done, by fire and sword, killing one half the people and desolating the country for the sake of conquering it, but simply by establishing so good and useful a government, that the neighboring nations ask the privilege of becoming subject to it. All the inducements which France, England and Mexico can hold out to Texas, will not make her doubt or hesitate one moment about accepting our proposal. Independence, commercial treaties, special privileges, she counts as cross, that she may win annexation. Certainly an alternative so utterly rejected by Texas cannot be desired by any State already in this Union. A force so irresistibly centripetal cannot throw off fragments. When Mr. Garrison, or Mr. Phillips, has, by the power of his eloquence, persuaded a moving body to float up stream, then there will be some danger that the same power will dissolve this Union. - Suppose some one of our twenty-seven States were to fall out of the Union, what is the first, thing it would do? Why, ask to be annexed."

If matters come to the worst - if war should ensue, as is hinted at in the following letter from Vera Cruz on the 8th inst., and published in the New Orleans Picayune, whose Editors fully vouch for the words of the author, ours will no be the fault - and we can appeal to the God of Battles with a clear conscience. We have committed no offence against the sovereignty of the honor of Mexico. We have made a compact of annexation with a Republic which has been recognized by the first nations of the earth as independent, not only of Mexico, but of the whole world. This is all we have done, and in every way in which the question can be viewed, we had a perfect right to do it, regardless of the action of Mexico, or of England and France, who are said to have guarantied the acts of the two Governments in their treaty for the independence of Texas, provided she reject annexation to ourselves. We have acted throughout according to the laws of honor and justice - and, if the peace of the American Continent be broken, we shall not be liable to blame:

"Elliott and the Texan Commissioners are about leaving this [Vera Cruz] in an English frigate for Galveston, with the treaty acknowledging the independence of Texas. But they little dream of their reception at Galveston. These people [the Mexicans] think that the acknowledgement of the Texian independence will prevent Annexation, and thereby they will get clear of declaring war, as they had threatened. They swear, however, that if Texas prefers Annexation to acknowledgement, they will declare war." [MSH]

EXCITEMENT IN ENGLAND

As an evidence of the deep feeling which agitates the public mind of England on the subject of the Maynooth grant, we publish an interesting article from the New York Albion. The Oregon ferment has given place to the violent convulsions of a religious struggle, which will spread over the whole Kingdom with increasing fierceness. Ireland, encouraged by the meagre offering, will never rest till she obtains all she craves. England, aroused by her bitter hostility to the Catholic cause, will be agitated to her centre, on account of the concession wrung from her ministers by Ireland. These two elements, in themselves, are enough to occupy the thoughts and efforts of British rulers. They will be very willing to "ease off" with the Oregon question, in order to concentrate all their energies upon their own discordant factions. To secure peace at home, they will be forced to keep on the best terms with foreign nations:
"By the people of England the measure is not received with so much favor; the opposition out of doors is most formidable. Five thousand petitions, it is said, cover the table of the House of commons imploring that body to resist the inroads of popery. Sir Robert Peel is branded with deception, and with deserting his party, his friends, and the people. Nor do those who support him in Parliament fare better, but are daily receiving the phials of wrath poured upon their heads by their constituents. Few of these men will ever be again returned to Parliament. The question has certainly split up and divided parties even more than the Catholic Emancipation measure, which was also, everyone remembers, carried by the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel in opposition to the wishes of their party, and to a great mass of the people of England. The division lists present the most curious and anomalous appearance. Members sitting on the Government side of the house are seen voting against the Government, and some of the most uncompromising opponents of the Government are voting with a cabinet they affect to despise. Among this latter number is seen Mr. Macauley, known in this country for his celebrated articles in the Edinburgh Review. He attacks the cabinet with all his characteristic fire and vehemence, and assails the Premier with gross personalities - yet he votes with him! We have given one of his speeches to-day; the concluding part, especially, is in his best style, because it is a piece of pointed censure and expression of political hate - feelings which always bring forward the entire energies of Mr. Macauley. He seizes his victim and growls over him as he tears him to pieces with the savageness of tiger and the strength of a lion.

"Sir Robert Peel, whose speech in reply we also copy, made a good defence, and also set himself right with the public in regard to his speech on the Oregon question, delivered on a former night. He showed most satisfactorily, that the Maynooth grant was not wrung from him in consequence of the supposed hostile attitude assumed by this country, since the measure was determined on many moths ago, and long before Mr. Polk took his seat in the Presidential chair. He also cleared himself from the suspicion of tampering with Mr. O'Connell, and demonstrated that the Maynooth question is nothing more than a party of his policy, and would have been adopted if Mr. Polk had never been elected, and if Mr. O'Connell were at the bottom of the sea.

Mr. Ward's resolution, which was to the effect that the grant to Maynooth should be paid out of the funds of the Protestant Church of Ireland, was, was are happy to say, by a very large majority, for only 143 could be found to vote with him out of a house of nearly five hundred members. To take Protestant funds and give them to the Catholics, would, indeed, be an additional firebrand in the present excited state of the Protestant mind of the country. The Maynooth grant must be paid from the national resources."

The New York Albion, ably edited by a native of England, does not seem to apprehend a difficulty between the United States and Great Britain. - We give his views, to which much weight is due, in consideration of his position and his intimate acquaintance with British politics. We presume that the negotiations are now going on, and trust that they may terminate satisfactorily to both countries. We deprecated war, unless it be necessary to vindicate the honor and the rights of the nation:

"The public sentiment in regard to the Oregon question is much less excited than at the former dates, and the public press has, in a great degree, passed on to other topics. The London Times, however, forms an exception to this remark, but, it must be borne in mind that the Times is a paper in fierce opposition to Sir Robert Peel, and therefore cannot be depended on as speaking the sentiments of the British Cabinet. We entertain the opinion that as soon as the mild tone of the articles lately published by the government paper at Washington, the Union, is known in London, the public mind will be much tranquilized. The danger of a rupture between the two countries is certainly much lessened by the appearance of the explanations on the part of the official journal. We hope and believe that the negotiations with Mr. Pakenham have been resumed, and that the discussions are going on favorably." [MSH]

June

June 3, 1845, REv42i8p1c6, The Crisis in Texas

The following from the New Orleans Cenriet of Saturday Evening. May 21, (illegible) to confirm the views expressed buy us, that the people of Texas will not listen, for a moment, to any thing but a tender of our annexation, and will insist upon that, and that alone:

We are indebted to Captain Hoffman, of the barque "William Ivy" from Matagorda, for the Weekly dispatch, of that place, of May 3.

It is filled with animated expressions of the public voice, in favor of annexation.

It contains the proceedings of a meeting of the inhabitants of Matagorda county-Seth Ingram in the chair, and Thomas Harvy Secretary.

In pursuance of resolutions adopted at a previous meeting, the Representative and Senior in Congress from the county of Matagorda, were appointed delegates to meet the delegates from the other counties, in convention as the seat of Government, on the 3rd Monday in May, in order to adopt such plans as they may deem most proper to obtain the action of the people throughout the resolutions adopted (illegible) lowing.

"Resolved, that we have heard with astonishment and indignation of the appointment and embarkation of a Minister from this Government to England and France, which, in conjunction with the delay used by the Executive, in calling
The volumes of the Despatch are toll of severe but justly merited invective against President Jones for his unreasonable delay in invoking congress for the purpose of deliberating on the propositions of our Government relative to the admission of Texas into the Union. Mr. Jones received those propositions on the 20th March; his proclamation for the meeting of Congress was issued only on the 13th April and he has fixed the day at assembling on the 16th of June. The dispatch says (illegible) The public feeling is forced to its utmost tension to tolerate this and liberal institutions under which they desire to live, or not to live at all. [BJM]

The Despatch contains also a letter from Mr. Richard Roman. Senator from the Matagorda district, in the Annexation Corresponding Committee, which expresses, says the Despatch, the sentiments of nineteen twentieths of the people of Western Texas. In this letter, Mr. Roman declares that ever since the commencement of the Texan Revolution, he had an abiding hope that annexation that annexation to the United States was the ultimate destiny of Texas. Such was then, and has ever since been the general conviction of the people. He goes on to state that the hope of its consummation was so strong in 1836, that the existing Government at that time submitted the question to the people simultaneously with the Constitution. The people were unanimously in favor of the plan. He says the present government of Texas was instituted for temporary purposes only. Mr. Roman concludes with expressing a firm resolution to promote the measure of annexation on every occasion—and if it fail, he will think that Texas has struck a blow for liberty in vain and he will feel the humiliation of defeat.

The people of Texas were indignant when they heard that President Jones had dispatched Ashbel Smith as Minister at the Court of Paris and London, for the purpose of completing his private, secret, dirty negotiation: to prevent, if possible, the Republic of Texas from joining our confederacy. It turns out, that Smith, instead of going to Europe, went to Vera Cruz, and is now in the City of Mexico, with Elliot, the British Minister to the Republic of Texas, This Fact is positively asserted by the Picayune of this morning and the assertion is based on information undoubtedly authentic, transmitted to the editors of that paper by their correspondents in Mexico. These two individuals, it was, unquestionably, who made the proposals to the Mexican Government, which induced it to acknowledge the independence of Texas. This recognition as the Picayune justly observes, is conducted “under the auspices of England, its object being to check the progress of this country, cripple her influence, and battle the will of the American people.”

Whatever may be the determination of our government under the state of things that now presents itself, we have no apprehension but that they are prepared, and ready to defeat by force of arms any conspiracy, of foreign enemies with domestic traitors, that has for its object to disappoint the wishes of the people of the United States and of Texas, for the junction of the latter confederacy. We entirely coincide with the Picayune, that our government is bound by a regard to the honor and safety of the country, and by the sacred obligation of good faith to the people of Texas, to interpose its whole power, in order to save them from falling under the domination of traitors, whom they abhor, or of England, which from their infancy they have been taught to look upon as the sworn enemy of those free and liberal institutions under which they desire to live, or not to live at all. June 3, 1845, REV42i8p4c3, Mexico and Texas

The New Orleans Bulletin, a paper that, early in the Texas struggle, broke its party vassalage, and, with a manly and patriotic spirit, threw itself into the front rank of the friends of annexation, and by its zeal and ability contributed greatly to the realization of the great measure, takes a view of the crisis, similar to what we have rapidly sketched off. We should be glad to republish the whole if its powerful article- but must content ourselves with pretty long extracts, bearing upon questions vital not only to Texas, but to the United States, It is a very severe, and justly so, upon the double dealing policy of President Jones, who at the very “of Texas, has shown himself to be the tool of British machinations against a policy, so dear to the American people, It eloquently exposes the designs of Great Britain, and points out the course which our Government should pursue. Upon this latter point, which is presented with much force, we are not yet prepared to go with the Bulletin, Let us await the action of the Texas Congress on the 16th June- and when the compact shall have been solemnly sanctioned, then we shall be ready to devise and adopt such measures to sustain the rights and honor or Texas, as well as our own, as the crisis may require. Then, it may become our duty to assume a stane, which may practically rebuke the traitors in Texas, and the plotters of foreign nations. The people of the United States will not tolerate the interference of foreign powers with our internal policy- and should events consequent upon the actions of the Congress of Texas make it necessary, the whole
"We are at length reluctantly compelled to express our unqualified belief, that the chief members of the Texian Cabinet, including, of course, the President of the Republic, have coalesced with the transatlantic emissaries who have so long sat as an incubus on the energies of that country, and are endeavoring by covert and dishonest means to circumvent the declared will of the Texian people and to defeat the projected union with this confederacy. The recent advices from Mexico leave us no loop to hang a doubt upon Mr. Jones’s conduct admits of no other possible explanation. Not only has he, through the intervention of a British functionary, and with a secrecy and stealth that of themselves stamp the transaction with fraud, placed his country, at the instant it was offered by the United States the most perfect and honorable guaranty of independence, in the humiliating position of a suppliant to Mexico, and dispatched at the same time the principal member of his cabinet on a mission (only announced after the ambassador was far on his journey) the most idle and profitless that can be imagined, if the purposes of it were indeed legitimate and honest; but he has also consented with others to the wretched imposition played upon the public by the announcement that Elliot, the Britannic Minister, had sailed for Charleston, when in fact he had departed as a go between from Jones to the Government of Mexico, with proposals that, carried out, would place Texas at the feet of Mexico and Britain, and rob her of all independence and dignity. Mr. Ashbel Smith, too, and, it we were not in error, M. Saligny, also, helped to spread this gross and unmanly deception, which must hereafter taint the character and transactions of every one engaged in it.

By the opportune discovery of the secret overtures of Jones to the Mexican Cabinet, and the betrayal of the falsehood circulated in relation to the destination of Elliot’s journey from Galveston, we are let much farther than before into the diplomatic (and we fully believe, mercenary) plot of which Texas is proposed to be made the victim and the United States the dupe. The games is even deeper, bolder, more complicated and far less scrupulous, than we had at any time suspected, and involves the Texian Administration to an extent that must be sincerely lamented. Being thus aware, however, of the strength and unscrupulousness of the combination that is to be encountered, the friends of annexation and of American principles can better prepare themselves for the crisis. The people of Texas have now the Great part to play. To their alertness, firmness, and patriotism must mainly be trusted the issue of the struggle. Deserted—ought we not to say, betrayed? By their Government; the sport of foreign intrigues carried out on their own soil—likely to be subjected, themselves and their Representatives, to the severest temptations from without, and the most insidious persuasions within—there might well be apprehensions for the result, had we not had so many proofs of the loyalty of the Texians to their native country and their proper appreciation of the advantages and blessings of the Union. With these recollections before us, however, we have not fears that as far as the Texian people are concerned they will perform their part of the work of annexation, over-riding, if need be, all sorts of internal opposition, and in defiance of dictation or temptation from abroad.

"It is not to the people of Texas alone, however, that the extraordinary proceedings that are coming to light in Mexico and Texas, address themselves. The Government of the United States, in view of them, has conspicuous duties to perform. In truth, what are the end and object of this Royal express establishment between Galveston and Vera Cruz, and of the dispatches and couriers which it is errand to convey? - The whole scope of the procedure is to defeat an avowed purpose of the United States. The government of Great Britain, through its agents on this side, has undertaken, by a series of secret communications, operating on the fears, interests, and prejudices of third parties, to forestall and defeat a law of the United States, having reference to no other American concerns. This is not only consistent with comity and good neighborhood; it is ipso facto an act of enmity, and would not be endured by or from any other country. It is not only petty intermeddling; it is grossly insulting to the United States, and calls for an indignant and unequivocal remonstrance. What would be thought and said, were the United States to send emissaries into India to stir up insurrection and discontent, and check the progress of British domination in that quarter of the World? Yet here are emissaries of Britain engaged with every appliance of artifice and cunning, in exciting animosity against this Republic for the declared purpose of defeating a friendly arrangement which it is endeavoring to consummate with a neighboring state, and of supplanting its influence and checking its progress.

"We ventured to express the opinion, some time since, that in a certain contingency, it would become the duty of the United States, (of the President of the United States, In case Congress was not in session) to solve this Texan question, as Mr. Madison solved the question of the Perdido line, namely, by a military occupation of the century. Our neighbor of the Picayune, with some caution and a material qualification, assented to this proposition; and thus mutilated, it has been the subject of considerable animadversion with that class of public prints with consider the quality of submission the only one that the American Government ought to exercise in its foreign intercourse. We think the present a proper occasion to reiterate that proposition, with the full extent and meaning of our former argument. We take this broad ground, that the United States would be derelict to every principle they are bound to maintain: would forfeit their character, dignity and self respect, and subject themselves to perpetual insult and injury, were they to suffer the Annexation of Texas to be defeated, by any means, whatever, through the intervention of an European Power. This option may be easily manifested by reference to examples in our previous history, as well as by the doctrines held by all our early statesmen and politicians, whose names are now held as authority.

The Bulletin here cites the celebrated Raleigh letter of Mr. Clay as justifying the action of our Government, under the present circumstances and relics, for a full explanation of the principles on which its opinion is founded, to Mr. Clay’s eloquent and triumphant speech in defense of Mr. Madison’s seizure of Baton Rouge and Mobile, pending the dispute with the Spanish Government concerning the Western Boundary or Louisiana, and also to Mr. Monroe’s manifesto of 1820, setting forth the rights and duties of this Government as the leading power of the West. On the example of Mr. Madison and on the two State papers and on the two state papers to which we have referred, we hope Mr. Polk will have the courage and decision and firmness of character to take his stand and maintain the position and the rights of the country"
The question has, indeed, assumed a new and deeply interesting phases. But we have no fears of the result. We are convinced that the people of Texas are too brave, honorable, intelligent and American, to yield for one moment to the bribe of its own Executive, acting as the tool of Great Britain. We have yet seen nothing to make us doubt the success of the grand measure of annexation. The Richmond Whig is destined to be disappointed in his hopes of seeing annexation defeated. The whirlwind of popular indignation will sweep off every cloud which the intrigues of President Jones and his British conspirers may have thrown over the fate of Texas. Refined by the ordeal through which they have passed, her citizens will be better prepared to breathe the pure air and enjoy the genial influence, of the American Union.

June 6, 1845, REv42i9p2c5, The Mexican Installments

After we publish in yesterdays paper the paragraph stating that a case had not been made out to authorize the president of the United States, under the appropriation of Congress, to pay the two installments alleged to have been paid by the Mexican Treasury to the agent of the U. Stages, the Northern mail brought us the New York Journal of Commerce, with a letter from its Washington correspondent, of the 31st May. It reads in the following manner:

"A letter was received from a most reliable source in Mexico,(by the Eugenia, I believe;) stating, that the two first installments of the Mexican indemnity have been paid! The writer states that he had acquainted Mr. Walker-the secretary of the Treasury- of the fact. Here then is the tardy confirmation of the statement made in august last by our Envoy, Gov. Shannon, that the installments had been paid by Mexico to the agents of the United States authorized to receive them. Six installments of the indemnity are now due, and not a copper has ever been paid to the claimants. Two installments have been paid by the Mexican Government and embezzled by agents of the United States! This is a most extraordinary state of facts; and our surprise is not lessened by the circumstance that not explanation of the matter has ever been maid to our Government by our Minister, Mr. Shannon , thought he must have been apprized on the calls made by the Senate for information, and of the action of that body, based on the supposition that the money was embezzled, and must, indeed, have been asked for some explanation by the Executive. A gentleman who left New York in the ‘Anahuac’ for Mexico in April last finally obtains the information. Another singular fact in connection with this matter is, that by the 'Somers' which Capt. Conner dispatched with important intelligence for our Government, not a word was received from Gov. Shannon; andletters to inform us that he has communicated nothing to Capt. Conner. This untimely reserve certainly needs some explanation. It is time that this mystery, which has been thickening for twelve months, should be cleared up, at least as far as this Government and its agents are concerned, Is it true that the Government, not satisfied with the contradictory statements of Mr. B. Green and of Gov> Shannon as to the payment of the installments, sent out a special agent to enquire into the matter? If so, what circumstances rendered it expedient or necessary to seek information through sources other than our own Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary?"

We know nothing of the details of the recent transactions-the "special agent"- or why it is that our minister Plenipotentiary did not make the necessary inquiries, although we all know that his intercourse with the government of Mexico has been very much embarrassed, if not entirely interrupted. But this we know, that the main fact upon which the correspondent of the Journal of Commerce relies does not exist. We have sought the necessary information upon that point only, and here is the explicit answer:

We are authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to say, that he has received a letter from a reliable source in Mexico; but it does not contain the intelligence that the money was ever paid to an agent of the Government of the United States.

We further understand that a private letter has just been received, direct, by another distingguished member of our Government from Mexico, which states that our agent in Mexico for the amount of the two installments9and had probably receipted for it,) but that, on presenting the drafts to the treasury, they were not paid-most probably for want of means-[Union][BJM]

June 6, 1845, REv42i9p4c4, Mexican Commissions, Letters of Marque

We learn by a gentleman from Havana, now in this city, that numerous commissions from Mexico have already been issued to persons in Havana, to take effect immediately in the event of war. Our informant states that there are such commissions now in this city, and that one of them has been offered to one of our citizens.[BJM]

June 10, 1845, REv42i10p1c5, Texas

We have received the Galveston News, of the 24th May. It states the excitement at Galveston to be intense, on the receipt of the news that President Jones, with the aid of Elliot, had made a treaty with Mexico, for the independence of Texas, if she should decline annexation. The rumors were not, however, considered perfectly authentic; the News considers annexation certain, in spite of every obstacle. It gives the following information:
The U.S. Squadron—We learn that Com Stockton will shortly leave Galveston, for the purpose of cruising to the Southward, with the view probably of communicating with the balance of the Gulf Fleet off Vera Cruz. A rumor of the approach of a British squadron, has been in circulation, though too vague and indefinite to merit much attention. Another report, without any very reliable authority, has represented that the Mexicans are concentrating their forces upon the Rio Grande. The instructions of Commodore Stockton are undoubtedly to guard the whole coast of Texas and to report whatever hostile movements may be in operation. He is expected to return in a few days, and will probably make Galveston his headquarters for the balance of the year. [BJM]

June 10, 1845, REV42i10p1c5, The Mexican Installments

Great mystery seems to hang over the question whether these installments have or have not been received from Mexico by the United States agent. The last Washington Union gives the following version, which seems to us to present the probable state of the question:

"We have been favored with the following statement from a gentleman who has derived it, as he thinks from the best authority:

"Mr. Voss received from Trigueros, Minister of the Treasury, drafts upon the treasuries of different interior departments- to wit: Guadalajara, Guanajuato, and Zacatecas. These drafts he placed in the hands of Jaylem, Jamison & Co., one of the firmest English Commercial houses in Mexico, requesting that they should be sent on for collection. They were sent on, and accepted conditionally, to be paid as soon as there should be any money collected, and coming into those treasuries, wherewith to pay them. It was expected that the four millions of dollars levied for the Texas war would be collected and that these drafts would be paid therefrom. But the revolution put a stop to the collection of all taxes, and the drafts are still unpaid." [BJM]

June 10, 1845, REV42i10p2c2, News from the South

The following extracts confirm the accounts of British Intrigues in Texan affairs, and give us a glimpse of the terms of the bargain. It moreover seems, that the Texan or English commissioner, "the man with the white hat," was to be conveyed in a French brig of war. We do not like this sign. It does not look much like the 'neutrality' promised by the courier des Etas Unis.

Regarding the treaty between Texas and Mexico, the Mexican Government finds itself in a dilemma which precipitate action might render dangerous. They have raised a war spirit, which they discover they cannot quell, and which even to conciliate appears to be hazardous. Notwithstanding the large majority, which the treaty, or the authority to treat, obtained in the Mexican Congress, having passed the Chamber by a vote of 43 to 13, and the Senate by 30 to 6, the measure is exceedingly unpopular with the people.

No attempts are made in Mexico to disguise the deep and active interest: which Great Britian takes in every thing calculated to prevent the effectuation of the annexation measure. It is said that to accomplish her ends she offers to pay the debts of Texas, and to assume for Mexico ten millions of her English Bonds guaranteeing independence to the one, and security from the inroads of the United States to the other.

Captain Elliot and the officers of the trig ate who came up, are stopping at the St. Charles hotel.

The Texas or English Commissioner, "whose name is never heard" was to leave Vera Cruz on the 23rd inst for Galveston in the French brig of war Penur. Governor Shannon arrived a few days previous to the sailings of the Euridice at Vera Cruz and would leave in a short time for the United States. Business in Vera Cruz is very dull. This is attributed almost wholly to the prohibitory tariff regulations now in force. It is confidently asserted that Congress will adopt a new tariff before it adjourns. The necessities of the Government will require an alteration which will encourage trade and bring more money to the treasury.[BJM]

June 10, 1845, REv42i10p2c2, Texas

The steamship McKim arrived yesterday morning from Galveston, We have it intelligence from that place to the 28th ultimo.

Nothing of any material importance has transpired since our last accounts from Texas.

The United States squadron had left Galveston the 27th on a cruise; The St. Mary had been dispatched to Vera Cruz by Commodore Stockton. (Illegible) It was rumored that Commodore Stockton would look in at corpus Christi, Brazzos Santiago, and other places.

The citizens of Galveston had behaved in the most hospitable manner- feting and entertaining the officers of the squadron- and intend on their return, to give them a special ball. The beautiful and accomplished ladies of Galveston appear to have been extraordinarily kind in those attentions, which none but the refined of the fair sex know how to bestow; the officers speak of them in raptures.

By this arrival, our friend Kendall, of the Picayune, came passenger, together with the party, which left here sometime since, on a hunt. The Picayune of yesterday says they found plenty of buffalo, deer and antelope, on the small streams between the San Gabriel and Little River, and were highly successful. We are glad to find Mr. Kendall looking so well, and apparently recovering from his late illness, that hat will be quite the rage.

President Jones seems to have been successful in calling a Convention of the people on the subject of annexation. His recommendation meets with general fervor. There is no longer cause for any fear about the Lone Star being added to our bright galaxy, for the feeling in favor of annexation gains daily strength throughout that Republic.

The McKim brought dispatches form Com. Stockton to the secretary of the Navy, which are now on their way to Washington.

The Houston Star of the 24th inst., seems to have received intelligence which, if well founded, seems to be of much importance. We extract from that paper the following.

"Within a few days we have received intelligence from a respectable source that these troops have approached the Rio Grande, and that it is now currently reported in Mexico that they are to be stationed East of the river. It is said that the Mexican Government is determined to take possession of the corridor west of the Nueces, and when the measure of annexation is consummated, she will appeal to the world and declare that as the territory West of the Nueces is in possession of of her troops, the claim of Texas to it is void. Information has recently been received at Corpus Christi that indicates that Mexico is playing a deep scheme of treachery. We are happy to state here, that arrangements have been made to obtain accurate information of the movements of the Mexican forces, and it is believed that our Government will be prepared to repel any incursion of Mexican troops into the disputed territory."[BJM]

June 13, 1845, REv42i11p2c5, The Navy Court Martial

After the Court met, the examination of the Rev. Mr. Jackson, the chaplain of the frigate was concluded. His testimony chiefly related to a conversation between the commander of the Argentine squadron, Commodore Filton, and Captain Voorhees, on board of the Congress, in which the latter disclaimed all knowledge of, or connection with, the conduct of the San Cala, which did not belong to his squadron; and stated that the difficulty might have been prevented if Capt. Voorhees, instead of attacking him, had requested an explanation.

Soon afterwards, Capt. Voorhees released the Argentine Officers, and ordered Commodore Filton to resume his command, which he refused to do, and retired to his vessel under a protest.

Mr. Black, the boatswain, and Mr. City, the gunner of the congress, were next examined, but did not give any material additional testimony.

Midshipman McCorkle was also examined- He proved an order from Capt. Voorhees, which he carried to the prize master on board each of the Argentine Vessels, to release all the Montevideo prisoners and prizes which might be found in their custody. He was, himself, the prize-master of the San Cala, and one of the officers who captured her. His testimony was mainly in corroboration of that Lieut. Porter. It appeared that neither of the witnesses nor any one on board the Congress, saw the alleged firing of the San Cala upon the American bark Rosalva.
A series of documents were also presented as testimony by the judge advocate, being a correspondence between the United States Consul, Capt. Voorhees, and General Oribe, tending to prove that Captain Voorhees knew and admitted the right of General Oribe to use the Montevidean flag; for wearing which by the San Cala, under authority from General Oribe he had pronounced her a pirate. The counsel for Captain Voorhees objected to the admission of this documentary testimony, but they were received by the court after argument. The judge advocate offered in evidence as the confessions and admissions of the accused, his official report of the transactions of the 29th of September, made on that day and sent to Commodore Turner, and by him to this Government; but on objection the court rejected the same, After which they adjourned.[BJM]

June 13, 1845, REv42i11p4c1, Political, Annexation of Texas

Hon. J. C. Calhoun

Dear Sir: At a Democratic meeting held in this city on the 14th instant, the undersigned were appointed a Committee “to express the cordial approbation of the meeting of your public conduct, their gratitude for your services, and to offer to you on the part of the meeting such other manifestation of their respect and esteem as we might think proper”

In carrying out the purpose of this resolution, we beg leave to assure you of the high sense felt by your Democratic fellow-citizens of this place of your distinguished public services. And especially of the wisdom, firmness and patriotism that marked your conduct as Secretary of State, under the late administration.

Grateful as this duty is to us, we fear that we can but lamely express the admiration left for those talkers that have lifted you so high in the world’s regard, and the devotion of which to the public interests has tender so much to a right understanding of our peculiar form of Government and reflected such lasting glory upon the Country.

It is to your public efforts that your fellow citizens are mainly indebted for a true exposition of the relative powers and duties of the State and Federal Governments.

From you they have learned the Great truth, that the harmony of all can only be preserved by each one’s confining its action within the allotted sphere, and that the rights of the people and the States can only be properly secured by carefully guarding against the centralizing tendency of our Federative System. It was made especially our duty to thank you for the manner in which as Secretary of State, you conducted the negotiations for the re-annexation of Texas. You were chiefly instrumental in effecting the settlement of that great question, upon which national prosperity and the security of the South so much depend. In your official papers is to be found a noble vindication of the character and rights of the Southern people; and our gratitude is due to you for the rescue of that rich section of your continent from fanatical influence and European domination. And now, when every indication promises the addition of Texas to our family of states, thus affording security to the Southern seaboard, and opening a wider field for the March of Republican institutions, permit us to assure you of our grateful sense of your agency in effecting this great result.

Many very many, of your fellow-citizens in this quarter of the Union, earnestly desire to see and hear you and shake you by the hand; and for them we would press you to gratify their wishes.

As an evidence of their approbation of your public and private life, we are instructed to tender you a Public dinner, to be given in this place at such time as you may designate.

We have understood that it is your intention ere long, to visit this State, and we trust that you will extend your journey to Mobile, and afford us an opportunity of manifesting the sincere regard in which you are held by

Your friends and fellow citizens,
PERCY WALKER, THOS, HOL ANS. THOS MCGRAN, JA CAMPBELL, WR HALLET. Committee.

Fort Hill, 15th May, 1845. Gentlemen:- From some delay in the mail, I did not receive, until a few days since, your letter of the 21st April, informing me that at a Democratic meeting held in the city of Mobile on the 11th of the same month, you were appointed a committee to express the copilot approbation of the meeting of my public conduct, their gratitude for my services, and to other, on the part of the meeting, such other manifestations of their respect and esteem as you might think proper.

I will not attempt to express the deep gratitude I feel for the warm approbation of my public conduct and services expressed by the meeting in their resolutions, and the very acceptable manner in which you have performed the duty entrusted to you.

In performing it, you have alluded with particular approbation to my conduct and services in reference to State Rights, and during the period I filled, for a shirt time, the State Department under the late administration.
To no part of my public life do I look back with greater pleasure, than the devoted to expounding and maintaining the relations between the Federal and State Governments, on which the doctrine of State Rights depends and it is a great conclusion for me to think it has not been in vain.

The Federal Government, regarded in its federative character, in which the State, and not individuals, are its continuants, is the most remarkable ever formed; and promises, if carried out honestly and tacitly as such, a higher degree of prosperity and happiness, than has ever fallen to the lot of any people. On the other hand, regarded as a National Government, in which individuals and not States are the constituents, it has nothing novel or remarkable about it, Instead of a great Federal Republic, as it is, it would be in that character a huge unwieldy Democracy, destined to be torn into fragments by hostile and conflicting interest, and to terminate in convulsions. Such being my coniveiorn, I felt it to be my duty to maintain the Federal character fo the Government against the national or consol dative, at any sacrifice and hazard, and shall continue to do so long as it shall please the author of my being to spare my life.

The services I rendered during the period I filled the State Department, were performed under great difficulties and embarrassments. Nothing indeed, but the magnitude of the questions involved in the negotiations in reference to Texas and Oregon, with the difficulties and embarrassments encircling them, and the unanimous call of the country to take charge of the negotiations, could have induced me to leave my retirement and return to public life, Besides those that were intrinsic, there were many that were of an extraneous character.

Among others, the administration was literally without a party in Congress, and very freely supported by the people; and the presidential question was pending, which experience had taught me overruled in a great measure all others.

The negotiation in reference to Texas first claimed my attention, because it was the most depressing and could not be delayed without haard, In order to avoid the difficultes and embarrassments which I apprehended from the Presedential election. I resolved to keep entirely form the party politics fo the day, and especially from questions relating to the election, and to use my effort to induce the candidates not to commit themselves against annexation. I had little apprehension that Mr. Van Buren would, as a great majority of his friens, with General Jackson at their bead, had declared for it. The Position of Mr. Clay was different, The masses of his friends in the North opposed it, which I learned would sway him, In order to prevent it it possible, I saw some of his most prominent friends with whom I was on friendly terms and used every argument I could with them, to exert their influence to prevent him from coming out against it.

It was all in vain. His letter in opposition soon after appeared, and Mr. Van Buren’s followed shortly after, most unexpectedly to me.

Their effort was great. Mr. Clays friends were rallied against it almost to a man, although the great body of them in the West and South, were strongly disposed to support, and not a few of the prominent, openly committed in its favor.

It was different with Mr. Van Buren’s. the great body of his supporters remained frim in its support; but an active, influential and not an inconsiderable number adhered to his course, Indeed, the stand tken by the selected candidates of the two great prties, with the influence of the presidential question and the feebleness of the Administration in Congress and the country, seemed, for a time, to reneder the prospect of success almost hopeless.

To these causes of opposition, there must be taken into consideration another, to realize the difficulties and embarrassments that stood in the way of the success of the measure, I allude to Abolition, IT may, indeed be truly regarded as the main spring which put the others in motion.

The Abolition party in the North and West had taken an early and decided stand against it, and had gone so far as to adopt measures to influence the party in Great Britain, and through them, the British government to oppose it as the most effectual means of abolishing slavery in Texas as the most certain means of doing so in the United States and that of doing it throughout the continent. To consummate this grand well laid scheme, it was indispensable that Texas should be prevented from being annexed to our Union while the only possible way to defeat it and prevent the mighty consequences which would flow from it, was the annexation of Texas.

The course of the British Government at an early stage of the negotiation, made it manifest that it had warmly and fully embraced the scheme, the declaration made by its Minister at Washington to our Government before it had fairly commenced (a copy of which was left at the Department of State after I had entered on its duties) left not a doubt on that point. It indeed as well as avowed it by declaring that Great Britain desired to see slavery abolished in Texas and throughout the world, and that she was using constant efforts to effect it, and by inference, that she was using her influence and diplomacy with Mexico to agree to recognize the independence of Texas, on condition that she should abolish slavery.
I saw in this declaration, thus formally made to our Government, a confirmation of what I believed to be her scheme of policy in connection with Texas, from other but less conclusive evidence in my possession. I also saw clearly, that whether it would succeed or not, depended on the fact whether Texas should or should not be annexed; and that, if succeeded, its inevitable consequences would be the final consummation of her great and deep design, to be followed by the desolation of the South, the prostration of the commerce and prosperity of the continent, with a monopoly on her part: of the great tropical products of sugar, coffee, rice, tobacco and cotton, which are almost exclusively as far as this continent is concerned, the result of slave labor.

Seeing all this, the question presented to me was, how shall the declaration of the British Government be met? Shall it be silently passed over, leaving annexation to be urged on other and different grounds, or shall it be directly and boldly met and exposed?

It is not in my nature to hesitate between such alternatives. My conviction is deep, that truth, honesty and plain dealing is the true policy on all occasions in the management of public affairs. Including diplomatic and I resolved, without hesitation to take them as my guides on this memorable occasion. The defeat of this deep-laid scheme. The success of annexation. As man now be almost certainly said, the vindication of the great institution on which our safety depends and the rescue of the commerce of the continent from the grasp of commercial monopoly, have been the result, and, I may add, as far as I am individually concerned, your approbation, that of the meeting you represent, and , if I may judge from indications, nearly of the whole country now of my course.

But at the time the approbation was not so unanimous, denunciation then, loud and deep, fell on my head.

I was charged with introducing a new local subject of little importance into the Texan Issue, where the base design of injuring the prospect of one of the Presidential candidates, and of dissolving the Union! And many, who did not go so far, even southern men whose all was at stake, thought that I acted injudiciously in introducing the slave question, and giving it such prominence; that it was calculated to have a bad party effect and to drive off some of the party who were not sound on the subject of Abolitionists. But I bass them by without remark or comment now, when time and experience and the approbation of the country sanction the wisdom of the course I adopted.

The absorbing character of the negotiation in reference to Texas, did not so engross my attention as to neglect that of Oregon. As soon as the former was sufficiently dispatched, and the business of the department brought up, I entered on that. I left it in an unfinished state; and as it is still pending, I am not at liberty to speak of the course I took in reference to it; but I trust, when it comes to be made public, it will not be less successful in meeting your approbation and that of the country generally, It is a subject not without great difficulties, and I feel assured I shall be conducted by those to whose hands it is entrusted to finish the negotiation, as to bring it to a successful and satisfactory termination, and thus to avoid an appeal to arms. Neither country can possibly gain any thing by such an appeal, or can possibly desire it if it can be honorably avoided.

In conclusion, I assure you, and through you those you represent, that it would afford me great pereaure to partake of the public dinner you have tendered me in their name and of forming the personal aquaintence of my numerous friends in your city; but it is not now in my power. It is probable, however that I shall be happy to meet you and all of my friends.

With great respect, yours truly

J.C. CALHOUN

June 17, 1845, REv42i12p1c5, Another Act in the Drama

Were it not for the deeply interesting consequences of the present crisis in Texas upon the welfare of our own country and the cause of liberal institutions everywhere, we might well laugh over the ludicrous farce enacted by some of the leading politicians of Texas. President Jones has proved himself to be the veriest proteus that we have ever read of. He almost comes up to his great original. His deeds have been immortalized by Homer. When men Claus seized this Sea God, and held him till he disclosed means of relief from the distress of himself and his suffering crew, Protenus turned himself into a lion; a serpent; a leopard, a boar, water and a tree. At length finding he could not escape he resumed his own form and revealed to Menelaus the remedy for his distress. So with President Jones, It is in vain for him to assume so many changing shapes—at one time in favor of annexation, and then leagued with Mexico and Great Britain against the solemn action of the United States. He will finally be compelled to return to his natural form, and yield to the clamorous demands of the people of Texas for a relief from Mexican oppression and British intrigue, in the arms of the American Union.

This Dr. Jones, who is from Massachusetts we believe, is full of mystery. We cannot, for the life of us unravel the motives of his contact. The last accounts from Texas, which will be found below, now represent him as a warm friend or annexation, and as having never made proposals to Mexico, to obtain an acknowledgement of her independence. This, sustained as it apparently was by the evidence of the American Naval officers, and by a number of corroborating circumstances is not semi officially denied by the Houston Telegraph, the organ or President Jones, That paper says "We have been assured by Colonel Allen, our secretary of State, That President Jones has made no proposals to Mexico, and authorized no agent to proceed to Mexico with proposals.” The same paper alleges, that there was “fraud” at the bottom of the affair; that the great seal of Texas had been forged, for the purpose of imposing upon the Mexican Government—By whom was this forgery committed. All seem to admit that Captain Elliott has had a finger in the business and has succeeded in consummation a treaty on the part or Mexico, a participation in which has been ascribed to president Jones. Moreover, there is no doubt that Captain Elliott arrived at Galveston on the 30th from Vera Cruz in a French vessel of War, ans set out for the seat of Government immediately—and the papers state that he was the bearer of propositions from Mexico, acknowledging Texan Independence. If, then, the great seal of Texas has been forged, and Mexico thereby induced to agree to a treaty, upon whom must the guilt lie? Can it be possible that the accredited agent of the great British Government, the pink of honor, good faith, and glorious ambition, has stooped to so criminal a proceeding, as to counterfeit the seal of a nation, in order to cheat the people of that nation out of their dearest rights or else involve themselves and their allies in a fierce war? These things are all strange mysterious incomprehensible. They furnish texts for a thousand versions of the conduct of President Jones, the British Agents. An air of romance is thrown over the whole proceeding. The Gordian knot will remain unraveled, until the Congress of Texas, representing as we doubt not, the wishes of the people, shall assemble on the 16th instant, today, and looking to but one leading object, annexation to our Union solve all difficulties by a decisive blow.

But strange as may be the conduct of President Jones, his organ plainly asserts, that he is now friendly to annexation, and intends, we presume, to throw no impediments in the way of the people of Texas. At all events, he must be now convinced that in affairs of the mighty importance which it has been his lot to conduct, a frank straight forward honest course is always the best. A man placed in his responsible position ought to deal frankly with his own people and with foreign nations. His vacillating shuffling movements have lost him the respect of fellow citizens, have weakened the moral force of Texas in the rank of Nations, and have cast a shadow over the destinies of the Republic. And there we would remark that we cannot concur in the “coquettish” policy of General Sam Houston. He may have a thorough knowledge of the workings of human passions, and his fame may be the true one in an Affair of the heart but we are sure that he has misapplied it in his attempt to get the advantaged of as cunning of a diplomat as Great Britain, represented as she was by Elliott, the man of China and Opium noriety. In his maneuver to excite the jealously of the United States and by that means to induce her to warmer acknowledgement of the suit of Texas, we fear that Gen H has stimulated the hopes of Great Britain, and caused her to involve herself so deeply in the game of advance and ambition, that she cannot, without losing her own self respect and sinking her honor, avoid giving some trouble to Texas as well as to ourselves. Our sincere impression is, that the unfortunate steps or Gen Houston, taken in connection with his leaving the country at this critical movement, though it were for the noble purpose of taking a final leave of his old companion in arms at the Hermitage, will not gain him much favor, either from the people of Texas or the United States. One thing seems to be certain—Texas will agree to annexation. But strange as may be the conduct of President Jones, the British Agents. An air of romance is thrown over the whole proceeding. The Gordian knot will remain unraveled, until the Congress of Texas, representing as we doubt not, the wishes of the people, shall assemble on the 16th instant, today, and looking to but one leading object, annexation to our Union solve all difficulties by a decisive blow.

The Events in Texas and Mexico furnish a picture full of strange features and most extraordinary combinations of light and shade, Our readers will compare the interesting news below with what we have already furnished them, and will have a find opportunity or exerting their faculties, in giving form to the chaotic elements:[BJM]

June 17, 1845, REv42i12p1c6, Six Days Later From Texas

By the steamship New York, Captain Wright, which arrived yesterday afternoon, we have received dates from Galveston to the 3d inst. The New York had a pleasant passage, and brought over 25 passengers.

Mr. Henderson, U.S. Consul at Galveston, and Judge Baldwin, of New York were among the passengers.

Soon after the arrival of the New York, a letter from a source entitled to the most unlimited confidence was placed at our disposal. From it we make the following extract:

"Look out for war with Mexico—Since Elliott’s arrival from Vera Cruz this is all the talk. IT is said , too, that Mexico is congregating a large force at the Rio Grande, which is to move against Texas if she rejects Elliot’s treaty. I believe war will be the effect of the steps recently taken by the British Government.

"Elliott has a set of proposals for the independence of Texas if she rejects annexation. These proposals will be rejected. Of course the initiation of war is thrown back upon Mexico: but in my judgment, Elliott will contrive to send secret intelligence to the Mexicans on the Rio Grande, and that they will not wait for new orders from the Mexican Capital.”

The U.S. Squadron under command of Com. Stockton, were lying off Galveston when the New York Left. No British Ships of war were in sight.
Captain Elliott the British Charge D’Affairs had arrived in Galveston with a treaty from Mexico, acknowledging the independence of Texas and set out for the seat of government immediately. The Galveston News on this subject says: The purpose of the treaty according to Elliott’s Statement to a friend or ours, is simply the recognition of our independence, without regard to limits, upon the condition that we renounce annexation to the United States, leaving us at liberty to be annexed to England or any government and comments very strongly against the meddling of this officious minister.

On the other hand the ethical organ denies that President Jones has sent or authorized my permission to go to Mexico and treat for the independence of Texas, and affirms that he is favorable to the measure of annexation.

This is News attacks in the following manner:

“The Telegraph has for several weeks past been endeavoring to convince the public that President Jones is a sincere and ardent friend of annexation. We have been accustomed to judge of public men by their acts, rather than their professions. Nothing would afford us more pleasure than to be able to concur in the opinion with the Telegraph. But this inference of Dr. Jones friendly disposition towards annexation is certainly not drawn from any statement of existing facts, but directly in the face of them. The Telegraph makes this announcement, as it were, ex cathedra, and officially. We have heard it suggested that the Telegraph has superseded the Register, and is in the confidence of the President. If this be the case, it would be rash to contradict its statements and disclosures. In relation to these strange proceedings, the Telegraph says: We have been assured that President Jones has made no proposals to Mexico and authorized no messenger to proceed to Mexico with proposals, and then suggests that all these negotiations have originated in fraud, and a forgery of the great seat of the Republic. This, to say the least of it, is a most extraordinary mode of explanation, and challenges no small share of credulity especially as at this moment Captain Elliott is in Washington, and probably again in secret conclave with the President. How they will accommodate matters, it passes the powers of conjecture to imagine. Can they succeed in making some irresponsible third party the scapegoat of all those impostumes? We can find no trace of him here. Has the Englishman this Mr. Smith, this man in the with hat, shuffled himself off, and kindly relieved all other parties from responsibility?”

In other respects we find but little of interest. Every preparation throughout the Republic was making to push the election for delegates to the Convention on with vigor and from all appearance any proposition, save that of re annexation of Texas to the United States would be rejected with scorn and indignation by the people who are unanimous upon that subject.

Major Donelson, and General M. B. Lamar arrived in Galveston on the 25th ult.

A shark attacked Mr. Wells, the well-known dancer, on Saturday last, while bathing in the gulf. His side was cut, much bruised, and two ribs broken. At last accounts he was getting better.

The Picayune of June 7th mentions the receipt of verbal news to the effect that the Mexicans are really concentrating a large force on the Rio Grande. Preparatory to war, should Texas agree to annexation? The information is further the feeling in Texas is thoroughly warlike all are eager for a brush with Mexico, and moreover the propositions of England and Mexico will promptly be rejected.

Many think, says the Picayune, that the movement of the Mexicans towards the Rio Grande is instigated by England, but let who will be at the bottom of it, our government ought at once to march an efficient force to the frontiers of Texas.

June 20, 1845, REv42i13p1c6, A Diary about General Jackson

My Dear Sir: Aware of your desire to know the condition of the patriot of the Hermitage in the closing scenes of his life, I write down from day to day, during the short visit I make him what occurs of interest.

On my arrival, I found ex president Jackson more comfortable than he had been, although his disease is not abated, and his long and useful life is rapidly drawing to a close. He has not been in a condition to lie down during the last four months. His feet and legs, his hands and arms are very much swollen with dropsy, which has invaded his whole system. Bandages are drawn tight around the parts most affected to prevent, as much as possible, the increase of the water, He has scarcely any use of his hands. The bandages are removed several times in the 24 hours and the parts rubbed severely to restore animation and the circulation of the blood. He has no sleep except by opiates. His left ling was ruptured many years ago during the Seminole campaign In Florida, and is entirely destroyed, and the other much diseased. When the dropsy commenced, the couch was extremely severe, and expectoration profuse. The symptoms, which had continued for years, now gradually gave way and almost entirely ceased. This was followed by a loss of appetite and constant nausea and prostration. This change took place early in April and about the first of May a diarrhea commenced which seemed to threaten an immediate dissolution. This continued for a few days with great suffering but fortunately reduced the swelling of the whole system. The abatement of the diarrhea was succeeded by the swelling in all parts, with violent pain and extreme difficulty breathing, when nature would again relive itself as above described.
Thursday, May 29—Gen Jackson is rather more comfortable having obtained sleep from opiates. This day he sat a while to Mr. Healy who had been sent by Louis Phillip to paint his portrait. Mr. Healy told me that it was the Design of the King of the French to lace his portrait by the side of that of Washington, which it already hangs in its gallery. The most celebrated and interesting historical gallery in the world, and to surround them with the pictures of the most eminents of American generals and statesmen. Mr. Healy is commissioned by the king to paint the portraits of some twelve of the most distinguished revolutionaries patrons, to surround those of Washington and Jackson, the greatest and best men our country has ever produced. Also some of the most prominent living politicians of the day, Messrs. John Quincy Adams and Henry Clay were named by Mr. Healy to me. Mr. Healy was enabled to make much progress in his work to day, and, as usual the General received visitors, more than thirty, All were admitted from the humblest to the most renowned to take the vererall chieftain by the hand and bid him farewell. Among the visitors was General Jessup, an old friend and companion in arms. The meeting of these most faithful and gallant soldiers and servants of the republic was deeply interesting and affecting. A reverend gentleman called to inquire in regard to General's Health, his faith and future hope. The General said: "Sir I am in the hands of a merciful God. I have full confidence in his goodness and mercy. My lamp of life is nearly out, and the last glimmer has come. I am ready to depart, when called. The Bible is true. The principles and statutes of that holy book, have been the rule of my life, and I have tried to conform to its spirit as near as possible. Upon that sacred volume I rest my hope for eternal salvation, through the merits and our blesses Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." Nothing further was said upon the subject.

Friday May 29. The General passed a bad night, no sleep, extremely feeble this morning.

Mr. Healy, with considerable exertions on the part of the General, was enabled to finish the portrait on which he labored with great care. It was presented to the General. After examining it for some time he remarked to Mr. Healy, "I am satisfied, Sir, that you stand at the head of your profession; if I may be allowed to judge of my own likeness, I can safely concur in the opinion of my family; this is the best that has been taken. I feel very much obliged to you, Sir, for the great labor and care you have been pleased to bestow upon it." The family was all highly gratified with its faithfulness. I consider it the most perfect representation I have ever seen, giving rather the remains of the heroic personage, than the full life that made him the most extraordinary combination of spirit and energy, with a slender form, the world ever saw.

At 9 o’clock, as is the custom, all the generals family—except the few who take their turn to watch by his side—took their leave of him. Each of the family approached him, received his blessing, bid him farewell, hissed him as it would seem an eternal good night, for he would say, my work is done for life. After his family retires, it is touching to witness this heroic man who has faced every danger with a unyielding front, offer up his prayers for those whom Providence has committed to his care, that Heaven would protect and prosper them when he is no more, praying still more fervently to God for the preservation of his country, of the Union, and the people of the United States, from all foreign influence and invasion, tendering his forgiveness to his enemies, and his gratitude to God for his support and success through a ling life, and for the hope of eternal salvation through the merits of our blessed redeemer.

The General exerts himself to discharge every duty, and with all his anxious care that is possible, but his debility, and the unremitting anguish he suffers, has almost extinguished every power except that of his intellect. Occasionally his distress produces spasmodic affections, yet in the midst of the worst Paradoxes of pain, not a murmur, not even a groan escapes from his lips. Great and Just in life, calm and resigned to death.

Saturday, May 30. The General passes a distressed night, no sleep extreme debility this morning, attended with increased swelling of the abdomen, and all his limbs and difficulty of breathing. He said "I hope God grant patience to submit to his holy will; He does all things well and blessed be his holy and merciful name." His bible is always near him; if he is in his chair, it is on the table by his side, when propped up in that bed, that sacred volume is laid by him and he often reads it. He has no power, and is lifted in and out of his sitting posture in bed to the same posture. The General exerts himself to discharge every duty, and with all his anxious care that is possible, but his debility, and the unremitting anguish he suffers, has almost extinguished every power except that of his intellect. Occasionally his distress produces spasmodic affections, yet in the midst of the worst Paradoxes of pain, not a murmur, not even a groan escapes from his lips. Great and Just in life, calm and resigned to death.

June 1, "this Day" the general said "Is the holy Sabbath ordained by god and set apart to be devoted to his worship and praise, I always attended church service at church when I could but now I can go no more. He desired his family to go and charged them to continue to educate the poor at Sunday school. This new system of instruction he said with blended the duties of a religion with those of humanity, he considered of vast importance, and spoke with an emphasis which showed his anxiety to impress this upon his family. Mrs. Jackson and her sister Mrs. Adams regularly attend to their instruction on the Sabbath. A part fo the family went to church, The General looked out of the window, and said, "this is apparently the last Sabbath I shall be with you. God will be done, He is kind and merciful” The Generals look is often fixed with peculiar attention to his granddaughter Rachel, named after his wife so beloved and whose memory he has so tenderly cherished, The young Rachel has all the lovely and admirable characteristics for which the elder Mr. Jackson was so remarkable.

Monday June 2- The General passed a bad night. No sleep. An evident increase of water on the chest. He read many letters as usual some of them were from persons of whom he had no knowledge, asking for autographs and making other requests. The letters were opened by some of the family, Mrs. Jackson or Mrs. Adams were almost constantly with him He looked over them, those of importance were opened and read. Among them was one from Major Donnellson, Charge de Affairs to Texas gising an account of the almost incredible proceedings of the British agent, Elliott, to prevent the annexation of Texas to the United States. The General said "we have made a disgraceful sacrifice of our territory, an important portion of our country was given away to England without a shadow of title on the part of the claimants has been shown by the admission of the English Ministers on referring in Parliament, to the Kings map, on which the true boundaries were depicted and of tic they were appraised when urging their demands.
Right on the side of the American People, and firmness in maintaining it” he continued “ with trust in God, alone, will secure to them the integrity of the possessions on which the British Government would now deprive them. I am satisfied that they will assert and vindicate, what justice awards them and that no part of our territory or country will ever be submitted to any arbitration of the cannons mouth

He felt grateful to a merciful Providence, that had always sustained him through all his struggles, and in the defiance of the continued independence and prosperity of his beloved country, and that he could now give up his stewardship, and resign his breath to God, who gave it with the cheering reflection, that the country was now settled down upon a firm Democratic basis that the rights of the laboring classes were represented and protected (for he adds it is from them that the country derives all its prosperity and greatness) and for them we must ever look to defend our soil when invaded. “ They have never refused, no sir, and and never will. Give them an honest government, freedom from monopolies and privileged classes and hard money, not paper currency for their hard labor and all will be well.

At 2 o’clock P.M. his distress became suddenly very great, and the water, increasing to an alarming extent. An express was sent to Nashville, twelve miles for surgical aid. An operation was performed by Dr. Easley with success, much water was taken from his abdomen, which produced great relief, although extreme prostration.

Tuesday, June 3rd—Much distress through the night. Opiates were freely administered but sleep appeared to have passed him. Calm and perfectly resigned to the will of his Redeemer, He prayed to God to sustain him in his hour of dissolution.

At 10 am, Mrs. Robinson and Walters arrived from Nashville. Dr Esleman having remained with the General throughout the night, a consultation was held and all that was done was approved, and all that could be done was to conform to the Generals temporary wants.

At 1 pm, I left his house for home. He expressed great solicitude in my behalf but I was silent, the scene was too affecting, and I left this aged soldier, statesman, and Christian Patriot with all the pious and hospitable inmates of the Hermitage, without the power of saying farewell.

Yours Truly, WILLIAM TYACK

June 20, 1845, REv42i13p1c7, Texas

“Jones now is determined to reject the Mexican treaty as soon as presented by Elliott; and in advance, the government organ of Texas denies that President Jones ever authorized any person to negotiate on the part of Texas with Mexico. If Elliott, ex parte, had negotiated this treaty, he has placed his government in a most incredulous position, and so clearly in the wrong in the eyes of the World, that he has disgraced himself as a negotiator and tarnished the honor of Great Britain”

June 27, 1845, REv42i15p1c , From Mexico, Santa Anna

By the arrival yesterday of the fast sailing packet brig Titi, Captain Brown from Havana, we have dates from that city up to the 11th inst. Fro files of papers, in addition to those received at this office, we are indebted to a commercial house of this city.

A correspondent of the Havana Diario do la Marina, writing from the city of Mexico under date of the 27th of May, says. “With Reference to letters written from Perote, it is said that Santa Anna was well pleased on receiving the passport granting him permission to leave the Republic. Canalizo, on the contrary, is said to have remarked, when he was informed that the amnesty was proclaimed, and that he could leave the country “that he would prefer death at home to starvation among strangers.”

In Regard to Texas, the same correspondent has the following. We translate from Dariode la Marina:

“It is said that the propositions which have been made, in relation to Texas, to the Mexican Senate, are the following:

“Recognition or independence.

An Indemnification of $20 000 000- $5000000 to be paid at once and 15 000 000 to be paid at some other time.

The settlement of boundaries.

The agreement of Texas not to annex to the United States, to be guarantied by France and England.
"I am not sure that this is all true, but it is certain that persons well informed, who converse daily with the president and members of the Cabinet, assure us that we shall have no war. I believe we shall not; and what renders it more certain, is the fact, that, up to this time, we have seen no preparations made for offensive operations.

"If these happened to be the real facts in regard to the propositions of annexation made in Mexico- our private advices, however, lead us to discredit altogether the stipulation about the $20,000,000 as well as to doubt the appearance of the guaranty of England and France upon the face of the treaty—the proceedings of Captain Elliott and the man with the white hat, are of a piece with the other exploits of the great and little functionaries that have figured in this business. This indemnification of twenty millions will make our Texan friends open their eyes—even though it be understood that credit is do be given on fifteen million of it to the day of judgment. It is thought by some of our Texan friends that the "man in the white hat" was hired by Elliott to mystify the Mexican People, whilst he conducted the negotiations alone, Full powers were given to Elliott to negotiate and the "white hat" was paraded through the streets of Vera Cruz and Mexico for effect, and palmed off upon the public as a Texan agent. Be this as it may. Elliott was agent enough and has powers sufficiently ample and the production of a phantom Texas agent was in character with his deception in telling everybody in Texas that he was going to Charleston for his family, when in fact he was on the eve of embarking for the city of Vera Cruz in the double character of British Diplomat and Texan intriguer. We know divers amusing incidents in the career of Queen Victoria's Ambassador to Texas. When the matter is ended they shall be forthcoming, but as we do not feel mirthful enough to relate them. [BJM]

June 27, 1845, REv42i15p4c6, Very Late From Mexico

The barque Anahuac, Capt. Wilson, arrived at New York on Saturday morning in twenty-two days from Vera Cruz. Gov. Shannon, our late minister to Mexico, came passenger, Capt. Wilson, with Mr. Shannon and his passengers and letter bag, came up, says the Express, in the eight o'clock boat from quarantine. The political condition of things was very unsettled. It was the general belief that there would soon be another revolution in Mexico. The Government was very poor, and unable to pay the army and nave with any degree of promptness. The general belief among all classes, in Mexico, was that Texas would not accept the terms offered by the Congress of the United States and that consequently the country would not be annexed. There was a very hostile feeling against Americans and the people believed that should Texas be annexed, a declaration of war would follow.

Mr. Shannon represents that the drafts on the Mexican Treasury, received by the American agent for the two installments due, had not been paid for the want of funds. James M. Joralmon, of New York, also came passenger in the same vessel. He was robbed on his way from Mexico to Vera Cruz with nine other coach passengers who together lost some 1500 dollars. Mr. J's loss in money and clothing did not exceed 100 dollars. The country continued in the most unsettled state, and war is confidently anticipated, if the annexation of Texas is completed.

Murders and robberies are constantly occurring and on the most public roads and in the most public places.

The Joint committees of Congress on the affairs of Texas came to the following conclusion: That Mexico is at liberty to authorize its government to enter into a specific negotiation with Texas, which may arrange their differences, or lead to a treaty, convenient and honorable to the Republic, subject to the approval of Congress. So the members of the committee regard it almost with unanimity, hot doubting that the unilateral steps taken by the government are conformed to the soundest policy."

It appears that Tampico was in such a state of alarm on the 10th of May, that a public meeting was held to allay the agitation of the people.[BJM]

REv42i16p1c6 July 1, 1845 Magnetic Printing Telegraph

If we may believe the New York Evening Post, a magnetic telegraph is now in actual operation in that city, which actually does its own printing with the letters of our English alphabet, and in a clear, legible manner. It is executed at one end of a magnetic wire, through a direction given at the other. It is true, as incredible as the statement may seem to be, that a man might, if the wires were laid, now sit at New York, and with more print at New Orleans a letter or dispatch in the ordinary letter of our language. In a few days this invention will be made more generally known. At present, arrangements are making for the perfection of the patents here and in Europe.

REv42i16p2c1-2 July 1, 1845 Editorial

Such was the hero we mourn! With a constitution undermined by privations incident to his military labors, and a frame shattered by disease, he had retired to the seclusion of the Hermitage, long and patiently awaiting the only and final relief from suffering. It came to them on the evening of the 8th instant, in the centre of his home's affectionate circle, while his great mind was calm and unclouded, and when his heart was prepared to welcome its dilatory messenger. Yes! Yes!—he, on whom, for half a century, his country gazed as upon a tower of strength—on whom she never called for succor against the desolating savage, without being answered by a rushing shout of "onward, to the rescue!" who anticipated her invading foes by destroying them ere their footprints on her soil were cold—he, the iron warrior, the reproachless patriot, has ceased to be mortal, has willingly made his single surrender—the surrender of his soul to its Almighty claimant! It may almost be said that General Jackson was constituted of two natures, so admirable and so distinctly were his qualities adapted to their respective spheres of action. I have portrayed, hurriedly and crudely, his public character—let us, for an instant, see him, on one or two points at least, in the other aspect; and perhaps we may thence catch the secret of his sublime and beautiful death. The rugged exterior which rough wars in our early Western settlements would naturally impart, was smoothed and polished in him by a spirit of benevolence deeply seated in his temperament. In social intercourse, though always earnest, rapid, impressive and upright, his friendship was marked by boundless confidence and generosity; while in domestic life a winning gentleness seemed to spread from the recesses of his heart over the whole man, filling the scenes around him with smiles of serenity and joy, No husband loved more ardently, more faithfully, more unchangeably—no parent could surpass the self-sacrificing kindness with which he reared and cherished his adopted children—no master could be more certain of reciprocating fondness than he was when, as expiring, he breathed the hope of hereafter meting in the Heaven to which he was hastening, the servants of household, "as well black as white." The truthfulness of this picture is attested by all who were admitted to the sanctuary of his home—precincts too sacred, even on an occasion equally sacred, for more than this brief intrusion. But there was a crowning characteristic, from adverting to which I must not shrink, though the presence in which I stand. General Jackson was fervently, unostentatively, and submissively pious! Wherever he might be, and whatever his absorbing pursuit—wading heavily through the swamps of Florida, on the track of Hillishago; speeding, with the swoop of an eagle, to grapple the invade Pakenham; careering, at the head of his victorious legions, through throngs of admiring countrymen; in the halls of the Executive mansion; or at his hearth in the Hermitage; there and then, ever where and always though not ostensible, and never obtrusive, his faith was with him. But it was most closely and inconspicuously with him as dissolution approached—it was with him to brighten the rays of his heart, to take the sting from his latest pang, and to give melody to his last farewell! The dying hour of Jackson, bears triumphant testimony to the Christian's hope, Such was the Hero; such the Man we mourn! Come then, my countrymen! Let us, as it were, gather round the depository of his remains! From those who knew him, as it has been my lot to know him, the frequent tear of cherished and proud remembrance must fall.

REv42i16p3c4 July 1, 1845 War

In the Atlas of the 16th was a communication, occasioned by some remarks in a letter from England to the effect that a war with the United States would be popular with the British nations, "as a war against the slave power of the world." The writer of that article, after speaking of the probabilities of war, on account of our position in reference to Texas, Oregon, and California, one or all," makes some very appropriate remarks concerning the evils of war, and the influence which should be exerted to avert it; but he closes with a proposition to the people of Massachusetts, that should find no favor with them, or any other Americans. The probable cause of war with England is Oregon—neither Texas nor California.

And can any one tell us what the question of our right, or the right of Great Britain, to Oregon, has to do with slavery? If slavery is brought into the question, about which we may possibly fight, by the British, are Northern Americans, who are opposed to slavery, to be counseled to stand back and not countenance such a war, or not defend their country against foreign a attack? If Northern men are to be so advised, and they listen to such, any nation, who desired to humble and ruin us, might seek to cause for quarrel, and then, covering that quarrel with the name of "a war against the slave power of the world," turn the North against the South, or, at least, produce an inaction and opposition to defence in one portion of the people, which would prove the ruin of all. Such is not the course for Northern Americans to take. If we are to have a war, and our enemies to falsely call it a war against slavery, let us stand by our country—though we, too, are opposed to some of her institutions. Ay, even if the war is to be on account of Texas, and we know e are brought to it by the slave power of the South, struggling perpetuate itself, let us not turn our backs upon our country, commit treason against the Constitution, and suffer a foreign for; if he chooses, to subjugate us, or dictate his own terms of peace. Other nations know not our State lines; we are to them one people, under one government; and a war against that government is meant to be and is, a war against the whole people. Any internal dissensions would be used by an enemy, if possible, for the ruin of all; and while we foolishly thought we were punishing our brethren from whom we differ, we should be ruining ourselves also. The North has much more to lose by any war than the South. By a disastrous war, the North has infinitely more to lose. Shall we, are opposed to some of the institutions of the South, forgetting what we have in common? No: let us tell Britain that it is not for her, and such as she, to call a war with us a war against slavery, nor to endeavor, under the garb of philanthropy, to destroy a rival. Let us how the world a peaceful but united front, and endeavor within ourselves to remove the curse of slavery. The duty is ours—foreign powers cannot effect it, save by the ruin of everything else.

If war could be averted by the course proposed in the article referred to, it might be good advice. Circumstances unforeseen, and unknown to the public, often determine the course of governments, (though I am far from denying that our present government has bee, and may be precipitate and reckless;) and a pledge signed by a portion of the nation—and it certainly would be a small portion—that they will not support their country, cannot avert war. It would only serve to increase the disasters, and inflict a punishment upon the whole people deserved only, or mostly, by those who thus prove recreants. Far distant by the day of war! Far distant we may reasonably hope it is; but, if the

REv42i17p2c1-2 July 4, 1845 Patriotic Spirit and Refined Taste

The Boston Morning Post, of Saturday last, says that, “on Thursday evening, June 26, in the Common Council Chamber of this city, upon the question an appropriation of $500 to defray the expenses of the solemnities in honor of the memory of the hero of New Orleans, William Hayden (editor of the Boston Atlas) rose in his place, and made the following brief remarks, viz: ‘Mr. President, as it cost the city some $15,000, a few years since, to receive General Jackson, if we can now get rid of him for $500, I have no objection.’ General Jackson declared that “the Union must preserved.” Now, this Whig editor, who published the other day the anti-war pledged without a word of comment, follow up the blow the following outrageous declaration from own pen: “We look upon that measure (Texas) as the most flagrant and outrageous violation of the Constitution which has ever been brought forward or attempted since our Constitution was adopted. It ought to be resisted, to the utmost, by every citizen who has the good of this country at heart. If it is finally consummated, it will be such a violent infractions of the solemn contract of union, as will, in our deliberate judgment, entirely absolve the several States from the force of that contract. And if Massachusetts or any other State of this Union, should see fit, on the ground of annexation to secede from the Union, she will be amply and entirely justified in so doing. This is our opinion of the matter, Sir, and you are at liberty to make the most of it.” Is it wonderful, then, that the author of this treasonable declaration, should have coldly insulted the memory of General Jackson in the Council Chamber of Boston? The whole is in character.—(Union.)

REv42i17p2c4 July 4, 1845 This Glorious Day

In accordance with a time honored custom, we once more lay before our readers the immortal Declaration of Independence. We invoke a new and thorough appreciation of its principles and its spirit, which made us a free and happy people, and which must be preserved, in all their purity, if we desire to reach the high destiny which Heaven seems graciously to have intended for us. The present anniversary of our deliverance from foreign thralldom, comes around to us with peculiarly interesting associations. Since the last celebration, the nation has passed through a heated and angry political excitement. From one end of the Union to the other, the two contending parties struggled zealously for the mastery; but, to the honor of the American people be it said, no bloodshed, nor even personal violence, stained the annals of our history.

By the simple and solemn agency of the ballot-box, millions have give effect to their wishes, and when the public voice was clearly ascertained, and announced the elevation of those men who are for four years to wield the destiny of the country, the people, lately so much excited by party feeling, quietly and with praiseworthy resignation, submitted to the national award, and retired to their fields, their workshops, and their posts of honorable labor. All was once more peace. All, or nearly all, while taking a deep interest in passing events, and resolved to stand by their country "for better or for worse," returned to their daily occupations, with the firm determination to judge fairly the conduct of those in power, and on the revolution of four years, again to express at the ballot-box their approbation or condemnation of the manner in which their high and responsible duties and beautiful spectacle be presented, of a free and powerful nation calmly electing the Governors, according to the form and spirit of a written Constitution, and, by their dignity of bearing and faithful adherence to the dictates of true liberty, transmitting to posterity a moral influence which must perpetuate our institutions! What a bright contrast to the threes and convulsions that mark the change of rulers in the old world, where the people play the part of mute actors in the drama, and see their lives and dearest privileges placed at the at the disposal of men, in whose selection they bear no part! But there is another striking event, which has impressed the past year with peculiar interest.

The world has seen, with wonder and admiration, the successful consumation of the union of two congenial Republics, for many years segregated, but now brought together by peaceful and indissoluble bonds. We say "consummation" for, though the New Orleans mail yesterday disappointed us in the reception of the news for this day, that the Texan Congress had sealed the contract of annexation, no rational man can doubt that the deed is done; and we hope that the “Lone Star,” now a bright element of our strength and greatness, will be, to-day, "in our flowing cups remembered.” We look upon it as no longer a party question. The public voice decreed it; the public authorities have given their sanction to it, and no man, who is a friend to national faith and honor, to the cause of civilization and liberty, will for one moment find it in his heart to raise a voice or hand against its final completion.
True is it, that some of the Northern fanatics, treacherous alike to the Constitution and the country, have avowed their resolution, and taken a pledge, not to aid their mother land, in case she be forced into an unrighteous war, as they call it, on account of the annexation to Texas; but these Arnolds are as few in number as they are recreant in feeling—and they will be swept, like chaff, before the whirlwind of popular indignation. It would be out of place for us to set forth the many advantages to all portions of our Confederacy, which this great measure is destined to extend. But surely, no American can refuse on this day of universal rejoicing over the blessings of Freedom, to cast a look of satisfaction down the vista of the future, and see the temples of religion, the academies and schools, which, fostered under the extended blessings of our Union, will dot the beautiful prairies and fertile valleys of Texas.

None will fail to rejoice at the diffusion of free and well regulated institutions over one of the most interesting portions of the globe. Out of this and the Oregon question may spring a cessation of the peace which now, hovers over our country. We have confident hopes that the firmness and moderation of our Government may avert such a calamity. But if foreign ambition or avarice should force the issue, can it be doubted, that the people will stand by their “country, right or wrong?” Can a better occasion offer than the present day of our national nativity, to approach the country’s altar, and, while breathing a prayer for honorable peace, make a vow of undying attachment to our soil and our institutions, and a pledge of unshrinking zeal in support of those who have been called by the nation to protect its interest and its honor? Millions of freemen will to-day offer up their thanks for the peace and prosperity which they enjoy. To Virginias the day should bring deeply interesting reflections. While, from a series of circumstances, Virginia has not moved onward in the cause of improvement with the same zeal and success as her younger sisters, we are gratified to think that a new light has dawned upon her fortunes—that the noble cause of Education and of moral and intellectual reform, and the development of her vast resources, and the welding 一起, by one bond of interest and affection, the most distant portions of the old Commonwealth, have engaged the cordial attention of her people. Let then every Virginian, whilst, on this day, be rationally and soberly enjoys the delightful associations which it calls up, look steadily to the future, and pledge himself never to despair of the Republic, but to devote his thoughts and his energies to the extirpation of vice and ignorance, and to the establishment, on a firm basis, of the blessings of Education and social improvement. When the evening’s gun shall announce the winding up of the festivities, let every one retire to his home, a better man and a more patriotic citizen, and let his noble motto be, in the last words of the lamented Jackson, “My God and my Country!”

REv42i17p2c5 July 4, 1845 Disgraceful Sentiments

No more fitting occasion can present itself than this anniversary of the vindication of our liberties and national existence against foreign tyranny, to denounce treason in whatever quarter and under whatever shape it may rear its hideous crest. Of such character we regard the following from the New York Tribune, a journal of ability and influence, but so steeped in the bitter waters of party and fanaticism, that it stands prepared to sacrifice the country to its own peculiar arrogant notions of right and wrong. Some weeks since, that print, in its violent crusade against slavery, endorsed the pledge of the fanatic Channing, not to aid the country in a war on account of the annexation of Texas, because that measure was “in violation of right,” and in direct opposition to the fiendish designs of Northern Abolitionists. In the following, it will be seen the Editor takes the same treasonable position, and, what is worse, endeavors to base his reasons upon a hypocritical appeal to our Holy Religion. He shamelessly repudiates the noble sentiment of Decatur, “our Country, right or wrong,” which every patriot, we feel, is resolved to stand by. Had many such mean-spirited and prejudiced lived in the days of the Revolution, we should not now assemble around the national altar, to give thanks for the blessings of liberty—because the same mind, which would now hesitate on the ground of “right,” to rally to this country’s standard, would, in the days of the Revolution, have refused to shake off the letters imposed by those claiming the “Divine Right of Kings.” But to the passage, which is enough to fire the indignation of every Freeman and patriot: “Our Country, Right or Wrong.’ The New Orleans Bee, a journal which always propounds its own opinions with dignity, and treats those of others with fairness, in the course of a mainly just and pertinent rebuke of the Locofofo hurrah about Oregon says: “Whenever the U. States determine on war, the course of her people is a simple one. They will not pause to enquire into the right and wrong, the pros and cons of the quarrel, but will with one common accord, rally around the standard of their country. With few and inconsiderable exceptions, we are persuaded that this is the universal sentiment of the American people. ‘We differ from the Bee with reluctance, but though it is possible the “universal sentiment’ is correctly indicated by that paper, we cannot doubt that it is a mistaken criminal, God-defying sentiment. ‘Thou shalt not Kill,’ is a command which we cannot find any good authority for disobeying; but if we are to be made partners in the orphan manufacture at all, we insist that there shall be right on our side. To sin ships, burn towns and butcher human being, without asking whether the cause for which we fight is right or wrong, we dare not. That is the elder law, and He the more authoritative lawgiver, who thunders ever in our ears, ‘Thou Shalt Not Kill.’” From such a print we might well expect a revival, over the ashes of Jackson, of the coffin-band-bill traductions of his name. The Tribune, at the present solemn pause over the grave of the soldier and patriot, exhumes the buried slanders of the Arbuthnot and Ambrister affair. It denounces the execution of the former, by order of a Court Martial, as a “fool and cruel murder,” and thus aims its poisoned arrows at the departed Hero, and at those who have honored his virtues and his services: “Not on our soul should it rest for all the power of the Presidency, the trappings of the White House, the honeyed mouthing of venal and pampered orators, the sickening slaver of self-seeking journalists, and the applauding huzzas of ignorant or reckless thousands. God be merciful in their extremity, even to those as merciless as the authors of that cruel slaughter!” To such a source it is natural to look for sentiments so revolting to human nature, so treacherous to the nation; for, the man who would insult the ashes of the patriot dead, would not hesitate to give aid and couragement to the enemies of his country.

We are indebted to the courtesy of Dr. Saunders so the N. Orleans Bee, who arrived here yesterday from Pensacola, for the following items of news: The United States West Indian or Gulf Squadron, under the command of Com. Connor, namely, the frigate Potomac, flag-ship, the ship Falmouth, and the brigs Somers and Lawrence arrived at Pensacola on Tuesday, the 24th instant, having sailed from Sacrificios, the man of war anchorage at Vera Cruz, on the 12th instant. The officers and crews of these vessels were all well. The squadron visits Pensacola for the purpose of getting supplies of provisions and water having been for some time on rather short allowance. The only foreign vessels of war off Sacrificios at the time of the sailing of our squadron, were the French brigs Mercurio and Grillon. The vomito or yellow fever was prevailing to a considerable extent in Vera Cruz. Another revolution broke out in the City of Mexico on the 7th inst. It was led by a General whose name the Mexican papers do not mention. It commenced with one of the Regiments of Grenadiers, who entered the palace and made prisoners of the President and three of this Ministers. The rebellion, however, was soon quelled and order restored—the citizens by rallying promptly to the rescue, evincing their adherence to the new Government. The General in command of the revolters made his escape but the Colonel of the Regiment and fort of his men were instantly tried and shot. In connection with this revolt, it is mentioned that previous to the departure of Santa Anna from Mexico, the troops stationed at Vera Cruz were marched several leagues below the city in order to prevent all tampering between the friends of the fallen tyrant, and the officers and privates of the army. This was done in consequence of a rumor, that another revolution was underway in the city of Mexico, the object of which was to re-instate Santa Anna in power. The steamer that conveyed him away from his country, we so learn, took him on board at a place called Pirote Landing, several leagues this side of Vera Cruz. Gomez Farias has been elected Senator in place of Don Sebastian Comacho. The Government of Mexico was raising an army of 2,000 men, ostensibly for the purpose of being sent to the Californias; but it is the belief of several intelligent American citizens there that this force is destined to march secretly to the frontier of Texas. (Mobile Advertiser, June 27th)

Now, that the Annexation of Texas, denounced by the Whig and New York Tribune as "a measure of iniquity," and the fruit of the corrupt motives of "land-robbers, avaricious speculators and disunionists," has virtually been achieved, with the unanimous voice of Texas, and amid the deep-toned rejoicing of the whole people of the United States—it is amusing to see how the physic works upon the various Whig parties. The R. Whig thus despairingly and grudgingly announces the result: "The 'long agony is over,' and Texas has been annexed to the United States. As anything we might say could not undo what has been done, we copy from the Union of the 4th the latest news from the no longer 'lone' Star. Let those that can rejoice do so, but take care their rejoicing do not turn to sorrow." We are glad that the Whig means to throw no more useless obstacles in the way. It certainly evinces more sound policy and patriotism, than its quondam anti Texas ally of the N. York Tribune, who is determined to resist to the last, and even refuses to aid his country, if war be the effect of this "slavery crusade." The Times and Compiler which, by the by, was not a "sound trout" on this Texas question, rejoices at its consummation, and at the consequent removal of a heavy stumbling block from the path of Whiggery. Hear it: "This event we here looked upon as one that would of course follow the passage of the joint resolutions by Congress. Regarding Texas as an American settlement, or rather as a settlement of Americans, we felt convinced, from the beginning, that no temptation or inducement could be offered by Mexico or England, or France, or all united, that would be superior to their enthusiastic desire to be incorporated with our Union, and come under its laws and institutions. As strong as we supposed this desire to be, the result has shown it even stronger—the proceedings of the Texan Congress were characterized by an unanimity we were not prepared to anticipate. This unanimous aversion to the Mexican treaty, negotiated by President Jones, which, it will be seen, was unanimously rejected. "So the Texas question is settled at last!" The energy of the last short sentence indicates that the editor took a long breath, and thanked his stars that The annexation of Texas so strengthens the slave power, that it is not probable there ever will be another Democratic President from the free States. This is a great consolation, we think; for, whenever what calls itself Democracy is to have the Federal power, we much prefer it from the meridian and air of South Carolina to Tammany Hall or Albany. "If we had our way, therefore, our Whig Northern friends would, when Congress meets, enter their simple protest against the annexation of Texas, as a resolution in the Government, and a change in the Constitution, and then let the matter drop. They may spend four of the session in debate; and sow the seeds of discord more and more among the Whigs of the South—but the debate will end as it begins—in smoke.

"To the miserable and ferocious clique of Abolitionists (and yet in numbers contemptible) are we indebted for this extension and perpetuity for the slave Government of this country. If they repent for a thousand years, and wait all the while in sackcloth and ashes, they never can atone for the injury they have inflicted upon mankind and upon their country."

We hope it will not here be out of place, to allude to the famous prediction of Senator Rives, that Texas would not come in. That same gentleman, last summer, hoped that annexation would not take place, as, in case of Polk's election, he wished to quit the United States, and go to Texas.

That retreat being cut off, he will be forced to remain at home. We are glad that the cause of Agriculture will be graced and improved by his undivided labors. The Virginia principles which he once illustrated, he has abandoned. We wish him more success in his Agricultural Essays for which he is said to have a turn.

If things continue as they have begun, the New York Tribune and Boston Atlas will soon be left alone to their glory of agitation and opposition to the Government and people: "A pro forma resistance may now be made to the annexation of Texas, but it will be all in vain. The two Senators from Texas will walk into the Senate Chamber next winter, and there is getting them out by violence or revolution. We have made up our minds to submit. Submission is preferable to resistance and a consequent dissolution of the Union. The Whig members of congress from the South will go with the Loco Foco members from the South north, on this question; and as Northern Democracy has given in, and consented to be governed by Southern slave-ocracy, the only consolation we Whigs, have is, that the slave power, extended and fortified by Texas, will rule and restrain its rabble allies in the free States of the Union. Through their monied leaders here, we trust it will govern them hard when it has the federal power, and so preserve us from the radicalism that threatens and surrounds us. For out part, we had rather be lorded over by the slave owners than by the Empire Club gangs that rule much of "the Democracy of the North."

"The annexation of Texas was "settlement at last!" The Alexandria Gazette, while admitting that Texas may "almost be now regarded as an integral part of the United States," adds: "The event is an important one—and fraught with consequences of the deepest interest to our country. There has been much in the inception and conduct of this business, which we have condemned, and which may yet produce results which all must lament. Bu, now, that the matter is settled, we shall be among the first not only quietly and peaceably to submit to the law, but even to hope for the best. The friends of Annexation have drawn the most flattering picture of the good that will ensue. We certainly never believed that all their promises would be realized—but, we shall not, on that account, look at the dark side of the picture, or anticipate the worst that might happen. What is done, in this matter, cannot be undone. The fiercest opposition to it, could not effect a change back again. We must take Texas, with all the acknowledged evils of it Annexation, lest with an ardent desire that Providence, in its kindness, will counterbalance them, by blessings which may flow from the measured of Annexation." This is the true spirit. It behooves every patriot to submit to the popular voice, and to unite in upholding the honor and interest of the Union. Let public indignation, without distinction of party, be concentrated upon the heads of those Northern fanatics, who would betray their county in the hour of peril. The annexation of Texas as will, like the admission of Louisiana, work out its own triumph over the judgments of its strongest opponents, and the whole country will soon award to the Democratic party the highest credit for this peaceful and brilliant achievement, fraught as it will be with blessings to every portion of the nation. We conclude with a passage from the New York Express, written before the receipt of the conclusive news by the Princeton. It is peculiarly savage upon the "miserable and ferocious clique of Abolitionists," whom it longed to have as its allies in the late Presidential canvass. They, however, failed them at the pinch, and now all the honeyed words of the Northern Whig prints and orators are converted into curses. The last sentence is important, as showing that, If Mr. Clay had been elected by the Abolitionists, (and their votes alone could have saved him,) Texas and her friends of the United States would have whistled for many years, before they would have had the smallest hope of spreading the wings of the American Eagle over the lovely plains of Texas. Let then the Democratic Party have full credit for their unprecedented victory last November. Its moral influence has been powerfully felt, and will continue to stomp with benefits the future destinies of our great country. We thank the Express for its consideration and kindness in eschewing "resistance and a consequent dissolution of the Union!"

Mr. Shannon, ex-Minister to Mexico, has published in the Union a letter to the Secretary of State, in which he confirms, substantially, the account heretofore given by Mr. B. E. Green, of the non-payment of the Mexican instalments. [MSM2]
But few papers and no news. The celebration of the 4th, in Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, went off most happily, without disturbance or accident, and with remarkable sobriety. The Texas news was received in the Northern cities with great enthusiasm. Everybody is now for Texas. Even the National Intelligencer is “mum” at the startling intelligence.

The following sporting information in Sunday’s New York Herald, is all the news we find: "The Greatest Piece of Pedestrianism ever Performed. A foot race came off on Friday, in the neighborhood of Stonigton, Conn., in which Maj. Champlin performed a mile in the astonishing and almost incredible time of four minutes and nineteen seconds. He now challenges to run any man in the U.S. one mile for one thousand dollars, or upwards, to come off over the Union or Beacon Course, any time between this and the first of August. The challenger can be heard of, or seen, at the American Hotel, Stonigton. It is not unlikely but that he will be accommodated."

REv42i18p3c2 July 8, 1845 Important and Glorious News

On the eve of the great day which is consecrated to the independence of our country, we hail the re-union of Texas with the United States. We will now tread the road of freedom and greatness together. This news comes to us by the Princeton steamer, which arrived at Annapolis to-day at 2 o’clock.

Dr. Wright brings the dispatches from Annapolis. He left Washington, Texas, on the 21st June, and arrived at Galveston on the 23rd—on which day the Princeton left that place. We are favored by the Doctor with the following memoranda: "The United States ship Princeton, Commodore Stockton, arrived at Annapolis, from Galveston, Texas, after the short passage of nine days, having consumed only 93 tons coal. She steamed against head winds, with the exception of only 36 hours, when she was assisted by her sails.

No Atlantic steamer has ever made so good an hourly average, with the same economy of fuel; and considering all the circumstances, it may be regarded as an unprecedented passage. The news brought by the Princeton is of the most interesting character. Both houses of the Texan Congress have unanimously consented to the terms of the joint resolution of the United States.

The Senate had rejected the treaty with Mexican by a unanimous vote. Capt. Wagaman had arrived at Washington, Texas, to select posts to be occupied by the United States troops, and to provide for their subsistence. A resolution was introduced into both houses of Congress, requiring the Executive to surrender all posts, navy-yards, barracks, &c., to the proper authorities of the U. States.

The joint resolutions were introduced into both houses of Congress on the same day, and were almost identical in their tenor. The resolutions passed the Senate on the 18th of June, and were sent to the House; the House laid them on the table, and passed their own resolutions unanimously, and sent them to the Senate on the next day. In the mean time, considerable jealousy arose as to which branch should claim the honor of the paternity of the resolutions; and it was finally settled that the House should take up the resolutions of the Senate, and amend them in the third section. The House then passed them in their present form, and sent them back to the Senate, which body concurred in the amendment. The President is pledged to give full and immediate effect to the will of Congress, so far as depends upon himself."

This important intelligence has just reached the President of the United States, [this evening, half past 8] Dr. Wright brings copious dispatches from our able charge Major Donelson; but they are written prior to the adoption of resolutions of the Congress of Texas. He also brings newspapers, embracing the National Register, printed at Washington, of the 19th June, three days after Congress assembled. We must confine ourselves principally to the contents of the Galveston News Extra of the 23rd June. The National Register contains the correspondence between Major Donelson and the Government of Texas, from March 31, 1845, down to June 11th, accompanying President Jones’ message to Congress.

REv42i18p3c2 July 8, 1845 News, Extra President Jones Message &c

We are indebted to Mr. Briggs for the following interesting documents, which we hasten to give our readers. Verbally we learn from Mr. Briggs, that the propositions for our independence have been submitted to the Senate. They are not yet made public; but it is understood that they are highly objectionable, and will be promptly rejected.

Executive Department. Washington, June 16, 1845.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives: I am happy to meet you, on this interesting occasion, as the representatives of the people, again assembled in the discharge of your high and important duties. The call of an extraordinary session of Congress at the early day, but the Executive, was not made without the most mature, deliberation, and a due deference to the great crisis which has arisen since your late adjournment, in the affairs of Texas as well as the almost unanimous expression of public will which took place throughout the country in regard to the same. The Executive has now the pleasure to transmit to the honorable Congress, for such action as the may deem suitable, the propositions which have been made on the part of the United States to this Government, for the annexation of Texas, and its incorporation, as a State, into that great and kindred Confederacy, together with the correspondence between the two Governments, which has arisen out of the same. This correspondence, entering, as it does, very fully into the views and sentiments of the Governments in question, renders in unnecessary for the Executive to add [for the information or consideration of Congress] but little thereto in reference to the proposed union, render those terms much more acceptable than they would otherwise have been. The state of public opinion, and the great anxiety of the people to act definitely upon the subject of annexation, by a convention of deputies, as prescribed in the resolutions of the United States Congress, induce the Executive to issue his proclamation on the 5th of May, ultimo. Recommending an election for sixty one deputies, to be held in the several counties throughout the republic, on the 4th of the present month, and to assemble in convention, at the city of Austin, on the 4th of July next. This recommendation has met the sanction of the citizens of Texas generally, and the deputies in the several counties; so far as heard from, having been elected upon the basis proposed, it is confidently expected the convention will assemble at the time and place fixed upon. To this convention, the question of annexation, and the adoption of a State constitution, will probably belong; and they will determine the great question of annexation, and they will determine the great question of the nationality of Texas, as to them seem most conductive to the interest, happiness, and prosperity of the people whom they will represent. It is important that the "consent of the existing Government" should be given to their exercising the powers which have been delegated to them, in order to comply with a requirement to that effect in the resolutions on the subject of annexation, passed by the American Congress. For this purpose, the present extraordinary session of the Congress of the Republic of Texas has been convoked, and to its wisdom, as a co-ordinate department, the Executive now submits the determination of the matter. The services to be performed by the Convention will be arduous and will probably engage it for a considerable period of time and the Executive would respectfully recommend to Congress the propriety of making a suitable appropriation for the payment of its members, as well as the officers it may find occasion to employ. The Executive has the pleasure in addition to presenting Congress the proposition concerning annexation, to inform them that certain conditions, preliminary to a treaty of peace, upon the basis of a recognition of the independence of Texas by Mexico, were signed on the part of the latter, at the city of Mexico, on the 12th of May last, and were transmitted to this Government of the 2d instant, by the Baron Alleye de Cyprey, minister plenipotentiary of his Majesty the King of the French, at that court by the hands of Capt. Elliot, her Britannic Majesty's Charge d' Affairs near this Government. In consequence of the signing of these preliminaries, the Executive believing it to be his duty, in the recess of Congress, to make the fact known to the people of Texas, and to declare and proclaim a cessation of hostilities between Texas and Mexico, until the same could be communicated to, and acted upon, by Congress and the Convention about to assemble. A proclamation for this purpose was consequently issued on the 4th instant, a copy of which is herewith transmitted. The preliminaries being in the nature of a treaty, will, with all the correspondence in relation thereto, be forthwith communicated to the honorable Senate, for its constitutional advice, and such action as, to its wisdom, the same shall seem to require. The alternative of annexation or independence will thus be placed before the people of Texas, and their free, sovereign and unbiased voice will determine the all important issue and so far as it shall depend upon the Executive to act, he will give immediate and full effect to the expression of their will.

His situation in regard to the important subjects now communicated to Congress, has, since their late adjournment, been one of great delicacy and embarrassment. Questions of much difficulty have been presented for this determination, upon which the fate and welfare of the country depended and. Without precedent or constitutional guide for his governance, he has been obliged to assume, in consequence, great and severe responsibilities. He trusts, however, that Congress will approve the course he has adopted, and, by their enlightened counsels, relieve and direct him in the course hereafter to be pursued in relation to those questions. The Executive is happy to announce to Congress, that Texas is at peace with the world; that with all foreign powers with whom we have had intercourse, friendly relations are maintained. The different tribes on Indians on our borders, with whom treaties exist, have continued to observe the same with good faith; and within the last few days, information has been received, that the only band of Comanches within our limits, who had maintained until then a hostile attitude towards Texas, have sued for peace, and expressed a wish to be permitted come to Bexar celebrate a treaty of friendship, which, on the part of this Government has been complied with. The arrangement made you regular session, for additional companies of rangers to be mustered into service, have been carried into full effect, and have afforded adequate and very efficient protection to our frontiers. The receipts into the treasury have been sufficient to meet various expenditures of the government. A specie currency has been maintained without difficulty; and all the exchequer bills which were in circulation at the period of your late adjournment, have been redeemed and withdrawn from circulation; and the Executive is happy to congratulate the Congress and the country upon a state of peace, happiness, and prosperity, never before experienced by Texas, and rarely, if ever, equaled by so young a nation. It only remains for the Executive to express an assured confidence in your individual wishes to sustain the best interest of Texas, and the fervent hope the He, who holds the destinies of me and nations in his hand, may crown your deliberations with his richest blessings. REv42i18p3c4 July 8, 1845 Address to A. J. Donelson

To A.J. Donelson, Charge d’ Affaires of the U. States.

It is believed that the Mexicans were occupying two positions—in what force does not appear.
We find the following article upon the subject in the National Registry of the 19th: Corpus Christi.—The trade of Corpus Christi has been remarkably brisk within the last four or five weeks, and the town is now rapidly improving. Several large parties of traders from the Rio Grande have visited the place; and they expressed great confidence that the difficulties between the two countries would soon be adjusted. They report that large bodies of Mexican troops have recently arrived in the provinces east of the mountains from the interior, but they did not state that any larger body of these forces had crossed the Rio Grande. We are inclined to believe that the forces east of the mountains have overtaken by the spies of Captain Hays. We do not believe that the whole number of troops at all the positions east of the Sierra Madre exceeds three thousand. The whole number of troops in Matamoros is estimated at only three or four hundred. (Telegraph)

REv42i18p4c4 July 8, 1845 The Lone Star glistening in the American Firmament

We were again disappointed on the morning of the 4th, by not receiving in the New Orleans papers positive information of the union of Texas and the United States, through the Congress of the former. But, before the setting of the sun, the glorious news was brought to the Northern cars, in time to enable the Artillery Company, in their evening salute, to fire one loud, clear and ringing gun for Texas, the newly recovered Pleiad, that for a time, had wandered from its political sphere. This news, which is destined to be received throughout the Union with the most thrilling emotions, will be found in full in another column, as taken from the Union. So impressed were we with its importance, that on Saturday morning we issued an Extra containing the joyful tidings. It is unnecessary for us to comment upon the scenes in the Texan Congress, which themselves speak so eloquently. We defy the world to produce a brighter instance of a people, by an unanimous vote, resisting alike the bribes and frowns of powerful nations, and, with a calm dignity and honorable devotion to principle, uniting itself to the destinies of the only free Government on the earth, resolved to share the glory and the fortunes of its adopted ally. From her tyrannical oppressor, Mexico, Texas had received the kindest and most beneficial offers; but, true to her American blood and high principles, she eschewed the tender, and, with one voice, sheltered herself beneath the Stars and Stripes of the American Union, “bone of her bone and strength of her strength.” In taking this critical step, she incurred the hazard of those “contingencies” to which her vacillating President had so earnestly alluded, and fearlessly crossed the Rubicon of her Fate. She has, thereby, perpetuated her principles, and given evidence to the world, that she is worth of all praise. What will these dreadful “contingencies” amount to? We confidently think, that they will prove to be as unsubstantial as air. The Government of Mexico, however it may desire to catch the popular favor by indulging its fancy for retaliatory measures, on account of the supposed insult upon its honor and national rights, will seize the earliest occasion to let the bitter cup pass, and to “ease off” the unpleasant difficulty on the best terms. It must feel conscious of its own excessive weakness. The last accounts tell us of an attempted Revolution in Mexico, and every thing proves that the Government and people are bound to each other by a rope of sand. While they are unable to keep peace at home, and to rally the people to the aid of the authorities, would it not be the extreme of folly to originate hostilities against the United States, strengthened as they are by the area and hearts of Texas? From Mexico, therefore, we apprehend no trouble. Should she be mad enough to resist the course of events, her effort will be like the attempt to dam up the ocean with a bulrush. Poor Captain Elliott, foiled in all his arts and tricks—stripped of his wardrobe by his “loving cousins” of the Mexican mountains, and robbed of all the diplomatic reputation which his odious opium transactions in China had won for him with the intriguers of the Old World; we can well understand how, his feelings chafed, his vanity mortified, and his bright visions of success and promotion dissipated, he may endeavor to avenge himself upon the people of the United States, now including Texas, and to that end endeavor to stir up the passions of England. But he will fail.

That nation has, at the present moment, “other (and more important) fish to fry.” Her hands are quite full enough of troublesome questions, and she will have no inducement to endanger her own safety and power, by further intermeddling with our affairs. As to France, our first and valued ally, much as we regret to see the part she has played in the discreditable intrigues, in direct contravention of the declaration of M. Guiznot to Mr. King, we cannot by think that she will soon become ashamed of her Paul Dry game, and will be far from disposed to incur our displeasure by further violations of courtesy and good faith. The news by the Acadia, since received, show that M. Guiznot, as the organ of the French Government, has disclaimed any intention to meddle with annexation, though she would refer to see Texas independent. From abroad, it will be observed, we apprehend no mischievous “contingencies.” Will our own land raise up traitors enough to stab our honor, national faith and welling greatness? We have no such fears. There sill scarcely be found in the broad limits of the Union a handful of men like the Editors of the New York Tribune, Boston Atlas, and other Northern fanciers, who have taken the pledge not to aid their country in a foreign war, should it ensue upon the annexation of Texas. The miserable remnant of humanity may endeavor to stir up disaffection and rebellion to the solemn action of our government and people, but they will be frustrated by public sentiment. The Convention in Texas, which assembled on the 4th of July, will frame the Constitution of the new State of Texas—and nothing can prevent the first achievement of the most brilliant event of the age.. In all sincerity, we believe that this measure, which once arrayed parties in such bitter hostility to each other, will now be hailed with joy by the whole Union. We are not disposed to mar the thrilling pleasure that must be produce by the rapid circulation of this joyous intelligence. We would willingly let “by-gones by by-gones.” But as the conductors of a free press, we cannot conscientiously let this subject pass, without an allusion to the ridiculous and improper bearing of President Jones, throughout this whole affair. It will be recollected, that a member of the Texan Cabinet denied positively, that President Jones had interfered at all with the treaty for independence. It now seems, from the memoranda brought by Dr. Wright, that the preliminaries, were agreed upon by Ashbel Smith, Jones’s Secretary of State, that the Mexican Minister, Cuevas, acknowledged “the receipt of those preliminaries, through the intervention of Baron Alleye de Cyprey,” that the national Congress had “consented that Mexico will accede to the preliminaries proposed by Texas, as the basis of a formal treaty;” and that President Jones had written a letter to Baron Cyprey, “acknowledging his kind offices in bringing about the negotiation.” If this series of facts does not show, on the part of Jones, a zealous desire to defeat annexation, and to violate the wishes of the people of Texas, there is no connection between cause and effect. His wretched apologies and shuffling professions will avail him nothing. The extraordinary conduct of the man will open the eyes of the people of the Union, and we hope never to see the name of “Anson Jones” connected with any of the offices of the State of Texas. The public have bad enough of the services of such men as Jones and Ashbel Smith. It can well afford to see such eminent patriots and candid and bold functionaries consigned to the shades of retirement!

REv42i19p2c1 July 11, 1845 The Glorious Measure of Annexation

The Charleston Courier of the 8th inst. Welcomes the news from Texas in the following brief but emphatic and joyous remarks. This is the spirit which will animate the whole country, as the intelligence is rapidly conveyed over the great mail routes, and gradually finds its way into the obscure recesses of our valleys and mountains. Here and there, may be a few croakers who will coldly look upon it as an unimportant business transaction of every day life, but the mass of the people will regard it as the most interesting event of the age, and will applaud its consummation as full of blessings to the Union, and as giving new evidence of the power and influence of this great nation. A new era is about to open in the destinies of our Southern neighbors, and we feel confident that they are made of materials, to build their high and reasonable duties, as members of a great and happy confederacy. The annexation of Texas, moreover, has proved the death knell to the machinations of Northern fanatics. In vain did they appeal to the prejudice of the North to oppose this scheme of “slavery.” The judgment and patriotism of the people prevailed over all their devices—and annexation was fully secured by the November Election.

The South was confirmed in her constitutional rights—the compromises of the Federal compact were guarded from violation, and the friend of Union and justice rejoiced at the happy event. Now that one more decisive step has been taken; now, that Texas had added her strength and influence in the South, we may well deny the fiercest assaults and most insidious movements of Northern fanaticism. But, at the same time that we rejoice at the realization of the union and safety of the South against domestic traitors, we wish it to be distinctly understood, that we do not in the least falter in our regard for the blessed Union, or hint at a national schism. This very measure of annexation has done much towards confirming the bonds that unite the different States. While it adds to the scale of the South an important element of power and influence, it throws open a wide and rich field for the productive industry of the North and the West. It appeals to the different sections, in the name both of patriotism and self-interest, to stand by the Union and its blessings. As a great national benefit, therefore, the whole country should rejoice at the triumph of the measure. Time will develop its fruitful sources of strength and prosperity. No longer regarded as a party question, all will be glad to enjoy its benefits, and to share the honor it will shed upon the nation.

“Annexation of Texas.—Yesterday was a fort of gala day in our city. The bells of old St. Michael’s rang their merry peals the live-long day; the vessels in our harbor wore their gayest colors; flags streamed from windows, and across our streets; and at 12 meridian, one hundred guns, from a volunteer detachment of Col. Kanapaux’s Artillery, thundered a loud welcome to Texas, as a member of our glorious Union and Republican family. Every body, we believe, was either please, or at least reconciled with the event. It has relieved suspense; settled a moot question, put end to dispute, and it only remains for all true patriots whether original friends or foes of the measure, to join in the honest endeavor to make it work for the good of our country, It has extended our domain—the domain of freedom and happiness—it has increased our population, and will bless and enrich the new citizens it has added to the Republic—and we hope too, it will tend to increase the felicity, as well as the extent, and the resources, even of the great and happy nation of which the new State has now become an integral part. We cordially respond to the public meeting should be called to tender a warm welcome to Texas, the candle of our political sisterhood.”

REv42i19p2c1 July 11, 1845 The Balance of Power

The success of annexation among its numerous benefits, will break up the conjoined effort of European powers to control Republican power to this country, and to effect the wings of free institutions. The National Intelligence contains an interesting letter from its Paris correspondent (Mr. Walsh,) which throws new light upon the movements of England and France. It turns out to be, that the French legations in Texas and Mexico received the same instructions as the British, and that the instructions of the French Cabinet to their diplomatic agent in Texas passed through the hands of Lord Aberdeen. We make a few extracts from the letter of Mr. Walsh. His views merit the attention of every American patriot. “The debate raised on the whole foreign policy is worthy of all attention, as it is reported with signal accuracy and plenitude in the Moniteur of the 11th inst. It seems to me that Billaut and de Beaumot, who spoke for the Opposition, had decidedly the advantage in the points of fact, national sentiment, and sound reasoning. The valetudinary Minister (Guirot) was not less intrepid, rhetorical and plausible than ever, he could not in the end, deny the allegations his adversaries that the instructions of the French Cabinet to their diplomatic agent in Texas passed through the hands of Lord Aberdeen, and that he had fully co-operated with the British Government is endeavoring to prolong and fix the independence of that region. He broached a theory and scheme of a balance of power for the American continent, which means nothing more than the limitation of the agrandizement of our Union—a general check and control of Republican power—by means of Great Britain for offensive or primary antagonizes to the United States in Canada, she can be only on the defensive. Oregon is too remote and precarious for material operation for a general or viral nature. Several of the Paris editors have shown how chimerical in itself and how inexpedient for France, is this unexpected, far-fetched theory. La Presse (Conservative) says: “We don not find n this opinion any marks of the (ostencity ?) which distinguishes M. Guiznot.
The interest of France is not to favor the breaking up into pieces of the American continent, and the creation of a crowd of little States, possessing neither vitality nor real independence.

That is the interest of England, not ours—to would be better for us, and for American herself, that Texas, on which we have no claim, should be protected, defended and fortified by the only Power of that cast continent having strength and good purposes, than that it should remain under the dominion of anarchy, foreign intrigues, and all the causes of destruction and ruin which act so deplorably on most of the other independent republics of the New World.” It is cheering to see such wise and liberal views taken by the Pairs press. Mr. Walsh refers to other sources of good feeling toward the United States on the Texas question, and, among the rest, to “an able inquiry by the Deputy Monsieur Duvergier de Hauranne, into the Present Relations of France and England, and the Re-establishment of the Alliance. He severely and minutely criticizes the doctrines and measure of the Soult-Guizot Cabinet. He dwells on the superior importance for France of the best understanding with the United States; their ultimate cause, he argues, is the same; independently of all positive concert or league, the greatness of France is strength for the United States, and vice versa.

"Until lately,” he adds, ‘I could not believe that our legations in Texas and Mexico received the same instructions as the British; but the language of M. Guizot. On the 10th instant, has set me right and determined the fact. And after this incredible, infatuated proceeding, the Minister orates to us of, I know not what equilibrium to be maintained in America between the United States and Great Britain. He wants three balances of power—one in Europe, another in Asia, the third in America! And, forsooth, Mr. Guizot would throw the weight of France in American into the British scale, for, as Mr. De Beaumont and Mr. De Lasteyne said, in the debate, Texas must be virtually either British or American; she cannot be really independent. This question will doubtless recur in the Chambers, and the Opposition will do their duty; France cannot, without repudiating all common sense and fore-sight, become the ally of England against the United States.” With these glaring facts before the world, can there be an American who does not rejoice at the defeat of foreign intrigues against the supremacy and influence of our free institutions! Here a crusade against the swelling greatness of our Union is openly avowed by the crowned hosts of Europe. But their schemes will be defeated. Texas, “the last stake of Great Britain for offensive or primary antagonism to the United States,” is now secured to us, and British cunning and ambition is baffled. The annexation of that country, in spite of the opposition of France and Great Britain, through their diplomatic agents, is, indeed, a triumph of the Republican spirit. It will secure our country from foreign intrigue, and will strike the world with an irresistible moral power. It will warn the rulers of the old world that there is a force and influence in free institutions, which will secure their onward march against all opposition. The young giant of the West has broken the fetters of foreign diplomacy, and will pursue its quiet and steady march towards the high destiny, which has been marked out for it. While America will carefully abstain from interference with other power, she has just demonstrated that no foreign nation can check or control her movements, or safely meddle with her own rights, and her duties to herself and to the cause of Liberty.

Well, then, may every patriot rejoice at the response which will be conveyed across the Atlantic to the shuttling intrigues of European rulers. The subject is full of clustering thoughts and associations. It opens a new and a bright picture in the history of the world, and places the American Union on a foundation of strength and influence, at home and abroad. Me. Walsh further transmits to his countrymen the following gratifying information: “In the final debate of the Deputies, on the bill fro the modification of slavery in the French possessions, Heryer, the great orator of the Legitimiss, paid, in a splendid harangue, some high compliments to the sagacity and trank energy of Mr.
Calhoun’s letter to Mr. King, and to the discernments and talents of American Statesmen in general.”

REv42i19p3c2 July 11, 1845 Will Mexico Declare War?

Politicians here differ about the course which Mexico will pursue. Gov. Shannon and Capt. Stockton incline to the opinion that her clamorous and infatuated people will hurry the Government on to hostile measures. Other politicians here will not believe that England will permit Mexico to declare war. They say, that it is her interest to keep her at peace, and that England has peace or war in the palm of her hand. A few days must now decide the question. Unless England is blindly intent on war with the United States, and she may think it the time to strike at us, she will urge upon her ally to keep the peace. (Union.)

REv42i19p4c2 July 11, 1845 Texas, (The Richmond Times)

It is very cruel in the Times to rebuke our heartfelt rejoicings over the triumph of annexation. It was a matter which has been marked by no little difficulty and for which this paper has sedulously labored, for sometime. We had a right, then, in this free country, to rejoice at the consummation. And the rebuke as particularly ill-timed, when it comes from a journal which, to say the least, has been neutral on this question. Even its yesterdays oburgatory article does not clearly inform the world what its opinions are, or what course it would have taken, had the settlement of the question rested in its hands exclusively. We quote it for the study of our readers:

“We are entirely disposed to acquiesce in the decision of the American people that Texas is to be a part of our Union, and believe that the annexation independently of constitutional considerations, will be of advantage to the country, though now without injury in many respects.” We hope, then, that the Times will let us rejoice at the results in our own way. The Editor, in another portion of his columns informs us that he was “fresh from the schools” of the University. It was natural, therefore, that he should indulge in verbal criticisms, and play the Censor over our language. We excuse the province he has assumed; for words are but of little avail, when used to announce important events. But we must protest against the attempt of the Mentor of the Times to convict our language of inconsistency. All have admitted that, for the few past weeks, annexation was certainly to be expected. The public opinion of Texas irresistibly ran that way and, on the morning of the 4th, we announced the consummation as having actually taken place: for “no rational man could doubt the fact.” But, for a long time after the action of our Congress, much doubt hung over the result. Indeed, an intelligent citizen of Texas has very recently assured us, that at one moment the question was full of gloom and many thought our Resolutions would be rejected. The opposition of the leading authorities and many distinguished citizens, the cunning and assiduous diplomacy of Great Britain, her immense resources, her honeyed promises, the threatened dangers of war, the conjoined action of the French Minister. (contrary, we hope, to the instructions of his Government) the direct commercial advantages held by G. Britain, and the artful appeals to the vanity of Texas to maintain an independent and prominent rank among the nations of the earth these and other facts form the “contingencies” in which we allude and which many patriots feared would defeat annexation. The Time has therefore, misconstrued our language, when it makes us refer to the vote of her Congress as “the critical step.” That vote was but the final consumation of the public opinion, which had, some time before, taken “the critical step,” and had put down all the difficulties which we have grouped above. We agree with the Compiler, that there was no “hazard” in concluding an arrangement, when these “contingencies” had been neutralized; but we contend that there was hazard in taking those critical steps which led to the grand result. The Times looks coldly upon annexation as common “matter of bargain and sale.” It says: “We might think it very well for the United States to add a few more cotton plantations on the Southern border; especially if they could get them for nothing; (this is a direct contradiction to the Whig’s argument) but we must confess we see nothing exceedingly glorious in it, on one side or the other. It seems nothing “glorious” in the diffusion of the light of education and religion over a most lovely portion of the globe; the extension of the rich blessings of liberal institutions and enlightened civilization; and the strengthening of our own bonds of union, and the multiplication of resources of all the great interests of the country. All we have to say is, that the Times does not look at this grand and “glorious” spectacle with the same eye that a majority of the people of the old and the new world will regard it. The final achievement of this measure, we venture to predict, will create more excitement, and call up more admiration, than any event which has transpired for many years. We insist upon calling it “glorious.”

REv4219p4c2 July 11, 1845 The Whig

The Whig can hold in no longer about annexation. Yesterday’s No. is full of “President-making” and private rapacity, impurity of motive, avarice, injustice, and iniquity, “and such other delicate compliments to the friends of annexation and they turned out not to be few! Time will gratify the anxious wishes of the Whig, and will dispel that cloud of “woe,” which it seems certainly to apprehend. As a foreign State, Texas would have been more dangerous “rival” of the cotton and sugar States, than she will now prove, as a member of the same confederacy, governed by the same laws and subject to the same burdens. It is now too late to re-argue that point. It was made perfectly clear by the “Whig” delegate James Lyons, Esq., in the late canvass. For the benefit of the Whig we re-publish the following from the London Morning Herald: "Mr. Calhoun reproaches us with opposing the annexation of Texas, because we wish to destroy slavery first in Texas, then in the United States. We avow it frankly, and invite our friends of France to avow it with us. We desire to abolish slavery in the United States from philanthropic and commercial, and still more from political reasons. As long as the United States preserve the monopoly of cotton, they hold the manufacturers of Europe in check and dictate laws to them and they will preserve the labor of the blacks. If, on the contrary, England were to prevent annexation she might at some future day, with India and Texas, (mark Indian and Texas afterwards) ruin the cotton trade of the United States, and in her turn dictate laws to all the manufactories in the world." The Standard, a paper in the confidence of the of Prime Minister says: “The Republicans of American seem to be little concerned about slavery; but, it must be admitted that, without the labor of the blacks, they could not produce cotton—that cotton which plays so important a part in their exports. Jin just recompense to her disinterestedness, England might soon render the cotton producing labor of the slaves useless, and thus abolish slavery by transporting the production of cotton through the aid of free blacks, to another hemisphere.”

REv4219p4c2 July 11, 1845 Singular Dispatch

Everything goes to prove that late voyage of the Princeton from Galveston to Annapolis one of the most remarkable on record. She passed the Capes of Virginia last Wednesday nigh, and Tuesday morning, the good people of N.
Orleans, so much nearer the scene of action, had not heard a word of the decisive action of the Texan Congress. The New Orleans Bulletin, of Monday, gives information from the seat of Government of Texas up to the 15th June, the day before the meeting of Congress. The general impression was, that the "unanimity would prevail" upon the annexation question. The Bulletin presents the following views, which may enlighten the minds of some to the Whigs as to the chances of war. Many of them, we learn, are now pleased with the result, though, with their usual croaking, they profess to apprehend a breadth of the peace. On that point our mind is at ease. "So soon as the measure of annexation passed the Congress will authorize the President to make a requisition on the United States for a sufficient military force to be marched to the Rio Grande, to repel the encroachments of Mexico on that line of boundary. Ere this, no doubt, the question of annexation is settled in the affirmative. An United States army may now be moving to occupy its position of the Eastern bank of the Del Norte. It remains to be seen, whether Mexico will dare dispute the boundary. She has an army assembled on the Western bank, and if a collision takes place at all, it will be on the line of the Rio Grande del Norte. A few days more will tell the result, and furnish us with the last scene in the grand drama of which Texas has been the theatre during ten years past."

REv42i20p1c4 July 15, 1845 More Treason

The course of the N.Y. Tribune continues to be marked by the most violent temper, and an utter disregard of national faith and honor. It would wreak its vengeance for political disappointments, upon the fair name and dearest rights of the country. The spirit of fanaticism is at the bottom of all its fierce movements. It is the duty of the people to point the finger and scorn at every man who would thus sacrifice his native land to the unhallowed schemes of mischievous party. We, therefore, make further extracts from the columns of the Tribune, in order that all patriots, of whatever political party, may know the schemes of some of the leading journals, and may prepare to prostrate the spirit of disaffection to our national cause, wherever and however it may spring up. Many Whigs, who were conscientiously opposed to annexation, have sunk their party feelings, and looking alone to the country’s faith and honor, and to the avowed policy of European nations to check the growth of Republican strength, and to establish an odious and absurd "balance of power," have nobly come to the rescue, and stand ready to defend and preserve our rights in Texas, at all hazards. Not so, the New York Tribune and its associate fanatics. The look upon Annexation as a triumph over their mad schemes, and unblushingly avow their determination to resist it, in every manner. We have no idea to what extent this feeling may pervade the Northern States. It is true, that the Tribune is the leading Whig paper in New York, and, from its large circulation, has been selected as the depository of the Post Office advertisements.

But we cannot believe that the anti-American feelings, which taint its columns, can, to any extent, affect the masses. It is particularly gratifying to know, that all the other Whig journals in New York have bowed to the popular will and surrender their objections to the completion of a measure which the United States are bound in honor to effect. The Tribune may call upon its fanatical clans to undertake a new and angry crusade against Texas—but its labors will be in vain. The mercantile and manufacturing classes begin to discover the benefits which they will derive from the new acquisition, and will be eager for the fruit. The Abolitionists will be staggered by the astounding victory over domestic and foreign intrigue and fanaticism, and will cower beneath the concentrated strength of the South, aided by the true friends of the Union in every State. Public sentiment is being rapidly and universally aroused to the vast importance of Texas, like Louisiana and Florida, to be safety and welfare of the Union. We have to fear of the threats of such traitors as are arrayed against annexation. The whole nation will laugh at the absurd and impotent menaces of the Tribune, as we now give them to our readers. Speaking of the passage of the joint resolution of our Congress, it says: "Yet this was not a efficient humiliation for the Representatives of the States and of the people before Presidential power. There must be farther usurpation.

The House Resolution, which could not pass the Senate, becomes a law contrary to the will of our branch of the Legislature, has new conditions attached to it by the 'magnanimous views' of our President, which if submitted to the Representatives of the people, would have absolutely prevented its passage through the House. And that, is the abominable combination of fraud, usurpation, and robbery that we are now called upon to support and extol. Do the successful manipulations and cunning of the pickpocket, or the daring villains of the highway robber become (not readable) by success? Or is it incumbent on honest men to coincide in the iniquity quietly, when the deed is done? No! Crime and iniquity are the same, whether successful or not; and he who aids or abets, or ceases to condemn and resist, becomes a participator in the wrong and infamy. Neither the money gained in the rise of Texas Scrip, nor the wealth acquired from old grants of what are now Texas lands, can make wrong right, or sanctify the most disgraceful drama of fraud and crime on record."

REv42i20p1c5 July 15, 1845 Echo of the Sentiment of the Whole Nation

Among the toasts drunk on the 4th at Martinsburg, Virginia, we find the following capital one. It will turn out that we were not singular in styling annexation as a "glorious" achievement: "By Charles James Faulkner. The 4th of July. The Anniversary of the dawn of American, and of the close of Texian Independence. As a Nation the Republic of Texas will this day cease to exist; but the light of her extinguished Star will re-appear with increased luster with in the circle of our own effulent Constellation; and henceforth the glories of Yorktown and of San Jacinto will be the common inheritance of one free and united people."

[MSM2]
The Executive has been polite enough place in our hands the following correspondence between Major Donelson and the Government of Texas, along with a printed document, communicated to the Congress of Texas, and comprising some of the mysteries of the Treaty with Mexico. It implicates Mr. President Jones in the extraordinary transactions. We hasten to lay them before our readers. This ridiculous negotiation, at which the courts of England and France will have some cause to blush—every way ridiculous, as well on account of the scheme itself, as of the conduct of its agents. (Elliot and Saligny.) and of its unqualified and unanimous rejection by the Senate of Texas, will reflect some light on the absurd and new-fangled doctrine of M. Guizot, about the balance of power on the American continent. How ridiculous, that after all this scenery, machinery, and doctorations—after all this elaboration of machinery—all this working of the wires—all these trips of the Eurydice back wards and forwards—the Mexican Treaty should have been unanimously rejected. The whole drama, indeed, is more ridiculous than any farce which was ever played upon the French or English stage. The papers, which we here lay before our readers, were received in this city last evening. They were to Galveston by Col. Samuel H. Marshall of Nashville, Tennessee, the brother-in-law of Judge Catros, who died at Galveston of a fever caught from exposure to the sun in the prairies on his way to that place. They were brought from Galveston by Captain Foster, in the revenue cutter Woodbury, who arrived at New Orleans on the 4th of July, and a letter from New Orleans, which encloses the to our Government, states, upon the authority of Captain Fowler, a report which had reached Galveston, that Major Donelson was seriously ill; but "I hope, (says the New Orleans Correspondent.) that the report is without foundation." The Congress of Texas was to adjourn, by resolution, on the 28th June. Department of State Washington, June 23, 1845.

The undersigned, Attorney-General of the Republic of Texas, charged ad interim with the direction of the Department of State, by order of His Excellency, the President, has the honor of transmitting to the Hon. Mr. Donelson, Charge d’Affaires of the United States, near this government, the enclosed copy of a joint resolution, Department of State, by order of His Excellency, the President, has the honor of transmitting to the Hon. Mr. The undersigned, Attorney-General of the Republic of Texas, charged ad interim with the direction of the resolution, on the 28th June. Department of State Washington, June 23, 1845.

The undersigned charge d’affaire of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge communication the Hon. Mr. Ebner Allen of this date, transmitting an official copy of the joint resolution which has been adopted by the Congress of Texas, on the 21st of March ultimo, and this day received and approved by the President, declaring the consent of the existing government of this Republic to the terms of the proposition for annexation, tendered by the United States, through the Hon. Mr. Donelson, on the 31st of March ultimo, to the government and people of Texas.

To all true friends of the great cause of annexation, and especially to the Hon. Mr. Donelson, whose energies and talents have been so ably and faithfully devoted to the success of that cause through the several stages of its recent triumphant progress, it must be peculiarly gratifying to observe the harmony and unanimity with which this resolution has passed the two houses of Congress, and received the Executive approval. Rejecting the idea of separate nationality, although commended to their choice by the proffered recognition of their independence by Mexico, and the countenance of powerful European sovereignties, the people of this country have thus evinced, by most decided manifestations, their strong by natural preference for the advantages of a voluntary incorporation into the American Union, and their strong attachment to the free institutions of that great and glorious Republic. Among the features of the resolution, it must be gratifying to the Hon. Mr. Donelson and his government to observe that provision, whereby the acts of the convention, to meet on the 4th proxima, are clothed with all the sanctions which can result from the concurring approval and consent of the executive, and the representatives of the people; and not less gratifying, the undersigned trusts, will be the assurance necessarily resulting from the premises, that the various steps yet to be taken on the part of this republic to perfect, so far as depends upon her, the measure of annexation upon the proposed basis, will be adopted with the same promptness and fidelity which have distinguished her preceding movements in the great cause, and to that confiding spirit of firm reliance upon the magnanimity and generosity of the United States, which has ever characterized the policy of her government and the dispositions of her people. The undersigned renews to Mr. Donelson, the assurance of his high regard, and remains his most obedient servant.

Ebner Allen.

Hon. A. J. Donelson.
Charge d’affaire of the United States.

The undersigned charge d’affaire of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge communication the Hon. Mr. Allen of this date, transmitting an official copy of the joint resolution which has been adopted by the Congress of Texas, giving the consent of their existing government for her admission as State of the federal Union and also giving the same consent to the steps which had been previously taken by this Excellency the President, to obtain from the people the requisite sanction for the measure on their part, on the terms offered by the United States. That this measure should be so acceptable to the existing Government and people of Texas a high proof of its wisdom; and its consummation in the manner described the Hon. Mr. Allen is no less honorable to the two countries than it is auspicious of the success and perpetuity of the principles of the Federal Union. The undersigned will value it as the most fortunate event of his life, to have been associated, as public agent, with the preparation and maturity of the steps which were necessary to the accomplishment of the measure; and he recurs therefore, with a just sensibility to the responsibility devolved upon him, to the flattering assurance he has received from this Government of the manner in which he has performed his duty. With equal sincerity, the undersigned bears testimony to the early determination of his Excellency, the President, to refer the proposals offered by the United States to the Congress and people of Texas, and to execute faithfully their decision upon them. And he also bears testimony to the uniformly kind and courteous manner in which the Hon. Mr. Allen has conducted the negotiation on the part of his Government. And the undersigned renews to Mr. Allen assurances of the high regard with which he continues.

His most obedient servant, A. J. Donelson.

Hon. Ebenezer Allen Attorney General of Texas and Acting Secretary of State.

Correspondence. Relating to a Treaty of Peace between Mexico and Texas, upon the basis of an acknowledgement of the Independence of the latter.

Executive Department. Washington, June 18, 1845.

To the honorable the Senate: The Executive herewith respectfully transmits to your honorable body, for its constitutional advice and action, the “conditions preliminary to a treaty of peace between Mexico and Texas,” signed on the part of the (not readable) at the city of Mexico, on the 19th of May, ultimo, together with an addition declaration made by the Government of Mexico, of the same date, in connexion with these conditions. The correspondence connected with the above is also transmitted for the information of the Senate. The Executive requests the Senate to return the original the original papers so soon they shall have received its examination and action. Anson Jones. [Translation] Legation of France in Mexico.

Mr. President, I am happy be able to announce to your Excellency, that the Mexican Government, after having obtained the authorization of the two Chambers of Congress, has acceded to the four preliminary articles which the Secretary of State of Texas had remitted to the Charges de Affaire of France and England hope your government, and which these last had transmitted to me, and to the minister of G.B.M to be presented to the Executive power of Mexico. The act of acceptation, clothed with the necessary forms, will be handed by Mr. Elliot to the Secretary of State of the Texian Government and your Excellency will thence find yourself in a situation to name commissioners to negotiate with Mexico the definitive treaty between Mexico and Texas. The success, which has crowned our efforts has only been obtained by much management of susceptibilities.

But I should say that the dispositions of the Executive power have never appeared doubtful to me, and that they give the hope of a solution proper to satisfy the two parties, and assure their reciprocal well-being. If, in the course which must be given to this affair, I can contribute to the wise views and sound policy which animate your Excellency, I shall lend myself to it with so much the more zeal, that it relates to the accomplishment of a work useful to humanity; and if the result answers to our hopes I shall consider the results which I have taken in it as one of the deed for which I may most applaud myself in my diplomatic career.

Receive, Mr. President, the assurances of the high consideration with which I am your Excellency’s very humble and obedient servant.

Baron Alleye De Cyprey.

[Translation] The Minister of Foreign Affairs and Government of the Mexican Republic has received the preliminary propositions of Texas for an arrangement of definitive treaty between Mexico and Texas, which are of the following tenor: Conditions preliminary to a treaty of peace between Mexico and Texas.

1. Mexico consents to acknowledge the independence of Texas.
2. Texas engages that she will stipulate in the treaty not to annex herself, or become subject to any country whatever.
3. Limits and other conditions to be matter of arrangement to the final treaty.
4. Texas will be willing to remit disputed points respecting territory and other matters to the arbitration of umpires.

Ashbel Smith Secretary of State.

The Government of the Republic has asked, in consequence, of the national Congress the authority which has granted, and which is of the following tenor:

The Government is authorized to hear the propositions which Texas has made, and to proceed to the arrangement or celebration of the treaty, that may be fit and honorable to the Republic, giving an account to Congress for its examination and approval.” In consequence of the preceding authority of the Congress of the Mexican Republic, the undersigned, Minister of Foreign Affairs and Government, declares: That the supreme Government receives the four articles above mentioned as the preliminaries of a formal and definitive treaty, and further, that it is disposed to commence the negotiation (as soon as) Texas may desire, and to receive the commissioners which she may name for this purpose.

Additional Declaration.

It is understood, that, besides the four preliminary articles proposed by Texas, there are other essential and important points which ought also to be included in the negotiation, and that if this negotiation is not realized on account of circumstances or because Texas, influenced by the law passed in the United States for annexation, should consent thereto, either directly or indirectly, then the answer which under this data is given to Texas by the undersigned Minister for Foreign Affairs, shall be considered as null and void.

Executive Department. Washington (Texas) June 6, 1845

Sir, I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency’s letter of the 20th ultimo; which, together with the official documents referred to in it, and be which Mexico has given Texas, upon the basis of an acknowledgment of the independence of the latter, were handed me by Mr. Elliot, Charge d’Affaires of her Britannic Majesty near this Government, on the 2d inst. For your kindness and courtesy in transmitting these interesting and important papers, as well as for your valuable services in producing the result which they announce to me, and the offer of a continuance of the same good offices whenever they can be useful, I beg you to accept my best thanks. Should the result be the establishment of a good understanding, and a lasting peace between the Governments of Texas and Mexico, with the concurrence of their people, the cause of humanity will assuredly be greatly indebted to your efforts, in its behalf. I have the honor to transmit you, herewith, for such disposition as you may think proper to make of them, certified copies of the proclamation issued by me on the 4th inst. Announcing to the people the agreement of Mexico to the preliminaries of peace, and the consequent cessation of hostilities between the two countries. The Congress of Texas will assemble on the 16th of the present month, and a convention on the 4th of July proximo. These bodies have been convened to consider the propositions made by the government of the United States on the subject of annexation. The subject of our relations with Mexico will also be present to them, and their decisions will necessarily govern my (more action in reference to the same.) Accept, sir, the assurances of high consideration and respect with which I remain, your Excellency’s most obedient servant.

Anson Jones.

To his Excellency.

REv42i20p2c3 July 15, 1845 The Heat of War

By yesterday’s Southern mail, we received the N.O. Tropic of the 7th inst., from which we extract some interesting intelligence from Mexico. It seems that the Congress have passed, and the Executive sanctioned, a decree full of warlike sound, earnestly invoking all her “children” to the defence of the National Independence, and alleging that “the Government will put under arms all the force of the army” and “use all her resources and power to resist said aggression (the annexation of Texas) to the uttermost” This looks very formidable on paper, but, as we are assured at the same time, that the Mexican finances are very low, and that the Government officers have great difficulty in getting one-fourth of their salaries, it may and will be presumed, that her “resources and power” are in the most wretched condition, and that “all the force of the army” must be trifling indeed, without the resources to pay the necessary expenses of a campaign. When we reflect, moreover, that revolutions are daily breaking out, and that the river Nueces and other water course in Texas are so swollen by rain as to be impassable, and will probably remain in that situation for some months, so as to prevent an invasion by the Mexicans from that quarter, we may put our minds at ease, as to an early commencement of hostilities for the “unjust despoliation” of Texas, which Mexico herself had agreed to recognise as an independent Republic. For appearance sake and to appease the rabid partisans of Santa Anna, the Mexican Government may talk of war and may issue fearful decrees, but they have not the courage, nor the means to force hostile measures upon the United States; armed as the latter are with the weapons of liberty and justice, and united as they will be in opposing foreign invasion, from whatever quarter it may come. But should “madness rule the hour,” and a skirmish ensue, (for such an equal contest would not deserve the name of war,) our people will be gratified to know, that their Government have adopted wise and energetic measures to meet the worst state of things that can ensue. The Tropic has the following “Military Movements. The steamboat Yazoo arrived here on Friday evening from Fort Jesup, with five companies of the 4th regiment U.S. Infantry, which proceed immediately to the Barracks below the city. The steamboat Rodolph arrived yesterday bringing from the same Military Post, the staff officers of the 3d and 4th Regiments of Infantry, and three companies of troops which also proceeded to the Barracks. The 1st Regiment of U.S. Dragoons, commanded by Col. Twiggs, has proceeded by land from Fort Jesup for the Rio Grande.

“Military. We learn that Company “E,” 3d regiment U.S. Artillery, left Charleston on the 57th ult. on board the brig Hayne, under the command of 1st Lieut. Braxton Bragg, accompanied by 1st Lieut. George H. Thomas and 2d Lieut. D. H. Hill, destined for New Orleans. As soon as the Joint Resolution was sanctioned by our Government, instant steps were taken by the Executive to project the people of Texas, in the new contingency in which they were placed and now, that Texas is virtually an integral part of our country, the people will commend the whole course of the Administration for their prudent and efficient arrangements to secure the new response against all hazards at the same time taking no step to violate existing Treaties, or, unnecessarily, disturb the amicable relations between the two nations. But to the last news.

[From the New Orleans Tropic July 7.) From Mexico. The schooner Creole, Capt. Frank, from Vera Cruz arrived here yesterday, having sailed on the 24th ult. An accident occurred on board the Creole during her voyage; which proved fatal to the steward and endangered the safety of the vessel. A casket of spirits took fire whilst the steward was in the act of drawing off some for use; the cask burst; and it was with great difficulty the fire was subdued—the injuries received by the steward caused his death. He was buried at the Balize. Capt. Frank reports that Gen. Bustamente arrived at Vera Cruz on the 17th ult.; and offered his services to sustain the integrity of the Mexican territory and the dignity of the Republic. He was rather coolly received by the Government and it is reported that he refused the military honors rendered him on his arrival. It was believed that his return was not invited by any party, and that he had no desire to meddle in public affairs. The people generally were quiet, and not at all alarmed, not withstanding the war cries made by the Federalists and the partisans of Santa Anna, who are loud in denouncing the Government for want of energy. The state of the finances was presumed to be pretty low, as the officers in the employ of the government found great difficulty in obtaining one fourth of their salaries. Business was very dull. The publication of the new tariff law was daily anticipated. The vomito, or yellow fever, was prevailing to a very aggravated extent at Vera Cruz. Capt Frank reports that the French sloop of war La Perouse arrived at Vera Cruz on the 24th, from Galveston, with intelligence of the action the Texan Congress, on the Annexation question.

Mr. Jon Cumminger, of this city, bearer of dispatches to the U.S. Government, came passenger in the Creole. We submit the following letter from our Vera Cruz correspondent:

[Correspondence of the Tropic.] Vera Cruz, 22d June, 1845.

Dear Sir: I had the pleasure of receiving by the schr. Creole, from your part, several copies of the Tropic, for which I am obliged. Here every body is anxiously expecting news from Texas, as to whether it will be annexed to the United States.

The Senate has returned to the Chambers the Dictamen respecting the new Tariff, but whether in favor or against mercantile interests is not yet known. The Ex-acting President, General Canalsio, and Ex-Minister of War, General Basadre, not accepting the propositions made them by Government, to be expatriated for ten years, have been imprisoned for the same term, the former in the castle of Perote, and the latter in that of San Juan de Ullon. On the 7th inst, an attempt at revolution was made in the Capitol, at the head of which was General Rangel, who made prisoners of Herara, president ad interim, and some of his Ministers, but it was put an end to in less than an hour by the discomfiture of the revolutionists; some 20 persons lost their lives between citizens and soldiers. Rangel escaped, has since been taken, tried, and condemned to lose his military honors, and to ten years' imprisonment. I am afraid this country will never a state of tranquility. General Tornel has been dispatched to Matamoras, as although he took no active part in the fray, yet he is considered a malcontent, and likely to assist any revolutionary project against the present Government. A decree has been passed by the Congress, and sanctioned by the Executive, the substance of which is:

"That the National Congress of the Mexican Republic, considering that the Chambers of the United States, sanctioned by a decree of the Executive, have resolved to incorporate the Territory of Texas to the American Union, and that this mode of appropriating foreign territories, of which other foreign nations are the rightful owners, introduces a monstrous novelty of great importance to the peace of the world, and detrimental to the sovereignty of nations. That this usurpation, thus consummated to the prejudice of Mexico, has been insidiously preparing for a length of time, whilst the most cordial friendship has been proclaimed, and whilst this Republic has scrupulously respected the existing treaties between her and the United States.

"That the aggregation of Texas to the United States tramples under foot all the conservative principles of societies, attacks all the right that Mexico posses on said territory, is an insult to her dignity as a sovereign nation and threatens her independence and political being. That those principles which served as the basis to the treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation, and especially that of the precise limits even in treaties previous of 1830, been threatened on the part of the United States are considered violated by that nation. "And finally, That the unjust defoliation of which she wishes to make the Mexican nation the victim, constitutes a just right to use all her resources and power to resist said aggression to the uttermost.

Decrees.

1st. The Mexican nation convokes all her children (hijos) to the defence of the National Independence threatened by the usurpation of the territory of Texas, which is included to be carried into effect by the decree of annexation passed by the Chambers and sanctioned by the President of the United States.

2nd. In consequence of which the Government will put under arms all the force of the army, conformably to the authority conceded by the existing laws—and for the preservation of public order, sustaining the Institutions, and if necessity requires, to serve as a reserve to army; the Government using the faculties conceded on the 9th December, may raise forces, of which the said decree speaks, under the name of Defenders of the Independence and of the Laws.

Mexico, 4th June.

The U.S. schr. Onkahie arrived here the 19th inst., and left again on the 20th, but I have not heard that she brought any news. The U. States squadron left here some seven or eight days ago for Pensacola. Business is very dull, both here and in the interior; nothing at present is selling, nor can a revival be expected until the new Tariff is known, which, it is to be hoped, will be soon, as merchants will not shop until the new Tariff is known, which, it is to be hoped, will be soon, as merchants will not ship until they are certain what duties will be levied.

It is also hoped that a good many prohibited articles will again be allowed to come in. The treasury is in a most miserable state of poverty; employees, soldiers, sailors, etc., receiving scarcely any pay, all the engineers of the steamers have come on shore, as on board they could not even get provisions, they are determined not to return until they are paid—and, as the Mexicans say; "quien sabe" when that will be, as but few goods are coming, or will come, for some months. The Conducta from Mexico arrived here on the 18th inst. Bringing about $430,000. Without further to add,
I remain, respectfully, your obedient servant.

Since writing what precedes, we have had two arrivals today. The French man-of-war La Perouse from Galveston, which, it is said, brings the purport of which is, however, not yet known, and a schooner from Tabasco, which brings the news of that place having pronounced for Federalism. British Consistency. However strenuously Great Britain may have exerted herself to interfere with our policy and prevent the annexation of Texas, it seems that she has had no scruples in making appropriation to herself of rich and valuable countries—While her great intriguier, Capt. Elliot, who turns out to be the identical "man in the white hat," a creature as mysterious as the celebrated "man with the iron mask," was floating from Texas to Mexico, in the absurd hope of defeating annexation; that grasping nation, and arrogant "Mistress of the Seas," fertile in resources, has had other intriguers in different portions of the world successfully engaged in promoting annexation for her own benefit. In the proceedings of the British Parliament, we see that Mr. Chas. Buller made an able speech, and characterized "the annexation of New Zealand" as a work congenial with the British national temperament and character, and urgently imposed upon Great Britain by the conditions of unnatural existence, of which the objects are, "to extend the employment of our shipping and our seamen—to secure new sources of supply for the raw materials for our Manufactures,“ and open markets independent of the policy of other nations—to provide the destitute with a home, where honest labor may insure a subsistence, to augment the influence of the British name, and to spread over the farthest ends of the earth our language, our arts, and our institutions." It is all right in Great Britain to aggrandize herself by the annexation of these Islands, of such vast commercial and political importance, and so full of beauty, productiveness and salubrity; it is, on her part, most honorable and proper to extend her power over the most distant portions of the earth, and to plant her heavy foot upon those islands, by means of simple colonization. All this is noble and just in Great Britain.

But when the United States welcome to her Union a Republic of kindred character—one that has been declared independent by Great Britain and other great nations, and is necessary to us, in order to check the invasion of foreign influence and ambition—then the tune is changed. Our people are represented as stimulated by a wild and lawless spirit of self-aggrandizement; Great Britain arrogantly interferes, throws into the question her most finished intriguier, and actually humbugs our oldest ally, France, into a support of British policy. England may, if she choose, annex New Zealand, or even Patagonia, the land of Giants, as we learn by the last accounts, we shall not interfere. Upon the same principle, we expect her to act towards us. She has made a ridiculous failure in her late diplomacy—and we trust that she has become nauseated with the whole Texas question. We can scarcely believe, that she will take the responsibility of tampering with our rights in Texas, now so near completion.

REv42i20p4c3 July 15, 1845 Whig Press on Annexation
The Norfolk Herald, alluding to the question of annexation, says: "Our mere party opposition to the measure is removed, and, on the scope of national policy, we offer no objection; we believe it will ultimately be found to be of necessity to the welfare and defence of the country as the acquisition of Florida and Louisiana, (of which it is claimed to be a part.) There are strong arguments against it, we admit. There is no specific power in the Constitution to cover the ground." The Herald, at the same time, lashes the anti-slavery people of the North for not having "secured the election" of Mr. Clay, who, according to the Herald, would have exerted all his influence to defeat annexation. His known opposition to it, and his election by the Abolitionists, would have so far influence the Whigs of Congress, as to exclude Texas forever. And yet the Whigs in Virginia urged the election Mr. Clay as the surest means of securing Texas. Is it not a source of pleasure, to every Republican, that, by voting for Mr. Polk, he not only vindicated the true cause, but rendered annexation certain, and without qualification? Look at another wing of Whiggery, and see what savage threats are made by the New York Tribune. So far from surrendering, that journal is for "war to the knife." His mutterings of wrath are terrible: "We tell them again, that the adversaries of annexation have not given up the contest, as they assert, and will not give it up while we have a gun which can be brought to bear. We shall make a stand in Congress on every inch of holding ground—on the consummation of the gigantic inequity, directly, on the slave clause of the constitution of the new State; and on the admission into the Union of each new slaveholding State which may be formed from Texan territory.

Petitions from the people against admitting Texas with a constitution guaranteeing eternal slavery, will pour into the next Congress with a million of signatures. A case will probably be made up for the Supreme Court, to test there the validity of an act which even the Courier declares a violation of the Constitution. Of course, it has not a shadow of rightful force; and we may fairly presume, that the Supreme Court will pronounce it null and void. Conspirators! You have won an advantage over us by treachery and deceit! But do no calumniate us by saying we have laid down our arms—Come and take them!" Conspirators!" would better suit the character of such men as the editors of the Tribune, & c., who have taken a pledge not to aid our country in a foreign war, forced upon us by annexation. We shall not pretend to answer the budget of arguments brought forward by the tribune; we find it well done by another Whig ally, the N.Y. Express—in whose views we fully concur. The cool manner in which the Express cuts up all the assumptions of the Tribune, must grate on the ear of the latter gentle, passionless editor. "The 'guns,' and the 'stand,' and the 'Petitions,' too, will all be in vain. There will not be more than ten or twelve Senators in Congress voting now against the annexation of Texas. The Southern and Southwestern Whigs deem the question settled, and will agitate against it no more. It is only a sectional question now, and the weaker section is rent in twain, one great party going with the South. There is no doubt, too, that the active interference of England and France to prevent annexation, has swollen the strength of those who, in this country, have desired to see it brought about.: The N.Y. Courier says: "Our firm belief is, that the whole country will be greatly benefited by that eve, while, instead of weakening, it will add greatly to the strength of the Union. Sub we know, were not the opinions of most of the Northern people some months since, but time and reflection, have opened their eyes measurably to the true merits of the question.

REV42i20p4c5 July 15, 1845 Singular Coincidence

- The good people of New Orleans received, by the sloop Cutter, the news of the annexation of Texas, on Thursday evening, July 3d—the same day that the intelligence by the Princeton reached Washington City. It came just in time to give a new zest to the celebration of the 4th. As an evidence of the joyous feeling produced by the reception of the news, we quote from the Picayune of the 4th July.

"This should indeed by a day of jubilee for the citizens of Louisiana. The news of the annexation of Texas reached us last evening, as if in swell the triumphant shouts with which all will hail the dawn which ushers in our independence. We regret that the news did not reach here at an earlier day, so that millions instead of thousands might raise their voices on so grand an anniversary in admiration and applause of the triumph achieved over European arts and diplomacy—Here at least as bumpers shall be quafed to the "The Day we Celebrate," and the memory of those who have made it immortal, the health of those whose influence effected this grand national achievement will not be forgotten." There is not much information in addition to what we have already. We cul from the Picayune a few items: "From the foregoing, it will be seen how signaliy have failed the intrigues and machinations of Elliot, Jones, Saligny & co., to prevent the Annexation of Texas. Speaking of Elliot, the Galveston News says, that 'the people of Texas are under obligations of gratitude to him for surely if any one man has done more than another to advance the cause of Annexation, he is the cone.' Complimentary, very. 'The news of the passage of the Annexation resolutions caused not a little excitement at Galveston. Salutes were fired, and other demonstrations of rejoicings were given."Jose Antonio Navarro, who was an long confined a prisoner in Mexico, has been elected a delegate to the Convention from Bexaf. Volney E. Howard, formerly of Mississippi, has also been elected from the same county. "Two vessels have arrived at Galveston from Bremen, having on board 185 German emigrants. "More trouble is anticipated from the Camanches.

Some of them who have recently bee in at Torrey's Trading House, did not receive as many presents as they desired, when the hostile looks and muttered threats of man of the warriors showed that they are yet by no means disposed to bury the hatchet. The United States Dragoons, we have little doubt, will set these savages right. "Mr. Gardner, ex-sheriff of Fayette county, was killed in a duel at La Grange a few days since. "The accounts of the crops in every section of Texas are very flattering "All appeared to be quiet on the frontiers." "We learn that Gen. Taylor, in command of the troops at Fort Jesup, has received orders from the War Department to the following effect: the 3d and 4th regiments of Infantry are to move immediately to some point in the neighborhood of this city, there to wait until the action of the Texon Convention, which meets today at Austin, is known, when they will probably move by water to Corpus Christi, or some other place in that neighborhood.

The 4th regiment, it is thought, will reach the barracks below our city today or tomorrow. "The 2d Dragoons, under Col. Twiggs, will be ordered to proceed to the Rio Grande by land at the same time the infantry starts by water. The Department, we have heard it rumored, recommended the dragoons to march on foot, probably deeming that there would not be sufficient forage for their horses. The officers in command, however, and very wisely and justly to our thinking, have resolved not to dismount this valuable command, knowing that the portions of Texas to be traversed offered the most ample subsistence. "Since writing the above, we learn by the De Soto, that the steamboats Yazoo, Cote Joyeuse, Rodolph and De Soto, have been chartered by the Government to convey the two infantry regiments mentioned above to this city. When the De Soto left Grand Ecore, the troops were marching in preparatory to the embarkation."

-The Washington correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce says that Governor Shannon, late Minister to Mexico, has made a full communication to the State Department, on the subject of the results of his mission, the present condition and policy of Mexico, and the character of our relation with that Government. The letter adds: Mr. Shannon fully confirms the truth of what had been strongly surmised before, that the British Government had got some hold upon the Californias. She has taken a mortgage upon them to secure the payment to her subjects of debts to the amount of twenty six millions of dollars. Our Government has, I learn, official knowledge of this transaction. That Great Britain will foreclose the mortgage, in due time, I have not the least doubt. The fine bays and harbors of that region are of immense importance to her—vastly more so than the Oregon territory. In the even of a war between the United States and Mexico, the Californias would become ours unless Great Britain herself mingled in the strife, and, under present circumstances, she would hardly hazard an unnecessary war. Her policy is manifestly to make a peaceably acquisition. She may, moreover, secure a lasting peace with this country by yielding her claim to Oregon, as she may well afford to do, if she is to have the undisturbed possession of the Californias. [MSM2]

The Vera Cruz Siglo Diez y Nueve, of the 9th ult., furnishes force composing the Mexican Navy at Vera Cruz. It is as follows:

Steamer Guadalone, 778 tons, two 68 pounders amidships, four 12 pound carronades, and one mortar.
Steamer Montezuma, 1100 tons, one 68 pounder amidships, two 32 pounders for carronades, and one mortar.
Brig Mexicana; one 12 pounder amidships, and fourteen 18 pound carronades.

unreadable). All of them without one exception are in want of men, of rigging, and other indispensable necessaries to fit them out for sea in order to do some service.”

REv42i21p4c3 July 18, 1845 The Approaching Crises had hoped that the croaking note of disaffection to the country’s honor and rights, on account of annexation, would have been confined to the New York Tribune, Boston Atlas, and a few of the fanatical crew. We did not think it possible, that in the vast West, full of an active and rapidly improving population—occupying the middle ground between the land established society of the Atlantic States, and an extensive wilderness roamed over by the red men of the forest alone—and, form their very position, calling for a vigorous and united action of the whole country, for the maintenance and strengthening of the national power—we did not think it possible, that there we should hear a voice raised, or a doubt whispered, as to the solemn obligation of every American to meet the crisis, which may yet arrive. But we ‘were deceived.’ The Cincinnati Atlas of the 9th July, in its undisguised horror at the addition of the new slave States to the Union by the admission of Texas, is carried away into an assertion of principles, abhorrent to the feeling of a patriot. It contends that, by the action of the Texan Congress, “we are at this moment virtually at war with Mexico.” Alluding to the prospect of England and France aiding and abetting Mexico in her resistance to our “aggressions,” the Atlas draws a picture, not too gloomy, of the horrors of war, and lays down the correct doctrine that, “in a case of self-defence, or where our rights and liberties are wantonly invaded, we hold, that whatever the calamities attendant on war may be, they should be promptly encountered, and with the united energy of a whole and mighty nation, a terrible example should be set to all tyrants and wanton invaders of the rights of others.” Here, his patriotism is exhausted and looking with the jealous eye of anti-slavery upon the accomplishment of the “inequity” of Texas annexation; it thus pours forth its revilings upon the acts and motives of the friends of that great measure, so gloriously concluded: “But un an unjust cause, in a war where we are the aggressors—in a war where one part of the Union seeks to obtain an undue and odious advantage over another part—where the black standard of Slavery floats in the breeze and calls upon their country to rally under it—will they obey the call? In such a war would he North—the real bone and sinew of the Nation—freely furnish men and munitions to fight the disgraceful battles of Slavery? Would they forsake their manufactories, their ploughs and fireside, in this Southern crusade for Slavery, and help to rivet upon themselves and their children the ascendancy of the Slave power in the Councils of the Nation, to render the free labor of their own hands, and of their descendants subservient to slave labor, and to the capricious policy of their Masters! In such a war, we should anticipate nothing but dishonor, discomfiture and disgrace. It would naturally fail with most severity upon those who provoked it. It might terminate in the total extinction of Slavery—or in a dissolution of the Union.” If these doctrines be carried out, what an easy prey would this great and beautiful land be to foreign ambition! The people of the free States, actuated by a dislike of slavery, would refuse to assist their Southern neighbors in the defence of their domestic institutions, guaranteed to them by the Constitution, whose broad holds envelope the whole country. By a similar argument, and with similar feeling, the people of the South, indignant at the Government monopoly extended to the free States, at the sacrifice of Southern interests, might withhold their aid to their Northern neighbors, assailed by a foreign foe. In either event, our country would be overrun by foreign armies, and the American Eagle droop his wings forever. Does not the Atlas perceive the absurdity, the wickedness, the treason of its views.] But it has grossly misstated the merits of the question. Should Mexico, even with the aid of European powers, force us into a hostile attitude, our cause would be “unjust,” and we should not be the “aggressors.” Texas was acknowledged to be independent by the greatest nations of the earth.

Her true glory and permanent offer a test to her to seek an alliance with the American Union. We embrace the offer, because it was all important that we should interpose and effectual barrier against foreign aggression, in an otherwise defenceless quarter; and, moreover, the connection was clearly calculated to benefit all sections of our Union. Experience had proved, that Mexico was powerless, as far as she aimed to control the growing energies of Texas. Where, then, was the “aggression” on our part! The achievement of annexation is stained by no violation of justice or honor, save in the eyes of the Mexican tyrants, and such narrow spirited creatures as the Cincinnati Atlas. The question, after having been violently though vainly opposed by a great political party, principally on anti-slavery grounds, at length signally triumphed. From Maine to Louisiana the people enthusiastically sustained it, and it is now a national question, and will be defended by the masses, upon its national merits. It is in vain for the Atlas to excite the jealousies of the north by its fanatical appeals—it is in vain to invite foreign interference and assault by meanly and treacherously assailing the honor and patriotism of the Northern masses, and representing the real “bone and sinew of the nation” as willing play the traitor to their country in the hour of peril. That journal miscalculates the feelings of the people. North and South, the masses will rush to the defence of their country’s rights and honor, and none but a few vile fanatics will be seen to stand back, when the struggle shall begin. The Atlas may “anticipate,” nay, may desire “dishonor, discouragement and disgrace” if such a contest—but there also will it be disappointed. No rational man can doubt, that such a war, thus forced upon us, will shame the tyrannical power of the invaders, and add new strength to our own system and to the influence of liberal institutions. But far be it from our wishes or expectations, that such an evil should arise. We have supposed the case, in order to hold up to public indignation the miserable want of patriotism avowed by the Cincinnati Atlas, and a few kindred prints. We do not think it likely, that Mexico can collect the men and means, or even the courage, to wage so unrighteous a war upon this nation. Bluster she may for a while, but time and reflection will bring her to her senses, and she will yield to the desires of fate, with the best grace possible under the circumstances. Should war, however, come, we are sure that it would not “fall with severity” upon men like the Editor of the Cincinnati Atlas—for, with the narrow spirit he has show, it would “naturally” be expected that he would keep as far as possible out of harm’s way. The South will bear their share of the battle, as they have always done—and we shall be grossly deceived, if the Northern people do not stand up to their high duties.

REv42i21p4c5 July 18, 1845 Later from Texas

The New Orleans Bulletin of the 8th, received yesterday, announces the arrival on the day before of the steamship McKim, which left Galveston the 3d instant. It contains the correspondence relating to a treaty of Peace between Mexico and Texas, upon the basis of an acknowledgement of the independence of the latter.

This correspondence we gave in full yesterday. After the unanimous rejection by the Senate of the Treaty of Independence between Mexico and Texas, Senator Wright introduce the following resolution, which was adopted by the Senate: Resolved, That the President is respectfully requested to inform the Senate if any other propositions than those confided to this body, have been made by Mexico; and the Senate ask that such propositions, if any, with all correspondence upon the subject, be laid before the Senate; whether any Texian agent, or officer of other description, was employed in negotiating the conditions preliminary to a Treaty with Mexico, now before the Senate; and if so, the person, rank and instructions under which he acted, To which the Secretary of State replied, as follows: Department of State, Washington, June 23, 1845. Sir—In answer to the resolution of the Honorable the Senate, adopted on the 21st inst. And referred to this department, requesting to be informed whether any Texian agent or officer of any other description, was employed in negotiating the conditions preliminary to a Treaty with Mexico now before the Senate; and if so, the person, rank, and instructions under which he acted; I have the honor to reply, that no propositions other than those now before the Senate, have been made by Mexico to this government, and that with these propositions, all correspondence upon the subject, has already been submitted to the Senate. In relation to the request contained in the latter part of said resolutions, I reply respectfully, but categorically, that no Texan agent or office of any description, was employed by this Government in negotiating with Mexico the conditions of that preliminary treaty. I the honor, etc.,

Eben’r Allen,
Act’g Secretary of State

To His Excellence the President Of the Republic of Texas.

We find the following additional items of news:

The President vetoed the bill passed by Congress, to reinstate Commodore Moore to his rank in the Navy. The veto had not been published. Congress passed the subjoined resolutions in relation to this subject, after the President’s veto had been communicated:
Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Republic of Texas, That it is the opinion of this body, that the trial of Post Captain E.W. Moore, under a joint resolution, approved February 5, 1844, by the Special Court Martial convened under that resolution, and the finding of said Court fully entitles Post Captain E.W. Moore to continue in his position as Commander of the Navy of this Republic.

Resolved, That the thanks of the House of Representatives of the Republic of Texas are justly due to Commodore E. W. Moor and those under his command in the service of the Navy of said Republic.

Resolved by the Senate, That it is the opinion of this body, that the trial of Post Captain E.W. Moore, under a joint resolution of the Congress of this Republic, approved February 5th, 1844, by the Special Court Martial convened under said resolution, was final and conclusive.

On the 21st the Senate adopted a resolution declaring that John Tyler, Ex-President of the United States of the North, the zealous and untiring advocate of annexation, the official mover and supporter of the measure, is entitled to the lasting gratitude of the citizens of the Republic.

Throughout Texas, wherever the death of General Jackson had become known, funeral obsequies were in preparation to commemorate the event. Previous to his decease being known at the seat of Government, the following resolutions were adopted unanimously both House of Congress: Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Texas, in Congress assembled, That in the name and in behalf of the people of Texas, we hereby tender to General Andrew Jackson, the unfeigned gratitude of the nation. Be it further resolved, That the President of the Republic of Texas is hereby requested to transmit to Gen. Jackson, to this Excellency the President of the United States, and to the Governs of each of the States and Territories of the American Union, a copy of this joint resolution.

The N.O. Jeffersonian gives the following details:

Congress adjourned on the 28th ultimo. The following is a list of the acts and joint resolutions, passed during the session:

- Joint resolution giving the consent of the existing government to the annexation of Texas to the United States.
- An Act, requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue patents in certain cases.
- Joint Resolution, acknowledging the claim of L.S. Hargone and other.
- Joint Resolution, for the relief of T. Jefferson Chambers.
- An Act, to establish certain mail routes therein named and for other purposes.
- An Act, making appropriations to defray the expenses of the Convention, and granting the members thereof the franking privilege.
- Joint Resolution tendering to General Andrew Jackson a nation’s gratitude.

In reference to the Ashbel Smith negotiation with Mexico, the Telegraph of July 2d remarks: "We did not receive a copy of the propositions made by our Secretary of State to the Mexican Government, until Thursday morning last. We bitterly regret to say, that they are more disgraceful and dishonorable to Texas than we had anticipated. Although they are dated at Washington on the Brazos, we still hope, for the credit of our Government, that they were concluded at Galveston, and that the Executive and his Cabinet knew nothing of them until a copy was sent by Dr. Smith to Washington.

Better would it have been if the hand that signed there had been paralyzed, ere the disgraceful act was consummated.” The Houston Telegraph states, most positively, that neither President Jones, nor any member of his cabinet, with the exception of Mr. Ashbel Smith, was aware of the nature of the negotiations with Mexico, which the latter set on foot, and that the President stated to the Editor, immediately after these negotiations became known in him, “that he considered there was but one measure of policy for the Government to carry out, and that was Annexation.”

REv42i22p1c6 July 22, 1845 Warlike Enough

What will the New York Tribune, Boston Atlas, and their associate anti-slavery fanatics say, to the following bellicose language of the N.Y. Express? They will surely, reprobate it as the ravings of a madman, or as the savage outpourings of a murderous spirit, in behalf of the vile cause of the “slaveocracy”! The Express seems wrought up to the highest war-note. Not satisfied with defensive measure on the soil of Texas, it is for making a “rapid” and decisive attack on Mexico—for summoning Volunteers from California and Coahuila —and for “crushing Mexico, if we can, at the start.” If war should ensue, which we cannot sufficiently believe in Mexican stupidity or madness to expect, the measure advised by the Express will follow as natural consequences. Mexico will not only lose the pearl of Texas, (for it has just slipped through the fingers of her tyrants,) but the splendid palace of the Montezummas, the rich mines of Mexico, the magnificent province of California, with its spacious harbors and glorious climate, & c., will be in danger of falling into the possession of the adventurous Yankees. To us, we are convinced, it will be a “little” war—but to Mexico it will prove full of disaster and end in annihilation. We cannot think, that England and France, anxious as they may be to swell their possessions and to check the spirit of Republican Government by the absurd “balance of power,” will rashly rush into a struggle which will set the whole world in arms, and cause he heated elements of disaffection at home to ferment with new violence. But let the worst come, we shall have right and justice on our side, and shall achieve another glorious triumph, that will protect us, for many long years, from foreign interference and embarrassment.

But to the Express:

“Well then, suppose war comes, what are we to do? Prosecute it with all our might to a rapid end, we say, submitting as we to the Joint Resolutions for annexing Texas, and yielding obedience to the laws of our country, even when we do not approve them, we repeat, let Mr. Polk exert all the constitutional powers he has to make this a rapid war, and to precipitate into an end, and if he is not clothed with power enough, let him summon Congress to an extra session forthwith. Let him concentrate all our disposable naval forces in the Gulf of Mexico, and on the Mexican shores of the Pacific. Let him push forward all of the arm he can spare to the Rio Grande, or land them at Vera Cruz, and threaten Mexico. Let him summon volunteers from California.

Let him concentrate all our disposable naval forces in the Gulf of Mexico, and on the Mexican shores of the Pacific. Let him sound the tocsin by Coahulia. If we are to be cursed with the calamities of a war, let it be a war worthy of our power, and our name, one that will, therefore, end as soon as it is seriously begun. We can, no more than Great Britain, afford to have a little war. Our commerce is too widely scattered, too important, to allow us to have it endangered long. The dangers of collision with foreign harbors through blockading squadrons, and by other means, is too imminent, to allow us to be along time in bringing Mexico to terms. She will court England, court France, court all the world to enlist them against us, and her voice will be heard too with the philanthropists among all mankind. We must therefore crush Mexico, if we can, at the start. Our own safety may depend upon our nipping this war in the bud.” The Express cannot let so good an opportunity escape without pummeling, once more its “loving friends,” the abolitionists. Can language contain a more withering anathema than the following? We rejoice to see the Whigs and Abolitionists thus fighting “like cat and dog.” It augurs well for the good of the country, the safety of the Union.

Last year, the Northern Whigs, from Daniel Webster down to the conductor of the pettiest Whig press, openly courted the “sweet voices” of the abolitionists for Henry Clay—they great opponent of annexation. The fanatics were not, however, conciliated, and most of them voted for their own man. That the “head and front of their offending.” Mr. Polk was elected—annexation triumphed—and the Whigs now consign to the lowest depths of infamy the men, upon whom, before the election, they lavished the sweetest smile. There is, the, double cause for rejoicing in the Democratic ranks—first, that, through the union and zeal of our friends, a great measure was achieved, for the safety of the South and the lasting benefit of the Union; and, secondly because one glorious effect of Annexation has been to set the Northern Whigs and the Abolitionists by the ears, and, thereby, to strip the latter of all power of doing mischief.

From the Democrats they expected nothing but rebuffs. United with the Northern Whigs, as at one time it seemed fearfully probable, they might have shaken the Union. Now, they are cast aside by their old friends “as unclean”—and are thus doomed to the most cruel fare by one of the leading Whig presses: “While urging even these summary measure, however, we shall have cause to shower down imprecations upon the heads of the loathless, and the fanatics of our own country, the real authors of this war. If Birney and his accursed clans were hung on the topmost crags of the Codilleras or hurled alive into the burning craters of Potocatepet, they would but be receiving the fate their foul treason to humanity deserves.”

The Charleston Mercury thus introduces a letter from its Washington correspondent: “Our Washington correspondent starts a point that cannot fail to interest the people of Virginia and Mississippi, and we are persuaded that, whatever choice they may make for the Senate, they will take care that there be no doubt that they elect men who will in good faith carry out the annexation of Texas.” This correspondent throws out a doubt lest in Mississippi and Virginia, U.S. Senators may be elected, who may be disposed “to throw obstacles in the way of the completion of annexation”—either by reviving a “proposition for a division of the territory into slave-holding or non-slave holding States”—or by “mixing it up with some other question” or by “refusing to receive Texas until her boundaries are fixed with Mexico”—or by “insisting upon having Oregon come in with Texas.” The correspondent urges “the importance of men being elected Senators, who are known to be true on this question.” We are satisfied, that the correspondent does injustice, though unintentionally, to the views of a distinguished Virginian who has been named for the high office of Senator.

No man, we are convinced, rejoiced more sincerely over the late glorious action of the Congress of Texas—and, while we have abstained fro any expression of opinion as to the claims of an of the candidates, it will not be traveling beyond our rule to say, that, should he be selected, we should have no tears for the cause of Texas in his hands. Indeed, no man, who will not “In good faith carry out the annexation of Texas,” will stand the smallest chance of promotion before the next Democratic Virginia Legislature. That is a question, upon which the hopes and anxious wishes of Virginia have been poised. It has been intimately connected with the political and personal sentiments of the State, and we sincerely believe that the whole people of Virginia, with but few exceptions, will rejoice at its final achievements. The Mercury and its correspondent may rest at ease upon this point. There is no fear that a Senator will be elected from Virginia, who will not press eagerly for the admission of Texas at once, and free from all embarrassing conditions. It would be a source of mortification, truly that Virginia, who has done as much as any other State for the origination and advancement of this vital measure, should see her high hopes cut down, in the moment of triumph, by one of her own sons. We cannot guess what course will be pursued by Mr. Archer, but we can boldly say, that next Winter, Virginia will have one Senator who will go as far as the farthest to completing this national blessing.

The general impression continues to be, what I have before described it, viz. that spite of the threatened war with Mexico—spite of the united hostility of England France—and spite of the lukewarmess of Texan authorities, the great majority of the Texan people are in favor of the annexation, and that therefore it will take place beyond a doubt. With respect to Oregon, it is said that American citizens are pouring into the country—that the American President is dallying as much as possible the negotiations with England; and that these two circumstances will eventually, render the possession of the whole of Oregon by the United States a certainty.

We understand that the immortal Capt. Elliott, the English charge d’affaires to Texas, “the man with the white hat,” is at Mansion House in Brooklyn. (N.Y. Herald)
REv42i23p1c5 July 25, 1845 Mr. Polk’s Position

The Whig press denounced the President as weak, hypocritical and grasping—severe charges, truly, and which a proper public sentiment will require to be sustained by clear and strong evidence, before they will be entitled to credit. On one point the Whig papers seem to unite in their attacks upon Mr. Polk. They take as their text the language of Major Donelson, in his Correspondence with the Texian Government, on the subject of the cession of the public lands of Texas in trust to the United States, with an obligation to apply the proceeds in the extinguishment of the public debt of Texas.

The language of Maj. D., on which the Whigs lay so much stress, is as follows:

"Such a proposition, the President of the United States has empowered the undersigned to say to this Government, if adopted separate and apart from the question of her admission into the Union, and not as a qualification of her acceptance of the terms capitulated in the first and second sections of the joint resolution, shall receive his cordial support, and shall be earnestly recommended to the favorable consideration of Congress."

For this position of the President, he is boldly assailed, as transcending his powers, and deceitfully usurping his authority. A calm review of the history of the Texas negotiation will remove all blame from the President—nay, will show, that a different course would have been a palpable violation of the state's duties to the country. The people of the Union had spoken in a clear and loud voice for the annexation of Texas;—the Congress of the United States had sanctioned it, and had instructed the President to carry out their wishes in achieving this great measure. As was his duty, the President gave such instructions to our charge as were calculated to ring the negotiation to a successfully result. He was well advised of the artful appeals made by England and evinces to seduce Texas from an alliance with the United States.

To counteract these movements, whose sure effect would be the defeat of annexation, the favorite object of the American people, the President, with an energy and propriety which will be sustained by the country, instructed our Charge to the effect, that he should, under his undoubted authority, by the Constitution, to “recommend” to the consideration of Congress “such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient,” bring before them the Texas land and Indian questions, which from motives of interest and justice, ought to be brought under the same system with our own instead of clashing with each other by their separate existence. This is the head and front of his offending.” It was his duty to recommend the measure referred to and it was his duty to inform our Charge of the fact. But, at the same time, he takes care not to pledge our Congress to and action over which he has no control. Congress may adopt or refuse his suggestions as they think best. They are not bound to sustain the views which it is his duty to recommend to fair consideration. For this discharge of his duty, and for securing the union of the two countries, which Congress and the people clearly demanded, the President will be triumphantly sustained. If this be an usurpation of authority, let the Whigs "make the most of it."

REv42i24p2c1 July 29, 1845 The Glorious Consummation

No words of ours are necessary to call attention to the very interesting news from Texas. It will be seen that the assent of the Texas Convention to the terms of the resolution for the Annexation was given on the immorl 4th of July, and that there was not one dissentient voice; for, though Mr. Bache voted against the ordinance, be on the same day signed it, with the other members of the convention. Thus, by the firmness and patriotism of two great Republics, now united into one harmonious whole, have foreign intrigue and ambition been redbuked, and domestic faction and treason prostrated. Full of inspiration as may be theme, it would be a work of supererogation to dilate upon the benefits of this, the greatest even of the age. No arguments are, now, necessary to demonstrate the policy of annexation. The whole country, of all parties, with a few miserable exceptions, have been convinced of the great advantages to flow from it and the question now is, not "who is for Texas," but "who is against Texas." Never have we witnessed a more rapitd change in public sentiment. Not many months ago, the measure was denounced as "an inequity," as originating from motives of ambition and avarice, as the creature of "disunionists" and avaricious speculators,; and as certain to be followed by disunion and war. Now, we hear not a single whisper against it, though the "iniquity" has been consummated. Disunion has hung its head in defeat and shame—Abolition cowers beneath popular execration and the increased solidity of Southern institutions. The whole country is convinced of the immense benefits to be derived from the measure, and thousands of determined opponents, who were carried off by Mr. Clay’s equivocal and mysterious letters, have now returned to their first love, and are warm and ardent advocates of the measure. But war was one of the monsters predicted by the Whigs, as a certain consequence of annexation. We cannot yet believe, that Mexico will be so mad or silly as to risk herself, single-handed, against the American power, strengthened as it is by the stout hearts and strong arms of Texas.

That contingency we look upon as of no consideration. If hostilities be threatened, it will be only a feint, on the part of the Mexican authorities. To ingratiate themselves with the people, and to secure themselves in power, will be their leading motive. That attained, they will be very willing to slip back into their shells, and submit with the best grace possible, to the destiny which they cannot ward off. There is an important question, affecting our revenue, which is now being agitated.

A letter in the Union, dated Galveston, June 23, says that some of the "Importers in Texas are making terms with French and English houses for extensive importations under the present low tariff of Texas, with a view to reshipment to the United States, free of duty, when that (our) government has excluded her revenue laws over the country." The letter goes on to advise that the government of the United States, "by timely prohibitions and arrangements with Texas, should prevent the contemplated frauds, which can be of no use to the people of Texas at large, but will accrue to the sole benefit of the foreign houses." The New Orleans Courier contends, that the only chance of preventing this serious injury to our revenue, is for the Convention of Texas to "insert a clause in their Constitution, to adopt forthwith the present Tariff law of the United States, to be binding on the custom-houses of Texas." We hope that the Convention have been induced, by their duty to themselves and the United States, to adopt such a policy. It would solve the whole difficulty. The Union, examining the question, informs us, that this delicate point has engaged the vigilant attention of our government, and that every legal step will be taken to prevent the glaring mischief threatened. We quote its language: "We deem it our duty to advise capitalists both foreign and domestic, to look well to the consequences before they embark in these perilous speculations or they may find, when it is too late, that they have lost something more than their anticipated profits. The attempt is to evade our revenue laws, by bringing goods into Texas not for the legitimate purpose of consumption there, but for transshipment free of duty, after annexation, into the United States. We can only say, that, for months past the Secretary of the Treasury has had his attention directed to this most important subject, and that the whole power devolved upon him by the constitution and the law will be exerted to defeat these speculations, and protect the revenue, and, as the goods cannot be imported here from Texas free of duties, until after the formal admission of Texas as a State, by the next Congress, that body, will no doubt feel called upon, by special legislation, to guard, to the full extent of its great powers over this subject, against these contemplated evasions of our revenue laws. We say, the, to these speculators,--Beware, the revenue laws cannot be evaded in this manner with impunity." Without pretending to speak positively on the subject, we are inclined to think that since the completion of the contract of annexation, which cannot be recalled without the consent of both the parties contracting. Texas now stands towards us in the light of a territory, applying for admission into our Union, with her Republican Constitution in her hand, to be criticized and canvassed by the U.S. Congress. All admit that we have a right to take possession of the country and defend it with an armed force. Consequently, our troops are now on the soil, prepared to resist invasion from any quarter. Now that Texas is already annexed, by virtue of the acceptance of our joint resolution, have we not a right to establish a system of police as to the revenue, upon the same principle that we take military possession of the country,—And, if so, has not the President the power to send officers to see to the execution of our revenue laws? We throw out these hasty suggestions, though we are not satisfied of their correctness. But of one thing, we feel certain and that is, that our Congress will have the power to enact laws, looking back to the present period of virtual annexation, and providing against any violation of our revenue law, through importations into Texas, while the latter was virtually a portion our confederacy. We presume that it is to this point that the Secretary of the Treasury is looking, as intimated by the Union.

It is much to be desired, however, that the Texas Convention has already done what was right in throwing our revenue laws around Texas. That would remove all difficulty, and save an immense deal of future annoyance and controversy.

It turns out that the British steamer "Unicorn," which arrived at New York from Halifax, was not employed for any deep affairs of States, and had no connection with the critical condition of things between Mexico and Texas. The quidnunes are taken a-back. The Unicorn was brought to New York on a voyage of speculation. The Tribune says, that she has been sold for fifty thousand dollars to a company of Spaniards and Americans, whose intention it is to place her on the line between Havana and New York. She will also touch at Vera Cruz and Carthagena —supplying the heretofore deficient link in this great chain of steamship inter-communication between England and the Western

Annexation Ratified—Death of Vice President K. Anderson—Incursions and Depredations of the Indians—General News.

By the arrival of the brig Hope Howes, Capt. B.G. Shaw, from Galveston, yesterday, we are apprised of the glorious and gratifying fact, that the question of Annexation has been finally consummated. Thus, by the honest and unwavering conduct of a free people, have the machinations of traitors at home, and enemies abroad, been foiled and frustrated. Honor to the Republicans of Texas for the part they have taken in the achievement of the purpose.
We give our worthy correspondent’s letter, which embrace a clear and succinct narration of the proceeding of the Convention, up to the latest period at which it were possible to receive Austin news:

Austin, July 7, 1845.

The Convention assembled on the morning of the 4th, and unanimously elected General Rusk to preside over its deliberations. On taking the Chair he made a short address, which was well delivered, and suitable to the occasion.
A committee of fifteen was soon after appointed, who reported by their Chairman, Judge Lipscomb, an ordinance assenting, on behalf of the people of Texas, to the terms of Annexation proposed by the United States Government.
It was adopted with one dissenting voice—but five member absent. It was engrossed, and signed by all the member present.

It is not a little singular, that the only dissenting voice was Richard Bache, the father-in-law of your Secretary of the Treasury, and brother-in-law of the Vice President. After the necessary resolutions were passed for the transmission of the ordinance to the United States, a resolution was offered by Col. Love, and unanimously adopted:

“That the wear crape on their left arm for one month, as a testimony of regret for the decease of General Jackson.”

Whatever differences of opinion may exist, as regards his political acts, elsewhere, Texas owes him a debt of

(From the N.O. Commercial Bulletin) President Jones’s veto of the joint resolution passed by Congress to restore Com. Moore to his command in the Navy, and to allow him pro rata pay since he has been removed from his command is published in the Galveston News of the 12th. The reason assigned for the veto are, first, relative the removal of Com. M, that the verdict of the court by which he was tried and fully sustained by the testimony adduced, and that dismissal from the service was the slightest punishment the law permitted for the offence of which he was found guilty. That the Executive is the only department, and therefore that Congress has unconstitutionally assumed a function not belonging to the legislative department. “The sympathies of Congress and the Executive might indeed be invoked in his individual behalf.” Says President Jones, “but it might well be refused, unless Antonio Lannois, James, Hodgins, Isaac Allen and Wm. Simpson who were executed at the yard arm of the Ship Austin, by hanging for one hour, and until dead, for a similar offence, by order of Capt. Moore, while under arrest himself, could be restored to life and partake of its efficacy. Could the deep give up its dead, and the sympathy claimed be made general in its operation, the Executive would listen to its dictates. But he can never sanction a rule which hangs the poor sailor, and rewards his officer for offences of congenial character.” To the allowance of pro rata pay it is objected that Com M. Stand indebted the Treasury of the Republic to the amount of $50,875.30, which he has drawn since June, 1842, and has not accounted for, besides an amount standing to his debit in the Auditor’s books at Austin, and claims $20,00 for debts contracted by him, making an aggregate for which he is held accountable, of between seventy and one hundred thousand dollars; and that, should the joint resolutions become law, he would be virtually release from all responsibility to refund or account for this amount, and besides that the allowance of pay which was proposed, “could only be viewed as a reward for disobedience and insubordination to the laws and authorities of the country.”

Col. W. G. Cooke, Secretary of War, left Washington on the 29th ult., with the intention of proceeding to Bexar for the purpose of effecting a treaty with the portion of the tribe of Comanche Indians known as Santa Anna’s party. The National Register states that the place of meeting is on the Pierdanales, in Bexar county. This Santa Anna is a noted marauder, at the head of a party of about fifty Indians detached from the main tribe. The scene of his depredations has chiefly been our Rio Grande frontier. We learn that a general council of the Comanche tribe will be held in the month of September, on Tahuacana creed, about Torrey’s trading house, for the purpose of celebrating a general treaty of peace.

Our readers will recall to mind the charge of disunion made against the Republican party, during the excited canvass of last year. Texas annexation was charged to be an iniquitous scheme, for the promotion of private avarice and ambition, and disunion was, in Whig logic, the dearest object of the friends of that great measure. They will further remember how the Republican party warded off the unjust assault, and charged upon the lading Whigs of the North a direct avowal of a determination to dissolve the Union, if Texas should be admitted. The famous letter of John Q. Adams and eleven other members of Congress was cited, in which these distinguished Whigs declared that annexation would not only have the effect of dissolving the Union, but would “justify” the dissolution. It now turns out, that there were braggart words, intended to frighten the South from her propriety, and to manufacture capital for the Whig cause, by raising up chimaeras dire, as the certain effect of annexation. With some few disgraceful exceptions, the Northern Whigs seems disposed to make the best of the bargain, and to soothe their indignant feelings by the pleasing prospect of realizing immense commercial benefits from the opening of a rich market for their industry. Finding all opposition to the wishes of the nation to be inefficctual, they have wisely and properly concluded, that annexation, after all, is not such a monstrous violation of right and justice—especially as it affords to private enterprise a new and bountiful field of action. Their interest and their patriotism are made to harmonize in beautiful proportions. Above all, Abolitionism finds itself force to cower beneath the increased strength and consequence of the Southern States. But has this same John Quincy Adams always expressed a holy horror for the extensions of our boundaries? Has he always professed to believe that the addition of a rich territory would produce, and should justify, disunion? Far from it, Mr. A. once acted with the Democratic Party, and wore its honors. When Minister at St. Petersburg, in 1811, he wrote to Elbridge Gerry, then Governor of Massachusetts, a letter which did honor to his patriotic, and broad and liberal views. In this letter he attacks the Federalists for their “readiness for a dissolution of the Union,” the very offence for which he was himself so glaringly responsible, not a year ago. He charges them directly with this grave offence, for he says, “I have known, now more than seven years, the project of the Boston faction against the Union,” and winds up with the following emphatic languages: “If that party, (the Federalists) are not ultimately put down in Massachusetts, as completely as they already are in New York, and Pennsylvania, and all the Southern and Western states, the Union is gone.

Instead of a nation of coextensive with the North American continent, destined by God and Nature to be the most populous and powerful people, ever combined under one social compact, we shall have an endless multitude of little insignificant clans and tribe at eternal war with one another for a rock or a fish pond, the sport and fable of European masters and oppressors.” How well he here draws his own picture! What a thorough change has come over him since he deserted the Democratic Party, and united his fortunes with “the Boston faction”—nay, became their leader! He no more thinks of, or advocates his country, “as co-extensive with the North American Continent,” but, upon the miserable grounds of fanaticism, resists the admission of a beautiful region, which was once ours, and which is so necessary to the safety of the Union and to the permanent prosperity of the Nation. He is now completely identified with the “Federalists,” whom he once denounced, in their anti-American, unpatriotic opposition to the acquisition of Texas.

It is this same spirit which opposed the last war, and which sympathized with Tories of the Revolution. But we rejoice to know, that “the project of the Boston faction against the Union” has been gloriously “put down” by a free and generous people, and that liberal institutions will rapidly spread over one of the finest portions of the globe. This onward march of civilization and moral improvement will be realized, in peace and safety, without, for one moment, disturbing the harmony of the Union—and John Q. Adams, “the Federalist,” will have the pleasure or the pain, of seeing the glowing visions of John Q. Adams, the Republican, fully and brilliantly verified.

An ordinance

Whereas, the Congress of the United States of America has passed resolutions providing for the annexation of Texas to that Union, which resolutions were approved by the President of the United States on the first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty-five: and whereas, the President of the United States has submitted to Texas the first and second sections of the said resolution, as the basis upon which Texas may be admitted as one of the States of the said Union: and whereas, the existing government of the Republic of Texas has assented to the terms and conditions of which are as follows:

"Joint Resolution for annexing Texas to the United States.

"Resolved by the Senate and the House of the Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Congress doth consent that the territory properly included within, and rightly belonging to, the Republic of Texas, may be erected into a new State, to be called the State of Texas, with a republican form of government to be adopted by the people of said Republic, by deputies in Convention assembled, with the consent of the existing government, in order that the same may be admitted as one of the States of this Union.

"2d. And be it further Resolved, That the foregoing consent of Congress is given upon the following conditions, and with the following guarantees, to wit:
"First, Said State to be formed, subject to the adjustment by this Government of all questions of boundary that may arise with other Governments; and the Constitution thereof, with the proper evidence of its adoption by the people of said Republic of Texas, shall be transmitted to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress, for its final action, on or before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and forty-six.

"Second, Said State, when admitted into the Union, after ceding to the United States all public edifices, fortifications, barracks, pots, and harbors, navy and navy-yards, docks, magazines, arms, and armaments, and all other property and means pertaining to the public defence belonging to the said Republic of Texas, shall retain all the public funds, debts, taxes, and dues of every kind, which may belong to, or be due and owing to the said Republic; and shall also retain all vacant and unappropriated lands lying within its limits, to be applied to the payment of the debts and liabilities of said Republic of Texas; and the residue of said lands, after discharging said debts and liabilities, to be disposed of as said State may direct; but in no event are said debts and liabilities to become a charge upon the Government of the United States.

"Third. New States of convenient size, not exceeding four in number, in addition to said State of Texas, and having sufficient population, may, hereafter, by the consent of said State, be formed out of the territory thereof, which shall be entitled to admission under the provisions of the Federal Constitution. And such States as may be formed out of that portion of said territory lying South of 36 deg. 30 min. North latitude, commonly known as the Missouri Compromise line, shall be admitted into the Union, with or without slavery, as the people of each State asking admission may desire. And in such State or States as shall be formed out of said territory, North of said Missouri Compromise line, slavery or involuntary servitude (excepts for crime) shall be prohibited."

Now, in order to manifest the assent of the people of this Republic, as required in the above-recited portions of the said resolutions:

We, the deputies of the people of Texas in Convention assembled, in their name and by their authority, do ordain and declare, that we assent to and accept the proposals, conditions and guarantees contained in the first and second sections of the resolution of the Congress of the United States aforesaid.[JM]

Friday, August 1, 1845, RE45v42i25p2c2 Words 507 Mexico

The Mexican brig Delfine, 14 days from Vera Cruz, brings advices to the 3d inst., from that place, and to the 28th ult., from the Capital.

The Mexican papers are unusually silent on the subject of Texas and the position she holds at present towards the United States, although the intention of the U.S. Government to send troops to the frontier of Texas was known in the Capital on the 10th ult. The Mexican Government had made a new division of the Republic into ten military departments – the fifth comprises Nueva Leon, Coahuila, Tamaulipas, and Texas- there-by intimating that she still intends to provide for the Texians as citizens of the Mexican Republic.

The Diario del Gobierno announces the entire peace establishment of the Mexican army, to consist of about 30,000 men, viz:- 19,000 foot, 8,500 cavalry, 2,200 artillery, and 1,300 sappers and miners, etc., some portion of which are at present engaged on the frontier against the Indians.

The candidates for the presidency are engaging the attention of the public journals, and judging from their tone, Gen. Herrera seems to be the favorite- though, had Gen. Bustamente arrived earlier in the country, his friends might have made some demonstrations in his favor. Of the latter, the Vera Cruzana says, "We know that he has offered his sword to the nation in defence of her rights over the territory of Texas, and we believe the Supreme Government will accept this noble offer." The support of so great a military character as the vuanquished of Puebla by the renowned prisoner of San Jacinto, can hardly give courage to the Mexican forces destined to be employed on the occasion.

The President has convoked the Congress for the consideration of various internal improvements, affecting the Tariff, etc., and also to place, before them the proceedings taken by the Government on the Resolutions concerning Texas, passed the last session. These resolutions empowered the President to make terms with Texas on any conditions, save her annexation to the United States. We shall now see what effect the consummation of this act will have on the Chambers.

A new military movement has taken place in the organization of the militia, under the title of "Defenders of the Laws."

Gen. Rancel, the leader of the last attempt at a Revolution, has been sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, loss of rank and pay, and General Basadre, the associate of Canalizo, has been removed to the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa.
The Hesperia says, it has been understood, that Santa Anna has received the Grand Cross of Charles III of Spain, and calls on the Government of information on this particular; as in such case he has forfeited his right and title to the pension allowed him by Mexico, as well as that of a Mexican citizen.

Vessels are permitted to enter Tobasco in ballast when they freight with dye-woods. The Tobasquenos have petitioned for the free entry of flour. The two war steamers are still lying at Vera Cruz in an unfit state for sea.

Friday, August 1, 1845, RE45v42i25p2c2 Words 732 Persecution of American Citizens Already Commenced in Mexico.

On the 18th inst., considerable excitement was caused in this place, occasioned by a body of artillery marching through the principal streets towards the custom house. On their arrival at that place, the officer in command received orders from the Collector of the Aduana Terrestre, to accompany one of the clerks of the said office with Sestigos, and lay a forced embargo at the point of the bayonet on the property of the only two American houses in the place, Parrott & Co. and Mott, Talbott & Co., to satisfy a demand for duties caused by a law of the State of Sinoloa, 1834, which law was annulled in 1837 by the Tariff of that year, and from that date up to a few days previous to the date of this, the custom-house had never demanded from any house such duties.

The house of Parrott & Co. of course was embargoed, on property to the amount of $45,000, to satisfy the claim, only amounting to about $4,000; after which the troops were marched to the house of Messrs. Mott, Talbott & Co., with the object of laying an embargo on their property, but Capt. Hope, of H. B. M. frigate Thalin, interfered and prevented the embargoes being laid, one of the partners of the said firm being a British subject.

Mr. Parrot, who, for many years, has been our Consul at Mazatlan, suffered with much patience the indignity to his person, and as the diplomatic relations between the United States and Mexico are suspended, he has no resource in seeking redress from the Mexican Government, and very properly called in the French Consul to witness the proceedings, which are illegal and unjust from the commencement, as no judge or competent authority in the place had passed sentence or judgment, in any shape or form, on the proceedings. Mr. Parrott has gone before the French Consul and made out his protest, and will submit it to his Government, to be settled with the other difficulties now pending with Mexico. There are at Mazatlan nearly a dozen importing houses, and notwithstanding not a single demand has been made by the Collector against them for duties, having, as it appears, determined to take his revenge out to the Americans.

Many respectable citizens seeing these scandalous proceedings, have used their influence to conciliate matters. It is proper to remark, that, in the year 1834, this State passed a law imposing a duty on foreign goods imported, of one-eight part of the import duties, to defray the expenses of the State. This duty was paid up to 1837, when the tariff of that year took effect, and the Central System of Government was established, the State Governments were abolished: the General Government abolished all the rights of the States to make and enforce laws. It appears that all the duties have long since been paid, agreeable to the tariff of 1837, which was a general disposition of the Supreme Government.

APRIL 24th.- The Prefecto of the Port has addressed a letter to the Governor of the State, complaining in strong terms against the violent and unjust proceedings against the Americans, and very properly pointed out that they were caprices of the Collector, and from the concourse of people who were present; it was sufficient to disturb the peace of the port, and bring on the country a war.

APRIL 25th.- The embargo on the property of the American Consul has not been raised, notwithstanding a meeting has taken place to that effect. The consul is determined to resist the payment and suffer his property to be sold. A military force was again demanded for laying the embargo on Mott, Talbott & Co.’s property, but it was wisely refused. Overtures have been made to the consul, that if he would address a letter to the Gefe Superior de Bacienda, his property would be released, but he has refused and is determined to let the matter take its course.

Other outrages will follow. Yours in haste,

X., Y. Z

Two-thirds of all the claims of American citizens were laid before the Board of Commissioners, were caused by the arbitrary laws of the States of Mexico, and this was one of the motives why the central system of government was established- as the States had always the General Government in difficulties.

accepting the proposals, conditions and guarantees contained in the first and second sections of the joint resolution of the Congress of the United States for the admission of Texas as a State of the Union.

This ordinance shall be immediately forwarded by a special message to the President of the United States, who will receive it with the gratification its dignity and importance are so well calculated to produce in every patriotic heart. – Texas has thus manifested to the world, with a unanimity unparalleled in the disposition of a debated political question, her preference of an association with the Republican States composing the Federal Union, over all the advantages, real or imaginary, that were held out to her as a separate nation. With a discrimination quickened by her contact with foreign influences, she has learned in the battle fields, and In her civil experience, the necessity of union among the votaries of freedom; and, in voluntarily agreeing to take her place hereafter as a sovereign member of the American Confederacy, she has paid a tribute to the cause of popular government, which will command the admiration of the world.

From the date of this ordinance, Texas will have acquired a right to the protection of the U. States; and the undersigned is happy to inform you, that the President of the U. States has taken steps to afford this protection in the most effective manner, against future Mexican and Indian invasion.

That the deliberations of the convention, thus far distinguished by calmness and prudence, may produce a constitution for Texas, as perfect as her trials in the achievement of her independence.

Wednesday, August 6, 1845, RE45v42i26pc1 Words 383 Fruits of Annexation

Our readers will sustain us in the position that the Enquirer has advocated the Annexation of Texas upon national grounds. We watched the movements of the Northern fanatics on this question. We heard it clearly announced on the floor of Congress, that all opposition to it progress was based on anti-slavery grounds; no one, therefore, could doubt, that if the measure of annexation failed in Congress, it would be virtually a triumph of abolition over the domestic institutions of the South, a signal that all Southern interests must bow to the dark spirit of Northern fanaticism. Great cause was there, then, for joy, when the joint resolutions were carried through. They came, with healing on their wings, to announce to the South, that her rights were yet safe in the hands of the confederacy- that the people's representatives were yet willing to respect the guarantees of the Constitution, and that the links of our blessed Union were strengthened and brightened. As a safe-guard for the South against domestic foes, and as a barrier against the intrigues and Pharisajical philanthropy (1) of foreign nations, we hailed the admission of Texas among the States of the Union. The first duty of the South was to...

The South ought to feel grateful for the kind sympathy of the U.S. Gazette in her assumed losses by annexation. She has advocated the measure, not only for the safety of her domestic institutions, but, also, to protect herself from the oppressive effects of having a rich neighbor, who would supply foreign markets with cotton free from duty, and thereby prove a most injurious competitor. But it is not necessary to dwell on this point. The South is perfectly content with the admission of Texas, and is willing to abide the consequences. We have shown from Whig evidence that New England will promptly seize the benefits to be derived from the measure- and we may safely assert, that the whole Union is pleased with the great event. There is no danger of disunion, because all the great interests of the nation will be benefited- and, before many years have rolled round, the whole country will applaud the noble Democracy for having defeated Mr. Clay, and thereby secured the greatest national blessing, since the acquisition of Louisiana.

To Collectors and Officers of the Customs.

The President of the United States has received official intelligence that the convention... last, for the admission of Texas as a State of the union.

By the 24th section of the act of the Congress of the United States of the 30th of August, 1842, it is provided: "That it shall be the duty of all collectors and other officers of the customs to execute and carry into effect all instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the execution of the revenue laws; and in case any difficulty shall arise as to the true construction or meaning of any part of such revenue laws, the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury shall be conclusive and binding upon all such collectors and other officers of the customs." In conformity with this provision of the law, it becomes my duty to communicate the vies and instructions of this department upon various important questions arising out of the new relations between Texas and the United States.

A similar question arose in relation to exports from Florida into New Orleans in 1819, when it was decided by the Treasury Department, "that all goods which have been or may be imported from Pensacola before an act of Congress shall be passed erecting it into a collection district, and authorizing the appointment of an officer to reside thereat, for the purpose of superintending the collection of duties, will be liable to duty."

If, then, as is apprehended, imports should now be made from foreign ports into Texas, with a view to introduction here free of duty from Texas, upon her formal admission by Congress as a State of the Union, such exemption from duty, in conformity with the decision before quoted in relation to Florida, could not be permitted "before an act of Congress shall be passed erecting it (Texas) into a collection district." When Congress shall pass such an act, ample provision can be made therein, to prevent the sacrifice of our revenue by the evasion of our laws, as is now believed to be contemplated.

2d. In all cases where application is made to enter goods with the privilege of draw-back of duties on exportations into Texas, before granting the debenture certificate, you will diligently inquire into the circumstances of the case, with a view to ascertain whether this exportation is ... where the goods are really designed for consumption within our limits, is a manifest fraud on our revenue laws, which will be prevented by all the lawful means within the power of this Department.

After the acquisition and occupation of Louisiana, by an order of the Treasury Department, the collector at new Orleans was directed to " consider Baton Rouge, and other settlements now in possession of Spain, whether on the Mississippi, Iberville, the lakes, or the seacoast, as foreign ports." In the same order it was declared, "in no instance are you to allow draw-backs for goods which have been landed, and may afterwards be exported to such places." This order was issued by one of my predecessors, (Albert Gallatin,) and was sanctioned by Mr. Jefferson, then President of the U. States.

By the 80th section of the act of Congress of the 2d of March 1799, it is provided, "That the Collector aforesaid may refuse to grant such debenture or debentures, in case it shall appear to him that nay error has arisen, or any fraud has been committed; and, in case of such refusal, if the debenture or debentures claimed shall exceed one hundred dollars, it shall be the duty of the said Collector to represent the case to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who shall determine whether such debenture or debentures shall be granted or not." An entry for drawback, with a view to re-importation, free of all duty, into the United States, is a fraud within the meaning of this act; and in all such cases it is the duty of the collector to refuse the debenture certificate. In all cases where the debenture shall not exceed one hundred dollars, the Collector will judge for himself whether such fraud as is before designated is contemplated; and, in the language of the law, "if the debenture or debenture claimed shall exceed one hundred dollars, it shall be the duty of the said Collector to represent the case to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who shall determine whether such debenture or debentures shall be granted or not."

By the 76th section of the act of 2d March, 1799, it is provided as follows: "And the said exporter or exporters shall likewise make oath that the said goods so noticed for exportation, and laden on board such ship or vessel previous to the clearance there of, or within ten days after such clearance, are truly intended to be exported to that place whereof notice shall have been give, and are not intended to be relanded within the United States; otherwise, the said goods, wares, and merchandise shall not be entitled to the benefit of drawback."

If, then, in point of fact, the goods thus exported to Texas are intended "to be relanded within the United States," they are not entitled to draw-back; an, if relanded, are subject to seizure and forfeiture; as well as the vessel in which they are thus introduced.

Great vigilance will be required in obtaining ample security upon all export bonds, as those bonds may not be cancelled in any case of exportation of goods to Texas with the privilege of drawback, until the numerous and important questions arising under such bonds shall have been finally adjudicated.

You will in no case omit to publish in the newspapers, as now required by law, the names of all persons who shall be found guilty of the violations of the revenue laws therein prescribed, as well as to seize for forfeiture the goods, vessel, tackle, apparel, and furniture, in all such cases.

As the speculations referred to would diminish the revenue, and affect injuriously the interest of the people of the United States, and of Texas, as a part of the Union, the utmost vigilance and the most cordial co-operation are expected from all officers of the customs, in carrying these instructions most fully into immediate effect.

Very respectfully, R. J. Walker
Secretary of the Treasury

Friday, August 8, 1845, RE45v42i27p1c Words 1015 Moral Treason

On the 1st August the Abolitionists at the North celebrated the Anniversary of Emancipation in the British West Indies. The Tribune gives a minute description of the proceedings at Boston. On that occasion, the notorious William II. Channing, the right-hand-man of the Tribune, indulged anew in his slanders upon the South and his treasonable assaults against the Constitution. To show how strongly his sympathies lean towards British intrigue and ambition, to the sacrifice of all the holy ties of love for his native country, we extract a few sentences:
“Well may Great Britain rejoice this day at the noble work she has accomplished. But while she rejoices we should hang our heads in shame, unaffected shame, at our own inaction.

“one avowed-object of the annexations of Texas I aid to slavery; and the counteraction of Great Britain’s efforts against slavery.

“This nation has announced to the other nations of earth the annexation of Texas to this Republic! A base and fraudulent act for an impious purpose! What can we do, as true men and children of God, to avert the consequences of this act?”

After this shameless imprecation of the honor of his own country, and servile flattery of Great Britain, this fanatic proceeds to point out the course that Massachusetts should pursue, and here it is:

“The Bay State has been the abode of freemen! Whether it shall still be so must be decided this day.

“Massachusetts has said in Faneuil Hall that the annexation of Texas is an infraction of the Constitution. Let her not retract this next winter, and folding her hands, say, the will of the Lord, be done. Such inaction would be accomplishing the will of the devil.

“The duty of Massachusetts is to stand by her principles: in deeds to acknowledge that her words were right. Let her declare, in the assemblies of her people, that she meant what she said, and let her now say distinctly, The Constitution is broken by Slavery in the Annexation of Texas! The Constitution has been tried, and porved but an instrument of slaveholding usurpation. Let her the recall her Representatives and Senators from a Congress disgraced by voluntary association with Texas, and say let her sister States. We are asolved from the Constitution. We will never receive Texas as a sister State- and we appeal for our justification to God, to the nations of the earth, and to the consciences of all free men. Let her take his position and keep it. Therein she will not be false, but true, to what really constitutes this nation.”

Can madness farther go! But we are not at all alarmed at the impertent ravings of this handful fo fanatics, this unblushing avowal of sentiments, which would disgrace the infamous proceedings of the Harford Convention. Last year, when the Texas question was in embryo, we exposed to the indignant reprobation of the people of Virginia similar sentiments from the lips of John Quincy Adams and eleven other members of Congress. The voice of patriotism then prevailed, not only in the South but throughout the Union. The disunionists were prostrated, Texas was decreed to be a portion of our glorious Confederacy, the rights of the Sought were respected, and the Constitution declared not to be a nose of wax in the hands of Abolitionists, for the accomplishment of their nefarious schemes. As it was then, so will it be now- but with this stronger fact- that how the faith of the nation has been solemnly plighted- that it is matter of undisputed proof, that foreign nations have arrogantly interposed to arrest our freedom of action, and to interfere with our rights- and that the monstrous proposition of “a balance of power,” has been impudently thrust into one face. For these and other reasons, the national pride has been aroused, and many who were bitter enemies to the extension of our flag over the “Lone Star,” are now zealous for the completion of the measure, as a rebuke of foreign intrigue and ambition, and as a signal proof of the establishment of our national rights on an impregnable basis.

Again, in the very midst of these howling fanatics of Boston, we have seen many gallant spirits arise, who will do their duty to their country and guard her honor from violation. All will remember the noble toast of Mr. Winthrop, who went for his whole country, however bounded.- He, doubtless, represents the views of many Massachusetts Whigs- who will resist the disorganizing and infamous proposition of Channing and others. Moreover, the commercial advantages of annexation, will operate with force upon the self-interest of a large class in Boston- and they too, will unite in sustaining the plighted honor of the nation. We, therefore, have no fear of the fiendish anatemas of a few Massachusetts abolitionists. They will be prostrated by the whirl-wind of public sentiments- and we may safely venture to predict, that the Bay State, so far from flying off from the Union and nullifying its laws, will cheerfully acquiesce in a measure, which to them is destined to prove so beneficial.

In connection with this subject, we take great pleasure in re-publishing from the Martinsburg (Va.) Gazette an eloquent communication, in view of the final union of the two Republics. It was written before the action of the Convention was known- but it shadows forth the true effects of the convocation of the people’s delegates.- From the signature and the locality, we are fully warranted in the opinion, that is from the pen of a Whig, formerly a distinguished State Senator; whose toast on the 4th July we were proud to publish with commendation. From the main bearing of such Whigs as Winthrop and F, we have no fears for a disruption of the Union, in consequence of the extention of liberal institutions. The few traitors in Boston and New York, may attempt to shake the Union with their hideous threats- but their impotence is equal to their malice. Their names will be hung upon the pillory of the fugitives.

Friday, August 8, 1845, RE45v42i27pc Words 63 Extraordinary Confusion of the Mails!

Our New Orleans mail has failed for three days. But the Union of Tuesday-night contains news from Texas, and we made a few extracts. Our Southern papers must have passed us by without condescending to stop and are, doubtless, wandering over the regions of the North. We shall be thankful for the capture and restoration of the fugitives. [JM]
It has been proposed in caucus, and by this time probably agitated in full Convention at Austin, Texas, to bring two Texian States into the Union- one East of the Brazos, and a new one West of that river, to be called Austin. Our correspondent, who is near, though not on the field of operation, thinks the affair was planned by the Hon. W. L. Cazneau, who is celebrated in Texas and the Southwest for his adroit management as the leading representative of the Western interests in the Texian Congress. By dividing Texas at the Brezos, there will be just enough population on each side to elect a representative, and thus meet the requirement of the United States Constitution. If, by this device, the Hon. Gentleman secures, at the very outset, four Senators in Congress, he will deserve all the credit our Matagorda correspondent gives him for ability and good management in making the most of Texas.

The Baltimore Republican and Argus comes to us in an enlarged and improved form. We congratulate this spirited champion of Democracy upon its increased means of usefulness and ability to contend with Whiggery, and we wish it a new and a glorious triumph at the coming election.

In reply to the enquiries of the Illinois Register and other journals, in regard to the negotiation now understood to be pending between the United States and Great Britain, on the Oregon question, the Union of Wednesday night employs the following language. The last sentence expresses the sentiment of the whole nation:

“We answer frankly, and in the same respectful spirit in which the 'State Register' has spoken to us, that all negotiations between nations, during their pendency, have at all times been confined to the parties conducting them. In reference to the Oregon question, as must be the case in all negotiations, the President and his constitutional advisers are the only persons who can know what is transpiring. Why, then, call on the 'union' to declare what has been done, or what will be done, on this subject? At the meeting of Congress, the President will doubtless lay before them all that has occurred, or may occur, as far as the same can be properly communicated, compatibly with the public interests. Of one thing we may confidently assure the Register, and all others who have been pleased to propound these question to us; and that is, that the administration will firmly assert and maintain all our rights to the Oregon territory, and that they will preserve and uphold the sacred honor of their country.”

(Whig) is a severe rebuke upon the absurd and unpatriotic position of the New York Courier & Enquirer, that the administration is liable to censure for sending troops, at the request of the people of Texas, to protect that country against foreign invasion. It is strange to us, that any man of ordinary capacity should object to a course, dictated by the soundest discretion and the plainest right:

“The process of annexation itself has been somewhat anomalous. It would, doubtless, have been better if Congress had made special provision for the defence of Texas in the event of the acceptance of the annexation resolutions, inasmuch a there were abundant reasons for apprehending hostilities on the part of Mexico. But because that duty was neglected, it does not follow that the President should neglect his. The compact of annexation has now the force of a law; and the requisition of the Constitution which binds the Executive to see that the laws are faithfully administered, is his warrant for securing to this law of annexation its full force and validity.

“If the machinations of Great Britain to defeat annexation, which gave a new aspect entirely to that question, had been direct and decided enough to endanger the final consummation of the measure, we should not have been disposed to find fault if the President had occupied Texas before the meeting of the Texan Congress. In matters of this sort, decision and energy are every thing. Responsibility must be taken when emergencies arise.”
The N. O. Republican thinks it probable that England will be a party to the war with Mexico. We must have strong evidence, to make us hope for such a result. She has too much staked upon her swelling commerce, to expose it to the attacks of our gallant navy. A war with us would cut off her supply of cotton—...bosom would spring up deadly enemies who, maddened by the want of break, would require a mighty force to subdue their fierce...—Her colonies, groaning under British avarice and oppression, would welcome the signal for their redemption from her galling chains and would strike for their independence. In a word, in the first moment of war, England would find herself surrounded by numberless obstacles, that would cripple her power in every direction—For these reasons, we cannot think, that she will have the folly, to involve herself in a war, which will break up her commerce, stop her factories, and probably wrest from her many of her rebellious colonies.

But, suppose she should rush madly into the melee, what would be the consequence? It will be admitted that it would be almost exclusively a maritime war, and in review of our early naval operations will show how such an one would result at the present time. The New Orleans Republican examines this point, and we make use of the facts furnished by that excellent Journal. In the Revolution our Navy consists of about twenty-five vessels of all descriptions. In 1798, small as it was, the ocean was covered with its glorious achievements. The first Lord of the British Admiralty, in his official report, stated that the Americans had captured seven hundred and eighty-three vessels, the loss of which, he estimated at twelve and a half millions of dollars—but it was subsequently ascertained to be nearer twenty millions. In a single cruise Paul Jones captured sixteen prizes! Before the close of the war, 175 fighting vessels, carrying 2,500 guns and 11,000 seamen, sailed under American colors. They secured both the great oceans, moved over the British Channel, and laid siege to castles and towns even on the British Isles. Bristol, the great commercial city in England, was shattered by the spoliations of our cruisers.

So much for the glorious deeds of our Navy in the infancy of the Republic. It would be easy to calculate what could now be done by our excellent Navy commanded by able and skillful officers, and thoroughly disciplined men. We have all the means and experience to fit out a formidable naval force. The numerous steamers which cover the Mississippi and Ohio, could soon be made valuable instruments of attack and defense—and we should have no cause to dread even the boasted Marine of England. For a brief period we might...but in a short time, we should be fully prepared to cut up British commerce, and tame her arrogance.

The Picayune thus shadows forth the probable course that Mexico will pursue:

"That she will issue letters of marque and reprisal—attempt to turn loose a set of foreign privateers upon our commerce—has been hinted at, and with good show of reason. There are not sailors enough, put them all together, in her contemptible marine to man a single sloop of war effectively, and we trust that our Government will at once declare every vessel engaged under Mexican colors, without the lawful complement of natives on board, a pirate, and string up every foreigner to the yard arm...The pages of Vattel may not afford such authority, but Vattel knew but little of Mexico when he wrote, and strong cases require prompt and forcible arguments—On land, the course of the United States is plain enough. With the regular troops now in Texas and the volunteers ready to start at a movement's warning, we have a force sufficient to crush any miserable apology of an army Mexico can concentrate between San Luis Potosi and the Rio Grande for three months to come—it would be an act of charity to take the entire army of our...neighbors prisoner. To save them from the starvation that has long been preying upon them. Possession of the harbors of California—a matter which a frigate and sloop of war could easily effect—might also be taken, and if all these plans are carried out, we shall have the enemy at our gates suing for peace before a year is over their heads."

The N.O. Courier contends that, even the closing of the ports of Mexico to American Commerce would, by the law of Nations, be tantamount to a declaration of war, and holds, that the United States should act accordingly and not wait until it should please Mexico to remove the embargo. The Courier cites the example of France, against whose commerce Mexico closed her ports- after France had wasted years in vain attempts to enforce the rejected claims of her citizens for indemnity. France at once blockaded the Mexican coast, seized upon the fort of San Jean de Ulna, held Vera Cruz as a hostage and forced Mexico to render full and perfect satisfaction.

The Courier urges our Government to pursue the same rigid course- or it is evident that, annexation being accomplished, the right of Mexico to Texas was destroyed- indeed the failure of Mexico to reconquer Texas amounted to a renunciation of all her claims. Moreover, contends the Courier, Mexico never had any just claims upon Texas- as both treaties and ancient maps prove that Louisiana, as ceded to this Republic, extended to the western banks of the Rio Grande, and, in fact, Texas never belonged to Mexico.

It seems that, after all, Mexico is about to commit some folly and either declare war, or an embargo. From such a people, under such rulers, no course, however mad or suicidal, ought to excite astonishment. We have only time to give the cream of the New Orleans papers received yesterday- so that our readers may make their own deductions.

'Tis finished now- the holy deed
By favoring Heaven’s will decreed:
Blessed with propitious fortune’s smile,
Despite of threat and lure and wile,
Two kindred nations clasp their hands,
And join their hearts in happy bands.

No streaming blood- no wasting fire;
Confusion wild- nor carnage dire,
Hath stained that union, fair and just,
Of nations, who may boldly trust
Their cause to God, and their own might,
To prove it, and defend it, right.

Proud Yorktown’s deeds of glorious fight,
And San Jacinto’s records bright,
Together stamped on History’s page,
Shall be rehearsed in every age;
While dark Paoli’s funeral wail Shall echo red Alamo’s tale.

The men of Texas- well may we Salute them brethren, bold and tree,
Blood of our blood, bone of our bone-
A round one common altar-stone,
Shalt meet wit us, and worship there
In freedom’s faith, with freedom’s prayer,
No longer lone, the Texian star
Shall shine in peace, and gleam in war,
A mingling ray of that bright beam
Which from the Eagle’s Flag doth stream,
And, from the land of freedom’s birth, Expands it radiance o’er the earth.

Friday, August 22, 1845, RE45v42i30pc Words 391 The Seat of War

It is strange- but we have no further news from Mexico-not even a rumor. The American schr. Water Witch, was to have left Vera Cruz on the 28th. She had not reached N. Orleans on the 12th inst. This prolonged voyage of 15 days has given rise to sundry speculations. Some think she has been seized by the Mexican authorities, as in a State of war. Another and more probable opinion is, that she has waited to bring home our Counsel and citizens resident at Vera Cruz, in the expectation of a declaration of war. The public excitement on the subject of the warlike demonstrations of Mexico seems to have subsided.

P.S. We have since received further news from Mexico, in the Union of Monday night. It will be found in another column. It seems that on the 26th July, there was no declaration of War, thought the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Cueras, had addressed a fierce and flaming paper to their Congress, recommending active War, as soon as they should officially hear of the acceptance of Annexation by Texas. In a previous address of Cuevas to Congress, on the 16th ult. This terrible Minister employed the following language, far from just or gentle. Our cabinet; no doubt, feel much mortified at this formidable blow:

“But Texas, degrading herself, and losing all consideration for those nations who, by a happy policy, hastened to recognize her as an independent people, has at length succumbed with shame and opprobrium to the usurping and perfidious policy of the American Cabinet. Such conduct deprives her of the rights upon which she might claim her independence, and the Republic will now be enabled to commence her struggle with a justice which will excite the sympathies of the whole world and will merit a result the more glorious, as its aspirations have always been in favor of peace, and of the principles of civilization and humanity. As time rushes in, the United States will discover in this usurpation a fatal error; the good faith and honesty of every nation will condemn her, and she alone will be responsible for the evils of a war which she will have provoked.

“The report concludes with another flourish about the loyalty and good faith of Mexico, and the perfidy of the United States.”

[JM]
And they will shout and huzza over victories which will fill the land with a few vast, unearned fortunes, and send their own children hungry and hopeless to miserable lairs. Such is the way of the world.”

The war with Mexico- As soon as the Richmond Whig carried to country readers the striking idea that none but annexationists ought to bleed or pay for the war which Mexico threatens us with, its language was caught up everywhere and from every genuine “Whig” might be heard the witty, profound, and patriotic remark addressed to Democrats-

“Well now you’ve got... Texas, I supposes you Locos are going to do all the fighting and paying – won’t you:”

An honest countryman, in reply to this threadbare piece of second-hand banter, retorted-

“O, no- We got Texas- that was our part. You Whigs must do what’s necessary now, to keep it!” – the Whig sloped.

Friday, August 22, 1845, RE45v42i30pc Words 391 Movements of Mexican Troops

The steam schooner Augusta, Capt. Giller, arrived here yesterday from Matamoras, which place she left on the 12th inst. We have gleaned some items from a letter written by a resident of Matamoras to captain Gillett, on the day he sailed.

The letter, speaking of the movements of troops in the vicinity of Matamoras, says, it was known positively that all the points of the Rio Grande would soon be covered; that General Arista had about 3,000 men within one days’ march of Matamoras on the 12th; that Gen. Pardeds was on his march to Monterey with 4,000 or 5,000 men, that Gen. Gaona was also on the march with 3,000, that Gen. Bustamente was going to New Mexico. The letter then says- Notwithstanding these preparations, I believe that hostilities are not so immediate as it might be thought as first.”

It seems that no General in chief had yet been appointed and that there are no contracts for the necessary supplies of a campaign or for serious invasion of Texas.

The letter states further that “the Mexican Government says to Congress, that in its opinion, there is no need of waiting for the delay stipulated in the treaty (between Mexico and this country) for a declaration of war, (if declared) because notices enough have been given to the United States Government months ago.”

The letter further says: “Some person, generally well informed, think that the government needs money much, and wants to hold up the prospect of a war to get their loan approved. The hope that foreign intervention will soon put an end to difficulties seems to be at the bottom of the ideas of this government, which, on another side, is threatened with a new revolution, according to some letters from the capital.” It, is also stated, that, according to the official papers of Mexico, the $15,000,000 had been negotiated- but this is doubtful.

By a dispatch of the Mexican Consul, then here, the General commanding at Matmoras had been advised of the shipment of troops from this port to Corpus Christi and Bexar.

The letter concludes thus: “The next mail will probably have the debates of Congress on the loan and war bills. We may perhaps better see into the future than now.”

We do not see much war in all this.

RE43n34p1c4, September 2, 1845: INSULT UPON THE COUNTRY

Most gladly have we chronicled the numerous evidences of patriotic spirit by the peculiar state of our relations with Mexico. In ever portion of the Country, an American feeling has been aroused, and gallant volunteers and thus left Texas to pursue, without molestation, such policy as we might deem best.

The signing of the articles in question removed all pretext for the renewal of hostilities by Mexico, First—received assurance on which I could rely, that the Mexican Government would sign these articles, provided the Texas Secretary of State would first affix his signature. It appeared proper to accede to this overture from Mexico, for the following considerations:

"First—The signing of the articles in question removed all pretext for the renewal of hostilities by Mexico, and thus left Texas to pursue, without molestation, such policy as we might deem best.

Second—It was in fact a relinquishment, sub mode, by Mexico, of all claim of sovereignty over the territory of Texas, thereby facilitating rather than impeding Annexation.

"Third—It was the only way by which the overture from Mexico could be presented to the representatives of the people of Texas, to whom alone the decision of so grave a matter as this, of peace or the risk of a renewal of hostilities.

"Finally—it was of great importance, in the event that any untoward circumstance should prevent the accomplishment of Annexation.

"Was the administration of Texas authorized, of itself; to reject ultimately, this friendly overture? Was it not bound to submit this matter to the people? There are facts in my possession which I shall at a proper time make known to the people of Texas, to convince them of the extreme importance of our coming to a pacific arrangement with Mexico at the period of signing the articles with Senor Cuevas, though that arrangement was temporary. The individuals who, in 1842, supplied Mexico with the facilities for procuring vessels of war to attack Texas, and whose machinations were then baffled by my activity, were ready in 1845 to advance means to equip the Mexican army for the purpose of waging active war against Texas, with the same ultimate design as formerly upon one of our institutions. Are we sure, I would ask, that some Northern or Western Senators might not have been found in the American Congress friendly to peaceful Annexation, but opposed to receiving Texas with a war on it lands? Were we not sufficiently told, too, that what a resolution of Congress had done, a resolution might undo? And is the importance of a single vote—Senator Bagby’s for example—forgotten?

It has been falsely asserted that I signed the articles with Senator Cuevas, without the knowledge of the Executive. I know my duty better. In all my official conduct, I have acted under instructions from his Excellency the President. A different course would have rendered me liable to impeachment.

"My general silence in April last on annexation, may have given rise to an honest misapprehension of my opinion on this subject. I had then just signed the articles of arrangement with Mexico. It is clear, that had the Texas Secretary gone about making public declaration in favor of annexation, the Mexican Government would have refused to sign these articles, notwithstanding the assurances previously made. A discreet silence seemed the proper course for me to pursue. But to avoid future misapprehension, I then wrote explicitly my opinion on this subject to General Houston, to General M. Baker, to Colonel Barnard E. Bee; I expressed the same opinion, in unequivocal language, to Colonel Thurstun, Mr. J. Temple Doswell, Mr. Henry F. Gillet, Doctor Bowers, Dr. Kelhum, Colonel M.B. Menard, General Charles Fenton Mercer, and some other gentlemen in Texas; and I had declared the same opinion to Hon. J. C. Calhoun, the Hon. Alcee Labranche, M.C. of Louisiana, the Hon. T.H. Seymour, M.C. of North Carolina, and numerous other gentlemen in the United States. I now authorize the publication of the above letters, and all other letter written by me, however confidential, wherein allusion is made to annexation. They will not be found to contain one adverse or discrepant word. Were I opposed to annexation, I should avow it fearlessly." [BRM]

RE43n34p1c6, September 2, 1845: FOREIGN VIEWS

We are glad that Wilmer & Smith’s European Times have, in some degree, made the amende honorable for its insults upon the American character, on the Oregon question. The following extract, received by the Hibernia, shows a liberality of feeling and expanded views, which do credit to that paper. It is a pungent hit at some of the European politicians, who have advanced absurd and intolerable theory of “the balance of power.”

"ANNEXATION OF TEXAS.---The annexation of Texas which may now be regarded as consummated, is too important an event in the history of nations to escape the lynx-eyed vigilance of the press in this quarter of the globe. It has been freely commented on since the arrival of the Acadia, last week, which brought the resolutions of the Texan Congress. The annexation is not, of course, palatable to John Bull, which is perhaps, the best reason why it should be popular on the Western shores of the Atlantic. The leading organ of the late Government, the Morning Chronicle, makes it the subject of a bitter attack on the foreign policy of the present Cabinet, which might, and ought, it contends, to have prevented the catastrophe. It is ridiculous to hold such language. The Ministry could not have prevented the annexation, if they had strained every art which diplomacy suggest.---The policy of Mexico, ever since Texas wrested her freedom from that imbecile power, has, step by step, accelerated the event at which the latter is now so chagrined. The ungrateful, not to say pitiful, conduct of Santa Anna, in constantly keeping in “hot water,” and actually making war upon the people who first defeated, and then, with a generous heroism, gave him liberty, cause Texas to be attracted, as sympathetically as the pole attracts the needle, to the United States. The citizens of that country were in feeling, as they now are in name, citizens of the great Republic---one common sympathy of country, and kindred, and institutions, animated alike the minor and the major Republic. The "star-spangled banner" has increased another stripe, and has baffled the policy of European statesmen---those long headed personages, who fancy that, like Joshua, the sun ought to stand still at their bidding.

"What has taken place was inevitable in the nature of things, and has long since been anticipated by all who could read the signs of the political horoscope. But American aggrandizement, they say, will not stop here. This large slice of decrepit Mexico may feed, but will not satisfy, greedy Republicans. Yearnings after California are already apparent. Oregon, nah, Mexico itself, may be swallowed up speedily by the energetic Anglo-American race, now spreading over the Northern Continent. Such are the fears of the rulers of the old world, fears which are participated in, to some extent, by many who ought to know better, in our own island."
TO THE EDITORS OF THE ENQUIRER

Gentlemen: Since Mexico has arrayed herself in a somewhat threatening and belligerent attitude I have seen it stated on several occasions in your paper, and, it I mistake not on some of them editorially, that in the event of a Declaration of War against the United States by Mexico, and the issuing on her part of letters of marque and reprisal, that it would be proper, and justifiable on our part, to take any foreigners found on board the commissioned vessels, as a portion of their crew—treat them as pirates, and dispose of them by the summary process of hanging—and, by some example of this kind, a speedy check would be given to privateering. Indeed, in your paper of this morning, you have a long editorial on our relations with Mexico, headed, “The Crisis at Last,” in which you adopt, as a portion of your article, an extract from “The New Orleans Picayune,” a portion of which is in these words: “We trust that our Government will at once declare every vessel engaged under Mexican colors, without the lawful complement of natives on board, a pirate, and string up every foreigner to the yard arm.”

If Mexico should, in her wisdom, decide for War, I am for giving her, as can be done, without much trouble, and genteel dubbing; but then I am for doing so, clearly upon the principles recognized by international law, which governs nations. Now I would like to be informed, in what work on international law, from Puffendorff to Wheaton, the doctrine is laid down, that a vessel regularly commissioned with letters of marque and reprisal by Mexico, to operate against her enemies in War, constitutes the foreigners, who may be a portion of such vessels, pirates, and punishes them with death, by hanging at the yard arm. If any authority recognized by nations exist for such a procedure, I have yet to find it. How can our Government, assuming that she will not prescribe an arbitrary rule of action for herself, “at once declare every vessel engaged under Mexican colors, without the lawful complement of natives on board, a pirate and string every foreigner to the yard arm?” It is not our own legislation, I believe, that is to be the authority or umpire in such proceedings, but the established doctrines of internal law. And what may be the consequences of a departure from them; or the adoption of such a course of conduct as appears to be sanction by you?

Should war come, (which Heaven and mercy avert, for I am emphatically a man of peace,) I want the duration of his grim visage to be as short as possible; and certainly it will be so, if our fighting is confined to the Mexicans, (and we have no reason to believe we will be engaged with any other nation;) but this will depend chiefly on ourselves; for, rest assured, should our Government attempt to carry out the doctrine sanctioned by you, and were it once put into execution, British subject the sufferers, nothing would save us from a conflict with her. We know the vigilance with which she protects her citizens wherever they may be. We know too, how extremely sensitive she has been on this Texas question; and, under the influence of that feeling, associated as the provocation would be with this very question, war would, indeed by inevitable. How calamitous would be such a result! Vanquish her, we certainly could; but consider the loss of blood and treasure, and all the miseries following in the train of a long and sanguinary conflict. Would not France, too, our old ally, take fire at such a procedure, were her subjects the sufferers? And why place ourselves in a position to arouse the ire of our faithful friend, should war ever come upon us from the combined powers of European potentates? Remember, the French Eagle and the American Eagle can again lead the way to victory, glory and independence.

[We think our clear-headed correspondent errs in stating that we have “adopted,” or “sanctioned,” the principle which he so warmly reprobrates. We have seen it strongly commended by able and leading journals—but our impression has been, and still is, that it is indefensible. We have not had time, however, to look into the learned authorities. In no even will it be necessary to resort to its employment against Mexico.—Enq]

MEXICAN INDEMNITY

From a private letter dated Mexico, July 26th, 1845, received by a gentleman in this city, we derive information that, on the 31st inst., a motion was made in Congress to call off the Secretary of the Treasury for a written report on the subject of the payment of the two missing instalments of the indemnity, which produced a very animated and lengthy discussion.—Mr. Trigueros, the late Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Voss, the Agent of the United States, were handled very unceremoniously; and the Ex-Minister of the United States, Mr. Shannon, was likewise subjected to some critical remark. The motion was finally carried by a vote of 27 to 26, and we are now likely to get possession of the leading facts in this hitherto mysterious affair.—[N.Y. Express]
The ship Suviah, Capt. Gibbons, arrived here yesterday from the bay of Aransas. She left the anchorage at that place on the 16th. Noting has transpired of any interest since our last accounts from that point. Previous to the vessel’s sailing, the steamer Monmouth came off and reported that war had been declared. How the news reached our force on the main land, we are not informed. It may be that Gen. Taylor had received recent intelligence to that effect from the frontier; and then again it may have been repetition of the menacing news received here a short time since.

Capt. Gibbons confirms the news of the loss of the Swallow. The greater portion of the cargo was lost.

Gen. Taylor, with his command, had left the neighborhood of St. Joseph’s, and established himself at San. Petrucio.

No further intelligence has reached us regarding the movements of the Mexicans.

The Capt. Of the Suviah reports, that, on the 18th, he saw the schooner E.S. Lauden, bound for Aransas, with Government stories. On the 30th, 100 miles West of S.W. Pass, aw the schooner Mary Wilkes, also for Aransas, with government stories.---[N.O. Jeffersonian, Aug. 25th.

RE43n34p2c4, September 2, 1845: MOVEMENT OF TROOPS

We have from every quarter intelligence of the movements of troops and munitions of war, but it will not be necessary to give the details, except some which may occur in our own immediate neighborhood. The Cleopatra, of the Norwich and Worcester line, came in yesterday with upwards of 800 passengers, of who were three Companies of United States Troops, two from Boston, and one from Portsmouth; they are ordered to Texas, and will proceed thither in the United States Storeship Lexington, from this port. Four-fifths of the United States Army will be shortly in Texas—a force, which will render any hostile demonstration on the part of Mexico almost a farcical affair. At the Navy Yard, say a Brooklyn paper of yesterday, a schooner has arrived with a cargo of boxes on top of each was marked, in bold letters, “20 rifles, Galveston, Texas, per United States ship Lexington.” They were immediately put on board said ship, and last evening she was pronounced ready for sea—two and a half days only having been occupied in fitting out. She will receive her troops on board, we learn, this morning, and proceed to sea during the day.—[New York Morning News.

RE43n34p4c2, September 2, 1845: WAR OR NO WAR?

It will be seen by the arrival from Texas, that the 3 or 4,000 Mexicans on the Rio Grande have dwindled down to about 400 at Matamoras. At the same rate of reduction, the formidable army of 10 or 11, 000 Mexicans, that were said to be marching upon General Taylor, will turn out to be little more than a thousand. “Men in buckram’ are not confined to Sir John Falstaff’s day.

It is gratifying to know, that the gallant soldiers under General Taylor, are in fine health and spirits, and not in immediate danger of being devoured by the yellow-skins.

But we have no faith in Mexican appearances. Her cunning and revenge may by plotting some great stroke against the united States, and we have done well to be armed at all points. Of one thing we are satisfied, that if war be avoided, it will mainly be owing to the wise, prompt and energetic measures which our Government have adopted. The best way to put down a bully is to meet him promptly, and expose his bragadocio. Mexico and the world will see that we are prepared to sustain our rights, and she may well hesitate about taking the suicidal step of declaring or making war.

RE43n34p4c2, September 2, 1845: TEXAS

By letters received yesterday from Texas, via Pensacola, as late as the 14th from Aransas, and the 15th from Corpus Christi, we have been put in possession of some additional information from these quarters. The U.S. troops had left St. Joseph’s Island, and had encamped on the main land. The officers and men were in fine health and spirits, and the fine breezes and cool atmosphere about the camp left no room for fear that any sickness would appear.
No accounts of the Mexican army of invasion reached the camp as late as the 14th. A courier had been dispatched to Matamoras and returned; he brought no news of Arista or any other Mexican General, and reports the force at Matamoras as not exceeding 400 strong.

On the 12th inst., the schr. Swallow, Capt. Miner, in attempting to cross the bar at Aransas, stuck on the North breakers, and went to pieces the day following. The schooner left here about two weeks since with 600 bushels of coal, some stores and clothing belonging to the 3d regiment of Infantry. The captain and crew reached the land in safety, saving nothing but the vessel’s papers and letters, and a portion of their clothing. A part of the cargo was recovered in a damaged state. [N.O. Jeff. Republican, Aug. 23.

To throw some light upon the ultimate designs of Mexico, we give a sketch of the views of the Amigo del Pueblo, (“Friend of the People,...”) published at Mexico, on the 26th July. This journal states that Senior Luis de la Rosa, the Minister of Finance, was last October a member of the Chamber of Deputies, and opposed a loan of ten millions—on the ground that, if the loan could possibly be obtained, it must complete the ruin of the Republic, in the horrid financial condition of the country. The foreign debt of Mexico is more that fifty millions of dollars—for the payment of which, one hundred millions of acres in California, Chihuahua, Senora, New Mexico and Texas are mortgaged. In consequence of the depreciation of Mexican bonds to 33 per cent. In London, and most probably 25 per cent., if the loan be made, it would require an addition of forty millions to realize the ten millions required.

In view, then, of the utter ruin of the nation, the loan of ten millions was rejected in October, 1844, at the instance of Luis de la Rosa—who, strange to say, as Minister of Finance, is now warmly urging the Congress to grant power to raise the “ruinous” loan of fifteen millions, by extraordinary means.

The Amigo asserts that the annual army appropriations amount to twelve millions of dollars, and that, even should the loan of fifteen millions be effected, Mexico will be in no condition to reconquer Texas or keep it in subjection.

“The ministry,” says the Amigo, “talks of war, but has no intention of making it. The opposition is regarded by it as much greater evil than the loss of Texas; and its own displacement as the heaviest calamity with which Mexico can be afflicted.”

Thus speaks a Mexican Journal. Our readers, taking all the facts into view, must judge for themselves of the resources of Mexico and whether we may soon expect to hear the war-trumpet of our troublesome neighbor.

We throw together all the interesting news we find in the N. Orleans papers, touching our troops on the Mexican frontier, the movements of our warlike neighbors and the proceedings of the Texas Convention. It seems that as yet, nothing is to be apprehended from the Mexican army on the Rio Grande. The concentration of American forces under Gen. Taylor will inspire the Mexicans with so much respect, that they will not be in a hurry to break lances with the Americans. [From the N.O. Picayune, Aug. 27]

The steamer Undine arrived here yesterday morning, bringing us Galveston papers to the 23d inst. The following communication from Capt. Grice embraces the latest news from Corpus Christi, with a narration of any thing of interest which occurred on the voyage. It will be seen, that up to the time when the Undine left Corpus Christi there was nothing there of war but the rumors.

"On Board Steamer Undine,}  "Ascending Mississippi River, Aug. 25, '45} "We left Corpus Christi on the 18th inst. All is quiet at the United States encampment. Hen. Taylor had succeeded in removing all the troops of the 3d and 4th regiments of Infantry and a large proportion of the public stores to Corpus Christ, where his head-quarters are at present established. A breastwork of earth had been thrown up and nearly completed. A few pieces of ordnance, procured in the worn, were brought into requisition. No certain information concerning the advance of the Mexicans had been received; but it was rumored, that Arista was assembling a large force at Matamoras and along the Rio Grande. The U.S. Dragoos, under command of Col. Twiggs, had crossed the Colorado, and were on their march to Corpus Christi—all well. A company of Mexican traders were expected in the next day. The location of the encampment is salubrious and pleasant, being immediately upon the beach of the bay, and open to the sea breeze. The health of the camp was good.

“We left Aransas Bay at 6 o’clock, on the evening of the 21st. The Schr. Florinday, with coal, &c., from New Orleans, had just arrived; schr Rosella, Shipman, was preparing for sea, to leave in a few days; steamer Monmouth, repairing at St. Joseph’s Island. The wreck of the schr. Swallow, on Aransas bar, had been stripped of her masts, sails, rigging, &c., and some of her cargo saved. A sale was to take place on the 22d inst.

“We arrived at Galveston the 23d inst, replenished wood and water, and left at noon on the 24th. The steamship John S. McKim was in port, and advertised to leave at 3 o’clock that afternoon. The ship Constellation, Capt. Jackson, and the brig Reaper, Capt. Bretton, were also in port—the former loading for Genoa to sail in five days.

“At 5 o’clock in the afternoon of the 24th isn’t., when about forty-five miles East of Galveston, we experience a very small squall of wind and rain from the South-east, accompanied by vivid flashes of lighting and a constant roar of thunder, which continued for the space of fifty minutes. This was followed by a dismal night and a heavy sea; however, we received no injury.

"On the morning of the 24th, at 10 o’clock, we passed the S.W pass of Vermilion Bay. We saw a steamer at anchor near the light-house, which was supposed to be the White Wing bound for Aransas, although no smoke nor signs of moving were discernable.

"Nothing off the S.W. Pass of the Mississippi river bound in."

The latest news which we see from Austin is to the 13th inst. The Convention was still in session, but it was anticipated that their labors would close on the 23d inst., Saturday last.

The Houston Telegraph of the 20th contains the letter of E. Allen, acting Secretary of State, to the Hon. Ashbel Smith, informing him of the rejection by the Senate of the preliminary propositions to negotiate a treaty with Mexico on the basis of the separate independence of the Republic, and telling him, that, under such circumstances, it is unnecessary for him any longer to continue to discharge the duties of Minister to the European Governments. Why, we though that Ashbel Smith had told the editors of the New York Journal of Commerce that the purpose of his very hasty, but every mysterious visit to England, was, not to carry on, or keep open diplomatic relations, but to close them in a becoming manner; although it now appears he was "driving away," or in the more polished Honstonic phrase, coquetting with those European Governments, until advised by his locum tenens that he might come home, as all future labor to defeat Annexation would be but labor in vain.

News of the arrival of the Dragoons, under the command of Colonel Twiggs, at San Antonio, had reached Galveston. They performed their march at the rate of twenty miles per day, and with very little sickness among their number—450. They are expected to join the army at Corpus Christi under General Taylor.

A Committee of Convention, to whom the subject was referred, state that the expenses of the new State Government for the first year will be 44,500 dollars. They estimate that the nett revenue for the year at $47,492.25; and by raising tax on land, which they suggest, from one-tenth of one per cent., thus equalizing it with the specific tax, they estimate that the yearly revenue will be 65,492 dollars and 52 cents.

The idea of annulling the present Constitution, and forming a Provisional Government, until Texas assumes its position as a State of the Union, which was bruited by many, has not been entertained by the Convention; nor do we hear anything of the formation of the territory into two States, about which some of our Northern contemporaries seemed to be so very much troubled.

understand Mexican braggadocio by and by.

So much in regard to, the desire for war on the part of Mexico. Now, in regard to the mean.—El Siglo says that the way department alone now costs the Government 23 millions of dollars per annum, while the revenues of the nation amount only to eleven millions. It is not probable that such an exhibition of the resources of the country and the demand upon them, in time of peace, will dispose capitalist to invest very freely in the fifteen million loan to carry on a way, which must both lessen the ordinary revenues and increase expenses of the nation to a very great extent.

Some of the New Orleans papers published on the receipt of the last news from Vera Cruz, the statement that ten thousand Mexican troops were on the march for Texas. But no foundation could be found for the report.

D.H. Klaener, Esq., has been recognized by the President of the Republic of Texas, as Consul for the Hanseatic City of Lubek, for Galveston.

By our last accounts from the Convention we learn nothing further relative to the project of attempting to establish a provisional Government and annulling out present Constitution, prior to the completion (ratification by the people and acceptance by the U. States Congress) of the Constitution of the State. From the opposition to the plan, shown wherever discussed, throughout the country, we infer that it has been abandoned.—It was opposed at the outset by Messrs. Henderson, Van Zandt, and other leading members of the Convention, and discountenanced by Major Donelson so soon as it came to his knowledge. So there is every reason to believe that wise and temperate counsels have again triumphed over the desire for novelty and rash experiments.

[From the Austin Correspondent.]

Convention Hall, Austin, Aug. 6, 1845.

To the Editor of the Civilian: it appears, as far as I can collect the opinions of the Convention, that they all desire that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the State, but much difference of opinion exists about what articles, if any, should be exempted; and, it appears, that some of the members wish to hold a controlling power over future Legislatures, and are unwilling to let them exercise entire control over the subject.

The question has just been taken on the subject, which passed in the following words:

"Taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the State. All property in this State shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law, except such property as two thirds of both houses of the Legislature may think proper to exempt from taxation. The Legislature may think proper to exempt from taxation. The Legislature shall have power to lay an income tax, and to tax all persons pursuing any occupation, trade or profession. Provided, that the term occupation shall not be construed to embrace the right to persons farming, or the exercise of any mechanical trade." Ayes 50, nays 3.

The section which says that "no corporate body shall hereafter be created, renewed or extended, with banking or discounting privileges," passed. Ayes 46, nays 7.

Thursday, Aug. 7th, 1845.

The Convention met, and had under consideration the 28th section, prohibiting banking institutions. Carried.

A motion was then made to authorize the chartering of banks, provided two thirds of the Legislature should agree at two successive sessions.---Rejected.

The section, as it originally passed, was then adopted.

After this question was settled a debate arose upon the 31st section, in which no part was retained but these words:

"The aggregate amount of debts hereafter contracted by the Legislature shall never exceed the sum of 100,000 dollars, except in case of war, to repel invasion or suppress insurrections."

Many amendments have been offered and rejected, to supply the remainder of the section, and the one under consideration, when the house adjourned, to prohibit the State, in any event, from pledging the faith of the State for money obtained on loan. What will be the fate of this amendment I can hardly say, but I am rather inclined to think it will carry.

Saturday, Aug. 9, 1845.

Since my last Convention has been engaged with the report of the committee on General Provisions, and have arrived as far as the Schedule.
The thirty-third section was stricken out, and one introduced by Mr. Bache, which was referred to the Judiciary committee, authorizing the Legislature “to erect four new States, in addition to the State of Texas, whenever sufficient population may hereafter entitle them to admission into the Union, under the Constitution and laws of the United States.”

The provisions for amending the Constitution were so changed as to render it necessary, after the majority of electors had decided upon amendments proposed, that they should pass ordeal of two thirds of the Legislature, before they could be incorporated as part of the Constitution. I do not, however, consider this mode of amending the constitution as definitely settled. Many delegates are in favor of any alteration being made by a convention to be called by the people.

This morning Mr. Ocheltree offered the following resolution:

Resolved, that the Judiciary Committee be instructed to examine Decree No. 308 of the laws of Coahuila and Texas, by which Samuel M. Williams, as Empressario, is authorized to create a bank to be called the “commercial and Agricultural Bank,” and to report to his committee whether in their opinion, unless prevented by a Constitutional provision, the said bank will be authorized to be established.

NEW YORK and GALVESTON PACKETS.— Messrs. Brower and Neilson have formed and advertise a regular line of packets to sail monthly between New York and Galveston. Their names and times of departure from New York are as follows:

Brig Empire, 1st September,

Ship Star Republic, 1st October,

Brig G. B. Lamar, 1st November,

Brig Mary, 1st December.

We publish to-day the Circular of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, the object of which is to prevent the shipment of debenture goods from the U. States to Texas, with the view of re-shipping the same back to the present limits of the U. States.

Frequent allusion has heretofore been made to this subject, and the novel and important question involved in it; and the Circular of Mr. Walker bears additional evidence of the difficulties and uncertainty attending the whole matter. Questions of importance to the United States have arisen where the laws are silent, or operative only construction. The Secretary says that “until further action of the Congress of the United States upon this subject and instructions founded thereon from this department, you (collectors of customs) will collect duties as heretofore upon all imports from Texas into the United States.” As a necessary consequence, the present tariff of Texas will continue to take effect upon goods of the united States imported into this country.

The Circular in question will, very probably, have in a great degree the effect intended—-to prevent the shipment of the debenture goods to Texas, with expectation of reintroduction into the other States of the union, after annexation shall have been completed; though we doubt seriously whether there is any existing law which might not be eveaved under the prevailing habit of “mental reservation” in relation to “custom house oaths.”
Debenture goods in quantities sufficient to supply the markets of Texas for the next five years, might be shipped to Texas, “no intended to be relanded within the United States,” and kept for sale in the markets of this country, to whom ever desired to purchase. It would require some new law of the United States to prevent those who might purchase here from reshipping these good to other States of the Union.

We have no doubt that this view of the sub. will be adopted to a considerable extent, by the merchants in Texas, though the Circular will probable defer many United States merchants from entering into the speculation who might otherwise have done so. This is probably the chief object of the Circular, for it makes no new regulation or application of law, but only impresses increases vigilance in the execution of existing provisions.

In connection with this subject, may be mentioned the fact, that entries of the U. States goods have been made under protest in the custom-house here—-the parties intending to try whether they are liable to duty upon the questions whether Texas is not now a part of the U. States.

August, from Galveston. Recent accounts had been received from General Taylor's camp. They are in good health and spirits. The artillery have provided themselves with some pieces of cannon which they wanted, and were mounting them in their intrenchments. The intelligence from Matamoras represents the Mexican troops as fortifying themselves, and expecting reinforcements.

"Col. Twigg's dragoons arrived at Austin on the 8th August, where the Convention of Texas was assembled. It was calculated that he would join Gen. Taylor about the 18th of the month. The dragoons had borne their journey to Austin well, and their horses were in excellent order.

"Their junction would increase Gen. Taylor's force to more 1,500, and the daily accessions they were receiving would place our troops out of a possible casualties from aggressions of the advancing Mexicans."

In the event of a war with Mexico, it is probable that a requisition will be made on his State for a part of the necessary force. Governor Brown, looking to this fact, has addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, on behalf of our people, requisition that, as Mississippi did her part of voting to acquire Texas, she may be permitted to do some part of the fighting, to retain possession of that province. He desired that Mississippi might be permitted to furnish volunteers, there being no necessity for a draft. Major General John M. Duffield, and Brigades General A. G. Bennett, have tendered their services to the Governor, in the vent a call is made upon Mississippi for men. This fact, so honorable to those officers, has been announced by the Governor to the War Department. [Mississippian, 20th August.]

According to the "Bunker Hill Aurora," a considerable degree of activity prevails at the Navy Yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts, where several vessels are being put in readiness for sea. The Aurora says:

"The sloop of war Marion, Commander Lewis E. Simonds, destined for the Gulf, will be ready for sea about the last of next week. She has been in the dry dock for examination and came out yesterday. She has been furnished with an entire new armament from Alger's foundry, and is now waiting for a few of her gun-carriages. She will proceed from this port Norfolk with recruits.

"The United States brigantine Boxer is not yet commission. She has been thoroughly overhauled and repaired in the dry dock, and has now got her yards up, and is nearly rigged. The Boxer will be ready in about ten days.

"The frigate United States was taken into the dry dock this morning and will be thoroughly repaired and got ready for sea. An entire new armament has also been received at the Navy Yard for this vessel."

In yesterday's Whig we find the following attempt to ridicule the patriotic motives which induced the Richmond Fayette Artillery to offer their services to the secretary of War, as developed in the Correspondence we published yesterday:

"RICHMOND FAYETTE ARTILLERY.

"MARCH TO MEXICO

"We find in the 'Union, (Mr. Polk's organ) or Saturday, the following warlike correspondence.

"The spirit thus manifested by the Artillery, we have little question would be that of the whole country was really considered in any danger by a singly human being. But as it is, we can scarcely believe that any rational man regards the 'attitude' of Mexico, whatever gasconade her Governors may employ, or the national habits of that people familiarly resort to, as implying the slightest danger to any Anglo American thing of life, from a man to a musquetoe! And talking of musquetoes, we regard them at present, and we believe the ladies of Richmond most heartily concur with us in opinion, as far more annoying and troublesome than the Mexicans, whom those ladies, if need were, flog themselves. They (the musquetoes) worry the children of nights, and the ladies themselves, effect? from the of Monday night, should turn out to be true, and the measures therein specified be carried into Union say, to the offer of the Richmond Fayette Artillery, if the following important intelligence, Whig exigency warrant the acceptance of your offer, the President will most readily avail himself of it.'" "Should the President by authorized to take into the service of the United States volunteers, and should the public

Of War, We are happy to quote from our other Whig neighbor, the Times, the following liberal tribute to the Artillery:
We are as fond of a good joke as any man—but it should be consistent in itself and rest upon some foundation. But, when a public journal, in direct contradiction of its own expressed opinions, attempts to throw ridicule upon a gallant corps, whose readiness and efficiency no one can doubt, and whose spirit in the present cave all must approve, it evinces, to say the least, a want of good taste and proper justice.

Even in the same No. of the Whig, which ridicules the move of our Artillery Corps, we find the following passage, which really does no look as if, in the opinion of that journal, all danger had blown over:

"Mr. Polk's errors committed, and in the very to be committed, have all grown out of this sensitive repugnance to an extra session of Congress. Yet, as Congress is the war-making and the war-providing power in our system, nothing is or can be clearer, than that Congress ought to be in session when war is to be denounced by this country, or AGAINST THIS COUNTRY."

We are happy to quote from our other Whig neighbor, the Times, the following liberal tribute to the Artillery:

"The last Union contains a correspondence between Capt. Thomas H. Allis, of the Artillery, and Mr. Marcy, Secretary of War, with regard to the tender of its services to the Government by the Artillery. Mr. M. justly compliments the Artillery to its public spirited and patriotic motives, and says:

"'Should the President by authorized to take into the service of the United States volunteers, and should the public exigency warrant the acceptance of your offer, the President will most readily avail himself of it.'"

P.S.—What will the Whig say, to the offer of the Richmond Fayette Artillery, if the following important intelligence, from the Union of Monday night, should turn out to be true, and the measures therein specified be carried into effect?
Letters have been received in this city, by the Ann Louisa, arrived at New York, from Vera Cruz. One of these letters is dated at Vera Cruz on the 2d August; and although not so late by two days as the accounts to which we referred on last Monday evening, yet the information which it gives is some importance. It certainly varies the appearance of matters in Mexico from what the other accounts of the 30th would represent them. The following is an extract from the letter of the 2d August, which was yesterday received in Washington:

"I deem it my duty also to state, that I have just seen a letter from the British Consul, sent to his house here, wherein he observes that orders had been issued, and approved by the war committee, for the troops on the frontier to take p their position ten leagues in advance of the Rio Bravo; and, if attacked, to defend themselves," &c., &c.

"Should Mexico carry out this scheme, we ask whether there be a man, with an American heart, in his bosom, who would not put forth an arm to arrest the invader. The National Intelligencer may hesitate to defend our rights and our honor; but, fortunately for those rights and that honor, that paper is considered rather in the light of the organ of foreign influence that of American feeling. Let the day come when it may, that the Mexican banner dares to pass our honor; but, fortunately for those rights and that honor, that paper is considered rather in the light of the organ of foreign influence that of American feeling. Let the day come when it may, that the Mexican banner dares to pass the Rio Grande, we are satisfied that the great body of the Whig party will come manfully forward to the support of the national honor."

RE43n35p4c3, September 5, 1845: MEXICAN CRUELTY

Many of the Whig presses, carried away by their hostility to Democratic measures, and especially the annexation of Texas, have evinced towards Mexico a tender sympathy which is far from being justified by the conduct of that tyrannical and barbarous nation. Some of these journals contend that the United States have exhibited an infamous desire to oppress a weak nation like Mexico—that the latter has fully complied with all her obligations to us, and that we are justly liable to the indignant reprobation of the civilized world for the meanness of taking advantage of her weakness in plundering her property and maltreating her citizens.

Mortifying as it is to read there unpatriotic attacks of Americans upon their native land, the grossness of their conduct is heightened by the fact, that there is no the slightest foundation for their miserable ravings. The history of the few past years amply proves, that we have received from Mexico numberless injuries and insults, which we have borne with too much lenity.—Had we shown the same energy and sense of pride, that marked the conduct of France, we should have taught Mexico a lesson, which might have saved us much trouble and annoyance at this particular moment. In a message of the 6th February, 1837, General Jackson wrote to Congress, "The length of time since some of the injuries have been committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress—the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the property and persons of our citizens—the officers and flag of the United States—indecent of recent insults to this Government and people by the late extraordinary Mexican Minister, would justify, in the eyes of all nations, immediate war." It is true, the claims of that date were submitted to Treat action afterwards—but the conduct of Mexico, in reference to that very treaty, would justify, more than the claims it was intended to close, war. We have not time even to sum up the wanton violations of faith shown by Mexico sufficient to stamp her character with a more than Punic infamy. This has been admirably done by the able series of "C," in the Washington Union. She has been shown to be equally faithless in the fulfillment of her treaty engagements, and of the obligations imposed by the law of nations and by the code of personal honor. Her highest functionaries have been guilty of an open disregard of truth—and the archives of the Board of Commissioners fully established her official and national turpitude.

We cannot stop to record the glaring instances of her outrages upon American property and citizens—her violation of the most solemn pledges to satisfy the claims of our citizens—nor the forcible seizure and imprisonment of American citizens. But we this morning are enabled, by the kindness of the friend from whose journal we extracted a few leaves on Monday, to adduce one of the most damning proofs of the barbarity and cruel tyranny of this semi-savage nation.—What American can read the following horrid details of the outrage, take from the same journal, without a thrill of indignation at the mean villainy and cruelty of Mexicans? We defy the records of history to produce a more revolting instance of cold-blooded cruelty and oppression.—This alone would be of itself cause enough for a vigorous punishment of Mexican infamy by our arms. But add to it the numerous insults and injuries yet unexplained—the withholding of the acknowledged claims of our citizens—and we run up a catalogue of outrages, which, independently of the insolence of Mexico on account of annexation, would fully justify the most vigorous measures of Government. We trust that when Congress shall assemble, they will at once call upon Mexico for a full and ample apology for her many insults upon our Government, and wrongs done our fellow citizens.

Anxious for peace as we are with all the world, we cannot agree much longer to submit to such overbearing and arrogant conduct as Mexico as shown. Self-respect, national pride, the good opinion of the world, and our own safety and welfare, imperatively demand, that we should settle all our difficulties with Mexico, peaceable if it can be
And yet we see American (?) journals hurling insult at the head of their own country—sympathizing with and sustaining the outrages of Mexico—and, at the same time, charging their own people with "meanness, infamy and plunder." Out upon such traitors, who, in the broad light of truth and history, desert their own native land, and take shelter under the wing of Mexican tyranny and infamy! Thank Heaven, there are but few such miserable apostolate of Mexico! Public sentiment will soon sink them to a still more degraded position than that which they now occupy. The present insolence of Mexico will attract the eyes of all America to her gross outrages upon our nation—and the few traitors, who may be found taking sides with her, will be gibbeted upon the pillory of public opinion. The following thrilling sketch is but one of the money instances of Mexican villainy which stain her history. It would be no glory to conquer such a nation—but it would confer a benefit upon the civilized would, to break up such a nest of robbers and malefactors:

Mexico, July 5, 1840.

 Early in April last, a verbal order was issued by the Governor of Upper California to the Alcaldes of that Department, commanding them to arrest all foreigners within their respective jurisdictions. On hundred and eleven were, in consequence, immediately arrested. They were taken from their fields or workshops— forbidden to carry with them clothes, passports, or papers—dragged through the country, some of them hundreds of miles, lashed with hides and beat with swords during the day, and at night thrust into the loathsome dungeons of the Catholic missions, commonly used to subdue turbulent Indian converts. As soon as they were arrested, the soldiers who made the arrest, robbed their houses, seized their arms, cattle, horses, and other property, and distributed them among themselves and their friends. On the arrival of the prisoners at Monterey, between fifty and sixty were put into a prison room nineteen by twenty feet square, with no means of ventilation, save one small grated window, at which they stood, alternately, to catch a breath of air. The ground under them was so damp, that their feet sank in it. For three days and nights they were with out food or water. They were forced to yield to the necessities of nature in the same apartment, until the atmosphere became so fetid, that at times, during the heat of the day, many of them became frantic, or stupid with suffocation. At the end of three days, some humane gentlemen obtained permission of the Governor to have the prisoners separated, and to be allowed to send them provisions; but he refused to let them send planks for the sufferers to sleep on, or to permit them to take the air, or to make an inventory of the property they had left behind. On the 22d of April, they were all marched between files of soldiers, from the prison to the front of the Governor’s house, where they were seated on the ground in the middle of the street, and then called in, one by one, and questioned before a tribunal of justices as to their names, where they came from, and if they had passports. They were then compelled to sign the justices’ record, without understanding what it contained, or being permitted to have any other interpreter than a Californian, who, they say, cannot hold the most ordinary conversation in English. They were then remanded in prison.

On the 23d, forty-seven of these prisoners, (the rest, it was said, being left for another vessel,) were marched in irons to the beach, and there put on board of a Mexican barque, under a strong guard. When on board they were sent below; some chained to long bars of iron fastened to the lower deck; others two together, others singly in handcuffs and fetters. On the passage from Monterey to Santa Barbara, they were no allowed to go on deck for any purpose—only one small hatchway was allowed to be opened at a time—and a soldier stood always in that, threatening, by order of his commander, to shoot the first man who spoke. They had little food, and less water—were under a tropical sun, confined to one position, not allowed to stand, and with no place to attend to the calls of nature, except where they lay, and ate, and slept. On the 25th, they arrived at Santa Barbara; there they were driven, in chains, over the side of the vessel, into a small boat, loaded to the water’s edge, and carried through a heavy surf, at the imminent risk of their lives. On landing, they were marched to the prison of the mission of Santa Barbara, where they lay upon the wet ground three days without food, save what the Indian women of the neighborhood brought them, and a part of that was always stolen by the officers of the guard as it passed it on the prison: here, one man, a British subject, died. After this, they were let out in front of the prison, and permitted to wash themselves—being first time since they were taken prisoners. They were then again put on board of the same vessel, in the same manner as before, and carried to San Blas. They represent their passage of eight days thither as fully as uncomfortable as was that from Monterey, except that they were once or twice permitted to go on deck, and had buckets furnished to them for the purposes of nature; but that the horrid stench, the pain caused by their irons when the ship rolled, the burning thirst, and the unceasing cruelty of the guard, were the cause of the sufferings which they cannot describe. Moreover, the guards that stood in the hold of the vessel among the prisoners, had always in their hands drawn butcher’s knives, and as the ship pitched, they being unaccustomed to the sea, would fall about, to the great danger of the prisoners’ lives. They arrived at San Blas on the -----day of May—were there put in prison, remained two days, and thence marched on foot to Tepic, a distance of 60 miles; driven under a blistering sun, beaten with clubs and muskets and swords, and fainting from the want of food. On their arrival at Tepic, the British and American Vice Consuls received them as if they had been brothers—procured them comfortable prison lodgings, furnished them with food and clothes, and, in short, did everything practicable to relieve the wretchedness of their situation. They are yet there. The party consists of 23 American citizens and 23 British subjects.

These men have had no trial: they declare that they are without crime, and that the do not know even of what they are accused.

The Governor, by whose orders they were arrested, charges them with a design to conspire against the authorities of California. We have seen no evidence that gives the slightest color of truth to such a charge—and there are many circumstances opposed to it. Few of the prisoners no at Tepic were acquainted with each other until they were assembled under arrest at Monterey. They had had no communication with each other. They were scatter over a territory more than seven hundred miles in extent. A number of them were seamen, who had been discharged from an American vessel but a few days before, in consequence of her sale and transfer to a citizen of that port. Other were men whose good characters are vouched for, established in the country, wealthy and industrious.

When news of this occurrence reached Mazatian, Captain French Forrest, commanding the U.S. sloop of war, St. Louis, immediately sailed for Monterey to enquire into the circumstances. And he swore that if they should prove to be as represented, and he could lay his hands on his Excellency Don John the Baptist Alvarado, Governor of Alta California, he would bring him to San Blas, in irons, at the risk of his ship and commission.

RE43n35p4c5, September 5, 1845: MEXICO

There is considerable force in the following statements of the N.O. Bulletin of the 26th ult. That very nearly express our own views:

"Some of the papers North are urging upon the President they expediency of immediately calling and Extra Session of Congress. We doubt very much the necessity of any such step, so far as our relations with Mexico are concerned.—There has been, as yet, no declaration of war, and whether there will be one or not, is just as uncertain now as it was two weeks ago. The probability is, that the state of uncertainty may last for months to come. Our opinion is, that Mexico, conscious of her impotence and entire inability to carry on active hostilities, will put herself in the attitude of quasi-war. By threatening and bullying and such warlike preliminaries, she will strive to make the world believe there is to be war, and thus she will impede our commerce, harass and vex our Government, and as effectually stop all trade and intercourse with our citizens as could be done by a promulgation of war or an embargo. Indeed it must be obvious to every one, that the continuance of the present dubious aspect of international relations for six months longer, will work much greater injury to us than could any belligerency, waged by our puny neighbor. The policy is one, too, which Great Britain is disposed to favor. The expulsion of American traders from Mexico, and the stoppage of American commerce, and the exclusion of American manufactures will be great gain to her, for then she monopolizes the Mexican market; whereas, a breaking out of hostilities might result in political changes very unfavorable to British ascendancy in Mexico. We think, then that the settled policy of Mexico will be to threaten war and keep up a constant state of alarm, without any over declaration of hostilities.
Under such circumstance, no necessity exists, for the present, for the call of an Extra Session. The Executive is vested with adequate powers to meet every emergency. In the meanwhile, let us quietly await the progress of events, and the development of Mexico's intentions. And if Mexico continues to maintain the same menacing, quasibellicose attitude when our Congress meets, in December, then will it be the duty of our President to recommend the adoption of measure to coerce our neighbors into decent behavior—a compliance with the usages of civilization, and an obedience to the laws of nations."

RE43n35p4c5, September 5, 1845: (no title)

"Three of the Schooners of War built for Mexico by Brown & Bell, in New York, still remain there, in consequence of the inability of the Mexican Government to pay for them. Three others were paid for a few months ago, and take to Mexico."

RE43n36p1c4, September 9, 1845: MEXICO-THE WHIG PRESS

The Whig presses are put to great trouble, to weaken the confidence of the present Republican Administration. Their eagerness to condemn betrays them into the most ridiculous inconsistencies. At one time, they denounced the annexationist for having outraged the rights and honor of Mexico—and for having given just cause for war to Mexico. They then condemn the Administration as not having prepared for war as a necessary consequence of annexation, and as exposing the citizens of the U. States and Texas to the furious troops of Mexico, and the vessels of our merchants to be plundered by Mexican privateers. When convinced, against their will, that wise and vigorous measures have been adopted to defend the soil and people of Texas, now our own, Mexican aggression, and to protect our commerce by an efficient fleet—they turn round and denounce the Executive for having wasted the public money in preparations for war, which had not happened, and no one looked for—forgetting, short-sighted creatures, that these very preparations had shown to Mexico that we were no to be trifled with, and had prevented a hostile explosion on her part, should war indeed not come upon us.

Indeed, nothing seems to satisfy the Whig press. If no preparations had been made by the Executive to protect the soil and people of Texas, and by this negligence Mexico would have induced to overrun Texas, slaughter her citizens and take temporary possession of a territory virtually our own, there would have been no end to the fierce denunciations of the "heartless neglect and wretched imbecility" of our Government. Like the wise statesmen and faithful officers, the administration have promptly and thoroughly organized these necessary precautionary measures—and at once, the Whig press turn upon the Executive, and impugn their motives for having lavished the public money upon useless arrangements, in order to play into the hands of a corrupt speculator. This is the consistence, the justice, the decency of a portion of the Whig press! The country, however, rightly appreciate the patriotic and salutary measures of the Executive, and, whether we have or war or peace, will sustain the enthusiastically. The last news from the seat of operations, to be found in another column, shows that all is right with our gallant little army in Texas, and that there is no apprehension of immediate hostilities in that direction. But we cannot yet predict what course Mexico may adopt.

For the benefit of the Whigs, who profess to be so familiar with Artillery movements, an, indeed, for the information of our readers, to whom the subject is new, though full of interest, we quote the following from the Union of Thursday night:

“The Artillery----Seening that certain newspapers are commenting upon the fact, that Gen. Taylor’s artillery in Texas were “without guns,” we have taken pains to ascertain the following facts: Our artillery regiments are not armed as field artillery, and were never meant to be, in the whole, so armed. They are armed, [the regiments, except one company in each,] and always have been, as infantry serving in the fortifications with heavy guns. They are called artillery in the law, and are meant for garrisons to the seacoast fortifications. We have four regiments of this artillery, or forty companies. If these were all field artillery, they would require 240 field pieces, guns, and howitzers—field artillery sufficient for an army of 240,000 men, according to the rule which prevails modern armies. This, though a preposterous force of artillery, if armed as field artillery, for any army the United States can ever maintain or send into the field, is much too small for complete garrisons of our forts on the sea coast and lake frontiers. These forts, which completed, are estimated to mount 6,800 heavy guns. The four regiments of artillery contain, rank and file, as we see from the Army Register, 2,168 men—less that 1 man to 3 heavy cannon. In time of war, this force would be increased; but it is not meant ever to garrison the forts entirely with regulars. The militia would, in great part, be employed for that purpose; and it is certainly the best and most useful employment for that force. We shall, however, have in each garrison a disciplined, well instructed body of artillery, of the more difficult duties at the guns and horses. Four such companies have been ordered to Texas. The other 12 artillery companies sent thither, are armed and instructed as infantry; and, of course, are without ‘guns’—that is, ‘field cannon.’ The newspapers which have commented upon this matter, may now understand it.”

RE43n36p1c5, September 9, 1845: AN IMPORTANT QUESTION

Many of our citizens have become proprietors of lands in Texas, and are, of course, solicitous as to the manner in which the various land titles of that country will be affected by the transfer of the supreme jurisdiction from her courts, on the final consummation of annexation, to the highest court known to the laws of the United States. In the Texas Convention, the question was referred to a committee of legal gentlemen of distinguished ability. After a full and critical examination, the committee made an able report through their Chairman, Judge Hemphill, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Texas—who is said to be one of the first jurists in the Southwest. We find the report, said to be from the pen of Judge H., in Galveston News of the 23d—and would be glad to transfer it entire to our columns—but are forced to confine our extracts to a few paragraphs, which, however, contain the cream of the learned and conclusive argument:

"Should, then, a controversy arise between the citizen of this country and a citizen of another State, who, subsequent to our incorporation into the American Union, might acquire a claim to lands within this State, either by inheritance, devise, or purchase, and should sit be prosecuted for the same in the federal courts the rights of the parties would be decided by the same laws and rules by which they would be determined in the courts of the States.

"Whether the laws, customs, and usages of Spain, the decrees of Mexico, or those of Coahuila and Texas, or the laws of the republic of Texas, or all together, affected the rights in controversy—to each and all of these laws would the courts of the Union give their just force and effect; and by no other laws or principles, deduced from other systems of jurisprudence, would questions at issue be determined.

"Neither the Constitution, treaties, nor laws of the United States, can change, alter, or modify the rights of individuals to real property, as established by the existing law of the Republic.—Both the Federal and State Courts will be restricted, in their decisions on those rights, to the provisions of the laws under which those rights originated, or by which they have been affected; and, should rights have arisen under that portion of our Constitution and laws, which, as being repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, will become null and void, yet the rights thus created will remain undisturbed.

"All controversies which may arise between citizens of this State, and aliens authorized to sue, will be determined by the same rules and laws which will guide the Courts in the decision of cause between the citizens of different States.

"Your committee have confined themselves to deductions drawn entirely from the Constitution, laws, and judicial decisions of the United States. These afford the most solid grounds of assurance that the rights of individuals to property will be guarded with the most jealous vigilance, by the Courts of the United States, and determined on the same principles of law which constitute the rules of decision in the tribunals of the State.—The establishment of the Federal Courts within the limits of the State, and their cognizance of disputed claims to lands,
From the foreign news by the Caledonia, we gather the opinion that the Governments of both France and England, thwarted in their arrogant attempt to control the free action of the United States by the famous "balance of power," and defeat the annexation of Texas, seem now disposed to let American and Texas settle the Texas question in their own way. Unless, therefore, there may be some deep game of diplomacy on foot, we are inclined to believe that Mexico will not receive any direct aid or countenance from these European powers in her proposed struggle for the re-possession of Texas. And here we would quote a very amusing passage from the London Times:

"The mediation of these powers between the incapacity of the United States and the debility of Mexico was ineffectual, from the moment the leaning of Texas herself was peremptorily declared. But that mediation was the only dignified and consistent course which could be pursued by the great European powers. The fact that it was jointly tendered sufficiently demonstrated that neither France nor England had in view any exclusive interest of their own upon that part of the continent of North America."

This is too absurd to gull even the most credulous. No one can doubt, that it was the policy of these two powers, by the defeat of annexation, to obtain the perfect control of Texas, and to deal a heavy blow at our agriculture and manufactures, by admitting from Texas her cotton and sugar at a low duty, on condition that the latter should receive the cotton and other manufactures of England and the silks and wines of France, also at a low duty. All interest, then, should rejoice that this mischievous policy has been so gloriously defeated by the wisdom and promptness of our Government.

For the amusement of our readers, we give the substance of some of these editorial ravings.—The London Times says:

"The world views the annexation of Texas, if the whole history of the transaction, from the first to last, be dispassionately surveyed, as one of those basest frauds and most unwarrantable acts of spoliation ever perpetrated by any nation. In the present state of public opinion in Europe, such an aggression on the territories of a weak state by a powerful neighbor would be impracticable. It can only be compared to the policy of Russia towards the Turkish empire—a policy which Russia herself is not bold or bad enough to avow, and which she has allowed the other powers of Europe to arrest by their interference and co-operation in the affairs of the East. As far as public opinion in Europe concerned, annexation has done for the political character of the Cabinet of Washington what repudiation had already done for the financial credit of the United States; infamy of repudiation rests upon some of the States only, and that of annexation is the result of deliberate and determined policy of the American people and their rulers."

The following extract from the Times exhibits the disgraceful fact, that our foreign enemies base their assault against our honor and virtue upon the arguments of our own citizens—upon the rabid and unpatriotic sentiments of Abolitionist and Dissolutionist of New England. What will be said, which this foreign embodiment of hostility to the progress of American institutions, thus lands the leaders of the Whig Party, and grossly assails Messrs, Calhoun and Polk and the Democratic Party?

"Not for Texas alone, but for the principles which she has basely violated, and indignant protest is sent forth by Europe, and we only re-echo the stern rebuke of the wisest and best of her own citizens, if, indeed, me are still willing to be called American citizens, when they must in that capacity sustain the burden of a transaction which the have themselves denounced as shameful and fatal to the true principles of their country. What says New England to those things? What is thought of them in the cultivated and intellectual society of Boston, which latterly possessed in Channing and eloquent defender of Christian morality, and still boasts in Story an unrivalled expositor of law and justices? The pride of the American people used to consist in the traditions bequeathed to them by the purity of Washington and the integrity of his illustrious companions; it is now stimulated by the artifices of Mr. Calhoun, and the aggressions of Mr. Polk. They used to boast of a superiority of Europe in their exemption from those political errors and crimes which have so often deluged the ancient world with blood; but whilst civilization among us daily consolidates the general peace by a firm observance of public duties and international rights, the American continent seems destined to witness the fatal consequences of an eruption of those passions and follies which a wise Government and a virtuous people do most studiously repress.---Henceforward, the passion which has been roused, principally for the purposes of an unprincipled party, must at all hazards be satisfied. Me like Mr. Calhoun or Mr. Polk, who subsist by stimulating and serving that passion, are the successful rivals of men like Mr. Webster or Mr. Clay, who aspire to the nobler task of controlling it. The same spirit is no altogether wanting in other free countries; in England it has one representative, in France it has many: but these are men thrown into opposition by the loss of the confidence of their Sovereigns and their country men, whilst the Government steadily pursues an opposite course. In the United States, on the contrary, the ascendency of the restless, unscrupulous party of the Democracy is complete, and with such men in power, directing the passions of the people to aggression of foreign States, no limits can be assigned to the wanton excesses which may be anticipated from such a Government. It is vain to conceal, it is impossibly to overlook the fact, that the possessions of the crown of England, and the relations of this country with the United States; are constantly and especially menaced by this detestable party."

This is beautiful language for a country whose enormities and oppressions in all Asia have aroused the indignation of the whole world! Indeed, taking into view the course of Russia towards Poland Circassia, and of France in Algeria, Europe has completely estopped herself from saying a word as to assumed aggressions of the rest of the world.

The Liverpool Mail says: "It becomes a question whether, if Mexico is unable to cope with the grasping ambition and military strange of the American Union, it will not be the duty of the powers of the old world to come forward to her assistance."

It is not almost incredible that, in this age of American progress and intelligence, and respectable journal would have ventured to send forth such miserable stuff as the following which we find in the same London Standard?

"It were invidious to compare the intelligence, the honor and honesty of the present United States generation with those of its British, German or French contemporaries. Nothing can be more certain that the extraordinary morel advancement of the population of the Old World during the last 50 or 60 years. Has there not been a corresponding retrogradation in the U. States? Now, should this be the case, as we acknowledge, with pain that it is, the interest of mankind will suffer nothing by the dissolution of a system so little favorable to the moral elevation of our race; and, therefore we can contemplate with indifference at least, that breaking up of the commonwealth of which the annexation of Texas and the Mexican war are so obviously commencement."

This paper then counts confidently upon the refusal of the Northern and Eastern States to submit to taxation to support a "long and difficult war for an object really opposed to their interests, and outraging their political and religious principles, for the war for Texas is a war against the abolition of slavery." England and Mexico will have found out before this, that all such calculation upon our dissensions are based upon entirely false principles. Even the few domestic traitors amongst us have been put down by public opinion.

The Liverpool Mercury belabors the Ministry in the following terms: "Such a war will, of course---whether Great Britain, so shamefully fooled both by Texans and America, shall take part in it or not---lead to the immediate blockade of all the ports, and consequent annihilation of our commerce with Mexico, another boon, for which our merchants will have to thank the bungling of Sir Robert Peel's administration. It is quite certain that, but for underhand encouragement and promises of support, Mexico would long ago have made better terms with Texas, by timely concessions, than she will now be able to procure by an appeal to arms, of which, unassisted, the most likely termination will be the loss of California as well as Texas, and still further dismemberment of the territory of the Republic."

In the same key the London Morning Chronicle says: "Our interference for Texas in these latter days has been most unfortunate. It was plainly the duty and the policy of the British Government to interfere, if that interference had the prospect or even the chance of being effectual. But to interfere without the slightest chance of success, to force the Mexicans to bootless sacrifice, and to irritate the Americans by idle meddling, was on of those acts of absurdity which stamp a Government as Imbecile. That a British Minister should be so mistaken, so helplessly ignorant, and so utterly misinformed, as to go on moving heaven and earth to prevent a resolve by the Texas, which they, or both powers, soon after unanimously took, is, perhaps, on of the most gross samples of blunder, and ignorance, and incapacity, that even the Tory Foreign Office ever committed. Not only have we irritated the Americans, but "we have destroyed the character of European ability and influence in the New World."

The French newspapers are pretty nearly unanimous in the opinion, that the war with Mexico, if that war there be, will soon be terminated, the immense power of the United States enabling them to impose silence, as soon as it pleases, upon its diminutive and bellicose antagonist.---Even the Journal des Debaus, which, as a Government organ, views the annexation of Texas with any thing but favor says---the only comment it makes on the matter: "In the present condition of Mexico, no one can attach any great importance to such a declaration of war." The Constitutionnel thinks neither Mexico nor American can do great harm to each other, and that the business will be settled after Mexico shall have seized a few American vessels, and America sent a few bombs into Vera Cruz. The Presse contemptuously designates the declaration of war as “fanfarnade” that no one can regard seriously. The Commerce declares, that war will be suicidal to Mexico, and condemns the partaken by the French and English Governments in opposition to the annexation of Texas. The National, the republican organ, contends that partaken by the French and English Government in opposition to the annexation of Texas. The National, ant that, therefore, denunciations of the Mexican Government, in its proclamations, are unfounded. While it thinks that England has more interest in Mexico making war upon the United States that Mexico itself, it declares that, not even with the assistance of England, can she carry on a successful campaign. On the whole, the Texas policy of M. Guizot is severely handled in Paris—and that Minister must now be convinced, to his sorry, of the ridiculous blunder he has made, in the celebrated doctrine of “a balance of power.” We rejoice, that the spirit of the French people is with us.
It should sill be more warmly encourage us to stick to the rights, and to maintain our supremacy at all hazards.

RE43n36p4c3, September 9, 1845: TEXAS PUBLIC LANDS

So much stress has been laid by the Whigs upon the enormous public debt of Texas, which it is doubtful, they say, whether her lands will be able to satisfy, that we are glad to have it in our power to furnish official information on the subject. The Texas Convention, now in session, has taken up the subject, and the result seems to be of a very favorable character.

An important document from the Land Office at Austin, has been laid before the Convention.—From it we learn that the superficial extent of Texas, as comprised within the limits defined by statute of the first Texas Congress, comprises in round numbers, 397,00 square miles, or 254,284,166 acres; that the total amount of land is issued by the various Boards of Land Commissioners, is 43,543,970 acres; that the total amount of the above, recommended as good and lawful claims, is 19,212,206 acres; issued by the Department of War, as bounty and donation claims, 6,300,000 acres; Land script sold by the Texas Government, 368,787 acres; amount of legal claims to lands issued by Texas, 25,880,993 acres; amount issued, and supposed to be fraudulent, 24,331,764 acres; issued by the authorities of Mexico, a portion of which is supposed to invalid, 22,080,000 acres; and that the total amount of public domain, subject to location and unsurveyed, is 181,991,403 acres. The officer of the Land Office, in communicating the above statement, says that he has no means of knowing the whole amount of script that has been issued by the Texas Government, but thinks the amount yet out, is about 4 of that shown to be in his office, and that the same is the case with reference to bounty lands.

RE43n37p1c4, September 12, 1845: FURTHER FROM MEXICO

The Baltimore Republican of Tuesday evening contains a letter from Pensacola of August 31st, received by the U.S. Ship Saratoga, which says:

“Congress has authorized the Executive to borrow fifteen millions of dollars, and to raise twenty five thousand troops. The policy of the Mexican government has undergone a change: The cease to speak to the United States as the party with whom the are to wage war, and have taken ground that they are arrayed only against their revolted province of Texas, which is to be subdued at once. This they have to effect by a sudden and vigorous vigorous invasion, before a sufficient force can be opposed to them. For this purpose, General Paredes has marched to Matamoras, on the Rio del Norte, with eight thousand men—The are equipping their Navy, and increasing the number of their gun-boats. Troops have been sent to Tampico in the steamer Montezuma. Mexico is convinced that England has persuaded her to take a false step, in offering to acknowledge the independence of Texas; and that no aid is to be expected from the quarter. The Saratoga exchanged salutes with Vera Cruz, and a little better feeling than could have been expected, grew our of the observance of that courtesy, though the newspapers continue to be abusive.”

The writer does not vouch for the truth of his intelligence, but only for the directness of the channel through which it comes. He is induced by many circumstances to doubt the important parts of it, such as Paredes’ army, &c.

Strange, this writer announces that Almonte is the new Secretary of War, and expects to be Secretary of State. This must be an error, as all other accounts represent Pedro Areaya as the Minister of War.

The Union of Tuesday night gives the following official papers received by the Saratoga at the Navy Department. The conduct of Mexico is covered with mystery and no one can predict what another turn of the cards may exhibit. We may expect, at the next arrival, to hear of strange events at the Mexican Capital. The exchange of civilities with out United States vessels, and the hinted disposition to resume negotiations with us, look pacific—but are neutralized by the large bodies of armed me, said to be on their march to reconquer Texas. We feel satisfied, that the new Government will see the folly of incading Texas, and, in order to concentrate all its power and attention at home, will consent to arrange all her difficulties with us upon a permanent and honorable footage. This is all our Government desires——nothing else, we are sure, will the submit to:
Extract of a Letter from

PENSACOLA, September 1.

The Saratoga arrived here last evening, having left Vera Cruz on the 18th ult. An opinion prevailed very generally at Vera Cruz, that Mexico would not formally declare war against the United States. We have a letter, also, which states the belief that the government would be able to realize but a very small portion of the loan, if any. The report of the advance of 25,000 men, to make a rush upon Texas, I regard as sheer fable. Gen. Herrerra has now obtained the supreme power. He will careful of placing in the hands of any man in Mexico a force sufficient to overthrow his government, by one of those sudden revolutions to which his countrymen are so much disposed.

Extract from a Letter, dated

Off Green Island, (Near Vera Cruz,) Aug. 18.

I avail myself of the sailing of the United States schooner Flirt, to inform you that the Saratoga anchored here on the 14th inst.

The mail of to-day, from the city of Mexico, brings information of the election of Gen. Herrera to the Presidency, the resignation of the old Cabinet, and the formation of a new one, consisting of Manuel Pena y Pena, (Minister for Foreign Relations,) Pedro Ayreaya, (Minister of War,) and Fernandez del Castillo, of Hacienda, (or of Finance.)

Congress has voted a loan to enable the government to prosecute the war against Texas; but at so low a rate of interest, that great, if not insuperable difficulties, will be found in effecting it.

--------in a communication of this day's date, informs me that he had seen, in a letter from a source which he knew could be depended upon, that the Mexican Government will, or are, collecting a force of 25,00 men on the frontiers of Texas; and that, with no declaration of war, they mean to make a rush at a moment when the U. States are not dreaming about it; and that the time talked of is September. He remarks: "Now, this is so much in character with the Mexicans, that I believe it to be true. It is true, they will not be able to get the loan of fifteen millions, but they will get enough to get them into a war; and. Mexican-like, they don't care how the are to get out."

--------told me, a day or two since, that it had been intimated to him, that a Minister from the U. States would, no doubt, be received with pleasure by the Mexican Government.

The Saratoga exchanged salutes yesterday morning with the batteries, and she has been tendered by a captain-general with the civilities of the port.

The officers and crew of the Saratoga are in the enjoyment of good health.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
VERA CRUZ, August 16, 1845.

Sir: Considering the present state of affairs between this republic and that of our own country, I deemed it prudent to call, myself, on the captain-general, before presenting Lieutenant Hunter.

I am happy to say, that this gentleman was received with more than ordinary civility, and the tender of gun for gun offered, with repeated assurances that it would be done with no common pleasure----at the same time tendering yourself every offer of hospitality the city can afford.

The time for the salute is 8, a. m., to-morrow morning.

I have the honor to be, sir,

With great respect,

Your obedient servant,

F.M. DIMOND.

COM. T. SHUBRICK,
U.S. ship Saratoga, off Green Island.

[BRM]
We have, at last, news, 12 days later, from our bellicose neighbors of Mexico. The most important item is the resignation of those fierce war-breathing Ministers, Cuevas, Conde and De la Rosa—produced, it is supposed, by the dilatoriness of Congress to accede to all the war demands of the administration. There seems to have been no action of Congress upon the fifteen million loan. The withdrawal of these Ministers, and the non-action of Congress, may certainly be regarded as pacific signs. But, on the other hand, the following bombastic and fiery address of Gen. Arista to his troops, which we find in the N.O. Courier, looks like war, though we begin to think it the safest plan to regard Mexican boasts as meaning exactly the reverse of what they say. This address we extract from the N.O. Courier:

"Comrades: The Supreme Executive has sent to me, by express, the news that the United States, in pursuance of their ambitious views, having taken possession of the Department of Texas, he had demanded a declaration of war from the Congress against that unjust nation.

"The time to fight is come. We must prepare with the ardor, inspired by duty and patriotism, when an attack is made upon the soil, the honor and pride of the nation.

"I am sure, comrades, that those presumptuous Americans will be greatly disappointed when they find that our soldiers not so contemptible as they thought, and that the cannot conquer them.

"I address you under the influence of a lively enthusiasm. All fanciful doubt is vanished; the question is decided; and we are about to commence the most righteous war that we ever waged. Laurels await us! To arms! It is the only means of avenging our honor, insulted by a nation that boasts, of it liberality and civilization.

"Arms are the only arguments to use against banditti and men without good faith. Let us hope for that justice which is invoked by all society and the decision of the civilized world.

"Our lot will be envied by the rest of the army—we are nearest the theatre of war—we are the first to avenge the outrages on our country, and to ravish the usurpers the object of their rapine.

"Large bodies of troops are on their march—they will soon be here to share our dangers, and repulse the enemy.

"The veterans of the North have given proofs of their valor and constancy—they are accustomed to conquer this presumptuous race. I know your worth, and how dearly you love to serve your country. It is for this that I am pleased to command you and lead you to combat, in which you comrade and best friend will be proud to follow your example.

"MARIANO ARISTA"

The re-election of Herrera as President, is stated as only rumor current at Tampico. In regard to the Mexican troops on the Rio Grande, the New Orleans Bulletin contains the following rumors:

"Capt. Gormez reports, that it was rumored that Gen. Herrera was elected President, and that there had been seven emissaries sent from Mexico to Texas, for the purpose of the negroes of Texas in the war; that one of the emissaries had returned to Mexico, and stated that they had succeeded in their mission. It was also rumored, that 1,500 men were marching from the interior of join Gen. Paredes, who had under his command 2,000 men, making his force 3,500; that they were on their march to Monterey. Those who had faith in the truth of this rumor thought that they were to take that route to Texas, for the purpose of making an attack on Galveston. Another rumor was in circulation, that there were about 5,500 men under Gen. Arista, at or near Matamoras, who would certainly attack Gen. Taylor on the Rio Grande."

The previous information, that the Yucatecos had peremptorily refused to comply with the requisitions of the Mexicans upon them for troops to assist in the threatened war against the United States, is fully confirmed. The Picayune says:

"The reiterated demands of Mexico upon the Yucatan, for troops, have received one uniform response—that, if Mexico chose to engage in war with the United States, she must bear the brunt of it; that the Yucatan, as a Department, would not contribute any quota of troops; but that, if any of her citizens chose to volunteer, they were at liberty to do so."

To judge from the delightful condition, in which the following, from Vera Cruzana, published by the Courier, represents the province of Tobasco, we should think it not probable that Mexico could get much assistance from that quarter:

"Passengers, arrived yesterday, report that the department was in a complete state of anarchy.——The commandant, Gen. Martinez, was broke and in prison. Col. Bruno held the reins of power, and, no doubt, would soon share the fate of Martinez. The insurgents knew not what to do. Many persons were leaving Tobasco, and many others had sought refuge on board a schooner bound to this port."
On the whole, things look very peaceable for us. But there are elements of internal dissension visible in the heart of Mexico. The next news may unfold some strange events.

P.S.—The following interesting intelligence from Mexico, and our army in Texas, which we take from Monday night’s Union, goes to confirm the impression, that there will be no immediate hostilities with Mexico. The election of Herrera, as President, over the war-loving Almonte, the bitter enemy of the United States; the withdrawal, whether forced or voluntary, of the rabid Ministers, and the almost certain failure to realize the loan, are pretty strong symptoms of peace. We trust that Mexico will awake from her fit of insanity, and agree to settle all her difficulties, and renew her intercourse, with us upon liberal and honorable terms. It will be seen, that the wise and vigorous measures of our Government have probably had the effect of preventing a hostile explosion:

“LATEST FROM MEXICO.—Just as our paper was going to press, letters were put into our hands from Pensacola, of the 1st September, and containing despatches from Vera Cruz of the 18th and 21st August. We have only time this evening, to state the substance of the information they convey. An opinion very generally prevailed at Vera Cruz, according to the last accounts that Mexico would not formally declare war against the United States, and that the Government would be able to realize but a very small proportion of the loan, if any, which had been authorized—so low was the rate of interest. It was said, that in lieu of a declaration, Mexico would carry on hostilities vigorously against Texas; and they talked of making a rush upon her with 25,000 men; but this was generally considered as sheer fable.

“The mail of the 18th had brought news from the city of Mexico of the election of General Herrera to the Presidency, and the formation of a new cabinet, consisting of Manuel Pena y Pena, Minister of Foreign Relations, Pedro Areaya, Minister of War, and Fernandez del Castillo, Minister of the Treasury.

FROM THE ARMY OF OBSERVATION.

[OFFICIAL]

“Despatches from General Taylor, as late as the 26th of August, have reached the War Department by express. The troops ordered to Texas, to compost the ‘army of occupation,’ are rapidly arriving, together with an ample supply of munitions of war. Colonel Twigg’s regiment of dragoons were at San Patricio on the 24th, in excellent condition, having well sustained their long march, and finding, through the whole route, a plentiful supply of water, provisions, and forage. The horses are in a fine condition, and fit for immediate active service, should there be occasion to put them to it. This regiment was expected to be at Corpus Christi on the 27th of August. General Taylor has, at no time since his arrival at Aransas bay, felt any solicitude for the safety of his command, or the necessity of calling for auxiliary force, even from Texas. The two gallant companies of artillery, which, with such promptness and patriotic spirit, volunteered to go to Texas from New Orleans, under the belief that their country stood in need of their services, have arrived at General Taylor’s camp. As there has not been, and probably will not be, any emergency requiring them, they will not, probably, be long detained from their homes. It is the general’s intention to discharge them as soon as a few more regular artillery, no on the way to Texas, shall have arrived—unless things on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande shall assume a more threatening aspect.

“The most reliable accounts represent that there were, near the middle of August, only about five hundred regular Mexican troops at Matamoras, and that General Arista was to leave Monterey on the 4th of that month for the former place, a distance of three hundred miles, with fifteen hundred more troops, five hundred of them cavalry; but there was no news of his arrival at Matamoras. It is not known, or believed, that there are regular Mexican troops at any other point on the Rio Grande. It was probably the original intention to employ these troops in carrying out the threat of Mexico to take possession of Texas; but the presence of the United States army, and the preparations in Texas to meet and repel their advance, have caused this design to be abandoned for the present, at least. The regular troops of the United States now in Texas, and those on the way there, are deemed sufficient to keep in check the Mexican forces assembled, or likely to be assembled, on the Rio Grande. General Taylor’s attention has not been exclusively confined to the Mexicans. He has had an eye to the Cumanchers, and taken measures to guard the country of their incursions.

“ The accounts of the climate at Corpus Christi are very favorable. Generally speaking, the troops are in fine health—better, it is supposed, that they would have been at the posts from which most of them were removed.”

[BRM]
Orders were despatched from the War Department on the afternoon of the 23d of August, for the concentration of seven companies of artillery at Fort Columbus, New York harbor, thence to embarked in the United States ship Lexington, for the army in Texas. Five of the companies were drawn from Frankford Arsenal, Pennsylvania; Boston; Portsmouth, New Hampshire; and Portland, Maine. The detachment from the most distant station (Portland) reached New York the morning of the 30th, when the whole command of 408 officers and men, under Major J. Erving, 2d regiment of artillery, with all their supplies and equipments for service, were in perfect readiness to embark. The promptitude with which the orders of the War Department were executed is highly creditable to the service. [Union [BRM.]

RE43n38p2c2, September 16, 1845: MEXICO

The very late and interesting news from this country, of bombast and mock valor, will repay a perusal. All of the threats and violent ranting of her Ministers and Generals, seem literally to be---

“Sound and fury, signifying nothing.”

From a comparison of the intelligence received from Texas and Mexico, it may be fairly predicted that no war will take place. Our gallant army in Texas is in a fine condition—and the Mexican horizon has been almost purified of the dark clouds which threatened us with an explosion.

The Administration deserve much credit, and the hands of the people, for this satisfactory state of affairs. To the wisdom and efficiency of the measures they have adopted, to guard against every contingency, must mainly be attributed the “better part of valor,” the discretion of Mexico. This view is forcibly presented by “Pike,” Pike in the Union, whose papers show him to be a statesman and a scholar. He ably reviews the extraordinary and arrogant position of M. Guizot, the Minister of France, as to the famous “balance of power” on this continent. He shows, from the late work of M. de Mofras, published under the auspices the conversion of Mexico into a Monarchy, to be wielded by a Catholic Prince, that Louis Philippe has an eye to the extension of French power in America, by placing on of his own sons on the new throne—and he solemnly and eloquently appeals to the President to follow the example of Mr. Monroe, and take strong ground against foreign interference with affairs of this continent. The concluding passage speaks nothing but the truth, and re-echoes, we doubt not, the sentiments of the nation:

"As the reflections I have been obtruding upon you, Mr. Editor, have a close connection with our acquisition of Texas, I cannot conclude without congratulating you upon the seemingly auspicious state of that question at present. Up to the moment when I am writing, everything would seem to promise a peaceful result. At this I greatly rejoice. We shall owe it to the forecast and energy of the administration, in concentrating sufficient land and naval strength at all proper points, to deter Mexico from string a rash blow at Texas, now that it is ours by the highest and best of human titles; the voluntary consent (for I take leave to repeat it from my first communication) of two independent countries deliberately and solemnly expressed. It, happily, the result be peaceful, President Polk will not stand on a lofty eminence when meeting Congress in December. He will have laid a good basis for future fame, on the very threshold of his administration, whatever present party spirit may say. To have overawed Mexico by present wisdom, is better than to have gained twenty battles. On the other hand, had our forces, through any accidents, been at all discomfited by Mexico at the onset—and let us not be lulled by an over-confidence even yet----the calamity would have been, that the feelings of national pride in the bosoms of Americans would have been so lacerated, that nothing could have removed the main but an amount of retribution, that might have bordered upon undue vengeance—to have been more deplored than easily prevented."

RE43n38p2c3, September 16, 1845: OFFICIAL-INTERSTING

Information from General Taylor’s headquarters in Corpus Christi, has been received as late as to the 30th of August. Since his last despatch, 7 companies of the 7th regiment of infantry have arrived at his camp. The General speaks in commendatory terms of the battalion of artillery from New Orleans, under the command of Major Gally.

The gallant Texans are determined to do their duty in defence of their State. President Jones has notified Gen. Taylor that he has taken preparatory steps to organize one thousand men for service if necessary.

General Taylor has communicated to General Gaines his wish not to have any more militia force sent from New Orleans to him, not apprehending that there will be any occasion for their services. He states that there is no new from the Rio Grande. Some idle rumors are occasionally brought in from that quarter, but the accurate information he possesses so entirely discredit them, that he does not think them even entitled to repetition.-- [Union. RE43n38p2c4, September 16, 1845: VERY LATE FROM MEXICO

VERY LATE FROM MEXICO

Vera Cruz dates to the 30th ult.---City of Mexico to the 26th ult.

NO WAR---NONE PROBABLE

Yesterday morning, we issued the following Extra:

SUNDAY MORNING, 11 O’CLOCK.

Sept. 7, 1845.

At about 9 o’clock this morning, the Mexican schooner Geraldo, Captain Herrera, arrived here from Vera Cruz, which place she left on the 30th ult. She brings Alexander Holmstrom, Esq., bearer of despatches to this Government, and to Com. Conner, commanding U. States squadron, now at Pensacola.

By this arrival, we have dates from the city of Mexico to the 27th ult. The papers contain nothing important, except that all was perfectly quiet. The war fever, both at Vera Cruz and Mexico, had subsided. It is now certain there will be no declaration of war.

We are indebted to Mr. Holmstrom for the following items of intelligence: It was reported at Vera Cruz, that the French Minister had demanded his passports in consequence of old difficulties. Business was exceedingly dull at Vera Cruz. There had been no arrival except the regular British Mail packets for fifteen days.

Only a few Americans were there, and they were satisfied that war had ceased to be among the probabilities.

The regular New York Packet, Petersburg, was the only vessel in port. She was advertised for the 5th, but would not probable leave before the 12th or 14th.

The Castle was nearly in complete repair, and the fortifications had been enlarged. Vera Cruz was healthy. The Vomito has disappeared.

We have looked over El Siglo from the 19th to the 26th, inclusive. Texas matters are not discussed; in fact, scarcely mentioned. This is pretty conclusive evidence that the Mexicans are in no way prepared, even if disposed, to commence hostilities. Don Julian Gonzalez Guiterrez has been appointed Spanish Vice Consul for the city of Merida, and Don Joaquim Moralez for the port of Sisal, both in the Department of Yucatan. Spanish Vice Consuls had also been appointed in the Departments of Aguas Calientes, Sonora and Chihuahua.

Don Valentin Rios, commanding the companies of the First Brigade, had written a communication to the Minister of War, in which he states that the different officers under his command were ready to defend their country against the perfidious aggressions of the United States, and to chastise the ingratitude of the Texans.

Don Luis Perez and Don Jose Maria Otahegui, commissioners from General Parades, had arrived in the city of Mexico, and it was presumed they had come to treat on the late events which had occurred at San Luis Potosi.

An election was held for President and Vice President of the Senate, when el Sr. Pizarro was elected to the first, and el Sr. Ramirez to the second.

Efforts were being made to organize a militia, but they were merely abortive. In the city of Mexico, which contains 200,000 inhabitants only eleven recruits were found enlisted.

Gen. Filisola, full of indignation, had thrown up the command of the division, which had caused the scandalous proceedings in San Luis Potosi, and had determined to return to the city of Mexico. It was stated, that the leaders of this act of insubordination had sent a record of their proceedings to Government, and measures were being taken to inflict the necessary penalties. Santiago Vasquer, who left Durango on the 28th July, for Chihuahua, carrying with him all the correspondence from the city of Mexico and the interior, was assassinated on the road on the 21st. The Collector of Cerro gordo went in search of him, and after two days of diligent search, only found his corpse in the middle of the road.

A decree fro the regulation of the departmental treasury has been published---the office is to pass from the Government to the Department, and the post of Collector of all departmental incomes it to be given by the Assembly, which, it is stated; reserves the situation for one of their own body.

The Department of Zacatecas appears to be in a great state of excitement, in consequence of the annexation of Texas. She offers her resources in order to carry on the war, and the inhabitants appeared desirous to march to the conquest of that territory.

The Ministry is composed of the following persons: Don Manuel de la Pena y Pena, Department of State; Don Jose Bernard Couto, Justice of the Ecclesiastical Affairs, Don Pedro F. del Castillo, Treasury Department; and General Pedro Mario Anaya, Minister of War and Marine.

The Manillon of the evening of the 22d ultimo, states that General Bustamente had been named as Commander-in-chief of the army to [illegible] against Texas.

New reached the city of Mexico on the 23d ult., from Matamoros, that 3,000 Texans and Anglo Americans were encamped at Corps Christi, forty leagues from Matamoros. Our readers are aware that our troops now at that port, do not number quite 2,000 men.

There is an article in the "Siglo Diez y Nueve" of the 26th ult, which bears heavily on the difficulties to be undergone by the Mexicans in the campaign against Texas. It asserts that during the eight years they have been making war against Texas, they have never made a single step which could enable them to conquer that territory, and not even to prevent it's extending and increase and power. The previous funds intended for the campaign, which would have been sufficient to have carried it on, were wasted in another way so that troops on the Matamoros have been obliged to become mechanics in order to gain a livelihood. There was no money to pay the army. The imposition of any new contribution will meet with powerful resistance. The Mexicans have acted like a prodigal and ill-advised heir, they have lost their credit, and wasted their wealth, and they have consequently arrived at that state of poverty which is almost incurable. The article in question states that it will be difficult to carry on a war with Texas; that the insubordinate movement in San Luis Potosi, shows the disorganize state of the country, and that the United States will laugh and gain confidence from the fact that Mexico is in a disturbed state. From the general tone of the Mexican papers, and form the almost utter impossibility for Mexico to organize an army, we are under the impression that there is little or no probability of any hostile proceedings on the part of that power.

FROM TAMPCIO.

The Mexican schr. Yucateco, Captain Pras, arrived here on Saturday from Tampico, which place she left on the 30th ult. We received to papers by her. The Picayune of yesterday publishes news from that place to the 27th, and from the city of Mexico to the 19th, not so late as furnished since Geraldo. The Picayune say: "El Gejen, a Tampico paper, states that it is reported that the disaffected portion of the army has incorporated itself with the forces under Gen. Paredes; that the latter refuses to obey the Government; that the third division of the army, which is under his command, is disposed for a pronunciamento, and it is even whispered, that the object of it will be to proclaim a Consul. El Gejen, is more than half inclined to believe all this.

We take the following items from the Picayune.

The House of Lizardi & Co. is again bitterly censured for its mismanagement of Mexican finances, but the controversy on this subject has been carried on in London, and is not, of course new here.

Gen. Paredes has become involved in a violent newspaper controversy with Sr. Boves, a Deputy who so discomfitted the late Ministry.---The President has expressed to the General his enduring confidence in his fidelity and patriotism.

General Arista, too, is quarrelling through the papers with General Wull—defending himself and accusing Woll of insubordination, &c. We note the affair only to show how the military leaders of Mexico are divided amongst themselves.

On the 23d ult., the Mexican steamer Guadaloupe was expected at Tampico, with from 800 to 1,000 tents for the troops of the Army of the North.

There were no American vessels at Tampico when the Yucateco sailed, nor does the captain bring any important verbal news. Rumors, however, abound, for which we have not room.

Advices to the 11th August have been received at Mexico from Guatemala. An effor is making to re-establish the bonds of confederation between the States of San Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras. For this purpose, the two former States have appointed Commissioner to meet at Zonzonate, to deliberate upon conditions. Guatemala has also named a Commissioner to ratify a treaty of peace with Honduras, and another of commerce with San Salvador.

The Constituent Congress of Guatemala has also passed two decrees, one introducing some very strict measures of economy, and regulating the order in which the public creditors shall be paid; the other, providing that the products of Mexico introduced into that State should pay the same duties as if the proceeded from another foreign country.
From the contents of the papers, we learn no declaration of war has yet appeared, or is at all likely to appear—that the whole country is in a dreadful state of insubordination, and crimes are committed daily which pass unpunished—The military forces under orders for the frontier of Texas, and commanded by Paredes, had refused to march beyond San Luis Potosi, without being paid their arrearages, three months' pay in advance, and being supplied with ever necessary for the campaign. Paredes, it is stated, has reduced this military mutiny to something like order, but it is strongly suspected that he had done so for personal motives and by personal influence. He lately applied to the Government for the permission to come to Mexico, for the purposes of explaining his proposed plan for the campaign, but it was refused, it is thought, from fear that his presence might create a counter revolution in the capital. Such an event is openly reported in Tampico as about to take place at San Luis Potosi—where he is in sole command of the troops—Gen. Flisola having thrown up his command in disgust, after being informed of the mutiny. General Bustamente, it is believed will be sent as commander-in-chief by the Government.

The French Minister, not having been satisfied with the course taken by the Government regarding the insult offered him at the Baths, has demanded his passports, which adds another embarrassment to many which the Executive has now to encounter.

RE43n39p4c5, September 19, 1845: LATER FROM TEXAS

"The brig Maria Spears, Felte master arrived yesterday from Galveston, whence she sailed on the 3d instant. We received no papers by her, but learn verbally that the Convention had not adjourned on the 1st inst." [N.O. Picayune, Sept 9.]

RE43n40p4c3, September 23, 1845: THE TRUE AND ONLY COURSE

Whatever the National Intelligencer and other Whig prints may say, in order to embarrass the Administration and invalidate our rights, we are proud to see the Norfolk Herald, Whig, take the side of its country, in the following manly emphatic language. The Rio Grande is the true boundary, and the country will sustain the Administration on this clear point—based upon every principle of justice and honor:

"WHENCE OUR RIGHT.

"In a series of resolutions passed at a meeting held in the town of Nantucket, (Massachusetts.) were the following, which we found our right to annex to our Union the Territory of Texas, from the Sabine to the del Norte, without violating any legal or equitab'e claim of Mexico.

"Resolved, That the recent annexation of Texas to these States is nothing more than the resumption of our own territory acquired in the purchase of Louisiana—a purchase, which gave to the United State the territory bounded on the South-west by the Rio del Norte—a boundary proved by John Quincy Adams, and claimed by Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and even by Mr. Clay; the latter having declared, in 1820, that our title as far as the Rio del Norte was well founded, as it was to the Island of New Orleans; and having in 1844 asserted, in a letter to the citizens of Raleigh, that by the purchase of Louisiana acquired a title to the country, bounded on the South west by the above mentioned river.

That even if this claim of right territory be waived, this country had an unquestionable right to make a Treaty with Texas for her annexation—as she had been acknowledged an independent nation by the powers of Europe, as well as ourselves, and had been, in fact, independent since the battle of San Jacinto, in 1837.

"That Mexico having, therefore, no just cause of complaint against the action of our own country in regard to Texas, it is our duty not only as lover of right, but as Americans, to sustain the course of our Government; even to the last extremity."

[BRM]

RE43n41p2c1, September 26, 1845: AS WE EXPECTED!

Whatever Mr. Polk may do some of the Whigs will attempt to make political cut of it. Their only hope is in our dissensions—and all their energies are bent to the great game of "divide and conquer." The appointment of Mr. Woodbury to the important post of a seat on the Supreme Court Bench is an undeniable instant of what we assert. Whether appointed or thrust aside, we felt assured that the Whigs would seize upon the occasion to blow up a flame of discord between the members of the Democratic party. Had Mr. W., who had been for some time named as a prominent candidate for the his office, been set aside by the President, the whole Whig welkin would have rung with the charge that the President had shown an utter want of respect for the "Calhoun wing" and the cause of Free Trade, by rejecting the claims of Mr. Woodbury, an able champion of a Revenue Tariff. But this pretext for attacking the administration and its Republican policy, was struck from under the Whig managers by the appointment of Mr. Woodbury. Look at the reverse of the picture--look at the attitude of some of the Whig politicians in the present state of the case. Mr. Woodbury has been appointed a Judge of the Supreme Court, to the satisfaction of nearly the whole country. Do all of the Whigs render justice to his motives? Far from it--The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot, foiled by the appointment of Mr. W., takes the other tack and appeals to the Southern friends, of a revenue Tariff, to look upon this appointment as a signal of the President's treachery to the South on this question! Hear what the correspondent says.---Speaking of the 'coalition' (which no true Republican believes,) between Mr. Benton and the Administration to "put down Mr. Calhoun and his friends," the writer says: "One of the best means to aid him (Mr. Benton) in defeating the Free Traders on the Tariff question, is the transfer of Levi Woodbury from the Senate to the Supreme Court. The batteries of one of Mr. Calhoun's ablest allies are thus [illegible] muzzled! How the organ will profess to regret Mr. Woodbury's withdrawal from the Senate!"

And it is by such stuff as this, that this Wing scribbler vainly hopes to excite the distrust of Mr. Calhoun's friends, and alienate them from the support of an Administration which is honestly and zealously devoted to the Republican cause, and resolved to carry out the principles avowed by the Democratic party at Baltimore.---The humbug is too transparent to deceive a single Republican. The trick is too bungling to cause any other feeling but ridicule in the mind of every friend of the Republican cause. Much as we regret [illegible] the valuable services and distinguished ability of Mr. Woodbury form the Senate of the United States at this trying moment, we are proud to know that he has been transferred to a theatre, where his fidelity to the Constitution will prove beneficial to the country---and, though New Hampshire may not be able to furnish a son as well known and able as her favorite champion, yet she has still within her borders many true soldiers in the Republican cause, able and willing to represent her sovereignty, and give voice to her long cherished love for a strict construction, and for the rights of the States. More over, if we are to believe current reports, the great statesman of the South—a host in himself---will probably, at a great sacrifice, take his seat in the Senate, and throw all his power and eloquence into the contest for equal laws and equal rights.

It is not evident, that whether Mr. Woodbury had been appointed or laid aside, the same attack upon the administration would have proceeded from some of the Whig press the same insidious design set on foot excite jealousy and distrust in the Republican party? But we are confident, that the wretchedly botched-up scheme will fall still-born to the ground.

At all events, let the President continue to do his duty, irrespective of threats or flattery. Let him plant himself firmly on the principles which brought him into power, and, acting with a sole regard to a solemn requirements of the Constitution, and to honor and welfare of the country, feel the proud reflection, on laying down the reins of office on the 3d March, 1849, that he had been true to the Constitution and to himself. Let him but pursue the outline sketched by the following article to the Union, as we doubt not he will honestly do, and the whole country will applaud the purity of the man, and the fidelity, statesmanship, and elevated bearing of the officer.

"PROMPT ACTION."

"Under this caption the 'Hartford Times' does justice to the administration to the following sketch which it portrays of their recent movements in regard to Mexico, and it might equally have embraced its measures respecting Texas. We have no doubt that the same energy, with equal circumspection, will be extended to the other great measures of the administration. In the reduction of the Tariff, the same decision will be displayed—the same, indeed, in carrying out all the resolutions of the Baltimore Convention, under whose principles of Mr. Polk was elected—by whose pledges he is bound. The President has hitherto been bold, decided, yet prudent in his course.—The spirit of 'Young Hickory' will continue to animate him. There is no quality so necessary in an Executive Officer as firmness. First discover what is right, then adhere to it. Let him take his course with wisdom, then promote it with firmness. 'Be strong, and you will be strong,' is one of the great secrets of success. By firmness, without passion, a President confirms his friends. He rallies them all directly around him. He determines the doubting me to come to his assistance. He, moreover, impresses his opponents with a certain degree of respect for shi own decision, which insensibly softens and effects their own conduct towards him."

[From the Hartford Times]

"There is nothing that the American people, more heartily approve of than prompt and energetic action on the part of those who administer the Government upon matters of public interest. They want no wavering. It was the bold, open honest, energetic course of Gen. Jackson's administration, that tended to give him such unbounded popularity as he possessed. The people admired his prompt action; they loved his honesty of heart; and their need of praise, their approbation, and their support will always be given to those who act with equal energy in the administration of public affairs, and with equal honesty of purpose.

"In the management of our affairs with Mexico, connected with the Texas question, President Polk's administration has acted with a promptness and energy worth of Andrew Jackson himself. The rapid movements of the army and navy—the quick preparation—the decided stand taken—the efficient course marked out, so far as we know that course—all reflect high credit upon the President and his cabinet. There has been no weak, inefficient, child's play about this matter, but a spirit and an energy have been evinced, calculated to prevent aggression on the part of Mexico, where threats alone will e put forth, when they see what the consequences of more rash steps would lead them to. In the prompt action of the administration, a desire to promote American interest and honor has been evinced, and American freemen will sustain it."

RE43n41p2c2, September 26, 1845: OREGON-BRITISH FLEET

The New York Commercial Advertiser says, the British fleet seen by the ship London, Ross, from Liverpool on the 12th ult., in latitude 45 degrees, 56 minutes, longitude 15 degrees, 20 minutes, was the experimental squadron which left Spithead a short time previously, to try the sailing qualities of the different ships composing the squadron—the Bay of Biscay being the most proper place for that purpose.

Upon which, the New York True Sun remarks: "The fleet, in question, was undoubtedly that referred to by the Commercial Advertiser.—Of the character and purpose of this fleet, we have received some information, since our notice of it, above quoted. It consists of two 104 gun ships, four frigates, and three steamships.—Under the guise of an experimental squadron, it is, in fact, a squadron of observation; sailing with sealed orders, and having a full regiment for Oregon, should their landing be deemed advisable; and, also, a governor for the territory, should circumstances warrant his assuming that position to carry out the instructions under which he has been sent.

"Such, we learn through a gentleman directly from England, and who was at Spithead at the time of the sailing of the squadron, was well understood among the officers of the squadron to be the object of the mission on which they were about starting."

RE43n41p4c2, September 26, 1845: CLAIMS UPON MEXICO

Many of the Whig papers, in their anxious desire and determination to pull down the administration, per fas cut nefas, have actually crossed the line, and are now fighting on paper the battles of Mexico. They contend, that the United States have heaped insult and injury upon the head of unoffending Mexico—that all the provocation has come from our side—that we have been guilty of treachery, wanton injustice, robbery and plunder. They deny that we have the least cause to complain of the conduct of Mexico.—Now, all this may be sheer ignorance, or political chicanery. If the former, we would recommend to their perusal a series of Nos. by Richard S. Coxe. As a specimen of the style, and to show the character of the publication, we extract a few passages. The facts stated are drawn from official sources, and exhibit, on the part of Mexico, a Punic faith and disregard of national obligations and honor, worthy only of the darkest ages of barbarism. They announce to the world the lenity and forbearance which our own Government has exhibited towards her weak but treacherous neighbor, and point out, in out, in strong and conclusive language, the propriety and necessity of prompt and vigorous steps, to unravel they tangled skein of our difficulties with Mexico, rather, to cut the Gordian knot, and secure the claims of our injured citizens, and establish permanently the peace and honor of the nation:

"The causes of complaint have been a long standing, and of an irritating nature. The amicable feelings which once bound the two nations together, have been obliterated. Mutual estrangement has succeeded, and terms of recrimination have been exchanged, rousing on either side the angry passions of the respective parties. It is not possible much longer to postpone the adjustment of these controversies. They must be terminated through the instrumentality of a war, or by amicable arrangement. The number and character of reclaims of the United States, for the remuneration for alleged infractions of their rights of person and property, cannot be estimated at a smaller amount than ten millions of dollars. The character of the outrages in which these claims originated, have imposed upon the Government the imperative obligation to demand, and, if necessary, to enforce, their liquidation. Every day swells the amount of compensation to which the parties are entitled, and increases the incapacity of Mexico to provide for their payment. They must either be adjusted and paid, or tamely relinquished. The latter alternative involving a renunciation of every national pledges, cannot, for a moment, be anticipated. It may be assumed as a positive certainty, that the payment must be voluntary made, or enforced by all the power of the nation. It is unnecessary to say that voluntary payment by Mexico, in any form, or to any extent, is utterly hopeless.

"If these papers—which, so far as regards the form which they assume, have been written 'currente calame' amid other engrossing occupations——shall be instrumental in vindicating, in the eyes of our own citizens, our common country from the aspersions so falsely or ignorantly cast upon it, as instigated by a reckless spirit of agrandizement to perpetrate injustice upon a neighboring community——of urging demands upon it, which have no foundation in justice——of asserting claims which have no substantial existence; if they shall have exhibited in their true colors and just proportions the character of Mexico, and the imperative obligations which rest upon this government to persist in every claim which we have asserted, until Mexico shall either voluntarily engage, or by the application of the whole power of the nation, he compelled to atone for multiplied wrongs she has inflicted, to compensate for the grievous injustices which one citizens have suffered at her hands, to atone for their insults she has offered to our flag and to our government, the object sought to be attained will have been fully accomplished. The honor of the country, the outraged rights of our people, demand imperatively that these results shall be attained; and the government will be recreant to its own duty and its own character, if it shall fail to obtain them all." [BRM]
THE CONSTITUTION OF TEXAS

We have neither time nor room to make an analysis of the new Constitution, but will briefly advert to some of its peculiar provisions, at the risk of repeating ourselves. We need not say that the instrument is modeled upon the theory of most of our own State Constitutions.

Every free male person, twenty-one years of age, who shall be a citizen of the United States, or who is, at the time of the adoption of the Texan Constitution by the Congress of the United States, a citizen of the Republic of Texas, and shall have resided in the State on year next preceding an election, and the last six months within the district, county, city or town in which he offers to vote, (Indians no taxed, Africans and descendants of African expected,) is to be deemed a qualified elector.

The term of the office of members of the House is two years, and the sessions of the Legislature are biennial. To be eligible to the House, one must be a citizen of the United States, or, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, a citizen of the Republic of Texas and an inhabitant of the State for two years next preceding his election, and the last year thereof, a citizen of the county, city or town for which he shall be chose, and have attained the age of the twenty-one years at the time of his election.

The term of the Senators is four years, and they are to be divided into two classes, so that one-half may be chosen biennially. The additional qualification for Senators is, to have been an inhabitant for three years, and to be thirty years of age.

No Minister of the Gospel or Priest is eligible to the Legislature.

The Executive is to nominate the judges of the Supreme and District Courts, and with the advice of two-third of the Senate, commission them for six years.

The Attorney General is appointed in the same manner, and holds his commission for two years.

The Governor is to hold his office for two years, and shall not be eligible for more than four years in any term of six years. His other qualifications are like a Senator’s. The salary of the first Governor is to be $2,000, and no more. He can hold no other office or commission, civil or military.

No Minister of the Gospel is required to perform military duty, work on roads, or serve on juries.

The oath of office is so formed, that in addition to the usual provisions, one must swear, that, since the adoption of the Constitution, he has not fought a duel within or without the State; nor sent or accepted a challenge; nor any way aided or assisted any person thus fending.

And all who shall offend, (by fighting a duel, accepting a challenge, &c.) after the adoption of the Constitution, shall be deprived of holding any office of trust or profit.

In all elections by the people, the vote is to be by ballot, till the Legislature otherwise directs; in elections by the Senate of House, (except of their own officers,) the vote shall be viva vice.

No members of Congress, nor person holding office under the United States, or either of them, or a foreign power, is eligible to the Legislature, or can hold office under the State.

The laws are to be revised five years after the adoption of the Constitution, and published; and the same repeated every ten years thereafter.

No lottery can be authorized by the State, and the buying and selling of all tickets is prohibited.

No divorce can be granted by the Legislature. All property, both real and personal, of wife owned or claimed by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise or descent, shall be her separate property; and laws shall be passed more clearly defining the rights of the wife, in relation as well to her separate property, as that held in common with her husband. Laws shall also be passed, providing for the registration of the wife’s separate property.

All claims, locations, surveys, grants, and titles to land, which are declared null and void by the Constitution of the Republic of Texas, are, and the same shall remain forever null and void.

No corporate body shall be created, renewed or extended, with banking or discounting privileges.

No private corporation shall be created, unless the bill creating it shall be passed by two-thirds of both houses of the Legislature; and two-thirds of the Legislature shall have the power to revoke and repeal all private corporations, by making compensation for the franchise. And the State shall not be part owner of the stock or property belonging to any corporation.

The Legislation shall prohibit by law individuals from issuing bills; checks, promissory notes, or other paper to circulate as money.

Most ample provisions are made for education, but we have not room to enter further upon the Constitution to-day.

The vote upon the adoption of the Constitution is to be viva voce. Should it appear from the returns to have been adopted, the President, on or before the second Monday in November next, is to issue is proclamation, directing and requiring elections to be held on the third Monday in December next, for the office of Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State Legislature, in accordance with the appointment of representation directed by the Constitution.

Upon receiving intelligence of the acceptance of the Constitution by the U.S. Congress, the President is to convene the State Legislature, when the votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, &c., are to be counted, and the persons elected at once installed.

The Legislature shall proceed as early as practicable to elect Senators to represent the State in the Senate of the United States; and also provide for the election of Representatives to the Congress of the United States.

The President of Texas, immediately after the inauguration of the Governor is to deliver to him all the records, public money, documents, archives, and public property of every description whatsoever, under the control of the Executive branch of the Government; and the Governor shall dispose of the same in such manner as the Legislature may direct.

The first general election for Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and members of the Legislature, after the organization of the Government, shall take place on the first Monday in November, 1847, and shall be held biennially thereafter on the first Monday in November, until otherwise provided by the Legislature; and the Governor and Lieutenant Governor elected in December next, shall hold their offices until the installation in office of the Governor and Lieutenant Governor, to be elected in the year 1847.

THE CONSTITUTION OF TEXAS

We glanced at some of the peculiarities of the new Constitution of Texas yesterday; to-day we must conclude the subject by mentioning a few other provisions. In its grand outline, as well as its details, it is too much like the Constitutions of the old States to need elucidation.

The proposed Constitution provides that the ordinance passed by the Convention on the 4th day of July last, assenting to the overtures for the Annexation of Texas to the United States, shall be attached to the Constitution, and form a part of the same. This must be continually borne in mind, as the creation of new States is therein provided for.

The city of Austin, is assigned as the seat of government until 1950, after which it is to be located by the people, by a vote to be taken in march, in a mode pointed out.

The Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction only; the District Courts have jurisdiction both in law and equity; and in all cases in equity, either party may claim a trial by jury.

The pardoning power is vested in the Executive, except in cases of treason and impeachment. The governor possesses the veto power, qualified, however, as in the United States Constitution.

In no case can the Legislature authorize the issue of Treasury notes, or paper of any description, to circulate as money.

The Legislature has power to protect by law, from forced sale, a certain portion of the property of all heads of families. The homestead of a family not to exceed two hundred acres of land-(not included in a town or city,) or any town or city lot or lots, In value not to exceed 2,000dollars, shall not be subject to forced sale for any debts hereafter contracted; nor shall the owner, if a married man, be at liberty to alienate the same, unless by the consent of the wife, in such a manner as the Legislature may hereafter point out.

Taxation is to be uniform throughout the State; the Legislature may pass an income tax, and it may exempt from taxation 250 dollars worth of household furniture, or other property belonging to each family in the State.

The Legislature cannot contact debts to exceed in the aggregate the sum of $100,000, except in case of General Taylor’s letter is dated at Corpus Christi, September 14th:

"All actual settlers shall be entitled to their lands as colonists, not exceeding 640 acres to the head of a

In conclusion, we copy entire the provisions of the proposed Constitution in regard to slaves:

SEC. 1—The Legislature shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves, without the consent of their owners, nor without paying their owners, previous to such emancipation, a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated. They shall have no power to prevent emigrants to this State, from bringing with them such persons so deemed as slaves by the laws of any of the United States, so long as any person of the same age or description shall be continued in slavery by the laws of this State: Provided, that such slave shall be the bona fide property of such emigrants: Provided, also, that laws shall be passed to prohibit the introduction, into this State, of slaves who have committed high crimes in other States or territories. They shall have the right to pass laws to permit the owners of slaves to emancipate them, saying the rights of creditors, and preventing them from becoming a public charge. They shall have full power to pass laws, which shall oblige the owners of slaves to treat them with humanity; to provide for them necessary food and clothing; to abstain from all injuries to them, extending to life or limb; and, in case of their neglect or refusal to comply with the directions of such laws, to have such slave or slaves taken from such owner, and sold for the benefit of such owner or owners. They may pass laws to prevent slaves from being brought into this State as merchandise only.

SEC. 2—In the prosecution of slaves for crimes a higher grade than petit larceny, the Legislature shall have no power to deprive them an impartial trial by a petit jury.

SEC. 3—Any person who shall maliciously dismember, or deprive a slave of life, shall suffer such punishment as would be inflicted, in case the like offence had been committed upon a free white person, and upon like proof, except in case of insurrection of such slaves.

family, and 320 to a single man.

“The legislature is prohibited from extending any contract for settling a colony, and from relieving any contractor from the failure of the conditions, or forfeiture accruing from non-fulfillment of contract.

“The Constitution is signed by the President and Secretary of the convention, as adopted in full form Aug. 27, 1845. The election for its adoption or rejection by the people is to be held on the second Monday of next October, and if approved, the election for state officers shall be held on the 3d Monday of December.” [BRM]

Friday, October 3, 1845 REv42i43p1c3 Texas Emigration; Words: 765

The subscriber offers, on behalf of the Texas Association, 320 acres of land, the one moiety of a section, to be surveyed by the Association, for $8, to any family who may settle thereon from any part of the United States or Europe, by the first day of July 1846; after which time, but 200 acres will be given to each family.

A title to the land may be obtained, at any time after settlement, from the Texan Government, on condition of building on it a comfortable cabin and enclosing and cultivating not less than 15 acres for three years. A failure to comply with these conditions will occasion a forfeit of the title of the emigrant to the government. A family is required to consist of not less than a man and his wife; a widow, or widower, with two children; or two single men, each above seventeen years of age.

The above lands lie on both sides of the Trinity above the mouth of Cedar Creek, and embrace the mouth of the Bois d'Arc, or East fork of the river. They are bounded to the West by the Brazos River, above the mouth of Aquila Creek; to the South, by a line from the mouth of Cedar Creek, the second large creek below Richland, to the mouth of Aquila Creek. The Eastern boundary commences 50 miles South of Red River, and runs East 48 miles from the Eastern boundary of the prior grant to the Texas Emigration and Land Company, who have, already, more than five hundred families colonized on their grant, between the country inhabited by the Indians, and the grant of C.F. Mercer and his associates. More than two hundred and twenty families have already been introduced and settled by the subscriber, and his associates, on the lands. Five dollars, in money, labor, or materials, will be exacted, hereafter, of each family, for the erection of schoolhouses.

Provision is making for the erection of a town on the Trinity, below the East Fork, and on has been already established in the Western Colony, at Dallas, three miles below the mouth of the West Fork. The Trinity is expected to furnish the best navigation of any river in Texas, and its navigation is susceptible of improvement at a moderate cost. Steamboats now ascend the Trinity to the vicinity of Fort Houston, and will, when its commerce is extended, as readily pass above, through the entire grant before mentioned- the first obstruction being a raft immediately below Dallas.

The present growing crop of corn within the colony, and its vicinity, now nearly matured, promises to be most abundant; and the late harvest has manifested the ability of the soil, upon and near Trinity, to produce abundant crops of wheat, rye, and oats, as well as cotton and tobacco. The tract of land here offered for settlement lies between latitudes 31 deg., 30 min. and 33 deg., 30 min. North; is interspersed with prairies and woodland, and unsurpassed in its capacity for grazing. Cattle and sheep need no food or protection from human labor, at any season of the year. Much of the above country is well watered, and cannot fail, especially the rolling prairies, with which it abounds, to prove healthy. Emigrants may reach the settlements already formed by the Arkansas River, the Land Carriage, from Fort Gibson to the Trinity,, being about 200 miles, or by the Red River, always navigable to Shreveport, within 200 miles, and between the Autumnal and Spring rains., to Fulton, within 60, and Piney Bluff, within 50 miles. From Galveston, when a steamboat can be had, the voyage to the new town of Fenton, within the granted lands, may be preformed in less than two and a half days. Galveston is a flourishing town on the West of the Gulf of Mexico. Food for horses and cattle abounds on the prairies, and may be procured free at no cost.

Dr. Daniel Rowlett, residing on the Red River, East of the Trinity, at Lexington, near Bonham, is the sub-agent of the Texas Association, for the lands East of the Trinity; and Col. E.L. Ripley Wheelock, of Wheelock, in Robertson county, for the part of the above grant West of the river. Their respective Post Offices are, Bonham, in Fannin county, and Wheelock, in Robertson County. Both have deputies to represent them in person, or by letter (post paid,) and further intelligence may be had that may be desired.

The English experiment in the East has signally failed. It was made under the most favorable auspices in different parts of India. It has succeeded in none of them. It was made under the eye of ten experienced planters from the cotton region of the United States, with the best American cotton-seed; but it has failed. Nature forbids any serious competition between the cotton of the East Indies and that of the United States. The Southern portion of our country stands unrivalled in the production of a staple which constitutes the basis of the most important manufacture both in Great Britain and on the continent. Well might England struggle to baffle us in the annexation of Texas, for there she would have platted her lever. By her aid, and by her cotton plantations, Britain would have attempted to make herself independent of the United States—throwing her manufacturers into Texas, upon terms that would have defied the competition of our own fabrics; and receiving the raw materials in return, upon better terms than she could have obtained the growth of our Southern cotton-lands. The acquisition of Texas, therefore, foils the most anxiously policy of Great Britain. It gives us every advantage in competition with her. It gives us wealth in peace, and power in war; because, how can Great Britain continue to persecute a desperate and continued war, which is destined to starve her own manufacturers? The acquisition of Texas thus puts us in possession of almost all the best lands in the world for the growth of Cotton; and this is decidedly one of the most important staples; in every respect, that can be cultivated by man. If we do not hold the monopoly of the article, yet we produce it of better quality, and in greater quantity, than any other country. We may safely defy all rivalry in its production. Thus is becomes a source of wealth and abundance—of prosperity in peace and power in war.

Let us further add, that the acquisition of Texas is not only of great value to the South, but it is destined to shed incalculable advantage upon the North. Let the Whigs oppose it as much as they please, or let the Abolitionist threaten even dissolution of the Union. Not many months will pass away, before our Eastern brethren will appreciate and confess the benefits which they receive. Is it nothing to them, that a growing trade is thrown open to their shipping? Is in nothing, that a market is opened for the consumption of their manufactures free of all duty, whilst the British fabrics are subjected to the requisitions of our revenue laws? Is it nothing, that our own manufacturers have the advantage of enjoying free trade in Texas, with 25 to 30 per centum in their favor, over the rival manufacturers of England of other continent? But enough for the present. The remarks of our correspondent supersede the necessity of any further reflections on our part, and we recommend the valuable statistics, as well as his general conclusions, to every reader and every editor in the country.

His long letter is copied at length, but elicits comments in the most unfavorable to the doctor’s purpose. It is a singular fact, that men of sense in this part of the country, and a large portion of Texans, do not believe in the sincerity of Ashbel Smith’s assertion, that he was, and is, in favor with the Annexation of Texas.

The National Register of the 11th, publishes a translation of Arista’s Proclamation to the Mexicans, which was received at Washington overland from Monterey, and comments as follows:

"The chivalry and patriotism of all Mexico are to be participants in the glorious work, which is to make every valley and mountain from the Rio Grande to the isthmus, verdant with never-fading laurels. The veterans of Santa Fe, accustomed victors, and the invincible battalions of the South, are on the march. Horrible to relate, the perfidious and rapacious Anglo Saxon, whose home is in Texas, or who comes from the land of the many stars, is to be overwhelmed, and swept from the fact of the earth. The honor of Mexico has been insulted - the property of her children threatened, and the integrity of the nation itself menaced. The sword must now do its work- and a glorious work is to be for the army of Arista. The world will look on with wonder and amazement; and after it is all over, will hardly believe that the soldiers of our Republic have been really vanquished by those of the other. But it must be so. General Arista has said it; and who will be bold enough to contradict him? The history of Texas-the battles of Valesco, Anahuac, Gonzales, Bexar, and San Jacinto, attest to the invincibility of the Mexican arms. General Taylor should make a ‘retrograde advance’ in the double quick time. As is certain that he will be ‘used up’ if he remains in his present dangerous position, we would insist, for the sake of humanity, that he place himself, with the whole of his command, at once beyond the reach of General Arista and his veteran hosts.”

We have been kindly furnished by a friend with the following. From it we should judge that the services of our Artillery company will not be needed.

Extract from a letter, written on board the United States Ship Princeton, off Pensacola (Florida) Sept. 20, 1845

“We have just reached our anchorage here, after a passage of four and a half days from Vera Cruz, off which place we arrived on the 10th instant, having taken thither a special message messenger from Com. Connor to the American Consul. We have found the Mexicans quietly pursuing their usual avocations, free from all excitement or apprehension of war. In fact, the warlike feeling which was lately discoverable in Mexico, has almost entirely subsided. Was is scarcely alluded to, and the only this to remind on that the relations between that country and the United States are not perfectly amicable, is an occasional paragraph in the newspapers filled with high-flown praises of Mexican honor and valor, and a corresponding amount of abuse of the Americans. This, however, only evinces the characteristic fondness of the people for gasconade, and affords no proper grounds for drawing an inference respecting a corresponding action on their part. The customary national salutes are exchanged with our men-of-war when they enter the Mexican ports; so that, notwithstanding all diplomatic intercourse has ceased between the two nations, in all our respects the usual courtesies are shown from on to the other reciprocally. Whether there will be war or not remains for Mexico to determine; and, if we might draw a conclusion in reference to her course so far as it is connected with policy and prudence, we might say there will be none. Her treasury is bankrupt, and there is no means to replenish its empty coffers. Her army is disorganized, disaffected and destitute, and manifest much insubordination. On the 9th of August, a division of troops, under orders to the Texan frontier, refused to march, alleging as the cause of their conduct, their destitute and neglected condition. General Goana, who commanded them, together with about 20 officers who had refused to join the malcontents, was compelled to return to the city of Mexico. General Paredes, the commander-in-chief of the troops at San Luis Potosi, is suspected of conniving at this disaffection with the view of bringing about another revolution. The whole affair, however, is at this moment is undergoing investigation at the seat of Government, the result of which may be shortly expected. The department of Tobacco, is still in possession and under the entire control of the leaders in the recent revolution there; and the Government is too feeble and impoverished to vindicate its own supremacy even in this little province. The party which there raised the standard of hostile opposition to the Central Government, claims to be Federal, and declares in favor of the Constitution of 1824; yet the Federal party in the other departments refuses to acknowledge it as a part of itself. The public mines are mortgaged for debts, which it will require many years to pay,- and forced loans and exactions have vitally impaired the ability of the people to lend, and entirely destroyed their confidence in the faith and credit of the Government. The loan of twelve millions of dollars recently granted by Congress will be of no avail, from the utter impossibility of getting it negotiated. Moreover, there is a system of internal duties and imposts which cripples the enterprise of the energetic and industrious, and which is kept up notwithstanding it barely pays its own expenses. The Mexican Navy too, is inefficient in every respect, there not being a single vessel fitted for sea, nor has the Government the ability to fit out one, as it was desirous of doing for the purpose of sending it down to Tobasco. Lastly, the French minister has demanded his passports, in consequence of the recent difficulty arising from his arrest, and there is reason for apprehending a rupture with France. In view of all these considerations, can we suppose that Mexico will be guilty of the folly of drawing upon herself the calamities of an invasion from the United States, by striking, with her public arm, the first offensive blow.

"Gen. Herrera is certainly elected President, and the cabinet which he had down to the period of election, has resigned, and the cause of their resignations is said to have some connection with the unsuccessful result of the negotiations in reference to Texas affairs. Of this, however, I am not definitely informed.

"The Yellow Fever had disappeared from Vera Cruz, but had just made its appearance on board a Spanish and an English man-of-war, both of which were laying off the island of Sacrificios. The health of our squadron is good- no case of Yellow Fever has as yet appeared in it, and we hope to escape it altogether, every precautionary measure being taken by our Commodore to prevent the introduction of it into such of our vessels as touch at places infected by it.

"Our vessels are kept in constant readiness for immediate service, so as to need no preparation when required for actions."

Liverpool, Sept. 19 – The present excited state of affairs in the United States, arising out of the Mexican dispute, and the feeling which, for no wise or pacific purpose, has been evoked there to prevent a speedy and satisfactory adjustment of the Oregon question- these combined causes are said to have determined the Government to increase materially our forces in Canada and the North American colonies. Such is the current rumor of the day.

London, Sept. 18th (Evening) – We have already referred to the extraordinary warlike preparations that are making at the naval yards of the kingdom; betokening some indications of an anticipation that peace may be interrupted. We now find, from another and distant quarter, a further confirmation of the apprehensions on the part of the Government. The several governors of the West India colonies have received instructions from the office at home to re-embODY the Colonial Militia, which, for some years past, have been in abeyance; and as there is noting in the internal condition of these colonies to render such a force necessary, the inference is that this precaution is required by some darkening clouds in our foreign relations. France and America are the only two countries by which the West Indies could be assailed. With which of these powers are we likely to come into collision; or, is there a chance that we may have them both on our hands at the same time? The extraordinary exertions that are making to equip steam-vessels of considerable power and force, leave the particular enemy uncertain. Steam vessels in a war with France would be indispensable, both for offensive and defensive operations, but, above all, for the protection of our trade. Again; steam vessels are just that description of force that could be most effectually brought into operation in a war with America. They are the class of vessels best suited for the rivers of that country; they could carry war into the very heart of the United States; they could keep every town and village in a constant state of alarm for its safety. Steam-ships, then, would apply equally to France and America, and nothing can be decidedly inferred from their equipment. But the block ships- these, as we have shown in an article yesterday, can only be intended to resist a French invasion. They could not be made available in America, or in any other distant quarter; they are a Channel and not a trans-Atlantic armament- a defensive, not an offensive force. Our speculations, we admit, may be visionary, but they are speculations which we have a right to entertain. The equipment of the advanced ships may have no intention that the putting the country into a state of maritime preparation which we have always contended is indispensable to her position as a great naval, commercial and colonial empire. Still, there is an earnestness and a haste in bringing them forward that would betoken something more than a mere formal matter of routine- a mere concession to public opinion; while the connecting links- the block ships and the Colonial Militia- appear to indicate a want of confidence in our present pacific relations with other countries.

Paris, September 16 – Mexico and the United State have again occupied much of the attention of the Parisian journalists; but all that has been said may be summed up in one line- either that there will be no war at all, or that, if a war, the United States will completely crush their puny adversary. The recent arrivals from Mexico have caused some little surprise, for they show that England is desirous that peace be maintained, whereas it was though that she would not only incite Mexico to hostilities, but supply the means for carrying them on.

Comments have been made by the leading journals on the documents relative to the external commerce of the United States, lately published by order of the American Government. The general feeling appears to be surprise at the gigantic growth of the commerce of the country of “Young Democracy;” and one or two of the journals draw the conclusion that, in course of time, America will succeed in completely breaking down and usurping the vase trade carried on by Great Britain with every country in the world. On every other question, as well as this, the French press affects to think that the decadence of Great Britain draws nigh, and that the United States will be the most active contributors towards, in no the sole authors of, he humiliation and ruin.

We devote a large portion of our paper today, to the foreign intelligence received at Boston per the Cambria. The Cotton market appears to have improved a little, and commercial aspects are favorable. The most important item however, which we notice, is the fitting out of vessels on the coast of Ireland, to be employed as privateers in the Mexican service. The impression abroad seems to be, that there will be a war between Mexico and the United States- in which event it is certainly to be expected; that any movement calculated to injure the growing commerce of this country, will be entered into with spirit by the opponents of Republican Government. On this subject, we extract the following from the Dublin Mercantile Advertiser:

"The last accounts from Mexico show, that however much the Mexican Government may be disposed to war against the United States, they sorely lack the means. It is by the issue of letters of marque to privateers, that any serious annoyance can be given to the trade of the United States. We have learned, that a number of vessels have proceeded to Mexico, to be employed as privateers. The Shamrock, which has been for some years a revenue cruiser on the Irish station, and has been known at Kingston as one of the fastest boats in the squadron, was sold by the government some months since. She subsequently proceeded to Liverpool, whence, two or three weeks since, she sailed from Mexico, the owners intending to take out letters of marque for the privateer service."

[Excerpts from article in Nashville Whig]

There has been speculation as to what kind of war it becomes this nation to wage against Mexico, in case of hostile demonstrations on her part- whether we should content ourselves with acting on the defensive and sparing her as much as possible, or “carrying the war into Africa.” And strike an effective and decisive blow? On this point, the Washington Union, which no doubt speaks the views of the Administration, says:

" If Mexico then advances to the verge of hostilities- if she declares war upon us, or strikes at us without any declaration, she may feel the blow recoil with tremendous force upon her own head. We would spare her in her weakness, if we could. But it is high time for us to settle our differences with her- to demand atonement for her aggressions- to secure justice for our injured claimants- and to enjoy an honorable and permanent peace. We desire this. We expect no honor in a contest with a power so comparatively weak as Mexico is. But if we can have no honor in beating, we should suffer the more disgrace in being beaten by her. In case of war, therefore, we must put forth our whole strength, that we may have a short war, and a lasting peace. And, acting in this spirit, we have no doubt the Executive will exert all the resources which the laws come together to unite their Constitutional power with his own.

We concur entirely in the propriety of the course here pointed out. In is high time that our differences with Mexico should be settled. She has no just cause of war against us. She has assumes a belligerent attitude, and through her Executive proclaimed her intention of declaring war. How long is this declaration of hr intentions to be held up by her and endured by us? If she does not act speedily, on way or the other, we shall be in favor of the adoption of summary measures on the part of the Government, to bring her to a settlement of the existing difficulties between the two countries. She has assumed an attitude which she should not be suffered long to maintain. With a strong military force on the Western frontier of Texas, and a fleet before Vera Cruz, let her be offered the alternative of War or Peace. We have a right to demand of her an explicit declaration of her intentions, and to strike the first blow, unless the demand be complied with. [JKM]
It is supposed and not without good ground, that President Herrera, in view of the proneness of the Mexicans to revolution, and aware of the ambitious aspirations of his generals, will not be likely to trust either of them with a command sufficient to make demonstrations upon Texas with, lest, instead of marching against Texas, they should march against him and revolutionize the country. Everything indeed, tends to convince us that Mexico does not intend to declare war- and dare not attempt to invade Texas, though ridiculously claiming it as part and parcel of the Mexican domain. But, in the meantime, by keeping us in suspense as to what she intends to do, she is forcing us to incur as heavy an expense for preparation as if war actually existed. This is not what our Government should be willing to submit to; and the sooner the question is brought to a close, the better. Let our army advance to the Rio Grande, and take possession of the "disputed territory," and leave her the alternative of immediate war or negotiation. The latter would be better for both parties. It would save the City of Mexico from the fate of the cities of Canaan, which would inevitably betide it if she went to war with us; and it would stop a vast expenditure of treasure by our Government; which would save twenty-five millions at least, by paying fifteen or twenty millions to Mexico to relinquish her claim to all the territory north of the Rio Grande. Indeed, we would greatly prefer to pay Mexico twenty millions for Texas to the Rio Grande, than to wrest it from her by conquest for half the money. We have a sort of superstitious dread of acquiring territory by conquest. It is counter to all our notions of morality and justice, from the principles of which one departure will but lead to another, until the character of our republic and the genius of our people are radically changed, and the fabric of our liberties overturned.

The Montreal Times, in noticing the success of the project of the annexation of Texas by the United States, makes the following remark:

"The balance of power has become a laughing-stock to the politicians of this enlightened age; but there can be no doubt that there is great danger in permitting any country to become so strong as to enable it to dictate its own terms to neighboring nations. Great power, if unchecked, will always be abused, whether wielded by the despotic sovereigns of France or Austria or Russia. Or by the despotic Democracy of the United States of America."

Whatever may be thought of the policy of annexation, which is a fair subject for difference of opinion, we apprehend that there is not a solitary man in this country who would tolerate for an instant the attempt, on the part of any or of all the nations of the world, to check the growth of the United States, on the plea that they were becoming "so strong as to dictate their own terms to neighboring nations."

Whether the interference with our affairs, for the purpose of retarding our growth, and so preserving the "balance of power" on the Western Continent, by made by Great Britain, or by France, or by both, we take it for granted that it would meet the determined, and, if need be, forcible resistance to every man of man of every party in the Union. To the editors of the Enquirer:

Camp of the 2nd U.S. Dragoons, West bank of the Colorado River, opposite "Le Grange," Aug. 14, 1845

Gentlemen: I wrote you a hurried account of the movement of the Regiment from Jesup, under date of the 24th ult., supposing that the information would be of interest to you. We are now exactly three hundred miles from Fort Jesup, which is just twenty-five from the Sabine River, which forms the line between the United States and Texas. By rapid and forced marches, this distance has been made, notwithstanding one or two occasions of delay at several at several intermediate points. This morning, an express arrived from General Taylor, who is at "Corpus Christi," on the coast, with the 3rd and 4th Regiments of Infantry. The orders received by the express, indicate an entirely different route for this Regiment from this point, from what was generally supposed to have been the destination of this portion of the command. Instead of moving in a North-Westerly or Westerly direction to Austin and San Antonio, as everybody hoped and expected, we proceed from this place in a Southerly direction, towards the coast, tomorrow morning, with all speed, for the old frontier settlement of San Patricio; which arrangement, it is supposed, will be only temporary, and that the Dragoons, or a portion of them, will ultimately be stationed in the neighborhood of Austin. Nothing of particular interest has transpired on the march, which thus far, all things considered, has been an exceedingly fortunate one. The people are all enthusiastic in their manifestations of delight at the presence of the U.S. troops, and are generally a much better class, in every respect, that they are generally supposed and represented to be.
It is strictly true, that no one is to be found, who is opposed to the great measure, so nearly consummated, except the Officers of the Government; and, indeed, not all of them. As to the general face, character and appearance of the country, I think that by far the better portion of it, thus far, is in the extreme Easterly section. The country is, however, improving in appearance the farther we go West, and that high up on this river, is represented to be exceedingly beautiful and abundant. For a week past, we have been crossing a succession of small prairies, beautifully interspersed with clumps of trees and skirts of wood, that mark the course of every little stream; but it is from this point only that the broad expanse of the grand prairies commences. The appearance of the country frequently peculiar, interesting, and sometimes even beautiful; but to the eye of a Virginian, it wants the sublimity of mountain scenery, to entitle it to the extravagant praises often bestowed. In accordance with my volunteer promise, heretofore given, I will improve every occasion for sending you accounts of whatever takes place of any interest. How and whether this will reach you at all, I am at a loss to say; but you may take it at a venture for what it is worth, and place the whole to the credit of OLD VIRGINIA

The U.S. steamship Princeton sailed yesterday morning with important (as it is conjectured) dispatches. Her immediate destination is Vera Cruz, whither she is directed to proceed to proceed with all possible celerity. The dispatches came by mail in ten days Washington, accompanied by an order to proceed with them without an "hour's delay." They were received at sunset and at sunrise the steamship was under way. It appears she has thus long been detained here for this purpose by a special order from the Navy Department; and it was also supposed she would carry our a special messenger.

There is a rumor afloat, that these dispatches contain a conciliatory overture to Mexico with regard to Texas. The manner in which it will be received by the Mexicans, is intended when laid before our next Congress, to show that body the spirit by which these people are actuated towards us, as also to demonstrate our Government the be as forward with offers of peace, as it has shown itself prompt with preparations for war.

The U.S. brig Lawrence will sail today, (the wind permitting,) and join the squadron. She would have sailed yesterday, but was detained by foul weather.

The frigate Potomac still lies at her anchorage her box or false bow is not yet fitted in a satisfactory manner.

LETTER FROM MR.CALHOUN

Fort Hill, 12th August 1845

Dear Sir: I am in the receipt of your letter, conveying a certified copy of a series of resolutions of your convention, unanimously passed, approbatory of the course of the late President and his administration in reference to the annexation of Texas, and communicated by its direction.

I accept this highly honorable approval of the distinguished body over which you presided, of the part I performed towards the consummation of this great measure, with sincere pleasure and gratitude.

Taken altogether, it is one of most memorable events of our history; and I am proud to have my name associated with it. One of its most striking circumstances is the unanimity and enthusiasm with which the people of Texas returned into our great and glorious Union, in spite of every obstacle thrown in their way, and every seduction presented to influence their decision. It speaks a volume in favor of their intelligence and patriotism; and is, at the same time, the highest eulogy ever pronounced in favor of our free, popular institutions; and will be so felt throughout the civilized world. This high evidence of the devotion of her sons to the land of their birth, and its institutions, gives assurance that she will shine as one of the brightest stars in our brilliant constellation.

I avail myself of the occasion to tender to you my congratulations at the high honor conferred on you by the convention, in selecting you to preside over its deliberations. It is, indeed, a striking, and, to me, a gratifying coincidence, that an old acquaintance, and a native of the district I reside in, should be called to preside in the convention which, on the part of Texas, consummated this great measure; in reference to which, it has been my fortune to take not an undistinguished part; and that another old acquaintance, and law student of mine, and native of the same district with myself, should be the chairman and organ of the committee by which it was consummated.

With great respect, yours truly
J.C. Calhoun

(from the regular Correspondent of the Union)

The defense set up by the “National Intelligencer” in favor of Mexico’s right to territory east of the Rio Grande, is most extraordinary.

It is well known that our Government, under every administration prior to the acquisition of Florida, considered our purchase of Louisiana extended to the Rio Grande del Norte.

At the time Mr. Livingston and Mr. Monroe purchased Louisiana from Bonaparte, the stipulations for which were concluded in Paris, they had a map of the country before them, which could no doubt be found in the archives of the French metropolis. This map, no doubt, would show the Louisiana extended to the Rio Grande.

This is not all. Gen. Lamar, in his inaugural address, several years ago, defined the boundaries of Texas, and claimed the Rio Grande. When ministers were sent to France and England to obtain the acknowledgement of Texas independence, they were instructed to claim boundary to the Rio Grande. I have been informed, on the highest authority, that when the proposition of acknowledging independence of Texas was submitted to the English minister in London, he called upon the Texas envoy to explain the boundaries of his country; whereupon the Texan defined its boundaries, according to the instructions of his Government- at which her Majesty’s minister expressed some surprise, but made it no bar to the acknowledge of Texas independence to the extent of the soil she claimed.

France acknowledged her independence, under the same circumstances.

It seems to us, that if these powers had succeeded in inducing Mexico to acknowledge the independence of Texas, their own previous acknowledge of the same to the Rio Grande del Norte would, or ought, to have induced them to adhere to the same boundary in their intervention with Mexico. But all this aside, the simple fact that Texas has maintained her independence for years, and by force of arms, over the soil to the Rio Grande, is conclusive of our right, through her accession, to the same. Never has a Mexican force passed the Rio Grande into Texas, for the day, of her independence but it has been considered and treated as an invasion, and measures adopted to expel them.

A case and point occurred in arranging our boundary with old Spain.

It seems that when we purchased Louisiana in 1803, Spain never doubted our right to all Texas under the purchase from France, extending to the Rio Grande del Norte; but she disputed our right to go east of the river Perdido, a small stream entering the Gulf of Mexico, between Pensacola and Mobile which we contended formed the eastern boundary of Louisiana; while Spain contended that the line should be drawn west of Mobile, and between it and New Orleans. While this dispute was going on, Spain held Mobile. She had troops strongly garrisoned there, apparently prepared to defend and maintain her title, of which she was in actual possession. She so remained in possession for ten years after our purchase, or from 1803 to 1813, till after the declaration of war. It was found that no negotiation could induce Spain to abandon her occupancy. Finally, Mr. Madison ordered Gen. Wilkinson, in 1813, to march upon Mobile, take possession of the fort, and erect our authority and flag over the country- from Louisiana east to the Perdido river.

We do not know where the Intelligencer stood in that day. If in existence, to have acted in accordance with its present unenviable position, it ought to have opposed Mr. Madison in his movement, and joined the Spaniards in declaring it was an invasion of Florida, and ought to have justified the declaration of war against us. That Louisiana did not extend East to the Perdido, but that Mobile, with the country, far West of stream, was Spanish territory; which, after allowing ten years’ occupancy on their part, we had forcibly entered, and expelled their troops from the country, pulling down the colors of Ferdinand the 7th, ruling “by the grace of God,” and hoisting the broad, glorious, bright stars and stripes of a free people. Where was the National Intelligencer then, that it could not have mingled its groans and tears of sympathy with his Catholic Majesty, the King of Spain and India?

How stands the case now? Between New York and the Rio Grande there is not a Spanish garrison. No regular for, no respectable body of troops have occupied a foot of the soil for years- almost every inch being under the exclusive control of the Texas Government, now merged into our territory; yet, because the President has sent our troops there to occupy it, the Intelligencer raises the greatest possible “hue-and-cry” for political effect.

From the date of the boundaries defined by the old bishopric of Louisiana, up to the present time, the Rio del Norte has formed the Western boundary of Texas.

Mexico never acquired any territorial right to Texas, unless Mr. Adam’s cession of it to Spain in exchange for Florida, in 1819, gave her some sort of claim; but at the period of this transfer, Mexico herself was not independent of old Spain. She never conquered Texas. The only connection formed subsequently, was her union under a confederacy, which could be dissolved by the gross violation of the compact on the part of Mexico; which was the fact. And leaving the Mexican confederacy, she, by permission, united herself to another confederacy, transferring the sovereignty of her soil West to the Rio Grande, to the confederation to which she had united herself; and all the powers of earth cannot wrest it from us.

The Rio Grande

The secret treaty, which Santa Ana formed with the authority of Texas, by which he obtained his own liberty and preserved the army of Mexico, has just been published by Texas. We copy both the private and public treaties from the columns of the Galveston News. It appears from both these instruments, that the Rio Grande was at that time designated as the Western boundary of Texas! [Unum]

Secret Treaty

Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana, general-in-chief of the army of operations, and President of the Republic of Mexico, before the government established in Texas, solemnly pledges himself to fulfill the stipulations contained in the following articles, as far as concerns himself:

Article 1: He will not take up arms, nor cause the to be taken up, against the people of Texas, during the present war of independence.

Article 2: He will give his orders, that, in the shortest time, the Mexican troops may leave the territory of Texas.

Article 3: He will so prepare matters in the Cabinet of Mexico, that the mission that may be sent thither by the Government of Texas may be well received; and that, by means of negotiations all differences may be settled, and the independence that has been declared by the Convention may be acknowledged.

Article 4: A treaty of commerce, amity, and limits, will be established between Mexico and Texas. The territory of the latter not to extend beyond the Rio Bravo del Norte.

Article 5: The prompt return of General Santa Ana to Vera Cruz being indispensable, for the purpose of effecting his solemn engagements, the Government of Texas will provide for his immediate embarkation for said port.

Article 6: This instrument being obligatory on one part as well as on the other, will be signed by duplicate, remaining folded and sealed until the negotiation shall be concluded, when it will be restored to his Excellency General Santa Ana - no use of it to be made before that time, unless there should be an infraction by either of the contracting parties.

Papers of Gen. Austin- Copy of an Agreement- Articles of agreement entered into between his excellency, David G. Burnet, President of the Republic of Texas, of the one part, and his excellency, Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana, President and General-in-chief of the Mexican Army, of the other part.

Article 1: Gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana agrees that he will not take up arms, nor will he exercise his influence to cause them to be taken up against the people of Texas during the present war of independence.

Article 2: All hostilities between the Mexican and Texas troops will cease—immediately, both on land and water.

Article 3: The Mexican troops will vacate the territory of Texas, passing to the other side of the Rio Grande del Norte.

Article 4: The Mexican Army, in its retreat, shall not take the property of any person without his consent and just indemnification, using only such articles as may be necessary for its subsistence, in cases when the owner may not be present, remitting to the Commander of the army of Texas, or to the commissioners to be appointed for the adjustment of such matters, an account of the value of the property consumed, the place where taken, and the name of the owner, if it can be ascertained.

Article 5: That all private property, including cattle, horses, Negro slaves, or indenture persons of whatever denomination that may have been captured by any portion of the Mexican army, since the commencement of the last invasion, shall be restored to the commander of the Texain army, or to such where persons may be appointed by the government of Texas to receive them.

Article 6: The troops of both armies will refrain from coming into contact with each other; and to this, the commander of the army of Texas will be careful not to approach within a less distance of the Mexican army than five leagues.

Article 7: The Mexican army shall not make any other delay on its march than that which is necessary to take up the hospitals, baggage, etc., and to cross the rivers. Any delay not necessary to these purposes, to be considered an infraction of this agreement.

Article 8: By express, to be immediately dispatched, this agreement shall be sent to Gen. Vicente Filisola, and to Gen. T.J. Rusk, commander of the Texan army, in order that the may be appraised of the stipulations; and, to this end, they will exchange engagements to comply the same.

Article 9: That all Texan prisoners, now in possession of the Mexican army, or its authorities, be forthwith released, with free passports to return to their homes, in consideration of which, a corresponding number of Mexican prisoners, rank and file, now in possession of the government of Texas, shall be immediately released. The remainder of the Mexican prisoners that continue in the possession of the government of Texas, to be treated with due humanity; and extraordinary comforts that may be furnished them to be at the charge of the government of Mexico.

Article 10: General Lopez de Santa Ana will be sent to Vera Cruz as soon as it shall be deemed proper. The contracting parties sign the instrument for the above-mentioned purpose, by duplicate at the port of Valesco, this fourteenth day of May, 1836.

[from the Union]

California- We have seen another letter from New York, which occurs with the one that was addressed to ourselves, and published in the "Union" of Friday evening. This second letter also speaks (with some specification, which is not proper for us to publish) of a scheme now projected to make California independent of Mexico. It says that "Americans and other foreigners are connected with the movement. It is positively asserted that England and France are to recognize and aid in completing this design, upon the express condition that no connection or union is to be formed with the United States."

This information is said to come from a gentleman of high standing and character. Nor do we doubt the respectability of the source, though we cannot vouch for the accuracy of the information.

The "Boston Advertiser" gives the following as "an extract from a letter from Peninsula of California, dated "San Francisco, June 29"

"The country is in a lamentable state of confusion, and entirely without law. 1,800 Mexican troops already expected, under the command of an officer who was educated in England, and is said to be a man of great capacity and character. Attempts are making to excite the Californians to oppose the landing of the troops, which will not probably succeed, and we shall be again under Mexican rulers."

In the last few weeks, public curiosity in relation to the affairs of Texas and Mexico, has wonderfully cooled down. In another column we give a summary of the last news from these two countries. Texas is now so closely associated with us in every particular, that we look upon her as part and parcel of ourselves- and the events of her history are regarded with not much more interest that the actions and doings of the older States. It will be seen, that everything is moving on quietly and prosperously. An excellent Constitution framed and submitted to the people- flourishing crops in all directions- the selection of the proper State officers to administer her affairs and wield her destinies- and the organization of political societies, based upon the party divisions of this country, preparatory to her entrance into our Union- these are some of the features of the stirring events now transpiring in the new Republic, which is so soon to take her stand by our side, and to share with us the honors and responsibilities of an independent and rapidly progressive nation. In one short year, what magic results have been achieved by this great question! In our own country, it swept away all opposition, and covered with gloom the brilliant prospects of the proudest politicians. A little more then a year ago, the triumph of the Texas candidate was a the sure guarantee of one of the most extraordinary events that history has recorded- the peaceful and voluntary union of two great Republics- in spite of the frowns and oppositions of the mighty nations of the Old World. For a time, treason reared its hateful crest; but it was crushed by popular indignation. And, now everything is moving on in peace and beauty- full of promise of honor and prosperity to the expanding Republic of the New World.

In Texas, too, a wonderful moral revolution has been effected. Stripped of the apprehension of attack from without, she has set to work and organized a Government, worthy of the spirit of the age. Agriculture is developing the rich resources of her soil. Education is about to throw its magic influence over her people and her Government. Upon the testimony of the Rev. Mr. Blair, of Victoria, Texas, as reported by the Watchman and Observer of this city, "We are gratified to learn, that, in a religious point of view, the prospect is encouraging- that the general character of the people is not of that rude and lawless violent cast which many suppose, but peaceful and orderly and well disposed, and prepared not only to receive the gospel, but to aid in its extension- that even the native Mexicans, tho' professed Catholics, are inclined to listen to the truth- and some of them are procuring Bibles and other religious works in the Spanish language, which they not only read themselves with interest, but are, in some measure, distributing them even in Mexico- that the attention of the people in many sections of the country is directed to the establishment of schools; and they would, were they able, make ample provisions for the education of the rising generation. What is greatly needed are more ministers of the Gospel, intelligent, prudent, zealous, and prepared to 'endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ'- men who would follow in the footsteps of those..."
pioneers of the Gospel in the earlier settlements of the States- and who would not only preach, but teach- become the founders of academies and of colleges, the influence of which is incalculable upon a rising population. Connected with the Presbytery of Brases, there are now seven ministers, and they will probably be very soon united with our General Assembly. But the number ought to be greatly increased, and ample means should be prepared for their support. The question then arises, who will go? And who will give? It is important that what is done should be done quickly. The Macedonian cry from that quarter of the great field, Come over and help us, seems to us in the providence of God to be clear, and distinct and emphatic- and therefore we invite to it the attention of the churches."

As for Mexico, she is bowed to the ground, and is now meeting, in sackcloth and ashes, the heavy penalty for her past tyranny, and her public and private perfidy and vice. Her new President, Herrera, is already threatened with revolutions; her treasury is exhausted, and her credit gone; her army, penniless and starving, breathes discontent and rebellion. All is anarchy and confusion, and there can be found no patriot of strong mind and courage to seize the helm of State, and, by firmness and energy, save the vessel from the impending storm. At the recent installation of President Herrera, he pronounced an address, wherein, after deploring the utter insufficiency of the revenues of State, whereby the powers of Government are completely paralyzed, and after demanding the prompt and energetic cooperation of the legislative body, to remedy the evil, he makes the following ominous prediction:

"The army cannot move; territory usurped, will remain usurped; and the hope of recovering it being once lost, the usurpation will be successively and gradually continued until it embraces the whole Republic, and (I shudder to confess it,) Mexico, with so many elements of abundance and of greatness, will disappear from the number of present nations."

Painful and forced as the confession was, it is true in the fullest extent, "Territory usurped will remain usurped"- or, to speak more in accordance with truth and reason, "Texas annexed by lawful and peaceful means, and in consonance with every principle of justice and international law, will remain annexed." Whether the remaining clause of his melancholy prophecy will be verified, rests within the discretion of Mexico herself. As long as she does us justice, the United States will respect her rights and leave her territory inviolate.

If any one doubts that Mexico has surrendered all hope and design of reconquering Texas, the following extract from a paper in the interior of Mexico, will solve the difficulty. Speaking of the arrival of Gen. Gaona's division at Matamoras, the journal exclaims: "Heaven grant that it may be true, and that it may not be composed of more officers than soldiers, and that items carried with it the means of subsistence; because if it comes to die of hunger, as had been almost the case with the troops now there, instead of improving, it will only aggravate our condition." The article goes on in this heart-broken strain; proving that the troops near the frontier are almost totally disorganized, for want of the necessary resources.

Mexico has no power to assail us. Her domestic troubles are sufficient to engage all her attention. Indeed, ye threaten her very existence as a nation. [JKM]
A Texas correspondent of the N.Y. Tribune, who strongly battled against annexation, but when it was completed, went out "to see what could be done there," described the natural resources of the new State in the following glowing tints. He makes it out to be a perfect El Dorado and "no price could have been to large for its acquisition." As a large majority of the people of the United States are convinced that it has been annexed without the least "violation of our Constitution or sacrifice of our national power," we ask all Whigs, who may still doubt the value of the acquisition, to read the strong testimony of a Whig eye-witness and give the proper praise to the Democrats for having secured a splendid national prize:

"Capital and Labor find a good market in Texas. The cotton planter will possess decided advantages over his competitor in the States. The soil is more cheaply and easily prepared for the plant and will produce more to the acre; the season is longer, and early frosts do not prevent the planter from picking all he can raise. From the Sabine to the Rio Grande, Cotton may be cultivated with the greatest facility."

"The capacities of Texas for the culture of the Sugar Cane can scarcely be overrated- the Brazos river alone and its tributaries afford more and better Sugar lands that is watered by the Mississippi, and this does not embrace one-fifth of the Sugar lands of Texas!"

"All the grains of the North may be grown in this country. I have seen Sugar cane, Cotton, Wheat, Corn, Rye and Pulse growing in the same locality in Western Texas, and it would seem difficult to say to which the soil seemed best adapted. Tobacco and Indigo succeed well, and will one day become articles of export. The culture of Silk in the region of San Antonio, was successfully tested by the Spaniards. For grazing and stock raising of all kinds, you can scarcely go amiss- the whole country is perennial, self sustaining pasture."

"Slavery, except in name, can never extend to Northern and Western Texas- if for no other reason, because it can never become in those parts a profitable investment."

"The people of Texas as a body, are law-observing, peaceable, intelligent and hardy. You must not judge of them from the turbulent and unworthy few who came here in earlier times- many of these have passed away. Fifty peaceable citizens come here and settle; no note is made of it- one notorious scoundrel flies from justice, takes up his abode here, and every paper in the Union heralds the fact."

"From this time forward the trade from Texas will go North- to New York and Boston; for there will be the consumption and outlet of her staple productions, and thence will be mainly derived her supplies. Indeed, considering the capacities of this country for the culture of the great staples of sugar, cotton, and wool, no price could have been too large for its acquisition, save that of a violation of our Constitution and a sacrifice of our national honor."

Friday, October, 24, 1845   REv42i49p2c1  Just Tribute    words: 535

The following extract of a letter, from the intelligent and reliable Washington Correspondent of the N.Y. Journal of Commerce, presents, in a condensed and luminous view, the true effect of the wise and energetic conduct of the President, in carrying out the wishes of the people of this Union, for the annexation of Texas. Mr. Polk boldly cut the Gordian knot, and all difficulty at home and abroad was at once settled. The threatened war with Mexico is now merely a subject of curious speculation- and the fiery wrath of the Abolitionists, and other anti-American fanatics, has been softened down to smothered mutterings of opposition at a few public meetings in Massachusetts. We doubt much, whether any serious resistance will be made in Congress to the consumption of the union of the two countries. It is certain, that he who attempts to thwart public sentiment in this favorite measure, takes upon himself a fearful responsibility. Whatever be the present views of his constituents, such a factious and anti-American interference will be regarded as a violation of national faith and honor, and will consign the mischievous agitator to inglorious obscurity.

After rendering to Messrs. Calhoun and Tyler the proper tribute of praise for their consistent and brilliant labors, in giving life and success to the glorious work, the writer proceeds:

"This promptness of action and directness of policy encourage Texas, paralyzed Mexico, astounded the political drivellers of the old world, who were always prating about our inefficiency, and, forever, silenced all factious opposition at home."

"It belong to foreign and anti-American interests, properly to appreciate the statesmanlike action of Mr. Polk on this subject. The praise grudgingly spared to the President by his friends at home, is willingly, but maliciously, accorded, by his enemies abroad. Witness the following paragraph from the London Examiner:"

"President Polk has, however, defeated the purpose of his own Senate; he has out-promised and out-maneuvered England, cajoled the Texians into a vote of annexation, and acted there on promptly by the dispatch of ships and regiments to the Rio Grande. Polk has shown himself in this a worthy son of Jackson; indeed, an improvement upon Old Hickory, since he has avoided the violence and bloodshed which accompanied the General's seizure of the Floridas. The question now is, whether the British Government, and that of France, having failed, will be content to refrain from all further interference. Will they give up their treaties with Texas? Will Englishmen give up their claims upon Texas, as a portion of Mexico, for the 60,000,000 dollars due to the settlement?"

"The action of the present Administration has put at rest all "further interference," either at home or abroad. Foreign Governments- i.e. the British Governments, have yielded all their hopes, all their interests, all their treaties, all their mortgages, all their pretensions- everything that can stand in the way of Texan annexation."

"The fact, then, seems to be, that Texas, already a territory of the Union, is about to become a State- as soon as Congress can meet and accept the State Constitution. This statement of the question above referred to as so puzzling at public dinners, and in some public papers, seems to unriddle the whole matter.

France- Paris, Sept. 30- Much attention has been paid in this capital, both by the press and the public, to the recent arrivals from the United States, with respect to Mexico. The probability of war or no war has been discussed; but all journals and all parties are unanimous in thinking that it would be the very height of folly for Mexico to attempt hostilities.

The tale of the Times of London of the finding of slave shackles in the wreck of the noble American Vessel, the Missouri, has been received in Paris with varied feelings of contempt, disbelief and indignation. All our journals, without a single exception, designate it as a falsehood; many characterize it as a most infamous calumny; and some think it a lie so monstrously stupid; as not to merit the honor of an answer.

By the schooner Florinda from Galveston, we have received papers of that place:

It appears the crops are very favorable. It is believed that the exports will exceed those of any preceding year.

The newspapers express a good deal of mistrust in the friendship of the Indians, and call upon the Government of the United States to remove them.

A great Democratic meeting was held at Galveston on the 2nd. Inst. for the purpose of organizing the party for the approaching election. The resolutions express great satisfaction at the annexation of the republic to the United States, and declare, what is very true, that it is a Democratic measure, carried in effect by the Democracy of the country.

It is stated that General Taylor arrested several Mexicans as spies, and although he had strong evidence against them, yet he permitted them to go at large, under the impression that their reports of the condition of his camp would do no harm.

From Mexico- We have seen a letter from a very intelligent source, dated the 25th ult. at Vera Cruz. The letter is full of rumors and speculations, most of which are not new. The writer has no idea whatever, that Mexico will fight, but applauds the preparations on the part of the United States upon the frontiers, inasmuch as the Mexicans are a treacherous race, and have too much Indian blood in them to be trusted, however peaceable they may seem.

It is said that the Mexican Government recently obtained a loan of $200,000 of the foreign merchants, in anticipation of accruing duties, and that the money was at once dispatched to the armies of Gens. Paredes and Arista. A rumor is mentioned that the church was willing to advance $15,000,000, if they could thereby prevent the inroads of heretics into the country- but this looks like moonshine.

An order arrived at Vera Cruz on the 24th ult. for all the women to leave the castle of San Juan d’Ulua; and on the 25th, news came that the State of Tabasco had returned to her allegiance to the existing Government.

The writer does not believe that a single letter of marque has been issued by the Mexican Government for future use, and he is very likely to know. The Mexican steam vessels of war are hauled up under the protection of the castle, prepared for nothing but Northers.

The fears of an internal revolution were so decided, that the very day was named for an outbreak of what is called Santa Ana’s party. But it is the more idle to give mere speculations, as we shall doubtless have later and explicit news within a few days.- [N.O. Picayune

Friday, October 31, 1845   REv42i51p2c3   The O’Connells in America   words: 498

No feelings of gratitude of sympathy in a common cause of resistance to tyranny, can restrain the “Agitator” and his son John from lavishing their abuse upon this country. The elder O’Connell is now on his walk of political agitation and never loses a chance of hurling his slanders at our head. In a repeal speech at Kerry, speaking upon the Oregon question, he uttered the following absurd and infamous expressions:

“While American has the canker worm of Negro slavery working at her heart’s core—while a remnant of slavery exists in America, she never can be strong or prospering in war, or able to hold her own against a hostile nation. There is within her the plague spot of slavery, and God forbid that any country should ever be permanently powerful, that is tainted with that infernal system.”

His hopeful son John seems resolved to follow in the footsteps of his father, and to rival him in gross and mendacious assaults upon American character. In a late speech he entered into a history of the Annexation of Texas, remarking, that “the slave-owners on the Southern States had, for their own base purposes of spreading and fostering the slave system, and, what was for worse, of slave breeding, annexed Texas, in order, by the addition of a few more Southern States, they might be able to outvote the Northern, who are opposed to slavery. He also characterized the proceeding as a ‘bare-faced’ wrong and a ‘notorious swindle’.”—He was not, however, suffered to proceed in his false statements, uncontradicted. There was in the body of the hall one individual of truth and courage, who stepped forward and rebuked the imprudent speaker for his misrepresentations. He boldly told him that he was better acquainted with the States that he, Mr. O’Connell, could be. He said, and with truth, that the object of annexing was not the purpose of promoting slavery, but to prevent England from ever having the power of making a successful attack upon American independence. Many thanks to this gentleman, who, despite the frowns and clamors of the Agitator’s party, was manly and virtuous enough to vindicate the name of a distant Republic.

The violence of the O’Connells is received with disapprobation even by a portion of the people in Ireland. Already we see a wide breach between “Young” and “Old” Ireland, and the establishment of a paper under the latter title, intended to represent the O’Connell section of the Repealers, will only increase the disaffection. The Dublin “Nation” is the able organ of the “Young Ireland.”

Warm as are our sympathies for the cause of Repeal, the course of the O’Connell and his intimate friends is well calculated to produce a reaction of felling in this country. No people can hear their character vilely aspersed, and still hold out their hand of friendship to their public revilers. A more moderate and liberal bearing would lose to O’Connell and Repeal fewer friends, both at home and abroad.

Mexican Tariff- One of the reasons for believing that Mexico mediated to declare war against this country, was the formal manner in which the Mexican Consul at New Orleans closed his official labors and returned to his country. The following which we yesterday received from the Mexican Consul in this city, places a very pacific face on the matter.

[New York Sun]

CONSULATE GENERAL OF MEXICO

The understanding in fulfillment of the instructions of his Government, hereby informs the merchants engaged in the Mexican trade; that the Mexican Government have authorized a new tariff to be in force, on and after the 1st February next; that he has received a extract of it which contains the principle alterations, and in order that they may be enabled to make their calculations in accordance, and to give it all possible publicity he has had it reprinted with the object to distribute gratuitously to them, on application at his office, No. 95 Wall Street

John Granja
Mexican Consul General
The Washington Correspondent of the N.Y. Journal of Commerce, writing under date of the 26th October, says:

"I learn that the Executive has, at length, determined to dispatch a special agent to Mexico for the purpose of making a formal demand upon the government for the payment of the indemnity due to us, under the Treaty concluded on the 5th of April, 1831.

"It is somewhat surprising, that public attention has not been called to the 34th article of that treaty, under which this demand is about to be made, though at so late a day in this business.

"The article is as follows:

"Thirdly- If (what indeed cannot be expected) any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infracted in any manner whatever, it is stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended, shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verifies by competent proofs, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed."

"This demand has probably been withheld by this Government, upon the supposition, that Mexico was about to carry into execution her threats of a declaration of war against the United States. An appeal to war would, of course, set aside all treaty stipulations. But, as the present administration of the mock Government of Mexico is supposed to be, in fact, of a pacific disposition, whether from preference or from helplessness, it becomes necessary and proper for our Government to make this long withheld demand."

Prospects of Peace

Late From the City of Mexico
The following, which we take from the New Orleans Delta of the 98th ult., received Saturday morning, will explain the rumor circulated in Washington, of Mr. Slidell's having been murdered. It now seems to be clearly ascertained that our Minister has not been received – though a renewal of diplomatic relations had been invited by the late brittle Mexican Government. To preserve our rights, and to ward off the evils of a devastating war, our Government should adopt the most prompt and efficient measures. Its course, we doubt not, will be materially influenced by the dispatches received by this last arrival from Mexico. We anxiously await for further developments.

By the arrival of the Pario, from Vera Cruz, which place she left on the 13th inst, we learn verbally – for she brought no papers that we can hear of – that President Herrera has resigned; that Paredes has been elevated to the Presidency by a sort of popular election, but whether by the leperos of Mexico alone, or with the assistance of their brethren in the other Departments, we cannot ascertain; that Almonte, the friend and counselor of Santa Anna, is Secretary of State; and that the military, such as it is, is in possession of the Government.

On the assension of Paredes, our Minister, Mr. Slidell, (probably after demanding to be recognized, and the demand refused.) asked for his passports, but was informed that as he had never been received as Minister, no passport in that quality, could be given to him; he then requested that the Government would give him an escort to Vera Cruz, which was peremptorily refused. Upon the news reaching Vera Cruz, seven officers of the United States brig Somers, which arrived at that port on the 6th inst., started for Mexico, well armed, to escort him through the country.

Such is the information which we have received. Whether it be true or not, we cannot avouch – but, if not true, it is very truthlike. It corresponds exactly with what might be expected from the Mexicans, from the Minister, and from the ardent and fearless officers of the Navy.

Since the above was written, we have conversed with a gentleman who had read a letter from a well informed source dated at Vera Cruz, the 12th inst, and who had conversed with the only passenger who arrived here by the Pario. Both – the letter and the passenger – concur in stating that Paredes has been proclaimed President; that Almonte has been appointed Secretary of War, not of State, as public report has it; that Mr. Slidell is at Puebla, (at the previous advices he was at Jalapa,) awaiting the further instructions of the Government. Everything was perfectly quiet in the capital and in the country. This letter says not a word, nor does this passenger, of Slidell's being ordered to leave the country – not a word of an escort being denied him – and not a word of the officers and men of the brig Somers arming themselves and going on to Mr. Slidell, with the view of forming his bodyguard through the country to Vera Cruz. This much of the verbal reports, which circulated through the city so freely yesterday, may therefore be put down as being doubtful.

The Pario brought dispatches for our Government at Washington.

We are indebted to the editor of the Bulletin for the following extract of a letter, dated:
VERA CRUZ, January 13th, 1846.

“The new President, Gen. Paredes, has established his Ministry, viz – Gen. Almonte, late Minister to the United States, Minister of War; Luis Parres, of Finance; Joaquin Maria del Castillo y Lanuzas, of Foreign Affairs; and Bishop Becerra, of Justice. These gentlemen appear to inspire general confidence. The American Minister has demanded his passports, having failed in the object of his mission.”

REv42n79p2c2, February 3, 1846: MEXICAN AFFAIRS

We have always thought that the European powers, following the lead of Mr. “Balance-of-Power” Guizot, were busily intriguing in the internal concerns of ill-fated Mexico. Baffled in the Texas affair, by the wisdom, foresight and energy of our Government, they have cunningly thrust themselves into Mexico, and by artful appeals to the anti-American feelings of that country, have succeeded in putting down an administration which was supposed to have a desire of settling amicably the difficulties with the United States. That the powers of Europe have had a finger in this matter, we are confirmed in the belief by the following paragraph in the Memorial Historico, published in Mexico under the eyes of the new authorities:

“By way of Havana, it is known that Spain, France and England have entered into an alliance to place in Mexico and Guatemala a stable and liberal Government, for which purpose each power will furnish a quota of men; at the same time, it is assumed that England has already at sea thirty ships of the line, which are on their way to the Gulf of Mexico.”

The Yucatan Imparcial so far corroborates this view, by expressing its opinion, that the three powers possess means to give effect to the projected movement.

In proof of the deep-seated hatred of many Mexicans for the people of the United States, we may refer to the proceedings of the Assembly of Notables; wherein a motion was made by Gen. Bustamente that a clause should be added to the oath to be taken by the President, compelling him to swear “to repel the invasion of the United States.” After a long debate, this motion was voted down upon the ground that the oath demanded by Gen. Bustamente would be equivalent to a declaration of war, and that the Assembly had no power to declare war.

The oath finally taken by the new President, Paredes, is as follows:

“You swear to God to sustain the independence and integrity of the national territory against any foreign aggression whatever; and the Republican, popular, representative system; and the plan of administration of the Republic, agreed to by the Act of the Army on the 2d of January.”

The General Bustamante, (says the New Orleans Picayune, ) who took part in this assembly, was not the Ex-President of that name. Both he and General Herrera were invited to take a part in the proceedings, but indignantly refused.

No one can doubt that the monarchists of Europe are attempting, from the fulcrum of Mexico, to wield the lever of the monarchical principle upon the future destiny of the American continent. The safety of our own territorial rights and of our Republican institutions demands from our Government firm and decided measures. This quasi was should not be allowed longer to continue. Mexico should be made to show her hand. If she is for peace the controversy can not be too soon settled. If war be her policy, let us have it over at once. The present state of affairs is dangerous to our rights and to the permanent peace of the country.

REv42n80p4c5-6, February 6, 1846: MEXICO

Monday night’s Union sets forth Mr. Slidell’s position in Mexico in rather a different light from what most of the New Orleans press represent it. It says:

We perceive that the accounts received on Saturday evening from New Orleans are not confirmed by the official accounts. The “Picayune” reports as one of the pieces of intelligence brought by the brig Pario, that “a letter written at Vera Cruz on the 13th ultimo, the day on which the Pariosailed, simply says "Mr. Slidell demanded his passports, having failed in the object of his mission." We do not understand that Mr. Slidell has yet demanded his passports, or that he has received any thing like a definitive answer from the Government. A letter has been received from Jalapa on the 12th January, which states that Mr. Slidell was expected to arrive in that town via Puebla on that or the following day.

There is too much reason to apprehend, that the mission may not be productive of the success which there was some reason to anticipate. The access of Almonte and Tornel to the existing administration is no very flattering...
Some rumors are still afloat of a design on the part of Great Britain, France and Spain to place a European prince on the throne of Mexico. We cannot couch for the correctness of so extravagant a report.

The New York Herald publishes the following "Ultimatum of Mexico," which, it says, has been furnished by San Luis Potosi, Dec. 15th, 1845

"Mexico can enter into no new treaty of boundary with the United States. The treaties of boundary and amity recent and solemn trial, sedition itself, covered with the shield of impunity. Our agriculture is perishing for want of proper protection and security, while our commerce, already exhausted, threatens to abandon altogether our coasts, which it formerly promised to cover with rich and populous cities. This sad picture of our condition is unfortunately not exaggerated. It is a faithful account of what all observing men see and feel. Consider what we were 23 years ago, and what we might have been with 24 years of peace and prosperity, and then contemplate the picture here drawn. – In the vain hope of remedying these evils, every day has witnessed more revolutions. These revolutions having been the offspring of private interest, have brought us no relief. Congress and Presidents have been changed buy the evils under which we labor have remained the same – the same abuses and corruptions continue to eat up the substance of the Sate. No movement hitherto made has been more popular than that of December last. The nation rose up as one man to overthrow a degrading dictatorship. But has our situation been improved? Have not rather these evils been increased? The demagogue has but grasped at the power let fall by Gen. Santa Anna. But little satisfied with the important concessions of the Government, he has preached up war to strengthen his party, while he has been laboring hard to destroy the army. Hiding under the cloak of ultra federalism his well known projects of vengeance and his love of anarchy, he cares little for the interests of a country which he is bound by no ties, and whose ruin even he [illegible] his adherents could fatten on the spoils. Governed by a set of partisans whom he frats, he travels from concession to concession. Defamation, calumny and threats extract from his weakness the most pernicious measures, whilst anarchy is daily organizing its forces to overthrow the nation anew.
The army has at length determined to save the country and put a stop to the precarious and insane state in which it has existed for some time past. I, who have had the honor of combating for the independence of my country; I, who have had the honor of being the first to raise the standard of insurrection in Jalisco against a hateful tyranny, feel myself called upon to carry out the grito which the nation raised on that occasion. Mexico has not beaten down one tyrant to elevate others in his stead. She has not overthrown a soldier to deliver herself, bound hand and foot, to the demagogue. If such had not already been my conviction, the entreaties which I have received from my countrymen, and the spontaneous election of the army, to put myself at the head of the present movement, would be sufficient to inspire me with them.

While marching upon the capital to crown the glorious enterprise entrusted to my care, I declared in the most solemn manner, in presence of the whole nation, that we do not go, simply to effect a change of persons in the Government but that we aspire to a more noble object. We have not undertaken to usurp the Presidency, and to change the members of Congress. Our object is, to call upon the nations, in order that, without the fear of turbulent minorities, it may embody its will in a set of representatives, who will raise a barrier against the dissolution which threatens us – prevent the administration from falling in the hands of factions who will bring disgrace upon the nation. Our object is to restore to the productive classes the wealth and influence which they have lost, and to give to the industrial and laboring classes the position which belongs to them in the Government. The nation, tired of living amid eternal broils, cries aloud for some guaranty of peace and tranquility. For this reason I have decided and the army have decided with me, to make a new revolution, in order that it may be the last and that we may at length commence, beneath the shade of peace and internal tranquility, to develop those resources with which we have so abundantly been blessed by Providence. As for myself, I desire no place, no power. Those ephemeral dictatorships, which have heretofore served only to heap ill-gotten wealth upon their possessors, hove no illusions for me. On this point my opinions are well known, and they have been proved more than once during my arduous career.

The army has at length determined to save the country and put a stop to the precarious and insane state in which it has existed for some time past. I, who have had the honor of combating for the independence of my country; I, who have had the honor of being the first to raise the standard of insurrection in Jalisco against a hateful tyranny, feel nation. If the United States, through a friendly power or powers, shall offer regret and reparation for the injury done, and that regret and reparation prove satisfactory and be accepted by Mexico – Mexico will, in that case, enter upon the subject of a new boundary, to be guaranteed to her by Spain, France and England. A new treaty of boundary, without such a guaranty Mexico can, in no case (excoriated as she is by the citizen and governmental perfidy of the United States) enter into or put faith in.

"Mexico cannot view annexation as the simple act of two independent nations. Annexation, in the eye of Mexico, commenced when Gen. Jackson’s friend, Sam Houston, went to Texas to ‘raise a flag of revolt therein,’ after the former found his earnest offers to purchase Texas would not be acquiesced in by the government of Mexico. Annexation, in the view of Mexico, progressed when the U.S. government, by ‘masterly inactivity,’ permitted its citizens to make war upon a neighbor with whom, for itself and citizens’ the United States had entered into a treaty of ‘perpetual amity.’ Mexico has claims, therefore on the United States for her public lands in Texas and for the expenses of the war in vain attempt thus far, to establish the national authority lost therein, solely by the aforesaid ‘masterly inactivity,’ of the United States, in respect to curbing its own citizens.

"Mexico denies that Texas was estranged from her rule by Mexicans. The government and citizens of the United States are solely responsible for all the evil brought upon Mexico by the Texas revolt.

"Under these circumstances, to send a message into Mexico to make offers for a still larger territory than even Texas, cannot but be viewed by her other than an additional insult to her nationality; especially as the presses of the U. States are advocating the like emigration to that larger territory (California) where with to re-enact the Texan wrong. Whether Mexico accede or not to the offers of purchase by the United States, then the territory in question must, by United States’ accounts, be lost to Mexico. The independence of Mexico thus jeopardized by a stronger republic she has no alternative but to throw herself under the protection of powers stronger than the United States – unless, as we have above shown, the U. States proffer ample reparation, and a new treaty of boundary, guaranteed by Spain, France and England, settle all differences between the two governments.

"The first aggressive movement of the U.S. fleet in the Gulf, or the U.S. army at Corpus Christi, will be the signal for Mexico to throw herself on the protection of Spain, France and England. The navies of these powers concentrated at Havana, will then sail to Vera Cruz and there intimate the fact to the commander of the United States squadron. If the latter, in defiance of this intimation, proceeds to a demonstration against Mexico, the combined fleets will proceed to capture it, in much the same way as the Turkish fleet was captured at Navarino.

Last summer, we became so accustomed to these valorous threats, this bruim fulmer of Mexican arrogance, that we can, with but little difficulty, credit the above terrible revelations. – Every one knows that the United States have no more bitter and uncompromising enemy than Gen. Almonte, the fierce master-spirit of the present revolutionary Administration of Mexico. – He is a man of powerful intellect and burning ambition – and he will spare no means to thwart the progress of the United States.

We should not be surprised, were he seriously to count upon the aid of France, England and Spain to put down our power. We cannot yet believe that these European nations are willing to thrust themselves into the controversy, and break up the peace of the world. We have done no injury to Mexico, and therefore have no “regrets or reparation” to make to her. It is Mexico herself who has been guilty of bad faith, and of wanton mischief and insult, to our citizens and to our nation. She talk of violated treaties! The notion is absurdly false. It was her own bad faith which forced the people of Texas to rise up in defense of a broken Constitution, and to demand the restoration of their rights. True, they had been our citizens, but they had gone to Texas, in good faith resolved to live under the Mexican confederation, but as soon as the Constitution which bound the States together had been violated by Mexico, the Texans rose up and declared their independence of Mexican tyranny. Many of our citizens went over, as individuals, to push on because of liberty. Our Government had no right nor power to prevent their emigration, and it is the flimsiest pretext in the world to make it responsible for the acts of its citizens, which it could not restrain.

Before Mexico demands reparation of us, let her do justice to our own injured and insulted citizens. The annexation of Texas is justified by every law of justice and right. She was forced by the perfidy and tyranny of the Central Government to stand up for herself. She was recognized as free and independent by the great powers of Europe, and by the voluntary consent of the two Republics she was made an important element of our Union of States. If we have done wrong, we have been justified in it, by the acts of Mexico’s sympathizing friends, England and France, who, in conjunction with us acknowledged the full and perfect independence of Texas, to do whatever she thought right.

Mexico, under the sinister influence of Almonte, may call in the aid of France, England and Spain to sustain her extravagant hopes. – It is needless to say, that these threats will have no other effect but to urge our Government to take prompt and wise measures to meet the crisis. We ought to know from Mexico her real designs, whether for peace or for war. And if she persists in her arrogant bearing we will be prepared to defend our just rights, we will be prepared to defend our just rights, even though all the powers of Europe be arrayed to put down the progress of Republican institutions. Would it not be wiser, however, for Mexico to summon some of her European allies to keep together her own rebellious provinces? Already has Yucatan raised the flag of independence. Others will follow her example, and fly off from the central power. Mexico will have enough to employ her at home, and without rushing into a desperate encounter with us. But in any event, it is the duty and policy of our Government to maintain our rights and to reserve peace, by prompt and firm measures.

REv42n81p2c2, February 10, 1846: GEN’L PAREDES’ PRONUNCIAMENTO

In the critical condition of our relations with Mexico, our readers must take an interest in every thing connected with that ill-fated, but arrogant nation. We shall, therefore, publish on Monday the “Pronunciamento” of Gen. Paredes, the newly installed President – before whose victorious march Herrera, the constitutional President, fell without a struggle. It is ably and eloquently written. It sets forth the wretched and crumbling condition of that country – but, true to the characteristic boasting and arrogance of Mexicans, it flaunts the flag of war in the face of the United States.

We have no fear of any alarming assaults by these vaunting Bobadils. In the excitement produced, last Summer, in consequence of our bloodless victory in annexing Texas, we learned how lightly to treat the “raw head and bloody bones” threats and denunciations of Mexican Generals and statesmen. We have no more fears of their present vaporings. Nor would we declare war upon them, or send our vessels of war to bombard their towns, because they have thought proper to refuse to receive our Minister, whom a previous Government had specially invited, or because our name and conduct had been traduced by their Chief. All must admit, however, that our relations with Mexico have continued too long in a nervous and uneasy state. Though we had the power to cut the Gordian knot, and dispel the excitement, we have, in our generosity, suffered this state of quasi-war to be kept up too long. We trust that our Government will promptly take the matter in hand, call upon Mexico for specific information as to her real intentions towards us, and whether she is for peace or for war. When we shall know the true grounds which she means to assume, we can then take our own course finally – a course in which we shall be justified in the eyes of God and of man. We would not crush Mexico in her weakness. We would not wield against her a giant’s strength, because we have the power, and she is on the brink of annihilation. But a due regard to our own interests, safety and quiet demands that we should break up the present entangling state of affairs and that, while we are generous to a weak people, we should be just to ourselves. No one can say whether the rumored intrigues of England, France and Spain, to place a French Prince on the Throne of Mexico, may not, if things are suffered to remain as they are, ere long become matters of history. No one can say, that a vacillating course on our part towards Mexico may not, in itself, induce European powers to thrust themselves into the controversy, and secretly to give practical effect to their famous doctrine of the “balance of power.” For the sake, then, of our future peace, and for the protection of Republican institutions against the insidious movements of the monarchists of Europe our Government should call upon Mexico for a clear and unequivocal exposition of her designs touching the unsettled difficulties between her and the United States.

The dark outline drawn by Paredes of the condition of Mexico, is applicable to nearly every one of the Spanish-American Republics. Alternate anarchy and tyranny characterize each and every one of them. As Paredes most justly and mournfully remarks of Mexico, these various States seem constantly on the verge of disruption. How different has been the progress of our own Republic. We have been peacefully extending our bounds to the South and to the West, and increasing our strength and durability by adding rich and fertile regions. Our policy and our practice have been to enlarge the Union of the States. Mexico and her Spanish American neighbors, on the contrary, since they repudiated the Spanish yoke and set up for themselves, have continually split up into crumbling and disjointed fragments. Anarchy and revolution at home, and threatened invasion from abroad, have marked their tottering career.

Doomed though Mexico may be, we would have our Government to treat her with anything but harshness. But in being charitable and generous towards Mexico, we should take care to be just to ourselves. The safety of our own institutions should overrule every other consideration.

REv42n83p2c5, February 17, 1846: MOVING TO TEXAS

News that Virginians are leaving for Texas and the expressions of general good wishes to those people.

The last Clarksville, Mecklenburg, Herald speaks of the great excitement in that country, produced by a projected movement to the new and fertile State of Texas. While we regret to see the citizens of Virginia, and from such a Democratic region too, quitting in a body their native State, to establish a new colony in a distant portion of our wide Republic, we must confess that the Herald advances some good reason, why they should turn their faces towards the great Southwest. We hope that it will not always be so. We trust to see the day, when the abandoned fields of Virginia will be cultivated with industry and success – and when the footsteps of our wandering citizens shall be turned back to their reinvigorated native State. But if our brethren of Mecklenburg will leave us for a richer soil and a more genial climate, we wish them “God speed” in their pilgrimage.

The Herald say:

“Some of our citizens are busy in forming a company for the purpose of journeying to the sunny South. We know several men of families who have pledged themselves to join the expedition – and we think they are entitled to much praise for their wise determination. This country in which we live have claims upon us scarcely to be resisted. We have friends – we have relatives – who are near and dear to us; but there is another friend for whom all others must be sacrificed – SELF. The rich landholder, whose situation is already that of plenty, would be much to blame to quit this country for any other; but we whose fortunes lie just in the palms of our hands – we, who, by the sweat of our brow, but barely receive enough to stop the mouths of our children, should better our condition if possible. It is a hard task, truly, for a man to 'make both ends meet,' who rents lands and negroes, and pays an enormous price. Such cases, when compared to our vast population, are few; but when together would, of themselves, make a nation. We learn that it is the determination of the projectors of this enterprise to settle a town in Texas, and to accomplish their object, a committee is to be appointed to proceed to Texas to hunt out a suitable site and purchase the same. There is to be a country meeting on the subject at an early day, of which due notice will be given."

RE46v43i1p1c1, May 1, 1846: MESSR. INGERSOLL AND WEBSTER.

As we wish to furnish to our readers an insight into the merits of the personal controversy now being waged between these two gentlemen, involving moreover important and delicate questions of State policy, we go back a few days, and first present the remarks of Mr. Webster delivered in the Senate on Wednesday, the 22d April, immediately after the reception by the H. of Representatives of the President's message, declining, for proper reasons, to make public the information called for in regard to the secret service fund—and at the same time stating, that the papers could be exhibited to a Committee of the House:

Mr. Webster rose and said: I have a few, and but a few, remarks to make on the President's message in answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives, calling for an account of the disbursements during the period in which I had the honor to be Secretary of State, out of the fund for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse.

In the first place, Sir, I am happy to say, that I entirely approve the course of proceeding which the President has adopted. In my judgment, he could not have acted otherwise than he has done, without the violation of law and of his own duty. Sir, as I know that not a dollar was disbursed from that fund without the sanction of the President, and as I am conscious that every disbursement was made for a proper and necessary public purpose, it might be thought that I should desire the publication of the papers, in order that every body might see what they are, or what they show. But this is a matter of so little concernment to me, (and I presume it is of as little to the late President, ) that I certainly would not wish to see an important principle, and an important law, violated and broken for any personal convenience in that respect. I am not at all apprehensive that the country will suspect either President Tyler, or me, acting under his authority, of any thing improper in the disbursement of a few hundred or a few thousand dollars, in a case in which the law reposes confidence in the President, and gives him a discretion as to making the expenditure public.

Sir, a President of the United States, or the head of a Department acting by his authority, must think but poorly of his own reputation and standing with the country, if he is afraid of being suspected of having violated his duty and his oath in a matter of so little moment. I will add, that a person who entertains such a suspicion, without reason, of any public man, may himself be well suspected of having held a no very complimentary dialogue with himself.

Sir, we all know that the head of a Department cannot touch a dollar of this fund except with the President’s sanction. The whole power and the whole responsibility is with the President. The President's Message states this so fully and clearly, that I need not dwell upon it. I will say, in the first place, that no expenditure, improper in itself, or improper in its amount, was made to my knowledge, judgment, or belief. And I will say, in the next place, that the late President of the United States, in all things respecting the expenditure of the public moneys, was remarkably cautious, exact and particular.

And I here say, Sir, that all declarations, averments, statements, or insinuations, made any where, or by any body, which impute perversion, misapplication, or waste of the public funds, committed or made by me while Secretary of State, are utterly groundless and untrue. And I will conclude with one remark, the bearing of which, I shall leave to the Senate and to the country.

Whoever charges me with having either misapplied or wasted the public funds, while in the Department of State, has either seen the papers, or has, in some other way, obtained knowledge on the subject, or he has not. If he has seen no papers, and has no knowledge, then his imputations are purely wanton and slanderous. If he has seen the papers, or has any knowledge, then he would be sure to state what he knows, if he knows any thing to sustain him in his charge. Silence, under such circumstances, is conclusive that he knows nothing, because he is under no obligation of secrecy, and, in absence of all other proof, he would, of course, tell all he knew, if he knew any thing which could, in the slightest degree, bear him out. The charge, therefore, was either made in utter ignorance of any facts to support it, or else with the knowledge that the facts which do exist would, if made known, entirely disprove it. As to the source of this miserable vituperation, I have nothing to say. I am afraid I shall be thought to have paid too much attention to it already. Sir, I leave the author of these slanders where he is—I leave him in the worst company I know of in the world—I leave him with himself.

Last Monday, in the House, Mr. C. J. Ingersoll made the follow remarks, by way of personal explanation:

Mr. Speaker: When Mr. Webster, in virulent terms, in Senate, assailed my truth, concerning transactions of which proofs ought to be in the Department of State, I went there in search of them for my vindication. As member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for some years, I have some freedom of access there, though probably none which any other member of Congress is not entitled to.

Searching for proofs, not to expose him, but vindicate myself, I fell most unexpectedly on others which led me next day, to denounce him as a delinquent.

When the President’s answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives refused certain documents, I repeated, in general assertion, the fact of his delinquency, and added that it is easily susceptible of proof. My friends advised me to go no further, supposing that Mr. Webster would challenge investigation.

Not having done so, but having again, with opprobious language, in Senate, charged me with slander, and called on me to substantiate my accusation of him, I now submit a short statement, which may be tested as to truth.

There are three charges of delinquency:

First. Unlawful use of the fund appropriated for the contingent service of foreign intercourse, commonly called the secret service fund.

Secondly. Misapplying part of that fund to corrupt party presses.

Thirdly. Leaving the Department of State in default to that fund.

First. Congress appropriates annually a small sum, commonly 30,000 dollars, for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse; the disbursement of part of which is sometimes usefully clandestine, but never, as has been erroneously supposed, corrupt. Whenever, in the President's opinion, it would be wrong to make public how any part of it is disposed of, he so certifies, and, by act of Congress, his mere certificate is sufficient voucher at the Treasury for the required settlement.

These funds have, for the last sixteen years, if not always, been in the hands of a clerk, called, by acts of Congress, the disbursing agent of the Department of State, who kept them in banks, as agent. The official routine is for the President, on the requisition of the Secretary of State, to authorize the payment of the money from the Treasury to the disbursing agent of the State Department. The disbursing agent is debited at the Treasury with the sum drawn into the Department of State, keeps it to his credit as agent, in bank, and gives checks as required by the Secretary, for payment to any person he may designate.

In this way, the first check I saw, when I went to the department, was drawn by the agent for the service at New York in McLeod's case, 1,000 dollars.

But shortly after President Harrison’s death, and before Vice President Tyler was at home in chief magistracy—in April, 1841—Mr. Secretary Webster began an entirely novel method of dealing with the secret service fund. Instead of directing the disbursing agent to pay any third person, Mr. Webster required the money to be paid to himself.

In this way he drew to himself from the disbursing agent twelve thousand dollars during the first nine months of Mr. Webster's incumbency as Secretary, about 1,300 dollars a month, in 1841, and 3,000 dollars more early in 1842.

Thus he took into his own hands 15,000 dollars in his first twelve months. The President, there is written evidence in the department to show, never authorized this, knew nothing of it, and when first apprised of it, more than fourteen months after it had been going on, to the large amount of fifteen thousand dollars, refused it his sanction.

It was not till July, 1842, as the evidence in the department shows, in Mr. Webster's handwriting, that he got a President's certificate for four thousand four hundred and sixty dollars, ($4,460.).

That President's certificate, of which I took a minute, dated 19th July, 1842, is—.

To J. J. Crittenden, for expenses of journey to New York, $100.

To F. O. J. Smith, for services connected with the North eastern Boundary, 2,000.

To Alexander Powell, for journey to, and stay on the frontier in 1841, on the subject of disturbances, 1,000.
With several other items.

The first item in this short account concerning McLeod, will show how I was led from that to other objects; and some of the other items will show the agents whom, as Secretary of State, Mrs. Webster employed. Both houses of Congress, if not the public at large, have not been left in ignorance of the characters of some of those on whom the Secretary of State bestowed large sums of public money, if their receipts correctly vouch what they got.

In a memorandum of payments to Mr. Webster, by authority of the President, there is a minute dated June 23, 1842, "By cash returned, $5,000."

After drawing $15,000 to himself during fifteen months, during which period there is no trace of what he did with those large sums, he appears to have returned one-third of the amount withdrawn. Why return it, if taken for any public purpose? Where he it been kept? If in any place of deposite, was it separate from Mr. Webster's private funds? funds? Did he use it?

These $5,000 were returned ten days after, according to the published correspondence, his negotiation with the British Envoy Extraordinary, began by conversational and confidential intercourse, without protocols or other usual records of such transactions.

In 1843 Mr. Webster took to himself $2,000 more, making altogether $17,000.

On closing his account, crediting the $5,000 returned, and various other sums, there remained a balance against him of $2,290 of the secret service fund. One of his credits against it was for $1,400, published in House document, report No. 29, first session, 28th Congress—report of Mr. Rogers, for maps, charts, surveys and expenses of bringing them to the seat of Government, and for copies of transcripts, and for various agencies to procure information connected with the boundary treaty.

This inarticulate and comprehensive mixture of many incongruous items, without specification of prices, dates, or any apparent test of rectitude, Mr. Secretary Webster certified himself as a proper credit for himself and deducted from his debit to the secret service fund. Without that credit his default to that fund would have been $3,690, instead of $2,290, which it was when he was removed from office.

The $17,000 were in his hands, contrary to the uniform usage; if used by him contrary to the sub-treasury act. Whether so, is for him to make appear. The burden of proof is on him.

Secondly: Application of the secret services fund to corrupt party presses. The Ashburton treaty bears date the 9th August, 1842. Congress were then in session; and as Mr. Adams has charged me lately, and I confess I did what little I could as one of a small minority in the House of Representatives (we had forty votes, I think, under the previous question) to resist a treaty which Mr. Webster has lately stated in the Senate granted near half a million of dollars from the treasury of the United States to the people of Maine and Massachusetts, I then desired to contend, when put down by the previous question, that the House of Representatives had a constitutional right to pass on such a treaty.

What I am now enable to add, of revelation from the Department of State, will prove that my instincts of aversion to the treaty were even truer than reason.

In the Department of State there is now a letter signed F. O. J. Smith, marked private, dated Portland, the 12th of August, 1842, addressed to Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, substantially as follows:

It begins by congratulating Mr. Webster on his settlement of the Maine boundary question by a new mode of approaching the subject, after forty years of diplomacy without which new mode another forty years of diplomacy would have come to nothing.

[Mr. F. O. J. Smith seems to have suggested the boast with which his correspondent, Mr. Webster, hugged himself in his elaborate vindication in Senate.].

Mr. Smith informs Mr. Webster by this letter, that he had occasion to resort to services and influences, in order to adjust the tone and direction of THE PARTY PRESSES, and through them of public sentiment, to a purpose so desirable of accomplishment under Mr. Webster's administration.

Mr. Smith, therefore, submits a claim or account, if I recollect right, in blank for Mr. Webster to fill up, of which he calls for payment out of the contingent fund. Mr. Smith presumes that the contingent fund will be ample, and Mr. Webster's control of it complete, to do whatever he may think just.

The sums Mr. Smith vouches as got by him from Mr. Webster are $2,000 for services connected with the North-eastern boundary, and two years after he vouches $500 more, as will be shown.

Thirdly: Leaving the Department of State in debt to the secret service fund $2,290.
The records of the department show this default beyond all denial or question.

They show, furthermore, that it was neither paid or accounted for during nearly two years after Mr. Webster's removal from office.

They show several letters sent to him by President Tyler's direction, urging payment, and evasive letters of excuse from Mr. Webster for non-payment.

At length, a peremptory letter that exposure would or might be the consequence of more delay, produced reimbursement. But settlement did not take place until the 1st February, 1845, ten days before President Polk arrived in Washington to be inaugurated, when Mr. Webster produced another voucher from Mr. F. O. J. Smith for an additional $500, and other vouchers, one from George Smith for $500.

George Smith, since dead, denied that he had ever been paid or vouched more than $150, to which sum Mr. Webster reduced the $500 at first demanded, as his agent now in Washington will prove.

Granting all the vouchers Mr. Webster produced, there was nevertheless a balance of about 1,200 dollars due from him, at all events, when he left the department. That sum he was in default to the secret service fund, after crediting every thing in the way of repayment, offset or voucher that he claimed.

In all I have said in this affair, no allusion has been made to any private aggravation. Regretting the exposure forced from me, having afforded Mr. Webster several opportunities to meet the charges in his own way, that which he chose left me no alternative but this forbearing justification of myself.

A resolution, or committee, which I cannot institute, will soon test the truth of my statements.

On a question by Mr. Hunter of Virginia, Mr. Ingersoll said that he had received no information or intimation of any sort on this subject from Mr. Trist, who was then acting Secretary of State; and on a question by Mr. Bayly of Virginia, Mr. Ingersoll repeated that he had disclaimed imputing to Mr. Tyler, late President of the United States, any fault in reference to the abuses that had been committed in this fund.

We continue a sketch of the proceedings to the end, omitting the points of order raised and decided, in endless confusion.

Mr. Ashmun of Massachusetts said, I was very confident, Mr. Speaker, that the sense of justice that prevails in this House would not preclude me from an opportunity of replying to the member from Pennsylvania. After the repeated, deliberate cold-blooded ebullitions of that gentleman here—.

The Speaker interposed to order. The gentleman from Massachusetts must avoid personalities.

Mr. Ashmun. Well, I suppose it was perfectly in order for the member from Pennsylvania to utter all sorts of abusive epithets about an absent gentleman, and that a senator, calling him by name too, and yet it is not strictly parliamentary to impute any bad motive to—.

The Speaker. The Chair has no power between present and absent gentlemen, but he has power between present gentlemen, and it must be exercised.

Mr. Ashmun, (resuming.) I intend to keep myself strictly within the rules of order. I was saying, that I was sure, after the repeated deliberate, premeditated assaults, which the member from Pennsylvania has made on the distinguished member from Massachusetts, this House would not refuse to hear a word or two in reply, and the vote of the House, just taken, has not disappointed me. I think the House, as the nation, are not only surprised, but are mortified at the scenes which have been exhibited here. The House has been denounced abroad in the press, and by the people, for its wanton violation of good taste and good manners, but I think an offence has been committed here higher than that against good taste and good manners. I think an offence has been committed against society, as well as against the reputation of this House.—Is it not a matter of mortification that this House should be the vehicle of such repeated vituperation as we have heard and witnessed? Is it not a matter of astonishment, pure and unmingled astonishment, that a member, who has lived so long in public life, and who ought to know what reputation is worth, (if indeed it is worth any thing to him,) should be willing so often, repeatedly, with words written down, to come into this House and attempt to destroy the fame of a distinguished man—a fame which is a part of the property of the people of the United States?—If he was a young member, just entering into political life, who desired to gain some fame by connecting his name with the name of the high and distinguished individual whose character he was endeavoring to traduce, it would not be so strange. The member from Pennsylvania told us the other day, that he first met Mr. Webster in public life thirty odd years ago. Well, from that time to this, has he ever received the slightest cause of offence from Mr. Webster? I appeal to the whole nation to say that, however strongly Mr. Webster has spoken of parties or of principles, all his speeches have been free from personalities. I do not believe, or know, that any, the slightest, cause of offence has been given by Mr. Webster—unless it may be that one that may rankle in his bosom; that he (Mr. W.) has left him alone, that he has fathomed enough of his character to know that it was not worth while for him to say anything about him. Sir, he has never attacked him. Why then, why then, I ask, on the 9th of February, when we had been discussing great and grave questions, involving peace and war, why then did the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, when permitted by common consent to make
Mr. Ingersoll was understood to say, that he had not said that it was paid by the Administration as a fee for the counsel of McLeod.

... and a solemn gravity that impress this House with the importance of his communication, with having written a letter...—Sir, tradition tells us of the withering, blasting attack of Mr. Stockton, in reply to the slander of that day; and that the man who uttered this slander left this hall crying like a whipped schoolboy; and I should wonder that that lesson had ever been forgotten. At least it has taught him one thing—never again to utter an attack upon a gentleman in his presence. And I believe now, as was intimated by my colleague the other day, that, sooner than he would have made this attack upon Mr. Webster, if present, he would have bitten his tongue off. But Mr. Webster is not here. He relies on his name, character, the fame of his public life, and the weak efforts of a few friends here to defend him.

Sir, this attack is but a continuation of that course of vituperation that commenced with Mr. Stockton, that followed upon Judge Marshall and the Judges of the Supreme Court, in a charge of corruption in their decision on the question of the extending of the charter of the Bank of the United States. That course of vituperation has lived till now.

The gentleman the other day, with the most bold simplicity—I might say with audacious simplicity—said that whatever thing had been said of him, he never knew before that his truth had been called in question. Now I beg to say, that the gentleman must either be very deaf or very blind, for that is the precise question that all the world make in relation to this matter. It is the truth of the charges—the slander, the vituperation, the villification which has been poured upon great men from the same course.

Sir, he is the accuser and the witness in relation to Mr. Webster. It becomes us, then, to know who the accuser is, and what is the character of the witness. He has brought us here, from the secret recesses of the State Department, certain memoranda, letters, and documents, and we are expected to take them on the credit of his veracity—his truthfulness—for no otherwise can we judge in relation to it. The President of the United States says the seal is too safe to allow him to break it, even upon the call of this House; and yet, with boldness that is unparalleled, the member from Pennsylvania stands up and says he has found out a way to get into these secret archives, and he comes here and asks us and the nation to believe he has told the truth in relation to this matter.

Now, what, then, says the accuser and the witness in this case? Why, on the 9th of February, he made five or six specific charges against Mr. Webster. He charged him in the most imposing manner, and with a shake of the finger, and a solemn gravity that impress this House with the importance of his communication, with having written a letter marked “private” to the Governor of New York, with certain contents; with having sent it by express. And he said the next step taken by the administration, of which Mr. Webster was a member, was to procure to be employed, as counsel for McLeod, a gentleman who was lately removed from the office of district attorney in New York, and that a fee of five thousand dollars was put into his hands for that purpose.

Now, these were specific charges. All of them have been proved false. It is true that a private letter was sent; but not by express. Why, then, did the gentleman get up here and declare the circumstantial manner in which this letter was sent in order to make the House think it a matter of great importance?.

Mr. Ingersoll, (in his seat.) Did I say it was sent by express?

Mr. Ashmun. I think so.

Mr. Ingersoll. I remember I did not.

Mr. Ashmun, (continuing.) And when he says, with that child-like simplicity, that he never knew his truth called in question, that is an excellent consideration to be looked at in this connexion.

Well, he did state that a fee of 5,000 dollars had been put into the hands of the gentleman, late district attorney. Has that not been proved false?.

Mr. Ingersoll, (in his seat.) True.

Mr. Ashmun. “True!” Sir, there is not one word of truth in it. On the contrary, if the gentleman undertakes to bolster up his former statements by the evidence produced this morning, it entirely fails to show that any money was paid by the Administration as a fee for the counsel of McLeod.

Mr. Ingersoll was understood to say, that he had not said that it was paid by the Administration.
Mr. Ashmun. I am not afraid of this interjectional conversation; for the more this matter is stirred, the more truth will be elicited.

The gentleman says he did not say that it was paid by the Administration. I put it to the honest sense of this House, if it was not so stated as to be understood that it was paid by the Administration?

Mr. Ashmun. I did not put it to you. I put it to the honest sense of this House.

Well, he says that a note was written by Mr. Webster to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for a minister to go to Great Britain to settle the Oregon question. Well, if he did so, I think the 51 degrees 40 minutes men should be glad that he moved so early. But this is only important as to the matter of truth. Mr. Webster says that he did not send a note. It is true that a verbal communication with Mr. Adams, or Mr. Cushing, or both took place. So far I admit the statement, and give the member from Pennsylvania the credit of having told one truth in the whole. And it reminds me of an ancedone of an Indian, who came by a farmer's house, desirous of getting something to drink. Knowing that the farmer was rather surly and tight-fisted, he told the farmer that he had just come by the bend of the brook, where was a tree, and that a deer was feeding by that tree.—"and now," says he, "give me something to drink for this information.” The farmer now complied with his request, and was off with his rifle after the deer. He got there and found the tree, and the bend of the brook, but no deer.—Upon coming back he denounced the Indian for deceiving him. "Well," says the Indian, "did you not find a brook and a tree? Well, did I not tell you two truths to one lie?" Now the gentleman gets up here and says—although I know the word "lie is not parliamentary—.

Mr. B. Martin rose to a point of order.

Mr. Ashmun resumed. I did not intend to apply that term to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. His were mistakes and if he has one accuracy to five mistakes, it is doing pretty well.

Well, these charges were denounced as false, and proved, as I said, false. There was no attempt on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to prove them to be true; and the gentleman says under these circumstances he went to the State Department in search of further materials. Well, sir, it was very natural, if he had the free run of the State Department, that he should go there; that, following the bent of his inclination, he should get all the means in his power to traduce Mr. Webster.

But now the question comes before this House and the nation—and it is an important question in judging of the witness and the accuser—by what means, foul or fair—how has this pretended information been extracted from the secretary-chives of the State Department? Why, Sir, the House made a solemn call by a majority of this body upon the President to furnish this information from the State Department. The President of the United States, in a solemn message addressed to this House, refused to communicate the information. The President stated, that the laws and the Constitution, and the oath he had taken, imposed upon him a duty which forbade him to expose to any eye any thing contained in that Department. He said there was a seal of confidence upon it that he could not break; that this House could not require him to break, unless it was in a case of impeachment; and yet the member from Pennsylvania stands up here, with a boldness most admirable, and says he has been prowling there, that he knows what is there, and that he has got there all this information which he has communicated to this House. Now, I want to know how he got there. The President says there is a seal of obligation, of confidence, upon this Department. Who broke that seal? He exempts the Secretary of State and the President, he says. I exempt them. I have no idea that the honorable men had any thing to do with that transaction. Was it some underling in that Department, that has been a pander upon this occasion? If assisted by anybody, it must have been by an underling, for I say no honorable man would have any connection with the subject.—Who furnished him with a key? Or did he take one from his own picket? Or did he pick the lock to ascertain what was contained in the secret archives of the Department? Who was the guilty man? If the gentleman does not reveal him, the responsibility is upon him, (Mr. I.)—He broke into the State Department where he had no right to go—knowing that he had no right to go. Has there been anybody removed from office in the State Department for breach of confidence? Has the gentleman, as a member of the administration party communicated to the Executive the foul agent? No, he takes the responsibility; he chooses to shield the conspirator, if there is any; it is upon him. And he admits he has gone and broken in where the President says he had no right to go, and where this House has no right to go. Now the gentleman states, this morning, that these documents are in possession of one of the clerks of this Department.—Dare the gentleman rise in his place and state who that clerk is? Was it he?

Well, the gentleman described to us how he “stumbled upon this information to his entire amazement.” And for my life, I could not but think it was like a man who has feloniously broken into a house for one thing and stumbles upon another, and, after laying his hands upon all he can get, decamps and sets fire to the house. It did seem to me so stealthlike, groping about where he had no right to be, doing injury, and lighting upon information which he says surprised him.

I have something important (he continued) in relation to the character of the witness. Well, it is by these means he avows before the world he has procured the means of uttering this accusation against the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. Now, in judging of the character of the witness and accuser, you must always take into consideration, to some extent, the position he has assumed upon the trial. He has brought against the Senator from Massachusetts...
Mr. J. R. Ingersoll interposed (Mr. Ashmun yielding the floor) and said: I regret the necessity which constrains me to take any part whatever in this proceeding. From the beginning it has been to me a cause of much pain; and I have carefully refrained from everything in connexion with it, except when duty has required that I should give a vote. I have voted, and I have done no more. In relation to the particular statement now made, I am not at liberty to preserve silence. Thus far the controversy has been one in which my feelings of affectionate relationship were alone concerned. A different situation is now created. I was counsel for the district attorney in the suit with the U. States. On the trial of the cause, I was his only counsel. I know, Mr. Speaker—I well know—the facts connected with the case. They were such as did not, for a moment, that I have ever heard, excite a suspicion of official or personal delinquency on the part of the individual concerned in them. He had lone held the office of district attorney. Very large sums of money had, during a course of years, passed through his hands. It was interesting to himself, and, as might have been supposed, it was scarcely less interesting to the government that his accounts should be settled. He endeavored repeatedly, and for a length of time, to bring about a settlement. His efforts were fruitless. No adjustment was made. He could not, in the nature of the thing, bring suit against the Government, or otherwise compel what he so much desired, and so anxiously sought. He, therefore, with the advice of counsel, gave notice to the proper department that he had some funds in his hands, and that he would require suit to be brought against him as the only means of effecting a full and final settlement, and that in the mean time the fund should be invested for the benefit of the United States. Suit was brought. An account of items was exhibited, amounting to more than a million of dollars, which had been officially required to exhibit voucher for the payment of them to the proper authority. He did so with entire clearness, and to the satisfaction of the judge and jury. A balance of between three and four thousand dollars remained, and a verdict was found accordingly. The conduct of the district attorney during the whole transaction was, in my estimation, perfectly honorable, and I have never, that I recollect, until this moment, heard a suggestion from any quarter to the contrary.

It has been in a collateral manner only—one known especially to myself—that I have felt myself at liberty, and under an obligation, to interpose. It is my intention, from motives that will meet with unhesitating response—motives of peculiar delicacy—to refrain as much as possible in the future, as I have done in the past, from taking any part in this controversy.

Mr. Ashmun resumed. I yielded with the utmost cheerfulness to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, whose near relation to the other gentleman from Pennsylvania entitles him to be heard, and whose high and honorable character entitles him to belief, as far as he states facts. So far as his opinions may be influenced by the delicate position in which he stands to the other gentleman, I leave for the House to decide.

But, in relation to these facts, I agree that the gentleman from Pennsylvania did urge time and again a settlement—a suit to be commenced—and, when that suit was commenced, its result was, that judgment was rendered against him for nearly 4,000 dollars, and that balance was not paid up until two years afterwards. The gentleman says, in his opinion, his whole course was highly honorable. I leave it for the House, for the world, to judge in relation to his bringing 651 cases out of one transaction—out of which he sought to accumulate a monstrous amount as an offset to the charges of the treasury against him.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll (in his seat.) Did you read the printed testimony in that document? Mr. Ashmun. It is of two students in the district attorney’s office. A certificate furnished years afterwards by the foreman of the grand jury. Did not every lawyer know that the grand jury were directed, instructed, counselled in their course by the advice of the district attorney?

But I leave this matter, with the facts of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which are all true, and with the opinions he has pronounced; and I ask the House and the world to pronounce upon these facts. Sir, for what was it that on the immediate accession of General Jackson to office, this district attorney was tumbled head and heels out of office? Gen. Jackson scented it out; his keen sagacity hit upon it, and he was immediately displaced.

Well, now, under such circumstances, and from such a source, these charges come. What are the charges? Charges of peculation—charges upon Mr. Webster of the personal use of this fund. Now, no proof has been produced to sustain the truth of his charge. It has not been sustained by one particle of evidence that the gentleman has undertaken to state to the House, that that secret service fund was taken possession of by Mr. Webster. The House knows that it is utterly impossible, that it cannot be true; that that fund is under the direction and control of the President, and can only be obtained on the certificate of the President, and when I saw the little by play by which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Bayly] called upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania to exempt Mr. Tyler from any connexion with this transaction, I understood it perfectly well, and I know equally well that Mr. Tyler has said, and now says, that not one dollar was expended but under his direction. And I know, further, the insidious efforts that have been resorted to, to get Mr. Tyler to take ground on this subject against Mr. Webster.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll. By me? Mr. Ashmun. Yes.

Mr. Ingersoll. It is utterly false.

The Speaker rapped to order.

Mr. Ingersoll (still standing and continuing his sentence.) It is a lie; the lie of a coward.

Mr. Ashmun (resuming.) Yes, the aged Pennsylvanian—.

Mr. Ingersoll (interposing.) I am quite young enough.

Mr. Ashmun. Yes; the aged Pennsylvanian comes here to use language towards me which he supposes can provoke a personal conflict. I come from a section of country where they neither believe in duelling, bowie-knives, nor pistols. We are neither afraid of them nor do we use them.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll (in his seat.) Nor of getting drunk?.

Mr. Ashmun (continuing.) The member from Pennsylvania supposed by using that phrase he would disturb my equanimity. If he chooses to try whether I am afraid, let him try and he will find out.

I stated that insidious efforts have been made to induce Mr. Tyler to take ground on this subject against Mr. Webster. I believe when the gentleman first found he was to be disappointed in the proof, that efforts were made by him, or at least with his connivance, for this purpose. And it has been stated in the public papers that certain gentlemen were requested to do so. I will not vouch for all that is said in the papers; but when I have seen the means resorted to—that the secret archives of the Government have been broken into for obtaining the means of detracting, I am at liberty to state all I know in relation to other efforts.

I come back, Mr. Speaker, to the charge that Mr. Webster has used the public funds. The gentleman says seventeen thousand dollars.—Where is the proof? It rests entirely upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania. He says he has obtained it; and in so saying, he admits his own shame; that he has been were he has no right to be. He professed to read what he called a letter. How much of that was his own comments, and how much the true letter we do not know.—It purports to be fore the corruption of the press.—Well, I beg the gentleman to answer how much money it will take to buy up the Democratic press of Maine. Even if a thousand or two of dollars had been used by Mr. Tyler and Mr. Webster for the purpose of circulating information among the people of Maine, so as to bring them to agree upon a conventional boundary, of the justice of which they were satisfied, Mr. A. considered it no worse than the giving the public printing to editors of the political press. But was this corrupting the public press? It is all idle, said he. There is not the slightest evidence of it, except the mere statement of the member from Pennsylvania.
How much that is worth, I leave the House to decide.

Sirs, this embraces substantially all the charges made by the member. It have not time to go more particularly into details. He has again written a communication on this subject, which will probably receive notice elsewhere. I have said all I intended to say. I have endeavored to discharge what I conceive to be my duty—to hold up this odious slander before the community for their disgust and their contempt. And although I know, until humanity is somewhat purified, there will be some that will countenance the member from Pennsylvania in the avaricious vilification he has pursued, yet I do believe that men of all parties—gentlemen of honor—high-minded gentlemen who hold the character of our public men to be part of the public property, will do full justice to all parties in relation to this accusation; that they will fix upon its author the mark of reprobation and condemnation which will stand uneffaced until repentance—long, deep and sincere—shall have claimed mercy for him.

Mr. Schenck offers the following resolution;

Whereas this House, on the 9th day of April instant, passed a resolution, which is in the words and terms following:
"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be furnished to this House an account of all payments made on President's certificates from the fund appropriated by law through the agency of the State Department, for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse since the 4th day of March, 1841, until the retirement of Daniel Webster, from the Department of State, with copies of all entries, letters, receipts, vouchers, memorandums, or other evidence of such payments, to whom paid, for what, and particularly all concerning the North Eastern Boundary dispute with Great Britain. Also copies of whatever communications were made from the Secretary of State during the last session of the 27th Congress, particularly February, 1843, to Mr. Cushing and Mr.
Adams, members of the Committee of this House on Foreign Affairs, of the wish of the President of the United States to institute a special mission to Great Britain. Also copies of all letters on the books of the Department of State to any officer of the United States, or any person in New York, concerning Alexander McLeod. Provided that no document or matter is requested to be furnished by the foregoing resolution, which, in the opinion of the President, would improperly involve the citizen or subject of any foreign power," which said resolution was communicated to the President of the United States: And whereas, the President, on the 20th day of April instant, communicated to this House his reply to said resolution, in which he declined to disclose, or furnish any information in regard to the expenditure of the secret service fund, assigning, among other reasons, the following: that if the President may answer the present call, he must answer similar calls for every such expenditure of a confidential character, made under every Administration, in war and in peace, from the organization of the Government to the present period; that to break the seal of confidence imposed by law, and heretofore uniformly preserved, would be subversive of the very purpose for which the law was enacted, and might be productive of the most disastrous consequences, and that the expenditures of this confidential character, it is believed, were never before sought to be made public, and he should greatly apprehend the consequences of establishing a precedent which would render such disclosures thereafter inevitable.

And whereas Charles Jared Ingersoll, a member of this House, and one of the representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, has this day declared to this House, in his place here, that he is in possession of, or has had access to, the information in relation to the expenditure of the secret service fund which was asked for in said resolution, and refused to the House, or of some portion thereof, with proof and documents in relation thereto, and has disclosed the same to the House and to the public, and the said Ingersoll avers that he found or procured the said information from the Department of State, therefore.

Resolved, That a Select Committee of five members to be appointed to inquire how the seal of confidence imposed by law, heretofore uniformly preserved in relation to the expenditure of said secret fund, has come to be broken; and how the said Charles J. Ingersoll has obtained the information which he has communicated to this House and to the public, and through whose agency such information has been procured; whether by the act of said Ingersoll himself, or by any officer of any department of this Government: And if by a member, then, whether he does not deserve, by such conduct, punishment by the House, and whether in such transaction there has not been an offence committed against the dignity and privileges of the House: And that the said Committee have power to send for persons and papers; and the they report to the House as soon as practicable the result of their investigation.

Mr. Pettit moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

"And that another select committee of five be appointed, to inquire into the truth of the charges this day made in this House by Mr. C. J. Ingersoll against Mr. Daniel Webster, with a view to founding an impeachment against said Daniel
Mr. Pettit’s amendment was agreed to, and the resolution adopted—so that two select committees will have to be appointed.

RE46v43i1p1c6, May 1, 1846: Thursday Morning, April 30, 1846.

The Whig papers, aroused by the unexpected gains in a number of Democratic counties, and our divisions, raise the cry that the Whigs have gained ground, and the Democratic party is losing the confidence of the people—that Mr. Polk’s course on the Oregon question, the proposed modification of the Tariff, and Sub-treasury, have operated upon the public mind of Virginia, and produced a reaction.

The reverse may justly be said to be the case. It is not our weakness, but our strength, which has perilled our success. In November, 1844, the Democracy swept the State so victoriously—last Spring, they wrested from the Whigs so many doubtful counties, that they were tempted to try experiments with their luck. Instead of organizing and concentrating their strength upon single candidates in the Northwest, they divided their votes upon several candidates, and the most thorough Democratic counties will have the mortification to be misrepresented by Whigs. Aided by these foolish antics in our ranks, and by the double-voting which has secured them several counties, the Whigs have run us much closer than they themselves had any idea of, or than we expected—for we have, all along, feared the effects of a want of concentration, especially in the West. The Whig paper in Raleigh, referring to the Virginia Elections, said it expected a defeat, for Virginia had never “gone right,” (that is, voted for the Whigs,) save “by accident.” It was this “accident” alone that we feared. We felt, and we now feel, that Virginia is more strongly Democratic than ever. At the late elections, had the parties been fairly arrayed against one another, even with the disadvantage of double votes and the general apathy, we should have carried the Legislature by as large a majority as last year. Eastern Virginia has done her duty. It is in the North-west that we have lost so many counties, because our friends were so strong, that they cut up their forces, and were captured by the enemy. They have learned a lesson, we hope, which will cause them hereafter to act with an unbroken front. In that case, they are invincible.

RE46v43i1p2c2, May 1, 1846: To the Hon. EDWARD BURLESON, President of the Senate of the State of Texas:

SIR—I cannot leave the seat of Government of your State, without returning my most grateful and respectful acknowledgments to the body over which you preside, for the very distinguished honor they have done me, by adopting with an unanimity which greatly enhances its value, a resolution expressive of the gratitude of the people of Texas for my early friendship to the country, my defence of the character of its people in the Legislature of South Carolina, and (as the Senate is pleased to say,) for my ability and success in procuring a recognition of your independence by some of the principal powers of Europe.

With whatever ability my negotiations may have been conducted, I will not be guilty of the absurd affectation of saying that I do not feel that I have a just claim to the residue of the applause which you have so generously accorded. Yes, sir, I was your early and fast friend when you Star rose over the surface of these verdant prairies, full of the light reflected from your arms.—South Carolina had just emerged out of the fearless struggle, which single-handed she waged, against the whole Union, in defence of the Constitution of the United States, as expounded by him who drew the Declaration of Independence, and those principles of free trade which are at once the vital element and just reward of human industry.

I confess that I flung myself, without scarcely a moment’s relaxation, from the toils of a distinguished post, which I had occupied in my own State, with an irrepressible enthusiasm in your cause. Independently of the just sympathy I felt in your heroic struggle, I could not but venture to anticipate that what we had contended for in South Carolina was to be realized in the auspicious fortunes which were dawning on your country.

My purse, pen and tongue, in the exercise of all the faculty of speech with which God had endowed me, were dedicated to your service. My arm would not have been wanting (feeble as it may have been) if the reapers whom you sent down to the harvest of death, at San Jaeinto, had left a single enemy to subdue or a single garland to be won. But valor had left nothing for ambition to glean.

Of the events connected with my civil and foreign services to the late Republic, I am admonished both of the propriety and delicacy of my being brief. Such as they were, they were rendered with fidelity and zeal. The recognition of your independence by Great Britain gave you the sovereign faculty of making the compact of annexation which you have consummated with the Government of the United States. You, are, doubtless, aware that many millions of your public domain had been mortgaged by the Government of Mexico to the British bond holders; and but for the recognition of Great Britain of your power in contract treaties and form alliances, some very delicate questions might have risen, or some new or complicated points of public law, which the sword alone could have solved.
And here you will permit me to offer some explanation of an apparent inconsistency that I, who had been so strenuous an advocate for the recognition of your sovereignty and independence by other nations, should subsequently have been an ardent champion for their being merged (at least in a qualified sense) in the government of this confederacy.

I have never had an opportunity of giving this explanation. I will now do it briefly and explicitly. On my visit to Europe in 1842, after I had ceased to have any official connexion with your Government, I satisfied myself, from the course of public opinion there, that Texas, independent, would soon become the fulcrum on which the lever of European politics would be planted; that our of the Union the vast preponderance of European emigrants coming into her territory would separate her in sympathy and affection from the people of the United States; that in less than a quarter of a century, her interests would be played against those of our now common country, and that she would soon become the Flanders of the North American States, at once an object and theatre for the struggles, ambition and policy of other States. On my return from Europe, passing through Washington in the autumn of 1842, I communicated these views to PresidentTyler, and found they had been anticipated by his own patriotism, sagacity and just ambition. Now that annexation has been consummated, and the grave has closed over the bright and unfinished labors of the lamented and highly gifted Upshur, I may say, without violating the semblance of confidence, that my private correspondence with the gentleman on this subject, would more entirely sustain the opinions which I have thus ventured to give you a hasty sketch. These opinions may not have belonged to the comprehensive views of a statesman, who looks far into futurity, but I believe they will find a response in every American bosom.

In reference to the subject of my pecuniary negotiations for your Government, I have but a few words to say: Money is undoubtedly a very pleasant thing to possess, but it is rather a stale and flat subject to write about. It is sufficient to say, that I never negotiated a loan for your, except at par, when your paper was at a heavy discount in the stock market of the United States, and what is far better, I have, in obedience to your order filed my accounts with the Comptroller of your Treasury, accounting for every farthing I ever received. My contract with Messrs. Laffite & Co. of Paris, in 1841, has been grossly misrepresented by those who never read that contract. It was a financial projet, drawn, as I have reason to believe, out by James Laffite, that valiant champion of liberty, and distinguished Banker, to convert, eventually, 37 millions of money certificates into land warrants, at seven francs per acre. This measure was defeated by the perfidy and injustice of the French Minister of Finance, without, as I have the best reasons to think, consulting his Government, and I believe, with the regret of the enlightened King of the French, and his highly accomplished Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Guizot, of whom nothing more need be said, than that his great public and private virtues are on a level with his distinguished genius. But enough of this subject.

It has given me infinite pain to appear before your Legislature, holding and representing, as I do, large claims against your Government. In reference to the former, if the interests of others were not involved, I do not know that, in the self-sacrificing affection of my children, I would not have found a justification so entirely in harmony with my own inclination in abstaining from presenting them. But in reference to the claims of others, whom I induced, in the darkest hours of your fortunes, to adventure their money in your service, I have a higher duty to perform—a duty which I could not neglect, without infidelity to them and dishonor to myself.

That Texas has both the willingness and the ability to pay every debt, which a fair and equitable examination can be justly brought against her, cannot be doubted by those who have any knowledge of her intelligent population and of her public resources; and as the best means of meeting the legitimate demands of her creditors, permit me (who like yourselves is a land holder, free holder and tax payer in Texas) to suggest the policy of transferring your public lands to the Government of the United States upon such terms as would place the character and credit of your State upon lofty grounds, and secure to her an immediate prosperity. The public domain now an inert mass, far too unwieldy for the State Government to handle, would become, under such arrangement, a source of value and beneficial usefulness to yourselves and the whole Union.—Their purchase by the United States, is a great measure of national policy, which has no more to do with the assumption of State debts than the purchase of Louisiana from France, necessarily involved an assumption of her revolutionary assignats.

It is wholly immaterial what ordinances of annexation the United States may have passed, they cannot take your Custom Houses, appropriate to themselves its revenues, with all the attributes which belong to the sovereign faculty of indirect taxation, without providing for debts, for which those very revenues were pledged; when, therefore, you propose to surrender your domain for the purpose of paying your public debt, you make a gratuitous concession to the sacred object of your public faith equally creditable to your honor and integrity.

With a renewed assurance of my gratitude to your honorable body for the distinguished compliment they have paid—I am, with greatest respect, your ob’t serv’t, JAMES HAMILTON.

[BWP]
PARLIAMENTARY. Three months have nearly elapsed since the tariff was introduced, and the measure still lingers in the House of Commons. It was vehemently opposed on its introduction by the enemies of free trade, and respective of extraneous delays, the protectionists showed anxiety enough to procrastinate its final triumph.

The fight about the tariff ceased, and the still more fierce wrangle about the "Curfew Bill" commenced. In this humor the House separated, ready, with renewed arder, to begin the conflict when it meets again. Sir Robert Peel states that the Irish Bill will be taken up again on the re-assembling of Parliament, and passed to a first reading.

Arrived at that stage, the Corn Bill, which stands committed to Monday week, will be once more on the tapis, , presse to a third reading, and sent to the Lords for acceptance or rejection. Had it not been for the fastidious deterence to the Peers, which induced Sir Robert to shelve his pet measure of Commercial Reform, for the purpose of discussing the odious Coercion Bill, the former healing measure would, ere this, have passed through its legislative formulas in the lower House, and the Peers would have been in a position to say aye or not to it.

ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.

We repeat most emphatically that the only line of conduct to be feared by England is the plausibilities involved in the laissez aller system. The clear perception of this has made us true prophets, and Mr. Calhoun a formidable antagonist.

It is the right policy for America. It was so from the first. It was only exceptionable on the score of its being unintelligible. When first promulgated the feelings of the people and the prejudices of the people were against it. The North was distrustful, the West ambitious. A change has since come upon them. Action has engendered re-action—that is one thing. Free Tariffs have engendered commercial interests—that is another.

The true appreciation of the apparently pacific position of England has engendered a valuation of the chances of war, as well as of the blessings of peace—this is the third and best point.—One with another, these elements in American calculation are beginning to make Mr. Calhoun intelligible, even in Ohio and Missouri.

The only policy formidable to England is Mr. Calhoun's; and it is formidable simply because it encourages the natural nonchalance of Great Britain. The Hudson's Bay Company is a strong company; so strong that it consists of the stronger sex only.

The American squatter takes his wife with him. The child follows. The different character of the immigration will make all the difference ten years hence.—Leave it till then. So says Mr. Calhoun; and for a Malthusian American he says rightly.

The sine die policy is Mr. Calhoun's. Can we in England meet it? At present we are the strongest within the Oregon; or, illustrating the distinction within rules, the constabulary is stronger than the thievedom.

But let the thieves multiply—what will happen then? Just what Mr. Calhous reckons on—an unequal battle ten years hence. The sinc die doctrine, if ever admitted in England, must be met with an antagonistic one—the pari passu policy. What they do in the way of immigration, let us do likewise.

The 54-40 doctrine is a mere stalking-horse. Facilis descensus—a imaginary point of right, created for the occasion of making the appearance of a descent. By letting themselves down from a fictitious position, the Americans take the credit of making concessions.

Mr. Calhoun's speech has had the effect of reducing the question to it generalities. The sense of the country, (so says the press,) "will be taken upon the latitudes 49 and 54 40." Latitude enough. On the question itself, however, there is no sense to be taken.

Pending, however, the processes of reasoning, which the country undergoes in making up its mind between the two parallels, (between the impossible whole and the equitable half) negotiations are to cease. So much the better, always assuming the pari passu system on the side of England.00[Morning Chronicle.

RE46v43i1p2c4, May 1, 1846: OREGON.

The article in the last number of the Quarterly Review, on the subject of Oregon, is beginning to attract attention, now that the hubbub, arising out of the Indian victories, is fast subsiding. The gist of the article is to promote a compromise, and the reviewer would be content with the 49th parallel.

We have contended from the first that any fair settlement of the dispute would be hailed with avidity by the English people, in order to avoid the horrible consequences which an appeal to force would produce; and the semi-official color of the article to which we allude, embodying the feelings of the great Conservative party on the subject, is cumfermatory of our views.
The arrival at Havre with New York papers to the 18th ult., brings the debates in Congress, on this subject, three weeks later than the previous packet. The ultra Oregon men appear to be losing ground, and the general feeling of the country, as well as of Congress, leaves little to apprehend now from belligerent results. Indeed, it is generally believed here that the dispute is virtually settled. We sincerely hope that this is not an assumption, but a fact. Wilmer & Smith’s European Times.

RE46v43i1p2c3, May 1, 1846. [Correspondence of the N. Y. Journal of Commerce.] WASHINGTON, Saturday, April 25.

It will be the fault of the British Government, if a treaty be not made on the Oregon question in sixty days from this time. If it is wise, it will avail itself of the ebb tide here, and offer terms at once, while they can be accepted. Whatever terms may be offered, the President will submit for the advice of the Senate. If they are too exacting, the Senate will show an undivided front in opposition to it; and, after that, there will be but one party to the question in this country.

If the British Government wait, after the Notice, for the action of Congress on the Oregon bill—if, for any reason, they continue their reserve, they may lose the opportunity of a pacific and liberal adjustment. The present unexpectedly moderate policy and measure of the Senate, on this subject, cannot be expected to continue beyond the present session. The temper of the people would not permit it.

The Senate would now undoubtedly advise that the country be divided by forty-nine and the Straits of Fuca; and they might even be willing to consent to concede to Great Britain the navigation of the Columbia river for half a century.

There are some reasons, as it is understood, for the opinion that the British Government will make an overture, or accept one of a reasonable kind.

The President, it is understood, will send out the Notice by the packet of the 1st of May. He will not make an overture, but he will accompany it with an expression of his wish for an amicable and speedy adjustment of the question, repeating, perhaps, the assurance on that subject which he gave through Mr. Buchanan, in the last correspondence with the British Minister.

RE46v43i1p3c2, May 1, 1846: From the N. Y. Journal of Commerce of Wednesday.

THE OREGON CONTROVERSY SETTLED.

By Last Evening’s Mail.

By last night’s mail we received no New York papers, but find the following in a P. S. of yesterday’s Baltimore American. While we do not put great confidence in its statements, we learn from Washington that the news by the Great Western is regarded as pacific. We give it for what it is worth—expressing our surprise that the Journal of Commerce, generally a coop paper, should speak with so much warmth and confidence. There may be some probability of the prospective realization of the settlement described:

Letters by the Great Western, from high sources, say that the Oregon question is settled, and give the details, viz: latitude 49 to the Straits of Fuca, and thence through said Straits to the Pacific, leaving the whole of Vancouver’s Island to Great Britain, the navigation of the Columbia for a term of years, &c. We understand the fact to be, that the arrangement made through the medium of several gentlemen in Washington, and which we announced perhaps two months ago, but which was retarded by the uncourteous manner in which the offer of arbitration was rejected, has now been recognized and confirmed. The forms of diplomacy will be gone through with at Washington, as we presume—for the formal negotiation has never by our Government been committed to Mr. McLane, though the generous confidence existing between him and Lord Aberdeen has doubtless enabled him to render important aid in bringing the controversy to a favorable issue.

The President, we have reason to know, is ready and will be prompt to accept the terms stated above, and the Senate not less prompt in confirming what he does. Let the dogs of war bawl and go to 54 40—the prey has escaped them. The "national heart" needs not now to "be prepared for war."

The paragraph from a Liverpool paper of the 11th, mentions the above intelligence as having been rumored on Change, but does not speak confidently of its correctness. Our regular correspondent writes us, under date of the 10th instant, that the war party in England, as well as here, was completely down; but he does not appear to have been aware that the terms of an arrangement had been agreed on.

[BWP]
A communication was received from the Secretary of War, transmitting the information recently called for, in relation to the copper mines on Lake Superior.

Mr. Jarnagin, in pursuance of notice, introduced his joint resolution to establish a home board to adjust the claims of our citizens against Mexico. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The preamble to the resolution, after setting forth the conduct of Mexico, says that our Government has now no other alternative but to make a peremptory demand for settlement.

On motion of Mr. Morehead, the Committee on the Library was instructed to inquire into the expediency of distributing the copies of the American Archives belonging to the Government among the Literary Institutions of the country.

The Senate then took up the bill granting alternate sections of the public domain to aid in the completion of certain works of Internal Improvement in the State of Michigan.

Mr. Calhoun said it was not only the right, but the duty of the Government to afford aid to works running through the public lands, by which the value of those lands would be enhanced.

Mr. Niles opposed the bill and expressed his surprise at the new doctrine to which the Senator from South Carolina had so recently become a convert.

Mr. Calhoun denied that he had become a recent convert to any new doctrine, but that he had acted upon the principles he now declared upon many occasions.

The debate was continued by Messrs. Cass, Niles, Breese, Westcott, Archer, J. M. Clayton, Woodbridge, and Benton.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. Speight gave notice that he should offer a bill of a similar nature to-morrow.

The Senate then adjourned.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Burt of S. C. in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill to establish the “Smithsonian Institution.”

Mr. Hamlin, of Me., addressed the Committee in favor of the bill, and in opposition to the substitute offered by Mr. Adams. He had no doubt about the constitutional power of Congress to accept the trust, and he hoped the present opportunity would not be suffered to pass, without some steps being taken to carry into effect the expressed design of the testator. Mr. H. contended that the money should properly be considered in the Treasury, and that it could not rightfully be any where else. He suggested some modifications of the bill, but would support any measure that would give a start to the noble design of Mr. Smithson.

The debate was continue by Messrs. Wood of N.Y., Giles of Md., and Wick of Ia., until the expiration of the hour, when the Committee proceeded to vote upon the various amendments which had been offered.

After spending some three hours in acting upon the amendments, the Committee finally adopted a substitute for the whole bill, proposed on the 21st inst. By Mr. Hough of N.J., with some modifications, and reported the same to the House.

The bill as amended was then passed—yeas 85, nays 76.

The House then adjourned.
In order to bring about a perfect and secure confidence of a speedy settlement of the Oregon question, the N. Y. Evening Post suggests that the Government should “despatch to England some able man enjoying the confidence of the country, such a clear-headed, persuasive and universally acceptable envoy, for example, as Silas Wright, charged with the mission of adjusting the dispute on such a basis as would be satisfactory to the mass of the American people.” The same paper makes the following additional remarks. While we would perhaps go with the writer in allowing to British subjects certain commercial privileges for a term of years, we cannot see the propriety or the necessity of our Government making the first overture. The British Government must be satisfied, through the representations of Mr. Pakenham, that no party in this country would consent to a surrender of an inch of territory South of the 49th degree. On this platform the most fiery advocate of war and the most timid friend of peace, stand, side by side, ready to draw the sword, rather than yield an inch farther. The declarations of the British press indicate that Great Britain is willing to take the first step in the renewed negotiation. She knows our views, and will probably tender such terms as she thinks we can honorably accept. Our position will be sensibly weakened, if, under the circumstances, we exhibit too anxious a desire to settle the question, by making the first offer. The giving the “notice,” will be evidence, strong enough, that we wish a speedy and amicable adjustment. That step taken by us, the first offer will come with propriety from Great Britain:

“The notice will, we suppose, be given promptly. The President has the consent of the Senate, that the time and expediency of giving the notice shall be left to his discretion, and the desire of the House of Representatives, a body in closer relation to public opinion than the Senate, has been expressed by its vote that he should give it immediately.

“The giving of the notice will make an early adjustment of the dispute necessary. For that purpose, negotiations must be renewed, and it matters very little from whom the first overtures come. Nor is it necessary, in our view, that the settlement of this dispute should be made to depend merely on the right of territory. The Hudson’s Bay Company has drawn from their trade in furs, now carried on in Oregon, a prodigious revenue, the desire to retain which perhaps, as much as any other cause, has made Britain slow to consent even to a partition of the territory. But this trade must gradually decline, and in a few years come to an end, as the animals who are hunted for their furs decrease in number. It is probable that if we were to allow British subjects certain commercial rights in the territory for a term of years, the difficulties in the way of a settlement would be considerably diminished.

“This view of the matter might furnish, we venture to suggest, an opportunity on our part of re-opening the negociations, without receding one inch from the ground our Government has taken. That the British Government does not desire to go to war with us for Oregon, is manifest enough, not merely to those who reflect on the consequences of such a step to herself, but to those who have observed the manner in which the subject is treated in quarters, to which we look for an indication of the intentions of that Government. A certain amount of bluster and insolence must always be expected in British journals, whenever there is any collision of interests, apparent or real, between their own country and any other; but from this, no inference can well be drawn, one way or the other. But the article in the Quarterly Review, to which we alluded the other day, as well as other indications, seems to show that the British Government is no3w prepared to assent to a settlement of the dispute, on terms considerably short of its previous demands.”[BWP]

RE46v43i1p4c3, May 1, 1846: No title.

The following is the substance of a report made by the Select Committee of the House of Representatives of the Texas Legislature, on the subject of the public debts and public lands of Texas. It had not been finally acted upon, and was expected to produce a violent discussion. It is said that Gen. J. Hamilton has recommended the measure:

Resolved, That our delegation in Congress be requested, and authorized forthwith, to open a negotiation with the Government of the United States, in such form as they may think fit, for the cession of the public lands of Texas to the United States, for an adequate consideration, to enable Texas to pay her public debt; and negotiation to be subject to the ratification of the Legislature of the State of Texas, according to the ordinary forms of legislation.

The following are the classes of debts incurred by the Republic of Texas, included in the bill to be entitled, "An act to ascertain and establish the public debt, and to define how the same is to be paid.".

1. All bonds issued by her authority, for which she received par in gold and silver, or its equivalent, together with the interest stipulated to be paid on the face of the bonds, shall be paid at par.

2. All bonds issued under special contract for munitions of war, vessels of war, and naval supplies, which continue in first hands, or have not been assigned at a discount, shall be paid at---with the interest stipulated on the face of the bonds, at whatever rate they might have been taken, provided such bonds can be traced to have originated under such special contract, and can be clearly authenticated and identified.

3. The bonds of the Consolidated Fund of Texas, having been funded when the Treasury notes and audited papers were at an average of less than 33 ½ cents on the dollar, shall be paid at 33 ½ cents on the dollar, with the interest on the same stipulated to be paid on the face of the bonds from the date of said bonds to the day of payment.

4. All other certificates of stock under the seal of the Treasury, shall be paid at 30 cents on the dollar, with interest from the date of issue to the date of payment.
5. The average value of Treasury notes and 8 per cent bonds, having been from the date of their issue less than 25 cents on the dollar, they shall be paid at 25 cents on the dollar, with the interest called for on their face; and when no interest is stipulated to be paid on the promissory notes, then with five per cent interest from the 1st of Feb'y, 1842, to the day of payment.

6. All audited certificates issued by the Republic for public service or supplies at par, shall be paid at par with interest at five per cent per annum from date; and all issued at less than par at the rate at which they were issued with similar interest.

7. All debts or open accounts charged at par, for services or supplies, ascertained and declared valid by law, shall be paid at par, with an interest of five per cent, or if charged at the rates of paper currency, shall be paid at the par rates equivalent.

The Mexican artillery is of a very poor description, it is said, and they have no field train. It appears that shortly after Gen. Taylor pitched his camp, a battery was with much labor constructed commanding it. Our gallant countryman quietly looked on, until all was finished when he quietly struck his tents and removed his camp a little further up the river, quite out of range of the Mexican battery, which is therefore entirely useless. This is the explanation of the story regarding Gen. Taylor’s moving away from the vicinity of the Mexican army, which went the rounds of the appears a week or so back.

To the Editors of the Enquirer:

NEW ORLEANS, 5½ o'clock. P.M. April 20, 1846.

The long agony is over—It has come at last. War is declared by Mexico, and her ports are blockaded by our fleet.

This morning about 6 o'clock, while the steam boat Alabama, from Galveston, was lying off the Balize waiting for a pilot, the United States steamer Col. Harney, direct from “Brassos St. Jago” came along side, and reported the above news. The Harney doubtless has despatches for our government, and will reach here probably to-night, or in time in the morning for slips to be sent off by the 11 o’clock mail. But as she may be detained by fogs or some other cause, I shall forward this. The city is in a state of great excitement, and the fever is getting up to "54 40."—Perhaps by the morning it may be beyond that point. I write in great haste. Yours, &c. J. A. P.

April 21.—The “Harney” arrived last night, and I send you the "Delta: containing the news brought by her. It does not fully confirm the report as annexed. I also send you the Galveston Gazette, of the 18th. Yours, Yours, J. A. P.

FROM MATAMORAS—
The Army—The schr. Wm. C. Preston, Capt. Taylor, left Matamoras on the 3d. inst. Capt. T. reports that Gen. Ampudia arrived at Matamoras, at the head of 3000 troops, on the 28th ult., from Monterey; and that volunteers continued to be brought in daily in small numbers.

Gen. Taylor was encamped opposite Matamoras, and it is said has full possession of the two ferries on the west bank of the river, running to the city.

The Mexican forces at Matamoras number about 4000 men. Capt. T. reports that the difficulties between the two countries had been amicably settled. They had not yet heard at Matamoras of the departure of Mr. Slidell.
The Galveston News, speaking of the proclamation of the Mexican General Mejia, says;--“Capt. Foster, of the Woodbury, informed us that this warlike document was sent by a messenger to Gen. Taylor when he was within a few miles of the Rio Grande. Upon reading it Gen. T. threw it back to the messenger, saying that he might tell Gen. Mejia, in answer, that his army would encamp on the banks of the Rio Grande that night, which was accordingly done, regardless of the fearful threat of the manifesto, that the banks of the Rio Grande shall be witness of the ignominy of the haughty sons of the North, and its deep waters shall be the sepulchre of those who dare approach them.”

By the arrival last night of the U. S. steamer "Col. Harney," Capt. Wood, from the Brazos San Jago, whence she sailed on the 16th inst., we received late and interesting verbal news from that point. We learn from a passenger that Gen. Ampudia arrived at Matamoras on the 11th inst. With 2000 troops, 1000 cavalry and an equal number of foot, which increased the Mexican force to about 5000 men. Gen. Ampudia, immediately after his arrival, notified Gen. Taylor that if he did not abandon the position that he then occupied, he should consider it as equivalent to a declaration of war.

On the 12th, Gen. Ampudia fortified himself opposite to Gen. Taylor’s position. Gen. Taylor also raised breast-works on the bend of the river, so as to command the river and the works raised by the Mexicans. So advantageously was Gen. T. situated, that it was evident no possible force at the command of the Mexican General could dislodge him; and on the 13th Gen. Ampudia notified Gen. Taylor that he would not act further until he received definite instructions from his Government.

It is reported that Gen. Taylor, hearing that there were two vessels off the mouth of the Rio Grande from this place, with provisions for the Mexican army at Matamoras, despatched Lieut. Renshaw, of the U. S. brig Lawrence, with the revenue cutter St. Anna to cut off all communications with that place.

The army was in good health and in fine spirits ardently wishing for an opportunity to give the Mexicans a lesson.

[The report in circulation in the city during the afternoon of yesterday, of a declaration of war on the part of Mexico, evidently grew out of Gen. Ampudia’s message to Gen. Taylor on the 12th—his decision of the 13th not having been made public. After the Mexican General’s declaration, Gen. Taylor was certainly justified in taking the precaution to cut off his supplies.][BWP]

By the barque Clermont, Captain Lermond, we have received Mexican papers to the 1d April, from the City of Mexico. Although the Clermont sailed from Vera Cruz on the 6th, there is in the papers nothing of local interest, not even a report of the revolution which was to have taken place on the afternoon of the 3d, according to the information brought by the barque Mandarin.

The papers we have perused are all filled with warlike clamors of the editors, and they all say that a war could not be long deferred now, as Mr. Slidell had been driven out, and the Mexicans, including the President himself, were all disposed to fight the Americans. Paredes had given a manifesto, in which he stated, that he will always defend the Republic, and shed the last drop of his blood to preserve a Constitutional and Republican Government in Mexico. The journals that opposed the doctrines of El Tiempo, seem to be quite delighted with this disclosure.

We have neither time nor space to translate all the rhodomontades of the Mexican press in relation to their affairs with this country. We give but one specimen.

El Monitor Republicano, of the 2d instant, in speaking of the United States and Mexico, and war between the two nations, says the departure of Mr. Slidell, on account of his not having been received as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, and the manifesto of his Excellency the President, ad interim, which we publish to-day, are sufficient to authorise us to believe that the moment has arrived when the justice of the question between the two nations must be decided on the field of battle. All the public writers, and among them ourselves, have demonstrated that the Mexican Republic has been seriously injured by our neighbor of the North; that to their intrigues is owing the first separation of Texas and its final annexation to the American Union; that their ambition, not satisfied with the rich territory of Texas, now contemplates by force new usurpations. We will not stop to prove the justice of the Mexican position in the struggle which is to follow. It must be apparent to the eyes of all the world, and there is not a Mexican that will not endure the hazards, horrors and disasters of war before he will succumb to the shameful humiliation of consenting to abandon one point of national honor. Terrible is war! Great are the calamities which it causes. causes. Humanity is horrified at its outrages; but more terrible still is the duty of a people to avenge its injured national honor. The greatest calamity that a nation can suffer is to see itself humiliated by the advances and usurpations of another nation; and it is a thousand times preferable to acquire glory in the field of battle, fighting for independence, than to secure life by ignominy and slavery. Mexico in this case must meet one of two extremes, and its selection cannot be doubtful. It must be that which will sacrifice everything to free its country from the yoke which is now attempted to be imposed upon it and to preserve the independence which it heroically achieved twenty-five years ago.

Mexicans! We have arrived at the solemn moment in which we must show to the world that we are worthy our name, in which we sink all other interests in the great and sublime interests of the country—that we prefer a glorious death to a life covered with reproach and ignominy; and that in truth we can imitate the sublime virtues of our fathers—shedding our blood to preserve the independence which we enjoy as the fruits of their heroic sacrifices. Mexico will assert the integrity of its territory; it will transmit to its descendants a name pure and without stain; or it will succumb with honor and glory in the present war; but it will never in the slightest degree compromise its honor or its nationality.

El Monitor Republicano, of the same date, contains an extract from a letter from Mazatian, of the 21st March, containing information that that port was blockaded by the American vessels of war.

The Monitor of the 27th ult. Complains bitterly, and with much apparent reason, of the efforts made by the government to restrain the free expression of opinion by the press; declaring, besides that it seems to be the intention of the government, through the intervention of its spies, to regulate the private affairs of every citizen of Mexico.

Although Paredes has declared in favor of the Republican form of Government, yet the discussion is continued in the city and provinces of Mexico, upon the propriety of establishing a monarchical Government, and calling a Spanish Prince to the throne; and the monarchical party embraces the men of wealth and influence in the nation; but such is the firm hold which Republican ideas have taken on the minds of the Mexicans, and so vivid is the remembrance of the wrongs which they and their fathers endured from the Spanish Monarchy, that the very name of King is too hateful to them to permit us to believe for an instant that they could, under any circumstances, tolerate the thing.

RE46v43i1p4c5, May 1, 1846: TWENTY-NINTH CONGRESS. Monday, April 27. SENATE.

During the morning hour, numerous petitions were received and referred.

Among the reports from committees was one authorising Mr. Powers to execute certain Statues for the Capitol.

Several unimportant matters having been disposed of, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the settlement of claims for French Spoliations prior to 1800.

Mr. Dix having the floor, made a long speech in reply to the remarks of Mr. Clayton, and in opposition to the bill.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

As soon as the journal was read, Mr. CX. J. Ingersoll rose and asked leave to make a personal explanation.

Objection being made, the rules, by a vote of 102 to 25, were suspended.

Mr. Ingersoll then read a statement in reply to the speech of Mr. Webster in the Senate, relative to the charges of official misconduct, etc.—The substance of it is as follows:

Mr. Ingersoll commenced by observing that, having gone to the Treasury Department to procure proof of what Mr. Webster had denied, he there fell upon proof of more serious matters, the charges of which he had intimated to the House. He did not proceed to furnish the proof at that time, because his friends were of opinion that Mr. Webster, himself, would demand an investigation. No such investigation having been demanded, but abuse having been substituted therefor, he (Mr. Ingersoll) now felt bound to bring forward his proofs. He then went on to state that there is undeniable evidence in the State Department to show that, shortly after Mr. Webster commenced drawing upon the secret service fund, he suddenly changed his plan, and for the first time since the formation of the Government, began to draw the money out of the Treasury, payable to his own order, so that no one but himself could tell what disposition he made of the funds.

In this way more than fifteen thousand dollars in about fifteen months were drawn out. At a subsequent period, five thousand dollars were returned by Mr. Webster. Now the question was, where had these five thousand dollars been deposited all the time. Had it been placed to the private and personal credit of Mr. W., or where? where? After further remarks on this branch, Mr. Ingersoll said that there was evidence to show that this mode of procedure on the part of Mr. Webster, was not sanctioned by the President, but was disapproved by him.

Mr. Ingersoll next went into the proof of the alleged unlawful use of the fund in bribing the party press. He referred to letters in the department from Mr. F. O. J. Smith, which spoke of a “new and effectual” mode of settling the N. E. boundary question, by acting upon and giving a tone to public opinion.

In the last place, Mr. Ingersoll said there was written and undeniable evidence in the department to show that when Mr. Webster left the Department, after deducting all he claimed, he was a defaulter to the amount of about two thousand three hundred dollars. There was also evidence in the Department to show that President (Tyler) had caused him to be written to time after time to refund the money, but without success. At length, on the writing of a letter by the President in very strong language, informing Mr. Webster that unless the amount was made up forthwith, and expose must ensue, a considerable portion of the money was refunded, but it was not till within ten days of the inauguration of Mr. Polk, that the amount was made up in the shape of another voucher from Mr. H. Smith, of Maine, of five hundred dollars. Mr. Smith, however, having stated that the whole amount of his claim was only one hundred dollars, and this fact being mentioned to Mr. Webster, the amount of the voucher was reduced by him, on the first application, to one hundred dollars, instead of five. This could be proved by an agent now in this city. In the concluding remarks of Mr. Ingersoll, he was understood to disclaim attaching any blame to Mr. Tyler.

Mr. Ashmun of Mass., desired to reply, but as objection was made, the House, by a vote of 135 to 22, suspended the rule.

Mr. Ashmun then took the floor, and in a very severe manner, proceeded to comment upon the course of Mr. Ingersoll in this assailing Mr. Webster. He contended, that had Mr. Webster been present, and a member of the House, Mr. Ingersoll would not have dared make the attack. He went on to ask how it was that Mr. Ingersoll had obtained his information, after the President had refused to answer the resolution of the House upon the ground that the seal of secrecy could not be broken. Had any of the underlings been corrupted, or had Mr. Ingersoll entered the Treasury and with a key of his own opened the desk?—After further remarks, of a very severe and personal character, Mr. Ashmun said it ill became Mr. Ingersoll to talk about “peculation” etc., when he himself had been turned out by General Jackson for peculation of the public money.

[Here there were loud cries of order, but the chair decided that as all rules had been suspended, it was a difficult matter for him to decide what was in order or what was not, provided improper and personal language was avoided.]

After considerable noise and confusion, Mr. Ashmun proceeded. He referred to a document for the purpose of showing that Mr. Ingersoll when removed from the office of U. S. District Attorney in Pennsylvania, had been sued by the Government as a defaulter, and that he had not paid the amount of the verdict found against him for several years.

Mr. Joseph R. Ingersoll here rose. He said that, as a matter of delicacy, it was proper that thus far he should have abstained from taking any part in this matter, but now he was placed in a different attitude, for, upon that trial, he was counsel for his brother. He then stated, on the word of a gentleman, that Mr. C. J. Ingersoll had, at the time referred to, been trying in vain for a long period to bring the Government to a settlement of his accounts as District Attorney. Attempt after attempt was made, but without success. At length, Mr. Ingersoll, having a sum of money in his hands, and being anxiously desirous of a settlement, proposed to the Government that the matter should be settled by a jury. This was finally agreed to, and the trial was had, when the whole matter was honorably settled to the satisfaction of all.

Mr. Ashmun resumed his remarks, and contended that the charges of Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, upon Mr. Webster, were totally false, and that the respectable portion of the community would be disgusted with them. Mr. A. then proceeded to assert, that an insidious attempt had been made to induce Mr. Tyler to break ground on the subject, and to disavow that he sanctioned the disbursement.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll.—By me, Sir? By me?.

Mr. Ashmun.—Yes, Sir; by you, Sir.

Mr. Ingersoll.—It is false! It is a lie!.

[Here a great uproar ensued, with loud calls to order, during which Mr. Ingersoll again rose and denounced Mr. Ashmun as a liar and coward.]

Mr. Ashmun said, if the member thought to provoke a personal quarrel by using such language, he was mistaken. He (Mr. A.) came from a part of the country where they did not fight duels. duels. He came from among people who did not use pistols, daggers nor bowie knives, neither were they afraid of them.

Mr. Ingersoll. And where they never get drunk. [Understood to be an allusion to Mr. Webster.].

Mr. Ashmun went on to say, that although he was not duellist, if any one doubted his courage, let them try it. He spoke of Mr. Ingersoll as the aged member from Pennsylvania.

Mr. Ingersoll. Plenty young enough, sir—plenty young enough.

Mr. Schenck rose to a question of privilege. He desired to offer a Preamble and Resolutions, setting forth, that after the President had declined to answer the resolution of the House touching this matter, Mr. Ingersoll states, that he has had access to the department, &c; therefore, that a Select Committee of Five be appointed to ascertain by what means the said Mr. Ingersoll obtained the information—said Committee to have power to send for persons and papers.

After various ineffectual motions to lay the whole matter on the table, and decisions upon points of order, Mr. Petit moved to amend the resolution of Mr. Schenck, by providing that a Committee be also appointed to inquire into the truth of the charges made by Mr. Ingersoll against Mr. Webster, and that the Committee also have power to send for persons and papers.

The resolution thus amended was adopted, and here the matter for the present terminated.

After an ineffectual attempt to fix a time for the termination of the debate on the Smithsonian Bequest Bill, the House adjourned.

RE46v43i1p4c4, May 1, 1846: VERA CRUZ, April 5th, 1846.

Dear____: I would send you news if I had any, but, bless me, I am like the needy knife grinder—“I have no story to tell.” We had a fair prospect for a little revolution here some days since, which was to recall Santa Anna, establish the republic, make peace with the United States, and hereafter go on swimmingly and prosperously. But the segar-smoking, mustachioed dons of the billiard rooms, like all this talking, bragging nation, end their acts like their segars—in smoke.

The Government of Parades, however, has no stability; he is looked upon with distrust by all parties. The monarchists—few here—dislike him for his proclamation in favor of republicanism; the real republicans—fewer still—hate him as an usurper and a hypocrite; and the partisans of Santa Anna, the strongest and best organized, are ready for a revolt whenever they re assured of the presence and assistance of their chief.—One thing is certain—the government of Paredes must fall.

I do not pretend to be deeply versed in the politics of this country, but I cannot, from my intercourse with the citizens, come to any other belief than that the recall of Santa Anna and the establishment of permanent peace with the United States, is the dearest wish of their hearts.

We have heard of the advance of Gen. Taylor, on the Rio Bravo, but as the movement was long expected it has caused no particular excitement. The only fear is, that on the arrival of Mr. Slidell in the United States, our ports may be blockaded, and the army so increased as to justify an advance upon this side of the river. Believe me, however, that even Paredes has no intention of fighting, and you will find that your Yankee legions will have no chance of reaping either glory or securing booty on the Mexican soil. Put that in your pipe and smoke it.

At the anchorage are the American ships of war Cumberland, Potomac, John Adams, St. Mary’s and Falmouth; others, however, as I learn, are soon expected. The merchant vessels are the Clermont and Mandarin, up for your port; and the Ann Louisa for New York. Yours. &c.

RE46v43i1p4c4, May 1, 1846: No Title.

In addition, we gather from the Courier of last evening, “that Mr. Slidell’s demand for his passports and his departure appeared so hostile to the Mexicans that they were making all the preparations in their power for war, which they thought inevitable, but which they would not begin themselves. The Mexican papers are filled with official orders and circulars, from the Executive Departments, for the speedy organization of the army and its march to the frontier of Texas.

In one of the papers we find a passage from a circular of the War Minister, as follows:

"The army is called upon to defend the country, and it should triumph or perish with glory.—It should triumph by great deeds over the calumnies circulated by its enemies, and acquire a monument and imperishable title to public affection. Inculcate in your subordinates the important duties which they have to discharge—tell them the President, in the name of the nation, will reward their valor and punish all who shall misbehave.

"The President ad interim expects that the rights of the nation will be defended with energy, and that the officers will prevent and punish all attempts to commit disorder, and take all proper measures to maintain the public tranquillity. —Understanding the wishes of the President, you will see that they are complied with in your orders, and justify your country’s confidence."
By the arrival of the steamship Alabama, Capt. Windle, arrived at this port yesterday, in 36 hours from Galveston, we are in receipt of late papers.

We have no further election news, (says the Civilian of the 18th,) except from passing reports from Jackson, Victoria and Robertson counties. These leave scarcely a doubt of Col. Williams’ election.

The Galveston News publishes a letter from General Hamilton in relation to his connection with the Texan Government, diplomatic and financial. It appears a Joint Committee of both Houses was raised, to whom was referred the memorial and claim of General James Hamilton, against the Republic of Texas; they refused to act upon the claim, (says the Austin Democrat,) referring the claimant to the Auditorial Court, which the Legislature contemplates establishing; but reported to their respective Houses a resolution of thanks to General Hamilton. The resolution passed the Senate, but was rejected by the House, upon the grounds, as urged by gentlemen who spoke on the occasion, that it is connected with the General’s claim—was an expression of opinion favorable hereto, or at least recommendatory, and might be construed into a partial approbation of the claim, which the House felt unwilling to give.

The News says that they have good authority for stating that the 90 emigranis, wrecked on the Pauline, (near St. Joseph Island) were actually robbed of a large part of the property saved from the wreck.

The Legislature has passed a law for the establishment of free schools in the city of Galveston. It authorizes the corporation of that city to levy and collect a tax on real estate for their support.

A “Bachelors’ Ball” is announced to come off at Galveston this evening, (the 21st) in commemoration of the battle of San Jacinto.

Petitions were presented by Messrs. Archer, Ashley, Breese, Speight and others.

Mr. Miller presented the resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, against a repeal of the Tariff of 1842; also, in favor of the erection of a light-house at Turker’s Beach, or Absecom, New Jersey.

A number of private bills were reported.

Mr. Jarnagin gave notice, that on to-morrow, or on some convenient day, he would introduce a joint resolution to authorize a home board for the purpose of adjudicating the claims of our citizens against the Government of Mexico.

The resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Sevier, requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to the Senate a supplement to the synopsis of instructions from the Treasury with regard to the revenue laws from 1789 to the present, coming up in order, gave rise to a slight debate, in which Messr. Archer, Benton, Sevier, Allen, Davis and others took part; after which the further consideration of the resolution was postponed until Thursday.

The bill for the relief of Nathaniel Goddard and others coming up on its third reading, Mr. Turney addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill.
Mr. Thurman said he should be under the necessity of leaving the city to-morrow or next day, at farthest, and he therefore asked to be excused from serving upon the committee on which he had been appointed. The request was granted.

Mr. Giles offered a resolution, which was adopted, granting the use of the Hall, after the adjournment to-day, for an exhibition of the pupils from the Institutions for the Blind, of Boston, Philadelphia and Virginia.

The Speaker announced the Smithsonian Bill to be the first subject in order.

Mr. J. R. Ingersoll hoped the House would first take up and act upon a very important bill, in relation to certain Treasury notes which were purloined from the Custom House at New Orleans, and had fallen into the hands of innocent holders, who were suffering from the neglect of Congress to provide for their relief.

The Speaker said the Smithsonian bill being the special order, it would require the unanimous consent of the House to take up any other.

Mr. Owen moved to go into Committee of the Whole, which motion prevailed, and (Mr. Burt of S. C. in the Chair,) the consideration of the Smithsonian bill was resumed.

Mr. Sims of S. C., spoke briefly against the constitutionality of accepting the trust devised by Mr. Smithson, and hoped that the fund would be returned unimpaired, and in the meantime be considered as in the Treasury of the United States—and the States of Arkansas, Illinois and Michigan deemed indebted to the Treasury to the amount of their bonds in which this fund was invested.

Mr. John Q. Adams advocated the substitute which he had offered for the bill. He wished to catch the bear before we sold the skin. He denied that the fund was in the Treasury, and it would be necessary to collect the bonds before we could establish this institution.

Mr. Sims said, that in a report made by the honorable member from Massachusetts a few years since, he had taken the ground that the bequest should be deemed to be in the Treasury, and that the States whose bonds were held, were to be taken as debtors to the Treasury, and not to the fund.

Mr. Adams said, that since that report was made, he had had some experience which had taught him that the money was not in the Treasury.

[Mr. Adams was here interrupted by a message from the President of the United States, stating that he had yesterday approved and signed "a joint resolution concerning the Oregon Territory."].

Mr. Adams. A very auspicious interruption, Mr. Chairman—a very auspicious interruption.

Mr. A. then went on to argue, that the money was not in the Treasury, and that it must first be got there before it could be expended.

Mr. Thurman said he had heard it stated that this fund had been invested in the bonds of Arkansas, &c., without any authority in law, and he respectfully requested the gentleman from Mass to enlighten him on the point.

Mr. Adams replied that the fund was not invested without authority, and that before its arrival in this country proposals were invited from capitalists and others by public advertisement to take the money upon interest. The offer of the Arkansas bonds was accepted for the greater portion of the amount, but as to the particular reason which led to the selection, he must refer the gentleman to a certain Senator from Arkansas, who knew more about it than any one else.

Mr. Adams was opposed to most of the provisions of the present bill, and particularly to the Normal School. He was in favor of collecting an extensive library.

Mr. Rathbun thought the delay that had taken place in executing the trust was a disgrace to the country, and he maintained that we were under the obligation, both in law and morality, to make good the fund if we had either wasted it or misappropriated it.

The debate was continue by Messr. Jones of Tenn., Ficklin of Ill., and others.

The debate was continue until half past three o’clock, when the Committee rose, and the House, after adopting Mr. Hopkins’s resolution, to terminate the debate in one hour after going into Committee, adjourned.

[BWP]
As we expected, the emphatic and confident announcement by the Journal of Commerce, of the “Settlement of the Oregon Question,” wants confirmation. However flattering the prospect of a pacific adjustment, no definite steps have yet been taken to close the question. It is not likely that any proposition will be made, until Great Britain hears of the final action of Congress on the Oregon Question. The notice has probably gone out by the steamer of Friday, and it may be a month and a half, or two months, before we receive a response from Great Britain. The Union says:

“The New York editor may spare his rebukes upon “our government journals,” for we can hear nothing of this settlement in England, or of these despatches by the Caledonia. In fact, we have no reason to believe either of them. It is further our impression, that Great Britain will make no offer until she hears of the disposition of the question of notice by Congress. The procrastination which has marked our counsels has probably had its effect upon the British policy.—If Congress had passed the naked notice in December last, we might by this time have witnessed a much more decided and cheering state of our relations with England. There is no knowing how far she expected the resolution of notice to be defeated, or how much she calculated on our divisions. As at present advised, we hear of nothing to justify the statements in the ‘Liverpool Mercury,’ or in the ‘New York Journal of Commerce.’”[BWP]

The Whigs boast of their triumph over the Administration on the Oregon Notice. They confidently assert, that but for their amendment of the form of the notice, the country would have been plunged into war. But which is the greater triumph? The form or the substance? The Whigs originally denounced the notice as the cause of ruin and war. Have they not retreated from that position, by unanimously endorsing and recommending the notice as the most efficient means of peace? They may have the form. We never attached very great consequence to that, as we felt satisfied that Mr. Polk was, as he avowed himself to be, in favor of an honorable peace. And even now the Whigs admit that the President holds in his hands the issue of peace or war, and they have given him full “discretion” in the matter. We believe that we shall have a pacific adjustment, but the same result would have occurred had the notice been given in the form as it came from the House of Representatives. The President is now, as he has ever been, for an honorable peace. He can now, as well as if the naked notice had been authorized, break up the pacific relations with Great Britain. Where, then, is the great triumph of the Whigs? The Baltimore American, Whig, says;

"In any form in which the 'notice' could be passed, unless it were accompanied by a definite naming of the boundary in Oregon, the President would retain in his hands the power of defeating any compromise arrangement, if he should be so determined. The preliminaries of negotiation are under his control; he could reject every proposition offered by England; he could withhold all proffers, on his own part, except such as she would reject. True, the sentiment of both Houses, expressed in the language of the resolution of notice, may impose, and doubtless will impose upon him, a strong obligation to seek an amicable adjustment of the grave question in dispute. Still he has, in point of fact, a great, and, we may say, a decisive power of control over the issue.”[BWP]

There was an arrival at New Orleans on the 24th ult. from Vera Cruz, bringing a few days later accounts than were before received. Nothing had occurred to change the aspect of affairs in the country. We copy from the Picayune the following items:

"We perceive that the Government is determined to be ready to meet Santa Anna, should the ex-President determine to return, as we have no doubt he will do. It may be known that criminal proceedings were instituted against Santa Anna for his transactions just prior to the revolution which hurled him from power. The proceedings in the case have been published by order of the Supreme Court, and they make a pamphlet of 130 pages. A general circulation of these may, it is thought, have some influence on the minds of people, and prepare them for any measure of severity which the Government may take against Santa Anna.

"The Puritano of the 2d April publishes two letters from Santa Anna to Senor Tornel, the first written in May last, when Santa Anna was about to retire from the country. The other is dated in Havana, on the 9th March, congratulating Tornel on his appointment as Secretary of War, and exhibiting much satisfaction with Paredes administration for its liberality in appointing many of his (Santa Anna’s) friends to office.

La Reforma of the 28th March says that orders have been given to the administrator of the mails from Jalapa and Vera Cruz, that any extraordinary courier from the latter port to the capital should be strictly detained at Puebla; and the drivers even are enjoined to preserve silence as to what may transpire at Vera Cruz. This may be an invention of La Reforma, but it shows what men are thinking about in the capital, and that Paredes knows well from what quarter danger threatens.

It is mentioned in the papers that the President has increased very considerably the detachment assigned to guard his residence, as if he were not without apprehension of difficulties in the city of Mexico.
The Mexican papers now deny the blockade of Mazatlan, and tell a long story to show how the rumor was started.

Mention is also made of an ineffectual attempt of the Incians in the South of Mexico, to get up an insurrection for purposes of rapine and plunder.

The press in the Department of Durango still complain of Indian outrages, such as robbery and murder, and suggest that the only remedy for the evil is the re-establishment of the old presidial guards.

The papers abound with more than usual complaints of the insecurity of the public roads for travellers.”.

From the New Orleans Delta of the 25th April, we copy the following additional particulars:

By the arrival yesterday of the Mexican schr. Ventura, Capt. Dorantes, at this port, 12 days from Vera Cruz, we are in receipt of later Mexican dates.

The political news is unimportant. The contest between the monarchists and republicans still continues, and it would seem from El Monitor, that the government has at last fairly embraced the principles of the monarchical party, for in its number of the 4th April, it remarks that El Tiempo is but a second edition of El Diario del Gobierno; so much so, that it advised the subscribers of the two papers not to fatigue themselves by looking at both, as the reading of one will answer the same purpose as the reading of the other.

It has been announced in several of the papers, that the government has assembled a junta of several members of the liberal party, for the purpose of taking such measures, agreeable to them, as will prevent a revolution. The editor of El Monitor, however, thinks this is something of a fiction.

We copy the following items from El Monitor of the 4th April. According to the Diario oficial, the government has received advices that the brigade under the command of Gen. De la Vega had effected a junction at Matamoras with the command of Gen. Mejia; and that the division of Gen. Ampudia had departed on the 1st April from Monterey; from which it was naturally concluded that the whole Mexican army would shortly be concentrated in front of the enemy, who had advance to Santa Isabel. The regiment of cavalry of Oaxaca, and the battalion of Jamiltepec, had march to Jalapa. A considerable quantity of munitions of war, particularly artillery, had been despatched to Vera Cruz.

On the 3d of April the President and all the principal officers of the Government visited the powder manufactory of Santa Fe, and after a minute examination of all its departments, made such arrangements and alterations in the administration of the manufacture, as it was deemed necessary to secure a speedy and constant supply of this first element of war.

The advices from Mazatlan are to the 23d of March, and they state that the report that that city is blockaded, is, as we well knew, false, although the American squadron is laying at anchor in front of that place.

The Department of Sinaloa is, for a wonder, perfectly quiet, and has submitted to the control of Paredes. The troops under the command of Col. Telles have left Guadaluara for Tepic. The South of Mexico is covered by a respectable body of troops under the command of General Guzman, and tranquillity is perfectly established. The remainder of the army is being equipped with the utmost activity.

We learn from El Espectador, that, on the 19th of March, a party of some forty Americans entered the town of Monterey and disarmed about twenty men in a garrison, and arrested Capt. Cavazos, whom they soon set free, however. They demanded corn, meat, and other provisions. The civil authorities armed the inhabitants against these barbarians, and finally defeated them. The good people of Monterey appeared to think them the advanced guard of a Texan General named Ges, of whom we never heard before.

In a late number of La Hesperia, the editor remarks that the Senate of the United States is proceeding with great caution in the consideration of the Oregon question—an opinion very prevalent in our own country.

The Mexican Government has prosecuted two newspapers and two officers of the army. The Reforma and the Contra-Tiempo, journals in the interest of Santa Anna, have been seized, and Cerecero, editor of the former, and Luis Espino, of the latter, have been arrested. General Lino Alcoria has been ordered to proceed to Oaxaco—Capt. Schiafino has been ordered to San Juan de Ulloa.

The Reforma and Contra-Tiempo advocated openly and boldly the restoration of Santa Anna.

[BWP]
Secretary of the Treasury, about five weeks ago, for Capt. Foster to yield up the command of the cutter to the next officer in rank to him, on board at the time of his receiving such notice, and to prepare himself for an examination into the charges against him on arrival at New Orleans. Lieut. Nimmo, the bearer of these despatches, from Washington, intercepted the Cutter on her late return from Brazos St. Jago, delivered his instructions, and on arriving at the South West Pass, the Captain complied with the Secretary’s orders yielding up the command to Lieut. Benson. Yesterday Captain Foster appeared before Mr. A. A. Cohen, the United States Commissioner, for an examination, at which Mr. Prieur, the Collector and the officers of the Cutter were present, but it being deemed necessary to have the assistance of the United States District Attorney, the Court of Inquiry was adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o’clock. The charges embrace tyrannical conduct to his officers and crew, ungentlemanly behavior, and withholding portions of the wages of the seamen, under frivolous pretensions and without just cause.

RE46v43i2p2c7, May 5, 1846: New Work on Oregon.

Oregon Territory, its History and discovery including an account of the Convention of the Escurial; also the Treaties and Negotiations between the United States and Great Britain held at various times for the settlement of a boundary line; and an examination of the whole question in respect to facts and the laws of nations. By Travers Twiss, D. C. L, Professor of Political Economy in the University of Oxford. I vol. 12m.

In this impartial examination of a most important question, Dr. Twiss has industriously collected from every available source, a vast amount of information bearing on the respective claims of Great Britain and the United States to an exclusive right to the Oregon Territory. In the course of his inquiries he was lead to investigate "the records of ancient discoveries and other matters of history connected with the Northwest coast of America, ” commencing with the . . . [illegible] . . . of Ulloa in 1539.

We particularly admire Dr. Twiss' volume for the lucid manner in which he has arranged the quantity of materials he has collected, and for the impartial mode in which he has conducted the inquiry. [Westminster Review].

This work aims to establish by documentary evidence that on the two strong grounds of prior discovery, and prior possession, the claim of Great Britain to the river Columbia is clearly proved.

RE46v43i2p4c1, May 5, 1846: CONGRESSIONAL. SPEECH OF MR. SEDDON OF VIRGINIA

In the House of Representatives, April 15th, 1846.

On the bill to protect the rights of American Settlers in the Territory of Oregon, until the termination of the joint occupation of the same.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—.

Mr. SEDDON rose and addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: In much that I had intended to say, glad I succeeded in obtaining the floor at an earlier period, I have been anticipated by the able gentlemen who have preceded me, and especially by the honorable member from Ohio, [Mr. Vinton, ] who so forcibly addressed the committee on yesterday in support of the amendment offered by himself. But for being so anticipated, I should myself have offered a similar amendment; for so important and essential in its character do I deem that amendment, that my own ultimate vote upon this bill must be determined by its acceptance or rejection. It proposes to limit the operation and effect of the bill to the period during which the existing convention between the U. States and Great Britain for the joint occupation of the Oregon territory, shall continue in force. The bill, as reported, Mr. Chairman, will operate in two very different and distinct states of our relations with reference to the Oregon territory. Ostensibly, judging from the title of the bill, which is for the protection of American settlers until the termination of the joint occupancy, and from most of its provisions, its aim and purpose were simply to provide for the extension of the laws and jurisdiction of the United States over our citizens in Oregon during the continuance of the convention at present subsisting; but in actual operation and effect without the limitation proposed by the amendment, being indefinite in duration, it must extend beyond the continuance of that convention and have an application and efficacy far exceeding, as I presume, the contemplation and purpose even of those who reported and now sustain it.
Mr. James Thompson here rose, and (Mr. S. giving way for explanation) said that the gentleman was mistaken. The effect of the bill, after the termination of the convention, had been contemplated and intended by those who reported it, and they had now come to the determination, when the proper time arrived, to propose to amend the title so as to make it read, "A bill to protect the rights of American settlers west of the Rocky mountains."

Mr. Seddon resumed. Well, sir, I must be permitted to express both my surprise and regret, if such effect was designed to be given to the bill, that it should have been reported with a title so incorrect and delusive. From the title as reported, and even a cursory examination of its leading provisions, members might readily have been misled to believe its operation was designed to be limited to the duration of the convention and be determined with it; and thus the House might have been betrayed, through misconception, into the heedless adoption of a measure repugnant to its sense of policy and justice. I am happy that, though late, such delusive guise is to be cast aside, and that the bill is to be made to avow on its face its real purpose and extent.

The bill, then, Mr. Chairman, is to have a double operation, and, as I have said, under essentially different circumstances. It is first to operate during the convention, and while our rights are determined by treaty stipulations, and then after the proposed and expected determination of that convention, it is to continue active in the assertion of our pretensions as maintained under the law of nations independently of that convention. I shall proceed to examine it with reference to each state of circumstances separately.

In its operation during the continuation of the Convention, I confess, Mr. Chairman, I see no just objections to its provisions; but, on the contrary, deem it with the saving clause embodied, which protects all the rights and privileges of Great Britain and her subjects under the Convention, salutary and just. During that period, it but extends the jurisdiction of the laws of Iowa, so far as applicable, in entire subserviency to the Convention, and with an express saving of all rights secured by it to British subjects over the territory West of the Rocky mountains belonging to the United States. Such extension is consistent with the rights, while it is demanded by the honor and obligations of the Government. We have citizens settled already in considerable numbers in the territory West of the Rocky mountains, and they are daily, by emigration and otherwise, increasing and multiplying. They have gone, and are going to the remote territory under the invitation and inducements of our Government in both its branches, Executive and Legislative. They are without laws, under no competent jurisdiction, and destitute of all regular government. Their exigencies have so imperatively demanded the sanctions of law and government, that they have been driven to the feeble substitute of self-constituted associations, and an appeal to general acquiescence in their decrees. They have appealed to this Government for the redemption of its obligations, impliedly at least given for their security and protection, and in evoke the aegis of our laws and jurisdiction over them. We have no exclusive ownership or jurisdiction under the Convention over the territory so occupied by them, it is true, but we have certain admitted rights and privileges there as defined and ascertained by that Convention itself. Coextensive with such rights and privileges, may our jurisdiction be most fully carried; and so far as we may, I humbly conceive we should not under the circumstances, hesitate, by the extension of our laws, to give the security and protection demanded.

The eloquent gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Holmes,] who addressed the House yesterday, urged that the extension of jurisdiction as contemplated by this bill would violate the provisions of the joint convention. I am generally proud to concur with that gentleman, but from this view I must be permitted wholly to dissent. During the convention, the bill is made to operate in subserviency to it, and all the rights and privileges of Great Britain and her subjects are expressly saved and excluded from its action.—How, then, can it violate or contravene the provisions of the convention? Is the objection that urged with zeal by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Brown,] that our laws should be extended over persons only, and not be made to operate on property, or "territorially," as this bill does?—I hold, Sir, that our laws, in their application, should be made coextensive with the rights and privileges ascertained and secured by that convention to our citizens, and sufficient for the protection and guarantee of those rights and privileges. Now, under the convention, have we not something more than the mere right of entry to our citizens? The eminent domain is indeed in abeyance; exclusive sovereignty is not to be claimed or exercised either by the United States or Great Britain; but our citizens are not merely free to enter; they may take their effects and property; they may trade and hunt; may build, settle, and even occupy the land, enjoying the usufruct, though not holding the absolute or exclusive title. We may, then, by our laws, do more than guard mere personal immunities; we may protect the property and effects of our citizens, and secure them in the peaceable possession and usufruct of their temporary settlements—nay, more, as among our own citizens on their acknowledging allegiance to the Government of the United States in that territory, having complete jurisdiction, we may regulate their claims and rights in regard to the lands settled or occupied temporarily by them as well as all other matters of right or contract. We may then legitimately, during the convention, legislate not merely over persons, but (as it has been called,) "territorially" likewise. We have done nothing more in extending the "laws of Iows, as far as applicable," over the territory West of the Rocky Mountains; and to exclude the possibility of misconstruction, we have inserted an express saving of the rights secured to Britain and her subjects. Such saving was not, indeed, of absolute necessity, and might, perhaps, with safety, have been omitted. We could not, if we would, by legislation, violate the convention; for, under the constitution, treaties constitute a part of the "lex legum"—the supreme law—and under judicial construction, the full effect of the saving clause, even if omitted from the bill, would have been secured, and all enactments in violation of the convention would be annulled and vacated. Still the insertion of the saving clause was wise and just, because we owe it to ourselves and the honor of our government that even the seeming of bad faith, or an equivocal purpose in our legislation, should be avoided and disclaimed.

Satisfied by the reasoning I have used, I, for one, do not need, in the extension of our jurisdiction as contemplated by this bill during the convention, the precedent and sanction of English example; nor is it my wont to guage by such measure the extent either of our rights or obligations. Yet, if such additional warrant for the extension of our jurisdiction under the convention be required, I insist, notwithstanding the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Brown,] it is afforded by the British legislation of 1821, to which reference has been frequently made.—That act of the British Parliament, I submit, is in equal sense, and to the like extent with the present bill, the power substantially of making war, and employing the military force of the Union, is intrusted to the discretion, States, to the dispossession of Great Britain, as of all other nations; and that, for the accomplishment of such result, that, in the assertion of jurisdiction, it goes at least as far, if not farther, than do the provisions of this bill. But the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Brown] argued that this act of the British Parliament must be held to have been superseded by the subsequent convention of 1827, which is the one now subsisting in relation to the Oregon territory, and, therefore, was not now in force.—The validity of this argument cannot be admitted. The convention of 1827, so far as it relates to the rights and privileges secured to the citizens of this country and Great Britain respectively, is identical with that of 1818, which was in force at the very time the English statute was enacted. If that statute was enacted, and operated during and under the joint convention of 1818, how could the renewal of the identical convention in 1827 (with no other change than its extension indefinitely, with a provision for its termination on twelve months’ notice in lieu of a specified term of years) annul and supersede the provisions of the statute?—
Such effect cannot be ascribed to the renewal of the convention in 1827; but even if it could, and the British act were really non-existent, still the full effect of the British precedent would remain. For by that act, passed in 1821, after and during the convention of 1818, a clear manifestation is afforded that, according to the understanding and construction of the convention by the British Parliament, provisions for the extension of jurisdiction, as in that act, (like unto those in the bill before the committee, ) were not in contravention or violation of the joint convention.

This precedent, Mr. Chairman, may suffice to relieve the scruples of such members as would not wish, in legislating under the convention, to give ground of complaint to Great Britain that it had been violated. But if apprehensions on this score are still entertained by any, they must, I think, be dissipated, by reference to the despatch of Mr. Gallatin, who, as minister of the United States, negotiated the convention of 1827. In that despatch he states the conferences had between the British negotiators and himself, in relation to the powers which might be exercised by the Government of the U. States under the convention. He says:

"The establishment of a distinct territorial government on the west side of the Stony mountains, would also be objected to as an attempt to exercise exclusive sovereignty. I observed that, although the Northwest Company might, from its being incorporated, from the habits of the men they employed, and from having a monopoly with respect to trade, so far as British subjects were concerned, carry on a species of government without the assistance of that of Great Britain, it was otherwise with us. Our population there would consist of several independent companies and individuals. We had always been in the habit in our most remote settlements, of carrying laws, courts and justices of the peace along with us. There was an absolute necessity on our part to have some species of government. government. Without it, the kind of sovereignty, or rather jurisdiction which it was intended to admit, could not be exercised on our part. It was suggested, and seemed to be acquiesced in, that the difficulty might be obviated, provided the erection of a new territory was not confined exclusively to the territory west of the mountains; that it should be defined as embracing all the possessions of the United States west of a line that should be at some distance from, and east of the Stony mountains."

In pursuance, probably of this very suggestion, the present bill has been so framed as to include within its operation undoubted territory of the United States lying east of the Rocky mountains, viz: "the intermediate country west of the Missouri river, between the 40th and 43d parallels of north latitude." The acquiescence of the British commissioners must apply to this bill, and preclude objection on the part of their government, that it is violative of the joint convention.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, to have now established that, so far as this bill operates during the continuance of the convention of 1827, its provisions are needed; that they are just in themselves, not violative of the convention, but only commensurate in the protection afforded, and authority exercised, with the rights and privileges ascertained and secured by it; that they have the sanction of English precedent and example, and are only in conformity with suggestions received and acquiesced in by the British government through its commissioners, at the negotiation of the treaty.—So far the bill has my approbation and support.

Before proceeding, Mr. Chairman, to consider the bill in its further, and, to my mind, most objectionable operation after the termination of the Convention, allow me, the more especially as it will have a material tendency to elucidate such subsequent operation, to ascertain with precision and certainty the limit of territory or latitude to which, during the Convention the jurisdiction of the United States is by the bill to extend. The object of the bill, during the continuance of the Convention, is to protect and secure all the rights and privileges ascertained to belong to our citizens by its stipulations, and consequently, to effect that end, its operation must be commensurate, as to limits, with the territory in which such rights and privileges exist. It will then cover the whole territory embraced by the Convention of joint occupancy; and as that territory unquestionably extends to the Russian line—to the utmost limit of 55 degrees 40 minutes North latitude—the operation of the bill must be to that extent likewise. On this point there can surely be no question; (here several members around expressed acquiescence aloud, and Mr. S. added) and I am happy to hear the position admitted by honorable gentlemen of all parties around me. I shall proceed on such admission.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the consideration of this bill in the more important view of its purpose and operation after the termination of the Joint Convention. What, then, will be its aim and effect? I maintain, with entire confidence, they will be to extend over the whole territory of Oregon, to the utmost limit of 54 degrees 40 minutes North latitude, or the Russian line, the absolute and exclusive jurisdiction of the laws and government of the United States, to the dispossession of Great Britain, as of all other nations; and that, for the accomplishment of such result,
the power substantially of making war, and employing the military force of the Union, is intrusted to the discretion,
The bill is indefinite in duration, and no distinction whatever is made in the language prescribing the limits to which jurisdiction shall extend before and after the convention. The phraseology is loose and vague, viz: "over all that portion of the territory of the United States which lies west of the Rocky mountains;" and after, as before, the termination of the convention, the proper construction to be given to the bill must be determined by the officers to administer it, or by judicial interpretation, as I have already established, Mr. Chairman. The object of the bill, during the pendency of the convention, being to assert jurisdiction coextensive with the rights ascertained by its stipulations to belong to us and they extending to 54 degs.40 minutes, the necessary construction of the phraseology of the bill, both in common understanding and judicial interpretation, will be to extend jurisdiction to that extreme limit. To precisely the same language must not, after the termination of the convention, this necessary interpretation, previously ascertained, be continued and enforced? With nothing in the bill to limit or restrict such construction, the meaning, once ascertained and affixed to the phraseology, identical both before and after the convention, must remain unchanged.

Precedent and common understanding as to the interpretation before, will extend after the termination of the convention. Could the stringency of such previous interpretation fail to conclude in the construction of the law, the result would probably not be changed. In the administration of the law, after the convention shall be terminated, the construction of the vague phraseology, to which I have alluded, must devolve on the executive of Iowa, or the Indian agent and officers to whom, by the bill, the executive power over the territory is given. With the feelings and influences operative on such functionaries, can it be doubted they will hold "the territory owned by the United States, West of the Rocky Mountains," to extend to the utmost limit of 54 deg. 40 min. Or should they hesitate, and submit the matter to judicial construction? It will fall under the decision of the United States judges, or the justices of the peace, resident in the territory of Oregon, to be appointed under this bill.—Think you not, Mr. Chairman, that they will carry our jurisdiction to the utmost extent of 54 deg. 40 min.? From position and the appliances to which circumstances would expose them, such would assuredly be their determination. Indeed it is worthy of the consideration of grave jurists, whether they would not, in judicial decision, be bound so to do; whatever may be the real title, the just rights, according to the law of nations, of the United States in Oregon, its government throughout all administrations, have asserted claims and maintained pretensions to the whole territory up to the Russian line. In the absence of any conventional stipulations to overrule, would not the courts of the United States, and the justices acting under the appointment of the Executive, be bound to maintain and respect the claims so asserted? I incline to think their duty would so constrain; but whether it did or not, no practical man can doubt but that, in fact, they would so decide and act. After, then, as before, the termination of the convention, it may be safely affirmed the jurisdiction to be exercised under this bill would extend over the whole of Oregon to the extreme limit of 54 deg. 40 min.

Then, Mr. Chairman, comes the grave, the all-important inquiry, what is the character and degree of jurisdiction you will thus extend after the termination of the convention? Absolute and exclusive must it not be? As was on yesterday ably shown by the learned gentleman from Ohio, [Mr Vinton,] we shall then be remitted to our rights as claimed under the law of nations, and to the assertion of the only sovereignty known in the absence of conventional arrangements—a sovereignty over the eminent domain; or, in other words, to the assertion of exclusive dominion over the territory. I will not attempt to add to his view, which was full and complete, of the assumption of title, and consequent obligations, which, under the law of nations, would result from the position in which, by this bill, we would be placed. But I may refer to the words of the bill, only glanced at in his more general view, as compelling the same conclusion. The language of the bill already quoted is: "The laws of the Territory of Iowa, as far as applicable over all the territory west of the Rocky mountains owned by the United States." No treaty will exist to limit the applicability of the laws of Iowa. Some mere local enactment for bridges or court-houses may not apply; but all the general laws of Iowa will be extended to, and operate over, the whole territory. Those laws, as over Iowa, maintain exclusive and absolute jurisdiction and sovereignty; so, likewise, must they do over the whole of Oregon. They are to be operative over it as territory owned by the United States in the absence of any treaty to limit or define that ownership. Who ever heard of a divided or limited jurisdiction on the part of an independent nation over the territory owned by it? The laws of Iowa assert over its exclusive jurisdiction—maintain the eminent domain, and exclude all pretensions to sovereignty or jurisdiction on the part of all other nations. Extended to Oregon, as territory owned by the United States, they must have no less efficacy and exclusive operation.—It might as well be contended that Great Britain, or her subjects, have rights of sovereignty, or are entitled to exercise jurisdiction over the spot on which we stand, in this, the Capital of the Union, as they will have any such rights or title recognised or respected in any part of the Oregon territory after we shall have extended the jurisdiction of our laws and government over it as territory "owned by the United States." It surely is not necessary to elaborate this view. The simple statement of the terms of the law is conclusive to show that after the convention shall, by its termination, have ceased to restrict the applicability of the laws of Iowa, their extension over the whole territory of Oregon involves the claim of entire sovereignty, and the exercise of exclusive jurisdiction, to the complete ouster of the sovereignty and jurisdiction of Great Britain and all other nations.

The exclusive character of the sovereignty and jurisdiction to be exercised under this bill, after the termination of the convention, having been thus ascertained, it remains to enquire, Mr. Chairman, by what means, and with what consequences, such jurisdiction and sovereignty are to be enforced.

The executive of Iowa, or the mere subordinate agents to whom this bill intrusts the execution of its provisions, will be bound immediately after the termination of the convention, to extend our exclusive jurisdiction, and take possession of the whole territory, dismantling all forts or other establishments in which the flag of a foreign sovereignty waves, closing and abrogating all tribunals in which a foreign jurisdiction is exercised, and ejecting all companies, settlers or traders, who will not acknowledge allegiance to the Government of the United States, and submit to accept the protection of its laws. The powerful Hudson Bay Company, with its army of agents and employees, and its tribes of savage auxiliaries, will be in the possession of much of the territory and most of its strongholds. Numerous British subjects, settlers, or traders, will be in different parts, relying on the asserted rights of their nation, and her pledged faith to protect and defend them. Great Britain having asserted, with singular unanimity on the part of her leading statesmen, that she has rights in the territory, which, at all hazards, she will maintain, and placed by such legislation in a position when to yield would be dishonor and the violation of the most sacred engagements of a nation to her subjects, must and will sustain her claims to the utmost of her power. At the first attempt, then, on the part of the Executive of Iowa, or this new Oregon territory, to enforce the provisions of this act, he must and will resist with the strong hand. The whole military force at his command and subsequently at that of the Executive of the Union, must be invoked, under his clear obligation to extend and maintain jurisdiction over the territory declared by clear enactment to belong to the United States. And this, Sir, will be war—nothing but war—the beginning of a dire contest, the end whereof no man can know.

This bill, Sir, has been regarded, in its application to the state of affairs after the termination of the Convention, as rickety and imbecile. Certainly but little foresight or sagacity has been manifested in framing provisions for the exigencies which will then demand much wise and cautious legislation. But, Sir, it is anything else but imbecile—for mischief, it will be found all-potent. It will render hostile collision of inevitable necessity, and will place at the discretion of the Executive of a remote territory, or to the petty officers to be appointed in Oregon, the issues of peace and war, with the full power of compelling the support of the whole military force of the country. Is the House prepared thus, in anticipation, to part with the dread power reposed in Congress alone, of declaring war? And if even so, are they so infatuated as to intrust it to the discretion of some distant territorial Executive, or petty ministerial officer in Oregon? I cannot believe it, while I retain respect for its wisdom or patriotism.

In view of the operation of this bill after the termination of the convention, in extending over the whole of Oregon collision and war, I feel that I may appeal, with entire confidence, to all such members as have thought our title limited to the 49th degree or thereabouts, or as entertain such conscientious scruples about the extent of our rights as to have been unwilling to assert absolute title to 54 deg. 40 min., to array themselves in form opposition to its passage, without the amendment limiting it to the duration of the convention. They cannot, without abandonment of their fixed opinions and ascertained positions, give it their support, and they are too wise not to see it.

But is there not even a more numerous class to whom this bill, without the amendment, must be repugnant? I refer to those who boast of entire concurrence in this Oregon question with the President, and manifest a peculiar desire to comply exactly with all the recommendations of his message, in all our legislation on the subject. The language and spirit of the message are clearly opposed to legislating now for the period after the termination of the convention, and the exigencies that may then exist. His recommendations are for the adoption of measures to protect our emigrants and conciliate the Indian tribes during the intermediate time before the abrogation of the convention. I will not detain the committee by reading the passages in the message which, during this debate, have been already exhibited, showing the nature of the executive recommendations. They all refer to the "mean time" before the termination of the convention, and contemplate only provisional legislation. The President, in this respect, acting wisely and prudently, so far from recommending ulterior legislation, has even abstained from developing his opinions as to the measures which should, after the termination of the convention, be adopted, or to what extent, and in what degree, exclusive sovereignty and jurisdiction should then be asserted in Oregon. He has, indeed, intimated his opinion of our title; but in reference to the position of things after the expiration of the convention, he has contented himself with saying that we shall then have "reached a period when the national rights in Oregon must either be abandoned or firmly maintained;" and that they cannot be abandoned without the sacrifice of national honor and interest. No intimation is given what specific measures will then be necessary; and much less does he advise legislation now for that period. Should not, then, his peculiar adherents on this matter of Oregon abstain where he has abstained, and shrink from legislating where he has not ventured even to advise?

To all, Sir, it must be a consideration of no little moment, that such premature legislation may most seriously embarrass and involve the relations of the country in the pending negotiations. They are already in a situation of delicacy and embarrassment, and a further element of offence or difficulty should not be cast in by improvident legislation. From the first, the notice has been strongly presented and advocated by its friends as a peace measure.
That being stipulated for by the Convention, and given in pursuance of an undoubted right, expressly reserved, it could afford no just cause of offence, while it must tend to bring both countries to a settlement of their conflicting claims. We were told, repeatedly, that by the notice there was no manifestation of hostile intent, or of a purpose to invade the rights of Great Britain. That we would not even be committed to the assertion of our rights over the territory one inch further than, according to the conscientious convictions of the majority of this House, our title should be clear and unquestionable. In giving the notice, would any, even the most infatuated 55 degrees and 40 minutes men, (as they are here styled,) have dreamed of accompanying it with the declaration or intimation that, at its expiration, we meant to take possession of, and maintain exclusive sovereignty over the whole Oregon territory to the Russian line? Who does not see that to have done so would have excluded the idea of a purpose to induce and expedite amicable settlement?—would have implied a most offensive menace to Great Britain, and have rendered negotiation impracticable, and hostilities inevitable? Yet if by contemporary legislation, we not merely declare such purpose, but actually provide for its execution, the course is not materially different, and scarce less dangerous. We are probably now warranted by what has proceeded from various influential quarters in England, in concluding that the mere notice, being but the exercise of a privilege reserved by Treaty, will not be regarded as war measure; but if the "quo animo," the intent to follow it up by taking and holding exclusive possession of the whole country be thus plainly stamped on our present legislation, how can the notice, thus explained, be regarded otherwise than as most offensive and aggressive? I have heretofore shown that the practical operation of the bill, on the termination of the Convention, would be direct collision and war. But is there not the most serious reason to apprehend that such dread result may more speedily, nay, even immediately ensue? Would Great Britain be liable to the censure of the civilized worlds, if, with an unequivocal manifestation of our purpose to seize and appropriate the whole territory, and in view of legislation formally enacted for the dispossessions of her subjects and her complete expulsion, she should not wait the termination of the Convention, but waiving notice, and availing herself of her superior state of preparation, strike at once a fearful, if not decisive blow. Whether thus near or more remote, war by our reckless course will be made almost certain. And what, Mr., Chairman, must be the nature and probable consequences of such a war?

Under any circumstances, Mr. Chairman, war is a great evil, perhaps the greatest which can befall a nation, except dishonor. Between two such nations as Great Britain and the United States, each of bravery unsurpassed, possessed of immense resources, and aided in the work of mutual destruction by the inventions and improvements of modern science, the conflict would be frightful and the devastation shocking. I wish not to dilate on the mere horrors of war. But, Mr. Chairman, if from the dreadful aggregate of misery, anguish, and death which must result from even a single field of carnage, we could segregate and individualize to the minds’ full conception each case of the wounded or the dying, with all its attendant suffering, and its mournful result to the home of the bereaved—to the widow and the orphan—we must have hearts more savage than that of the bloodiest despot who ever outraged humanity, it holding in our power the blessings of peace, without the most palpable necessity, we should “cry havoc, and let slip the dogs of war.” To my mind, the character of the Duke of Wellington is not more illustrated as a conqueror in the annals of history by the decisive victory of Waterloo, than as a man in the view of enlightened humanity, by his simple answer to a friend who, congratulating him on his glorious achievement, expressed wonder at the absence of all elation on his part. “Be not surprised, (he said,) for, in my view, save a defeat, the greatest of all calamities is a glorious victory.” He was right, Sir, and the noble moral of his sentiment is of peculiar applicability to us.—For, if assured—as we are far from being—of triumph in war beyond our sanguine anticipations, of what profit would it be compared with the destruction of human life, the outpouring of treasure, the devastation of property, the jeopardy to our institutions, and the retardation of our progress in improvement and happiness by which its blood-stained laurels would be gained?

The genius of our institutions are essentially peaceful, and it is the glorious privilege of our position on this continent that we are most surely aggrandized as a nation by the noblest instrumentalities, the culture and peopling of the earth. Our Government is admirable adapted for the development and prosperous display of the individual energy and industry of its citizens; and in every form of human effort—in agriculture, in commerce, and in manufactures—we have thriven and prospered in a manner wholly unexampled in the annals of mankind. Many a hoary head is yet seen amongst us, whose possessor, having seen our nation emerge from colonial vassallage, has witnessed its progress with scarce a check, till now, by the acknowledgement of the first statesmen of Europe, it ranks among the greatest of the earth. For the conduct of war I will not say our government is incompetent, for on the sufficiency of its energies for every want, I have great confidence; but certainly in its capacity for the concentrated executive efforts essential for war it contrasts less favorable with the monarchies and aristocracies of Europe, and especially with the government of Great Britain, than in its adaptation to inspire incentives to industry and secure the triumphs of peace. There have been frequent manifestations on this floor of feelings hostile in England, and as if to incite to resentment and vengeance. We have had paraded in vivid array all the crimes and atrocities alleged to have been perpetrated by her for ages back in all quarters of the world, and have listened to fervid appeals in behalf of the groaning and down-trodden millions of her subjects, who, it is said, write under the oppression of her boasted aristocracy. Sir, if we are to be animated by such national Quixotry, or be betrayed into a crusade for the deliverance of those who desire not our sympathy and would spurn our proffered aid, let me say, that in my opinion, they would greatly err who would resort to war for vengeance or redress. The most certain means for us to overthrow English power—to avenge the past and remedy the present ills of her inflicting—is by our peaceful progress, by successful competition in commerce and manufactures, on her superiority in which rests the main staff of her dependance. Our agriculture of course exceeds hers; our commercial marine is fast approximating to hers; in many branches of manufacture, for which our country with our artificial stimulants is ripe, we are underselling her in the markets of the world. Let us but await our growth, and time and peace will, in a few years, do more to gratify such national antipathy, if it unfortunately exists, than present war could by possibility accomplish.

By, sir, what would be the probable consequences of war, should it come, in relation to this disputed country of Oregon? It has been well remarked, in a leading English journal, “What can England justly dread in that territory, when she has command of the seaboard and the interior—of the forts and the Indians?” Her resources there would be far greater than ours, and her facilities of access superior. Between nations, at least kindred in valor and skill, these advantages would seem decisive. Elsewhere we might, and probably would, obtain indemnities, especially in the Canadas. But, after all, the great struggle must be on the oceans, and for nothing short of the supremacy of the seas. Immense present odds must there be against us; yet, for one, if the conflict begin, I should not despair of at least an equal result. With all our national energies roused, and our immense resources fully directed to naval ascendency, the God of battles could along foresee and award the ultimate issue. But against conflict so doubtful, and consequences as dire as must ensue, every patriot should strive while honor will permit.—Such I confidently believe to be the feeling of them who have the honor to represent this floor. Prepared as one man to breast the shock of arms whenever necessary, they are too sagacious not to perceive that in the ways of peace their true honor and interest lie, and too conscious of real valor to dread the idle imitation of timidity in adopting the counsels of prudence and wisdom. In their name, humble as I am, I protest against and denounce the folly and madness which, by such improper legislation as this bill proposes, would expose them and the country to the hazards and sacrifice of a needless war.

To the grave objections which have been urged to this bill without the restriction of the proposed amendment, one answer, having sufficient plausibility to require notice, has been given. It is, that the English legislation applicable to this Oregon territory is co-extensive with the proposed operation of this bill; and that in adopting it we but follow the precedent and example of Great Britain, who will consequently be precluded from complaint. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to cavil and technicalities, or quibble on the precise construction to be given to some of the clauses of the English act of 1821. I am inclined to admit that the general phraseology of that act may be justly susceptible of the construction contended for. But it must be remember when that act was passed, and with what assurances it was followed. The enactment was as far back as 1821, after the adoption of the convention of 1818, and when it was [Here Mr. Jacob Thompson, of Mississippi, interrupted Mr. Seddon with the remark: “But in the English act, what savings in favor of American citizens exist? Are there any others than the simple right to hunt?”]

I have stated, sir, (resumed Mr. Seddon, ) my inclination with entire candor, to admit that the general words of the English statute may admit of a construction which would be less favorable to our citizens than under the convention they would have been entitled to expect. But to the existing convention, in view of which the act was passed, top the full assurances given in explanation of it, and to its practical operation for so long a time, I refer with confidence, to demonstrate the real character of that law, and to show that it was personal to British subjects and their possessions —not injurious to our citizens.

[Here Mr. McDowell, of Va., who was sitting by, handed to Mr. Seddon a book containing the English act, and desired him to read to the committee in this connexion, and in answer to the remark of the gentleman from Mississippi, the clause in that act in which the jurisdiction of the courts of Canada is extended to the Indian country, but so as not to apply to any part under the civil government of the United States, &c.].

Mr. Seddon proceeded. My honorable colleague, whose opinions are entitled to the highest deference, has obligingly handed me the English act, and desired me to read one of its sections. Feeling the utmost respect for his judgment, I do so. [Here Mr. S. read the section.] From its language it is apparent that the authority of the government of the United States is not meant to be injuriously invaded.

[Here Mr. James Thompson interrupted Mr. Seddon with the inquiry, whether, at the time of the passage of the English act, there was any civil government of the United States in the Oregon territory, or any part of it, and whether the jurisdiction established by the English act could be ousted by any subsequent establishment of the civil government of the United States in it?]

Mr. Seddon resumed. I wish, Mr. Chairman, to deal with this subject in no spirit of mere partisanship, or for seeming triumph in argument, but with perfect candor and frankness. I therefore do not hesitate to reply to the gentleman, that there was not, to my knowledge, at that time, any civil government of the United States in Oregon, and that the law may probably be held to apply to the countries as they were. Opinions, however, as to the construction of the law differ; and, as I have stated, I have read this clause in deference to the wish of a respected colleague whose judgment is of more worth than my own. At least, on any construction, the clause proves that more respect was shown to American citizens than merely to save their right of hunting, since all under any civil government of the United States at the time are excluded wholly from the operation of the act. As I have said, however, I am not disposed to controvert the view taken by gentlemen of the mere language of the act. My argument is based on the time and circumstances of its passage; on the assurances which were solemnly given of its intended operation, and on the undoubted fact that its application has been to British subjects alone, and never extended to the invasion of the rights of our government or its citizens. Instead of ferreting out this musty act and wrangling on the exact construction to be given to its mere words, let the matter be viewed practically and substantially. Candor must admit that in the time and circumstances of the English legislation, as contrasted with those or our proposed bill, consists the greatest imaginable difference. There was then no reference beyond the convention, and the legislation of England was in contemplation of, and in subservience to its provisions. Now, having already in this House voted to give notice, and not doubting the concurrence of the other branch of the legislature in some form, our legislation is proposed in direct reference to the termination of the convention, and in full contemplation of the ulterior state of affairs when no treaty stipulations are to exist.—Bills, in general words of which, if adopted soon after the convention was entered into, or while it was indefinite in duration, would have been of little moment and no danger would, under present circumstances, possess peculiar significance and convey most offensive menace. To such a law as now proposed had it been brought forward when the English act passed, serious objection might not have been entertained. I might myself have voted for it without note or care for its operation beyond the convention, the termination of which was not contemplated. But now thoughtlessness or recklessness in our legislation would be both foolish and criminal. It is no fair test of the wisdom or safety of passing this bill to compare its provisions with the mere phraseology of the English act. The true touchstone is to reverse the attitudes of Great Britain and our government, and to bring home to our own breasts the thoughts and emotions which conduct like that we propose, if adopted by Great Britain, would excite.

Suppose, in the absence of any cause of irritation on our part, in the course of a pending negotiation for amicable adjustment of the conflicting claims of the two nations, the government of Great Britain were to give us notice for the abrogation of the existing convention, and her Parliament were cotemporaneously not merely to show an intent, but provide by actual legislation immediately thereafter to take possession of the whole territory, and dispossess our citizens and exclude all claim on our part to jurisdiction or sovereignty in any portion of the country even south of the Columbia, would not indignation deep and intense be kindled in all American hearts? And would not such course be deemed most significant of hostile intent, and the prelude to certain war? We might indeed deem it wise in our present state of preparation to nurse our wrath and delay an immediate outbreak of hostilities, but all would feel that prudence, not international obligations, feel that prudence, not international obligations, withheld, and that we would be warranted, so soon as by vigorous efforts we should adequately prepare, to seek the ultimate resort of nations.—In the reverse of positions, we find an admirable admonition to forbear from the rashness and aggression this bill unamended would exhibit; for what we would not endure, we may justly expect Great Britain—a nation as potent and sensitive to honor as our own—will promptly resent.

A strong additional argument, Mr. Chairman, for limiting this bill by the amendment proposed is afforded by the unanimity which will then be secured to its passage. This is a consideration which should be strongly felt by those honorable gentlemen, its immediate advocates in its present objectional form, who have been so solicitous and clamorous for unanimity—cordial and united action in our measures about Oregon. We have been stunned by honorable members here, till we scarce heeded the no less frequent appeals of the press, with assurances of the mighty influences to be exerted at home and abroad by the moral effect of united action and harmonious cooperation of all branches of the Government in relation to Oregon. Now, surely, if union and harmony constitute such potent levers whereby to move the world on this subject, they cannot be less essential on the manifestation of our purpose to encourage and protect our settlers in Oregon, than in the form in which the notice to terminate the convention is to be given.

There will scarce by any dissent in the provisions of the bill for these objects; whereas, by extending its operation to the dispossession and exclusion of Great Britain, after the convention is terminated, from the whole territory, the bill, it passed at all, can be carried only by a meagre majority. I appeal to gentlemen, on their own arguments, to meet us fairly, and accord, where all may agree, and not to legislate as if the isolation of friends, rather than the attainment of ends common to all parties and sections of parties, were their real object.

All considerations of prudence and policy conspire, Mr. Chairman, to dissuade us from legislating now for the exigencies which are to exist after the termination of the convention. There is certainly no occasion for Congress to anticipate events so far. far. Another session must occur before the convention can expire, and then, with much fuller lights, and in view of all intermediate events, we may adjust our legislation to the necessities of existing affairs. Should a settlement be effected in the intermediate time, your present legislation would be intercepted and overruled. Should conflict prove inevitable—and by that time the development of events will probably allow a correct decision—many members, who are now averse to the assertion of exclusive sovereignty and jurisdiction, would be prepared to go for the whole. If flight the nation must, then let it fight for all that the fate of arms can bestow. But now our negotiations are pending—our relations in a doubtful and embarrassing condition. We are on the eve of events to be decisive of our future course in relation to this whole Oregon matter. How, then, can we prudently or wisely legislate in advance, when we literally “know not what a day may bring forth.”

*The same clause has been heretofore quoted.

RE46v43i2p4c6, May 5, 1846: Saturday Morning, May 2, 1846.

Let the President do what he may, he will be denounced by some of the Whig press. If, under the obligations of his oath, he lay before Congress his solemn convictions of our rights to the Oregon territory, and recommend the adoption of measures for the ascertainment of those rights, and the permanent security of the honor and peace of the nation, the Whig press assail him for wantonly invoking a war, to subserve his own personal ambition. But no sooner has this Oregon storm blown over, quelled by the firm, yet dignified and moderate stand of our Government, than some of the Whig journals turn around and denounce the administration for want of courage and energy in its bearing towards Mexico. The Philadelphia North American, that once shuddered with horror at the shadow of British power, and shrieked with fear when it was announced that the people of the United States would be ready, if forced to do so, to vindicate their rights and honor against Great Britain, has suddenly changed its dove-like note, and raises a warlike cry against weak and unfortunate Mexico. It calls for the most stringent and uncompromising measures. It would no longer give quarter to our Southern neighbors, but would at once sweep them from the face of the earth. We give a few passages of its bellicose article:

"Our country is made by the Mexican government the subject of the most dishonoring vituperation; a quasi war is declared against us; our Minister is discarded; and, in short, we are subjected to more of humiliation and wrong than we have endured since the Tripolitan war. Where is the Executive? All that was characterized by the President as demanding national resentment, has occurred. The insults we have invited, by sending our Minister we have received. What new dishonor is necessary to arouse our Government to action? And why is it that the administration, which so anxiously seeks to embroil us with Great Britain in relation to an abstract question of title to a disputed territory, submits to be kicked and cuffed, wronged and dishonored by a power like Mexico? It is true, that, as the stronger party, we may, without shame, exercise a magnanimous forbearance; but there are limits beyond which submission to a wrong is a sanction, and tameness and invitation to fresh injury.—What government in existence would have borne what we have borne from the Mexicans, if not conscious that it was in the wrong?.

"Is this the secret of the inertness of the Administration? The acquisition of Texas seems to have cowed the better part of man in our Government. Its sword is glued in its scabbard; and while it protest against the wrongs and insults which are showered upon its head, a shrug of the shoulders is the only response. Now, the act, whatever it be, has been adopted by the nation: it is too late to debate about it. The reputation of the country is at stake—not merely its reputation for honor, but the credit of possessing the strength and courage to protect our commerce abroad—and it is necessary that should be vindicated, or we may expect that every petty power, whether despotic or anarch, will conclude that it is safe to prey upon our people. It is an insult so deliberate, a wrong so profound, that to endure it is to invite, from the meanest of the communities of the earth, indignity and oppression.—Our duty is plain. We should erather retrace our steps or go on. To stand still and permit Mexico to treat us and our citizens as robbers of her territory, and, therefore as unworthy of recognition under the laws of nations, is a degradation that cannot be endured.

"War is a great evil; but there are greater evils. The issue between this country and Mexico has reached a point where there is no room for turning. Our government should act with promptness and decision, and upon a scale worthy of the republic. The police force now on our borders is wholly inadequate; and it is doubted whether our squadrin is of sufficient strength. There will, we apprehend, be no action until the administration shall have received the sanction of Congress; but it should then be backed by a force sufficient to close the war by a blow. The country anticipates, and with anxiety, early and earnest action upon this subject."

Now let us suppose the reverse of what is actually the case. Let us assume that, instead of pursuing the forebearing but dignified and vigilant measures which have been taken, Mr. Polk had drawn the sword of war——d directed General Taylor to cross the Rio Grande, attack and destroy the Mexican army, and had ordered our fleet to bombard Vera Cruz, and blockade the other ports of Mexico. This we would have been justified in doing, on account of the various insults thrown out by Mexico, her repeated declaration of war by her Presidents, Generals, &c. But had this been done, the Whig press would have come out against the "wanton, bloody war," which Mr. Polk had waged against weak, unoffending and powerless Mexico! The acquisition of Texas, instead of being said to have "cowed the better part of man," as sneeringly charged by the North American, would at once have been paraded, as inflaming the Southern blood of the President against a wretched and unprotected nation. Texas, as now, would be made the scape-goat for all the offences imputed to Mr. Polk.

But, no; the Administration, while it has practised a praiseworthy forbearance towards Mexico, has vigilantly consulted the honor and interest of the United States. Gen. Taylor has been stationed on the banks of the Rio Grande, not to assail the Mexicans, but to guard our own rightful territory. Our fleet is in the Gulf, in striking distance of the scene of action, and ready to act at the first signal. Mr. Polk would willingly avoid, if possible, violent measures towards Mexico; but we are satisfied that he has at heart, as sincerely as the North American, the honor and interests of this country. He is certainly better acquainted with all the points of the case, and will, at the proper time, recommend what he thinks is necessary and politic, to settle all our difficulties with Mexico. He will do his duty, regardless of the sneers or assaults of his opponents. We have no fear that he will recklessly take any step which may endanger the peace or dim the honor of the nation.

The Union says that the Administration "has the Mexican case under its best consideration, and will act in its own good time, without waiting upon Santa Ana, or for a new revolution, or play9ng at all the part of what Walter Scott calls 'a waiter upon Providence.'"[BWP]

While we differ from some of the views in Mr. Seddon’s speech, on one of the Oregon bills published to-day, we cannot suffer it to go forth without referring to the talent and powers of amendment which it displays. His constituents will be pleased to see the distinguished part which he has taken in the proceedings of Congress.
[BWP]

The question "What will the Whigs do?" frequently suggests itself to our mind. Their old weapons are all broken or taken away from them—and, although they excel particularly in manufacturing, yet they used up nearly all their raw materials in '44, and what little was then left has since been consumed in vain attempts to create war panics, currency panics, and every other imaginable panic, since the commencement of the present session of Congress. The Oregon question is in a fair way to be amicably and honorable settled—the Tariff will doubtless in a very short time be reduced to the revenue standard, yielding a sufficient amount to meet the economical wants of the Government—the Independent Treasury bill will soon become the law of the land—and Texas has already been peaceably brought into our sisterhood. Then, we repeat, what will the Whigs do? All of their predictions have proved erroneous, and their hopes of the dismemberment of the Repulican party have wofully deceived them. The Democratic party have come out of every contest since the election of Mr. Polk with their brows crowned with victorious laurels—and the Whig party have met with nothing but defeat and discomfiture.

But we must remain united—the little germs of discord must be crushed. Every man who expects to rise should be ever willing to submit his claims to his party, and if selected by them, the others should forget their own personal aspirations, think only of the success of our common principles, and assist in the elevation of their successful rivals.
Let the aim of each and all of us be, to excel the other in the perpetuation of the glorious doctrines of the Repulican party. Let all heart-burnings and jealousies be banished from our councils. Remember the losses which we sustained during the recent elections, on account of the refusal of some of the candidates to submit their claims to the conventions of their party; and, above all, remember that “Union is strength, and that division ensures defeat.”[BWP]

RE46v43i3p1c5, May 8, 1846: LATER.

The steamship Telegraph arrived here on Thursday evening, bringing accounts to Tuesday. The only additional intelligence is as follows: Just before the Telegraph sailed, news arrived that Lieut. Porter and a detachment of 10 men, who had been sent out on duty not far from Gen., Taylor’s encampment, had been fired upon by 50 Mexicans, killing Lieut. P. and three of his men. The others succeeded in making their escape and returning to camp. Whether the party which made this attack were soldiers or robbers, is uncertain; but we believe the Mexican officers say the latter. These officers had already said to some of ours, that every thicket was infested with banditti who would kill a man for 50 cents or his blanket, and that the Mexican commander could not think of holding himself accountable for any accident which might happen to detached parties venturing incautiously too far from camp.

Gen. Ampudia denies all knowledge of the fate or whereabouts of Col. Cross, but, as the country in the vicinity where he disappeared has been thoroughly searched, and no information of him obtained, it is suspected by many that he has been sent a prisoner into the interior of Mexico, instead of having been murdered.

Impressions as to the probability of a battle are very much divided. It seems highly probable that the Mexican army does not contemplate a general attack, inasmuch as it has allowed favorable opportunities for making one to go unimproved; and in the present position and situation of his forces, Gen. Taylor is much stronger than at any time since his removal from Corpus Christi. He has finished mounting his heavy artillery and fortified his camp completely, so that an attack from the enemy would doubtless be the most welcome event that could happen to our army.

RE46v43i3p1c5, May 8, 1846: PROCLAMATION OF AMPUDIA.

[From the Extra of the Galveston News.]

The General-in-Chief of the 4th Military Division, to the inhabitants of the interior departments of the East.

Fellow-Citizens: My most ardent prayers are fulfilled, and propitious fortune grants me the pleasure of returning to these departments for which I have so much sympathy.

In entering the East, the greatness of the enterprise which the supreme National Government has thought worthy to confide to my poor abilities does not deter me; for your patriotic virtues and your courage are doubtless superior to the audacity with which the stranger insults us.

Since the cabinet of Washington removed the hypocritical mask which covers its treason to support with effrontery the usurpation of Texas effected by her ungrateful inhabitants, our colonists, my heart possessed with a sacred fire, like that which every good Mexican ought to experience, inspired me with a lively desire to avenge so great an insult by chastising the aggressor, and in March of the last year, I placed my desire in form before the administration of that time, in order either in my own grade, or that of the private soldier with musket upon my shoulder, I might be permitted to make that campaign.

If it be well then that publicity was given to that proposition through the journals, it is much more gratifying to renew it at a time which finds me among you, and that at your side I shall joyously sacrifice my life upon the altars of the country, if, for the happiness of this country, so near to me, my existence may be the victim which destiny shall mark out.

Neither by any motive shall I be brought to forget, nor shall I pass in silence the occasion which is presented to me, to offer a grateful remembrance as a tribute to the inhabitants of Tobasco for the honorable demonstration of their esteem for my person, and the extraordinary efforts which they made that I might remain permanently there; but to the country every thing is due, and for its interest every other thing ought to be postponed; the reason why I am not still in the society of those estimable fellow citizens.

The worthy Chief Magistrate has conceived my poor services important to the nation, and I came with the greatest pleasure to bestow them upon you, for the affection, indeed, which you inspire in me; also, indeed, for the noble and patriotic sentiments to whose influence our enemies can oppose no resistance; they who, as you know, to the scandal of the Christian world, assist barbarous Indians with arms and munitions, in order that they may ravage our people. This ferocious enemy shall be also corrected, and we will chase him from our frontiers with the greatest possible brevity.

My heart has felt the most grateful pleasure in witnessing the public demonstrations of joy and general satisfaction with which the heroic people of Saltillo have received the division which marches under my orders; and no one ought to doubt that the brave men who compose it, united to our comrades, who do-day are entrenching themselves on the field of battle, will know how to give a convincing lesson to the enemy who dares to insult you; making him know the rights and power of a great and warlike people, highly offended in its honor and integrity.

The General in Chief of the 4th Military Division to the Inhabitants of the Frontier.

My Friends: I left the village of________, sick, to come and participate with you in the labors and glories to which the hypocritical and daring North American usurpers invite us, and I instantly longed to find myself upon the banks of the Bravo, to salute them with all the effusion of my soul. I arrived yesterday in this city with the brigade which the brave General Don Anastasio Torrijon directs. At this moment the second is entering, and notwithstanding the necessity which exists for my remaining in this city, to adjust interesting matters, I advance, with a body of cavalry, by forced marches; for, indeed, you know me—I cannot have a moment of tranquility while I am not with you. In the meanwhile, let the sacred fire of your country burn as always in your hearts, and I will answer you with victory.

We have seen with the greatest satisfaction the manifesto given to the nation by His Excellency the President ad interim, in regard to the correspondence relative to the subject of Texas, held between the Supreme Government and the Envoy Extraordinary of the United States. This document is as satisfactory as could be hoped for after the sincere offers made at San Luis Potosi by the chief of our destinies; in it we see explicitly treated the difficult question which for ten successive years has been the pretext for civil discord, and in it we have a safe guarantee that the existing energetic Government will fulfill without delay the obligations which it contracted with the nation in giving the programme, which unites all divisions, which makes opinion unanimous upon independence, the calumniating point of our social exigencies.

It is true war is not precisely declared in the manifesto referred to, and this will not readily satisfy the anxiety of those who are menaced by the ironically called colossus of the North; but in addition to their being in the expressions of his Excellency, the President, marked indications of a desire for the campaign so long a time talked of, a matter which has no little force in the mouth of the Chief Magistrate of a people, it is also therein expressed, as a fundamental basis, that the forced occupation of our territory by the U. States, and the appearance of their squadrons upon the coasts of Mexico, are regarded as a real aggression; such is the language proper for governments which desire to uphold dignity and decorum; nevertheless, there will not be wanting some malevolent spirits to charge us with not having finally declared war, as if such an act were not for some time between himself and one or two other officers.

The number of the Mexican troops at and near Matamoras is not known with any degree of accuracy, but we cannot learn of any considerable augmentation. Indeed, the impression appears to be, that they have been diminished of late, in consequence of the difficulty of obtaining supplies.

The two armies are encamped on opposite sides of the river, in view, and within some two hundred yards of each other, and both have thrown up fortifications, and added to the strength of their positions.

The steamship Telegraph had arrived from N. Orleans with 200 additional troops for the army under General Taylor. She struck on the bar in going in and drifted over without sustaining any injury worthy of note. She is expected here daily.

The weather has been exceedingly tempestuous off the coast, and fears are entertained that damage has been done to vessels in the vicinity.

The brig Equity, Capt. Place, arrived yesterday, brings information that when off Matamoras, with the intention of entering, on the 17th inst, she was overhauled by the U. S. brig Lawrence and ordered off the coast. [N. O. Jeffersonian, April 29. [BWP]
As this is the anticipated battle ground, opposite which General Taylor is encamped, the following description of the city, from a correspondent of the New York Tribune, may prove interesting:

Matamoras is an old Spanish City, containing about 7,000 inhabitants, and is beautifully situated on the Southern bank of the Rio Grande, within its folds so that its front and rear are both on the river. Seen from the American side, it has every appearance of being an American town. The streets intersect each other at right angles, and appear to be lined with many varieties of shade trees, which give the town an air of coolness, and render its appearance very inviting. Many of the buildings are built of brick and in the modern style of architecture. The Cathedral, market, and buildings occupied by the military, are among the finest. The dwellings of the poorer classes are constructed with canes, brush, mud and the like materials, and are essentially Mexican. The town formerly contained double its present number of inhabitants, and was a place of some importance. This rapid decline is owing to their internal commotions, and the growing indolence of the people. The citizens are all under the rule of the military, and are obliged to provide for them. The military is supreme, and the orders of their General, Mejia, are law.

The city has several fortifications, armed with guns of different calibres, and a force of 500 or 600 men is kept in them constantly. Since our arrival they have increased their force to nearly 3,000 men, and have been working night and day upon the defences of the place. They have thrown up several batteries which bear upon our camp, and we are quietly waiting for them to give us a ball. Should they favor us, we shall return the compliment with a series of them, for the Spanish are very particular in matters of etiquette. Our camp is directly opposite the town, and 800 yards from their batteries. We are engaged in throwing up a field work, constructing gun batteries, and taking such precautions as are necessary to enable us to maintain our position. This seems important since our intercourse with them is entirely prohibited by the Mexican authorities, and their attitude decidedly hostile.

RE46v43l3p1c7, May 8, 1846: The Earl of Aberdeen to Mr. Pakenham. FOREIGN OFFICER, March 3, 1846.

Sir: I have much satisfaction in conveying to you the entire approval of Her Majesty’s Government of the steps which, as reported in your despatch of the 29th of January, you took, and of the letter which you addressed to the American Secretary of State, for the purpose of ascertaining clearly and authoritatively, whether the United States Government would be disposed to admit the application of the principle of an arbitration of the Oregon Question on any other terms than those which they had already rejected.

In thus acting, you have, in a most judicious and satisfactory manner, anticipated the instructions which I was preparing to forward you on this subject.

We have now nothing to do but to await Mr. Buchanan’s reply to your appeal to him, although I collect from your despatch that your proposal will certainly be refused. Should that reply, however, be of such a nature as to give any ground of hope that the matter in dispute may be brought to an amicable issue by means of direct negotiation, I shall gladly avail myself of such an opening. If not, it will then be for Her Majesty’s Government to consider what measure it may be expedient to adopt, in order to meet any emergency which may arise. I am, &c., [Signed, ]

ABERDEEN. The Earl of Aberdeen to Mr. Pakenham. FOREIGN OFFICE, March 3, 6 P. M., 1846. Sir: Since my preceding despatch of this day’s date was written, I have received your despatch of the 5th of February, with its inclosure, by which you put me in possession of the final rejection by the U. States Government of our proposal of a reference of the Oregon question to arbitration.

There is, of course, no time before the departure of the mail of this evening for the consideration of so serious a question as that which is involved in the President’s decision as now announced. I am, &c.,

(Signed, ) ABERDEEN.

RE46v43l3p1c6, May 8, 1846: No title.

The Oregon question continues to be a fruitful source of discussion with the British journals.—The speech of Mr. Webster, and the propriety of settling the dispute upon the basis of 49 degs., were much commented on. The London Times, by some called the organ of Lord Aberdeen, tho’ it is more probably the mouth-piece of the Hudson’s Bay Company, is as bitter as ever in deriding and opposing the American title North of Columbia river, and states that latitude 49 was as far as the original claim of the U. States extended, and that line had never been conceded by the British statesmen. If conceded now, the Times claims the freedom of the Columbia, the whole of Vancouver’s Island, and the Straits of Fuca, with full indemnity to the Hudson’s Bay Company for resigning their posts.

The London Examiner say England loves peace, but is ready for war.

[BWP]
England and the United States—The Oregon Question.

The Times says the accounts from the United States by the Hibernia, to the beginning of April, have excited a good deal of attention. The message of Mr. Polk to Congress is not considered warlike. Indeed, some of the public sureties profess to see the best guaranty for the continuance of peace, in the expense to which the country would be put by arming for a conflict.—Seventy millions of dollars bestowed upon putting the army and navy on a footing for commenting the emergency of the case, would induce every man to contribute this quota to that astonishing sum to inquire into its necessity.

The following extracts from an article in the London Times, of the 18th ult., show that that paper does not look upon the line of 49 degrees even as a certain line of agreement, and gives also the latest opinion which we find on this question:

* * * In the whole course of these negotiations, that which has changed moist completely, is the claim set up by the Americans. In 1818 and 1826, the territory in dispute was expressly asserted, and clearly understood, to be comprised between the 42d and 49th degrees of latitude. As for the more Northern tract, between 49 and 54 40, we are not aware that the paramount claims of Britain to that part of it, were then called in question. The proposals of it for partition, ranged between the mouth of the Columbia and the 49th degree, but not beyond; and the American Plenipotentiaries unsuccessfully claimed the whole of that region, but no more. Since that time, and in their more recent discussions, they have raised their demands; they have laid claim to the whole country; and then, as if it were the farthest limits of condescension and concession, they revert to their former offer, the very same which they before rejected. * * * *

They have raised a claim to the whole of Oregon, not with any expectation of acquiring the entire province, but in order to reconcile us to terms we have before declared to be admissible.

FROM MEXICO.

Yesterday’s Southern mail brings us a few additional items of intelligence from this excited country. The latest dates received at Vera Cruz from Matamoras were of the 2d inst.; they state that General Mejia had not attacked General Taylor on account of the retreat of the latter. Those from Mazatlan were of the 1st—and in “El Locomotor” of the 22d, we find a list of the American vessels of war which had blockaded that port; they consisted of the frigate Savannah, 60 guns; do.Constitution, 50; sloop of war Portsmouth, 34; do.Levant, 34; and schr.Shark, 12 guns.

A revolution had taken place in the Southern Departments of Mexico, where Gen. Don Juan Alvarez had published the Federal Constitution, and advocated the return to power of Gen. Santa Anna. No further particulars had been received about the revolution, but it was confirmed from several sources.

According to the “Locomotor” of the 20th ult., the American squadron laying at Sacrificios set sail on the 18th, and returned on the third day. It is believed that these movements were caused by slight fevers, which had prevailed among the crews of said vessels during those days, and that they went to sea in order to get a cool and pure air.

The news of the death of Signor Don Maximo Garro, late Envoy to the King of the French, had reached Vera Cruz, and this is supposed to have detained at Havana Gen. Almonte, who sent his secretary back to Mexico by the British steamer of the 9th.

The said journal of the 18th states, that it was reported that the Mexican government had entered into agreements with the Spanish government for the sale of the steamers of war Montezuma and Guadalupe, for the sum of $80,000; and it suggests that under the actual circumstances, it was not proper for the Mexican government to enter into any such arrangements with Spain, but to offer the said steamers at public sale, and dispose of them to the highest bidder. It has been reported, and it is stated in some private letters, that the steamers have been bought by the English house of Manning, Marshall & co., for the sum of $640,000, and that they were to proceed to Havana immediately. We cannot credit the latter rumor, for we have seen both steamers, and are well acquainted with their force, build and other circumstances, which are not enough to make them worth half the amount which it is said has been paid for them; and there is too great a difference between that sum and the one which the Locomotor states had been offered for them by Spain.

FROM THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION.

Below we give farther extracts from the New Orleans papers relative to the U. States troops now stationed on the Rio Grande, under the command of Gen. Taylor. Gen. Worth, Cols. Coffin, Waite, Fisher and Treadwell, Majors Van Ness and March, Captains Duncan, Whitehead and McLellan, and several other officers of the army, arrived at New Orleans on the 30th April, in the steamship New York.

The iron steamer Hunter was off Galveston bar on the 27th April, having lost her smokepipe, and being short of provisions. She was then eleven days out from Brazos Santiago.—Some of her passengers were transferred to the New York.

The schr. L. M. Hitchcock, Captain Wright, arrived at Galveston on the 23d April, from Brazos Santiago, having sailed on Sunday, the 19th—three days after the Colonel Harney—but she brought no news of much interest. The rash attempt of Lieut. Deas to discover the fate of his friend Col. Cross, whereby he fell into the hands of the Mexicans, is fully detailed, with its unfortunate issue, in the letters below from correspondents of the New Orleans Picayune. The remaining intelligence by the Hitchcock has been anticipated by the arrival of the Col. Harney.

About fifty of the American army had deserted, and swarm the river for the Mexican camp; but a number of them were shot as deserters while in the water. The whole number of American troops is estimated at between two and three thousand, and they are said to be in excellent discipline, and eager for an engagement with the enemy. Ampudia’s forces are reported at between three and four thousand. It reported, that Arista is about to supersede Ampudia in the command.

RE46v43i3p2c4, May 8, 1846: Correspondence of the New Orleans Picayune. CAMP OPPOSITE MATAMORAS, Texas, April 18th, 1846.

The two opposing armies are within five hundred yards of each other—both busily engaged in entrenching themselves and throwing up fieldworks. The most perfect non-intercourse is established. Thousands of reports are in daily circulation with regard to the probable time at which we are to be eaten up, and frequently news reaches us that the Mexicans are crossing the river at some point above or below us, when some unlucky devils [whose detail it happens to be] are detached on a scout for the whole night.

The last report is, that Gen. Arista has taken command of the Mexican army, and that all hostile operations are to be suspended until next June, in order to give the two Governments an opportunity of negotiating peaceably—or, in other words, giving the Mexicans an opportunity of backing out with some show of decency. Take my word for it, we are to have no fun, unless we lead off the dance.

Many of our officers assemble daily on the banks of the river, and gaze with longing eyes at the houses, streets and signoras of the beautiful city of Matamoras. In the course of a week our fortification will be finished, when we may safely defy the whole Mexican army. It is said that Arista is the rival and enemy of Paredes, and will therefore be disposed to favor the American Government.

Col. Cross, our Quartermaster-General, has doubtless been taken prisoner by a party of rancheros, and taken over to Mexico. Lieut. Deas, of the 4th Artillery, concluded, very strangely, the other night, that he would swim over to Matamoras and get information about Col. Cross.—He swam over in his uniform; and yesterday when Gen. Taylor made a demand upon the authorities for Col. C., they returned an answer that he was not there, but that they had Lieut. Deas, whom they held as a prisoner of war. Deas he not [have] permission from Gen. T. to go, so I suppose he will have to get back the best way he can. There is no apprehension but that these gentlemen are safe--Deas at Matamoras, and Col. Cross at some place in the interior.

I have not time to say more to you this morning, except that there has been a very severe fog here for two days, which has brought the mud to about ancle deep. Yours truly.

[BWP]

RE46v43i3p3c2, May 8, 1846: COL. CROSS.

A private letter received in Philadelphia, says the Times, from an Officer at the Camp of Occupation, states that the Mexicans have acknowledged the capture of Col. Cross.—He had rode a distance of about two miles outside of the advanced pickets, when he was surrounded, and captured by about twenty mounted Mexicans. He had been conveyed across the river, and some distance into the interior, but the enemy declare that no harm is intended to him.

RE46v43i3p3c2, May 8, 1846: TWENTY-NINTH CONGRESS. WEDNESDAY, May 6. SENATE.

The Committee on Finance made a report in favor of agreeing with most of the amendments of the House to the bill providing for deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1846, and recommending that the Senate recede from some of its amendments and insist upon others.

The report was read and adopted, and the bill as amended ordered to be returned to the House.

On motion of Mr. Lewis, the Senate took up the Fortification bill, and after the adoption of one or two amendments, it was passed over informally at the request of Mr. Yulee, who wished to obtain some further information relative to the proposed fortifications upon Florida reef.

Mr. Johnson of La., on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the Mexican Railroad Company.

The resolution offered by Mr. Speight yesterday, to change the hour of meeting to 11 o'clock, was taken up and rejected—ayes 16, noes 22.

The bill to provide for the settlement of the claim of New Hampshire against the General Government, which was rejected sometime since, and afterwards agreed to be reconsidered, was taken up.

Mr. Atherton explained the merits of the bill at some length.

Mr. J. M. Clayton moved to postpone the bill until Monday next, owing to the thinness of the Senate.

Mr. Allen opposed the postponement, and said a few words in behalf of the bill.

Mr. Mangum was in favor of the postponement, not on account of the thinness of the Senate, but on account of the necessary absence of one or two Senators who are conversant with the whole subject. He moved to postpone until Monday week, and make it the special order.

After some remarks from Mr. J. M. Clayton, Mr. Atherton, and others, the motion was lost.

The question then recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 13.

A message was received from the House, stating that the House had resolved to insist upon its disagreement to the 3d and 9th amendments of the Senate to the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. Haywood moved to recede from the third amendment (to pay Dr. Thomas P. Jones some $3,000 for making experiments relative to steam boilers.).

Mr. Evans hoped the Senate would not recede. There were only two amendments in dispute between the two Houses, and he hoped that the amendments would be insisted upon, and Committee of Conference appointed, who could doubtless soon settle these differences.

After some remarks, the question was taken upon receding from both amendments, and the Senate agreed to recede, by a vote of 17 to 12. The bill therefore only requires the signature of the President to become a law.

The French spoliation bill was made the special order for next Monday.
The bill to establish Federal Courts, &c., in the State of Florida was next taken up in order.

The House went into Committee of the Whole—Mr. Boyd of Ky. In the Chair—and took up the special order, being the bill "to repeal that part of the act of the 30th August, 1842, (Tariff act) which imposes a duty of 20 per cent., ad valorem on Java Coffee, and to refund the discriminating tonnage duties levied on Spanish vessels (except those from Cuba, and Porto Rico) by the act of 13th July, 1832."

Mr. Winthrop, of Mass. Opposed the bill on the ground that Java Coffee was by it made an exception to the coffee imported from every other part of the world. The motive assigned for bringing in the bill was the alleged violation of some treaty. Some skillful Dutch diplomatist had convinced the Chairman of Foreign Affairs of this fact, and by a Treasury circular discriminations had been made in favor of Coffee imported into the U. S. in Dutch vessels.

Mr. W. argued that there had been no violation of the treaty between the United States and Holland. Secretary Bibb had violated the law during nearly the whole term of his office by the circulars he had issued, and the present Secretary of the Treasury had done nearly the same thing for a year past. The treaty which it had been alleged was violated, has not been violated, in point of fact, at all. This treaty, indeed, afforded no advantage to us. An export duty of 25 per cent was laid upon all coffee exported in foreign vessels, and this discrimination was extended to 50 per cent. Against the United States merchants. It was therefore impossible for our merchants under this heavy export duty to compete with the coffee imported from Java in Dutch vessels. In 1830 there were thirty ships employed in the Java trade, and now there were but three or four. It was now proposed in the bill to make a further discrimination against the United States. This was the reciprocal free trade proposed by the bill and defended by the friends of free trade, in the House. It was a discrimination against American vessels, both by the Dutch government and the American government.

Mr. W. said he regretted that the Executive Government had given so little heed to this subject. He had reason to know that it had been brought to his notice of the Treasury Department, and important information laid before it, but thus far without any attention being paid to it.

Mr. Seaborn Jones moved an amendment to the first section, so as to confine the benefits of the bill solely to coffee imported in American vessels. At this stage of the proceedings,

Mr. Dromgoole of Virginia moved that the Committee rise, as he wished to submit a question of privilege to the House.

The Committee rose accordingly.

Mr. Dromgoole then offered a resolution, that any member summoned as a witness before the Circuit Court of the United States for this District, should have leave to attend the Court.

Mr. Winthrop moved to add a proviso, that the member should attend when summoned, if he thought proper to do so. He contended that the Courts of law had no power to require the attendance of members.

Mr. Dromgoole concurred in this opinion, and accepted the proviso.

Mr. Thommason, of Ky., and Messrs. Holmes and Sims, of S. C., debated the propriety of adopting the resolution as one of privilege, and, therefore, one of a very delicate character.

Mr. Gordon, of N. Y., moved to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. Dromgoole called for the yeas and nays—and the motion was lost—yeas 44, nays 117.

Mr. Hunter of Va. offered a proviso that the leave granted should not be regarded as waiving any privilege on the part of a member, and that they should be exempt from attachment if summoned to attend.

Mr. Adams was desirous that the courts of law and the member of the House should not come in collision with each other. His own practice had always been to attend as a witness when summoned, and he never supposed that he violated any privilege by doing so. A new motion was made to lay upon the table and lost. The previous question was then seconded upon a substitute offered by Mr. Burt, of S. C., giving leave to George W. Hopkins of Va. To obey the summons of the Circuit Court. The resolution was adopted in this form.

The House insisted upon the amendments to the arrearage bill.

Several Executive communications were then received, one in relation to the slave trade, and one in answer to the call as to the deserters of the army. The Adjutant General states that two men have been shot while deserting, and four drowned.

The communications were laid upon the table, and the House then went into Committee of the Whole, upon the bill in relation to Java coffee.

A motion was made to strike out the first section, which was lost by a vote of 59 to 55.

The second section was agreed to, when the committee rose and reported the bill to the House, which was ordered to be read a third time, and passed. After which the House adjourned.

RE46v43i4p1c3, May 12, 1846: NOTICE SENT TO GREAT BRITAIN.

It is understood, says the Newark Advertiser, though not officially announced, that Mr. Buchanan, by direction of the President, sent despatches by the steamer which sailed from Boston on the 1st instant, addressed to Mr. McLane, in London, directing him to give Lord Aberdeen the year’s notice providing for the termination of the joint occupation of the Oregon territory. Mr. Buchanan, it is also said, has given official information of the fact to Mr. Packenham. The form in which the notice was sent, embraces, the understanding is, the preamble and resolution as it passed Congress.

RE46v43i4p1c3, May 12, 1846: No title.

Some ultra Whigs, ever watchful for an occasion to condemn the acts of the Administration, have pounced upon the first unfavorable news from the army, to charge the President with neglect of duty, in not ordering to Texas a force sufficient for any contingency. He the President carried out their views, as now expressed, who doubts that these same Whigs, long ere this would have been loud in charging the President with a profligate waste of the public money, &c. But we make a short extract from Saturday night’s Union, which places this matter in its true light.

“'It should be understood that General Taylor has been for several months authorized to call for any auxiliary forces from Texas, Louisiana, and some other of the Southwestern States—in fact, for such reinforcements as he might deem it necessary for him to possess. But, like a gallant officer, believing his force adequate to meet any enemy which might present itself, and to overcome every danger, he omitted to exercise the authority with which he has been intrusted. His sense of security has overcome every other consideration; and he has not made his call in time to secure himself against all contingencies. There is no doubt entertained that this sense of security was increased by the communications from the Mexican General, from which he had a right to conclude that no hostilities would take place on this side of the river till the meeting of the new Congress.”[BWP]

RE46v43i4p1c4, May 12, 1846: FROM THE ARMY! LATE AND IMPORTANT FROM RIO BRAVO!

General Taylor’s Camp Surrounded by the Mexicans—Capture of two Companies of Cavalry—Lieut. Cain and thirteen Men Killed!—The Enemy on American Soil!

From the Second Edition of the New Orleans Bulletin, of May 2d, we take the following highly important news from the Army of Occupation:

By the arrival at 5 o’clock, this morning, of the steamship Galveston, Capt. John T. Wright, we have been put in possession of the Extras of the Galveston News and the Civilian, of the 30th ult. The News says: "On Thursday morning, 23d, a Mexican came into Gen. Taylor’s camp and reported 2000 Mexicans crossing the river some 20 miles above. That afternoon Captains Hardee and Thornton were sent with two companies of cavalry, 63 men in all, to reconnoitre. On Friday morning, they fell into an ambush of the enemy, when Lieut. Cain and 13 men were killed, Capt. Thornton missing, and Capt. Hardee and 46 men prisoners. On Saturday afternoon the Mexicans sent in a wounded man, who made the above report. These Mexicans, it is stated, were commanded by Canales and Carabajal. After the fight, the Mexicans on this side of the river were largely reinforced and have surrounded General Taylor’s camp, cutting off all communication with Point Isabel, at which place is the train and all of the stores belonging to the army—Gen. Taylor not having over ten days’ provisions. There are at Point Isabel 90 artillery men, 20 dragoons, about two hundred and fifty teamsters, and about a hundred and fifty citizens and laborers; and the entrenchments not half finished.

The steamer Monmouth, landed Mr. Catlett on the night of the 28th, at Port Labaca, with despatches from Gen. Taylor, calling on Gov. Henderson for forty companies of riflemen, 60 men each, 20 of the companies to be mounted men, to rendezvous at Corpus Christi. When they will be mustered into service and supplied with provisions. The foot companies will rendezvous at Galveston, where transportation will be furnished. The steamer Augusta was to have left the Brasos St. Iago on Monday night for New Orleans, with Gen. Taylor’s call on the Governor’s of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, for 8000 troops. Should immediate relief not be sent to Point Isabel, it will most probably fall into the power of the enemy, with all the army stores, and the destruction of the whole army may follow.

Gen. Taylor’s works in front of Matamoras would be completed on the morning of the 28th, at which time it was expected the fire would be opened on the city. Troops should not await the call of the Governor, as it will be a week before it can reach this place, but hurry to the relief of Point Isabel, as by saving that place only will we have it in our power to render the army timely assistance. Texans! You have now at last a glorious opportunity of retaliating on these perfidious Mexicans the many injuries they have done you, and of carrying that war into the heart of their own country, the cruelties of which they have so often made you feel.

We are indebted for the above to Mr. Benjamin S. Grayson, who has just returned by the Monmouth. He informs us that Capt. Catlet left the army on Sunday night with a Mexican guide, and, passing down the river, reached Point Isabel on Monday morning, with Gen. Taylor’s despatches to the Governor of Texas. The Monmouth was unable to leave until Monday morning, in consequence of having to discharge, and take in provisions to be sent in to Corpus Christi for the volunteers as fast as they arrive. These were left at St. Joseph, whence the White Wing is now taking them to their destination.

The Galveston reports that on Friday, the first of May, she fell in with the schooner Augusta, from Brasos St. Iago, and took on board Colonel Doane, bearer of important despatches from General Taylor.

It will be seen by the following (says the New Orleans Commercial Bulletin, ) that our brave fellow-citizens of Texas are already mustering to the rescue. We do not know whether the Governor of Louisiana has been called on for volunteers, but with or without a requisition, we know there are thousands in our city ready and eager to avenge their countrymen and chastise the invader. We have no doubt, however, that requisitions have been sent to Gov. Johnson.

From the Galveston Civilian—Extra.

The steamer Monmouth arrived off the bar yesterday evening, and came into port this morning, with late and exciting accounts from the army.

A company of 60 dragoons, under Captain Thornton, have been taken by the Mexicans.—They were out a short distance from camp—saw a few Mexicans reconnoitering, pursued them, and shortly found themselves surrounded by 1,000, (as is reported, ) Mexican infantry, who fired upon them, they turned to retreat, but found themselves surrounded by cavalry, and within the range of four pieces of artillery. They saw the Captain leap the fence enclosing the Mexican camp, and think he escaped. This information was obtained at General Taylor’s camp by a wounded man sent in by the Mexicans, for the benefit of our hospital. There were 13 or 14 of Captain Taylor’s Company killed.

General Taylor’s camp is said to be surrounded by a vastly superior Mexican force, and cut off from his supplies at Point Isabel, where there are but 400 men, liable at any time to be taken. Arista is in command of the Mexican forces, which he assumed on the 22d. He says he wishes to carry on the war in the European and Christian style.

General Taylor has called upon the Governor of Texas for forty companies of volunteers; the infantry to leave Galveston by steam; mounted men to rendezvous at Corpus Christi. Gen. Taylor is said to have but ten days' rations in his present position, which is a strong one, and capable of being defended against a greatly superior force; but it is feared he will be cut off from his supplies unless reinforced.

These are all the main facts which are in our possession as yet.

Gen. Hunt will leave for the seat of war this evening, and land, and wishes to be joined by those who are ready.

RE46v43i4p1c3, May 12, 1846: COIN IN TEXAS.

A correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce, writing from Austin (Texas) on the 13th of April, says:

“The currency here is gold and silver, the people relishing nothing else. They count by ‘dimes,’ ‘half-dimes,’ ‘bit’ (one shilling,) and dollars.—If a stray bank note makes its appearance, it is examined closely; and 'tis not strange, for they have been badly . . . [illegible] . . . If a merchant is going East or North, he finds no trouble in purchasing a bill of exchange on New Orleans, at which place he can obtain drafts on any point. I am inclined to think that the provision of the constitution prohibiting banking, is well for this new country.—There are so many extremely smart men always on the qui vive for obtaining bank charters, that Texas might have suffered by their financiering; if she had not, she would have been luckier than most of the new States have been.”[BWP]
To the Editors of the Enquirer:

WASHINGTON CITY, Saturday night, 1 o’clock.

"The news produced a great sensation and some little alarm, at first. I saw Gen. * * * and Mr. * * * to night. They seem to think that there is no danger of the army’s being cut off. I hear that Gen. Worth, who had tendered his resignation, on hearing the news this evening, with a promptness and patriotism which do him great credit, asked that his resignation should be suspended. He will to-morrow or next day return to his post in Texas. A great many persons seem to be pleased that we shall now have an opportunity of bringing our affairs with Mexico to a speedy settlement; that we have shown forbearance long enough, &c."[BWP]

TO ARMS! TEXANS, TO ARMS!

"The U. States Army under Gen. Taylor, is surrounded by the Mexican enemy on American soil. Gen. Taylor has called on the Governor of Texas for 2,400 troops; let Galveston show the world that they are always ready for the defence of their country.

ORDERS
Head Quarters, Galveston Volunteer Batallion,
30th April, 1846.

The commissioned and non-commissioned officers of the companies composing the Galveston Volunteer Battallion are requested to meet for consultation at 10 o’clock this morning, at the Galveston Artillery Armory, at Mr. Crawford’s store. The country needs our services! No time should be lost in immediately organizing the several corps of this battalion. The commandant of the battalion has the fullest confidence in the patriotism and zeal of the citizen soldiers of Galveston! He is sure they will not hesitate in this emergency! They have always desired an opportunity of showing their prowess to their Mexican enemies!

That opportunity has now arrived! It is expected the young men of Galveston will immediately rally as volunteers, nor wait for their services to be required by draft.

A rendezvous will be immediately opened for volunteers, to increase the ranks of each of the volunteer corps of the city, and also to organise and additional company of Infantry or Riflemen. A prompt attendance of the officers is expected at the time and place appointed. By order of C. G. BRYANT, Major Commanding Galveston Volunteer Battalion.

If 150 or 200 men, with the proper officers, can be raised by to-morrow morning, at 8 o’clock, they will be supplied with arms and accoutrements, and will take passage on board the steamer Monmouth, now bound for Point Isabel. N. KINGSBURY, Lieut. U. S. Army.

[From the New Orleans Bulletin, Extra, May 2].

The news in our second edition this morning, is regarded as of much importance.

Letters from authentic American sources in Matamoras state that the Mexican forces are at least 8,000 men, well equipped, with an excellent part of artillery.

The Governor of this State has issued his requisition for twenty-five hundred volunteers, and the soldiers are already in the Street, and making the most active preparations for departure. They will leave in the course of twenty-four hours.

The Legislature of this State with a patriotic promptitude, worthy of all praise, have already passed a bill appropriating 100,000 dollars for the service. The measure passed by acclamation.

[From the N.O. Picayune, Extra, May 2].

The Legislature has just passed, by acclamamation, a bill appropriating ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS to equip and forward Volunteers from this place to Point Isabel, or at whatever point they may be required.

The city is in great excitement. Guns are being fired from the Public Square, and drums and flags are paraded through the street. Louisiana will do her duty in this crisis![BWP]

RE46v43i4p1c5, May 12, 1846: FURTHER EXTRACTS.

In addition to the foregoing, which was published on Saturday last in a second edition of the Enquirer, the New Orleans Picayune has received an extra from the office of the “News,” at Galveston, where the intelligence was received by the steamboat Monmouth, with Capt. Catlett on board, a bearer of despatches from Gen. Taylor to Gov. Henderson, of Texas, calling upon him for aid. We give the letter to the Galveston Committee in full, as it best shows the urgency of the call for reinforcements:

LETTER OF CAPT. CATLETT TO THE PEOPLE OF GALVESTON.
ON BOARD STEAMER MONMOUTH, Off St. Joseph’s, April 28th, 1846.

Gentlemen: I am the bearer of a communication from Gen. Taylor to Gov. Henderson, requesting to be immediately reinforced by twenty companies of foot Riflemen. My destination is Victoria, and thence to Austin. I was instructed by the General to send an express from the former place by land to your city, with communications to Lieut. Kingsbury, and at the same time to spread the information through the country.—But it having been left discretionary with me, and the Monmouth being available, I have determined to send the communications by her, and also to write to you, in order to facilitate as much as possible the sending on of troops. Gen. Taylor is in a very precarious situation at his camp near Matamoras, and an attack is feared on the post at Point Isabel. I believe that a reinforcement of two hundred men would save that place. This is vastly important, as a large amount of commissariat and ordnance stores are deposited there, and, if that place should fall, Gen. Taylor will be left without resources of any kind.

I was instructed by Gen. Taylor to send out from Victoria expresses in such directions as I might deem most advisable, so as to have all the men possible on their march to his relief without awaiting the orders of the Governor. You will have it in your power to send to the Lower Brazos, Houston and Montgomery, sooner than an express can go from Victoria. I therefore leave that to you, knowing that it will be promptly attended to. I shall send to Matagorda, Texana, Richmond and San Felipe. If you have an opportunity, please send to Washington. Washington. I shall send there from La Grange.

The place of rendezvous for the foot companies is suggested by the General at Galveston; that of the mounted men at Corpus Christi; at which place there will be provisions and forage. No party less than 400 should think of going through on the direct road to Matamoras, as there is a large force of Mexicans on the Aroyo Colorado, for the purpose of cutting off reinforcements in that direction. Small parties can cross from Corpus Christi on to Padre’s Island. Arrangements are made for crossing from the lower point of the Island to Point Isabel.

If two hundred men could be raised even temporarily at Galveston, I am decidedly of opinion that it would be better to send them forth with by the Monmouth; the security of Point Isabel is of the last importance.

From the best information we could obtain, the force of the Mexicans is set down at seven thousand certain, and reports go as high as twelve thousand.

All communication is now cut off between the camp and Point Isabel, except by running the gauntlet. I came out in the night of the 27th with a guide, and was prowling all night through chaparral, swamps and lakes.

Capt. Baker will be able to give you all the particulars of what has happened, the situation of Point Isabel, &c., &c.

The old General is as cool as a cucumber, and has so strengthened his position, that I am of opinion nothing can move him but starvation. In haste, your obedient servant, W. G. CATLETT.

Messrs. Williams and others.

RE46v43i4p1c6, May 12, 1846: [Correspondence of the New Orleans Tropic.] ST. JOSEPH’S ISLAND, April 28th, 1846.

Mssr. Editors: By the arrival of the steamer Monmouth, this day, intelligence has been received at this place of the army of occupation being surrounded by 10,000 Mexican troops. The Mexican army passed the Rio Grande in the night. Capt. Thornton, 2d Dragoons, in attempting to cut his way out with his company, was killed. Also, two subalterns and 13 privates—the remainder taken prisoners. Gen. Taylor on this day, 28th, engages with the enemy. His whole force of fighting men will not number 3,000—his motto is, “conquer or die!” The U. S. troops are eager for the fray.

By the Augusta I sent you some of the items now transpiring around this interesting spot—The opinion is fast gaining ground here, that the inebriety of the Mexicans has been greatly overrated. This is the theatre of real war, not paper squabbles, but is the seat of the commencement of sanguinary conflict, and one it is feared of more importance and longer duration that has been anticipated; but the farce is at an end, and the curtain has risen midst blood and carnage, the opening of a drama almost unexpected, and our country already mourns the loss of some of her finest and bravest officers. On Thursday, the 23d, General Taylor received information that a body of the Mexican Army had crossed the Rio Grande some distance above the encampment.—Early the following morning, Captains Thornton and Hardee, of 2d Light Dragoons, with a Company of 70 men, were dispatched by Gen. Taylor to reconnoitre above, and Capt. Kerr, of the same regiment, with a Company to reconnoitre below the Encampment. The latter returned without having made any discovery. The former detachment fell in with what he considered to be a scouting party of the enemy, but which proved to be the advanced guard of a strong body of the enemy, who held a situation in the chapparel immediately in the rear of Gen. Taylor’s camp. Capt. Thornton charged upon the guard contrary to the advice of his Mexican guide, and on following the enemy Capt. Thornton found his command surrounded by the enemy, who fired on him, killing, as is supposed, Capt. Thornton, Lieuts. Kane and Mason, and some 26 of the men, and taking Capt. Hardee and the remainder of the command prisoners.

The Mexican commander sent in a cart to General Taylor’s camp with a soldier badly wounded, with a message that he had no travelling hospital with him and could not give him the assistance his situation required. There is no doubt the detachment of the enemy east of the Rio Grande consists fully of 2,500 men commanded by Colonels Carasco and Carrajabal, bold and intrepid officers of experience and ability; and were the whole army officered by such men as Carasco, as I know him personally, we should not be upon an unequal footing. There is no doubt their object is to cut off all communication with Point Isabel, this being the general depot of provisions for the American army; they have succeeded, and consequently placed the American army in a precarious situation. It will be utterly impossible for Gen. Taylor to force his way along the dreary chaparels in which the enemy are strongly posted. His command cannot exceed 2,300 men.

Gen. Taylor has an excellent position in the rear of Matamoras; and can hold his position against the whole Mexican army combined, and his batteries can raze the city in an hour. Most of the citizens have left Matamoras, and Gen’l Taylor has said, that when the regular soldiers of Mexico were seen on the East bank of the river, he would destroy the city. His batteries are to be ready on the 27th, complete. General Taylor has in camp full rations for 15 days, which he thinks can be made to last 30, by which time he is in hopes to receive large reinforcements from the States of Texas and Louisiana, upon each of which States he has made a requisition for the equipment and transmission to Point Isabel of four full regiments of militia.

It is thought by the superior officers of General Taylor’s army, that 20,000 men will be required within a very short period, as it is well known that the Mexican army is daily receiving large reinforcements from the interior. It was supposed by the American officers that General Arista reached Matamoras on the evening of the 22d, with a large Brigade, but up to the period of my informant leaving the camp, no communication had been received by General Taylor from General Arista. On the 22d, General Taylor received from General Ampudia, by the means of a flag of truce, a communication in very offensive terms, complaining of having blockaded the Rio Grade. To which he replied, that he General Ampudia, had been the cause of the blockade, he having expressly declared that, unless General Taylor commenced his retreat beyond the Neuces, within twenty-four hours after his displaying his flag upon the banks of the Rio Grande, he would consider War as being declared, and should act accordingly. General Taylor furthermore stated that he would receive no further communication from the Mexican Government, unless couched in language more respectful towards the Government and people of the United States. At Point Isabel, great fears were entertained of a night attack, which, from the exposed situation of that Point, could not be otherwise than successful, if conducted with energy.

The post is defended by Major Monroe, with a detachment of 80 artilleries. There are also at the post about 200 armed waggoneers, and 50 laborers under the orders of the Quarter Masters; some 100 citizens, furnished with arms by the United States Ordnance officer, organized under the command of Capt. Perkins, and denominated the Sumpter Guards. A company of 50 Mexican cavalry was seen on the night of the 26th, within five miles of Point Isabel., They were supposed to be a corps of observation. The body of Col. Cross was found on the 21st ult. About three miles from camp, frightfully mutilated and entirely divested of clothing.

The body of Lieut. Porter, who was killed by a party of banditti, under the command of Romero Flacon, had not been found. The principal officers, known to be in command of the Mexican forces, are Generals Arista, Ampudia, Mejia, and Canales; and Colonels Carasco and Carrajabal are men of talent. I am indebted for the above information to the politeness of Col. Doane, who is on his way to New Orleans in the Augusta.

P. S. A Messenger has just arrived, after severe toil and much danger, owing to the proximity of the troops and the state of the prairie. From him I learn, that Arista communicated politely to Gen. Taylor, that he had assumed command of the Mexican Army.

[BWP]
This distinguished officer passed through Richmond on his way to Texas on yesterday afternoon, to resume his command. On hearing of the probability, if not certainty, of a war with Mexico, he asked that his resignation should be returned to him.

The Fayette Artillery, Captain Thomas H. Ellis, were on parade yesterday, and on hearing of the arrival of General Worth, immediately repaired to the Petersburg Depot, and fired a salute in his honor, as the cars moved off for the South.

We understand that he says there is no doubt but that President Polk sent in a strong War Message to the two Houses of Congress on yesterday, and that the services of at least twenty thousand Volunteers will be required.

There never was a more righteous war than this which the United States now find themselves obliged to wage against Mexico, nor ever one into which a powerful country was so literally forced as this country has been into this. It ought, therefore, to engage the hearts of the entire people, to be prosecuted with a vigor and spirit corresponding with the forbearance and unwillingness to engage in it that have hitherto been manifested. It can be no difficult matter to invest the entire western coast, and that we take it will of course be done. The ports on the Gulf, all except Vera Cruz, will fall an easy prey. That strong hold, however, is very important, and if a sufficient force can be concentrated before the summer months set in, it ought to be reduced. If not, the remainder may be taken and a strict blockade maintained at Vera Cruz till the approach of winter. As for land attacks and invasions, the northern departments are already ripe for revolt, and far more attached to the American States than to Mexico, which they only know through its exactions and oppressions; these departments would no doubt hail an American invasion, as not intended to devastate but to liberate. Yucatan would of course eagerly seek the opportunity to confirm her independence, and no doubt give all the aid possible to the United States. The central departments would probably be more difficult. Their entire submission, however, dictated from the capital of the country, is the least that ought to be listened to.

That the war, if prosecuted with the least spirit, will lay the foundation for, if it do not immediately produce, the entire overthrow of Mexico, and its incorporation into the Federal Union, hardly admits of question. For that reason, therefore, if for no other the least possible violence ought to mark the progress of the army; and the people be conciliated rather than exasperated, wherever they do not make any hostile manifestation. [New Orleans Bulletin.]

A Company of Volunteers, numbering fully one hundred, left here last evening on the steamboat Fashion, for New Orleans, whence they will proceed with all possible despatch to the American Army on the Rio Grande. Before leaving, the Company elected Gen. Robert Desha Captain, and Capt. Thos. Adrian Lieutenant. Gen. Desha, immediately took charge of the Company and departed with it last evening. He is a gentleman of great energy, of undoubted bravery and has "seen service." A better man could not have been selected to take command of the Mobile Volunteers.

For an hour before their departure last evening, the wharves in the vicinity were lined with spectators, and as the boat shoved off the air resounded with the shouts and cheers “three times three, ” of the assembled thousands, in honor of the gallant and patriotic Volunteers who so nobly and promptly responded to their country’s call. May the God of battles protect them! [Mobile Daily Advertiser, May 5.]

The following American vessels of war, and perhaps others which we do not now recollect, are at present in the Gulf, and , we may suppose, are in communication with Gen. Taylor, and will proceed to blockade the entire Gulf coast, on learning that the Mexicans have commences hostilities, viz: the flag ship Cumberland, Com. Connor, the Potomac, Raritan, John Adams, St. Mary’s, Lawrence, steamer Mississippi, and schooner Flirt.—There is also quite a strong naval force on the Western coast of Mexico; quite sufficient, we think, with the aid of American settlers in California, to take possession of that entire line—very probably too, with the free consent of its inhabitants. We trust our vessels in the Gulf did not allow the Mexican steamers of war, recently pretended to have been sold to a mercantile house in Havana, to leave the ports of Mexico. There is scarce a doubt that the sale was a ruse, intended to get the vessels out of port without opposition, in order to fit them for privateers. [New Orleans Bulletin.] RE46v43i4p2c3, May 12, 1846: For the Enquirer.

The news last received from the Rio Grande is such as leaves great scope for speculation.—The ablest Mexican Generals are in the field. The little Texan Republic, it seems, has only angered this huge Spanish bull—we have infuriated him. By the union of Texas with the United States, he lost forever a portion of territory which he claimed, (though unjustly;) and now he is fighting to sustain himself. How his sides swell, and his mouth, how it foams! He is noble in his madness, and it is a great pity his means are not equal to his valor. He may loss about as much as he chooses, for that is all he can do; and, to my thinking, it gives him a little fatigue, and us no great alarm. Poor fellow, he will not see the ground presently for his blood; but not until he shall have gored some one. The overthrow of Capts. Thornton and Hardee's companies is deplorable in one sense, which will presently be shown. I think Point Isabel is already taken.—I think the enemy have attacked Gen. Taylor. If they have not done so, Mexican ingenuity is not a forerunner of Mexican foresight and ability. If the first blow be not followed by a last and general one, the Mexican war will be of short duration. It is their policy to drive Gen. Taylor's forces to destruction, and that is what they may do. If they do it, the war is only begun. With an advantage to the skill of Mexican generalship and the arms of their forces, there will come out of this affair more than is looked for. If we play with Mexico, England will fight with us—and thereby lose more lives and more glory than if we were to crush her at once.

No man cares much about defeats and victories who is far removed from them; nor even much about a war that is about to break out just under his nose. He only cares when he sees it begin, and begins with it. If there shall be found cause of mourning in the conflict of the two armies on the Rio Grande, we will be the first to find it. But the poor Mexicans, as they will be the first to find cause of rejoicing, so will they be first to lament the haste and imprudence of their proceedings. How can they expect to govern others who cannot govern themselves? Or how expect to show the treachery of others, when they are so treacherous themselves? I will await the issue of this conflict, satisfied that the valor of our arms will achieve a great and decisive triumph. But those of our army who are already in the field, I am afraid will never more return to their homes. They must fall, or I have little confidence in the foresight of the ablest of the Mexican generals. I hope all will yet be well; but I fear a few days will tell us an unwelcome tale. JONATHAN FORESIGHT.

RE46v43i4p2c5, May 12, 1846: No title.

No later information has been received from the army on the Rio Bravo than was published in our second edition of Saturday morning. We have seen, however, a number of private letters, which give a clearer insight into the state of affairs. From the best information we can get, we do not anticipate any serious disaster to the main body of the American army. The camp of Gen. Taylor is so well situated and entrenched that letters from himself and other officers of the army evince no apprehensions whatever. We infer that it is entirely impregnable except to an assault by greatly superior numbers. We do not remember any instance in which the Mexican soldiery have attempted to carry a stronghold by a coup de main; and, although we are far from placing the low estimate that is usually put on the character of the Mexican forces—we do not believe they have the degree of discipline, courage or resolution required to storm a breastwork in the face of a heavy cannonade. We doubt not therefore that Gen. Taylor will be able to keep his encampment, at least, if he do not find it expedient to match our and attack the enemy.

Every, however, that reinforcements are delayed serves to render the position of American troops more precarious; and, moreover, the occupation of our territory, and especially the besieging of our army on our own soil, are highly disgraceful, even should no branch of the service meet with a serious disaster. [New Orleans Bulletin, May 4.]

RE46v43i4p2c5, May 12, 1846: Correspondence of the Baltimore Sun. WASHINGTON, Sunday, 5, P.M.

Since the arrival of the mail last evening, fearful apprehensions have been entertained in every circle, that our brave little army on the banks of the Rio Grande have suffered loss from its sanguinary foe.

The President and Cabinet are at their posts; and the Clerks of the Navy and War Office have been busy during this whole Sabbath in preparing despatches for the Seat of War.

In the Capitol, the Committees on Military and Naval Affairs have been closely engaged all day. I learn that the
On to-morrow, President Polk will transmit a message to Congress, recommending certain measures, which will doubtless, he promptly responded to by both branches of Congress. Immediately on receipt of the news last evening, General Worth called on the Secretary of War, and inquired whether any action had been taken on his resignation? He was replied to in the negative, as he then withdrew it, and volunteered to return to the camp. He will leave here to-morrow morning. The mail is not yet in. The excitement increases as the moment of arrival approaches. Democrats and Whigs, Natives, and adopted citizens, are now all one family.

The officers of the Government.

This city is intensely excited by the recent news from the Rio Grande, and the general impression is, the President will send to Congress to-morrow an earnest recommendation to exert, promptly, the whole energies of the Government, to repel the insolent attacks of the Mexicans, and to avenge the blood of our citizens, which has been shed upon our own soil. As war does actually and avowedly exist no formal declaration may be recommended;
although the raising of a large . . . [illegible] . . . and the appropriation of the most ample means will probably be urged.

Mexico has declared the war—it will be for us to say, as Gen. Worth said to Gen. Viegas, when peace shall be made. Not only Matamoras, but Vera Cruz, Pampico and the City of Mexico, will feel the force of our avenging arm, and before peace will be restored, indemnity will be required for past offences, as well as for all the expenses of the war. Some members of Congress have expressed the expectation that a bill will be passed at once, for raising 25 or 50,000 volunteers for 12 months, if their services shall be required for long. But I will not attempt to anticipate the result of the important deliberations of to-morrow.

We were rejoiced to find, by the enclosed letter that the gallant Capt. Thornton and Lieut. . . . [illegible] . . . have, in all probability, escaped the doom of the lamented Cross, Porter and Kane, and the other brave men who have fallen with them in their country's service. This, you will see, is the very latest intelligence.

Gen. Worth returns to-morrow to the Camp, which he expects to reach in eleven days. The moment he heard last evening of the disasters that had occurred, he addressed a letter to the Government, requesting leave to withdraw his resignation, and to be restored forthwith to his recent command. The same delicate sense of honor which prompted him to tender the resignation of his commission, which he valued more than his life and less only than his . . . [illegible] . . ., induced him to tender his services to Gen. Taylor, in any and every shape or form that might be desired. Gen. T. wrote him that there was not the remotest probability of a conflict with the Mexicans, and that he need not remain a moment on that account. In the confidence of the truth of this opinion he came on here, but upon the instant of hearing that hostilities had commenced, he withdrew his resignation, and waives all consideration in regard to himself, till the question between his country and her enemies shall be settled. This spontaneous, prompt and voluntary act harmonizes with the chivalry of his character, and all are delighted who have heard of it. No man in the army possesses more of the confidence of the country. I have heard several anecdotes about him, that show an enthusiasm and ardor of temperament, which, combined with his known intelligence and heroism make him the man for the crisis. When that part of the letter I now send you, relating to Captain Thornton's cutting his way through the enemy with his own hand, was read to him, he exclaimed, "That was my sword—I knew it would never disgrace its country in that noble fellow, Thornton's, hand. As I left the camp, he asked me for it. I buckled it on him, and nobly and gallantly has he used it"—his manner, much more than his language, indicating the generous warmth of his feelings.

I have also been much interested in another incident in his history. As his brigade approached the Colorado of the West, he was warned by the Mexicans not to cross—that they would regard the attempt as a declaration of war, and fire upon them instantly. He replied, he had been ordered to take a position on the Rio Grande, and should do so, regardless of consequences. Many of the Mexicans lined the Western banks, and a larger body was represented to be in the rear. Gen. W., in speaking of it to a friend of mine, said, "I never saw a brigade display a finer spirit; yet I knew but few of them had ever been in action, and that the bravest were often appalled when first going into battle; I knew the importance of avoiding the slightest disaster, and that it would have a good effect for an officer of rank to set the example. I bad the men to follow me, and took to the water. The brave fellows followed in perfect order, with their cartridge-boxes tied to their heads, and their muskets raised above. The best troops of Europe could not have acted better. But as we took to the water, the Mexicans took to their heels." "Yes," as his Aid subsequently repeated the story in his absence, "he directed us to carry orders to a remote point of the brigade, and then, on his fine charger, plunged into the water—we soon saw his object was to send us out of danger, while he placed himself in front of it, and of course we soon returned to him."

I confess this little incident has added much in my eyes to the beauty of this gallant officer's character, and unless I am much mistaken, you will not reproach me for this detail, imperfectly and tediously given as it is. I got most of it from his interesting Aid, who will pardon me, I trust, for sending it to you. In great haste, W. F. R.
Thornton was sent out with a squadron of Dragoons four days since. Observing a party of Mexicans, he ordered the charge, when, to his astonishment, he found that it was a trap laid for him, and he was actually surrounded by about two thousand men. Thornton, nevertheless, cut his way through them with his own hand.—Lieutenant Mason and himself were the only two who passed through the ranks of the enemy. Captain Hardee, with forty men, were captured. Lieutenant Kane was killed in the charge. None have yet returned to Camp, save one wounded man, sent in by the Mexicans.—Thus, you see, the ball has opened at last.—Gen. Taylor despatched a messenger to this place last night. The steamer Monmouth will leave this place in half an hour with a requisition for ten thousand volunteers. Three thousand Mexicans are on this side of the river. Their object is no doubt to cut off the supplies from General Taylor’s Camp. Lieut. Montgomery informs me that there is but ten days’ provisions with the army. If so, I am afraid that they will be compelled to fight very hard for their “grub.”.

I sincerely hope that Gen. Worth’s friends have persuaded him to withdraw his resignation. We cannot lose him in our present situation—particularly so, when I tell you that, out of seven regiments, there are not six field officers with the army, army. Write me, my dear_____, and let me know what Gen. W. has done. I write you in haste, as the Monmouth is now firing up.—With my kindest regards to the General, whom I hope I shall have the pleasure of seeing soon among us. I remain, very truly, &c.

RE46v43i4p4c2, May 12, 1846: LATER FROM THE ARMY.

Colonel Cross Murdered—His Body Found.

The brig Apalachicola, Capt. Smith, which arrived at New Orleans on the 1st May, from Brazos Bay, whence she sailed on the 24th ult., reports that on the 22d she left Point Isabel, where Major Thomas, the acting Quarter Master, informed Capt. Smith that the body of Col. Cross had been found about four miles from Gen. Taylor’s camp on the Rio Grande. From the wounds upon the body it seems evident that he was killed by a lance. It was further reported that a person in Matamoras had acknowledged that he was the murdered, and had the watch and clothing of Col. Cross in his possession; and, also, that Gen. Taylor had made a formal demand for the murderer.

All open communications were permitted to pass by the commandant at Point Isabel between that post and Matamoras. The Mexican schooner Juanita, from New Orleans for Matamoras, was taken into Brazos Bay on the 22d ult. by the pilots—no doubt by permission of the blockading force.

We have the Galveston papers to the 29th, from which the following extracts are gleaned:

The Legislature will probably adjourn on the 5th proximo.

R. D. Johnson, Esq., has received the appointment of Postmaster, at Galveston, from the United States Government.

Daniel J. Toler, Esq., has been appointed special Agent of the Post Office Department in Texas.

Col. James Love, of Galveston, has been nominated and confirmed, as Judge of the District, including that city.

The Brazoria Planter of the 17th April, informs us that the Brazos has risen to within six feet of the top of the bank, but adds that it was then beginning to fall rapidly.

Verbal accounts state that the country has been nearly impassable in consequence of a long and quick succession of rains, which have extended from the Sabine to the Rio Grande. So much cloudy and wet weather has probably never been known in Texas, as has prevailed during the last six months.

The following is an extract of a letter, dated, Galveston, 27th April:

"The schooner Luda, Capt. Hunt, is supposed to be lost, with all on board; and the sloop Orange Branch, it is feared, is gone also; but this is not so certain. There are two other vessels wrecked, supposed to be from N. Orleans. Parts of vessels and bodies, have been picked up along the shore, from St. Joseph’’ island to the Brasos Santiago. It is feared that there has been great loss of life and property.

RE46v43i4p4c2, May 12, 1846: From the New Orleans Picayune, May 1st. STILL LATER.

The schr. Cornelia, Capt. Stark, arrived last evening from Brazos Santiago, whence she sailed on the evening of the 24th ult. She reports that about three hours before she sailed an express arrived from Gen. Taylor, stating that the commander of the Mexican forces had made a formal declaration to General Taylor that if he did not move his army from the position he then occupied within thirty-six hours, the Mexican batteries would be opened upon them.

The same express also stated, that at that time a body of 2,000 Mexicans had crossed the Rio Grande near Boretta—a small town about eight miles below Matamoras, on the West bank of the river—and taken up a position between Point Isabel and General Taylor’s camp. The design of this movement is evidently to cut off the American troops from their supplies. A private letter was also received last evening from an officer in General Taylor’s camp, confirming in part the above report of the Mexicans having crossed the river, but stating the number at 1,000 only. There had previously been so many rumors to the same effect in the camp, that little reliance was placed upon this one, which was first communicated by a Mexican, who was prudently detained by order of Gen. Taylor.

The accounts by the Cornelia confirms the melancholy news given above as to the fate of Col. Cross. He was found entirely stripped and wounded as before stated.

We have a letter from an officer in the camp, dated the 21st ult., the postscript to which states, what we had not doubt of that the Americans “had not retired one foot from the bank of the river, nor does the General mean to do anything that can look like it” “Our flag waves over the waters of the Rio Grande, and we have a fixed battery of 18 pounders, that can ‘spot’ anything in Matamoras.”

While upon the subject of the army, we may state that the steamer Col. Harney, which left here on Wednesday for Brazos Santiago, took with her a battery of ten long twelve pounders, and a quantity of munitions of war, and that she was to take in more at Galveston for the same destination. The New York, which sailed yesterday for the same point, had a detachment of 180 men on board for the army, under the command of Lieut. McPhail. Four companies of infantry are expected here in two or three days, who will be despatched immediately for the same destination.

The steamer Gen. Worth, twelve hours later from Brazos Santiago, and bringing, it is said, one day’s later intelligence from Gen. Taylor’s camp was in the river late last night, eight or ten miles below the city, waiting for a tow. It is said a bearer of despatches from Gen. Taylor was on board. Colonel Hunt immediately despatched a boat to bring her up. Mr. Marks, attached to the American Consulate at Matamoras, is on board the Gen. Worth. There was a rumor brought by one of the schooners last night, that our Consul at Matamoras, apprehending imprisonment from the Mexicans, had left his post and repaired to Gen. Taylor’s camp.

[BP]
It was stated through an interpreter—Mr. Mitchell—that a general officer of the U. S. Army had been sent by his commanding general, with despatches, to the commanding general at Matamoras, and to the civil authorities; and that an interview was requested.

After some conversation explanatory of the above, the Mexican party recrossed the river, to report in the commanding general at Matamoras, and return with his reply. An open note for the American forces wished a conference with the commanding general of the Mexican forces, it would readily be acceded to; but as a junior to the commanding general, on the part of the American troops, had requested a conference, General Mejia could not entertain such a proposition; but that an officer of corresponding rank and position, in the Mexican forces, would be ready to receive any communication sent by Gen. Taylor.

It was perceived that the relation of the parties was misapprehended, they supposing that a conference was requested; this was corrected immediately, and it was reiterated that Gen. Worth was merely the bearer of despatches, with authority to relate verbally certain matters of interest to the commanding general at Matamoras.

The proposition of Gen. Mejia was then acceded to, with the remark that this was a mere question of form, which should not be permitted to interfere with any arrangements necessary to the continuance of the friendly relations now existing between the two governments.

The Mexican party recrossed to the right bank, and after a short absence returned, stating that Gen. Romulo Vega would receive Gen. Worth on the right bank of the river—their own selection—for the reception of any communication which Gen. Worth might have to make from the commanding general.

Gen. Worth then crossed the river; accompanied by Lieut. Smith, aid-de-camp; Lieuts. Magruder, Deas and Blake, attached to his staff, together with Lieut. Knowlton as interpreter. On arriving at the right bank of the river, Gen. Worth was received by Gen. Vega with becoming courtesy and respect, and introduced to the "authorities of Matamoras," represented in the person of the Licenciado Casares. On he Mexican part were present, Gen. Vega, the Licenciado Casares, two officers represented as cavalry officers, and interpreter, with a person names Juan N. Garza, Official de Defensores.

After the usual courtesies on meeting, it was stated by Gen. Worth that he was the bearer of despatches from the commanding general of the American forces to Gen. Mejia, and to the civil authorities of Matamoras. A written and unsealed document was produced, and Gen. Vega desiring to know its contents, it was carefully read, and translated into French by Lieut. Knowlton, and afterwards translated into Spanish by the Mexican interpreter. Gen. Vega then stated, that he had been directed to receive such communications as Gen. Worth might present from his commanding general; going on to say, that the march of the U. S. troops into a part of the Mexican territory, Tamaulipas, was considered as an act of war.

Gen. Worth.—"I am well aware that some of the Mexican people consider it an aggressive act, gut [interrupted by the Mexican interpreter, and after a slight discussion of the international question on the part of Gen. Vega] Gen. Worth repeated the above remark, adding that it was not so considered by his Government; that the army had been orderethere by his Government, and there it would remain; whether rightfully or other wise, that was a question to be settled between the two Governments. Gen. Vega, still disposed to argue the merits of the case, was told by Gen. Worth, that "he came to state facts, not to argue them."

Gen. Worth then stated that he had been sent with despatches from his commanding general to Gen. Mejia; that Gen. Mejia had refused to receive it from him personally, adding, with emphasis and some degree of warmth—"I now state that I withdraw this dispatch, having read it merely as an act of courtesy to Gen. Vega; that, in addition to the written despatch to Gen. Mejia, I am authorized to express verbally the sentiments with which the commanding general proposed to carry out the instructions of his Government, in which he hoped to preserve the peaceable relations between the two Governments, leaving all questions between the two countries to be settled between the two Governments; and if hereafter Gen. Mejia wished to communicate with Gen. Taylor, he must propose the means—assuring Gen. Vega that, should Gen. Mejia present himself or send his communications by a subaltern officer, in either case, he would be received with proper courtesy and respect. The question of right of territory was again opened by Gen. Vega, who asked how the United States’ Government would view the matter should the Mexican troops march into or occupy a portion of the territory of the United States. Gen. Worth replied, that Gen. Vega might probably be familiar with the old proverb, "sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." And that "it would be time enough to consider such matters when the act was perpetrated.”.

This proverb did not appear to have been translated by the Mexican interpreter, but was received by General Vega with a smile and slight shrug.

Gen. Worth.—"Is the American Consul in arrest or in prison?".

Gen. Vega.—"No.”.

Gen. Worth.—"Is he now in the exercise of his proper functions?".
Gen. Vega, after apparently consulting with the Licenciado Casares for a moment, replied that he was.

Gen. Worth.—"Then, as an American officer, in the name of my Government and my commanding general, I demand an interview with the Consul of my country."

No Reply.

Gen. Worth.—Has Mexico declared war against the United States?"

Gen. Vega.—"No.".

Gen. Worth.—"Are the two countries still at peace?".

Gen. Vega.—"Yes.".

General Worth.—"Then I again demand an interview with the Consul of my Government in Matamoras—in presence, of course, of these gentlemen, or any other that the Commanding General in Matamoras may be pleased to designate."

General Vega reiterated that he was in the proper exercise of his functions—that he was not in arrest, nor were any Americans in Matamoras in arrest; that he would submit the demand to General Mejia, adding that he thought there would be great difficulty. This demand was repeatedly made, in the most emphatic manner, and a reply requested. General Vega stating that the Consul continued in the exercise of his functions, and that the demand would be submitted to General Mejia.

Here the interview was suspended, while the Licenciado left the party, to submit, as we understood, the demand for an interview with the Consul to General Mejia. While engaged in friendly intercourse, General Worth stated to General Vega, in an informal manner, as an evidence of the good faith, intentions and dispositions of his Commanding General, that he was well aware of the importance of Brazos Santiago to the commerce and business community of Matamorast—that he would respect their laws and customs, and freely grant entrance and exit to all Mexican and other vessels trading with Matamoras on the same terms as before its occupation by the United States, leaving all questions arising therefrom to be settled hereafter by the two Governments. At the expiration of about a quarter of an hour, the Licenciado returned, and reported that General Mejia would not accede to the request for an interview on the part of General Worth, saying nothing, however, relative to the question of the Consul.

Gen. Vega was then again informed that the despatches intended to be delivered to Gen. Mejia by Gen. Worth in person would be returned by him (Gen. W.) to his commanding General, considering any other disposition of them as disrespectful to him, repeating that they had been read to Gen. Vega in courtesy to him, and that Gen. Mejias must take his own means of communicating with Gen. Taylor; that whether Gen. Mejia sent a superior or subaltern officer to Gen. Taylor, at all times accessible, he would be received with becoming courtesy and hospitality, presenting at the same time a written and sealed document for the civil authorities of Matamoras, which was received by Gen. Vega and immediately transferred to the Licenciado Casares.

Gen. Vega.—"Is it the intention of Gen. Taylor to remain on the left bank of the Rio Grande?"

Gen. Worth.—"Most assuredly; and there to remain until directed otherwise by his Government."

Gen. Vega remarked that "we felt indignation at seeing the American flag placed on the Rio Grande, a portion of the Mexican territory.—Gen. Worth replied, "that was a matter of taste; notwithstanding, that, there it would remain."—The army had been ordered to occupy its present position by its Government; it came in a peaceful rather than belligerent attitude, with a determination to respect the rights and customs of those on the right bank of the Rio Grande, while it offers protection to all on the left bank within their own territory.

No reply having been received from Gen. Vega relative to the demand for an interview with the American consul, the question was again introduced by Gen. Worth, and the demand for the last time reiterated.

Gen. Vega promptly refused to accede to the demand, replying, without waiting for the interpretation, "No, no."

Gen. Worth.—"I have now to state, that the refusal of my demand to see the American consul is regarded as a belligerent act; and in conclusion I have to add, that the commanding general of the American forces on the left bank of the river will regard the passage of any armed party of Mexicans, in hostile array, across the Rio Grande, as an act of war, and pursue it according."

The interview here terminated, and General Worth and staff returned to the left bank of the river.

The above contains the substance of the interview between Generals Worth and Vega, and, as far as possible, the exact words and expressions used on the occasion. Lieutenants Knowlton and Magruder, of the 1st Artillery, Lieut. Deas, of the 4th Artillery, Lieut. Blake, of the Topographical Engineers, and Lieut. Smith, of the 8th infantry, were present at the interview.
The establishment of the seat of Government here, has completely "resurrected" the place.—Last year at this time the only denizens of the houses were hogs and fleas—now every one is filled, and they are even building more. So far as regards news, I have not a word to give, other than what you will find in the papers. I have been told, since my arrival here, that the public debt of Texas, which does not amount to more than $8,000,000, will be repudiated—one person tells me that they will not give even a league of land to cancel it.

We are off this afternoon for the scene of the treaty which Governor Butler is endeavoring to form with the Indians of Texas, and are told that the buffalo are to be found in immense herds between here and that place. G. W. K.

The following intelligence from the Army of Occupation, though not so late as the above, contains considerable of interest at the present time:

"On the morning of the 10th ult., when Gen. Taylor found himself exposed to the enemy’s fire, with his right and left unprotected in consequence of the peculiar bends of the river, he ordered one division of his army to take position in the bend above and the bend below the town, while with the main army he maintained his first position, where he still remains. Gen. Taylor has used all diligence to strengthen his position by throwing up breastworks, by intrenchments, fortifications, &c, and the Mexican General, Ampudia, has been equally industrious in fortifying, the town, defensively keeping his soldiers employed night and day.

"Gen. Taylor’s heavy ordnance of eighteen pounders are said to be situated within point blank shot of Gen. Ampudia’s house in the middle of the city, at a distance of 300 yards. Thus the two armies have been situated for upwards of two weeks up to our present dates, neither having committed any positive act of hostility upon the other." [BWP]

RE46v43i5p1c1, May 15, 1846: President’s Message.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The existing state of the relations between the United States and Mexico, renders it proper that I should bring the subject to the consideration of Congress. In my message at the commencement of your present session, the state of these relations, the causes which led to the suspension of diplomatic intercourse between the two countries in March, 1815, and the long continued and unredressed wrongs and injuries committed by the Mexican Government on citizens of the United States in their persons and property, were briefly set forth.

As the facts and opinions which were then laid before you were carefully considered, I cannot better express my present convictions of the condition of affairs up to that time, than by referring you to that communication.

The strong desire to establish peace with Mexico on liberal and honorable terms, and the readiness of this government to regulate and adjust our boundary, and other causes of difference with that power on such fair and equitable principles as would lead to permanent relations of the most friendly nature, induced me in September last to seek the re-opening of diplomatic relations between the two countries. Every measure adopted on our part had for its object the furtherance of these desired results. In communicating to Congress a succinct statement of the injuries which we had suffered from Mexico, and which have been accumulating during a period of more than twenty years, every expression that could tend to inflame the people of Mexico, or defeat or delay a pacific result, was carefully avoided. An envoy of the United States repaired to Mexico with full powers to adjust every existing difference. But though present on the Mexican soil, by agreement between the two governments, invested with full powers, and bearing evidence of the most friendly dispositions, his mission has been unavailing. The Mexican government not only refused to receive him, or listen to his propositions, but, after a long continued series of menaces, have at last invaded our territory, and shed the blood of our fellow-citizens on our own soil.

It now becomes my duty to state more in detail the origin, progress, and failure of that mission. In pursuance of the instructions given in September last, an inquiry was made, on the 13th of October, in 1845, in the most friendly terms, through our consul in Mexico, of the minister of foreign affairs, whether the Mexican government "would receive an envoy from the United States intrusted with full powers to adjust all the questions in dispute between the two governments;" with the assurance that "should the answer be in the affirmative, such an envoy would be immediately despatched to Mexico." The Mexican minister, on the 16th of October, gave an affirmative answer to this inquiry, requesting, at the same time, that our naval force at Vera Cruz might be withdrawn, lest its continued presence might assume the appearance of menace and coertion pending the negotiations. This force was immediately withdrawn. On the 10th of November, 1845, Mt. John Slidell, of Louisiana, was commissioned by me as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to Mexico, and was intrusted with full powers to adjust both the questions of the Texas boundary and of indemnification to our citizens. The redress of the wrongs of our citizens naturally and inseparably blended itself with the question of boundary. The settlement of the one question in any correct view of the subject involves that of the other. I could not, for a moment, entertain the idea... that the claims of our much injured and long suffering citizens, many of which had existed for more than twenty years, should be postponed, or separated from the settlement of the boundary question.

Mr. Slidell arrived at Vera Cruz on the 30th of November, and was courteously received by the authorities of that city. But the Government of Gen. Herrera was then tottering to its fall. The revolutionary party had seized upon the Texas question to effect or hasten its overthrow. Its determination to restore friendly relations with the United States, and to receive our minister, to negotiate for the settlement of this question, was violently assailed, and was made the great theme of denunciation against it. The Government of General Herrera, there is good reason to believe, was sincerely desirous to receive our minister, but it yielded to the storm raised by its enemies, and on the 21st of December refused to accredit Mr. Slidell upon the most frivolous pretexts. These are so fully and ably exposed in the note of Mr. Slidell of the 24th of December last to the Mexican minister of foreign relations, herewith transmitted, that I deem it unnecessary to enter into farther detail on this portion of the subject.

Five days after the date of Mr. Slidell’s note, Gen. Herrera yielded the Government to General Paredes without a struggle, and on the 30th of December resigned the Presidency. This revolution was accomplished solely by the army, the people having taken little part in the contest; and thus the supreme power in Mexico passed into the hands of a military leader.

Determined to leave no effort untired to effect an amicable adjustment with Mexico, I directed Mr. Slidell to present his credentials to the government of Gen. Paredes, and ask to be officially received by him. There would have been less ground for taking this step had Gen. Paredes come into power by a regular constitutional succession. In that event his administration would have been considered but a mete constitutional continuance of the government of Gen. Herrera, and the refusal of the latter to receive our minister would have been deemed conclusive, unless an intimation had been given by Gen. Paredes of his desire to reverse the decision of his predecessor.

But the government of General Paredes owes its existence to a military revolution, by which the subsisting constitutional authorities had been subverted. The form of government was entirely changed, as well as all the high functionaries by whom it was administered.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Slidell, in obedience to my direction, addressed a note to the Mexican minister of foreign relations, under date of the 1st of March last, asking to be received by that government in the diplomatic character to which he had been pointed. This minister, in his reply, under date of the 12th of March, reiterated the arguments of his predecessor, and in terms that may be considered as giving just grounds of offence to the government and people of the United States, denied the application of Mr. Slidell. Nothing, therefore, remained for our envoy but to demand his passports, and return to his own country.

Thus the Government of Mexico, though solemnly pledged by official acts in October last to receive and accredit an American envoy, violated their plighted faith, and refused the offer of a peaceful adjustment of our difficulties. Not only was the offer rejected, but the indignity of its rejection was enhanced by the manifest breach of faith in refusing to admit the envoy, who came because they had bound themselves to receive him. Nor can it be said that the offer was fruitless from the want of opportunity of discussing it: our envoy was present on their own soil. Nor can it be ascribed to a want of sufficient power: our envoy had full powers to adjust every question of difference. Nor was there room for complaint that our propositions for settlement were unreasonable: permission was not even given our envoy to make any proposition whatever.—Nor can it be objected that we, on our part, would not listen to any reasonable terms of their suggestion: the Mexican Government refused all negotiation, and have made no proposition of any kind.

In my message at the commencement of the present session, I informed you that upon the earnest appeal both of the Congress and convention of Texas, I had ordered on efficient military force to take position "between the Nueces and the Del Norte." This had become necessary to meet a threatened invasion of Texas, by the Mexican forces, for which extensive military preparations had been made. The invasion was threatened solely because Texas had determined, in accordance with a solemn resolution of the Congress of the United States to annex herself to our Union: and, under these circumstances, it was plainly our duty to extend our protection over her citizens and soil.

This force was concentrated at Corpus Christi, and remained there until after I had received such information from Mexico as rendered it probable, if not certain, that the Mexican government would refuse to receive our envoy.

Meantime, Texas, by the final action of our Congress, had become an integral part of our Union. The Congress of Texas by its act of December 19th, 1836, had declared the Rio del Norte to be the boundary of that republic. Its jurisdiction had been extended and exercised beyond the Nueces. The country between that river and the Del Norte had been represented in the Congress and in the convention of Texas, had thus taken part in the act of annexation itself; and is now included within one of our Congressional districts. Our own Congress had, moreover, with great unanimity, by the act approved December 31st, 1845, recognised the country beyond the Nueces as part of our territory by including it within our own revenue system; and a revenue officer, to reside within that district, has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It became, therefore, of urgent necessity to provide for the defence of that portion of our country. Accordingly, on the thirteenth of January last, instructions were issued to the general in command of these troops to occupy the left bank of the Del Norte. This river—which is the South-western boundary of the State of Texas—is an exposed frontier. From this quarter invasion was threatened; upon it, and in its immediate vicinity, in the judgment of high military experience, are the proper stations for the protecting forces of the government. In addition to this important consideration, sever others occurred to induce this movement. Among these are the facilities afforded by the ports at Brazos Santiago and the mouth of the Del Norte for the reception of supplies by sea, the stronger and more healthful military positions, the convenience for obtaining a ready and a more abundant supply of provisions, water, fuel and forage and the advantages which are afforded by the Del Norte in forwarding supplies to such posts as may be established in the interior and upon the Indian frontier.

The movement of the troops to the Del Norte was made by the commanding general, under positive instructions to abstain from all aggressive acts towards Mexico, or Mexican citizens, and to regard the relations between that Republic and the United States as peaceful, unless she should declare war, or commit acts of hostility indicative of a state of war. He was specially directed to protect private property and respect personal rights.

The army moved from Corpus Christi on the 11th of March, and on the 28th of that month arrived on the left bank of the Del Norte, opposite to Matamoras, where it encamped on a commanding position, which has since been strengthened by the erection of field works. A depot has also been established at Point Isabel, near the Brazos Santiago, thirty miles in rear of the encampment. The selection of his position was necessarily confined to the judgment of the General in command.

The Mexican forces at Matamoras assumed a belligerent attitude, and on the 12th of April, General Ampudia, then in command, notified General Taylor to break up his camp within twenty-four hours, and to retire beyond the Nueces river, and in the event of his failure to comply with these demands, announced that arms, and arms alone, must decide the question. But no open act of hostility was committed until the 24th of April. On that day, General Arista, who had succeeded to the command of the Mexican forces, communicated to General Taylor that "he considered hostilities commenced, and should prosecute them." A party of dragoons of sixty-three men and officers were on the same day despatched from the American camp up the Rio del Norte, on its left bank, to ascertain whether the Mexican troops had crossed, or were preparing to cross the river, "became engaged with a large body of these troops, and after a short affair, in which some sixteen were killed and wounded, appear to have been surrounded, and compelled to surrender."

The grievous wrongs perpetrated by Mexico upon our citizens throughout a long period of years, remain unredressed; and solemn treaties, pledging her public faith for this redress, have been disregarded. A Government either unable or unwilling to enforce the execution of such treaties, fails to perform one of its plainest duties.

Our commerce with Mexico has been almost annihilated. It was formerly highly beneficial to both nations; but our merchants have been deterred from prosecuting it by the system of outrage and extortion which the Mexican authorities have pursued against them; whilst their appeals through their own Government for indemnity have been made in vain. Our forbearance has gone to such an extreme as to be mistaken in its character. Had we acted with vigor, in repelling the insults and redressing the injuries inflicted by Mexico at the commencement, we should doubtless have escaped all the difficulties in which we are now involved.

Instead of this, however, we have been exerting our best efforts to propitiate her good will. Upon the pretext that Texas, a nation as independent as herself, thought proper to unite its destinies with our own, she has affected to believe that we have served her rightful territory, and, in official proclamations and manifestoes, has repeatedly threatened to make war upon us for the purpose of reconquering Texas. In the mean time, we have tried every effort at reconciliation. The cup of forbearance had been exhausted, even before the recent information from the frontier of the Del Norte. But now, after reiterated menaces, Mexico has passed the boundary of the United States, has invaded our territory, and shed American blood upon the American soil. She has proclaimed that hostilities have commenced, and that the two nations are now at war.

As war exists, and, notwithstanding all our efforts to avoid it, exists by the act of Mexico herself, we are called upon, by every consideration of duty and patriotism, to vindicate, with decision, the honor, the rights, and the interests of our country.

Anticipating the possibility of a crisis like that which has arrived, instructions were given in August last, "as a precautionary measure," against invasion, or threatened invasion, authorizing Gen. Taylor, if the emergency required, to accept volunteers, not from Texas only, but from the States of Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee and Kentucky; and corresponding letters were addressed to the respective Governors of those States. These instructions were repeated; and in January last, soon after the incorporation of "Texas into our union of States," Gen. Taylor was further "authorized by the President to make a requisition upon the Executive of that State for such of its militia force as may be needed to repel invasion, or to secure the country against apprehended invasion." On the 2d day of March, he was again reminded, "in the event of the approach of any considerable Mexican force, promptly and efficiently to use the authority with which he was clothed to call to him such auxiliary force as he might need." War actually existing, and our territory having been invaded, Gen. Taylor, pursuant to authority vested in him by my direction, has called on the Governor of Texas for four regiments of State troops—to be mounted, and two to serve on foot; and on the Governor of Louisiana for four regiments of infantry, to be sent to him as soon as practicable.

In further vindication of our rights and defence of our territory, I invoke the prompt action of Congress to recognise the existence of the war, and to place at the disposition of the Executive the means of prosecuting the war with vigor, and thus hastening the restoration of peace. To this end I recommend that authority should be given to call into the public service a large body of volunteers to serve for not less than six or twelve months unless sooner discharged. A volunteer force is, beyond question, more efficient that any other description of citizen soldiers; and it is not to be doubted that a number far beyond that required would readily rush to the field upon the call of their country. I further recommend that a liberal provision be made for sustaining our entire military force and furnishing it with supplies and munitions of war.
The most energetic and prompt measures, and the immediate appearance in arms of a large and overpowering force, are recommended to Congress, as the most certain and efficient means of bringing the existing collision with Mexico to a speedy and successful termination.

In making these recommendations, I deem it proper to declare, that it is my anxious desire not only to terminate hostilities speedily, but to bring all matters in dispute between this government and Mexico to an early and amicable adjustment; and, in this view, I shall be prepared to renew negotiations, whenever Mexico shall be ready to receive propositions, or to make propositions of her own.

I transmit herewith a copy of the correspondence between our envoy to Mexico and the Mexican minister for foreign affairs; and so much of the correspondence between that envoy and the Secretary of State, and between the Secretary of War and the General in command on the Del Norte, as are necessary to a full understanding of the subject.

JAMES K. POLK.
Washington, May 11th, 1846.

RE46v43i5p1c3, May 15, 1846: TWENTY-NINTH CONGRESS. MONDAY, May 11, 1846. IN SENATE.

The journal having been read—.

A Message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. Walker, his private Secretary, which was read by the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. Sevier moved to refer the message and accompanying documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate, and that they be printed.

Mr. Davis called for the reading of the documents.

Mr. Speight moved to print 20,000 extra copies.

Mr. Calhoun said that we were placed in a position calling for solemn consideration, and which it might take years to terminate. He hoped that the Senate would act with that calm deliberation which became so important a subject, and meet the crisis firmly and in a proper spirit. He hoped the printing would be confined to the usual number, and the Committee of Foreign Relations could then determine upon the propriety of printing an extra number. He was opposed to any precipitation.

Mr. Speight said he offered his motion to print at the suggestion of Senators around him. He approved of the views of the Senator from South Carolina, but as the documents would be spread before the public in the newspapers, he could see no impropriety in printing an extra number.—He approved of the message, which did not ask for a declaration of war, but merely for the means of repelling invasion.

Mr. Allen advocated the printing of an extra number of copies. The Senator from Mississippi had stated that the President asked no declaration of war; but he forgot to mention the important fact which the President communicated, that war already exists. Mr. A. asked for the ayes and noes, on the motion to print an extra number.

Mr. Sevier inquired whether his motion to refer the message and documents, and to print the usual number of copies, had been carried?.

The President said the question had not been put.

Mr. Sevier asked that it should be put, before the question was taken on the motion to print an extra number.

Mr. Calhoun pointed out the distinction between a state of war and a state of hostilities.—According to the Constitution, war could not exist without action on the part of Congress. The President may repel invasion, but cannot make war without the advice of Congress. Mr. C. said his objection to the motion to print was made with a view to prevent any precipitate action, or by the printing of so large a number, to give the endorsement of the Senate to the sentiments of the message.

Mr. J. M. Clayton moved to refer to the Committee on Military Affairs. War existed, and the message called upon us for troops and money. The Military Committee was therefore the proper Committee to refer to.

Mr. Morehead regretted that he could not concur in the motion of reference made by his friend from Delaware. He thought the Committee on Foreign relations was the proper Committee to which the subject ought to be referred. He agreed with the Senator from South Carolina, that there was a distinction between a state of war and a state of hostilities, and that war could not exist, according to the Constitution, without the action of Congress.

Mr. J. M. Clayton said the Military Committee was, in his opinion, the proper one to refer the subject to. The President had informed us that war existed, and he was not going to pause to enquire whether we were at war according to the Constitution or not, but to vote the supplies of men and money at once, and by so doing he did not indicate any approval of the course of the President in bringing about such a state of things. Our first care was to adopt measures to defend the honor of the country, and inquire into causes afterwards.

Mr. Archer opposed the reference to the Military Committee. He was surprised that his friend from Delaware had not discovered the distinction pointed out by the Senator from South Carolina. He did not understand the message as saying that war actually existed. It could not exist legally and constitutionally. If we recognise the assertion that war did exist, we placed it in the power of our Military commanders on the frontier to involve the country in a war at their pleasure.

He would remind the Senate that an American vessel was destroyed a few years since in our own waters by an authorized force of Great Britain. Did that constitute a state of war between this country and Great Britain? Certainly not, and neither did the attack of the Mexican troops.

Mr. Benton said that two distinct questions were presented in the message. One involving the voting of supplies and recognizing the call made for volunteers, and the other in reference to the political relations between the two countries. He moved to refer so much of the message as related to the former subject to the Military Committee, and so much as referred to the latter to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. Sevier accepted the modification.

Mr. Cass said he approved highly of the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Delaware. They were sentiments which did honor to him as a man and as a Senator. In reference to a state of war, he said that it took but one country to make a war, although it took two to make peace. There were recent occurrences in Europe which showed that war could take place, without a formal declaration on either side.

After some further remarks from Mr. Allen and Mr. Calhoun.

Mr. Morehead expressed surprise that the Senator from Michigan should have taken occasion to congratulate the Senator from Delaware for the expression of sentiments, patriotic and honorable in themselves and beautifully expressed, but which he ventured to say were the sentiments of every member upon the floor. Mr. M. said that if we were at war in the proper sense of the term, the President had the power of bringing about a state of war without the action of Congress.

Mr. Cass said he certainly could not have been understood, in congratulating the Senator from Delaware upon the expression of his sentiments, as intending to cast any imputation upon any other Senator. He repudiated any such idea and said that he was satisfied that there was not a Senator upon that side of the chamber who would not go as far as he (Mrs. Cass) would in defending the honor of his country.

After an interesting debate, in which, Messrs. Sevier, J. NM. Clayton, Allen, Calhoun, Crittenden, and others, took part, the resolution of Mr. Sevier, as modified by Mr. Benton, was adopted with a division.

The motion to print 20,000 extra copies was also adopted.

The bill to increase the rank and file of the Army was taken up, slightly amended, and passed.

The bill from the House to retrocede the county of Alexandria to the state of Virginia, was read twice and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. Archer moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill to increase the rank and file of the Army was passed. The motion will come up to-morrow.

After an Executive session, the Senate adjourned.

RE46v43i5p1c3, May 15, 1846: HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Long before the hour of meeting the galleries commenced filling, and the members were gathered in groups upon the floor, discussing the important matters about to be brought up.

As soon as the journal was read, the rules were suspended in order to receive reports from committees.
A bill was reported from the post office committee to amend the act of 1845, regulating the rates of postage. It was twice read and referred to a Committee of the Whole. A great number of private and local bills were also reported.

An ineffectual attempt was made to introduce all orders which have been given to General Taylor since he has assumed the command of the army on the frontiers of Texas.

On motion of Mr. McKay the House then went into Committee of the Whole, and took up the bill making appropriation for the support of the Military academy at West Point.

The usual motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, was made and rejected by a large vote.

Mr. Sawyer having given the Senate a scorching rebuke for its tardiness in passing the Oregon bills, to the great amusement of the Committee, was still upon the floor, when the private Secretary of the President of the United States appearing at the bar, the Committee immediately rose, and the Speaker resumed the Chair.

The Message was then received, and read by the Clerk amidst breathless silence, after which Mr. Haralson, the Chairman of the Military Committee, moved that the Message, with the accompanying documents, be laid on the table and printed. On that motion he moved the previous question, alleging as a reason the importance of prompt action.

Messrs. G. Davis and Schenck warmly advocated the reading of the whole of the accompanying documents before the House should be called upon to vote on the printing.

After a sharp skirmish upon various points of order, the previous question was insisted upon, and a division of the question on the laying on the table, and printing ordered.

The motion to lay on the table having been carried, and the motion to read the papers having been negativated, Mr. Schenck rose, and with some warmth held a controversy with the Chair, relative to certain points of order.

The resolution of Mr. Schenck differing from that of the Chair, Mr. S. exclaimed that the question of peace or war involved the honor of the Speaker.

The Speaker promptly replied, that a question of peace or war involved the honor of the country, and not of the Speaker.

Finally, in the midst of great confusion, during which it was very difficult to hear, Mr. Schenck moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the House had refused to have the papers accompanying the message read. This motion was laid on the table by a vote of 116 ayes . . .[illegible] . . .

Mr. Haralson then, amidst great uproar and calls to order, succeeded in explaining that the only motive he had in objecting to the reading of the papers at this time, was in order that the House might have the benefit of them in Committee of the Whole. After further remarks, he moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of taking up the bill reported from the military committee some weeks ago, authorizing the President of the United States, in case of invasion of any portion of the United States, to accept the services of volunteers, &c.

The motion to go into committee was carried without a division, whereon the House went into committee and took up the above bill.

As soon as it had been read through by the Clerk, on motion of Mr. Brinkerhoff, the committee rose, in order that he might offer a resolution to the effect that all debate on the bill, when next taken up in committee, shall cease in two hours.

A motion was made to lay the resolution on the table, but without success.

The resolution was then adopted, after which the House went again into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the bill.

All the documents accompanying the message having been read, Mr. Brinkerhoff, a member of the Military Committee, moved to amend the bill, so that, in conformity to the wish of the President, the actual existence of war might be clearly recognized, and the means given at once to the Executive to prosecute it with vigor, so as to bring it to a speedy termination.

Mr. Brockenbrough moved to amend, by authorizing the President of the United States to retaliate upon Mexico, and to take as much as possible of the Mexican Territory, with a view of holding it until the conclusion of an honorable peace.
Mr. Isaac E. Holmes made an appeal to the Committee, and warned members not to be too precipitate in their declaration of war. He reminded them that it was possible that the Government of Mexico might disown the act of her Commander; and, if so, in what a situation should we be placed by a premature declaration of war? He denied that any information received warranted the belief that Mexico has declared war. If, therefore, we shall declare war, he knew that in several quarters letters of marque were in readiness to be given to vessels which, under Mexican colors, would sweep our merchantmen from the seas.

With a view of preventing his disastrous result, and of allowing time to our merchants to recall their vessels, he was in favor of waiting until we could get more information, and ascertain whether the Congress of Mexico would recognize the act of the Commander, etc. The noise and confusion at this period was so great that it was utterly impossible to hear the conclusion of the gentleman’s speech.

Mr. Rhett gave his views, after which Mr. Haralson, the Chairman of the Military Committee, took the floor. He was for no timid or halfway measures. He wanted firm and decisive measures. If energetic measures were not adopted, the cost and trouble of prosecuting the war, and of sustaining our right and honor, would be increased twenty fold. Would members refuse to authorize the President to send troops into the Mexican territory, after the Mexicans had come over upon our soil, and shed the blood of our citizens?

Here the time allotted for debate expired, and the Committee commenced voting on the amendments.

A slight amendment having been made to the first section of the bill, Mr. Burt moved that the committee rise and he desired to give his reasons, but it was not in order. The question on rising was then rejected by a large majority.

Mr. Tibbatts moved to amend the 1st section of the bill by authorizing the President to employ the naval and military forces of the country in invading Mexico. This was rejected without a count.

An amendment was then offered, to the effect that the President be authorised to employ the naval and military forces of the country in the vigorous prosecution of the war now existing between this country and Mexico.

Tellers being ordered, the amendment was rejected, ayes 58, noes 91.

Mr. Holmes of New York moved to amend by providing that the first section of the bill shall not apply except so far as it may relate to the removal or rescue of our army from the Rio Grande. Tellers being had, the amendment was rejected, ayes 8, noes 122.

Mr. Chipman moved to amend by a declaration of war against Mexico for her misdeeds, and tried to get in a little speech, but he was called to order. His amendment was rejected.

Numerous other amendments of a similar character were also rejected.

The question was then taken by tellers on the amendment of Mr. Brinkerhoff, recognising the actual existence of war, &c., and it was rejected ayes 80, noes 82.

Several other propositions to amend having been negatived, at 4 o'clock, Mr. J. R. Ingersoll moved that the committee rise, but without success.

Mr. Boyd moved to strike out the first part of the bill and to insert a substitute for that portion, which was agreed to.

At a late hour the committee rose and reported the bill to the House as amended.

The question then was on concurring in the amendment of the committee.

The question was first taken on the amendment of Mr. Boyd, striking out the first part of the bill and inserting a substitute for the same, in substance as follows: “Whereas, the recent acts of Mexico have caused a state of war to exist between the government of Mexico and the government of the United States, be it enacted, etc., that with a view of prosecuting the war and bringing it to a speedy termination, the President is authorized to employ the Naval and Military forces of the United States, and to accept the services of sufficient number of volunteers not exceeding fifty thousand, who will serve for twelve months, or to the termination of the war, unless, sooner discharged.

"Also, that the sum of ten millions of dollars be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury, or which may come into the Treasury, to carry the provisions of this act into effect.”.

This substitute was agreed to by a vote of –yeas 123, nays 67.

The third section provides that the volunteers shall furnish their own clothes, and of cavalry, their own horses, and when mustered into service to be armed and equipped at the expense of the United States.

The other sections are unimportant.
The bill as amended, of Mr. Haralson, was then passed by a vote of 174 ayes to 14 nays.—Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. John Q. Adams, Ashmun, Cranston, Culver, Delano, Giddings, Grinnell, Hudson, D. P. King, Root Severance, Strohm, Tilden and Vance.

The House then adjourned.

RE46v43i5p1c5, May 15, 1846: FROM THE SENIOR EDITOR. Washington, May 12, 1846.

Another deeply interesting day in the history of the country. From 12 o'clock till half past 4 P. M., I listened to the most engaging debate in the Senate which it was ever my good luck to enjoy. The great question of peace or war was in agitation. The subject was the bill from the House, recognizing the existence of war with Mexico, and investing the President with the power to raise 50,000 volunteers, and putting ten millions of dollars at his disposal. As in the House, the main debate was confined to the proposition to strike out those passages declaring that war was in existence, and limiting the operation of the bill to the repelling of the invasion of Mexico. The leading men of the Senate took part, and it is unnecessary to say, that it was able and profound. I rejoice to add, that it was, as the solemnity of the occasion required, cool, unimpassioned and dignified. I shall not attempt to sketch any part of it. It you will find it well and fully reported with the votes, &c., in the City papers, and I am sure that you can find nothing more interesting to occupy the columns of the Enquirer.

Mr. Calhoun was, as usual, bold and ingenious; but he was far from convincing me that war did not really exist with Mexico. He denied the truth of this proposition so strongly and so solemnly, that on the passage of the bill he did not find it consonant with his deep convictions to vote for the bill. It is needless for me to add, that he did not find it in his heart, like Davis of Massachusetts ("Honest John") and Thomas Clayton of Delaware, to vote against so important a measure. I regret that a statesman so distinguished for his talents and virtues, was compelled by circumstances to remain neutral upon so momentous a question. I cannot do justice to the forcible and eloquent speeches in favor of the bill as it came from the House—and shall, therefore, not attempt to give even an outline of them. Suffice it to say, that they all managed the great question in a masterly style, and carried conviction to their hearers. As a Virginian, I feel proud at the stand taken by Senator Pennybacker. Pennybacker. He was the first to march up to the exposition of the leading doctrines of the law of nations and by apt quotations from the great writers on the subject, clearly demonstrated that war could exist, without a prior declaration, and that, in the present case, there could be no doubt of the existence of war with Mexico. It was a strong and able argument, and, as I heard a gentleman remark, such an one as would be listened to with interest by men of sense. He to-day showed himself to be a Senator worthy of the Old Dominion, and of the glorious Tenth Legion.

Mr. Archer expressed himself as free from doubt as to the existence of war, but he voted for the motion to strike out, to enable gentlemen to deliberate upon the important question. His matter and his manner were very creditable to him. The motion to strike out was lost—20 to 26—and the bill was passed by the overwhelming vote of 40 to 2, after having been amended by reducing the pay from $10 to $8 per month, (a proper modification, placing the volunteers on the same level with the regular army, ) and by giving to the States, instead of to the President, the right of appointing the officers. The House had taken a recess, to re-assemble at half past 7, P. M., when they promptly agreed to the amendments, and the bill is now the law of the land.—Is it not most gratifying spectacle, to see the two Houses of Congress boldly seizing the subject, and with almost entire unanimity adopting the promptest and most vigorous measures for the defence of the country? Rely upon it, the action of yesterday and to-day will go very far to inspire the respect of foreign nations for our national power and courage, and to secure the peace of the country. Had Congress hesitated to sustain the recommendations of the Executive, we might have looked with dread to the unfavorable impression produced abroad. Now, the world will see that we are willing and able to defend our honor and our rights, when assailed—and other powers will be satisfied of the policy of doing us justice, and thereby keeping on good terms with us.

Before the meeting of the Senate I enjoyed an hour in the House, listening to a most extraordinary tirade from Joshua R. Giddings. Extravagant as my notions were in regard to the stupid frenzy of this chief of the Abolitionists, his effusions to-day far out-topped my expectations. The bill under discussion was to organize a company, amounting to 100, of sappers, miners and pontoniers. It came from the Senate. Strange to say, they have in the army no such useful elements of military organization. The object of the bill was to form a nucleus for the diffusion of such valuable intelligence and skill throughout the army. Giddings embraced the opportunity to pour out his bile upon the annexation of Texas, the slaveholders, &c. If ever man was guilty of moral treason, by giving aid and encouragement by words to the enemies of his country, this madman to-day brought himself fully under the ban. He denounced his fellow-citizens for all that was mean, and exalted the Mexicans to the skies. He said that Heaven was on the side of the Mexicans, and that they never could be conquered by the grasping and guilty Americans. In a word, he openly trampled upon the American flag, and raised his voice in favor of the triumph of Mexican arms. Had not this fanatic sunk himself so low by his ridiculous and treasonable exhibitions, I might have felt my Southern blood grow warm under his coarse and brutal attacks. But all he wants is notoriety, and I rejoice that no Southern man gratified him by a reply, and that G. was passed over with the silent contempt he deserved. I did not envy the feelings of the Southern Whigs, when Giddings referred to them as "my political friends."

A very good hit was made at him by Mr. Martin of Ky. Mr. Brodhead of Pennsylvania called G. to order; when Mr. Martin rose and said, that the gentleman (Giddings) was perfectly in order, in defending his friends who had deserted from the American army across the Rio Grande!
But I must stop—it is very late, and I feel exhausted by the excitement of the day. I have just returned from a brilliant and most picturesque "May Ball" at Carusi's, celebrated by the pupils of Mr. Labbe. Hundreds of lovely little girls, decked with flowers, and their youthful partners, arrayed in uniform costumes, went through every variety of graceful fancy dances. I shall not trust my pen to write of the beautiful ladies, who graced the scene. Many distinguished men of our own and foreign nations were also there. Upon the whole, it was a grand affair, and I shall be much disappointed if I do not to-night enjoy many "rosy dreams." But enough. W. F. R.

RE46v43i5p1c5, May 15, 1846: Extracts of a letter from New York, dated May 12.

The excitement in this City in relation to the Mexican news, continues to rage, but it is mingled with an intense anxiety to hear further accounts from the seat of war. Stocks have rather rallied to-day. They will no doubt go up and down for some time to come.

Public sentiment is decidedly in favor of a vigorous prosecution and speedy termination of the war. The measures of Congress are approved, and a disposition manifested to sustain the Executive, except by some presses which are noted for being arrayed against the cause of the country. On yesterday a hand of volunteers, preceded by music, &c., paraded the streets.

RE46v43i5p1c6, May 15, 1846: THE MEXICAN STEAMERS.

The New Orleans Tropic of the 5th inst. says: "We noticed some two weeks since, that we believed the announcement of the sale of the two Mexican war-steamer a sham, and that they would appear, in case of hostilities with Mexico, as privateers. We are still of this opinion, and we have a fear that the harbor of Havana will contain our worst enemies. A United States 74 should be stationed off the mouth of the harbor, to watch with great care what comes out of it. It will be recollected, that in 1835, the Mexican armed brig Montezuma lay off the Sabine and captured the American schr. Julius Caesar, and others, filled with emigrants bound for Texas, and carried them into Matamoras. The vessels conveying soldiers from our city to the seat of war should be provided with two or three pieces of heavy artillery. They might be intercepted by the way."

RE46v43i5p1c6, May 15, 1846: No title.

The New Orleans Tropic of the 6th instant states, that there are foreign emissaries in that city who hold correspondence with the enemy; and the Tropic suggests that a public meeting be called at once to devise means to circumvent the betrayers.

RE46v43i5p1c6, May 15, 1846: No title.

The two companies of artillery now at Fort McHenry, will leave in a day or two, for the seat of war under the command of Lieut. Col. Belton. It is stated that the Ship Merman will take them to their destination, and will stop at Old Point Comfort for four more companies.

RE46v43i5p1c6, May 15, 1846: ARMY MOVEMENTS &c.

News from the army in Texas is now looked for with intense anxiety—but we have received no later accounts than those published in our second edition of Saturday last.

The news of the defeat of Capt. Thornton's detachment seems to have revived the war spirit of '76. At New Orleans, in the course of two days, about 1200 volunteers had already enrolled themselves for service on the Texan frontier; though it is said the enrollment had not progressed as rapidly as could be wished, owing to the nonpayment hitherto of the volunteers who come time ago went from that city to Corpus Christi. Next morning, however, notice was given that the troops would be paid off on that day, and that no such delinquency would be suffered to occur in future.

The Governor of Louisiana has also issued his proclamation, offering ten dollars bounty and a month's pay in advance to each volunteer.—On the 2d inst., about forty printers gave up lucrative situations in New Orleans, enrolled
Gov. Johnson of Louisiana has complied with the request of Gen. Taylor and has appointed Gen. Persifor F. Smith to the command of the troops to be raised for reinforcing Gen. Taylor.—The Governor has also appointed the following gentlemen as his Aides-de-camp: Cassimer Lacoste, Quarter Master General; John Winthrop, Henry A. Lyons, Charles T. Steward, Emilie Wiltz, J. Watson Keene and H. W. Palfrey.

The Brigadier General has informed the Governor of the State, that he believed volunteers enough would be found to fill up the call on the State, without having recourse to drafting any portion of them from the militia.

Commodore Moore arrived at New Orleans on the 4th inst., and left immediately in the steamship New York, for Texas. It is thought that the bill for the increase of the Navy will be passed by Congress, and that Commodore Moore will be reinstated. The steamer New York had on board 180 troops, destined for the defence of Point Isabel.

The steamer Diamond arrived at New Orleans on the 3rd inst., with twenty-five 18 pounders and 1,000 balls, destined for the army in Texas.

When the news from the frontier via New Orleans, reached Pensacola, Commodore Saunders, of the U. S. ship St. Mary's, was ordered to get under way immediately for Brasos St. Iago, to render all assistance in his power to the forces at Point Isabel. The steam frigate Mississippi, Capt. Fitzburgh, was ordered to start for Vera Cruz at 4, P. M., on the 4th inst.

Several of the New Orleans papers publish engravings of the position of Gen. Taylor's camp. The Tropic says it extends about four miles along the river bank—two miles above, and two below Matamoras. The entrenchment to erect it required twenty-three hundred men for thirty days. It is made of sand, and covered over with twigs, woven together like basket-work, surrounded by a very wide and deep ditch. The walls of the magazine, in the interior of the fortification, are formed of pork-barrels filled with sand, seven tiers thick, four tiers high, covered over with timber, on which sand is piled ten or twelve feet. Twelve heavy pieces of ordnance are so placed as to command the town of Matamoras. Five hundred men could defend the fortification against any force the Mexicans could bring against it at present.

The Tropic publishes a letter from Gen. Taylor to a friend in New Orleans, from which the following is an extract:

"Strong guards of foot and mounted men are established on the margin of the river, and thus efficient means have been adopted on our part to prevent all intercourse. While opposite to us their pickets extend above and below for several miles, we are equally active in keeping up a strong and vigilant guard to prevent surprise, or attacks under disadvantageous circumstances.—This is the more necessary, whilst we have to act on the defensive, and they at liberty to take the opposite course whenever they think proper to do so. Nor have we been idle in other respects; we have a field work under way, besides having erected a strong battery, and a number of buildings for the security of our supplies, in addition to some respectable works for their protection.—We have mounted a respectable battery, four pieces of which are long eighteen pounders, with which we could batter or burn down the city of Matamoras, should it become necessary to do so. When our field work is completed (which will soon be the case) and mounted with its proper armament, five hundred men could hold it against as many thousand Mexicans."

As an evidence of the spirit which animates all classes of the citizens of New Orleans, the Courier of that City publishes the following anecdote, which, indeed, reflects great credit upon the individual concerned:

A gentleman names Addie, who served with honor during three years of the Florida War, is raising a Company of Volunteers to join General Taylor. He went to the store of Messrs. Layton & Col., hardware merchants on the Levee, for the purpose of purchasing a flag. Mr. Layton answered that his were all disposed of, but directed one of his clerks to go to a neighboring store and buy one; and said to Captain Addie, "I present this flag to your Company as my own offering for the defence of the country." Mr. Layton also told the Captain that when the Company was complete, he would furnish each man, gratis, with a plate, knife, fork, spoon and other accoutrements of the same kind; and also said he, "If you should want a few hundred dollars to purchase other conveniences for your men, apply to me, and you shall have the amount."[BWP] be show, that, while we are ever anxious to be at peace, we are not afraid of war, come from what quarter it may. Let our deeds proclaim, that the patriotic fire of Liberty, which lighted on to victory the heroes of the Revolution, still burns with unchaged brightness in the bosoms of their sons. Let the war be carried on with the utmost vigor. To borrow the language of the New Orleans Picayune—"a tiny, Lilliputian affair will be tarnish our arms. To end the campaign as becomes the honor and dignity of the Republic, " it may be necessary that "an American General should dictate the terms of peace in the city of Mexico".

A call has been made upon all foreigners (by the Mexican Commander) to come to the aid of Mexico. Indeed, it has been fully understood that the Mexicans have been sustained in their hostility to the United States by foreign emissaries residents of Mexico. It is stated that the Mexican fort of San Juan de Ulloa is filled with foreign engineers; and that the army now on this side of the Rio Grande is accompanied by French, English and other artillery men. This statement, no doubt, is based on the following document, translated for the N. O. Picayune, and which that paper states Ampudia has found the means of distributing in the American Camp. In connection with other circumstances, it will doubtless shed some light upon the secret movements of the Mexican army, and the machinations at the bottom of the present enterprise.

RE46v43i5p1c7, May 15, 1846: The Commander-in-Chief of the Mexican army to the English and Irish under the orders of the American General Taylor:

Know ye, that the Government of the United States is committing repeated acts of barbarous aggressions against the magnanimous Mexican nation; that the Government which exists under "the flag of the stars," is unworthy of the designation of Christian. Recollect that you were born in Great Britain; that the American Government looks with coldness upon the powerful flag of St. George, and is provoking to a rupture the warlike people to whom it belongs, President Polk boldly manifesting a desire to take possession of Oregon, as he has already done of Texas. Now, then, come with all confidence to the Mexican ranks, and I guarantee to you, upon my honor, good treatment, and that all your expenses shall be defrayed until your arrival in the beautiful capital of Mexico.

Germans, French, Poles, and individuals of other nations! Separate yourselves from the Yankees, and do not contribute to defend a robbery and usurpation, which, be assured, the civilized nations of Europe look upon with the utmost indignation. Come, therefore, and array yourselves under the tri-colored flag, in the confidence that the God of Armies protects it., and that it will protect you equally with the English.

PEDRO DE AMPUDIA.
FRANCISCO R. MORENO,
Adjutant of the Commander-in-Chief.
Head Quarters, upon the Road to Matamoras, April 2, 1846.

RE46v43i5p2c1, May 15, 1846: TWENTY-NINTH CONGRESS. INTERESTING DEBATE. TUESDAY, MAY 12, 1846.

SENATE.

As soon as the journal was read, a message was received from the House, to the effect that the bill authorizing the President to prosecute the war against Mexico, had been passed by that body, and asking the concurrence of the Senate thereto. Also, that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill increasing the rank and file of the army, making an addition to the present regular army of about 7,000 men.

The bill to enable the President to prosecute the existing war with Mexico, was then taken up by the Senate and read twice.

Mr. Allen moved to postpone the prior orders in order to go on with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. Calhoun was opposed to any hasty or precipitate action on so important a measure. On looking at the first section of the bill, it would be seen that it involved a declaration of war.—He had carefully examined the documents, and he was fully satisfied that other Senators who had nay doubts on the subject should be allowed a full opportunity to examine them. He repeated, therefore, that he was opposed to any hurried action.

Mr. Allen adverted to the fact that the news from the army arrived in this city on Saturday evening, at 5 o’clock, and that in one hour afterwards the Executive Government was at work, devising the necessary steps for the rescue of the army. Now, however, all depended on Congress. The case was with them, and active and prompt measures were necessary. What was to be done must be done at once. A delay of 48 hours might have the effect of protracting the war for twelve months.

After some remarks touching points of order from several Senators, Mr. Mangum took the floor. He denied that there is any evidence to show that war, in its proper sense, actually exists, as is set forth in the preamble to the bill.—If the political question could be separated from the question of expediency, he would cheerfully vote for any amount of men and money to rescue the army and maintain the honor of the country. But he for one was not willing to assume that war actually exists. Suppose, said he, that the Sovereign Government of Mexico should disavow the act of her Commander in crossing the Rio Grande, who would then say that war existed between the two countries? He hoped that a bill would be reported from the military committee separated from all extraneous matter, and confined solely to measures for the raising of men and money to meet the present exigencies without any reference to the question as to whether war exists or not.

After some explanatory remarks from Mr. Benton, which were not heard,

Mr. Calhoun again took the floor. He asked what reason there could be for refusing to strike out the objectionable preamble of the bill, in order to satisfy those who have doubts as to its propriety? He did not wish to delay the bill, but rather, in the absence of all information, he would vote for such a preamble, recognizing the existence of a war, he would plunge a dagger into his breast. The doctrine of assuming that there is actual war between two nations, merely because there had been a collision on the frontier, was monstrous.

If carried out, it will place it in the power of a corporal’s guard to involve two great nations in a war. He repeated that we have no knowledge that Mexico has decided upon war with us, and it was, therefore, wrong for us to assume the fact until we shall have further information. For his part, he did not wish to delay the bill if it were pressed, but he would not vote upon it. He would not vote “No,” because he could not; and he would not vote “Aye,” because he wanted information. He would not make war upon Mexico, by making war upon the Constitution, for he held, that by passing such a bill in the present state of things, and in the absence of proper information, the Senate will be making a much greater war upon the Constitution than upon Mexico.

Mr. Clayton of Delaware following on the same side. In addition to this, he considered the bill as too loose and indifferent. He desired, for instance, that the bill should specify what portion of the ten millions was to be appropriated to the land forces, and what portion to the navy. He hoped the bill would be referred to the Military Committee. He made that motion.

After further remarks, the question was about to be taken on the motion to refer, when.

Mr. Benton, the Chairman of the Military Committee, said that in anticipation of such a motion, the Committee met at an early hour this morning, and had authorized him to report the bill with sundry amendments. These proposed amendments were then read for the information of the Senate. One of them proposes to strike out the preamble to the bill.

Mr. Allen, the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations reminded the Senate, that the portion of the message relating to the political re-(unreadable) red to that Committee. And he would state, that the majority for he Committee were of the opinion that the first section of the bill was correct, and that war actually exists. He therefore hoped that the motion to refer this bill to the Military Committee would not prevail.

[Here several messages from the President of the United States were received.].

Mr. Allen proceeded to explain that the views of the Committee on Foreign relations were in full accordance with the first section of the present bill. In reply to a question of Mr. Clayton, as to whether the Committee had the documents accompanying the message before them, Mr. Allen said that the Committee did have the manuscript documents before them, but they could not shut their eyes to the glaring fact that war actually exists.

Mr. Clayton then moved to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. Benton read an extract from the recent message of Parades to the Mexican Congress for the purpose of showing that in the opinion of the latter, the conflict between us and Mexico is going on, etc.

Mr. Clayton, with a view of affording time for consideration changed his motion so as to strike out of the first section the words “prosecution of said wear” and to insert the words “with a view of enabling the Government of the U. S. to repel invasion, the President be hereby authorized to employ the naval and military force, “ &c.

Mr. Calhoun made another appeal. He said that even if the President of Mexico had declared war, that of itself did not constitute a declaration of war, for, as with us, the Congress of Mexico had to decide such questions. If the Presidents of the two countries should both declare war without the consent of their respective Congresses, it would amount to nothing.

Mr. Houston declared it was this solemn conviction that war actually exists. Mexico had been at war with Texas for ten years, and now it had become apart of the United States, that government has in effect assumed the position of Texas without regard to a Mexico. There was, therefore, nothing but war existing between the two countries. He went on to urge the necessity of chastising Mexico for the wrongs committed by her upon us. So long as she was capable of injuring us she ought not to be regarded with pity. We ought to chastise her for her injuries.

Mr. Archer rose, and after alluding to the assertion of the Senator from Texas that war had existed since the annexation of Texas, said he maintained that doctrine when the question of annexation was presented. In that view he might be supposed to vote against the motion of the Senator from Delaware to strike out. They must, as he had before said, draw a line between war de facto and de jure. The circumstances brought to their knowledge satisfied him that war ought to be declared against Mexico, and by the act legalize the acts that have ensued and annexation of Texas to the United States. He would be entirely willing to vote for such declaration then, because he could not see the rectitude of granting large sums of money without a full recognition of its necessity and propriety by government. He wished, in relation to that and every war in which his country might be involved, to see it prosecuted with vigor and unanimity. Many gentlemen thought that such a state of things is not existing between this country and Mexico as would authorize a declaration of war by the United States.

Mr. Calhoun (after ascertaining that the allusion was to him,) said he had not used any such expression. He could not take on him to say in the absence of necessary information, how far the present state of things would justify the government in declaring war; but what he said was, that there could be no state of war—no declaration of its existence made, but by the constitutional authority—the Congress of the U. States.

Mr. Archer continued to say, that on yesterday he spoke of war not existing de jure, or in the legal acceptation of the term; but a state of war de facto did exist; and the question to be presented in a few days would be, were they prepared to make that war de facto a war de jure? He would vote for the motion of the honorable Senator from Delaware to strike out the word "war," but he could not do so without that avowal of his opinion to go before the people of the United States. He was willing to wait for advices from Mexico, and learn what was to be the termination of the present state of things; and if it was to be war, he was for prosecuting it with promptitude and energy. He would not consent that any officer, military or civil of the United States, should make blockades, throw up fortifications in sight of a foreign nation, and exercise, in truth, all the powers of war, and impose all its expenses all its commitments, with foreign nations. In that state of things he would not consent, unless sit got a legal coloring from the United States. The Senators on the other side, in this view of the question, and for the sake of unanimity, ought to defer to the suggestion made on his side for delay, and see the necessity of deliberation before they put themselves in this position before the world.

Mr. Johnson of Louisiana called attention to the fact, that on several occasions the Mexican Government has repeatedly informed our Government that the annexation of Texas would be considered by them as a declaration of war. This fact was incontrovertible, and there could not be a doubt of the existence of actual war.

Mr. Pennybacker next addressed the Senate at some length. The principal aim of his argument was to show that a formal declaration was not essential to the existence of war. In support of this he cited a number of instances from modern history, and quoted from Vattel, from Judge Kent’s Commentaries, and the decisions of the English Admiralty, to the same end. After settling this point, the honorable Senator argued that, in the absence of a declaration of war, it was competent to judge from hostilities enacted, whether war existed or not. Admitting that, he proceeded to review the relations between Mexico and the United States, the successive events that had led to the present state of things all which proved that war actually does exist between the two countries, and that although it might be dispensed with a declaration of war was desirable by the United States, that the people might all know their position; that neutral nations might conduct themselves suitably; and that there might be an open and palpable occasion shown for the voting of the supplies necessary to its energetic prosecution.

Mr. Cass objected to the motion to strike out. He did not believer that a Mexican army could have crossed our frontier without the orders of the Mexican Government. What else could we want? Did we want a certificate from a Mexican justice of the peace to certify that war has commenced? What further evidence could we want? Suppose an American fleet should bombard the city of London, would the British take our Constitution and say, "Look here, your Constitution does not authorize you to make war without the consent of Congress?" No! they would look to the fact, and act upon it. He had proceeded to give several laughable illustrations of the ridiculous attitude in which we should be placed, if we should carry out the principle that we must first wait for a formal declaration of war from the Government of an invading army.

Mr. Berrien at some length and with much point controverted the positions assumed by Messrs. Pennybacker and Cass.

Mr. Crittenden was in favor of voting for any amount of funds which might be deemed necessary to repel invasion, by which he meant, not only the driving the enemy beyond the river, but in pursuing him, and beating him down, so that the borders should no longer be in danger of a repetition of the offence. He would be satisfied with this until we should have had time to ascertain whether the Mexican government would sanction the act of their commanding officer.—But if we were forced to have war, he was for making it as short as possible, by sending an overwhelming force at once. He would have the army carrying peace in one hand and war in the other, so that we might end the war at once upon the least desire from the enemy. He was opposed to the preamble to the bill. There was no necessary for it. There was no preamble to the declaration of war in 1812.

Mr. J. M. Clayton rose to reply to the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass.] He appealed to the opposite side, and asked them to wait at least till the evidence transmitted by the President was printed. The Senator from Michigan said he was satisfied of the fact. But he was satisfied without evidence—with nothing but newspaper reports. He was willing to go it blind. He then proceeded that there was no evidence before them to enable them to make up an honest opinion on the subject. He hoped that the majority would not exercise a power which they would not desire to be employed against them. Let them recollect that the day might come when the majority would be on his side of the chamber. It might be that after examining the documents he (Mr. C.) would be willing to vote a declaration of war. But he could not assent to that without examination—without a fair opportunity of forming a judgment.
Mr. J. M. Clayton replied that authentic evidence of the fact that the hostilities had been sanctioned by the Mexican authorities, would satisfy him. But there was no such evidence before them now. It was a common thing for the Mexican Government to disavow the acts of their Generals. A General committed an act to-day which was disavowed to-morrow. It, after a declaration of war, or a recognition of a state of war by the Congress of the United States, intelligence should be received of the fact that the Mexican Government had disavowed the act of their military officers on the Rio Grande, how mortified would they all be, and how much would they regret that they had not waited until they themselves had decided, after deliberate ...[illegible] ... rushing on in a declaration of war.

Mr. Westcott said that calm and cool reflection had convinced him that it was his duty to vote for this bill, although he did not entirely approve of its phraseology. He was not disposed to throw upon Mexico, (as this bill seemed to do,) the commencement of this war. He preferred that this Government, instead of the declaration that "war existed." And "by the act of Mexico," should make an independent affirmative, positive and unequivocal declaration of war against that Government. The past conduct of Mexico towards the United States would fully justify such a declaration. If the soldiers of Mexico had not invaded Texas during the last month; if they had not murdered Col. Cross; if they had not killed Lieut. Porter; if they had not attacked Hardee and Thornton; nay, if her present rulers were now to apologise and atone for these acts, there is ample cause for our declaring war against her, to be found in her past conduct towards us. Mr. W. was in favor of a declaration of war, because he did not believe that hostilities could be as efficiently, as effectually, as successfully carried on by the Executive without it. Mr. W. concurred in the opinion advanced on this point by the Senator from Virginia, Mr. Pennybacker, and other Senators.

Mr. Crittenden hoped that the emergency would not be found so pressing as some Senators appeared to suppose. He had great confidence in the officer commanding the forces on the Rio Grande, and was pretty confident that, in eight and forty hours after the date of last advices, it would be found that the General commanding had whipped the Mexicans, driven them across the river, and was in the town of Matamoras. — He might be wrong, but that was his speculation. Still he admitted that they were not to get under such a supposition. They were to act with the least possible delay consistent with order and propriety. He was to a great extent prepared to vote for the supplies— but indeed so advisedly as he would have desired. One thing was certain, that there had been, to some extent, a conflict on the Rio Grande between the troops of the two countries. To whose fault that was to be ascribed he could not now say, but he feared that when the matter was investigated, it would be found that he would not be able to regard with entire approbation the conduct of the Executive. He saw no reason for the advance of the troops to the Rio Grande— for the hazarding of those consequences which every sensible man must have foreseen. It was not for a moment to be imagined that the angry armies of two angry and quarrelling nations should day after day face each other with cannons pointed at each other, and only a fordable river between them, and conflict not result. It was conceded that this was disputed territory. What right had the U. States to take possession of it? Had not the other disputing claimant an equal right? But he would not prosecute that view of the subject at present. He was willing to consider the exigency as urgent as they pleased, and to make adequate preparation. As it was the wish of some Senators to rest with that in the meantime, he should be entirely content with that course, but he did not know that he would be willing to limit the government to repelling invasion. Perhaps he would be satisfied with an expression of what he meant by repelling invasion. He meant by that, pursuing, beating down, till the borders were freed from danger of a repetition of the invasion.

A Senator. That would be war.

Mr. Crittenden. No; there was a shade of difference—a very perceptible one. He believed it was indispensable policy to make the war as sharp and short as possible. If it lingered one year it would not be a Mexican war. With a straw, you could kindle a fire to burn down a city. In this connected condition of the world, war was felt everywhere. War could not be made with Mexico without touching the interests, and exciting the jealousies of all nations trading with us. Great consequences might be involved in that war. war. He would, therefore, make it as compendious as possible delay consistent with order and propriety. He was to a great extent prepared to vote for the supplies—but indeed so advisedly as he would have desired. One thing was certain, that there had been, to some extent, a conflict on the Rio Grande between the troops of the two countries. A Senator. That would be war.
moment war was declared privateering commenced, and swarms of privateers were let loose upon our extended commerce. And more than that any mode of adjustment was set aside except that by a treaty of peace. Why, in the name of all that was reasonable, he asked, could they rush at once to the ultimate resort? Suppose this turned out to be a case in which war ought to be declared, after examination of all the documents. Let the declaration be made in due form and with becoming dignity—not in this side-way, as if they were afraid to do it. Let them show a front to the world, such as was becoming the character of the nation. In the present condition of the world war was a tremendous thing. The whole sentiment of the civilized world was turning stronger and stronger against war. And let us not, (said Mr. C.,) for the honor of our country—for the dignity of the republic—be the first to create a state of war.—Mortal man cannot see the end of it. When I look on and see that we are rushing upon the most tremendous event, I am amazed. I am more than amazed; I am in a state of wonder and deep alarm. This is not the tone of character to go into war. They who go into war in this manner—as if seeking a decisive course—cannot expect to succeed. It is a hasty, thoughtless course. I do not wish to use any words in an offensive sense—but with all possible emphasis, I exhort you to avoid the appearance of precipitancy, or want of that deep reflection and profound meditation, which alone can guide you to a successful issue.

After some further remarks, (principally on points of order,) by Messrs. Allen, Johnston of Louisiana, Crittenden, Calhoun and Mangum, the question was taken on the motion of Mr. Boyd, to strike out the words "prosecute said war to a speedy and successful termination," so as to make the preamble read, "that for the purpose of enabling the Government of the United States to repel the invasion, the President is hereby," &c., and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Berrien, Calhoun, Thomas Clayton, John M. Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, Dayton, Evans, Huntington, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, McDuffie, Mangum, Morehead, Simmons, Upham and Woodbridge—20.

NAYS Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Benton, Breese, Bright, Cameron, Cass, Colquitt, Dix, Houston, Jarnagin, Jenness, Lewis, Niles, Pennybacker, Rusk, Sevier, Speight, Sturgeon, Turney and Yulee—25.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. Crittenden expressed a desire that the ground taken upon this subject by the minority should be recorded upon the journal, and for this purpose he moved to strike out from the first section of the bill the words, "to prosecute said war to a speedy and successful termination," and insert "for the purpose of repelling the invasion, the President is hereby," &c.

The President was of opinion that this renewal of a motion to strike out a sentence which the Senate had already refused to strike out, was not in order.

Mr. Crittenden explained, and contended that the motion to strike out and insert was in order.

After a short discussion upon the point of order between Senators Calhoun, Mangum, and Berrien, the objection was withdrawn.

Mr. Crittenden asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and the result was—ayes 20, nays 26. Same as the preceding vote, except that Mr. Westcott’s name was added to the nays.

Mr. Huntington moved that the preamble to the bill be stricken out; and proceeded to make a few remarks in support of the motion, in the course of which he animadverted strongly upon the course of the administration in relation to the difficulties with Mexico, in sending the troops of the United States upon disputed territory.

Mr. Morehead said that the subject of boundaries was expressly . . . [illegible] . . . in the discussion on the annexation of Texas, and was referred to in the annexation resolution itself. The 2d section of the resolution says:

"Sec. 2. And be it further Resolved, That the foregoing consent of Congress is given upon the following conditions, and with the following guarantees, to wit: First. First. State to be formed, subject to the adjustment by this government of all questions of boundary that may arise with other governments."

The question which we are now called upon to determine he understood to be, whether the war declared to exist has been caused by Mexico.—Whether it is waged by the authority of Mexico may depend on circumstances. We have not had an opportunity to investigate the subject. The question may hereafter present itself in a different light from that in which we now see it; and yet, under these circumstances, we are called upon to declare that this is a war authorized by Mexico.

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, said that Mexico claims the whole of Texas. We cannot go to Mexico, therefore, to ask about our boundaries. She denies the existence of such a State as Texas. Texas. We go to Texas to inquire about the boundary.
Mr. Berrien said, that in the debates on the annexation of Texas the question of the true boundary was one of much doubt and difficulty. It was difficult to understand whether the Nueces of the Rio Grande was the boundary between Texas and Mexico, and the section referred to was added by the Senate for this very reason.—It was to settle this disputed boundary that the amendment referred to was made.

Mr. Archer said the bill to be reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations would probably contain the same preamble. Why, then, refuse to strike out the preamble from this bill, thereby securing a full vote? This would not prevent the adoption of the same preamble in another bill, which would amount to the same thing. This preamble properly belongs to a bill to be reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations declaring war.

The yeas and nays were then taken on Mr. Huntington’s motion to strike out the preamble, which was decided as followed:

YEAS__Messr. Archer, Barrow, Berrien, Calhoun, Thomas Clayton, John M. Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, Dayton, Evans, Huntington, McDuffie, Mangum, Morehead, Simmons, Woodbridge, Yulee—18.

NAYS__Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Benton, Breese, Bright, Cameron, Cass, Colquitt, Dix, Houston, Jarnagin, Jenness, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Lewis, Niles, Pennybacker, Rusk, Semple, Sevier, Speight, Sturgeon, Turney, Upham, Westcott—28.

No other amendment being proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole.

The amendments made in committee were then agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Several senators called for the immediate third reading of the bill, and no objection being made thereto, it was so read.

The President then proceeded to put the question “Shall this bill pass?”.

Mr. Crittenden hoped that the question might be so put as to divide the preamble from the bill. The question might first be taken on the passage of the bill, without the preamble, and the preamble could be voted for separately. This would secure a large vote for the passage of the bill.

Mr. Sevier said the preamble was only the title of the bill.

The President said, it is the opinion of the chair that the preamble is a part of the bill, and that it cannot be divided.

Mr. Crittenden said, now I want to vote for the bill, and I trust that by unanimous consent of the Senate the question may be taken on the bill and on the preamble separately.

Mr. Calhoun would not vote for it, with or without the preamble. It is a solemn declaration of war to Mexico and to the world. This was taking a step which he could not approve. When his name should be called, therefore, he would remain silent.

Mr. Upham wished to vote for the bill, but he could not vote for the preamble. He had not information to enable him to vote for the preamble, and he could not vote what he did not know.

Mr. Dayton made a similar statement.

Mr. Crittenden said the question might be put, "Shall the bill pass?" Make that the question without the preamble, and he was willing and anxious to vote for it. He would not vote for the preamble.

Mr. Breese said that if the question could not be divided unless by unanimous consent of the Senate, he would object.

Mr. Mangum asked the President whether he and other senators could vote for the bill with a protest against the preamble, and whether that protest would be put on the journal.

Mr. Speight said that were was a precedent for entering a protest on the journal.

Mr. Crittenden appealed to the senator from Illinois [Mr. Breese] to withdraw his objection. After a pause, Mr. C.
asked, does the senator yield his objection?

Mr. Breese said it might endanger the passage of the bill if it should pass first without the preamble.

Mr. Crittenden pledged himself that he would move to reconsider, if there was any danger like that which the senator from Illinois apprehended.
Mr. Breese then withdrew his objection.

The President then stated that, by unanimous consent of the Senate, the question would be, Shall the bill pass without the preamble?.

Mr. Bagby could not consent to have the question put in this way. He could not vote for the bill without the preamble.

Mr. Crittenden suggested to the Chair, that the question might be put somewhat differently from the form in which it had been stated.

Mr. J. M. Clayton saw no difficulty in voting for the bill itself, first, without the preamble, and then for the preamble.

Mr. Bagby said, if it was put in this form, he would have to vote against the bill, while he wished to vote for it.

Mr. J. M. Clayton thought that the Senator from Alabama might vote for the bill without the preamble, and vote for the preamble afterwards.

Mr. R. Johnson said that the Senator from Alabama could have not more difficulty in voting for the bill and the preamble separately, than he could have in voting for different sections of the bill separately.

The yeas and nays were called for and ordered.

Mr. Morehead suggested that the question might be taken without the yeas and nays. There was evidently a large majority for the bill, and it would be better not to have the nays recorded.

Mr. Mangum had made up his mind to vote for the bill, but he entered his most solemn protest against the hasty declaration of the preamble, about the existence of the war, and he would ask the Senate that that protest might be entered on the journal.

Messrs. J. M. Clayton and Dayton entered similar protests.

The question, "Shall the bill pass?" was then put, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Barrow, Benton, Breese, Bright, Cameron, Cass, John M. Clayton, Colquitt, Corwin, Crittenden, Dayton, Dickinson, Houston, Jarnagin, Jenness, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Lewis, McDuffie, Mangum, Morehead, Niles, Pennybacker, Rusk, Semple, Sevier, Simmons, Speight, Sturgeon, Turney, Upham, Westcott, Woodbridge and Yulee—40.

[Senators Berrien, Calhoun and Evans, being in their seats, did not vote. The other members, whose names are not recorded above, were absent.]

When Mr. Crittenden’s name was called, he votes "aye, except the preamble." So also did Mr. Upham.

The bill was then read by its title and passed.

And the Senate adjourned.

[Revised]
the genius of our free institutions, and we had recently had proof of its abuses in the occurrences upon our frontiers.

He alluded to the act of shooting down deserters, which he regarded as a monstrous violation. Another of the fruits of a Standing Army was the invasion of a foreign country. Our Government had been guilty of this, and Mexico had been to all intents and purposes invaded. The excuses of the President laid before Congress yesterday were a series of palpable misrepresentations of facts.

Mr. Broadhead contended that this was not in order, but the Chair decided that Mr. G. was not out of order.

Mr. Broadhead, amidst cries of “let him go on,” persisted that the gentleman was out of order.

Mr. Giddings went on and complained of the attempts made to gag him down, and to cry him down, but returned at once to the charges of misrepresentation against the President in his Message. The main falsehood was the declaration that our soil had been invaded by Mexico. He denied this, and said that the camp of General Taylor was now in the Department of Tamaulipas, while a part of the territory claimed by the United States was in the Mexican Department of Cohahuila. If Texas had claimed to the Rio del Norte, she had never maintained that right. It had never been acknowledged by Mexico.

Mr. Giddings said that the result of this Mexican business would be the surrender of all our rights in Oregon North of the Columbia river;--54 40 would be cut down to the North bank of the Columbia.

Mr. G. went into the slavery question, and denounced the proceedings against Mexico as an act to bring more fellow beings into bondage. At this point he was cut off by the expiration of his hour.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill to the House. It was read a third time and passed;--ayes 153, noes 9.

A motion to reconsider was put and lost.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and took up the bill for the support of the Military Academy.

Mr. Sawyer made a violent speech against the Institution, and against the Army and Navy.

Mr. Tibbats and Mr. Darragh spoke at length upon the state of Mexican affairs, and a little of Oregon.

Mr. Gordon obtained the floor, and on his motion the Committee rose.

After more than an hour spent in attempts to adjourn, the House took a recess until 7 ½ o’clock, P. M.

On re-assembling at 7 o’clock, a message was received from the Senate returning the bill of this House providing for the prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, passed with amendments.

The House proceeded to consider these amendments: they were read.

Mr. Haralson moved the concurrence of the House, and, at the same time, moved the previous question; which was seconded, put, and carried; and, under its operation, all the amendments were concurred in except that which strikers out $10 per month as the pay of privates, and allows mounted volunteers forty cents per day for the use of horses, instead of $20 per month pay for themselves and the use of their horses.

On this amendment Mr. Gentry asked for the yeas and nays. They were ordered; and, being taken, there were for the amendment 116, against it 53.

And so the amendments of the Senate were concurred in, and the bill was passed by both Houses.

And, to clinch the matter, Mr. Haralson moved to re-consider the votes agreeing to the amendments; but the House refused to do so, and the bill stands passed.

The Senate, then, at 6½ o’clock adjourned.

The following is a corrected copy of the bill as passed by both Houses, and since signed by the President:

AN ACT providing for the prosecution of the existing War between the United States and the Republic of Mexico.

Whereas, by the act of the Republic of Mexico, a state of War exists between that Government and the United States:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representative of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purpose of enabling the Government of the United States to prosecute said War to a speedy and successful termination, the President be, and he is thereby, authorized to employ the militia, naval and military forces of the United States, and to call for and accept the services of any number of volunteers, not exceeding fifty thousand, who may offer their services, either as cavalry, artillery, or riflemen, to serve twelve months after they shall have arrived at the place of rendezvous, or to the end of the war, unless sooner discharged, according to the time for which they shall have been mustered into service; and that the sum of ten millions of dollars out of any money in the Treasury, or to come into the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated be, and the same is hereby appropriated, for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into effect.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted. That the militia, when called into the service of the United States, by virtue of this act, or any other act, may, if in the opinion of the President of the United States the public interest requires it, be compelled to serve for a term not exceeding six months, after their arrival at the place of rendezvous, in any one year, unless sooner discharged.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said volunteers shall furnish their own clothes, and, if cavalry, their own horses and horse equipment; and when mustered into service, shall be armed at the expense of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That said volunteers shall, when called into actual service, and while remaining, therein, be subject to the rules and articles of war, and shall be, in all respects, except as to clothing and pay, placed on the same footing with similar corps of the United States army, and in lieu of clothing every non-commissioned officer and private in any company who may thus offer himself, shall be entitled, when called into actual service, to receive in money a sum equal to the cost of clothing of a non-commissioned officer or private (as the case may be) in the regular troops of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said volunteers, so offering their services, shall be accepted by the President in companies, battalions, squadrons, and regiments, whose officers shall be appointed in the manner prescribed by law in the several States and Territories, to which such companies, battalions, squadrons, and regiments, shall respectively belong.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorised to organize companies so tendering their services into battalions or squadrons; battalions and squadrons into regiments; regiments into brigades, and brigades into divisions, as soon as the number of volunteers shall render such organization in his judgment expedient; and the President shall, if necessary, apportion the staff, field, and general officers among the respective States and Territories, from which the volunteers shall tender their services, as he may deem proper.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers who may be received into the service of the United States, by virtue of the provisions of this act, and who shall be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to all the benefit which may be conferred on persons wounded in the service of the United States.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized forthwith to complete all the public armed vessels now authorized by law, and to purchase or charter, arm, equip, and man such merchant vessels and steamboats as, upon examination, may be found fit or easily converted into armed vessels fit for the public service, and in such number as he may deem necessary for the protection of the seaboard, lake coast, and the general defence of the country.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever the militia or volunteers are called and received into the service of the United States, under the provisions of this act, they shall have the organization of the army of the United States, and shall have the same pay and allowances; and all mounted privates, non-commissioned officers, musicians and artificers, shall be allowed 40 cents per day for the use and risk of their horses, except of horses actually killed in action; and if any mounted volunteer non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, shall not keep himself provided with a serviceable horse, said volunteers shall serve on foot.

liberality towards Mexico, and has suffered this state of things to exist until forbearance has ceased to be a virtue. We do not believe that, in the attack upon our troops, and the murder of our citizens Mexico is influenced by patriotism alone. We believe she is used by foreign governments as the cat's paw for the prosecution of their own schemes.

We moreover believe, that unless this spark, which is now being kindled up on the Rio Grande, shall be speedily and effectually extinguished, it is possible that it may spread to the remotest borders of our Union.

Shall it then be said that Virginia, if her services are needed, will be dilatory? Shall the reproach rest upon her Metropolis, that she cares nothing about the welfare of our common country? Baltimore and Philadelphia, another cities, are a rousing themselves for action. We are all Americans; and shall Virginia sit passive as the lamb when our enemies are in the field murdering our citizens, and killing our troops? No—no. When we see our own soil crimsoned with the blood of our citizens, the motto of the gallant Decatur should be the motto of every man: "Our country, right or wrong." We hope that, in the event of troops being desired from Virginia, every true-hearted son will at once rally around the standard of our country, and show that the deeds performed by our fathers in '76—the Revolutionary sires—can be equalled by their descendants in '46.

Let not any one hug to his bosom the thought, that Mexico alone is our enemy. Let him look behind the curtain—doubtless he will observe the emissaries of Foreign Governments busily employed in controverting the efforts of our Government to protect the rights of our citizens and obtain justice from Mexico.

RE46v43i5p2c6, May 15, 1846: FROM NEW ORLEANS.

By the arrival, at New Orleans, on the 7th May, of the steamer Telegraph from Galveston, papers have been received from that place up to the 2d May. From the Galveston Civilian of the 2d inst. We learn that the United States schr. Flirt was endeavoring to get over the bar into the Brassos Santiago, in order to co-operate more effectually in the defence of the depot and position at the mouth of the river. Captain Symptom of the Alert, was assisting in the accomplishment of this object, having taken off some of the Flirt's guns, in order to reduce her draught of water. The steamer Monmouth left Galveston on Friday, the 1st instant, for Brassos Santiago, with a number of volunteers for the army under Gen. Taylor.

The New Orleans Times of the 7th May, states that recruits were rapidly filling up the companies destined for the army of occupation. A considerable number have been enlisted at the head-quarters of all the companies throughout the city, and seven other companies were in barracks below the Third Municipality, whose numbers are complete, averaging seventy men each. The following is the order in which they were mustered into the service: No. 1 company, Capt. I. Stockton; No. 2, Capt. Smith; No. 3, Capt. Hunt; No. 4, Capt. Breedlove; No. 5, Capt. Head; No. 6, Capt. Tobin; No. 7, Captain Glenn. These, in round numbers, make about 500 men. The companies which are nearly complete but not yet mustered, viz: Capt. Crevon's, Capt. Dessomme's, Capt. Soniat's, Capt. White's, and Senator Mark's, will probably reach in the aggregate 400 more; making in all 900 men. The Times says:

"There are a few more companies in process of formation, scattered in different localities, which will be filled up, it is expected, by Saturday, when they will be en masse a body of 1200 men. Gen. Smith expects the First Regiment to be ready to proceed to the scene of action on the Rio Grande, on Saturday. It will be under the command of Col. Walton. We hope certainly to see them off before the week closes, as much depends on the celerity of their movements at this critical juncture. Indeed, since the principal object is to reinforce Gen. Taylor at once, we are unaffectedly of opinion that it would be better to send them off, even one hundred at a time, as soon as ready. They could easily be formed into regiments and be brigaded, after the first pressing want has been relieved. We should imitate the Mobile people herein; they sent off the first available force at a moment's warning."

We make the following extracts from the New Orleans Delta, of May 7:

We understand that Company A., Regiment Louisiana Volunteers, have filled their ranks, and will be mustered into the service of the United States this morning, for the purpose of proceeding immediately to the aid of Gen. Taylor; with the other volunteer corps already formed.—The above company is commanded by the following young men: A. F. Rudler, Captain; Lieutenants J. L. Jordan and R. F. Tupper; and Sergeants John D. Berry, J. D. Patter, E. F. Williams and J. D. Stordorff.

Besides Maj. Marks, of the Senate, Messrs. Lyons and Fountain, of the House of Representatives, have joined the volunteers. There are three vacancies created for persons ambitious of Legislative honors.

HURRA FOR MOBILE!—Lieutenant Lovell, of the United States Army, left in the Creole yesterday for Mobile, for the purpose of mustering into the service of the United States nineteen companies of Volunteers, which are expected to be ready on his arrival.

This is the spirit such as the occasion calls for, and responded to in a manner which sustains the already well deserved praise which the chivalric Mobilians have hitherto obtained. No petty differences or trifling questions of who shall command them? Have interfered to prevent them from volunteering promptly. promptly. They heard that Texas had been invaded by the wily Mexican—that General Taylor was likely to be surrounded—and that Point Isabel, containing his supplies, was in imminent danger of being taken. This was enough—ambition and distinction were forgotten, and each vied with the other as to who should be the first in the field. Well may the welkin ring again with the shout—Hurra for Mobile!—Hurra for Alabama!

REQUISITIONS FOR RATIONS, CLOTHING, &c.—In consequence of hearing some murmurings that the companies of the Volunteers which had been mustered into the service of the United States, and sent to the Barracks, found neither rations nor uniforms there, we made inquiries of Col. Hunt, the U. S. Deputy Quarter-Master-General, as well as Capt. Grayson, U. S. Commissary, and found that no requisitions had been made upon them. In order to prevent disappointment in these particulars with those who are not already mustered, we are requested to suggest that these matters should be attended to the first thing by Commanders of companies; and if so, that they will be promptly attended to.
