It is now very generally believed that Capt. Besacon’s company went up with the train under Major Lally.

The following letter gives some facts that we have not before seen, though news promptly reached here of the insurrection on in Yucatan.

[Correspondence of the Picayune]
Gentlemen—On Sunday last the city was startled with the intelligence from Yucatan that the whole Indian population of that State had risen against the whites, and in some districts massacred entirely the whole population with the exception of the women, whom they only spared for a fate still worse than death. The news was received here by the French Consul in a communication from the French Consul at Campeachy, and the massacre he says was universal, no distinction being made except between Indians and whites. In some of the districts the whites have succeeded in reaching the cities and were there waiting succor. There is good reason to hope they will be able to defend themselves until they are reinforced. At Campeachy they were in expectation of an immediate attack.

The French brigs of war La Peyrouse and La Pilate have, it is understood, been ordered to Campeachy, and there is a report that Com. Perry is about ordering down one of the vessels of our squadron. There is, perhaps, some exaggeration in the accounts of the extent of the massacre, but of the main facts there is not a doubt. The Indians in Yucatan have been more oppressed than in any other part of Mexico, because the landholders are generally absentee residents in Spain, and entrust the management of their estates to stewards, who to subserve their own interest, grind the unfortunate Peon to the dust.

An express arrived here on Tuesday from Alvarado to Com. Perry, with information that the guerrillas had attacked that place the night before and killed a surgeon and two marines in that town. The steamers Petrita and Scorpion were immediately dispatched to reinforce those in possession of the place.

In the Sun of Anahuac, of the 25th ult., we find the following note from Mr. Hayes:

Mr. Editor will you do me the favor to correct an error into which you have inadvertently fallen in the account of the march of the small train under the command of Capt. Wells. In the article you give me the command of the detachment—–it was under the command of Corporal Meredith. I accompanied the train on the invitation of Capt. Fairchild, and was of course, temporarily attached to his command; but am entitled to no credit, as I merely performed the usual routine of duty.

I regret the necessity of troubling you, but my silence might be construed into a desire to take credit for acts performed by others.

Respectfully yours,
A.H. HAYES.

The same paper also contains the following orders, no doubt suggested by the escape of Paredes from Vera Cruz:

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 11
U.S. Flag Ship Germantown, Anton Lizardo, Aug. 18, 1847.

All vessels, excepting army steamers and transports, arriving at ports in Mexico held by the United States forces, are to be visited by a boat from the general ship of the day, or any single vessel of the squadron, that may be in port for the purpose of tendering the usual compliment of services to foreign vessels of war, and detecting any irregularities in foreign mail steamers or merchant vessels, whether foreign or American.

It is desirable when it be practicable, that the boarding officer should be a lieutenant.

M.C.PERRY,
Commanding Home Squadron.
The following notice from the collector of Vera Cruz is important to travelers:

NOTICE.—Passengers arriving at this port without passports from the American Consul, resident at the port they embark from, will not be allowed to leave the vessel, and the master of any vessel permitting such passengers to land will be fined $500 for each and every passenger landed and the vessel held responsible for the same.

From the N.O. Delta, 3d inst.

Extract of a letter from an officer at Vera Cruz under date of the 27th August, 1847

“Your correspondents have doubtless informed you that Gen Scott reached the city of Mexico on the (I have not the date at hand.) Worth went around behind the city, and cut off the water. Valencia, with a larger force salied out of the city, met Gen Scott, fought a little while, and then vamoosed into the city. Santa Anna then brought out a force and fought some time, but retreated into the city in great disorder---convoked the Congress, and sent out for a cessation of hostilities, expressing himself willing to treat with Mr. Trist. Hostilities ceased---Scott surrounding the city. There is no doubt of the correctness of this information. Some think peace will soon be established, but nobody thinks so in Vera Cruz. Maj Lally was heard from beyond Ponce, on his way to Puebla, not molested.”

The following from our regular Vera Cruz correspondent, was scribbled off very hastily, just at the Fashion was about to leave:

August 27, 1847:

EDITORS DELTA—Every conceivable variety of rumor relative to the movements of the Great General and his generals, have been afloat for several days past, but none having the color of authenticity about them. I omit sending them to you. This morning, however, a rumor found its way from the interior, which leads to the belief that Scott has had two most decisive battles, in both of which the American arms were successful. The first of these was with Valencia who hid his shard of the amusement with the advance guard; and the other was between the General himself and Santa Anna. The best and most authentic information I have received is, that the armies of both Valencia and Santa Anna have been dispersed; that the city is in the state of confusion and panic, and Congress has been summoned together, to take into consideration the propositions of Mr. Trist. That these rumors are better founded than any that have been received for some time I have no doubt. But in a day or two more, when the regular news comes here from Mexico, we shall either a confirmation of it, or otherwise.

P.S.—I have just time to inform you that the prisoners taken from Well’s train, (Lieut Henderson an 13 men,) have been, according to a Mexican who arrived here this morning, SHOT. He says he saw them shot.

D. Harden, of the Louisiana Battalion, died this morning, after a protracted illness. He will be buried this afternoon. Capt. White’s company is still at Tampico.

CAMP BAGARA, Aug. 19, 1847.

Sir—I have the honor to report for the information of the Colonel Commanding, that on the morning of the 13th inst., in obedience to his orders, I proceeded, with my command, composed of Captain Haile’s company 14th Infantry, E company of the 12th Infantry, commanded by Lieut. Wyche, and Captain Fairchild’s company of Louisiana Rangers, in all seven officers and two hundred and one rank and file. The train was composed of two ambulances, each drawn by four good horses, fit for the service in which they were employed, and nice wagons drawn by half broken down but still unbroken Mexican mules, with which it would have been difficult for me to have fulfilled my orders even I there had been no enemy to contend with. The commanding officer was not mounted and was under the mortifying necessity of dismounting a dragoon and taking a horse when circumstances were such that he could not possible perform his duty on foot. Such was the command with which my orders required me to traverse a country and pass a bridge and fortification which no less than eight hundred men, supported by artillery, had heretofore attempted. I had not proceeded four miles from camp when it became necessary to throw out a part of my provisions; and it was then only with the aid of my infantry, and the extraordinary exertions of the active and efficient wagon master (Mr. Booley) who accompanied the train that the wagons could be forced up the sand hill. I reached Santa Fe and encamped for the night. The next morning I pursued the march, the enemy appearing on the flank, but evidently with no intention of attacking us. A few shots were exchanged between them and Captain Fairchild’s company, who had left the road to give chase. I arrived at Juvento del Rio about nine o’clock at night and encamped. Here I judged myself to be within six miles of Major Lally’s camp. The next morning I directed Captain Fairchild to detach an officer (Lieutenant Henderson) and thirteen men with the orders to proceed to Major Lally’s camp, and report my advance, provided he could prudently do so and the distance did not exceed six miles, but by no means to go beyond that distance, but to return and report the condition of the road to me. This command was accompanied by Dr. Cooper of the army and two of the Georgia Volunteers. I regret to inform you that I have not since heard of this detachment, and I am ignorant of its fate. I pursued the march until about ten o’clock, with difficulty getting the mules along, and at Pass La Beja, whilst the train was on the bridge, and the troops were getting water, the enemy appeared in force in front, on the hill, and commenced a fire upon us; some of the shots were also fired from the rear. After the necessary preparations were made, I detached Capt. Haile. Haile with his company through the chaparral to gain the flank, and if possible the rear. This service was promptly and gallantly performed, whilst the command was ascending the hill. He gave them a fire which put them into immediate flight. I ordered Lieut. Morrelle, of Capt. Fairchild’s company, with twenty men mounted to hold the horses near the bridge until the train had ascended the hill. The rear, however, was not attacked at this place. We continued our march, dispersing the enemy before us, until dark; when, as the train was passing a bridge within three miles of Puerto Nacional, the enemy opened his fire from the hills, within two hundred yards of the command, the balls generally ranging too high; the fire was so promptly returned that they were soon driven from their position, and, I think, with considerable loss.---Here, as I had previously intended, I ordered the troops to encamp. The wagons were placed in a safe position, the white covers taken off, the horses placed under shelter, and everything disposed for a quiet night’s rest, which my men so much required. At three o’clock next morning I had the men under arms, and detached Lieut. Wyche with a part of his company through the chaparral, to gain a position on the hill side to be ready when the enemy should advance to attack. Just at daybreak they appeared on the hill with a drum beating and firing into our camp. I did not return the fire, but ordered Capt. Haile with his company to pass up the hill to the left of the road and again their flank. They continued their music for about twenty minutes, when Capt. Haile suddenly fired upon them and was after them with the bayonet, much to the amusement of our troops, who could see them from the opposite side of the bridge. Lieut. Wyche had gained his position and was lying in wait, but they did not approach sufficiently near. I held the hill with my infantry until the train was ready to move. I was now within about three miles of Puerto Nacional. The enemy had attacked us three times in force, and was always routed, with the loss, on our part of a man. The only loss sustained was on horse wounded and three muskets rendered unserviceable by musket balls. It was so reported to me this morning by the wagon master that one of the mule teams could proceed no farther; I was compelled in consequence to destroy my tents and leave one wagon. The other mules I had no hope of getting much beyond Puerto Nacional, and had determined that if I did not find Maj. Lally near there, to destroy all the wagons and property, and with four days provisions in the haversacks, and the mail and ammunition, and some light baggage in the ambulances, to join him by forced march. Every thing being in readiness I commenced the march about half-past nine in the morning. Before this time I was fully satisfied that the enemy occupied Puerto Nacional in force. The tracks of unshod horses in the road left no doubt of that. My orders were positive; no direction was allowed me, and according to my ideas of military service, I felt bound to proceed in the execution of my order, until it was proved without the possibility of a doubt that it could not be carried out. My force was too small to detach any part of it to endeavor to turn the position. I accordingly made my dispositions so as to sacrifice the least possible number of my troops. With thirty picked men under the command of Lt. Cheney, 14th Infantry, extended to six paces, I descended towards the bridge. This detachment was ordered to keep at least one hundred yards in front of the mounted men. After the mounted men with some interval, marched Lieut. Wyche’s company; next came the train followed by Capt. Haile’s company, who were ordered to close on and protect it, in case it should be charged. The rear guard, commanded by Lieut. Morrelle, of Captain Fairchild’s company, followed after Capt. Haile’s company. I halted the command on the slope of the hill, continuing to [illegible] myself, with Lieut. Cheney’s command, hoping to draw the enemy’s fire, without further ex[illegible] my troops. All was, however still—nothing could be seen. I directed the advance to move upon the bridge, ordered up the main body, and took my position in person near the bridge, where I could direct the advance, or order a retreat as one might prove practicable, or the other necessary. The rear of the command had scarcely got in motion, when the enemy opened their fire from the forts and heights with muskets, escopets, and artillery, and shoved themselves in such numbers and position, that I perceived at once that in passing the bridge, they must necessarily inflict upon me such a loss in killed and wounded, that it would be impracticable for me to advance or retire. I therefore directed the fire to be returned, and the retreat commenced; and withdrew my troops from under the fire of this strong place, with the loss of only four men killed, and one man and two horses wounded. One of the ambulances was quickly turned and gained the top of the hill—the other, in the act of turning, had one of his horses killed, and could not be brought off. The mules were of course more unmanageable than ever, and as soon as the enemy perceived that we were retiring the concentrated their whole fire upon the train. Half the mules were almost instantly shot down and the teamsters compelled to abandon their wagons. The enemy now displayed a strong force outside the fort, and was moving to gain our rear. I now moved off my command, which had been halted at the top of the hill, just beyond the effective range of the enemy’s guns, and abandoned the train, which I could not possibly have brought off, nearly all the mules having been either killed or wounded; and to have blown up the ammunitions or saved anything from the wagons would have been to sacrifice men, which it was not evident I had not to spare, and would have compelled to leave my wounded, as I had not the means of transporting them. All the property, as well the personal baggage of the officers, was lost, and some despatches

Which I ordered Capt Haile to keep in his trunk as the safest place, were also lost. The mail intended for the army was, however, saved, and the only wounded man brought from the field.
The enemy’s force occupying the forts I could not estimate with any degree of accuracy; it was certainly several times my own, and there was also a considerable force outside. Nothing was left now for me to do but force my way through the enemy in the rear and return by rapid marches to this place. The enemy appeared on every side during the day, and I was compelled to proceed with the greatest caution, always holding one hill until my infantry gained possession of the next in front, by a fatiguing march through the chaparral. This laborious duty fell principally upon Capt. Haile. I continued my march at night, but after dark I met with no further opposition from the enemy, and arrived the next morning at Santa Fe.

The next day I arrived and encamped at this place. In conclusion, I must be permitted speak of the officers who so ably sustained me on this trying march; Capt Haile, of the 14th Infantry, I had frequently to detach on laborious and dangerous service, and it was universally performed in a manner that called forth my warmest admiration. Lieutenant Wyche, 12th Infantry, though sick, was with his company, and rendered important service. Lt. Cheney, 14th Infantry, who commanded the advance on the 16th, I was compelled to glance in a most dangerous position at the bridge, and his coolness and bravery were conspicuous. To Lieut Morrelle of Capt Fairchild’s company, and the twenty brave volunteers who composed his command, my thanks are also particularly due. I had assigned him the duty of holding heights and protecting the rear. He selected his positions with judgment, and I frequently saw from the front his men charging and firing upon the guerrillas who were annoying the rear. Mr Hayes, of N. Orleans, accompanied the command as an amateur, and was always a volunteer whenever dangerous or difficult service was to be performed.

I am, sir, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
J.M. Wells,
Capt. 12th Infantry, Com’dg Detachment.

RW47v24n72p4c5, September 14, 1847, GEN. PAREDES

We have a letter from Vera Cruz, dated the 19th of August, which mentions a rumor current there that General Paredes had reached Orizaba, and was at the head of three hundred men. No other particulars are mentioned. From the tone in which our correspondent speaks of the rumor, we infer that he attaches no consequence to it. We observe in the Vera Cruz papers speculation upon the probable designs of Paredes and his chances of success. They are not of a character so plausible that we deem it necessary to reproduce them. But a few days will elapse before we may expect to receive authentic accounts of his movements. New Orleans Picayune, 3rd inst.

RW47v24n73p1c1, September 17, 1847, THE GREAT BATTLE

We have at length authentic and highly interesting intelligence from Gen. Scott’s camp—intelligence of a brilliant but bloody victory, after perhaps the most severely contested battle fought since the commencement of the war. The letter of Mr. Kendall, of the Picayune, gives a more connected and satisfactory account of the events of the 19th and 20th of August, than any other narrative we have seen, though it is not so full as that of the Delta’s correspondent in its history of the skillfully planned and courageously executed affair of the morning of the 29th, in which Gen. Persifer F. Smith so signalily distinguished himself. We subjoin that portion of the Delta’s narrative:

"At 3 o’clock on the morning of the 20th, the movement commenced, which was so slow that daybreak appeared before the head of Caldwell’s brigade commenced ascending the ravine at the village. As soon as Col. Riley ascended the hill and came in full view of the enemy, they opened a severe fire on Riley’s forces.

"Our correspondent then continues—"Col Riley threw out his two advance divisions as skirmishes, and said—’Now boys give them hell; close in with them, and let the bayonet do its work,’ and his command rushed down the slope with a yell and enthusiasm enough to strike terror to the heart of the boldest, while the rear of his command moved steadily forward as if they were all made of one piece. The Sappers and Miners and Rifle Regiment, which had been thrown across a ravine intervening between the one they passed up, and under the brow of the slope Col. Riley came down, from that position poured in a fire which swept in front of Col. Riley’s column, then inclining towards their left, joined in the attack of the troops outside of the left flank of the fort. Gen Cadwalader followed the route taken by Col. Riley and soon as his troops were formed, moved on to his support. The first brigade, which was bringing up the rear, had been ordered to follow the same route—while it was on its march by the right flank of the ravine, and nearly opposite the fort, Gen Smith ordered the brigade to face to the left and advance in line to attack the enemy’s force in flank—this movement was executed in less time than it takes me to write it—they met the enemy outside of the fort just as Col. Riley’s brigade rushed into it—the enemy was completely routed, and commenced a precipitate retreat—their cavalry and infantry had been formed to receive the
The reader will find, in our columns to–day, a list of the officers killed and wounded in the late sanguinary conflict near the city of Mexico. Among them he will recognize the names of several Virginians,—Thornton, Easley and Johnson among the dead, and Graham among the wounded.

But all of the incidents which go to illustrate the horrors of war, we have seen none which presents them to the mind in a more striking and powerful manner than the present condition of the South Carolina regiment of volunteers. They left their homes six months ago, about 800 strong. Of this number, 140 died at Vera Cruz or on the way, in the fort at Veracruz, and 1200 more are left in Mexico, of whom 500 are in hospital, and the remainder in the army. The list of names is a long one, and we shall not attempt to give it here. It will be more interesting to read the experiences of some of the survivors, who have been through the horrors of war, and to hear their own accounts of what they have seen and suffered.

march to Puebla; 360 were left sick in the various hospitals. About 272 were in a condition to fight at the late battle, and of that number 137, including their gallant Colonel, Pierce M. Butler, were killed—leaving a meager remnant of 135—a moiety of whom may yet perhaps fall in battle or perish by disease before the war shall terminate! What a contrast will the return home of this shattered corps present to the "pride, pomp, and circumstance" which attended their enlistment and departure for the seat of war!

RW47v24n73p1c3, September 17, 1847, FURTHER ACCOUNTS

The Washington Union of Tuesday night publishes several letters from officers of the army to the Departments in Washington. The following is the only one, however which adds any thing to our previous information:

VERA CRUZ, August 31, 1847.

"SIR: I have the honor and satisfaction to inform you that our army has again been crowned with victory; 31,000 Mexicans engaged, with Gen. Santa Anna at their head, our little army, who, with the bayonet, drove them, in two hours, to the gates of the city.

Commissioners were immediately appointed, and negotiations are going on. The protocol appears on the face of it to be dictated by our commissioners. I had an English copy of it to send to you, but Colonel Wilson, for some cause best known to himself, begged it to send to the President.

"I send despatches which I received from Mr. Trist, to the hon. James Buchanan. I cannot conclude without congratulating you, sir, on the mighty conquest, for I feel assured it will result in peace. Paredes will, in my opinion, hurry the conclusion of it. He ought never to have got out, after he got into the city; nevertheless, I firmly believe it will hasten a peace. Valencia made his escape with only two companions to Toluca, where he pronounced against Santa Anna and peace.

"I enclose a copy of a letter which I have received (from a very distinguished officer of the army.)

"With great respect, your obedient servant.

Hon. WILLIAM L. MARCY,
Secretary of War, Washington City.

"I am pleased to add, that the following named persons are the commissioners on the part of Mexico; and more so, because they are considered most friendly disposed for peace, viz;

General Herrera,
Sor. Couto, Lawyer.
General Mora y Villamil, Sor. Atristain, Lawyer,
Sor. Arroya, Secretary (formerly secretary of legation the United States.

"I have just seen a letter from one of the most respectable English houses to their house here; they say that the Mexicans are so out generalled and so cornered, that they must make peace; but that Gen. Scott says if they do not at once, he will occupy the city with a territorial government—place 5000 troops to open the roads, &c. They speak of the Americans with admiration.

"The country people were already commencing to supply the army with every thing."

Mr. Trist writes to the Secretary of State that the American and Mexican commissioners had had two meetings, and were to have a third and probably last interview on the 30th of August. The Union, however, although it says Scott's victory places the Mexican capital at the mercy of our army, adds: "The issue of this negotiation is not to be counted on with confidence;" as the Mexicans, "after the panic of the moment is passed, may again manifest their insane obstinacy in prolonging the war."

RW47v24n73p1c4, September 17, 1847, BRILLIANT VICTORIES

From the New Orleans Picayune, Sept. 5.

Important from Gen. Scott's Army
BATTLES OF CONTRERAS AND CHURUBUSCO.

Total Defeat of the Mexicans---General Scott encamped within two and a half miles of the City of Mexico---Armistice between the two Armies---Negotiations with Mr. Trist for a Peace commenced.

The U. States steamship Mary Kingland, Capt. John Davis, arrived at an early hour this morning.–By her we have received our letters from Mr. Kendall from the 22nd to the 28th of August, all dated from Tacubaua. A courier dispatched by him on the 29th with the first account of the battle fought on that day, was cut off.

From a map and plan of the battle fields before us, we note that they are called the battles of Contreras and Churubusco--so called from field works of the enemy of those names. The victories were decisive, but as far as we can judge from a hasty perusal of a portion of our letters, the proposition for an armistice was made by Gen. Scott--probably at the suggestion of the British Embassy. The report we have hitherto given that the city of Mexico was at our mercy, appears to have been unfounded.

Should peace not follow from the negotiations now pending, another battle must ensue, the enemy having a force of from fifteen to twenty thousand men yet left. But the road appears to be completely open to us, and the city is only two and a miles form our encampment.

Our victories have been purchased at a vast loss of valuable life, as will be seen by the following list. We see names of men at the loss of whom we weep; but all have their friends, and we make no distinctions.

Our entire loss in killed and wounded is short of eleven hundred; that of the enemy is not well known. His loss in killed alone is believed to be fully equal to our entire loss, and it is estimated that at least 3,000 prisoners were taken. The number of his wounded was not ascertained, but is supposed to be very large. Gen. Scott himself received a wound n the leg below the knee, but from the manner in which Mr. Kendall speaks of it, we are led to hope the injury a slight one.

Tacubayo, (near Mexico,) August 22, 1847.

The celebrated Archibishop's Palace of Tacubayo is now occupied by Gen. Scott, and a portion of the army, after twice defeating the enemy in two of the hardest fought battles of the war, are quartered immediately around him. I have already sent you off a hurried sketch of the glorious events of the 20th, and even the present letter must be but a hurried synopsis of the battles, which have shed such additional glory upon the American arms.

On the 14th inst. A reconnaissance made by Col. Duncan having proved that a road for artillery and wagons
At 7 o'clock on the morning of the 18th, Gen. Scott arrived at San Augustin, and at 10 o'clock Gen. Worth was in full march for the city of Mexico by the main road. Majors Smith and Turnbill, Capt. Masori and other engineer officers, were sent in advance, supported by Captain Blake’s squadron of dragoons, to reconnoiter, as it was known the enemy was in force at or near San Antonio. The party, when withing a thousand yards, was fired upon from a battery, which was masked by trees, and the first ball from a 12–pounder instantly killed Capt. Thornton of the 2d Dragoons, besides severely wounding a guide, Jonathan Fitzwalters. Col. Garland’s brigade was now ordered to occupy the hacienda of Carrera, within plain sight and range of the enemy’s batteries at San Antonio, while Col. Clarke’s brigade and the battery under Col. Duncan took a station in the rear close by. The engineer officers were at once sent out to reconnoiter by Gen. Worth, to ascertain the practicability of turning the strong works of the enemy, and in the mean time Gen Scott had despatched Capt Lee with a supporting party, composed of Gen’l Kearney’s squadron and a body of the 11th Infantry under Col Graham, to ascertain the practicability of finding a read by which the village of San Angel could be reached, and thus turn the strong hold of San Antonio. This latter party had a sharp encounter with the advance of this enemy, the main body being found posted at a strong point not far from the factory of Coutreras. In the skirmish some six or eight Mexicans were killed, and as many more taken prisoners—on our side not a man was touched. The result of the reconnoissance proved favorable. It was ascertained that a road could be made which would enable the army to reach San Angel, and thus turn the strong batteries of San Antonio and perhaps others the enemy might have upon the road between the and the city of Mexico. The Mexicans were plainly seen in force at a commanding position near Coutreras, and it was evident that they had a number of cannon in position; but at a council held at night, it was determined upon to attack them the following day.

In the meantime, while the reconnaissance was in progress, Gen. Worth had established his headquarters at the hacienda of Curera, while from the windows countless numbers of the enemy could be seen at work upon the batteries of San Antonio. About noon they opened upon the hacienda with both round shot and shell, nearly every one of which took, effect, but without doing other injury than to the building. Late in the evening of the batteries again opened, but with no other result than showing the position of the different guns. For a marvelous the batteries were silent during the night. Had the fire been kept up, the hacienda might have been torn in places and the entire command compelled to retire. Before going farther it may be well to state that the city of Mexico lies about nine miles nearly north of San Augustin, that San Antonio is about 3 miles in the same direction, while the point occupied by Gen. Valencia, near Coutreras, for he had command at that place, is at least three miles in a straight line and in a direction nearly west. It was ten miles the way many of our troops had to march, for you cannot imagine a more rough, uneven and jagged surface.

At 8 o’clock on the morning of the 19th the batteries again opened on Gen. Worth’s position at the hacienda near San Antonio, the balls crushing through the way and filling the rooms with fragments of plaster and broken furniture. Shells also burst in the air over the building and the pieces dropped among the men stationed in the rear. So hot was the fire that the troops were obliged to gain shelter behind the building, but still did not give up the position. About 9 o’clock the divisions of Gens. Pillow and Twiggs were ordered to advance in the direction of Coutreras and by one in the afternoon were in plain sight of the enemy’s batteries, and within range of his heavier guts. The brigade of Gen. P. F. Smith was ordered to advance directly towards the enemy’s works, while that of Col. Riley moved towards a small village to the right, with orders to gain the main road and thus be enabled to cut off any reinforcements which might be sent to Valencia from the city. An incessant firing of cannon was opened upon the advance of Gen. Smith, and soon the Rifles were engaged in skirmishing with the pickets of the enemy and driving them in. The 12-pounder battery of Capt Maguder, was pressed forward with all speed, as was also the rocket and mountain howitzer battery, now commanded by Lt. Callender of the Ordinance Department. As soon as the could gain a position they opened upon the enemy, but were so much exposed to the fire from heavier guns that they were soon silenced. Lt. Johnson, of the 1st Artillery, but attached to Magruder’s battery, was mortally wounded, while Lt. Callender was severely wounded in both legs. At 3 o’clock the brigade of Gen. Cadwalader was ordered out to support Col. Riley, heavy reinforcements being soon on their way out from the city, while Gen. Pierce’s brigade was sent to sustain Gen. Smith. The firing from the batteries of the enemy continued incessant, while from a hill just outside of the range of their guns, the spectacle was most grand and imposing. At about 4 o’clock Gen Scott arrived, and seeing the immense strength of the Mexicans, at once ordered Gen. Shield’s brigade from San Augustin—a part of Gen, Quitman’s command—to the right support Riley and Cadwalader, and prevent, if possible, a juncture of the forces coming out from the city with those of Valencia. But few of the movements of our own troops could be seen from the hill where we were posted, owing to the dense chaparral, sharp rocks and ravines, but not a motion of the enemy but was plainly visible. The order of battle of Valencia was certainly most imposing—infantry were seen drawn up to support the batteries, while long lines of the enemy’s cavalry were stationed in the rear, as if awaiting the shock of battle. Two separate charges of the latter were distinctly seen repulsed by Col. Riley, who had moved his brigade at one time to a position partially in the rear of the enemy’s work. Col Harney was exceedingly anxious to march his cavalry to the sense of actions, but it was deemed utterly impracticable. The nature of the ground was such that the infantry even had great difficulty in finding the way across the pedregal, as the Mexicans term it—ground covered with sharp, jagged rocks.

Until the night had fairly closed in the fire from the enemy’s batteries did not slacken—it had been a continuous roar for nearly six hours. Gen. Scott retired to San Augustin about 8 o’clock, an in the midst of a hard rain which had just commenced falling. Gens. Twiggs and Pillow came in about 11 o’clock, wet and completely exhausted. It was impossible to use horses on the rough and exceedingly broken ground on which they had been operating for nearly twelve hours. Not anticipating the immense strength of the works of the enemy, or the almost insurmountable difficulties of reaching them, it had been at first thought that the batteries would be taken at a dash, and that the troops would be all comfortably quartered in San Angel for the night; instead of the a large portion of them were compelled to bivouac without blankets in the midst of a pitiless rain, and on ground where they could not even stretch themselves out. Add to this, the prospects of the morrow were far from flattering—were enough to dismay any but the stoutest hearts—that the enemy would doubtless reinforce and strengthen his works during the night, having every superiority in knowledge of the ground—add again to this that the men were weakened by long exertions, want of food, and chilled by the continuous night rain, and it is not saying too much assert that the bivouac of the 19th August was gloomy in the extreme.

Early on the morning of the 20th, Gen. Worth was ordered to move with a part of his division—Garland’s brigade—towards the scene of action at Coutreras, to aid in the attack upon Valencia, for to force this position was deemed indispensable. A few discharges of cannon were heard about 7 o’clock, and a heavy rattling of musketry, and some even said that in the distance they had seen large masses of Mexicans in full flight towards the city; yet few dreamed that the batteries at Coutreras had been stormed and carried. Yet so it was. Gen. Scott himself accompanied by Gen. Worth, started for the scene of action, when they were met by Capt. Mason, with the joyful intelligence that Valencia had been completely routed, after a short but terrible struggle. The attack upon his works was planned by Gen. Smith, and resulted in the capture of fifteen pieced of artillery, some fifteen hundred prisoners—among them, Gens. Bianco, Garcia, Mendoza, and the notorious Salas; all the ammunition and camp equipage, while the road along which those who escaped fled was strewn with muskets. No less than 700 of the enemy, among them many officers, were left dead on the field—the number of wounded was undoubtedly far greater. I have no time now to enlarge or comment upon this well planned and brilliant achievement, but reserving a more full description for some other time, must pass on to other exciting events. The works at Coutreras completely in the power of the American army, Gen Scott at once ordered Gen. Worth to fall back upon San Antonio, to turn and capture that work and then to push on towards the main road, while the main body of the army under Gens. Twiggs, Pillow, Smith, Pierce and Cadwalader, moved on towards San Angel and Cohoycan.—Scarcely had the advance of Gen. Twiggs got half a mile beyond the latter village, before a rattling fire of musketry announced that it was actively engaged with the outposts of the enemy, and the heavy booming of cannon now gave token that noted 2d division had fallen upon another strong work. But a few minutes more and tremendous firing from the right, and immediately in the main road from San Augustine to the capital, made it evident that General Worth’s division was actively engaged. He had completely turned the strong works of San Antonio, but while doing so the enemy had abandoned the place with the loss of their heavy guns, and had fallen back upon his second and stronger line of works. It was now at the commencement of the battle, about 1 o’clock in the afternoon, and sure such a rattling of firearms has seldom or never been heard on the continent of America, accompanied with such booming of artillery; and this was continued over two house and until the enemy was fully routed from every point, and until those who were not killed or taken prisoners were in full flight for the city. Let me endeavor in words to give the reader an idea of the position and works of the enemy. As you come along the road leading from San Augustine to the capital, and immediately this side the Puerto del Roseana, the Mexicans had thrown up a strong and exceedingly well-built battery, commanding the road completely. On the right as you faced the city, stretching for a long distance was a continuous ditch, behind the bank of which an immense number of Mexican infantry were posted. On the left of the tete de pont, or work at the bridge, and about three hundred yards distant, was the church of Churubusco, or San Pablo, strongly fortified with works for infantry, and also having a well constructed battery containing a number of guns of heavy caliber. This work was a little advanced from the tete de pont, and nearly in a line between it and the village of Cohoycan—Further on, on the other side of the work at the bridge, and about three hundred yards from the road, was a large building, well adapted for the protection of infantry, an in which the enemy had also posted an immense body.—The ground in the vicinity of all these points was completely covered with corn, and other fields, cut up in every direction by wide and deep ditches, presented obstacles innumerable to the advance of our troops. No reconnaissance of the position of the enemy had been made, and consequently its strength could only be ascertained by hard blows and knocks.

The divisions of Gens. Twiggs and Worth were at once engaged, the former with the church and strong-hold of Churubusco, and the latter with the batteries at the bridge; and in the meantime Gen. Shield’s brigades—the New York and South Carolina volunteers—together with the 9th, 19th, and 15th regiments of Infantry under General Pierce, were hurrying onward from Cohoycon to attack the hacienda. Soon they were engaged, and the battle now became general. The enemy had over twenty pieces of cannon, all in admirable position, and served with more than ordinary skill, while but few of our guns could be brought to bear. The battery of Capt. Frank Taylor, it is true, opened a well directed fire upon Churubusco, but so exposed was its situation that it suffered most terribly, both in officers and men.

To describe the fierce conflict, even now that two days have elapsed, or to give an account of the part taken by the different regiments, were impossible. From the opening of the strife up to the time the Mexicans were entirely routed and in full flight for the city, was one continuous roar of cannon and musketry, accompanied by the loud shouts of the Victoria as some new vantage ground was gained; and high above the din rose a dense column of smoke, at time completely shrouding the combatants.—The strength of the enemy at this battle is known to have been 15,000 at least, many say 20,000, all fresh troops in a position of uncommon strength. Opposed to them were about 6000 Americans, jaded and broken down by marches and countermarches, and by incessant toil before the stronghold of Courtwras and San Antonio. At Churubusco, the Mexicans themselves say, Santa Anna commanded in person, but that he left early. The noted battalions of Hidalgo and Victoria, and of Independencia—the Polkas, or young men of the capital, from whom so much was expected—nearly all fled without firing a gun.

In the different works (but mostly in the church) taken by Gen. Twiggs, near 2000 troops were captured. Among them were Gen. Rincon, who commanded in person, Gen. Anaya, lately President Substitute, and Gen. Arevallon, as also Col. Gorentega, formerly Minister at Washington.—Gen. Garay was captured near San Antonio by General Worth, and several influential officers, among them Col. Miramon, by Gen. Shields at the hacienda; but the most important capture of all was the entire Foreign Battalion, mostly made up of deserters from our own army, with their commander, notorious Riley himself. They are all now under close guard, and I trust will be strictly dealt with.

The loss on our side has fallen most heavily upon the South Carolina and New York volunteers, the 6th Infantry and Smith’s light battalion, attached to Worth’s division, and the batteries of Capts. Magruder and Taylor. The S. Carolina regiment was nearly cut to pieces losing 137 out of 272 men, with which it went into action. The 1st Artillery has suffered severely in officers.

The Mexican accounts acknowledge the loss, in killed, wounded and prisoners, or no less than thirteen Generals, (among them three Ex. Presidents,) and forty-five pieces of cannon. One of our officers says that we have captured more ammunition than Gen. Scott has used since he has been in the country. Yours, &c. G. W. K.

The Armistice.

The undersigned appointed respectively—the three first by Maj. General Winfield Scott, commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States; and the two last by his excellency D. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, president of the Mexican republic and commander-in-chief of its armies, met with full powers, which were duly verified in the village of Tacubaya, on the 22nd day of August, 1847, to enter into an armistice, for the purpose of giving the Mexican government an opportunity to receiving propositions for peace from the commissioners appointed by the president of the United States, and now with the American army; when the following articles were agreed upon:

ART. 1. Hostilities shall instantly and absolutely cease between the armies of the United States of America and the United Mexican States, within 30 leagues of the capital of the latter states, to allow time to the commissioners appointed by the Mexican republic, to negotiate.

2. This armistice shall continue as long as the commissioners of the two governments may be engaged on negotiations, or until the commander of either of the said armies shall give formal notice to the other of the cessation of the armistice, and for 48 hours after such notice.

3. In the mean time, neither army shall, within thirty leagues of the city of Mexico, commence any new fortification, or military work of offence or defence, or do anything to enlarge or strengthen any existing work or fortification of that character, within the said limits.

4. Neither army shall be reinforced within the same. Any reinforcements in troops or munitions of war, other than subsistence now approaching either army, shall be stopped at the distance of twenty-eight leagues from the city of Mexico.

5. Neither army, nor any detachment from it, shall advance beyond the line it at present occupies.

6. Neither army, nor any detachment or individual of either, shall pass the neutral limits established by the last article, except under flags of truce bearing the correspondence between the two armies, or on the business authorized by the next article; and individuals of either army who may chance to straggle within the neutral limits, shall by the opposite party be kindly warned off or sent back to their own armies under flags of truce.

7. The American army shall not by violence obstruct the passage form the open country into the city of Mexico, of the ordinary supplies of food necessary to the consumption of its inhabitants, or the Mexican army within the city; nor shall the Mexican authorities, civil or military, do any act to obstruct the passage of supplies from the city, or the country needed by the American army.

8. All American prisoners of war remaining in the hands of the Mexican army, and not to heretofore exchanged, shall immediately, or as soon as practicable, be restored to the American army against a like number, having regard to rank, of Mexican prisoners captured by the American army.

9. All American citizens who were established in the city of Mexico prior to the existing war, and who have since been expelled from that city, shall be allowed to return to their respective business or families therein, without delay or molestation.

10. The better to enable the belligerent armies to execute these articles, and to favor the great object of peace, it is further agreed between the parties that any courier with dispatches that either army shall desire to send along the line from the city of Mexico or its vicinity, to and from Vera Cruz, shall receive a safe conduct from the commander of the opposing army.

11. The administration of justice between Mexicans, according to the general and state constitutions and laws, by the local authorities of the towns and places occupied by the American forces, shall not be obstructed in any manner.

12. Persons and property shall be respected in the towns and places occupied by the American forces.
No person shall be molested in the exercise of his profession; nor the services of any one be required without his consent. In all cases where services are voluntarily rendered, a just price shall be paid, and trade remain unmolested.

13. Those wounded prisoners who may desire to remove to some more convenient place for the purpose of being cured of their wounds shall be allowed to do so without molestation, they still remaining prisoners.

14. Those Mexican medical officers who may wish to attend the wounded shall have the privilege of doing so, if their services be required.

15. For the more perfect execution of this agreement two commissioners shall be appointed, one by each party; who in case of disagreement shall appoint a third.

16. This convention shall have no force or effect unless approved by their excellencies the commanders respectively of the two armies within 24 hours, reckoning from the sixth hour of the 23rd day of August, 1847.

The following is the letter addressed by Gen. Scott to Gen. Santa Anna:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY U.S. AMERICA.
Coyoacan, August 21, 1847.

To his Excellency the President and General in Chief of the Republic of Mexico.

Sir—Too much blood has already been shed in this unnatural war between the two great Republics of this continent. It is time that the differences between them should be amicably and honorably settled, and it is known to your Excellency that a commissioner of the part of the U. States, clothed with full powers to that end, is with this army.—To enable the two Republics to enter on negotiations, I am willing to sign, on any reasonable terms, a short armistice.

I shall wait with impatience until to-morrow morning for a direct answer to this communication; but shall in the meantime seize and occupy such positions outside of the capital as I may deem necessary to shelter and comfort this army.

I have the honor to remain, with high consideration and respect, your Excellency’s most obedient servant.

WINFIELD SCOTT.

To this letter a reply was returned by the Mexican Secretary of War, of which the following is a hasty version:

Ministry of War and Marine,
Mexico, August 21, 1847.

To His Excellency Gen. Winfield Scott, Commander in Chief of the Army of the U.S. America.

Sir—The undersigned, Minister of War and marine of the Government of the United States of Mexico, is instructed by his Excellency the President, commander-in-chief, to reply to your communication in which you propose to enter into an armistice, with a view to avoid the further shedding of blood between the two great Republics of this continent, for the purpose of hearing the propositions which may be made for this purpose by the commissioner of his Excellency the President of the United States of America, who is at the headquarters of the American army.

It is certainly lamentable, that in consequence of the disregard of the rights of the Mexican Republic, the shedding of blood has become inevitable between the first republics of the American continent; your Excellency with great propriety qualifies this war as unnatural, as well on account of its origin as the antecedents of two people identified by their relations and their interests. The proposition of an armistice to terminate this scandal has been received with pleasure by his Excellency the President, commander–in–chief, as it will enable the propositions to be entertained which that commissioner of the President of the United States may make for the honorable termination of the war.

Accordingly, the President, commander–in–chief, directs me to say to your Excellency that he accepts the proposition to enter into an armistice, and for this object he has appointed the brigadier generals D. Ignacio Mora y Villamil and D. Benito Quijano; who will be present at the time and place which may be designated.

His Excellency also instructs me to communicate his satisfaction that the army of the United States should occupy convenient and fitting quarters, trusting and hoping that they will be our of reach of the fire of the Mexican fortifications.

I have the honor to be with high consideration and respect, your Excellency’s most obedient servant, ALCORTA.

The same day Senor Pacheco, the Secretary of State, issued the following summon for the assembling of Congress:

MINISTRY OF INTERNAL AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,

Mexico, August 21, 1847.

Most Excellent Sir—All Mexicans, but especially the inhabitants of this capital, have been witnesses to the extraordinary exertions which have been made by his Excellency the Provisional President to collect an army capable of meeting that of the United States, and restoring the luster of the arms of the Republic. They are witnesses also that he has fought with intrepidity, exposing his own life, until the moment which the victory was lost and the enemy was at the gates of the capital.

In these circumstances, and when the numerous inhabitants of Mexico have made ever kind of sacrifice to carry on the war, it is one of the most imperative duties of the First Magistrate to prevent the calamities inseparable from an assault, and to avoid all consequences of a violent occupation of the city. To this end, and in the exercise of his constitutional powers, and in conformity with the wishes of Congress communicated to him on the 16th July last, he has determined to hear the propositions which Mr. Nicholas Trist has to make on the part of the United States, and to consent that in the meantime there shall be a suspension of hostilities.

At this question is of the utmost interest to the Republic, his Excellency desires that the national Congress should take their appropriate part, and accordingly directs me to notify your Excellency that you may take measures diligently to summon the Deputies to assemble at 12 o’clock to–day.

I reiterate the assurance of my distinguished consideration. God and Liberty.

JOSE RAMON PACHECO.

RW47v24n73p2c2, September 17, 1847, From Vera Cruz

We learn from the New Orleans Picayune of the 9th inst. That the Spanish Ambassador to the Republic of Mexico arrived at Vera Cruz, on the 31st ult. On his return home, having been recalled, it is understood, in consequence of his intrigues to establish a Monarchy in Mexico, with the Duke de Montpensier [on of Louis Phillipe’s sons] throne. It is said that the Governments both of France and England disavow having ever entertained this scheme; but the Picayune thinks they would not have been so ready to disclaim it, had it been successful. At incident which occurred on the Ambassador’s journey to Vera Cruz, and which must have disturbed his equanimity, is thus stated in the Picayune:

“A squad of Capt. Fairchild’s company of rangers happening to be in a scout, espied a body of Mexican lancers in a valley, advancing along a road from the city of Mexico. –The men had not forgotten the fate of some of their companions who accompanied Captain Wells to the Natural Bridge. Thirsting for vengeance, they were soon charging down the hill with sabres drawn. As they approached the Mexicans, a gentleman was to spring from a litter borne by a pair of mules endeavoring by gesticulations and speech to keep the squad off. Some few of the boys who understood Spanish, learned that the gentlemen who was making such a liberal use of arms and tongue, was no less a personage than the Spanish minister, and that the lancers were sent with him from the city of Mexico. The squad mistrusted there might be some trickery in the matter, and escorted the party to the gate of the city, where his Excellency, followed by numerous trains of mules, entered; and the lancers wheeled about and made their way back.”
Letters from Mexicans at Jalapa, received at Vera Cruz, state that Capt. Walker, with a detachment of about 300 men from Perote, arrived there on the 25th or 26th ult. And took several of the inhabitants prisoners, but released some of them when they proved to his satisfaction that there were not concerned in the murder of several Americans and caused two or three to be shot who were pointed out to him as murderers. Capt. W. then went to Caotepec, frightening the guerillas, who, with the Mexican Governor of the Department of Vera Cruz, fled, leaving every thing behind them. It is also stated that there was some trouble between Major Lally and Capt. Walker, the latter acting independently of the former, and doing some things that did not exactly meet with the Major’s approbation. The Major consequently ordered the Captain’s arrest, who cavalierly disregarded the order, and moved off to Caotepec! The Captain is said to be the terror of the country.

Nothing authentic has been heard of Lieut. Henderson and the 14 men who it is supposed were taken by the Mexicans recently near Puente Nacional. A Mexican in Vera Cruz, however, states that he was present when the detachment was taken into the chapparal after surrendering to twenty times their number, and shot. It is to be hoped this statement untrue.

Paredes, it is stated, halted before he reached the city of Mexico, at a place called Callenta, and communicated with Santa Anna; but Santa Anna would have nothing to do with him, and ordered him to leave the country on penalty of death. Paredes refused to obey, and was attempting to raise a party to put down Santa Anna.

It was rumored, but not credited, that Jarauta, the guerrilla chief, emboldened by his recent partial successes, mediated a descent upon Vera Cruz.

We are again so crowded with advertisements that we are compelled to defer many articles, as well as to abridge the highly interesting particulars from the seat of the war, furnished by the correspondence of Mr. Kendall of the New Orleans Picayune. We have, however, omitted no important portion of his letters.

The Picayune of the 9th inst. Also contains a letter from an English commercial house in the city of Mexico, dated on the 29th of August, which says there were about 15 or 20,000 Mexican troops in the city, and adds would be another brush unless an honorable peace should result from the pending negotiations. The writer’s opinion, however, is, that a treaty would be made, and such he says is the opinion of the better classes of Mexicans, as well as of the English residents.

RW47v24n72p2c3, September 17, 1847, LETTER FROM THE ARMY

We have been favored with the following extract of a letter from an officer attached to Gen. Scott’s staff:

TACUBAYA, Aug. 25, 1847.

We have had another brilliant but bloody battle, which brought us triumphantly up to the very gates of the city. We should now be in the capital but for an armistice which was agreed upon to enable MR. Trist to treat. As it was supposed the prospects of peace would be greatly lessened if we occupied the capital, the army has made this sacrifice upon the altar of patriotism. It seems to be a bitter one, but excellent hopes are entertained of its resulting well.

Our loss has been severe, but that of the enemy utterly ruinous, so as not to leave him any power of resistance.---Gen. Scott has outdone, by far, all his former achievements; and the army has done, with the bayonet alone, probably as much as was ever accomplished by any troops without artillery. You are aware that we have had no opportunity of sending letters for months past; I am not even sure that I shall be able to slip this in with the despatches. From where I write I overlook the city (but two miles distant) and the whole valley of Mexico—a view scarcely less charming from association than itself. So many officers have been killed and wounded, that I fear there will be great distress and anxiety on account of many who are safe. No one from Richmond was hurt; my friend, Capt. Craig, who is known there, received a smart flesh wound, but not at all serious* * * *Our loss is about 1000 killed and wounded. The Mexican loss about 5000 killed and wounded—and about 10,000 more prisoners and dispersed—15,000 in all. We had about 9000 to 30 odd thousand.

RW47v24n72p2c4, September 17, 1847: LETTERS FROM THE ARMY OF GENERAL SCOTT

[Editorial Correspondence of the New Orleans Picayune]
I have spent not a little time in endeavoring to collect a list of the killed and wounded officers in the great battles of the 20th, not a difficult matter, inasmuch as the different divisions are quartered in villages several miles apart. The entire loss in the division of Gen. Twiggs was 266, in that of Gen. Worth 339, in that of Gen. Quitman (Shield’s brigade), 240, in that of Gen. Pillow 212.

The New York Volunteers suffered severely, but not in proportion to the regiment from South Carolina. Col. Butler, who commanded the latter, behaved in the most gallant manner. In advancing upon the hacienda attacked by Gen. Sheldes, at the head of his regiment, his horse was shot dead. He then advanced on foot until he received a severe wound in the leg, which caused him to fall.—In a fainting condition he was carried to the rear, but soon rallying he again advanced to the head of his regiment, when a musket ball struck him in the head and he died almost instantly. South Carolina lost on of her bravest and most generous spirits when Col. Butler fell.

I have not had time to obtain a full list of all the killed and wounded in the different divisions of the army, but shall endeavor to do it at the earliest opportunity. A great proportion of our loss—perhaps ninetenths—was in the attack upon the strong works at Churubusco—Santa Anna’s second line as he called it. As I have previously stated, no reconnaissance whatever of this strong position had been made. The brilliant success of the morning had inspired both officers and men with the highest enthusiasm, and they rushed pell mell into the position the post exposed, and where they were mowed down by hundreds.

It will be seen that our own loss falls short of eleven hundred—about 6,000 men were actively engaged.—When the works of the enemy are examined, one naturally wonders that Gen. Scott’s entire force was not swept away. Put his army in the same position and since the days of the viceroys there have not been Mexicans enough to born to drive them out.

White flags are now constantly passing and repassing between the Palace here and the Palace in Mexico. At this game the Mexicans can beat us. Yours, &c.

G.W.K.

The armistice has finally been settled and signed, and I do not tell half the story when I say that it had produced universal dissatisfaction in the army—in the entire army. In the first place let me give you, from recollection, its main provisions, and then I will give you an idea as to the mode by which it was brought about.

The articles of the armistice first go on to say, that hostilities between the two armies are at once to cease., in order that the peace propositions of the United States may be listened to, and that they, the hostilities, are not to be renewed until either commander shall give the other forty eight hours’ notice; that in the meantime all work or fortifications on both sides shall cease, and that no further reinforcements or either party shall be allowed to approach nearer than twenty–eight leagues of the capital; that no persons other than citizens shall be allowed to either the city, and they only with passports from the Mexican authorities; that certain persons of the American army shall be allowed to either the city to borrow money and purchase supplies, but no officers are allowed to pass in except upon special business and under a flag. Such are about the amount of the different articles of the armistice, signed on our part by Gens. Quitman, Smith and Pierce, and on the part of the Mexicans by Gens Mors and Gujano.

Let me now give my speculations as to the mode by which this armistice was brought about. On the night of the 10th inst. After the great Mexican army was thoroughly beaten, broken to pieces and routed, Mr Thornton, or the English legation, accompanied by the British Consul, Mr Mackintosh—a man who regards Santa Anna, hates the Yankees and never moves unless his own ends are to be gained—came out to the city post haste on a visit to Gen. Scott. The next morning Gen Mors, accompanied by Mr Arrangoiz, who was formerly Mexican consul in New Orleans, came out, also on a visit to Gen Scott, and on the same day the latter wrote a letter to the Mexican authorities, hinting an armistice between the two armies with a view of opening negotiations for a peace. This proposition was eagerly jumped at by the Mexican Minister of War, at the instigation of Santa Anna of course, and the result has been a treaty of armistice in which, according to rumor nearly every thing the Mexicans asked for was conceded. I know nothing of the proceedings of this commission except from hearsay. There are many who believe that Gen. Scott has been compelled to adopt this policy, at the threshold of the Mexican capital by Mr Trist and his instructions, but there are a few, and I must acknowledge myself among the number, who think that a peace honorable and satisfactory to the U.S. is to grow out of this matter. The whole affair, on the face of it, looks like on of Santa Anna’s old tricks to gain time to plan some new scheme of trickery and dissimulation, and as he has British influence to back him he will be likely to carry out what he undertakes. I have always said and always believed that Santa Anna was favorable to peace—to peace from policy only—and still believe he may endeavor to bring it about; but great as is his power, like a sail vessel he can only go with the wind and current, and has too many and too powerful enemies to carry out his present schemes, at least without strong assistance from the United States.

Santa Anna accuses Valencia of having lost the capital by not obeying his orders to abandon Coutreras on the 19th, and has ordered him to be shot wherever found; on the other hand, Valencia accuses Santa Anna of having lest every thing by not coming to his assistance, and it is now sad that he has pronounced against him and peace with the Yankees at Toluca. Thus matters stand between these great Mexican leaders. Again, it is reported that Paredes is advancing from Oriziba, which place he successfully reached from Vera Cruz, breathing nothing but death and utter annihilation to the infamous North Americans, while it is further stated that Bustamente is at or near the capital with 6000 men, breathing the same amiable sentiments—The papers of the capital are almost silent about every thing—they do not even give an account of their terrible defeat.

The number of deserters and other foreigners found fighting against us the other day, and who are now prisoners, is 72. A court martial, with Col. Garland as president, is now in session here, for the trial of a portion of this precious set of scoundrels, and it is to be hoped they may have full justice done them. Riley, the Irishman who commanded the battalion of San Patricio, as it is called, openly makes his brags of what he has done, and says he expects no mercy.

Gen. Scott was himself wounded on the 20th inst. By a grape shot. It struck him on the outside of the leg below the knee, and gave so little a pain at the time that he said nothing about it, but it has since caused him more uneasiness.

Our own loss, in killed, wounded and missing, is put down in the numbers at 1000—it may possibly range a little under. The Mexican loss in killed alone amounted to nearly that number, their prisoners to about 3000, while their wounded we have no means of computing. Among the officers taken prisoners were three member of Congress, and I believe they are to be liberated to take part in the proceedings of that body in relation to peace.

P.S.—Since the above was written, we have received a thousand and one rumors from the city. The report that Bustamente is approaching with some 6000 troops is renewed, as well as the account of the advance of Paredes upon the capital. All the shops in the city are closed, and consternation reigns. Many will have it the evidence being their own proper eyes, that the Mexican are throwing up breast works and constructing batteries at different points, and they say too, that Santa Anna either is desirous of gaining time, or else to make one of the main conditions of peace that he is to be supported by American Arms against any faction that may rise against him. In this they are probably more than half right. A train of wagons, which was going in this morning headed by Capt. Wayne and an escort of dragoons, were turned back by Mexicans on the pretence that there were regular soldiers with the envoy. I don’t know how the matter will be settled, but Santa Anna will probably have his own way. Our own officers are many of them outrageous at the occurrence.

TACUBAYA, August 27, 1847.

The official report of Gen. Salas, who was second in command at Cotureras, and who is now a prisoner, has been published in Mexico. He admits that his defeat was total, but as usual lays the blame on some of his brother officers. He says that on the afternoon of the 19th—(this was while no one was returning their fire)—The Mexicans fought with uncommon valor and enthusias, but that early on the morning of the 20th August they were suddenly surrounded and at once thrown into confusion, and in the end utterly routed. Salas says that at the outset of the disorder he shouted "Victory for Mexico," ordered the trumpets to sound, and directed Gen. Torrejon to charge with his lancers; but according to the same account that officer fled in the most cowardly manner, the infantry got mixed up with the cavalry and also fled, and the rout of all was complete and most disastrous. Salas says that Gen. Valencia ran off at the commencement of the fight, that he does not know what has become of him, and for this reason has felt himself called upon to make the report. Sch is the account given by his Excellency Gen. R. Don. I. Mariano de Salas, of the defeat at Coutreras—one of the most brilliant victories achieved by our arms since the commencement of the war—brilliant and most important for the great results produced with so little loss on our side, and for which Gen. Smith, as well as Col. Riley and the other officers engaged in it, are receiving the unqualified approbation of the entire army.

Gen. Salas himself acknowledges that in this battle Gen.Fronteras was killed, that besides himself Generals Mendoza, Bianco and Garcia were wounded and taken prisoners, in addition to a list of over 100 others—Colonels, Captains, &c. who were either killed, wounded or are now in our hands. And here let me mention one fact in relation to the after battle of Churubusco, which will show how near Gen. Scott was to capturing the entire Mexican army. At the time Gen. Worth was pressing upon the tete de pont, Gen. Twiggs upon the church, and Gen. Shields and Pierce upon the hacienda farther on, the commander–in–chief ordered Major Sumner to take command of the Rifles, and by circuitous march to reach the road between the enemy and the city. Nothing but the daring impetuosity of our own men in front prevented this plan from succeeding—had the Mexican held out or our own soldiers held off ten minutes longer, the enemy would have been in a bag as it were, and killed or captured to a man. Santa Anna might perhaps escaped, as he has a peculiar way of his own; but he would not have taken even the remnant of an army with him.

The trial of the deserters—the celebrated battalion of St. Patrick—is still going on, but how the affair will terminate, no one but those on the court martial can say. A strong influence is at work in favor of the prisoners. In the first place, all the Mexican ladies in this town, La Senora Cayetano Rubio among the number, have signed a warm petition in their favor, which has been sent to Gen. Scott. The lady whose name I have given, is the wife of the rich Rubio, who has a country house here in Tacubaya. The English, and perhaps some of the other foreign ministers, have also interested themselves in behalf of the scoundrels. I might here state that the celebrated flag of the foreign battalion was captured by the 14th Infantry, attached to Gen. Pillow's division.

Two o'clock, afternoon.------New has just come in from the capital which has caused great excitement. At an earily hour a train of wagons, under charge of Captain Wayne, dressed in citizens' cloths, started for the city. Scarcely had they reached the Plaza before the wagons were surrounded by an immense concourse of leperos, who at first commenced cursing at jeering the wagon–masters and wagoners. Soon, however, they began to pelt the poor fellows with stones and other missiles, and notwithstanding the pretended exertions of a squad of Mexican soldiers, who acted a guard, the entire train was driven out of the city. Several of the wagoners received bruises and contusions from the showers of stones thrown at them, and foremost in the mob were said to be the women of the town. One Mexican was shot by the wagon masters, and another by a Mexican officer, but not until they had half killed an American. In the crowd of loafers or leperos were soon [illegible] apparently of the better class from their dress, who excited the mob to acts of violence, while in the balconies were ladies looking on and evidently enjoying the sport. Even the Mexican cavalry guard, or many of them, sat upon their horses—not indifferent spectators, for they fairly laughed to see the unfortunate and unarmed teamsters beset in a manner so cowardly. I suppose that Santa Anna will apologize for the outrage, and that thus the matter will be settled; but this done not prevent many from thinking that the tyrant instigated the whole affair. He is up to all sorts of trickery. There are others who think, and probably with good show of reason, that the mob was set on by the enemies of Santa Anna and peace, with the intention of involving the whole party and breaking off all negotiations. Be this as it may, the Mexicans have won a great battle in driving our wagons from the city, and will not fail to exult over it. I know not what measures Gen. Scott will no resort to in order to obtain his money and supplies from the city.

The accounts this morning from the city would go to show that Mexicans are chuckling over the defeat of the wagon train yesterday, and its expulsion without the walls—they absolutely term it a victory! The authorities pretend they did everything in their power to suppress the row, but no one who understands the Mexican character believes them. If anything in this world can be driven easier than Mexicans with arms in their hands, (vide Churubusco and Coutreras,) it is Mexicans without arms. A Mexican mod can be likened to nothing save a flock of sheep—as easily routed and dispersed --and now the authorities pretend they did everything in their power to suppress the one which was raised yesterday. A single squadron of our dragoons could have ridden over the rioters as easily as they could over a lawn. I suppose now that the wagons will not be allowed to enter the city—another point gained by the enemy. They certainly have not been in to–day.

The Diario del Gobierno of yesterday is almost entirely filled with documents and letters, all undertaking to prove that Valencia was the sole cause of the defeat of the Mexican army. Santa Anna’s friends are at the bottom of all this of course. Several of Valencia’s letters are lugged into the document, in one of which, dated at 8 o’clock on the evening of the 19th, at Coutreras, he speaks of having routed the entire American army at all points, and that the liberty and honor of his country had been saved by the glorious victory. He further discloses the fact that General Frontera was killed while leading on a charge of cavalry, and that Gen. Farrodi was wounded. This is news; we shall get all the truth out of them after a while. The last we hear of Valencia he was at Toluca, whither he had gone, according to his own published statement, to collect forces to vindicate the honor of his county.

The same number of the Diario contains an account of the attack upon the wagon train. It makes light of the whole affair, says that a few persons were slightly injured, that Gen. Tornel, Herrar and Quijano soon dispersed the rioters, and that the fact of the wagons going as far as the Plaza Principal was an error or oversight. Among these who received a shower of stones on the occasion was Mr. Harous, the gentleman, who has mainly fed and clothed the army since it marched from Jalapa. He was in the city after supplies at the time.

I believe that up to this time I have neglected to mention that Major Gaines, who recently escaped from Mexico, was on the staff of Gen. Scott during the recent battles, and that Midshipman Rogers was on that of Gen. Pillow. After the route at Coutreras, and while our troops were on the way to Churubusco, a house where Capt. Danley and Major Borland were secreted was passed. The former was quite unwell at the time, but the latter came out, shouldered a musket, and was in the defeat of Churubusco. I hear that Clay and all the other prisoners will now soon be released.

The peace commissioners met again yesterday, and at a point near this place. Nothing positive in relation to the proceedings of this second meeting has transpired—some say that everything went on smoothly, others say not, which is tolerably strong proof that but little is known one way or the other in relation to the deliberations. The new commissioner, Barnardo Couto, was present, as was also Atristain. The latter is represented as a tool of Mackintosh’s; but if he can do anything towards bringing about a peace this makes no difference. They say that in the city they indulge the hope that the commissioners will agree upon the Neuces as a boundary. This is carrying the stakes and stones a little too far. “Give them an inch and they’ll take and ell” is applied to many people in the world—give a Mexican and inch and he’ll take at least seven miles and a half.

I must close this letter haste, as a messenger has just come in to say that the express man is about to start. You shall be kept informed of everything.

In war, an accident—a circumstance apparently the most insignificant—may frustrate the most skilfully devised combinations. A glance at the defences which I caused to be constructed around the city is sufficient to discover the plan which I had proposed to myself.

The troops which I had advanced, by one of the flanks, supported by others posted en echelon at convenient distances, were to have made a concerted retrograde movement, which I commanded at the proper moment. A general who commanded a strong division of 5,000 men and 24 pieces of artillery, whose headquarters were at the town of San Angel, was ordered by me on the 18th, and 11 o'clock in the morning, to fall back on the village of Coyocan, in order to effect the concentration of forces, in consequence of demonstration already made by the enemy, and for the purpose of exactly carrying out my plan of operations. But this general, forgetting that there cannot be two commanders on the field of battle, and that the execution of a plan will not admit of comments which annul or retard it, suffered himself to himself to object to the orders which he had received; and obedience and discipline, so indispensable in military movements, having been banished from among us, thus rendering it necessary, in order to avoid greater and imminent evils, to tolerate what it would be absurd to approve of, I suffered him, in spite of myself, to persevere in his purpose, and charge himself with the whole responsibility of the consequences. They were not less disastrous than they had been obvious. He advanced, motu proprio, [of his own accord,] more than a league to choose a position from which to meet the enemy, without acquainting me either with his movement or his intentions. His refusal to obey the order sent him was the first notice which I had of this temerity; and soon afterwards the report of cannon enabled me to ascertain the position he had taken, and apprized me that an action had commenced.

Although weighed down with the presentiment of what was to follow, I instantly placed myself at the head of a splendid brigade of four thousand men and five pieces of artillery. I arrived at the moment when the enemy had cut off the rear of the position of the ill-fated general by a considerable force, whose operations I was then hardly able to check, for it was now nearly night.

But I observed, with the greatest grief, that the position in question was isolated—that a large ravine intervened, and a neighboring wood was occupied by the enemy; the troops under my immediate command could not advance by the only road which existed, without being exposed to the same fate as the others; and a single battery, which arrived late, was my only means of attack. The firing having ceased, our brigade took up their quarters in the town of San Angel; for the rain fell in torrents, and to keep the troops in the field would have been equivalent to their being routed.

Previous to this, I ordered that my aid-de-camp, Col. Ramiro, should, taking as a guide the deputy, Don Jose Maria del Rio, who was acquainted with the ground, proceed to the head of the terrible ravine in front of us, and along the skirt of a distant hill, and, making all haste to the camp of the general referred to, order him to retire that night, without fail, with his infantry and cavalry, to San Angel, by the only road which was left him, firing spiking his cannon, if it already impossible to save them. This my aid accomplished, and communicated my order between 10 and 11 at night; but instead of punctually obeying the order, the general hardly suffered my aid to speak, interrupting him by saying that what he wanted was 6,000 men and munitions, and sent him off, after giving him two official letters, which he had signed and sealed, one of them containing a report of the action of the evening, in which he stated that he had beaten the enemy, and put him to shameful flight, and that he had, in consequence, granted promotions of the generals, field officers, and others.

The following day, at dawn, I repaired again to the same field, reinforced by the brigade which I had ordered to be brought from the capital, and determined to effect the enemy made his attack, which lasted about ten minutes, and I witnessed, in the midst of despair, the rout of those troops, worthy of a better fate, and unfortunately commanded by a general who was himself the cause of their being cut off.

The consequences of this affair were, in my view, terrible. The enemy could, by a rapid movement, reach the capital before it would be possible for me to succor it; he could, by a flank movement, cut off my detached forces; he could, by a flank movement, cut off my despatched forces; he had obtained, as the result of his victory, the power of falling with the main body of his troops upon a part of mine; the enemy, in fine, through the unskilfulness and insubordination of a general, converted to his own benefit all the advantages of my situation.

The advanced fort of San Antonio could not sustain itself; for our time had been intersected, and I ordered its garrison to retire, while I covered the fort and tete de port of Churubusco. The enemy advanced, cutting off a portion of the troops as they were retiring, and presented himself in front of our nearest defences. I there placed myself again in front of our soldiers, and my efforts cost the enemy not a little bloodshed. The losses ensued, although lamentable, were the natural result of the retreat, which was sudden, unexpected; and embarrassed by the trains, marching along a narrow causeway flanked throughout its whole extent. The defence was from line to line, until the third was reached, where I personally opposed the enemy, and a saved the capital, which was suddenly placed in danger. While I was engaged, on the 22d, in reorganizing the forces and covering the batteries, and again in person at the head of a column, which would have continued the defence to the last extremity, I received a communication from the enemy’s general-in-chief, proposing to me to conclude an armistice, which would afford time to consider the propositions which may be made by the commissioners of the United States, for ending the struggle between the two nations. I consented to the armistice; and, after consulting the ministers in cabinet, I determined that the propositions referred to shall be taken into consideration.

The suspension of hostilities is always a good thing, because war is always an evil; and much more so, after great combinations have been frustrated. To save the capital from the horrors of war, or at least defer them, was a consideration which I could not overlook, more particularly when viewed as a means of arriving at an honorable
When two nations find themselves in a state of war, they have the reciprocal right to make propositions. A perpetual war is an absurdity, because it is a calamity; and the instinct of self-preservation, which is even stronger and more powerful in nations than in individuals, counsels that no means shall be disregarded which may lead to an advantageous adjustment. The constitution gives me full authority to adopt this course.

Devoted to interests so great and of such pre-eminent importance, I must maintain at all risks the respect and consideration due to the supreme authority which I exercise—now especially, when, if factions beset and harass the government, they will deprive it of the power of deliberating, and it will become contemptible in the presence of the enemies of the nation, I will be still more explicit—commotion and sedition shall be exemplarily punished.

I have preserved a considerable body of troops, and the nation will support me in maintaining its honor and vindicating its reputation. I consider myself as free as if I had just obtained a signal victory, and there is no fear that I shall be imposed on by the enemy's negotiators, when his troops and a cannon have failed to alarm me. We shall adjust our differences, provided honor, above all, is saved; and we shall renew the combat, if the sword is thrust between our justice and acknowledgment of the rights of the nation.

The following is General Taylor’s letter to the Natives, to which we referred yesterday. Notwithstanding the General declines to express his “frank opinion” touching the One Idea of that very insignificant faction, its Convention gave him a quasi nomination—in other words, it recommends him as a candidate for the Presidency! Its members were easily satisfied:

HEAD QUARTERS, ARMY OF OCCUPATION,
Camp near Monterey, July 13, 1847.

Sir: I have had the honor to receive your letter submitting, on the part of the Nominating Committee of the N. A. Convention, the request to be informed of my views relating to several points of national policy entertained by the body of Native Americans in our country.

Limited leisure from my public duties constrains me to reply in very general and brief terms, that to the points cited in your letter I do not feel myself at liberty to express my frank opinion. My willingness to yield to the wishes of the people at large, and to serve them in the office of the chief magistracy, should they fully and unanimously place its weighty responsibilities upon me, has been more than once expressed; but I am not willing to be the candidate of any political party, or to pledge myself to any political creed save that which proceeds directly from the constitution, and the best and paramount interests of the county, and which they solemnly demand. If elected to the Presidential office, it must be without any agency of my own, (it certainly will be at variance with my most cherished aspirations,) and to these duties I must go untrammeled by party pledges of every character.

Should the people nominate and elect, (and there is ample space for this, previous to the time of election) some one of the gifted statesmen of the country to represent its highest interests, I should hail the measure with joy.

With sentiments of high respect, I have the honor to subscribe myself.

Your most obedient servant,

Z. TAYLOR,
Major General U.S. Army.

Wm J.A. Birkey, Esq.
President N.A. Convention, Pittsburgh, Pa.

We subjoin also Mr. Clay’s letter in reply to the Natives:

ASHLAND, 2d April, 1847.

Dear Sir—Your favor of the 19th ultimo, transmitting the proceedings of “The American Ratification Meeting,” reached here a few days prior to my return from New Orleans. Owing to my absence, and to a great domestic affliction, which has befallen me in the death of a beloved son, who fell in the battle of Buena Vista, of which intelligence arrived here a few days ago, a delay has arisen in my return of an answer to your letter, which I hope you will have the goodness to excuse.
You require of me, 'at the instance of the Native American Committee of the State of Pennsylvania,' of which are the Chairman, whether, if it be tendered to me—and that unanimously—I would be disposed to accept the nomination of President of the United States from the National Native American Convention to assemble at Pittsburgh in May next, for the purpose of nominating candidates for President and Vice President of the U. States.

Waiving all inquiries into, and the expression of any opinion on the principles and objects of your Association, as being unnecessary from the conclusion to which I have come, I can perceive no public good likely to result from my acceptance of the propose nomination; and that, if tendered to me, I should be constrained to decline accepting it.

I request you, nevertheless, and the other member of the Executive Committee to be assured that I justly appreciate the compliment intended me, and to accept my cordial thanks for the personal confidence and kindness which prompted their attention to be directed to me.

I am, with respect, your friend and obedient servant.

H. CLAY.

Gen. Peter S. Smith

RW47v24n72p5c2, September 17, 1847, FROM THE SOUTH

The New Orleans Picayune, of the 7th inst. Announces the arrival of the Stanton from Tampico, having sailed thence on the 7th inst., three days later than the Fashion. The intelligence brought by her is thus summed up:

"It is said than an express arrived at Tampico on Monday, the 30th of August, with the intelligence from capital confirming the news we have already given General Scott’s operation, and adding that he had actually entered the city. Another version has it that "Scott has taken the city." The day when the courier left Mexico we have no learned. We received no letters or papers by this arrival, and give the above entirely upon verbal report. We hope another day will not go over without authentic accounts from the city of Mexico."

The Picayune publishes a number of letters from its correspondent in Gen. Taylor’s camp—some of them written under the belief, which by a General Order of the 9th of July we perceive Gen. Taylor himself entertained, that the army would make a forward movement, and which have now, since it is certain that he is not to do so, lost their interest.

Writing from the Camp at Buena Vista on the 13th of August, the Picayune’s correspondent gives us the following information:

"A report similar to that which was brought in some days since reached us last night, that a force of about 1000 strong (cavalry) where marching from Durango, but whether towards Mazapil or Zacatecas was not known.
Information has also been received that there is a party of guerrilla robbers, composed partly of Americans, in the neighborhood of Salado, who plunder every Mexican they come across, and would our people, as a matter of course, if they came in their way. In order to ascertain the truth of these reports, and also the condition of the country, Gen Wool despatched Major Chevallie with two companies of Texan Rangers in the direction of El Encarnacion, to make reconnaissance in that quarter. Lieut Benham, of the topographical corps, accompanies the expedition, and also Kendall’s old friend of Santa Fe memory, Major Howard.

"Night before last corporal and nine men belonging to Capt. Dess’s battery of horse artillery, which had been paid off in the morning, deserted from camp. Among them were some very bad fellows. Their desertion was discovered at reveille yesterday morning, and measures were immediately taken to capture the scoundrels. A reward of $300 has been offered by Gen. Wool for their apprehension. It is supposed that they made their way towards Monclova, to go to the States, as it is not supposed they would go over to the Mexicans at the present crisis."

On the 16th of August, he writes as follows:

"I mentioned in my letter of the 19th inst. That Capt. Carleton, with a company of dragoons, left that morning for Parras. Gen. Wool received a letter this morning from the captain, dated "Parras, August 13th," which contains some interesting intelligence. It was currently reported that place that a force consisting of 400 cavalry and 600 infantry, with four pieces of artillery, under the command of Gen. Vincentia Filosola, had moved from Durango—sire accounts said to Masapil, others to join Gen. Reyes at or near Zacatecas. A spy was sent out by Capt. C., to to endeavor to ascertain if there was any truth in these reports. It was also reported at Parras that a force had moved towards Cuenca, probably to advance upon the former place. A small party arrived on the 12th from Chihuahua, among whom was an intelligent American, from whom Capt. C. gleaned the following information: That Gen. Trias had passed up from the south with ten pieces of artillery, 2000 stand of small arms and 1000 horses, under the
Mr. James Awl, the partner of Mar. Samuel Owens, who was killed at Sacramento, has been assassinated in Chihuahua. He was a wealthy trader from Lexington, Missouri, and much respected. All his goods have been seized and confiscated by the Mexican authorities. The inhabitants in that region are said to be growing more hostile to the Americans each succeeding day. They had received no news from New Mexico at Chihuahua later than the 9th of June.

"Such information contained in the letter of Capt. C., and if any member of the Peace Society can make out anything that gives the slightest indication of peace from all this, they can do more than I can.

"In camp here matters go on much the same as usual and the health of the troops continues about the same. It gives me pain to announce that the Virginia regiment has lost one of its most accomplished captains. Virginia one of her most worthy and respected sons, in the person of Capt. Henry Fairfax, of Fairfax county, Virginia, who died in Saltillo evening before last, of fever, at the age of forty-three years. He commanded the 13th company, and came out after the regiment had been some time in the country. He had received a military education at West Point, but did not remain in the army after he graduated. A brave, chivalrous spirit, and an ardent desire to give his country the benefit of his services in the field, induced him to sever the ties that bound him to the domestic hearth, around which gathered an affectionate wife and smiling children, and lead on his neighbors to a distant country; and now in the prime of life, with the prospect so gratifying to a soldier, of marching on to meet the enemy and wielding the good right arm for victory, he has met the enemy against whom none can combat—Death! Who has taken him prisoner and borne him to the grave, where legions have been borne before.---Although it has been denied him to die upon the field of battle, his death is not the less glorious that it has a peaceful one. Friends watched over his sick bed, cared for his wants and wept over his demise. His remains will be conveyed to the States to-day by two of his late companions in arms, Lieuts. Fry and Donnan, who had resigned their commissions and were about returning home. Two of the Virginia companies stationed in town, and the staff camp, will escort the remains to the edge of the town. Gen. Wool has also signified his intention of being present with his staff upon the occasion, as a toke of respect for deceased."

In a later letter the Picayune's corresponded relates the following singular occurrence:

"An occurrence took place last evening which I had no purposed relating, fearing that something more distressing might grow out of it, but as everything seems quiet now, I will briefly relate the circumstance. Col. Paine, of the North Carolina regiment, form the rigid system of discipline which he has pursued, has become very unpopular in his own regiment and in the Mississippi and Virginia regiments, with which he has been thrown in connection as officer of the day. Many Insults have been offered him by members of the two letter, and this feeling has gradually been ripening till it came to the head last night. A crowd assembled about different tents of about thirty men, some of his own and some privates of the Virginia regiment; and subsequently stones were thrown at his tent. A number of men also assembled in front of his lieutenant colonel's tent, who was sick and vomiting, and indulged in brutal laughter at his illness. These crowds were dispersed and two men ordered to be taken to the provost guard. The men of one company ordered to perform the duty refused, but were compelled to obedience by the colonel. One of them, however, refused to take his arms until the colonel held his sword over him and threatened to cut him down if he refused. That company having evinced a determination not to obey, were ordered to the rear of the colonel's tent, and obeyed, contrary to his expectations, and were dismissed after answering to their names. Subsequently, quite late in the evening, another posse assembled in front of the colonel's tent, but as he came in sight they began to disperse in different direction. He ordered them to halt, but they refused. The colonel then cried out that he would fire if they did not halt, and ordered them again, and upon their refusing, discharged his pistol into the crowd, bringing down two men, wounding one of them mortally. This prompt and decisive step quelled the mutiny, and the colonel reported to Gen. Cushing and Gen. Wool, who approved of his conduct. They both repaired to the camp, but everything was quiet. I regret to say that the colonel did not receive any very unanimous support from his officers on the occasion. The man who was so badly shot died last night. I have no time to write more, for the mail is on the point of closing.”

The steamer E.A. Ogden, Capt. Bowman, arrived yesterday morning from Brazos Santiago, whence she sailed on the 7th inst. Making a very fine run. Her news is not without interest.

We learn with great regret that Brigadier General Hoping died at Mier on the 1st inst. The general was appointed from the western part of the State of New York, and was a gentlemen of ability well known in the politics of the State. The brigade under his command at Mier has been broken up, the 10th Infantry garrisoning Matamoros and Camargo, and the 19th Infantry Cerralvo and Monterey.

Gen Lane’s brigade was at the mouth of the river, expecting to embark about the 8th inst. The first transport which reached there would proceed to take the troops on board.

Gen. Cushing arrived at Matamoros on the 3d. inst. Accompanied by Lieut. Col. Abbott. Gen. C. is concentrating his brigade, as the several detachments come down at El Savinito, near Palo Alto. Desse’s battery, which was to have accompanied Gen. Cushing, has been ordered to remain with Gen. Wool, at the express request of the latter. Our correspondent alludes to the matter in a letter below. Capt. Shover passed down the river with Gen. Cushing, on his way to Washington. The Flag says he hopes to bring out a battery and join Gen. C.’s brigade in place of Capt. Dess.

Capt. Clinch was at the mouth of the river on the 6th inst., with a detachment of recruits for the 13th Infantry, and would leave the next day for Gen. Cushing’s camp at the El Sabinito.

Despatches have passed through Matamoros for General Marshall, at Monterey, to proceed to Vera Cruz without delay. The despatches were forwarded by Lieutenant A. M. Henry as far as the mouth of the Rio Grande, where he was taken ill and transferred them. He subsequently proceeded to Matamoros, where he was doing well at last accounts.

Col. R. E. Temple arrived at Matamoros on the 1st inst, with four companies of his regiment, the 10th Infantry.

The Flag says that Col. Tibbatts, who was proceeding from Mier to Monterey with six companies of the 16th Infantry, escorting a train, was attacked by a large party of Mexicans near Ramos, and succeeded in driving them off, with a loss of two wounded. We have the best reason for believing that the whole object of the Mexicans in this attack was plunder. Only the day before Lieut. Givens passed up from Cerralvo to Monterey with only twenty dragoons, and Gen Cushing, (who met Col Tibbatts at Ramos) passed down the day after with a guard of only 25 mounted men, and neither of them saw any thing of the guerilleros. Col. Tibbatts and his men were under fire for some time, and conducted themselves with great intrepidity.

Intelligence was received at Buena Vista on the 20th of August, in a letter from San Luis Potosi, by the way of Parras, that Gen. Scott’s column had marched from Puebla, and two days afterwards a rumor reached there of the capitulation of the city of Mexico. This illustrates the rapidity with which intelligence travels in Mexico by verbal report.

The Flag says that Mr. E B Lundy and Mons. Montilly, who were tken prisoners some four weeks cine Carvajal, have been set at liberty, and arrived at Matamoros on the 3d inst. They state that they were liberated by representing that they were not Americans. They were taken as far as Tula. Mr. L. says that Gen. Urrea left that place a few days since with 1200 men, for the purpose of taking trains or good between Camargo and Monterey. They represent that Col. Carvajal—a-[the Flag and other papers always give this name Carrabajal. He writes it Carvajal]—was in the vicinity of Soto la Marina with a small force.

The Flag publishes the following letter from Urrea, designed to encourage desertion among our troops:

Gen. Joseph Urrea, of the Mexican Army, Commandant General, Inspector of the Interior Easter States, and in chief of the Division of Observation, to the American Invaders:

Soldiers and Volunteers of the American Army! The war that you carry on against Mexico is the most unjust and barbarous that can conceived. Civilized nations detest it—they do not see in you the defenders of the rights of an injured country, but merely the tools of a man without foresight, without calculation, who, to obtain an unfortunate celebrity, has not feared seriously to compromise a great people. Do not doubt it. Every sensible American will consider this war on of the most atrocious nature—sent by Polk to Mexico, and essentially iniquitous, because it is vandalic, and by lies the severe republican principles that you all profess, because it serves to convert the children of Washington and Franklin into robbers and assassins.

Sons of America! Let the world see you in a better than in the miserable and odious character you now represent. Do no serce any longer the caprice of a man destitute of virtue of good feeling. Abandon his lines, because they are not those of honorable men—throw yourselves into the arms of the Mexican nation, who magnanimous and forgiving, will forget the injuries you have committed. Here you will find ground to cultivate, and honest occupation whereby to gain the necessaries of life without great fatigue. You will find the sympathies of a generous people, and the tranquility of conscience otherwise not to be obtained; because the man who attacks and destroys the principle of Universal Moral, which brings together nations as it does individuals, cannot obtain it.

Soldiers and Volunteers! Come to us, and abandon the cause of crime—I was your appearance, and will receive you as brothers.

JOSEPH URREA

CAMP BUENA VISTA, August 19, 1847.

“There’s many a slip twixt the cup and the lip,” as I have seen in my short experience. All our fond anticipations of an immediate advance have been “dished and diddled quite.” The flaw when the War Office has gone forth and no advance can be made from this line. The unwelcome intelligence was received yesterday in an order from headquarters directing Gen. Cushing to take command of the Massachusetts Regiment and 13th Infantry as his brigade and proceed with the least possible delay to the Brazos, there to embark for Vera Cruz. Brig Gen. Lane, who is below, has been assigned the Ohio and Indiana volunteers, two regiments and also ordered to Vera Cruz. An order also came from Gen. Taylor directing Capt Dens to proceed to Vera Cruz via Brazos with his battery (late Washington’s battery.) Gen. Cushing will probably leave wit Capt. D’s battery to–day or to morrow. You should have heard the “curses not loud but deep” at this news, which very naturally creates the greatest dissatisfaction.—Many officers of the volunteer regiments declare their intention of resigning, and the only thing that will tend to keep them together is the bare, faint prospect that we shall be again attacked in the front with a large force. General Taylor, I understood, has been ordered to maintain this line either as far as this post or Monterey, leaving it discretionary with him. This point is all–important. Col. Hay’s regiment of Rangers has also been ordered to Vera Cruz.

Since my last, Major Chevallie and his command have returned from their reconnaissance. They went to La Punta and struck across to La Encarnacion. At the latter place they heard the same reports of troops in front, and also that there was a force at the Salado. A report has also been received here that Urrea was at Potosi, not San Luis—but the hacienda of the name—with a considerable force. Rumor would gift him the power of ubiquity, Capt.
Carleton has not yet returned from his expedition, but is expected in to day.

The mutiny in the North Carolina regiment has been effectually quelled. On the morning after it broke out a number of the officers of the regiment signed a petition to the colonel to resign, which he very properly refused to listen to, but laid it before Gens. Cushing and Wool. It was considered by the commanding general that there was a participation in the mutiny and two of the signera were dishonorably discharged from the service. As soon as this was known seventeen officers, I think, tendered their resignation, but after twenty–four hours had elapsed they thought better of it and begged leave to withdraw, expressing all due contrition, and leave was granted. Thus quiet and subordination has been restored. The three regiments have all been separated; the North Carolina ordered to the rear, and the Virginians to the front. The soldier who was wounded by Col. Paine at the time he shot the mutineers was a Virginian and has been dishonorable discharged from the service

CAMP BUENA VISTA, August 23, 1847.

Yesterday morning two horsemen came galloping across the plain in front of headquarters, and the tout ensemble of one soon made it evident that he was no less celebrated a person than the eccentric Capt. Tobin of your city. With the captain was a Mexican in a very brown leather breeches who forth with presented himself to Gen. Wool. He had just arrived with a small stock of cigars from San Luis Potosi, which place he left on the morning of the 14th inst., having made the trip in eight days.

This man reports that there were but about 1500 troops at San Luis and that he saw none on the route except at Matehuaia, where there were about 1500 also. He knew that troops had been raised at Durango and Zacatecas, but was not aware of their destination. He did no come by the way of Zacatecas and Mazabil and heard of no troops being at the latter place. There were several guerrilla parties on the road between San Luis and this place who had robbed a number of Mexicans, but he did not, luckily for him, fall in with them, or they might have puffed his cigars more than was agreeable to a modest, unpretending dealer in the article.
BUENA VISTA, AUGUST 21, 1847.

Last evening was received a mail from the States with dates as late as the 31st ult from New Orleans, and about 5 o'clock the express which was sent down to Gen. Taylor on the evening of the 18th returned, bringing an order from Gen. T. countermanding the order for Dess's battery to go below at the solicitation of Gen. Wool. Capt. D. had completed all his arrangements in order to start this morning, and had brought his battery out in front of Gen. Cushing’s quarters, everything in splendid order. His chagrin at having his marching orders countermanded may be easily conceived. The express to which I have alluded brought a number of letters received at Monterey by express, containing copies of the Picayune of August 7, with the highly exciting news from Gen. Scott as late as the 20th ult, by which we learn the gratifying intelligence that Gen. S. would move in a few days.

Since my last, two companies of the North Carolina regiment have been ordered to the support of Capt. Prentiss’s battery on the hill above Saltillo. One of these companies, commanded by Capt. Henry, is the crack corps of the regiment and has been stationed in town ever since their arrival. It had no participation whatever in the late mutinous outbreak. Mr. Buck, formerly adjutant of the regiment, but recently appointed aid-de-camp to Gen. Cushing, has been elected captain in the regiment to fill a vacancy and will not go to Vera Cruz. The express sent to Gen. Taylor on the morning of the 19th, relative to the reported advances upon this quarter has not yet returned.

RW47v24n73p4c4, September 21, 1847, THE BATTLE

We lay before our readers some further details of one of the proudest events of the present day. In addition to the letter of Mr. Kendall of the Picayune, embracing many of the incidents of the several engagements, and the list of the honored dead, and of those who have been wounded and shed their precious blood in the cause of their country, we publish a letter from a highly gifted officer of the army, which presents the most graphic and correct details which we have yet seen. It is a letter never intended for the public eye; but it bespeaks a taste and talent which would do honor to any writer. The details are, of course, correct; because they come from an eye-witness and an actor in the stirring scenes, who has the judgement to seize the most important event, and the power to describe them. We add to his description the Mexican account of the same events, as they are presented by two Mexicans, who write without reserve to their intimate friends at Tampico.

Extract of a very interesting letter received in Washington:

“The army left Puebla on the 8th of this month, and after a few day’s march, reached Ayotla, immediately on the margin of the valley of Mexico. Between this place and the city, about four miles distant, we knew there was a strongly fortified position, called St. Pinon; it is a small isolated mountain, surrounded by water, on one side of one of the principal causeways leading to the city. After spending a day or two in reconnoitering this place, and which it would have caused a great loss of life to have taken, it was ascertained that there was a practicable road south of Lake Chaleo. The General determined to take this route, and put the army in motion, leaving our division to watch the enemy in our rear. The march was a dreadful one, being the rainy season. The road was in many places, where it passes at the foot of the mountains, and on the margin of the lake or narrow causeway, nearly covered with water, and excessively muddy; at others it was over rocky spaces of the mountains, and in places entirely obstructed by huge rocks rolled down by the enemy; but nothing seemed to damp the ardor of the army—all obstacles vanished before them. In two or three days, when the whole army was in motion, they could be seen from the front stretched out over a distance of seven or eight miles. On the 18th, the General reached a small town called San Augustin, about twelve miles south of the city, the leading divisions having arrived there the day before, Gen. Worth had placed his pickets in advance for the arrival of the General; he ordered the whole division to advance and take possession of a hacienda within striking distance of a strongly fortified place called San Antonio, and also that reconnoitering parties should be pressed forward still in advance; the party was supported by a squadron of cavalry and a battalion of infantry. In passing to the front, I found that a troop which had been place as a picket had gone forward; and as I came up with it, it made a turn in the road which brought it in full view of the enemy’s battery, which opened upon them. The first fire killed Capt. Thornton, mangling his body in the most horrid manner. The ball, a 16-pounder, afterwards struck the road, and literally covered me with mud and fragments of stone, one of which made a slight bruise on my right thigh. A guide was knocked from his horse within five feet of me, with a shocking wound in the head by a piece of stone.---It is thought he will recover, but with the loss of an eye. The reconnoissance was continued right and left with some hopes of storming the battery that afternoon; but night and the rain came on, and it was given up. Very early the next morning, I discovered from the top of the house in which we were quartered in San Augustin, a large body of the enemy, some 12,000 or 15,000 on our left, about three miles distant, The general had ordered reconnoissance in that direction towards San Angel, where I reported to him. He immediately ordered two divisions forward under Pillow and Twiggs, and followed soon after himself. The enemy were found in an entrenched camp, at a place called Conrreras, with twenty pieces of artillery, some of them very heavy siege pieces. The attack commenced at noon, and the firing continued incessantly until dark, when it ceased on both sides, our troops maintaining their ground and occupying a village near by. During the afternoon we watched the different movements of our troops with the most fearful anxiety, and could plainly see one of our columns resist a charge of a large body of cavalry, and the enemy falling from their saddles and taking to their heels, or rather to their horses’ heels. During the whole of the fight, we could see on the right a body of at least ten thousand infantry, and cavalry in reserve, towards the city; but they had not the courage to advance, although Santa Anna himself was said to be there. The attack was ordered to be renewed at 3 o’clock next morning, and the general returned to San Augustin. He left at an early hour, taking with him General Worth’s and one-half of his division as a reinforcement; but en route he was met by an officer, who reported that the batteries had been carried by our troops in a most gallant style, Colonel Riley leading the assault. As he approached the scene of action, it seemed most incredible how our men got over the ground to the attack. It was over immense masses of lava thrown up in the roughest, sharpest possible shapes, and covered with dense brushwood. Streams had to be crossed and deep ravines; and most of them having passed the night in a pelting rain without shelter, it appears almost incredible that they should be able to drive double their numbers from a battery of 23 heavy guns. The scene of the arrival of the General was most exciting. The cheering of the troops left to protect the property taken, and their delight on seeing him, was very gratifying. Many of the guns taken have been added to our siege train. The amount of ammunition taken, exceeded by three times the whole which we brought from Vera Cruz, so that we are well provided. But the greatest cause of exultation was the recapture of two of our own guns, brought from Buena Vista, the last battle of General Taylor. When I saw the U.S. on them, I felt like dismounting and embracing them. What is remarkable about their recapture, it was made by the 4th artillery, to which the regiment they formerly belonged. They, with other small captured pieces, were immediately fitted up as a light battery, and the Captain (Dunn) who took them in command of it. The General when he received the intelligence of this victory, sent Gen. Worth back to make a demonstration on San Antonio, whilst he, with the portion of the army which was pressing the enemy, should get in it rear. I will not stop to describe the scene on the field of battle. On leaving it, the road was literally strewn with dead Mexicans, arms, broken carriages, &c. In passing a bridge, I looked over, and saw the bodies of at least twenty, piled on the other, and the bank of the stream was strewed with them, and it was some distance before we got out of sight. Going on we came to a church, in which were confined 700 prisoners. The General halted a few minutes, and addressed the officers very kindly. Amongst them were four generals. He then hurried out to join pursuing army. We came up with them at San Angel, where they had halted. As the General passed along the line, it was on continued shout. After a few minutes we passed on to a village called Coyoacan, where we heard firing on our right, about two miles off, in the direction of San Antonio. The General immediately sent me, with Captain Kearney’s troop, to ascertain the state of affairs. We galloped on; and on approaching the place, I found that Worth had turned the place by both planks, and driven the enemy from it, and was in hot pursuit of them. I returned to the General as quickly as I had gone, and as I galloped along I heard a brisk firing in front. When I reached him I found that he was fiercely engaged with the enemy at another strongly entrenched position—San Pablo. This action lasted more than two hours, and the firing was more general and more continuous than any I had heard yet. The enemy’s grape and canister flew like hail, and the fire of our infantry was one continued volley. Capt. Taylor’s batter was obliged to retire, being most sadly crippled––lost two officers, a great many men, and left the field with only two horses to a gun; but the enemy although behind entrenchments, with heavy guns, could not withstand the impetuosity and valor of our troops. The place was carried by assault, and the whole armament and a great number of prisoners were taken. In the meantime, Worth having hotly pursued the enemy, come up with him at another fortified place in advance of San Pablo, called Churubusco, and after an obstinate resistance, carried it, made many prisoners, and drove the enemy before him. The dragoons pursued and followed him to the very gates of the city. Two officers are said to have been killed inside the entrenchments of the gateway. Thus ended the day; and I think you will agree with me that it was a TOLERABLY active one—four distinct battles having been fought and won, and the enemy out numbering us in each at least three to four times. They acknowledge to have had thirty thousand men in the field on that day; and yet we drove them one very occasion, and, in the end, made more than twenty–three hundred prisoners, among them seven of their principal generals, and about forty pieces of cannon. Our loss, I am sorry to say, as may be expected, has been very great. It may possibly reach one thousand killed and wounded; but the returns are not yet in; but enough is known to satisfy us that we have lost many valuable officers. Among the prisoners taken, I was mortified to see between 50 to 70 deserters from our army, with the Mexican uniform on. A court is in session to try them; and I trust that many of them will be punished. It is pretty well known from their position in the battle at San Pablo, that a volley from them killed and wounded sixteen out of seventeen of the second infantry, including an officer, and leaving one officer (the adjutant of the regiment) standing.

“There are many of our friends, I am sorry to say, among the killed and wounded; but I can hardly enumerate them now. Young Captain Hanson, of Washington, was killed. Colonel Butler, of the South Carolina regiment, was killed; Smith, badly wounded in the arm and thigh; hopes are entertained that his army may be saved. Lieut. Irons shot through the wind–pipe, slight hopes of his recovery. Captain Phil. Kearney lost his arm in the charge towards the gate of the city; he is doing well. There are other, no doubt, which I cannot recollect at this moment; but many that we are equally interested in are safe. Hagner and Galt are both safe.

“The next morning, the General, leaving a hospital and a garrison in San Augustin, set off with a determination of reaching this place before night. Halting at Coyoacan a short tie, to allow time for his various orders for the movement of the troops to be executed, he was met by a flag from the city, asking terms. After making his reply, the bearer of the flag, a general of engineers, very civilly proposed to the General, knowing his intention of coming here, that if he would halt a few hours longer he would request his government to send word to the castle of Chapultepec not to fire on us as we approached. But the General replied that it was his intention to come here, and he would take the risk, on he went. On approaching the town, the General sent me forward with an order to Col. Harney, of the dragoons, to take possession of it, and make the necessary disposition of pickets,&c., and wait the arrival of Gen Worth before unsaddling his horses. We rode into town without molestation; but a troop, which had accompanied Gen Captain Lee, in advance, had proceeded. We was lucky for us that Chapultepec did not fire upon us; for the tow is in perfect range of its guns, and might have knocked us into a cocked hat. Worth’s division did not arrive until near dark, and we had none but dragoons with us. The same evening another flag was received from the city. I will not pretend to give the objects. Several have been interchanged since; and I am happy to say, that an armistice was this day agreed upon, with the object of negotiation for peace. The terms were dictated by the General, very magnanimously, and very discreetly, no doubt, too, did not ask a surrender of the city, as it is virtually under his control; and to have taken the army into it, would have been productive of some trouble, as it would be next to impossible to control the troops. We are occupying the Bishop's Palace, a huge pile of buildings with magnificent gardens attached, but as uncomfortable as can be, there being no furniture. The view from here, though, is beyond description. Chapultepec, a little on the left, looks frowning down upon with is heavy guns, and the city, with it innumerable spires, nearly surrounded by water, is directly in front. But I have not space for further description.

It is amusing to see the accounts which are given by the Mexicans themselves of the great battle which was fought near the walls of Mexico. We are indebted for the two following letters to a gentleman of this city. They were forwarded by an officer of distinction at Tampico. Who obtained the Spanish copies at that place. They were addressed to Mexicans at Tampico—the one written from the capital itself on the 21st, August, and the other at Huijatlal, between Mexico and Tampico, written on the 26th. They are sufficiently piquent, and very interesting in the views which they present of the progress and result of the battle of Churubusco.

CITY OF MEXICO, August 21.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I am in the blackest of humors; I am overpowered by the most profound melancholy; the whole has gone to the devil. The Yankees—the hateful Yankees—have triumphed, because our inefficient generals cannot even command four soldiers. Generals Valencia and Santa Anna have been routed successively at the stone quarry of San Angel, and at Churubusco bridge; and Scott with his army occupies the hacienda of Portales, distant five miles from here.

That gang of miscreants would have occupied the capital to-day, but General Santa Anna, in order, is reported, to prevent such ignominy to the nation as to have the hateful flag of the stars waving over the palace of the Montezumas, has decided on hearing the proposals for peace from the United States commissioner; and, as a preliminary, tomorrow they will discuss the terms of an armistice. The Generals Mora, Villamil, and Quijano.

Malediction and eternal hatred to the perversed who have usurped the title of leaders of the nation only to head revolutions they promoted for their own aggrandizement, and to demoralize all classes of society. A treat of peace appears to me inevitable, under the most shameful conditions to us; for, without an army or public spirit, which has been deadened by civil dissensions, and in the face of the treasonable selfishness shown by the authorities of some of the States, what advantages is possible to obtain from a proud enemy who is conscious of its power.

I will not continue discussing this point, because I feel my soul is burning with despair. Poor country! She has been buried in the mire by those of her sons that she most distinguished.

HUIJALTIA, August 26, 1847.

MY ESTEEMED FRIEND: I have learned the following letters to the 21st, received from Mexico:

At dawn on the 19th, the enemy made false attacks on the farm of San Antonio and on Churubusco, which is supposed they did so as to execute their real maneuver, which, as was afterwards seen, was to advance on Tacubaya—This was done by sending their troops along the thickets and ravines between Tialpam and that town. Valencia was not taken unawares, who, you will recollect, was in charge of that post, and was timely advised by his explorers of the advance of the enemy, and therefore received them with a terrible fire of artillery and musketry. When the enemy found they were discovered, they took the direction of the heights where our batteries were placed, sustaining an active fire from their infantry, aided by some artillery shots, with the object of succeeding in getting up; but everytime they attempted it, they were checked and disordered by our troops, and immediately threatened to charge with bayonet, which was never done. They were therefore retreated four times to the ravine, where they kept their reserve, and whence they returned organized and reinforced. The day was spent in this manner. It is calculated the enemy lost in their attempts more than one thousand men. Valencia repeatedly asked for assistance, or to call the attention of the enemy that he might flank them, but he was always answered in the negative. Not withstanding, at 3, p.m., one of our divisions was seen flanking the enemy with 5,00 infantry, 2,000 cavalry, and 6 field pieces, commanded by Gen. Santa Anna.

This so intimidated Scott that he showed by his maneuvers a disposition to retreat; but when he saw that the said division had remained as simple spectators, he returned to the charge until the close of the day.

In the early part of the night, Gen. Santa Anna marched to Churubusco, and the enemy, who knew this movement, sent the greater part of their force to the rear of Valencia's and as this general had no information of the withdrawal of Gen. Santa Anna, slackened his vigilance in that quarter. And at dawn the 20th he found himself hemmed in by the enemy, who, reinforced with 2000 men, charged along the ravine with such fury that they were not intimidated at our soldiers charging them with the bayonet; on the contrary, when our troops advanced, their fell
It appears our loss in this action amounted to 400 killed, and more than 1000 prisoners.

On the afternoon of the 10th, Gen. Rangel left Mexico with a brigade of 3,000 men, and orders to reinforce Valencia, or attack the enemy in the direction the former might think proper; but on the road he received instructions from Gen. Santa Anna to remain in San Angel until further orders. As Valencia was posted on the hills and farm of Contreras, he knew nothing of this force. The remnants of this general's forces pursued by the enemy, joined Rangel's, who, as soon as he knew of the defeat, countermarched to the citadel. In this affair we lost 20 pieces, most of them of heavy caliber, all the train, ammunition, &c. that came from San Luis, and above all, the name of military men, which, until now, we had well or badly borne. Gen. Scott immediately fell on San Antonio, and before mid-day, he was molesting our troops with the artillery he took at Contreras, which, united with his own, and with the whole main body of his army—emboldened by a triumph which, in my opinion, they had not even dreamed of—routed ours in a moment, but so shamefully, that at the first fire they took the farm with all the ammunition and park of artillery, which, it is said, they spiked; and from that very place they went to attack Churubusco. Here the attack was very brisk on both sides, both parties losing many men. On our part, we have lost battalions Independence and Bravo, of the National Gueard. Scarcely 400 have been rallied of 1,300 forming No. 11. The 4th light infantry was destroyed, and nearly the whole of the company or legion of St. Patrick; the few that remained were the Polks—i.e. the Victoria battalion—who were the last to retreat. The enemy, therefore, took possession of the post at 5 p.m., after having obtained four victories. These they have, in spite of the unskillfulness of our general, purchased at a very high price, because, it is said, their dead amount to more than 3,000. Notwithstanding this they advanced as far as the farm of Portales, distant one and a half leagues, when they fortified themselves, believing they would be attacked on the 21st. This was not the case; because that day was employed in going in and out of the gates, and in talking a great deal. On the afternoon of the 21st there were quartered at the Palace the battalion Sur Morelas, the remnants of the 4th light infantry Victoria, and the Grenadiers of the Supreme Powers, and many ammunition wagons, and some artillery, of which we had too much left in the direction of Chapultepec. It is said a charge on the enemy was expected this night. However this is, Gen. Santa Anna moved for an armistice, the terms of which will be discussed on the 22d. As a preliminary to this, Gen. Santa Anna offered to listen to the proposals of peace from the United States commissioner. In order to arrange the armistice, Generals Mora, Villamil, and Quijano were appointed. So far, we know among the killed are Generals Torjon, Frotera, and Mexis, and Col Perdijon; and among the prisoners, Bravo, Goresteago, Rincon, Gezoman, and Parrodi, and Capt Tabera, and Choss, and Major Cera; but there is no doubt there are a great many of both. The capital was in the greatest consternation.

By the next post I will tell you whatever else may occur. Fare you well. From your affection friend, &c.

TACUBAYA, MEXICO, Aug. 26, 1847.

SIR: I trust a cordial intimacy and friendship of twenty-five years with your late Brother, the gallant Col. Butler will excuse the trespass of a stranger. Your Brother fell most gloriously in the great battle of the 20th, before the gates of Mexico. In that bloody conflict, no man gave higher evidence of valor and patriotism, or exhibited a brighter example. He fell when it was God's will, precisely as he would have desired to die. His body rests here; his memory in the hearts of his countrymen; his spirit, bright and pure as his blade, with his God.

The enclosed letter, written the day before the battle, I did not receive until the day after, through the hands of Dickinson; and it is not because of the kind things said by a friend's partiality, but because it is probably the last letter he penned, that I send it to you; begging that some future day it may be returned to me, to be preserved and cherished.

The gallant Palmettos, who showed themselves worthy of their State and Country, lost nearly one-half. This victory will carry joy and sorrow into half the families in South Carolina. Col Dickinson is getting on well, and will, it is hoped, save his leg. An Armistice is concluded, and Commissioners meet to-morrow to treat of Peace. God speed them.
Very truly, your obedient servant,
W. J. WORTH

Hon. A. PICKENS BUTLER.

SAN AUGUSTIN, August 19, 1847.

Letter from Col. Butler to Gen. Worth.

Dear General; We are here in tribulation. I can but hope, however, it is but temporary. It is ordered that this division remain as protection to the train. There is gloom on us all: while I am one who believes there will be fighting enough for all. The moral effect is withering. The regiment, though weak in numbers, is up to the fall point, and I trust South Carolina may have a place in the picture. We have been watching you and your division for the last two days with fraternal affection; but the entire voice of the army, where I have been, or heard, is unbounded confidence in "Worth" "So mote it bed." But I have strayed from the principal point or purpose of my note, which is to say, our friend, Col Dickinson, more impatient, and not so long a soldier as myself, desires a place nearer the flashing of the guns; and with good taste, wishes to get near you. If you can make him useful, he will feel much gratified. I am aware you are surrounded by a talented staff, but a littler more of a good thing will render it not the less complete or effectual.

I am, my dear General, yours sincerely,

P. M. BUTLER, S. C. V.

General W. J. WORTH, Comd'g, &c.

We are now located in one wing of the Archbishop's palace, Chapultepec, with its significant grove, is before us, and we overlook the great city, surrounded by its [illegible] and embosomed in its mountains. I never recalled the beauty of the valley of Mexico until I reached this spot. To see it now, lighted by the soft, bright moon with every village, spire, hut, and mountain reflected in its silver lakes, you would think it even surpasses the descriptions we read of it. There are also some stupendous works of art around us. I can tell you nothing, for I have not been in the city, of something more interesting, I shall have to tell you of the operations of the army.

On the 7th inst. Gen Twigg's division left Puebla.---It was followed on the 8th by Gen. Quitman's on the 9th by Gen. Worth's, and overtook Gen. Twiggs that night at San Martin. Our march over the mountains was undisturbed, except by rumors of guerrillas and resistance. Both disappeared as we approached, and we left their abandoned works as we found them. On the 11th Gen. Twiggs encamped at Ayotla, 15 miles from Mexico, 15 miles from Mexico, on the direct road. The other divisions, on each succeeding day, came up in order, and took positions in the rear---Gen. Worth occupying Chalco. The reconnaissance of the 12th and 13th satisfied us of the strength of the enemy's defences n our front. Their principal defence was at El Penon, commanding the causeway between the lakes of Tezecaco and Chalco. The hill of El Penon is about 300 feet high, having three plateaus of different elevations. It stands in the waters of Lake Tazeuco. It haze is surrounded by a dry trench, and its sides arranged with breast works from its base to its crest. It was armed with thirty pieces of cannon, and defended by 7,000 men, under Santa Anna in person. The causeway passed directly by its base---the waters of the lake washing each side of the causeway for two miles in front, and the whole distance seven miles to the city. There was a battery on the causeway about four hundred yards in advance of the Penon, another by its side, a third about a mile in front of the entrance to the city, and a fourth at the entrance. About two miles in front of the Penon a road branched off to the left, and crossed the outlet of Lake Hochimilico, a the village of Mexicalingo, six miles from the main road. This village surrounded by a marsh, was enveloped in batteries, and only approached over a paced causeway a mile in length. Beyond, the causeway continued through the marsh for two miles farther, and opened upon terra firma at the village of Churubusco, which was also fortified, and which we shall see more presently. The reconnaissance of the 14th satisfied us that the route south of Lake Chalco was practicable for our wagons, or could be made so. That day Gen. Pillow's division closed upon the village of Chalco, and the next morning (15th) gen. Worth led off south of the lake. The divisions took up the line of march in succession, Gen. Twiggs bringing up the rear, and we turned our backs upon the fortifications of the Penon and Mexicalingo. General Valencia, with 6000 men, made an attempt to annoy our rear as it turned Lake Chalco; but General Twiggs having his train in front, and his division well in hand, wheeled into line to the left, and, with one discharge of Taylor's battery, tumbled over some men and horses, and sent the rest flying over the hills like the wild ducks from the lakes. He then broke again into column, and resumed his march. The racheros and guerilleros hovering about our front gave us little trouble, and the working parties filled up the trenches, and rolled away the rocks that had been placed there to retard us, without stopping our march.

On the 17th Gen. Worth encamped at San Augustin, on the Acapulco road, and moved down on the 18th two and a half miles, in front of San Antonio, or make room for the other division to close upon him. The 18th was devoted to reconnoissances. San Antonio was situated similarly to Mexicalcingo. Batteries commanded the causeway in front, and swept over the marches to the left as far as the lake. The pedregal, or volcanic rocks, rendered the right impassable for everything but infantry, and difficult for them... one and a half mile in the rear were situated the defences of Churubusco, commanding the approach over the pedregal, and by the way of Mexicalcingo, A route was discovered west from San Augustin over the spurs of the mountain, to the San Angel road, by which these positions could be turned. Gen. Twigg's division coming up the morning of the 19th, was thrown forward on this route, to cover the working parties formed from Pillow’s division. By 1 p.m., we had surmounted the hills and approached the two divisions of the army, with their field batteries, &c., within cannon range of Valencia’s entrenchments, situated on the San Angel road, and commanding the only approach through the pedregal, or volcanic rocks. The working parties were returned to their regiments, the tools repacked, and preparations made to dislodge the enemy, before continuing the road further. On approaching his front within canister range, and driving in his advanced parties, posted behind breastworks across the road, with Magruder’s and the howitzer batteries, it was found that the ground on his left offered the greatest advantages for the attack. He lay entrenched on rising ground, behind a deep ravine about midway between us, to which the ground gently descended from both directions. His front was defended by four 8-inch howitzers, and three long 16-pounders, one 18-pounder, and some smaller caliber, His right was almost equally strong; and, after crossing the ravine, approached over smooth ground in form of a natural glacis, and taken in reverse by a body of racheros and lancers. The heads of the different divisions were accordingly changed to the right; and, each leaving their horses and batteries behing, slowly worked their way, among the volcanic rocks, to the ravine, which they passed in front of the small village of San Raymond, out of gunshot of Valencia’s batteries. They were now on the firm San Angel road, between the ravine and the head of Valencia and relief; but Santa Anna coming out to his support with seven thousand infantry and cavalry, drew up in battle array on the hill of Contreros, to our right. Col. Riley’s brigade, that had been moved to the right earlier in the day, to co–operate with a front attack, and had passed beyond the San Angel Road, now falling back upon the village which we had take possession of, General Smith at once determined to drive away the force threatening our right. By the time his dispositions were made, the sun had set; and night drawing on, it was feared we should not have light enough for our work. The attack was therefore suspended till morning. The troops bivouacked around the village, without food, without shelter, and without fire. It was afterwards determined to return the original intention of assaulting Valencia’s entrenchments, as the dispersion of Santa Anna’s force affected but little our principal object.

At 3 a.m., Col. Riley’s brigade was pt in motion, followed by Gen. Smith’s and Gen. Cadwallader’s; Gen Shields holding the village. During the night, the 9th and 12th regiments, with a company of rifled and some detachments that had been thrown out the previous day, were moved to the ravine in front of the enemy’s position, and, after driving in their picquets in the gray of the morning, filed off to the right, an took sheltered position on their left, ready to co–operate with the attacking force in rear. This force moving around the base of the hill on which the battery was placed, covered from their view and fire, began about sunrise to show themselves over its crest. Col. Riley’s brigade, sweeping around their rear and right, moved down with great impetuosity, while Gen Smith attacked their left from the rear. In the meantime Col Ransom, pushing across the ravine the force in front, opened his fire upon their front and left. The enemy fiding himself thus attacked, and apprehending the main attack from the direction in which we approached the previous day, opened his heavy battery on his front. But Riley’s brigade carrying everything before them, on that of Shields. They broke at all points, abandoning artillery, pack train, ammunition, &c. We took 800 prisoners—4 generals: Salas, Mendoza, Blanco, and Garcia; 4 colonels; 2 commanders of brigades and squadrons, and other officers in proportion. Among the twenty–two pieces of artillery taken, were the two belonging to Washington’s battery, taken at Buena Vista. They were retaken by the 4th artillery, the regiment to which they originally belonged. We buried 600 of their dead found on the field. Our loss did not exceed 60. After allowing the troops a little time for refreshment, they were put in march down the San Angel road, to take in reverse the positions of San Antonio and Churubusco. The enemy, finding himself turned, immediately commenced to evacuate his lines at San Antonio; but we moved upon him so rapidly that he had to abandon his guns. Gen Worth’s division, that had masked him in front, followed so close upon his heels as to drive his rear into the defences of Churubusco. In the meantime Gen. Twiggs had taken his position in the front on the battery surrounding the convent, while Gen. Worth seized upon that defending the bridge, and blocking the main road to Mexico. The battle opened fiercely on that side. Generals Shields and Cadwallader advanced to the right of the convent, and General Pierce, following quickly up, took position to his left, and the howitzer battery opened on his right. The Mexicans made a stout resistance, and the reverse under Major Sumner, composed of the rifle regiment and a squadron of dragoons, was brought to their support. By the time they broke into the cornfield, the enemy began to give way. Worth and Twiggs had forced their front, and they were being driven upon the capital. As soon as the way was clear for the dragoons, they swept over the causeway, charging up to the very gates. Many a fine saddle was emptied by the discharge from their last battery. Capt Kearney, whose troop was leading, lost his left arm, and the rest of his officers were wounded. Our men had done their work well faithfully. Their exhaustion required rest. The recall was sounded and we returned to the care of the killed and wounded. Of these we have a goodly number. I fear they will reach nearly 1000. Many gallant officers are at rest. Col. Butler, of the South Carolina regiment, bringing his regiment into action, had his horse shot under him; continuing the charge on foot, he was wounded in the leg, and finally shot through the head. Of the regulars, Capt. Thornton, of the dragoons, Capt. Burke, 1st artillery, Hanson, Lieut. Irons, Easly, Hoffman, and Johnston. About 40 are wounded more or less severely. All the engineers are safe. We cannot be sufficiently thankful, nor repay the interest or prayers of our friends in our behalf. The greeting of General Scott, by the troops after the action, on seeing the success of all his plane, was loud and vociferous. It must have shaken the "Halls of the Motezumas." Their enthusiasm seemed to cheer the Mexican officers in their captivity. The army has implicit confidence in him, and apprehend nothing where he commands. He sees everything, and calculates the costs of every measure; and they know and feel that their lives and labor will not be uselessly commanded. During the day, we too 9,700 prisoners, 6 generals, 37 pieces of artillery, and ammunition enough for a whole campaign, their defences were completely turned and their plans upset. We could have entered Mexico that evening, or the next morning, at our pleasure, so complete was the disorganization of their army of 38,000 men. We learn that 27,000 men were opposed to us at all points on the 29th, and they acknowledge is killed and wounded 5000 men. On the 21st, as the army met by a proposition for a cessation of hostilities, for the purpose of taking case of the killed and wounded. This he refused, but in the evening agreed to an armistice, or enable commissioners to meet Mr. Trist, and to treat for peace.—The armistice has been officially ratified. It is difficult to foresee the result; though I can very well see that it is for Santa Anna’s advantage to make peace. So far I can trust him.

The Lieutenant Johnson killed, was the nephew of Lt. Col. Johnson, of the voltigeurs. I was standing by him when his leg was carried off above the knee by a cannon ball. He was gallant little fellow, and an merry over his work all the morning as a boy at play. He fell by the side of the gun he had been effectively serving, and died that night, 19th instant. The Colonel did not hear of his death until next morning. He was standing in Valencia’s captured entrenchments, flushed with the recent victory; his frame shrunk and shivered with agony, and I wept to witness his grief. It is the living for whom we should mourn, and not the dead. The engineers did good service on both days; nor was the engineer company behind in any under taking.

The telegraph of the 6th inst has the following paragraph about the crops of Texas:

"DROUGHT AND THE CROPS.—We were not apprised until within a few days that the drought that has prevailed in the undulating region had been so extensive and disastrous. We have been informed that it has seriously injured the upland cotton through the whole tier of counties from San Antonio to the Trinity. On the San Antonio, many of the settlers have been compelled to cut up their corn as it was withering in the fields. The settlers near Bexar have raised so little corn that the crop is insufficient for the consumption of the citizens, and large quantities have been transported from Guadaloupe to that town. It is selling at Bexar for a dollar a bushel. We are informed that the cotton has suffered more upon the uplands than the corn. In many places but little or half a crop will be made. In the bottom lands, however, the crop is immense; some of the planters are already complaining that they cannot procure hands to pick it out as fast as it matures."

From the Telegraph of the 6th inst, we take the following:

"BEXAR.—Several Mexican traders have lately visited Bexar and purchased a large quantities of goods.
Some of them brought a quantity of silver in bars. This silver is remarkably pure. We learn that there are several silver mines in the vicinity of Santa Rosa, and Monclova, which are quite productive, and as the Government can no longer monopolize the profits, the people in that section will probably work them to a greater extent than they have been worked in any previous year. The trade of Bexar would doubtless be increased to a very great extent, if a company of rangers were stationed near the Nueces or the route to the Presidio. The Lipans and Camanches are almost constantly watching on that route to intercept the Mexican tradres and it is believed that several renegade Mexicans are also connected with these marauders. It has been reported in Bexar, that the guerrillas have appeared in considerable force between Saltillo on the road to Mier. A large party of guerrillas lately appeared in the vicinity of Parras, and their [illegible] cause they had befriended the Mexicans; but he retired without fulfilling his threat. A large number of Shawnee and Delaware Indians have recently encamped near Bexar. They are engaged in hunting and are remarkably friendly.”

The Houston Star says a large number of Mexican families have removed from the Rio Grande to that town, and other are expected to follow them this season. These families, however, possess little property, and appear to have removed from Mexico to avoid the oppressive exactions of the numerous guerrilla parties that now infest all the eastern States of Mexico. According to their representations the people in the valley of the Rio Grande are in a deplorable condition. Unprotected in any manner by their own Government, almost without laws or officers who are empowered to restrain marauding bands of their own countrymen, or to check the incursions of the savages, they are unable to enjoy the least security of person or property.

The Star learns that Bexar is not the only town that has been benefited by the emigration from Mexico. Laredo, which has enjoyed comparative security since the ranging company of Gen. Lamar has been stationed there, seems to be slowly recovering its former prosperity. We have been informed that its population is now even greater than that of Bexar, and it is estimated that not less than five thousand souls are now residing in the town and the neighboring settlements. The number of Mexican votes that will be polled in Western Texas, at the election in November next, is estimated at about three thousand.

The Houston Star of the 9th inst. Has the following paragraph:

“GERMAN COLONY.—We learn that MR. Meusenbach, the agent of the German Colony, has raised a company of about sixty men, and gone out to the Conchos to protect the surveyors, who are engaged in running the boundary lines of the colony. The Camachens threaten that they will kill any surveyors who attempt to make surveys in that section, and he in his turn threatens to fire upon any Indians that may molest the surveyors. No Camaches have recently been seen near the frontiers, and the rangers who lately went out to visit one or two of the lodges they occupied a few weeks since, found them deserted. It appears that they have retired with all their women and children far into the interior, and the settlers fear they have gone back to the mountains to secrete their families with the intention to make war upon our settlements.”

The following letter from the city of Mexico to the Tampico correspondent of the New Orleans La Patria, by whom it has been forwarded to that paper, though of no later date than they accounts previously received by way of Vera Cruz, was deemed of sufficient interest to authorise its publication in an extra sheet. We copy it, in the absence of later intelligence, but we do not at all confide in its statements:

MEXICO, August 29, 1847.

Esteemed Friend——I have already informed you that Gen. Scott proposed a suspension of arms on the 21st, and it was followed by an armistice agreed to on the 22d inst. A negotiation was forthwith opened with Mr. Trist, and I have just been assured that up to yesterday it had progressed very satisfactorily. Very shortly a treaty of peace, it is expected, will be concluded. The principal articles are the following:

“The United States shall restore to Mexico the Californias, together with all the ports, cities and towns which the Americans forces occupy in our territory.

“The United States shall forever retain the State of Texas, whose limist shall exted to the left bank of the Rio Bravo del Norte, comprising Matamoros, by means of a canal which shall be cut for that purpose.”

In Respect to this latter point it appears that nothing definite has been agreed upon. It has been found impossible to assemble Congress, consequently a junta of “notables” will be formed for the express purpose of revising the treaty. There are other articles, but as they are of secondary importance they re not given.

Gen. Alvares is announeed as intending to reassemble his troops, for the purpose of attacking the Americans on the first favorable opportunity.

Gen. Paredes, it is stated, is marching on the capital with a respectable force, which he has succeeded in bringing together, with a view to assist his countrymen. This he persist in doing, notwithstanding the order that has been transmitted to him from Santa Anna to quit the country—-to return again to the place of his exile.

GEN. SALAS.—I have just seen a communication from Gen. Salas, dated from Coayacan, where he remained a prisoner. In this, he declares that it was by the unskilfulness of Valencia, and the cowardice of Torrejon, that the orders of Salas, which directed him to charge the Americans with his cavalry, pusillanimously fled, and in this manner brought ruin and destruction on our infantry.

RW47v24n75p2c2, September 28, 1847, THE ARMISTICE

A letter from a field officer of the Army to a friend in New York, published in the Journal of Commerce, says, that, after the battle of the 20th, "it was known in our camp that the panic-sticken remains of the Mexican army could oppose only a feeble and ineffectual resistance to the entrance of our troops into the capital; but Mr. Commissioner Trist, who is charged by the Administration at Washington with the negotiation on our part, announced, as his deliberate conviction, that if the army were to follow up the victory and enter the capital, all hope of a speedy peace would be destroyed, while, on the other hand, forbearance promised that happy result. On the morning after the battle, Santa Anna sent out a flag and asked for a truce preliminary to negotiations for peace. The General in Chief, desirous to carry out the views of his Government, and acting in concert with the Commissioner, Mr. Trist, assented to the armistice, to afford opportunity for the negotiation under the most favorable auspices."

The writer thinks that peace will be the result; but the opinion of the majority was that the Mexicans would practice their usual chicanery and treachery, and compel Gen. Scott to resume hostilities—in which event, he says," the city will be captured—and if by assault, fearful will be the consequences."

RW47v24n75p2c4, September 28, 1847, THE LATE MEXICAN BATTLES

The following narrative of the late Battles near the city of Mexico, is extracted from a letter by an officer of the U. States Army, to a friend in Virginia. The writer is a Virginian and held a conspicuous position in the conflicts he describes:

"MEXCOAC, 3 miles from the City of Mexico,} August 25, 1847. }"

"My Dear----: 'We have met the enemy and he, is ours'--Santa Anna has been completely out--Generalized, and though his men fought like Devils ours fought like ----Angels! With an army of less that 10,000 men and about 27 pieces of Artillery we have beaten Santa Anna with about 35,000 men and 100 pieces of Artillery behind well constructed fortifications--each knowing that victory or death must be his fate---the flaming cannon’s mouth had no terrors for any. Our men charged batteries shot down cannoniers, routed Infantry and turned the enemy’s own cannon upon them, with a rapidity and impetuosity that nothing could resist, in all cases led by their officers. Of 15 officers in our regiment, 8 have fallen, 5 killed and 3 severely wounded. We have lost at least 1000 men, but we have taken 50 pieces of Artillery, which makes us stronger than before our loss. The City is at out feet, sueing for mercy—but what Soldier has so well done, the Diplomatist may spoil. An armistice has been concluded, the terms of which are, in substance—that hostilities shall cease, to be renewed at the option of either party at forty eight hours’ notice—that free trade shall be allowed with the city to supply the army with necessities—that no officer or soldier other than those connected with the Commissary and Quarter Masters' Departments is to enter the city, with or without arms—that an express can pass though the city with a safeguard to the Coast—that no more fortifications are to be erected be either part—and no reinforcements to be received by either----that this armistice is agreed to, to give the U. States the opportunity of proposing terms of peace!!! I am a solider, to make no comments.

It is but just to state, however, that the reasons given for the armistice are,“ that if Santa Anna and his army are entirely destroyed or dispersed, there will be nobody to make peace with—that we shall be compelled to assume the government and become entangled in Mexican politics—and that such a state of things would be the worst that could happen to our country.” We are therefore to treat with Santa Anna, and strengthen him, as far as is proper, to enable him to make peace—but when we go, he must fall as he knows: hence when he is sufficiently strengthened, he may turn upon us again, and fortune cannot always be with us. He is treacherous and unprincipled in the extreme, with great talents as a general and intriguer; and though he is said to be without personal courage, his firmness of purpose and confidence in himself are absolutely marvelous. Whilst all this is going on, much course to the dissatisfaction of the army, the troops are quartered in the little villages around the city, and are anything but comfortable. I myself, however, with my company, occupy a beautiful country church, the food Padre having kindly given up his library to me as a sleeping room. At the head of my bed stands a waken image of the Virgin Mary, and opposite its foot two figures as large as life, each having a hand of the infant Saviour, all covered with glass cases; the books are all theological, and on every side there are images of saints—leaving nothing earthly in the room except your humble servant, and a Daguerreotype of Bocanegru, who, I believe, is a relative of the Padre.

My battery has been much injured in this fight. I was ordered to attack with 6 light pieces a Fort furnished with 23 guns, among them 18 pounders and three 8-inch howitzers—the latter being the same caliber as 68 lb Paixhan guns. I was obliged to go within their grape to be felt by them with my light guns, and to open on them from the road without any cover for my battery. However, it was necessary to hold the position at all hazards, in order to give time to the storming parties to turn uninterruptedly the enemy’s left. I held it from 2 o’clock, P.M. until I was relieved by a brigade of infantry, at 10 o’clock at night—having in the meantime been repeatedly urged by the Engineers, and ordered by others, to retire; which I did not think myself justified, however, in doing, being better acquainted with the state of affairs in that part of the field that others whose orders I received, but who were engaged elsewhere. I have the satisfaction of knowing that my conduct met with the entire approbation of my commanding officers. I had three pieces dismounted—the 1st Lieut. Of my battery, J. P. Johnston, 1st Artillery of Virginia, killed by my side, (one of the brightest and most valuable officers of the army,) several privates killed and wounded; and I lost ten horses killed or so badly wounded as to be unfit for service. Poor Irons is dreadfully wounded, with a grape-shot through his neck; he may recover—God grant he may. Martin of the 1st, I deeply regret to say, has lost his arm. I hope he is doing well.

In the Fort of San Angel, we captured the pieces lost at Buena Vista; 'tis said they were captured by the 4th Artillery, the same regiment which lost them.

I hope we now shall have a peace—but I distrust diplomacy. The Mexicans ought, in my opinion, to have been made to treat during a fight. Nothing makes them so much disposed to peace as the roar of our artillery and the cheers of our men. They will beat us to death at diplomacy carried on in tranquility. I hope for the best, and am not disposed to condemn what I may not fully understand. One thing is certain, that the Army has the most unbounded confidence in Gen. Scott—he has proved himself great in all things. Mr. Trist is the negotiator on the part of the Government, and I am told, with the fullest powers. Quitman, Persifer Smith and Pierce (Generals) were the Commissioners to arrange the terms of the armistice on our side—all fighting men and all Administration men.

I am naturally most anxious to return home—I am glad there is a prospect of peace. Having participate in five great battles, the last the greatest in numbers, and perhaps in consequences, yet fought during this war, and been engaged in several skirmishes, I am not so ferociously ambitious as to desire a continuance of the war, when I cannot see that any good end is to be attained other than the advancement of our own profession.

I cannot give you an intelligible account of the battles without describing our operations in detail, which would fill a small volume. From the reports which will soon be published, you will gain a tolerably good idea of this short campaign. It is sufficient at this moment to say, that the City of Mexico was not so well fortified in rear as in front, though strong on both sides; that Gen. Scott amused Santa Anna in front, whilst he turned the city by the left; taking a road 30 miles in length, supposed by the Mexicans to be totally impracticable for artillery and wagons, we thus were enabled to fight him with better chances of success.—As Santa Anna said, "the enormous rocks we rolled into the road to stop the Americans, they kicked out of the way with their feet; deep ditches we cut to impede their progress, they filled up in a moment, without halt in their march."

The private correspondent of the Diario de la Marina represents that the Mexican Government had some difficulty in inducing any one to accept the office of commissioners, but the commissioners we have before named.—Gen. Herrera, Gen. Mora y Villamil and Señores Cuoto and Atristain, were engaged on the 28th of August in negotiating. According to some accounts, if Gen. Santa Anna did not obtain fair terms, and such as would save national honor, the war would be continued. Others said that peace would be made at all hazards. In regard to this, however, the editor of the Diario says that there are two notable letters from Mexico touching the matter. One of them declared that Congress would not consent to convene in the capital but offered to meet in Queretaro, from which fears were entertained that it was their design to disapprove of any treaty which might be made. This view of their probable action was confirmed by the fact that the Executive, by his own confessions, did not possess the power to make peace. And furthermore, says the Diario, there were many general officers in Mexico at the last dates who declared that the would resign, or which is the same thing, abandon Santa Ann if a treaty should be concluded.—From all which it would follow that the position of the President was extremely critical.

In a subsequent number of the Diario the editor enters into a more critical examination of the news and gives the following digested summary of the results:

The Americans under the command of Gen. Scott arrived in the immediate vicinity of Mexico a little before the middle of August. The Mexican troops who left the capital to observe their movements, and to cut off their retreat in case they should make a decisive attack upon any one of the points of the defence had no encounter with the Americans before the 19th, on which day Gen. Valencia, contrary to the orders of the commander-in-chief,
My Dear Friend—I have the pain of announcing to you that on the 21st inst the Mexico arms suffered an unexpected disaster. The first action which took place at Rio Frio was favorable to us, our loss being 2000 men, while that of the enemy was 1000 and odd. This was occasioned by the imprudence of Gen. Valencia, who disobeyed entirely the orders of the commander—chief. The second action took place at El Penon, and there our army was overwhelmed the following day. Gen. Santa Anna, in immediate command of the auxiliary forces which left the capital to assist Gen. Valencia, succeeded in checking the Americans and preventing their entrance into the city of Mexico on the same day. Gen. Scott having proposed to Santa Anna an armistice, the latter accepted it, the American troops stationed within cannon-shot of the city, and the Mexican troops inside the city—the latter being the principal portion of the army, inasmuch as the troops who served under Valencia did not exceed 6000 men, though for the most part veterans. The armistice being accepted for the purpose of negotiating a peace upon honorable conditions, the negotiations had been commenced, and on the 29th were yet going on, notwithstanding that the summons of the Government of Congress had not effect. From preceding occurrences and from the fact that Congress had offered to meet at Queretaro, that place being the centre of operations for those opposed to peace. The conclusion of a treaty was no less offensive to several chiefs, although they had been adherents of Santa Anna. And finally, the disappearance of Gen. Valencia as well as the existence of a league of the States, of which Queretaro was the centre, and the arrival of Gen. Peroles, who some letters say already pronounced at Toluca all threatened to prolong the war, thus rendering useless all the efforts of those in the capital who were at work to secure peace, and threatened to wrest power from the hands of Santa Anna, whose acts in favor of the conclusion of a treaty it was thought would require even the support of the American troops.

Our readers,—the editor of the Diario continues,—will recollect that when the invitation of the envoy of the United States the Mexican Government consulted Congress to know whether it should listen or not to the propositions which it was proposed to make to it, Congress did not respond to the demand made upon it save in an evasive manner, that the settlement of that business belonged to the Government. But they will also recollect that the Government replied to Congress that it possessed no such powers, inasmuch as they were not granted by the fundamental law, and as in conferring extraordinary powers upon the Executive in April, the power to make peace was expressly withheld. Accordingly, the necessity of the co-operation of the legislative body to sanction any treaty which should be made being recognised by the Government itself, if Congress should refuse to meet, as it was supposed would be the case, this want of their concurrence, even should they make no express declaration against a treaty, would be a powerful weapon for those united by the league of Queretaro, as well as for all who might be disposed to join them out of hostility to a treaty, or from their personal dissatisfaction with the Provisional President. Notwithstanding, we do not think it improbable that the commissioners will bring their labors to a successful conclusion, and that for the ratification of the work, and to supply in a measure the absence of Congress, that an assembly of notables will be formed in Mexico,—At the same time we foresee by the General tenor of the conclusion, and that for the ratification of the work, and to supply in a measure the absence of Congress, that an assembly of notables will be formed in Mexico,---At the same time we foresee by the General tenor of the correspondent from Mexico, that the end of hostilities has not yet arrived, and that assuredly the treaty which may be concluded will not terminate them.

Such are the views of the Diario de la Marina, a journal conducted with great intelligence and industry, and with ample facilities to obtain information from Mexico. We have gone at length into its views, thinking that nothing, in the absences of news from any quarter, would give more interest to our readers.

"MEXICO, August 29, 1847.

"My Dear Friend—I have the pain of announcing to you that on the 21st inst the Mexico arms suffered an unexpected disaster. The first action which took place at Rio Frio was favorable to us, our loss being 2000 men, while that of the enemy was 1000 and odd. This was occasioned by the imprudence of Gen. Valencia, who disobeyed entirely the orders of the commander—chief. The second action took place at El Penon, and there our army was compelled to retire by the destructive fire of their artillery.—The same day Gen. Scott demanded an armistice, which was granted. Santa Anna fought personally in the most brilliant manner, but I believe that he will find himself compelled to resign, as parties are agitated in a most alarming manner.

"Many think that peace will now be made, but my opinion is that Congress, which is to reassemble at Queretaro, will oppose whatever treaties may be made."

Letters were received in this city yesterday, from Chihuahua, of as late date as the 1st of July. From one of these, we are glad to learn that a very satisfactory state of things existed, up to that date, between the American traders and the citizens and government of Chihuahua. The Mexicans adhered rigidly to the terms of the treaty made with the traders after the departure of Col. Doniphan’s command, and the latter were kingly treated. The only exception was in the case of the murder of James Aull, but that was for the purpose of plunder; and the Mexican authorities were active and unwearied in securing the murderers, and it was supposed that they would suffer the penalties due their crimes. In regard to Mr. Aull’s property, it is aid that the authorities had possession of it, but it was for the purpose of keeping it safe, and not with the view of confiscating it, as it seems to have been supposed. The traders were permitted to go to any part of the State, for the purpose of selling goods, and some advantageous sales have been made.

James Magoffin was in Chihuahua, acquitted of all charges which had been made against him.
Another letter is speaking of the respect paid to Mr. Aull, says: "He was buried in the Catholic graveyard. The church beautifully ornamented with roses, and the ceremonies were very long. The funeral was attended by all the principle citizens of this place, who have universally expressed the greatest horror and detestation of the perpetrators of the murder, and have spared neither trouble nor expense in their endeavors to arrest them."

FROM SANTA FE.—Letters as late as the 8th of August, were received in this city yesterday. The information which they contain, so far as we have been able to ascertain, is not important. Fourteen companies of volunteers had then left Santa Fe for Fort Leavenworth, leaving only four companies of volunteers in New Mexico. The number of men composing the returning companies has been greatly reduced, by death and by discharge from the service before the term of enrollment had expired. A letter remarks, that the companies will not average forty men!

Two companies were organized, it is stated, out of the volunteers in Santa Fe, to serve "during the war," and they remained at Santa Fe.

Lieut. Love, of the Dragoons, having in charge $300,000 for the pay of the troops in New Mexico, arrived at Santa Fe on the 7th of August. The money, as our readers recollect, was in the custody of Major BODINE, Paymaster of the United States.

It was expected, that the remaining four companies of volunteers would leave Santa Fe, for Fort Leavenworth, about the 15th of August. Major WALKER, Paymaster, and other officers of the government, would return in company with the volunteers.—St. Louis Republican, Sept. 18.

The administration at this moment presents itself before the people as having done, thus far, all that military policy and prowess could do to secure just and honorable peace. The events of the war seem almost to have obeyed our word of command."

"In estimating the glory of our arms, the people now feel, and have a right to feel, that the men charged by the voice of the nation with the maintenance of its rights and fame, have foreseen and provided for, and prepared beforehand the whole process and transaction of their recent noble triumph."

It is difficult to describe the unmitigated and unalloyed feeling of disgust and indignation with which every man, who has made himself acquainted with the progress of events during this war, must witness this attempt to pluck the laurel from the brows of our brave officers in Mexico, and transfer them to an Executive whose whole course has had a tendency to thwart their most wisely conceived plans, and to leave them continually exposed to the danger of defeat and destruction. Instead of thanking God that his imbecility has been productive of no worse consequences that the indefinite protraction of a war, which he boasted the capacity to finish in a few weeks--- instead of blessing the fortune of the Republic, which secured to it, in the hour of danger, General whom no neglect could paralyze, and no danger appal---instead of asking pardon for the past, and promising amendment for the future----the Executive of this country, without shame and without remorse, comes forward to claim credit for all the happened in spite of him---to war the laurel which his neglect could not wither---to steal the soldier's hard earned glory, after his utmost efforts had failed to him its luster. To stigmatise such conduct as mean, would be to do it too much honor. Infamous would be a term more appropriate.

In what manner, we venture to ask, has the Administration done "all that military prowess and policy could do to secure a just and honorable peace?" Such praise implies the personal performance of military achievements, and can be understood in no other sense. On what fields, we ask, has the prowess of Mr. Polk been conspicuous? For what achievement, either of tactics or strategy, in the numerous battles and marches by which the war has been distinguished, are we indebted to his policy? Has his sword been found gleaming foremost in the fight? Have his councils directed the maneuvers of the intricate and bloody campaign? If he has ever been at the scene of action, he has kept the fact most profoundly secret. The public has believed him to be "snugly concocted" (to use the phrase of a Democratic friend) in the White House, two thousand miles from the theatre of war, quietly enjoying his twenty-five thousand per annum, and never interfering, but to produce heart-burnings and disgust, among the gallant

apparently authentic information in regard to the origin of the proposition for the armistice between Generals Scott and Santa Anna. Immediately after the battle, it says, Senor Arrangolz, formerly Mexican Consul at New Orleans, and Mr. Mackintosh, acting Consul General of Great Britain, went under a flag of truce to visit Gen. Scott, and, after a conversation of some hours, returned to the capital. This visit, it is sad, was made by authority of Santa Anna, who, through his agents, represented to Gen. Scott that he was disposed and anxious to enter into negotiations for peace, but that his situation hindered him from taking the first step, account of the opposition of the people; but that if Gen. S. would propose an armistice, he would enter into negotiations with Mr. Trist, and that he was confident he would put an end to the war. We have no doubt this statement is in substance true.

A SOLDIER’S LETTER.—The following letter from Gen. Pierce is one of the most interesting that we have yet seen, from the army in Mexico, inasmuch as it gives more of individual experience—enables the reader to fix his eye upon a single figure amid the struggling mass, and so obtain a clearer idea of what a battle is. The letter was not intended for publication, as will be readily perceived, but it fell somehow into the bands of our friend of the Boston

Mexsoque, Mexico, Aug. 27, 1847.

Since I left Vera Cruz to this hour I have had no means of communicating with the States. Although but a few months in the service, I know what are fatigue, anxiety and exposure. Contrary to expectations, and contrary to my orders from the Department at Washington, I was compelled, for the want of the requisite provisions for transportation, to remain for more than three weeks at Vera Cruz, and for more than four in Terra Caliente, (the vomi–to region, as it is called) I left the dreaded city on the 10th of July with 2500 men of all arms, and a train of wagons which, when closed up, extended more than two miles.

On the 6th of August I reached Puebla, without the loss of a single wagon, with my command in fine condition.—My command was attacked six times on the march, but the enemy’s force in each instance was easily dispersed, with trifling loss on our side. The National Bridge afforded the enemy great natural advantages, to which they added breastworks on a high bluff which commanded the bridge perfectly; across the main bridge they had also thrown a barricade. I soon discovered that there was no way in which his position could be turned, and that my artillery was ineffective from the most commanding point where it could be placed. I determined, of course, to cross under the plunging fire of the enemy’s escopetas. My order to advance was admirably executed. At the moment Lt.
Colonel Bonham’s battalion rushed forward with a shout; the enemy poured down a heavy fire, by which several of

The Mexican force, as they said afterwards, consisted of 500 men. Had the possessed courage and skill in use of arms our loss must have been very great. You can hardly conceive the strength of the natural defences over which we passed. Rumors came to me almost every night that we would be attacked by large forces the next do, but they made no where anything like a brave and stern resistance. The official reports of the great battle of Mexico will probably reach you as soon as this letter, and I shall therefore not attempt to give the minute details. It was fierce and bloody beyond anything that has occurred in this war. The battle differed in many respects from that of Buena Vista. There Gen. Taylor received the enemy in a strong position selected by himself. Our force on the 20th consisted of less than nine thousand men; the Mexican force, within supporting distance and engaged, undoubtly exceeding thirty thousand. We attacked him in position upon ground of his own selection, admirably fortified. You will distinguish, so far as numbers are concerned, between the battle of the morning and that of the afternoon, although spoken of in official reports as one engagement under designation of “the battle of Mexico.” We took, during the day, thirty–five pieces of artillery—an immense quantity of ammunition—eight hundred mules and horses, and more than two thousand prisoners—among the eight generals and any number of colonels.

The Mexican loss in killed and wounded must have been immense. Our troops buried 500 Mexicans upon the field of battle commenced in the morning at Contreros, and the loss in the afternoon was much greater. Our loss has been heavy. With this small army we could not afford to purchase many such victories at such a price; one of the
It was exceedingly dark, the rain poured in torrents, and being separated from my servants and baggage, I was without tent or covering; add to this, that during the afternoon of the 19th we had gained no advantages over the enemy, who remained firmly entrenched with 7000 men opposed to about 4000 on our side, without the possibility of bringing our artillery to bear, and you will readily conceive that our situation was not the most agreeable. The morning of the 20th was, however, as brilliant as the night of the 19th was dark and gloomy. Soon after daylight the enemy’s works were carried with the bayonet, and of their 7000 men, regular troops, under the command of Valencia, probably 4000 cannot be found to-day. As we passed this field in pursuit of the fugitives, the scene was awful, the road and adjacent fields every where strewed with mangled bodies of the dead and dying. We continued the pursuit until 1 o’clock, when our front came up with the enemy’s strong works at Churubusco and San Antonio, where the great conflict of the afternoon commenced.

At San Angel, dispositions having been made to attack in reverse the enemy’s works on the San Augustin road. Gen. Scott ordered me to march my brigade in concert with that of the intrepid Gen. Shields, across the open country between Santa Aclerina and the above named road, in order to cut off the enemy’s retreat. We gained the position sought, and although the enemy’s line was perfectly formed, and extended as far as the eye could reach in either direction, they were attacked vigorously and successfully. Arriving at a ditch which it was impossible for my horse to leap, I dismounted and hurried forward without thinking of my injury, at the head of my brigade, for 200 or 300 yards, when turning suddenly upon my knee, the cartilage of which had been seriously injured, I fainted and fell upon the bank in the direct range and within perfect reach of the enemy’s fire. That I escaped seems to me now providential. The rout and overthrow of the whole Mexican force soon became complete, and we could easily have taken the city; but Gen. Scott was met with a proposition for an armistice, (after demanding the surrender of the city,) with a view to open negotiations for peace.

In my judgment the army, full of ardor and confidence, was humanely and wisely restrained. Major Gen. Quitman, Gen. Persifor F. Smith and myself were appointed [illegible line] to the terms of the armistice. I had not taken off my spurs of slept an hour for two nights, in consequence of my engagements and the pain of my knee. I obeyed the summons, was helped into my saddle, and rode two and a half miles to Tacubaya, where the commission assembled at the house of Mr. McIntosh, the British consul general. Our conference commenced late in the afternoon, and at four o’clock the next morning, the articles were signed.

That I was thoroughly exhausted you will readily imagine. I slept an hour or two that morning at Gen. Worth’s quarters, and my sprained knee, which was by far my most serious injury, has been daily improving and to-day I ride without much inconvenience. I have lost several dear friends, although our acquaintance had been of short duration. I visited the hospital yesterday, and saw officers and men with shots in all parts of their persons. Although all who were not really dying seemed cheerful, and many who had lost limbs in high spirits, still I sickened at the sight.

My general health has been good. I have been either in my saddle or on my feet every rod since I left Vera Cruz, which can be said by few officers in my command; for almost all were obliged at some point of the march, in consequence of the change in climate, water, exposure, &c., to avail themselves of the ambulance. Col. Watson, with his marine corps, accompanied me, and has been uniformly well. He is an excellent, agreeable gentleman, and admirable officer, and I regret, that, having been left with Gen. Quitman’s division at San Augustine, he had no opportunity to participate in the battles of 19th and 20th.

Now a word with a regard to the great object of this war—peace. There is no doubt that Santa Anna is sincerely desirous of peace. Commissioners to treat have been appointed, and met Mr. Trist this afternoon at four. My belief is that peace will be the result, although no man can speak with confidence.

[BRM]
In the outlines of the treaty presented by Mr. Trist to the Mexican commissioners, certain passages appear, which, we are told by the Union are not in the draught furnished to Mr. Trist by his own Government. Mr. T. must consequently have taken the responsibility of modifying the terms upon which he was instructed to insist. The first of these interpolated clauses is in the 2nd article of Mr. Trist's draught, in these words:

"Besides, it is agreed that if any Mexican citizens should be prisoners of the Cumanches, or of any tribes of Indians within the limits of the U. States, the Government of the U. States will endeavor to obtain their returns to their homes could not oppose himself to our soldiers and that he was losing his men rapidly, Gen. Scott took possession of the convent of San Isador, which extends back to the center of a block, and at once set his sappers and miners to cutting a way directly through the blocks of buildings. In some instances whole houses were blown up to facilitate his progress; but after several hours he again emerged into the street, and finally regained the Plaza with great loss. On entering the Plaza heavy fire was opened on him from the Palace and Cathedral, which were filled and covered with our patriotic troops.

Finding himself thus assaulted, the enemy drew out his forces in the Plaza, and opened a cannonade on the Palace and Cathedral, firing over one hundred shots, which did immense damage to the buildings, and cause a severe loss of killed and wounded. Seeing further resistance useless our soldiers ceased firing, and on the 15th September (sad day!) the enemy was in possession of the Mexican capital. Though we inflicted havoc and death upon the Yankees, we suffered greatly ourselves.

Many were killed by the blowing up of the houses, many by the bombardment, but more by the confusion which prevailed in the city, and all together we cannot count our killed, wounded and missing since the action commenced yesterday at less than 4,000, among whom are many women and children. The enemy confessed a loss of over 1,000; it is no doubt much greater. What a calamity! – But Mexico will yet have vengeance. God will avenge us for our sufferings.

Santa Anna has gone with his generals and all the troops he could draw off to Guadalupe. He is said to be wounded severely. We have lost heroic officers and brave men in these two days. I cannot foresee what is to come. Thousands are gathering upon the hills around the city determined to cut off all supplies and starve the enemy who has so audaciously entered it. Gen. Scott may yet find that Mexico is not vanquished. He may find our lakes berating their barriers and filling this beautiful valley, to annihilate the infamous Americans.

We scarcely hope, yet do not quite despair. Our brave generals may recover what is lost, and Mexico with her ten millions of people arise to sweep the invader from the land he has desecrated.

Friday, October 8, 1847, RWv24i81p1c3 Letter from General Taylor words: 669

The National Intelligencer of Tuesday last publishes the following very interesting letter recently received by Dr. Bronson from Gen. Taylor. It is more explicit, in reference to the political predilections of the General, than any thing which has yet appeared from his pen, and will be read with pleasure by the Whigs throughout the Union – by those who, like ourselves, have deemed it "premature" to commit themselves to his support for the next Presidency, as well as by those, more ardent or more sagacious, who have long since hoisted his flag:

Headquarters Army of Occupation,
Camp near Monterey, Aug. 10, 1847.

Sir: Your letter of the 17th ultimo, requesting of me an exposition of my views on the questions of national policy now at issue between the political parties of the United States, has duly reached me.

I must take occasion to say that many of my letters, addressed to gentlemen in the United States in answer to similar inquiries, have already been made public, and I had greatly hoped that all persons interested had, by this time, obtained from them a sufficiently accurate knowledge of my views and desires in relation to this subject. As it appears, however that such is not the case, I deem it proper, in reply to your letter, distinctly to repeat that I am not before the People of the United States as a candidate for the next Presidency. It is my great desire to return at the close of this war to the discharge of those professional duties and to the enjoyment of those domestic pursuits from which I was called at its commencement, and for which my tastes and education best fit me.

I deem it but due to candor to state, at the same time, that, if I were called to the Presidential Chair by the general voice of the people, without regard to their political differences I should deem it to be my duty to accept the office. But while I freely avow my attachment to the administrative policy of our early Presidents, I desire it to be understood that I cannot submit, even in thus accepting it, to the exaction of any other pledge as to the course I should pursue than that of discharging its functions to the best of my ability and strictly in accordance with the requirements of the constitution.

I have thus given you the circumstances under which only can I be induced to accept the high and responsible office of President of the United States. I need hardly add that I cannot in any case permit myself to be brought before the people exclusively by any of the political parties that now so unfortunately divide our country, as their
It affords me great pleasure, in conclusion, fully to concur with you in your high and just estimate of the virtues both of the head and the heart, of the distinguished citizens [Messers, Clay, Webster, Adams, McDuffie and Calhoun] mentioned in your letter. I have never yet exercised the privilege of voting; but had I been called upon at the last Presidential election to do so, I should most certainly have cast my vote for Mr. Clay.

I am, sir, very respectfully your obedient servant,

Z. TAYLOR,
Major General U.S. Army.

F.S. Bronson, M.D., Charleston, S.C.

The emphatic approbation expressed by General Taylor of “the administrative policy of our early Presidents,” in which the Whigs find ample authority for all their leading principles and measures, taken in connection with his frank declaration that he should have certainly voted for Mr. Clay in 1844, had he voted at all, can leave no doubt of his entire concurrence with the Whig party in sentiment. – While on this point we have never been ourselves in doubt, we are nevertheless gratified that the General has been sufficiently explicit to satisfy others, who, not content with the positive declarations of third parties, have insisted upon waiting for the “best evidence” – that of General Taylor himself.

Friday, October 8, 1847, RWv24i81p1c3 High Tribute of Gen. Taylor words: 641

The New York "Literary World" of the 2d inst. is enriched by a brief paper from the pen of Mr. Stephens, who acquired both celebrity and fortune, a few years since, by his interesting "Incidents of Travels" in the Holy Land, and at a later period by his discoveries in Central America. Mr. S. was one of the passengers on board our splendid steamer Washington, on her first voyage to Europe, and he availed himself of her brief detention at Bremen to pay a visit to Baron Alexander Von Humboldt, whom he found residing with the King of Prussia in the place at Potsdam, 30 miles from Berma. After --------- of the Baron's personal appearance and pursuits in his green old age, Mr. S. Stephens proceeds to say:

"Out of Europe, Mexico seemed to be the country which interested him the most; perhaps from it’s connexion with those countries which had brought me to his acquaintance, or more probably, because it was the foundation of his own early–fame. He spoke of Mr. Prescott’s History of the Conquest, and said that I might, when the opportunity offered, say to that gentlemen as from himself, that there was no historian of the age, in England or Germany, equal to him.

"And he was keenly alive to the present condition of Mexico: he was full of our Mexican war: his eyes were upon Gen. Taylor and the American army. I was well aware, that in the conduct of this war Gen. Taylor was drawing upon himself the eyes of all Europe; and that whatever might be the differences of opinion as to its necessity or justice, it was producing everywhere, in monarchical and anti–republican countries, a strong impression of our ability and power for war – which, in enlightened (?) Europe, even at this day, more than all the fruits of peace, industry, and extended commerce, more than the comforts of life, raises as to the rank off a first rate power, and makes us 'respected.'

"Baron Humboldt said that with one of his own maps before them, the King and his military council had followed General Taylor from his encampment at Corpus Christi to Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palms, through the storming of Monterey, and the bloody scenes of Buena Vista – They had fought over all his battles, and with his positions all marked on the map, were then looking for further tidings. They had seen and appreciated all his difficulties at Buena Vista. In Prussia was is a science, and according to the leading policy of Europe, to be always ready for war, every male in Prussia, the highest nobleman’s son not excepted is compelled to serve his regular term in the army. In the teeth of all settled opinions, and as it were upsetting the whole doctrine of standing armies, General Taylor, with a handful of regulars, and a small body of volunteers who had never been in battle, had stood up for a whole day against a murderous fire and had finally defeated four times his number. Field Marshals and Generals of Prussia, among them veterans who had studied the art of war on the great battle–fields of Europe, were struck with admiration at the daring and skill displayed at Buena Vista; and this admiration Baron Humboldt said, they expressed without reserve, freely, publicly, and everywhere. Amid the bitterness and malignity of the English Press, it was grateful to hear from such lips, that the leading military men of a military nation did justice to the intrepidity and firmness of our volunteers, and to the courage, skill, and high military talents of General Taylor: while Baron Humboldt's comments upon his dispatches and orders, and in fact upon all that related to him personally in the conduct of the war, were such as no American could listen to without feeling proud."

If anything can equal the recklessness with which the present Administration has exposed the lives of our gallant soldiers in Mexico, it is the effrontery with which it claims applause for every achievement which its own imbecility has been unable to paralyze. This trait, always prominent, has never been so fully exemplified as in the following passages from a late number of the Union, which had escaped our notice until we met with them in the Philadelphia North American:

"The administration at this moment presents itself before the people as having done, thus far, all that military policy and prowess could do to secure just and honorable peace. The events of the war seem almost to have obeyed our word of command."

Again, in the same paper:

"In estimating the glory of our arms, the people now feel, and have a right to feel, that the men charged by the voice of the nation with the maintenance of its rights and fame, have foreseen and provided for, and prepared beforehand the whole process and transaction of their recent noble triumph."

It is difficult to describe the unmitigated and unalloyed feelings of disgust and indignation with which every man, who has made himself acquainted with the progress of events during this war, must witness this attempt to pluck the laurel from the brows of our brave officers in Mexico, and transfer them to an Executive whose whole course has had a tendency to thwart their most wisely conceived plans, and to leave them continually exposed to the danger of defeat and destruction. Instead of thanking God that his imbecility has been productive of no worse consequences than the indefinite protraction of a war, which he boasted to complete in a few weeks – instead of blessing the fortune of the Republic, which secure to it, in the hour of danger appeal– instead of asking pardon for the past, and promising amendment for the future – the Executive of this country, without shame and without remorse, comes forward to claim credit for all that happened in spite of him – to wear the laurel which his neglect could not wither – to steal the soldier's hard earned glory, after his utmost efforts had failed to dim its lustre. To stigmatise such conduct as mean, would be to do it too much honor. Infamous would be a term far more appropriate.

In what manner, we venture to ask, has the Administration done "all that military prowess and policy could do to secure a just and honorable peace?" Such praise implies the personal performance of military achievements, and can be understood in no other sense. On what field, we ask, has the prowess of Mr. Polk been conspicuous? For what achievement, either of tactics or strategy, in the numerous battles and marches by which the war has been distinguished, are we indebted to his policy? Has his sword been found gleaming foremost in the fight? Have his councils directed the maneuvers of the intricate and bloody campaign? If he has ever been at the scene of action, he has kept the fact most profoundly secret. The public has believed him to be "snugly concocted" (to use the phrase of a Democratic friend) in the White House, two thousand miles from theatre of war quietly enjoying his twenty-five thousand annum, and never interfering, but to produce heart–burnings and disgust, among the gallant officers who have been fighting the battles of the country. The world has given him credit for converting the army into a sort of hospital, for the reception of his damaged favorites, whom he found it inconvenient or impossible to employ elsewhere, and for spending the greater part of his time in promoting this agreeable and ennobling amusement. If he has been otherwise engaged – if having made this war himself, he has magnanimously fought it out at the peril of his own life – if his policy and prowess have been so conspicuous as he tells us – it is due to himself – it is due to the public – it is due to justice, and to history, to say what field has been the theater of his martial exploits – what corps has witnessed the display of his valor – what success is due to his military councils. Let him recollect that the credit of organizing and directing alone, is no longer claimed for him; his prowess is openly spoken of by his organ, and he public has a right to know where he earned a title to the praise.

So much for the "prowess and policy" of Mr. Polk – We now come to that portion of the eulogy in which the people are warned to remember that the Administration has "foreseen, and provided for, and prepared beforehand the whole process and transaction of their recent noble triumph." This is high praise, certainly, and if it were true would doubtless entitle Messrs Polk and Marcy to be ranked with Carnot and Bonaparte. Let us toast its verity by the unfailing crucible of fact.

In the summer of 1846, Gen. Scott, being desired to lay before the Executive such a plan as he thought most efficient for the speedy termination of the war, obeyed the instruction. His plan was precisely such as that afterwards indicated by Gen. Taylor in his celebrated letter to Gen. Gaines. It was not only consistent with common sense, but it had in its favor, we had been told, the united testimony of all the military men in the army who's opinions were worth asking. Does Mr. Polk suppose that the people have forgotten the manner in which his plan was received by the Administration, and the whole host of its hireling presses from Maine to Texas? Have the storm vituperation that followed it – the denunciation of its author – the insinuation even that he, whose noble courage on the field of Bridgewater was the admiration of Europe and America, was afraid or unwilling to meet the enemy – have all these things slipped the memory of the Executive? – Has it been blind to the fact, likewise, that every step of the war was justified – aye! Justified most triumphantly – the genus and forethought of the General whom it ungenerously sought to crush, because it believed that in doing so it was removing a rival? And is it not ashamed of this effort to seal the honor of a man whom it attempted, without success, to destroy?
But what has been the course of the Administration since the rejection of that plan, and the attempted disgrace of its author. Has it always furnished means to prosecute war? Have men always been found when they were wanting? Has the army never suffered anything for supplies and munitions? Has it undergone no exposure but what was inseparable from the condition of war? Let the indignant letter of Gen. Taylor answer. Let the fact that after the battle of Monterey, he was found without the means of transportation sufficient to justify a march in front answer. Let his inaction at Saltillo – let his contest at Buena Vista with five times his force – let the fact that he was pushed forward, with a handful of men, far from his resources – in the midst of an enemy’s country – without reinforcements – let his inaction for six months after a glorious victory answer.

Was the matter mended, after General Scott had been a second time called to head the army? The public has not forgotten, if Mr. Polk has, that even before General Scott left New Orleans, he complained bitterly, that the Administration had neglected to redeem its pledge, solemnly given, to furnish every thing necessary for the prosecution of the war. Nor has it ceased to remember the delay of the operations at Vera Cruz, all caused by the want of the most necessary munitions, and all due to the criminal imbecility of the Federal Administration. The same public very well knows, that since that period, even after the glorious victory of Cerro Gordo, our army has been suffered to waste away by disease and inaction – to have its supplies cut off by a hostile population rising in its rear – to delay its march until its enemy could recover from the stunning effect of Cerro Gordo – and after all, when only six thousand strong at the gates of Mexico – to encounter twenty-five or thirty thousand Mexicans, infuriated with the prospect of beholding their capital the prey of an invading army – fighting on their very hearths, in sight of all they loved and for all they held dear – stimulated by every passion that can inflame the human breast, to slaughter their enemy, whose inaction had afforded them their only chance of making head against him. And shall the people, in view of all these occurrences, the hearts of many of them still bleeding from the loss of friends at Churubusco, which might have been the Administration, be called on to kiss the hand that has smitten them, and even sing hosannas to its praise?

The boast of Mr. Polk is simply this. That he has exposed an American Army for months to all the failures of inaction and disease, and at the end of that time to the bayonets of five times its own number.

From the Washington Union of Wednesday night we copy the following paragraphs:

"Letters have been received from the campo of General Taylor, who was then near Monterey. The General had made the necessary arrangements for carrying out his late general order for sending the troops he could spare to Vera Cruz, to join the column of General Scott. In addition to the troops which he kept upon his line of defense, he had detained the light battery of Captain Deas, to strengthen his line. A mixed force of dragoons and Texans was employed in clearing the country between Camargo and Monterey of the roving guerrillas.

"Reports are renewed of the General's intention to visit the United States; but he does not yet mention such an intention in his recent dispatches."

La Patria, of New Orleans, deriving its information of course through Mexican channels, gives us some apparently authentic information in regard to the origin of the proposition from the armistice between Generals Scott and Santa Anna. Immediately after the battle, it says, Senor Arrangoiz, formerly Mexican Consul at New Orleans, and Mr. Mackintosh, acting Consul General of Great Britain, went under flag of truce to visit Gen. Scott, and after a visit, it is said, his agents, represented to Gen. Scott that he was disposed and anxious to enter into negotiations for peace, but that his situation hindered him from taking the first step, on account of the opposition of the people; but that if Gen. S. would propose an armistice, he would enter into negotiations with Mr. Trist, and that he was confident he could put an end to the war. We have no doubt this statement is in substance true.

The Enquirer has not yet noticed the emphatic affirmation of "A Plain Democrat," in New Orleans Courier, that Gen. Taylor is not only a decided Whig, but that his antipathy to Locofocoism is actually inveterate. Well, here is "more of the same sort," which we hope will be satisfactory to all doubters. The Lexington (Ky.) Gazette, giving an account of the late meeting in that city, to consider the expediency of nominating Gen. Taylor, informs us that Gen. Coombs said "he had spent a week with Gen’l Taylor in the South, had conversed with him upon all political questions at issue in the contest of 1844, and found him a good Whig."
Friday, October 8, 1847, RWv24i81p2c4 A Soldier's Letter  words: 1710

A Soldiers Letter – The following letter from Gen. Pierce is one of the most interesting that we have yet seen, from the army in Mexico, inasmuch as it gives more of individual experience – enables the reader to fix his eye upon a single figure amid the struggling mass, and so obtain a clearer idea of what a battle is. The letter was not intended for publication, as will be readily perceived, but it fell somehow into the hands of our friend of the Boston Post, and he, very properly as we think, has made it public:–

Mexsoque, Mexico, Aug. 27, 1847.

Since I left Vera Cruz to this hour I have had no means of communicating with the States. Although but a few months in the service, I know what are fatigue, anxiety and exposure. Contrary to my expectations, and contrary to my orders from the Department at Washington, I was compelled, for the want of the requisite provisions for transportation, to remain for more than three weeks at Vera Cruz, and for more than four in Terra Caliente, (the vomito region, as it is called.) I left the dreaded city on the 10th of July, which, when closed up, extended more than two miles.

On the 6th of August I reached Puebla, without the loss of a single wagon, with my command in fine condition, – My command was attacked six times on the march, but with trifling loss on our side. The National Bridge afforded the enemy great natural advantages, to which they added breastworks on a high bluff which commanded the bridge perfectly; across the main bridge they had also thrown a barricade. I soon discover that there was no way in which his position could be turned, and that my artillery was ineffective from the most commanding point where it could be placed. I determined, of course, to cross under the plunging fire of the enemy’s escopetas. My order to advance was admirably executed. At the moment Lt. Colonel Bonham’s battalion rushed forward with a shout, the enemy poured down a heavy fire, by which several of my men were severely wounded. Col. Bonham’s horse was shot near me, and a ball passed through the rim of my hat in very disagreeable proximity to my face. Our men leaped the barricade, followed by Capt. Dupera’s company of cavalry, in less than ten minutes the enemy were in flight in every direction, and the American flag waved upon the high bluff which they had occupied.

The Mexican force, as they said afterwards, consisted of 500 men. Had they possessed courage and skill in the use of arms our loss must have been very great. You can hardly conceive the strength of the natural defenses of the road over which we passed. Rumors came to me almost every night that we would be attacked by large forces the next day, but they made no where anything like a brave and stern resistance. The official reports of the great battle of Mexico will probably reach you as soon as this letter, and I shall therefore not attempt to give the minute details in this war. The battle differed in many respects from that of Buena Vista. There Gen. Taylor received the enemy in a strong position selected by himself. Our forces on the 20th consisted of less than nine thousand men; the Mexican force, within supporting distance and engage, undoubtedly exceeding thirty thousand. We attacked him in position upon ground of his own selection, admirably fortified. You will distinguish, so far as numbers are concerned, between the battle of the morning and that of the afternoon, although spoken of in official reports as one engagement under the designation of “the battle of Mexico.” We took during the day, thirty-five pieces of artillery – an immense quantity of ammunition – eight hundred mules and horses, and more than two thousand prisoners among them eight generals and any number of colonels.

The Mexican loss in killed and wounded must have been immense. Our troops buried 500 Mexicans upon the field of battle commenced in the morning at Contreras, and the loss in the afternoon was much greater. Our loss has been heavy. With this small army we could not afford to purchase many such victories at such a price; one of the regiments of my brigade (the 13th) lost in killed and wounded one third its entire force. In killed and wounded we number not less than 1000, and among them I lament to say an unusual portion if valuable officers. The New England regiment suffered severely, and behaved throughout in the most gallant manner. My horse, at full speed on the evening of the 19th, when leading my brigade though a perfect shower of round shot and shells, fell under me upon a ledge of rocks, by which I sustained a severe injury by the shock and bruises, but especially by a severe sprain in my left knee, which came under him.– At first I was not conscious of any serious injury, but soon became exceedingly faint, when Dr. Ritchie, surgeon of the 12th, [a portion of my command], who was following the advancing columns closely, administered to me as well as he could under the circumstances. In a few moments I was able to walk with difficulty, and pressed forward to Capt. McGruder’s battery where I found the horse of poor gallant Lt. Johnson, who had just received a mortal wound, of which he died that evening. I was permitted to take him [my own having been totally disabled] was helped into the saddle, and continued in it until 11 o’clock that night.

It was exceedingly dark, the rain poured in torrents, and being separated from my servants and baggage, I was without tent or covering; add to this, that during the afternoon of the 19th we had gained no advantages over the enemy, who remained firmly entrenched with 7000 men opposed to about 4000 on our side, without the possibility of bringing our artillery to bear, and you will readily conceive that our situation was not the most agreeable. The morning of the 20th was, however, as brilliant as the night of the 19th was dark and gloomy. Soon after daylight the enemy’s works were carried with the bayonet, and of their 7000 men, regular troops, under the command of Valencia, probably 4000 cannot be found to-day. As we passed this field in pursuit of the fugitives, the scene was morning of the 20th, thanks to the bad position which we occupied, and to the neglect to counteract the movements
the valor and decision with which they were ready to sacrifice their lives in defense of their nationality; but on the

could be said by few officers in my command; for almost all were obliged at some point of the march in consequence of the change of climate, water, exposure, &c., to avail themselves of the ambulance. Col. Watson, with him Marine quarters, and my sprained knee, which was by far my most serious injury, has been daily improving and to–day I ride without much inconvenience. I have lost several dear friends, although our acquaintance had been of short duration. I visited the hospital yesterday, and saw officers and men with shots in all parts of their person. Although all who had lost limbs in high spirits, still I sickened at the sight.

In my judgment the army, full of ardor and confidence, was humanely and wisely restrained. Major Gen.
Quitman, Gen. Persifor F. Smith and myself were appointed ambassadors to meet the Mexican commissioners to settle the terms of the armistice. I had not taken off my spurs or slept an hour for two nights, in consequence of my engagements and the pain of my knee. I obeyed the summons, was helped into my saddle, and road two and a half miles to Tacubaya, where the commission assembled at the house of Mr. McIntosh, the British consul general. Our conference commenced late in the afternoon, and at four o'clock the next morning, the articles were signed.

That I was thoroughly exhausted you will readily imagine. I slept an hour or two that morning at Gen. Worth's quarters, and my sprained knee, which was by far my most serious injury, has been daily improving and to–day I ride without much inconvenience. I have lost several dear friends, although our acquaintance had been of short duration. I visited the hospital yesterday, and saw officers and men with shots in all parts of their person. Although all who had lost limbs in high spirits, still I sickened at the sight.

My general health is good. I have been either in my saddle or on my feet every rod since I left Vera Cruz, which can be said by few officers in my command; for almost all were obliged at some point of the march in consequence of the change of climate, water, exposure, &c., to avail themselves of the ambulance. Col. Watson, with him Marine Corps, accompanied me, and has been uniformly well. He is an excellent, agreeable gentleman, and admirable officer, and I regret that having been left with Gen. Quitman's division at San Augustine, he had no opportunity to participate in the battles of the 19th and 20th.

Now a word with regard to the great object of this war – peace. There is no doubt that Santa Anna is sincerely desirous of peace. Commissioners to treat have been appointed, and met Mr. Trist this afternoon at four. My belief is that peace will be the result, although no man can speak with confidence.

Tlalpan, August 28, 1847

Excellent Sir – On the 19th of this month, at about between 12 and 1 o'clock, the enemy made an attack on the position which the army occupied on the height of Contreras. Immediately an active fire opened upon him from cannon and muskets, as fast as he showed himself at the points defended by our troops, and we succeeded in checking him at all points until night put an end to the conflict. During this time all ranks of the army gave proof of the valor and decision with which they were ready to sacrifice their lives in defense of their nationality; but on the morning of the 20th, thanks to the bad position which we occupied, and to the neglect to counteract the movements made by the enemy to surround us, we were beaten at all points by a force exceeding 6000 men; and 3000 infantry, which were stationed at one point, were cut off from our main body.

As soon as I observed the dispersion of our forces I endeavored to check it Crying “Victory in Mexico,” and sounding the signal of attack, I succeeded for a moment in rallying our troops, and ordered Gen. Don. Anssatsia Torrejon to make a charge with his cavalry; but this chief, far from obeying my orders, fled like a coward, and the cavalry, followed his example, trampled down the infantry in their flight and completed our defeat.

It would appear ridiculous to recommend those who took a part in the unfortunate engagement; nevertheless I must inform your Excellency of the valor of the chiefs and their officers who, in the midst of the confusion, deavored to rally their troops in order to resist the enemy, who was pursuing us with vigor. Their conduct in permitting themselves to be made prisoners rather than abandon their soldiers will always confer honor on them, and on this account I believe them entitled to the consideration of the Supreme Government and to the gratitude of their fellow–citizens.
His Excellency the general–in–chief, Don Gabriel Valencia, disappeared from among us at the commencement of the engagement of the 20th, and I am ignorant of his whereabouts. I thought it my duty to address your Excellency, and to send you a list of the chiefs and officers of my command who are now prisoners in this city; also a list of the wounded who are at San Angle; of those that I have thus far known to have been killed, and of those who were made prisoners in the battle of Churubusco.

All this I have the honor to communicate to your Excellency the President, and to represent to him the destitution in which the prisoners find themselves, as they have lost all they possessed, and as the American general has given an order that they shall be maintained by the inhabitants of this city which is in ruins. – They must therefore, perish from want unless the Government should grant them the relief to which they are so much entitled and which their situation imperiously demands.

I present to your Excellency my respect and particular esteem.

JOSE MARIANO SALAS

To Gen. Don Antonio Lopez De Santa Anna, President of the Republic of Mexico and General–in–Chief of the Army.

San Angel, August 26, 1847

Excellent Sir – In compliance with the orders of your Excellency, I took the command of the troops at Churubusco on the evening of the 18th inst. and immediately set about completing the fortifications with activity, as the position at the points facing the west and the south was entirely defenseless, and availed myself of the services of Capt. Don Francisco Palafox to construct the most important and urgently required works.

On the evening of the 19th I received instructions from your Excellency to send to the hacienda of San Antonio the battalions of the National Guard, Hidalgo and Victoria, which I did without delay, and which left to garrison Churubusco the National Battalions of Independence and Bravo.

On the morning of the 20th a 4–pouner with the necessary appurtenances, arrived, and I ordered it to be placed into the “red ente” – [we are ignorant of the signification of this word, and cannot find it in any of our dictionaries] which was on the road to Coyoacan, detaching at the same time 150 men of the Independencia, to occupy the church of that village and watch the enemy. A short time after this I received an order to proceed to this place [to San Angle, where the dispatch was written,] with all the forces under my command, leaving at Churubusco a small garrison; but immediately afterwards I received a counter order (no doubt owing to the unexpected events which had occurred at the height of the Pedregal) on account of which I deemed it prudent to keep at Churubusco, under arms, all my forces.

But a short time elapsed when the commander of the artillery, Don Martin Carrera, with six pieces of artillery if various caliber arrived, which I ordered immediately to be placed in battery on the road to Coyoacan, in the embrasures of the center and oriente which commands the road to San Antonio.

At this moment Gen. Don Francisco Perez passed through Churubusco at the head of his brigade, following the road to the hacienda of Portales, according to the orders of your Excellency; and shortly after your Excellency separated from us the rear guard of that brigade passed us in disorder, resulting from the proximity of the enemy, who sheltering himself behind the mud–houses, farms and fruit trees, was advancing on our lines.

The peremptory refusal of Mexico to acknowledge the claim of the United States to the strip of territory lying between the Nueces and the Rio Grande has led to the revival of the discussion in regard to the validity of that claim; although it is undeniable and undeniable that the most influential leaders of the Locofoco party – Benton, Ingersoll and others have themselves affirmed, in the most solemn manner, the right of Mexico to the valley of the Rio Grande, while Mr. Calhoun, without expressing a positive opinion upon that point, in his official capacity as Secretary of State, in a letter to the American Charge in Mexico, authorized him to say to that Government, that by the terms of the Tyler treaty of annexation, the boundary of Texas had been "left without specification, so that what the line should be might be an open question, to be fairly and fully discussed and settled according to the rights of each." And so, likewise, when, the treaty having been rejected, the advocates of "immediate" annexation, in their hot haste to accomplish that measure, violated the Constitution, by bringing into the Union foreign territory, by a joint resolution of Congress, even they, with all their disregard even of constitutional forms, were cautious enough not to claim the Rio Grande as the true boundary of Texas; but, admitting that the line was uncertain, declared that the State of Texas was to be formed subject to the adjustment by this Government of all questions of boundary that may arise with other Governments.”

The last Washington Union dedicates an elaborate argument to this subject; but it does not, as it cannot successfully, meet the true issue. The only ground that it assumes, and which it labors to establish, is, that all our early negotiators has asserted and demonstrated that the Texas which we obtained by purchase from France under the Louisiana treaty in 1803, and which, by the Florida treaty in 1819 we ceded to Spain, extended far west as the Rio Grande. Among the authorities adduced by the Union to establish this position is Mr. Benton! And yet, in Mr. Benton’s speech against the Tyler treaty, that gentleman emphatically said: “The real Texas which we acquired by the treaty of 1803, and flung away by the treaty of 1819, NEVER APPROACHED THE RIO GRANDE, except near its mouth, while the whole upper part was settled by the Spaniards, and a great part of it in the year 1694 – just one hundred years before La Salle first saw Texas. All this upper part was then formed into provinces, on both sides of the river, and has remained under Spanish or Mexican authority ever since.” No man in the Union, we venture to say is so thoroughly acquainted with this subject as Mr. Benton; for as early as 1819 he denounced the treaty by which Texas was bartered for Florida, and had even then, as his writings show, made it a subject of extensive and profound investigation. The truth is, the mere assertion of a title to territory in the process of adjusting a boundary, is the weakest possible evidence of the justice of the claim. Negotiators, like lawyers, are to be regarded rather as counsel employed to make out the best possible case, than as judges to decide agreeably to the rules of equity. What better evidence do we need of this than the fact, that not only our negotiators in the Oregon affair, but the President himself, in a communication to Congress, asserted, without qualification, our “clear and unquestionable” right to the line of 54 40, but nevertheless came at last to accept the line of 49?

But, let us, for the sake of argument, admit that the Texas ceded by France to the United States, and by the United States to Spain, did extend to the Rio Grande: What then? Was that the same Texas which achieved her independence at San Jacinto? Was it the same Texas which was annexed to this Confederacy? It is not a fact, admitted and incontrovertible, that, as a member of the Mexican Confederacy, Texas was shorn of her ancient limits? Then, upon the formation of a new States, the Nueces was, by law and by common consent established as the boundary line between the Mexican Department of Texas on the one side, and Tamaulipas, New Leon and Coahuila on the other? It is pretended, that, west of the Nueces, with the exception of the little village of Corpus Christi, “immediately at its mouth, the jurisdiction of the Republic of Texas had ever been acknowledged by the inhabitants residing in the valley of the Rio Grande? It is not true, on the other hand, that between the river and the Nueces, when Gen. Taylor moved from Corpus Christi, the people were all Mexicans, governed by Mexican officers, and under the rule of Mexican laws? Why, to say nothing of the fact that these people all fled at the approach of the American army, there was a Mexican custom–house at Point Isabel, which was burnt on Gen. Taylor’s approach. If this territory belonged to us, why did Mr. Polk permit it to remain in the quiet and undisturbed possession of Mexico – why did he permit the custom house to remain upon “American Soil,” exacting duties upon our trade – for so long a period after annexation had been consummated? Would he have permitted it at Galveston? If not, why did he sanction it at Point Isabel? But one answer can be given to this question: He knew that Galveston was a part of Texas that had been annexed, and he knew just as well that Point Isabel was not. If this be not so, then he was as criminally negligent of his duty in suffering “American Soil” to be held by the Mexican government, and duties to be collected thereon by Mexican officers, as he was culpable, if it be so, for taking possession of it in May 1846. From this dilemma he cannot escape. If we acquire a “clear and unquestionable” title of the valley of the Rio Grande by the annexation of Texas, he ought to have taken possession of it when the transfer of Texas was regularly made. If we acquired no such title, he ought not to have taken armed possession of it at all.

The Rio Grande may have been the true boundary line of the Texas acquired by us in 1819. On this point we express no opinion, because we have not that precise and accurate information on the subject which is necessary to the formation of a satisfactory one. But admit it to be so, and still it does not follow that it now belongs to the United States. Let us see: At the close of our Revolution the limits of Virginia extended very far west of its present boundary line. Suppose, in the march of events, Virginia should secede from the Union, and annex herself to a Southern Confederacy: would it not be absurd and preposterous in her to setup a claim to her ancient boundary, instead of that since established with her consent? And if Kentucky, Ohio, &c. &c. refused to secede with her, could the Southern Confederacy nevertheless claim those Commonwealths, because they could prove, by ancient title deeds, that they formerly constituted a part of Virginia? It has not been many years since Maine, now an independent State, was a part of the State of Massachusetts: In the event of the withdrawal of Massachusetts from the Union, and her annexation to the British Provinces in her vicinity, could she, with any semblance of propriety, carry Maine with her, against the consent of the people of the latter State, because foreshoof many years ago, the twain constituted a single State, known as Massachusetts? So of Vermont, which has come into existence as a separate State since he establishment of the American Confederacy: Could the State out of which Vermont was formed, reassert their former title to their ancient boundaries, which have been by their own consent obliterated, and new lines drawn? No one will contend for such absurdity. Just so with Texas. Even if Texas, as ceded to us by Spain, extended to the Rio Grande, since that cession was made radical changes has ensued. Mexico has herself thrown off the Spanish yoke, and, since the establishment of her independence, has, by the consent of those interested, created new Departments, and defined their respective boundaries. Whatever might have been the boundary line of ancient Texas, as a Department of Mexico, it extended no farther east than the Nueces for many years before and at the time of her successful revolution, and the establishment of her own independence; and when she relinquished her separate national existence by becoming a member of our own Confederacy, she could not, by a mere legislative act, which she never had the power to enforce, transfer with herself any portion of the territory belonging to the neighboring Mexican departments, which had never participated in her revolution, nor been for a moment after its successful termination subject to her jurisdiction.

If there is a question which admits of no dispute, we think this is that question. Whether it is desirable to extend the boundaries of Texas to the Rio Grande may admit of doubt; but that we had no title, when the war broke out to that territory, is to our minds as clear as that we had none to the city of Mexico herself. We say it may admit of a doubt whether it is really desirable to possess the valley of the Rio Grande. Mr. Benton tells us that it is not, and we have his authority for saying that Gen. Jackson concurred with him in that opinion; while Mr. Charles Jared Ingersoll affirms that it is not our "natural boundary," and of course he must believe that it is not therefore a desirable, just or "proper one". For our own parts we are inclined to concur with these eminent Locofoco authorities – though it is not improbable we shall be stigmatized as a "Mexican Whig," and strongly suspected of "moral treason" for adopting their sentiments. We hope, however, their cloaks are broad enough to shield us from imputations, which must affect these great Locofoco luminaries more seriously that ourselves– since we but light our taper at the fire they have kindled.

Col. James Riley, who was the Texan Minister to the United States in 1842, publishes in the Houston Telegraph a letter, in which he controverts the position taken by Mr. Tyler, in his late address to the public, that he (Riley) withdrew the application for the annexation of Texas to the United States. He says he had no instructions from the government of Texas to withdraw the proposition for annexation, and that he assuredly would not have done so on his own responsibility.

There is for reflection in the following extract of a letter from Washington to the New York Herald– a paper, as well as its correspondents, decidedly friendly to the Administration. We submit it without comment.:

"Mr. Trist proposed the Rio Grande, thence a line across to the River Gila, say latitude 33 North. This river runs thence westward from the Rocky Mountain chain, or southwest to the Colorado, near its mouth, at the head of the Gulf of California. Mr. Trist proposed to follow the Gulf down to the sea to the tropic of cancer, or about the latitude of 23 degrees north, so that in addition to New Mexico and Alta California, we should acquire Lower California.

"Describe this Lower California:

"It is a peninsula lying between the Gulf of California and the Pacific, and is from twenty to fifty miles wide, and about five hundred miles in length, coastwise; said peninsula being almost entirely filled up with a range of barren mountains. There are, however, a number of harbors in this line on the Pacific; and besides this, the command of the Gulf of Colorado, and the River Gila, would give us a passage way for a railroad for the Rio Grande to the Gulf of California, and thence a steamers down the Gulf into the Pacific. Between the termination of the boundary of Mr.
Trist and the mouth of the Gulf in latitude 23 degrees and the latitude 42 degrees, the northern boundary of Mexico in the Pacific, we should acquire an additional line of coast on the Pacific of from twelve to fifteen hundred miles.

"And yet, for all practical purposes, a straight line, giving us the harbor of San Francisco, (which is north of 36, 30,) would give us all that is worth having on the coast of the Pacific, short of the absolute occupation of the whole of Mexico; because the construction of a railroad from the head of navigation of the Rio Grande across the mountains to the Gila, thence to the Gulf, would cost a moderate estimate, (the whole route being through a desert of mountains, rocks, and sands) for say 700 miles, not less than ($300,000,000) three hundred millions of dollars; consequently, it would never be built.

"As an ultimatum, therefore, the demand for Lower California and the Rio Grande was an unfortunate proposition, both for the object of a peace an for a good bargain"

"On the other hand, we find by the Delta, that the Executive Council, with the approbation of Santa Anna, gave in the instructions to their commanders, and order requiring them to demand the application of the Wilmot Proviso to the territories ceded to the United States, and substantially their plan of a treaty embraced this future.

"The fact is, this was with Mexico, originated in a profound ignorance of the geography, the topography, the soil, the climate, and the capabilities of the countries of New Mexico and the Californians.

"They were thought to be a perfect paradise, where all the fruits of every country under heaven grew spontaneously, and only required the gathering.

"Of course, such a country would pay for a war, and even a long and bloody war, and all the attendant stupendous expenses, however large.

"But what is the fact? Surveys, explorations, marches, examinations, and eighteen months occupations of New Mexico and California, Upper and Lower, have resolved those territories into part and parcel of a bona fide African
The great body of these territories never will be worth one dollar to the square mile while the sun shines.

Hence, we are astonished that Mr. Trist should propose to take a large slice of them, not in indemnity for the war provoked by Mexico, as the only means of payment she has to give, but as a purchase, at fifteen or twenty millions of dollars, to be paid to Mexico! We are astonished the more at the idea that Lower California is worth buying! It would be a dead cost to the government of half a million a year, in light houses, petty collectors with nothing to do, and Indian agents.

In one word, for the present, we know not which was the most absurd, the stipulations of Mr. Trist, or the propositions from the Mexican Commissioners!

Among the anxious inquirers, who have endeavored to extract from Gen. Taylor his opinions upon questions of national policy, the reader will remember the name of Dr. Edward Delony of Louisiana. We find in the proceedings of a Locofoco District Convention recently held in Louisiana, to nominate a candidate for Congress, the following among other resolutions reported by the aforesaid Dr. Delony, from which we infer that Gen. Taylor's letter was not at all satisfactory to him. He hoped to find the General a Locofoco, like himself, no doubt, and being disappointed, he thus strikes at him:

Resolved, That, in view of the next Presidency, we hold it as one of the fundamental principles of our Democratic faith, that every aspirant for that high office is bound, by the nature and character of our free institutions, and the right of the people to demand them, to declare his political principles and opinions, when called upon to do so, and that we will not yield our support to any individual who disregards such right, or who, in answering, is opposed to the principles of the republican faith.

Resolved, That we approve of a National Democratic Convention, to be hold in the city of Baltimore, on the second Monday in May, 1848, to nominate candidates for President and Vice President of the United States.

Dr. Delony was himself accordingly appointed a Delegate to the National Convention.

By the arrival of the U.S. transport schooner Heroine yesterday, from Brazos Santiago, which place she left on the 23rd, we have the Matamoros Flag of the 22nd, from which we obtain the following intelligence.

Since Col. Hays arrived, says the Flag, he has learned that the portion of his regiment constituting the late command of Major Chevallie, and now at Saltillo, is not to join him, but remain with Gen. Wool. It is also intimated that Lieut. Col. Bell’s present command, two companies, left at San Antonio, will not be withdrawn from Texas. If so, Col. Hays will have only five companies of his regiment under his immediate command. Major Chevallie, who is supposed had resigned in order to join Col. Hays, as the presumptions was that there would be more active service on Gen. Scott’s line, is a passenger on the Heroine.

The whole of Gen. Cushing’s brigade, also ordered to Gen. Scott’s line, had arrived from above, and was encamped at Palo Alto. The brigade was reported to be in good health. Transports were looked for daily at the Brazos, and as soon as they arrived, the brigade would move down the embark.

Mrs. Ferguson, who it was first reported was not dangerously injured by the explosion of the steamer Lama, died on the 17th, of internal injuries caused by inhaling the scalding steam at the time of the explosion.

We copy the subjoined paragraph from the Flag of the 22nd:

Wanton Murders— On Monday last two Mexicans were shot in the public street by a cowardly ruffian named Thomas McLaughlin, of the Texas Cavalry. We have not heard the full particulars, but it is said to have been a most wanton act, and without the slightest provocation. It caused the greatest indignation in the regiments to which he was attached, and we are gratified to hear that they rendered prompt aid in having the murder arrested. He is not in custody, and we hope that his punishment may be such as the nature of his crime calls for. It is time for the strong arm of the law to be put forth—punishment must follow crime. It sickens us to record such acts, and we trust that the authorities will show that they cannot be committed with impunity. Let it not be urged that the man was drunk. Drunkenness is no excuse for crime— it should make the offense greater.
The copy of the Diario del Gobierno containing a brief account of the battle of El Rey, fought on the 8th, in which it was represented that our troops were ultimately forced to retire to Tacubaya, after suffering a loss in killed and wounded of 1000, has been received by Urrea and the Governor of Tamaulipas, and we find in the Matamoros Flag the following letter from the former:

Tula, September 14, 1847:

To his Excellency, the Governor of Tamaulipas: The Supreme National Government having declined the propositions of the America Minister, as being exorbitant, hostilities were renewed, and on the 8th our troops gave a severe lesson to the hateful invaders, heroically repulsing their assaults and driving them to their positions. I enclose for your information a copy of an editorial in the Diario of the same date.

This event has produced an extraordinary enthusiasm in the capital of the Republic, the defense of which, I have no doubt, will be heroic and grand, although the American army may besiege it on all sides.

Providence is satisfied with or sufferings, and the days of glory and consolation commence to dawn upon the Republic.

I congratulate this government on so brilliant an event, and supplicate you to announce this to the people of Tamaulipas, in a proper manner.

Accept my attentive consideration:

God and Liberty
Jose Urrea

The probability is that this intelligence, and the difficulties which there is reason to suppose Gen. Scott found in taking the capital, will inspire the Mexicans with new hopes. We have recently had an account of a bold attack upon Mier by a guerrilla party, and it will not astonish us soon to hear that the valley of the Rio Grande again swarms with guerrillas, especially since the enemy must know how weak we are on that line. The Matamoros Flag of the 22nd, speaking of the reported victory of El Rey, says:

“The latest rumor which has reached us is, that the Mexicans, inspired by the news of Gen. Scott’s repulse at the capital, are flying to arms throughout the country and determined to be in at the extermination. Three thousand are reported to be already embodied between here and Victoria. Guess there is upwards of considerable exaggeration in this report, but mischief may be prevented if the movements of the Mexicans are closely watched about this time.”

The Hamburg (S.C.) Journal publishes the following letter from Capt. Bragg, giving an account of the late fortunately unsuccessful attempt to assassinate him:

Camp near Monterrey,
Aug. 26, 1847

An attempt was made about 2 a.m., night before last, to assassinate me in my bed. I have no clue to the perpetrator, and can suggest no reason for the act. My escape without injury, is regarded as almost miraculous. As exaggerated accounts will probably reach the press, the truth may interest you. A twelve pound shell, heavily charged, was placed within two feet of my bed, just outside my tent, and exploded by a slow match; the fragments literally riddling my tent and bedding, pieces passing above and below me, some through a blanket spread over me, and yet I was not touched. I was not aware that I had an enemy in the world, and at times, fell disposed to believe now, that I may have been intended as a practical joke, by some fool ignorant of the effect of shells thus exploded. Be that as it may, my escape was almost miraculous, and I prefer not repeating the joke.”

The steamship Alabama, Capt. Windle, arrived at an early hour yesterday morning from Vera Cruz via Tampico. She left Vera Cruz on Sunday the 26th of September, and Tampico on the 30th.
We learn through a source entitled to great respect that in the recent battles of the 8th and 13th the American army had twenty-seven officers killed and forty-five wounded. Capt. Cady, of the 6th Infantry, was among the killed. We have no confirmation whatever of the death of any of our generals.

By the arrival we have no later new direct from Gen. Scott’s headquarters, but we learn that letters have been received by commercial houses in Tampico, from their correspondents in the city of Mexico, confirming entirely our former reports of the barrel of Mil del Rey and Chapultepec heights on the 8th and 13th of September, in which Gen. Scott carried the place at the point of bayonet.

It appears from the following circular that Gen. Santa Anna determined at once, upon the conclusion of the battle of the 13th, to abandon the capital. The verbal report is that he retired to Guadalupe, which is scarcely three miles from the capital, with 10,000 troops and twenty-five pieces of artillery. The accuracy of the letter from Orizaba to Mr. Diamond, and published in this paper, is thus confirmed. The letter made the date of Scott’s command of the capital September 13th, and made no mention of the bombardment of the 14th and 15th, which was so extensively circulated by other papers. Santa Anna evacuated the city expressly to avoid such a bombardment. Our formal entry may not have been made for a day or two, but the city was at our mercy on the 13th.

A CIRCULAR TO THE COMMANDANTS GENERAL OF THE DEPARTMENTS
Guadalupe Hidalgo, Sept. 14, 1847

Most Excellent Sir– After the important and great events that have yesterday taken place, there remains no other alternative to the government of the union, than that of abandoning the capital, in order that other means be adopted and pursued for the harassing of the enemy. Accordingly, his excellency of the integral Republic orders me to inform you, in order that through you, the honorable Congress of the State over which you preside, may know it, that his excellency is firmly resolved to prosecute military operations against the invaders. And that whatever be the consequences resulting from the war, yet his Excellency is determined to wage it in every possible manner, and be every attainable means. A heroic resistance was made in the capital, for the space of six days, but at length established himself in places and positions from which his missiles and projectiles could reach the peaceful thousands of the city, then the supreme government seeing the state of affairs to be such as warranted their departure, changed their abode; and very soon I will have the pleasure of announcing to your excellency the site upon which it will fix, which at present is impossible for me to do, as it accompanies the army, and as yet is not agreed upon the resistance of the Supreme Power of the nation. But as soon as the latter is known, I will give your Excellency a detailed account of everything that has occurred; but now I shall confine myself to the single following statement. The American army charged yesterday at daybreak, with all its force upon Chapultepec, which, after a spirited defense of six hours yielded at last to the attack of the enemy, who immediately marched to take possession of a fortification situated between the centry–box of Belen and St. Thomas, St. Como and the citadel. The first advance was checked by the troops his Excellency the President led up, disputing the ground inch by inch, till finally the invader was routed from the citadel, after nine hours hard fighting. The capital being in this situation. His Excellency was anxious to avoid a bombardment, and to spare it the tumult and confusion attendant upon an assault which would have given room for a thousand calamities, and a repetition of those acts in which the army of the foe has manifested so instinctive a spirit of extermination.

His Excellency the President of the Republic hopes that your Excellency will endeavor to preserve and reanimate the public spirit, in order that the war may be carried on with that vigor and energy which the national honor and the rights of the Republic so imperiously demand.

By this letter which we give below from our Vera Cruz correspondent, it will be seen that Gen. Lane has been compelled to send back for a supply of ammunition. Upon an inspection which was instituted upon receiving a rumor that the guerrillas had occupied Cerro Gordo, it was found that he had but eight or nine rounds of cartridges!

Our correspondent, to whose letter we must refer for a variety of details, mentions a rumor that Gen. Santa Anna has resigned the Presidency, and speaks of a proclamation to that effect, which we have not yet seen. We attach little confidence to the stand said to have been made by the guerrillas at Cerro Gordo. Now that they are deprived of the National Bridge as a rallying point, they will of course occupy the most eligible ground higher up on the road, but they will readily be dislodged by a force like that under Gen. Lane.

Capt. White’s company of Louisiana volunteers, and two companies of the 11th infantry, left Tampico on the 28th of September for Vera Cruz.

We regret to perceive that Lieut. Kline, of Capt. Lewis’ company of Louisiana volunteers, had been shot by the guerrillas.

The Sun of Anahuac has been suspended, and it devolves upon me to furnish you with what may transpire in the local line as far as I am able to do so, although nothing of real importance has taken place since the departure of the James L. Day. She was hardly under way before a report reached the city that the Vergara camp was attacked by guerrillas, and that they had put to the sword all the Americans who occupied it. Of course there was a general rush to the gates, and the house tops were covered with citizens eager to witness the fray, but it soon ended in smoke, no attack having been made, although it is positively stated that a considerable body of the enemy were seen within a few hundred yards of the camp on the sand hills.

The information that I sent you yesterday, that Gen. Scott had entered Mexico, has been fully confirmed today; with but few additional particulars; but you shall have all that are authentic, leaving the rumors to take care of themselves.

It appears that on the 15th, the Americans charged and carried the Citadel, and immediately turned all the guns of the fortification on the city. About 12 o’clock at night, all the Mexican Army retreated upon Guadalupe.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs addressed the Civil Governor, directing him to manage affairs as well as he could, until he should receive official information as to where the Government should be established. From what I can learn, the Mexicans will not stand another fight at present, and we may therefore look for temporary tranquility.

The only portion of the news that is not confirmed, is Santa Anna being wounded, of which nothing is said in the address which reached us today.

It is reported that Gen. Quitman is on the way down with dispatches, and has 4000 men with him. If this be the case, he has no doubt been induced to take so large a force from the fact that Paredes is near Puebla with 6000 men; but I can hardly understand how Gen. Scott could have spared so many men after the severe losses which he must have suffered.

We have all sorts of reports about a small detachment that left here the day after the departure of Gen. Lane’s command to overtake him, but as I do not consider any of them authentic I will not recapitulate the rumors.

Col. Wilson was taken very ill yesterday evening, and the duties of Governor consequently devolve upon Lieut. Col. D.S. Miles, who is au fait in such manners, and everything connected with the Department will be sure to be conducted as it should be. I forgot to mention in my last that Lieut. Arthur, adjutant of the 1st Infantry, was thrown for his horse last Sunday, and severely though not dangerously hurt, but he is doing quite well.

I neglected also to mention in my last that your express man informed me that Mr. Kendall had sent down four other couriers since he left Puebla, none of whom have reached here.

The New York Courier and Enquirer, which has been always decidedly belligerent in its tone towards Mexico, and whose views have so often been copied with approbation by the Washington Union, goes farther in condemning the rejection of the Mexican proposition to make the “miserable strip of country lying between the Nueces and the Rio Grande,” neutral ground, than any other paper we have seen. The Courier and Enquirer thinks, as we do, that in obtaining from Mexico the cession of California down to latitude 37 north, we shall secure all that we ought really to covet. “Such a line (says that paper) would give us every foot of territory on the Pacific which is necessary to us, or desirable, and would include even Monterey, as well as the magnificent bay of San Francisco; while on the Gulf coast it would give us all that any reasonable person can desire.” The Courier, therefore, thinks that Mr. Trist committed an error in not at once closing with this proposition; but that paper will perceive, from the indignant manner in which the Union denies, in the face of the positive declaration of the Mexican commissioners, that Mr. Trist even asked for time to consult his Government as to the admissibility of this proposition, that he had not discretion in the premises, and that, had he made a treaty on that basis, it would have been annulled by the Washington Cabinet. Indeed, we take it for granted, if Mr. Trist did ask for time to communicate with the State Department, that he was disposed to accede to the proposition, and that he would have done so had his instructions permitted him so to do. He would scarcely otherwise have proposed the prolongation of the armistice forty-five days for this purpose, and subjected himself to the imputation, which has been already hypothetically cast upon him, by the Executive Organ, of being a “Mexican Whig.” And is such shall turn out to have been the fact, it will show, by the Union’s own declaration, that Mr. Polk has displayed as little sagacity in selecting a negotiator ashen did in instructing Com. Conner to give Santa Anna a free passage to Vera Cruz.

While the Cabinet, however, will hardly adopt the suggesting of our New York contemporary, by sending “a new commissioner to Mexico, with full power to accept of the terms which Mr. Trist has rejected,” we are gratified a course which it is unfortunate met with no favor when it was first suggested by Gen. Taylor, and was afterwards recommended by Mr. Calhoun. This policy will require comparatively a small force, for sure we are that Mexico will never attack us, as she forbore to attack even Texas; but if, on the other hand, we are to continue a war of extermination for the purpose of punishing the Mexicans for refusing to cede to us 696,000 square miles, or one-half of their territory, we must at once proceed to bring into the field a hundred thousand men, and prepare ourselves for an expenditure, before the close of the war, of from three to five hundred millions of dollars. Whether the people, who are to do the fighting; and to bear the taxation, will deem it wise to incur this expenditure of money and life, for the pleasure of hearing, every week or two, that a Mexican city has been battered down, and thousands of men, women and children have been blown into the air, or cut down by the sword, and with the ultimate prospect, the war being over, of seeing the Indians, Negroes, and half-breeds of Mexico annexed to the Union, and Santa Anna, Ampudia, Arista, Armijo, etc., etc. making laws for us at Washington "remains to be seen," as Mr. Polk said when he endeavored to show that Santa Anna's return to Mexico, by his permission, notwithstanding his belligerent attitude, might contribute to the restoration of peace!

The last New Orleans Picayune publishes a letter from the camp at Buena Vista, dated the 28th of August, which represents everything there as unsupportable dull- the troops doing nothing, and have no prospect of doing anything.

Maj. Chevallie has resigned his command of the battalion of Texas rangers, with a view, it is said, of assuming the same rank as Hay's regiment. Lots of resignations are being tendered, owing to the prospect of remaining active.

We copy the following extract from a letter of the 29th;

August 29th– Since writing the above letter intelligence has been received here from the Mexican authorities in Saltillo that five Americans have been killed at a small town some distance from S. They were either deserters or discharged wagoneer's, and had been committing a great many outrages in the neighborhood, stealing from the inhabitants all they could lay their hands on, even the horses and saddles. At some place on the Monclova road they were attacked, five killed and two taken prisoners. An investigation will be made in the affair, and I hope, for the sake of example, it may turn out that they were deserters. A party was sent out last evening to bring in the prisoners. Since closing the last paragraph the party that was sent out for the two men have returned and brought them in from Campana, a pretty little town on the north of the Saltillo and Monterey road, in the valley east of the former place, and about fifteen miles off. One of them deserted on the 24th from the Texas camp, and the other was a discharged teamster. They started in company with seven others for Texas via Monclova, and according to their own account had committed numerous depredations upon the route. When about fifty miles from Saltillo they stopped at a ranch for breakfast, and the inhabitants collected about them and charged one of the party with having a stolen horse. He asserted that he had exchanged it at a rancho they had passed; but not crediting the story, the Mexicans sent back to the designated place to ascertain the truth. After the party came out from their breakfast they found a collection of Mexicans assembled from the various ranchos in the neighborhood, and as they went towards their horses they were attacked by them. Four of the Americans were killed, (two of whom were artillery deserters), when these two men made their escape and got into the mountains. At night their horses became broken down and they were compelled to leave them, and wandered about till morning, when they found themselves within about 15 miles of the rancho where they had been attacked. They were subsequently discovered and taken by a party of Mexicans, who were about to shoot them, but one Mexican persuaded them not to do so, and they were taken before the judge, who appeared to be friendly to them and sent them off under a guard of two men, as he said, toward Saltillo. When they arrived at Campana they were again detained until our party arrived for them. What ultimate disposition will be made of them I do not know, but at present they will remain as prisoners under charge of the provost guard.

Scott's Demeanor in Battle– A correspondent of the N.O. Delta thus writes of Gen. Scott's demeanor in battle;

"Gen. Scott, at the head of our army, during the engagement received a slight wound in the leg, and what is very remarkable, no person whatever except himself was aware of it until the battle was over. A great deal has been said and written in reference to the ability of Gen. Scott as a military man, but those who have not seen him in command and under fire, cannot form any just conception of his abilities. His cool consideration of everything around him– his quick perception– his firm resolve and immediate execution– equal if they do not surpass those of any of the great generals whose deeds have been made so conspicuous in history."
The following letter from Major Lally was addressed to Col. Wilson at Vera Cruz, and by him forwarded to Adjutant General R. Jones, at Washington:

Headquarters Jalapa, Aug. 26, 1847.

To Gov. Wilson, Vera Cruz:

My command reached this place on the morning of the 20th. We have fought our way triumphantly every inch of the route, but have had severe contests—nay, battles— with the guerrillas: on the 10th at Paso Ovejas, (as before reported,) on the 12th August at Cerro Gordo, and on the 19th at Las Animas, only a mile and a half from this city. Not a wagon has fallen into the hands of the enemy. We have been opposed by at least 1,200 or 1,500 guerrillas on these occasions—perhaps least at the last, for they were badly whipped at Cerro Gordo, where their loss was so large that they could not reorganize. Farther Jarauta commanded them. Our loss is great. During the entire march—7 officers wounded; 12 of rank and file killed; 5 mortally wounded; 66 wounded. Of this number, 4 killed and 4 wounded were at places elsewhere than the four actions named above. I regret to say, that at National Bridge Mr. George Twiggs (expecting a commission, and to be A.D.C.to Gen. T.) was killed while gallantly serving in my staff; Capt. J.H. Calwell, of voltigeurs, and Capt. A.C. Cummings, 11th infantry, were wounded on the 10th, (as before reported.

A large number of sick have accumulated, besides our wounded; and we shall be compelled to remain here many days to recruit. I cannot too much praise the gallantry of the officers— the men, raw and uninstructed, have gradually acquired confidence. Col. Wynkoop arrived from Perote on the 24th, having heard we were in danger at Cerro Gordo. We waited three days for your reinforcement, and hearing of it at Plan del Rio, sent back a body of dragoons to the National Bridge, who, finding it in the possession of the enemy, we concluded that it was repulsed: I am pained at the rumor we heard of the loss of some of the wagons. Dr. Cooper and thirteen dragoons reached us. I cannot too earnestly recommend that you assume the authority to order the reoccupation of this city. Even if Gen. Scott was not before the city of Mexico, and beyond the reach of reinforcements, you perceive trains are constantly endangered by guerrillas, and that their supplies have been forwarded from here. Their spirits have been raised by absence of the troops. I am certain that Gen. Scott, on the spot, would order its reoccupation. Col. Wynkoop concurs in its importance.

Very truly yours

manes of the generals or general who there fell! And in what manner did the hang them? Noosing them by the neck as they stood upon the ground, and so suspending them that they died, "by inches," strangled by their own weight, the mode adopted being such that their horrible agony lasted more that one–hour. A spectacle worthy of such men, or rather of demons escaped from hell! This they did with eighteen of these unhappy men, and among them the brave Captain Reilly, whose head they stuck upon a pike and planted at Churubusco. To six others, who proved that they had not volunteered but been impressed, they gave two hundred lashes each, and compelled them to dig the graves of their companions.

Mexicans: These are the men who call us barbarians and say they come to civilize us: these are the men who have plundered the houses of the surrounding villages, who have stolen children from their families, who have slept in the niches devoted to the sacred dead, who have, with blasphemous revelry, clothed themselves in the ornaments of the alters, who have thrown upon the ground the body of Jesus Christ, and have made themselves drunk in drinking out of the sacred vessels. Accursed may they be of all Christians as they are of God!

Countrymen: The Supreme Government commanded its commissioners, as you have seen in already published, that they should inquire of their Commissioners first of all, why they had brought war upon our Republic with blood and fire? What injuries we have done to them that they should thus seek to revenge themselves? Their mode of concealing their confusion at not being able to reply to these inquiries, and of satisfying their displeasure because we would not consent to an ignominious peace, has been to light up anew the flames of war, to send us from the King's Mill day before yesterday our assassinated countrymen who had in no manner offended them, and to glut their diabolical rage upon the defenseless men whom they had in their power.

Mexicans: The Supreme Government conjures us in the name of the honor of our race, in the name of our dignity as men and of God himself, that we should all unite boy unanimous and continues effort to revenge these great outrages, to yield never to dismay, and to wage this war without truce and without relenting.

Mexico, September 10, 1847

The following interrogatories were addressed by the Diario del Gobierno to "Scott, Polk, and to that part of the people of the United States in favor of the war, to all that nation and to the world:"

"What is the cause, what the impelling motive that the United States of America have brought pillage, desolation and death upon the Mexican Republic?"

"What offenses has this Republic committed?"

"What reasonable or just aim does that Government entertain, to gain which it has adopted measures so barbarous and unworthy of Christian and civilized people?"

The Diario publishes a communication from the Governor of Guanajuato to the Minister of Foreign Relations, approving the determination of the Central Government to submit to no concessions which shall compromise Mexican honor, and tendering the assistance of that State, in money and men, to the full extent of its resources. The Governor of the State of Jalisco, also, breathes war to the knife. He exhorts the people to give the world occasion to say, that "Jalisco was the cradle of the liberty of the Mexican Republic, and the tomb of the conquerors of the North."– of should the struggle be fruitless that "Jalisco lost her independence, but linker her honor with the tomb." If the Mexicans could fight as heroically as they write, our armies would long ago have been annihilated.– Paredes is said to be in Jalisco, beating up for recruits.

Will the Union in its elaborate exposition of the ground assumed by the Administration that the "Rio Grande is the true Western boundary of Texas," please to direct its observations particularly to Mr. Senator Benton! That gentleman wants as much light on this subject as anybody we know of. We don't know that the Union considers him a "Mexican Whig," but it is very certain that Mr. Benton thinks or did think that the Rio Grande is no more the Western boundary of Texas, that it is the western boundary of the moon! – Alexandria Gazette

And a greater than Mr. Benton concurred in that opinion. We mean Gen. Jackson, who, as we are assured by Mr. Benton, after surveying the map with the eye of a soldier as well as a statesman, came to the conclusion that the Nueces would be a more desirable boundary for the United States than the Rio Grande, in reference both to the civil and military aspects of the question. Referring to Gen. Jackson's attempt, in the first year of his Presidency to get back "our sacrificed territory," Mr. Benton said, that the proposition of Gen. Jackson "included no part of New Mexico, Chihuahua, Coahuila, or Tamaulipas. It extended to no part of the River, or even the valley of the Rio Grande. Not a drop of the water of that river– not an inch of the soil of its valley– did he propose to disrupt from its old possessor, and to incorporate into our Union. Gen. Jackson was a wise man and a just man, and he was assisted by another man (Van Buren) who was also wise and just. They mediated no such crime or folly as that of adding the left bank of the Rio Grande, from head to mouth, to our Union. In seeking to recover the dismembered part of our own country, they did not undertake to dismember the empire of a neighbor. Like a general, he saw the natural frontier of his country on the ridge of mountains at the head of the Red river and Arkansas, which lie east of the Nueces; and like a statesman, he was limiting the domain of his country to this natural frontier. Leaving the whole valley of the Rio Grande to the Mexicans, and taking the whole valley of the Mississippi to ourselves, he sought a line suitable to both parties, more than a hundred miles this side of the Rio Grande, and even east of the little river Nueces, a solitary frontier stream, connected with no system of rivers, and without a single geographical affinity, and falling into the Gulf of Mexico in a shallow and difficult part of the coast. This was his boundary, and not act of his life shows a more wise and enlightened forecast. A less sagacious head would have stood out for our ancient claim to the Rio del Norte: His judgment enable him to see that this would be an encroachment upon the geographical divisions of Mexico– would bring the population of two great countries into contact and collision– give rise to disputes for the navigation of the river and the possession of its mouth– and sow the seeds of eternal dissension in advancing a salient angle of one empire into the natural empire of another. His sagacious mind saw this; and, waving the question of old limits, he took those which the future peace and harmony of the two countries required, and left the whole extent of the Rio del Norte, every inch of its soil and every drop of its waters, and all its fields and flocks, to its ancient possessors, who had held it for centuries.”

What does the Washington Union mean by the following significant remark? “If,“ says that paper, “Santa Anna is not so profound or bold a Statesman as was supposed” (by whom?)-“ If circumstances do not permit him to withdraw, not only from the Sabine, but from the Nueces to the Rio Grande, the President may have misunderstood the man, or the circumstances in which he might be placed.” We understood the Union, the other day, as affirming that there was no understanding between Mr. Polk and Santa Anna: Yet if the foregoing language means anything, it means that there was, and that the President has been deceived by the wily Mexican. It seems difficult to learn the precise reasons which induced Mr. Polk to permit Santa Anna to return to Mexico. We hope, however, that the next Congress will be able to find out the well guarded secret.

Mutiny on the Plains – Indian Movements– The St. Louis Union, of the 30th September, has intelligence of the 24th from the troops en route for Santa Fe, in a letter of that date from the Middle Semirone Spring. After mentioning the extraordinary march of 525 miles in thirty–four days, performed on foot by a detachment of the companies of the Illinois Regiment, the writer states that by far the greater part of the companies F and G were a few days before the date of his letter in open mutiny– absolutely refusing to obey positive orders. The dutiful force, consisting of but one company, was not sufficient to quell the insurrection, and the mutineers had pretty much their own way, till the regiment was joined by Lieut. Col. Boyaken, with a detachment of three companies. Order was then forthwith restored, and the non–commissioned officers who took part in the insubordination, were arrested and reduced to the ranks. The offense being above regimental jurisdiction, final proceedings in the matter had to be postponed until the arrival of the troops at Santa Fe.

Extract from a letter dated at Fort Kearney, Table Creek, Sept. 19, 1847– "A party of Otto Indians came to this place on the 17th. A large party of Sioux had attacked their village, killed twenty of the tribe, burned the village, and destroyed the corn.– Some of the children were drowned whilst crossing the river. The Pawnee farmer came to our camp on the 17th, and reported some seven or eight hundred Ious and the Pawnee village destroying the corn. The hostile operations of Ious against the Pawnees and Ottawas, also the movements of the Omahas against the Mormon encampment, will make it necessary to send an additional force of mounted men to the Plains.”

Friday October, 15, 1847, RWv24i83p2c2 Gen. James Hamilton Jr.  words: 91

We publish this morning a characteristic letter from this gentleman to Senator Butler of South Carolina, condoling with him on the loss of his gallant brother, Col. Butler, of the Palmetto regiment. We have been somewhat surprised, ever since the conflict with Mexico commenced, that we had not heard the “snort” of General Hamilton’s “war–horse,” either “on the banks of the Rio Grande,” or elsewhere. His letter to Senator Butler apprises us that he was an applicant for a commission, which the President did not think proper to confer upon him. [JKM]

Friday October, 15, 1847, RWv24i83p2c2 Upper California  words: 290

It is conceded, we believe, that Lower California is a sandy desert, the dreary aspect unrelieved by a single oasis. But, with Upper California we had until lately, deceived by travelers’ tales, been accustomed to associate the idea of beauty and fertility— with how much justice may be inferred from the subjoined extract from a letter recently received in Worthington, Massachusetts, from one of the “armed emigrants” dispatched by Mr. Polk, soon after the war began, to go up and possess this modern Canaan—this land flowing with milk and honey. Confessing himself a most egregiously humbugged ass, he thus writes:

“The land here is very poor, not a vegetable is raised. All it is fit for is grass, and that all dries up in summer and blows away. There is no rain from May to September. Not a tree grows within 20 miles of this. A few scrub bushes are seen, and they hardly furnish wood enough to cook with. All I can say about the land here, and I mean without a circuit of 20 miles, is, that it is on large sand bank, where vegetation starts up in the spring, the dries and blows away. If there are any with you that wish the emigrate let them go to any other place in the world than California. Never was any taken in so bad as the 7th regiment of New York volunteers. W expected to find it almost a paradise, and here we are; poor dogs, living on sea biscuit, pork and beans, in face of an enemy, exposed to wind, weather, and bullets rattling among us, and all for seven dollars a month. Blue coats, red patches, stripes and death perhaps—a gloomy prospect indeed.” [JKM]

Friday October, 15, 1847, RWv24i83p2c2 Incentives to Desertion  words: 171

The New Orleans Picayune continues its selections, in the absence of later intelligence, from its Mexican files. In that paper, of the 7th, we find a decree of Santa Anna, offering $10 to each unarmed deserter from the American army, and in case they be armed, an extra allowance to the value of their arms, is to be made. They are also promised a grant of 200 square acres of land. An earnest appeal is addressed particularly to the Irish Catholics, to abandon the flag of a people who burned their temples in Boston and Philadelphia— and “Christian hospitality and good faith” are proffered to all who will avail themselves of the invitation. While on the other hand, they are told that although they may take towns and cities by conquest, they will never possess two feet of ground unmolested as long as there is a Mexican left. Very few of our soldiers have been silly enough to accept the Mexican invitation. It is remarkable that there should have been one. [JKM]

Friday October, 15, 1847, RWv24i83p2c2 Col. Jefferson Davis  words: 363

We find in the Union the annexed letter from Col. Davis to the President of the United States, giving his reasons for declining the appointment of Brigadier General:

Warren County, Miss. June 20, 1847.

My dear Sir: Your very kind and complimentary letter of the 19th May last, was received in New Orleans, together with the commission to which you therein referred.

To be esteemed by you as one whose services entitled him to promotion, is to me a source of the highest gratification; which will remain to me undiminished, though my opinions compel me to decline the proffered honor.

I will this day address to the Adjutant General U.S. Army an official note informing him that the commission has been received, and is declined. To you I wish to give an explanation, being too sensibly affected by your expressions of honorable estimation and friendly regard, willingly to run any hazard of a misapprehension of the motives which have decided my course.

You inform me that my command will consist of volunteers. I still entertain the opinion expressed by me as a member of Congress, in May and June of 1846, that the “volunteers” are militia. As such, they have a constitutional right to be under the immediate command of officers appointed by State authority; and this I think is violated by any permanent organization made after they have passed into the service of the United States, by which they lose their distinctive character of State troops, become part of a new formation, disciplined by, corresponding and only recognized though the head, which the federal government has set over them.

Such I consider the organization of volunteer regiments into brigades, under brigadiers appointed by the President, as provided for in the law of June, 1846; and entertaining this opinion, my decision, as stated to you, was the necessary result.

For the gratifying notice you have taken of myself and the regiment I had the honor to command, for the distinction you have been pleased to confer upon me by this unsolicited appointment, and for the kind solicitude you express for my welfare, receive, sir, my sincerest thanks.

Very truly your friend
Jefferson Davis

Friday October, 15, 1847, RWv24i83p2c4 The Late Col. Butler words: 895

The Charleston Mercury of the 5th, publishes the following interesting correspondence between General Hamilton and the brother of the lamented Colonel Butler:

Meriwether Co., Sept. 16th, 1847

My Dear Butler:– I know no death at all comparable to that of a soldier in the field, falling in this service of his country. Your gallant brother has met this fate.

Among the friends who loved him, and whom I know had his esteem, I come to offer you my sympathy, and mingle my sorrows with your own, if the glorious termination of his career did not almost forbid their indulgence.

You know full well that whilst I was Governor of South Carolina, at a most trying crisis, he was my first and senior Aid-de-camp. When I had to look out on what many persons supposed, a troubled sky; it was something to have near a man of his hereditary courage and tried nerve. If, therefore, any one knows him well, I did. The brilliant flash of glory in which the taper of his life has been extinguished has not, therefore, surprised me. When I was in New Orleans last spring, and heard of the embarkation of his regiment for Vera Cruz, I said to a friend, if Butler and these lads get fairly engaged with the enemy, against whatever odds, they will make their mark, and if need be, leave half their number in killed and wounded on the field.

What was prophecy has ripened into fact.

I knew the stuff they were made of.

This time last year your brother and myself met in Washington. He was stretched on a sick bed.

In the confidence of a friendship, the fervor of which had never been interrupted for one instant, he informed me that as soon as he was sufficiently recovered he was to meet in meet in mortal combat Col. Mason of the United States Army, in consequence of a quarrel of some standing, which had been greatly aggravated, perhaps by mutual misconception. He asked my friendly counsels in the progress of the unhappy affair. I need not speak of his composure to you, but I will speak of his sensibility– of the tenderness of his noble nature when he spoke of meeting (on terms which scarcely permitted the hope of the escape of either party) a man with a family as numerous and dependant upon him as his own. From policy, I rather seem to enter into his feelings as an antagonist, and so prepare him for the deadly strife.

Without saying one word to him, however, I left Washington the next morning, and proceeded to Virginia to see Col. McCarthy , the friend of Col. Mason. On reaching Alexandria, I learned that Col. McCarthy was not at his residence in Loudoun. On my return to Carolina, I wrote him, and proposed an armistice and reference. It was met by the brave man with a benevolence and chivalry worthy of his exalted courage. Col. Mason’s departure before your brother’s recovery, for California, under orders which precluded a moment’s delay, suspended our work of conciliation. Your brother knew nothing of my pacific interposition until Col. Mason’s departure. His life was preserved for a noble destiny. He perished where he would have liked to have died best. Before embarking for Vera Cruz he wrote me, entreating me to apply for an appointment as general officer in the army of the United States; and as the most powerful inducement he could offer, he informed me that he and his command would rather serve under me than any man in the United States. I state this fact at the hazard of having imputed to me a ridiculous, in not censurable self–love.

But those, my dear Butler, who know our countrymen, will only recognize in it the fibers which unite one South Carolinian to another. As little deserved as the compliment may be, why should I not cherish it next to my own heart, at least, for secret pride and solitary enjoyment? In the burning interest of the progress of events in Mexico, I found it impossible to resist the invocation. I tendered my services to the President in a post not inconsistent with the rank I had held in my own State; he preferred, as he has a right, another to myself. I hope I am the last man in the world to take exception to a preference which the subsequent distinction of this gentleman has so entirely justified.
If I has been appointed, however, I think I hazard not much in saying that our Palmetto standard, which has never "paled its fires" on any field, would have been borne aloft wherever my command may have been. If I could not have restrained the impetuosity of the darling valor of your gallant brother, and our brave South Carolinians, I should at least have claimed the melancholy privilege that he should have died in no other arms but my own.

My dear Butler, arrest the current of your own grief. Let his widow and his children cease to shed a tear; there is but one transition from death–bed of a Christian soldier, who died for his country, to that realm where tears of care and sorrow are unknown.

Believe me, in sympathy and esteem your devoted friend

J. Hamilton

Friday October, 15, 1847, RWv24i83p4c2 The Nueces  words: 716

We cannot forbear expressing our surprise at the long an elaborate vindication in yesterday’s Whig of the Mexican title to the Nueces. It is strange that the Whig should have so little confidence in the patriotism or national spirit of the American people, as to expect to persuade them to surrender, at the insolent bidding of Mexico, any portion of the territory of a Sovereign State.

Enquirer of yesterday

If we have vindicated the Mexican title to the Nueces, it was by the testimony of Democratic witnesses; and if the valley of the Rio Grande be, as Mr. Benton asserts and Mr. Ingersoll admits, Mexican territory, we submit, that even if we had endeavored to persuade the American people to surrender it, (as we did not), it cannot be metamorphosed into a “portion of the territory of a Sovereign State,” (unless it be one of the Sovereign States of Mexico) by the ipse dixit of the Enquirer. So far from advising its surrender, we expressly said, that it “admitted of a doubt its expediency or wisdom to extend the boundaries of Texas to the Rio Grande” – and we surely have a right to doubt its expediency or wisdom, when such men as Gen. Jackson, Mr. Benton and Mr. Ingersoll, three of the most brilliant lights of the Progressive Democracy, have thought otherwise.

As to the “claim” of Texas to the Rio Grande after she asserted her independence, it is of no more weight that a claim on our party to the Enquirer office. Suppose the American Continental Congress had asserted its claim to Canada in 1776– of what value would it have been, in the teeth of the fact, that the large force sent to the province, under Montgomery and Arnold, failed to achieve its conquest? So likewise Texas sent a force to capture Santa Fe, on the east side of the Rio Grande; but every an of them were taken prisoners. Nor is the Enquirer correct in saying “our jurisdiction was extended by special acts to the Rio Grande;” for it will remember that our own Congress expressly recognized Santa Fe as a Mexican town, by regulating commercial intercourse between that part of Mexico and the United States, and kept a Consul there long after the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas. So, too, we permitted Mexican troops to remain in undisturbed possession of that part of that part of the valley of the Rio Grande in close proximity to the Nueces, and permitted a Mexican customhouse to remain undisturbed at the mouth of the river. Would Mr. Polk have permitted such things in any "portion of the Old Dominion?" If not, with what propriety can the Enquirer, which did not complain of Mr. Polk for permitting parts of "the territory of a Sovereign State" to be occupied for many months after the annexation of Texas by Mexican troops and Mexican customhouse officers, now say that "we might as well cut off a portion of the Old Dominion as surrender the portion of territory between the Nueces and the Rio Grande" – embracing a region west of the line which Mr. C.J. Ingersoll, the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, and in the capacity the confidential organ of the Executive on the floor of the House of Representatives, solemnly affirmed constituted "our natural boundary?" If the assumption of the Enquirer be true, then Mr. Polk deserved to be impeached for permitting the Mexican Government to hold, for so long a time, quiet possession of "American soil" a "portion of the territory of a Sovereign State!" But he knew better–and no such claim was ever seriously made until it became necessary to his vindication from the serious charge of usurping the war–making power, from which there is no escape if the valley of the Rio Grande be in truth Mexican territory0 as Mr. Benton declares it is, and as our own laws regulating the trade between Santa Fe and the United States show that Congress and the Executive knew it to be– and as Mr. Polk’s neglect to take possession of it on the annexation of Texas demonstrates that he also so believed, until it became necessary in order to justify his high–handed outrage to proclaim that “American blood had been shed on American soil.”

Friday October, 15, 1847, RWv24i83p4c2 Intelligence from Mexico  words: 272

The reader will find in another column some additional, though not very satisfactory items of news from the seat of war. It seems now to be almost certain that the rumor of the death of Generals Worth, Smith and Pillow was unfounded; and, if the statements now before us be reliable, that Gen. Scott, in entering the city of Mexico, met with very little resistance from the army, after the battle of Chapultepec— the assault up on his troops subsequently having been made by the mob, whose plunder of the city, which commenced with its evacuation by Santa Anna, was arrested by the presence of our troops.

The New Orleans Bulletin of the 5th says: "We have covered with a gentleman who came passenger in the Alabama, and who has long resided in Mexico, who says that there is not the least chance of peace, but that, on the contrary, the future resistance will be more formidable than it has been, and that the mass of the Mexican nation is decidedly in favor on the continuance of the war. We believe that the recent events at the capital will only tend to confirm this determination, and that it will emphatically become a national war. From the same information we learn that a report existed of an intention to withdraw our garrison from Tampico, and to abandon the place."

The Bulletin added, that letters from Tampico state that Gen. Smith, who so greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Contreras headed the successful attack upon Chapultepec, which is represented as a brilliant affair, in which our officers and men greatly distinguished themselves.

Somewhat copious details of the news from Mexico brought yesterday by the Alabama, will be found in another column in the appropriate head. Since, however, that article was in type we are placed in possession of further details, and reflection leads us to attach additional importance to the accounts.

Beyond dispute, the most satisfactory feature in the news touches the loss sustained in the recent actions by the army of Gen. Scott and its present position. Our news is rather of a negative nature, but it is hardly less satisfactory than if it were more definite. We have ample ground on which to deny the painful reports brought by James L. Day of the deaths of distinguished American general officers. Our information is positive that Gen. Smith has not been slain, but that he has anew covered himself with glory. Gen. Worth had been appointed Governor of the city of Mexico, and was acting as such as late as the 24th of September, letters of which date have been received by commercial houses at Tampico. We have not been able to learn anything definite of Gen. Pillow and his wounds, but from the total silence of letters in regard to him which make mention of our losses, we are persuaded that he has not been killed, and we hope not wounded. We cannot learn that either Gen. Worth or Gen. Smith have been wounded, Gen. Worth, who came passenger on the Alabama, is entirely satisfied of Gen. Worth's safety. In this connection we may mention that Maj. Capers is the bearer of dispatches from Tampico for Washington. He has with him, also, letters private and unofficial, from various sources in the city of Mexico, which make incidental mention of public affairs, which letters will be communicated to our Government. It is from this gentleman we learn such information as we possess of the loss of our army in the recent engagements, which is unexpectedly small. The Mexican accounts make it exceed one thousand men killed and wounded, while more authentic accounts from English sources set it down at four hundred and seventy or eighty, all told. The number of American officers killed is said to be 27, and the number of wounded 45. The only individual mentioned among the killed is Capt. Albemarle Cady, of the 6th Infantry, and accomplished officer, a graduate of West Point and native of New Hampshire. It is somewhat singular that so little should have transpired in regard to our loss, but with all diligence we have been unable to learn anything more. The Mexican loss is set down in round numbers at 3000 killed and wounded. We do not attach much credit to this estimate. The accounts from Tampico confirm the death of Gen. Bravo, killed fighting bravely, but our Vera Cruz correspondent discredits the report that Santa Anna was wounded, though it is reiterated by the Patria's advices, which say that he also lost his horse in the retreat by the route of Tulancingo.

From the circular to the commandants of the different States of Mexico, announcing the abandonment of the capital by Santa Anna, we are persuaded that the fighting for its possession ended on the 13th of September. From the moment that Santa Anna fell back upon Guadalupe, the position of Gen. Scott became assured, so far as the Mexican army was concerned. The same considerations which influenced Santa Anna not to prolong the defense of the city, would restrain him from molesting Gen. Scott in its quite occupation. But if we are thus relieved from all apprehension in regard to Gen. Scott’s army from this source— and we have not thought the alarm felt for him in some quarters well founded— we have to deplore the calamities which have overtaken the city of Mexico from another source, and which are much more formidable than could have resulted from our occupation; nor do they fail to excite alarm lest our army has suffered from the same cause.

According to the Arco Iris of Vera Cruz of the 26th received by La Patria letters from Jalapa and Orizaba announce, that immediately after Santa Anna abandoned the capital, and as soon as the populace felt themselves relieved from the restraint of his bayonet’s, the Leperos commenced the work of sacking the city, plundering the houses of citizens as well as foreigners and committing all species of excesses. During this pillaging these accounts say that a division of the American army entered the city to restore order— verbal accounts say that their aid had been solicited by the magistrates. A conflict ensued between these troops and the rabble, in which some accounts say that the whole division was cut off, while others say that one portion was driven back to the gates and the citadel, and yet another took refuge in the convent of San Francisco, abandoning two pieces of artillery to the leperos. The accounts go on to say that Gen. Scott was then compelled to bombard the city from the citadel and other commanding points to reduce it to subjection. Such in brief are the rumors we derive from the Arco Iris and La Patria. From Tampico we have another version of the same story.

[JKM]
The entire subjugation of the Mexican Republic and its annexation to the United States, is seriously mediated by the President and his advisors, we will not undertake to assert, because there has been yet no truth of such a purpose. But "coming events" often "call their shadows before;" and it is impossible for those who contemplate with horror the bare possibility of this feared union of two nations, of different races, and between which, in all their institutions, civil, social, and religious, there exists a decided antagonism, and no point of affinity, to close their ears to simi-official intimations of such a design, which find their way to the columns of the daily press. When a people, like those who achieve the independence of Texas– who went out from among us, and who were deeply imbued with the principles of civil liberty, and thoroughly comprehended the obligations as well as the privileges and rights of citizenship in a Republic, asked and obtained permission to become a member of this family of States, however, objectionable were the means resorted to for the accomplishment of the object, it is nevertheless not to be denied that it was correctly described by Mr. Polk, in announcing its consummation to Congress, "as the deliberate homage of each people to the great principles of our federative union." But why? For the very reason which the President himself so forcibly stated– because "the sword had no part in the victory"– because we had "not sough [too dark to read]

If it be true that the Executive meditates this grand scheme of conquest and subjugation, we cannot but apprehend, from the natural tendency of the human mind to be influenced by ideas of national aggrandizement, and more especially from the force of party feeling, which always ensures for the acts of the President the passive acquiescence, if not the active support, of the great mass of those by whom he has been clothed with power, that the most energetic efforts will be made to carry it into successful execution. In this event, the dispute about boundary lines will of course become obsolete. It will be to Mexico no longer a question of territorial jurisdiction, but of national existence; and, though we may finally achieve her subjugation, we shall bring into the Union a people animated by as fierce a hatred of the conquerors, as that which inspired the Greeks, after centuries of servitude, to throw off the Turkish yoke, or as that which now fills every true heart of Poland with a sense of humiliation under the bondage of her oppressors, and a thirst for vengeance which nothing can restrain but their overwhelming power.

So monstrous is the idea, however, of this wholesale annexation– so appalling in its present as well as in its remote consequences, to ourselves even more than to Mexico– that, while we have sufficient reason to believe that it has been already a subject of Cabinet deliberation, and that it is strongly urged by the most influential member of that Cabinet– we have yet that confidence in the people of the country, as to believe that the announcement of such a design will shock the moral sense of the country, and prostrate forever the authors and advocates of the suggestion. [too dark to read]

We find in the Washington Union the following story, translated from "La Patria," of New Orleans, from the Government paper of Mexico. In publishing it, the Union says: "We trust the story as true, not only because it is pleasing to meet with as rare an instance of generosity from so unexpected a source as the breast of Santa Anna; but also because the daring act of the American Captain and his four dragoons reflects honor on the country. If the incident really occurred, the names of the heroic five, it is to be hoped, will long be known." The Union, however, attaches little credit to any report which appears in "La Patria." The story, we confess, savors somewhat of romance; but, if the character of Santa Anna was correctly understood by Gen. Waddy Thompson, there is nothing in the part ascribed to him which renders it improbable. Gen. Thompson narrates several instances of his generosity, entirely in keeping with the conduct referred to in the following narrative.

During the action of the 20th inst., while our troops were retiring from the bridge of Churubusco of Candelaria, still combating with the forces that charged after them, four dragoons and a captain of the enemy threw themselves forward into our column with such rapidity, that they were not observed till they arrived at the works of Candelaria. They were there first recognized as enemies, and fired on by the garrison, by which the four dragoons and the captain's horse were killed. The captain, on regaining his feet, was surrounded by some of the President's aides, and other officers, who came with his column. They were about to kill him, when the President interposed and ordered them only to disarm him. His excellency, after taking a turn along the embattled ranks, returned to the place where they had the prisoner; when one of the officers said to him "General, this man ought to be shot; he has himself confessed that he came here for the purpose of killing your excellency." "How so; what says he?" inquired the President. "He says," was the reply, "that learning in Churubusco from one of our prisoners that your excellency was with this column, he, with the four soldiers who followed him, took the resolution of reaching and slaying your excellency; for if they accomplished this, it would be a most glorious act and still more so if they should perish in doing it." Admiring their daring bravery, the President replied: "Now, less than ever, will I allow any harm to be done him. He is a prisoner of war; and let him who lays a hand on him beware. Alas! If I had many officers like him, Scott would not now be so near us." He then places the officer in charge of young Don Augustin Tornel, with whom he was seen entering the palace last evening.
Messrs. Editors: Although the subscribers to your paper generally belong to that party, which, according to Mr. Polk, are giving "aid and comfort to the enemy," they still feel a deep interest for the safety of our gallant army, which have been required, by the weakness and wickedness of himself and his advisors, to invade, without cause, the territory of a sister Republic, and whose imbecility has left them so much exposed in the heart of an enemy’s country.

Imagine, then, our disappointment and chagrin, when, after hanging around the Post Office till a late hour of the night, to hear the news from Mexico, our eager inquiries are met by the chilling response of “no paper tonight.” This has so frequently been the case, for some months past, that I have only been prevented from informing you of it, by indulging the hope that it would be done by some one else, and from the fear that the fault might be in one Mr. Polk’s Post masters, and that it would not be in your power to remedy the evil. I trust, however, you will make some inquiry into the matter, and do what you can for our relief, as, I assure you, I have received but one of the last five Whigs to which I am entitled.

Lest you should think the fault is at our own office, I beg leave to assure you that it is not so; as our Post master is a genuine, old-fashioned, honest, Whig, who faithfully does his duty. I see you start with surprise at hearing of a Whig— especially such a Whig— even in the humble office of a village Post Master! I know not, how certainly, to account for it, as I have been credibly informed that, early last spring, one or more letters on the subject of his removal were received in Washington city, by a leading Locofoco of this district, and that the subject was solemnly deliberated on, in this place, by a council of the faithful! Still ours is a country of liberty and equality, where freedom of opinion is not only tolerated but encouraged! Where “manifest destiny” points to the extension of the “area of freedom” though it be accomplished by the evil—yet only temporary evil—of wholesale murder and robbery!

Let us sustain our rulers, who are the “elected” instruments by which great things are to be achieved!

The schooner Arietis, Capt. Marin, arrived yesterday from Frontera, near the mouth of the Tabasco river, whence she sailed on the 22nd. We are indebted to Capt. Martin for the following memoranda of the news brought by him:

Frontera, Sept. 22, 1847

The U.S. bomb brig Etna are lying in Frontera, near the mouth of the Tabasco River, where, up to day, all has been quiet. The importation of logwood I prohibited. Latest accounts from Tabasco state that everything is quiet there, and that a great many of the Mexican soldiers are deserting on account of not receiving any pay for their services— and that those who remained were under the command of the famous Miguel Bruno, who, it is said, has been appointed commander— in— chief of the Mexican forces in the State of Tabasco. Quite a number of our men have been on the sick list, but are now rapidly recovering. There is no very late news from the interior. The greatest number of the inhabitants, who had left this town on account of “war’s alarms,” are now returning, having become satisfied that the Yankees do not eat Mexicans— when they keep themselves quiet. Com. Perry was, at the last accounts, lying at Anton Lizardo, but daily expected at this place.

On the 11th, four companies of artillery sailed from this port for Vera Cruz, on board the ship Empire. They numbered, exclusive of officers, 368 men. The names of the officers we gave yesterday.

These companies have been raised in conformity to the recent acts of Congress, authorizing two more companies to be added to each regiment of artillery. The men appear to be excellent, especially those of the two companies of the 1rst regiment, raised in this city and Poughkeepsie, by Captains Knowlton and Van Ness.

I believe I mentioned that the expedition consisted of a company of the 1rst Regiment of Dragoons, commanded started on the morning of the 2nd and went as far as Capellania, a small town lying to the northwest of Saltillo and about ten miles distant, where we remained until the next morning without any incident occurring worth mentioning, charging the authorities of the town with the same orders that were issued by Gen. Wool to the inhabitants of the habitations are all poor and the town is evidently going to decay. I must mention one thing, and that is, that in this town is the country residence of Don Ramos, the father of the belle of Saltillo– and a very pretty girl she is,– which lies a little east of north of Capellania about thirty miles distant, passing in our route several small ranchos at a considerable distance from each other. About half way there is a dry arroyo called El Paso de los Carretas, a famous place for robberies and the scene of a number of events of that character in times past. We met a number of atofos loaded with corn and sand, the latter used in glazing pottery; the arreros were all armed. The hacienda, of Messillas was once a very flourishing one, but during the march of the Republican army under Hidalgo and Ayende to Monclova, in 1809, it was broken up and nearly destroyed, and has never since been been what it was before. The sons of the proprietor, who was a Spaniard, now occupy the place. The success of the crops depends principally upon the rain, as the land pertaining to the estate is some distance from the river Venado and but a small portion of it can be irrigated from its waters. Its vicinity to a broad creek, dry except during the rains, enables them generally to irrigate their lands sufficiently. The proprietors received us with oppressive civility, and appeared as rejoiced to see us, as we knew they really would be to get rid of us. I may safely say that a dustier, more uncomfortable place I never stayed at, and the tank water was extremely disagreeable to that palate. In the valley in which this place is situated there is quite a number of ranchos where good crops are raised, but from a peculiar failing of most of the proprietors their crops cannot yield them much revenue. About the time the corn is in roasting ears the worthy proprietors begin to gamble at monte for their coming crops, and as all cannot win some must lose. Saltillo sharpers frequently pay them a visit and win from them their entire crops.

As we rode into the plaza of the hacienda, the proprietor, as well conditioned, light complexioned, jolly looking old fellow, dressed in white, skipped gaily from his domicile and received us with the most excessive demonstrations of delight, as if we had been the old boy's old playmates a long time ago. He shook hands with everybody within reach, and summoned Jesus, Jose Maria, Conception, and a host of other peons to attend to the cavalios of the officials: hopped about with the alacrity of a galvanized bullfrog, and all because he was most horribly delighted. It was extremely, and a green one would very naturally have conjectured that he had a most exuberant flow of good spirits. We found an old 6–pounder here, mounted upon a very old rickety carriage which the proprietor assured us he had for six years for the benefit of the Indians.

Numerous meetings have been recently held in South Carolina, on the subject of the Wilmot Proviso, and among them one at Greenville, on the 3rd at which Gen. Waddy Thompson, our late Minister to Mexico, was present, and made a speech, and abstract of which is reported. He declared his settled conviction of the impolicy of the war with Mexico, and said he believed that if it were to close now, one hundred million dollars would not pay its cost.

Referring in terms of just exultation to the gallantry displayed in by the South Carolina regiment in the sanguinary battle of Contreras, in which one–half of the number were killed or wounded, he was naturally led to comment indignantly upon the principle of the Wilmot Proviso, which, in the event of annexation of any part of Mexico to the United States, would deny to the people of the South the right to share in the territory so obtained. But he expressed the opinion that the extension of our limits would not ensure to the benefit of the South.

“He believed the North would not recede from their positions. Ten States, with votes enough to control the popular branch of Congress and to elect a President of the United States, had taken their arrogant and insulting stand – and they were daily gaining strength. Last year 300,000 foreigners landed on our shores – not 2,000 of who settled in the South– the rest spreading over the North and West, with imported sentiments hostile to our welfare. With Oregon and the expected accession of Mexican territory, added to the present non–slaveholding States, the number of free States would be ultimately numerous and strong enough to amend the constitution and overthrow the institutions of the South.

“The true remedy for this state of things, he thought, was to be found in acquiring no more territory. We have already quite enough: that which it is proposed to acquire is not desirable, being sterile, covered with Spanish grants and held by a population accustomed to rebellion and unaccustomed to work; and besides, he said, he would stake his life that no part of the territory could or would be occupied by slave–holders: Upon this point he added, that

“He would consent to be gibbeted, or, if dead, that his bones should be dug up and made manure of, if ever a slaveholding State were formed of any portion of it. We should be satisfied with Texas, every part of which will be slaveholding territory, under the compact of annexation, having the Rio Grande for its boundary and a reasonable margin, where necessary.”

That this is soon to be the watchword of the Administration in regard to Mexico, as it was in reference to Oregon, we have no doubt, unless the indications of public opinion should in this case, as in that, compel it to modify its views, and to restrain its insane passion for territorial aggrandizement. We laid before our readers yesterday the sensible remarks of the New York Evening Post, one of the ablest organs of the party, on this subject, and we now present them with a condensed view of the objections urged to this plan, which we have no doubt is seriously mediated at Washington, by the New York Journal of Commerce, which, although not recognized as an organ of the Administration, has not on that account been a less efficient supporter of its general policy. The Journal presents the following reasons in opposition to the adoption, by the Government of the United States, of the odious maxims of the Despotic European Triumvirate by which the nationality of Poland was destroyed, and the Spoils divided among her greedy conquerors:

1. We have no right to adopt such a course. Mexico has as good a right to her Independence as we have to ours.

2. We are opposed to the permanent occupation of Mexico, because she is herself opposed to it. The days of the crusades are gone by, whether for the propagation of religion, industry, or the arts. As to her form of government, Mexico is already more like the United States than any other nation in existence; and if she were not, it is not our business to make her so.

3. We are opposed to the permanent occupation of Mexico, because it will cause us infinite trouble. Suppose we establish a territorial government there, as the writer suggests; how long will it stand, without the support of an American army?

Who would pay for it? We, for the honor of ruling a sister Republic? Or they, for the privilege of being ruled? If the former, we have taxes enough already. If the latter, it would only increase their exasperation.

4. We are opposed to the project, because it is contrary

[BREAKS UP]

5. We are opposed to the measure, because it is liable to bring us into collision with European powers. The sympathy of spectators, other things being equal, is always with the weaker party.

6. We object to the measure, because it must lead to great embarrassment in our own political affairs. If Mexico were to be permanently occupied, it would doubtless be with a view to bring her ultimately into the American Union. But upon what basis would this be done? Are we prepared to admit to the ballot–boxes, on equal terms with ourselves, the ignorant, degraded, and superstitious people of Mexico, black, white, yellow, red, and mixed? And how much strength will be added to the Confederacy by the accession of a cluster of unwilling States?

We have received no later tidings from the seat of war, except the following brief notice of Gen. Scott's proceedings since the occupation of the Mexican capital, which reaches us by a circuitous route:

LATER FROM HAVANA AND MEXICO— By the schooner Somers, Capt. Woop, arrived yesterday, we received a copy of the Diario de la Marina of the 8th.

The English steamer Medway, from Vera Cruz, having on board $140,000 in specie, arrived at Havana on the 7th.

The Havana paper is filled with extracts from Vera Cruz Journals, which, however, contain but little in addition to what has already been published.

The only articles of new worth translating, is furnished by a correspondent from Vera Cruz, under date of the 27th Sept. which states that Gen. Scott had addressed Circulars to the several Mexican States, inviting them to send their deputies to the Capital with full powers to conclude a treaty of peace. It is said that a division composed of 1500 men, had been sent by Gen. Scott to take Toluca, a place near the city.

The schooner Panama, Capt. Porter, arrived on Saturday from Brazos, but brings no news of interest.

Gen. Cushing's brigade left the Brazos on the 20th, in four vessels.

Col. Hays arrived on the 29th, and was to leave the next day with five companies of his command, on board the steamship Fanny, for Vera Cruz.

The brig Cruson and schooners Equity and A. Cadmus were at the Brazos on the 29th, to leave for the port in a few days.

The Matamoros Flag on the 25th says:

Gen. Mirabeau B. Lamar has been announced as a candidate to represent the counties of San Patricio and Nueces in the representative branch of the State Legislature. The election will be held at the different election precincts in these counties on the first Monday in November next.

Gen. Lamar has, for about a year past, been stationed at Laredo, in Nueces county, in command of a company for the defense of the frontier, and is very, and deservedly, popular throughout the district which he is a candidate to represent.

The Governor of Texas has authorized Lieut. H. Bee to raise a company of mounted volunteers, to be mustered into service sometime in October. This company will be stationed at Laredo, and supply the place of that now there, under the command of Gen. Lamar, whose term of service expires in three or four weeks.

Capt. J.S. Sutton is also authorized to raise a company, to be stationed between the Nueces and Rio Grande, to supply the place of that recently commanded by Capt. Gray. Capt. Sutton was in Corpus Christi a few days ago recruiting.

They were translated for the Literary World, and probably a considerable portion of that merit may belong to the translator.
THE MEN OF CHURUBUSCO

They'll point them out in after years
The men of Churubusco fight! And tender hearts will name with tears,
The gallant spirits quenched in night,
When each who under Winfield fought,
And kept the field alive,
Was equal, in the deeds he wrought,
To any common five—
They'll point them out, those veterans then,
As far beyond all common men,
And each to each, with stern delight,
Will name the Churubusco Fight.

They'll sing their praise, when they are no more
The men of Churubusco fight!
And when their latest march is o'er
As one by one is lost to sight
Then girls will ask his friends to spare,
From off the hoary brow,
A shred but of the scattered hair
Which waves so richly now;
And loitered by the inn–side hearth
Will pause amid their tavern mirth,
And, filling, fear since he has pass'd
They drink "to Churubusco's last!"

They'll paint their deeds in statued hall
The deeds of Churubusco fight:
And on the smoke dried cottage wall,
Will smile their pictures, brave and bright,
Who fought with stalwart Scott of yore,
That glorious field to win
When every warrior bosom bore Five hero hearts within:
They'll legends tell of heroes then,
Far, far beyond of modern men,
And still in song will grow more bright,
The deeds of Churubusco fight.

Tuesday October, 19, 1847, RWv24i84p4c2 Bloodless Achievement words: 133

In his Message to Congress in 1845, Mr. Polk announces the consummation of the annexation of Texas in these jubilant strains:

"The accession to our territory has been a bloodless achievement. No arm of force has been raised to produce the result. The sword has had "no part in the victory. We have not sought to extend our territorial possession by conquest, or our republican institutions on a reluctant people. It was the deliberate homage of each people to the great principles of our federative Union."

We hope he will use this paragraph as a text in his next Message. The commentary, from his pen, now that we are seeking "to extend our territorial possessions by conquest," and to force "our republican institutions on a reluctant people," could not but be highly edifying!

Tuesday October, 19, 1847, RWv24i84p4c3 The Virginia Regiment words: 850

The last Staunton Spectator publishes several letters from its editor, Captain Harper, now in Mexico, from which we make the following extracts:

Camp Buena Vista, Aug. 25, 1847

Dear – : We arrived here last evening, the two Virginia companies in Saltillo– Capt. W.B. Archer’s and my own companies– having been relieved by Capt. Fletcher Archer’s and Capt. Thrift’s (late Capt. Fairfax’s,) and we are now once more established in our tents. The change in considerable, but I hope it will not prove disadvantageous to the health of our men. During the time we were stationed in the city we suffered greatly more from sickness than the other companies of the Regiment in camp, yet it may be as we have been so long housed, that we will have to undergo a new process of seasoning for the field. On this account I was averse to being sent into Saltillo in the first instance, having passed two nights in a house myself since my arrivals in Mexico, and quite as little inclined to the change again, until some movement of the troops was decided upon. A few days, however, will test the matter. Our sick-list, the day we left Saltillo, had dwindled down to six. The company, I am gratified to be able to say, well sustained its character for correct and soldierly deportment in the ten weeks it was stationed in the city, and many regrets were expressed to me at our departure. On marching out of the city, Governor Washington addressed us in a very complimentary manner, and requested me to say to the men, one and all, that their conduct had met his entire approbation. The Governor is a most estimable gentleman, and I sincerely hope, for his sake, as well as for the credit of our Regiment, that he will be equally well served by the companies which have relieved us. The duties of the post are arduous and responsible, being not merely the protection of the public stores and property, but embracing the almost entire government and police of the city.

The North Carolina Regiment, since the serious disturbances which occurred in it, has been detached from our brigade, and itsencampment removed. It is now stationed between this and Saltillo about two miles from the city, a little to the right of the road. I have heard nothing satisfactory from it since its removal; but I doubt whether anything like harmony can exist in the regiment under its present head. Our brigade consists of the Virginia and Mississippi regiment, and is under the command of Lieut. Col. Randolph. Gen. Cushing having left for Vera Cruz and Col. Hamtramck being sick. Major Early is in command of the Regiment.

It is said very confidently, but I do not know upon what authority, that Maj. Gen. Butler is to have command of this division of the Army. If so, I presume it is settled that Gen. Taylor goes home. This is greatly to be regretted: yet with the little prospect he has of being able to do anything more here, I am not surprised at it, nor can I blame home.

The Virginia Regiment, I am proud to say, is pronounced by the Regular officers here, the best appointed and best disciplined Volunteer Regiment that has yet been sent into the field. Our effective strength today, I understand is reported to be 650, which is not quite as great as the conjectural estimate I made of it one of my late letters. A number of changes have taken place in the company officers since we have been in Mexico, which it may be of interest of our friends at home to know. The following list I believe embraces them all. Our recruiting service: Capt. Carrington, Lieut. Ashby and Lieut. Kinney. His health has been bad nearly ever since he has been in the country. And Capt. Alburtis will also probably leave in a few days for Vera Cruz, to take home the remains of his brother, Capt. Alburtis, of the Regular Army, who was killed at the taking of the city.

Camp Buena Vista, Sept. 4, 1847

Col. Hamtramck has now entirely recovered from his recent indisposition, and assumed the command of the Volunteer Brigade. His staff are, Lieut. Porterfield, Va. Regiment Assistant Adjutant General, Lt. Henry, Mississippi Regiment, Aid–de–Camp, Capt. Harper, Virginia Regiment, Assistant Inspector General. The health of our regiment continues about the same that it has been for the last two months. The eleven companies here number 666 sent, of whom 95 are on the sick list. A very good hospital has been erected near our encampment, where every comfort is provided for the sick. The Mississippi regiment has also a hospital which appears to be very conducted. My company reports nine on the sick list this morning– none of whom are in the hospital, and of course the cases as yet are not of much seriousness. I fear, however, from the manifest influences of the climate upon two or three of those now sick, that they will have to be discharged.

Tuesday October, 19, 1847, RWv24i84p4c3 The Administration Views  words: 353

The intimate acquaintance with the views of the President and his Cabinet so often exhibited by the Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger, justifies the interference that in the following extract from one of his late letters we have an authentic intimation of the purposes of the Executive, as far as they have been formed, in regard to the farther prosecution of the war with Mexico:

"I informed you, some time ago, that there are various opinions in regard to the manner in which the war ought to be prosecuted against Mexico, how far, and for what ultimate purposes. The result of the election in Maryland may not be without effect of the deliberations of the Cabinet and as those of Pennsylvania are so near at hand, these also may be suffered to pass before a defensive conclusion is come to. The most natural supposition would be that it should be the line across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, when would compromise all that we desired of Mexico, and which, in her folly, she resolved upon refusing us. The time from Vera Cruz to Mexico, and thence to Acapulco indicated in one of my late letters, comes very near it; but, of course, I would submit to anything that held out from the commencement is now wholly administrative in question. It is a vital question which cannot be left hypothetical conclusion, as it will require a unanimous effect of all the branches of the government to bring it to a satisfactory issue. The time is precious, circumstances pressing, events pending within the next hour be resolved upon. The thought once expressed cannot be called back; a million of arms will be raised to realize it– De facto, we are already masters of the Continent; the question is whether we shall have the courage to assert our sway. If the administration finally resolve upon that, we have at least the consolation to know that there never was a period in history of Europe and Asia– more favorable to the enterprise. Half way measures, however, we not answer either in the Cabinet or the Field."

Friday October, 22, 1847, RWv24i85p1c1 The Country and the President  words: 818

We made a brief extract yesterday, in the sentiments of which we entirely concurred, from a speech delivered a few days since before a WH meeting at Newark, by Senator Miller, of New Jersey, in opposition to a suggestion, which has met with some favor in other quarters, that the next House of Representatives should refuse to grant further supplies for the prosecution of the existing war, unless the President shall satisfy that body that it is not waged for the acquisition of territory. And as the President cannot of course do this, since the failure of the lately attempted negotiation resulted altogether from the refusal of the Mexican authorities to cede New Mexico and the valley of the Rio Grande to the United States, which had been demanded of her as a sine qua non of the cessation of hostilities, the recommendation necessarily assumes an unconditional character. While, however, we are opposed to any course of policy that will embarrass the Administration in the "vigorous" prosecution of the war while it shall last, we are not less so to the able administration of public affairs, and are subject to no impeachment therefore, if the Commons judge it expedient to resort to that mode of trial. Hence, when the measures of the British Ministers fail to receive the sanction of the Commons, they instantly resign, and the King, obedient to the popular will thus expressed by its duly recognized organ, however repugnant it may be to his individual views of State policy, or to his personal feelings, promptly dismisses them, and calls around him individuals entertaining views of an opposite character. Public Opinion is in truth the King. In the United States, however, according to the doctrine of the Administration, as proclaimed and reiterated by "its Organs, great and small," the British maxim is assumed to be literally true—our King can do no wrong—and it is "moral treason" to say that he can! For it is only upon this assumption that this champions can affirm that those who assail the President for involving the country in war, are, for that reason, traitors to the country itself— or that such as denounce the conduct of the Administration, either for originating as unnecessary war, or for the feeble manner of it prosecution, can be reproached with inconsistency when they should their muskets, or when, not feeling called upon to take that step, they give their sanction to every proper measure that may be recommended by the President, to give "aid and comfort" to our gallant soldiers, of whom it is not unsafe to assume that a full moiety are Whigs, and to and to uphold the honor and the rights of the nation. In one word, (to use and idea of Senator Miller,) the Whigs draw a distinction between the war and its authors. We support the war, because it is connected with the honor of the country; but we oppose its authors, because that have unnecessarily involved the country in a sanguinary and costly conflict, from which no benefit can accrue to the people of this country, terminate as it may—certainly none at all comparable with the mischief’s and dangers of which whether it end sooner or later, it will be the prolific source.

At a meeting held in Lynchburg, on Friday evening last, Col. Odin G. Clay in the Chair, and Messrs. C.W. Christian and R.H. Glass action as Secretaries, resolutions were adopted, after speeches from Maj. James Garland and Thomas S. Bocock, Esq. in favor of a more "vigorous prosecution of the war." This is all right, and it is to be hoped that the Administration will not fail to profit by the timely admonition. It is, indeed, rather surprising that these evidences of public discontent growing out of the want of ability and energy heretofore displayed by the Administration in the conduct of the war, have not been much more frequent. Look, for example, at the consequences of its imbecility, as set forth in the following extract of a letter from one of the Pennsylvania volunteers, written lately from Puebla:

"General Scott has fought and won a splendid battle at the city: this was followed by an armistice and a talk, which has resulted in nothing, and again "the dogs of war" are loose. I suppose that army will go into the city, and, after it does, we will be about as near to peace as "The Far West" is to sunset. If we had 25,000 more troops on this line, so as to command everything between Vera Cruz and Mexico, victories would be worth something towards a great end—peace. As it is, this country is fooled to the top of its bent by the cry of peace when there is no peace. The Government is wronging itself—wronging its friends—and, worse that all, wronging the country, by its miserable meager supply of forces. It is wretched and cruel economy."

"When we get about thirty thousand additional troops on this line, it is probable that peace will be in sight, but not till then. Our victories, brilliant and glorious as poetry can make them, are utterly worthless. We have taken possession of the country between Vera Cruz and Mexico, and hold none of it except Perote and Puebla, and here our troops are more like prisoners than victorious tenants."

If Mr. Polk had called out the entire force authorized by law, as soon as the war began, it would now in all probability have been over. But even at this moment, while the Union is breathing nothing but slaughter, what indication is there of the infusion of new energy in the councils of the Government of in the acts of its offices? We look in vain for any such exhibition. So far as the public know, everything is moving on as it was before. It is still “all talk,” as it has been from the beginning.

But Resolutions, it has been well said, will not make railroads– not will they win battles. If they could, the Tenth Legion, which passed flaming resolutions in support of a vigorous war long ago, would have been already crowned with laurel. We hope, however, whenever another requisition shall be made upon Virginia, that the "old Tenth" will not fail to back its resolutions by its acts– to show its faith by its works. The truth is, people are beginning to talk about its backwardness in this matter, and we think it the part of friendship to let it know of the fact in this private way.

At the late hour last night, the steamship Fashion, Captain Ivy, arrived from Vera Cruz and Tampico– having left Vera Cruz on the 7th and Tampico on the 9th inst. By this arrival we are placed in possession of letters from our correspondent, "Mustang," from the city of Mexico, as late as the 28th of September, and files of the "American Star," a new paper published by Messrs. Peoples and Barnard, at the capital. Our correspondence, both from the city of Mexico and Vera Cruz, is very voluminous. The lateness of the hour at which we received it, precludes the possibility of our giving more than one of the graphic letters of our correspondent "Mustang", entire, this morning, with a brief synopsis of the highly interesting news, hastily gleaned from the mass of documents in our possession.

We have full details of the killed, wounded, and missing; copies of the General Orders issued by the Commander–in–Chief, from the time of the capture of the city up to the latest date; the manifesto of Gen. Bravo, addressed to the Minister of War and Marine, descriptive of the operations of the Mexican forces at and about Chapultepec, on the 12th and 13th of September; resignation of the Presidency by Gen. Santa Anna, etc.,– all of which we will endeavor to lay before our readers tomorrow. Our loss has been severe. The previous rumor of Generals Pillow, Worth, and Smith being killed, we are gratified to learn were without foundation.

Among the wounded, we regret to see the name of our contemporary, Mr. Kendall, of the Picayune. We trust, however, his wound is but a slight one.

The American prisoners, who were sent from the city of Mexico to Toluca, on the approach of Gen. Scott to the capital, have been sent back to the city of Mexico, still as prisoners of war and under parole. It is said they were sent by the governor of Mexico on his own responsibility. The names of the officers, thus liberated on parole, are Capts. Clay, Heady, and Smith. Lieuts. Churchill, Davidson, and Barbour, and sixteen privates.

The city of Mexico we quiet at the latest dates, though daily reports of the rising of the populace and the assassination of our army were rife. Little fear, however, was entertained by our army of any such attempt; for, as our correspondent remarks, “an enemy who could not stand against us in the field will not be likely to attack, much less attempt to overpower us, with the city and its strong holds in our possession.”

The Mexican Congress was to meet on the 5th of this month at Queretaro

The seven Northern States, which some time since formed a coalition to oppose negotiations for peace, have held a meeting be delegates, and denounced Santa Anna as a traitor and an outlaw, and at the same time have passed a resolution pledging each State to furnish 3000 men, armed and equipped, for the further prosecution of the war, and appointed Generals Paredes and Bustamante to command the troops thus to be raised.

The whereabouts of Santa Anna was not known at the capital on the 28th Sept. Rumor placed him in the vicinity of Puebla.
Cols. Dickinson, Baxter, and McIntosh have dies of their wounds; Gens. Pillow and Shields are recovering slowly.

We have received the first two numbers (the 20th and 23rd September) of the "American Star," published in the city of Mexico, by Messrs. Peoples and Barnard. They are principally filled with the General Orders of the Commander–in–Chief, after the capture of the city, which we will endeavor to lay before our readers tomorrow. The following Order, issued by Gen. Scott, immediately after his entrance into the Capital, we cannot, though at the late, or rather very early hour at which we write– omit to lay before our readers:

Mexico, Sept. 14, 1847

General Orders no.234–1. Under the favor of God, the valor of this army, after many glorious victories, has hoisted the colors of our country in the capital of Mexico and on the palace of its government.

–2. But the war is not ended. The Mexican Army and government have fled only to watch an opportunity to return upon us in vengeance. We must, then, be upon our guard.

–3. Companies and Regiments will be kept together, and all stand on the alert. Our safety is in military discipline.

–4. Let there be no drunkenness, no disorders, and no straggling. Stragglers will be in great danger of assassination, and marauders shall be punished by court martial.

–5. All the rules so honorably observed by this glorious army in Puebla, must be observed here. The honor of the army, and the honor of our country call for the best behavior on the part of all. The valiant must, to win the approbation of God and our country, be sober, orderly, and merciful. His noble brethren in arms will not be deaf to this hasty appeal from their commander and friend.

–6. Major General Quitman is appointed Civil and Military Governor of Mexico.

By command of Major General Scott
H.L. Scott, A.A.A.G

The American Star of the 20th September, in speaking of the execution of the deserters, says that 16 of them were hung at San Angel on the 9th, and immediately after some 10 to 12 were whipped and branded on the cheek with the letter D. Riley, the chief of the crowd, came in for a share of the whipping and branding. The next morning 4 others were executed at Mixcoac, and on the 13th, 30 more were hung upon one gallows at the same place. It appears that Riley, according to our military laws, could not be hung, he having deserted from our army before the commencement of hostilities.

The Deserters– A former citizen of Columbus hung.– Capt. Sanderson, in a letter from Mexico to the Ohio Statesman, says: "It is said that they (the Mexicans) had twenty thousand troops in this battle; so says Harrison Kinney, from Columbus, whom I found fighting with the enemy– he having deserted from Puebla, and is now a prisoner, and will be shot. This is the opinion of most of the officers." The deserters have all since been hung; and the Statesman adds: – "This Kinney was a tailor by trade in this city, and it is a melancholy record to make of his end. We cannot see what tempted him to this great crime of deserting his country. He has a child in this city, his wife being dead. We did not suppose our city would have such a reproach to bear from one of her volunteers."

Our columns are crowded this morning with the highly interesting details of the recent exciting and important events in Mexico. By a succession of victorious unsurpassed brilliancy by any series of triumphs, in ancient or modern war,our heroic army has won imperishable renown. Indeed, when we contemplate its numerical inferiority, in connection with the fact that it was operating in the heart of an enemy's country, and in the midst of a fiercely hostile population, possessing all the advantages resulting from an accurate knowledge of the strongest natural points of defense, improved as they had been by formidable works of art, the march from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico, and the triumphal entry of our forces into that ancient capital, can be regarded as scarcely less than miraculous. General Scott has established new claims to the admiration and gratitude of his country, by the brilliancy of this wonderful campaign; and we need not add that the accomplished band of officers by whom he was consoled and aided; and the unconquerable soldiers by whom their skilfully devised plans were so fearlessly executed, are not less entitled to the applause and the thanks of their country. These, we doubt not, will be given to them in not stinted measure. But, if justice be done, a more substantial, though scarcely more acceptable reward, will be promptly tendered by the Government, in the promotion of the survivors in these sanguinary engagements, so far as existing vacancies, or as the creation of offices in new corps hereafter to be raised, may permit. This is the best evidence that can be given them, assuredly, that their heroism— their heroism of endurance as well as of action— is justly appreciated,— which, in view of the contumelious guarded by the appointing power, they might otherwise by well justified in doubting.

The conquest of the capital has not been affected, of course, without a deplorable loss of life, embracing, as usual, a very large proportion of distinguished officers. A complete list of the latter will be found in our columns this morning, as well as of those who were wounded in the several battles. Among them will be found the name of several Virginians— among them Col. Garland, Col. Johnson, who was also wounded at Cerro Gordo, and Captains Larkin Smith and J.B. Magruder. The Enquirer is mistaken in embracing Capt. Calwell in the number. An officer of that name is among the wounded, but Mr. Kendall states that he is from Pennsylvania. Capt. Calwell, of Virginia, is with the detachment under Maj. Lally.

The measures adopted by Gen. Scott, since his entrance into the city, seem to have been equally decided and judicious; and, although many of our troops have been assassinated, we think there is very little reason to apprehend a general outbreak among the population. We do not, nevertheless, think the danger is entirely over. It will be seen, by an extract from the Tampico paper, that one of the most destructive battles, so far as the loss of life is involved, fought since the opening of the campaign, occurred between Maj. Lally's train and the guerrillas under the Priest Jarauta; and there are indications that the whole power of Santa Anna will now be directed to assaults of this kind upon the various detachments on their way to reinforce Gen. Scott. We have now before us Santa Anna's Manifesto, issued after his flight from the city of Mexico, in which he says that it is now necessary "to attack the enemy, in his lines of communication from Vera Cruz to the capital," and that he has taken upon himself that responsibility, because he feels it incumbent upon his ever to place himself in that quarter in which there is the most peril! He talks as bravely as ever; but it is almost impossible, after the splendid achievement of our troops on all occasions heretofore, to feel any very serious apprehension in regard to the result of this effort to arrest the progress of the detachments of their way from Vera Cruz.

"Matters are approaching a crisis, while the great mistake in not entering the capital on the night of the 20th, when the Mexicans were perfectly panic stricken and in full flight, is hourly developing itself. The great sacrifice of life yesterday— the loss of so many gallant spirits— has all been owing to the cession of hostilities and that armistice which followed, and an awful responsibility rests either with the Government or with Gen. Scott and Mr. Trist. The instructions will show, but I am of the opinion that the former is mostly to blame. The latter are censurable for placing faith in Mackintosh, in giving Santa Anna so much time, or even in having any reliance upon his power and ability to make peace under all the circumstances, however much he might have desired it personally. I will say nothing of the bribery— that dark side of the picture is undoubtedly the work of the exceedingly wise men at Washington. Bad advisers have been busy, both here and at home, in recommending measures to bring about a peace, and their consuls have prevailed to the exclusion of the opinions of men who might have been listened to with profit. I trust the experience of the past may prove a lesson for the future, and that by this time our rulers must see—and their consuls have prevailed to the exclusion of the opinions of men who might have been listened to with profit. Friday October, 22, 1847, RWv24i85p2c1 Return of Gen. Taylor  words: 160

In the New Orleans National of the 14th, it is stated, on the authority of an officer of the army twenty-four days from Gen. Taylor's camp, that the General might be expected in that city in the course of a week or ten days. "He was preparing (says the National) to leave Walnut Springs when our informant last saw him, and he spoke of his return to the United States freely, and anticipated the pleasure he should have on his cotton farm. He is in good health and spirits." The National adds the following items of intelligence.

"At Gen. Taylor's camp, when our informant left, was the following immense army: Bragg's battery and the skeleton remains of three companies of the 2nd Drag. under Col. Fauntleroy. At Monterey, there was Col. Tibbats, with five companies of the 16th Regiment of Infantry. The city of Monterey, it is said, was under better government, from Gen. Taylor's camp, that the General might be expected in that city in the course of a week or ten days. "He was preparing (says the National) to leave Walnut Springs when our informant last saw him, and he spoke of his return to the United States freely, and anticipated the pleasure he should have on his cotton farm. He is in good health and spirits." The National adds the following items of intelligence.

Friday October, 22, 1847, RWv24i85p2c2 Another letter from Gen. Taylor  words: 451

We find in the last New York Courier and Enquirer the substance of a letter addressed by Gen. Taylor to Joseph R. Ingersoll, Esq. of Philadelphia. It will be seen that the General, in this letter, removes all doubt in regard to his political affinities. He avows that he is "a decided Whig"— and this, we suppose, will be admitted to be "the best evidence" of which the case admits! The Courier says:

The letter is dated the 3rd of August, 1847, at the Head Quarters of the Army of Occupation in Mexico. It commences by stating that he (Gen. Taylor) is "a Whig not an ultra partisan Whig, but a decided Whig;" that no one could have observed the debate in the Congress of the last session on the attempt to censure him for this capitulation of Monterey, conducted mainly on “party grounds,” and doubt “the complexion of his politics.” That he has held a commission in the army of the United States for forty years,—this commission being one of the last issued by Mr. Jefferson; that in the last Presidential election he advocated the election of Mr. Clay, believing that he and his friends “assimilated” more to the principles of Mr. Jefferson than their “opponents.”

Gen. Taylor proceeds then to define his present position;—that he does not think himself qualified for the Presidency; that he would willingly postpone his name to secure the election of Mr. Clay or any of the distinguished men of the same school now presented to the public. If, however, the people of the United States shall spontaneously elect him, he shall feel himself bound to serve; but that he will not accept of a party nomination “exclusively.” That if he should be elected he will go into office unpledged to any particular course; that he was determined to carry out the intention of the framers of the constitution, of who two (referring to Washington and Madison,) were among the early Presidents of the country, and that he is determined in such case to be the President of the “nation” and not a “party.”

This letter is, we understand, the most full and satisfactory exposition of Gen. Taylor’s views, yet given by him. Mr. Ingersoll will not consent to its publication, because it is an answer to a letter forged by some individual and purporting to have been written by Mr. Ingersoll, when no such latter was ever written by him.

We think Mr. Ingersoll right in the position he has taken; but we hope he will take the proper measures to relieve himself from this difficulty, and obtain the consent of Gen. Taylor to lay this interesting document before the public.

The steamer Fashion, Capt. Ivy, arrived last evening from Vera Cruz via Tampico, having left the former city on the 7th and the latter of the 9th. From the 3rd to the 7th outward bound vessels were detained at Vera Cruz by a heavy norther, and little communication was had with the shore. The Fashion has experienced very rough weather.

By this arrival we have our correspondence from Mr. Kendall and others up to the 28th of September from the city of Mexico. The news is glorious, ever glorious for the American arms; at the same time our losses are severe, and the details of the killed and wounded heart sickening. Thank God! None of our generals have been killed, but Maj. Gen. Pillow and Brig. Gen. Shields were both wounded severely, but were doing well at last accounts. We are not about to repeat the list of killed here; it will be found in Mr. Kendall’s letters. We may mention, however, that Col. McIntosh and Col. Ransom, Lieut. Col. Martin Scott, Lieut. Col. Graham, of the 11th Infantry, Lieut. Col. Baxter, of the New York Regiment, and Lieut. Col. Dickinson, of the South Carolina regiment, are dead. For the rest of the deplorable list we refer to Kendall’s letters.

In the battle of the King’s Mill on the 8th, Gen. Worth’s division lost about 600 men killed and wounded. In the battles of the 13th— the storming of Chapultepec and the attacks on the citadel— Quitman’s division lost 300, Twiggs’ 268, Pillow’s 142, and Worth’s 138– 848 in all. Worth had scarcely a thousand men in this action. Our entire loss since leaving Puebla in killed, wounded and missing Mr. Kendall sets down at 3000; another authority makes it 4000. And yet Gen. Scott entered the valley of Mexico with an army only a little exceeding 10,000 men. What wonders have not these “ten thousand” achieve! The Mexican accounts representing that we were at any time seriously repulsed are not true. The Mexican loss is not definitely ascertained, but was enormous.

Gen. Bravo was not killed, but was taken prisoner. We do not see that Santa Anna was wounded. It is true that he has resigned the Presidency. We have the act before us, but have not room for it today. Since his resignation he has made an address to his countrymen, which we will give tomorrow.

Friday October, 22, 1847, RWv24i85p2c6 Affairs of Vera Cruz and on the Road  words: 710

Our paper and letters by the Fashion contain much interesting and important information in relation to the state of the road from Vera Cruz to the capital. We proceed to give such items as are of immediate interest.

The report that Gen. Rea was at Puebla is fully confirmed, and the Genius of Liberty, of the 27th, says our troops under Col. Childs were bombarding the city from the surrounding heights. The same paper, of the 2nd, has the following.

“Gen. Santa Anna never so badly discomfited, was by the very latest accounts at Puebla. His force, after its junction with that of Gen. Rea, amounted in infantry and cavalry to 3000 men, and it was quartered in the convent of St. Carmen. The Americans under the command of Col. Childs, were strongly fortified in a massively built and very capacious convent of the same city, conscious of the strength of their position, and its impregnability, were awaiting the arrival of reinforcements, in the utmost security and tranquility. At intervals bombs were thrown into the city, which, however, we are happy to say did not receive much injury from their explosion previous to the date of our accounts.

From the tenor of our Vera Cruz correspondent’s letters, we have no doubt that Col. Childs would soon be reinforced by the arrival of Gen. Lane with his brigade at Puebla. He reached Jalapa on the 30th, and was to leave the next day for Puebla. Maj. Lally’s command accompanied him. Our correspondents say, writing on the 29th.

"Capt. Biscoe’s command returned yesterday from the National Bridge, whence it had been to escort ammunition for Gen. Lan’s command, which had already started, the general having left orders for the ammunition train to move on and join him. From pretty good information received at the Bridge, Capt. Biscoe was confident there was not a guerrilla at Cerro Gordo, and that the whole command would arrive safe at Jalapa, where it would obtain a supply of provisions.

"Another small train of provisions left the city last night, a part of which was for Col. Collin’s and a part for Col. Hugee’s command. The fact that Capt. Biscoe’s company was not attacked either in going to or returning from the National Bridge, is evidence that the guerrillas have abandoned that road for the present, but I have no doubt they will return when least expected."

Our correspondent, writing from Vera Cruz on the 4th, says that a gentleman who arrived from Mexico on the 15th September, says that he met fully 2000 Mexican soldiers (deserters) on their way to Puebla and other southern places south of Mexico.

Capt. Fairchild’s command returned to Vera Cruz on the 8th, from the Bridge, having escorted provisions to Col. Hughes’s and Col. Collins’s command. On the way back they were fired into, and Lieut. Maralles, of Capt. F’s company, was severely wounded in the left hand, which will no doubt have to be amputated.

Gen. Alvarez has been appointed commandant of the State of Puebla, and is represented to be unceasing in his efforts to organize and equip another force for the purpose of cutting off Gen. Scott’s communication with Vera Cruz, and of preventing any new accession of men and supplies.

The following is from the Genius of Liberty of the 30th:

"Our city looks quite brisk and lively this morning, owing to the arrival of the steamers New Orleans, Telegraph, and Ohio; our harbor, notwithstanding the violence of the wind, is literally covered with boats running backwards and forwards, landing horses, mules and government stores; and the loud peal of the cannon is occasionally heard from Fort Conception, giving a hearty welcome to our gallant officers and brave soldiers.

Our correspondent, writing on the 4th, says Gen. Patterson expected to be able to start for the interior in about a week with 2000 or more men.

The U.S. schooner Flirt had been out eleven days on a cruise in search of a suspicious vessel, supposed to be a privateer, but returned without getting a glimpse of her.

The Genius of the 29th, says a report was circulating in Vera Cruz, that a bearer of dispatches from Gen. Scott was killed at the city of Cordova— N.O. Picayune

Friday October, 22, 1847, RWv24i85p4c2 The Natural Boundary words: 343

We assure the Baltimore American that we have never doubted that the line of the Sierra Madre would constitute an admirable line of diversion between two nations. Our objection to its adoption is, that, in order to reach the line, we shall be compelled to annex to the Union a vast territory, which we are assured is itself wholly worthless, and, with it, a race of people who are worse than worthless.

The Allegheny range of mountains, we suspect, is of not less stupendous height that the Sierra Madre, and is marked by Nature with as bold an outline: But we should not deem it entirely logical to argue from this fact that Nature intended it to be the dividing line between two independent nations, instead of, as it is, and as the Sierra Madre is, a not very inconvenient barrier to the intercourse of one people, owing and owning allegiance to the same government.

The "paramount idea" of the "Unity," upon which our Baltimore contemporary dwells with so much plausibility and earnestness, is far more important in its application to the inhabitants of a country, that to the country itself. The habits and customs of a people exert for more influence upon institutions of government, than mere geographical affinities. Hence, while the Sierra Madre might be, geographically, a very suitable line of division between Mexico and the United States, the people who dwell between that range of mountains and the Rio Grande would, in our estimation, constitute a very undesirable, not to say a very demoralizing and dangerous acquisition. That other “natural boundary,” long ago pointed out by the sagacity of Gen. Jackson and (perhaps for that reason) adapted by Mr. Benton and claimed by Mr. Ingersoll as the western frontier of Texas, even after Texas has legislated herself into possession of upwards of two thousand miles of Mexican territory in length and some hundreds in breadth, is no doubt quite as good a dividing line, geographically considered, as the Sierra Madre, and is infinitely preferable in its social and political aspects.

By the arrival of the steamship, Yacht, Captain Crane, from Galveston, we have papers of that place to the 9th and corresponding dates from the interior.

There had been a few cases of fever in Galveston, which manifested a tendency to the yellow fever type. These cases occurred in the hospital, and none are reported in private practice. The general health of the city, it is said, was never better. The Austin Democrat says.

“Dr. Veatch, 1rst Lieut. of Gen. Lamar’s company, arrived in this city on Monday last direct from Laredo, and proceeded immediately to San Augustine, in search of the Governor. Gen. Lamar desires assistance if it can possibly be given, as he is of the impression that there is danger of the general rising of the Mexicans at the different small towns on the Rio Grande, and between that stern and Gen. Taylor’s rear. He states that he has various reasons for forming this opinion. Commissions have been issued, and the population seems to be organizing rapidly into guerrilla bands. Mr. Van Ness, of San Antonio, who was at San Fernando with goods, was compelled to leave that place with the utmost precipitancy in order to save his life, leaving the whole of his goods in the hands of the Mexicans. These guerrillas are represented as being well armed, many of them having revolvers, and as they are chiefly rancheros, whose proximity to, and long intercourse with, the Americans has made them familiar with the rifle, and expert in its use, they may justly be reckoned the most formidable and dangerous portion of the Mexican population.

The Mexican Views of the War with the United States. The letter of which the following is a translation was sent to the New York Herald by a gentleman in Montgomery Alabama. It was taken from the hacienda of Santa Anna, after the battle of Cerro Gordo. It is a curious epistle and very striking in many of its points.

New York, May 7, 1844.

To his Excellency the President, Gen. Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna:

My much–venerated Sir– Of course you have been duly informed of the condition of affairs in this country by Gen. Almonte; and thus, it would be superfluous for me to say anything on that subject.

My object now is solely to call the attention of your Excellency to the articles which have been written latterly in El Noticioso de Ambos Mundos, not for what they are worth, but because all that I say in them is the pure truth; and on this account they afford material for serious reflection.

In order to know this country, it is necessary to be here many years, study it well in all its aspects, undergo many vicissitudes, and experience difficulties. Thus it is that travelers, who have written about this country, have only written nonsense. Gen. Almonte, himself, with all his knowledge of this people, can continually pick up facts which had before escaped his notice; and I, myself, am also learning something new about them every day.

From all which I have been able to observe, I have obtained the thorough conviction that this is an enterprising nation, full of energy, which borders more on rashness than on true courage, ambitions without bounds, and uniting to a childish presumption of what of all fixed principles of justice. The blind vanity with which they are possessed, causes them to regard all other nations, and especially our race, with the greatest contempt, and it will be only by means of some hard lessons that reason can be knocked into these men whose understandings are so far astray in consequence of their never having known adversity; and in my opinion no one can learn these lessons better than Mexico.

To do this it is only necessary to prepare yourself to maintain an endless war against this country; the Russians burnt Moscow and saved the empire; Moscow is now flourishing, and Napoleon terminated his days sadly as St. Helena. Let the people retire from the coasts with all their cattle and effects, and let them guard the mountain passes, continually surprising from thence those who dare to land on the shores, and the army will do the rest. Let them arm the Indians who have been thrust out on our frontiers by these people, in the most perfidious and barbarous manner; arm also the Negroes, promising them lands from those which they conquer; proclaim also the abolition of slavery, and let an army of 20,000 regular troops be planted in Texas to sustain the movements of the auxiliary troops, who will act as guerrillas; let both these forces retire to safe positions whenever the enemy advance in large numbers, merely endeavoring to fatigue them by continual marches and counter–marches, and then falling on them in all security, when they are thoroughly tired out, and completely exhausted by hunger and thirst.

Finally, in order to accomplish all this, there is no necessity for going hastily to work; but we can imitate the example of Fabius the Tardy, acting with the same vigilance that that famous Roman consul observed, so that the Mexican army may be preserved intact, and the war my last as long as the one between the Spaniards and Moors, whilst our privateers are scouring every sea and annihilating the American commerce; and I will forfeit my head if they do not, on their knees, beg a peace from Mexico before six years have passed, allowing her to dictate the conditions, for it is not killing men which will alarm this people, but the expenses and cost which they are put to.

Beyond this it is necessary to recollect that war can also be made with the pen nowadays, and a manifesto on the part of Mexico, published in three languages – Spanish, English, and French– would attract towards her much sympathy, particularly from the abolitionists in all parts of the world, who are now both numerous, strong, and active, for which it will be necessary to settle all small questions with the rest of the world, even making temporary concessions not perpetual ones. When these Northern and Eastern States see the war is going to be a long one, that they have to contribute much, that their commerce is ruined, and their funds or credit prostrated, they will soon raise the cry against the Southern States, and an issue will be raised which only end with Union, and leave the Southern States alone. And how the rest of the nations would rejoice in the humbling on the pride of the United States, and what glory for Mexico in being the one who "belled the cat!"

Would your Excellency believe that in the contempt with which they regard Mexico, it has never occurred to these people that you have taken any of these measures, or would take them, until I have alluded to it in my articles. The mere hint that I threw out that Mexico, in her despair, would sell the Californias to a powerful nation, has alarmed them in a most inexplicable manner, supposing that this country is England. That article, which you will see in El Noticioso, of the 20th April, was like a rocket in awakening them, and immediately it was copied by all the opposition papers; and, without vanity, I must say that on its account many who were before undecided, have declared against the treaty, and since then the most terrible opposition has been made to it.

Finally, I believe, that at present annexation will not take place; but let your Excellency rest assured that on this account we must not desist; war is the only thing which can save the honor of Mexico and the integrity of her territory, as what I state in the last number of the Noticioso of the 4th is the exactest truth. Moreover, without war, this people will swallow up this country with their deceits and falsehoods, and there is no other mode of restraining them that by a well directed war.

My zeal has perhaps allowed my pen to run too far into matters which your Excellency understands far better than I do; but I hope your goodness will not attribute them to presumption, but to the enthusiasm which naturally inspires me in the good wishes I have to see my country triumphant over its false friends and natural enemies.

God grant that I may see them verifies, and that your Excellency may be the chosen one to direct such a worthy enterprise and oh! That I may be of some service, even from such a very humble servant as I am of your Excellency.

JUAN DE LA GRANJA

Tuesday October, 26, 1847, RWv24i86p1c1 An Erroneous View words: 595

Among the resolutions adopted at the public meeting recently held at Darlington Court House, South Carolina, in reference to the Wilmot Proviso, is the following:

"That to repudiate the conquests won by our victories in our present and just war, beyond the Rio Grande, after the expenditure of so much blood and treasure, for the purpose of avoiding the shock of this collision, would be a futility, and the acknowledgement of a weakness that would justly expose us to the derision of the world; while at the same time, such a puerile policy would only postpone the issue."

"If it could be shown that that portion of the Mexican territory, the cession of which has been demanded by the Administration, were in itself desirable, for the purpose of strengthening our frontier defenses, or that it is necessary for the accommodation of an over crowded population, or even if, being unnecessary for these objects, it contained a large body of waste lands, the title of which being in the Mexican Government, would be transferred to our own and constitute a source of revenue hereafter, to be dedicated to the payment of debt incurred in the prosecution of the war– and if, in addition to this, we might get the soil without the ignorant and turbulent population by which it is inhabited, as alien and hostile race, whom it would cost more to govern that their whole country is worth, if this could be shown, we might be disposed to subscribe to the position embodied in the foregoing resolution. If all this were so, the object view would at least justify, without making an effort commensurate with its importance, and at whatever hazard, might naturally subject us to the imputation of that “fear which betrays like treason.” But if the reverse of all this be true, would we not, by courting the agitation, and peril to the perpetuity of the Union, that must obviously result from the acquisition of Mexican territory, not only valueless in itself, but absolutely pernicious, if by process we are to transmute whole provinces of Mexican rancheros and lepers into American voters, justly subject ourselves not only to the “derision of the world,” but what would be far more keenly felt, to self reproach, and to the excretion of the friends of civil liberty in this and all other lands, in this and all coming generations? If Mexico were “one entire perfect chrgsolite,” we might well hesitate before, for the glory or for profit of its acquisition, we should consent to put in jeopardy and great and glorious confederacy formed by the men of the Revolution, and which, by the magic rapidity of its growth, the consolidation of its power and the multiplication of its infinite sources of national and individual prosperity, has more than realized the hopes of its founders, and refuted the malignant prophecies of those who foretold because they desired its speedy overthrow. But when that portion of the Mexican Republic demanded by the President is described uniformly by all who have seen it as sterile and barren, as if the curse of God had blasted it, is it wise or patriotic for the purpose of securing an evil, to incur the hazard of forfeiting all the blessings which have resulted from the Union, and which will be perpetuated by its preservation, simply because, if we decline to do so, our motives may be liable to misconstruction, and we may perchance incur the “derision” of foreign despots, in whose vocabulary Might and Right and convertible terms? We think not.

The great importance of everything coming from Mexico, and the deep interest felt by all in everything appertaining to the war, induces us to appropriate a considerable portion of our columns today to further details of the news received yesterday: We copy from the Picayune.

From the Picayune we take the following extract from Gen. Scott’s orders proclaiming martial law in the city of Mexico, and levying contributions upon its citizens:

“14. For the ease and safety of both parties, in all cities and towns occupied by the American army, a Mexican police shall be established and duly harmonized with the military police of the said forces.

“15. The splendid capital– its churches and religious worship; its convents and monasteries; its inhabitants and property, are, moreover, placed under the safeguard of the faith and honor of the American army.

“16. In consideration of the foregoing protection, a contribution of $150,000 is imposed on this capital, to be paid in four weekly installments of thirty–seven thousand five hundred dollars, ($37,500) each, beginning on Monday next, 20th, and termination on Monday, the 11th day of October.

“17. The Ayuntamiento, or corporate authority of the city is especially charged with the collection of payment of the several installments.

“18. Of the whole contribution to be paid over to this army, twenty thousand dollars shall be appropriated to the purchase of extra comforts for the wounded and sick in the hospitals; ninety thousand dollars (90,000) to the purchase of blankets and shoes for gratuitous distribution among the rank and file of the army, and forty thousand dollars ($40,000) reserved for other necessary military purposes.”

The following orders will show how solicitations General Scott is, that the religious sentiments of the Mexicans should be respected by his soldiers. All tolerant and good men we think will approve:

General Orders – No. 297
Headquarters of the Army,

Extracts of a letter from Col. George W. Hughes, of the District of Columbia and Maryland regiment, dated at the National Bridge, the 30th Sept., 1847, to a friend in Washington.

“You are aware that I had taken possession of this important place with about 400 men, against a very superior force, ten days before Gen. Lane reached us with his 1600 men.

“I have completely broken up the nest of murderous bandits here, so that any individual may travel between it and Vera Cruz with impunity. On arriving at this post, my feelings were greatly outraged at the barbarity of the Mexican guerrilleros, who have so long infested the route. The soldiers who had loitered on the road behind the train, had been savagely murdered, stripped naked, brutally mutilated and exposed and the remains on one of our officers had been exhumed from the grave, and torn limb from limb –food for wolves! I determined to teach these people a lesson, which I believe has been a salutary one. I have shot several who acted with the guerrillas, and have burnt every house within ten miles round, in which public property, plundered from our trains, was discovered. We found knapsacks, camp and garrison equipment, oats, quartermasters wagons, candles, soldiers clothing, caps with the names of soldiers in them, boxes of medicine, and United States ammunition – everything indicating a depot of banditry. We have also discovered and destroyed their place of rendezvous. In no case have quiet and peaceable people – men, women, or children – been disturbed. The result is, that the fellows are panic struck, and have taken themselves off– not a single shot having been fired into my camp. A few still linger about, but rarely show themselves of Watts, of Washington city, a few days ago, both mounted and armed. He killed one from whose body he took a U.S. Dragoon sword and belt; the other he charged upon with his bayonet (after receiving the fire of his esopet) and wounded; but the dog escaped. If I only had a squadron of dragoons, I could most advantageously extend my operations.”

“Having punished them severely, I offered protection to such as would abandon the guerrillas, come in, trade with us, and remain quite. They seem delighted with this, and trade has become quite active. I have assured them that our government wished to wage no war upon the people of Mexico; but that, as this neighborhood has chosen to make war on its own account, in a guerrilla shape, it could not complain of any consequences which has followed, and would certainly follow, its evil conduct. They replied that it was all just– that they had bad men amongst them, and that they were rejoiced that we had at last taken possession of the National Bridge; for that now they would have protection against their own robbers, who had forced them to desert their villages. They have been invited to return, and several families are about to return. This course, if followed up with energy, firmness, and discretion, and a sufficient and proper force, will put down the guerrilla system.”

“ You will see all the news by the next steamer, before this reaches you. The British courier saw Santa Anna yesterday at Puebla, where he was endeavors on to raise money. The impression is, that he is seeking an opportunity to quit the country, knowing his game is up.

We copy the following notice of this gallant officer from the Baltimore Sun, which, however, is in error in claiming him as a citizen of that place. Capt. M. is a native of Caroline county, in this state:

From The Sun

"Capt. John B. Magruder – the name of our gallant fellow citizen, Capt. John B. Magruder, of the 1rst Artillery, has appeared conspicuous in nearly all the accounts from the seat of war, from the first battle at Palo Alto down to the storming of the gates of the Capital. He joined Gen. Taylor at the first formation of the Army of Occupation, and at the battle of Palo Alto, mingling in the thickest of the fist, we read of him taking charge of Gen. La Vega, and delivering him to Gen. Taylor. After the capture of Matamoros, an increase of the army having been ordered, he gave up his company to another officer, and returned to Baltimore, where he soon raised a company of one hundred of our brave citizens, with whom he sailed for Tampico. On landing in Tampico, he immediately marched to the relief of the five hundred shipwrecked soldiers under Colonel De Russy, and from thence proceeded to Vera Cruz, and took an active part in the bombardment of that city, charging the batteries of the enemy until but five of his men were left by his side. His gallantry on this occasion received the honorable mention and only other reward in the power of the Commander–in–Chief, the charging of his command of Infantry–Artillery to Artillery proper, with a full and efficient battery. The first gun fired by Capt. Magruder's battery was on the hills of Churubusco, engaged with guns twice the caliber of his own, and holding the enemy in check, while Gen. Persifor Smith turned his flank. It was here that the gallant Johnson, a lieutenant in his company, fell, and we read that the loss of life as well as horses was greater at this than any of the "Halls of Montezumas," Capt. Magruder's battery again makes sad havoc among the Lancers charging on our picket guard, and he himself is twice wounded. Baltimore, indeed, should be proud of his gallant soldier, as well as our brave fellow–citizens who fought under him."

By the arrival of the U.S. Steamship Telegraph, Capt. Wilson, from Brazos Santiago, which place she left on the 12th, we have received papers from Matamoros to a late date.

Capt. Wilson reports that Col. Hays, with one Company of his men, still remained at Brazos, the remainder had sailed for Vera Cruz previously to the sailing of the Telegraph. Col. Hays expected to leave in a few days on the steamer J.L. Day, which was hourly looked for from Vera Cruz.

The Yellow Fever was on the increase at Matamoros. There were also a few cases as the Brazos, and the mouth of the Rio Grande.

Gen. Taylor is to make his headquarters at Matamoros, and is expected there by the 15th November.

The Flag on the 9th, states that upwards of 50 new cases of Fever had occurred since the 6th, but the number of deaths is comparatively small.

The capture of the City of Mexico was known at Saltillo, on the 23rd. The Flag is filled with matter relating to the elections in Nueces County, which were to take place on the 11th. In other respects, the paper is destitute of subjects of local interests.

Tuesday October, 26, 1847, RWv24i86p2c4 Letter from Gen. Shields words: 669

I regret to say that I am again suffering under the affliction of another wound received at the storming of Chapultepec. The wound is from a musket ball, received in the left arm, which has occasioned me much pain, but my surgeons assure me the arm is safe. So entire has been my recovery from the effects of the former wound, that at Puebla I assumed command of a brigade, consisting of the New York and South Carolina volunteers; and the Marine Corps, under Lieut. Col. Watson. We marched from Puebla and entered the valley of Mexico with an army amounting all to ten thousand two hundred men. Our march was one of extreme difficulty– over roads broken up filled and with rocks. We reached San Augustin on the 18th of August, from whence we could see the enemy's troops and works at Contreras. On the 19th I led two regiments – the New Yorkers and Palmettos– across a route that was deemed impassable by Mexicans for everything but goats; joined the other forces in the night; remained most of the night without shelter or covering, under incessant rain; and joined in the attack in the morning which carried the position, and cut Valencia's whole force to pieces. All this I encountered without suffering any injury from the effects of my former wound. From Contreras I joined in pursuit of the enemy towards Mexico. We came up with the main body of his army at Churubusco. The enemy's force was about 30,000. The position was most formidable. The fortifications were not only exceedingly strong, but their infantry was posted under cover of embankments, which afforded them such protections as to enable them to fire on us with security. The battle at this place was not only a bloody but a terrible one. The Mexicans determined to make it their last great struggle, and the Americans fought with desperation; knowing that nothing was left for them but success. Here I lost over half my command in killed and wounded. Some of the noblest officers and bravest men that ever marched to battle fell on that bloody field. Yet we routed the whole Mexican army, and drove it, panic-stuck, into the city; and had I, who happened to be in the advance, only been permitted to continue the pursuit into the city, I doubt not, form what we have since heard of their fright, that they would have run through the city, and sought shelter in the mountains. Peace, however, being the great object, it was hoped that the moment was favorable for that purpose. Santa Anna, however, whose whole being is a composition of falsehood and treachery, employed the time in preparation for defense, and imposed upon us the further necessity of carrying Chapultepec and taking the city. This was all done too in the most glorious manner.

So, my dear friend, you may tell the world that an army of between 6000 and 7000 Americans has taken the city of Mexico, strongly fortified, with an army of between twenty and thirty thousand men within its walls. True, we have suffered, and suffered severely. Many a noble spirit has breathed his last in the valley of Mexico; but the glorious results have proved to the world the invincibility of the American arms. I have been thus diffusive, to show that my recovery has been tested by every species of trial and endurance to which the human system can be subjected. It is a hard case, therefore, that the physicians who contributes so much to this recovery should be accused of incapacity, and that my recovery, in itself so wonderful should be you, had as an instance to prove this incapacity. I trust those journals that gave place, inconsiderately, to the article to which I allude, will do me the favor; in justice to my physician and the medical department of the army, to insert this letter.

I have the honor to be, your friend and obedient servant.

JAMES SHIELDS

[JKM]
La Patria, of New Orleans, has a letter from Vera Cruz, dated the 1rst which states that an aid-de-camp of Santa Anna, and a groom who usually accompanies the latter, had been seen in that city, where they arrived two days previously. The inference is that Santa Anna himself is lurking in the vicinity of the sea coast, intending to embark in the English steamer Medway, which was to sail the next day. La Patria, however, like the New York Sun, has a very convenient, and not very reliable set of correspondents. They write too far from the scene of action!

The Delta’s correspondent informs us the Generals Pillow and Shields were wounded on the 13th.

The hill, whence Gen. Pillow’s command ascended, had been mined for the purpose of blowing up our troops when they arrived at this point, but the rapid movements of the Voltigeur Regiment, and the deadly effect of the fire of their rifles, as they followed up the enemy from the first position, prevented their carrying out their views and intentions. Just as the command of General Pillow rose the hill, and while in the act of assaulting the work, he fell wounded, and Col. Ransom was killed, but so lucidly had Gen. Pillow explained his objects and intentions in carrying the work, and aided by an active and efficient staff, that his command moved on and carried the work without even being brought to a stand. As Gen. Quitman’s divisions was charging on the work in the road, Brig. Gen. Shields received a severe wound in the arm, and as soon as the works were carried he returned and had it dressed and again mounted his horse, which was shortly afterwards killed under him, but he continued to command his brigade, which was actively engaged throughout the day, and the name of Shields will long be remembered in connections with the laurels won by the Palmetto of the South and the Empire of the North.

We have heretofore said that we did not doubt Gen. Pillow’s personal bravery; but we are now willing to go farther, and say, that his gallant bearing, on this occasion, out to “cover a multitude” of faults, such as have been heretofore ascribed to him.

In our enumeration yesterday of the Virginia Officers killed and wounded in the late battles, we inadvertently omitted to mention Lieut. Joseph Seldon, of this vicinity. This is the second wound that the gallant Lieutenant has received, having been seriously injured in the hand at Resaca de la Palma.

The correspondent of the New Orleans Delta, in his interesting description of the operations of the army, which we should publish if it were possible to make room for it, speaks of two other Virginians, Captains Magruder and Steptoe, in these terms:

"On the 11th, a column of cavalry sailed out from the fort on the San Antonio road, either for the purpose of threatening our position or taking Capt. Magruder’s battery, which was stationed with the picket within about 800 yards of the fort, though in a great measure covered from the range of their guns. As soon as they got their column moved out into a place free from all obstructions, Captain Magruder opened two pieces upon them with shot and shell, which passed through them with great destruction, and they took to their heels, and got back to the fort as quick as possible. The fort opened two guns on the battery, but without further effect than killing one man of the 15th infantry. An officer shortly after rode up and inquired of Captain Magruder it the fort had fired upon him. Holding a 12-pound shot, he replied, that he had the gentlemen’s card, and he expected the cavalry would carry back his compliments to the fort.

"In the course of the night three heavy batteries were planted in from of the Castle of Chapultepec: No. 1 commanded by Capt. Drum; No. 2 by Lieut. Hagner; No. 3 by Lieut. Stone— all under the general command and superintendence of Capt. Augur, Chief of the Ordinance. Also, during the night Gen. Twiggs Division planted Capt. Steptoe’s in front of the fortifications on the San Antonio road, it being intended that Gen. Twiggs should make a feint for the purpose of drawing out the enemy in that direction.

"At daylight on the morning of the 12th, all the batteries opened— the feint made by Gen. Twiggs division succeeded admirably. As soon as Capt. Steptoe opened his guns the enemy marched out several heavy columns, and in reaching the fort passed within range of Steptoe’s guns, when he turned a heavy and destructive fire upon them. As soon as they reached the work he turned his attention on the fort, and in the course of an hour’s cannonading drove them out of it; and silenced all the guns. Capt. Steptoe’s fire throughout was one of the most effective and well directed that has been witnessed during the war, while his position was such that the enemy's shot had little or no effect upon him.

“The siege batteries continued an uninterrupted fire upon the Castle of Chapultepec throughout the day, which was answered by eleven guns in the work. Our guns proved to be very destructive, as we found after the work was taken 500 dead men unburied but thrown in ditches. The building also was completely riddled.

Friday October, 29, 1847, RWv24i87p1c3 Vigorous Prosecution of the War  words: 243

When the war first broke out, we were assured that was to be vigorously prosecuted-- and, following every battles that has since been fought, from that of Monterey to the entrance of Gen. Scott into the city of Mexico, the assurance has been reiterated, until at length the phrase has become "a proverb of reproach." The very fact of its utterance necessarily implies the absence of vigor and energy previously; but, notwithstanding the admission, made by the Executive Organ only a few days ago, that the war has heretofore "looked too much like peace," and must heretofore assume a more warlike aspect, any attempt to question the "preeminent ability of Mr. Polk" in conducting it, which was so emphatically proclaimed by the Virginia Legislature last winter, on the motion of (the since appointed) Consul to Genoa, is resented as closely akin to "moral treason." That the Executive has not displayed either wisdom or energy in the prosecution of the Mexican campaigns, is attested by innumerable facts; and the splendid results, achieved by our gallant armies, in despite of the deficiency both of vigor and sagacity at Washington-- results scarcely less than miraculous -- have alone saved it from general execration. But if the Union implied administrations are not to be regarded as conclusive upon this point, we think the facts set forth in the following brief summary from the Cincinnati Chronicle will leave no doubt on any unprejudiced mind that they are altogether true.

Friday October, 29, 1847, RWv24i87p1c3 Capt. Larkin Smith  words: 141

From a letter received in this city, written by this gallant and accomplished officer, since the army of Gen. Scott entered the city of Mexico, we are happy to discover that the wound which he received in the severe battle at King's Mill, on the 8th September, will not prove fatal.

Without meaning to indulge in any invidious discrimination, where every officer and soldier in our army covered himself and his country with glory, we may be permitted to congratulate the numerous friends Capt. Smith on his brave and gallant bearing in his new field of distinction, and indulge the hope that his recent well earned character for true bravery, military discipline and ardent devotion to the standard and glory of his country, will be properly appreciated and duly rewarded. Those who know the man can at once appreciate the officer.

Friday October, 29, 1847, RWv24i87p2c1 Congress and the War  words: 494

The intimations thrown out by many of the Administration journals, and more especially by the Organ of the Executive, that the entire Republic of Mexico is to be subjugated, and that, even if "the whole" of it should not be annexed, no peace will be concluded with that country which shall not give us at least a moiety of her territory, including of course the ignorant, profligate and turbulent race of Indians and half-breeds by which it is inhabited, have elicited from the Baltimore American the following remarks:

"To the people of the United States, this grave subject commends itself, with all the serious responsibilities which it involves. It will be expected of Congress to represent the public sentiment in reference to it truly and promptly. The time has gone by when sufficient confidence could be reposed in the Administration to leave to it the intimation in a business so important as this.

"The country, moreover, has had a solemn warning of the ill results consequent upon a reliance on Executive discretion. The ill advised counsels which precipitated this war by advancing troops into a territory reserved by Congress for future negotiations, cannot now be trusted to deliver the country from the troublesome and protracted hostilities thus wantonly provoked. The two Houses must step in and take the whole matter in hand. If they cannot succeed in pointing out a mode by which Mexico may be induced to come to a satisfactory adjustment by negotiation, they can at least define a boundary within which our troops may be withdrawn, to maintain, if need be, a defensive war.

In this suggestion we most heartily concur; and we rejoice to see it stated by on of the Washington correspondents of the New York Herald, who generally leans to the side of the Administration, that "the defensive line policy is gaining ground, gaining confidence, gaining adherents, and, we verily believe, will be the plan of Congress. The whole of Mexico, (he adds) will be too expensive an enterprise-- too uncertain of duration in the work of acquiring– too uncertain in its results to the Union– too hazardous an experiment, in every sense, to be entertained for a moment.“ The acquisition even of half, or any portion of it, indeed, is liable, in a modified sense, to the same objections; for, as the correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, (also a friend of the Administration,) well says, whenever a peace shall be concluded with Mexico, “the war will be transferred to our own limits. It will be carried on in Congress and at the polls. There will be a slavery war and a territorial war; and neither of them will be small wars. They will shake this Union to its very center; and, if menaces from sources recommended to attention by the Official Organ are not idle, may split it asunder and divide it in twain, by the line where free labor ends and slave labor begins.”

Friday October, 29, 1847, RWv24i87p2c2 Reveling in the Halls words: 139

A letter from Gen. Persifor F. Smith to his friends in New Orleans informs them that he was quartered in the palace of Gen. Lombardini, and enjoying the good things of life, instead of being numbered, as formerly reported, with the dead. He is "reveling in the halls of Montezuma" after this fashion:

"For breakfast he has nothing at all to eat, but chicken, steaks of beef and mutton, biscuit or rolls made of the finest flour, and as to drink, it is impossible for him to get anything but fresh milk, or fragrant teas, coffee or chocolate. At dinnertime his sufferings is intolerable. Roast turkeys, huge joints of savory roast beef and mutton, fish from the adjoining lakes, wild fowls of every description, every variety of the tropical fruits of the country, together with Tokay and Champagne wines."

Friday October, 29, 1847, RWv24i87p2c3 Untitled words: 270

Col. Martin Scott, who was killed in one of our sanguinary battles before the city of Mexico in Gen. Worth's divisions, was a native of Bennington, Vt. He was educated at West Point, and from that school entered the army some thirty years ago. He has since then seen much hard service, and conducted himself always with great caution, skill, and kindness. In his youth he was famous among the sharp-shooters of the Green Mountains, very few of whom could perform feats to be compared with his. He never shot game in the body; but, at whatever height or distance, always struck the head. He would drive a nail into a board part way with a hammer, and the, taken the farthest distance at which his eye could distinctly see it, drive it home with his unerring bullet. He has always been much respected and beloved by his townsmen for his amiable and benevolent qualities, associated with the most exact integrity. With a moderate income, he has so economized in his personal expenses as to support his own family and very essentially to aid two maiden sisters, several nephews, and other relatives, who, with his wife and immediate family, now at Milwaukee, are left to mourn his loss. How these hearts bleed and ache! How many such circles of bleeding aching hearts have our victories made! The guilt of all this misery must rest on somebody. Who is it? Wretched man. For those losses and this guilt the nation takes its pay in glory. What a pity that men should not reflect that all true glory is in doing good.

Friday October, 29, 1847, Mexican Whigs

The fact that the Mexican authorities, pending the late abortive attempt at negotiations, insisted upon the Nueces as the boundary line between Mexico and the United States, leaving the territory between that river and the Rio Grande as neutral ground, upon which no settlements should be formed be either country, has furnished some of the champions of the Administration with a pretext for renewing their assault upon the Whig party as the allies of Mexico. This coincidence of opinion they pretend to think altogether too remarkable to escape animadversion, and they have not failed adroitly to address themselves to the prejudices of the people, against the "moral traitors" who happen to coincide with the Mexican rulers in regard to the true boundary line of Texas, when the latter asserted and established her independence, and of course when she became a member of the American Confederacy. These astute critics seem to forget, that, had Mr. Trist succeeded in persuading the Mexican Commissioners to accede to the line drawn by himself, there would, in that case, have been a concurrence of opinion between Mr. Polk and Santa Anna– (as there was unfortunately in another infamous instance) – and consequently, in that event, that the imputation of "moral treason" would have been as strictly applicable to our negotiators, as it is at this time to those who are not so anxious to extend the "area of freedom" by the annexation of the Union of more than one-half of the Mexican Republic, including its population, who tell us themselves, constitute the most ignorant, depraved, turbulent and worthless race on the face of the Globe, and whom nevertheless they are determined, by force of arms, to convert into American voters and legislators, and probably at no distant day into Presidents!

From all we can see, the treaty, though destined to meet with violent opposition in the Senate, will eventually be ratified. The addition to our already overgrown territory will be enormous; to say nothing of the population it will bring in to the Union, to form in future a portion of the free and independent citizens of the U. States.

From the first, as our readers very well know, we have depreciated the addition of any territory, from a well-grounded apprehension of the convulsions that must follow upon raising the question of the admission of slavery in to the conquered country. Yet when we take into consideration the still greater perils of the war to our national prosperity and the project, not avowed it is true, by the President, but openly proclaimed by his partisans, of conquering the whole of Mexico, we must confess, that we are glad to get out of the scrape even upon these terms.

And yet a convulsion is destined to agitate this country to its very centre, before two years shall have rolled over our heads, exceeding in intensity that of the Missouri commission. The free States will never consent that the conquered provinces shall admit the institution of slavery, and being strongest in both branches of the National Legislature, they will not fail to carry their point. It was a foresight of the evil, that induced us from the fires to deprecate, with all the earnestness that belongs to our nature, the addition of any more territory. Deplorable will then be the condition of the slave States. On the North and West of us we are bounded by non-slaveholding States, many of whose inhabitants deem it a praiseworthy act to steal our slaves, though they will not risk a cent to rescue them from bondage. We shall now have on our Southern frontier an immense tract of country, offering, in climate, soil and facility of living, every inducement to the natural indolence of the slave, to escape from the dominion of the master. Be the Constitution of the United States, the slave can be reclaimed anywhere in the Union; but the slave stealer, in the North, manages to get him off to Canada, and in the South, will contrive to smuggle him in to Mexico. IN either case, the master does, and will stand but a poor chance of recovering his property.

The only possible remedy will be a dissolution of the Union; and to that we look forward with horror, which it is impossible to repress. Should such an event occur, (which Heaven in its mercy avert,) the execration of the country, of the world, of all future ages, will pursue these who for the basest of all purposes have first kindled, and then kept in a continual flame, this unnecessary and unnatural war.

Bad as it is, however, we repeat that peace, even on these terms, is better than the protraction of a war, destined to end only in the entire conquest of Mexico. By the terms of the treaty, obliging this Government to pay fifteen millions for the ceded territory, and to assume the payment of the adjudicated claims of American citizens for spoliations, we avoided one great rock of offence, at which so many republics, of ancient and of modern date, have stumbled, and which as invariably proved the fate of them all. We allude to the lust of conquest, which when it once takes possession of the national mind, is but too apt to override all other considerations, and finally, to bury the very names of Justice and Freedom in one common ruin. We shall be spared the shame of seizing upon the spoils of a weak and comparatively helpless neighbor; Mexico will be spared the humiliation of seeing herself partitioned at the will of the conqueror. It becomes the justice and magnanimity of the might nation to take no undue advantage of the weakens of our neighbor, and to allow her, as far as possible, to preserve at least her honor. In this, we shall offer a striking contrast to all the other great Powers that at present, in a measure, divided the earth among them. England excites a war in India whenever she begins to feel a hankering of a new province, and never thinks of paying the wretched Governments of that country for her seizures, nor even allows them to retain nominal independence. Russia appropriates every things she can lay her hands on with as little remorse as a highwayman lightens the traveler of his purse, and with as little design to render an equivalent. France hunts down the wild Arab of the desert, exterminates his tribe, seizes on his possessions, and never thinks of offering him a price for parting with his all. Austria hold Italy and Gallicia at the point of the sword, and makes them both feel that they are slaves, not fit to treat with their masters for the price of their land and their liberty; while Prussia, as fast as she has been able, has followed closely in the Track of her might neighbors.

Not so does this treaty propose to deal with Mexico. It pays her, for her ceded provinces, more than they are actually worth, and leaves her independence intact, and, so far as this Government is concerned, inviolable. By refraining from making her feel her humiliation, we neutralized much of the bitterness which never fails to attend upon conquest, and lay a broad foundation for future harmony, between two nations which should never have gone to war, and the one of which stands to the other in the capacity of an elder sister, whose duty it should be to watch over and protect the weakness of her junior, not be the first to take advantage of her infancy.

We presume the plea alleged in favor of this war, "indemnity for the past," will now be suffered to rest, since we pay more for what we get than it is actually worth. —Surely, if that was one of the causes of the war, our Government, if this treaty shall be ratified, will have shown a marvelous promptitude in abandoning it; a circumstance which obviously indicates that it was without foundation from the beginning.

or usages of the people; in a word, that the whole valley of the Rio Grande, whether on the right or left bank of that river, was Mexican—a Mexican population, speaking the Mexican language, with Mexican laws, Mexican customs, Mexican jurisdiction—as purely Mexican as the city of Mexico itself. These facts are fully sustained by the public records of this Government, known and read of all men.

With a perfect knowledge of these facts, (for we cannot suppose the President ignorant of his country’s history,) the Executive ordered our army into a territory to which we had no just title—a territory in possession of a nation with which we were at peace; and there our forces, under the direction of the President, committed overt acts of war, by blockading the Rio Grande and charging the Mexican lines, before they had fired a gun or obstructed the movement of our army by force. Although the design of this war was at first concealed from the American people, the late avowals of the President and his friends leave no doubt of its object. It was commended and is prosecuted for the unholy purpose of conquest. I will not enlarge upon this point. A bare statement of the case is sufficient to show its injustice, to crown its authors with infamy, and create serious alarm in the breast of every friend of our free institutions. But I will not pursue this branch of the subject. Passing over the causes of the war and the unholy object of which it is prosecuted, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the financial embarrassment in which it has involved us.

At the commencement of the war our finances were in the most prosperous condition, there being a surplus of ten millions of dollars in the Treasury. And now, after the war has been prosecuted some twenty months, we are on the verge of bankruptcy. We have consumed the ordinary revenue, exhausted the ten millions surplus, together with a loan or Treasury notes of thirty-three million and are now called upon for a grant of sixteen millions more, to supply the wants of the Government during the present fiscal year; and this sum, I am persuaded, will be found too small by eight or ten millions, as I shall endeavor to show hereafter. So that, when the war shall have continued twenty-five months, we shall have spent, in addition to the accruing revenue, some $68,000,000. This is but a part of the burdens brought upon us by this unnecessary war. Our munitions of war, which have been accumulating for years in our arsenals, some fifteen millions of dollars worth of our public domain given, or to be given, in bounty to our soldiers, and long lists of pensions and private claims growing out of the war—these should be taken in to the account, and will go far in increasing the sum. These are some of the pecuniary burdens which a weak and wicked Administration has wantonly brought upon the people.

War is necessarily expensive, and is almost another name for oppressive taxation. And I rejoice that it is so; it bears the stamp of a preventive Providence, and is calculated to awaken the people to a sense of their condition, and to induce a strict scrutiny into the conduct of their rulers. I am glad that this war has involved the Government in financial embarrassment, because the burdens of taxation may reach the grand sensurium of some men, who, mad with ambition and drunken with the idea of acquisition, seem insensible to the calls of justice and the pleadings of humanity. And I venture to predict that, if the party now in power—the criminal authors of the are—had the manliness to come forward and impose taxes sufficient to support the war, and sustain the credit of the Government, the people would rise in the majesty of their strength, and hurl indignantly form power those who have abused the trust which a confiding people have reposed in them.

It is, Mr. Chairman, from a view of the documents which have been submitted, impossible even to approximate the amount which has been wantonly wasted in this war of aggression and conquest. The reports of the Secretary of the Treasury are so obscure, and his accounts are so confused, that it is difficult to understand them. There are some items, however which are perfectly intelligible, and to these I wish to called the attention of the committee. I allude to the army expenditures; and when I speak of these, I do not include the whole military establishment, but leave out of the account the armories, arsenals, fortifications, Military Academy, and that part of the civil service which relates to the War Department.

Here we perceive at once that the expenditures of the army, including volunteers, have, during the year ending June 30, 1847, exceeded the peace establishment of the year ending June 30, 1845. $30,727,041; and for the present fiscal year the expenditure will be much greater. I am aware that the Secretary of War estimates the cost of the army for the present fiscal year at $27,798,448, being more than $6,000,000 less than it was last year; and I am also aware that these estimates are entitled to very little consideration. The secretary last year estimated the cost of the army at $27,733,096, which was $6,148,972 less than the actual cost. And how was this? What occasioned this increase of expenditure over the estimates which were made when the year had nearly half passed away? The secretary would probably tell you that the President during the last half of the year called out more volunteers than had been anticipated, and that Congress created ten new regiments after the estimates were submitted, and that these were the causes of the increased expenditures. I admit that this new force would swallow up the extra $6,000,000; but still with this increased force the honorable Secretary goes forward at the commencement of this Congress with an estimate for the army for only $27,798,448, being but $65,362 more than that estimate of last year, when it was too small by $6,149,972. The ten regiments which were created, and the additional volunteers called out, could not have served more than six, and most of them did not serve more than two or three months; and if this carried the expenditures from the $27,733,096 estimated, up to $33,882,068, I cannot conceive how this increased force called into service during the war, and consequently serving during the whole of the present year, can be supported for $6,000,000 less than they were last year when they served but a short time. Besides, we have already been informed by the Executive department (see Executive document No. 2, and miscellaneous document No. 14, published by order of this House) that the appropriations of the last winter for the present fiscal year for the army were $14,014,635 too small, and that this additional sum must be provided for. And yet with these facts staring him in the face, the Secretary presents us with an estimate for the army less by $6,083,620 than the ascertained expenses for the last year. Nothing short of a disposition to conceal the real state of the Treasury can
Thus far, Mr. Chairman, I have confined myself to the expenditures of the army alone; but if we look at the whole expenditures of the Government, we shall come to the same result, viz. that the estimates are not at all reliable, being far below the actual expense. The ascertained expenditures of last year. The improbability of this result will appear from the facts already stated. We have already seen that the army in the field the present year is 18,500 rank and file greater than it was last year; and there are now vacancies amounting to more than 15,000 in the regular and volunteer forces, which the president is authorized to fill, and which is now filling with all possible dispatch. The Executive has informed us that they have already ascertained deficiencies in the different departments in the appropriations of the last session for the present fiscal year of $14,229,844. From every view we can take of the subject I am satisfied that the estimates are from eight to ten millions too low. It is difficult and even impossible to estimate the expenses of a campaign with perfect accuracy, but we have data before us sufficient to show that the estimates of the Departments are not at all reliable. Though the Secretary of the Treasury estimates the total expenditure for the year 1848 at $58,615,114, I have no doubt but that we may add $8,500,000 to this estimate with perfect safety, bringing the total expenditures of the year up to $67,100,000. On the other hand, I am satisfied that the Secretary of the Treasury has over-estimated his receipts. He sets down his means for the year ending June 30, 1848, as follows:

No man, as it seems to me, can examine these estimated receipts without being satisfied that they are exaggerated if we compare them with the receipts of preceding years, or if we inquire into the amount of imports, we must perceive at once that the receipt of $31,000,000 from customs is out of the question. To obtain that revenue we must import from home consumption goods, wares, and merchandise to the amount of $180,840,021; which would be $68,806,632 more than the average of the four preceding years. The average consumption of imports for the years 1844, 1845, and 1846 was $103,067,692; the consumption for the year 1847, was $138,534,480; being $35,466,788 more than the average of the three preceding years. Seeing the imports for domestic consumption for the last year were $35,466,000 above the former average, I am satisfied that the people cannot, in their present embarrassed condition, pay for an import of $180,840,021; which would be $42,305,541 more than was purchase last year and $77,772,329 more than the average of 1844, 1845, and 1846. —And yet this enormous importation must be made in order to give Mr. Walker his $31,000,000 of revenue from customs. The principal reasons why our imports were so large last year was the famine in Europe, which enabled us to send abroad $41,000,000 of breadstuffs and provisions more than the preceding year; but that cause has now passed away, and to infer that we can import, $77,772,000 more than the average while the famine existed, shows a love of the marvelous hardly consistent with financial calculations.

I believe that the revenue from customs cannot with any propriety be estimated above $26,500,000 for the year 1848; and to obtain that revenue we must import for home consumption $154,059,861; which is more than $12,700,000 above the imports of last year and more than the country can support. In estimating the revenue for the present year I have taken the last year’s imports and revenue as the basis, though that basis is altogether too favorable to the Secretary. Five-twelfths of the last year was under the tariff of 1842, where the rates of duty were from five to ten per cent higher than under the present tariff. So that to realize the $31,000,000 estimated by the Secretary, we must in fact import a larger amount than I have stated; and the $26,500,000 which I have set down as the amount to be received would in fact require an import of more than to be received would in fact require an import of more than the $154,059,000 already stated. But, as I wish to be upon the safe side, I have to adopt the ratio of the last year. If I am correct in my positions, $4,500,000 must be stricken from Mr. Walker’s revenue from customs.

He estimates the revenue from the public lands at $3,000,000 which I believe is at least $1,500,000 more than can be realized from that source. The average income from the lands for the last three years has been $2,423,276, and there are causes which must operate unfavorably upon that branch of the revenue. By the act of February 11, 1847, it was provided that all soldiers who have served twelve months in the Mexican War, or have been killed in battle, or have been discharged in consequence of sickness incurred in the service, shall receive one hundred and sixty acres of land, or scrip to the amount of one hundred dollars. Some twenty-five thousand of these soldiers have been discharged in consequence of sickness incurred in the service, shall receive one hundred and sixty acres of land, or scrip to the amount of one hundred dollars. Some twenty-five thousand of these soldiers have been discharged, and these land warrants are being issued in large numbers, and these warrants will absorb a large quantity of the public lands, an expense the proceeds of the sales from the Treasury. If I am right in these calculations, the balance sheet at the end of the year will be materially affected. The case would then stand thus;

Revenue from customs less than estimate 4,500,000
Which sum of $14,500,000 added to Mr. Walker's corrected balance, would make $23,314,036 excess of expenditures over means on the 30th of June next; and hence the loan, including 3,000,000 to be left in the Treasury, should be $26,314,000 instead of $16,000,000.

I regard this part of the subject so important that I must beg leave to dwell upon it more in detail. I have already shown that the importations for the last fiscal year, after deducting the re-exports, amounted to $138,534,480, and that this exceeded the average of the three preceding years by $35,466,788. It must be manifest to everyone acquainted with the laws of trade that our importations and exports for a series of years must nearly balance each other. During the last fiscal year our exports of domestic products amounted to $150,637,464, being $50,362,848 more than the average for the three preceding years. But this excess consisted almost entirely of breadstuffs and provisions, and was occasioned by the failure of the crops in almost every part of the eastern continent. The Secretary himself informs us that the breadstuffs and provisions exported during the last year exceeded the exports of the same articles the preceding year by $41,332,282. This fact confirms my position that this large export arose from the failure of foreign crops. This excess over former exports consisted not only in the increased quantity, but also in the increased price. But the improved harvest in Europe has checked this export, and we have no reason to expect that we shall be able to send forth the same quantity; and the reduced price will greatly diminish the value of our exports. In the articles of cotton and flour alone, the reduction of price, even if the quantity was the same, would reduce our exports several millions.

This European famine not only increased our exports and consequently our imports, but turned the balance of trade $12,102,984 in our favor. But nothing can be more fallacious than to reason from a single year. In 1837 we actually imported $4,280,000 worth of breadstuffs; but it would be absurd to argue from that fact that we should continue to import that amount. Equally absurd is it to maintain that we shall send abroad $65,900,000 of provisions and breadstuffs annually because we did during the past year, when the famine was so pinching in Europe that we sent out Government ships laden with provisions as a charity to the starving thousands.

But we need not reason upon this subject. We have facts, official and stubborn facts, which show that the tide of trade is already setting against us. The imports during the first quarter of the present fiscal year amounted to $50,675,599, while the exports amounted to only $37,937,981, showing a balance of trade against us of $12,737,618, which exceeds the balance of trade in our favor during the past year of $634,634. The entire imports and exports for the whole half year have not been received; but I have returns from some of the principal cities, as will be seen by the following tabular statement:

Imports into and Exports from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, for the quarters ending September 30 and December 31, 1847.

NOTE. —During the same period our imports of specie have amounted to $2,344,896, and our exports of specie to $5,937,804.

Here it will be seen that, taking these four cities, which comprise more than three-fourths of the commerce of the country, the balance of thread for the last six months is nearly $30,000,000 against us, and that specie is rapidly leaving the country; the excess of specie exported during this period being about $3,600,000 above the import. We have had pleasing accounts of the great balance of trade in our favor; and golden dreams of specie flowing into the country and filling the vault so the Sub-Treasury, presented to us by the secretary of the Treasury. Be we already see that an average harvest in Europe has turned the tables against us, and dissipated those golden visions.

The present conditions of the money market and the general depression of business must reduce the imports of the last half of the year. All experience shows that prosperity in our industrial pursuits at home contributes greatly to the increase of our commerce; and that we never purchase foreign fabrics so feely as when money is plenty in the country. It is true that our imports at the present time are heavy, but the depression of prices shows that we have a large supply on hand, and leads us to expect that the future imports will be light. The pernicious effects of the tariff of 1846 and of the drain of specie from the country to support a foreign war are beginning to develop themselves—Manufacturers already feel the shock. The cotton, woolen, and iron interests of the country are greatly depressed; and with depressed manufactures we may soon anticipate a paralyzed agriculture and a stagnant commerce. Even if the tide of trade should continue so as to give us a large revenue during the present year, its inevitable effect would be to diminish our revenue for the next; and so leave as great a deficit on the 30th of June, 1849, as though it fell within this year. It should also be observed that the have importations of tea generally coming in the spring, and as this is free of duty, no revenue will be obtained from that source.

A brief view of the finances of the country will show the utter failure of the tariff of 1846 as a revenue measure. — Though the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President in his message assure us that the tariff of 1846 has augmented the revenue of the country, every view I have been able to take of the subject leads me to a very different result. The imports and exports, together with the nett revenue from imports for the three years ending with the 30th of June under the tariff of 1842, were as follows: (see chart)
Here we have an amount of imports for the last year of $35,466,778 above the average of the three preceding years; and yet the nett revenue falls below the average $3,060,252. The nett revenue for the years under the tariff of 1842 assessed upon the imports for home consumption would amount to a duty of 26,01 per cent, and if we multiply the imports of 1847 by that rate, it would give us a nett revenue under the tariff of 1846, from what it would have been under the tariff of 1842, of $12,384,954. While the Administration and its friends are clamorous for a loan of $16,000,000 they should remember that if they had not wantonly destroyed the best revenue system which this country ever enjoyed, they would have had more than two thirds of that sum now in the Treasury; nay, if that system had remained in force up to this day, it would completely have superseded the necessity of this loan, and have left a balance in the Treasury. Here we have a full illustration of the crude digested system of the present Administration, a system which, had it not been for the famine on the eastern continent, would have overwhelmed its friends in disappointment. If the imports had remained at the average of the three preceding years, the revenue under the present tariff would have amounted to only $17,624,575, or $9,283,531 less than the average of the three years under the Whig tariff. Thus, by the miserable policy of the Administration, the best interests of the country have not only been sacrificed, but the Government itself has been robbed of twelve millions of revenue at a time when the largest amount that the country could have afforded would be insufficient to meet the wants of the Government.

The receipts from customs for the year 1847 have not only fallen off $3,060,252 from the average receipts of the three preceding years, but they have fallen $4,087,867 below the secretary's own estimate submitted to Congress in December, 1846.

But it is hardly necessary to point out the blunders of the Secretary of the Treasury, or to show that his estimates are entitled to very little consideration. Of this, however, we may be certain—that his estimates are always in conformity with his preconceived opinions, and designed to recommend his own visionary schemes. In his first annual report on the finances to bring the tariff of 1842 in disrepute, he estimated the revenue from customs for the year ending June 30, 1846, at $24,500,000; but the result showed a nett revenue of $26,712,667, showing that the Secretary's estimate was too low. When he has his own darling system before him, there is no danger or error on the same side of the question. At the opening of the last Congress he estimated the receipts from customs for the year ending June 1847, at $27,835,731, being $4,087,867 more than was realized—true sum being $23,747,864. Thus we see that the secretary's falsehood for is free trade system lead him into an error of $2,212,000 in one year, and of $4,078,000 the next.

But in view of all these blunders, and in the face of all these facts, the secretary says: "The new tariff ahs no been in operation more than twelve months, and has greatly augmented the revenue and prosperity of the country. "—The nett revenue from duties during the twelve months ending the 1st of December, 1847, under the new tariff, is $31,500,000; being $8,528,596 more than it was during the twelve months preceding, under the tariff of 1842."—While this statement may be true to the letter, it is nevertheless calculated to deceive the public, and is so manifestly unjust that I should hardly expect to see it presented as a basis of a settled principle in grave official document—his first annual report to the 29th Congress; he strongly recommended a reduction of duties, and that this subject was agitated for months before the passage of the act; that the bill was reported to the House as early as April 14, and became a law July 30, 1846. Under these circumstances, we know that the importers would naturally keep back their orders in expectation of the reduction of duties. In this manner the tariff of 1846 would operate to check imports long before it became a law. And when the bill was passed, July 30, 1846, it contained an express invitation to importers not to bring their goods into market until the reduced duties had taken effect. The receipts from customs for the year 1847 have not only fallen off $3,060,252 from the average receipts of the three preceding years, but they have fallen $4,087,867 below the secretary's own estimate submitted to Congress in December, 1846.

I have, Mr. Chairman, thus far confided myself mainly to the receipts and expenditures of the past and present fiscal years. But, as we are now called upon to provide for the next fiscal year, it may be well to look into futurity, and ascertain, as well as we may, what will be the probably expenditure for the next year. We have the estimate of the Secretary of the treasury, covering those of the different Departments, and it seems peculiarly fortunate that he is able to reduce the expenditures very much in proportion to the increase of the force called out. We have already seen the actual expense for the year ending June 30, 1847, and the estimated expenditures for 1848; and I will now call your attention to the estimates for the year ending June 30, 1849, and that they may be seen at a glance I will place them together:

It will be sent that Mr. Walker’s estimated expenditures are based on sliding scale similar to the British Corn Laws, where the duty is reduced with the increase of the price. Our force in the field is constantly increasing; and yet our estimated expenditures are reduced from year to year, the cost of the service for 1849 being $3,806,236 less than the actual expenditures for 1847, though the force is much greater. Such is the picture presented to us by the official documents. But every man who will take the trouble to examine the subject will be satisfied that the estimate for the present and for the next fiscal year is altogether too low. There appears to be a systematic attempt on the part of the Executive department to reduce the estimates to the lowest possible point; not, however, as it would see, from a conviction that the sum estimated will meet the wants of the service, but with a knowledge that if greater expenses are incurred Congress cannot refuse to make appropriations to pay just debts. I speak advisedly when I make this remark.

Agreeable to law and usage, the officers of the different bureaus make out their estimates for the coming year, and submit them to the head of the Department. These estimates for the next fiscal year have undergone an unusual degree of pruning. In confirmation of this I will state a fact which will illustrate the principle, and show the reliance which may be placed upon the estimates. The Quartermaster General, on the 4th of November, submitted to the Secretary of War an estimate of expenditures in his department for the next fiscal year. The Secretary returned the estimates, with a request that they be reduced. The Quartermaster General complies with his request, and on the 15th of November submits his revised estimates, saying he has made “considerable reductions.” He says, however, that his first estimates “were made out from data derived from the experience of the last year.” The then adds, ‘whether these reductions be judicious, time must determine. I would not have ventured to make them, but for the fact that two sessions of Congress will have terminated before the expiration of the fiscal year for which the estimates now submitted have been made. The sums asked for averages of the present fiscal year are not more, I am persuaded, than will be required.”

Here, sir, it will be seen that the Quartermaster General, in his second estimates, virtually admits that they are too low; lower than the service in his opinion will justify. In fact, he was so well persuaded that his estimates were too low that he says he would not have ventured to make them but for the fact that he could come in at the next session and ask for additional appropriations. The Committee of Ways and Means, being desirous of obtaining all the information requisite to a proper understanding of the subject on which they were called to act, addressed a note to the Secretary of War asking him for the original estimates of the Quartermaster General. When the original estimates were sent us, we found that it was literally true that he had made “considerable reductions.” And what do you suppose Mr. Chairman, they were? How much do you suppose was cut off? I will tell you: the modest little sum of $7,901,200! But he does it under protest; declaring that he believes it will be wanted, as he founded his estimates upon the experience of the last year.

Again, sir: the Secretary of the navy gives us an estimate of $10,905,558; but after this estimate had been in the hands of the committee some six weeks, the Secretary of the Navy comes forward and informs us that we can reduce the estimate $1,500,000 without any detriment to the public service. And what reason does the honorable Secretary offer in support of this reduction? What new discovery had he made? Why, he had discovered just what he must have known when he made his estimates—that certain unexpended balances would come over from the last year. But would he reduce the actual expenditure by this means? Not in the least. It would show less on paper; but, whether the $1,500,000 were drawn from the Treasury under the law of last year or this, the sum would be the same, and the means must be provided in either case as much as in the other.

I have stated these facts, not because I am opposed to reduction, but because I am opposed to imposition. I have stated them to show that here is a systematic attempt to make the appropriations as small as possible. I do not believe that reducing the appropriations will reduce the expenditures, on the whole, one mill, and am perfectly satisfied that there is a great unwillingness on the part of the Executive to have the enormous expenditures of this war known at the present time. But the President does not wish to be behind hand in the good work of retrenchment; and consequently he comes in an proposes to cut off the paltry sum of some $18,500 from the grants made to the poor Indians for the purposes of education! In several of the treaties made with the different tribes there is a provision that certain sums shall be paid to them annually, at the pleasure of the president, for their education and civilization. The different denominations of Christians who support their missionaries among the tribes, and accounts to this Government a portion of these funds, which they expend for schools among the tribes, and account to this Government for the manner in which it is expended. The Presbyterians, I am informed, expend two dollars of their won money, for purposes of education, for every dollar they receive from the Government; the Baptists expend about one dollar of their funds for every dollar they receive from the public Treasury; and the Methodists, who always act as pioneers in ever good enterprise, expend their money in aiding the Government to instruct these unfortunate children of the forest. And while these heralds of peace and salvation are willing to spend and be spent in the glorious cause of civilized the untutored savages, and opening to their dark and benighted minds the glories of immortality, the President of the United States come forward, and taking advantage of a clause in the treaties in which a confidence is reposed in him, proposes to strike out these small appropriations granted to them for a valuable consideration. The Executive of a people calling themselves Christian appears to be unwilling that the ministration of life should be dispensed among the savages in our won country at our expense; he wants the money to dispense the ministration of death among the savages in Mexico. He wants all the resources of this country to convert, sword in hand, the wretched hordes of Mexico, not to Christianity, but to citizens of the United States, a nation which has spread slaughter through their country, and treated them, as they believe, with the greatest injustice.

Here, Mr. Chairman, a question naturally arises, why the Administration wish at eh present time to reduce the appropriations? Their motives are in their own breasts. I am satisfied of the fact, for they have revealed it; but they have not disclosed the motive. But, being a Yankee, I shall claim the prerogative of a Yankee, and guess the reason. An important election is approaching, and the Administration do not which to have the troublesome question of the expenses of the war brought before the people in the next Presidential contest. They know that, before we shall assemble here again, that question will have been decided one way or the other, and that at that time, they may safely come forward and ask us to appropriate, not fourteen millions of dollars to supply deficiencies, but thrice that sum. This is a solution of that question; and if any friend of the President on this floor thinks me uncharitable. I will ask him whether he had not a little rather these have appropriations should be put off till the next session. I know he had. If he is frank and candid he will admit it.

But sir, all these artful attempts to blind the eyes of the people will not avail. The note of alarm shall be sounded and the people shall know the fraud that is attempted to be played off upon them. The estimates that are presented are beyond all question too low; and if this miserable war continues, we shall find it so. That we may see what demands the Administration are making upon the taxpayers of this country, I will present a statement of what they ask, directly and by implication.

They ask us to appropriate certain specific sums, and these sums will involve others which are not specified; and these incidental expenses will increase with the continuance of the war. The deficiencies for this year are already ascertained to be more that $14,000,000, and it will be perfectly safe to set down the deficiencies for the next year at $16,000,000. The account, then will stand thus:

<tr>
<th>Appropriations asked for</th>
<th>$55,644,341</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Appropriations to supply deficiencies for this year</td>
<td>14,220,400</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Deficiencies next year</td>
<td>16,000,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>$85,861,982</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

Here we have direct and tangible appropriations for $85,864,900, in round numbers. But this is not all: they ask us to grant them ten new regiments of regulars, which cannot be enlisted, transported to Mexico, and supported [ . . . ] for a year, judging in from the expenses of the past above of $9,000,000. Then they ask for authority to call out twenty regiments of volunteers, which as it may in some degree save the expense of recruiting, I will set down at $17,500,000. If we comply with the request of the Executive and grant him all the force he asks, and this force thus be called into service, the account would stand as follows:

| Ten new regiments of Regulars | 9,000,000   |
| Twenty regiments of volunteers | 17,500,000  |
|                             | $112,364,981 |

Here sir, we have the round sum of $112,000,000, and who will say that this statement is exaggerated? Let the whole force now asked for be called out, and let the regiments now in the field be filled up, and every dollar of this sum will be required. There are also several sources [ . . . ] expenditure which have not been taken into this account and which will be constantly increasing. If we go on borrowing money, the interest on eh public debt will make no inconsiderable sum. The pension list will be constantly increasing, and before the end of the year the numerous private claims for injuries sustained in and by the war will begin to come in, and the script which the discharged soldiers will receive instead of their land bounty will be in the character of public debt, on which interest must be paid. The exhausted arsenals must be replenished, and a thousand other charges incident to war must be taken into the account. The incidental expenses of the Florida war, nor the war of 1812, nor even the war of the revolution, are

How would the democracy of the Keystone State be pleased with the idea of paying $5,263,000? Could they inscribe

What would the warlike gentlemen from Maryland say to tax of $1,315,000, in addition to the burdens they are now called to bear? What opinion of the war would be entertained by the good people of Alabama if it was brought home to them by a tax of $1,535,000 in a single year? Illinois would not find it exactly convenient to pay $1,535,000, nor Indiana to pay $2,192,000, annually. The sum of $657,000 would, I apprehend, [ . . . ] rather heavily upon

Michigan, and $212,000 would remind Arkansas that the sinew of war were as troublesome end the war itself. The people of Texas would find the glory of the war a poor investment, when they were required and pay $438,000 as the purchase money. I might mention Mississippi and Florida, and several other States, apart whom this task would be rather oppressive; bus as they are clamorous for the war, they ought to be willing to bear their share of the burden. Particularly should the Democracy of these states advocate direct taxation, because they are in favor of the war, and of this mode of revising means?

But, Mr. Chairman, the fact is that neither the Administration nor their friends upon this floor dare recommend direct taxes. They know that the people in those States most clamorous for the war would not sustain it for a single day, if they thought that they must come forward and pay their fair proportion of its burdens. If such as tax were imposed, we should be compelled to withdraw our army from Mexico, not only because we should not be able to support them there, but because they would be needed and suppressed insurrections, which such a tax would produce.

But this fact is a striking commentary upon the character of the war, and of the Administration which have wantonly

"Gen Scott is considered by the officers of the army, the great Captain of the age. He has not only their unbounded confidence, but he is in the hearts of his soldiers. It is his habit to receive the mutilated and care worn soldier into his presence, when officers of the army are denied; administering to their necessities, not only by his influence, but BY HIS PURSE, HELPING THEM TO RETURN TO THEIR HOMES. In short, he has been their father as well as their General. Not one who has ever served under him will refuse to follow where he may lead.

"There seems to prevail an impression through the United States, that divisions in the army have been, to some extent, the result of the arrest of Gens Pillow and Worth. —So far from it, there never has been greater unanimity than at present. The circumstance was not even a nine day’s wonder. The army is a perfect unit in sentiment. Its discipline and harmony have never been more complete.

"The known justice of Gen Scott would be conviction to every officer in the army, of the military propriety of all his acts; and the arrest of any officer, however high in ranked, from any known breach of military discipline, would cause no more surprise, than that of any subaltern for a like offence.”

"As evidence of returning sanity on the part of Mexico, (if the present government may be said to be a responsible government,) these overtures are gratifying indications and implying concession of our rightful claims to indemnity and reparation, and of the justice of the war on our part, which will be anything but welcome to Mexican partisans and apologists in this country, whose efforts to place Mexico in the right and the United States in the wrong, have been as incessant as they have been effective, thus far, in encouraging Mexico to further hostilities. There can be no manner of doubt—the whole current of evidence which has set this way from Mexico, corroborates (we may say demonstrates) the oft-repeated allegation, that but for this treasonable supply of “aid and comfort” from the Whig leaders and presses, on this side the Rio Grande, we should long since have had overtures of peace from deluded Mexico, and a minister there to adjust the details of a treaty. —As it is, the minister being re-called and his powers revoked, we have at last a proposition for adjustments—but in so questionable and uncertain a shape as to prolong and hazard the ultimate success [if success should result] of negotiations.”

We should be glad to know who are the Mexican partisans to whom the Argus alludes in this letter. Are they Scott and Taylor, Clay Hardin, Morrison, McClung and Haskell? Are they Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, John Minor Botts, who have lost brave and promising sons in Mexico, by the sword and by disease? Or are they Mr. Polk and his Cabinet, who gave to Mexico the only Chief that could unite her distracted and divided population—create new resources—raise new armies—infuse fresh courage into a beaten and disheartened people—and direct the energies of a whole nation against our armies? Who, jealous of one General, in the very moment of victory, left him without means to follow up his successes—who gave by their own supineness, tie to the enemy, beaten at Palo Alto, and almost overwhelmed a Resaca, to recruit his troops, to re-inspirit him, to lead them into the fortification of Monterrey, and to slay our troops by hundreds when they attempted to storm it? Who, while this same General was threatened by four-fold number, sunder the very Chief of whom they had as kindly sent to the aid of Mexico, deliberately took from him all his regulars, and left him with 4,700 volunteers, to sustain the shock of 22,000 veterans? Who left another General at Vera Cruz, to fight his way to the city of Mexico, roughly fifty thousand men, with scarcely one-fifth of the number? Who, after that General had just made one of the most remarkable campaigns on record, reward him by an arrest, and an order for his trial by a broken down political hack, whom the Executive fiat had, ludicrously enough converted into a General, so far as a wearing epaulettes and receiving pay can make one? We ask, which of the two classes are most likely to rank as partisan of Mexico, in the eyes of posterity, the President and his Cabinet, or these Whig officers? Who have, of all others, furnished most “aid and comfort” to the enemy?

The statement that this treaty is an acknowledgment of our just claim to indemnity, and consequently of the justice of this war, is notoriously without foundation. If the war was just, why do we not require the Government of Mexico to pay our citizens for spoliations, instead of engaging to pay them ourselves? These claims amount, all told, not to five million: why could we not have paid them at first, before so much blood and treasure had been wasted, as well as who? As for any indemnity, where is it? We have already wasted at least ten thousand lives in this contest, and spent one hundred and fifty millions of dollars at a very moderate calculation. After all, we pay for the territory which we get, fifteen millions; much more than it is worth. This is indemnity with a vengeance.

SANTA FE IN DISPUTE!
The Houston (Texas) Telegraph seems to be very indignant at the establishment of a territorial government at Santa Fe, the capital of New Mexico—as indeed it has a right to be, if the Rio Grande being the rightful boundary line between Texas and Mexico, that magnificent city of mud-hovels really constituted a part of the Republic of Texas at the time of its annexation to the United States! But then, while if Mr. Polk had not sent Gen. Kearny thither to conquer it, there would have been no “territorial government” in existence there at this time, it is not less certain that Don Amrijo, who slew and captured every individual belonging to the only Texan expedition ever sent thither, would have been still in his palace, administering as aforetime the laws of Mexico, and receiving the homage of the people of Mexico, who, without question, exclusively owned and occupied the soil. We do not see very clearly why the Texans should repine at the change, even if it be an invasion of their sovereignty!

The Houston paper suggests to the legislature of Texas that "a new county should be laid off in that region, of which the city of Santa Fe expedition, under the auspices of the Texan government, will fare differently from that which some years ago terminated so disastrously.

RW48v25i19p4c2 Tuesday, March 7, 1848: The Treaty, from the Baltimore Sun

THE TREATY.

Yesterday's Baltimore Sun has the following letter from its Washington correspondent:

Washington, March 2, 6 P.M.

The Senate adjourned at about five o'clock, the treaty having been up until that time. Its fate is as doubtful as when I last wrote. The opposition to it steadily increases, though the President and his Cabinet, with the exception of one Secretary, were using every human effort to have it ratified. I still hope that the president will be sustained; by he has anew and powerful odds to contend against. The upshot of the matter may be that two commissioners, (one Whig and one Democrat,) will be appointed to negotiate with Mexico in optima form juris. This will satisfy Messrs. Webster and Crittenden. Some new historical features have developed themselves. Of these I will speak in my next letter.

The National Intelligencer of the 2d inst. makes the following remarks on the subject:

"No one can say what developments have been made in regard to its ultimate fate. It is now said, with what certainty we do not know, that the treaty is not acceptable to the Senate in its present shape. Whatever becomes of it the Senate will not decide in one way or the other but upon sufficient motive. The general expectation out of this city undoubtedly is, that the treaty will be ratified."

The Union of Wednesday night says:

"It is generally believed that it will not be ratified without a few modifications—relating principally to Spanish grants of land in Texas, California, &c. The general belief and hope are, that the question will be decided in the course of the week."

The Union of Thursday night almost implores the Senate to ratify the treaty.

The New York Tribune says:

"Major Van Buren, who has just arrived from Washington, states that the clause in relation to Mexican Land Claims, will not be insisted upon by Mexico, and that when inserted, it was in deference to certain influential men, with a perfect understanding by the Commissioners, that it would be objected to by the U. States and would be abandoned by Mexico."

RW48v25i19p4c2 Tuesday, March 7, 1848: Late From Chihuahua

A telegraphic dispatch, dated St. Louis, March 1, says: --"Dates from Chihuahua have been received to the 2d of January. The American force still remained at El Paso, but expected to march during the month. Their march had been delayed by the loss of their cattle, which it was found impossible to replace. —The people had determined to offer no resistance. Governor Frias had made himself very unpopular by an assessment of taxes upon the people, and it was understood that he would retire to Durango upon the approach of the Americans. The trade had become very unsettled in anticipation of that event.

THE TREATY

In the Baltimore Sun of Sunday, we find the subjoined letters from two of its correspondents in Washington. —The writers do not agree entirely; but we presume they reflect only the varying shades of opinion in Washington:

Washington, March 3, 1848

The fate of the Treaty in the Senate is uncertain. The senators themselves have spoken of the result as doubtful. The Whig Senators held a caucus yesterday morning, in relation to the Treaty, and, after an animated debate, adjourned without coming to any conclusion. The Whigs are as much divided in opinion as the Democrats on the subject. More than one Whig Senator expressed, last night, the opinion that the treaty would be rejected. —Others, again, deem it doubtful.

But if Mr. Webster should sustain the objection which he has made to the treaty, it must be rejected. He objects to a clause, deemed essential by the Southern Senators, which is capable of being construed, and was intended to get so construed, as to prevent the U.S. Government from passing any law prohibiting slavery in the Territories which we acquire. There are a number of democratic Senators who will oppose the treaty out-and-out, and these will, of course, combine with those who object to the treaty on some particular grounds.

There were two votes taken yesterday, which resulted in striking out two articles from the treaty—one of them, the 10th, confirming Mexican land grants.

The form of taking questions on a treaty is this—to wit:

The treaty is taken by articles, and each article, in turn, is open to amendment. A motion may be made to strike out an article or a part of an article. The question is, shall "the article or the words in the article excepted to" be retained as a part of the treaty? It requires a vote of two thirds to return the article or part of the article. Thus each separate article or clause must be affirmed.

After going thou with the treaty, in this manner, the question will be, "Shall the Senate advise and consent to the treaty, as altered?" There the vote of two-thirds is against necessary, and upon this last vote all those who may be opposed to the treaty, on whatever ground, may unite and reject it. But, again, it may happen that those who have dissented to particular articles or clauses may still give their assent to the treaty, in preference to taking the responsibility of its rejection. Not a single Northern Senator, Whig or Democrat, can show his fact to his constituents, if he does vote against this treaty.

The votes which have so far, been given against the retention of particular articles or clauses, are therefore by no mean conclusive as to the fate of the treaty as amended. The Senate here adjourned.

The treaty is what the man said of the fever, "getting no better very fast," but while there is life, there is hope;" and while the treaty is being considered by the Senate, the chances of it ratification are not altogether abandoned.

There was as strong article in last evening’s Union in favor of the ratification, accompanied by some singular arguments which present the subject in a new light. We are there given to understand that if this treaty is not ratified, our chances of finding a government in Mexico that will ratify any treaty of the basis of indemnity are indeed small, if not desperate. The government which has made the treaty or sanctioned its being made with Mr. Trist, holds its breath by that treaty, and its rejection by our Senate would inevitably destroy it, and lead the way, perhaps, to a military dictatorship. This is important news, which is corroborated by private letters that have reached here, and which, from personal perusal, I have no hesitation to endorse.

The question then is reduced to ratifying Mr. Trist’s treaty or having no treaty at all. This answer of the Union is categorical, and extended for the Whig Caucus that was held yesterday, and the probable resolutions come to by the gentlemen present. It throws a very heavy responsibility on their heads. It tells them—"You who style yourself the peach party of the country—you who hesitate to vote money and rise for the prosecution of the war, spurn the only means of arriving at an honorable adjustment of our national account with Mexico.” The charge is a grave one and the alternative anything but agreeable Query, will the Whigs in a body oppose the treat? I believe not’ but between them and the Democrats who are opposed to it, the treaty, if acted upon definitely today would undoubtedly be strangled.

But to return to my figure! The longer the patient is under medical treatment, the more likely are the inflammatory symptoms to subside, the more probably is the recovery.

There is a charm in that word ‘peace,’ which makes the boldest and most determined man hesitates before he ventures to vote against it. His choice is between the positive sacrifice of blood and treasure on one side, and a prospective boon on the other; and the present and immediate considerations are ever uppermost in the minds of men.

The longer the Treaty remains before the Senate, the more public opinion will be brought to bear on the opposition to it, and the more tractable will become the Democratic Senators. It is one thing to oppose a peace and another to oppose the administration.

There is rumor in town, based on a letter received from a very respectable officer now in Mexico, that the English, during the last summer, have surveyed the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. This is said to have alarmed Mr. Calhoun and his friends but I will not positively venture to say which way Mr. Calhoun and his friends will vote. That matter will depend on the bearing of the Mexican question on that of slavery. Further than that Mr. Calhoun, is for peace, and his party with him.

I have heard it whispered that the Whigs intend to let the treaty die on the table; but that experiment is not likely to be successful, from the reason above stated. Neither will the Clay and Taylor Whigs agree as to the course to be pursued, and thus the treaty may escape by a two-thirds majority, saving as many Senators personally as circumstances admit of, and allowing as many to vote against it as can be spaced to save the treat. Were it not for he Presidential election, the treaty would have been handled long ere this.

RW48v25i19p1c4 Tuesday, March 7, 1848: General Scott and the Army

Gen. Scott and the Army.

"Mustang," the correspondence of the New Orleans Delta, in describing the departure of general Caldawader’s command to occupy Toluca, says:

"The brigade formed in the grand Pris at an early hour, when there was an old fashioned "goodbye"—it is so warm, so enthusiastic, and so full of the sincerity of true friendship, and invariably accompanied with the emphatic and expressive sentiment "God bless you!" How strongly does it contrast with the cold, unfeeling, hackneyed phrase of civilians at home, "adieu, my dear friend." As the column emerged from the Plaza and marched by the quarters of Gen. Scott, who hat in hand, exchanged solutions as they passed, the air was filled with the spirit stirring notes of "Yankee Doodle." The rank and file entertains the most remarkable degree of enthusiastic feeling for the chief who has directed them through so many trying and perilous positions, and who has conducted them to the topmost peak of the ladder of fame. When they stand before him, or pass by him, they appear to look better, and assume the more correct character of the soldier than at any other time. This, however, is one of the great secrets of the success which has attended our arms in the war with Mexico. If the rank and file had ever doubted, or even entertained the least want of confidence in the officers who led them, there is no judging what would have been the result.

RW48v25i19p1c5 Tuesday, March 7, 1848: Editor's Correspondence, Camp Buena Vista

EDITOR’S CORRESPONDENCE.

Dear-------: The report which I mentioned in my last, that the Mexicans were collecting large forces at different points in our front, has not been confirmed, and is now generally discredited. I should not have spoken of it, but of the fact that the source from which the information came has hitherto been regarded as reliable. There is no doubt, I believe that Gen. Urrea is in Durango; but his force is entirely too small for any operations of consequence in this quarter—being not over four or five thousand. Some small force is said also to be embodied in Chihuahua, --That States has all along been exceedingly hostile to us, and I have wondered that a few of us have not been sent among them to teach them a little lore humility and submission. Such an expedition would have been quite a relief to the dull, prosing life who have been compelled to lead while awaiting the means for more important operations.

A most cruel murder was perpetrated upon three of our poor, sick discharged soldiers, on Tuesday last, a few miles below Saltillo, who, in their anxiety to get home, would not await the opportunity for protection afforded by some descending train. Being exceedingly feeble, it is supposed they had grown weary and fallen asleep by the way side, when they were come upon by a party of Mexicans and cruelly butchered. —Such is the e enemy we have to contend with! It was but the day before that one of our soldiers was hanged in Saltillo for murdering gone of their people. — Is it not high time that there was something like reciprocity in this thing? If I had my way, I would have the murderers, or hang the Alcalde in whose jurisdiction these murders were committed. He, undoubtedly, could find them out. The murdered men belonged to the Mississippi Regiment, and were named Walker, Rainwaters and Lantex.
—the latter but a youth of 16 or 18 years of age. Their bodies were brought back on Thursday, and interred with military honors by their comrades.

Our Colonel has had quite a blow up with the Governor (Aguerrí) of this State. As commandant of our Division of the Army, he had issued a proclamation of outlawry against the robber, Gonzales, and also warned the Alcaldes that he would hold them responsible for any injuries done us by guerrillas, if they did not give timely information of them. These he communicated to the Governor, and called upon him to give publicity to them, which his Excellency refused to do, in a most insulting manner, and threatened to retaliate if the proclamation was attempted to be carried out. The Colonel thereupon sent a party to take him, but his Excellency ways on the alert, and made his escape. Since that time (I believe) protection has been offered to the Governor if he would return and behave himself, but he has refused to do so, and the Colonel has taken possession of about $4,000 worth of his moveable effects, which he is determined to hold as a sort of surety ship for his Excellency’s good conduct. This appears to be the present state of the game between them, what is to come of it I don’t exactly know.

Nothing farther of consequence has reached us from the interior. What the enemy are doing in the way of raising troops if anything, we are as much in the dark about as ever. I do not believe they are doing much however, or we would hear of it.

A new and important measure is now on foot amongst us. Arrangements are being made by the Commanding General, in this and the neighboring States of New Leon and Tamaulipas, for the collection and transfer to our uses of all their public revenue. I have heard large calculations made in regard to the amount expected to be realized in this state (Coahuila,)—not less than $500,000 per annum! Saltillo alone, from all sources, is set down at $10,000 per month, and the rest of the State at over $40,000. Upon what data these calculations are made, I do not know, but if the yield trebles the monthly estimate, I shall think, from all I can see, that we are doing very well. The entire population of the State is not over 200,000, and but a small portion of them own property, or indeed use anything, that could well be made a subject of taxation. But the result will show.

The murderers of the three discharged soldiers from the Mississippi Regiment, whose melancholy fate I mentioned in my last, have been discovered, and five of them taken and executed. There were eighteen in the party, all Mexicans, of most villainous character, and hopes are entertained that we will get more of them, as we have the names of all. The rancho near which the murder was committed, has been destroyed by order of Col. Payne, Governor of Saltillo—several articles of clothing and other effects of the murdered men having been found in it. The order for the executions was given by Col. Hamtramck, as Commandant of the Division, and his prompt action is highly approved, not only by the whole command, but by the better portion of the Mexicans themselves. The names of the men executed, were Juan Morales, Jose Maria Duxan, Samaron, Pasqual Morales, and Philipia Espinosa—several of them notorious robbers—a terror to the whole country. They were hanged at Saltillo on Wednesday, and met their fate with great indifference, smoking and talking amongst themselves to the last.

We have just heard of the arrival of the new company from Virginia, Capt. Talbots, at Monterey, and also fifty-three recruits for the regiment, under Lt. Pegram. They are expected here in the course of two or three days.

The health of the Regiment continues good. My company has two on the sick list, with rheumatic affections, but the cases are not at all serious.
Mexico transfer the soil and people to the United States, the latter must come into the Union with all the rights and immunities of citizens of this Confederacy—entitled not only to exercise the right of suffrage, but to aspire to the highest offices in the country. We shall be gratified therefore, at the success of any proposition the tendency of which will be to diminish the extent of the territory ceded to us by the treaty as it now exists.

Under the date of the 2d inst. The correspondent of the North American writes:

“The three most important propositions pending are

1. To ratify the treaty with the amendments.
2. To alter the southern line of the territory proposed to be ceded.
3. To lay the treaty on the table and to appoint here or five ministers plenipotentiary, possessed of the views of the Senate, and authorized to institute a new negotiation.

“The explanations already made, will enable the public to discriminate as to the respective merits of these suggestions.

“The actual cost of the acquired territory, admitting the treaty to be confirmed, will be about twenty-one millions dollars and a half, exclusive of the war expenses, but including the claims against Mexico. This is a pretty round sum for a barren tract of country which nobody desires, and which must be a source of vast increase to our public expenditures.”

The Washington Union of Saturday night evinces extreme anxiety for the ratification of the treaty, and makes copious extracts from which papers, favorable to that result, in order we presume to influence Whig Senators to rally to the support of the Administration, which it seems has been abandoned, on this as upon eth Oregon question, by many of its own leading partisans! The Union says:

“The general impression seems to be today more decided in favor of the ratification of the treaty with a few modifications. Some seem to consider that the striking out of the 10th clause, respecting the Mexican grants of land, decreases the chance for its ratification. This would seem to be a mistake. On the contrary, the modification in this respect, which is recommended by the President, increases the chance of its confirmation. The question will probably be taken early in the next week.

“The Whigs have it in their power to reject the treaty. But when it is recollected that they have professed a desire for peace on almost any terms—that peace not only saves the expenditure of men and money, but moreover arrests the objection to an annexation of the whole of Mexico, it can scarcely be supposed that the Whigs will act in such direct contravention of their own professed desires, as to reject the treaty. The Whig papers, too, whilst they condemn certain articles of the treaty, express the greatest anxiety for its ratifications.”

LATER FROM VERA CRUZ.

The U.S. steamer Edit, Capt. Couillard, arrived yesterday morning from Vera Cruz, whence she sailed on the 19th instant, bringing papers from that city of that date. –We have letters from our correspondents in Mexico as late as the 7th inst. But they are not so late as intelligence received by the Dee, although containing interesting matter. We cannot leave that there had been any arrival from the city of Mexico since the Dee left.

A rumor prevailed in Vera Cruz when the Edith left, that Santa Anna had made an application to Gen. Scott for a passport to Vera Cruz and permission to leave the country, and that Gen Scott had acceded to his request. Those who credited the rumor believed that he would arrive in Vera Cruz in four or five days, to embark for Europe or Havana. The Arco Iris of the 18th inst. contains the following article on its Spanish side:

Gen. Santa Anna. —We are assured that Gen. Santa Anna has arrived within a few days at Tuxtepec, provided with the passport which he demanded from the Government, countersigned by Gen. Scott. Would this prove to be the case, it is not improbably that we shall see his Excellency in his city, with the view of embarking for a foreign country, in search of an asylum which he has not been able to find in his native land. It is also asserted that he will not proceed to Havana, as the Government of the island has prohibited his entry. We have not much faith in this intelligence, and it would be a pity if it should be true, as it is not easy for Don Antonio to find an asylum where he could give himself up with so much liberty to his natural inclination for intriguing.

A train left for Vera Cruz for Orizaba on the 13th instant, with an escort of 250 men. The roads to Orizaba and the city of Mexico are said to be entirely cleared of the guerrilla parties.
The following named passengers came over on the Edith:

Since writing the above we have conversed with a passenger on the Edith, who states that he had been informed by Gen. Twiggs he had received positive information that Gen. Scott had granted Santa Anna his passport, and that he was expected in Vera Cruz by the 24th inst.

On the 6th inst., as we learn from the Star, four privates of the 5th Indiana Regiment were attacked near the Molino del Rey by a gang of Mexicans, and two of them, named David Lyons and Nimrod Rigglesburger, were killed, the others, David T. Tower and Henry Dawson, badly wounded. Eleven Mexicans were arrested the next day as being concerned in the murderous attack.

Mr. Edwin Tobey, brother to the editor of the North American, died on the 8th inst. In the city of Mexico.

The train under command of Maj. Caldwell, which left Vera Cruzon the 7th inst., was encamped at Jalapa on the 15th and was to remain there another day. It consisted of 350 government wagons, 2300 pack mules and about 50 wagons belonging to merchants. The difficulty of proceeding with such a lengthy train with any rapidity is manifest. The conduct of Maj. Caldwell and all the other officers of this command is very highly commended in a letter from a correspondent who is with the train. But one wagon had been abandoned, which circumstance was occasioned by the loss of the mules, which strayed off. It belonged to the merchants’ train.

We have been most kindly permitted by a friend to publish the following extracts from a letter written in the city of Mexico by an intelligent English gentleman, who has become intimately acquainted with Mexican affairs by a long residence in that country. It will be seen that in the second letter he gives the substance of the treaty which as been signed by the Mexican commissioners and Mr. Trist, obtained from a source which can be implicitly relied upon.

Dear Sir—People say here generally that the peace is signed, and that an indemnification of some ten millions will be given by the Untied States for the territory they take, while a considerable body of troops, say 10,000, will be left to sustain the Government. In the mean time the Mexican Government is in difficulty, wishing to negotiate a loan of some $800,000 only, and cannot effect it until the publication of the fact of a treaty of peace being entered into, as every one is naturally anxious to know what he may expect in future; while unless the Government can obtain this it can hardly march, as the States will stop supplies of all kinds on pretence of being for the war, and that the Government does not proceed on the wishes of the people.

The other day Gen. Scott was invited to a grand party in the Desierto, about seven leagues from here, which has been the subject of much talk. It would seem that a notorious character, named Abraham de los Reyes, a Spaniard, who has been seven times convicted of assassinations and escaped from the Acordada, was there reconnoitering, and it was rumored that the commander-in-chief would go attended only by twenty five dragoons. However, he was disappointed in his expectations of taking the General, as there was in addition a regiment of Rifles, with two pieces, and many sentinels were placed in the woods about, so that he was obliged to make himself scarce. The thing passed off very well; but the Purists, who would now like to rule the destinies of the city, as they form the new Ayuntamiento gave sound toasts, which have been not a little commented on by their discontented fellow citizens. Among these was one against the Priests and Monks; and another wishing that the blood of all the Military (Mexicans) might be poured out “like the wine in this glass;” and another that the seed of the Anglo-American may take root in the soil, and that the army may not retire until it have germinated, &c. &c. I am told that it was one of the handsomest “diss de camps,” that has been given in this country.

Yesterday a body of about 700 men, cavalry and infantry, with some pieces, were dispatched or Cuernavaca, a town to the south about eighteen leagues from Mexico, the key to the Tierra caliente in that direction, and have a population of 5000 souls; though it is probably very considerably augmented now form the influx of many families from Mexico before and subsequent to our entry into the capital.

Peace stock, which had been rather on the decline of our President and Senate I have little doubt; that Pena y Pena and his cabinet approve of it; but the great sticking point I conceive to be the Mexican Congress. This body has not yet met, though they will have, in a few days a conrum of members and Queretaro; but a large portion quorum will be composed of men pledged to oppose a peace upon any terms—or in other words to support Santa Anna’s claims to the presidency. Eleven members from Oajaca have declared this in express terms; and last night’s mail brought news of the adhesion of Aguascalietnes and Chispas to the plan of San Luis. La Bandera del Pueblo winds up its notices of these movements in the following terms: “The treason of the Government at Queretaro is everywhere perceptible, and public opinion begins to express itself. The towns will soon rise in a mass against the odious invader, and the capital republic will rise triumphant from the struggle, if not regenerated, as the illustrious Gen.
Santa Anna said in his memorable manifesto of the 16th of August.

At a late meeting of the members of Congress at present in Queretaro, twenty five in number, it was ordered that the members absent be notified, through he Governors or local authorities, that if they do not appear in their seats by the 20th of February, “they shall be adjudged as traitors to their country, guilty of high treason, arrested, treated and punished accordingly.” It was further ordered that this decision be published three times in each official journals of the local and State Governments. At a subsequent meeting, held on the 1st inst the same number of members present, the Government communicated to them the late orders and instructions given to the Mexican commissioners, in their conferences with Mr. Trist, and which “may have terminated in negotiations of peace.”

In San Luis everything remains quiet, although, judging from the tone of the papers, that State will support Santa Anna body and soul. In Durango the Indians were becoming very troublesome, and the Governor was taking measures to organize a sufficient armed force to put them down.

This morning a courier arrived from Vera Cruz bringing dates to the 27th from New Orleans. Considerable excitement created by the order from Washington for a court of inquiry to be held at Puebla, on the cases of the arrested officers, dated the 17th from Washington, and the letter of “Truth Teller,” in the Picayune, dated the 18th which directly contradicts the order, and announces the recall of Gen. Scott and the release of the other officers. The knowing ones are bothered.

It would bother a brace of Philadelphia lawyers to unravel the tangled skein of Mexican politics, notwithstanding the later declaration of the Oajaca people against the peace policy of Pena y Pen, and their approval of the Pronunciamiento in San Luis—which looked to Santa Anna as the proper person to fill the Presidential chair, after the present occupant has been driven out—the monitor and Eco of today both assert that he has been refused an asylum by the authorities of both the State and capital of Oajaca.

Peace continues to be the principal subject of discussion here, and an important one it is to those who have located themselves and made extensive preparations for a long sojourn in Vera Cruz. A large majority of the intelligent proton of the community, and those most familiar with Mexican affairs, do not appear to regard the prospects of peace in any brighter light than they did before the treaty was signed, and argue generally in opinion that neither Mr. Trist nor the Mexican commissioners were properly authorized by their respective Governments to negotiate, but admitting that they were, if the basis of the treaty be such as it is represented to be, the U.S. Government cannot, with honor to itself, after having carried the war so far, and in a manner subjugated the whole country, accept of peace on such conditions as set forth in that precious document.

On the other hand, you may well judge of the future by the past, that the national obstinacy of the Mexican people to hear any propositions of peace from the U. States still continues to reign supreme, and particularly as these commissioners on their part have no doubt acted without authority. It is true that at several meetings of the Deputies at Queretaro, consisting of from eighteen to twenty-five members, a large majority of them were in favor of peace, but this is only about one-forth of the number sufficient to form a quorum, and although every effort has been made for the last six months to bring them together, they are not much nearer to it now than they ever have been since Queretaro was made the seat of Government. Again, admitting that peace will be made, it is the universal opinion that, in the present state of things, the Mexican people would be fighting amongst themselves in less that three months after the Americans should withdraw to the limits which may be agreed upon; and if the peace party be not strong enough to thrash those opposed to it, which is quite unlikely— as those generally opposed to it are the soldiery of the country— we would be just where we were before the war was carried into their old capital. To obtain and secure a permanent peace with Mexico, a strong party must first be raised to support it, and it must be raised independent of American influence and succor. Its leaders must be entirely disconnected with previous efforts to accomplish that end, and must come forth with their own free will and accord for that purpose.

yet for the whole.

City of Mexico, Doubtful Territory.

Dear Colonel: If anybody asks you that impudent question again, "What are you fightin' for?" jest tell him he's a goose, and don't know what he's talking about, for we aint fightin at all; we've got peace now; got an armistice, they call it; so there's no sense at all in their puttin that question to you any more. We've got the opposition fairly on the hip upon that question, if no other; fairly gagged 'em; they can't say to you any longer now, "What are we fightin for?" This is some consolation of the shabby trick Trist has served us. That fellow has made a bargain with the Mexicans to stop the war, in spite of the orders you sent to him to come right home and let things alone. I felt uneasy about it when I see him hanging about here so long after he got his orders to come home, and I said to him, once or twice, "Mr. Trist, what's the reason you don't go off home and mind the President? This unlawful boldness of yourn is shameful."

"Why, Major," says he, "he that does his master's will, does right, whether he goes according to orders or not. —

The President sent me out here to make peace, and it's a wonder to me if I don't fix it yet, somehow or other, before I've done with it." And then he put his finger to the side of his nose and give me a sassy look as much as to say, Major Downing, you better not try to be looking into diplomatic things that's too deep for you.

Says I, "Mr. Trist, I'm astonished at you; I thought you was a man of more judgment, and looked deeper into things. Don't you see what advantage it gives the President to let things now stand jest as they be? He's offered peace to the Mexicans, and they have refused it. Therefore, the opposition at home can't cry out against him any more if he goes ahead with the war. He's shut their mouths up on that score. He's made the war popular, and can go into the presidential campaign now with a good chance of being elected another term. And now if you go to dabblin in the business any more, I'm sure you'll do mischief. As things now stand, peace is the last thing in the world that the President wants. You've done your errand here and got your answer, and it's turned out jest right; we can go on with our annexin all Mexico now, without such an everlasting growlin among the opposition at home, for we've offered the Mexicans peace, and they wouldn't take it. So you've nothing to do now but to be off home, for the war is jest in the right shape as it is."

Well now, after all this plain advice—for I felt it my duty to be plain with him—he still kept hanging about here, day after day and week after week, and the first I knew we was took all aback by being told that Mr. Trist had made a treaty and General Scott was to order an armistice. I couldn'y hardly believe my ears at first. I posted right off to General Scott to know what it all meant.

"General," says I, "are you going to order an armistice?"

"Yes, Major Downing," says he: "Mr. Trist and the Mexican Commissioners have signed the preliminaries of a treaty, so of course we shall have an armistice."

"Well now, Ginerl," says I, "I don't think the president will thank you for that."

"Can't help that," says he, "I must obey the order of the Government, thanks or no thanks. And when Mr. Trist was sent out here to make a treaty, I was directed, whenever the plan of a treaty should be signed on both sides, to order an armistice, and wait for the two Governments to ratify the treaty. Well, Mr. Trist and the Mexican Commissioners have at last fixed up some kind of a bargain and signed it, and of course according to my orders we have nothing to do but to stand still and wait for the two Governments to clinch the nail."

"But," says I, "Ginerl, you know Mr. Trist has no right to make a treaty any more than I have, for the President has ordered him to come home; and if he has made a treaty it's no better than a piece of blank paper, and you shouldn't mind it."

"Don't know any thing about them matters," says he, "I can't go behind the curtain to inquire what little maneuvers are going on between the President and his Commissioner. Mr. Trist came out here with his regular commission to make a treaty. He has brought me a treaty, signed by himself and the Mexican Commissioners; and my orders are to cease hostilities. Of course we can do nothing else but halt and stack our arms."

"Well," says I, "Ginerl it aint right; it's bad business; it'll break up this grand annexin plan that was jest going on so nice that we might a got through with it in a year or two more; and then it will bother the President most to death about his election of the second term. That treaty must be stopped; it mustn't be sent home; and I'll go right and see Mr. Trist about it."

So off I went and hunted up Mr. Trist, and had a talk with him. Says I, "Trist, how's this? They tell me you've been making a treaty with these Mexicans."

"Shouldn't wonder if I had," says he: "that's jest what I come out here for."
"Well, I must say, sir," says I, "I think this is pretty piece of business. How do you dare to do such a thing? You know the President has ordered you home."

"Yes," says he, "and I mean to go home as soon as I get through the job he sent me to do."

"Well now," says I, "Trist, I claim to know what the President is about, and what he wants, and I'm his confidential friend and private ambassador out here, and I shall take the liberty to interfere in this business. This high-handed doings of yours must be nipped off in the bud. What sort of a bargain have you been making? Jest let me look at the treaty."

"Can't do it," says he, "its half way to Vera Cruz by this time; I sent it off yesterday."

"Blood and thunder!" says I, "then you have knocked the whole business in the head, sure enough. You've committed an outrageous crime, sir, and a great shame; and don't you know, sir, that great crimes deserve great punishments? I don't know what Col. Polk will do; but I know what my friend old Hickory would do if he was alive; he would hang you right up to the first tree he would come at."

"What, hang me for doing jest what I was sent here to do?" says he. "For I've made jest such a bargain as the President told me to make; only a leetle better one."

"That's nothing here nor there,' says I, "you know circumstances alters cases. And you know well enough, or you ought to have sense enough to know, that as things now stand, the President don't want a treaty. Now, says I, Mr. Trist, answer me one plain question: Do you know you have any right at all to make a treaty after the Presidents has ordered you home?"

"Well," says he, "I think circumstances alters cases too; and when the President ordered me home, I suppose he thought I couldn't get through the job he sent me to do. —but I though I could, and so I kept trying, and I've got through with it at last, and done the business all up according to my first orders; and I don't see why the president soudin't be well satisfied."

"Well," says I, "what's the items of the bargain? —What have you agreed upon?"

"Why," says he, "we have the whole of Texas clear to the Rio Grande; we have all of New Mexico, and all of Upper California. And we pay the Mexicans fifteen millions of dollars, and pay our own citizens five millions that the Mexicans owed them. And we stop firing, draw our charges from the guns that are loaded, and go home."

"Well, now," says I, "Trist, don't you think you are a pretty feller to make such a bargain as that at this time of day? The President will be mortified to death about it. Here we've been fightin near about two years to make the Mexicans pay over that five millions of dollars they owed our people, and now you've agree that we shall put our hands in our pockets and pay it ourselves. The whole plan of the war has been carried on by the President upon the highest principle to go straight ahead and 'conquer a peace,' man-fashion; and now you've agreed to back out of the scrape, and BUY a peace, and pay the money for it. You know very well the President has declared, time and again, that the war should go on till we got indemnity for the past and security for the future—them's his own words—and now you've agreed to settle up without getting one jot of either. For the past we are at least a hundred millions of dollars out of pocket, besides losing ten or fifteen thousand men. As for the men, I spose you may say we can offset them against the Mexicans we have killed, and as we have killed more than they have, may be it foots up a little in our favor, and that's the only advantage you've secured. As for the hundred millions of dollars, we don't get a penny of it back. So all the indemnity you get for the past is a few thousand dead Mexicans—that is, as many as remains after subtracting what they've killed of us from what we've killed of them. But the cap-sheaf of your bargain is the 'security for the future.' The cities and towns and castles that we have fit so hard to take, and have got our men into, and all so well secured you now agree to give 'em all right up again to the enemy, and march our men off home with their fingers in their mouths; and that's our security for the future. —As for the fifteen millions of dollars you agree to pay for New Mexico and California, you might hest as well a thrown the money into the sea, for they was ours afore; they was already conquered and annexed, and was as much ours as if we had paid the money for 'em."

Here I turned on my heel and left him, for I was so disgusted at the conduct of the feller that I wouldn't have any more talk with him, and now, my dear Colonel, there is nothing for us to do but to look this business right in he face and make the best we can of it. If there was any way to keep the thing out of sight, it would be best of you to throw the treaty into the fire as soon as you get it, and send word on to General Scott to go ahead again. But that is impossible; it will be spread all of the country and known to every body. And I'm convinced it will be the best way for you to turn right about, make out to be glad of what can't be helped, and accept the treaty. The nominations for the President is close at hand, and you must get ready to go into the election for your second term on what you've got, and make the best show you can with it. If you should reject the treaty, the opposition would get the advantage of you again; they would cry out that the Mexicans had asked for peace and you had refused it; and there would be no end to their growling about this oppressive war of invasion. But if you accept the treaty, it puts an end to their grumbling about the war.

To pacify our friends that are very eager for the whole of Mexico, you must tell 'em to keep quiet till after your next election is over, and may be you'll contrive some plan to be cutting into 'tother half. Keep Mr. Ritchie blowing the organ, all weathers, to the tune of half of Mexico for a song. Tell the whole country, and braze it out to every body that you've made a great bargain, a capital bargain, much better than Jefferson made when he bought Louisiana for fifteen millions of dollars: tell 'em for the same sum of money you have got a great deal more land and more men on it. I'm satisfied this is the best ground to take; we must go for the treaty, and bitter pill as it is, we must swallow it as though we loved it. I spose it will have to go before the Senate, as the Constitution now stands, (the constitution is very defective on that pint, and ought to be mended, for it's dangerous trusting important matters to the Senate,) but you must drive your friends all up to vote for it; don't let it fail on no account; don't let 'em go to fingerin it over and putting in amendments that will make the Mexicans so mad that they will kick it all over again. For that would put things into such hurly-burly I'm afraid you would lose your election.

Ratify the treaty, and then gather up all the glory that's been made out of this war, twist it into a sort of glory that's been made out of this war, twist it into a sort of glory wreath round our head, and march with a bold step and a stiff upper lip right into the Presidential campaign, and I shouldn't wonder if you bet the whole bunch of all your enemies and your friends. And if you went into your second term on the strength of half of Mexico, it would be a pretty good sign that you might go into a third term on the sterns of the whole of it.

I remain your faithful friend.
MAJOR JACK DOWNING

compact as this will not save these departments, upon which the eyes of the progressive and ultras are already fixed, from the fate of absorption, unless we begin now, by foreclosing the principle of acquisition in the treaty, when and where are we to end?

Among the many striking and imposing objections to the treaty, there is one, which as yet, has not been urged before the Senate, and has not been touched by the press. The ninth article stipulates that the most ample guaranty shall be enjoyed by all ecclesiastical and religious corporations and communities in the enjoyment of their prosperity of every kind, whether individual or corporate. This guaranty shall embrace all property destined to the support of these religious corporations, or that of schools hospitals and other foundations for beneficent purposes. No property of this nature shall be disposed of by the American Government, or ever be diverted to other uses. Those are not the exact words of the article, but they represent the substance fairly.

It has been shown by Mr. Benton and others, that nearly all the valuable lands in California have been granted away under one pretext or another. Some of them in quantities of 40,000 square miles to a single individual, --in document No. 75, recently published by the Senate, entitled "California Claims. Col Fremont and various witnesses testify as to a single grant of 3000 leagues to one Eugenio McNamara, who describes the purposes for which these lands were to be applied in the following words, to be found at page 21 of the document, in an address to the President of Mexico:

"If the means which I propose be not speedily adopted, your Excellency may be assured that before another year, the Californias will form a part of the American nation. —Then Catholic institutions will become the prey of the Methodist wolves, and the whole country will be inundated with the cruel invaders.

The question is not for what object Macnamara designed to appropriate these lands, or to what cause or religion—these are matters entirely foreign to the case, in my judgment. By the treaty we fix forever the absolute right t of the grantees in those lands, and we revive that odious and despotic system which prevailed over and impoverished England from the time of the Plantagenets down to that of Henry VIII when it was uprooted by his power of holding estate with the dead hand. The United States is prohibited from exercising any authority over the lands for the treaty purposes, to ratify them in perpetuo, and stipulate that they shall never be diverted to other uses. The admission of such a feature in connection with any territory to be recognized as under the jurisdiction of the United States is monstrous in the extreme; it is at war with every notion of republicanism, and there is no State in the union which has not protected itself against such a system.

Under this article, the Mormons, now collected in California, could and doubtless would establish an ecclesiastical tribunal as they did in Illinois and try and condemn their people in defiance of the laws of the State or Territory. No civil power could reach them. Let the people and the press ponder upon this odious feature in the treaty, and ask whether an American Senate would be justified in retaining an article, which is to cover California with privileged grants, inalienable from their very nature, and so confirmed by the highest compact known between civilized Governments.

If the treaty is ratified on both sides, it is confidently, predicted, that Mr. Mackintosh will be among the very first arrivals from Mexico, with an assignment or mortgage to cover the whole three millions stipulated to be paid after ratification. This is good democratic prophecy, and is worthy to be remembered.

The indications grow stronger that the present boundary will be expunged or some other leading article, so as eventually to lay it on the table, which requires a bare majority. If this is done, the Senate will then authorize a Commission, and the responsibility will devolve upon the President of selecting persons competent to represent the Government and the Magnitude of the interests at stake.

This course does not involve the rejection of the treaty, for the Senate can still hold it in possession, liable to ratification at any moment, should the pressure of events dictate so odious an alternative.

Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the senators present concur." This treaty is, therefore, ratified by more than the constitutional majority of two thirds.

It is also understood that the votes both of the majority and minority are made up of both political parties.

It is said that the original treaty has been ratified with some modifications—as proposed by the President, or adopted by the Senate.

The seal of secrecy has not been removed; and, in fact, we do not understand that any proposition was made to that effect. It cannot, therefore, be expected that we should at this time enter into any specifications of the precise modifications that have been adopted, or of the names of the senators who voted in the affirmative or negative. —It is presumed, however, that the boundary line, as said to have been originally specified by the treaty, or the amount of the money to be paid, has not been changed by these modifications.

We congratulate the country upon the result—as furnishing some hope and some augury of the restoration of peace. We trust that the Mexican government will not be so blind to the true interests of both countries, as to refuse its final ratifications of the treaty, now about to be sent back to them. We have obtained glory enough by our valor. We shall rejoice if the blessings of peace shall now succeed to the clash of arms.

We shall wait, of course, with some anxiety of the decision of the President and Congress of Mexico. We pursue that intelligence of the general result will be immediately forwarded by a special express to our commanding officer in Mexico—to be followed, as soon as possible, by an authentic copy of the ratified treaty, and with accompanying instructions.

The Senate have adjourned over till Tuesday next, for the purpose of enjoying some relaxation after the sever labors to which they have been subjected for these two weeks past.

CAPTURE OF MAZATLAN

The National Intelligencer has the following letter dated—

Mazatlan, Nov. 16, 1847

On the 10th of November the squadron under command of Commodore Shubrick, consisting of the frigates Independence and Congress, sloop of war Cyane, and transport Erie, arrived and anchored near to the town of Mazatlan. At six o'clock the next morning Capt La Valetta, accompanied by Lieut. Henry Lewis, and the Commodore's Secretary, Mr. La Rientrie, went on shore with a flag of truce, the Independence at the same time hoisting one at the fore, to demand the surrender of the place, and granting the authorities until 11 o'clock to respond. Tellis, the military commandant, said that his honor forbade his seeing or listening to any proposal of surrender, and that he should fight us if we landed. His troops, consisting of some six hundred well-armed and well-drilled men, were encamped about a mile and a half from the town. At eleven the Independence hauled down the flag of truce, and the squadron prepared to land their crews. At twelve the signal to land was hoisted, and we all pushed off from the respective ships in high glee and quite ready to meet our expected for. After a pull of some twenty minutes or so, five hundred jolly fellows, full of fight, were landed at the mole, and under the immediate command of the commander-in-chief. Our land was, I am sorry to say, entirely unopposed, and we were greeted by some thousands of inhabitants with looks of what I thought delight and gratification bearing from countenances. The men were formed in sections, and gaily marched through the streets with [ . . . ] playing "Oh whar did you come from?" Men women, and children followed us in all our meanderings through the streets. In the meantime the United States flag was hoisted on the Cuartel of the city, so lately and [ . . . ] deserted, and was saluted with twenty-one guns from the Independence, now under the command of Lieut. Frederick Chatard. The Cuartel was now taken possession of by our men, that is, a portion of them, and the reminder withdrew to their respective ships. The troops remaining on shore to guard the city consisted of one company of fifty men from the Independence and her guard of marines; for companies of forty-five each from the Congress, with her marines, and the marines and one company of forty men from Cyane.

On the 15th of November, landed from the Independence two long 24-pounders and two mortars and planted them in front of the building. The building is now well defended and we defy all attacks from the enemy.

Several skirmishes have taken place between our [ . . . ] and the Mexicans, and in one of them, near a little place called "Nonas," they had some five or six killed and a good number wounded, whilst on our side one man was killed and eight or ten wounded—some badly.

The Portsmouth sloop of war has arrived, and sails shortly for home. The Southampton has been here, and has sailed for La Paz, Lower California. The health of the squadron is generally good. Some few cases of fever have made their appearance.

“We are all well and in good spirits. We have plenty of stores on hand, sent us from the store ship Southampton, now lying here. The sloop Cyane is at anchor in the bay, We have the place well fortified with a deep trench encircling our camp, and a fresh supply of ammunition. We are in a condition, therefore, to maintain a long siege, and the probability is that eh enemy will soon give it up for a bad job.”

There had been some skirmishing between the American forces and the Mexicans, in which the latter were defeated, with a loss of 35 killed and as many wounded. —The Americans had one man killed and one wounded.

March 14, 1848 Approach of peace hailed

Nothing appears to us to demonstrate more entirely, the hearty disgust of all parties in the Union, with the provocation of the present war, then the very general joy with which the approach of peace is hailed. Whig and Democrat, agreeing in nothing else, seem to come together upon this. We never expected to see the day when the Intelligencer and the union, the Enquirer and ourselves, would be found rejoicing together at the same great political event. We should as soon, indeed, have looked for the advent of the Millennium, in our own day. Yet it has actually come to pass.

A remarkable feature of the whole transaction, connected with this treaty is, that no body seems to be entirely satisfied with it, and yet all are so thoroughly sick of the war, that they willingly adopt it as a choice of evils.

In such a light we ourselves regard it, and as such, we rejoice that it has been ratified. The terms, it is true, appear to us to be fraught with danger to their Republic. We adopt as citizens, an immense number of the most worthless of all God’s creatures—creatures with no proper conception of rational freedom, or constitutional Government, depraved in mind, debauched in habits, restrained by no sense of moral obligations, ignorant, degraded and stained by every vice that can possibly pollute mankind, when least elevated above the brute creation—we receive an immense amount of territory, a great part of which is uninhabited, the certain effect of which will be to stimulate to superhuman activity that brood of vampires, the Land Speculators, who are always the bane of new countries—we excite in the nation a passion for conquest, the most deadly of all diseases that ever preyed upon the vitals of a Republic—we throw open for discussion, a question of such fearful import, that Mr. Jefferson compared it to a fire-bell at midnight, at a time when parties are already in a state of bitter exasperation. Yet so thoroughly do we execrate this war, that even with all its disadvantages, we are willing to take as an alternative.

We, as our readers very well know, were from the first opposed to taking any more territory into the Union; but the time has long passed when it would have been possible to prevent it. it is now a question of how much or how little shall be received; and as we believed that this treaty gives us the smallest possible quantity, we are disposed to receive it. Every day’s continuance of the war added to the chances of enlarging our demands, and we verily believe that after one year more of hostilities, it would have been impossible to have stopped short of the whole of Mexico. The same evils, then to which we have already alluded as introduced by this treaty, would have followed in a form, enormously aggravated, under any other that could be ratified. In addition, we should have seen in Mexico a standing army of 50 or 100,000 men—we should have beheld, without being able to counteract it, the patronage of the Executive, already too great, swelled to a degree that would enable it to set law and constitution at defiance—we should have stained our souls with the guilt of trampling under foot the independence of another nation while we were boasting and justly, of our own. All these things, it appears to us, would most certainly have come to pass; and involving most deeply as they do the fate of the Union we are glad that they are put off, by any sacrifice.

THE TREATY.

We announced yesterday the conditional ratification, by the Senate, of the Treaty of Peace recently entered into between Mr. Trist and the Mexican Commissioners. We say, the conditional ratifications, because it is understood that several very essential modifications have been made it its provisions, and we have yet to learn whether or not those modifications will be acceptable to the Mexican Government. Notwithstanding its ratification, however, by more than the requisite constitutional majority of the Senate, the treaty is, we learn, far from being satisfactory to many of those, who, believing that the restoration of peace, upon any terms not actually dishonorable, is preferable to the indefinite prolongation of this most unnecessary and unconstitutional war, with the uncertainty of its results would it be farther prosecuted, were reluctantly persuaded to vote for its ratification.
Certainly, it seems remarkable, that, while the war has been professedly waged, for some time past, for two great objects—"indemnity for the past, and security for the future,"—the treaty by which it is proposed to terminate it requires us to pay to Mexico some twenty millions of dollars, by way of INDEMNIFYING HER for the territory she has been required to cede, while, so far as we are able to learn, there is no stipulation whatever (as indeed we do not perceived very clearly how there could be) having reference to that "future security" about which so much has been said. If the Administration had gone only for indemnity, it would have taken only so much of Mexican territory as would have been sufficient to have satisfied that requirement. But the fact that Mexico has been compelled to sell a large portion of her territory more than was deemed by our own Government adequate as "indemnity"—a fact demonstrated by the payment to her of a sum of money greater in amount than Mr. Jefferson gave for Louisiana, or than Mr. Monroe gave for Florida, the value of either of which is incomparably greater than that part of the Mexican Republic which is hereafter to constitute a portions of this Confederacy—establishes beyond controversy the truth of the assumption, so often denied by the friends of the Administration, that the ostensible pretexts for this war are materially different from the real causes. No one can doubt that it was instigated by a foregone conclusion on the part of Mr. Polk and his advisers to obtain from Mexico, by purchase or by conquest, or by both combined, such portions of her territory as those gentlemen deemed it important to possess. For our own part, while we have been desirous to see the treaty ratified, and while we hope that the changes made in its provisions may be acquiesced in by the Mexican Government, we nevertheless believe that it is on our part, in the pecuniary aspect of the question, a very hard bargain. To the acquisition of Upper California, though we believe that the advantages of its possession have been even more exaggerated than were those promised, but not yet realized, from the possession of Texas, we should have had no particular objection; and that territory we presume, might have been regarded as sufficiently valuable to have fully indemnified the United States. We should not have objected to it, because, in addition to the commercial facilities anticipated from its possession, that province is sparsely inhabited, and may consequently be soon Americanized. But we confess that we do not like the idea of paying twenty millions of dollars for New Mexico, which, although not very densely settled, is nevertheless occupied by a comparatively large number of Mexicans, how are uniformly represented to be the most ignorant and most depraved even of that degenerate race. If twenty millions of dollars be necessary to induce the Mexicans to consent to make peace, we should greatly have preferred to have given that sum to her for California alone, rather than for California and New Mexico together. Indeed, we think it would be wise, even now, to pay Mexico a handsome sum, in addition to the amount stipulated the treaty, to take New Mexico back again. We have no doubt that we should save money by the operation, while we should get rid of territory in no point of view valuable, and the possession of which may give rise to controversies that cannot fail to disturb the tranquility and to jeopardize the existence of the Union. As the prolongation of the struggle, however, might and probably would have led to the acquisition of several other Mexican provinces, on the Rio Grande frontier, we confess that we are gratified at the prospect of its termination upon such terms—even by giving instead of getting "indemnity," and by resting for the future "security" of our rights, upon our power to enforce a proper respect for them from nations far more powerful than the Republic of Mexico is or has ever been.

We subjoin an interesting extract of a letter from the Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia North American, giving an account of some of the most important changes made in the treaty towards the close of the Senate's deliberations upon it:

Correspondence of the Philadelphia North American.

The Rubicon is at last passed, and the votes this day given on the treaty, indicate the final result as clearly as if it was already recorded.

At the outset of the discussion, the active opposition was confined entirely to the majority. The Whigs took no part in the debate, but proceeded calmly and dispassionately to investigate and analyse the details and stipulations of the treaty. After a week of anxious solicitude to adopt some effectual means of bringing about a stable and honorable peace, predicated upon the basis of this negotiation, but differing as to the cession of territory, and partly as to the extent of consideration to be paid to Mexico, though the amount would never have interposed any serious obstacle, they frankly submitted their vies to the chamber, and various independent propositions were offered, calculated, in the estimation of their movers, to accomplish more satisfactorily the result so anxiously desired by the good men of all parties. These efforts were not responded to by the majority, and were discountenanced by the Executive, to whom they were communicated. It was then that the most direct opposition of a portion of the Whig party,—of men animated by the highest and most patriotic motives, ranking the first intellects in their number,—discloses itself. From that hour the hostility on the other side began to diminish, until now, it is within the competency of the President to number his majority on the final vote, or to reduce it at pleasure.

From ignorance or from some other cause, those who have been most influential in carrying through the treaty, have been misrepresented to the public, through correspondence from this city, as directly adverse to the positions which they have occupied throughout the whole struggle. Every estimate that has fallen under my eye has been erroneous, and based upon nothing else but wild speculation. Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Butler, Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Mangum, Mr. Dayton, and others, have been gazetted over and over again, as the most irreconcilable among the opponents of the treaty, while it is well known to those who have opportunity of knowing correctly that no other members of the Senate have labored as earnestly and as honestly to procure its passage, upon the conviction that it was the lesser of two great evils.

If any single individual on the Democratic side, is entitled more than the other, to the credit of the adoption of this treaty, though he would greatly have preferred other terms than those negotiated, it is JOHN C. CALHOUN. His repugnance to many of its provisions was never concealed, but still all his efforts were directed to ratification as the preferable alternative. He had it in his power, at any moment during the last ten days, to have rejected it beyond recovery.
I shall take a favorable occasion to explain the reasons that divided our friends on this question, but I may say now, after having enjoyed the privilege of understanding the views that operated on many of them, that no body of men ever acted under purer motives or influences so entirely disconnected from personal or partisan considerations. Had they regarded political policy only, or at all, quite another state of things would have been disclosed, than will be tomorrow or the next day. But I shall leave this subject for the present, to resume it more opportunely.

The debate was animated, but in a better temper than at the adjournment last night. The principal amendment was introduced by Mr. Davis, of Mississippi, to understand which I must explain an article in the treaty. Two modes of payment are contemplated, to liquidate the fifteen millions stipulated for the cession of territory; but both provide for the payment of the three million son the ratification by Mexico, or as the President has recently directed, on the exchange of ratifications. One mode proposes four annual installments, with interest from the date of ratification, payable in gold and silver in Mexico. The other, an issue of six per cent, stock, redeemable by the United States.

If Mexico preferred the latter alternative, as she had a right to do under the treaty, it was apprehended that the Government might at once negotiate a sale of the whole amount, and being subject to popular revolutions, might be displaced before our army could be withdrawn from the country. This would, perhaps, subject the United States to a loss of money and to a renewal of the war.

It was contended on the other hand, that by limiting the treaty to the provision of annual installments, we should be able to preserve a lien on the good faith of Mexico in the execution of the contract, and enable the negotiating government to maintain itself more permanently—at all events, that we should extricate ourselves from the present embarrassing position, by retiring within the boundary prescribed by the treaty.

This argument prevailed and Mr. Davis’ motion to confine the payment of the twelve millions to annual installments, was carried and the alternative of stock was expunged. Ina word, the transferability of the money has been stricken out. It is conjectured, that this amendment will not be particular by acceptable to Mr. Mackintosh and those who are connected with him, for they are really the person who are to receive directly or indirectly, the great bulk of the fifteen millions for advances. They would most undoubtedly have preferred our public stocks, for they are the agents of all the important mining operations in Mexico, and could readily have supplied the specie on the spot, and the difference in their favor would have been the difference of exchange between the countries on the whole amount, or something like a million and a half dollars. There are Senators who think this alteration will be productive of injurious consequences, by diminishing the cooperation of Mr. Mackintosh; but I apprehend that peace is of such urgent importance to him and the capitalist for whom he acts, that this restriction will be forgiven. If I am rightly informed, they have good reason for acknowledging the truth and force of the homely old axiom, that “half a loaf is better than no bread.”

The provision in the Treaty, which limits the claims of our citizens against Mexico to three and a quarter millions, is particularly unacceptable to those immediately interested, who have conjured up demands and damages to the tune of ten millions or thereabouts. There is a remarkable difference of opinion on this subject, for Mr. Calhoun, who gave it a thorough examination a few years ago, is decided in the conviction, that the amount stipulated, will more than cover the just rights of the claimants, --yes, fully by a million at least. A proposition to strike out this clause and to leave the extent of obligations that our government was to assume, unlimited and dependant upon the awards of the Commission that is provided for under the Treaty, was lost without even the form of a division.

made, and our troops are withdrawn, Mexico throws herself into the arms of the nations of Europe, and a monarchy is the result."

RW48v25i22p1c5-6 Friday, March 17, 1848: Later From Vera Cruz

From the New Orleans Mercury, March 7

LATER FROM VERA CRUZ.

The arrival, early this morning, of the steamship New Orleans, four days from Vera Cruz places us in possession of Mexican papers to the 2d inst. The Free American of that date contains the official report of Santa Anna, in regard to his surprise by Gen Lane, and request for his passport to retire from the country. This dispatch is dated Feb. 1st and explains how closely the hunters were upon the heels of the fox. He says to the Minister of War:

"At Tehuacan I was preparing the accompanying note, to be forwarded to your Excellency, when the people were suddenly invaded early in the morning of the 25th ult. By four hundred dragoons of the enemy, under the command of General Lane. They came from Mexico, and by the express order of Gen Scott, to take possession of my person some way or other Gen Lane, by hurried marches and journeying by night succeeded in reaching the vicinity of Tehuacan without being perceived. Fortunately, however, I was informed of his approach two hours before he came and thus was safe from his clutches, with my family, and with a small escort which accompanied me, I took refuge in the town of Teotitlan del Camito, where there was a force from the State of Oajaca. My persecutors forced open the door of my habitation, and searched for me with extraordinary activity, extending their search to different houses of the place. The greater part of my equipage was destroyed by the invading soldiers, and their chiefs took my wrought silver plate, two canes, a new uniform, and other things of less value, as I have been informed.

"After two days, Gen Lane proceed to Orizaba, where he remains, having left no very favorable recollections of himself in Tehuacan. I left for this place in order to look about me, and see whether I shall go, and place myself beyond the reach of the enemy, now that I cannot fight against them, in consequence of the mournful condition to which I have been reduced by the Government, which ordered that I should throw aside my arms. I am sensible that spurious Mexicans and the invaders persecute me at the same time—the one calling me a traitor, and the others, the only obstacle to the negotiator of peace. Fatal position in which I am placed by the injustice of some of my fellow citizens.

When I shall have found an asylum which offers sufficient security, I shall make it known to your Excellency, for the information of the First Magistrate of the Republic, in compliance with my duty."

RW48v25i22p1c6 Friday, March 17, 1848: Rumor

From the Free American.

RUMOR. —At a late hour last evening, we learned that an express had arrived from Mexico. How true it is, there is no saying. All we know is, that it is rumored that an armistice has been agreed upon for two months, by General Butler and the Mexican Commissioners. Strange if true!Mitchell.

RW48v25i22p1c6 Friday, March 17, 1848: Guerrilla Fight

GUERRILLA FIGHT—LIEUT HENDERSON KILLED. A desperate conflict between Lieut. Col. Biscoe's command and a powerful force of guerrilleros occurred on the evening of the 13th of February, at a place called Matacordero, on the Orizaba road, in which Lieut. Henderson, of the Louisiana Volunteers, was killed. He fell in a hand to hand conflict. Four of the Georgia Dragoons, who were part of Col. Biscoe's command, were also killed, and three men of the Louisiana Battalion wounded. The Guerrilleros having been driven from the field, Col. Biscoe's command proceeded unmolested to Oajaca. The body of Lieut. Henderson was brought to Vera Cruz on the 1st instant. It is to be sent to this city for interment.

The following officers were in the engagement: Lieut. Col. Biscoe, commanding; Capts. Wafford and two Lieutenants, Georgia Mounted men; Capt. George Keri; Lieuts Henderson, Berry, Hook, Hunter and

A train of 160 wagons arrived at Very [sic] Cruz on the 29th ult. Escorted by a portion of Lieut Col Boscoe's Mounted Volunteers, consisting of the companies of Captains Fairchild, Connelly and Keri, Capt Howe's company of the 2d Dragoons, and two companies of Michigan infantry—280 in all. According to the Free American of the 1st inst. a Mexican, who arrived with the train, reported that on or about the 23d ult. Gen Santa Anna, with 2000 men, had an engagement with about 400 American at Tehuacan, and that eight men had been killed on the American side.

From the City of Mexico.

The dates from the city of Mexico are to the 25th of February. Letters written that day say that an armistice for two months would be signed by Gen Butler the following. Our correspondent at Vera Cruz agrees with the Free American that such an armistice had been arranged and determined upon.

We have no letters from the city of Mexico so late as the 26th ult., and the New Orleans sailed so soon after the arrival of the express from the capital, that the news by it had not finally transpired. Our latest papers from the city of Mexico are to the 19th ult.

Gen. Cushing, with an escort of two companies of Dragoons, left here on the 15th for Puebla, to assist in organizing the Court being organized, it will adjourn to this city and here transact its business.

On Sunday night a Texan Ranger named Adam Alsence, of Capt. Robert's company, was attacked by a number of Mexicans in the suburbs of the city and killed. He was mangle din a brutal manner, and the Texans, exasperated at the cruel death of their comrade, sallied into the streets the next evening, to the number of fifteen or twenty, and proceeding to the quarter where Alsence was killed, took fearful vengeance upon a party whom they found armed with pistols and knives. Seventeen of the Mexicans are reported killed, and forty wounded. Alsence was a German, had served in Bonaparte's cavalry, and was a good and faithful soldier.

Yesterday Col. Jackson, bearer of dispatches from Washington, arrived with a small escort from Vera Cruz in six days. Shortly after his arrival it was known that he brought dispatches both to Generals Scott and Butler, and the inference was at once drawn that the former was recalled, and the latter placed in chief command of the army. This proved true, and enclosed you will find the farewell address of the late general-in-chief to the army. It is brief, pointed, and feeling. Now that he is leaving the scene of his glorious exploits, those who shared danger and victory with him in many a great battle, weep like children parting with a father. His recall may possibly have an effect upon the treaty, should it ever be returned from the United States ratified. No doubt the gentleman who succeeds him, will do all that he thinks his duty requires, but Gen Scott had identified his fame with a peace as a result of his operations in this valley, and would have exerted himself more than any other man to bring the war to a close. He, too, from his longer residence here, has a better acquaintance with the Mexicans, and therefore knows better how to operate upon them. It is added that the despatches bring orders to restore the swords of Generals Pillow and Worthe and Col. Duncan. If I can before the mail leaves, I will learn the certainty of this.

We copy from the American Star of the 19th ult. The following article in regard to General Scott’s withdrawal from the command of the army in Mexico in obedience to the orders of his Government, regretting extremely that the whole farewell address of the Commander-in-Chief has not reached us. It has unaccountably, been lost.

MAJ. GEN. SCOTT. —BY REFERENCE TO GENERAL ORDERS it will be seen that Gen Scott has turned over the command of the army to Maj. Gen Butler. We promised to inform our readers of this when officially advised on the subject, and we now do so, though with regret. Although we were told in Puebla that the General had requested to be relieved when active operations ceased, we were not prepared to received the news that such had been the case. We do not think that either the Government or Gen Scott’s inclinations should take him from the army until a peace is made. He has accomplished so much and against such great odds, that we regret to see him part with his companions in arms, and we have no hesitation in saying that such are the sentiments of the American army. It matters not how accomplished and gallant his success may be, under the circumstances his place cannot be filled, and if we know Gen Butler, we believe that he will echo that sentiment, for he is not so much weighed down by ambition as to applaud the re-call, although the act places him in command of the proudest army in the world.

Winfield Scott this morning, takes leave officially of the army, of that gallant band with which he has carried his and their names upon the highest point of fame’s column. Many an eye will fill with tears this morning, when they read
Even in his shortly order he pays the following deserved compliment to his successor—a brother officer, who was his companion in arms in 1812, as he was here until today.

"In taking official leave of the troops he has so long had the honor personally to command in an arduous campaign—a small part of whose glory has been, from his position, reflected on the senior officer—Major Gen Scott is happy to be relieved by a General of established merit and distinction in he service of his country."

The latest dates from Queretaro are to the 17th ult. The American Star of the 19th thus sums up the news.

Queretaro. —Advices have been received from the seat of Government up to Thursday last. Several new deputies had arrived, but the meeting of Congress was going on very slowly, and some were beginning to lose all patience. The Monitor’s correspondent says he shall forward the names of all those who have presented themselves, and also the names of those who have not, with the opinion in regard to the matter, of the States to which the latter belong.

At the meeting on Monday last, thirty deputies were present, though we infer, from previous letters of the correspondent referred to, that more than this number have presented themselves, and are ready for action as soon as there is a prospect of a quorum. A communication was received from the Minister of Relations, stating that he was using every possible means for the assembling of Congress, enforcing the penalties, ordered at a previous meeting of the members, and such as he was constitutionally invested with.

The writer adds that the passport asked for Santa Anna, by Sr. Trigeneros, had been made out for him.

The Arco Iris of the 1st inst. has rumors that Santa Anna had changed his mind about leaving the country and that he was about to try his fortunes again amidst the internal convulsions which threaten to distract the nation. —He is represented as being in the neighborhood of Tehuacan, at the head of eighty followers. His design is said to be to unite his fortunes with the Vice Governor of San Luis and Gen Alvarez and then march upon Queretaro, over throw the Government of Pena y Pena, and establish a Dictatorship. But before executing this grand design, he proposed striking a blow at the Americans, in order to recover the credit with his countrymen. The Arco Iris puts as little faith in this project as we do; but that Santa Anna is still lurking about Tehuacan there would appear to be no doubt.

[AEK]
In searching the town it was evident it had been a recruiting station or rendezvous. Army clothing and arms were found in abundance, all of which were destroyed. —The General, with a view of inducing Rea to attack him in the town, or to give battle the next day on the road to Mexico, gave out that his ammunition was entirely exhausted, sad to complete the RUSE, mad a requisition upon the arcade for a supply, which, as was anticipated, he said he was unable to meet, there not being, he declared, a pound of powder in the town. His word for it was of course taken, but all failed, and the command marched into the city without firing a gun, with the exception of a few of the Rangers in advance, who shot eight or ten straggling guerrillas.

RW48v25i23p1c2 Tuesday, March 21, 1848: Colonel. Fremont and Mr. Mcnamara

COL. FREMONT—MR. MACNAMARA, &C.

Our attention has been attracted, by an article in the New York Courier, to a series of most extraordinary facts developed by the petition of Col. Fremont, for some time under investigation in the Senate, relative to the claims of certain citizens of California, &c.

It is well known that Mexico has always charged upon the United States that she assisted in fomenting the difficulties which arose between her and Texans, and that our Government has always disclaimed it, in he most direct and explicit terms. The press both of England and France, taking their cue from Mexico, has continued, even to the present day, to ring the changes upon our supposed delinquency, and stigmatizes our conduct in this particular as not only insidious and mercenary, but, in view of all the circumstances, absolutely atrocious. The care which has been taken to repel these imputations shows that not only the Government but the public intelligence of the country is well aware of the utterly inexcusable nature of the charge, provided it could be proved. We have no means of ascertaining what was done with regard to Texas, but the petition of Col. Fremont leaves us no room to doubt of the course pursued towards California.

It is evident from that petition, that, before war had broken out between the United States and Mexico, he, Col. Fremont, an officer in the service of the United States, aided in a rebellion in California, the object of which was to sunder that province from Mexico, and erect it into a free and independent Government. He succeeded completely, and after the revolution had been conducted to a successful issue, and the independence of California established, upon receiving intelligence of the war between this country and Mexico, he tore down (not the Mexican flag, but) the flag of the free State of California, and erected the stars and stripes in its stead. The expense of all these proceedings, volatile as they were of all ideas of international law, and even of common justice, Col. Fremont engaged to have paid out of the coffers of the United States. The facts are substantially set forth in the following passage from the petition:

"The petition of John Charles Fremont, a citizen of the United States, Respectfully Shows: --That in June of the year 1846, being then a brevet captain of topographical engineers in the service of the united States, and employed as such in California, he engaged in military operations with the people of the country for the establishment of the independence of California, before the existence of war between the United States and Mexico was known, and was successful in said undertaking; the independence of California, being proclaimed at Sonoma on the 5th of July, and the Mexican forces routed and dispersed. That, immediately on hearing of the war between the United States and Mexico, the flag of independence was pulled down and that of the United States run up in its place, and under the flag military service was rendered to the United States until the conquest was complete, and supplies obtained from the people mostly on credit of certificates given for them. That, after the conquest, a temporary government was formed; the expenses of which, like those incurred for military operations, are mostly yet paid, and should be paid by the United States, to whom all the benefits of the conquest of California has accrued."

From the following letter it will be seen that a portion of the claims which from the subject of the petition, is for services rendered before there was any war between Mexico and the United States:

"WASHINGTON CITY, OCTOBER 8, 1847.

"Sir: in the discharge of my official relations in California, as military commandant and governor of that territory, I incurred liabilities for which the faith of the government, as well as my own, were pledged, and same of which I think it absolutely necessary to bring to your attention. —

These are:

The payment of the volunteers for their services during the war, and for supplies in arms and other necessaries furnished by them.

Payment to citizens of that territory of money loaned to me by them, required and expended in the administration of the government and partial payment of the troops.

"The principal amount required for payment of the troops is comprised in what is due to the volunteer emigrants for
Before it had become so fashionable to set the constitution at open defiance, such conduct as this would have exited one united cry of indignation all over the land; but now, in the midst of a host of more dangerous infractions, it is hardly noticed. We have yet to learn whether or not the officer in question acted under order; whether or not he is up held by the Executive in assisting to establish an independent nation, and then at will subverting its independence.

Col. Fremont states, as an apology for this summary proceeding, that the British Government had already formed designs upon California, which would have been successful but for its own promptitude. In his evidence before the Military Committee, he says:

"There is good reason to believe, and evidence at hand to sustain that belief, that the revolutionary movement prevented a design of the Californians to put their country under the flag of the British, and also prevented the completion of the colonization grant of 3000 square leagues to Macnamara, who was brought to California in the British sloop of war Juno in the month of June, 1846. Admiral Seymour, in the Collingwood of 80 guns, arrived at Monterey on the 16th of July. Macnamara was on board the Collingwood when I arrived at Monterey on the 19th, and was carried away in that vessel. The taking possession of that place on the 7th had anticipated him, and the revolutionary movement had checked the design of the Californians to place the country under British protection and also prevented the fulfillment of the great grant to Macnamara."

The evidence to which he alludes was found at the city of Los Angelos, the most conspicuous of which is the proposition of the notorious priest Macnamara, an Irishman by birth, addressed to the President of the Mexican Republic, which was to the following effect: that unless prompt measures be taken, California will soon cease to be part of the Mexican Republic—that those measures consist in settling the coast with a body of emigrants capable of maintaining themselves in their possessions—that these emigrants should profess the Roman Catholic religion—that men of the right stamp, not existing in Mexico, is it necessary to look to Europe for them—that of all others, the Irish possess the highest and most numerous recommendations—that he has a triple object in view in settling Upper California with a Colony of Catholic Irishmen, viz. to advance the cause of Catholicism, "to throw every obstacle in the way of farther usurpation on the part of an irreligious and anti-catholic nation," and to benefit his won countrymen. He proposes to establish the first Colony at San Francisco, and gradually to settle the whole coast. Four thousand acres of land are required for each family, one thousand of whom were to be imported immediately, and so on until the whole coast is settled. The grant would amount to about 14,000,000 acres.

In a second letter he urges the President to make haste, saying that unless his project is speedily accomplished, "before another year the Californians will form part of the American Union, and their Catholic inhabitants become the prey of Methodist wolves." This proposition was accepted, as appears from a proclamation of the Governor, Don Pio Pico, also in evidence before the committee. It farther appears that immense tracts were granted to British subjects for little or no consideration, in order to give the British Government a pretext for protecting the rights of their subjects, and thereby entering California.

Col. Fremont defends his conduct by saying that these schemes could only have been defeated by his prompt interference, but we regard this as a clear non sequitur; for, had he but had the patience to wait a few months, long before Macnamara could have imported his Irish Colony, he would have found a war ready made to his hand, and might then have proceeded without incurring the guilt of having palpably violated the law of nations.

RW48v25i25p4c5 Tuesday, March 28, 1848: From Monterey

From Monterey

The Monterey Gazette of the 26th ultimo is filled with a graphic account of the celebration of the anniversary of the battle of Buena Vista. The celebration took place at the Governor's palace on the 23d. The officers of the 16th infantry gave a splendid dinner to Gen. Wool and the officers of the army now with the division who shared with him the perils and achieved the victory of the ever-memorable 22d of February 1847. The general was in excellent health and spirits, and entered with zest into the festivities. Toast, story, reminiscence, song, and sentiment went round the sumptuously spread board, and several very pertinent speeches were made. We copy a sketch of that made by Gen. Wool, in giving the following toast:

"General Taylor: He has returned to the bosom of his family crowned with a wreath of laurels, and bearing on his shield the victories of Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, Monterey, and Buena Vista."

Gen Wool remarked that he thought it a proper and fit occasion, seeing so many gallant spirits present, to contradict a statement which had been published in the United States, and recently as coming from the other line, that at some period of the two eventful days of the 22d and 23d of February, 1847, when, as Santa Anna said, blood flowed in torrents, and the field of battle was strewed with the bodies of the dead, that he had advised Gen. Taylor to fall back, or retreat from the position occupied by the American troops at the pass of Angostura. He declared statement to be wholly and totally false, and without the shadow of foundation. The idea of abandoning that position had never for a moment occupied his mind; so far from it, he considered it the only position in the valley of Saltillo where a small force could maintain itself against a large one; and had selected it as early as the 23rd December, 1846, two days after his arrival at Agua Nueva, under the earnest entreaty of General Worth to come and assist to repel General Santa Anna who he supposed was approaching Saltillo with a large army. He was confident that he could defend it with his column, at the time about 2,700 strong, against any force with it was probably Santa Anna could bring against it. He further remarked that such was the strength of the position that but for the unfortunate and most unexpected retreat of Col Bowles's regiment, the 2d Indiana volunteers, the Americans would have defeated the Mexican army early in the day. The attack in the centre had been repulsed with great loss by Washington's battery; the advancing columns sent to attack and force the left had also been repulsed and dispersed; when, at this moment, Bowles's regiment fled, under his order to retreat, the field of battle. The engineer in the staff of Santa Anna says in his report of the battle that if the Americans at the time they dispersed the advancing columns had pushed on, the Mexicans would have been defeated; Santa Anna seeing our troops flying the field, hastened up fresh columns of lancers, drove back Lieut. O'Brien, now captain, and forced our left.

FROM THE NEW ORLEANS PICAYUNE, MARCH 18.

FROM THE CITY OF MEXICO

By the arrival yesterday of the U.S. brig Mary Jane, Capt. Hussey, from Tampico the 8th Inst. we have received papers from the city of Mexico to the 23d of February. —The papers previously received were only to the 19th.

It will be recollected, however, that a courier reached Vera Cruz just before the New Orleans sailed who left the capital on the 26th of February. The only glimpse of news derived from him was to the effect that an armistice for two months had been assented to by Gen. Butler, and that it would be formally signed on the 27th. By this arrival from Tampico we have nothing so late as this, but by the Star of the 22d we see that both the commissioners to negotiate and armistice had arrived. They are Gen. Mora y Villamil and Senor Quijano. The Monitor says that Gen.
Scott had had an interview with them, adding, as we learn from the Star, that “though suspended in his functions as general-in-chief, we understand this presents no obstacle to the negotiation of an armistice.”

The same Monitor says that Gen. Butler had consented to the suspension of the payment of the assessments levied upon the people of the city for the space of four days, and that this was granted in consequence of the request of the above commissioners.

The Star gives an extract from a letter dated Toluca, February 18th, which says that Gen. Alvarez was within half a day’s ride of that city; that the American troops were under arms, and the town full of people. No apprehension is expressed by the Star or its correspondent.

The Toluca diligence was robbed, as before mentioned by us, on the 16th ult. One of the persons robbed says that the chief of the robbers is a deputy of the State.

a military duty, he sent to the house of a Lieutenant colonel had him brought out and received twenty-five blows of the kind known to the Mexican Service. — The unfortunate lieutenant colonel had but a short time before, and in the same place, in agreement with Perdigon, inflicted some lashes upon two of his assistants for robbery. The colonel has brought charges against Perdigon.

The following are the first general order issued by Maj. Gen. Butler upon assuming the command of the army of Mexico:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF MEXICO,
Mexico, Feb. 19, 1848.
Orders No. 1

Pursuant to the order of the President of the United States, and the instructions of Major Gen. Scott, communicated in his General Order No. 59, of yesterday’s date, Major Gen Butler hereby assumes command of the army of Mexico.

On entering upon the duties assigned him, Gen Butler cannot be unmindful that he succeeds a general familiar alike with the science and the art of war, and who has but recently brought to a glorious termination one of the boldest campaigns to be found in its annals. He feels, however, less diffidence in assuming the important and responsible command assigned him, from the conviction that the is sided and sustained by many of the talented and experienced officers who contributed nobly to our recent success in arms, and by a gallant army who have learned too well the road to victory easily to mistake it.

The orders and instructions issued by Major Gen Scott for the government of this army will be continued in force.
By order of Major Gen. Butler:

L. THOMAS, A.A.G.

The following article is from the Star of the 22:

"Santa Anna—The Mexican papers of yesterday contain a long communication from Santa Anna dated at Coxcatlan on the 5th inst. It is addressed to Senor Ross, the Minister of Relations, in reply to his circular to the Governors of the States on the subject of the late attempt at a revolution in San Luis. It contains a long and rather severe review of that circular, more particularly in reference to the implied charges in it against Santa Anna himself, and closes with an extract from that document as applicable to himself. It is that passage which says that the present generation cannot judge impartially and do justice to those who established the government when the nation was without a head—though posterity will do them justice and perhaps do them honor."

The Star does not translate this manifesto on account of its length. We ourselves received a copy of it by the New Orleans and upon careful perusal of it, we thought it not worth translating, throwing no light upon Mexican politics or Santa Anna's designs. The Monitor and the Eco del Comercio are both sever upon it, indulging in language which would be deemed harsh towards Santa Anna in the mouth even of an American.

A train of eight wagons, under Capt Moore, A Q M., escorted by Lieuts Berry and Cooper with fifty men arrived at the city of Mexico on the 20th ult. from Cuernavaca. —Lieut Williamson, Quartermaster of the15th Infantry arrived with them. Every thing was quiet at Cuernavaca and the troops in good health. Two Mexican Generals arrived in Cuernavaca on the evening of the 18th inst. but their names are not given.

Since Mr. Peoples has returned to the city of Mexico he has had the misfortune to lose four of this expresses. By the following order of Gen Butler it will be seen that we shall not much longer require the aid of expresses:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF MEXICO.
Orders—No. 3.

As soon as suitable arrangements can be made a mail will be sent from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico on the 1st and 15th of each month, and returning, will leave this city the third day after the arrival of the upward mail. — An escort of not less than twenty-five mounted men, to be commanded by a commissioned officer, will be sent with the mail, to be relieved at each of the following stations, viz: National Bridge, Jalapa, Perote, post intermediate between Perote and Puebla, should one be established, Puebla and Rio Frio. The detachment will remain at the station at which they halt, to receive the downward mail. —The mounted corps will furnish the escort, but in the event that this cannot be done—as my sometimes happen at some of the smaller garrisons—horses will be furnished to mount the necessary number of foot troops.

As far as possible, letters and papers for the several stations will be made up in different packages, with way bills, and addressed accordingly, and only those having the addresses of any post will be taken from the general mail on its arrival thereof. Packages marked "Miscellaneous" may be overhauled and examined at any intermediated post between Vera Cruz and Mexico, but none others; unless in very special cases, when it will be done under the personal supervision of the commanding officer of the post.

The quartermaster's Department is charged with making the necessary arrangements for carrying out the above order; and commanding officers of the posts designated will see that no unnecessary delay takes place in sending forward the mail from their respective stations.

By order of Major Gen Butler:

L. THOMAS, A.A.G.

Col Randall, Deputy Paymaster General and Chief of the Pay Department with the army, has been appointed to receive the assessments levied for the support of the army in the Federal District of Mexico. The same order announcing the appointment likewise announces that Lieut. G. W. Lay, 6th Infantry, had been appointed aid de-camp and military secretary to the commander-in-chief. Lieut Lay held the same post under Gen Scott.

The third brigade (Col. Riley's) was reviewed and inspected on the plains of Molino del Rey on the 21st ult. By Major Buchanan, Acting Inspector General. It is needless, says the Star, to speak of the perfection of this command when it is known that the 2d Artillery, 2d4th and 5th Infantry and Voltiguers compose the command.

The Star mentions the receipt of a letter from Rio Frio, now occupied as a military post by Capt Little’s company of Illinois mounted men. A member of the company, John E. Wells, had died; otherwise the health of the company was good.

The 22d February was to be observed in various modes appropriate to the day, in the city of Mexico.
Some idea of how we are raising money in Mexico to pay our troops may be gathered from the following, which we copy from the Star of the 20th:

"Assessments, --Observe at the corners of the streets a large handbill, issued by the ayuntamiento, containing the names of person, shopkeepers of every class, pulque venders, and dealers in every kind of business, with the sums which each is to pay towards the assessment of $100,000 levied upon the district by the American authorities. The catalogue contains about four hundred names, divided into different classes according to their means and standing as person of wealth. The first class of merchants pay $12 per annum and the lowest $2. The lowest contribution per year by different trades is $1.20 per annum. It is stated in this large document that one-third of the amount assessed, or four months, is to be paid at the end of three days after its publication."

We have received a copy of El Iris Espanol of the 23d, but find no news in it. The dates from Queretaro are only to the 17th ult. --the same which we received by the New Orleans. The Government is said to be reduced to straits for want of money, but the agents of stock-jobbers were in the city endeavoring to come to terms with it for a loan. — We may shortly expect later news from Mexico by the way of Vera Cruz.

NEWS FROM MEXICO.

The important intelligence just received from Mexico leaves us but little space for other matter. The negotiation of an armistice, which provides for the suspension of hostilities throughout the whole of the Mexican Republic, is the most decidedly favorable indication of the probability of the ratification by Mexico of the treaty lately negotiated that we have seen. It must nevertheless be remembered that the treaty has undergone several material changes, which may deprive it of the support of influential foreigners resident in Mexico, and especially of Mr. Mackintosh, under whose immediate auspices it is supposed to have been formed. It is probable, however, even should his influence be exerted against the treaty, that in the existing prostrate and hopeless condition of the Mexican Government and people, the returned treaty will be confirmed in he shape given to it by the Senate. We hope so, most certainly; for although it be one of which, as has been truly said, no one can be proud, even they who are most ashamed of it will not the less rejoice at the termination of the war upon such terms—terms less humiliating in themselves, that, from the nature of the issues that must grown out of them, they are threatening to the future tranquility and perpetuity of the Union.

Punctual to her day, the royal mails team packet Great Western, Capt. Chapman, arrived a Ship Island at 11 A.M. On Wednesday last.

By this arrival we have letters and papers from our correspondents—our dates from the city of Mexico being nine days later than our last accounts.

The Great Western left Vera Cruz on Saturday afternoon, the 18th, bringing letters and papers from that city to her day of sailing.

It is said that Gen Twiggs expresses great anxiety to visit the U. States, having been five years absent from his family.

The Free American of the 17th inst. Announces the death of Lt. Col. Allen, of the 2d infantry. He had but recently arrived in Vera Cruz, in his way to join his regiment in the interior.

Santa Anna has applied to Gen. Twiggs, through Col. Hughes, for permission to pass through Vera Cruz and out of the country. A special express from Jalapa reached Vera Cruz the evening of 16th inst. with the application, and as the General at once granted the permission asked, it was supposed the Ex-President would arrive there in a day or two.

A report is current in the city that the steamer was detained at Vera Cruz from the 17th to the 18th, to receive Santa Anna on board, and that he is in truth a passenger on her. We mention the rumor, but without putting confidence in it. At all events, it was not known to the passengers with whom we have conversed.

We have seen a private letter from the city of Mexico dated the 14th inst. The Mexican and English couriers arrived there on the 12th from Vera Cruz. There was nothing talked of at the capitol but peace. It is said that foreign
In a letter I wrote you on the 8th inst., I enclosed a copy of an armistice concluded at Guadeloupe on the 2d. In my letter of the 8th I briefly adverted to the armistice in terms of censure. More mature reflection has fixed me in the opinion I then expressed in relation to it, and the army, so far as I have been able to canvass its opinion, is unanimous in pronouncing this the most one-sided "military convention" we have had during the war.

Santa Anna and Paredes. —The Monitor states that there is a rumor afloat that Santa Anna and Paredes had made up their minds to issue a joint pronunciamento in San Luis, but this, he adds, cannot be so, as two cats could not live in the same bag, and that a person worthy of credit has assured him that he has seen a letter from Santa Anna to a friend desiring him to place money for him in the island of Jamaica.

The Star of the 9th says Senor Quijano, one of the armistice commissioners, had gone to Cuernavaca, with instructions from the Government to make use of every means in his power to suppress the Indian rebellion in that vicinity, which we have before mentioned.

The North American of the 10th inst has accounts of a revolution in Guatemala. If that paper be accurately informed, Gen. Carrera has been deposed from the presidential chair, and the Vice President is acting in his place, and endeavoring to put down the Insurrection.

This is not the dullest place imaginable and will continue so during the armistice. Several officers anticipating no further active service, have resigned and returned home with the train which left here on the 6th inst. in charge of Col. Black, of the Pennsylvania Volunteers; and others have returned on leave which will not terminate until with peace is made or the armistice ended.

Among them is General lane, who found on his arrival from his last expedition, letters informing him that the great flood of the Ohio had made sad havoc with his plantation in Indians, sweeping off all his stock.

In a letter I wrote you on the 8th inst., I enclosed a copy of an armistice concluded at Guadeloupe on the 2d. In my letter of the 8th I briefly adverted to the armistice in terms of censure. More mature reflection has fixed me in the opinion I then expressed in relation to it, and the army, so far as I have been able to canvass its opinion, is unanimous in pronouncing this the most one-sided "military convention" we have had during the war.

From the tone of the papers received here from the United States, but little doubt exists that the so called treaty will be ratified at Washington, and we suppose the great question with you now is, “will it be ratified by the Government at Queretaro?” It is as difficult to answer than question now as it was a month ago, and judging from the inactivity of the President, and allowing him to be sincerely deserving of peace, the presumption is that he is awaiting to make an energetic effort to assemble a quorum of congress and to obtain its approval. The friends of the administration justify his inactivity in this manner, and say in Congress were assembled before the treaty comes back from Washington, his strength I the body to obtain a ratification would be frittered away by the debates and quarrels fort he break up in a row. This is plausible enough. I do not doubt the President’s sincerity, but the uncertainty of ratification here consists in this ability, first, to bring together a quorum, and next to exercise sufficient influence to control the requisite majority. He has at Queretaro, in Tolaca, in this city, and scattered through the country now between sixty and seventy members, ready, it is said, to meet whenever the treaty is returned from Washington with the approval of our Government, but he considers it necessary to hold elections for other members, in some, if not all the cities and States occupied by our army, not only to secure a quorum, but to secure the assembling of a much larger number in order that his opponents and the opponents of peace may not defeat his object either by non-attendance at Queretaro, or if there, withdrawing from Congress what the question is put and break the quorum. This last is a common trick in Mexican congresses, and among the members who avow their willingness to go to Queretaro, and who are there, some ten or twelve are reported to be either opposed to peace or inimical to the administration.

Your will see by the extracts from the papers which I send to you, that insurrectionary movements against the government at Queretaro still continue to break out it the State of San Luis Potosi, notwithstanding the effects of that Governor to suppress them, and it is also said that Paredes is there fomenting rebellion. Santa Anna also, although it is reported he has applied through the Mexican government to General Butler for a passport to leave the country and obtained it, we hear, at one time, is on his way to San Luis Potosi to head a revolution, and another, that he is in Tehuacan again with eight hundred men, preparing at the first opportunity to upset that existing government. His power, however, is not of the feeblest, and it may be if the has such a force, he is waiting the withdrawal of our arms to re-establish himself in power. Alvarex, too has by the seizure and imprisonment of Governor Olaguibel, and the numerous acts of disobedience manifested contempt for the power of the government. You will notice that the replies of the Governor of the States to [ . . . ] circular in relation to the treaty are various.
Some demand the publication of the treaty; a few express themselves desirous of peace, and in such manner as lead to the supposition they will favor almost any terms that can be obtained, while others openly avow themselves war. Problems in Mexican politics are always difficult of \[\ldots\]-tion, and never more so than now. Notwithstanding however, the demoralized state of the country and the \[\ldots\]indifference of the great body of the population \[\ldots\]War, if the past be a guide to the future, Pena y Pena by a judicious us of the two millions and a half which is advanced him by the parties here peculiarly \[\ldots\] peace, can overcome on opposition of so many condemning elements and obtain a congress to ratify the treaty. \[\ldots\] In this it is impossible to say what will ever in a day week or a month.

RW48v25i36p1c1, May 5, 1848: Gen. Taylor’s Sentiments – Executive Power.

So far as we have had an opportunity of conversing with the Whigs, since the appearance of Gen. Taylor’s letter to Mr. Allison of New Orleans, we are gratified to say, there is a very general concurrence of opinion, that the views embodied in that document are entirely satisfactory; and we do not doubt that there will be a general, if not a universal, acquiescence in the opinion. We have, of course, not conversed with many of the Whigs in the brief period that has elapsed since the General’s letter has reached the city; but among the few we have seen are gentlemen who had heretofore been decidedly opposed to the General’s nomination as the Whig candidate for the Presidency. It is now placed beyond all doubt, to use his own expressive words, that on "CARDINAL PRINCIPLES," Gen. Taylor’s sentiments are in entire harmony with those of the Whig party; and it would be obviously preposterous to suppose that the MEASURES of an Administration recognizing such principles would not be equally in accordance with Whig POLICY. The one must result from the other, as any other effect from its cause. We need scarcely say to the intelligent reader that the limitation and restraint of the power and influence of the Executive, is the prominent idea in gen. Taylor’s letter. Eleven years ago, when the President of the United States had not been bold enough even to dream of the daring encroachments and usurpations that have since been perpetrated with impunity, the then Editor of the Enquirer admonished the country, that the power and patronage of that department of the Government had not only fearfully increased, but that they were daily increasing, and that they must be diminished, if we would preserve the integrity of the Constitution, the just influence of the co-ordinate Departments, and the liberties of the people. We need not recapitulate the great events that have since transpired, beginning with the project for the "immediate" annexation of Texas, which burst upon the country like a bomb-shell, as Mr. Benton well called it, from the laboratory of the State Department, without the slightest premonition to Congress or the people of its approach, and following them successively to the legitimate fruit of that act, the war with Mexico, commenced by the President without the knowledge, much less the consent of the war-making power, and the long train of Executive encroachments by which its brief history has been characterized. The vents to which we refer are fresh in the memory of the country; and, it seems to us that that man who perceives in them no indication of a gradual but thorough revolution in our system—quite as complete, though less violent and sudden than that which has occurred in France—is as blind to the past as he is heedless of the future. Gen. Taylor is not alone in the apprehension, that from the "undue and injurious influence" hereto fore exercised upon the Legislative department of the Government by the Executive, "our system is in danger of undergoing a great change from its true theory." According to that theory, the President, it was feared, had been clothed with even too little power to render the past an object of ambition to great minds; but in practice, it has become almost the sole power in the State—quite as complete, though less violent and sudden than that which has occurred in France.

At this point the defence interposed an objection.

Maj. Gen. Scott said that Paymaster Burns, when before the court, had stated in an appeal for protection made by him to the court, that he had never before been a witness before a military court, and to the best of his recollection before a civil court. That the present witness was called to show that that statement was false.

The court was here cleared, and after some consultation the following decision was announced.
It does not appear from the record that Paymaster Burns has stated under oath that he never had been a witness before a Military Court, nor to the best of his belief before a Civil Court. The Court is therefore of opinion that Lieut. Clarke’s testimony to show that Paymaster Burns had been a witness before a Court of Inquiry is irrelevant.

The Court requires that hereafter all objections to evidence, either by the prosecution or defence, shall be in so many words—"I object to that evidence," and that the reasons for and against such objections shall be stated in writing.

Gen. Scott said he wished to place upon the record his protest.

Capt. Taylor called and sworn.

Question by the Prosecution.—Did the witness chance to see Major Gen. Pillow in the night of the 19th August last; if so, where, at about what hour, and what declaration or remark, if any, did the said Pillow then make respecting the continued attack that night of the next morning by the American forces on the entrenched camp of Contreras.

A—On the night of the 19th August last, some time after dark, I think it was between 8 and 10 o’clock, I am not positive as to the hour, it was after dark, I went to see him and found him outside the guns of my battery, and after exchanging salutations, I asked him, I think, how things looked. He replied, badly, and I remarked, I was afraid so. He said the position of the enemy was very strong, too strong to be attacked, and that he was going to report that fact to Gen. Scott, advising him to leave it and get in the rear of San Antonio. I also asked him if artillery could not get where he had been; he told me not; that it was impossible to get along on horseback; that was the substance, and I believe, nearly the words of the conversation. Gen. Twiggs then called him and asked him if he was not going on, and he went on and we parted.

Q—The witness has said the conversation he has given took place near witness’ battery—where was that battery at the time?

A—Just outside the cornfield, on the edge, or perhaps in the Pedregal, and within range of the heavy guns of Contreras, in front of the enemy’s camp.

Question by Gen. Pillow.—Witness will please say who was with Gen. Pillow at the conversation referred to.

A—I do not know. The night was very dark, and I do not know who was with General Pillow. When I say Gen. Twiggs called, I knew by his voice, and not by sight. When I say that I don’t know who was with him, I mean I did not recognize those who were with him. They were on horseback, and I could see that there were horses, but could not distinguish the faces of those on the horses.

Q—Has the witness detailed all the conversation that occurred at the time?

A—I think I have. I think of nothing more. The conversation was a short one, and soon interrupted by Generate Twiggs calling out to Gen. Pillow to come on.

Q—Did Gen. Pillow tell witness that he had been at or near any position occupied at that time by American troops?

A—I don’t think he did; I stated before that he said he had found great difficulty in getting along; that it was no place for artillery, for he could not get his horse along.

Q—Did Gen. Pillow tell the witness, or did the witness understand that General Pillow had attempted to cross the Pedregal to join the troops in the village of Ensaldo, and that he had been unable to cross the Pedregal in consequence of the darkness of the night and the extreme difficulties of the ground?

A—The conversation opened by my asking Gen. Pillow as to the state of things as they then were. My question was put in reference to artillery, whether he said he could not get over himself or not, I do not know. I think, however, on recollecting particularly, that he observed that it was very difficult to get along, even on foot, much more upon horseback; he made, as well as I remember, some remark of that kind, but I am not positive.

Q—Does witness know whether Gen. Pillow referred in that conversation to the work being too strong to be carried or attacked at all, or that it was too strong to be varied by the front assaults?

A—The word front was not used in the conversation, I understood it exactly as I have stated, that the work was too strong to be attacked.

Q—Does the witness know of the repulses of any of the forces or of any new light or information, which Gen. Pillow had received at that time and did witness not know that the American troops cut off the communication of the enemy’s line with the capital, and held possession of the village of Ensaldo?
A—I knew but very imperfectly the position of our troops, and spent a very anxious night, knowing that a large body of the enemy had come out of the city, and the enemy was posted in an entrenched position, with a great deal of artillery. I knew nothing of Gen. Pillow’s information, except what he himself stated, nor did I know of any repulse of any of our forces. About an hour previous to the conversation =, one of Gen. Scott’s staff, I think Lieut. Lay, said that an attack was to be made upon the enemy’s position by Gen. Smith, about 3 o’clock the next morning. That conversation had removed in part my anxiety, until it was brought back by the conversation with Gen. Pillow, which renewed it. I supposed that our troops had interposed between the two forces of the enemy.

Q—Did witness know where Gen. Pillow had been that night?

A—I did not, I suppose he had been with the troops as far as we had gone.

Q—If Gen. Pillow had not been at the position occupied by the American troops across the Pedregal, had not heard from there, had been lost in the Pedregal, in his efforts to cross to the village, can witness conceive to what Gen. Pillow alluded, when he said things looked gloomy—could he have alluded to the gloomy prospect before the army (which had met with no reverse or disaster,) or to the prospect before himself this night?

A—I presumed then, and now think, that he meant that, there was a strong work to take, which our forces would be unable to take, when he said things looked badly. I will alter the answer, and say, I know from that conversation that he alluded to the position of the troops in all respects, as well as our own, as those of the enemy. The conversation is fresh in my mind. I know this, because it was in answer to my question, “how things looked?”

Q—As the witness’ memory is very fresh, he will state whether he can recollect equally well, that it was about 8 or 9 o’clock. Can witness say in fact it was not as late as half past 11 o’clock?

A—My memory is very fresh, as it regards the important matters of conversation, but as regards the exact time my memory is not very fresh.

Capt. Grayson called and sworn.

By the Prosecution.—

Q—Where was the witness early on the morning of the 20th August last; did he chance to see Gen. Pillow on that morning, and about what time?

A—I was in San Augustin on the morning of the 20th Aug. last. I had been woke up by my servant, about 25 or 30 minutes after 6 o’clock. I know it was this time, or about this time, from the fact of having overslept myself, and I looked at my watch when I got up; I dressed myself hurriedly, and in passing by the window opening on the street, I saw Maj. Gen. Pillow pass the window. I remarked “Good morning, General;” the General turned his head, and rested his eye not upon my window, but on that of Capt. Irvin, whose room was immediately adjoining mine; Gen. Pillow answered the salutation, but I do not believe that he saw me. From the time of my getting up, to the time I saw Gen. Pillow, I should suppose it to have been about 15 minutes or about 20 minutes before 7 o’clock.

Lieut. BEAUREGARD called and sworn.

By the Prosecution.—Q—Was the witness present a meeting between Gen. Scott and many General and Staff officers at Piedad, on the 11th Sept. last, and if so, state the general character of the meeting, particularly so far as the witness may remember, in respect to the views and preferences of the said Scott and Gen. Pillow, as to an early general attack upon the enemy?

A—I was present at that meeting; which I entered the room, Gen. Scott was there, exposing his views to the officers present, relative to the advantages or disadvantages of immediate attack on Chapulteepe, or the Garita of San Antonio. In so doing, he expressed a decided preference for the former, but at the same time invited the officers present, without regard to rank, to express their views freely on the subject, unbounded by his own preferences.—Thereupon, many of the officers spoke on the subject without coming to any positive conclusion; their remarks consisting principally in inquiries; made of the engineer officers, relative to the nature of the ground in the vicinity of the enemy’s works, in each of the above places. Among those who spoke, I remember distinctly that Gen. Pillow in concluding his remarks, expressed a preference for the attack in the direction of the Garia of San Antonio. That which struck me the more, was, on the evening preceding, whilst completing a reconnaissance of the same works, I met Gen. Pillow near the broken bridge of the Nino Perdido road, and there, whilst conversing with him on the intended attack of the enemy’s works, he expressed to me his opinion, or belief, that the time of attacking that point had passed by, and I partially coincided with him, stating that we would know better what conclusions to come to, after the reconnaissance of the next day, which then confirmed me in that opinion.

Q—Did the witness himself express any opinion on the questions propounded, and discussed by the said Scoot; at about what time of the meeting, and what were the views and opinions of the witness as then expressed?

A—Yes, I did express my opinions on the subject towards the end of the meeting, not feeling bound to do so before that time, wishing to know first the views and opinions of the other engineer officers present who ranked me, and it was only upon the suggestion of one or more officers present, that I did express them. I coincided, or rather supported, as well as I could, the opinions expressed by the General-in-Chief, relative to the advantages of an immediate attack on the works at Chapultepec, and I believe I was the only engineer officer present, who entertained those views.

Q—Did the said Scott at the Piedad meeting, or in the discussion of the reconnaissance with the engineers, show or give any evidences of being stunned, cast down, or in any way unnerved by the late event at M__ del R__ (illegible), or elsewhere?

A—Not in the least, to my mind. No doubt we were all under the sad influence of the severe loss we had experienced at that place, but I could discover no other feeling.

By Gen. Pillow—Q—How many guns were in position at the San Antonio Garita, on the morning of the 9th September, and how many were there on the afternoon of the 11th September, when the consultation was held?

A—I was not present at the reconnaissance made on the 9th, but was present at the one made on the afternoon of the 8th, and also at those of the 10th and 11th. On the afternoon of the 8th I counted three guns at the Garita of San Antonio and I believe two on the works leading from the Garita of San Antonio to the Garita of Nino Perdido, of the latter two I am not certain, and by the sketch of the works that I made on the 10th, I find that I have seven guns in position on the works, immediately around the Garita of San Antonio, and late in the evening as I was completing the reconnaissance, I saw the enemy bring 5 more guns to be place in position, as I supposed then, either on those same works or those about the Garita of La Vega, and so expressed myself at the council of war on the 11th, and although on the 11th I did not notice that they had increased the number of guns on the above mentioned works, still they seem to have increased the strength of the works themselves, having strong working parties employed on them during the whole time.

Q—Were the enemy's line of entrenchments in a much more complete state on the 11th then on the 8th, meaning the batteries immediately around the garita, as well as the line constructing there?

A—I should suppose they were. In fact I feel positive of it, from the circumstance of their having such a strong force employed upon them.

Q—Could the lines in the direction of San Antonio have been much more easily forced in your opinion on the 8th, 9th or 10th, than at any subsequent period?

A—I should suppose so, up to the afternoon of the 10th, when all those additional guns were brought into position, because those works derived their principal strength not only from the nature of the ground in front, but also from the number of guns they had in position.

By the Prosecution—The witness has spoken of a council of war, held at Piedad; at that meeting did Gen. Scott call for votes, or take the ayes and noes, on any question whatever?

A—He did not; certainly not whilst I was present.

James L. Freaner recalled:

By the Prosecution—Has the witness ever had any particular conversation with Maj. Gen. Pillow on the subject of the interest he, the said Pillow, took in the newspaper, printed in New Orleans, called the Delta, and respecting what the said Pillow would do for the benefit of that paper? If so, when, where, or in what particular connection was such conversation held? Give also the substance or the words of the conversation, as far as memory may serve?

A—It was on or about the 23d of August last, at Mixcoac, and I think in the afternoon, while in conversation with Gen. Pillow, Gen. Pierce entered the room; Gen. Pillow introduced me to Gen. Pierce, as being connected with the New Orleans Delta, remarking at the same time to Gen. Pierce, that this is one of our friends, and said, I don't recollect whether it was immediately after, or in the course of that conversation that he intended to make it, or words to that effect; I can't use the precise language; I think the words were to that effect; my impression is, those were the words used. I replied to Gen. Pillow, that no one person could make the Delta; that it had met with a success from the time it went into existence, which no other paper ever had I the Southern country, and it was mainly indebted for it to the energy, industry and independence of its proprietors. It was in the course of a general conversation while I was talking to Gen. Pillow, that afternoon.

Q—In the conversation which the witness had given, did Maj. Gen. Pillow hand to the witness any letter or article for the delta; and if so, what letter or article was it.

A—I did not receive any article from Gen. Pillow that afternoon; when I returned, according to his invitation, in the evening, I received the paper marked No. 1, which is before the Court.

By the Defence—State if Gen. Pierce was present, participating in the general conversation which you have detailed.

A—Gen. Pierce was present and I believe about starting for the conference to be held by the commissioners in
Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Court.—I beg that the following statement and protest may be permitted to go upon your record: Major Gen. Scott being before the Court as prosecutor in the case of Major Gen. Pillow, and intending further to impeach the testimony of Paymaster Burns, a witness in the part of the defence, who had been before the Court some days earlier, introduced this day a witness, Lieut. Clarke, of the 8th Infantry, to contradict the said Burns in this particular. The said Burns, after having been examined in chief by the said Pillow, and particularly examined by the said Scott, came into Court the following day, at its re-opening, with a paper carefully written, praying the protection of the Court under the cross-examination; alleging his inexperience in military tribunals, and solemnly declared, in his capacity of witness, that it was the first time he had ever been before a military court as a witness.

And when the said Clarke, called as above, had proceeded to the extent of some sentences, in answer to a question propounded through the Judge Advocate by the said prosecutor, and had evidently shown that he was acquainted with the facts sought for by the question on the record, the said Pillow, the defendant, interposed an objection to the question or to the answer, if not to both.

Whereupon the Court was cleared, and decided to stop the witness’ further answer to the said question.

Against that decision the said Scott protests on these grounds:—1. The said Burns offered his paper to the Court in his capacity of a sworn witness, which paper being read in open court, and with all the benefit to the said Burns sought by him, is, or ought to be, on the record of the Court. 2. The said Scott ought, as prosecutor, to se allowed to contradict, by competent evidence, any solemn declaration made in the said paper in common with any other assertion made by the said Burns, as a witness before this or any other Court; and 3. That being cut off from that, as the said Scott believes, legal resource, he is, to that extent, deprived of the means of attaining the ends of public justice sought for in the institution of this Court. Respectfully submitted.
The Court made the following decision:—The Court will not hereafter receive any protest against any decision it may make; but the parties will be heard in writing, if they desire it upon any question pending, before the same shall have been decided.

The Court then adjourned till 9 o’clock to-morrow morning.

NINETEENTH DAY—April 6, 1848.

The court met at the usual hour—all the members present. The last day’s proceedings were read.

JOHN H. PEOPLES called and sworn.

Question by the Prosecution—Did the witness receive, some time in October last, a note or letter from Maj. Gen. Pillow respecting an article recently published, signed Leonidas; and had the witness, about the same time, any conversation with the said Pillow, respecting the course of a newspaper called the American Star, of which the witness was editor, if so, produce the letter, and state the particular conversation or conversations and when and where it took place?

A—I received a note from Gen. Pillow at his own house on the 22d October, I think. I had given notice on that day or the day previous, that I would republish the Leonidas letter with such comments as I though the production merited. During that day Gen. Pillow sent an orderly to my office and requested I would call on him at his quarters; I did so immediately; when I entered the room, he either showed or handed me this note, saying that it was his intention the day before to publish it over his signature, but that he had been advised not to do so, and he had sent for me on the subject of this letter and of the Leonidas letter. The conversation afterwards turned to the Leonidas letter, and I think Gen. Pillow asked me if I had read it over, or what I thought of it; I remarked, that in my opinion it was a letter that would do the General a great deal of harm; he asked me, I believe, if there were no truths in the statement. I do not know that the word truth was used. I do not recollect my reply, but I ended by saying that I thought still it would do him infinite harm.—He asked me what kind of a notice I intended to preface it with, I answered that I had written nothing yet; well, said he, I have confidence enough in you, to believe that I will be justly dealt with, or that you will do me justice. You must recollect, as I said before, that I never forget my friends nor forgive my enemies. At that time the late Capt. Smith, 3d Infantry, came in, and the conversation stopped. After Capt. Smith had left the room, I asked Gen. Pillow if he would allow me to take that letter which he had addressed, but not sent, to me, that could shape a contradiction, as he authorized, from it. He reminded me again, then I got up to leave the room, that he was second in command, and if Gen. Scott should go home or any thing were to happen to him, he then would take command of the army.

Q—The name of Gen. Pillow at the foot of the letter presented by the witness, and also the postscript, are both canceled, but not the initials to the postscript; does the witness chance to know who made these cancellations?

A—I do not know; they were there when the letter was handed to me, and I suppose he scratched out the name when he declined publishing the letter.

Gen. Pillow said he cancelled the name and address himself.

Lieut. TILTON, Voltigeurs, called and sworn.

Questions by the Prosecution—Has the witness chanced to hear Maj. Gen. Pillow, since the entry of the American army into this city, speak of the effects of the battle of the Molino del Rey upon the energies of Maj. Gen. Scott, and that he, the said Scott, subsequent to that battle, required to be stimulate to further action by the said Pillow? If so, give the remarks of the said Pillow on the subject.

A—On or about the 22d of Sept., I, together with another officer, paid a visit of ceremony to Gen. Pillow. Upon that occasion, the conversation turned upon the battles preceding our entrance into the City. Maj. Gen. Pillow stated to us that the battle of Molino del Rey was an unfortunate affair: He informed us that we had lost 860 men, which loss we (meaning the General officers) sedulously concealed from the army, lest it might have a dispiriting effect on the men, and that Gen. Scott was stunned or paralysed by this lose; and consequently, upon himself, as second in command devolved the subsequent movements—or words to that effect: I don’t recollect exactly the words he used. I was also given to understand at the same time, by gen. Pillow, that the conception, as well as the execution, of the assault upon Chapultepec, originated with himself. With the exception of some personal compliments on ourselves and the Voltigeur Regiment, that was, I believe, the substance of the conversation.

By Gen. Pillow—Witness will state what officer was present with him when this conversation was held which he detailed. And where was Gen. Pillow, and what was his condition?

A—Capt. Barnard was with me. There were one or two officers there when we came,—but I don’t know who they were,—together with a citizen, an Englishman.—Gen. Pillow was in bed, apparently suffering from his wounds.

Q—Witness speaks of Gen. Pillow’s remark that we lost 860 men—did gen. Pillow say there were that many killed and wounded?
A—My recollection is, that the 860 men referred to the general loss, killed and wounded; my impression is, that the men were disabled for subsequent engagements.

Q—Witness will state if in speaking of the conception of the attack on Chapultepec, Gen. Pillow did not say that
gen. Scott’s plan of attack upon that work was, that Gen. Pillow, with his division, should march along and attack the eremy and battery stationed on the road north of Chapultepec, and that Gen. Quitman should march along the road leading from Tacubaya, on the south of that work, and attack the battery on that road, that Gen. Pillow and Gen.
Quitman should shake hands at the junction of these roads, and make Chapultepec feel its isolation, and then that both commands should attack Chapultepec; which plan of attack, he Gen. Pillow, had opposed so warmely, that Gen.
Scott gave up his plan, and that the plan of attack, that was carried into successful operation, on his (Pillow’s) side of the work, was the substance of the conversation about the conception of the attack?

A—I have no recollection of the plan of attack: with regard to the shaking of hands, I never heard the expression before. On that occasion, my understanding was, that the plan, as well as the execution, was that of Gen. Pillow, and that I believed. The details of the attack I did not understand. Q—Did you understand that Gen. Pillow was speaking of the plans of attack in which his own division carried that work upon the final assault?

A—At the time, I understood that no other division was in the attack upon Chapultepec proper, but Gen. Pillow’s division alone. We were speaking at the time of the attack upon Chapultepec, which commenced on the morning of the 13th of September, which I believed to have been made solely by Maj. Gen. Pillow’s division. Maj. Gen. Pillow stated that whilst he was lying wounded at the foot of the hill, he received an order from gen. Scott to carry the work at all hazards, and this led me to believe that that division alone had the main assault.

Q—Was the witness with the Voltigeur Regiment in that assault upon Chapultepec; were you among the first who entered that work, and was that regiment in the advance in this assault?

A—Upon the Western side, in the redoubt, a storming party of infantry formed with us at the foot of the hill. Being struck down myself at that place, I know not which party entered first, but on overtaking them a few minutes after I recovered, I found them pell mell; upon a second rush the Voltiguers got the advance. The first ladders were planted by my order, by the men under my command, and the five first that went up I knew were from the Voltiguers, indeed I myself was the fifth, the Voltiguers were certainly the first men in that part of the work. I saw no other when we got in. What happened on the other side of the hill I know nothing about.

Q—The witness had spoken of the storming party of infantry. Does he mean the 9th and 15th Infantry of Gen.
Pillow’s Division?

A—No sir; I mean the 250 regulars of the old regiment, under a Captain whose name I can’t recall to memory.—
When I stated that they formed with us, I meant that we waited until they came up, by order of Major Caldwell, and then a rush was made.

The Court was cleared here, in order to consider whether an objection, offered by Gen. Pillow, to a portion of the witness’ testimony, which he considers as irrelevant to the charges and specification under investigation be received.
Gen. Pillow submitted the following:

Gen. Pillow moves to exclude the following passage of the witness’ testimony, viz: “and consequently upon himself, as second in command, had devolved the subsequent movements, or words to that effect, I don’t remember the exact words, but that was the idea I received”—upon the ground that there is no matter in the charges and specifications to which it has reference, and it is therefore irrelevant and improper to go on the record as proof. The witness’ testimony was recorded before its character and its irrelevancy were manifest to Maj. Gen. Pillow.

Gen. Scott submitted the following, in opposition to Gen. Pillow’s motion to “to strike out”:

Mr. President, and Gentle me of the Court:

In reply to the motion just made by Maj. Gen. Pillow, the defendant before the Court, in respect to a part of the testimony of Lieut. Tilton, a witness on the part of the prosecution, Maj. Gen. Scott, the prosecutor, begs to say that he deems the evidence to be legal, relevant, and material to the support of the fourth specification, second change, now under consideration.

Nothing is here said in particular of the LEGALITY and MATERIALITY of the evidence, as those points do not appear to be objected to by the defendant; I shall therefore, limit myself to the remaining point—RELEVANCY.

The specification alleges, in substance, that the said Pillow claimed that, in consequence of the stunned or paralyzed state of the said Scott’s energies, consequent upon the results of the battle of the Molino del Rey, the said Scott would not have undertaken or ordered the attack on the castle or fort of Chapultepec but for his, the said Pillow’s interposition: and the testimony of the said witness, giving the declaration of the said Pillow, is substantially to the effect of the allegation.

Respectfully submitted.

castle of Chapultepec was carried by the American troops, and how long it was after that event before the said Pillow

A—I do not know where Gen. Pillow was at the time the place was carried. He gave us the order to enter the

Mr. TRIST recalled.

By the Prosecution.—Was, or not, the witness in Major General Scott's room at San Augustin on the night of the 19th August last, when Major General Pillow and other officers were present. If so, please give the names of the principal officers of rank who were present, and add any remarks the witness heard from the two Major-Generals, in the hearing of each other and the witness respecting the impending operations about and against the enemy's tenent camp at Contreras. Also, please give any separate conversation, after leaving, said Scott's room, between the said Pillow and witness, respecting the said operations, wither that night, or early the following morning?

A—I was in Gen. Scott's room on the night of the 19th Aug. last, at the time when he returned and got back to San Augustin, until he was ready to go to bed. During that period, I was absent from his room only a few minutes at a time, and I think on but one occasion. Besides Gen. Scott that were present Gen. Pillow and Gen. Twiggs, who came in together late in the night, and among the officers present,—the number of which was quiet large at different times during the night,—there were Capt. Lee, and Lieut. Stevens, of the Engineers—the officers of the General's staff, probably all of them. The only conversation that I recollect, after the two General officers came in, was on the plan of attack to be made on Valencia's entrenched camp, of which Capt. Lee had brought intelligence from Gen.

Smith, previously to the arrival of Gen. Pillow and Twiggs. Capt Lee had not only explained the plan, but a great many details respecting the relative positions of the forces, and the accidents of the ground about it; and after those Generals had come in, Gen. Scott made that whole matter subject of explanation to them. The only remarks on their part, that I recollect, was one from Gen. Twiggs, echoing an expression of great confidence in Gen. Smith, and in the result of anything undertaken by him. If Gen. Pillow made any remark, it has made no impression on my memory.

The company dropped off until at a very late hour of the night, when preparations were made by gen. Scott to go to bed, and he had a bed made in his room also for gen. Pillow. Upon my leaving the room to of to my own, Gen. Pillow followed me, and went with me to me room. He then, in a very solemn tone, said to me, this is going to be a failure;
I answered that things had certainly not looked very bright at nightfall, but my own spirits had been very much raised by Capt. Lee's arrival and the information he brought with him. Gen. Pillow did not notice my remark, but, in a tone and manner implying that I had interrupted him, went on to say, that I call on you now to remember and bear me witness hereafter, that I have had nothing to do with it. At that time, I looked upon these words as the

Mr. TRIST re-examined.

By the Defence.—Q—In witness' examination by the prosecution, he stated that Gen. Pillow followed him into the room on the night of the 19th of August, and there held a conversation with witness; was no one present at the interview, and was it entirely private?

A—It was entirely in private; he closed the door after him.

Q—When did you disclose this conversation to Gen. Scott—was it before his charges were preferred, and how long before?

A—A disclosed it to Gen. Scott soon after his position with reference to Gen. Pillow had become decided, as arising out of the correspondence between them, in regard to the statements contained in Gen. Pillow’s report. It was in gen. Scott’s parlor. Col. Hitchcock I know was present and some other officers, whom, I do not recollect. Mention was made of the underscored words in Gen. Pillow’s report, claiming credit for the whole of Contreras. I rose from my seat and said, gentlemen, I will astound you, while stating a thing which I had determined to bear witness to, to the country, but had not expected to do so on that occasion, and then stated what Gen. Pillow said to me at San Augustin that night.

Q—Did Gen. Pillow’s report claim the whole credit of Contreras?

A—I so understood it—the whole credit which a general officer should have had, such as plans, &c.

Q—You say Gen’l Pillow told you this—that the attack upon Contreras was to be a failure. Did not witness know that the order of attack by Gen. Scott that night was the same as that previously given by Gen. Pillow?

A—Did not say the attack on Contreras—I used no such words. I did not know the order of attack given by Gen. Scott that night was the same as that previously given by Gen. Pillow. I never heard of any order of attack given by gen. Pillow; had I known it, I should not have promised to bear witness that he had nothing to do with it.

Q—Did witness understand that under the order of attack given by Gen. Scott on the evening of the 19th, that General Smith was to make an attack at 3 o’clock next morning?

A—Agreeably to the plans of Gen. Smith, as explained by Capt. Lee, the attack was, so far as I can recollect, to take place at 3 o’clock, and, as far as I can recollect, the plan was generally approved by Gen’l. Scott, whatever orders he gave, they were in conformity with them. I could not at this moment recall any precise recollection of those orders, except the one sent Col. Ransom.

Q—As Gen. Pillow was known by witness to be at San Augustin, and intended, under Gen. Scott’s orders, to stay there that night, and as the attack that night, or rather the next morning, was to have taken place at 3 o’clock, how is it that witness regarded the pretended conversation as the dying charge of a man who expected to be killed next day?

A—That question implies that Gen. Pillow was ordered by Gen. Scott to remain at San Augustin, and intended, under Gen. Scott’s orders, to stay there that night, and as the attack that night, or rather the next morning, was to have taken place at 3 o’clock, how is it that witness regarded the pretended conversation as the dying charge of a man who expected to be killed next day?

A—That question implies that Gen. Pillow was ordered by Gen. Scott to remain at San Augustin that night, and by answering it without pointing out this fact, I should make myself a witness to that order having been given. I know of no such order, and I believe it was not given, unless the offer of a bed can be construed into an order. That same offer was made to Gen. Twiggs also, who went off to the battle field.

(Here the President requested that the witness would give his evidence with less of a spirit and tone of hatred than the witness seemed to feel, &c.)

The Witness Resumed—In answer to that part, I said I expected that there would be hot work next day; and took for granted that Gen. Pillow would hurry to take command of his troops.

Q—Did witness hear Gen Pillow express any doubts to Gen. Scott of the success of the movements explained by Gen. Scott in the room where the conference was held?

A—I did not, so far as I can recollect, hear a word from him on the subject.

Q—At what time did the confidential conversation before referred to take place? Was it strictly confidential and where did it occur?

A—The time was on one of the days after the 8th September, and before the 11th. It may have been (possibly) late in the afternoon of the 8th. I think that it was on the day preceding the meeting at Piedad—that is to say, on the 10th. It was most strictly confidential, as appeared from the words that prefaced it. No one was present, that I could see. This was at Tecubaya.
Q—Witness will say if he saw Gen. Pillow—to hold any conversation with him—after he left the battle-field?

A—On the 8th of September after he left the battle-field; I have no recollection now of seeing him.

Q—The witness has said in a previous answer that Gen. Pillow said, that if Gen. Scott were to make any more such experiments as the battle of Molino del Rey, that we would have no army; that the witness replied that it was not an experiment of Gen. Scott, and that he, witness, was a living witness, as long as he lived, of the fact, what does witness mean by that expression?

A—by the expression of being a living witness, I meant that I was always ready to testify to that fact, that it was no experiment of Gen. Scott’s, I should be ready to testify that there were no such experiments, as well as to facts.

Q—Witness will say, if it was not Gen. Scott’s experiment, whose it was, and how is it if Gen. Scott gave the order for that battle, that he did not make the experiment, and what are the facts referred to or understood to be spoken of in witness’ last answer?

A—I did not call it anybody’s experiment, in saying that it was not Gen. Scott’s experiment, I meant merely to repel a slur or insinuation cast upon him, and unjustly cast upon him, as I knew, and as the person who puts the question subsequently told me he knew, whatever there was diss...[illegible] (to use his own expression) in that day. The order given by Gen. Scott in regard to any operations on the morning of the 8th was strictly and peremptorily confined to the destruction of the foundry as its sole object; I never knew him to feel so much anxiety on any point as on this one, that nothing beyond the destruction of that foundry should be attempted.

Q—Does the witness know the fact that Gen’l. Pillow communicated to gen. Scott that the machinery could have been rendered powerless by the withdrawal of the water, also that the machinery was removed from the foundry, and does witness know that that machinery was found in the city afterwards?

A—I recollect that Gen. Scott received from a great many sources information in regard to the existence and nonexistence of the machinery in the building. I have no recollection of his having received any from Gen. Pillow; if I knew it at the time, it had escaped my memory; with regard to turning off the water, the state of my mind at present is similar; it was, I think, mentioned by a number of persons, but I have no recollection of who they were. I do not know that the machinery was removed from the city, although I have no doubt of the fact.

The Court was here cleared, to consult on the admission of evidence of a peculiar nature on the part of the defence. After some time the Court opened, and the Court had some to the conclusion that the testimony given should remain, but it came to no conclusion as to future evidence.

Here Gen. Scott made his objections in writing regarding future evidence being put of similar nature. Gen. Pillow also replied to the objections of Gen. Scott.

Q—The witness has said, on a former occasion, that Gen. Pillow sought to make him the depository of his confidence, and thus constituted him a party to a scheme of villainy, &c; did witness ever object to the reception of confidential matters or did he intimate that he objected to become the recipient of his confidential views?

A—I had, at the time of receiving those confidences, no idea of the uses to which I was to be made subservient, and I did not know, till the expressions made use of by Gen’l. Pillow were poured into my ear, what they were to be. I made no objection, and never sought them by any means whatever.

Q—Does witness recollect that while his negotiations were pending under the armistice, that Gen. Pillow addresses to the President of the United States a letter, opposing, warmly and earnestly, the agreement of witness to receive and send to his Government a proposition of the Mexican Commissioners, to make the country between the Nueces and Rio Grande forever a neutral territory? Say if Gen. Pillow did not show this to witness at Tecubaya; and upon witness declining to read it, did he not tell you the views therein expressed, and offer to permit you to read it? That up to that time the friendly relations between witness and Gen. Pillow had been uninterrupted?

Q—Has the witness now disclosed all the confidential revelations made to him by Gen. Pillow, in this prosecution? Can he remember any other letter or letters he has written to the American Senate, for the purpose of defeating Gen. Pillow’s confirmation, or the Secretary of State, or any other public functionary, to save them from the deep and damming disgrace, by reason of their connection with Gen. Pillow?

A—With regard to the private and confidential disclosures, the two that I have stated became rooted in my memory, by incidents connecting themselves with them. I have a general impression that many minor matters have
The Enquirer flatters itself that we are in "a sort of dilemma," in regard to Gen. Taylor's late letters. Not at all. When we read the General's letter to the editors of the Republican, which seemed to intimate his determination to be a candidate for the Presidency, whether nominated by the Whig Convention or not, we saw that it was impossible, with such an understanding of his purpose, that his name could be presented to the Whig National Convention even for its consideration. The friends of no man have a right to ask that his claims shall be considered, in a body of that kind, who proclaims in advance of his purpose that he will pay no respect to its decision unless that decision be favorable to himself. As a member of such a Convention, we would not insult it by asking it to deliberate upon a matter already pre-determined—or in other words, to decide by vote whether a certain individual should be a candidate, when that individual had forewarned it, that, having been already announced as a candidate, he would remain so, be its decisions what it might. Nor would we consent to weigh even the claims of such a man, if presented by another. What business has such an one indeed, in a Convention at all? Yet the language of Gen. Taylor's letter to the editors of the Republican, seemed to us to be susceptible of no other interpretation; and consequently, pursuing the course we have heretofore done in regard to that gentleman, and which we shall adopt towards other aspirants, all of whom, in our estimation, stand upon a level platform and have equal rights, we promptly and explicitly expressed our decided dislike of a position, which, while General Taylor had a perfect right, if he thought fit, to take it, must of necessity have been regarded, under the circumstances, as grossly offensive to other aspirants for the Whig nomination, and as a defiance to the Whig party itself. And had it so remained, we, for one, would no longer have considered that Gen. Taylor's friends had a right to present his name to the Whig Convention as a candidate for its nomination. But we had scarcely finished our comments upon that letter, when the Southern mail brought us the much more interesting, explicit and satisfactory letter from Gen. Taylor to Mr. Allison of New Orleans, in which his meaning, upon this point, is distinctly expressed: "I have (says the General) consented to the use of my name for the Presidency.* * * * * Having, at the solicitation of many of my countrymen, taken my position as a candidate, I DO NOT FEEL AT LIBERTY TO SURRENDER THAT POSITION, UNTIL MY FRIENDS MANIFEST A WISH THAT I SHOULD RETIRE FROM IT. I WOULD THEN MOST GLADLY DO SO." This we have said, is entirely satisfactory. It shows that although Gen. Taylor will not withdraw his own name, his refusal to do so results, not from any egotistical or ambitious or envious motive, but from the peculiar circumstances under which he became a candidate, and in consequence of which he does not "feel himself at liberty" to change his position. But he leaves the matter in the hands of his "friends"—by which expression we presume he means something practical and practicable. How are his friends to be consulted, and how are their views to be ascertained? No one will do General Taylor the injustice to suppose that he meant that each one of his friends, from Maine to the Gulf, is to be consulted—and that, in that case, there is to be entire unanimity of opinion on the subject. We take it for granted that the General meant, what every other candidate who consents that his name shall go before a Convention means, when he uses the same expression—and that is, that his friends in Convention shall, before it proceeds to deliberate, announce their intention to abide by its decision—and that announcement will be to Gen. Taylor a sufficient manifestation of their wish that he should not be a candidate, in the event of his failure to obtain its nomination. That the great body of his friends, throughout the country, would concur in the manifestation of this wish, we cannot doubt; because they would clearly perceive not only the impossibility of his election, but the probability of his failure to obtain a single Electoral vote—an attitude in which, as his true friends, they would never consent to place him. Thus understanding Gen. Taylor's letter to Mr. Allison, as giving the true meaning of the less explicit language, upon this point, in his letter to the Republican, we had no hesitation, while we permitted our comments upon the latter to remain as we had written them, to add that we should not have deemed it necessary to write them at all had the former reached us before they were penned. So far, indeed, from being thrown into "a sort of dilemma," by the two letters, that to Mr. Allison extricated us from "a sort of dilemma" into which we might have been thrown by that to the Republican, had its meaning been unexplained.

But the Enquirer thinks the Republican has cut away this last plank from us. How? Because that paper says that not only Gen. Taylor cannot withdraw, but that he "will not be withdrawn;" and, as Gen. Taylor has written a letter to the editors of the Republican, ergo, says the Enquirer, they "certainly ought to know what the Old Hero means." But this is neither logical nor plausible. We have received in our time sundry letters without being able to comprehend the meaning of the writers; and we are very sure that we have sometimes been aided in reaching just conclusions by the acumen of others who had never received a line from our correspondents. It by no means follows, therefore, that our neighbors of the Republican are better qualified to interpret the General's language, because he has written a letter to them, than other folks who have not had the honor of a correspondence with him. Certain it is that the General himself no where says that he will not permit his name "to be withdrawn." He means no such thing, whatever the Republican may mean; and we admit that the determination of the editors of that paper to run him, "nolens volens," has not been at any time matter of doubt, except perhaps during the sitting of the Whig State Convention, when, as its editors were members of that body, we took it for granted they were prepared to abide by, as well as willing to participate in its deliberations. Nor do we suppose that the general means that expressions of this sort, though there should be a hundred of them, in as many different parts of the Union, are to control his course, rather than the embodied sense of his "friends" who may be members of the National Convention, and who, if they go into that body at all, must do so in no such uncompromising spirit as that evinced by the Republican. For it cannot be expected that the friends of other gentlemen, in that body, (experienced gamesters too, as they have been dubbed,) will consent to play at "Open and Shut" with those of Gen. Taylor or any other man.

The writer of this article voted in the Virginia Convention for the resolution nominating Gen. Taylor; but he is no farther committed to him by that vote, or by any thing that has appeared in the columns of this paper, than are the ultra friends of the General in that body committed to action of the National Convention—the second resolution of the State Convention having referred the whole matter to the decision of the meeting in Philadelphia, by whose determination its members, una voce, pledged themselves to abide. We confess to no such intense affection for Gen. Taylor—whose high qualities both of head and heart we nevertheless duly appreciate and honor—as to induce us to regard the "union of the Whig party" and the permanent ascendancy of Whig principles, as of subordinate importance to his nomination—and so we say of Mr. Clay, and of nay and every other man in its ranks. Hence, while, for reasons, some of which we have already stated, and others we may hereafter have occasion to make known, we have expressed a preference for Gen. Taylor, we do not intend, by any act of ours, to intimate a belief that "the world was made for Caesar." And, if the Corporal's Guard, who talk of running him as an "independent" candidate, should the Whig Convention refuse to submit to their arrogant attempt to dictate to it—as it will refuse, of that attempt shall be made—should "slough off," as they threaten to do, they will constitute a "forlorn hope," and will scarcely be missed when the vote shall be counted; or if they be rather more numerous than we suppose them to be, residing as they do in States which, with perhaps two exceptions, never have heretofore voted for a Whig candidate for the Presidency, they will, like the fly upon the coach-wheel, kick up a great dust to very little purpose. They may render themselves ridiculous, while they place their candidate in the mortifying attitude of having run as the "people's favorite," without receiving an electoral vote in the Union, as he will not if he permit them to keep him in that position.

But Gen. Taylor is not to be held responsible for what a portion of his "friends," isolated here and there, may say. Their opinions are of course entitled to respect, but they are not to be regarded as conclusive. If his friends in the National Convention shall speak that language, it will of course have more weight; and, the effect of it may be to prevent a nomination altogether—certainly to prevent the nomination of General Taylor. But we have too much confidence in their sound judgment and their love of fair play to suppose them capable of taking a position, which, as every one must perceive, must render the assemblage of the Convention itself an act of supreme folly.

Col. Haskell, of Tennessee, delivered a Lecture in the city of Washington, a few evenings since, on Mexico. His main points were that Mexico can never be subdued or reclaimed—that the country is not adapted to the Caucasian race—that they will become enervated and degenerate in such a climate in a few generations, and that, consequently, we had better give up the idea of annexation, and develop our inexhaustible resources at home. He also gave as his opinion, from the character of the Mexicans, that the treaty will not be ratified, and that we had as well prepare to fall back upon the line we intend to occupy, as our only safe alternative.

The New Orleans Bulletin publishes the following letter from Gen. Persifer F. Smith, the distinguished commander at the battle of Contreras, written to a friend in New Orleans. It is a beautiful, and we doubt not a just tribute to the character of General Taylor, from one who has had ample opportunities to judge of it. It is at once gratifying to the General's friends, and is a fitting rebuke, though not so intended perhaps, to those who take pleasure in depreciating the capacity of the hero of Buena Vista:

MEXICO, April 8, 1848.

General TAYLOR's military exploits are not the CAUSES of his popularity, they are only the occasions for the display of his sound judgment, energy of character, lofty and pure sense of justice, and incorruptible honesty. He has as much reputation for what he has WRITTEN as for what he has DONE, because, even if the composition is not his own, the sentiments, motives and feelings are his, and every thing he says, as every thing he does, is marked by the purity and greatness of his own character.

I have never heard of any one, however corrupt or base himself, that after five minutes conversation, with Gen. Taylor, has dared to propose, or even to hint, at anything dishonest or mean, and no intercourse in the ordinary events of common life, can give the true idea of the loftiness of his character.

I remember that you asked me at the time he was put in command at Corpus Christi, whether he was equal to the circumstances? I told you in reply, of his sound judgment and inexhaustible energy, as I learned them in Florida, but I did not then properly estimate the other and higher points of his character. In the campaign on the Rio Grande I saw him tried under all circumstances, and he always came out pure gold.

His profession that he will be the candidate of no party will, if he be elected, be carried out in his practice; not that his opinions on matters of policy may not be those of one or the other party, as on most of these he is a Whig, and he is not the man to act adverse to his own opinions, but no party management or power, can ever lead him to do a mean, or what he thinks, a wrong thing.

As soon as Gen. Taylor was furnished by events, with the opportunity to display his character, you see that it was at once properly estimated, and I come back to the proposition I started with, that the people will always properly measure great men. I do not say that they will always reward them properly, for they cannot always give a direct expression to their feelings, and the less worthy may have their vote without their wishes.

and the confidential correspondence of the departments at Washington, have been ransacked, and every paper that could be brought to bear, directly or indirectly, on the questions at issue, have been copied and sent to the defence, in hopes to influence the decisions; private correspondence to the military bureaus, written at a time when it was impossible to forward regular official communications from here, have been published in the Union, and the letters, with the names of the officers, sent to the defence, in hopes that it would prove that persons belonging to Gen. Scott’s general or personal staff had written letters for publication, or that it was the practice of officers to write letters, in order that they would find their way into the public prints.

“But the Administration have made a great mistake.—When they aimed at the object of their destruction, they selected a gun with too small a caliber.”

It is stated that the President has nominated Colonels Harney and Riley to the Senate as Brigadier Generals.

Why is it that the President has never sent in the name of Maj. Gen. Pillow for the action of the Senate? That General has for more than twelve months held his present commission alone by Presidential appointment. Is Mr. Polk afraid to trust his own friends?

RW48v25i36p2c4, May 5, 1848: Proceedings of the Court of Inquiry. Twentieth Day – (Concluded.)

Capt. Hager recalled.

By the Prosecution—Q—Did the witness chance to be in Major Gen. Scott’s room on the night of the 19th of August at San Augustin, when he gave some instructions to Capt. Lee regarding the operations of the next morning; was Gen. Pillow also there, and did he make any remarks?

A—I was in Gen. Scott’s quarters on the night of the 19th of August; I did hear the orders and directions given; Gen. Pillow was there, but I do not recollect that he remarked on the orders given.

Q—After the battle of August last, did the witness chance to fall into conversation with Gen. Pillow respecting the plan or plans of battle which had been executed that day, and if so, state the substance of the conversation?

A—I had no conversation with Gen. Pillow, discussing this subject, but accidentally met him at the hacienda of San Antonio on the evening of the 20th, after the battle, I rode up to him to congratulate him on his safety and success of the day, which had turned out as well as we could have wished from the prospects of the previous night. The General replied, Yes, sir, I am getting along very well; I had arranged all my plans, which had been successfully carried out, and that Gen. Scott was perfectly satisfied with it.

Q—When in September last did the witness receive orders to select sites, in connection with the late Capt Drum and others, for batteries to be placed against the castle of Chapultepec, that is how long before the attack by the batteries was it, that such orders were received?

A—The orders received by me to make reconnaissance of the battery, was on the morning of the 11th of September, just before Gen. Scott left Tacubaya to so to Piedad, my directions were to select the sites, and that the General would make up his mind before he returned about making the attack. On his retiring that evening, the erection of the batteries was determined upon, and the engineers instructed accordingly, and I was ordered to bring up the guns that night, and the batteries opened in the morning (the 12th).

Q—Had the witness many official or other interviews with Gen. Scott between the 7th and the 12th of September, and what was the impression received by witness of those occasions, regarding said Scott’s energy compared with earlier occasions in the campaign?

A—I have had frequent interviews with Gen. Scott during the stated time, and as the occasion required any great energy; I think he always displayed as much or more energy, both of mind and body, as I observed on lesser occasions.

Q—Does the witness chance to know any thing about the collection of scaling ladders, and what time the orders were given on that subject?

A—I do not know that scaling ladders were ordered, for I met some of the Quartermasters collecting them about Tacubaya, on the 11th Sept. in the morning; at what time they received their orders I don’t know.

Q—What did witness understand from said Scott to be the object in placing batteries against Chapultepec, or what did the witness learn from the same source, to be the plan of attack upon that Castle?

A—Gen. Scott had asked my opinion of the effect heavy guns would have upon the Castle, and I gave my opinion in which he concurred; a very considerable effect could be produced on the Castle, by the fire of our heavy batteries, and though we could not approach it so as to make any considerable breach in the walls; but the fire would so annoy and harass the garrison, it would greatly facilitate its being carried by storm, which I understood was his plan. These conversations occurred on the morning, before Gen. Scott went to Piedad.

Lieut. BEEMAN called and sworn.

By Prosecution.—Did the witness chance to hear, previous to the order for this Court, Paymaster Burns say anything on the subject of the Leonidas letter, if so what was it?

A—Some few days after the American army entered the city, I met Maj. Burns at a public Fonda, near the National Theatre; he, without having any particular acquaintance with me, showed me a paper, in which were some verses about Gen. Pillow. Some time after this the Leonidas letter made its appearance, and I then immediately reverted to this affair; my impressions were that Maj. Burns might be its author. Some short time after the appearance of the Leonidas letter, I think about a month, I met Maj. Burns again, he asked me of he had not shown me, before, those verses. I remarked that he had made some change in them; he said he had, as they were going to the United States, for publication, and that when they came back, they would create a great excitement here. I replied, as great an excitement as the Leonidas letter, I suppose? He replied, that he did not write the Leonidas letter, that he had been accused of it before. He said this, in a serious manner, as if it appeared I was taking a liberty with him, in indirectly accusing him of the authorship.

Q—Does the witness know that here were any officers other than Gen. Pillow introduced into said verses?

A—I do not know a single word of the verses; I only know that the tune was JIM CROW, and that Gen. Pillow’s name was introduced into the chorus, and he remarked that he had changed the tune.

Major Woods called and sworn:

Q—Has the witness, at any time since the capture of Chapultepec, heard any remarks from Gen. Pillow, relative to plans connected with that attack, &c.?

A—I heard Gen. Pillow make several remarks concerning the capture of Chapultepec, though I do not think the remarks are called for by the question. This question was withdrawn by Gen. Scott.

Lieut. McConnell called and sworn:

Q—Was the witness present at the taking of Chapultepec? If so, when and where did he see Gen. Pillow during that battle?

A—I was along with the storming party at Chapultepec, which was commanded by Col. ____, 2d Artillery. It was at least twenty minutes after the place had fallen that I saw Gen. Pillow, when he came up. I ascertained the length of time by this circumstance: after every thing was comparatively quiet—that is, when there was no enemy to be seen, except such as were killed or made prisoners, and no firing to be heard from Chapultepec—I collected some of my men together, and went out to search for and collect the killed and wounded of my command; among the killed was Lieut. E. T. Rodgers, of my Regiment; I had his body taken up and accompanied it myself to the building of Chapultepec; when I was near the building, I saw Gen. Pillow borne along on the backs of some soldiers. I remember it was at this time that they were carrying him along, for I stopped a moment to look at him, and, seeing that he did not appear to suffer much hurt, and remembering a circumstance which happened some time previous, I passed on, thinking that he was but slightly hurt.

Q—At what point was Gen. Pillow when the witness first saw him, and how far was that point from the body of the captured work?

A—I did not see Gen. Pillow until I saw him carried along inside the work.

Q—How long, after the place fell, was it before the national flag was hoisted?

A—I am not able to judge precisely as to the time, but I think that all firing was over when it was hoisted; I did not see it when it was hoisted.

Q—Where were the soldiers taking Gen. Pillow when you saw him?

A—they were taking him to a shed against the side of the wall—the same place in which was Lieut. Tower, after he was wounded.

Q—How long had the National flag been hoisted before you saw Gen. Pillow go into the work? Was it before or after you saw Gen. Pillow?
A—I do not remember whether it was before or after. I think it was after; I am pretty positive, from the fact that I saw Lt. Pickett and another in the yard. Lieut. Pickett I believe was on the top of Chapultepec when the National flag was raised.

Q—In what direction was it, from the main gate; was it towards the east end of the building that they were carrying Gen. Pillow, or towards the main entrance of the Castle, or towards the shelter a the east end of the building.

A—They were carrying him almost parallel to the south wall of the building; the shed was about ten or fifteen paces to the right of the main entrance of the Castle as you enter.

Q—Had Gen. Scott arrived before Gen. Pillow, or did he arrive afterwards?

A—I did not see Gen. Scott a the time he arrived.—When I did see him, he was making some congratulatory remarks to our troops at the main gate; how long he had been there speaking, I do not know.

Q—Does the witness mean to say that they were carrying Gen. Pillow to a shed in the main building, or to a shed near the main building?

A—They were carrying him to a shed near the main entrance.

Q—Was Gen. Pillow put by those who were carrying him under or by the shed you speak of?

A—He was placed, to the best of my recollection, a few yards from it, when the men laid him down; he may have been removed afterwards.

Q—Did witness chance to notice on what Gen. Pillow was laid, when laid down?

A—He may have been laid upon a Mexican mat, as there were some about there; whether he was or not, I don’t know.

Q—How close was witness to Gen. Pillow when he noticed him?

A—Within a yard or two.

Q—Is witness sure that Gen. Pillow was carried on a blanket when he saw him?

A—It was either a blanket, or a piece of cloth made to answer the purpose. I am pretty positive it was a blanket.

LIEUT. SIMPSON called and sworn.

Q—Was the witness present at the capture of Chapultepec? If so, at what time and place did he see Gen. Pillow there?

A—I was present at the taking of the castle of Chapultepec, and at a certain time in the morning I saw Gen. Pillow carried by me in a direction to the castle; I had no watch to observe the hour of the day, but to the best of my knowledge, it was more than twenty minutes after the place had fallen. I judge of the time from the happening of certain events, and the probable time between each one of them.

Q—What event transpired between the capture of the works and the moment at which the witness first saw Gen. Pillow in or about the place?

A—I entered the work, passing over the round or second ladders resting on the wall and in the ditch. I passed in front of the building, and entered near the principal entrance of the castle, for the purpose of going into the interior of the building, which I found impossible. I then went round towards that end of the building towards the Molino del Rey, and went into a room where I found a number of pick axes, shovels and other instruments—Some of the soldiers were standing near me, whom I directed to go and break open the doors in the interior of the building. I followed them, and saw the work done. The rooms were found to contain a number of Mexicans, who were made prisoners. I then passed from the interior of the building to the outside, to the south-western extremity, where I saw Gen. Pillow. A soldier of my company accosted me, and desired me to render him some assistance. About the same time we made the capture of Gen. Bravo, who was standing near by. After doing for the soldier all that was in my power to do, I passed to the other extremity of the castle, to see if any more Mexicans were concealed in the rooms. I went leisurely through all the rooms in that part of the building, and not seeing any of my party, I concluded that they had gone round to pursue the enemy. I then left the building, and went in the direction of the aqueduct, stopping frequently to drive soldiers out of houses, and to destroy the liquor they contained. Not finding any of my party, I returned to Chapultepec.
Question by Gen. Pillow.—Where was Gen. Pillow when you first saw him, in or outside of the main gate?

A—Inside the main gate.

Q—Were they carrying Gen. Pillow into the main building?

A—They were carrying him to that part of the main building, or what is now an opening in that part; I do not know whether there was an opening there then or not?

Q—Was it toward what is now called the main entrance and opening in the building?

A—It is not what is called the main entrance; the main entrance was partially covered with sand.

Q—Was it before or after the national flag was raised that you saw Gen. Pillow?

A—I have no recollection of seeing the flag when hoisted upon the works.

Q—Where was the entrance of which you speak, and was it leading into some private room, or through the building into the back yard?

A—It was the entrance which leads to the back yard; I do not know whether it was open or not.

Question by the Prosecution.—Does the witness mean to say that no flag had been raised a the time witness speaks of, or that the flag, if he saw any that forenoon, was hoisted before he observed General Pillow in or about the castle?

A—I have no recollection of having seen any flag at all that day.

RW48v25i36p2c5, May 5, 1848: From Tobin’s Knapsack. Parras, Mexico, March 20, 1848.

Eds. Delta—I am again in “dear, delightful Pawas.”*—The Camanches have made another descent, and made another clean sweep of horses and mules. Don Manuel y Ibarra tells me he has lost 4000 head. The Indians were only a small party, but the Peons, or rather serfa, had no arms to fight them; and even if they had, they don’t know how to use them. Such is the policy of the Mexican government. The rancheros are a splendid-looking set of men; and when this country is annexed, they’ll make capital Sepoys, if led by American officers, with a few companies of white men sprinkled amongst tem.

Capt. Adams, with his company of Texas Rangers, is here, and four companies of the Virginia Regiment—all under command of Capt. Harper, one of the most gentlemanly officers I have ever met with. You may believe it when I tell you so, and I am not inclined to flatter him, as he has wounded me in the most delicate point, by dancing all night with a lady, who, they say, is going to marry me; but it’s doubtful, ’cos she hasn’t asked me yet, although it is leap year.

The Virginia Regiment is a splendid one: no wonder Col. Hamtramck is so proud of it. It is the best I have ever seen, always excepting the “Washington regiment, Labrigade,” of which said regiment the Mount Zionites, Co. D, commanded by myself, was the flower, as Lieut. Col. Forno used to Say. Give him my love, and kiss him for me, if he will permit you. Ask him, too, if he remembers the day he swore he’d be d—d if he’d let me go over the Rio Grande to Matamoras; and also how I blarneyed him out of it, by taking a testament out of my pocket and reading him a verse. The testament was given me by the Rev. Arthur Meister, British Chaplain at Rio Janeiro, when I was LYING in sick in the hospital there. If this should meet his eyes, I wish him to accept the thanks of one to whom he was very kind when the object of his kindness was very poor and friendless. But, if I talk sentiment, you’ll put it down for the emblem of german literature, viz: a big butcher blubbering over a calf he has just killed.—The verse I read to Col. Forno, was from a letter written by a gentleman named Paul, to a COSSOON called TIM something. It’s in the 1st Epistle, 5th chapter, 23d Verse, and runs thus: “Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach’s sake and thine often infirmities.” The Colonel then told me to do to the realms reigned over by Lucifer, but to be back for the evening parade; I didn’t go to the place directed, but I was back for the parade.

Writing of Paul puts me in mind of a dispute between two sailors, when I served on board the war schooner “Invincible.” One of them said Paul was a saint; the other asserted that he was not. The matter was referred to the boatswain, an old Englishman from the Hard of Portsmouth. He decided that Paul was not a regular commissioned saint, but that he had a brown paper warrant.

Two of the Virginians have just come in, cut up into sausage-meat by the Mexicans. They had been missing some days, and as they were known to be excellent men and not deserters, a search was made for them; and Capt. Harper himself brought in their bodies, beautifully mangled with knives. They had been buried a day or two.
I had a narrow escape here from an inebriated virgin heifer I bought from Dan Manuel. Lieut. McGowan, of the Virginians, and myself, were watching the operation of tying her down, and when the Vacheros had fixed her so that she couldn't move, she got up and made a tilt at us; we both ran at quarter-horse speed, and I had only time to close the door of the corral, or yard, when she came butt on to it, within an inch of Mc.'s posterities. "How do you feel, Mc.?" Said I. "That showed some presence of mind in you; come down to Campo's and take a drink," said he. When we returned, I shot the lady; and on disemboweling her, I discovered a fine little masculine calf which I soon skinned, and I made a pot-pie of the little gentleman. That trick I learned from a Seminole Indian.

An express has come in, stating that Capt. Adams, of the Rangers, has had a brush with the Camanches, and had 7 of his men killed, and that he killed 5 of them. I don't know how true it is, but if we learn anything more before the mail closes, I shall let you know. The incarnate fiends actually came (a fresh band) within one league of us, but vamoosed the ranch when they learned that we were here. Capt. Adams, and all the Virginia officers who could obtain leave, started after them. I could not go, but I loaned all my horses, except one, to the Virginia Officers, and my double-barrel to Lieut. Garnett. I hope none of them are among the killed, or I shall be minus my gun and horses; and I'd rather lend my wife than my horse—that is, if I had a wife. I wonder how I'd look, walking down Chartres street, with a Mrs. T. on my arm, and a dozen little small T's toddling on after us. If I did send her, I'd only have the horses; and I'd rather lend my wife than my horse—that is, if I had a wife. I wonder how I'd look, walking down Chartres street, with a Mrs. T. on my arm, and a dozen little small T's toddling on after us. If I did send her, I'd only follow the example of an ancient philosopher:

Who lent his lady to his friend Hortensius,"

Some of Gonzales' people stole my fine horse "Belzebub," and shot another; the one I now bestride has two eyes, but one of them's out—however, he has speed and bottom.—On St. Patrick's Day he tried to eat the Shamrock out of my cap, and I had to get on the blind side to mount him.—He is most angelically wild, and when we get together there's a pair of us, the boys say. He has received Christian baptism, and bears the euphonious name of "Rip Van Snout." The boys are bothering me, and that will account for all the scratches and mistakes. We gave one fellow fifty lashes this morning for stealing—he was a greaser; and I'm going out now to look for another, who cheated me out of 81. If I catch him, I'll break half the bones in his body, as certain as that the Lord made small apples.

We have just buried the murdered Virginians; their names are Peck and Hurt. If I be not much mistaken, our people mean to immolate a hecatomb to their mates. A Hecatomb used to be 100 oxen, from Hecatos (100) and Bous, (a ox,) but the modern Ancients, (when beef grew scarce,) interpreted it into Hecatos, (100,) and Tombos, (1 foot,) making altogether 25 cattle; thereby whipping the Devil round the stump and cheating, "Jove high thundering," out of the smoke and incense of 75 beeves.

In this isolated place, I have no news, and must make up this letter by a joke or tow. Gen. Urrea, (they say,) is coming down on us, and within one day's march, with 10,000 men; and as the fighting must be done from house to house, (we are but 300,) we'll have "bloody politeful" times.

I caught Lt. Coleman, Va. Reg't in a beautiful fix, making a unique tableau, composed of himself and a calf and a cow, and a little girl. The cow was spanced by the hind legs, the calf engrossed two tits, (have tits two T's or three? The Lord help me, I'm forgetting how to spell,) Coleman had one the girl had the other, and both were milking into one pot, except the calf, who was milking into his own and Coleman's mustache was saturated with the milk and looked like a fresh flake of snow. I should have wished a daguerreotype of the group, taken by Mr. Maguire, and for the trouble of taken it, I should willingly have given him my note, payable 21 days after convenience. Coleman asked me what his friends at home would think if they saw him? Please ask them.

There's a true joke about Major Ben Mcculloch. The day after the battle of Buena Vista, I went to Saltillo with him, and stopped at the Great Western's. I was then Orderly Sergeant of his company, and had on the frock coat I wore when Captain, with the straps, however, taken off. We asked the Great Western for supper; the Major had not a ball dress on; she told me I could have it, but as to the Major, she kept no house for teamsters, although he might eat after the gentlemen got through. I roared and laughed, and the Major was leaving when Col. May came in, and invited him to supper. Master Ben declined, and the madame asked Col. May who he was. On learning that he was Major Ben of the Rangers, she ran out, brought him back, gave him supper, charged him nothing, opened a monte bank and took $18 off him. Next morning I caught Ben adjusting a shawl round her shoulders. Ben's a sly one.

This is perhaps the last time you'll ever hear from me, as Gen. Urrea is close by, according to Mexican accounts; and if he attacks us I shall, as a matter of course, be in the thick of it, and I don't intend to be made a prisoner of, because I've served so long on horseback, that it would be mighty inconvenient to circum-pery-ambulate on foot, through all the country between here and Mexico, and be displayed like a wild beast, instead of the quiet, bashful Christian I am. Yours, G. H. T.

P.S.—The lady says she'll have me, if I get baptized by a priest and become a legitimate good Catholic. I don't like the idea of abjuring the trifle of religion my mother taught me, and if the lady persists, I'll grow desperate, go out and turn regular Turk, and then I can marry every body (wot's willing.) G.H.T.

The dear, delightful Pawas is a joke, well known among the Va. Regiment here. [BWP]
Petitions and memorials were presented by Messrs. More, Sturgeon, Bagby, Crittenden, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Borland, Cass, chiefly in reference to the purchase of Mount Vernon by the Government, to the duties on timber exported, and to the Western Indians.

Several private bills were reported from committees.

Mr. Hannegan introduced a resolution, providing for the removal of the remains of Mr. Ashley whenever requested by the widow of the deceased. Adopted.

Mr. Bell gave notice of a bill to authorize the holding of a special term of the District Court of the United States in Tennessee.

Mr. Underwood reported a bill for the relief of the American Colonization Society, for the operation of the law relating to passenger vessels.

Mr. Westcott reported without amendment House bill providing for the holding of a term of the United States Circuit and District Court at Chicago, Illinois, on the first Monday in May in each year. Passed.

On motion of Mr. Crittenden, the bill extending the pension of Harriet Barney, widow of Com. Barney, was taken up and passed.

Mr. Butler, from the Judiciary Committee, to which had been referred certain resolutions of the Kentucky Legislature, in favor of the passage of a law in relation to Slaves escaping from Slaveholding to non-Slaveholding States, made a long report, accompanied by a bill, providing for their arrest, and the examination of testimony, before any Judge, Clerk, Marshal, Post-Master, Collector, or Commissioner of the U. S. for the State where the arrest, is made and for their return to their owners. The report and bill were read, and on motion of Mr. Atchison, 10,000 copies were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hale offered a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the Judiciary committee to inquire whether any legislation is necessary to protect the colored population of the non-slaveholding States in the rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution.

Mr. Douglass moved to take up the bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way through the public lands, for a railroad between the Mississippi and northern lakes, and alternate sections of these lands to and in the construction of such road.

Mr. Hale moved to take up the question of granting him leave to introduce his bill relative to property destroyed by mobs in the District of Columbia, but the motion of Mr. Douglass prevailed.

A debate ensued, and a few amendments,—one of which stipulating the conditions upon which the U. States Mail shall be conveyed over the road, when completed—were proposed. The debate was participated in by Messrs. Douglass, Crittenden, Cass, Benton, and Foote, in support of the bill, and by Messrs. Clarke, Butler, Niles, Calhoun, and Bagby in opposition; the constitutional question as to the powers of the General Government to aid in the construction of works of internal improvement, being of course introduced incidentally.

In the course of Mr. Baby's remarks, some allusions made to aspirants for the Presidency, supposed to refer to either Mr. Cass or Mr. Calhoun, which called up Mr. Calhoun, and induced a very sharp reply also from Mr. Foote, and not less pointed rejoinder from Mr. Bagby. Mr. B. said that his allusions were mainly directed to the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Crittenden) and for him had thought them a very small matter. The debate finally took a very pleasant turn, and terminated after this episode, in the passage of the bill, yeas 24, nays 11.

Mr. Cass gave notice that he should to-morrow, at 1 o'clock, move to take up the bill authorizing the raising of twenty additional regiments of Volunteers.

Mr. Atherton gave notice that he should call up the West Point Appropriation Bill.

Mr. Foote introduced a bill for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad Company, which was twice read and referred.

Mr. Borland gave notice that he should, on Monday, introduce a bill, granting to the State of Arkansas the public lands therein unsold, in consequence of overflow, for purposes of internal improvements or other objects, under the direction of the State.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a communication from Wm. Brent, presenting to Congress a portrait of Baron De Kalb. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. McClelland reported a bill to set apart a portion of the public lands to aid Mr. Whitney in the construction of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific. Read twice.

The bill to extend the time for locating Virginia Military Land Warrants in the State of Ohio, was taken up, discussed, and finally referred back to the committee of the whole on the state of the Union.

The House then, in committee of the whole, resumed the consideration of the bill extending the provisions of the act granting bounty lands to soldiers in the Mexican war to those officers who may have been promoted from the ranks, the question pending being the amendment offered by Mr. Thompson of Mississippi, to include officers so promoted during the last war with Great Britain.

The discussion was continued until the hour of adjournment, and a further amendment to the amendment, was proposed by Mr. Lumpkin of Georgia, including also officers in similar cases during the Florida war.

Without any action on the bill, the House adjourned.

RW48v25i36p2c6, May 5, 1848: (Correspondence of the N. O. Bulletin.) City of Mexico, April 7th, 1848.

Mr. Editor: The treaty, as ratified by the U. S. Senate, arrived here some days since, and the general impression amongst those having the responsibility of affairs here, is, that we will have peace, but probably not so soon as we generally anticipated some months ago or more.

The great difficulty appears to be the impossibility of getting the Mexican Congress together. All efforts on the part of the Executive up to this period, have failed. Many members held back under plea that they had not means to pay their traveling expenses to Queretaro? The Executive transmitted them the necessary funds, and they have replied to the renewed summons to them to appear in their seats—that the money has not been received!

However, I believe the President and Cabinet are of the opinion, that during all of this month, the Congress will convene. It is hardly expected that they will act upon the treaty with dispatch, the dignity and importance of the assembled wisdom of the great Mexican nation, and the momentous subjects embraced in their decisions, will prevent the ratification of the treaty, until the last moment of the days of grace, allowed them.

We are beginning to reap the fruits of the idleness and demoralization which have been growing up here amongst our officers and troops.

The robberies and murders that were prevailing in the neighborhood of the City, are transferred within the walls, and house breaking and robbing individuals in the streets, are by no means uncommon.

A few nights ago, a most horrible murder was committed by a band of desperadoes, who attempted to rob a wealthy mercantile house, in one of the most populous streets of our city.

Seven or eight of the gang have been apprehended.—Several Volunteer officers have been implicated, and a deep gloom and mortification hangs round the heart of every lover of his country, a the disgrace of the American Flag.

Any observing, reflecting person, long since would have known, that the gambling and debaucheries that prevail here amongst the American officers, to a great extent, must necessarily terminate in degradation to themselves, and distress and mortification to their friends. A great responsibility rest somewhere, for the outrages that are committed here against the welfare of society.

Those who ought to have rebuked vice and frowned upon iniquity, have winked at and tolerated it here; until nothing but a moral courage and firmness, that we need hardly expect from those who look forward to political preferment at a future day, to possess, can stay the torrent of immorality and vice as exhibited in our midst.

The health of the army is improving. We have had several hard rains recently, which has improved the health of the city very much.

[BWP]
We had a rumor last night of the ratification of the treaty. We understand that the President had information of the probability that it will be ratified, direct from Mr. Clifford, at Puebla. If it fails, the defensive line will yet be adopted, unless the Baltimore Convention should throw itself forward upon the annexation of the whole of Mexico.

General Sam Houston has received a magnificent set of Mexican trappings for a charger, saddle, bridle, &c., gold mounted, cost $500, from the city of Mexico. They are now to be seen in the Rotunda. The general is proud of them; and if not nominated for the Presidency, he will probably ride all the way back to Texas before the election on that gold mounted saddle.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill to enable the President of the U. States to take temporary military possession of Yucatan, and moved to make it the special order of the day for to-morrow.

Upon this motion, a long debate ensued, in which Messrs. CALHOUN, HANNEGAN, FOOTE, CASS, HALE, and NILES participated. The debate lasted three hours. Finally, the motion making the bill the special order for to-morrow, was agreed to.

After the transaction of some unimportant business, the Senate adjourned.

After sending us the above, the Telegraph ceased operations.

RW48v25i36p4c1, May 5, 1848: General Taylor’s Letter.

There can be little question that letter-writing has been the death of more than one Presidential aspirant, of not occasionally of a nominee for that office. Yet what is a gentleman who occupies this (in our judgment) most unenviable position, and who is too frank and candid in his nature to desire to stand before the country in an equivocal attitude,—what, we ask, is such an individual to do, when ardent friends as well as curious foes throughout the Union are perpetually pressing him with interrogatories, demanding to know whether he has ever said this, or done that, or thought the other, or what he intends to say, do or think hereafter? An adroit politician, like James K. Polk, need not fear such searching inquisition—for however closely such an one may be pressed, he finds in the ambiguity of language adequate means of confounding those who insist on “putting him to the question,” by the use of phrases—such as those in the Kane letter, for example, which may be cited as the model of an electioneering epistle—that are adapted alike to all shades of opinion and to all degrees of latitude. But when an ingenuous, unsophisticated, unambitious man, like Gen. Taylor, who has nothing of the artifice or chicanery of a trained politician about him,—or when an open, frank and fearless man like Mr. Clay, who although long in political life, has not learned the art of holding two sets of opinions at the same time, or of concealing any that may be unpopular,—when such men are asked respectfully to answer interrogatories, it is to be expected, if they answer at all, as they are very apt to do, that they will reply in categorical and explicit terms.—Hence, the triumph of Mr. Polk in 1844, which may be attributed to the fact that he would write but one letter—and that of so enigmatical a character, that, by the use of phrases—such as those in the Kane letter, for example, which may be cited as the model of an electioneering epistle—that are adapted alike to all shades of opinion and to all degrees of latitude. But when an ingenuous, unsophisticated, unambitious man, like Gen. Taylor, who has nothing of the artifice or chicanery of a trained politician about him,—or when an open, frank and fearless man like Mr. Clay, who although long in political life, has not learned the art of holding two sets of opinions at the same time, or of concealing any that may be unpopular,—when such men are asked respectfully to answer interrogatories, it is to be expected, if they answer at all, as they are very apt to do, that they will reply in categorical and explicit terms.—Hence, the triumph of Mr. Polk in 1844, which may be attributed to the fact that he would write but one letter—and that of so enigmatical a character, that, while Mr. Buchanan proved from it that he was even more in favor of a Protective Tariff, then Mr. Clay, his friends in the South on the contrary, held it up as the condensed manual of the Free Trade School! Hence, too, the defeat of Mr. Clay, who answered all questions, whether from friend or foe, careless of all consequences, and only desirous that his views on all questions of public policy might be understood. But we digress. General Taylor, it be already said, has written too many letter—especially, as, having been precluded, by the very position assumed by him in the outset, from giving a detailed exposition of his opinions, he had necessarily very little to say—a position from which he could only be relieved from flagrant misrepresentations of those opinions, such as have recently appeared, given to the public in the shape of his own positive declarations. We were satisfied, when those publications were made, that they did gross injustice to Gen. Taylor. They bore, indeed, upon their very face intrinsic evidence of their falsehood. But we had other and more conclusive reasons for this opinion; and we had good reason to believe that in due time the most conclusive refutation of these narratives of professed conversations would be laid before the country. This is now done in the following letter from gen. Taylor to the editors of the Republican, I answer to certain questions addressed to the General by those gentlemen, the character of which is sufficiently indicated by his reply.

BATON ROUGE, La., April 20, 1848.

Dear Sir: Your letter of the 10th inst. which alludes to certain statements that have recently been made in some of the papers at the North, and which submits several inquiries for my consideration, has been received.

To your inquiries I have respectfully to reply:

FIRST—That if nominated by the Whig National Convention, I shall not refuse acceptance, provided I am left free of all pledges, and permitted to maintain the position of independence of all parties in which the people and my own
SECONDLY—I do not design to withdraw my name if Mr. Clay be the nominee of the Whig National Convention—and, in this connection, I beg permission to remark that the statements which have been so positively made in some of the Northern prints, to the effect, "THAT SHOULD MR. CLAY BE THE NOMINEE OF THE WHIG NATIONAL CONVENTION," I had stated, "THAT I WOULD NOT SUFFER MY NAMES TO BE USED," are not correct, and have no foundation in any oral or written remark of mine. It has not been my intention, at any moment, to change my position—or to withdraw my name from the canvass, whoever may be the nominee of the National Convention, either of the Whig or Democratic party.

THIRDLY—I have never stated to any one that I was in favor of the Tariff of '46—of the Sub-Treasury, nor that I originated the war with Mexico. Nor, finally, that I should [if elected] select my cabinet from both parties. No such admissions or statements were made by me, at any time, to any person.

The election of another candidate would occasion no mortification to me, but to such a result, as the will of the people, I should willingly and calmly submit. As I have had no ambition to serve, but in the desire to serve the country, it would bring to me no disappointment.

With sentiments of high respect and regard, I remain your most ob't servant, Z. Taylor.

The denial by General Taylor of the authenticity of the conversations ascribed to him by certain Mississippi letter-writers, places him precisely where he stood before those letters were published. We are satisfied not only that he never expressed any such opinions, but that he does not entertain them. The declaration in the above letter, that, in the event of his election, he will, in administering the Government, make "our Earlier Presidents" his model, is, indeed, by direct and necessary implication, a repudiation of the systems and measures of our later Presidents, as emphatic as if his hostility to those systems and measures had been expressed in so many words. In one word, we have not the shadow of a doubt that he is in all essential points "A WHIG UPON PRINCIPLE;" and, entertaining this undoubting conviction, we are prepared to support him cordially and zealously. IF HE BE THE NOMINEE OF THE WHIG PARTY. WE regret, therefore—and it is the only thing we much regret to see in the foregoing letter—that Gen. Taylor, while expressing a willingness to receive, under any circumstances, the nomination of the Whig National Convention, should have deemed it necessary to say, in so many words, that, should he fail to do so, he will, so far as it depends upon himself, remain a candidate. Such a declaration is calculated to deprive him of that nomination, if there were otherwise a certainty of his getting it. "Heads I win, Tails you lose," is rather too strong a game, in politics, as in less important matters. The very basis upon which Conventions are organized is a spirit of compromise,—the members, as well as those who are willing to received the vote of such bodies, consenting, for the sake of a common triumph, to submit to the chances of an individual sacrifice. If this rule is to be violated—if one of the individuals willing to received its vote, may say, "if you nominate me, I will accept the nomination, but if you do not, I will be a candidate in opposition to your nominee," it is manifest that Conventions are themselves solemn farces, or even worse. It can scarcely be expected that some two hundred and fifty gentlemen will consent to meet in Philadelphia, in June next, from the most remote parts of the Union, at great inconvenience and expenses to many if not all of them, simply for the purpose of NOMINATING A GENTLEMAN WHO IS ALREADY IN THE FIELD, "NOLENS VOLENS;" and intends so to remain, whether a majority of them shall think it advisable or inadvisable. For one, we confess we do not like this part of Gen. Taylor's letter; and, foreseeing that it will constitute an insuperable objection with some, who would be otherwise in favor of Gen. Taylor's nomination, we regret that he has been induced to assume an attitude so embarrassing to all of his friends, except the handful who expect to support him as an "independent" candidate, and which may have the effect of defeating his own nomination and election. That the General does not care to be elected, one may readily infer from the language of his letter; but, if he be thus indifferent to his own success, he ought to feel some anxiety for the triumph of sound principles and wholesome measures; and we do not very clearly comprehend, therefore, why he has determined so pertinaciously to cling to his position as a candidate for an office that he does not want, in opposition to both the Whig and Democratic nominees, IF BY DOING SO HE SHALL WEAKEN AND DEFEAT THE FORMER, and render the election of the latter inevitable.

But we have already extended these comments to an unreasonable length, and we commit the whole subject to the consideration of the country.

[BWP]
NAME in the event of the nomination of another individual by the Philadelphia Convention, yet his FRIENDS are at liberty to do so whenever THEY may deem it expedient; and that they will unquestionably advise his withdrawal in the event of the nomination of any other Whig, cannot be doubted. The peculiarity of the circumstances under which the General was brought forward as a candidate, AUTHORIZES and almost COMPELS him to take this ground; and for one we are satisfied with it; as indeed we are with the admirable sentiments—and especially those relative to EXECUTIVE POWER and INFLUENCE—embodied in his letter. But our space is already exhausted, and we must defer further remark until to-morrow:

BATON ROUGE, April 22d, 1848.

Capt. J. S. Allison.

Dear Sir: My opinions have recently been so often misconceived and misrepresented, that I deem it due to myself, if not to my friends, to make a brief exposition of them upon the topics to which you have called my attention.

I have consented to the use of my name as a candidate for the Presidency. I have frankly avowed my own distrust of my fitness for that high station, but, having, at the solicitation of many of my countrymen, taken my position as a candidate. I do not feel at liberty to surrender that position, until my friends manifest a wish that I should retire from it. I will then, most gladly do so. I have no private purposes to accomplish—no party projects to build up—no enemies to punish—nothing to serve, but my country.

I have been very often addressed by letter, and my opinions have been asked upon almost every question that might occur to the writers, as affecting the interest of their country or their party. I have not always responded to their inquiries, for various reasons.

I confess, whilst I have great cardinal principles, which will regulate my political life, I am not sufficiently familiar with all the minute details of political legislation, to give solemn pledges to exert my influence, if I were President, to carry out this or defeat that measure. I have no concealment—I hold no opinion which I would not readily proclaim to my assembled countrymen; but crude impressions upon matters of policy, which may be right to-day and wrong to-morrow, are perhaps, not the best test of fitness for office. One cannot be trusted without pledges, cannot be confided in, merely on account of them.

I will proceed, however, now, to respond to your inquiries.

FIRST—I reiterate what I have often said—I am a Whig, but not an ultra-Whig. If elected, I would not be the mere President of a party. I would endeavor to act independent of party domination. I should feel bound to administer the Government, untrammeled by party schemes.

SECOND—The Veto Power. The power given by the Constitution to the Executive to interpose his veto is a high conservative power, but in my opinion, should never be exercised, except in cases of clear violation of the Constitution, or manifest haste and want of consideration by Congress. Indeed, I have thought that for many years past, the known opinions and wishes of the Executive have exercised undue and injurious influence upon the Legislative department of the Government, and from this cause I have thought our system was in danger of undergoing a great change from its true theory. The personal opinions of the individual who may happen to occupy the Executive Chair, ought not to control the action of Congress upon questions of Domestic Policy, nor ought his objections to be interposed, when questions of Constitutional power have been settled by the various Departments of Government, and acquiesced in by the People.

THIRD—Upon the subject of the tariff, the currency, the improvement of our great highways, rivers, lakes, and harbors, the will of the people, as expressed through their representatives in Congress, ought to be respected and carried out by the Executive.

FOURTH—The Mexican war. I sincerely rejoice at the prospect of peace, My life had been devoted to arms, yet I look upon war at all times and under all circumstances, as a national calamity, to be avoided if compatible with national honor. The principles of our Government, as well as its true policy, are opposed to the subjugation of other nations and the dismemberment of other countries by conquest. In the language of the great WASHINGTON, "why should we quit our own, to stand on foreign ground?"

In the Mexican war, our national honor has been vindicated, amply vindicated; and in dictating terms of peace, we may well afford to be forbearing and even magnanimous to our fallen foe.

These are my opinions upon the subjects referred to by you, and any reports of publications, written or verbal, from any source, differing in any essential particulars from what is here written, are unauthorized and untrue.

I do not know that I shall again write upon the subject of national politics. I shall engage in no schemes, no combinations, no intrigues. If the American people have not confidence in me, they ought not to give me their suffrages. If they do not, you know me well enough to believe me, when I declare that I shall be content. I am too old a soldier to murmur against such high authority.

Z. TAYLOR.
Quite an animated debate arose in the House of Representatives, last Saturday, on the Special Message of the President in regard to the proposed “immediate” relief to the province of Yucatan, with but an ill-concealed expectation of its ultimate annexation. Mr. Holmes, of South Carolina, took occasion to advert, as Mr. Calhoun had done in the Senate, to the President’s reiteration of Mr. Monroe’s doctrine, (as it is called,) and to which Mr. Polk seems to think this Government “pledged”—as any President or any Congress can bind its successors—that European intervention in the affairs of this Continent shall not be hereafter permitted. Whether that doctrine be a sound one or not—whether the United States Government had the right to dictate political institutions to the independent States of this Continent, and force them to accept the gift, any more than Russia has to set herself up as the great REGULAROTR of European affairs, and to prescribe a form of government for France—we agree with Mr. Holmes that there never was a more inappropriate time of occasion for the assertion of that doctrine. As Mr. Holmes proceeded to remark:

"Because the Yucatanese told them that they were about to be exterminated, and, in obedience to the law of nations—salus reipublica suprema Lex—which in all minds should be above all other considerations, to save their lives, appealed to other countries, did this country, in this enlightened age, when all Europe was responding to the sentiment that a people have the right to select for themselves their won guardians in a manner and form agreeable to their own institutions—should we say, while we are unable to rescue them from the difficulties by which they are surrounded, that we will interpose between them and any other country that should attempt to give them the necessary aid and protection? Should we, in advance, throw ourselves before other nations and bid them defiance, and say to them respectively, Stop; if you do afford protection, if you do throw the aegis of your protection over these people to whom we are not able to afford assistance, we will meet you in a conflict of arms? That doctrine of Mr. Monroe was applied, be it remembered, at the time the allied sovereigns were about to interfere with self-government. When the States of South America had disenthralled themselves, the allied sovereigns, fearing difficulties in Europe from the diffusion of free sentiments and the establishment of republics in South America, contemplated bringing back to colonial subjection the southern hemisphere. But we promptly met them; and the people, feeling the justice of the course—feeling a hearty sympathy with South America—were willing to support Mr. Monroe; but did that include the doctrine that Yucatan should not choose who should be her protector? Did it prohibit her from calling upon any nation for protection? He warned gentlemen—he warned this country—while we are assuming this bold attitude, not to be so lofty in their pretensions. There was yet one nation that had not lost the imperial diadem, and such pretensions might involve us in a calamitous war. He protested against that doctrine which the President in his message had promulgated, and he hoped it would not be sanctioned by this House.”

There was a time, indeed—and that, too, long after the proclamation of Mr. Monroe’s doctrine—that James K. Polk, then occupying a position much better adapted to his capacity than that to which he has been since elevated by blind and capricious Fortune, HIMSELF VEHEMENTLY OPPOSED THE DOCTRINE of which he has recently become so violently enamored. In 1828, as a member of the House of Representatives, when John Q. Adams, then President, appointed Ministers to Panama, to confer with those of other American Republics, as to the best means of mutual protection against European aggression—not to set up this nation as the “Grand Protector” of all the rest,—Mr. Polk made the following remarks, which constitute a striking commentary upon his Yucatan message:

FROM MR. POLK’S SPEECH ON THE PANAMA MISSION.

"He had voted for it [a resolution adverse to the message] because he believed it was declaratory of that uniform course of policy so happily pursued by the Government, form the adoption of the constitution to the present period; because it was, as he conceived, still the true policy of the country; and because, being opposed, as he was, to the proposed mission to the Congress of Panama, under any circumstances, he wished to signify to the President and his Cabinet, by a distinct expression of opinion by the popular branch of the Legislature of the Union, the views which they entertained of THE TRUE POLICY OF THE COUNTRY.—That object had been effected by the vote of yesterday.—By that vote it was distinctly announced by a majority the House, as their opinion, that our policy with foreign nations is the same now as that laid down by WASHINGTON, in his Farewell Address to the American People; that no circumstances had occurred in our foreign relations, or in the political connexions of other Powers with each other, which authorized us to change that policy or to hazard the experiment of a new one. We had distinctly declared it as our opinion, by the adoption of that amendment, that our policy was now, as it ever had been, to observe a strict neutrality between all belligerent Powers; that in extending our commercial relations with foreign nations, we should have with them as little political connection as possible; that we should preserve peace, commerce, and friendship with all nations, and form entangling alliances with none; that we should not form any alliance, offensive or defensive, or negotiate respecting such an alliance, with any of the South American Republics; nor should we become parties with them, or either of them, to any joint declaration for the purpose of preventing the interference of any of the European Powers with their independence or form of government; or ‘to any compact for the purpose of preventing colonizan on the continent of America.’ These are sentiments, Mr. P. said, to which he most willingly subscribed. However strong his sympathies might be in favor of liberty and republican institutions, in whatever part of the world they might make their appearance, the peace, the quiet, and prosperity of his own country were paramount to every other consideration.”
RW48v25i36p4c4, May 5, 1848: From the Rio Grande.

By the arrival of the schooner, H.L. Scranton, Capt. Taber, from Brazos Santiago, we have dates from Matamoros of the 8th inst., and Monterey to the 29th ult. There is but little news upon the Rio Grande of much interest, the stirring scenes which have been enacted upon that line having given place to the utter and insufferable dullness of a line of garrisons where a robbery or murder is looked upon as a great event.

The Monterey Gazette of the 25th ult. states that a report is in circulation in that city that several American merchants have been murdered near Mazapil, but is unable to trace it to any authentic source.

The same paper states that the 16th Infantry, who have been garrisoning the city, have been ordered out to Walnut Springs.

Appropriate honors were paid to the memory of John Quincy Adams at Monterey by the 16th Infantry, on the 22d ult. A cannon was fired every half hour during the day from the citadel, and thirteen in the morning and twenty-nine at sun-set.

The Gazette learns from its agent in Saltillo, who had just arrived from Parras, that three Virginia volunteers had been murdered there a short time previous. The perpetrators had been arrested.

The news of the ratification of the treaty by our Congress was received by Gen. Wool at Monterey on the 29th inst.

RW48v25i36p4c6, May 5, 1848: Later from Santa Fe.

Advices have been received at St. Louis, by an arrival from the far West, which contains accounts from El Paso to the 3d ult. and Santa Fe to a correspondingly later date.

Gen. Price had finally marched for Chihuahua with his whole disposable force, in fine order and spirits, and eager to meet the enemy, who were reported to have mustered in strong numbers to oppose their entry into the capital of the State.

At Santa Fe there were indications of another attempt at insurrection, the Mexican population daily becoming more insolent, and appearing disposed to take advantage of the absence of Gen. Price with his command. Precautionary measures had been taken to suppress any EMEUTE.

Intelligence from Iowa, received a St. Louis, has settled the question of the contested election in that State. It is ascertained from the returns, that Harlin, Whig, has been elected Superintendent of Instruction by 75 majority over Thos. H. Benton, Jr. the candidate of the opposite party.—This sets at rest the rumors that have been floating about in favor of each.

An explosion had taken place in a powder and fire work establishment in Cincinnati, by which two persons were killed and three seriously injured. Names not given.—Much damage was done the houses in the neighborhood by the concussion, in broken glass, &c.

[BWP]

The Senate transacted no business to-day. Shortly before 12 o’clock, the Committee of Arrangements and Pallbearers, with the coffin containing the body of the deceased Senator Ashley, beautifully decorated with flowers, entered the Chamber, followed by the Senator and Representative of Arkansas, the widow, daughter and personal friends of the deceased. The President and Private Secretary, with Messrs. Buchanan, Walker and Marcy, entered immediately afterwards, and were soon followed by the members of the House of Representatives.

There were also present several officers of the army and navy, members of the corps diplomatique, and other distinguished gentlemen; but the number of spectators in the galleries and lobbies, owing to the state of the weather was no so large as is usual when the last honors are paid at the Capitol to distinguished men of the nation.

The services commenced with an impressive and eloquent prayer by Rev. Mr. Gurley. The funeral discourse was delivered by Rev. Mr. Slicer, from I. Peter, 24th and 25th: verses: "For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of the grass: the grass withereth, and the flower of the grass fadeth away: but the Word of the Lord endureth forever."

The Reverend Speaker commenced with an allusion to the fact that within the short period of eighteen months, Death had six times visited that Chamber, Heaven thus demonstrating not only the mortality of public men, but the facility with which that mortality reaches even the most elevated. The only fact stated in the course of the discourse, which has not already been published, was that the last words of Mr. Ashley, to those who surrounded his bed of death, was—"Pray for your country, and prepare to meet me in Heaven."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock, and the journal was read, when the members proceeded to the Senate Chamber to attend the funeral of Mr. Ashley.

(The remains of Mr. Ashley were deposited in the receiving vault at the Congressional Burying Ground. His remains, it is understood, will not be removed to Arkansas, and the National Cemetery will be his final resting place.)

Mr. Atchison introduced a bill granting the right of way through the public lands in Missouri, and granting alternate sections of the same, for the construction of a railroad between certain points on the Missouri and Mississippi rivers.

The resolution offered by Mr. Johnson, of Md., inquiring of the President whether any officers, civil or military, were acting under commissions from the President, whose ap-ments had not been submitted to the Senate for confirmation, and why? Was taken up and adopted, but the vote was subsequently reconsidered, on motion of Mr. Allen, and held over.

On the motion of Mr. Hannegan, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the Bill to enable the President to take temporary military possession of Yucatan.

Mr. Hannegan addressed the Senate, in reply to the remarks of Mr. Calhoun on the day the message of the President on this subject was presented.

He was unable to discover the dangers in which the Senator had alluded, but had not stated. He could perceive no hidden rocks upon which we were to shipwreck, if the measure was adopted and the old required furnished.

The President, he said, does not ask expressly prohibits, the permanent occupation of Yucatan. Considerations, it is true, might arise, which would render it necessary to turn it into something more than a temporary occupation, and he desired now to make this declaration, for he wished no disguises.

We have positive information not only that England intends but that she has interfered in the affairs of Yucatan. She has taken possession of the Belize, and advanced her troops from Honduras into Southern Yucatan, under the pretence of protecting the interests of her own subjects.

But her desires, he entertained no doubt, were to obtain possession of Yucatan, and he had no more doubt that if she did obtain Yucatan, her efforts would next be directed to the obtainment of Cuba also.

Give her Cuba, and she would control the mouth of the Mississippi as easily as she now controls the mouth of the Thames; and her power would be extended to the entire North American coast. Would the Congress of the United States stand by and see this?

It had come out; in the correspondence with Mr. Sierra, that the agent of England had actually furnished the Indians with the very arms which they are using against the white population of Yucatan.

He represented that it was not the intention of the President, or of the bill, to take permanent possession of Yucatan, unless compelled by unavoidable circumstances, and then the whole matter would be within the control of Congress.

Mr. Clayton gave his reasons which would influence him in voting against the bill. The President says, in his Message, that, during the continuance of he war with Mexico, if he could spare the troops, he would take possession of Yucatan and offer the aid desired. But the bill provides for tan indefinite occupation of Yucatan. It was true the word "temporary" was introduced, but that was a very indefinite expression. He desired to know how long it was contemplated by this bill to continue this occupation?

The bill also, he said, was in violation of the treaty of peace with Mexico, and of the terms of the armistice. A Congress was about to assemble at Queretaro, with a fair prospect of ratifying that treaty. And was not it probable that when the intelligence that this bill is before the Senate reached them, this would throw the treaty to the wind—reject it—considering the movement not as intended to repress the incursions of the Indians, but to take permanent possession of one of the States in her confederacy.

The passage of this bill would be a violation of the treaty, unless we obtained from Mexico her consent to send our troops into her territory.

Mr. Jefferson Davis said Yucatan was recognized as a part of Mexico, and being so a part, we had the right, during the existence of the war, to send our troops into that territory. The President only asked for troops to carry out objects entirely consonant with the prosecution of the war with Mexico.

As to the question of seizing certain points in the gulf, in the exigency to which the Senator from Indiana had referred, he declared that he would not hesitate for one moment. And even if we had no war with Mexico, he would still stand by the people of that country in their present struggle.

But here there was no such difficulty. We are at war with Mexico, and the only event in which we are allowed, during the existence of the armistice, to take possession of any other territory of Mexico had transpired—it had been rendered necessary by "acts of the Mexicans themselves"—"there had been a military movement by Mexicans."

He moved certain amendments, in conclusion, not affecting the character of the bill, but designed so to modify its provisions as to merely establish a "new military post," leaving the right to take possession to the authority given under the act "recognizing the existence of a war with Mexico."

Mr. Crittenden opposed the feature of the bill which provided for raising additional volunteers, to take the place of those withdrawn from other portions of the service in Mexico. Where was the necessity, he said, of any provision, when there is already another bill before the Senate providing for 20,000 additional volunteers? If the exigencies of the war required it, he was ready to vote for any additional number; but no such exigency had yet arisen.

The measure proposed, so far from having was in view as its object, is presented as a measure of charity, of humanity. And he could not perceive that under the terms of the armistice, we could take possession of a province not in our hands at the time the armistice was made. It could not be contended that such would be a fair construction of the armistice.

He was also opposed to the bill, on the ground of inexpediency. It was contrary to sound policy to involve the country in a difficulty of this character. He was opposed to any such intervention by one country in reference to the affairs of another, even as an act of humanity—to engage in that which might lead to war throughout the world, and thus, by endeavoring to allay one calamity, to create a greater. We should allow every nation, as we would every family, to manage its own affairs.

He would succor the distressed and relieve the needy, but it was impossible to do this by any general system, regulating such intercourse between nations, as here proposed.

The Indians whom it was proposed to put down, were as much citizens of Yucatan as those whom it was proposed to succor, and entitled to the same privileges. But he would rescue the white population if possible, even though they had, for ages, oppressed and borne down their present oppressors. But he would not do it by withdrawing our troops from other portions of Mexico.

We would only make our interposition effectual by placing an army in Yucatan, and that he had no disposition to do until he understood fully everything connected with this question—until he could reconcile the whole subject with the great principle of non-intervention.

Mr. Jefferson Davis replied to a portion of Mr. Crittenden's remarks; and was followed by Mr. Foote. The evidence before them, he said, was of such a character that, if they did not act, they would disgrace the country, and justly incur the execration of the whole civilized world.

In the course of his remarks he expressed, in strong terms, his opinion that neither Yucatan nor Cuba should be permitted to fall into the hands of any European power, even if we were compelled to go to war to prevent it. And he declared also, if he were President of the U. States—a position which he never expected to occupy—he would not hesitate now to apply to the government of Spain to transfer, on just terms, the Island of Cuba to the government of the United States.

At the conclusion of Mr. Foote's remarks, the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

After several unsuccessful efforts were made to introduce resolutions, the Speaker laid before the House a communication from W. W. Brent, stating that he had just received, addressed to his care, from Robert Walsh, United States Consul at Paris, a portrait of Major Gen'l Baron de Kalb, to be presented to Congress, as an offering from the surviving family of De Kalb, persons of great distinction and worth, and asking the decision of Congress in regard to the reception and disposition to be made of the picture—referred to the Library Committee.
Mr. Stewart, of Pennsylvania, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following:

Resolved, That "the power given by the constitution to the Executive, to interpose his veto, is a high conservative power, which should never be exercised except in cases of clear violation of the constitution, or manifest haste and want of consideration by Congress."

Resolved, That "the personal opinions of the individual who may happen to occupy the executive chair ought not to control the action of Congress upon questions of domestic policy, nor ought his objections to be interposed when questions of constitutional power have been settled by the various departments of the government, and acquiesced in by the people."

Resolved, That "upon the subjects of the tariff, the currency, the improvements of our great highways, rivers, lakes, and harbors, the will of the people, as expressed through their representatives in Congress, ought to be respected and carried out by the Executive."

Resolved, That war, at all times and under all circumstances, is a national calamity, to be avoided if compatible with national honor," that “the PRINCIPLES of our government, as well as its true POLICY, are opposed to the subjugation of other nations and the dismemberment of other countries by CONQUEST—for, in the language of the great Washington, 'why should we quit our own soil to stand on foreign ground.'"

Objections being made, the resolutions were not received.

On motion of Mr. Rockwell, the House then resolved itself into committee of the whole, for the consideration of private bills, and after taking up one or two of this character, found itself without a quorum, the roll was called, the committee rose and reported the names of the absentees to the House, and they were ordered to be entered on the journal.

A quorum having appeared, a number of private bills were subsequently considered in committee of the whole, reported to the House, and passed. And then, at 20 minutes past 1 o'clock, the House adjourned until to-morrow.

RW48v25i37p2c1, May 9, 1848: How Gen'l Taylor come to cross the Nueces.

Notwithstanding the pertinacity with which the supporters of the Polk Administration have defended the order given to Gen. Taylor to march to the Rio Grande, on the false and flimsy pretext, as admitted by themselves in various official acts, that that river, from its source to its mouth, constituted the true boundary between Texas and Mexico—an assumption, which, if it had been well founded, would not only have justified the order in question, but rendered it imperative—they have nevertheless impliedly confessed that it was a great blunder, by endeavoring to divide the responsibility of that act between the Administration and Gen. Taylor—which they would never have done had the act itself been a defensible one. For this purpose they seized, in the first place, upon an expression in one of Gen. Taylor's letters to the War Department, to the effect that the army ought promptly to take its position at some eligible point on the Rio Grande, if the President had determined to insist, as a sine qua non, upon that river as the boundary. But this perversion of a suggestion founded upon a contingency over which the President alone had control, into a positive recommendation, is manifestly so preposterous and absurd that it has been abandoned except by a few of the more unscrupulous party hacks, who, like the witness that had testified that a certain horse in dispute was fourteen feet, instead of fourteen hands high, refused, as he had once sworn to it, to retract his declaration. More recently, however, a convenient witness against Gen. Taylor upon this point was found in one Dr. Kimmell, of Hinds county, Mississippi, who transmitted to one of the representatives of that State in Congress a fabulous narrative of a conversation between Gen. Taylor and himself, in which the General was made to assume the entire responsibility of bringing on the war with Mexico, by the movement of his army from the Nueces to the Rio Grande, and entirely to exculpate Mr. Polk from all censure in respect to it!—Otherwise they would place the President's vindication upon the impregnable ground of right and duty, instead of endeavoring to show that it was necessary that he should be instigated to its performance by Gen. Taylor's recommendation.

The New Orleans National throws some additional light on the subject, by the publication of the following letter from Baton Rouge, (Gen. Taylor's place of residence,) written, it informs us, "by a gentleman acquainted with the facts," (not improbably by Major Bliss.) It not only exonerates Gen. Taylor from all agency in advising that act of war, but shows that he would not even CROSS THE NEUCES until he had received positive instructions from the War Department:

When Gen. Taylor was ordered to Mexico, he was instructed to take up a position NEAR the Rio Grande, POINT ISABEL BEING NAMED AS A PROPER PLACE, but in consequence of having large discretionary powers, he preferred to take a position on undeniably American soil, rather than infringe upon disputed territory. He therefore made his head quarters at Corpus Christi, a place that, beyond its being within the acknowledged boundary of Texas, was inconvenient, and in no way favorable for an encampment—still Gen. Taylor prepared to suffer every evil incident to his situation, rather than in any way compromise his government. After Gen. Taylor had been some time at Corpus Christi, Maj. Donaldson, the representative of the United States government in Texas, came to Gen. Taylor’s camp for the especial purpose of advising General Taylor NOT TO CROSS THE NUECES, lest he should involve the government in a war in Mexico; Gen. Taylor in the mean time having been informed by “the government” that it wished him to confer with Maj. Donaldson. In the course of events, Maj. Donaldson left Gen. Taylor’s camp, and there came on from Washington letters to Gen. Taylor, informing him that he should move part of his force west of the Nueces. Gen. Taylor not wishing to divide his small command and the government having relieving him of the responsibility of crossing the Nueces, he took his whole force over, as he could by so doing, readily obtain a good camping ground, and a depot convenient for his military stores. The events that followed this movement on the part of Gen. Taylor are familiar to the world. The above is a true statement of the preliminaries that led to the advance of our army on Matamoras.—The main facts can be gathered, as I have stated, from the “public documents” already published, containing the correspondence of Gen. Taylor with the war department, previous to the battles of the 8th and 9th of May. Othe facts stated can be proved if denied. The most superficial observer must perceive, that Gen. Taylor originated the order, and marched on to Matamoras by his own will and judgment. That any member of congress should be so unscrupulous or so ignorant of the true history of General Taylor’s movements, is a matter of surprise, as documents already published by the “War Department” give the outlines, if not the particulars, relative to the subject, so clearly, that there need be no justifiable cause of misinterpretation.

The tone of several of the leading Whig presses at the North, heretofore most decidedly opposed to the nomination of Gen. Taylor, or even to the consideration of his claims by a Whig Convention, has undergone a marked change since the publication of the General’s letter to Capt. Allison. Among these is the New York Express, the opposition of which to Gen. Taylor has been of the most decided character, which now says: “The Allison letter is a good enough Whig letter for us, we must confess; and but little or no fault can be found with its promulgation of a Whig creed. Nobody wishes a Whig President to be the President to administer the government trammled by party schemes. It is a Whig doctrine, too, that as Congress represents the people in the matter of the currency, internal improvements, tariffs, &c. the Executive should yield to the people’s will, and not set up any opinion of his own against the public representation in Congress. All this, however, has been the reverse of the Democracy, since Gen. Jackson made the vetoes of one man the “Democratic” doctrine of the many. * * * “We should have no hesitancy in supporting him if nominated by the Whig Convention.””

But perhaps the most significant sign is the letter of the Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune, extracts from which we subjoin: (see next article).
The Union finds fault with the General’s idea of the veto-power. Its own idea would seem to be, that the power was lodged in the hands of the President, to save the people from their own madness—a breakwater against the consummation of their own wishes. The true deduction from which premises is, that the President, elected for a term of four years, should, of his own arbitrary will, interpose and neutralize the action of the people as expressed by their immediate representatives. Such in theory is it under the English constitution; in practice, however, it is less formidable there than with us.

There is a striking resemblance between the views of Gen. TAYLOR on this subject and those communicated by Mr. CLAY in his Senatorial term: it is a resemblance, in truth, not confined to idea, but extending to the words themselves in which the two distinguished gentlemen make known their opinions. The interposition of the Executive veto should never take place where questions of Constitutional power have been established by the uniform practice of the various Departments of the Government, and have been acquiesced in by the People. Such was the opinion of MADISON and MONROE, sanctioned by their practice—such is the opinion of WEBSTER, of CLAY, and of TAYLOR. Of course, this letter of Gen. TAYLOR, will be productive of abundant commentary. At present, perhaps, it requires mostly a paper perusal.

RW48v25i37p2c3, May 9, 1848: American Deserters in Mexico.

The New Orleans Delta contains a letter from the city of Mexico, under the date of the 8th ult., which says:

Last night, about twenty soldiers and teamsters deserted, taking with them the best horses they could lay their hands on, together with their full arms and equipments. It is supposed, with good reason, that their object is to form a banditti, for the purposes of plundering the highways, the haciendas, and the churches of the small towns: We learn that there is already a band of American deserters and followers of the Army, to the number of about 100, now organized and operating in this way. They may have Mexicans connected with them, for all we know. Active measures have been taken to ferret them out, but as their places of rendezvous are in the mountains, they will be hard to break up, as a party large enough to destroy them could not move as fast as they can, and a small party they would be able to defeat, for there are some very desperate men among them.

Last evening, as the Rev Mr. McCarthy, Chaplain of the Army, was riding through one of the streets in this city, two leperos placed a pistol at his head and made him dismount, and then very quickly robbed him of his watch, all the money he had in his pockets, and his horse. Shortly after Lt. French came along the same place, and they attempted the same thing with him, but with not so much success—he drew his sabre and soon extricated himself.

RW48v25i37p2c5, May 9, 1848: From the N O Mercury, May 1. Prospects of Peace.

There is much reason to fear that it would be impossible to assemble a quorum of the Mexican Congress at the seat of Government. The absentees arrive very slowly.

The Arco Iris, of the 20th ult. says that at a preparatory meeting of Deputies held at Queretaro, on the 10th ult. it was resolved—

1. That those Deputies who were not present should be called upon, and if they still continued to absent themselves, the Governor of the States from which they were elected should be informed, and they should be published in all the newspapers.
2. That those gentlemen who answered the first call should be again written to, informing them that the number necessary to form a quorum is very small, only their presence being necessary to complete it.
3. That, the substitute who was appointed from Vera Cruz, is place of Sr. Conto, who was elected Senator, be notified.
4. That the substitute for Sr. Solana from Jalisco, who was chosen to represent Zacatecan, be also called upon.

The same paper of the 17th ult says: “Various persons write to us from Queretaro that the disorders committed by the officers are insufferable, and the soldiers have become so infected with their pronunciamento mania, that a certain very well known general, who possesses the confidence of the government asserts, that as soon as the Yankees have left, he will pronounce against the Federation.”

FROM GUATEMALA, YUCATAN, ECUADOR, &c.—A letter from Merida, dated March 21st says:

“Yesterday the Spanish corvette Luisa Fernanda arrived at Sisal. Three other vessels of war, belonging to the same nation, arrived with her. We have received the guns, cannon, powder, and everything we expected, excepting the $200,000, which it was not possible for the authorities of Havana to land us.”
Another letter in the same paper, from Campeachy, dated April 9th, contains the following:

"Concerning the unfortunate condition of our country, I can only tell you that yesterday the schooner Aparecida arrived here from New Orleans. She brings information that the government at Washington had ordered Commodore Perry to this point, with some troops, in order to save those points which have not yet fallen into the power of the Indians, who still continue their advance upon the capital, committing the most outrageous acts of barbarity."

GUATEMALA.—A treaty has been entered into between Great Britain and Guatemala. It was signed on the 22d of February.

Gen. Bustamente is taking measures to suppress the formidable insurrection of the Indians in the State of San Luis Potosi. A part of his division had marched against a large body of Indians who were concentrated at the town of Xichu, to which place they had retired, after having burned the town of San Diego del Biscocho.

Return of Mr. Trist and Gen.Cadwalader.

The steamships Augusta and Virginia left Vera Cruz on Saturday, the 22d inst. The Augusta came up to town, yesterday afternoon, while the Virginia, having got a drift log in one of her wheels, was obliged to come to anchor a Poverty Point, fifteen miles below the city. It is hardly probable that she will come up before our paper goes to press.

Gen. Cadwalader and Mr. Trist came over passengers on the Virginia, and will no doubt come up to town this morning. The great mail sent by the Virginia, but we received a package of letters and papers by the Augusta containing Vera Cruz papers to the 22d, and from the city of Mexico to the 15th. In another column we have given the twenty-sixth day's proceedings of the court of inquiry. We understand that the impression was that the court would not adjourn for three weeks, and that Gen. Scott would await its adjournment. The Star of the 15th says that he is in fine health.

The burden of the editorial articles in the Star is that there is yet no quorum of Congress at Queretaro. It is obvious from the Star's reiterated complaints that there is great fear lest no quorum should meet at all. We have not room to-day for its articles, but this is the burden of them.

Major Stewart, of the Pay Department, arrived in the city of Mexico on the 14th.

Paredes as late as the 11th inst. had not been arrested by the Mexican Government. He was still at San Luis, and, accosting to a letter in El Eco de Comercio, "taking up his residence with the different lawyers in the place." We hear nothing more of his designs.

There is no further news from Chihuahua.

The ship American sailed from Vera Cruz for this port on the 19th inst. with ninety-two sick soldiers in charge of Dr. Wright.

We gather some miscellaneous intelligence from the Vera Cruz papers.

The Senate was not in session to-day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Under the new rule, Mr. Go.. handed to the Clerk notice for a motion for leave to introduce a bill allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and to the Delegates from Territories, and appealing all other laws on the subject.

Mr. Rockwell of Conn. Offered a resolution for terminating the debate in Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Richard W. Monde, in two hours, after it shall again be taken up.

The motion was modified so as to read "Friday next, at 2 P. M." and then agreed to.
After some unimportant business, the House, in Committee, took up the bill for the relief of R. W. Monde, which was discussed until half past 2, when the House adjourned.

RW48v25i37p2c5 May 9, 1848: (From the True American of the 18th). Arrival of Gen. Cadwalader and Mr. Trist.

A train arrived yesterday from the city of Mexico. The escort was commanded as far as Jalapa by Lieut. Col Emery, and from Jalapa to this place by Major Gardner. The mounted escort was under the command of Lieut. Waters, of the Louisiana Volunteers.

Gen. Cadwalader and MR. Trist, framer of the treaty, accompanied the train.

On the road, near Passa la Vega, a Mexican reported to the commander of the escort that he had been robbed of some mules, and stated that the robbers were in the chaparral. Lieut. Hawkins dismounted ten of his men and started in search of the ruffians, and shortly afterwards returned with them, having surprised and taken them in the most admirable manner. They are now in custody.

This train left Mexico on the 7th inst. and on the 10th day after its departure arrived here.

A grand banquet was given in Vera Cruz the evening of the 16th inst. by the French residents and others in honor of the revolution in France. It is quite out of our power to give place to the enthusiastic proceedings. The Americans were to celebrate the same glorious event on the 22d inst.

The Free American remains of opinion that there is little prospect of peace. On the 19th its language is:

“We announced, a few days ago, that we had conversed with a gentleman from Mexico, who was of opinion that the members of Congress would not vote for the treaty as ratified at Washington. We have since seen two letters from influential men, one at Queretaro and the other at Mexico, who coincide with the opinion of the gentlemen in question. Another letter says that should the members of Congress violate the constitution of Mexico by ceding any part of the territory, the same members will have to ask the United States to leave a force of several thousand men to keep order in the Republic. The writer is of opinion that so soon as the American troops will embark for the United States, the Government will be overthrown, and new causes for war will be given to the United States by the turbulent people of this country.”

We regret to learn that Gen. Kearny has been seriously ill at Vera Cruz; at the same time we rejoice that he was pronounced out of danger and convalescent at last accounts.

The State of Mexico gives its voice for Gen. Herrera as President, he receiving 152 out of 166 votes.

There was a caucus of the members of Congress present at Queretaro on the 10th inst., at which resolutions were adopted to prevent members then present from afterwards absenting themselves, and to fill one or two seats made vacant by promotion or otherwise. It appeared that but few members were then wanting to form a quorum—but this is an old story.

The Congress of the State of Vera Cruz assembled this day; that of Puebla met on the 0th. D. Juan Mujica y Osorio was appointed Governor of the latter State.

There are 2000 Mexican troops in Queretaro, and yet on the 12th inst. a diligence was attacked within half a mile of the city by eight men. They fired upon the passengers, but the latter showed fight and killed one of the robbers. The passengers returned to town, however, lest they should be again attacked.

The Monitor Republicano of the 14th inst. says that, on the 10th, Gen. Bustamente was at the village of Dolores with a party of his division, while another portion had gone against the Indians of the village of Xichu, an insurrection of whom had become formidable. They had had the audacity, so confident were they in their numbers, to sack the village of San Diego del Biscocho.

RW48v25i37p4c1, May 9, 1848: The Locofoco Platform.

In little more than a fortnight the Democratic nominating Convention will assemble in the city of Baltimore; and, in anticipation of that event, to which of course the Democracy are looking forward with deep interest, the Washington Union republishes in part the famous Resolutions adopted at Baltimore in 1844, and urges their readoption in 1848, as its platform of action. The Union takes care to strike out the Oregon resolution—[the tragedy of Hamlet, with the character of Hamlet omitted “by particular desire.”] We are not surprised at this omission, since its re-publication would have been a stinging satire upon the termination of a controversy which, although it ought not to have constituted a party issue, was cunningly seized upon at Baltimore for the purpose of reconciling the non-slaveholding States to the “immediate” annexation of Texas. “Oregon and Texas” were made the twin-stems of a system of territorial extension—the one in the South and the other in the North—and it was hoped, by the adroit political managers who blended them at Baltimore, (and not without reason, as the result demonstrated,) that, by using this balance-pole, with Texas suspended at one end and Oregon at the other, a safe equip... might be found, and the sectional objections which might be fatal to each, of the questions were separated, be thereby successfully obviated. Thus, if n the North, it was objected that the annexation of Texas to the Union would add to the number of slaveholding States, the answer was at hand—the increase will be more than counterbalanced by the larger number of non-slaveholding State to be formed in Oregon—and vice versa. But the ligament that bound the Siamese twins at Baltimore was severed after the election of Mr. Polk. The joint resolution for the annexation of Texas indeed, had been passed by Congress and hurried off by express to the Executive of that Republic before Mr. Polk had been inaugurated; while the formidable power of Great Britain deterred that functionary from the trial of so summary an experiment in relation to Oregon. In the decision of the Texas question, negotiating the only constitutional process of acquiring foreign territory—if indeed the constitution prescribes any mode by which such territory may be added to the Union—was superseded by legislation: In the decision of the Oregon question, however, the Executive adhered, doubtless for sufficient reasons, to diplomatic arrangement. And the result was, as the country knows, that, instead of maintaining the ground taken in the Baltimore resolution, and from which he had given a solemn pledge not to deviate a hair’s breadth, because, as he declared, our title was “clear and unquestionable,” to all the territory claimed, President Polk surrendered to Great Britain all of it lying between the parallels of 49 and 54-40! We are not surprised, therefore, we repeat, that the Union, in the re-publication of the Baltimore resolutions, omitted that, which, if published, would have shown that its party had been faithless to at least one of the "principles" embodies in them, and its President false to the "pledge" he had given strictly to stick to the schedule.

But have the Democratic Party and its President been true to the great fundamental principles embodied in the Baltimore resolutions, and to many of which not a Whig in the Union would refuse to subscribe? So far from it it is, in part at least, because they have shamelessly violated those principles that we would expel them from power. Let us select a few of the most prominent, and bring these gentlemen to the test of comparison. The first great principle asserted by the Baltimore Convention, and in which we heartily concur, is in these words:

"1. That the federal government is one of limited powers, derived solely from the constitution, and the grants of power shown therein ought to be strictly construed by all the departments and agents of the government; and that it is inexpedient and dangerous to exercise doubtful constitutional powers."

Who denies this proposition? We venture to say that no politician, of any party in the United States, will refuse to give it his assent. But what mockery is it, in one who advocated the annexation of Texas, by a joint resolution of Congress, to prate about the strict construction of the constitution—or for a President who has usurped the war-making power, and who, since the war with Mexico began, has levied duties by a treasury order in Mexican ports, and expended the revenue so collected without the sanction of the law,—and who had organized territorial governments, by his own showing, both within and without the limits of the United States, and appointed legislative, judicial and executive officers without authority of law—what solemn mockery in him and his friends to talk about the danger of exercising doubtful constitutional powers!

The next proposition affirmed in the Baltimore resolutions is in this language:

"2. That the constitution does not confer upon the general government the power to commence and carry on a general system of internal improvements."

The President ha, we believe, faithfully conformed his action to this resolution. But has the Democratic party done so? We have heretofore shown that General Jackson and Mr. Van. Buren expended a muck (sic) larger sum for internal improvements than any President, before or since their time. But, besides this, how many of the members of Congress of that party voted for the River and Harbor Bills that Mr. Polk vetoed? Has not a large majority of that party, in the House of Representatives, at the present session, declared, by a solemn vote, that the constitution does confer upon Congress the very power which the Baltimore resolution denies to that body? Indeed, as if to render the contrast between the declared PRINCIPLES of this Democratic party and its ACTION more striking and vivid, we find, in the very same number of the Union in which the Baltimore resolutions are reproduced, an editorial synopsis of the proceedings of the Senate of the 3d instant, which we proceed to quote for the edification of those who put their trust in creeds and creed-makers. The Union’s Congressional synopsis says:

"On motion of Mr. Douglas, the Senate took up the bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way and a donation of public land for making a railroad connecting the Upper and Lower Mississippi with the chain of northern lakes at Chicago.

"This bill led to considerable discussion, in which <r. Douglas, Mr. Clarke. Mr. Niles, Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Bagby, Mr. Butler, Mr. Benton, Mr. Cass, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Foote, and others took part; when the question was taken by yeas and nays on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 11, as follows:

"YEAS—Messrs Allen, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benton, Borland, Breese, Bright, Cass, Clarke, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis of Mississippi, Douglas, Felen, Foote, Greene, Hanner, Johnson of Louisiana, Mangum, Spruance, Underwood and Westcott—24.
Of the 24 Senators who voted for this bill, which clearly recognizes the power of the General Government to make appropriations for internal improvements, 14 belong to the Democratic party, which, by their Baltimore resolution, has declared that Congress has no such power! And among them the people will see the name of Mr. CASS, perhaps the most prominent, next to Mr. Polk, of all the candidates for the nomination of the approaching Baltimore Convention, which is urged by the Union to re-adopt this same resolution! Why, do these political managers think that the people are fools, to be this gulled with pledges made in Convention, which are daily falsified in the Legislative Halls?

The next item of the Democratic creed is in these words:

"3. That the constitution does not confer authority upon the federal government, directly or indirectly, to assume the debts of the several States, contracted for local internal improvements, or other State purposes; nor would such assumption be just and expedient."

No one in this generation has proposed or suggested any such measure as is here condemned, or contends for the existence of the power in question. This article therefore is just as sound Whig doctrine as Democratic. It was thrown in, we suppose, merely by way of implication, that the opposite doctrine was maintained by the Whigs—though of course the author of it knew that there was no foundation for the insinuation.

But it is not our purpose to go through the entire creed; and we shall refer only to one more of its articles—which reads thus:

"5. That it is the duty of every branch of the government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised then is required to defray the necessary expenses of the government."

To this article the Whig party cordially subscribe; and one of the great objections to the present Administration is that it has not done its "duty" in this regard. On this point we shall call upon Mr. Calhoun to testify. In a late speech, that gentleman says, "We have gone forward with a rapidity in our expenditures, far, far, outrunning wither England, France, or any other country in the world. Mr. Monroe administered this government for eight years, terminating in 1825, at an annual cost not exceeding 12 millions of dollars. Twenty-three years have since elapsed, and our population has perhaps been doubled in that time. I suppose we may think ourselves fortunate if we can get along with an expense of thirty millions." [Mr. Calhoun, in this estimate, has reference only to the ordinary expenditures of the government, in time of peace, and leaves out of view the hundred millions worse than wasted in the Mexican war. Including the latter, Mr. C. said "the annual expenditures of the government are now nearly double as much when we had the war of 1812 on our hands."]

The people may judge from this contrast of Democratic professions with Democratic practices, of what value are political creeds, manufactured for the occasion by political conclaves, for the express purpose of gulping the million.—What man, among them all, considers himself bound to conform to these creeds, whether he be in private life or in a public station? What legislator ever has reference to them in his votes? Nay, what man among all those who gave their assent to these principles at Baltimore is 1844, remembered them the next hour? In one word, how can it be expected that a President or a Party will regard as of sacred obligation a string of resolutions written by nobody known who, end adopted without examination or reflection, when even a Constitution, framed under circumstances of peculiar solemnity, and every article and word of which was scanned with peculiar care, is daily violated without hesitation and without compunction?

Major Woods, 15th Infantry, recalled by the Prosecution.

By the Prosecution.

Q—Have you chanced to hold a conversation, or to have been present at one hold with Maj. Gen. Pillow, respecting a plan or plans of attack against Chapultepec, proposed by Maj. Gen's Pillow or Scott, in September last, respectively; and if so, state the substance of said conversation?

A—Gen. Pillow came to Chapultepec some time in November, or the first of December last. I was walking over the Castle with him and other officers. Whilst on the top of the building, on the end next to the city, I was pointing out to General Pillow that operation s of Colonel Garland's brigade on the north side of the Castle, as also the direction in which the enemy retreated from Chapultepec towards the city, and I think while expressing something of admiration of the plan by which that work was carried and put in execution, General Pillow asked me "if I was aware Q—Was the witness with the 5th Infantry on the 19th of August last? In what position was it before being ordered officers generally. I mean commanders of divisions and brigades.
A—Yes, sir, I understood that there were several present, and I supposed that he referred to commanding and other officers.
Q—Did the witness understand or not from Major Gen. Pillow, that the council was attended by many Generals that council, but am in doubt if I heard it from Gen. Pillow, and I understood that it was at the one held at Tacubaya, and other officers.
A—I don't know that I could state, I heard there were two or three held, and I suppose it must have been the one fixing the place of operations of Chapultepec. I think, however, he referred to a council that was held at Tacubaya. I am not certain that Gen. Pillow stated that it was at that one held at Tacubaya. I have heard much of that council, but am in doubt if I heard it from Gen. Pillow, and I understood that it was at the one held at Tacubaya, but I do not know that that was the one referred to.
Q—Did the witness understand or not from Major Gen. Pillow, that the council was attended by many Generals
A—Yes, sir, I understood that there were several present, and I supposed that he referred to commanding officers generally. I mean commanders of divisions and brigades.
Q—Was the witness with the 5th Infantry on the 19th of August last? In what position was it before being ordered across the pedregal, and by what superior orders was its position changed before being ordered across the pedregal?
A—I was with the 15th Infantry on the afternoon of the 9th; Col. Morgan was in command of it. The regiment was halted immediately at the base of the hill for some time, and I supposed by the orders of Gen. Pillow, as he was present. What time it remained there I am hardly able to say—from half an hour to an hour, I should think. The regiment was moved from that position to one near to a corn field, which was interposed near to the hill between it and the enemy's position, where it was again halted—both the movement and halt, I suppose, were by the command of Maj. Gen. Pillow, as he was the senior officer present, and the regiment belonged to his division. It remained there half an hour, and was again directed to move to the support of Gen. Cadwallader, who was occupying a position on the left of the enemy, and across a ravine. The order was given by Capt. Hooker, I think, to Col. Morgan.
Gen. Scott was then on the ground, and I have no idea where the order came from or emanated.
Q—Were the three orders to halt in the first and second positions and to cross the pedregal, all delivered by the same staff officer, or different staff officers?
A—I do not know who delivered the first two orders for the halt and movement. I only know that Captain Hooker delivered the order for the advance across the pedregal—Col. Morgan being in command of the regiment, he I presume. I know nothing but the fact that it was halted and set in motion.
Q—About what time had elapsed from the arrival of Gen. Scott at the position of Gen. Pillow upon the hill, before the regiment was again put in motion, by an order through Capt. Hooker?
A—I suppose the regiment remained 10 or 15 minutes, at least, after his arrival on the field. I think that one of his staff officers, who I presumed, arrived with him, passed me, and inquired for Brigadier Gen. Pierce; I directed him to the side of the cornfield, on the right of the road, by which the troops approached the enemy's position. I saw him go there, and not finding him, Gen. Pierce, he passed on around the cornfield, in the direction of the troops advanced, the time necessary for that, and some additional time elapsed from the time the regiment was put in motion.
Q—Was the regiment at a halt near the cornfield, when the staff officer of Maj. Gen. Scott passed the regiment;
did the witness see the same staff officer, on his return to said Scott, and was the regiment then at a halt?
A—I do not recollect seeing the staff officer on his return, and cannot say whether the regiment had moved before his return or not. I have stated the regiment was at a halt when he passed on his way to Gen. Pierce.
Q—Does the witness chance3 to know when the regiment was at the base of the hill, or after being halted near the cornfield, that any intimation was given, previous to the order communicated by Capt. Hooker, after it had taken that position, that the regiment would be required to support Gen. Cadwallader?

A— I know nothing of the matter; when we were halted in the second position, Col. Morgan remarked that the regiment was held in reserve, and I don't know that he had any intimation as to the direction in which it would move, nor did I hear him say that he had any intimation as to the direction in which it would move.

Q—Did witness chance to see or know anything of a personal combat between Maj Gen Pillow and an isolated Mexican officer or soldier, during any of the battles fought on the 19th and 20th of August last?

A—I did not, sir. I know nothing about it.

Questions by defence:

Q—What other officers were present during the conversation you have related, with Gen. Pillow?

A—Lieut. Tilton, the Adjutant of the Regiment, and also I think Capt. Hooker and Lieut. Ripley.

Q—In the actual assault upon Chapultepec, did Gen. Pillow say, that Gen. Scott left him to exercise his own judgment in the dispositions made for the assault of the work on the west side?

A—I don't recollect that Gen. Pillow made any special reference to that; if he did it has passed from my mind.

Q—After that part if the witness' statement, relative to the two Generals shaking hands, will he not recollect that Gen. Pillow said he had stated to Gen. Smith that his division would be obliged to carry a battery on the north side of the work, while Gen. Quitman's would be obliged to carry the batteries on the Tacubaya road, and thus two battles would have to be fought, and Chapultepec, at last, be assaulted, and did not Gen. Pillow ask why not assault at once?

A—I think the objections referred to in the two roads in the question, were the objections made to that mode of attack, but in reference to fighting the third battle, upon the attack upon Chapultepec, I will not say it was referred to by Gen. Pillow as stated by him. My impression was from the conversation, that the troops were to move on to the attack of the city. This impression, however, may have arisen from the expression of making Chapultepec feel its isolation, and as to the attack upon Chapultepec after the meeting of the two Generals, at the point referred to, I have now no recollection, but would be very unwilling to say that it was not named by Gen. Pillow—the phrase above used may have given me that idea of the plan proposed when it might have referred to the isolation of the Castle after the union of the two Generals, as it would be more easily carried.

Q—Did Gen. Pillow say that Gen. Scott had proposed his plan at a Council of War, or was that your supposition?—Did not Gen. Pillow say that the plan had been proposed at Tacubaya, when Gens. Pillow and Quitman, and a few other officers were present?

A—As to the place where these plans were suggested or proposed, it is supposition with me alone. I don't recollect that Gen. Pillow made direct reference as to at what council these remarks were made, but I inferred that it was at a council, and that it was held at Tacubaya. For the attack alone, I may say that is my impression from the fact alone, that he and others had objected to it. This is my present recollection, whether he referred to the place, and the persons present, I do not remember.

Q—Witness has said that the order given to the 15th Infantry through Capt. Hooker, was for the regiment to go forward and support Gen. Cadwallader. Is the witness clear that such was the order?

A—I don't recollect positively whether I heard it from Capt. Hooker when he delivered the order or from Col. Morgan; such, however, were the orders given, and when we crossed the Pedregal and passed the ravine, Col. Morgan halted his regiment and went and reported to Gen. Cadwallader.

Question by Prosecution—Does the witness now mean to say, on reflection, that he did not understand Gen. Pillow in the conversation referred to as speaking of a Council composed of a number of generals and of other officers.

A—I will state in answer to that, I don't recollect whether he stated positively a council or an assemblage of officers, or whether I inferred it from his conversation. It may be that I inferred it alone; my impression was that it was made in such an assembly, and I so repeated it.

Q—Is the witness clear that he understood from Gen. Pillow that the first step of Gen. Scott's plan was for the divisions of Pillow and Quitman to pass, the one to the north and the other by the Tacubaya road around the base of the hills, and should shake hands at this junction?

A—I am very certain that he made the remark that the two divisions were to pass on the two roads referred to—that this was a proposition on the part of Gen. Scott—but whether or not it was the first one, I don't recollect. It was the first step (my impressions were) towards an attack upon the City, not upon Chapultepec.

Question by Defence.—Does the witness mean to include the operations of the Artillery on the 12th, or that the
A—Well, I presume that this proposition was the first step towards the attack upon the city, without any attempt upon Chapultepec, further than clearing the out works of that castle, which would be obstructions to the passage. I suppose that was the first movement intended to be made by the Infantry; I do not know that any thing was said in reference to establishing batteries.

Capt. LEE recalled.

Q—What does the witness know of Maj. Gen. Scott’s plan of attack, on the Castle of Chapultepec on the 12th and 13th of September last, and was not the plan of attack, as executed by batteries and assaulted with scaling ladders, substantially the same as was executed on the 12th and 13th September last.

A—The plan executed, I believe, was substantially the one contemplated by Gen. Scott at the time that he proposed to attack it at the meeting at Piedad; he then, there, and at that time stated that after cannonading the work for one day that the work would be so shattered as to be abandoned by the enemy, or reduced to a state that they could be easily carried by assault. I recollect that on the 12th, after the batteries had been playing upon the Castle for some hours, and under cover of which I had reconnoitered the approaches to the building on the hill, in company with Lieut. Tower, Engineer, when Lieut. Beauregard came to me and said that Gen. Scott desired to see me. I returned with Lieuts. Beauregard and Tower to Tacubaya, and found Gen. Scott in the Plaza, in front of his quarters, who expressed much disappointment in not having seen me before—he said he had wished to know the effects of the cannonade upon the enemy’s works, that he might decide whether it would be better to assault the Castle that evening or the next morning—that he had directed storming parties to be organized from Generals Worth and Twiggs’ divisions and scaling ladders to be collected—that General Pillow was to attack from the direction of Molina del Rey, and Gen. Quitman along the Tacubaya road, and asked it the assault was postponed until the next morning whether the enemy, during the night, would not repair the damages sustained by the cannonade that day. I expressed my apprehensions that they would, and Lieutenant Tower joined me in the same apprehensions. General Scott said, then we must attack to-night or this evening, and turned towards his quarters. After Lieuts. Beauregard, Tower, and myself speaking of the necessary preparations, I followed Gen. Scott and told him that perhaps, upon the whole, the attack had better be delayed until next morning, for I feared there would be hardly time that evening. He readily assented, as he appeared to be more in favor of the morning attack. Lieuts. Beauregard, Tower, and myself then reported to him more in detail the result of our examination, and explained, by a diagram, the positions of our batteries and those of the enemy, and the approaches to the Castle of Chapultepec. He also (Gen. Scott,) went more fully into the plan of attack—said that he would direct Gen. Twiggs to renew the feint attack upon the San Antonio gate next morning at daylight, and the batteries against Chapultepec to resume their fire a short time afterwards, and after continuing it for one or more hours, to make the enemy believe that we were repeating the game of attack played that day, and at a concerted signal, which would be the cessation of the fire of the batteries, that the attacking columns would move to the assault of the hill.—Gen. Pillow would support one of the storming parties with one of his brigades, and with the other move on the road on the north-west side of Chapultepec to cut off any re-inforcements that might approach it from the city, and take in reverse the batteries on the Tacubaya road, while Gen. Quitman, with his division and the other storming party would make the attack on the south east side—that he had sent to desire Generals Pillow and Quitman to visit him that evening, and that he wished me to return at that time. I did return, and upon the arrival of Gen. Pillow I was called in to an inner room, where Gen. Scott desired me to explain the plan of attack of which he had spoken that afternoon, which I did.

Q—What did Gen. S. say to witness—if any thing concerning our batteries being able in the morning to reduce the garrison to its minimum, if it should be reinforced during the night?

A—He used that argument, among others, to show that we should not lose any thing by postponing the attack until next morning; and he added, moreover, that we should have the remainder of the day to take advantage of circumstances after carrying Chapultepec.

Q—Did the witness ever chance to hear Major General Scott say to Maj. Gins. Pillow and Quitman, or to any body else, that those Generals were to march around the hill of Chapultepec, and shake hands on meeting; or did the said Scott say at any time, to said Pillow or Quitman, or any body else, any thing subsequent to the meeting at Piedad, any thing which was a material modification of the plan substantially laid down at Piedad?

A—I do not recollect having heard General Scott say that Generals Pillow and Quitman were to march round Chapultepec. On the evening of the 12th, at his interview with Gen. Pillow, Gen. Scott said Gen. Pillow was to attack on the side of Molino del Rey, passing through those buildings and the wood or grove with one of his brigades, and assault the work along the ridge. I never heard Gen. S. say any thing contrary to the principles of the attack proposed by him at Piedad.

Q—Had or not the witness many official or other views with Maj. Gen. Scott, between the 7th and 12th of September last, and did the witness perceive any want of energy on the part of said Scott at that time, compared with any prior or subsequent period?

A—I had many interviews with Gen. Scott during that time, and did not perceive any want of energy; but on the contrary, he was very anxious and active in pushing the preparations, establishing depots and hospitals, preparatory to making the attack upon the city. I did not perceive any difference in his acts at that time and any other time during the campaign.
Questions by Defence:

Q—Witness will state if, after Gens. Pillow and Quitman arrived on the night of the 12th, Gen. Scott had not a rough diagram of Chapultepec lying on the table in the room where Gen Scott received those generals?

A—There was a diagram used at that interview, and was the one of which I have previously spoken. I don’t recollect that Gen. Quitman had arrived at that time.

Q—Did he (Gen. Scott) or yourself explain the diagram and Gen. Scott’s views of the movements of the two infantry divisions, to Gens. Pillow and Quitman?

A—I explained the diagram according to Gen. Scott’s request to Gen. Pillow, and the proposed movements of divisions, were also stated by me; Gen. Scott occasionally taking part in the conversation in reference to any particular point under discussion.

Q—Does not witness know that Gen. Scott suggested that Gen. Pillow should pass round Chapultepec, north of that work, and that Gen. Quitman should advance by the Tacubaya road; that the two major generals should shake hands upon their meeting, and thus make Chapultepec feel its isolation? Was not Gen. Pillow’s opposition to this plan expressed on the ground that it would be necessary to fight two battles, and that at last Chapultepec must be assaulted?

A—I recollect distinctly that Gen. Scott proposed that one of Gen. Pillow’s brigades should advance along the north western side of Chapultepec, passing through the grove at the foot of the hill. To this separation of his division Gen. Pillow did object and stated that if Gen. Scott would allow him to make the attack upon the Castle of Chapultepec, with his whole division, that he thought he could answer for the result; but if his division was separated; as he could be with only one brigade, he could not. Gen. Scott then assented that he should make the attack upon Chapultepec with his whole division. The only difference of opinion on this point, that I recollect, between Gens. Scott and Pillow, was, that the former considered one brigade sufficient to carry Chapultepec, whereas the latter desired both, as I have stated before. I do not recollect that Gen Scott desired the divisions of Gens. Pillow and Quitman to pass around Chapultepec.

Q—Did witness hear anything of Generals Pillow and Quitman shaking hands, and making Chapultepec feel its isolation?

A—I do not recollect either that that expression was used, or that that entered into the plan.

Q—Did he hear nothing of the remark of Gen. Pillow, why fight three battles instead of one?

A—I don’t recollect anything of those expressions, or anything like it, at this length of time; I can only recollect the substance or impression made by conversations, but not expressions. I don’t mean to say that I do not recollect the substance of conversations, for I do, distinctly, but I mean I cannot recollect particularly the expressions of individuals.

Q—Does not the witness know that Gen. Pillow did himself voluntarily send two of his regiments, the 11th and 15th, around by the north, and may not, therefore, the witness doubt his memory, as to the points stated?

A—I have seen in his report that a part of his command did advance on that road; I did not know it at the time he made the attack upon Chapultepec; when he, Gen. P. made that attack, I saw a force left in the Molino del Rey, which I supposed was a guard to Magruder’s field battery, and this was the force that subsequently advanced on the road on the North West side, of Chapultepec. I think I have a distinct recollection of a difference of opinion between Gens. Scott and Pillow as regards the movements of the two brigades of this division.

Q—Does the witness know that the 12th Infantry, another regiment of Gen. Pillow’s division, was left at Miscoac?

A—I did not know it.

Question by Gen. Scott, but withdrawn.

Court then adjourned to 9 A. M., Monday.

TWENTY-SECOND DAY—April 10, 1848.

The Court met pursuant to adjournment, and the proceedings were read over by the Judge Advocate.

Col. Riley, 2d Infantry, duly sworn.

Questions by Defence.—Was the witness upon the battlefield of Contreras on the 19th of August last. If so, he will state his movements of that day?

A—I was upon the battle-field of Contreras on the 19th of August last. After Gen. Twiggs' division joined Gen.
Pillow's division in front of the enemy's works, Gen. Pillow road up and gave me two or three orders to move a little to the right, and then a little to the left, and then to move forward. Gen. Pillow gave me an order to cross the Pedregal. I asked if Gen. Twiggs knew of the order, and he said that he did; that he had sent the order to him. I think the order was, as near as I can recollect, to cross the Pedregal, turn the enemy's left, and he would support me. We were scarcely done speaking, when Lieut. Brooks, Adj't General of Twiggs' division, camp up and gave me a similar order. I executed the order, and did not see Gen. Pillow again that day.

Q—Where was witness when the order spoken of was delivered; and where was witness' command when Lieut.
Brooks delivered the order?

A—I was on the left flank of my brigade, near some trees. The command was in position near the cornfield near the Pedregal, and when Lieut. Brooks, gave me the order it had not moved. I had told Gen. Pillow previously, that it had moved, but upon a reference I found that it had not moved.

Q—When witness asked Gen. Pillow whether General Twiggs knew of the order, did not Gen. Pillow reply that he had given the same order to Gen. Twiggs, and that he would probably meet Gen. Twiggs about the cornfield, but that if he did not, witness would go forward with his command and execute the movement?

A—I said so in my former testimony. He did tell me that I would meet with Gen. Twiggs in or about the cornfield, but that if I did not meet him, to go forward and execute the movement.

Q—Does witness recollect that Gen. Pillow pointed out any object in or about the village of Ensaldo, and directed him to make that object his guide? If so, what was that object?

A—I don't recollect of any observation of that kind.

Q—Did witness see and understand from the position of Gen Smith's brigade, and from the explanation and orders given him, witness, relative to his own movements that it was intended to gain the enemy's left and rear, and with what object?

A—Gen. Smith's brigade had moved off, I understood, to support Magruder's Battery. I never heard anything of the attack on Contreras, how it was to be made, or of any thing of the kind at that time. I supposed I was sent across to cut off the retreat of the enemy and prevent reinforcements coming from the city; it was a supposition of my own at the time; I never had any explanation given to me.

Q—Where was Magruder's Battery placed in position? Was it in front of the enemy's entrenched camp?

A—I thought it was in front from the firing; I was not near it, but I thought it was in front or nearly so?

Q—Did witness pass the Pedregal; pass through the village, and engage the enemy's cavalry in several conflicts?
If so, why did he pass the village, &c., except with the object to gain and assault the enemy's rear?

A—I did pass the Pedregal and the village, and did engage the enemy in the first instance in front of the village, between the village and the city. I attacked the Lancers and drove them from their position on to the plain, not in rear of the entrenched camp, but a little to its left and rear. I passed through the village with a view of reconnoitering the rear of the enemy's works, and kept them busy with a view of preventing them from interfering with any reconnaissance; I was not endeavoring to gain their rear with a view to assault. My reason for passing forward was, I was chasing the enemy.

Q—What was the object in making a reconnaissance, unless with a view of ascertaining the practicability of an assault in rear? Or, with what view?

A—My object was to get as much information as I could for my commanding General, without knowing when or where he was going to make the general attack.

Q—If witness had ascertained that an assault upon the rear was practicable, and had been supported, would he have assaulted that work on the 19th August?

A—I should.

Q—Was it possible, under the circumstances, to have given minute and detailed instructions to you, applicable to the movement of your command, and did not, therefore, of necessity, great latitude of discretion devolve upon you in the execution of your instructions?

A—I can't answer the first part of the question. I do not know that it was possible to give me instructions. I now nothing of any plan whatever, and I always assume responsibility when by so doing I can serve my country.—Not very great latitude of discretion, for when I am looked over by a superior officer, he is the responsible person; when I am in command I then exercise discretion.

Q—Did witness or not ascertain from reconnoissances that an assault was practicable, and did not witness make such report to Brig. Gen. Smith?

A—I did discover that it was practicable and the best possible place to attack the works at Contreras, and I did cause it to be reported by Lieut. Tower, Engineers, to Gen. Smith, that same evening about sundown.

Q—Did witness, on the 19th, have a knowledge that Gen. Cadwalader with four regiments was in the villages shortly after witness left it, for the purpose of supporting witness, and that he was only prevented by a large body of the enemy's reinforcements?

A—I never knew there was a soul belonging to the army in the village, until I was returning to make a camp for the night, and consequently did not know that he was stopped by a large force of the enemy. If I had known it I should have attacked the entrenched camp at Contreras that evening, on my own responsibility.

Q—Whilst witness' brigade was passing the Pedregal, did any order overtake him to return, and from whom did such order come?

A—No order reached me to return, and I never heard of such order until after the battle next day, when I heard that an order of recall had been sent after me.

Q—What other orders during that day had witness received from any Maj. General relative to movements upon the enemy?

A—None whatever to the best of my recollection.

Q—Had or not any order, oral or written, been received by witness from General Head Quarters directly, or through Brig. Gen. Twiggs, relative to operations against the enemy on the 19th of August?

A—General Order, No. 258, was read to me at San Augustin, either by a staff officer of Gen. Scott, or of Gen. Twiggs. He, the staff officer, said he had not time to copy it—when I say read to me, I mean it was read to brigade and regimental commanders.

Q—Had or not, the order so read nay bearing on the operations which followed, relative to gaining the village, or San Angel road?

A—The order was to make ready intrenching tools, wagons, &c.; that Pillow's division was to move forward and Twiggs to support it, to gain the San Angel road, I think was the expression used. All of which I think bore against the operations of the enemy—every part of it.

Q—When witness, late in the evening of the 19th of August met Gen. Cadwallader and Gen. Smith, did he inform either of them that he had been ordered by Gen. Pillow to move against the enemy's left?

A—I did not. I had forgotten entirely that Gen. Pillow gave me the order at all, until he refreshed my memory afterwards in this city, by the circumstance of recalling my question—p"Did Gen. Twiggs know of the order?"—I said he did not give me any orders.

Q—When was the witness first reminded in person, by Maj. Gen. Pillow, that he had given him an order to pass the Pedregal; where and under what circumstances; and was witness then requested by Maj. Gen. Pillow, to give a written statement of his revived recollections?

A—At his house in this city, shortly after we got in the city—I don't recollect the date.

A—I think I was sent for by Gen. Pillow, and he revived my recollection by the circumstance already cited, and he did propound questions to me in writing some time after, though not on that occasion; and I believe I answered them in writing.

Q—From all that witness saw and knew on the subject, was, or was not, the plan of operations or attacks executed against Valencia's camp, on the morning of the 20th, the same given by Major General Pillow, or the same as that pointed out in general instructions from general headquarters?

Motions submitted by both parties as follows:

Maj. Gen. Pillow objects to the question last propounded by the prosecution in the case, because it calls for no fact or statement of the parties, but calls for the opinions of witnesses about the identity of two movements, which the Court (and not the witness) must determine from all the facts in evidence in the record before it.

This question—calling for witness’ opinion—is equivalent to asking the witness in general terms if defendant is guilty of the 3d Specification, 2d Charge, the very point which the Court is ordered to investigate and report to the Government, not from the opinion of the witness, but from all the opinions in the cases. The objection is not the opinion of this witness, but to that of any witness upon this point. The testimony is illegal as evidence.

After the reply in part was read, Gen. Pillow asked to add a few lines as follows:

Professional opinions upon matters of science are always competent, but professional men cannot be called upon to give opinions about matters of FACT, or the IDENTITY OF FACTS, any more than other witnesses. The witness can never be called upon for his opinion as to the TRUTH OF CHARGES DEPENDING UPON FACTS: This must be shown by the FACTS THEMSELVES, and the Court from these facts, must FIND the truth of the charges. [Signed.] Gid. J. Pillow.

To the objection of the defendant the prosecutor briefly replies—

1. PROFESSIONAL opinion is always good evidence to be heard by any tribunal, not as concluding the matter under investigation, but to aid the judgment of the Court.

2. The defence has several times, without objection from any quarter, asked directly or indirectly for the opinions, impressions and judgment of witnesses, and

3. The question under consideration, asks the witness to speak from what he said and knew.

To the remarks the defendant has been allowed to add to his objection to the interrogatory since the above reply was written, the prosecutor asks leave to add.

The witness has spoken of the facts of the case, so far as he has been interrogated, and he is now asked by the prosecutor to give his opinions on those facts.

In questions touching any mechanical or scientific department of business, person skilled in such pursuits are often called by the parties to give an opinion, and war is a science to the learned, and a trade to others. Respectfully submitted, [Signed] In Court, April 10th, 1848. WINFIELD SCOTT

The Court decided the question should be put, and the witness should answer, so far as any facts within the witness’ knowledge led him to form an opinion.

A—As Gen. Pillow never gave me any instructions, I cannot say. I always conceived that any and every order from General Headquarters has a bearing upon the movements of an army. I don’t know that I can state positively any thing farther in answer to the question; I know nothing of any instructions from General Headquarters farther than I have already stated.

Q—At the interview with Maj. Gen. Pillow at his quarters, referred to by witness, did Maj. Gen. Pillow, in the act of writing his questions to witness, inform him that he had recommended witness for a brevet, or that he would recommend him, and if he had recommended him, did witness read the letter?

A—Not at that time; some time before. I had spoken to him on that subject, and he read me a passage of a letter on that subject. It was not recommending me for a brevet, but that in case I was recommended, a certain date should be affixed to the brevet.

Q—TO whom was the letter Maj. Gen. Pillow read addressed, and did not the letter read contain commendations of the witness?

A—I did not see the direction, but I think he told me it was addressed to Mr. Polk. I do not think he read to me any commendations of myself, but merely asking the President to affix a certain date, that of Cerro Gordo. I think that was what he read to me.

Q—Was the witness under the command of Maj. Gen. Pillow at the time; and if not, why did he apply to him rather than to his actual commander?

The court said they could not perceive the object in putting the question.

Gen. Scott said that he begged the court would turn to the testimony of the case of Col. Hitchcock.

Gen. Pillow said that he had stated his desire to impeach the testimony of Col. Hitchcock; if Gen. Scott desired to impeach the testimony of this witness, very well.
Gen. Scott said, God forbid that I should attempt to impeach the testimony of this witness or his character, wither for truth, honesty, or bravery and prowess before the enemy; but, he added, he had strong reasons for putting the question, and by permission of the court, he would put them in writing; he had no fear of nay one at Washington in stating them.

The Court said the question was decided not to be put, was an improper one, and those remarks were improper, particularly in respect to one person.

Gen. Scott replied—He had said before that he would treat this Court with the same respect that he would treat three Field Marshals, but with no more; and where he thought the rights of the Prosecution trenched upon he would proclaim it, with equal freedom, before fifty Field Marshals.

Q—About what time elapsed between the witness' two interviews with Maj. Gen. Pillow mentioned, viz: that relative to brevet, and that relative to the written questions and answers, and was witness sent for on both occasions, by Gen. Pillow, and did the witness belong to Gen. Pillow's division?

A—I do know I was sent for as to the questions; whether I was sent for as to the first, the brevet, I do not know. I did not belong to Gen. Pillow's division. I was sent for several times, several weeks elapsed between these interviews.

Q—How long was it after Valencia's entrenched camp was carried, before witness first saw Gen. Pillow that morning?

A—Between half an hour, and an hour after the camp was carried, was the first I saw of Gen. Pillow after the 19th.

Q—On meeting Maj. Gen. Pillow that morning did he then claim to have given the plan of attack, which had been so successfully executed?

A—He did not.

Q—By whose order was the brigade of witness put in motion, after the entrenched camp had been carried, and again from Coyoucan, to support Twiggs and Smith?

A—By Gen. Scott in person.

Question by the Defence.—At the time Gen. Pillow first showed you the letter relative to a brevet, state whether any question had arisen relative to the orders above detailed, and whether Gen. Pillow then had any difficulty with Gen. Scott?

A—I do not recollect the conversation between Gen. Pillow and myself. I had some conversation at that time; there was no difficulty that I recollect of between Gens. Pillow and Scott. I knew of no controversy about the order at that time.

Q—Was the passage in Gen. Pillow's letter a simple reference to the service of Riley's brigade, or to the proceedings of a Court of Inquiry held at Puebla, and Gen. Pillow's opinion that if a brevet were given, it should date from Cerro Gordo; and was this done at the request of witness?

A—That was at my request, and there was nothing more read to me than the reasons Gen. Pillow gave from my statement as to why I should be brevetted from Cerro Gordo.

Q—Will witness state if he was not some distance towards the mountain when Gen. Pillow came to the camp; and did not witness first see Gen. Pillow within the camp?

A—Gen. Pillow, I think, was in the camp when I first saw him; I was in the camp; I had just come from towards the mountains, where, I understood, there was a flag. I had directed it to be brought to me, and after a few words, as I understood, he went and received the flag.

Q—Witness has been asked if, on the 20th of August, Gen. Pillow claimed the orders under which the battle was won. Witness will state whether anything was said on the subject?

A—I don't think there was at that time. I don't recollect.

Lieut. Col. SAVAGE, 11th Infantry, duly sworn:

Questions by Defence.—To what corps did witness belong on the 19th of August last, and state whether witness was on the battle-field that day?

A—I was Major in the 14th Infantry, which was part of Gen. Cadwallader's brigade. I was present on the battle-
Q—Did witness hear the orders given by Maj. Gen. Pillow on the 19th of August last, and to Gen. Cadwallader; and if so, state what those orders were?

A—My regiment had been halted on the side of the hill in front of the enemy’s works. I observed a group of officers on the side of the hill nearest the enemy; I left my regiment and approached them; Gen. Pillow was among them, and I think Gen. Cadwallader; a few moments after, I approached where Gen. Pillow was standing; an officer on horse-back rode up from the direction which Gen. Cadwallader’s brigade too through the Pedregal. He said to Gen. Pillow that he had been unable to overtake Col. Riley.—A conversation then ensued between Gen. Pillow and the officer near him; the particular words of which I do not think I could at present recall. The course of Col. Riley’s march was pointed out by Gen. Pillow, and I understood from this conversation that Col. Riley was to turn the enemy’s left and gain his rear. I could not say whether Gen. Pillow said that he had directed Col. Riley to do this, or that Col. Riley had been directed to so it. Gen. Pillow immediately gave orders for the marching of Gen. Cadwallader’s brigade to the support of Col. Riley, and in a few minutes I joined my regiment.

QUESTIONS BY PROSECUTION—Were not the orders given to Gen. Cadwallader made dependent upon those given to Riley, and if the latter had been recalled or returned, would the former have stood fast, or returned also?

A—I can only give my impression, which may be correct or incorrect. My understanding was that we were to support Col. Riley, and of course our action was dependent upon his, and I examined several times for Col. Riley’s trace in crossing the Pedregal—thinking that we had been ordered to take the same march that he had taken.

Q—Did the witness chance to see or know of any personal combat on the 19th or 20th of August last, in or about any battle-fields of those days, between Maj. Gen. Pillow and any Mexican officer or soldier?

A—I did not see or know of one on or about the battle-field of the 19th and 20th of August last, and further I never heard of one until months afterward.

Lieut. J. R. BENNETT, 15th Infantry.

Question by Defence—Were you on the battle-field on the 19th of August last; to what regiment were you attached, and who was its commander?

A—I was attached to the 15th Infantry commanded by Col. Morgan, and was on the battle-field.

Q—Witness will state what he knows about the movements of the 15th Infantry across the Pedregal on the 19th of August; who gave the order; at what time the movement was made, and time of the arrival of Gen. Scott upon the ground? Who delivered the orders to the regiment?

A—the regiment was halted first in the wheat-field on the edge of the Pedregal, which intervened between us and the enemy, probably for half an hour. There was then an order came from Gen. Pillow—understood at the time given by Capt. Hooker. This order I understood was to move across the Pedregal. We moved down to the cornfield near the point where we were to start across, and we had to halt there for a few moments. This halt I understood was made because the troops in our advance had not got sufficiently out of the way to let our regiment move on.—Our regiment was there for a few minutes, as I mentioned before. At the end of that time the advance commenced moving, an while moving I heard cheers given by the Dragoons in the rear, and looked and saw that Gen. Scott had arrived on the side of the hill, where they were cheering. I was in the rear company of our regiment. I would add, Capt. Hooker had ridden towards Gen. Scott; at least he went that way.

Q—In what manner did the regiment move across the Pedregal? Did it march by flank or columns? State also whether the difficulties of the ground did not oblige the rear to wait upon the front some time?

A—It marched by the flank, and by the time we got over we had become exceedingly scattered. Sometimes we were twenty or thirty yards apart. The rear had to wait nearly fifteen minutes on the advance at starting.—My memory is very fresh in regard to moving across. I never was so tired in my life before, moving the same distance, and never was in a place so rough for the same distance.

Q—Witness has spoken of the regiment being halted some time in the wheat filed? Was or not the regiment again moved and halted before being approached to the Pedregal, and was it at the second halt where the order was given to cross?

A—It was at the second place of halting. We halted a third time, but only for troops in front to get out of the way. Capt. Hooker kept along with us until Gen. Scott got on the field and showed us where to start across the Pedregal.

I beg, Mr. President, the attention of the Court to the addition of words to the answers of witnesses, and beg to refer the Court to the passage on its record in reference to prompting witnesses when speaking to the Judge Advocate.

Q—Did Capt. Hooker deliver the order to cross the pedregal before or after you heard the cheering and saw Gen.
Scott; state also where Gen. Scott was when you heard the cheering—was he at the base of the hill, or ascending the hill?

A—He was near the foot of the hill, near the Dragoons, who were in the wheat field; he was moving towards the hill about twenty yards from the Dragoons.

Q—Was the witness in the assault upon Chapultepec—if so state what he knows about General Pillow being wounded; what assistance he got; where was his command? State also what kind of shot wounded General Pillow?

A—I was in the storming of Chapultepec in the 15th Infantry. The Voltigeurs 9th, and 15th Infantry were formed inside of the walls of Molina del Rey, under the orders of Gen. Pillow in person. Gen. Pillow led the three regiments to the advance on Chapultepec through the bottom in about half way of the bottom-land on consequence of its being so muddy, he had to dismount and march with the advance on foot, near the bottom of the hill he ordered a charge on a small fortification on the side of the hill, some twenty yards up while about half way to that charge, he was stepping or rather jumping across a mud hole, and had just arrived on the opposite side, and I myself jumped across immediately after him, and was about to loose my balance, and while in the act of recovering myself, with my right hand on his left shoulder, he was struck by a canister shot, which shot struck a limb in a tree, broke it off and glanced and struck him; I heard the ball hit him and discovered from the appearance of his complexion and face that he was about to fall; I slipped my hand from his shoulder to his back and prevented him from falling, and assisted him to near the root of a tree, and while he was moving towards the tree with my assistance and one other man, he spoke out as loud as he could and ordered the charge, still I laid him near the tree, and by this time some other officer or some men that I had called came to him, and he ordered me to leave him and move on to my company as fast as possible.

That Court then adjourned until 9 o’clock to-morrow.

U.S. Senate

Mr. Hannegan, chairman of the committee on Foreign Relation, reported a bill to enable the President to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan—to employ the army and navy of the United States for that purpose, and to repress the incursions of the savages against the white population of that country—to furnish the white population with arms, ammunition, &c., to repel the attacks of the Indians—and to authorize the raising of additional volunteers, equal in number to replace the troops withdrawn from other portions of the service, for this service in Yucatan.

The bill was twice read, and Mr. Hannegan moved that it be made the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. Calhoun thought the day named too early—more time should be given for reflection. He proposed Monday next.

Mr. Hannegan said it was important that this bill should be acted upon without delay. A day or an hour might be productive of calamitous consequences to the people of Yucatan. HE had seen letters from Lieut. Murray M__ [illegible], now in the Gulf, stating that the whole coast was darkened with women and children, without food or clothing.

Mr. Cass also was in favor of prompt action. Never better occasion presented for them to vindicate before the world the character of the Nation.

Mr. Foote expressed his strongest surprise at the effort to procrastinate action on this bill.

Mr. Calhoun saw enough in the message to require from this body the most deliberate candor. The Executive had been in no hurry, if he had taken from the 7th of March down to the date of the message, to make up his mind on the subject; surely two or three days would not be considered too long for reflection upon the subject. In his remarks the other day he had simply expressed his regret that the President should have mixed up a mere question of humanity with other subjects of high political consideration.

Mr. Foote said that the Senator himself had also mixed up with the subject, another, of high political consideration; he referred to the present was with Mexico, and declared that he had hoped its results had taught the President a lesson—this war which the Senator said had cost the country 30,000lives—a war brought on, in a great measure, by the act of the annexation of Texas—a measure necessary for the protection of the South and of Southern interests—for which the Administration, of which the Senator was then a prominent member, was mainly responsible. In regard to the movement of the army from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande, he had believed that Gen. Taylor would, with some of Jackson’s independence of character, assume the responsibility of his own acts. And he now had it from an authentic source, that Gen. Taylor, scorning to skulk, had assumed such responsibility.
The Senator from South Carolina, he must be permitted to tell him, occupied a peculiar position before the country, on subjects of this kind. The Senator he believed, had once been in favor of a National Bank, and many other measures to which it was not necessary to refer. It has been boasted by some of his friends, too, that he was the father of the system of internal improvements. He said these things with no unkind feelings, but to show that he should be more circumspect in his declarations, when he is himself responsible, to a great extent, for the consequences to which he refers.

The great issues of the campaign of 1844 were furnished by that Senator. We had placed a man in the Presidential chair upon those issues, and who had successfully and gloriously carried out the great principles for which the Senator had contended. Yet who had ever heard him commend the Administration. He had sometimes acted with them, but he had generally been among the first to give the administration a thrust under the fifth rib.

Why had it been he would ask the Senator? Had it been that the Senator had not girded on his armor in defence of the administration—an administration which had secured upon the pages of history a name more glorious than even any administration which had preceded it—one of the wisest, so far as its measures were concerned, ever known in this country?

Why was he seen surrounded after these attacks upon the Administration, by high minded and honorable Senators of the other side, with their warm congratulations? He hoped he would do himself justice before the close of the debate, and take the lead in support of this bill.

Mr. Calhoun denied that he had opposed any measure of the Administration which he deemed right, those only of any Administration did he support. It had been agreed on all hands, Mr. Polk included, that the annexation of Texas was just cause for war on the part of Mexico.

He denied that the present war necessarily grew out of it, and contended that it might have been avoided, annexation notwithstanding. He took his seat in this body with reluctance, and with a sincere desire to give the Administration of Mr. Polk a fair support. He had endeavors to perform his duty faithfully, and if he had failed, it was a question to be settled with his own conscience.

Mr. Hale said that he had been charged with being a fanatic for declaring that the war had grown out of the annexation of Texas. He was happy to have it in his power whenever again so charged, to call the Senator from Mississippi to the stand, and declare upon the responsibility of his Senatorial oath, that this war grew out of the annexation of Texas, a measure necessary for the protection of the south. It did not come this time from fanatics, but from one of the faithful, one of the sachems of the tribe.

Mr. Cass said the question was merely whether the bill should be considered to-morrow or at a later day. He thought that is any thing was to be done, it should be done speedily. The delay on the part of the administration had been occasioned by their efforts to obtain correct and official information. That information had now been obtained and was before them. By delay they would be able to obtain nothing further. Then why delay? He had regretted the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina in regard to what he had characterized this wretched war.

Mr. Calhoun. This rash and precipitate war.

Mr. Cass. He begged the Senator's pardon, but his expression had been so quoted here this morning, without contradiction, by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. Calhoun. I did not consider it necessary to contradict what that Senator said.

Mr. Foot retorted, but his remark was not distinctly heard.

Mr. Cass proceeded, chiefly on the cause of the war, and insisting that, from all the information before them,—from the declarations at the time of Mexico herself—was a cause of the war; though he said as now universally admitted, no just cause of war.

Mr. Calhoun replied to the remarks of Mr. Cass, the question of boundary being introduced, and Mr. Cass rejoined.

Mr. Hannegan said the object of his motion was proper action, but he debate to day was the poorest illustration of prompt action he had ever known. The question of the annexation of Texas having nothing to do with the subject, had been dragged in, as it always unfortunately was on almost every great measure emanating from the Administration. The motives which had induced him to move the consideration of the bill to-morrow, were better expressed in the concluding portion of Mr. Sierra’s letter than they could be by any thing which he could say. He read the extract, showing the condition of the white population of Yucatan, and expressed his wish that the question should at once be taken on his motion.

Mr. Niles followed. He was wholly unprepared to act now upon a bill involving such great principles—principles entirely new—he desired time to examine the documents. It was not merely a bill involving the question of affording temporary relief, but one of far greater and more vital importance connected with the policy of the country. He was not disposed to act under the "whip and spur"—they should not act without giving the subject all the consideration which its importance demands.

The question was then taken successively, on motion to postpone until Saturday, and until Monday, and rejected. Mr. Hannegan’s motion then prevailed, and the bill was made the special order for to-morrow.

One or two bills, not of public importance, were passed, several petitions and memorials presented, a great number of bills from the House read twice and referred; and a resolution, offered by Mr. Calhoun, adopted calling on the President for all the correspondence between Mr. Sierra and the Secretary of State. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Murphy reported a bill to regulate the exchange of certain documents and other publications by Congress.—Read twice and referred.

Mr. Grinnell, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to admit certain articles, the growth or production of Canada, free of duty, on condition that similar articles be also admitted into Canada free of duty. Read twice and referred.

Mr. Collamer introduced a resolution, which was adopted, directing the printing for the use of the House of a map of the public lands, showing the amount surveyed and the amount sold.

Mr. Goggin, from the Committee on Post Offices and Postroads, reported a bill to regulate the postage on newspapers and for other purposes. Read twice and referred.

Mr. Jones of Tennessee, from the same Committee, reported back the bill for making permanent arrangements for the transportation of the mails by the steamboats and railroads in the United States, with a recommendation that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof. Mr. Tompkins of Mississippi moved a reference of the bill to a Select Committee. The subject was one of great importance, and he desired that a Report should be made and go forth to the people. The reference to a Select Committee after some debate, was accordingly ordered.

Mr. Burt, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to establish two National Foundries and a National Armory, the sites to be determined by a Board of Examiners. Read twice and referred.

Mr. King, of Georgia, from the same Committee, reported a bill to establish a line of war steamers from Monterey or San Francisco, California, and the Sandwich Islands, and also from Monterey or San Francisco to Shanghai and Canton, China. Read twice and referred.

The bill repealing the section of the act creating an additional number of general officers, which requires that the number of Generals at the close of the was shall be reduced to one Major General and two Brigadier Generals, to be selected by the President without regard to priority of commissions, was taken up and passed.

Several Executive communications on the Speaker’s table were read, referred, and ordered to be printed.

The Rosolation of thanks to Maj. Gen. Taylor, was taken up, and the amendment of Senate was agreed to.

The bill providing for an additional number of examiners in the Patent office was taken up, the House insisted upon its amendment, and a committee of conference was asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

A great number of bills from the Senate were read a first and second time and passed.

Adjourned.

RW48v25i38p1c1, May 12, 1848: General Scott.

The arrival of this distinguished officer in the United States, fresh from a dozen fields, in all of which his genius and valor have triumphed over the combined forces of climate, natural impediments and immensely superior numbers, is calculated to call up mournful reflection in the bosom of every man who loves his country and would fain respect its rulers. The hearts of the people, it is true, are in the right place, and all that respect and admiration can dictate, he will receive from them. But his Government that Government which he has so long and so faithfully served, have prepared no triumph—have not even ordered an ovation. As far as it could effect it, he returns home a disgraced man! Such is the gratitude of rulers, and so entirely correct was Strafford, who exclaimed, when he found that after all his services, Charles I had signed his death-warrant, in the emphatic language of Scripture, “put not your faith in princes, neither in the great ones of the earth.”

We said that the arrival of General Scott, under these circumstances, is calculated to call up mournful reflections in every lover of his country. Not, however, on his account. He cannot be hurt; and for Mr. Polk and such as he to assail his lofty reputation, is an act about equal, in point of wisdom, to that which John Randolph once compared to assailing the rock of Gibraltar with a pocket pistol. True, we doubt not, that had they but the power, they would not lack the disposition to crush him. But every patriot must feel mortified and humiliated that the Chief Executive office should be in the hands of a man who could feel it is his heart to reward such extraordinary merit in such an extraordinary manner. If General Scott had been guilty of the most flagrant dereliction of duty—if he had behaved in the most cowardly and disorderly manner in presence of the enemy—if his conduct had caused the destruction of the army, instead of securing it a succession of triumphs as brilliant certainly as any recorded in our history—he could hardly have received more decided marks of Executive disapprobation.

There is another man, however, of a totally different character—one who can never throw the Executive in the shade by any brilliant exertion of generalship or valor—one who has, on more occasions than one, been charged with the most flagrant misconduct by the oldest and best officers of the army. That man the President has taken under his especial protection. He is his peculiar pet—the recipient of all the honors he has it in his power to bestow. He is consistent to the last; for if he persecuted worth and genius in the person of Scott, it would be unaccountable that he should not connive at the attempt to rob others of their laurels, so notoriously proved upon Pillow.

General Scott will doubtless be received with enthusiasm wherever he may make his appearance in the United States. His majestic form, which has so often towered in front of the battle, will be recognized at once by tens of thousands of his admiring countrymen; for no man who has seen him once, can fail to know him at the second meeting.

“He looks the hero that he really is.”

And it is no small addition to his character that in private life he is as estimable as his public services are great. We heard a friend of his, who had had as many opportunities of understanding his sentiments as any other person, once say, that he was certain he placed far less value upon his military reputation, than upon that of an upright man.

the deep interest which you evidently take in the welfare of the Whigs. But we assure you that it is wholly unnecessary. They mean to take care of themselves; and from present indications, we have no doubt they will be perfectly successful in the attempt.

Before concluding this somewhat discursive article, it may be proper to state, that we ourselves heard, six weeks ago, from a gentleman who had just returned from New Orleans, that there was precisely such a letter as this Allison letter, in existence. When we say precisely, we mean, of course, to allude only to the sentiments of the letter. Major Bliss, at least at that time, was not within reach of the old Hero.

RW48v25i38p1c2, May 12, 1848: The Irish Brigade!

Of all the contemptible farces yet gotten up in this age of humbug, we regard the proposition to raise an Irish brigade in the City of New York, to liberate Ireland, as the most contemptible. How do these gentlemen, or their leaders, propose to get to Ireland? Do they mean to do so as one of their countrymen once proposed to do, in order to get from Ireland to here—namely, take their feet in their hands and walk? Have they made any contract for shipping? Are they sure the English fleet will not overawe them on the way? Are they certain, if they once land safely in Cork or Dublin, they can overturn the British power in Ireland? If nine millions of people at home cannot release her from the yoke of England, can fifteen hundred or two thousand coming from the shores of America?

It is the misfortune of the Irish, who are as fine as a race of people as any under the sun, that they have always allowed themselves to be cheated by any Demagogue who would take the trouble to cajole them. It is so at home, and the passion for being cheated seems to follow them all over the world. But this is the baldest piece of cheating yet. There are, no doubt, designing men at the bottom of it all; for the dupe and the deceiver always go together.—In this instance, we learn from the New York Herald, that some hundred dollars have been collected, and if it does not go, in the shape of “rint,” to some leader among them, we shall confess ourselves very much mistaken.

RW48v25i38p1c1, May 12, 1848: Correspondence of the Baltimore Patriot. Washington, May 7, 1848.

I am, as a Whig, rejoiced to see, that Gen. Taylor’s last great letter, is received warmly and cordially by the Whig party in other parts of the country as well as here in Washington. The N. Orleans Whig papers state, that the noble sentiments of the letter have met with the unqualified approbation of all the Whigs in that region. The Whig papers in the North and of the West say the same thing in regard to the reception which the frank old soldier’s letter has met with in those quarters. All this argues well. Everybody knew, that, at the proper time, the old hero, if his friends kept his name before the people for the Presidency, would come out with a manly avowal of his sentiments upon the leading questions of the day. Have I not, from the first, so argued? Have not other friends of the old hero maintained the same thing? And yet, his political enemies affect to believe, that his coming out now is the work of politicians here, and not the free act of Gen. Taylor himself? They have discovered, that the “Nashville Whig,” a short time since, gave out, that Gen. Taylor would, before long, give to the public a letter similar to the one which he has recently addressed to his kinsman, Mr. Allison. They contend, that Gen. Barrow, in Congress, from Tennessee, was formerly editor of the Nashville Whig, and that he must have seen, here in Washington, the letter which General Taylor was to sign and publish as his own, and consequently, that he either sent home a copy or the substance of it to Nashville, when it crept into the Whig? They are very wise, those Locofoco seers!

General Barrow was the editor of the Nashville “Republican Banner,” and not of the “Nashville Whig.” Allen A. Hall, Esq. is the editor of the latter journal. He is the friend and correspondent of a distinguished Whig of Louisiana, who is the devoted personal and political friend of General Taylor his intimations, as to what kind of a letter he designed writing for the public eye, and communicated the same to his friends Hall at Nashville.

But the “Nashville Whig,” contained letters from distinguished Whigs in Washington, one of whom is a member of Congress, stating that Gen. Taylor would shortly appear in a letter, which would put down the slander of the two Mississippi epistles, which Messrs. Brown and Thompson introduced into the columns of the “Union” and into the House of Representatives. Very well, it was generally understood here, a month ago or more, at the time Major Bliss was in this city, that General Taylor, if his friends did not withdraw his name from the canvass, would come out with an explicit enough declaration if his principles, upon the great questions of the day, to satisfy all reasonable men as to his true position.

Everybody here knew this; why then is it so surprising that members of Congress should write the same thing home to their constituents?

But the charge is—and the “Union” thinks it a matter of importance—that Major Bliss, or Mr. Crittenden or some body else, wrote the letter for Gen. Taylor to sign! And this charge is made by those who used to be so indignant at similar charges made against General Jackson. They should hide their head in shame! If Gen. Taylor does not any more than did Gen. Jackson, write with his own hand, all his official reports and all his letters, for the public eye those official dispatches and letters all, as was the case with Gen. Jackson’s, nevertheless, bear the stamp and impress of the old hero’s mind. They are his. NO one denies that he wrote with his own hand the letter to Gen.
Gaines and Col. Butler, which found their way, without their author's knowledge or consent, into the public prints. They show that he possesses strength and ability of mind in the matter of putting his sentiments down in writing. If, therefore he chooses to avail himself of the polished form of his military aid, Major Bliss, who blames him for so doing?

The organ of the Administration at first pretended to think, that Gen. Taylor's Allison letter was no great affair, and would do no harm, because it was explicit only in the matter of yielding up the veto prerogative! But now it is in the greatest consternation imaginable about it and the effect which it will, in its estimation, inevitably have! From this time forward that organ will move heaven and earth to prejudice the public mind against that letter and its glorious old author. But it willavail nothing.

GEN. GAINES.—This veteran of the army arrived in this city in the Magnolia on Sunday evening, and has taken lodgings at the St. Charles Hotel. He is accompanied by his lady.

Important News From Mexico.

Battle at Santa Cruz.—Defeat of the Mexicans—Arrival of Mr. Sevier in Mexico—Court of Inquiry not yet adjourned—New charges to be made against Gen. Scott.

Correspondence of the News. New Orleans, May 4—10 A.M.

The steamer Fashion has arrived from the Brazos, whence she sailed on the 30th ult. Squire Collins, bearer of dispatches for Government and Gens. Price and Wool, are among the passengers.

The above vessel brings full particulars of a battle fought at Santa Cruz, which lasted all day. The Mexicans surrendered at discretion, after having 150 killed and 20 wounded. The Mexican force was 2000 strong, while that of the Americans was but 700. All the Mexican officers, forty in number, were taken prisoners, with all the ammunitions and arms, consisting of fourteen cannon and two thousand muskets. The prisoners were liberated on parole and sent to Chihuahua.

The schr. Heroine has also arrived, bringing dates from the City of Mexico to the 20th.

Mr. Sevier, the U. S. Commissioner entered that city on the 15th.

Governor Michoacan has resigned, in consequence of his opposition to the treaty.

The American flag was flying on the top of Popacatapal, three quarters of a mile above the level of the ocean, being the highest point of elevation in the ancient kingdom of the Aztecs.

No meeting of Congress had yet taken place, but it was expected there would be a quorum on the 5th May.

The Court of Inquiry was expected to adjourn in a few days, though it is probable another would be called, as Government has serious charges to make against Gen. Scott.

Gen. Scott is daily expected in New Orleans.

It is said that several American officers had enlisted in the Mexican army—which is very doubtful.

The body of Mr. S. Andrews has been discovered.

The schr. Heroine arrived last night from Vera Cruz, and we are indebted to the Captain for the prompt transmission of our letters and papers from the city of Mexico to the 20th of April.
By this arrival we have the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry on the 15th, 17th, 18th and 19th ult. The letters of our correspondent, hereto annexed, are all that we can make room for this morning, without detaining our paper from the press. They are extremely interesting, and will be found to contain all the news of importance, the burden of it being that there is as yet no quorum of the Mexican Congress at Queretaro, that the prospects of the ratification of the treaty are waxing fainter, and that Paredes is still at large at San Luis Potosi.

Enclosed you will find translation of the first letter I have receives from the gentleman employed as your correspondent at Queretaro. You will perceive that he says Senators and Deputies are constantly arriving there from all parts of Queretaro, and yet he adds that the House of Deputies lacks sixteen or eighteen of a quorum, and the Senate four, showing the number of Congressmen present at the seat of Government to be less now than it was a fortnight ago, when the Mexican journals reported that but fourteen were wanted in both houses to make a quorum.

—This tallies with reports here that members are leaving Queretaro for their homes, as fast, if not faster, than new ones arrive. There are few here now that do not despair of the treaty being ratified by the Mexican Government, chiefly in consequence of the tardiness displayed by Pena y Pena, in bringing Congress together, and the non-fulfillment of his promise to have a quorum assembled as soon as the treaty was returned ratified by our Government. Reports are current still, too, that Bustamente is opposed to peace, and, you will observe that you Queretaro correspondent, in speaking of him and Minon going to San Luis Potosi with the army, says they have gone under the pretext of suppressing an Indian insurrection in the Sierra Gordo district, which lies between Tampico and San Luis Potosi.—Paredes, notwithstanding the fulminations of the Government at Queretaro against him, and the order issued to the Governor of San Luis Potosi to arrest him, was still at liberty at the last advices from San Luis. Now, the object of Bustamente in going to San Luis, without doubt, is either to overawe the partisan of Paredes, and arrest him, or to coalesce with him, and, if the latter, farewell to the Government of Pena y Pena and peace. Time alone can reveal the designs of Bustamente, but we shall very soon have a knowledge of them. It is gratifying to know that the men now here will permit no trifling on the part of the Government at Queretaro.

Mr. Sevier arrived here on Saturday. Both he and Mr. Clifford say they can have but very few words with the Mexicans, and these are to ratify the treaty quickly, and the general-in-chief has within a few days declared that he will be very soon either in Vera Cruz or to Queretaro.—This is the only way to deal with Mexico, for their strength is entirely in procrastination.

The trial of the officers and men accused of the late murder and attempt at burglary is going on. I would send you a report of the evidence, but the court has only admitted reporters on condition that the evidence shall not be published here or in the United States, until such time shall have elapsed that there will be a certainty of the publication not reaching here before the trial is concluded.

The Court of Inquiry will be through with the evidence here this week, but if the information I have received be correct, it may be delayed to investigate another case. I am told, and I consider my authority good, that serious charges are to be preferred against gen. Scott by the Government.

You have doubtless heard that a council of war was held when the army was in Puebla, to debate the propriety of “buying a peace,” by advancing a certain sum of money to Santa Anna. It is said that Gen. Scott, although the council of war decided against the pan, entered into negotiations with Santa Anna, through Mackintosh, to bribe him either into a treaty, or not to oppose the advance of the American army upon the capitol; that the sum was agreed upon, and that ten thousand dollars were advanced as “earnest money.” I cannot believe that Gen. Scott is guilty of this, but that a charge to the effect I have mentioned, or somewhat similar, is to be made, the character and position of my informant leaves me no room to doubt.

There is a part of your Queretaro correspondent’s letter that I do not very clearly understand. It is that stating that several American officers have joined the Mexican army. I can only learn of one American officer who has gone from this line of the army to Queretaro, a Lieutenant O’Sullivan, who was promoted from the ranks to a commission in one of the old Infantry regiments for his gallantry at Palo Alto and Rosaca de la Palma. He resigned his commission some time ago, and it is believed went to Queretaro to join the Mexican army. It is probable that many of the deserted from the ranks of our army, with the view of obtaining commissions in the Mexican army, represent themselves on arriving at Queretaro, as having been officers, and thus your correspondent may have fallen into error.

The inhabitants of Zecualtepec, at which place General Lane had the fight with Jaraulita, have petitioned gen. Butler to remunerate them for the losses suffered by them by the fight and the partial sacking of the town. Gen. Butler has requested Maj. Polk, now the senior officer of command engaged in the fight on the absence of Gen. Lane and Col. Hays, to inform him how far those people are deserving of remuneration. Maj. Polk is collecting evidence to show that their reports of their losses are greatly exaggerated, and which will also show that the town must have been almost exclusively inhabited by guerrillas and their accomplices. Nearly every house and store in the town had articles in them, which bore evidence of their having been robbed from the trains. American whiskey and American manufactured tobacco—articles never used by Mexicans—were found in the most of them, and in others, goods of all description marked to American and other merchants in this city.

You will find matter of interest in the enclosed extracts from the “Star.” D. S.
Senators and Deputies are arriving here daily from all parts of the States of the Republic. Those who are here meet frequently in caucuses (juntas preparatories.)

It is generally believed that Congress will meet after the Easter holidays, that is from the first to the fifth of next month.

The number of Deputies wanting for a quorum now is sixteen to eighteen, and the number of Senators wanting is four.

The army of reserve, and the munitions, have left here under Generals Bustamente and Minon, for San Luis Potosi, under the pretext of preserving order and tranquility, which are threatened by the rising of the Indians of the Sierra Gordo.

All opinions expressed up to this time by the members of the new Congress are in favor of peace.

Some officious Mexicans have induced several American officers, as it appears, reluctantly, to come to Queretaro, and they have enlisted in the army. Three of them have been sent to Guadalajara, and the others are waiting here for their appointments. In my next letter I will give you their names. The two battalions of San Patricio consist of from a hundred to an hundred and twenty men.

The stage which left this city for Guanajuato yesterday was attacked by a band of robbers about 5 miles from here. The passengers fired and killed one of the robbers, who was carried off immediately by his companions. The passengers returned to town, and asked the Government for as escort, which was refused. They let the stage go on empty, and entered their protest against the refusal of the Government to protect them under such circumstances.

Herewith you will find the second letter of your Queretaro correspondent, dated the 14th inst., and had it not been for the breaking down of the diligencia on the road I should have had a letter a day later from him. This letter will be found exceedingly interesting at the present moment, in view of the possibility of the treaty not being ratified at Queretaro, and a re-opening of the war, in as much as it gives in detail the present military resources of the country and what is deemed necessary by the Government in case a prolongation of the war is determined upon; but in case such a determination is thorough of, how appalling must these statistics be to any Mexican of sense, who desires to preserve the nationality of his country. Eleven thousand five hundred men is all they can bring into the field. They say if peace cannot be had they want 53,500 men more, and 155 pieces of artillery, of which latter they have, I learn from good authority, at all points, not more than 40 pieces, and these generally of an inferior quality. To support the force which they say would be required, would involve a monthly expenditure of over a million of dollars, and with all their ports in our possession an a large portion of their richest territory, together with seven or eight of their most wealthy and populous cities, whence, in the absence of all national credit, can they expect to raise so large a sum. So desperate a situation of affairs of the country one should think would bring the members of Congress together at Queretaro in a rush, to ratify the highly favorable treaty that awaits their action; but we have no evidence of such a disposition, and by virtue of the members of Pena y Pena’s Government and the “occupationists,” who are daily growing in strength, the treaty may be rejected, or which would be the same in result, they may prevent the action of Congress upon it until the 2d June, when, as is understood, if the treaty be not ratified, warlike operations are to be resumed.

You correspondent at Queretaro, still refers to desertions, and continues to assert that American officers are among the number. I am yet of opinion that he has been deceived in this matter, and that privates and non-commissioned officers who have gone to Queretaro have, for the purpose of obtaining respectable positions in the Mexican army, represented themselves as having been commissioned officers [which I take it, your correspondent means they have been] in the American army. You will think the statement of your correspondent that several of these deserters have been sent into the interior States to organize companies of Americans strange, but I am credibly informed that there are some 6 or 800 teamsters, discharged soldiers and deserts, scattered through the country, some idling, and others at work in the factories, or engaged in other occupations. The greater part of this number are at Guanajuato and Guadalajara. This attempt on the part of our Government to increase the military force of the country and the efforts to promote desertion from our army would seem to convey belligerent intentions; but it may be that Pena y Pena is looking to the possibility of being compelled, by his own counymen, to continue the war.

The letter ways that several of the States have refused to send their Representatives to Congress, and private letters from Queretaro represent that it is contemplated by the Government, in view of the present position of Yucatan, and the state of the country generally, to decree that fifty or sixty members of congress shall constitute a quorum, and thus declare a quorum to be present now, and thus baffle the designs of the opponents of peace. It is said our commissioners will not recognize a ratification of the treaty that is not constitutional, but with Mr. Buchanan’s instructions to Mr. Trist, to negotiate with a Dictator, should he find one in power, it would not be prudent to believe that our Government will be over nice as to the constitutional organization of the Government at Queretaro.

There is but little news to communicate from this point. The trial of the officers and men charged with the murder and attempted burglary in the Calle de la Palma is progressing. Lieut. Hare is the only one of the party that has yet been before the commission. The evidence against him thus far proves beyond doubt his connection with the affair, and Armstrong, who has become ‘State’s evidence,’ swears that Hare was the leader.

The treaty was sent to Queretaro on the day before yesterday by a Mexican express, and at the same time a despatch was sent to the Mexican Government by our commissioners. I do not know the purport of their communication, but a reply is anticipated on Friday, when they expect to start for Queretaro. Should they go, Maj. Polk with a hundred or an hundred and fifty men will escort them. I shall go with them, as there is but little of interest to write upon from this place, and I can be more useful to you at Queretaro.

Col. Black, of the 1st Pennsylvania, arrived here on Saturday, the 15th, from Vera Cruz, in command of a military train. He made the shortest march to and from Vera Cruz that has ever been made with infantry. He made the march each way in thirteen days. Col. Loomis, who is escorting a merchant train from Vera Cruz, will be here tomorrow. We received a very large mail this morning, which brought us New Orleans dates to the 8th inst. D. S.

During the last few days from fifteen to twenty American soldiers, deserters have arrived here, who enlisted immediately into the Mexican army. Several of them have been attached to the artillery and ordinance department. Others have been sent to Guanajuato and Guadalajara for the purpose of organizing companies which are to be formed of Americans, [deserters]. There is much talk about a desertion of from four to five hundred men, that, it is said, is to take place in a few days from the American troops quartered about the city of Mexico, and it is further said that several agents have left this place in order to facilitate the desertion.

It is a fact that in the above named departments there are not only American soldiers but also American officers, who have deserted within a short time. Amongst them is an artillery officer, who deserted six days ago, and they have left this place in order to organize in all the interior States.

According to a statement presented to Congress, the Mexican Government require, for the purpose of carrying on the war against the Americans: Sappers and Miners, 531; Foot Artillery, 2640; Mounted do, 536; Infantry of the Line, 47,340; Cavalry, 9440; other disciplined forces, 4500. A total of 65,077 men, to form 60 battalions and 16 regiments, and added to this a train of 145 pieces of Artillery.

To support this force would involve a monthly expense of $1,172,539, without taking into account the extra pay and extra rations during the war, the cost of the horses for the artillery train, train for bridges, ammunition, clothing, hospital stores and other necessary expenses.

The forces existing at present are: Infantry from 6000 to 8000 men; Cavalry, from 2000 to 3000 men; Artillery, 500 men. Total, 8000 to 11,5000, which latter will include all the disciplined forces in the service.

Therefore, the Mexicans, in order to continue the war, will have to arm and equip 531 Sappers and miners, 2140 Foot Artillery, 536 Mounted do, 29,340 Infantry of the Line, 6440 Cavalry, 4590 other disciplined forces—53,577 men in all, and 145 pieces of artillery, as an expenses of one million and some hundred thousands of dollars per month.

The insurgents of Xichu, in the State of Guanajuato, have risen to a formidable body. They already number more than 2000, and they have partisans even as far as the district of San Felipe. They have given the cry for anarchical principles, and are destroying all towns through which they pass. The forces sent against them have not been sufficient to quell the insurrection.

It appears that the South and some of the other States refuse to send their Representatives to Congress, but the number is not sufficient to prevent the opening of Congress.

Interesting from Chihuahua.

THE BATTLE OF SANTA CRUZ DE ROSALES.

The U. S. steamship Fashion, Capt. Morgan, arrived from Brazos Santiago yesterday, whence she sailed on the 30th ult. bringing us several day's later intelligence from the Rio Grande, and interesting news from Chihuahua.—Among the passengers on the Fashion was J. L. Collins, Esq. bearer of dispatches from Gen. Price and Gen. Wool to head quarters at Washington. Our readers are already familiar with the name of Squire Collins, honorable mention having been repeatedly made of him. He was taken prisoner some months since near Chihuahua, and confined till about the first of February, when he succeeded in making his escape and joining the American troops at El Paso. He participated in the battle of Santa Cruz de Rosales, with gen. Price’s command, and has kindly furnished us with succinct statement of the affair and the events which were connected with it. As we have had no accounts of the engagement save from Mexican sources, an American’s version of the affair will be read with interest.

Mr. Collins informs us that about the first week in February he succeeded in breaking prison at Chihuahua, then in proceeds on to Washington this morning.

soon after they arrived at Chihuahua. Squire Collins left Chihuahua on the 6th of April under an escort of one distinguished themselves by their bravery, officers and men. The Mexican prisoners were all liberated upon parole follow as soon as practicable. Mr. Collins informs us that our troops conducted themselves in the coolest manner and first under Col. Ralls, the second under Lieut. Col. Land, and the third under major Walker, of the Snata Fe Battalion. The contest was maintained with great vigor until about 11 o’clock, when a report was brought in that a force of about 900 Mexican lancers had arrived near by, and were about making an attack upon the rear. The troops were then withdrawn, and a cessation of hostilities ensued, Lieutenant Colonel Lane being sent to reconnoiter. The report of the arrival of lancers proved to be false, and about 3 o’clock the action was resumed and continued until about dusk, when the Americans had succeeded in working their way through the houses into the plaza, and the Mexicans surrendered at discretion, after having fought with unusual bravery all day. The loss of the side of the Mexicans was about 150 killed and as many wounded, while on our side there were but five killed and twenty-two—two of whom subsequently died. The Mexican force was about 1500 to 2000. The officers, some forty in number were taken prisoners, and the whole amount of arms and ammunition captured. There were fourteen pieces of artillery, some of a heavy caliber, and about 2000 stand of small arms. On the 18th, gen. Price started back for Chihuahua, taking with him Gov. Trias and a portion of his prisoners, and leaving Lieut. Col. Ralls in command, to follow as soon as practicable. Mr. Collins informs us that our troops conducted themselves in the coolest manner and distinguished themselves by their bravery, officers and men. The Mexican prisoners were all liberated upon parole soon after they arrived at Chihuahua. Squire Collins left Chihuahua on the 6th of April under an escort of one company of 1st Dragoons, commanded by Capt. Greer, and arrived at Gen. Wool’s head quarters on the 20th. He proceeds on to Washington this morning.

It was ascertained that the report of Urrea’s advance was entirely false, and Squire Collins furnishing Gen. Price with all the information of Gov. Trias’s position and means of resistance, Gen. P. at once determined to march down and attack him. Accordingly, on the 1st of March, he started with about 400 men and arrived at Chihuahua on the evening of the 7th, performing the entire distance in the extraordinary space of seven days. A deputation of the civic authorities came out and held an interview with Gen. Price, informing him of the reported conclusion of a treaty of peace between Mexico and the United States, and entreated him not to enter the city. Gen. Price very properly disregarded this request, doubted the information and marched into the city. Ascertaining that Trias was but on one day’s march removed from him, he determined to follow him the next morning, and accordingly raised all the horses he could to supply the place of those broken down on the march from El Paso, and the next morning ay 8 o’clock, his command were all on the march after Trias. Notwithstanding the previous long marches, this gallant command accomplished the distance of sixty miles that day and halted before the town of Santa Cruz—a place of about 2000 inhabitants, where Trias’s command was in possession. About 7 or 8 o’clock the next morning, Gen. Price sent into town a flag of truce and demanded the unconditional surrender of Trias. This Gov. T. refused, but subsequently consented to hold a personal interview with gen. Price, at which he informed him that he had received information of the conclusion of a treaty of peace, and was in daily expectation of the receipts of intelligence announcing the establishment of an armistice. Various propositions were made on both sides, both parties, under existing circumstances, being reluctant to resort to a contest at arms. Gen. Price would not consent to Gove. Trias marching away with all his arms and munitions, but agreed to permit him to return with them or send them to Chihuahua, and if they received official intelligence of the treaty, then to permit him to remove them where he chose. Gov. Trias rejected this, as well as the proposition to surrender, but begged Gen. Price to wait four days, by which time he confidently expected the return of an extraordinary courier, whom he had dispatched to Durango for information with regard to the treaty and armistice.

to this Gen. Price consented, and not only waited the four days, but four days longer, at the expiration of which time, a portion of his force having come up, increasing his strength to about 700, he determined to attack the town.
—The Mexicans had not been idle all this time, having strongly fortified the plaza and streets leading to it, loop-holed their houses and made every preparation for a firm resistance. On the morning of the 16th, about 8 o’clock, after another demand for an unconditional surrender had been made and rejected, the attack was commenced by a brisk cannonade. The American forces were subsequently divided into three parties, to attack the works from three different positions—the first under Col. Ralls, the second under Lieut. Col. Land, and the third under major Walker, of the Snata Fe Battalion. The contest was maintained with great vigor until about 11 o’clock, when a report was brought in that a force of about 900 Mexican lancers had arrived near by, and were about making an attack upon the rear. The troops were then withdrawn, and a cessation of hostilities ensued, Lieutenant Colonel Lane being sent to reconnoiter. The report of the arrival of lancers proved to be false, and about 3 o’clock the action was resumed and continued until about dusk, when the Americans had succeeded in working their way through the houses into the plaza, and the Mexicans surrendered at discretion, after having fought with unusual bravery all day. The loss of the side of the Mexicans was about 150 killed and as many wounded, while on our side there were but five killed and twenty-two—two of whom subsequently died. The Mexican force was about 1500 to 2000. The officers, some forty in number were taken prisoners, and the whole amount of arms and ammunition captured. There were fourteen pieces of artillery, some of a heavy caliber, and about 2000 stand of small arms. On the 18th, gen. Price started back for Chihuahua, taking with him Gov. Trias and a portion of his prisoners, and leaving Lieut. Col. Ralls in command, to follow as soon as practicable. Mr. Collins informs us that our troops conducted themselves in the coolest manner and distinguished themselves by their bravery, officers and men. The Mexican prisoners were all liberated upon parole soon after they arrived at Chihuahua. Squire Collins left Chihuahua on the 6th of April under an escort of one company of 1st Dragoons, commanded by Capt. Greer, and arrived at Gen. Wool’s head quarters on the 20th. He proceeds on to Washington this morning.

We are indebted to the St. Louis Republican for some of the most remarkable documents to which the Mexican war, prolific as it has been of monstrosities of this sort, has yet given birth. One of these is the imposition of a tariff of duties on all merchandise conveyed to Santa Fe from any part of the United States—which, anomalous as such a proceeding would be under any circumstances, is rendered still more astounding by the fact, that, if MR. Polk was right in claiming the Rio Grande as the true boundary between Texas and Mexico—a claim recently affirmed by a solemn vote of the Legislature of that State—the city of Santa Fe, which is situated on the eastern side of that river, is already, and has been ever since the annexation of Texas, within the limits of the U. States and under the jurisdiction, (constructively,) of our own laws. What right, we beg to know, has an officer in command of a detachment of U. S. troops, stationed at any point, in any one of the States of the Union, to decree, by a General Order, that there shall be an “import duty” on all merchandize introduced into that State from any other part of the Confederacy! No man will sustain so monstrous a proposition. And yet this has been done by Brigadier General Sterling Price, in “General Order, No. 10,” the second article of which reads in this wise;

21. “There shall be levied an import duty of six per centum, ad valorem, on all merchandise introduced into the territory of New Mexico, from and after the date hereof, based upon the original invoices, duly authenticated before the officer hereinafter designated.”

If Santa Fe constituted a portion of the Mexican Republic, as every body most certainly believed it did until Mr. Polk contended that “the Rio Grande, from its source to its mouth,” was in truth the dividing line between that Republic and Texas—an assertion of which the Legislature of Texas has promptly availed itself for the purpose of extending its territorial limits—this levy of an “import duty,” by the Commanding General, might be plausibly excused, as similar acts, in other parts of Mexico, have been, by the friends of the Administration, upon “the tyrant’s plea, Necessity.” But when, according to Mr. Polk, all that part of the Department of New Mexico which lies east of the Rio Grande, and in which Santa Fe is embraced, is within the State of Texas—and when, as is well known, the Legislature of Texas, taking Mr. Polk a this word, has recently passed an act extending her jurisdiction over this territory, and appointed judicial officers to administer her laws there-in,—the outrageous character of this military decree stands out in bold relief, challenging the admiration of mankind, and furnishing a striking exemplification of a remark, made a the commencement of hostilities with Mexico, by one of the champions of the Administration, that “THE CONSTITUTION HAS NOTHING TO DO WITH THE WAR.”

But the following address of Pro-Consul Price, issued on the eve of his departure from Santa Fe for Chihuahua “cape the climax.” As Orator Phillips would say, it is “grand, gloomy, and peculiar.” Here it is: [see entry, “To the Delegates of the People of New Mexico in Convention assembled.”].

RW48v25i38p4c2, May 12, 1848: Proceedings of the Court of Inquiry in the Case of Gen. Pillow.

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY—April 12, 1848.

The Court met this morning at the usual hour. After the records were read by the Judge Advocate—Capt. Hooker was re-called for the defence.

Q—Witness will state if he knows whether or not Gen. Pillow intended to return to the battle field on the night of the 19th August, from San Augustin, after reporting to Gen. Scott—if so, what prevented his doing so?

A—I know that General Pillow intended to return that night, and was prevented. I suppose, by the orders he received from Maj. Gen. Scott to remain in San Augustin—Gen. Scott said to Gen. Pillow, “You will remain here tonight,” or words to that effect, which order was repeated.

Q—Was witness at Gen. Scott’s quarters with Gen. Pillow on the night of the 19th August? If so, state if he heard Gen. Pillow more than once express the wish and determination to return to the field of operations, and what was said by gen. Scott?

A—I do not know what was expressed by Gen. Pillow as to his determination a the time; do not know the language made use of; he told me that he should return, and I heard nothing said by him to remove the impression that I was under, that he was to return. Gen. Scott’s order to Gen. Pillow has already been recorded, in answer to the latter part of the previous question.

Q—Was witness present, and did he hear a conversation between Gen. Pillow and Capt. Taylor on the night of 19th of August, near the cornfield? If so, state what he heard said by Gen. Pillow.

A—I was present a the conversation which took place between Gen. Pillow, Gen. Twiggs, and Capt. Taylor. I thought that I heard all the conversation; but, as it was raining severely, and there were a number talking, I cannot state positively that I heard the whole of it. Capt. Taylor asked Gen. Pillow how matters were looking, and my impression is that Gen. Pillow told Capt. Taylor that he found the enemy in a stronger position than he expected; and that the attack in front would have to be abandoned. There was more conversation with regard to the enemy’s position, &c. Gen. Twiggs had something to say, but I have forgotten what it was.

Q—Where did witness and Lt. Rains sleep on the 19th of August? State what time Gen. Pillow on his way to the field, in the morning of the 20th, called upon yourself and Lieut. Rains to go with him to the field. Was it before or after sunrise, and did he wait for you or leave you that morning and go the field without you?

A—Mr. Rains and myself slept in a house occupied at the time by gen. Quitman; I think it was gen. Quitman. The house was on the plaza at San Augustin, and on the road reading from the quarters of Gen. Scott. Gen. Pillow came in early in the morning; I cannot tell whether it was before it after sunrise; I think it was about sunrise; the room was a dark one. Gen. Pillow said it was time to be off, but I think that he did not start immediately; he may have been detained by Mr. Rains having his horse saddled. I do not know but it might have been by other causes.—With regard to myself, he did not wait for me; I lost my horse, and was some time in finding another to go on the field; I did not know the precise time Gen. Pillow left, as I was not with him.

Q—Was witness at a conference of officers held at Piedad, on the 11th; if so, state what were the views of Maj.
Gens. Scott and Pillow in reference to an early attack upon the enemy, in the directions of San Antonio and Chapultepec?

A—I was present during the greater part of that conference; I am confident from the views expressed by Gen.
Scott that he was decidedly in favor of attacking Chapultepec; he called on the officers present to express their views in regard to the proper point of attack; whether Piedad or Chapultepec; several of the officers present (Gen. P. among the number) evinced a great desire for more information than they possessed on the subject; they appeared to be anxious to know what position we would occupy in regard to the city and the interior defences, after we came in possession of either one of the points. The difficulty appeared to be a want of knowledge of what was behind those two positions. Gen. Pillow suggested, or asked for information with regard to the citadel; other officers present inquired as to the same fact, and suggested other difficulties on the Chapultepec route. Whether these suggestions were thrown out to elicit information or not, I cannot state, but they inclined me to the impression that they preferred the attack on the Piedad. They inclined me very slightly to that impression; there was one officer present of whose views I could speak with more certainty—which was Capt. Lee, who preferred the attack on Piedad.

Q—What does witness mean by the Piedad works?

A—I mena the works a the San Antonio garits.

Q—Does the witness chance to remember any prominent reasons advanced by gen. Scott in favor of Chapultepec —if so, state them?

A—I know that Gen. Scott said he would have more elbow room after taking Chapultepec, and also, that he had reason to believe, or words to that effect, that he would be met by a white flag from the city on taking it. I would also state, that during the conference Gen. Scott said to one of the engineers present that Capt. Huger could reduce Chapultepec with his batteries in one day. This was stated in the form of a question; the engineer said he had his doubts. I do not think of any thing else, at this time, connected with the subject.

Q—At what hour of the night or the 11th September did gen. Pillow move with his command from Piedad to Tacubaya, preparatory to the operations upon Chapultepec?

A—I think it was between 9 and 10 o'clock at night.—I took no note at the time, and that is my impression.

Q—Has witness any knowledge of Gen. Pillow’s views in relation to the Tacubaya armistice, before or about the time it was entered into—if so, state whether Gen. Pillow’s views were in favor of or opposed to said armistice, and if opposed, state if he collects the grounds of Gen. Pillow’s opposition?

A—I think it was about 2 o'clock on the 23d of August Gen. Pillow returned from Tacubaya, and communicated to me the first information of an official character in regard to the contemplated armistice; he stated that commissioners were soon to be appointed to determine the terms of it; at the same time he expressed himself decidedly opposed to the armistice, and immediately seated himself, and wrote a note addressed to Gen. Scott, in which he expressed his opposition to the proposed armistice. The note was written and given to me before dining on that day, at 3 o’clock; it was copied after dinner; I conversed with Gen. Pierce during dinner, and with all the officers of his staff, I think; he expressed similar opinions—

[Gen. Scott suggested that the note itself would be better evidence, and desired its production. The note was produced, when the witness continued]

I think that same letter was handed to gen. Pierce to take to Tacubaya the same afternoon.

Q—Is the letter shown to witness the same letter alluded to in his testimony—the date of the letter is the 23d, does witness know if it was written on the 22d—and has he any knowledge when, and through what channel said letter was transmitted to Gen. Scott?

A—I think this is the same letter, written on the 22d, and transmitted to Tacubaya through Gen. Pierce on the same afternoon.

Q—Was Gen. Pierce going to Tacubaya at that time, and for what purpose?

A—He left for Tacubaya; I don’t remember for what purpose.

Q—Was or not Gen. Pierce one of the commissioners to fix upon the terms of the armistice?

A—He was; my impression now is that he was going in obedience to an order—and I think as a commissioner.
Q.—What knowledge has witness of Gen. Pillow having continued to direct the operations of the forces after he was wounded, which made the successful assault upon Chapultepec on the 13th September; state also what forces carried that work; was it those under his command or other forces—if other forces, state what forces they were?

A.—On the morning of the 13th, three regiments of Gen. Pillow's Division, with a storming party from Gen. Worth's Division, were ordered to move to the assault of Chapultepec; four companies of the Voltigeur Regiment, under Lieut. Col. Johnston, followed by the storming party under Capt. McKenzie, were the first troops put in motion. The remainder of the Voltigeur Regiment, under Col. Andrews, were the next to move to the attack; Col. Johnston moved without the grounds surrounding the base of the hill of Chapultepec; the others passed through the Molina del Rey, inside of the walls; the 9th Infantry followed the Voltigeurs, under Col. Andrews, and formed in line of battle directly after passing through the gate; the 15th followed the 9th, and formed in line on the 9th; in that order, they moved forward to the attack; with slight interruptions, they progressed until they reached the ditch enclosing a part of the work at the summit of Chapultepec, where the 15th, the 9th and a part of the Voltigeur Regiment, and the head of the storming party, under Capt. McKenzie, were stopped by the wall enclosing the summit of the hill; many of these men entered the ditch, and many of them concealed themselves behind rocks, which lay upon the surface of the ground. The Voltigeurs that I refer to more particularly—a part of Col. Andrews' party—were under the command of Maj. Caldwell at this time. Col. Johnston's command was more to the right; the hill prevented me from seeing the main body of that command. While these troops were occupying this position, the fire from the crest of the work, directly in our front, ceased; I saw several pieces discharged in the air, behind the breastwork, but the Mexicans appeared afraid to expose even their hands above the crest of the work; their [the Mexicans'] fire, however, was delivered, but not from those behind the breastwork; it came from the roofs of the houses and the windows, and at that time the left flank was occupied by the enemy. The fire did but little execution, as the shots were generally too high. The troops that I have named, or the main body of them, were kept in this position, I should think, at least fifteen minutes, but it seemed to me much longer, waiting for the ladders to come up. When the troops of the storming column were put in motion, these ladders were in the rear of the storming party; after waiting some time with the troops at the top of the hill, I went after the ladders, and in descending the hill, and about half way down, I saw the head of the 2d Pa. Regiment, the S.C. Regiment, and what I took to be the N. York regiment, for the colors were with that party, but I have since been told there were only two companies of that regiment under Lieut. Reed; they were all moving up the hill, and moving by flank. These troops, as I stood bear the redan, and facing down the hill, were on my left; on my right was the head of Colonel Clarke's Brigade; on reaching the foot of the hill I found Gen. Pillow wounded; I asked him where the ladder were, and said to him that we had more troops than were necessary at the top of the hill. I asked him for authority to take a regiment to attack the right flank of the enemy to my left; he told me to take any regiment; as the 8th Infantry was partly up the hill, I gave the order for the 6th to go, but only a part of them did so, the others went up the hill—the 6th was immediately in rear of the 8th, ascending the hill a the time. Capt. Hoffman was in advance of the 6th with me. On reaching the point at which the attack was intended to be made, we found that the ascent was very difficult, there was no cover, and that flank was occupied by the enemy, and they were firing very rapidly. I then directed Capt. Hoffman to halt, and to move to the rear of Chapultepec with his command the moment he saw us take possession of the work on the top of the hill. I then returned to the troops who were in advance, and reached the summit of the hill in time to see the first ladder planted to enter the work. It was planted at the bottom of the ditch with one or two others, the others were paid across the ditch. The first man that I saw (and I think I saw the first one) enter the work, was a private that I took to be of the Voltigeur Regiment; following him were officers and men rushing over the work in great rapidity. I think that the greater part of them belonged to General Pillow's division, and to the regiments of his division that I have before named. I think that the first officer who went over the work belonged to the Voltigeur Regiment, and I know that the first colors in the works were those of the Voltigeur Regiment. When I entered the work (and I was not among the foremost) the terreplein was clear of our troops, except those that entered on the side I speak of. We had a number of men shot belonging to our party by the cadets who were occupying the upper terreplein, the ground opposite to the point of our attack. They would not have fired upon us had an enemy been nearer to them than we were. I have said that the Voltigeurs—the 9th and the 13th Regiments were a portion of the storming party—as a body, were the first that entered Chapultepec. There may have been individuals of other regiments, but the regiments that I have named were started in advance, and they kept it until they reached the summit of the hill, where they were so densely crowded together that it was impossible for any other large body of men to pass through.

Q.—Was Gen. Pillow's wound slight or sever; state also if Dr. Slade (the surgeon who attended him) is dead, and if you know the Surgeon General of the army examined his wound, and what he said about it at the time?

A.—Gen. Pillow's wound seemed to be one which gave him a great deal of pain; Dr. Slade pronounced it a serious wound. Some time after coming into town, (I think Gen. Pillow was brought into town on the 13th,) I was present when Surgeon Lawson, Surgeon General of the army, examined his wound, at which time he told Gen. Pillow that he thought he could save his leg, but not his ankle. Dr. Slade is now dead.

Q.—Does witness know at what time the batteries on the outside of the walls of Chapultepec, on the Tacubaya road, which were attacked by Gen. Quitman, fell? If so, state whether it was before or after Chapultepec was carried by Gen. Pillow's division and forces under his command?

A.—It fell after the work at the summit of Chapultepec fell.
A—Gen. Scott had finished his dinner, and followed me within an hour or little more. I probably rode faster than Gen. Scott did.

Q—Did not the witness chance to see the said Scott while the witness and the said Scott were ascending the hills going to Contreras?

A—No.

Q—How many times did you go to the 15th Infantry on the afternoon of August 19th last, with orders from Gen. Pillow?

A—I went but once.

Q—Where was the 15th halted when you gave the order for its advance across the Pedregal to the support of Cadwalader?

A—It was halted near the road between the corn-field and the hill on which Gen. Pillow was standing. The left of the regiment was a little nearer to the hill than the right was to the corn-field.

Q—Was the 15th Infantry delayed or obstructed in the beginning of its march by other troops; an if so, by what other troops? And how long was the regiment obstructed or delayed near the corn-field?

A—The regiment met with no serious impediment.—I was not obstructed after I gave the order by any troops whatever, that is, after I gave the order to Col. Morgan.

Q—How long had Morgan’s regiment been in the pedregal when the witness head Maj. Gen. Scott inquire of Maj. Gen. Pillow what troops those were then seen winding in the pedregal.

A—The head of the regiment was on the pedregal some time before the rear of the regiment, and I believe it was all in the pedregal some time before Gen. Scott asked Gen. Pillow the question referred to. The head of the regiment was out of sight, and only the rear could be seen at the time.

Q—The witness is desired to reflect and say whether he had gone from Major General Pillow’s position on the hill, to the senior engineer, then again to give final orders to Morgan’s regiment, and back to the said Pillow a second time, before the witness was ordered to meet Maj. Gen. Scott in the direction of San Augustin?

A—On reporting to General Pillow after my return from San Augustin, I went forward to Major Smith, returned to General Pillow, soon after carried the order to Colonel Morgan, and conducted his regiment to the pedregal, returned to General Pillow, and it was soon after that I was sent to meet Gen. Scott. His position was on the hill.

Q—Did or did not the witness chance to see, on going to or returning from Major Smith, a staff officer of Gen. Scott, passing or repassing the position of Col. Morgan near the corn field?

A—I think that the only staff officer I saw of Gen. Scott’s, before I met him on the road, was Mr. Lay, who was the first to communicate, so far as I know, that Gen. Scott would soon be on the field—that he was coming. My impression is that I was standing on the hill when My. Lay communicated this information, he at the base of the hill.

The Court then adjourned.

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY—April 13, 1848.

Court met pursuant to adjournment, and the proceedings were read over by the Judge Advocate.

Capt. Joseph Hooker’s examination resumed.

Questions by Prosecution—To whom did Lieut. Lay communicate that information, and was it before or after the witness had returned from the Chief Engineer?

A—I think it was communicated for the information of Maj. Gen. Pillow; he being the senior in rank there, it was after I returned from seeing Maj. Smith; I do not recollect that Gen. Pillow’s name was used by Mr. Lay, but I think it was announced so that Gen. Pillow could hear it, and also others who were near him.

Q—The witness says that upon the arrival of Lieut. Lay, witness had already been to Maj. Smith; about how far in advance was the position of Maj. Smith from Major General Pillow?

A—I think that Maj. Smith may have been 100 or 200 yards this side of Magruder’s battery, which was 1500 or 1600 yards from the position occupied by Maj. Gen. Pillow. I have paced off the distance, and made Magruder’s battery 800 yards from the entrenched camp of the Mexicans, and Gen. Pillow’s position 2300 yards from the same
Q—Had the witness already ascended the hill when Lt. Lay announced the approach of Maj. Gen. Scott?

A—To the best of my knowledge I was standing at the side of Maj. Gen. Pillow, at the time the announcement was made.

Q—How long after the arrival of Lieut. Lay was it before the witness was again dispatched with orders to Morgan’s regiment?

A—To the best of my recollection, Lieut. Lay made this announcement after I had delivered the order to Morgan’s regiment, and return from it. I would state that if any doubt is entertained on the part of any member, or of any person connected with the Court, in regard to the time that Major Gen. Scott arrived on the field, I beg leave to refer them to his official report, dated on the day of the battle.

Gen. Scott objected to the suggestions of the witness, as they thereby made himself a party not to what was said by the witness. The witness then went on to add, “It is there stated,“ &c. Here the Court interposed and stopped him, having refused to do it before, on the ground that the witness had the right to call the attention of the Court to any circumstance corroborative of his testimony. Here general Scott begged that as the witness had gone so far he might be allowed to go on, but the Court would not permit it.

Q—Will the witness reflect again, and say whether Maj. Gen. Pillow did not separate himself to the left from Major Gen. Scott, go towards the witness, and dispatched with orders to Col Morgan?

A—I was despatched by gen. Pillow with the order to Col. Morgan’s regiment. I remember no such circumstances as those referred to in the question.

Q—To what order does the witness allude in his last answer?

A—The order for Col. Morgan’s regiment to be moved to the support of Cadwalader.

Q—If the witness were near Maj. Gen. Pillow, did not witness hear Maj. Gen. Scott offer his staff to Maj. Gen. Pillow?

A—I heard Gen. Scott say to Gen. Pillow:—”My staff are at your disposal,” or words to that effect. This was of course after gen. Scott arrived, and after I was despatched to Col. Morgan.

Q—By what process of memory is it that the witness remembers that it was Lieut. Col. Hitchcock, and no other, who looked at his watch and said it is now a quarter of five, or a quarter past five, and the said Gen. Scott and staff came up at four o’clock?

A—The ordinary process of memory.

Q—If Maj. Gen. Scott then asked the hour, how did it happen that the said Hitchcock should have superfluously added the hour at which Gen. Scott and staff came up?

A—I supposed that Col. Hitchcock read the time to those who were present before any one else, because his watch was more convenient, though I think several watches were taken out at the time, though I do not think any one else spoke a the time. So far as I know, the announcement by Col. Hitchcock, that Gen. Scott arrived on the field at 4 o’clock, was voluntary.

Q—Did the witness make, at or near the time, any written memorandum of what Lieut. Col. Hitchcock said?

A—I made no written memorandum.

Q—If the witness’ memory had recently been aided by conversations with others on the subject, state who are those persons?

A—It has not been aided by any person.

Q—On separating, on the 19th of August, from Major gen. Scott, witness has said that Maj. Gen. Pillow asked if Gen. Scott had any orders. Did gen. Pillow ask if he had any further orders?

A—I did not understand it so. That he had no orders, was my understanding.

Q—At the time of the conversation with Capt. Taylor, referred to by witness, had Gen. Pillow learned more of the enemy’s position in the dark, than he knew before night?
A—We had met with Gen. Twiggs in the meantime, with whom he had some conversation in regard to affairs on the field, the purport of which I am not able to state, as I do not remember it.

Q—Had not the attack on the front of the enemy’s camp at Contreras been virtually abandoned, when Smith’s Brigade marched across the Pedregal; and did no this occur before the conversation alluded to with Capt. Taylor?

A—To the best of my recollection, the firing from Magruder’s Battery in front of Contreras was kept up until night; the 9th Infantry was in front of the work a the time, and there were other troops there that night. I will state there had been a falling off in the attack in front; judging from the firing before night. I was not on the field when Gen. Smith left to go to Ensaldo; a the time, to the best of my knowledge, (I will fix the time,) when Gen. Pillow left gen. Scott to cross the Pedregal, I did not know that the attack had been abandoned in any way.

Q—The last question refers in part to the time of the conversation between said Pillow and Taylor. Between that time and nightfall, had there been any aggressive movements by the American troops in front of the entrenched camp?

A—The interview between Gen. Pillow an Capt. Taylor, as nearly as I can guess at the time, took place I sold think about 11 o’clock at night; after that I know of no aggressive movements in front of the enemy; in the morning, I heard that there was. I can’t tell as to what team the firing and aggressive movements were discontinued, in relation to the movements of Gen. Smith, as I do not know at what time he left his position in front of Contreras.

Q—At the moment of the conversation between the said Pillow and Taylor, was not the witness aware that the said Smith had passed the Pedregal?

A—I think that the first intimation I had of General Smith’s movement, was a the time of joining Gen. Twiggs; I am not able to state whether I learnt it from him, or the officers who were with him. I was not informed, that I remember, that his whole brigade had left their position in front; I took it for granted a portion, if not all of his command, was with him. This occurred before the conversation between Gen. Pillow and Capt. Taylor.

Q—Under the circumstance of the moment, how could the witness understand the said Capt. Taylor and Gen. Pillow to refer in the conversation to the abandonment of the front attack, and not to the withdrawal of the troops from the position?

A—I would stat, so far as I know, this was the first interview between Gen. Pillow and Capt. Taylor. Capt. Taylor asked him how matters looked; gen. Pillow, in reply, informed him, I suppose because he thought it was a piece of information that he had not heard before, that the attack in front was, or would have to be, abandoned. I think it must have been “would have to be abandoned,” as no orders had been given, so far as I know, to abandon it. Gen. Pillow said that he had found the work stronger than he had expected, or words to that effect.

Q—The witness being in hearing, is he sure that Maj. Gen. Pillow did not say that he was going to the said Scott to recommend an abandonment of the attack on the enemy’s camp, or the front of the enemy’s camp; and did or not the said Pillow say anything on the subject to said Scott, on his arrival at San Augustin?

A—As I stated before, it was raining at the time this conversation took place between Capt. Taylor and Maj. Gen. Pillow, an at times several persons were talking, and it is barely possible that something may have passed between them in conversation that I did not hear. All that I did hear confirmed me in the impression that Gen. Pillow intended to return to renew the attack or to be present at the attack on the works in the morning. He had stated to me when I asked him for permission to remain on the field, that he would be absent but a short time, and I heard no conversation on his part either with Capt. Taylor or at Gen. Scott’s that led me to suppose that he had changed his intentions; this was of course before he determined to remain at San Augustin; that I do not remember to have heard Gen. Pillow refer to the attack upon the front at Gen. Scott’s. A long conversation took place there much of which I have no reason to suppose I heard, and I have no doubt I may have forgotten a portion that I did hear.—I did not sit near Gen. Pillow, and part of the time I was engaged eating supper.

Q—When witness came into Gen. Scott’s room, on the 19th of August, did not witness and Maj. Gen. Pillow early learn the vigorous preparations that were made between Gen. Smith and Gen. Scott, through Captain Lee, for the attack of the entrenched camp early next morning?

A—I think, in the early part of the interview at Gen’l Scott’s, at least very soon after going in, Gen. Scott informed Gen. Pillow—I can’t repeat the words, I will repeat the substance—that Capt. Lee was just in from Gen. Smith, and that Gen’l Smith had determined to attack the enemy at daylight the next morning, and that an attack or demonstration, I don’t now which, would at the same time be made in front of the enemy’s position, and about the same time Gen. Scott directed apt. Lee to repair to Gen. Smith, when Capt. Lee replied that it was impossible, or words to that effect. Gen’l Scott then directed him to return with Gen. Twiggs to the position in front of Contreras. His going back on service, as I understood it, was in connection with the demonstration or attack to be made in front of the enemy’s position the next morning. Capt Lee also informed Gen. Scott that the attack would be made the next morning by gen. Smith, whether he heard from Gen. Scott or not, or words to that effect.

Q—Did not Maj. Gen. Pillow in that interview claim, or intimate that the plan was the “ORIGINAL PLAN OF ATTACK” of the said Pillow’s?
A—I did not hear him.

Q—When Maj. Gen. Pillow informed you that he was opposed to an armistice, or the armistice, did witness know that said Pillow had not been called upon as one of the commissioners to negotiate one, and what were the said Pillow’s views before he knew that he would not be called upon?

A—I do not know at what time Gen. Pillow did know he would not be one of the commissioners. I can only state that fro the time I heard of the armistice as agreed upon, that I don’t remember ever having heard him say any thing in favor of the armistice. The first time that he spoke to me on the subject was about 2 o’clock on the 22d of Aug. I had no knowledge that his name had ever been spoken of as a commissioner to determine on the terms of an armistice. I did not now whether he had been called upon or not.

Q—Did the said Pillow say anything about the instructions of Gen. Scott to the commissioners, and if so, did he say that the commissioners were instructed to demand the surrender of Chapultepec?

A—I don’t know that I ever heard Gen. Pillow speak of the instructions—if I did, I have forgotten it.

Q—Who were present when Maj. Gen. Pillow handed to Brig. Gen. Pierce, the letter dated Aug. 23d, to be delivered to Maj. Gen. Scott, besides Brig Gen Pierce?

A—If I recollect right, Gen. Pillow said to Gen. Pierce that he wanted to send a note to Gen. Scott by him; (this idea has been recalled to mind during the time I was giving my testimony and since,) that it was at the close of the dinner, Lieut. Col. Herbert, Lt. Rogers, of the Navy, and Mr. Rains might have been there, also Lieut. Ripley. It was understood by Gen. Pillow that Gen. Pierce was to go there as one of the commission, and the conversation turned upon what concerned the armistice. I don’t know how many of the party beside myself understood that the note referred to was the identical note in question—perhaps Mr. Ripley and Mr. Rains may have seen the same note. I do not know that anyone was present at the time the note was given to Gen. Pierce. I did not see it delivered to him, but as the note had been spoken of previously, in connexion with his going there, and as I had seen the note, I have no doubt the note was sent by him.

Q—Was or not Mr. Freaner present at the time last mentioned by the witness?

A—I don’t remember that he was.

Q—Had the note of August last, been seen or read by Brig. Gen. Pierce, before it was sealed and dispatched?

A—I don’t know whether it had or not.

Q—Did the witness make at the time any written memorandum, or was he at the time desired to not particularly the character, as well as the delivery of the letters of Aug. 23d last, to Maj. Gen. Scott?

A—I made no written memorandum, nor was I requested to be particular in my remembrance of the fact. I remember it from its being the day after our arrival at Miscoac. I have already state I knew nothing of the actual delivery of the letter to Gen. Pierce.

Q—is the witness conscious if any peculiarity of memory which enables him to seize any particular parts of conversation of inferior importance, and forget others of greater importance?

A—I have no objection to answer the question, but I am not pleased with it. I am not conscious that I have, nor am I conscious that I have done so.

The Court here remarked, that had not the witness expressed a willingness to answer, they were about to tell him he need not do so. Gen. Scott said he would argue that point. The Court said they would have listened to the argument. Gen. Scott asked that the remarks of the Court might be recorded. Gen Pillow expressed the same desire. The Court said they did not think it material.

Q—at about what point was Maj. Gen. Pillow lying, pending the assault upon the body of the work at Chapultepec, and how far was that point from the main work?

A—I was not with Gen. Pillow at the time he received his wound. At the time I did see him, he was lying at the base of the hill, about 70 yards from the main work. I have said before, about 100, but I have since measured the distance, by the route which I ascended the hill—it was about 70 yards from the Castle.

Q—Will the witness particularly describe the spot at which he saw Maj. Gen. Pillow lying, after he had been wounded?

A—At the time I saw Gen. Pillow, he was lying on the ground: I am not sure he was lying on the ground; I think he was; I don’t remember any thing peculiar in the spot by which to designate it. He was lying near the foot of the path which leads directly to a redan midway up the hill on the left hand side; I don’t know of any other way by which to describe the point.

Q—By the left of the redan, does the witness mean, looking up the grove, or the reverse?

A—Looking up the hill.

Q—What, if anything, does the witness chance to know of a personal combat in or about the fields of Mexico, between Maj. Gen. Pillow and any Mexican officer or soldier, or of Gen. Pillow's killing any Mexican?

A—I have no personal knowledge of it.

Q—Was the point where witness saw Maj. Gen Pillow lying wounded, sheltered or not from the fire of the work?

A—A falling shot could strike him.

Gen. Pillow remarked that he was willing to admit that it was pretty well sheltered.

Gen. Scott said it did not enter into the Specification; there was not imputation on Maj. Gen. Pillow’s courage.

Gen. Pillow objected to this going on the record, as he understood the Specification to at least a sneer at his courage, and he was prepared to vindicate his conduct.

Lieut. RIPLEY, A. D. C. sworn.

By Defence.—Q—was witness a member of Gen. Pillow's staff, on the 19th of August last, and if so, he will state what message he bore to Gen. Scott, and the reply?

A—I was a member of Gen. Pillow's staff on the 19th of August last, and after Gen. Pillow's Division had advanced as far as Penal Pobre, a hacienda between San Augustin and the field of Contreras, I was sent back to Gen. Scott, in company of Maj. Kirby, who had just previously arrived with a message from Gen. Scott to Gen. Pillow. Of the message borne by Maj. Kirby to Gen. Pillow, and from him to Gen. Scott, I have no personal knowledge; but was sent back to bring Gen. Scott's reply. I met Gen. S. on the roof of his quarters at San Augustin, shortly after Maj. Kirby had delivered his message, and was directed by Gen. Scott to deliver to Gen. Pillow the message, I the following words, so near as I can recollect them: "Tell Gen. Pillow that he will keep his attention fixed upon making the road and will complete it was far as practicable. Twiggs’ Division is already, or soon will be, in advance of Gen. Pillow, and should the enemy become impertinent, Twiggs will brush them away—if the action becomes serious, and he can go no further with the road, Pillow will support Twiggs with his whole division, and assume the command."

Q—Was witness present on the field on the 19th of August at an interview between Maj. Gen. Pillow and Brig. Gen. Twiggs relative to the disposition of the forces. If so, witness will state what occurred at that interview?

A—I was present on the field at the interview referred to, and the conversation which took place was to the following effect: Gen. Pillow addressed Gen. Twiggs by saying he could go no farther with the road until the enemy was dislodged, and it was necessary to take that battery. Gen. Twiggs replied with one or two oaths, Yes, that we must take it before sunset. Gen. Pillow said that Gen. Scott had placed him in the advance, and that he (Gen. Pillow) did not wish to interfere with him, and that he would open the battle. Gen. Twiggs replied that he would take the battery in one or two hours, I don’t recollect which, and appeared anxious to move off. Gen. Pillow spoke to him again, and I think first there was something said about the batteries, and afterwards said to Gen. Twiggs, that if he would move with one brigade against the enemy's works, and send the other over in the direction of that steeple, pointing in the direction of San Geronimo, to operate on that flank and cut of the communication with the city, that he thought the situation of the enemy would be very precarious. Gen. Twiggs assented to this in very much the same way as he had done to gen. Pillow's previous remarks, when gen. Pillow told him to go ahead and he would support him.

Q—Witness had spoken of Gen. Pillow’s speaking to Gen. Twiggs of certain batteries. To what batteries does the witness refer?

A—As well as I can recollect, Gen. Pillow asked Gen. Twiggs whether he had any artillery with him. Gen. Twiggs replied that the battery of his division had not come up.—Gen. Pillow then offered him the batteries of his division—Magruder's Field Battery and Callendar's Mountain Howitzer Battery; both of which moved forward soon after.

Had Gen. Pillow been on the hill reconnoitering the enemy's works with his glass, during the greater part of the forenoon? And state also whether Gen. Twiggs had not just come up, and passed on without reconnoitering.

A—I know that gen. Pillow was on the hill for some time during the morning; but as I was not immediately present with him, I cannot say whether he was reconnoitering or not. Gen. Twiggs had arrived fifteen or twenty minutes before this conversation took place—perhaps more. During that time, he had been engaged in passing his troops to the front of Gen. Pillow's command, and, immediately after the conversation narrated, he passed on, with Smith's Brigade, to the front.

Q—Has witness a recollection of the time of Gen. Scott's arrival upon the mound? And if so, state his means of knowing the time.

A—My recollection is that it was half-past three or four o'clock; it may have been later that four o'clock. I had no particular means of noting the time.

Q—Does witness know when Morgan's regiment commenced its movement across the Pedregal, and was it before or after Gen. Scott's arrival on the ground.

A—I recollect seeing Morgan's Regiment in motion through the cornfield entering on the Pedregal, just before Gen. Scott arrived, and understood from Gen. Pillow, I think, that he had sent it off.

Q—Has witness any recollection of hearing Gen. Scott ask Gen. Pillow what bayonets those were in the Pedregal, and what was Gen. Scott's reply?

A—I remember that while Gens. Scott and Pillow were conversing on the hill concerning the disposition of the forces, within five, and certainly ten minutes, after Gen. Scott's arrival, Gen. Scott inquired, "what bayonets are those?" pointing to Morgan's Regiment. Gen. Pillow replied, that it was Morgan's Regiment, and I think added that he had just sent it to support Cadwalader.

The Court then adjourned to 9 o'clock, A. M. to-morrow.

RW48v25i38p4c1, May 12, 1848: To the Delegates of the People of New Mexico in Convention assembled:

I, GENERAL COMMANDING, being about to leave for the South, with the most earnest desire for the happiness, contentment and prosperity of the people of New Mexico, leave, for your consideration, the following suggestions:

The territory of New Mexico, by the movement of armies and military occupation, has become permanently subject to the government of the United States. The acts of you Convention cannot, in that particular, change the destiny of New Mexico; but as delegates chosen by the people, you will be presumed to declare the popular will, whether they desire a dissolution from the government of Mexico, and ask to be immediately constituted a territory under the Constitution, with all the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States, or whether from ancient and unchanged prejudices, they still cling to the idea of returning to the republic of Mexico, thereby rendering it necessary for the government for years, to hold over them the severity of military rule.

Your Convention, as Delegates from the people, for the consideration of a matter so vitally important to their happiness and prosperity, is an event of great interest in your political history. The result of you deliberations may permanently establish your happiness as a people or the contrary.

I sincerely desire that you will carefully and calmly consider the interests of those who represent, and prove yourselves superior to the blinding influence of prejudice.

You are asked to recollect the disgust you suffered under the late Mexican government, from the turmoil and anarchy of revolutions—the oppression you endured from a government ever ready to impose onerous exactions, but ever unable to protect you in person, property and rights. You have it now in your power to establish a civil government, under a constitution which guarantees to you the rights of freemen, which permits no exactions but such as are imposed by the representatives of your choice.

You can now secure the protection of a government which imposes no bounds upon the conscience, which will protect you in the unmolested enjoyment of your personal, political, and religious rights, under the regulation of equal laws. In short, you have it in your power to secure for New Mexico, all the rights and privileges of citizens under the freest government in the world.

You stand in a position of the highest responsibility to those who have elected you delegates, and I express the hope, that in view of your serious and important duties, the deliberations of the Convention will be conducted with the strictest propriety and decorum; and though the right freely and properly to express opinions should not be restricted, yet I desire all clearly to understand, that seditious and indecorous language against the constituted military or civil authorities, calculated to inflame or excite the people against the government, my desire for the peace and welfare of the Territory, will induce me immediately to notice. The utterers of such language will be held responsible and called to a strict account.

With the sincerest wishes that your proceedings will be conducted in harmony and good feeling, and result in the permanent benefit of those you represent, I leave the above for your consideration.
A number of petitions and memorials were presented.

Mr. Johnson, of Georgia, offered a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the Judiciary Committee to enquire into the expediency of establishing a Professorship of international law at the Annapolis Naval School, and to extend the number of appointments, so as to allow the admission of two for each member of Congress.

Mr. Breese reported a bill to grant the right of way through the public lands of Indiana, and alternate sections of the same, for a railroad.

The bill to authorize the holding of a special term of the District Court in Tennessee, was passed—also the bill relative to the public archives of Florida.

Mr. Borland introduced the bill of which he had given previous notice, to grant unsold overflowed public lands in Arkansas to that State, for purposes of internal improvement. Read twice and referred.

The special order of the day—the Yucatan bill—was then taken up.

When Mr. Foote referred to that portion of my report of Thursday’s debate (I believe) in the Senate, which attributes to Mr. Calhoun the remark, that he “had not considered it necessary to notice what the Senator from Mississippi had said,” in his speech of that day. Mr. Foote said, satisfactorily, that the remark referred to had been entirely misunderstood by the reporter.

Mr. Calhoun also disclaimed having used the expression, or any other disrespectful to the senator from Mississippi.

Mr. Houston would be glad if the Hon Senator would point out any instance in which Texas had coquetted with England.

Mr. Johnson said that during the pilgrimage of the Senator to Gen. Jackson, if the papers had correctly quoted him, he had used such an expression.

Mr. Houston thanked the Senator from Maryland for the opportunity to contradict the statement. He had never used such remarks as had been attributed to him.

Mr. Houston then addressed the Senate at great length, in support of the bill, but I have not time before the cars leave to give a sketch of his remarks, which embraced several topics of public importance which now occupy the public attention.

Mr. Foote made a few remarks, and Mr. Hannegan also again urged the importance of prompt action. It had become a question—Shall we or shall England take possession of Yucatan.

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, followed, and in the course of his remarks referred to the fact, that though the message had only been on their table for a week, the subject had been brought to the attention of the Executive more than six months since. He also alluded to the charge which had been made against Texas, of “coquetting with England.” He was opposed to the bill in its present shape, and expressed his views on the subject at considerable length.

Mr. Hannegan said that the Senator from N. York, some days since, had so clearly laid before the Senate the operations of England on the Yucatan coast, &c., that it was unnecessary for him to refer to the facts. It was well known that the object of England was to seize Yucatan. And Mr. Sierra, in his last communication, said that if the aid asked is not afforded in two short months, Yucatan, as a government, will cease to exist.

Mr. Jefferson Davis said that if this bill was to be passed over, he hoped the twenty regiment bill would be taken up, that the President might be enabled, in this particular case, to prosecute the war with Mexico in such a manner that a new was might not grow out of it; for he agreed with the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign relations, (Mr. Hannegan,) that if delay was practiced, the next question would be whether we shall expel England from Yucatan.

Mr. Calhoun contended that there was not the slightest probability that England would interfere or take possession of Yucatan. He was ready to take the responsibility of this declaration. He had examined the correspondence which had been referred to, and there was nothing in it to warrant such a conclusion.
Mr. Crittenden followed. He desired, before agreeing to the movement authorized by the bill, such information as would warrant the taking of military possession for the objects contemplated, or from the consideration stated. He was in favor of the amendment proposed by Mr. Jefferson Davis.

Mr. Westcott addressed the Senate at length and expressed his conviction that it was the intention of England to take possession of Yucatan, and that once in her possession, she would not relinquish it. And he would vote for any measure necessary to prevent England from taking possession, and to protect the interests of the U. States.

After some further conversation, the bill was passed over informally, and the Senate adjourned, after adopting a resolution calling on the president for further correspondence on the subject.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

After some unimportant business, the House, in committee of the whole, resumed the consideration of the bill granting bounty lands to officers promoted from the ranks, and the several amendments proposed.

The amendments of Messrs. Thompson, of Mississippi, and Lumpkin, of Georgia, to which I have already referred, and numerous others offered to day, were rejected, and the bill was finally reported to the House and passed, with a single amendment, requiring that the officers referred to “shall have been elected or promoted,. After reaching the seat of war.”

And then the House adjourned.

U. S. Senate.

Very little business was done in the Senate to-day.

Numerous petitions were presented.

After some debate on the resolution offered several days since by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, asking the President to inform the Senate why Major General Pillow’s nomination had not been sent in,

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to take up the bill authorizing the President of the United States to furnish the military aid to the people of Yucatan.

Mr. NILES spoke at some length in opposition to the bill in its present shape, denouncing it as a war measure, with conquest for its aim and end. Mr. N. expressed his willingness to afford aid to the people of Yucatan, but was opposed to taking possession of the country.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House had been engages all day discussing the bill for the admission of the Territory of Wisconsin into the Union as a State. Without action an (sic) the bill, however, the House adjourned till to-morrow.

U. S. Senate.

The bill for the relief of settlers in Florida, under the armed occupation act, was taken up and passed.

The Senate, on motion, proceeded to the consideration of the order of the day, viz: the bill affording military aid to the People of Yucatan.

Mr. CASS addressed the Senate, in a speech of some length, in support of the bill. He replied in detail to the speech of Mr. NILES, delivered yesterday.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, has the floor on this subject for to-morrow.
After a short Executive Session, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House has been engaged all day in committee of the Whole on the bill to admit the Territory of Wisconsin in to the Union as a State.

The committee finally rose and reported the bill, with several amendments to the House, and the House then adjourned.

RW48v25i39p1c1, May 16, 1848: Yucatan.

About two years ago, it was proposed, in Congress, to make an appropriation to keep alive the Irish population, great part of which was at the time actually dying of starvation. To this scheme President Polk was opposed; and opposed much to our sorrow, for it would have been a great and godlike deed on the part of a magnanimous nation. —Probably he thought he could not spare any of the treasure he was squandering with such a lavishing hand in Mexico to help the poor Irish. The times are changed.

He now proposes to send a military force to protect one portion of Yucatan against the other; for, according to Stevens, the are nearly all partakers of Indian blood; and to say that the Indians are attacking Yucatan seems very much like describing a civil war.

Who are best entitled to our sympathies, who have assisted us most in time of trouble, who furnished most men to our Revolutionary armies? The Irish or the Yucatanos? And if the former, then how does it happen that Mr. Polk could bring his heart to feel no pang of regret for them, while sympathies are all alive for these comparative strangers? We have no objection to his kindly emotion, provided it does not involve us in the difficulties of Yucatan, for we revere softness of heart as the best gift of heaven. But all we wish to know is, why he did not feel for the Irish, our own kindred, when he can feel so acutely for these strangers?

A letter from gen. Taylor, acknowledging a copy of the proceedings of the meeting held at the Exchange some time since, has been received by Brantz Mayer, Esq. one of the Secretaries of the meeting. One passage of the letter reads, “You will please do me the favor to make known my acknowledgements to the citizens of Baltimore for the unexpected and unmerited honors they have conferred upon me, in such manner an terms as you may deem most proper.” To comply with his request Mr. Mayer deems that the most suitable manner would be to publish the letter itself; and he has accordingly handed it to us for that purpose. The letter is in answer to a duplicate—which accounts for the interval that has elapsed since the proceedings of the meeting were forwarded first:

BATON ROUGE, LA. May 1, 1848.

Dear Sir:—I have by this day’s mail received a copy (duplicate) of your letter of March 21, with an enclosed copy of the proceedings of a meeting held by the citizens of Baltimore who are friendly to my election to the Presidency.

The political sentiments embraced in the preamble and resolutions adopted at that meeting, I rejoice to say, meet with my cordial approval and assent. No movements in any part of the country, having the object to offer testimonials of honor and respect towards myself, or to advocate my election to the Presidency, have caused in me more lively pleasure, or demand more my gratitude.

You will please do me the favor to make known my acknowledgements to the citizens of Baltimore for the unexpected and unmerited honors they have conferred upon me, in such manner and terms as you may deem most proper.

They are obligation which, should the votes of the country be cast in my favor, it will most surely be my endeavor to redeem to themselves and to all the people of our country.

I must be permitted to add, that, as they have, with so much confidence placed my name in nomination before the country on their own responsibility, free from party action and the exaction of pledges from myself, I shall serve them strictly as a constitutional and not as a party President (in the event already alluded to)—and as my ability will permit.

Please accept my thanks for the kind sentiments you have, in forwarding the proceedings of this meeting, been pleased to express to me.
With sentiments of cordial respect and regard, your most ob't servant,

Z. TAYLOR.

[to] Brantz Mayer, Esq. Secretary Public Meeting in Baltimore.

RW48v25i39p1c1, May 16, 1848: The Washington Union and General Taylor.

The Washington Union, not content with attempting to play the dictator over its own party, has kindly undertaken to superintend the affairs of the Whigs also; and not condescending to wait until their candidate shall have been nominated, takes upon itself to say who should, and who should not be the candidate of the Whig party. Its fears of Gen. Taylor amount to agony. Day after day, and week after week, the editor is engaged in pouring forth the most dolorous jeremiads over the fate of Mr. Clay; in deploring the inconsistency and bad faith of the Whig party. These strains, proceeding from an apprehension which the old man finds its impossible either to restrain or to conceal, are the subject of the most convulsive merriment to all Whigs in and about Washington. But should not this extreme anxiety, from such a quarter, teach our friends in Virginia where their true strength lies? Should not the very fact that the editor of the Union is utterly averse to Gen. Taylor's nomination, be sufficient to secure it? Why is he averse? Does she really care for the dignity or consistency of the Whig party? Is any man simple enough to believe that? No! his aversion arises from a knowledge, shared with every Locofoco in the land, that Gen'l Taylor can dash their party into fragments. The reader will find this subject, as well as several others, discussed with much ability in the following letter from the correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot:

Correspondence of the Baltimore Patriot. WASHINGTON, May 11, 1848.

The spasms of the official organ about the nomination of Gen. Taylor for the Presidency, create a great deal of merriment among all clamor of politicians hereabouts.—The Whig National Convention will certainly have to send a committee on to see and consult the editor, as to the proper man to be nominated as the Whig candidate. It will never do to disregard his wishes—never!

The organ of this morning is worth looking at, in regard to the subject. The editor as deeply regrets that Gen. Taylor consents to be a candidate for the "highest office in the world," as he regretted, twenty-five years ago, that General Jackson had consented to run for the same exalted station! His articles now read very much as those he then wrote! He could not then see any qualifications or fitness in Gen. Jackson for the station—he cannot possibly see any now in Gen. Taylor! From the lowest deep of his heart he should wish that the Whig candidate for the Presidency should possess more experience, more general knowledge and better qualifications for the station,—but nevertheless that can dictate, whoever he may be, is to be beaten. The Locofoco watchword is to be "harmony, union, concession, everything for the cause, nothing for men!" and with this rallying cry the Whigs are to be overthrown "horse, foot and dragoon." If Taylor is to be the Whig candidate, the venerable and elastic editor exclaims, why then the stronger the man the "democracy" has to contend with, the greater will be its efforts!

The official organ shows the cloven foot! It cannot disguise its alarm! It sees old Zack acoming! It remembers how the old hero met Mr. Polk's pet friend Santa Anna, and its instinct tells it well, in advance, how he will be apt to meet Mr. Polk himself, or whoever may step into Mr. Polk's shoes!

But if the official organ's party is going to beat General Taylor, if nominated, with all ease, why need the editor feel such deep regret on account of his lack of the proper knowledge, experience, and qualifications for filling the Presidential chair? Can the venerable editor be sincere in the expression of his regrets? If not, he is very wrong to so express them. Is it not settling a good, honest, wholesome example.

But the official organ is not to blame simply in this.—There is another matter it harps upon which presents but little proof of the sincerely of its statements, in regard to Gen. Taylor. It asserts constantly that Gen. Taylor declares he will be a candidate, no matter who else may be nominated! I quote from it:

"Suppose them prepared to submit to his dictation—suppose them nominating him next month at Philadelphia, because he declares that he will oppose any other nomination they might select, even through it be the "Great Embodiment" himself." What then—Union, May 11.

"Gen. Taylor will urge his claims upon the convention while distinctly refusing to abide by that decision of it shall be against him"—Union, May 11.

"Gen. Taylor, whether nominated or not nominated by the Whig convention, when going before that body under the dictatorial terms laid down in his letters, will not be President of the United States, if Mr. Clay and his friends can prevent his electron."—Union, May 11.

"Gen. Taylor has no chance at all, even if he be nominated, to be elected without the most cordial and unanimous and zealous aid of all the Clay men. To that aid he had forfeited every pretense of claim by his open refusal to abide by the decision of the convention."—Union, May 11.

"We shall fearlessly discharge this duty, if the Whig convention of June 7th should nominate him as their candidate. They may take him up, because he has declared that, if they do not nominate him, he will still run against any other nominee."—Union, May 11.

Now, what ought to be said of the sincerity and candor of a newspaper, professing to be respectable, that will make such unblushing misstatements as those in the foregoing extracts?

Gen. Taylor had not declared, or proclaimed, that he will be a candidate for the Presidency, whether or no. He has not said, that his name shall not be withdrawn, should the Whig National Convention nominate Mr. Clay, or any other good Whig, for the Presidency. He has said, that he entertained no intention of withdrawing it himself—why? Because, he had taken no part in placing his name before the public, for that high office. His friends, who had done it would act in the matter—withdraw it or not—he left it with them. If they decided to withdraw it, he would acquiesce with pleasure! Is this bidding defiance to Mr. Clay, and declaring, that his name should not be withdrawn? No, and they who assert it do gross, meditated injustice to honest old Zachary Taylor! If he is not nominated by the Convention, his name will then be withdrawn by his friends. This is a "fixed fact." If he is nominated, he will take the field, and beat his opponent, as he did Santa Anna at Buena Vista.

Senator John Davits made a very strong and forcible speech in the Senate, to-day, against the bill for taking military possession of Yucatan. Not much else was done. The resolution of inquiry, respecting the neglect of the President to send to the Senate his nominations of Gen. Pillow and Gen. Cushing, was, on the motion of its author, Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, laid over.

In the House, the Wisconsin bill was passed. Afterwards, in committee of the whole, on the annual Revolutionary pension bill, Mr. Rockwell, of Connecticut, took the floor, and made a very able and powerful speech, in continuation of a speech, which he made some two months ago, on the subject of the gross blunders and stupendous errors and misstatements of the Secretary of the treasury, in his reports and explanations, relative to the condition of the finances of the country. He cited the declaration of the official organ, a long time ago, that a refutation of the representations of his former speech should be published by that journal, and asked, why it had never appeared? He produced facts, figures, and vouchers to fortify all that he had formerly asserted, and went on to exhibit still more blunders and misstatements on the part of the Treasury Department. He ridiculed and laughed a the flimsy apologies and excuses, which had been gotten up, and offered to the public, for the bungling conduct of the head of the Treasury Department, and showed how the system would work, if carried out, by charging the blame upon one clerk, and he upon another, and so on, perhaps, all through the Department. He read from the law what were the duties of the Secretary of the treasury, and clearly showed, that Mr. Walker had not performed them, and was far from being a fit and competent person for the responsible station which he occupied. In the course of his speech, he referred to the fact that Mr. Stormh of Pennsylvania, chairman of the committee on the Expenditures of the treasury Department, a very competent and up right man, had taken the errors, committed by the Department, in hand, and had made a most thorough examination of the books, records, and papers, in relation to the subject. He will, in the course of a few days, submit his report, pointing out some astounding errors to the House.

Mr. Rockwell, by this speech, has added much to his already high reputation as a man of most industrious legislative habits, of great clearness of intellect and of untiring industry. The speech will probably appear in the Intelligencer of to-morrow. It will receive a wide circulation. It kills Mr. Secretary Walker, and demolishes the monument of his financial greatness, as the "Union" styled his last annual report.

Mr. Sawyer, however, said it wouldn't hurt the Secretary. The attack, he said, was but a squib, a small innuendo and a small insinuation—all got up for Buncombe. And doesn't Mr. Sawyer know? The House always laughs when Mr. Sawyer takes the floor. He said to-day that he could make a speech. And he would like to speak about several matters—the abolition question and the Presidential question among the number—but he thought the house had been humbugged enough, and so, as his own constituents did not require him to make a speech for Buncombe, he would desist. And so the old gentleman took his seat and looked complacently.

The "Union" begins to think there is but little chance for the treaty to be ratified by the Mexicans, because they cannot agree about the distribution of the money we propose to pay them. Did not the "Union," did not Mr. Polk, know that when the provision in the Treaty, under which the British bankers in Mexico, who got the treaty up, were to obtain a large amount of the spoils, was stricken out here, that those British bankers would not use their influence for its final ratification by the Mexicans?

their choice, although much astonished at so unexpected a reward of most distinguished military services, hesitated to express their condemnation of the administration. They suspected there was something behind the curtain to justify so strong a step as that of depriving a victorious General of his command, and subjecting him to a military tribunal in an enemy's country. The letter of the Secretary of War, obviously written with care, and as the manifesto of the administration against the commander-in-chief of the army, has relieved them from all such apprehensions. In this letter there are no charges of misconduct, none of oppression or injustice.

Much is insinuated as to what would have happened to General Taylor's army at Buena Vista, had a court martial been called for the trial of Gen. Marshall and Capt. Montgomery; and Gen. Scott is arraigned by implication for the delay in his forward movements, because on the 4th of May he discharged the volunteers whose term of service had nearly expired, so as to allow them to reach Vera Cruz, and return before the vomito commenced its ravages.

Whether the American people will regard it as a crime in Gen'l Scott, that he took the responsibility of allowing the gallant volunteers the few weeks remaining of their year, (varying, as the Secretary asserts, from thirty to forty-five days,) to escape the pestilence of the coast, rather than of bringing them within its deadly grasp by insisting on a literal compliance with the terms of their voluntary enlistment, is a question that may be safely entrusted to the country; but it requires no sagacity to ascertain the real strength of the cause of the administration, when its official defender make this one of the chief grounds of complaint against Gen. Scott, and relies upon it as a conclusive defence of the Department for not supplying him with adequate reinforcements.

The grave statements by Gen. Scott all tend to prove an unfriendly feeling towards him on the part of the Administration. The most important facts proving the existence of this feeling, are 1st, the attempt to deprive him of the command when in the face of the enemy by placing a civilian at the head of the army, and 2d, depriving him of the command at the close of the campaign on the complaint of a junior officer against whom charges had been preferred, whilst the complaining officer was released from the arrest to which he was of course subjected when charges were made against him.

To these charges the Secretary of War makes no defence, nor justification. In his long manifesto or seven columns he notices and attempts to refute or excuse the other statements of Gen'l Scott proving the existence of this hostility, and then concludes that it is a "chimerical imagination," because he deems that some of the secondary evidence refuted. How far even this refutation of the collateral evidence is successful may be hereafter inquired into. The American people, however, will not be satisfied with such a refutation, even if true. They are not so ostrich like as to overlook the main body of the charge, because one of its members is covered with mud.

The great question is, has the administration been influenced by any unfriendly feeling towards our GREAT CAPTAIN, and has it treated him with intentional injustice? Is this a chimera of the imagination? Send forth thou master of the pen, who, from the tranquil retreat of the war department, prepares so skillful an attack upon the reputation of an absent general, writing his dispatches upon a drum head in the face of an enemy, and answer these questions. This is what the people wish to know.

Did the administration when it found itself at a loss, apply to Gen. Scott, (after having evinced its unwillingness to do so,) to conduct the war in Mexico? Did not the President, before he left Washington, promise him his most cordial cooperation and support? Was not the secret design then entertained of supplanting him in the chief command by then appointment of Mr. Benton, then Senator of Missouri and wholly undistinguished as a soldier, as Lieut. General as soon as Gen. Scott should be in such position that he could not withdraw from the field without an imputation of his character and patriotism?

Did not the administration urge that appointment, until Congress, alarmed by the indications of popular feeling, evinced its unwillingness to perpetrate so flagrant an injustice? Are these chimeras of a diseased imagination? On the contrary, are they not all facts so notorious that the Secretary has found it safest in his defence of the administration, to avoid all notice of them, and to make the issue upon other and less important points. Whatever advantage Gen. Scott may have given him, by alluding to these as additional proofs of the hostility of the administration towards him, the country will not deem his charges to be refuted while those facts remain unanswered.

With these things staring him in the face, it required no small confidence in the controversial powers by Gov. Marcy to attempt the proof of a cordial feeling of confidence and co-operation on the part of the administration towards the commander-in-chief of the army.

If such be the modes in which the Administration manifests its confidence and friendship, it would be more safe to be on terms of open hostility. Gen. Scott and his army might then, at least, run the hazard of having paced over them a commander, who, like Santa Anna, had given some proof of his ability to command.

It might gain from its capacity to blunder, more than it could hope from its judgment and sagacity.

But no such excuse can be allowed. The Administration in the paltry chicanery or political management is at home, and evinces, in the choice of tools, a power of discrimination that would be commendable were it applied to better ends.

After it had been defeated in its attempt to degrade Gen. Scott, by putting him under the command of Mr. Benton, it gave another manifestation of its feelings, by the appointment of Mr. Trist to negotiate the terms of peace.
I do not mean to make any comment upon the conduct of Mr. Trist. His exposure of the contemptible plot of President Polk and his law partner Gen. Pillow, is a public service of no small merit, and should protect him from any animadversions on the account of the spirit of hostility manifested against Gen. Scott on his first arrival in Mexico. This spirit, however, affords a striking proof of the motive to his appointment, and, indeed, the withholding of these powers from the commander of the army, was in itself sufficient indication of the feelings prevailing at Washington, and how well he divined those feelings when he predicted that he was in more danger “from the fire in his rear than from the enemy” he was sent to encounter.

Other administrations had entrusted to him more delicate and important functions than those in question.

By Gen. Jackson he was sent to maintain and enforce the authority of the Government against the Government of South Carolina. After succeeding in that difficult and delicate mission, without resort to force, the removal of the Cherokees was committed to his charge. All this was skilfully performed. Under Mr. Van Buren’s administration he was employed to pacify, and at the same time to protect the frontier, when the border population were in arms and eager for collision, not only on account of the patriot movements, but on account of the dispute as to the North Eastern boundary.

In all these difficulties, Gen. Scott evinced great tact and ability, and won from the late John Quincy Adams the marked compliment, that he had gained more glory from these diplomatic achievements then from his military triumphs.

How fit and proper was it then to confide to one this qualified, when called to lead its armies, the power to negotiate the treaty that was desired by the government.—Nothing but the unworthy feeling of political hostility could have dictated the appointment of any other person.

So, too, the refusal to appoint an Assistant Adj’t General of his own nomination, to act as chief of his staff, is another evidence of the inimical feeling at Washington.

Notwithstanding the positive averments of the Secretary of War, ”that such an appointment would have been contrary to the rules of the service,” ”and infringement of the President’s power of appointment,” and ”an indignity to all who held the same post with the rank of captain,” I venture to appeal to all conversant with military history, for a confirmation of the fact, that this is the first instance when a commander-in-chief in the field has been denied a head of the staff of his own selection. So much depends upon the cordial co-operation and confidence subsisting between the general and his chief staff officer, that not even Gov. Marcy’s appeal to the democracy, by his allusion to the President’s regard for the rights of officers of inferior rank, can prevent general astonishment that the request was not complied with.

But is it true, that it was the President’s scrupulous regard for the rights of military rank that prevented his compliance with that request?

Where was that regard when the veteran and accomplished officers of the army were passed by, and the political partisans and favorites of the President were taken from private life, and placed over them in command?

Were there no whispers of that conscientious feeling to stay his hand, when it took Gideon J. Pillow from the peaceful drawing of pleas and demurrers, and sent him to Mexico to astonish the universe with his despatches, where the writer was cut down four times in one battle, and then, ”while lying on his back from an agonizing wound,” was employed in writing his despatch?

Such doughty valor has not been witnessed since the days of Witherington at Chevy Chase.

"Who when his legs were smitten off

Still fought upon his stumps.”

After such exhibitions of the President’s views as to his power of appointment, it will be difficult to make the army or navy believe that the refusal to comply with Gen. Scott’s request proceeded from his regard to the rights of rank.

Such stories must be classed among Punch’s “Tales for the Marines.”

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, moved to take up the resolution which he had previously offered, making the President of the United States to inform the Senate why certain nominations had been withheld.

The motion to take up, was agreed to and Mr. Johnson resumed his remarks and proceeded with his argument. He stated that if the President withheld General Pillow’s nomination because he feared the Senate would not confirm the appointment, he (the President) was pursuing a cause unbecoming his position, and contrary to his duty.

At the conclusion of the speech of Mr. J. the subject was informally laid aside.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, the Senate held an executive session, and then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House has been engaged all the day discussing the Monde claim; and, finally, it being put to the vote, was rejected, and the House adjourned.

WASHINGTON, May 13, P. M.

U. S. SENATE.

Very little business was done in the Senate to-day.

The subject under discussion was the bill providing for occupying temporarily with an army the Peninsula of Yucatan. Mr. MILLER addressed the Senate at great length on the subject, and in opposition to the bill.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

On motion, the House resolved itself into a committee of the whole upon Private Bills, (Mr. Stus in the Chair.)

A bill to indemnify the owners for Negro slaves lost during the last war, coming up before the committee, gave rise to a warm discussion on the subject of Slavery, which was participated in by Messrs. TUCK, GIDDINGS, RHETT, BURT, and others.

On the rising of the committee, the House adjourned.

We received last night from our correspondent at Macon the following despatch:

MACON, May 9—9 P. M.

The Georgia Whig Convention named Gen. Taylor as their first choice for its Presidency, and recommend him to the Whig National Convention for nomination. They have agreed to send delegates, and will support the nominee of the Convention provided he be sound on questions involving Southern rights.

RW48v25i39p2c4, May 16, 1848: Twenty Eighth Day – April 17, 1848.

The court met this morning at the usual hour. After the reading of the records,

Gen. Pillow rose and proposed that the remainder of the evidence on the part of the prosecution should be gone through with before any further evidence on the part of the defence was produced. He believed that the witnesses for the prosecution, who were absent from the city, and who had been summoned, were now here. After a short discussion in which Gen. Scott opposed the proposition of Gen. Pillow, the court decided that the witnesses for the prosecution should be called. While waiting the attendance of the witnesses for the prosecution, Gen. Pillow desired to ask Lieut. Ripley, for the defense, one question, and he was accordingly called.

Testimony of Lieut. Ripley.

Q—Was witness present upon the mound on the 19th August when Lieut. Lay passed that position. If so, he will state what he heard Mr. Lay announce, and if that annunciation was made loud enough to be distinguished at the position occupied by Gen. Pillow?

A—I was present upon the 19th of August when Mr. Lay came up and announced the hear approach of Gen. Scott from the foot of the mound, and in a tone loud enough for me to hear. I think I was standing at the time near Gen. Pillow.

Q—How long after Gen. Scott arrived upon the field was it before Mr. Lay returned to the mound?

A—I did not see Mr. Lay for a half or three quarters of an hour afterwards; when I next saw him he was returning towards the mound from the position occupied by Magruder's battery. I met him I think, about half way to that position.

Cross-examined.—The witness had heretofore given in his evidence reasons for knowing or believing that Maj. Gen. Pillow was not at the side of Scott's quarters on the 9th and 10th of September last, nor until the night of the 11th. He has also spoken of the said Pillow's passing from the battlefield of the 8th (Molino del Rey) to the hacienda of San Borjo. Did not the said Pillow call at the said Scott's quarters, in Tacubaya, and there breakfast; lunch or dine, before proceeding to the said hacienda on the said 8th of September?

A—I think I stated in my testimony before, that I rode with Gen. Pillow from Tacubaya after the battle of Molino del Rey to the hacienda San Borjo; I came in from the battlefield to Tacubaya by a different road from the one Gen. Pillow took, stopped some little time a the quarters of my own regiment, afterwards rode down to Gen. Scott's quarters, Gen Pillow came from Gen. Scott's quarters afterwards, mounted his horse and rode off, what happened I know not, as I was not in there at all. This was about 2 or 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

Gen. Scott having expressed a wish to confer privately with the witnesses for the prosecution before they were called to the stand, the court took a recess for an hour to afford him an opportunity to do so. Upon resuming the session, Gen. Scott rose and stated to the court that upon conferring with the two witnesses on the part of the prosecution he desired to have called, he had ascertained that their knowledge of the matters contained in the specifications could not be received as evidence in chief, and would not call them. He might avail himself of what slight knowledge they possessed as rebutting testimony.

RW48v25i39p2c4, May 16, 1848: Testimony of Lieut. Rains.

Lieutenant Rains recalled for defence—Q—Was witness with Gen. Pillow at Piedad. If so, he will state what report or message he bore upon the 9th September from Gen. Pillow to Gen. Scott?

A—I was at Piedad on the morning of the 9th of September, and was dispatched by Gen. Pillow to Gen. Scott at Tacubaya, to detail the result of the reconnaissance made by Gen. Pillow and myself. Having arrived at Tacubaya I gave Gen. Scott the information that the works of the enemy at the garita San Antonio were in an incomplete state. I informed Gen. Scott that there were two guns in my opinion, which bore upon our position, with some two or three more which bore upon other points of the line of entrenchments, but that Gen. Pillow supposed there was a less number of guns than what I have stated. That the enemy had a very large force of laborers engaged in rapidly perfecting their line of works—consequently General Pillow requested that the general-in-chief would come himself if his time served to look at the position of things, but if he were not able to come himself to send his engineers. The general-in-chief replied that he had already intended or resolved not only to make a minute reconnaissance in person of the works in question, but also to send the most if not all of the engineers for the same purpose, and to inform Gen. Pillow that he would follow me at an early moment to Piedad.

Q—Witness will state of after Gen. Pillow established his headquarters at Piedad he was absent from that place at any time long enough to have gone to Tacubaya and back. He will state also what time, on the night of the 11th September, Gen. Pillow and his command left Piedad preparatory to the assault upon Chapultepec, and what time they reached Tacubaya?

A—I am under the strong impression, though not altogether positive, that in the interval in question Gen. Pillow was not absent from Piedad a sufficient length of time to go to Tacubaya and return. Gen. Pillow's command left Piedad about 8 or 9 o'clock on the night of the 11th for Tacubaya, where he and his command arrived probably between 10 and 11.

Q—Was witness himself at Piedad the whole time spoken of from the morning of the 9th till the departure of Gen. Pillow on the night of the 11th, with the exception of the trip to Tacubaya already detailed by witness?

A—I was at Piedad and in its neighborhood; that is my impression.

Q—Witness will state whether or not, to his knowledge, Gen. Pillow was absent from Piedad on the night of the 9th, after or before supper?

A—I feel pretty sure he was not absent during the day of the 9th or the night of the 9th.

Q—Witness will state what he knows of the views of Gen. Pillow in relation to the Tacubaya armistice, before that measure was consummated, and what—if he knows—induced Gen. Pillow to address a note to Gen. Scott on the subject of the armistice?

A—On the 22d of August Gen’l Pillow was returning from an interview with the general-in-chief at Tacubaya to Miscoac, and entered into the following conversation, in substance, with myself: "Well, an armistice has been determined on by gen. Scott, who has appointed, or is about to appoint, commissioners to fix on its terms." I asked, "What are those terms?" The reply was that Chapultepec was not to be required to be given up, and that the army were not to have general access to the city. I replied that I was very sorry for it, that the general-in-chief had a very great popularity in the army, which would raise to enthusiasm by his taking forcible possession of the city of Mexico, and I thought the armistice, particularly its terms, would not be received by the army with much favor. Gen. Pillow replied he thought so too; that he was opposed to any armistice, particularly one which did not require Chapultepec to be placed in our possession. I asked if he had expressed himself in these terms to the general-in-chief. He said he had not, or had not done so strongly, because the general-in-chief did not like opposition to his views. I replied that I thought it due to the general-in-chief, from the terms of intimacy which existed between them, that he should have expressed himself freely on the subject. He said then that he would write a note giving his opinions in relation to the armistice, which he wished I should take to Gen Scott, as I could probably obtain an interview with him, having formerly been his aid-de-camp, and could express to Gen. Scott more clearly possibly then the note could do his opinions on the subject. On our arrival at Miscoac gen. Pillow wrote a note and read it to me. I observed that it was needless for me to return to Tacubaya with the note, as the general-in-chief's time was so much occupied that I could have no means of obtaining a personal interview; by whom it was sent, if ever sent, I do not know.

Q—The witness will examine the note before the court and say if that be the note referred to in his testimony.

A—I judge it to be the same note; it is the same in substance.

Q—The witness will state of he knows what date said note was written.

A—I judge it to be on the 22d, because it was the next day after arriving at Miscoac.

Q—Was witness close to Gen. Pillow’s person when he was wounded at Chapultepec; if so, if he picked up the ball with which he was wounded, and what was its size?

A—I was within three or four yards of Gen. Pillow at the time, and picked up the shot that struck him, which was a large sized grape shot, over an inch in diameter.

Q—Witness will state if he left San Augustin on the morning of the 19th August, with gen. Pillow, with yourself, left there that morning.

A—I did leave with gen. Pillow at the time on question; he had been delayed a few minutes for the saddling of my horse, which had been just brought in, having been lost the day before. As I was awakened out of sleep, and much engaged immediately afterwards, my attention was not called to the time of day, though my impression is that it was before sunrise.

Q—Witness will state if he was separated from Gen. Pillow in the battle of Churubusco, from the time witness was struck upon the head by a splinter of a rock, until after the battle was over. State also where witness joined Gen. Pillow; on which side of the tete-du- pont was it?

A—I was separated from Gen. Pillow a few minutes before the time specified, and remained separated for the reason assigned, (that I could not find him afterwards, as I supposed he was on one side of the road when he was on the other,) after the occurrence in question. When I next saw him, he was at or near the portalles, a short time after I returned from accompanying Capt. Kearney’s charge a short distance.

Q—Where was Gen. Pillow placed when he was brought into the works at Chapultepec, until he was carried into the building?

A—I know nothing of it personally.

Cross-examined by the prosecution. Q—Had the witness a the time he was sent by Gen. Pillow to General Scott, at Tacubaya, on the subject of the defences at the gate of San Antonio, any previous information that he said works had already been or were under the examination of engineers from general headquarters?

A—I think they had been. I derived the information from Lieut. Tower. I don't know that they were under examination at that moment.
Q—Did witness learn from Gen. Pillow on the 22d of August last, that he, the said Pillow, had not been appointed one of the commissioners to negotiate an armistice, and what did the said Pillow further say, if any thing, respecting the instructions which had been given or would be given to the American commissioners by the said Scott on the subject of an armistice?

A—Gen. Pillow told me he had not been appointed as one of the commissioners; he was not on the commission. He declined giving any information regarding the instructions at that time, upon my requesting him to do so. I do not know that what I have stated about Chapultepec and the access to the city were in the instructions; if so, he said nothing about it.

Q—Was Brig. Gen. Pierce present when Gen. Pillow produced the note, dated August 23d, addressed to the said Scott, and if so, was the note read by or to the said Pierce also?

A—I have no recollection of any connection of Gen. Pierce with the note whatever; he may have been present, but I have forgotten it. He was present that afternoon, but I do not know that he was present when the note was read.

Q—Does the witness chance to know whether Mr. Frenner was present when the note was produced and read at Miscoac?

A—I do not recollect; I cannot call it to mind; he was at our quarters several times, and he may have been thereat that time.

Q—How long, as well as the witness can recollect, was Valencia’s entrenched camp carried on the morning of the 20th August, before Gen. Pillow arrived at that point?

A—When we were at or near the foot of the mound next to where the wagoners with their trains were clustered, not being able to get any further, we heard that the battle was then going on. We passed the mound into the open field, beyond where we stopped a few moments, while Gen. Pillow observed the entrenchments of the enemy with his spy glass, saw that our troops were in the works, when he dispatched Lieut. Ripley back to Gen. Scott, and we galloped forward as rapidly as we could to the entrenchments.—That is the only way that I can judge of the time.

Q—Does the witness chance to know at what time in reference to the capture of the main work on the heights of Chapultepec, (September 13th last) Gen. Pillow was brought up on the heights or to the main work?

A—Gen. Pillow being at the foot of the hill, while the assault was going on, there was a shout raised by our troops, I was requested by Gen. Pillow to ascend the hill where the assault was going on, and see what it meant. I did so rapidly, and arrived at the crest of the hill in time to pass over with the rear troops into the work. The shout was raised on the rush of our troops. In the excitement of the moment I continued on with the troops into the body of the work near the east end, before I recollected that I had to go back and report to Gen. Pillow. I returned as rapidly as I could to the foot of the hill. Gen. Pillow had been removed, and was being carried upon the hill. I missed him on the way, and it was some little time before I saw him in the work.

Q—Had the Mexican garrison been subdued, captured or driven out of Chapultepec when the witness turned about to go to Maj. Gen. Pillow?

A—It had. There was firing go on, but I took it to be from the enemy in a grove, and a return for from that direction.

Q—The witness has said that on returning from the castle of Chapultepec in search of Gen. Pillow he missed him; describe, as far as the witness can, the route he took returning and that taken by the said Pillow ascending its heights?

A—In coming down to the foot of the hill and arriving at the place where Gen. Pillow had been, and not finding him there, I went first to the left of the hill, not knowing but what he might have been carried in that direction; finding that he had not been carried in that direction, I returned to the place where he had been, and supposing that he might have been taken to the Molino del Rey to have his wound dressed, I proceeded in that direction until I found that such had not been the case; there was but one other path to get off by, and that was the one leading up the ramp which ascended the hill, which hence must have been the course in which he was carried.

Q—Was there any fire from the enemy in the direction of or upon the witness as he descended or re-ascended the hill at the time alluded in witness’ last answer?

A—The firing had entirely cessed on that part of the hill—the western side.

Q—At what point about the foot of the hill of Chapultepec did the witness leave Maj. Gen. Pillow when the witness left him to go towards the castle?

A—I think a little to the right of the center, at the foot of the hill, looking up. If you were to draw a tangent parallel to the front of the wood and call that the center, he was to the right of that point.

Q—Does the witness chance to know that Gen. Pillow, passing from the battle-field of September 8th last, called a the quarters of the said Scott, in Tacubaya; and of so, how long did the said Pillow remain at the said quarters on that occasion?

A—My memory is indistinct as to how long he remained. I know he called there, because I stopped with him.

Q—Did Major Gen'l Pillow remain at the said Scott’s quarters on that occasion ten, twenty, or a greater or less number of minutes; and did or not the said Pillow breakfast, lunch or dine there?

A—He did not breakfast there, that is certain. I was behind him when he entered Tacubaya; I think he lunched there after the battle, though I am not certain—that is my impression that we had something of a lunch. As regards the length of time, my memory is, as said before, indistinct—but I think over twenty minutes, if we lunched there.

Q—What does the witness know of a personal combat on or about the fields fo battle in this basin, on the 20th of August last, between Gen'l Pillow and a hostile Mexican officer or man, or of the said Pillow's having slain with his own hand on that day any hostile Mexican?

A—Nothing personal.

Examination in chief resumed. Q—Where were the wagons of which witness has spoken as being the place where Gen. Pillow got the first intelligence that a battle was being fought on the 20th August; were they in the gorge at the base of the hill? State, also, if from that place the party rode as rapidly as possible to the position from which the enemy’s works were observed with a glass?

A—I think the place referred to is at the commencement of a steep ascent at the bottom of the hill called Zecatapec. I am not a tall certain of the ground—I have not been over it since; I know it was a very short distance from there to where the spy-glass was taken out. We passed it in a few moments; we galloped with greater velocity over the ground than we would have done under any other circumstance.

Q—At the time the enemy’s works were observed with the glass witness will state if Gen. Pillow did not say he saw the enemy in retreat from the work?

A—I do not recollect; I saw myself what I took to be the enemy in retreat—I do not know whether that observation was made or not; I had no glass.

Q—Was not Gen. Pillow's own command and a part of Gen. Twiggs' still in and near the works?

A—The 4th Artillery and a portion of Cadwalader’s brigade, I think, when we entered, were in the work. A portion of his command was in the work and the remaining portion was in the neighborhood of that bridge, one hundred and fifty yards off.

Q—What orders did Gen. Pillow give witness about detailing part of the 14th Infantry to guard the prisoners at that place, and what duty did he assign witness personally about the prisoners.

A—Orders were given to the 11th Infantry by himself in person, I think to guard the prisoners; having detached me a few minutes previously to where the prisoners were, to see that they were properly taken care of, and to take a list of the names and rank, which I did, and gave to Col. Hitchcock that same morning.

Q—Was Gen. Pillow necessarily detained some time in getting the troops in motion and making the necessary dispositions for guarding the prisoners before he could leave to assume the command of the entire forces present.

A—He was.

Q—Witness has said he entered the works at Chapultepec with the rear of the troops; will witness say if he entered the work upon the west or southwest front; say also if the troops entered that part of the work before they did the south front.

A—It is not the south front, and I call it the west front because it is in that direction. I entered over the center of that front by a couple of ladders which had been thrown over the ditch, and over which a considerable body of troops passed.

Q—Did Gen. Pillow retain the witness near him after he was wounded, and did he continue to give orders and direct the movements of the American forces against the castle, and did witness know that Gen Pillow three times ordered the charge upon the redan; did he give orders to Gen Cadwalader, Col. Andrews, to Capt. Hooker and Colonel Clarke.
A—At the time gen. Pillow was struck by the grape shot, I advanced towards him as rapidly as the mud and water intervening would permit; this was near the open space at the foot of the hill, near the woods, probably twenty or thirty paces from the open space. Up to this point our troops under Gen. Pillow’s command had advanced rapidly, driving the enemy entirely out of the grove; they were here checked by a very heavy fire from the redan about forty yards off. Gen. Pillow at this moment was being assisted by some officer toward the root of a tree, a few paces to his left and front, now shouted out loudly, still endeavoring to walk, "Forward, men, forward." This he repeated several times. Finding him apparently in great pain, endeavoring to advance, I told him to keep quiet, and to take a seat at the foot of the tree, and that we (meaning his staff) would attend to his troops; he then pointed to the left, looking towards the place where the largest portion of our troops were still in check, telling me to urge them forward. At this moment a large body, or considerable portion of them rushed up the side of the hill to the redan, and after some little time I urged forward the remainder. I now returned to Gen'l Pillow, and found him near Col. Andrews, to whom he was saying something. I observed to him that Gen. Cadwalader was a few paces off; he told me to tell him of his situation, and to request his personal attention to all his command on the hill. I think it was at this time, or just before, that he dispatched Lieut. Ripley to bring up a portion of Worth’s division. Capt. Hooker some little time after this occurrence, while Gen. Worth’s troops had advance to the foot of the hill, (Clarke’s brigade) came down the hill and reported to Gen. Pillow, and requested permission to take a regiment in the direction that he could point out. Whilst the troops were clustered on the crest of the hill, waiting the arrival of the scaling ladders, which probably was some fifteen or twenty minutes, I was repeatedly sent up the hill to report the situation of things a the moment.

Cross-examination resumed: Q—The witness had spoken of a hill ascending by the roadway, and where he saw many wagons clustered and unable to ascend the hill.—Does the witness mean the mound from which the enemy was observed in the afternoon of August 19, by many officers, or some other hill nearer to San Augustin where the wagons were stopped?

A—There are two hills, one a mound from which the enemy were observed on the 19th of August, and one immediately adjoining, higher, in the direction of San Augustin; I think it was at the foot of this latter hill that the ascent spoken of is located, where the wagons were stopped.

Q—At what distance was Gen. Pillow laid upon the ground after being wounded, from the nearest point of the ditch surrounding Chapultepec by the shortest line, and what is about the distance of that position of the said Pillow to the gate of Chapultepec, by the route which the witness supposes the said Pillow was carried to that gate.

A—I think it is about forty yards from the ditch to the crest of the hill, about twenty from that to the redan, and about twenty to where Gen. Pillow was laid—all in the same line. I should suppose it some seventy yards to the round battery on the ramp, not exceeding that, and about as much from that point to the gate of the castle.

RW48v25i39p2c5, May 16, 1848: Testimony of Lieut S B Davis.

Lieut. Samuel B. Davis, 14th Regiment, recalled for defence:

Q—Witness will state whether he received any orders from Gen. Pillow on the 20th of August to return to Gen. Scott and acquaint him with Gen. Pillow’s movements, and to ask him to cause Gen. Worth to cooperate with him in the attack upon San Antonio, while he (Gen. Pillow) would move round and attack the rear—if so, state what was Gen. Scott’s reply?

A—Gen. Pillow sent me back from the village (I do not remember its name) to inform Gen. Scott that he had driven the enemy before him, and that with Gen. Worth’s cooperation—he attacking in front of San Antonio, and Gen. Pillow attacking in rear—he might easily take the work. I met Gen. Scott inside of the fortifications at Contreras, and communicted to him what Gen. Pillow had directed me to say to him. Gen. Scott replied that he was then arranging in his mind the instructions he was to send to Gen. Worth. He directed me to tell Gen. Pillow to proceed cautiously, and I am under the impression that he said he would soon overtake Gen. Pillow.

Cross-examined.—Did the witness leave Gen’l Pillow near the first ...[illegible] below the captured camp, or the next (San Angel) or the third or fourth village; or how long had it been after the said Pillow had advanced from that camp before he detached the witness?

A—I do not remember how many villages we passed; it took me about twenty minutes fast riding to get to Contreras from where I left Gen. Pillow.

Q—When the witness met the said Scott was Gen. Worth then with the said Scott, or had the said Worth already gone back towards San Augustin and San Antonio?

A—I did not see Gen Worth, and did not know whether he had been at Contreras or not.

Q—Did not the said Scott say to the witness that he had already sent Gen. Worth back to San Antonio with instructions respecting the attack in front upon that place?
A—Gen. Scott told me his answer before, that he was then arranging in his mind the instructions he was about to send to Gen. Worth. Those are nearly the words he used, as well as I can remember.

RW48v25i39p2c6, May 16, 1848: Testimony of Capt E Bogardus.

Captain E. Bogardus, of the 14th Infantry, sworn for the defence:

Q—Witness will state what he knows of the orders Gen. Pillow gave, or directed to be given, to Gen. Cadwalader about going forward with his brigade to support the movement on Col. Riley, on the 19th of August last?

A—The regiment to which I belonged halted near where Gen. Pillow stood some ten or fifteen minutes, when Capt. Deas, I think, came from the pedregal and reported that he was not able to overtake Col. Riley, and pointed out the direction Col. Riley had taken. During the conversation he spoke of Col Riley being likely to encounter some difficulties from a large force of reinforcements of the enemy, who were advancing from the city—I did not understand which. Gen. Pillow remarked that he had ordered Col Riley across the pedregal, to attack the enemy’s left and rear, and ordered Gen. Cadwalader’s brigade to go immediately to his support, which was then instantly put in motion across the pedregal.

RW48v25i39p2c6, May 16, 1848: Testimony of Lieut. N McClenahan

Lieut. N. McClenahan, of the 14th Infantry, sworn for defence:

Q—Witness will state what he knows about the orders given by Gen. Pillow to Gen. Cadwalader, on the 19th of August last; what orders he understood Col. Riley had received, &c.

A—Whilst the regiment was halted on the hill in front of the enemy, at Contreras, most of the men lay down, and I, observing Col. Herbert and Major Savage talking, walked up to them. After remaining there some fifteen or twenty minutes, I suppose, I turned to go to my company, but seeing Gen. Pillow and several officers around him, I started for where they were. When I arrived within about a hundred yards of them, I saw an officer come galloping up the corn-field, and supposing him to be a staff-officer, I hurried on to hear what he had to say. When I got up to the crowd he had turned round on his horse, and was pointing towards a very tall tree; he said he had been there. But could go no further; that Col. Riley had passed, and he could get his horse no further. Gen. Pillow then gave the order to follow Riley’s track through the corn-field to that tree, pointing it out, across the pedregal, either to support Col. Riley, who had been ordered to turn the enemy’s left flank, or that Gen. Cadwalader was to turn the enemy’s left flank, I am not certain which, but the order was given to turn the enemy’s left flank. The regiment was in motion then, and I heard no more orders given until we got across the pedregal.

The court then adjourned.

RW48v25i39p2c7, May 16, 1848: Queretaro, April 23, 1848.

The Secretary of the treasury expresses himself as follows in relation to the forced loss of $150,000 or $200,000, which will be employed exclusively by the Government to pay the necessary expenses in assembling the General Congress, and for its support in this city for two months:

“You will perceive according to the last advices published in the papers of the capital, how short a time there remains for us to ratify the treaty of peace, celebrated between our Republic and the United States of America.—In order that that treaty should be exchanged at Washington on the 2d of June, it is indispensably that it should be ratified at the latest, on the 15th of May next, and I doubt if it can be done if the Congress does not get together immediately. A multitude of unfortunate circumstances have prevented, until now, a reunion of Congress, and the principle one has been the want of money to give to (sic) Senators and Deputies for their necessary wants in this capital. Government has made the greatest efforts to realize this sum but without success, and having expended all its resources, his Excellency the President has, in order to facilitate the meeting of Congress, resolved that all the capitalists and persons of easy circumstances in this city, shall, to assist the Government, under the title of a loan, advance a sufficient amount of money to pay for two months the per diem of the Senators and Deputies of the General Congress. Once a quorum had been assembled, Congress will dictate the necessary laws to create such funds and resources as the Government may want to continue its existence.”

He concludes thus:
"His Excellency the President thinks that the salvation of the Republic imperatively demands the prompt meeting of Congress, and in order not to incur the terrible responsibility of losing the nationality of the country, the Executive will dictate extraordinary measures, which he never would have adopted if circumstances were not so very difficult and dangerous. God and Liberty! ROSA."

The priest Sanchez, the clergy’s organ in one of his sermons, preached on Friday night last, the 21st inst [Good Friday,] in the Church of Santa Clara, at which the greater part of the members of the Administration, and of the members of Congress that is about to meet, were present, said:

"Gentlemen—The only way to save the Republic, and—in pardoning the injuries you have received—to prove yourself Christians, is to make peace."

Yesterday, an American officer, a deserter of the 3d Infantry of the line, was baptized in this city with great pomp. He had for his godfather the President of the Republic, Pena y Pena.

CITY OF MEXICO, April 27.

I wrote you yesterday, and enclosed a translation of a letter from your Queretaro correspondent, containing highly important information. Lest my communication may miscarry I now send you the original letter. Our commissioners have not yet received an answer to their communication to the Government at Queretaro relative to the escort. Gen. Butler, a day or two since, was requested by the Mexican Government to allow some Mexican troops to enter this city to take possession of a quantity of army clothing left in one of the convents when the Mexican army evacuated the city. Gen. Butler, instead of granting the request, seized the clothing. It would not now be surprising if the Mexican Government were to ask the arms taken in the different actions to be returned. It would be in keeping with the modest relation to the clothing.

The mail is in from Queretaro, and should there be a letter from your correspondent, I will endeavor to forward it by the Mexican Vera Cruz mail, which leaves here at 10 o’clock to-night, an hour from hence. D. S.

MEXICO, April 27, 9½ P.M.

I have just received a letter from your Queretaro correspondent of the very latest date, and hasten to give you a rough translation:

QUERETARO, April 25, 1848.

The preparatory union of Congress have retaken their usual course, and few of the Deputies are wanting for a quorum. Queretaro, politically speaking, presents a most animated aspect, and nothing is talked of but peace. In every quarter there are warm discussions upon this grand question. The most vehement party for war is, without doubt, the army, but it has fallen so low in public estimation, and is so numerically weak, that it is doubtful if they can get up a pronunciamento, as it was publicly rumored here within the last few days they would.

Attention! To-morrow there is to be a meeting of the officers of the Artillery. The object of the meeting is not positively known. Some say that it is to deliberate upon the possibility of sending reinforcements to Gen. Landero; others say the meeting is called to pronounce against the Government, who have affected a loan to pay the Deputies and Senators their per diem for the last two months, and who have done nothing for the army.

It was rumored to-day that the American Commissioners would be here this afternoon.

The Charge d’Affairs of France, Monsieur le Marquis de Renepont, is here.

General Landero is, as you are aware, the general who signed the capitulation of Vera Cruz and the Castle of San Juan de Ullos.

From the copious files of papers which we have received by the New Orleans, we proceed to make extensive extracts:

[From the American Star of the 24th April]

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.—The case of Lt. Isaac Hare was disposed of yesterday, but of course the finding is not known.

Lt. Mathison, of the same regiment, one of the arrested, whose names we have before given, was cleared of the charges preferred, but a nolle prosequi was entered, and he was again remanded to prison.

Another officer of the army, Lt. T.B. Tilden, of the 2d Infantry, whom the State evidence implicates in the matter, has been also arrested.
The case of Lt. Dutton will commence, we hear, on Monday next.

Major A. D. Stewart, the senior Paymaster in the field, Col. Randall being ordered to N. Orleans, will, we understand, assume the duties of that office at once.

[From the American Star, of April 25]

The editor of El Eco del Comercio, one of the deputies who left the city yesterday for Queretaro, says there are sixty-four members in attendance, and that by the last if the week there will be seventy-six. If so, we see not why Congress may not organize by Monday or Tuesday. The same paper says Messrs. Sevier and Clifford will leave tomorrow or the next day, escorted by a small cavalry force, instead of by a division. It pronounces the story that they were going to threatened the Government as false—their only object being to present the treaty to the Mexican Government.

THE TREATY.—El Progreso at Queretaro has a long editorial in opposition to the treaty, intended to show the loss which Mexico suffers by it. It says, “though the U. States offer us $20,000,000 they take about $50,000,000 from us.” It urges various reasons why the treaty should not be ratified, and amongst other things says the Government is check mated—placed in a position where it can neither make peace (there being no Congress) nor war. El Progreso, as our leaders know, is the organ of the revolution or the war party. It is a journal of limited circulation, and has but little influence. Many of its articles are so personal and libelous, that were it not for the great liberty which the press in Mexico has enjoyed since its occupation by the American troops, it would long since have ceased to be published.

A CALL.—We observe in the Monitor of yesterday an advertisement, which is a little out of the usual way—For the benefit of the young gentlemen who were present on the occasion referred to, or others desirous of making a most agreeable acquaintance, we translate it, as follows:

“A young lady, who has attended the public balls, bears a strong resemblance to a daughter of mine, and being anxious that the reputation of my family should not suffer for any cause, I entreat those persons who were present at the ball to call at my house, No. 1 Calle de Ildefonso, and (though resembling each other) they will observe the difference between the two.”

RW48v25i39p2c6, May 16, 1848: Later From Mexico. From the New Orleans Picayune, May-1 o'clock, P. M. Arrival of the Steamer New Orleans. Later from the City of Mexico.

The U. S. steamer New Orleans, Capt. Edward Auld, arrived on Sunday evening from Vera Cruz, having sailed thence on Wednesday, the 3d inst. The ship made capital passages both going and coming.

Gen. Scott and suit left the city on Mexico on the 22d ult. and arrived at Vera Cruz on Sunday, the 30th. He immediately embarked on the brig St. Petersburg for New York, under a salute from Fort Conception. He was waited upon by the commander of the fleet and received a salute from the flag ship Cumberland. On Monday, the 1st inst. the St. Petersburg was towed to sea by the propeller Thompson. In passing the store ship Relief and frigate Cumberland their rigging was manned and three cheers given to old hero. On the 3d inst. the General exchanged visits with Com. Perry and was saluted by the flag ship Cumberland.

Among the passengers on the N. Orlenas, a list of whom will be found below, were gen. Pillow and staff, Gen. Towson, Gen. Cushing and staff, Col. Belknap, Col. Childs, Col. Duncan, Col. Withers and a large number of officers.

So desperate at one otime was thought the chance of bringing together a quorum of Congress, that the President had determined to exclude the Staets of New Mexico, Chihuahua and Yucatan in estimating the representation so that a smaller number may constitue a quorum.—Subsequent events led him to believe that a quorum could be obtained, and the President re-considered his determination.

Passengers by the New Orleans. —Major Gen. Pillow and staff; Gen. Towson; Gen. Cushing and staff; Col. Childs; Col. Belknap; Col. Randal; Col. Duncan; Col. Wither; Col. Watson and servant; Major Crutchfield; Capt. Huger; Capt. Swasey; Capt. Toulmin, Assistant Quartermaster; Capt. Brown; Capt. Sibley, 5th Infantry; Capt. Asquith; Lieut. The letters of our correspondent are to the latest date; we annex them.
CITY OF MEXICO, April 26, 1848.

Gen. Pillow left here on Sunday, the 22d inst. with an escort of Louisiana Mounted Men, under command of Capts. Fairchild and Ker. The night before he left he was serenaded by the splendid band of the 2d Infantry, and the next morning a large number of officers accompanied him some distance upon the road. The Court of Inquiry left on the 24th.

In my last letter I stated that Gen. Butler was to review the volunteers in the city on the 22d inst. The review was for more extensive than I was informed it would be, and came off on the plain fronting Molina del Rey. The divisions of Gens. Worth and Pillow, the former consisting of five regiments of infantry of the old line, a squadron of horses, and Col. Duncan’s battery, now commanded by Lieut. Hunt, and the latter of the six regiments of Kentucky, Tennessee and Indiana volunteers, were reviewed, and the line when extended, was over a mile in length. This is the largest review that has been during the war, and all present confessed it was the most magnificent military display they had ever beheld. A melancholy interest was added to the spectacle, by the display of the torn and battered colors of the 4th, 5th, and 6th regiments of Infantry, as they marched by the General-in-chief. On the 24th, the fine division of Gen. Smith was reviewed by the General-in-chief and its maneuvering elicited the admiration of every military man present. These reviews were in anticipation of the possibility of a forward movement being soon required; and you will perceive by the enclosed general order, that the inspection of all the troops in and about the city is ordered on the 30th inst.

HEAD QUARTERS ARMY OF MEXICO, [Orders 75] MEXICO, April 24, 1848.

1—The troops in the city of Mexico, at San Angel, Tacubaya, Chapultepec and Molino del Rey, will be mustered and inspected on the 30th inst.

The regular troops will be mustered by the respective regimental commanders—detached companies by company commanders; the volunteers at San Angel, by such staff officers at Major Gen. Patterson’s head quarters as he may designate; the 3d and 4th regiments Kentucky Volunteers, in the city, by Brevet Major R C Buchanan, acting Inspector General, and Capt. E R S Canby, Assistant Adjutant General, respectively; the 3d and 4th Regiments Tennessee, and 5th Indiana Volunteers, at Molino del Rey, by Capts Cady, 6th Infantry, W. Chapman, 5th Infantry, and B Alvord, 4th Infantry, respectively.

The several officers designated to muster the troops will refer all cases, on which they may desire information, to Lt. Hitchcock, acting Inspector General, and receive his instructions accordingly.

The duplicate "muster role" will be forwarded by the inspectors to the Adjutant General U S Army, and the "muster and pay rolls" for the pay department to Paymaster A D Steuart.

2—Paymaster A D Steurat and 1st Lt. P V Hagner are announced as the chief of the pay and ordnance departments with the army, respectively. All orders relative to their departments given them, in the name and by the authority of the commanding general, will be obeyed and respected accordingly.

By order of Major General Butler:
L. THOMAS, Asst’ Adj’t General.

In my last letter I stated that Col. Withers, of the 9th Infantry, had gone home on leave. I have learned since that he has tendered his resignation.

The letter of your Queretaro correspondent, of the 23d inst., which I send you, is full of interest, and some of his information is important. The extracts from the message of Rosa to the members of Congress now at Queretaro, show that Pena y Pena fully realizes the dangerous position of the nationality of the country, should the treaty not be ratified in season—and also shows an energetic determination to spare no effort to bring about peace. The passage in the conclusion of the message quoted by your correspondent, in which Rosa says—“and in order not to incur the terrible responsibility of losing the nationality of the country, the Executive will dictate extraordinary measures, which he never would have adopted if circumstances were not so very difficult and dangerous”—I presume refers to the intention of the President to decree that, in consequence of the condition of Yucatan, and other States, arising from the war, a certain number (less than the constitutional quorum) shall form a quorum. It is probable he will have to resort to this measure, as it is understood here that several Congress men, who are not willing to oppose the treaty by a direct vote, intend to defeat it by breaking the quorum, whenever the question is put.

The paragraph in the letter relative to the sermon of the Padre Sanchez is at this moment very important. It was

The Hon. Messrs. Sevier and Clifford have been invited within a few days past to various entertainments. They received invitations from Gen. Butler, and Senors Hargous and Emilio Voss. Night before last Messrs. Sevier and Clifford gave a supper to the American generals, at which the Mexican Gen. D. Ignacio Mora y Villamil was present.

Senor Haro y Tamariz was also invited to be present, but from motives of delicacy and patriotism, which were appreciated by the American Ministers, he was compelled to decline the invitation—Eco del Comercio.

MORE ROBBERY.—The stage which left the city yesterday was attacked by ten or fifteen ladrones. One was killed and another wounded by the American guard which accompanied the diligence. The ladrones were dressed like

The individual referred to as having been baptized with so much pomp at Queretaro, and who had the honor of having Pena y Pena stand at the baptismal fount as his godfather, is, without a doubt, the Lieut. O’Sullivan I have already spoken of as having resigned his commission in the 3d Infantry and gone to Queretaro to join the enemy. He is not a legal deserter, but all the dishonor of moral guilt will ever attach itself to his name.

The Commissioners will not leave for Queretaro, until the 29th or 30th inst. In the meantime, the troops which are to form the escort are being inspected daily, and are being prepared to present a fine appearance, in point of clothing and equipments.

A few officers from the train from Orizaba, under command of Captain Howe, came in in advance to-day, and the train is expected to arrive to-morrow or the day after.

It is reported in town to-day that here is a quorum of Congress at Queretaro, but I cannot trace it to an authentic

source. [BWP]
CAUGHT AT LAST.—A few weeks ago we advertised a reward for a sum of money stolen from the Gran Sociedad. The money belonged to Boyden & co. Yesterday Auguste Royer was arrested on the charge of taking it, and he confessed it $1400 of the money was found deposited in a merchant’s safe in Espirituo Santo.

COL. KINNEY.—We neglected to mention the arrival of the Colonel yesterday. He is still riding Selim, and as fast as ever, for he came from Puebla here in one day.

ROBBERY.—On Friday morning last, the diligence from this city was robbed near Perote, by two ladrones, armed with a knife each. There were eleven passengers in the stage. Two to eleven! The latter could not have been Americans.

Three Deputies from Puebla have arrived in the city, who we understood, will not proceed to Queretaro until the 5th of next month, on account of their not being able to obtain seats in the diligence.”—[Monitor of Friday].

If seats in the stage cannot by any possibility be had, is there no such a thing as obtaining private conveyance.—The Queretaro diligence goes three times a week—so it would seem that the seats in it were all taken up to the 5th of May. The American Commissioners, will probably leave in a day or two, and we presume would have no objection to the Puebla Deputies taking advantage of their escort. If this fails, we feel confident that our patriotic contemporary of the Monitor will see that they are conveyed to Queretaro in some way or other. Their presence may be necessary to enable him to keep his word about that quorum on Monday next.

FOR QUERETARO.—Four Deputies left the city for Queretaro yesterday morning, and three more will leave during the week. Monday next is the 1st of May, the day on which, according to the Eco, a quorum will be in attendance.

Ladrones all about us, committing their depredations in broad day as well as in the night. An American was beset by several of them yesterday near Plaza de Toros, who took his horse, saddle, spurs, money, &c. One or more of them were taken yesterday and carried before the governor. They owned up in regard to the theft, and probably expect to get off.

Herr Alexander has gone to Guanajuato and San Luis to charm the Senoritas in these opulent cities. The papers in those States will, of course, do the fair thing by the Herr, who is really a miracle, an enigma—in other words, a magician.

From the Vera Cruz Free American of April 30. A train arrived yesterday from Jalapa, commanded by Capt. Clendenning, assistant quartermaster, and escorted by a company of the Texas Rangers.

We understand that Maj. Chevalie, bearer of dispatches, arrived yesterday from the city of Mexico.

A train will leave this city this morning for the city of Mexico.

Private George Ealer, of Capt. Fairchild’s company of Louisiana Mounted Men, in company with two of his comrades, about a mile and a half from this city, on the Orizaba road, was shot dead by one of a party of Mexicans, said to have been about twenty strong.

THE COURT OF INQUIRY.—The court of inquiry met at the St. Charles Hotel in this city this morning with closed doors and adjourned until to-morrow morning, when various witnesses now in this city will be examined. We understand that the members of the court will leave the city on the 10th or 11th by the way of the river to hold a session in Frederick Md. Where they will adjourn about the 29th inst. unless something unexpected should turn up in the meantime.

The first business before the Senate this morning was the resolution of Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, calling on the President of the United States for his reasons why certain nominations had not been submitted to the Senate.

Mr. BORLAND spoke at some length in opposition to the passage of the resolution.

The subject was then informally laid aside, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the order of the day, viz: the bill for the Military Occupation of Yucatan.
Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate in a speech of some length in opposition to the bill and amendments.

Mr. BAGBY has the floor on this subject for tomorrow.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, transmitting correspondence between the Secretary of the Navy and Commodore Perry, relative to affording aid to the people of Yucatan.

On motion, the Senate the adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A Bill refunding to the several States advances made to Volunteers in the Mexican war, was taken up and passed.

Mr. STEWART submitted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a statement of the amount of exports of Cotton and Breadstuffs sent to England from this country for the first three quarters of 1847 and 1848.

An interesting debate sprang up on the subject matter of the resolution, which was participated in by Messrs. INGERSOLL, STEWART, and BAYLY.

Mr. BAYLY offered an amendment to the resolution, extending the statement to the last twenty years, which was agreed to.

The vote was then taken on the resolution, as amended, and it was adopted.

On motion, the House adjourned.

RW48v25i39p4c2, May 16, 1848: General Taylor.

That correspondent of the Tribune must be a wizard. Gen. Taylor HAS published a letter which does satisfy everybody, and he is an unreasonable man, be he Whig or Democrat, who is not satisfied with it.—N O Com Bulletin. [BWP]

We have but little to add to the letters of our correspondent, which we published yesterday, touching occurrences in Mexico. They gave a very complete resume of the state of affairs there. From the papers before us we cull a few items that may possess interest for some of our readers:

From the American Star, of April 20.

QUERETARO.—The Monitor of yesterday says preparations are making at the seat of Government for the reception of the American commissioners. It supposes they have the power to extend the time of the ratification of the treaty, as it would be impossible to have it ratified here and forwarded to Washington by the 2d of June. The best reception the Government could give the commissioners would be to see that Congress is in session to act upon what they have to submit to it. We do not hear of any increase of the members in attendance.

From the same.

FROM THE INTERIOR.—We received by the last mail a number of papers from the most important points in the interior. We find but little in them in relation to the treaty. Indeed the editors seem unwilling to touch upon the subject. El Progresso, at Queretaro, the organ of the revolutionists and anti-peace party, is violently opposed to the treaty. We find nothing, however, either in that paper or in Los Debates, the ministerial organ, in confirmation of the rumor that a pronunciamiento had been got up against the Supreme Government.

El Progresso says Ocampo, Governor of Michoacan, has resigned his place because opposed to recognising the treaty of peace while the Americans hold military possession of the country.

Adame, the late Governor of San Luis, has been released from prison, and sent with a competent escort to Zacatecas. He made this request of the Supreme Government, arguing the state of his health and condition of his family as a reason. The Progresso concludes an article on this subject in these words: “The alliance with the enemy is complete. Senor Adame, for being a friend to the war, is confined by order of the Government of his country. Senor Trias, at Chihuahua, for the same reason, is at the disposition of the Government. What will the world say to this?”

El Porvenir, at Toluca, has an article on the subject of the assembling of Congress. It says the 15th day of April is that upon which the Congress of the Union should close its ordinary session according to the 71st article of the Constitution. If the Government had succeeded within the few last days in getting the members together, they could, by a motion made to that effect, or by a petition to the President under the same article be prorogued for thirty days. But if the quorum should not be in attendance, the editor says Congress cannot be constitutionally convened. The Porvenir then remarks upon the culpable remissness of the members in not listening to the voice of their country, and attending to the discharge of their duties. He exclaims, “Heaven have compassion upon us!”

CHIHUAHUA.—The Official Register of Durango has an official communication from Munoz, the commanding general, addressed to the Governor of the State, which states that after a siege of eight days, the Villa de Rosales was taken by assault, and Gov Trias taken prisoner by the American forces. We have stated this before unofficially. Munoz adds that in consequence he is obliged to assume the Executive power of the State, according to the constitution. He concludes by complimenting the “poor and abandoned State of Chihuahua” for fighting for the national honor, and defending itself from its perverse invaders.

The same paper says that private letters state that four hundred of the American forces in the capital of Chihuahua and Rosales, were advancing with four pieces of artillery to take up a position at Rio Florido, and that a battalion of five hundred Texans had left Saltillo, in the direction of Balsan de Mapimi, and nine hundred more towards the frontier fo Zacatecas. On the 27th ult. an order was published by the American major general, stating that both Americans and Mexicans would be protected in their persons and Property—that private houses would be taken only for the general and quartermaster—that public and religious buildings would remain under the protection of the United States Government—that a Mexican police be established, and that the municipal and judicial authorities continue in the exercise of their functions until further orders. The Vice Governor of the State sent a note to Gen Price on 24th ult., requesting him to withdraw his forces to the line which they occupied before the 1st of March last, according to the stipulation of the articles of the armistice. The editor adds: We do not know the general’s reply, but private letters state that he has said that he is not subject to Gen Butler, but to his Government at home, from which alone he will received orders.” The Progresso has a similar statement, on the authority of a private letter, substituting the name of Gen Scott instead of Gen Butler.

The Alcalde of San Juan de Guadalupe, under date of the 12th ult. complains that he has heard that a party of one hundred Americans were at Caopas on their way to the mines of San Juan, (in Durango.) One of the military commanders writes to the Governor of the State, that he supposes these men to be a portion of those at Mazapil, who were moving from that place in consequence of the armistice.

[From the American Star, of April 19]

PACHUCA.—Col. Withers, Maj. Lally, Cap’s Bodlish and Sprague, of the 9th, arrived in the city on Sunday, from Pachuca, with an escort of dragoons. We learn that the health of the troops at that post is improving. We have a letter from an officer at Pachuca, giving an account of a recent pleasure excursion in the vicinity, for which we hope to find room in a day or two.

EARTHQUAKE.—We have heard from several gentlemen that there was quite an earthquake on Sunday evening, at about 9 o’clock. It is said to have created quite an undulation among the chandeliers of the city, though it belonged to the perpendicular rather than the class of these subterranean visitors. We felt nothing of it ourselves, and conclude it was “no great shakes” after all.

[From the same]

OUR FLAG ON POPOCATEPETL.—The American flag has been unfurled to the breeze on the highest pinnacle of the North American continent, and the glorious stars and strips have waved in triumphant folds over the eternal snow of the “smoking mountain.” Six of the party which was reported a few days since as having failed to ascend Popocatepetl, remained in camp two or three days after the first unsuccessful effort, to wait a more favorable day for the enterprise; they were soon gratified, and again made the attempt, which was entirely successful, and the party arrived at the highest peak, overlooking the great crater, without accident. Here the flag of the United States was raised at an elevation of more than three miles and a quarter above the level of the ocean, and the party enjoyed a prospect of unsurpassed magnificence and sublimity. The six persons composing the party were Lieut Stone, Ordnance; Lieuts Buckner and Kirkham, 6th Infantry; Lieut, Anderson, 2d Dragoons; Lieut Romford, 8th Infantry, and Mr. Bagley, an English gentleman of this city.

Thus has the American flag waved, not only over the Halls of the Montezumas, but over the highest point of the Land of the Aztecs.

There are in the papers details of robberies and other outrages not uncommon in Mexico, but they would possess no interest for our readers.

Brevet Maj. Gen. Wm. J. Worth sworn for defence: Q—Witness will please state if he knows what the views of Gen. Pillow were in relation to the Tacubays armistice, before said armistice was entered into; also, whether Gen. Scott was made acquainted with Gen. Pillow’s views on this subject, and were said views in favor of or opposed to the armistice.

A—I answer that on the morning of the day on which the commissioners were named and instructed, I was, by invitation at the headquarters of the general-in-chief; shortly after my being there Gen. Pillow arrived, whether by accident or invitation, I cannot say. The general-in-chief read to Gen. Pillow and myself the instructions to be given to the commissioners so far as they were written; being incomplete, he desired us to retire a short time until he had completed the paper. While out Gen. Pillow and myself had some conversation upon the subject generally, in which he expressed himself unfriendly to an armistice. I use the word “unfriendly” because it hits the precise degree in which he expressed himself. Not coinciding in the opinions he expressed in that particular point, I briefly gave the reasons from the information I had received shy it might not be improper. In regard to the latter part of the question, I do not know whether Gen. Scott was or was not acquainted with Gen. Pillow’s views.

Q—State the substance of the conversation which took place in the outer room referred to in your last answer; state also what witness and Gen. Pillow finally agreed upon as being in your opinion proper, and whether these views were by agreement of witness and Gen. Pillow made known to Gen. Scott by the witness.

A—I have already stated a part of the conversation which took place when we had retired from the room—Gen. Pillow urged the opinion that if an armistice was concluded that the city of Mexico and Chapultepec should be given up as guarantees. In respect to the city Of Mexico, for the same reasons that induced me to suppose that an armistice might be proper, I also differed with him but coincided with him in regard to the latter opinion as it was also my own; but there was no “agreement” between us in the ordinary sense of the word, but Gen. Pillow intimated a wish to express that opinion to Gen. Scott. (When I say opinion, I mean simply to refer to the fortress of Chapultepec,) to which I assented. On returning to the private apartment of the general-in-chief shortly after, either the added part or the whole paper was read to us; my impression is that the general-in-chief read over the whole paper as completed; after which, when a suitable occasion occurred, I expressed the hope that the possession of Chapultepec might be made a condition, a sine qua non. It is my impression, although it is a point on which I cannot be positive, that I used the expression “we hope.” There was a rapid conversation between the parties, which was shortly interrupted by the arrival of the commissioners. Gen’l Pillow was present when I expressed that hope.

Q—Will witness recollect whether they were the American or Mexican commissioners that interrupted the conversation?

A—I refer to Gen. Quitman, Gen. Pierce, and I thing Gen. Smith afterwards came in. I knew those gentlemen to have been designated to constitute the commission.

A—Witness will please state if he has any knowledge that Gen. Pillow’s sought or desired a position as commissioner to negotiate the Tacubaya armistice? State also, if witness heard any conversation between Gen. Scott and Gen. Pillow on his subject, about the time the commissioners were being selected by Gen. Scott; if so, state what such conversation was?

A—I have no knowledge that Gen. Pillow sought or desired a place on that commission. There was a conversation in the early part of the morning, principally by the general-in-chief, in regard to the composition of that commission, in the course of which the general-in-chief remarked, that he feared he had offended two of the commanders of regular divisions, by not including them in that commission, referring to the commands of the second and third divisions, without naming them. While this conversation was going on and towards the close of it. Gen. Pillow entered the room, when the general-in-chief addressed him, as I thought at the time, jocularly or playfully, saying, “And I suppose I have offended or made an enemy of you, too?” Whereupon Gen. Pillow asked an explanation, saying he did not understand, or some such remark. The general then rapidly went over what had taken place, and explained to Gen. Pillow that for certain reasons he had not included the officers alluded to in the commission, To which Gen. Pillow replied that he had no desire to be on the commission, but was ready cheerfully to obey any orders the general-in-chief had for him. I repeat again that the observations of the general-in-chief appeared to me to be jocular and playful.

The court then adjourned.

transmitted a message communicating copies of certain dispatches, &c. only one of which the Intelligencer was able to obtain, viz: the following to Commodore Perry, written when the Senate was actually debating the question of succor to Yucatan:

"While the United States are engaged in a war with Mexico, the actual presence, without our consent, of the armed force of a neutral Power within the territory of our enemy, co-operating with any portion of the Mexican people in military operations, [even assisting the Yucatanese to resist the Indians, we suppose,] cannot be permitted.—Such a state of things, it is hoped will not occur. If you should have reason to believe that it will, you will communicate it without further delay, that THE PRESIDENT may take such measures as HIS constitutional duty will require at his hands."

We have had occasion, more than once, to notice the extreme callousness with which the present age is accustomed to observe any extraordinary act of the Executive or its officers, civil and military, at home or abroad. This has arisen from their frequency, which has had the effect of blunting public sensibility, and rendering the public mind careless or indifferent. What would have been said, in the days of James Madison, of such instructions as these to a naval officer, given while the Congress of the United States was in session, and while the question which it decides in such a summary way was actually under debate?

RW48v25i40p1c2, May 19, 1848: Mr. Trist.

The Administration papers are already preparing to make an onslaught upon this gentleman, because he had the very uncommon audacity to testify to the truth in favor of America’s “great captain.” The Nashville Union, Mr. Polk’s home organ, has a letter from a Lieut. Col. Whitfield of the Tennessee Volunteers, who, it seems, has been attending the Court of Inquiry, and who delivers his sentiments in the following chaste and elegant language:

“The court of inquiry is still sitting, and what every body says must be so. They say Pillow is making worse than a soup case of Scott. I heard Mr. Trist examined—I can assure you he was tight on Pillow. * * I suppose you will have seen his testimony before this. I think Mr. Trist is the infamous scoundrel. I am of course for peace, and will be glad when this war is closed; but I would prefer to have remained here five years, rather than Mr. Trist’s treaty should have been ratified by our Congress. These are not my feelings alone, but many others think the same.”

What respect can any paper that would admit such an assault into its columns, have, wither for itself or for its readers, and what sort of friends must Gen. Pillow have, in the army, if this writer is a fair specimen?

RW48v25i40p1c2, May 19, 1848: Gen. Worth’s Letters.

The reader will find these singular productions in another column.

When Gen. Worth was in the United States last, after he had resigned his commission, because the President refused to exult him over the head of Gen. Twiggs, he professed himself, on more occasions than one, the warm personal friend of Gen. Scott. He appealed to his situation at that time, when, having resigned his commission, he had given up along with it all ambition or future promotion, in proof of his sincerity.

And well he might be the friend of General Scott. He took him from the ranks, where but for him he might have been to this day, had he continued in the army—held him by the hand throughout the whole of his ascension—gained him a grade, by his own personal interest, wherever he could—and, to use an expression of his own, proved himself, in very truth, more than a father to him throughout his career. There are officers in the army, and many of them—officers of high grade and undoubted worth—men that have grown grey in the service of their country, who we know have conceived unconquerable prejudices against Gen. Scott, for what they conceive to be his unwarrantable and misplaced affection for Gen. Worth, operating, as they have supposed, to their own immediate detriment.

In spite of all these considerations, we find Gen. Worth, without a moment’s previous warning, attempting, to use a common phrase, to plunge a dagger into the bosom of his nearest and dearest friend; and the pretext which he alleged was so shallow, and the act otherwise so unaccountable, that we cannot in our hearts attribute it to any other cause then that indignantly alleged by the gallant victim himself; namely, that he supposed it would be a sacrifice acceptable to the higher powers.

It is not wonderful that he who left the United States as the devoted friend of Gen. Scott, acknowledging towards him the obligation of a child to a parent, and within one year thereafter became his most deadly enemy, should leave Washington a Whig, and find himself in Mexico a Locofoco of the most unmistakable stamp. What these letters are published for at this time we are unable to say; we suspect, however, that the wire-workers at Washington have already begun to despair of electing any but a military man, and that General Worth is though of, by a portion of them, as a counterpoise to the immense popularity of Gen. Taylor. They do not seem to consider, that the moral weight of the latter, far more than any military services he may have rendered, is that which inclines the beam so decidedly in his favor, and that Gen. Worth has forever relinquished all claims to consideration upon this score. We are pained to be compelled, by a sense of public duty, to speak in harsh terms of one who has often fought bravely and shed his blood freely for his country; yet we cannot, for our lives, regard his conduct towards Gen. Scott as rising greatly, either in dignity or gratitude, above that of Amos Kendall to Mr. Clay.

For one thing, at least, however, we are under great obligations to Gen. Worth. We allude to his exposition of the Locofoco doctrine of the Veto, which is done, as the Union says, with a soldier's frankness, and with far more candor than we have seen any Locofoco do it before. If Gen. Worth does not draw the picture of an Autocrat in this expose, then we confess we are at a loss to know what an Autocrat is. That our readers may form their own opinion of it, we insert it here:

"2d. ‘The Veto Power.’

“This I regard as the tribunitial power, essentially democratic, popular and conservative; placed by the Constitution in the hands of the Chief Magistrate, to represent, in his person, the absolute sovereignty of the people; and it must be an extraordinary abuse, of which we have had no example, that would induce me to vote any change or alteration. I have supposed that the constitution only looked to its exercise in the case of hasty or unconstitutional legislation, or (an insupposable case) fraudulent or treasonable.”

We had thought before that Congress represented the people, and that the President was only the Executive officer. [BWP]

RW48v25i40p1c4, May 19, 1848: Tacubaya, (Mexico, April 12th, 1848.)

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 18th ultimo reached me last evening. The return courier leaves in a few hours; and as another opportunity will not probably occur in the next two weeks, I hope you will excuse me for substituting the enclosed copies of replies to two other friends, as answers, in part, to the inquiries you have addressed to me.—To many communications on the same subject from citizens of different States, these are the only answers, other than simple acknowledgments of civility, that I have felt at liberty to make. In each case, the writer was already named—or looked to be named—a members of the Democratic Convention, to meet in May. To that extent these replies embody, distinctly and truly, my sentiments and opinions. In respect to the additional points presented to yourself, I shall now as distinctly and truly answer.

1st. "Graduation and reduction of the price of public lands."

I would vote any reduction necessary to place farms within the reach of industrious bona fide settlers or emigrants, regarding the early occupation and cultivation of the public domain as the richest public treasure; hoping still to see an annual surplus over and above expenses of administration—as surveys, sales, &c—carried to the public treasury, to be appropriated, among other national objects, to the improvement of our great lakes and rivers, to the extent of constitutional permission. It is my settled conviction, that within twenty years the commerce of the great lakes and western rivers will reach a magnitude far exceeding, and ever thereafter taking the lead of, that flowing to and from the Atlantic; and when our lines of communication with the points now attained on the Pacific are once established and opened to the enterprise of our people, there will hardly be found a term a comparison. We shall exhibit the extraordinary spectacle, under our free and glorious institutions, of clutching and controlling the commerce of Europe with one hand, and the riches of China with the others. I speak of riches; but the fulfillment of our high political and social destiny is the prominent and grand consideration.

2d. "The veto power?"

This I regard as the tribunitial power, essentially democratic, popular, and conservative; placed by the constitution in the hands of the Chief Magistrate, to represent, in his person, the absolute sovereignty of the people; and it must be an extraordinary abuse, of which we have had no example, that would induce me to vote any change or alteration. I have supposed that the constitution only looked to its exercise in the case of hasty or unconstitutional legislation, or [an insupposable case] fraudulent or treasonable legislation.

3d. "The right of the people of the different section of our Union to carry their property” [of whatever kind or complexion] “to, and participate in the territory about to be acquired from Mexico,” [or acquired from any other power on this continent.] I cannot suppose to he seriously questioned. When the acquired territory shall be admitted in to the sisterhood of States, it will be for the admitted States to determine all things relating to their own social condition. Congress, in its recognition of these views, will doubtless ever recur to the principles of that great landmark—the Missouri compromise—to guide its decision.

I remain, my dear sir, your friend and obedient servant, W. J. WORTH.

[to] Hon. F. W. BOWDON, M. C., Washington, D. C.

P. S. May it not be well doubted, whether the public domain and the Post Office Department are legitimate, or other than incidental sources of revenue?—our policy being to people the former, and to make the latter [as it was designed) a convenience to the whole country, by the rapid transmission of intelligence. If either defrays its own expenses, will not the national objects be fulfilled, aside from surplus for other great national objects? W.J.W.

The following are the letters referred to above:

TACUBAYA, Mexico, March 12, 1848.

MY DEAR SIR: Your friendly and obliging letter of the 3d ultimo reached me yesterday.

I have never had a party tie, or association, in any partisan sense; nor ever failed, in social and familiar intercourse, on proper occasions, freely and frankly to utter such opinions as I may have entertained on questions of general political interest to my country. As a soldier, I have held it unbecoming to mingle in party strife, or take part in local politics. God forbid that we should ever, even seemingly, witness a union of the ballot-box and the cartridge box.

RW48v25i40p1c5, May 19, 1848: City of Mexico, January 10, 1848.

MY DEAR SIR: In acknowledging your favor of November 12th, it is due to candor to say that I am not aware of ever having entertained a desire for preferment out of my own profession, probably because of conscious want of qualification, and distaste for the means whereby preferment is usually attained.

The subjects you pay me the compliment to present, are of high national concern and interest, in respect to which my humble opinions are equally unimportant and uninfluential; and it is only in courtesy to a generous, although unknown friend, that, with these remarks, I proceed to answer your interrogatories, viz:

1st. “What are your views of the Mexican war, and do you believe it an unjust one?”

War, ever to be deplored, should be avoided so long as may be consistent with national honor and national rights. IN my opinion, there has been no war in our history, [always excepting that for independence, which stands out, and will through all time, a case by itself, nor in that of any other people, commenced under greater provocation, or waged with higher humanity. Regarding, then, this war as eminently just, I sincerely hope it may be the pleasure of government, sustained by the people, to prosecute it with vigor, until ample satisfaction for indignities, and full indemnity for sacrifices, be received.

2d. “Are you in favor of, or opposed to, the chartering a United States Bank?”

When the question was agitated as a measure of financial and political expediency, I looked no further into the subject than to keep myself informed generally on matters of public interest. During its struggles for a recharter, and when writhing and reeling under the blows of the patriot President Jackson, my judgment was instructed that such an institution, however wisely restricted or cautiously guarded, must, of necessity have within itself elements dangerous to public and private virtue, if not to the appropriate and healthful action of government. So the people seem to have regarded and decided the question; and it is dif... [. . . INCOMPLETE . . .]

U. S. SENATE.

The Senate transacted very little business to-day. Mr. Bagby offered a resolution declaring that neither the Congress of the United States the Legislatures of the States, or the inhabitants of the Territories of the United States, had any power over slavery existing therein.

Mr. BAGBY moved to lay the resolution on the table.

This motion gave rise to an interesting debate, which was participated in by Messrs, BAGBY, FOOTE, BADGER, and

The yeas and nays were demanded on the motion to lay on the table; and being taken, stood as follows: Yeas 27

Mr. BAGBY spoke at some length in favour of the passage of the bill. He favored the temporary military occupation of The amendment of Mr. DAVIS was then put to the vote and rejected—Yeas 5, nays 25.

Mr. DIX offered an amendment to the bill, the object of which was to place the army and navy of the United States at the disposal of the President, to act under and by direction of the Government of Yucatan.

Mr. CLAYTON hoped that the friends of the bill would postpone further action to-day, as the Senate was very thin.

Mr. HANNEGAN assented to the postponement, but said he should press the subject to a final vote to-morrow.

On Mr. HANNEGAN'S motion the Senate held a short executive session, and afterwards adjourned.

Bills were reported from the various standing committees, read twice and referred, to the Committee of the Whole.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole and took up the Revolutionary Pensions Bills, which was passed.

Mr. BAYLY rising to address the committee, Mr. VINTON asked permission to occupy the floor for the span of ten minutes, to enable him to move to take up the Naval Pension Bill.

Mr. BAYLY declined yielding the floor and proceeded to address the Committee on the subject of slavery in the Territories, and in opposition to the principles of the Wilmot Proviso.

Mr. WILEY followed, and read his speech. He was most decidedly in favor of the Mexican war, &c.

On motion, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

U.S. SENATE.

After the transaction of some unimportant business, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the Yucatan Bill.

RW48v25i40p1c5, May 19, 1848: The Court of Inquiry.

This military tribunal assembled yesterday morning about 10 o'clock at the St. Charles Hotel, for the purpose of taking the testimony of Mr. Alexander Walker, one of the editors of the Delta, and of Mr. McGinnis, also employed in that establishment. The court sat with closed doors, on account of the smallness of the apartment in which it was held, and no members of the press were able to procure admittance for that reason. As the members of the court departed in the afternoon, immediately after dinner, in the steamboat Cincinnati, there was not sufficient time to obtain a transcript from the record of the day's proceedings. The only material fact elicited, however, was in the testimony of Mr. Walker, who swore that the interlineations made in the celebrated "Leonidas" letter, as published in the Delta, were not made by Gen. Pillow, but were in his (W.'s) hand-writing, and made in the Delta office before the publication of the letter.—N. O. Picayune, May 10.

RW48v25i40p2c1, May 19, 1848: Gen'l Taylor – The Philadelphia Convention.

We perceive, with some degree of surprise, that the resolution of General Taylor, expressed in his letter to our neighbors of the Republican, not to withdraw his name from the canvass whoever may be the nominee of the Convention, still continues to agitate and excite our Whig brethren of the press in a very extraordinary degree. We say we are surprised to see it; for, to us, the declaration of General Taylor appeared natural, precisely such as we might have been led to expect from all his previous letters, an precisely such as we should have expected had we written to him ourselves on the subject.—Though it would have been far more agreeable to us, and we doubt not to a large majority of his friends, had he thought proper to withhold it, we yet maintain that it is perfectly consistent with every thing he has either said or written since his name was first put in nomination for the Presidency. He has invariably said, that though a Whig he would not run as the candidate of a party—that he would not be the exponent of a party creed—that he had no aspirations for the office—but that if he did run it all, it must be as the candidate of the people, and not of a party. On more occasions than one, too, he has said that he would accept the nomination of any party, or of all parties, provided such acceptance left him totally free and untrammeled—unpledged to act in any other way than according to the dictates of his own judgment—and unbound by any party obligation whatever, to do the requirements of any party, it being his determination, in case of his election, to discharge his duty as it is laid down in the Constitution, and to admit no other rule as a guide. After having taken such strong ground, before the whole country, as this—after having said repeatedly that if run at all, it must be as the candidate of the whole people and not of a party—after having over and often assured the public that he would give no pledges whatever as to his future course—he would assuredly be guilty of the most direct and palpable recreancy to his own deliberately expressed opinions, only a few months old, should he now consent to abide by the nomination of the Convention.

The letter to the Republican, then, may have been injudicious, and we think, under the circumstances, it was—it may have been imprudent, and as such we certainly regard it—it may have been ill-timed, and we surely think it was;—but it was honest, it was candid, it was consistent; it told the whole truth, and spurned all concealments. It appears to us very easy to explain the reason why Gen. Taylor, Whig as he has always been—one, too, who has had a near inspection of Locofocoism in high places, and has learned to despise its narrow and selfish spirit from his own personal experience—should have, from the first, determined to run as the candidate, not of a party, but of the people. After his four great victories, the whole nation, without any distinction of party, seemed to call him with one acclaim to the Presidential chair; and there is little doubt that had the election come on about this time last year, he would have been elected by a majority more than trebly as large as any other candidate ever received.—He was nominated by public meeting of all parties—his name was hoisted by newspapers of every possible political complexion—thousands of letter were written him by persons belonging to every possible shade and variety of party, begging him to come out as their candidate. Because they believed his name to be a tower of strength, and that it could not fail to secure the triumph of their peculiar principles. It was natural for him to believe from these demonstrations’ as he actually did believe, and as many who profess to be far better judges of the popular current than he, believed, that his name was, of itself, sufficient to level all distinctions of party, and that he would go into office as the Chief Magistrate of a great and united people, not as the mere President of a party. That he should prefer to go in as a National, rather than as a party candidate, was not only natural, but highly honorable. It is what any man would prefer, provided it involved no sacrifice of principle. It is what Mr. Clay has already said that he should prefer; for it is understood, that after the result of the late election was known, he declared that he would never again be a candidate, unless called into the canvass by the voice of the whole people. What other man then of high worth, situated as Gen. Taylor was, and believing as he did; would have acted differently? What other man, who believed that he could go in as the National candidate, would have narrowed himself down to become that of a party? Would

Even though he may have found the opinion which he formed of his popularity, to have been in the main incorrect, yet since he professes to have no desire to be President, (and we doubt not, sincerely,) who has a right to blame him for maintaining his position even now?

Let us say a few words as to the Whig Convention, the day of whose assemblage is rapidly approaching. As a no-party candidate, Gen. Taylor, it is true, does not recognize its authority so far as he himself is concerned; but all his Whig friends constituting nine-tenths of all the political friends he has in the Union, fully recognize it, and will be bound by its decision. The immense majority of them every where throughout the Union, have determined to meet their brethren at Philadelphia—to urge the claims of their favorite candidate to the utmost of their power—to secure his nomination of them can—to push his claims before the people, in every possible way, if he be nominated—to submit without a murmur, if he should undergo a defeat in the Convention. Nay, they will do more than submit. Deeply as they may deplore the loss of their favorite, they will yet exert themselves to the uttermost for his successful rival—they will in all cases act as though Old Zach himself were in the field. Such is the loyalty of the Taylor Whigs to the great principles of their party. Upon the Convention devolves the very serious duty to weigh the respective claims of Mr. Clay, of Gen. Taylor, and of any other candidate who may chance to be brought before them, and to settle in their own minds who presents the most perfect combination of availability and qualification. It is our duty, (the mass,) if we would still continue to be worthy of our political name, to support him upon whom the choice of the Convention may fall.

This, then, is the true state of the case. Gen. Taylor himself will not submit to a Convention, but nine-tenths of his friends will. If he fail to receive the nomination, he will not withdraw himself. Indeed he cannot do so with any degree of consistency. He has always been passive in the matter—he has always said he did not desire the office, and that if his friends chose to nominate him, they must do so of their own motion—he has in fact repeatedly declared, substantially, that he was in the hands of his friends, and that he would have neither lot nor part in any movement that might be made with regard to the Presidency. Now, retiring from the canvass would, we take it, be a very active step, and so far, perfectly contradictory of Gen. Taylor’s passive determination. He cannot consistently do it; but his friends, nine-tenths of whom are Convention Whigs, can just withdraw his name if he should not receive the nomination, without his agency, as they introduced it in the first instance. The two parties, comprising almost the whole population of the U. States, will of course, after their nominations shall have been made, rally each upon their man; so that the party which would be left to support Gen. Taylor should be...[4 illegible words] very small—not such as his friends would wish to see come forward in his support.
It probably does not become us to give advice to the Convention itself; yet we cannot forbear saying, that if in the indulgence of a personal preference, they shall neglect the signs of the times, as they appear upon comparison of notes among themselves, they will expose the cause to ruin, and not only incur, but merit, the excretion of every true Whig in the land.

We give below an animated, and we have no doubt just picture of this distinguished man, from an article in the Boston Traveller, the writer of which evidently speaks understandingly upon the subject. It is a full length likeness, full of life an interest, standing out from the canvass like a picture by one of the great masters. And what an opinion does it not give us of the simple tastes, the unpretending demeanor, the moral worth of Zachary Taylor! We have never heard of but one man in this country who combined so much simplicity of character, with such a high standard of moral and intellectual excellence, and that was one of Virginia's greatest sons; probably next to Washington, her very greatest—we mean the late Chief Justice Marshall. Strangely as the would-be-great misunderstand the fact, it nevertheless is the fact, that in the vast majority of instances—a majority so great indeed that the rule may almost be considered universal—the truly great man is remarkable for a certain simplicity of character, and an entire absence of all pretension. Numberless instances abound to prove the fact, of men whose reputation is as wide as the limits of the habitable globe.

In the high moral worth of Gen'l Taylor, as testified by all who have known him, the people have the best guarantee that he will do his duty faithfully and to the best of his ability should he be elected. In his regard for the Sabbath and his respect for religion generally, he bears a close resemblance to the Father of his country, his great model—the glass by which he appears desirous to fashion all his actions. Yet not alone in this point does he resemble him. His calm demeanor, his patience under trials, his respect for law, his humanity, his courage, his skill, his perseverance, are all traits enjoyed in common with Washington. Should a great crisis arise in this country now, as one arose in 1775, the people of the Union would as naturally turn to Zachary Taylor, as the man for the occasion, as their forefathers did to George Washington at that epoch. We do not mean to say that Gen. Taylor is equal to Gen. Washington—he never had his equal—but that his qualities are of the same nature, and fit him for a similar line of duties.

His family relations are honorable—Mrs. Taylor is one of the most elegant women in the army. And that is great praise; for some of the most elegant and accomplished ladies in the country are united in marriage to the officers of our army. She is elegant in her person and manners; a lady of humble, but decided piety, being a member of the Episcopal Church. His son has recently graduated from Yale College. His daughter is distinguished for accomplishments and beauty. She has declined offers from many officers of the army, in obedience to the desire of her father, who does not wish to see her married to a soldier.

Gen. Taylor is not a profane man. He has been accused of profanes. Words said to have been uttered by him on the field of battle, have gone through the Union. But no one who knows Gen. Taylor believes such a report. Men who have been with him in scenes most trying, under circumstances the most provoking, never heard him utter an oath; he refrains, from principle.

Gen. Taylor was two years in a fort as the commander of 1600 men, many of whom were the worst of the race; in that fort, swearing was as common as plumes; the very moral sense seemed to demand an oath as a test of a gentleman. The chaplain was with Gen. Taylor during his whole command, and saw him under circumstances of the greatest provocation, says he never heard an oath from his lips. His principles and practice in this respect are known to the whole army.

Gen. Taylor is a strict teetotaler. He conforms to the customs of the army, and keeps on his sideboard such liquors as are drank in the army; but he pledges his officers only in cold water. At the close of a parade, it is etiquette on the part of the officers to call at head quarters and pay respect to the Commander-in-Chief. It is etiquette on the part of the commander to allow the officers to drink his health. It has been Gen. Taylor's custom for years to pour out his glass of cold water, and drink the health of his staff in that alone. When he assumed the command of Fort Jesup, he found intemperance to be the prevailing sin.—Whipping, imprisonment and fines had been exhausted.—It was proposed to attempt to reform the men. Gen. Taylor gave the chaplain his warm co-operation by authority and example. And all know that in the army nothing can be done without the aid of the commander. A change was seen at once; and in less than two years, more than 600 reformed men marched in procession with badges and banners.
Some of them went home, the shame of their intemperance, obtained their discharge through Gen. Taylor, and returned home to their families sober men. Some of them are in good business in Boston at this time.

JALAPA, (Mexico) April 28, 1848.

MY DEAR ____ : As I may not have time at Vera Cruz to put pen to paper, I write now, though much fatigued and half sick with a cold. I am—being too late in the season—pushing on rapidly to embark from the beach, without entering that city. [Vera Cruz.]

I have written ahead to have ready, if possible, a vessel to take me directly to the Narrows, below New York, whence
I shall proceed, without entering that city, to my family at Elizabethtown, New Jersey.

I have learned on the road that some of the spirited and patriotic citizens of New Orleans—including perhaps the municipal authorities—are thinking of taking public notice of my arrival among them; and possibly there may be a few persons in other places on the route to the North (inland) who would give the long-absent soldier a passing cheer or two. This, my dear sir, is another reason why I should hasten to my family, at its home in the sequestered village fifteen miles this side of New York; for, laboring as I am under the public displeasure of the Executive, it would be highly improper in me, as a soldier, to put myself in the way of provoking a cheer or a shout from my warm hearted countrymen. Should there be any such intention in New Orleans as I have alluded to, please make all necessary explanations and apologies for me; for I make a great sacrifice of feeling, to a sense of public duty, by avoiding on my return home some hundreds of personal friends whom I should have the chance of greeting by the inland route.

Always, my dear —-, your friend, WINFIELD SCOTT.

[BWP]
I had not time to write, last evening, of Mr. Calhoun's effort on the Yucatan question. He spoke with all of his accustomed force and ability. He was very attentively listened to by a full Senate and a brilliant auditory in the galleries and lobbies. His grounds for opposing the bill were impregnable, as it seemed to me.

His elucidation of the sentiments avowed by President Monroe, in regard to the interference of Foreign Powers with the affairs of any of the Republics on this continent, was highly satisfactory. He said, that he was the only surviving member of Mr. Monroe's Cabinet, and that his memory was clear upon the matter in question. What was said in Mr. Monroe's messages, in regard to the interference of foreign powers, was the result of cabinet consultations; but the hasty declaration, respecting European colonization upon this continent, was not, to the best of his recollection, ever brought before Mr. Monroe's Cabinet. He maintained, that there was a difference between interference and possession and colonization, and pointed out the same.

During the morning hour, Mr. Borland, the new Senator from Arkansas, read a prepared speech against Mr. Reverdy Johnson's resolution inquiry, respecting the nominations of sundry Generals, contending, that the inquiry was inquisitorial and unconstitutional, and that the President could make appointments during the recess of the Senate, and the latter body, when afterwards assembled, had no right to meddle in the matter. His style of reading a speech is far from being captivating.

In the House, yesterday, the passage of the bill to amend, . . . MISSING PORTION] . . . Bagby made a long, dull, sleepy speech on the Yucatan bill Mr. Clayton go the floor for to-morrow—and then the Senate went into Executive session.

In the House, the times were unexciting and sadly out of joint. First, bills were reported from the standing committees and appropriately referred. Next, the House went into committee, (Mr. Howell Cobb in the Chair,) and took up the revolutionary pension bill. Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, offered an amendment, which the Chair declared irrelevant and not in order.

Mr. Cumming, of Ohio, made a speech, a loud, windy speech, in support of the decision of the Chair, and with the utmost SANG FROID pronounced that the amendment had no GERMANITY in it! So sure was he of this that he repeated the important declaration once or twice—there was no GERMANITY in it! Pretty well for Mr. Cumming! He'll do.

But Mr. Cumming's brilliancy, or oratory, or something else, drove the greater part of the members out of the House, —or, it may be something more attractive invited them out—surely it could not be Mr. Bagby's speaking in the Senate—and so the committee had to rise for the want of a quorum. The names of the absentees were read over and ordered to be recorded on the journal. After which the House again went into committee, when the bill was further considered and reported to the House with an amendment, and by the House passed.

Again the House went into committee—this time on the Naval Pension bill. Mr. Bayly took the floor, but instead of speaking on the merits of the bill, he banged away for an hour on the right of a territory to hold slaves, and in dead opposition to the doctrines of the Wilmot Proviso—There were but few members in their seats to listen to him. Next, Mr. Wiley, of Maine, took the floor, and, without touching the merits of the bill before the committee, read off a long speech in support of the war with Mexico and in eulogy of the Mexican country, the Bay of San Francisco, &c., &c. At last, his hour being up, he came suddenly to a stand still. When the committee rose and the House adjourned. Beautiful legislation!

The weather is quite warm here to-day, though a high wind makes the dust too abundant. POTOMAC.
FROM MEXICO and QUERETARO.—We received dates from the city of Mexico, last night, two days later than those received by Monday's mail.

A letter in the Monitor, dated Queretaro, April 25, says that nine Deputies were still wanting to constitute a quorum. The same letter states that Senor Rejon, before resigning his seat in the House, left a written speech against peace, and it is probable it will be published.

Gen. Almonte arrived at Queretaro, to take his seat in the Senate. He is opposed to the treaty, and the Government look upon him with suspicion.

The two Senators of the district of Mexico have resigned their seats in Congress.

The writer closes his letter, saying that he would not be surprised to see the Government, before ratifying the treaty, dissolved, and each one take the road home.

The Monitor is of opinion that Congress should meet on the 1st inst.

It is reported that Otero is the leader of the war party in the House of Representatives.

El Progresso, of Queretaro, says, on the 27th ult. that Congress will not meet.

The following is a translation of a letter from our Queretaro correspondent in Mexico, which has not yet appeared in our columns. It is not without interest, though we have published later dates from the same source:

QUERETARO, April 20, 1848.

Yesterday, the twenty-first meeting, preparatory to the session of the new Congress, took place, and after the reading of many documents relative to the Deputies who have not yet made their appearance (for want of money,) a note was addressed to the Minister of Finance to the effect that he should cause remittance to be made to the absent Deputies of the funds necessary to defray the expense of their journey to the capital.

The continued arrival of new Deputies, and the excuses offered by such as have not yet reached here, presage a prompt denouement. The prevailing opinion is that there will be peace.

The troops of the Government have obtained some advantages over the revolters of Xichu. (Sierra Gordo). These last have had six killed and twenty-two wounded and made prisoners. Still, the affair is not yet determined. There was a report yesterday that the revolters had made their appearance within six leagues of Queretaro, at the hacienda of Chichimaquillas, with predatory designs, but they had not time to effect their purposes. This new civil war bodes unhappy results.

By the next courier I will send you the law or programme issued by these revolutionists.

The fetes of Easter have changed completely the aspect of Queretaro. From being political it has become altogether religious. Labor of all kinds is interdicted, and we have nothing more interesting to communicate then the above.

U.S. SENATE.

After the transaction of some business unimportant in the main, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution offered some time by the Senator from Maryland, (Mr. R. JOHNSON,) calling on the President of the U. States for his reasons for withholding from the Senate certain nominations.

Mr. ALLEN opposed the resolution as unnecessary and improper. He spoke upwards of two hours on the subject, and in reply to the speech of Mr. JOHNSON.
The resolution was then informally passed over.

On motion, the Senate agreed to adjourn from Monday next, over to the ensuing Thursday.

On Mr. HANNEGAN'S motion the Senate held an executive Session, and afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House was engaged most of the morning, on unimportant business, when it got through with the morning business, a motion was made and agreed to, that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Appropriation Bills.

The Bill providing for expenditures in the Post Office Department was taken up; several amendments were offered to the bill, which gave rise to much discussion. Without definitive action on the bill, the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

The court meet this morning at the usual hour. After the records were read, Private David Ayres, 15th Infantry, was called and sworn for the defence.

Q—Were you in the battle of Churubusco, and what duty were you on that day?

   A—I was orderly for Gen. Pillow, and in that battle.

Q—What do you know about Gen. Pillow's firing at or shooting a Mexican officer? State what particulars you know regarding that fact?

   A—It was near the bridge, or fort that surrounded the bridge on the road towards where Gen. Worth and been engaged with the enemy; there were some three or four officers (Mexicans) who came in a direction towards the bridge, where Gen. Pillow was advancing; he drew his pistol and fired at one of the officers, who fell to the ground; the horse started towards Gen. Pillow in a straight line; and Gen. Pillow gave directions to a soldier that was standing near him to take the horse.

Q—In which direction were the officers moving? Towards or from the city of Mexico?

   A—They were moving towards the bridge, from the direction of San Antonio; this was after the bridge head had fallen.

Q—State if any of Gen. Pillow's staff officers were with him at the time; if not, state if you know where they were gone?

   A—There were none of them with him; Lieut. Ripley had been sent by Gen. Pillow to Gen. Scott; Capt. Hooker had gone towards the church where the white flag had been raised by the direction of Gen. Pillow; what Gen. Pillow's exact orders to him were I do not know, but they were in relation to the flag; where the other staff officers were I do not know.

Q—What work does witness mean that he thought Gen. Worth had been engaged at?

   A—I mean the one on the opposite side of the church from the bridge, surrounded by the main work, and on the road leading to the city along which Gen. Pillow was advancing.

Q—Were the Mexican officers advancing rapidly or slowly.

   A—I should call it rapidly.

A pencil and paper was here given the witness and he was requested by the defence to mark out or draw a plan of the bridge fort, the church fort, and the position of the spot where Gen. Pillow shot the Mexican officer; Gen. Pillow subsequently withdrew that request, and propounded the following question:

Q—From what direction were the Mexican officers retreating, and in what direction were they advancing?

   A—They were retreating from the west, and towards the bridge surrounded by the fort, which was an eastern course.
Q—How near were you to Gen. Pillow when the shot the Mexican officer?

A—I was within some few rods of him, I should think; it was a very short distance.

Q—About how far from the bridge fort was Gen. Pillow when he shot the officer?

A—I could not tell the exact distance; I do not know it.

Q—From the direction the Mexican officers were retreating, did they appear to be coming from the convent fort or some other place?

[Gen. Scott objected to the question as a leading one, when it was withdrawn.]

Q—I witness now acting as orderly for Gen. Pillow, and in what capacity is he engaged?

A—I am not; I am now acting orderly for Col. Bonham, of the 12th Infantry.

Q—How long is it since, witness ceased to act as orderly for Gen. Pillow, and when did he join his company?

A—It was three or four days after the battle of the 20th that I was sent to my company.

Cross-examined—To what soldier did Maj. Gen. Pillow give the shot Mexican’s horse?

A—I do not know; it was an infantry man, however.

Q—How came the witness to know that Lieut. Ripley had been sent at that time to Gen. Scott, that Capt. Hooker had gone to the church? Has the witness’ memory been helped on this subject, and if so, by whom has the witness’s memory been helped?

A—I was with Gen. Pillow when he gave them orders to go; my memory has not been helped.

Q—When did Maj. Gen. Pillow first send for the witness on the subject of shooting the Mexican officer, and where was he stationed at the time?

A—I was stationed at the time at Chapultepec; the length of the time I cannot state; it was near a month before the regiment left for Cuernavaca.

Q—How many times in all had the witness been sent for to come to Gen. Pillow, and what took place on those occasions?

A—I was sent for but once. He asked me if I was orderly for him on the 20th. I told him I was. He asked me if I was with him at the time or knew anything about his shooting a Mexican officer; I replied that I did. He wanted me to state the circumstances, (there were two or three officers present in the room,) and say where it was.—I did so, and he told me that was all he wanted with me. I then returned to my company.

Q—At some visit to Maj. Gen. Pillow, did not the witness sign a certain statement, and if so, who drew up the statement.

A—I did not.

Q—Had not the witness stated to Lieut. Col. Howard, or some other officer that (witness) had made more than one visit to Maj. Gen. Pillow concerning the slain Mexican officer.

A—I did not.

Q—How far from the captured bridge, and on which side of the bridge, was the Mexican officer shot?

A—The distance I cannot say—I do not know. It was on the west side of the road.

Q—At which end of the bridge was it that the Mexican officer was shot, was it the end next to the city, or on the opposite end of the bridge?

A—As I stated before, it was at neither end; it was on the west side of the bridge.

Q—On which side of the creek or canal was the Mexican officer shot, was it on the side next to this city, or on the
A—It was on the opposite side from the city.

Q—Had any American troops already been advanced on the bridge towards this city, when the Mexican officer was shot?

A—I think there had.

Q—Which way did the four Mexican officers appear to be going when they approached Gen. Pillow, and he shot one of them?

A—As I stated before, they appeared to be going towards the bridge or towards the east.

Q—If the bridge had been carried before, and some Americans had passed the bridge, why should the Mexican approach the bridge in order to reach the city?

A—I do not know.

Q—How far off were the four Mexican officers when Maj. Gen. Pillow shot one of them?

A—I could not say.

Q—Were the four Mexican officers at the time approaching in such a manner as to induce the belief that they were going to attack the Mexicans, or to surrender as prisoners of war?

A—If I were going to decide, I would say that they did not appear to me as if they wanted to surrender as prisoners of war?

Q—Did either of the four Mexican officers fire before or after the officer was shot?

A—They did not fire either before or after, as I noticed.

Q—Were Gen. Pillow and the witness alone when the Mexican officer was shot?

A—We were not alone—there was an infantry man near by; the one to whom he gave directions to take the horse.

Q—Was there no American present at the shooting of the Mexican officer but Gen. Pillow, the witness and the infantry man?

A—Not at that place; there may have been others near by and I not noticed them.

Q—How far was Gen. Pillow from other American officers and men at the time of the shooting?

A—I could not state—there were others around on the main road that we had passed; how far I could not say.

Q—Where were the other officers and men of Gen. Pillow's command when he shot the Mexican officer?

A—Where they were I could not tell.

Q—Is the witness certain there was no American officer present with Gen. Pillow when the Mexican officer was shot?

A—I am sure there was none with him at that time where we were.

Q—How did it happen that Maj. Gen. Pillow was detached or separated at the time of shooting the Mexican officer, from the men under his command?

A—That is more than I know. In the fore part of the engagement I was holding his horse and I supposed he was with his men on foot, as I was in the rear a short distance. When he came back to where I was and motioned to me to fetch his horse to him, and he then advanced on horseback. The reason that I was not with him when he was on foot is that there was a very wide ditch which he could not get his horse across; he gave me his horse and told me to lead him around on to the main road; that he would cross the fields with his men. He jumped into the water in trying to jump across the ditch, and I went back through the lot and around into the road near where they were engaged with the enemy, and waited there with the horse until he called for him.

Q—What became of the shot Mexican officer; was he kicked or only wounded, and did Major Gen. Pillow go up to him after he fell from his horse?

A—I think he was not killed—only wounded—for I saw him move after he fell from his horse. What became of him I do not know, as I turned back immediately after that on the main road, where there were some wagons and some men.

Q—What became of the other three Mexicans officers after the other had been shot?

A—I do not know what became of those; they turned round and went back the same way they had come.

Q—Was the witness in the rear and holding Gen. Pillow’s horse when the Mexican was shot by said Pillow?

A—I was not; he was on horseback.

Q—Has the witness ever served in any regiment of the American army before entering the 15th Infantry; and, if so, how was he discharged from that former regiment?

A—I have; I belonged to company H, 2d Artillery, commanded by Lt. Sedgwick; I was under age—about twenty years old—at the time I was taken out by my mother, authorizing my uncle to get a habeas corpus. The regiment then lay at Buffalo, and now lies at Chapultepec.

Examination in Chief.—Witness has been asked if, upon any visit to Gen. Pillow, he signed any statement of the facts in writing; witness will say if he has signed such statement at any other place; and, if so where he signed it?

A—I have, at the castle of Chapultepec.

Q—Who requested the witness to sign the statement, and who drew it up

A—Lt. Ripley.

Private Bernard Carroll, company E, 2d Artillery, sworn for defence:

Q—Was witness in the battle of Churubusco, and on what duty was he that day?

A—I was employed as interpreter in the Commissary Department, and was in that battle.

Q—State what you know about a Mexican officer being shot from his horse that day, and where it occurred; state also what became of the horse after the officer was killed?

A—I went up to the mud fort on the right and in front of the church; on going there I found it was still occupied by the Mexican troops, which caused me to retire by the road. I heard some big guns firing as I came out from the bridge head, and on looking round to my right, I observed the Mexicans retreating from the church; one of them, whom I took to be a colonel, came over in the direction of the road, where our troops were; I went towards the field which he was in, seeing I could not get my horse to cross the ditch, I dismounted and gave my horse to a musician. At this time, there came up what appeared to me some officers mounted; I then crossed the ditch which, I had some difficulty in doing; while crossing there were some shots fired close to the ditch, at the part where I was crossing. On my gaining the other side of the ditch I observed the officer fall from his horse. Some voice spoke to me that was among the persons who were mounted on the road, and said, "My man, you will catch that horse for me." I turned round to see who addressed me, and from the appearance of the person who I thought addressed me, I thought the person was a general officer. I then advanced and caught the horse, and from the appearance of the saddle and bridle, and sword, scabbard and belt, which was attached to the pummel of the saddle, I believed that he mist have been an officer of some rank. A man came to me and demanded the horse from me. To whom I would not give him up. Lieut. Longstreet, of the 8th Infantry, then came to me and addressed me by name, and wanted me to give up the same horse, which order I obeyed. After I had delivered up the horse, I came out of the field, mounted my own horse, and followed Capt. Kearney’s dragoons within a few hundred yards of the garita. After returning, I reported the circumstance of Lieut. Longstreet taking the horse from me to Capt. Armstrong, Col. Duncan, Col. Garland, Capt. McKenzie and Capt. Brooks.

Lieut. Richard Drum, 9th Infantry, sworn for Defence:

Q—Were you present at the storming of Chapultepec, on the 13th September; if so, state what you know in relation to Gen. Pillow’s being wounded at the foot of the hill, and the dispositions made for carrying him up the heights?

A—I was present at the storming of Chapultepec.—Shortly after we ascended the hill, the enemy being driven from the outworks, I was ordered, I think by Col. Andrews, to give his compliments to Gen. Pillow and tell him that the outworks were carried. I obeyed this order immediately, and after informing Gen. Pillow of what I knew personally, he directed me to have some men brought to have him carried up the hill. I got together six men who I found at the bottom of the hill. After instructing them to carry him up immediately, Gen. Pillow ordered me to my Q—What does witness mean by the enemy’s out-works in his previous answer?

A—We were lying at the top of the hill at the west side, on the outside of the ditch from the castle. The enemy was driven from the ordinance on the inside of the work; this is what I understood Col. Andrews to mean by the out-works of the castle.

Q—After directing the men to carry Gen. Pillow up the hill, did you get back to the summit before the troops began to cross the ladders in the work?

A—Yes.

Q—Does the witness know the exact time Gen. Pillow was brought into the works at the summit of the hill, and where he was placed?

A—I do not.

Q—Had Col. Andrews, at the time he gave the witness a message to Gen. Pillow, then just left said Pillow?

A—I cannot say.

Q—In returning from Maj. Gen. Pillow towards the castle, was there any fire from the enemy in the castle towards the west or towards the position in which the witness had left the said Pillow?

A—Yes. I considered the danger much greater at the foot of the hill, than while on the hill.

Q—What firing was it from the castle towards Gen. Pillow that the witness speaks of at the moment the witness was reascending the hill?

A—It was the continual bursting of shells in the woods below, at the foot of the hill.

Q—Does the witness know how long Gen. Pillow remained at the foot of the hill after witness delivered the message from Col. Andrews?

A—I do not.

Q—The witness has said that the danger was greater at the foot of the hill than on the top, does he mean that the danger from the fire of the enemy was greater where Gen. Pillow lay, or greater in the grove farther off?

A—It was equally so at the foot of the hill, as it was towards Molino de Rey.

Q—Did the witness leave Lieut. Rains, aid-de-camp, with Gen. Pillow, or had Lieut. Rains preceded the witness in going up to the castle?

A—I do not remember seeing Lieut. Rains.

Cross-examination in chief resumed: Q—At the time Gen. Pillow directed witness to have him carried forward, what did Gen. Pillow say relative to his having wished to be taken forward some time before?

A—He told me that he had used some exertions to have himself carried forward previous to my going to him.

Capt. C. Sprague, 9th Infantry, sworn for defence: Q—Was witness present at the storming of Chapultepec; if so, state whether he saw Gen. Pillow after he was wounded, where it was, and what occurred between Gen. Pillow and witness?

A—I was present at the storming of Chapultepec. My regiment was advancing through the woods. We had arrived very near the base of the hill, when there was a momentary pause by all the troops, and a heavy fire of infantry was poured into the hill. Col. Ransom had led some of his regiment in advance, and had arrived at the foot of the hill. He was standing pointing up the hill with his sword, I think he gave the order to cease firing, as it endangered our own men, some of whom had got partly up the hill; I think they were Voltiguers. I then went back in obedience to the supposed order to stop the firing which was in my rear, as well as to bring the men from behind the trees; and on my return to my position, I saw Gen. Pillow standing, I think, alone; he appeared unable to move or walk. The troops were at the time rushing by him, and did not seem to heed him at all. I immediately went up to him and asked him if he was hurt; he replied he was, I then attempted to assist him myself, but found that I was unable, as he required my entire strength—he was so badly hurt. I then directed some men to assist him, which they did.—They took him out of the foot of the hill and seated him, I think, At the foot of a tree. I then left him and advanced with my regiment. When I arrived at the top of the hill—that is a short distance outside of the ditch—they were lying there... indiscriminately—the 9th and 15th Voltigeur regiments—and did not advance, as I supposed, for the want of ladders. I was then directed to go down and report to Gen. Pillow that there were no ladders on the top of the hill. I did so, and returned to my post.

Lewis Bates, Company E, 6th Inf’ty, sworn for defence: Q—Were you present at the storming of Chapultepec on the 13th September last?

A—I was.

Q—State if you saw Gen. Pillow on that day; if so, state where you saw him.

A—I saw Gen. Pillow on the day stated, about sixty or seventy paces from the ditch which is at the foot of the hill of Chapultepec.

Q—Did you assist in carrying Gen. Pillow up the hill?

A—Not individually, but I was present and went up the hill with the men that did carry him.

Q—Were the Mexicans firing from any part of the work on the hill about the time Gen’l Pillow started up the hill?

A—Yes.

Q—Did the firing continue while Gen. Pillow was being carried up the hill; and where was Gen. Pillow when the firing ceased?

A—To the best of my opinion, when the firing ceased from the enemy, Gen. Pillow was within sixty or seventy paces from the main gate going into Chapultepec.

Q—Where was Gen. Pillow laid after he was carried in the work, and how long was Gen. Pillow in the work before Gen. Scott arrived?

A—Gen. Pillow was laid upon the wall or breastworks, inside of the main gate to the right, leading to the battery commanding the road leading from Tacubaya to the city. The commander-in-chief entered the work about twenty or twenty-five minutes after Gen. P. had entered the work and was laid down on the wall.

Q—Who is the captain of the company to which you belong, and who commanded the company on that day?

A—On the day mentioned I commanded company E myself. Capt. Hutter is the captain of the company, but he was not along on that day.

Cross-examined.—Q—Where was the witness’s company at the time he was with Gen. Pillow?

A—Part of the company was with me; the 6th Infantry had got orders to charge the hill; a part up the hill and part round it; part of the company got separated from the main command. I could not keep the run of the company as they were much scattered.

Q—How came witness to be absent with part of his company while the castle was yet resisting the attack of the American troops?

A—I was not absent. We only received the order to advance after the attack had been commenced by the troops before us at the castle.

Q—When Gen. Pillow was going up the hill, and within sixty or seventy paces of the main gate, what firing was it that the witness then heard?

A—After Gen. Pillow was removed from the base where I first saw him, the firing was from the enemy retiring from the part where the storming party first entered the castle, keeping up a scattering fire, which ceased when Gen. Pillow was about within the distance I stated in my answer previously.

Q—Was the scattering fire the witness speaks of from the castle or the grove towards the city, outside of the castle?

A—It was from the castle.

Q—Was Lt. Raims, a d.d-camp, with Gen. Pillow when the witness saw Gen. Pillow set out to go to the castle?

A—I do not recollect.
Q—How many years has the witness been in the American army, and has he ever deserted from the American army?

A—I decline answering the question.

The court decided that the question should not be answered.

Lieut. Col. Johnstone, Voltigeurs, sworn for defence:—Q—Was witness present at the storming of Chapultepec; if so, what occurrences took place within the work under your own observation previous to your meeting Gen. Pillow in the work. State also if you know who was the first officer in the work that ranked yourself?

A—I was at the storming of Chapultepec; those around me were engaged in firing upon the enemy between the castle and the battery on the Tacubaya road, and upon the troops within that battery. After the firing ceased, and finding myself the senior officer, I was endeavoring to have the several regiments re-formed. While this was going on I saw Gen. Pillow coming in through the main gate; he was the first officer who ranked me that I saw in the work.

Q—How long did the American troops in the work keep up the fire against the enemy at the base of the hill and against the battery on the Tacubaya road?

A—It is very hard to judge of time under such circumstances. It may have been perhaps near ten minutes.

Q—State what time, in connection with the movements already detailed, did the troops under Gen. Quitman’s command come upon the hill, and what time was the battery on the Tacubaya road taken?

A—I can answer only the last part of the question. I saw from the east end of Chapultepec the head of the troops under Gen. Quitman’s command approaching about one hundred and fifty yards in the front of the battery.

Cross-examined by the prosecution: Q—Had the castle been captured, and how long before was it that witness saw Gen. Pillow enter the gate of the castle?

A—The castle had been captured. I have stated already that when Gen. Pillow had come in the firing ceased.—There was nothing particular to mark the time from which the firing ceased to the time Gen. Pillow was brought in.—That was the first strong point to me after the cessation of the fire.

Q—After witness had, with a portion of the troops, entered the west end of Chapultepec, how long was it before the cessation of the enemy’s fire in the direction of the grove to the west?

A—I did not enter the end of the work. I suppose from the time our troops first came in to the cessation of the firing alluded to was not less than fifteen minutes.

Q—After witness entered the castle, how long was it to the cessation of the firing by the Mexican garrison within the works in the direction of the grove towards the west?

A—It must have been somewhat more than ten minutes. I spoke in my last answer of the time the troops entered on the west, now I speak of the time that I entered by the main gate by the south side.

Q—After the entrance of witness within the ditch and wall nearest to the castle of Chapultepec, what time elapsed before the cessation of the enemy’s fire from within the same limits towards the direction of the Molino del Rey?

A—I was not on that side at all. I entered by the south side, through the main gate; I thought the firing in that direction had ceased as soon as our men had crossed the parapet. The firing was to the south side and the terrace to the east of the building. When I saw our troops inside the castle, I had an impression that there was no firing in that direction.

Q—Had, or not, the witness, some time after the battle of Molino del Rey, a conversation with Gen. Pillow on the subject of that battle, and what were Gen. Pillow’s remarks as to the effect the result had upon Gen. Scott?

A—I don’t remember that I had such conversation. I think I may say that no such conversation occurred.

Q—Has, or not, the witness heard Gen. Pillow say something of the battle of Molino del Rey, that its effects upon the mind or energies of Gen. Scott?

A—I think I have just answered the question. I have never heard any such conversation.

The court then adjourned.
[BWP]
The court met this morning at the usual hour. After the records were read. Ca[pt. T. Loeser, 1st Pennsylvania Regiment was called and sworn for the defence.

Q—Did the witness see Gen. Pillow carried in the work at the summit of the hill—if so, state where Gen. Pillow was first laid after entering the work?

A—On the morning of the 13th of September last, after we had entered the work, myself and command, I was returning under orders to collect some few of the men of our regiment that had remained back; in doing so I met within the walls of the work the party bringing up Gen. Pillow; I assisted in carrying him forward; he was carried to the wall of the bastion fronting Tacubaya or nearly so; the angle of the wall fronting the city was on the general’s left, within ten feet; at that time there was firing through the building, and some considerable firing from underneath the wall; a few moments after I was by the general commanding ordered forward and saw nothing more of Gen. Pillow till I met him in the city.

Q—After Gen. Pillow was carried into the work at the main gate, was he laid upon the wall without ever being laid upon the ground?

A—After I met him he was not let down; he may have been before; I met him within the main gate.

Q—How near the main gate did witness meet Gen. Pillow?

A—The distance I could not exactly state; it was opposite the main doorway going in to the building within a very few feet.

Q—Was or was not Gen. Pillow inside the work before the American national flag was hoisted; and what circumstances, if any, enables witness to recollect when the flag was hoisted?

A—A moment after I had met Gen. Pillow, and had hold of the canvass or cloth on which he was laid, the flag was hoisted; I remember it because there were two separate and distinct attempts made to raise the flag; the first failed on account of some fault in the halyards; at the same time there was displayed from the roof of the building a flag with a yellow ground; I do not know what flag it was.

Cross-examined—Was the witness among the first who entered the last, or immediate defences of Chapultepec, and if not, what troops preceded the witness in that entrance?

A—I was among the first that entered of Gen. Quitman’s division; my hand was upon the rim of the muzzle of the last piece that was fired from the work as I went over it; Capt. Lovell ordered us forward in front of the New York Regiment.

Q—If witness had been sent under orders from the works to collect straggling men below, how came he to return or to stop on meeting with Gen. Pillow?

A—I met the commanding officer of my regiment, who sent the orderly of my company down the hill; and I returned.

Q—Had not the Voltigeur Regiment, the storming party under Capt. McKenzie, the 15th Infantry and other troops, preceded the entrance into the works of Chapultepec, of the witness and his company?

A—We passed the Voltigeurs under the trees, inside the first wall; they at this time had their mountain howitzers with them; the 15th Infantry I know nothing of; there were some troops in the works as we entered, but of what regiments I do not know; the Rifles were detached from us and thrown to our right; I saw nothing of them till we reached the Garita Belen.

Q—Did the witness enter by the main gate, and who then command his regiment?

A—I did not; I entered over the angle of the second bastion, on the side towards Molino del Rey; Maj. Brindle was then in command of the regiment.

Q—The witness has spoken of some firing about the time of meeting Maj. Gen. Pillow; was that firing from our troops within the captured castle, or from any part of the enemy within the same castle, or if there was at the moment any firing about the castle, or if there was at the moment any firing about the castle from the enemy, in retreat, then outside the castle, in what is called “Montezuma’s Garden” below the hill and towards the city?

A—At the time that we entered there was firing through the hall at the extreme end of the building, fronting the city; that firing was from the enemy; below the wall there was also considerable firing—that also from the enemy and from the side towards the city.
A—Witness says when he entered there was firing through the hall at the extreme end of the building, fronting the city; what does the witness mean by “at the time we entered;” does he mean when the witness originally entered the work, or what does he mean by the words “when we entered?

A—By the term “we” I mean the time when we carried Gen. Pillow in. Just at that time the detachment crossed the building and drove the enemy over the wall. Gen. Pillow lay upon the Tacubaya side, and the enemy was driven out on the opposite side, the detachment passing through the hall.

Q—How long was it after the work was carried by our troops before the witness saw the national flag hoisted upon the castle of Chapultepec.

A—I could scarcely give the moment, I think it was over thirty minutes. There were other flags hoisted preceding the national flag.

Q—Did the witness chance to see Lieut. Col. Johnstone or Lieut. Rains, aid-de-camp, in the castle before Maj. Gen. Pillow was brought in.

A—I did not. I do not know either of them. I may have passed them, but do not know them.

Examination in chief resumed:—Q—To what regiment does witness allude in that part of his previous answer, where he speaks of the Rifles being attached to the right.

A—I mean Gen. Smith’s command; he took them off or was present at the time, I think.

Capt. M. J. Bernard, Voltigeurs, sworn for defence:—Q—Did you see Gen. Pillow at the time, or soon after he was brought in the works of Chapultepec on the 13th of September; if so, state about how long was it after the first troops entered the works before he first saw Gen. Pillow, and when was the American flag first hoisted. Was it after Gen. Pillow entered; if so, how long.

A—I saw Gen. Pillow carried into the works about ten minutes after the first troops entered the work. The flag was hoisted about ten minutes after that making twenty minutes after the work was carried.

Q—Were or not the enemy still firing from the grove at the foot of the hill when Gen. Pillow entered that work?

A—There was a scattering fire from the side towards the city, around the base of the hill.

Cross-examined: Q—By what means has the witness ascertained the time of the arrival of Gen. Pillow in the castle on the morning of the 13th September.

A—By personal observation according to the best of my judgment.

Q—About in what part of the attack did the witness himself enter the castle, and how was he employed when he first saw Gen. Pillow in the castle of Chapultepec?

A—I was one of the foremost in the attack. I think I was the third or fourth man in the work, and was employed with my regiment.

Q—From the first passage of our leading troops over the ditch and wall of Chapultepec, how long was it before the firing or resistance of the Mexicans within the same ceased?

A—The resistance of the enemy in the main work ceased, I think, in about five minutes after the body of the troops went in—there was firing upon those who first went in from the end towards Molino del Rey. The firing from the base of the hill towards the city, continued scattering for about fifteen minutes. I should think from the time the troops first entered the work.

Q—Did the witness see, in the captured work Lieut. Col. Johnstone or Lt. Rains before the witness saw said Gen’l Pillow?

Q—After the American forces passed over the ditch at the west end of Chapultepec, was there any farther fire from the enemy within the main works towards the western grove?
A—Yes, after the foremost troops passed in.

Q—How long after the foremost of our troops passed into the work was it before the enemy’s fire to the west ceased; or how many of our troops had followed before that cessation of fire, and name them.

A—The fire ceased from four to five minutes to the west. When the troops first went over the wall the firing was from the main body of the building and the west, and after there was some firing inside the west end of the building; when our troops entered the building, they fired down the stairway; portions of the Voltigeurs, and the 9th and 15th Infantry.

Q—When the witness answered that he saw Lieut. Col. Johnstone in the captured work before he saw Gen. Pillow, he failed to answer anything in respect to Lieut. Rains, a id-de-camp. Did or not the witness also see Lt. Rains in the work before he saw Gen. Pillow?

A—I did not see Lt. Rains.

Examination in chief: Q—Who was the first officer in Chapultepec who ranked Col. Johnstone.

Capt. John S. Perry, Company "H" 15th Infantry, sworn for the prosecution:

Q—Does Private Ayres belong to witness’s company; and if so, what character does he bear in the company?

Major Gen. Pillow objected to the question, and offered the following paper in support of his objection:

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Court—Major Gen. Pillow objects to the question just propounded to Captain Perry, a witness for the prosecution, brought to impeach the character of Private Ayres, as illegal and against the practice and usage of both civil and military courts. No witness' character for veracity can be impeached except by a contradictory proof, by cross examination, or by proof affecting his character for truth. The object of all legal investigation is to arrive at the truth (unreadable) the necessity, when seeking to impeach the character of a witness by proof of his character for truth, the question is and must be confined to his reputation for truth. A man or soldier may have a bad reputation—arising from other causes, and yet, as a man of truth, under oath, he may be entirely unimpeachable. If we depart from the well settled principle of practice of all courts, both civil and military, and launch forth into the boundless field of uncertainty, by asking as to a witness, character, generally, we have no longer any guide or rule by which to proceed, but the indefinite and vague notions or opinions of a witness as to what constitutes a good or bad character, in which men will differ as much as their own moral characters or physical features. Without knowing anything of what the present witness knows or will testify, the defendant, therefore, objects to this question as illegal. If the witness's conduct as a soldier were being investigated it might be competent to go into his general character; but in this case the character and rights of the defendant are sought to be affected before this court and the world by asking for proof not recognised by any civil or military tribunal. The rule of evidence of both tribunals are expressly laid down in all military books as being the same, and that they should be, the wisdom of the rules of civil practice for ages constitutes the best and strongest reason. Respectfully submitted, GID J. PILLOW, Major Gen, U. S. A.

Major Gen. Scott replied as follows:

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Court—In reply to the objection of the defence to the question under consideration I beg leave to say, the practice is universal in military courts, where the character of a private soldier is in question, to ask of his company officers and non-commissioned officers what is the standing or character of the private in his company; and such questions embrace both moral and military character and standing. The question may also be met as to the one or other kind of standing, by cross examination, either to support or impeach the character of the private in question. The practice of military courts is of treat duration, and I trust may not be overturned in the present instance. Respectfully submitted, WINFIELD SCOTT.

In Court, April 19, 1848.

The court closed, and decided that the question should be limited to the general character of the witness for veracity. The question was then modified as follows:

Q—Does Private David Ayres belong to witness’s company; and if so, what is Ayres’s standing in the company in respect to truth or credibility?

A—So far as I have any knowledge, bad.
Cross-examined by the defence. Q—How long has the witness been in command of his company, and how long has he known Private Ayres?

A—I was in command of the company from the time we left Cleveland, Ohio—which I think was some time in March—until it reached Puebla. I joined it again at Chapultepec. I think, in October, I was left sick at the march of the army. I have known Ayres since he enlisted at Cleaveland some time in March, I think. I may be a little mistaken with regard to the dates, but I think they are correct dates.

Q—How long has said Ayres been on duty in said company while under command of witness?

A—That I cannot positively state.

Q—Does witness know if any instance in which the character of Private Ayres for veracity has been impeached or attempted to be impeached before a court, before this one. If so, when, where and in what case?

A—I do not.

Q—if witness has never known Ayres’ testimony to be impeached as a witness, can he say that he would not himself believe Ayres under oath in a matter in which (Ayres) was not interested?

I would not be willing to swear that I would not believe him under oath.

Examination in chief returned. Q—Does the witness know that Private Ayres has been before any other court as a witness until called to testify before this court.

A—I did not.

Q—If Ayres’s testimony before the witness, as judge or juryman, were unsupported by circumstances, or within itself at all strange or inconsistent, though it might by possibility be true, would the witness in such case believe the testimony of said Ayres?

A—If under oath, yes.

Sergeant Samuel Ross, company Hm, 15th Infantry, sworn for prosecution. Q—How long has the witness known Private David Ayres, and what is the standing of the said Ayres in the company in respect to truth?

A—I have known Ayres since the day he enlisted—about the 10th of April; his character for truth and veracity is questionable in the company.

Cross-examined. Q—Has witness ever known Ayres’s testimony to be impeached and questioned as a witness under oath?

A—I have never known him to be a witness before.

Q—Would you believe Ayres under oath in a case in which he had no personal interest?

A—I should believe him under oath and under circumstances where he had no interest.

Examination in chief resumed. Q—From witness’s knowledge of Ayres’s character does he believe said Ayres to be capable or incapable of receiving a bribe?

A member of the court objected to the question, when Gen. Scott offered the following reasons for its being put:

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Court—The witness is now under examination to impeach the character of Private Ayres, a former witness on the ground of want of truth or moral standing; and the present witness has testified that the said Ayres has a questionable standing in the company, common to the two, in respect to veracity and also that the present witness would believe the said Ayres under oath in a matter where he (Ayres) had no interest. The question, therefore, is essential to show the witness’s knowledge of the moral standing of the impeached witness. It does not ask whether he believes that Ayres has actually been bribed, but generally, whether his moral standing is such as to render him incapable of receiving a bribe. This is one test, and a strong one, of moral character.

Respectfully submitted:
WINFIELD SCOTT.

In Court, April 19, 1848.

The court decided that the question should not be put.
Lieut. Beauregard, Eng. recalled for the prosecution. Q—What does the witness know of the movements of the 15th Infantry and the enemy’s reinforcements from this city, both on the hamlet of Ensalda and of the arrival of Maj. Gen. Scott on the mound overlooking that hamlet, all in the afternoon of the 19th August last? State the succession and hours of those several events.

Gen. Pillow objected as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COURT.—The prosecutor has introduced testimony to show the succession and hours of certain events that occurred about and upon Endalda in the afternoon of the 19th August last, and the defence has since that time, introduced testimony to impeach and overturn that testimony, on the part of the prosecutor. The present witness is now first called to be examined in support of that first testimony, and about which matter he has not before been examined. It is believed by the prosecutor that his rebutting testimony may be important to support the first set of witnesses and perhaps to impugn those on the side of the defence in the same matters.

The court will also please remember that Lieut. Ripley after being examined and cross examined several times was, the other day called up the third time by the defence and then re-examined and cross-examined, without any objection on the part of the prosecutor. Besides it may be remembered by the court that it was agreed upon by the patty early in this case, and with the understanding that the court assented thereto, that no strict rule would be enforced in respect to the examination of staff officers belonging to either of the parties in the present case.

Respectfully submitted.
WINFIELD SCOTT.
RW48v25i41p1c1, May 23, 1848: Col. Wynkoop.

Every party is cursed with base and degenerate spirits who would at any time, barter their principles, their conscience, their country—nay, if the scene of Judas and the forty pieces could be re-enacted—their Redeemer for a price. The Whig party is not more fortunate in this particular, than any other. It has within its bosom pretended friends, who wait but an opportunity to betray it; men whose minds are bent, not upon the good of the party, but upon the money that can be made out of it; to whom it is a matter of supreme indifference, whether the gold they receive be made by supporting or betraying their friends.

Of this number we hold those vile wretches to be, who from the city of Mexico, have filled the Locofoco prints with infamous slanders directed against the Whig party; men of no consideration at home; of worse then none in the army. Their object is, in all instances, the same, and it is palpable to every body. They seek promotion, and they would be willing to purchase it by slandering the very mothers that bore them, provided it could be obtained in no other way. The Government organ has offered a large premium for letters of this kind, by publishing them, whenever received, and accompanying the publication with articles written in terms of the most extravagant eulogy. Such a course of conduct on the part of the Executive organ, is highly detrimental to public morals, in as much as it encourages falsehood, and actually converts slander into a profession.

Among the most active of the new converts is the individual whose name stands at the head of this article, and who commands one of the regiments from Pennsylvania. In order that his denunciations of his late friends might carry along with them a greater degree of force than they would otherwise have commanded, he has been uniformly represented by the Locofoco press, as a man of great gallantry, who had proved his martial prowess on more than one stricken field. The reader will learn to estimate these pretensions at their proper value, after he shall have read the following account of this doughty hero, from the Lynchburg Patriot, the editors of which paper evidently speak by the card. We have not the smallest doubt, that could the names and doings of all those Mexican letter-writers, who have converted the columns of the Union into a receptacle for slander, be dragged into light, then would be found very much on a level with Wynkoop; for any man, who deserting the Whig party—as pure, as patriotic, and as disinterested a party as any that ever existed—under the suspicious circumstances which must attach to every officer in Mexico who is seeking promotion, shall come out in denunciation of those with whom he has acted, on the lying pretexts assigned by these apostates, must be a knave.

The Patriot adds, that Pillow would have brought Wynkoop before a court-martial, had he not been afraid of exposing his own blundering imbecility. And this is the man whose slanderous letters to the editor of the Union, are relied on to impeach the integrity and patriotism of one-half, if not a majority, of this Union! This man, who should have been broken for his shameful behavior, is the witness by whom it is expected to prove that the great Whig party is nothing more nor less than an enormous band of Traitors!

"Prominent among those letter-writing heroes, who have transmitted to the United States, their senseless and slanderous libels, and thus acquired for themselves, a publicity, they never sought on the field of battle, stands Col. Wynkoop, of the Pennsylvania volunteers. This gentleman our readers will recollect, a few months since, published a letter in some Locofoco Journal, which was subsequently copied in every village sheet, of that party, dissolving his connection with the WHIG party, and assigning as a reason for this political apostacy, the course of the Whig members of Congress, and the Whig press in opposition to the war. A few facts in regard to this "doughty warrior," who thus assumes to brand as cowards and traitors, at least a moiety of his countrymen, may perhaps serve to add to the notoriety, he is so desperately seeking and to obtain which he has not hesitated to woo disgrace and contempt.

"The first spot of Mexican ground upon which either he or his regiment landed (excepting the island of Lobos,) was the beach near Vera Cruz. The morning after that splendid debarkation Col. Wynkoop’s regiment, together with 1st and 2d Tennessee regiments underCols. Campbell and Haskell, constituting Gen. Pillow’s brigade, moved on round the city. Arrived at a dilapidated old monastery, these regiments were fired upon from the Chaparral by the foe whom it concealed. The 1st Tennessee regiment under Col. Campbell, was ordered to take the magazine upon a height from which the greatest part of the firing seemed directed, while Col. Wynkoop was ordered to take another height a little nearer the city, and upon which there could be seen a small body of Mexican troops. Both officers proceeded to discharge their duties. Col. Campbell succeeded in taking the magazine without the loss of a man—Col. Wynkoop after conducting his regiment to the base of the hill, led them back again and reported to Gen. Pillow, that the defences of the Chaparral rendered the ascent impassable, who immediately ordered forward Col. Haskell whose regiment charged the hill, and after a slight skirmish, hoisted the Tennessee flag, from its height.—The easy taking of a position, which he had deemed impassable, would have mortified any man, not favored with less ordinary sensibility. It operated far differently upon Col. Wynkoop, who being his own "Leonidas," send back to the United States, a very graphic and exaggerated account of that inconsiderable skirmish, in which he represents himself as being among the first upon top, and the Pennsylvania flag as the first to float from the summits. So much for his "first battle."
"Following him to the field of Cerro Gordo, our attention is attracted by another letter of his in which, he represents himself as being subjected to a most galling fire, and pours out encomiums without stint; upon the gallantry with which his regiment bore themselves in that memorable battle. What, however, are the facts? Col. Wynkoop, never participated actively in the fight, being place as also Col. Campbell’s regiment, in a ravine nearly out of the range of the batteries. Although in this reserve position, he succeeded however in acquiring for himself, no very enviable reputation, as is proved by the fact, that so flagrant was his conduct, that it brought down upon him the denunciation of Col. Campbell, upon whom the command devolved, after the wounding of Gen. Pillow and was proclaimed by this gallant officer as a coward, upon the field of battle. The facts are as follows: Col. Haskell’s regiment being repulsed after losing one third of their number, in less than three minutes, preparations were made by Col. Campbell, the Senior officer, and in command, Gen. Pillow being wounded, to renew the assault. For this purpose Col. Wynkoop’s regiment was ordered forward by Col. Campbell. He refused to obey, trembling assigning as a reason, that he had been previously ordered by Gen. Pillow to hold that position. Col. Campbell told him that Gen. Pillow was wounded and had assigned the chief command to him, as the Senior officer. He still refused to obey, whereupon Col. Campbell, denounced him as a poltroon and coward—and called upon his regiment to follow him as their commanding officer. The surrender of the Mexican garrison, at this time, caused by the successful assault of the gallant Harney upon the main height of Cero Gordo, saved this recreant WHIG, and dastard soldier, from any farther exhibition of cowardice. Such is the character of the wretch, whose libels upon the WHIG party have furnished so delectable a repast for the political gluttony of Loco-Foco presses.

"In regard to these facts, which may be questioned, we assure our readers and the public that they are derived from a reliable source, and are susceptible, if false, of an easy refutation by application to Col. Campbell of Tennessee. The reason of the failure of the trail of Col. Wynkoop, for such cowardly conduct, is found in the fact, that Col. Campbell, who of course, have been the most important witness, was to return in a few weeks, with his regiment, (their term of service having expired) to the U. States, and could not consequently be expected to remain in Mexico."

RW48v25i41p1c3, May 23, 1848: General Scott.

The Mayor of New York, understanding that the “great Captain” had embarked at Vera Cruz direct for that city, promptly communicated the fact to the Board of Aldermen. Measures were taken to render him all possible honor on his arrival.

In Washington, on the 17th inst., a large meeting was held at the City Hall, Major Seaton presiding, when the following highly eulogistic but just tribute was offered to the old hero, by Gen. Walter Jones, in the shape of a resolution:

"Resolved, That the Municipal Authorities of Washington truly understood and fairly represented the feelings and sentiments of the People of Washington, when they invited their fellow-citizens to unite in a reception of Major Gen. WINFIELD SCOTT, with such public demonstrations of honor and respect as are due to the eminent soldier and patriot, renowned in his prime of life for bravery and devotion in defense of his country’s most sacred rights, which were imperiled in the second war waged for national independence; for services and achievements in that vital struggle which had materially contributed to the glory and the safety of his country, and made his own name conspicuous in the rolls of fame; a soldier and patriot who, with all these titles to a name identified with a nation’s glory, has shed a new luster on his country’s arms by his campaigns in Mexico; and, at the same time, exalted and conspicuous in the rolls of fame; a soldier and patriot who, with all these titles to a name identified with a nation’s struggle which had materially contributed to the glory and the safety of his country, and made his own name.

RW48v25i41p1c5, May 23, 1848: Correspondence of the Vera Cruz Arco Iris. Campeachy, April 25, 1848.

"DEAR SIR: I take this opportunity of communicating to you the most important news.

"The country becomes every day in a worse condition; and if, in four months, foreign aid does not arrive, Yucatan will not survive. The negotiations which have been concluded with the Chief PAT will only serve us momentarily. The treaty runs in this wise: PAT, at the instance of his friends, signed articles highly degrading to the whites and their Government, PAT is to be Governor during life of the Indians. Don BARBARNINO is to be Governor of the white during life. Twenty-five hundred guns, taken from the Indians previous to the war, are to be returned to PAT. All debts due by the Indians are to be remitted. The uncultivated lands which had been sold by the Government shall become common property. There shall not be any personal contribution in Yucatan. The right of estola is abolished."
"The other Indian chiefs, however, deny that Pat had any right to make this treaty. His troops are abandoning him, and committing the worst sort of excesses. This army, it is thought, will soon take Izamel, which they were besieging.

"I ought also to tell you that Pat says he has sent emissaries to other parts of the Republic of Mexico to promote insurrection; and they having returned, he, from their statements, anticipated the greatest success."

[This seems to corroborate the intimation made previously in our columns that the Indian insurrections in San Luis Potosi and Guadalajara were connected with the Yucatan revolt.—Arco Iris. [BWP] RW48v25i41p1c5, May 23, 1848: From the New Orleans Courier.

Hayti has again been the scene of bloodshed and murders. We learn that the brigantine Queen Victoria, (of Trinidad) Capt. Tucker, from Port-au-Prince, bound to Hamburg, with a cargo of coffee, &c., put into Mount Bay on Thursday last to purchase stores, as none could be procured a Port-au-Prince, in consequence of the state of matters at that place; and that Capt. Tucker reports that he has brought despatches from the British Consul there to Com. Bennet, on this station, requesting that a vessel of war should be immediately sent to Port-au-Prince, where a serious disturbance had taken place—a large number (some say upwards of a hundred) of the colored population having been massacred by their brethren. The cause of this outbreak has not been fully mentioned, but it is said that the lives of people of color were daily being sacrificed in large numbers. This determination on the part of the blacks to exterminate the browns had been brewing for a long time, in fact since the tyrant Soulouque has been president; and is now being realized with a vengeance that none but savages would be guilty of committing.

The commodore, we learn, has been unable to comply with the requisition of her Britannic Majesty's Consul at Port-au-Prince, there not being a single vessel of war at Prot Royal at this moment, excepting the guard and store-ships, which are useless in their present state.

It is certainly a cause of much regret that this island should be left so destitute of vessels or war as it is at present. It has been said that we can have no possible cause for alarm, but who can tell what a moment might produce. The present outbreak in Hayti, where the presence of a man-of-war to protect British interests would be much service, is a sufficient proof why Port Royal should not be as she now is—destitute of at least one available vessel of war to be used in cases of emergency. Who knows how many innocent beings have by this time been sacrificed to a merciless mob; who, had protection been afforded by one of her Majesty's vessels, would have been enabled to save themselves and their families from the general massacre, which, we are told, was going on in that unfortunate country.

The Alarm, Daring and Vixen are, it is said, cruising off the island of Cuba, and it is known when they will return to Port Royal.

We hope when this intelligence reaches England that the Admiralty will see the necessity of having a larger number of vessels of war on this station than at present. England seems, as had been said, truly to have forgotten her colonies, and evidently cares little or nothing about their prosperity when she leaves them so unprotected and at the mercy of other nations.

RW48v25i41p1c5, May 23, 1848: From Yucatan.

An arrival at New York, from Balize, Honduras, April 28, brings intelligence that the whole of Yucatan is now in possession of the Indians.

The taking of Bacalor by them has filled Balize with refugees, and, indeed, fears are entertained that they will attack Balize, in fulfillment of their threats. In the attack on Bucalor only five of the inhabitants were killed, but at Valladolid every male inhabitant was put to the sword.

A public meeting assembled on the 27th day of April, at the call of the British Superintendent, and fifteen thousand dollars were voted for the defence of the place. The militia will be called out, the old fort at the harbor repaired, and a cordon of posts established for the better security of the town. If the Indians should venture an attack they will certainly meet with a warm reception. They are represented as being in force to the number of twelve thousand strong.

The transmission of mails through the interior of Central America, was exceedingly difficult, in consequence of the unsettled state of the country.

By Express and Telegraph. AUGUSTA, GA. May 19, P. M.

Your daily Overland Express has arrived here, bringing New Orleans papers if the 14th inst. The following is the only news contained in the Picayune of that date:

LATEST FROM TAMPOCO.

The US propeller Col. Stanton arrived at New Orleans on the 13th inst. from Tampico, whence she sailed on the 7th. Lieut. Jenks, of the Seventh Regiment U S Infantry, is said to have died at Tampico, of yellow fever.

Rumors had reached Tampico that there was at least a quorum of the Mexican Congress at Queretaro, but there appeared to be but little faith in the truth of the report.

LATEST FROM BRAZOS SANTIAGO.

The U.S. steamship Telegraph, from Brazos Santiago, arrived at New Orleans on the 13th inst. She sailed on the 10th, but brings no news of interest.

An American named Towers was murdered at Matamoros recently by a Mexican servant, whose object is said to have been robbery. The murderer escaped, and had not been taken at the last accounts.

United States Senate.

The Senate despatched a great deal of business to-day. Several important bills were passed—among them, one making appropriation for the support of West Point Academy; and, also the bill admitting the Territory of Wisconsin into the Union as a State. The latter portion of the day’s session was devoted to private bills, several of which passed.

On motion, the Senate adjourned over to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House was to day the theatre of an excited discussion on the Hodges slave case. Mr. STEPHENS made a great effort in behalf of the rights of the South and the preservation of the Union. His remarks were listened to with breathless attention by the House. After Mr. S. concluded, the vote was taken and the bill passed; and, then the House adjourned.

WASHINGTON, MAY 20, P. M.

U.S. SENATE.

The Senate did not sit to-day.

The House was engaged nearly all day in Committee of the Whole on the bill for the purchase of the Madison Papers. Mr. McDONALD advocated the passage of the bill, and Mr. BOWLIN and others opposed it. The Committee finally rose and reported the bill to the House; and the question being taken on its passage, it passed the House.

On motion, the House then adjourned.

The question of who “killed the Mexican officer?” is argued with the ability of a lawyer, in the following communication. We think it is pretty clear, that if General Pillow really did kill a Mexican, he has failed to establish the fact so firmly as to command general belief. His only witness is a man of notoriously bad character; one whom all witnesses concur in representing as such. Besides the tale itself is so strange and incomprehensible, that it would shake the standing of any man, however celebrated for veracity. A desperate battle had taken place. The enemy had been driven towards the West—Gen. Pillow was standing on the field of battle, when up ride four Mexican officers, from the rear—the very direction whence the American army had moved in the morning—as it seems just to swell the glory of Gen. Pillow! The thing is too much made up—there is too much of romance in it—it does not wear the face of probability. Where did these Mexicans come from, and where were they going? To reach Mexico, they would have to pass through the whole American Army; to have reached the position in which Pillow stood, they must already have passed the same lines. What could have been their object in either instance? But we leave the field to our a cute friend, Quivis:

RW48v25i41p1c1, May 23, 1848: Gen. Pillow and the Mexican Horse.

Messrs. Editors—Since the reports of the evidence in General Pillow's case have been in the course of publication, I have been looking with some curiosity for the particulars of the great combat, in which that officer killed a Mexican, and secured his spoils. For a long time no witness of the conflict appeared. "The man, who struck Billy Patterson," did not preserve his incognito more carefully, than the by-standers on this occasion. It occurred to me that something might be effected by and advertisement—"one hundred dollars reward for the man who saw Gen. Pillow kill a Mexican!" It does not appear that any thing of this kind was actually published: but, by some means or other, the General has at last succeeded in bringing out one man, who testifies (after a fashion) to the purpose desired. It is true that the witness is of doubtful reputation—that he has been visited, questioned, and his answers written down, by a member of the General's staff—and it is also true that his story is in itself very strange, and to many people incredible. Still, he is a witness, and he is the only one available: wherefore, it behooves Gen. Pillow to make the most of him for his purpose.

It will be remembered by all who read General Pillow's own report of his share in the day of Contreras and Churubusco, that he was invariably a little too late in every thing he planned, or directed to be done. Just as he had made up his mind to attack this point, or to turn that, he was sure to find himself anticipated by the activity of other officers and troops; and he seemed to report these matters rather to show, that he was not blind to the propriety of the movements, than as claiming any personal share in their achievement. Especially in the affair at the bridge, or tete du pont, there is no doubt that it was carried by the troops under WORTH'S command, and the Mexicans were driven out of it along the road towards the city, long before Pillow came up from the rear to the scene of action. Yet this fortified bridge, so obstinately defended by the Mexicans, so gallantly stormed by Worth's division, one of the most prominent features in the narratives of that memorable day, is the spot selected by Gen. Pillow's witness for the exploit in question. The troops who had stormed it, have all disappeared: the Staff of Gen. Pillow is all gone too: there is no body at hand, save Gen. Pillow himself, and t his witness, His Orderly, who has, until recently, been leading his horse by the bridle, while the General marched on foot. Suddenly, four Mexican officers appear, riding from the rear of Gen. Pillow, and endeavoring to pass him, on their way into the city. How it happened that they were left behind, not only by their comrades, but by the Americans under Worth, and even by the pedestrian Pillow, no one can conjecture. But they come—and the find a lion in the path! The heroic Pillow fires a pistol—one Mexican rolls from his saddle—the horse runs on and surrenders—while the other three Mexicans turn about and make off, no one knows whither. Whether the Mexican is dead or wounded—actually or only "substantially" killed, as the General phrases it, witness does not know. The whole affair seems to be inexplicable, except as a Providential arrangement, to enable the Tennessee champion to shoot a Mexican, and "gather" his horse. Nor is it less unaccountable, that no man should have seen it, except this one questionable witness—not one of the brave fellows who had carried this contested bridge—not a wounded man, nor a straggler, nor one of those left in charge of the post—not a single man of Gen. Pillow's personal followers, saw, or knew, or heard of, this gallant deed! One soldier does turn out of the ditch, and catch a stray horse by command of Pillow: but he saw no Mexican shot by him, and heard noting of any. Doubtless, there was many a fine horse seen riderless that day, without the agency of our hero prepared to sustain Gen. Pillow's account of his own personal prowess!

Is it uncharitable to say that this attempt is even more disgraceful than the original boast? I may be prejudiced, but it does remind me so strongly of Sir John Falstaff and the dead Percy, that I cannot forbear to quote the passage; and with it, I take my leave of this fustian warrior and his boasts.

"Falstaff.—If your father will do me any honour, so; if not, let him kill the next Percy himself. I look to be either earl or duke, I assure you.

Prince Henry.—Why, Percy I killed myself, and saw thee dead.

Falstaff.—Didst thou? Lord, Lord, how this world is given to lying! I grant you, I was down, and out of breath; and so was he: but we rose both at an instant, and fought a long hour by Shrewsbury clock. If I may be believed, so; if not, let them that should reward valor, bear the sin upon their own heads."  [First Part of Hunry IV.—Act. V.]  QUIVIS.

[BWP]
A very summary disposition was made of this debate in the Senate, by the announcement, on the part of Mr. Hannegan, that the parties had agreed upon terms of peace.—Those terms, we learn from the New York Tribune, are to the following effect:

1. That the aboriginal races shall be governed by their own chief; the Yucatocos by theirs; so that neither race can oppress the other.

2d. Twenty-five hundred muskets, taken from the Indians by the Yucatocos, before the war broke out, are to be restored. (The Congressional orators have been particularly careful not to hint at this, or any other provocation offered to the Indians.)

3d. The debts due to the whites by the Indians, are to be remitted. (The Tribune explains the manner in which these debts have accrued. The whites have stripped the Indians of all their lands, and these latter holding under them as tenants, fall hopelessly in debt to their landlords, and being compelled to make it good with their persons, on which the landlord retains a lien, a system of slavery known as peonage, in Mexico, is thereby established. This appears to have been one of the causes of the late rising.—All travellers represent the system of peonage as practiced in Mexico to be exceedingly oppressive.)

4th. The uncultivated lands are to revert to the people and again become common property. The Yucatecos, it appears, had divided them among themselves, and kept them in their wild State.

5th. Certain oppressive and unjust taxes are to be abolished.

These terms appear to be very moderate, and their exaction will afford the reader some idea of the grievances under which the Indians, who seem to be citizens, have long labored. It gives us a must higher idea of the Yucatan Indians than we had before conceived; and if the Yucatecos are like the rest of the Mexicans, and Santa Anna's invasion of Texas may be taken as a fair sample of that Nation's disposition, they are far less bloodily disposed, and are must farther advanced in civilized feelings, than their neighbors.

The correspondent of the Philadelphia North American alludes to a remarkable scene which took place, when the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations announced that a treaty of amity had taken place between the belligerent parties. Mr. Niles declared, that since the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Illinois had announced that the interposition of this Government was demanded, because intervention was threatened on the part of England he could not see how the re-establishment of peace between the belligerents could render that bill nugatory. These gentlemen attempted to reply; but it was a dead failure, and the bill and debate were disposed of, in the most summary way know to Legislative bodies.

This most lame and impotent conclusion, to a most strenuous effort at humbug, lays bare the hypocrisy of the Democratic party in a manner which, we opine, must be any thing but agreeable. All the world can now see through the whole business from beginning to end. It was never more warmly contended, no, not even in the days of the man with the “white hat,” that England was intriguing to get a foothold in Texas, than it was in this debate that she had her heart fixed upon Yucatan. The object is sufficiently obvious. It was designed to get up a feeling against England—always a powerful lever in this country—by means of which Democracy might continue to rule the Union. What did they care for the Yucatecos? Nothing! The Indians might have tomahawked or scalped the whole nation without a tear from them. It is for the purpose of making capital that the matter has been brought forward at this interesting crisis. These, it will be recollected, are the very men, who, after insisting that our claim to 54 deg. 40 min., was clear and indisputable, shamefully backed out, and give her all that she had ever claimed.

The correspondent of the North American says, the news of peace fell very heavily on Cass and his compeers. No doubt of it! What was it to them whether the Indians murdered a thousand men, women and children a day or not? If it could be made to “enure to their benefit”—could be converted into an electioneering element—what would they have cared had the war been eternal? It might be well enough, to be sure, provided it implied no sacrifice, to put a stop to the war, but when it was so much better for party purposes to let it run on, they would not hesitate in their choice. “The heart of a thorough polemic,’’ says Burke, “is as hard as the nether mill-stone.’’ So is the heart of the politician who makes politics a trade, and whose profits come in the shape of the “spoils of party.’’

That the President himself is, likewise, regardless of the issue of the Yucatan struggle, provided he can make a little capital for himself, we are firmly persuaded. He has known that a bloody war was desolating that country ever since February last—the Yucateco Commissioner, Mr. Sierra, represented to him the deplorable condition of his country—He turned a deaf ear to his complaints—and never, until the sovereignty of the country was offered, did he deem it worthy of notice. So much for the philanthropy of Mr. Polk, who, for his conduct in this affair, has been extolled by the Locofoco press as not inferior to Howard, to Reynolds, or to Benezet. His great aim has been to establish his worthiness of notice. So much for the philanthropy of Mr. Polk, who, for his conduct in this affair, has been extolled by the Locofoco press as not inferior to Howard, to Reynolds, or to Benezet. So much for the philanthropy of Mr. Polk, who, for his conduct in this affair, has been extolled by the Locofoco press as not inferior to Howard, to Reynolds, or to Benezet. His great aim has been to establish his monstrous doctrine of intervention in the affairs of our neighbors, as a corollary from Mr. Monroe's message in 1823. How differently he thought and acted twenty-two years ago, before he had begun to think that he should one day reach the White House, the following extract from a speech of his, will abundantly testify. The subject was the Panama mission, proposed by Mr. Adams, and bitterly opposed by the Locofoco party. We desire our readers to pay particular attention to it, in order that they may be enabled to contrast the views of the President at these two different periods of his life. We take it from the Buffalo Express:

FROM MR. POLK'S SPEECH ON THE PANAMA MISSION.
He had voted for it [a resolution adverse to the message] because he believed it was declaratory of that uniform course of policy so happily pursued by the government from the adoption of the constitution to that period; because it was, as he conceived, still the true policy of the country; and because, being opposed, as he was, to the proposed mission to the Congress of Panama, under any circumstances, he wished to signify to the President and his Cabinet, by a distinct expression of opinion by the popular branch of the Legislature of the Union, the views which they entertained of the true policy of the country. That object had been effected by the vote of yesterday. By that vote it was distinctly announced by a majority of the House, as their opinion, that our policy with foreign nations is the same now as that laid down by Washington in his Farewell Address to the American People; that no circumstances had occurred in our foreign relations, or in the political connexions of other powers with each other, which authorized us to change that policy or to hazard the experiment of a new one. We had distinctly declared it as our opinion, by the adoption of that amendment, that our policy was now, as it ever had been, to observe a strict neutrality between all belligerent powers; that "in extending our commercial relations with foreign nations, we should have with them as little political connection as possible; that we should preserve peace, commerce, and friendship with all nations, and form entangling alliances with none; that we should not form alliances offensive or defensive, or negotiate respecting such as alliance, with all or any of the South American Republics; nor should we become parties with them or either of them, to any joint declaration for the purpose of preventing the interference of any European powers with their independence or form of government; or "to any compact for the purpose of preventing colonization on the continent of America." These are sentiments, Mr. P. said, to which he most willingly subscribed. However strong his sympathies might be in favor of liberty and republican institutions, in whatever part of the world they might make their appearance, the peace, the quiet, and prosperity of his own country were paramount to every other consideration.

RW48v25i41p2c3, May 23, 1848: Major Gen. Scott.

Pursuant to notice, a general meeting of the citizens of Elizabethtown, (N.J.) was held at the Court House for the purpose of taking proper measures of giving to Gen. WINFIELD SCOTT a hearty welcome to his HOME.

Elias Winans, Esq. was appointed Chairman; Henry Downington, Assistant Chairman; Joseph C. Hinchman, Secretary, and William Ross, Assistant Secretary. On motion,

Resolved, That a committee of thirty be appointed to make suitable arrangements for the reception and welcome of General Scott.

Which committee being appointed, it was

Resolved, That Charles King, Benjamin Williamson, and Edward Sanderson be a committee to prepare resolutions expressive of the views of the meeting—who reported the following, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we rejoice in the near prospect of welcoming home our friend, neighbor and townsman, General Winfield Scott, from his brilliant and arduous field of service in Mexico.

Resolved, That as Americans we exult in the proofs afforded by the campaign from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico, not less of the indomitable valor, eminent military skill and well sustained discipline of our armies, than of the moderation in triumph, and humanity in the midst of conquest, which have signalized and sanctified their victories.

Resolved, That in the inexhaustible resources, the remarkable military foresight, and the unaltering confidence on his gallant troops, of there commander, General Winfield Scott, we find abiding motives of national and personal pride and gratification, and that all these feelings are enhanced by the fact, that this great American is our neighbor, townsman and friend.

Resolved, That while we admire the brilliant achievements of the soldier, we love the virtues of the man, and no difference of political sentiment shall restrain us from greeting his return from the fields of his own, and his country's glory, with the warmest feelings of our heart. We will do him justice, though the Heavens fall.

Therefore, Resolved, That we will voice with the Corporate Authorities of this borough in manifesting in such mode, as shall be judged most fitting, our attachment, admiration, gratitude and respect, to Gen. Winfield Scott.

RW48v25i41p2c5, May 23, 1848: Correspondence of the Baltimore Patriot. Washington, May 18, 1848.

In the Senate, to-day, Mr. Allen made a long, an Allen-speech, in opposition to Mr. Reverdy Johnson's call upon the President. It was all thunder, however, without rain or lightning. No damage was done to any body. It was far from being anticipated that any would be done. At the termination of the speech, the Senate went into Executive session.
The principal feature in the proceedings of the House, to-day, was the Presidential speech of Mr. Cocke, of Tennessee, who took uppon the Loco-foco colleagues, who feared to do the work themselves, and, as assigned attorney, brought out Mr. President Polk as a candidate for re-election! He said, the party all maintained, that Mr. Polk had been true and faithful to his principles—was as popular now as he ever had been—and was eminently entitled to the thanks of the whole country! Why, then, he asked, not run him again. Did he not run powerfully four years ago, and what had he done since, that should cause him to be less strong now? All his partisan friends were contending that he had been faithful and true to his country, and had done well. Why, then, discard him—why throw him overboard?

Mr. Cocke said, he was apprehensive, that the office-holders did not dare meet the coming crisis with Mr. Polk as their candidate. They dreaded the terrible retribution which the people would visit upon him for the manner in which he had administered their affairs.

In order to show, that Mr. Polk had been true to his spoils principles, and to his friends who procured his nomination by the Baltimore Convention of 1844, Mr. Cocke furnished a statement as below* [not included, but ran at end of article (copy was incomplete)].

The speech produced some fluttering in the party. Two of the Tennessee members, Mr. Stanton and MR. Jones, wished to interrogate the speaker, but he had no time to waste in answer to such question as they might choose to ask him, and so he went on and concluded his speech, or, rather, spoke his hour our before he had concluded.

If he can do what General Bayly did, day before yesterday, he may get the whole of his speech into the newspapers. In on e hour after the General, from Accomac, had finished speaking his speech on the rights of the territories, he had written out in full for the press, as it appears in the “Union!” I say, in full, for it is very full, containing, certainly, twice as much as he delivered in the House!

Among the distinguished passengers here at this time, is General Cadwalader, looking finely. The Court of Inquiry, and Major General Gideon J. Pillow, are expected to arrive here in two or three days. Whether the Court will be re-opened here or at Frederick, has not been, as I learn, ultimately determined.

Mr. Dave Johnson was in the House to-day. So was Gov. Smith, “Extra Billy,” of Virginia. So also was “the man in the corner,” as Mr.Clay once designated and at the same time immortalized him, Perry Smith, late United States Senator from Connecticut. Doubtless he is a delegate to the Baltimore Convention.

The presence of so many members of that Convention here at this time, and the Locofoco manoeuvering going on, will have a good effect upon the Whigs, and do much towards determining them to complete harmony. POTOMAC. [BWP]

RW48v25i41p4c1, May 23, 1848: Secretary Marcy and Gen. Scott.

From the long period of time which elapsed between the receipt of Gen. Scott’s letters and the answer by Secretary Marcy—from the immense labor evidently bestowed upon the latter document—and from the unconscionable elaboration of all its details—it is fair to presume that he has made the best and most comprehensive defence, which his case will admit. As, however, documents of that length are rarely ever read by any body but editors of newspapers, and a few inveterate quidnuncs scattered through the country, it is a matter of very little consequence whether such be the fact or not. It is too late to change the current of popular opinion. It is the general belief of the country that the conduct of the Administration towards General Scott, has been highly iniquitous; and that it proceeded entirely from jealousy. So palpable is this fact to every mind, that the defence of Mr. Marcy has been

We regard Mr. Marcy’s letter, with all its attempt at sarcasm, and all its special pleading, as a virtual confession of every thing material that has been charged upon him. For first, the Whig press charged, that in May 1846, the Cabinet was guilty of intriguing with Congress to obtain the passage of a bill for increasing the number of Major Generals, with leave to the President to select the Commander-in-Chief, and that the object of the Executive was, to put civilians over the heads of Scott and Taylor, for political purposes. It was further charged that during the next session the President attempted to create the office of Lieut. General, which is known to the Constitution only when the country is in extreme danger, for no other purpose than to put Mr. Benton over the heads of Scott and Taylor, who it was hoped would resign in disgust.

The reader cannot but see at a glance, that these charges involve turpitude of a very deep die; that they imply corruption in its very worst form; and that the authors if guilty, deserve and should receive the severest condemnation of the public. The first was proved at the time by the incontrovertible evidence of concurrent facts. With regard to the second portion of the allegation, (the Lieut. General,) Gen. Scott in his letter says:

*I left Washington highly flattered with the confidence and kindness the President had just shown me, in many long personal interviews on military matters. For more than two months my expressions of gratitude were daily and fervent, nor were they less emphatic towards the head of the War Department. Proceeding with zeal and confidence in my most hazardous duties, I learned, January 27, at the Brazos San Jago, that an attempt was on foot to create a Lieutenant General, to take command in the field over me. Shocked and distressed, I allowed of no relaxation in my efforts to serve my country, resolved that for the short time I was likely to remain in commission, to be—

"True as the dial to the sun,

Although it be not SHINED upon."

A yet greater outrage soon followed: falling to obtain an act for the citizen Lieutenant General, a bill was pressed upon Congress to authorize the placing a junior Major General just appointed (the same individual,) in command over all the old Major Generals then in front of the enemy!

I will not here trust myself to add a soldier's comment upon these attempts; but I may thank God that He did not allow them, or subsequent injuries, to break down entirely the spirit and abilities (such as they are) with which He had endowed me.

This is a very serious charge. It accuses the President and Secretary, of intriguing against an old and experienced General, while he was at a long distance from home, in the field at the head of the American troops, and even in the actual presence of the enemy. If they were indeed guilty of this intrigue—if the plan actually was conceived to put a pettifogging lawyer, whose only claim to the title of soldier was derived from his military hat and boots, over the hero of Chippewa and Niagara—if they actually did contemplate all this—then it is impossible to find a name sufficiently expressive of their baseness. Does the Secretary, in his enormously elaborated "reply," attempt to refute or deny the charges here directly made by Gen'l Scott, and so deeply implicating his character as an honorable man? Not he. Loquacious as he is upon every other point, on this he is as silent as the rave. This silence is significant enough. Under the circumstances, it is equivalent to a full and unreserved confession of all that Gen. Scott has charged against him.

In the second place, not only the people of this country, but all Europe, whose eyes were fixed with mingled feelings of anxiety and admiration upon the daring career of the 'Great Captain,' are astonished, that without any charge to which it was possible to give credit for a moment, he has been suspended from his command—placed before a court martial—and brought down to a level with Lawyer Pillow. What does Mr. Marcy say with regard to this most anomalous proceeding? Hear him!

"The crowning outrage, as you regard it, is the simple fact that you, and 'the three arrested officers' 'are all to be placed together before the same court—the innocent and the guilty—the accuser and accused; the judge and his prisoners are dealt with alike.' 'Most impartial judge!' you exclaim. And why is it not impartial justice? On what ground of right can you claim to have your case discriminated from theirs? It is true, you have assumed to be their judge, and have pronounced them guilty; and complain and repine that the laws of the country do not allow you, their accuser, to institute a court to register your decrees. But you are not this rightful judge, although they were your prisoners. Before that court you all stand on the same level, and all have equal rights. Though you may have the self-satisfying conviction that you are innocent and they are guilty, the government could act upon no such presumption."

Mr. Marcy must have known, when he wrote this paragraph, that he was guilty of a gross misrepresentation.—He knows that the "crowning outrage" was not such as he represents it to be, and his own conscience tells him, but too truly, what it really was. The whole country—the whole civilized world, knows what the "crowning outrage" was, and Governor Marcy cannot conceal it from them any more than he can from his own conscience. It was that the most renowned General of the age—he who had just performed a series of achievements surpassing in brilliancy any that were ever before enacted on this continent, at least since the days of Cortez—should, without being charged with any moral offense whatever, be dragged before a tribunal of inferior officers, to answer charges which no human being believed in, and which, in truth, were so absurd, that Worthy, who brought them, was ashamed to prosecute them. This the Secretary knew perfectly well when he wrote this hypocritical paragraph. He knew, and the whole nation knows, that when Gen. Scott attempted to enforce order 349, Mr. Polk's own order, he met with the most violent opposition on the part of Pillow, Worth, and Duncan. To say that their conduct was contumacious, would be to give but a faint description of it.—It was full of malice and insult. The Secretary does not attempt to defend the Constitution of his Court, for in truth, he very well knew that it would not admit of defence. According to every notion which we have entertained with regard to military law and etiquette it was illegal; at any rate, it was constituted in total disregard of the feelings of the prisoner.

Gen. Scott applied for a court-martial to try Brig. Gen. Marshall, for a gross violation of the laws of war, and his application having been rejected, he complains of the fact in his letter to the Secretary of War. From the Secretary's reply to this letter, we shall learn how much value is to be placed on any motive he may choose to assign for his conduct. He contradicts himself as flatly as though he were cross-examined in open court, under an oath to speak the truth.

"The next specification in the catalogue of charges preferred against me, is that a court martial was not instituted by the President for the trial of Gen. Marshall and Captain Montgomery on your charges against them. The offenses imputed to them were certainly not of an aggravated character. The one, as was alleged, had been incautious in relation to a despatch under circumstances that might admit of its coming to the knowledge of the enemy, and the other had not carried a despatch with as much expedition as you thought he might have done. As one was a general officer, a court to try him must have been composed of officers of high rank. Before the order for assembling it could have reached Mexico, it was foreseen that your command would be at Vera Cruz, and probably engaged in an active siege of that city."
Let the reader take particular notice of the reasons here assigned for declining to call a court-martial in the case of Gen. Marshall. They are that "the offences imputed to them were not of an aggravated character," and that "as one was a general officer, a court to try him must have been composed of officers of high rank." Why could not these rules be allowed to operate in favor of Gen. Scott? Why should he, of all others, be selected as the object for a trial, upon charges too frivolous to be prosecuted, even by the envenomed malice of an apostate friend? Why should he, of all others, be tried by a court of inferior rank? In fine, why was he alone considered by the Secretary of War, as out of the pale of the law military? It would have been easy to have placed Generals Butler, Twiggs and Shields on that court. Why were they passed over, and Caleb Cushing, the very emblem of venality, and Gen. Towson, who, though as far as we know, an honorable man, is yet paymaster of the army, (an office which is renewed every four years, and as such dependent on the Executive,) placed upon the court?

We shall pursue this subject no farther for the present. If Mr. Marcy's commissions were not sufficient to shew the malignity with which Gen. Scott has been pursued, this letter would furnish such proof in abundance.

Yucatan.

The reader will find, in our columns to-day, much that is interesting with regard to this country and its inhabitants. The communications of the Secretary of War to Commodore Perry, (in another column,) are remarkable documents, and if they do not involve us in several wars, we shall have every reason to bless our stars. The correspondent of the Journal of Commerce says, with regard to them:

"The above order is the most important that has ever been given from this Government on any occasion. It is manifestly intended to carry out Mr. Polk's views and policy, as declared by him in his various messages, in regard to the interference of European Powers in the affairs of this continent. It will involve us in a war with England, Spain and France, if anything can do it. I begin to believe now that Mr. Polk is going for re-election, and is carving out work enough for his second term which is evidently to be signalized by several glorious wars!"

Yucatan Instructions.

The following are copies of the Instructions to our Navy in relation to the contest waging in Yucatan, as recently transmitted by the President to Congress:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 15, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 13th instant, to transmit a copy of my communications to Commodore Perry of the 8th of March and of the 12th instant, on the subject of giving protection to the white population of Yucatan with the naval forces under his command.

No advices have been received at this Department from the commander or officers of the squadron in the Gulf of Mexico of a date later than the 15th of April, ultimo.—All the communication on the subject, received from any of them, have been already transmitted to the Senate.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

The PRESIDENT.

JOHN Y. MASON.

Navy Department, March 8, 1848.

SIR: Your despatch, No. 125, of the 15th February, 1848, with its enclosure, has been received.

During my absence from Washington a communication was received from the honorable Secretary of State, under date 28th December, 1847, enclosing a copy of Mr. Buchanan's despatch to Mr. Sierra, a commissioner from Yucatan. I have acted under the impression that it had been communicated to you, with instructions to conform to the wishes of the President, as made known to Mr. Sierra. On receiving your despatch, I have caused inquiry to be made, and suppose that I was mistaken. I therefore hasten to make to you this communication, and to send to you copies of Mr. Buchanan's letters to the Department and to Mr. Sierra. It is desirable that the Yucatecos shall have the benefit of the relief which was assured to them; and I therefore request that you will give immediate orders to carry out the proposed plan of exempting Yucatan vessels and cargoes from payment of duty at Laguna, as suggested in Mr. Buchanan’s letter; and, as far as it can be satisfactorily ascertained, refund any duties which have been collected at that place since the date of February 4, 1848, which duties would not have [been] exacted is you had received this instruction in due time, after the letter of the Secretary of State.

The President has heard with regret of the ferocious and murderous conflict now raging between the Indians and whites of Yucatan. I am happy to hear of your contemplated visit, and hope that you will be able, by your presence, to exert a favorable influence in checking the advance of the Indians towards the towns and villages on the seacoast.
An application has been made to the Department, and another by Mr. Sierra to the President, to allow a shipment of gunpowder, to enable the whites to defend themselves in their war with the Indians, to be landed at Sisal. I enclose you a copy of my answer. No authority can be given from the Department to land articles contraband, without a knowledge of its necessity, and without satisfactory assurance that it will be applied exclusively to that object. But humanity requires that the importation should be prevented, if you shall be satisfied that the powder is not to be used for other or hostile purposes towards us. If, when the vessel called the "Mary Ann" shall appear off the coast, the Indians shall have been defeated and dispersed, and, in your opinion, the powder should not be landed, you will not subject the vessel to any penalty or forfeiture, but will allow her to retire without landing that part of her cargo.
If the contest still rages, and you are satisfied that the powder will not be used against us, you will interpose no impediment to its being landed at Sisal.

The Department has entire confidence in your discretion, and in your judicious views of the best mode of maintaining intercourse with Yucatan.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

J. Y. MASON.

Commodore M. C. PERRY, Commanding Home Squadron, Gulf of Mexico.

[BWP]

RW48v25i41p4c4, May 23, 1848: (Confidential.) Navy Department, May 12, 1848.

SIR: Your course of proceeding, in your recent visit to various points along the coast as far as Campeachy, as reported in your dispatches, beginning with that of the 29th of February, has been highly satisfactory to the Department.

The deplorable condition to which the State of Yucatan appears to have been reduced by the ferocious and inhuman war waged by the Indians against the Government and white inhabitants of that State appeals most strongly to the sympathies of the civilized world, and I am gratified to perceive that you have employed your kind offices, as well as disposed of the limited force at your disposal, so as to give protection to the inhabitants who are flying from their homes before a ruthless enemy.

I was very reluctant to order the "Albany" to Laguyra, when your force was so much weakened by the return of the Mississippi, John Adams, Germantown, and Saratoga to the north; but the dispatches of Mr. Shields represented the condition of our citizens and their commercial interests in Venezuela as so critical that the President considered it indispensable that a ship of war should be present to give protection, if required. Your prompt dispatch of the Albany on that interesting service is highly approved. The Germantown, Commander Lowndes, sailed for Vera Cruz from Norfolk on the 25th of April ultimo, and the Saratoga, Commander Nicholson has orders to touch at Aux Cayes, and to give any required protection to American interests in Hayti, and to report to you with the least possible delay.

The questions presented in your dispatches are of very grave import. I send you herewith a copy of a message which the President deemed it to be his duty to send to Congress, on the second day of the present month, in regard it as the settled policy of the United States not to permit any colonization of new territory on the North American continent by European monarchies; and recommends to Congress that means be placed at his disposal for the military occupation of Yucatan, with a view to save the white population from destruction by the Indian race, and to prevent the practical occurrence of the question by the Yucatcoes being compelled to receive protection from any European Power.

During the present war with Mexico, conducted on our part with a humanity which must excite the pride of every American, it has been our constant policy to repel rather than encourage Indian depredations and incursions even on our enemy; and the liberal treatment extended to Yucatan, as the just reward of her neutral position, entitles her people to the full benefit of this policy.

I am aware that, from the necessity of your holding the several points now in your possession, and with your limited force, you cannot spare the means of effective assistance, even along the coast of Yucatan; and from the danger to which the vessels would be exposed in the navigation of the Gulf there would be great danger of their loss if their crews were landed, even if they were in sufficient number, or prepared with camp equipage or field artillery, for operations inland. I have not, therefore, expected you to do more, with the naval forces under your command, than to give protection to the fleeing inhabitants, and, acting on the principal of my instruction of March 8th, waiving all belligerent rights against Yucatan as a part of Mexico, our enemy permit munitions of war to enter per ports, if you are satisfied they are to be used for the defence of the whites against the savage enemy. It will be judicious to strengthen your forces at El Carmen; and, in addition to those already sent by you to Laguna, it would appear to me to be proper to send the entire detachment of marines now at Alvarado, with instructions to repel the Indians if they approach that point; but there is not sufficient force, nor have you the necessary equipment, to justify a march into the interior. Such an operation should only be conducted by a well-appointed military force.

Before the receipt of your despatch of the 29th of February, announcing your intention to sail for Campeachy on the next day, and communicating your purpose in regard to any intervention on the part of Spain, I had received dispatches from Commander Bigelow, communicating the cautiously-guarded instructions of the small Spanish vessels of war which were at Sisal. I am happy to learn by your subsequent report that no occasion has presented itself for you to determine whether the measures of the Spanish authorities of Cuba required interposition on your part.

While the United States are engaged in war with Mexico, the actual presence, without our consent, of the armed forces of a neutral Power within the territory of our enemy, co-operating with any portion of the Mexican people in military operations, cannot be permitted. Such a state of things it is hoped will not occur. If you should have reason to believe that it will, you will communicate without delay, that the President may take such course as his constitutional duty will require at his hands.

The distinguished services of Commander Bigelow are highly appreciated, and you will make known to him the unqualified approbation of the Department of his ready acquiescence in your request that he remain in his command after he had received a permission to return home.

Your despatch of the 29th of March will be made the subject of a special communication.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. Y. MASON.

Commander M. C. PERRY, Commanding U. S. squadron Gulf of Mexico.

delivered any other order to the regiment on that day.—This conversation was carried on in an ordinary tone of voice, Lieut. Martin being on one side of Lieut. Bennett, and myself on the other, and I presume that Lieut. Martin heard all that passed, though I can recollect that when I first told Lieut. Bennett that I wished to put a question to him he separated a short distance from Lieut. Martin.—This conversation was entirely without the knowledge of Gen. Scott, nor have I at any time during or previous to the sessions of this court knowingly had a conversation with a witness for the defence except in one single instance, perhaps two—those are Major Caldwell and Lieut. Colonel Johnson, of the Voltigeurs, to whom I put a single question as to whether they had heard Gen. Pillow state that Gen. Scott was stunned or paralyzed by the disaster or disasters of Molino del Rey, and then I understood that they would be called as witnesses for the prosecution on that point.—These two conversations were held without the knowledge or instance of Maj. Gen. Scott. I have no knowledge of any staff officer of Gen. Scott's wither having inquired of any of the witnesses of the defence as to what their knowledge was.

By the defence: Q—Is witness aid-de-camp to Major Gen. Scott?

A—I am acting in that capacity.

Q—Witness has said in the conversation with Lieut. Bennett that he, witness, stated his "impressions" as to the orders delivered by Capt. Hooker. If witness was not on the ground and could not, therefore, have any knowledge of facts, what was his, witness's, object in stating to Bennett what was his impression, when witness, in point of fact could have no impression?

A—My impressions were derived from the testimony which has been given, and from conversation with others. The remark was made as to my impressions after Lieut. Bennett had said that Capt. Hooker had delivered the order to cross the pedregal, and he (Lieut. Bennett) did not know or recollect that he delivered any other; I told him of my impressions as the reasons of my asking the question.

Q—Has witness been in the habit of submitting his reports of the proceedings of this court to Mr. Freaner for his information; has witness been in the habit of furnishing other information to Mr. Freaner which, but for the facilities thus afforded Mr. Freaner he could not have obtained—knowing he was the correspondent of the Delta?

A—The witness said he thought as the court had permitted reporters to be present, he did not consider the question put as being a proper one, or connected with the case. He thought it losing the time of the court, still he had no objection to answer it.

Gen. Pillow submitted the following question which he said would follow the former one objected to. It was not allowed to be put.

Q—Witness will state if Mr. Freaner has been in the habit of submitting his letter and correspondence designed for his paper, to witness, for his examination, information and correction, and did Gen. Scott not know that witness was thus furnishing information to Mr. Freaner, and that Mr. Freaner was submitting his letters and correspondence to witness, and was this habit of supervising the correspondence of Mr. Freaner by witness known to and approved by Gen. Scott?

Gen. Pillow submitted the following in support of the question put to witness:

The defence submits the two last questions and desires that they may be answered. He deems them important, as showing the habits of close intimacy and personal relations existing between the witness, Freaner, and prosecutor, so as to enable the court properly to estimate the testimony of that witness. The defence also deems the proof material, as sustaining and justifying the conduct of the defence in himself furnishing the information asked by Freaner, which is now the subject matter of a distinct specification in the charges against defendant, namely, the paper marked No. 1. The defendant admits he caused it to be furnished said Freaner, and the defendant has proved that the paper was furnished upon the application of the said Freaner. The facts in that paper the defendant has proved to be substantially true, he believes. If the prosecutor was himself, through a confidential staff officer, furnishing the same kind of information to the same correspondent, it is a justification of the very act which the prosecutor condemns in the defendant, by doing the very thing condemned in the defendant.

The view of the case is greatly strengthened by the practice already proven of the general staff of the prosecutor having in five different instances written letters which appeared in the public press, giving very partial and inaccurate accounts of the operations of the army in this valley, two of which it is proven were known to the prosecutor himself, and parts thereof read to him. One grossly and scandalously false and abusive of the defendant, misrepresenting the conduct of the defendant, and discussing the very matters which the court is now considering, and intended and calculated, as the defense believes, to poison the public mind against the defence, and to cause it to prejudice the very matter at issue while the defendant was held under arrest, awaiting the application of the prosecutor to the Government for a court martial, for the trial of the defendant. Surely, under the circumstances it is legal testimony, and proper to go before this court, as showing the motives of the prosecution, as well as justifying the act of defendant in furnishing a paper (No. 1) already referred to, and in both points of view it is offered. The defendant does not consider the proof, sought to be made by the two questions above, as calling for proof of conduct which is in violation of regulations or law. If right in the prosecutor it cannot be wrong in the defendant; but as the prosecutor considers it wrong in the defendant, he (the defendant) has a right to prove the defendant did the same thing.
Respectfully submitted.

Gen. Scott submitted the following:

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Court—The question to the witness has not been objected to by him nor by the prosecutor; but if the court allows it to be answered, the prosecutor will ask to be permitted to inquire what papers or notes connected with this investigation the defendant and his staff have furnished to the reporters for the public press; and the court will recollect that reporters openly copy evidence and documents belonging to the case from its records in open court.

In reply to the paper of the defendant I will merely add, that it has assumed as proven a great number of assertions which have not been proven, and which are entirely unsupported by facts.

Respectfully submitted.

The court decided that the question be not answered.

Lieut. Bennett, 15th Infantry, recalled.—Is witness acquainted with the general character for veracity of Private Ayres, and from witness’ knowledge of him would he credit his testimony?

A—I have been acquainted with him for about ten months, and would give credit to his testimony under oath.

Q—Where is the 15th Infantry now stationed?

A—At Cuernavaca.

Q—Does witness know the gambler Miller, a witness for the prosecutor in this case, if so, he will state what he has heard him say within the last few days about Gen. Pillow?

A—I have known him about nine months. I think it was about three evenings ago that I saw Miller at the Gran Sociedad. I heard some person abusing Gen. Pillow; I stepped close to a crowd, there were four persons together; Miller remarked that "Gen. Pillow ought to be taken out of town, or out of the city, (I forget which) and shot.

Gen. Scott submitted the following paper:

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Court—Under the rule you have established, I briefly reduce to writing the remarks which I yesterday submitted orally. I have not had time to consult the mass of evidence which has been spread upon the record of the court, and therefore can only speak from memory. Among the side issues the defence has been allowed to raise by cross-examination in the progress of this investigation and direct testimony, are the following:

1. The merits of the attack upon the Molino del Rey, the 8th of September last, whereas that battle is only alluded to in one of the specification (the 4th charge, 2d) to introduce an assertion of the defendant which the specification alleges to be false.

2. The relative merits of the attack commenced September 12th, on the castle of Chapultepec, compared with an attack that might have been made about the same time upon the gate of San Antonio, one of he southern entrances to the city, whereas the latter attack is only alluded to in the same specification to introduce declarations of the defendant which are alleged to be false.

3. The merits of the temporary armistice agreed upon at Tacubaya in August last, whereas the armistice is only alluded to in the sixth specification (same charge) to introduce the alleged fact that the defendant was not opposed to an armistice until he knew that he would not be a commissioner on the part of the American army to negotiate one.

All the testimony introduced by the defendant touching these matters is entirely irrelevant under the merits of any specification under the inquiry of the Court, and has served to overlay the true merits of the case, and by partial view, to misrepresent the events of the campaign, the motives and conduct of several of the commanders and particularly those of the General-in-chief of the American army in Mexico.

The prosecutor repeatedly admonished the Court in the progress of the investigations of the irregularities in question, without following the testimony, except incidentally and very partially the defendant in these side issues.

It is now asked will the Court permit the prosecution to go fully by evidence into the matters recited above, so as to repel and contradict the partial testimony complained of.

Respectfully submitted.
The court was cleared for some time, Maj. Gen. Pillow and Scott remaining. After the usual daily recess which followed, Gen. Pillow submitted the following:

Maj. Gen. Pillow respectfully submits to the court that he has gone into side issues not further than was necessary to meet the several points set forth by the prosecutor in his charges and specifications, to make such explanation so to put the court in possession of the facts and the circumstances immediately connected with the charges preferred, and to shield his reputation from the imputations, and insinuations (whether true or false, remains for this court, or the evidence to determine) cast upon it by his prosecutor, Maj. Gen. Scott.

Maj. Gen. Pillow expresses his willingness and anxiety to go into proof of his conduct before the investigations commenced in relation to the voluminous charges and specifications preferred against him. This matter (so far as the witnesses in this country were at hand) is now disposed of, he now expresses an equal willingness and anxiety to proceed to the investigation of any other matter the court may think proper to enter upon in the shape of charges or sensations preferred by Gen. Scott or any body else against himself, but if new issues are to be made not connected with the charges against himself, he claims the position of a witness and no longer that of a defendant.

Respectfully submitted.

The court was again closed, and after a short consideration came to the following decision:

The court, not having admitted collateral evidence irregularly, nor gone into any collateral evidence, when objected to by the prosecution in the form presented by the court, decides not to enter upon the inquiry now purposed as it will be seen by the record that neither the merits of the attack on Molino del Rey, nor the relative merits of an attack on Chapultepec and San Antonio Gartis, nor the merits of the armistice of August last are before the court.

There being no witness present in Court, the President stated that the court would then be cleared, at the same time requesting Gen's Scott and Pillow to remain, for the purpose of coming to a decision about arrangements for adjournment to the United States. At same time, the President informed Gen. Scott that if his two witnesses Col. Morgan and Capt. Chase, whom he wished to examine, in reference to the movements of the 15th regiment on the 19th August, and his arrival on the mound, overlooking Contreras, on the same afternoon, should be before the court left this country, they would be both examined.

The court soon after adjourned until to-morrow morning.

the Administration editors, and some Washington letter writers, to create the impression that the letter had been expressly prepared by politicians at Washington.”

Upon what peg will the Union and its echoes now hang their cavils?

No title. Mr. Trist, it is said, ... Mr. Trist, it is said, is going to publish a pronunciamento vindicating his course while in Mexico. Mr. T. was a great pet of Mr. Polk in the beginning, but coming in collision with a still greater pet, Gen. Pillow—"my dear Pillow"—Mr. Polk’s infirmity, as he is called out West—he is fallen into irretrievable disgrace.

Speech of Mr. Calhoun, Upon the Temporary Occupation of Yucatan.

[From Dr. Houston’s Report]

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan.

Mr. CALHOUN—The President in his message recommends to Congress to adopt such measures as they may deem sufficient, in the first place, to prevent Yucatan from becoming a colony of any European power; and in the next place, to prevent the white inhabitants of that territory, from being exterminated or expelled. In support of the last recommendation, he informs the Senate that there is now raging a cruel and devastating war, on the part of the Indians against the whites; and that unless some foreign power interpose, they will be destroyed or driven from the country. In support of the other recommendation, he states that the government of Yucatan has offered to the governments of Great Britain, Spain, and the United States, the dominion over the country, in order to obtain aid. The President also informs the Senate, that unless we grant aid, some other power may assert its dominion and sovereignty over the territory—a result which he alleges would be in contravention of the declaration of Mr. Monroe, and which on no account must be permitted.—The committee on Foreign Relation, in order to carry out these recommendations, have reported a bill which is now before us; the first section of which provides for the taking military possession of Yucatan, as recommended by the President.

The subject, sir, is of great magnitude. It is pregnant with consequences, both near and remote, which may deeply affect the peace and interests of this country. It demands the most serious deliberation. I have bestowed upon it full attention, and have arrived at a conclusion adverse to the recommendations of the President, and the report of the committee. I propose to show, in the first place, that the case of Yucatan, even as stated by the President himself, does not come within the declaration of Mr. Monroe, and that this declaration does not furnish the slightest support to the report of the committee.

In the message referred to, that of 1823, Mr. Monroe makes three distinct declarations; the first, and by far the most important, announces that the United States will not regard any attempt on the part of the Allied Powers to extend their power to this country, otherwise than as dangerous to our peace and safety. To show that the case of Yucatan does not come within this declaration, all that will be necessary will be to explain who were the Allied Powers, the object of the alliance, and the circumstances in which the declaration itself was made. The Allied Powers were the four great continental powers—Russia, Prussia, Austria, and France. Shortly after the overthrow of Bonaparte, these powers entered into an alliance called the “Holy Alliance,” the object of which was to sustain and extend the monarchical principles as far as possible, and to oppress and put down republicanism. England, in the early stages of the alliance, favored it. The members of the alliance held numerous congresses, and declared either in person or by ambassadors, that they would undertake to regulate the affairs of all Europe, and that they would interpose in the affairs of Spain for the purpose of putting down popular doctrines. In its progress, the alliance turned its eyes to this Continent in order to aid Spain in regaining her sovereignty over her revolted provinces.

At this stage, England became alarmed. Mr. Canning was then prime minister. He informed Mr. Rush of the project; and conveyed to him at the same time the assurance that if sustained by the United States, Great Britain would resist. Mr. Rush immediately communicated with our government. It was received here with joy, for such was the power, such the combination of the Holy Alliance, that even we did not feel ourselves safe, from its interpositions. It was anticipated, almost with certainty, that if the interference took place with the governments of South America, the Alliance would ultimately extend its interposition to ourselves. I remember the reception of the despatch from Mr. Rush as distinctly as if all the circumstances had occurred yesterday. I well recollect the great satisfaction with which it was received by the cabinet. It came late in the year; not long before the meeting of Congress. As was usual, the papers were sent round that morning, to each member of the cabinet, so that all were duly apprized of all the circumstances, and each was prepared to give his opinion. The cabinet met. It deliberated. There was long and careful deliberation; and the result was the declaration which I have just announced.—All this has passed away! That very movement on the part of England gave a blow to the celebrated Alliance from which it never recovered. From that time forward it gradually decayed, till it utterly perished. The late revolutions in Europe have put an end to all its work, and there is now nothing that the Alliance ever ordered or formed but has been utterly overthrown.

Now, by what ingenuity of argument—by what force of sophistry, can it be shown that this declaration comprehends the case of Yucatan? The events which called it forth have passed away forever. The next declaration was that we could not regard the interposition of any European power to oppress the governments of this continent, which we had recently recognized as independent, or to control their destiny in any manner whatever, in any other light than as manifesting an unfriendly disposition towards the United States. This declaration, also, belongs to the history of that day. It grew out of the same state of circumstances, and may be considered as an appendage to the declaration to which I have just alluded. By the governments on this continent which we had recognized, were meant the republics which had grown up after having thrown off the yoke of Spain. They had just emerged from their protracted revolutionary struggles. They had hardly yet reached a point of solidity; and in that tender stage, the administration of Mr. Monroe thought it proper not only to make that general declaration in reference to the Holy Alliance, but to make a more specific one, in order to countenance and encourage these young republics as far as we could with propriety. Now, I put the question—does the case of Yucatan come within this declaration? Has there been any interposition in the affairs of Yucatan on the part of any European power, with the design of oppressing her, or changing her destiny? If not, how can the case of Yucatan be comprehended in this declaration?

But it may be said, although the case of Yucatan is not expressly comprehended in the declaration, yet it is so indirectly—although there is not any such interposition on the part of any European power, yet it is mediated by England, for after all, that is the government which is meant in the message, under the general terms “European power.” The message, indicates that England meditates such interference, and the chairman of the committee on Foreign relations distinctly avows that opinion. Has England, then, manifested any disposition to interfere in order to oppress the people of Yucatan, or to change the character of their government from a republic to a monarchy? We have no evidence whatever on that point. It is true that the commissioner from Yucatan, Mr. Sierra, would insinuate as much. He speaks of the Indians who are in hostility to the white people of Yucatan as having obtained their arms from the British. He speaks with some degree of uncertainty, however and is unable to say whether the arms were given or not, and cannot state how they were obtained by the Indians. He speaks also of the hostile temper of England, and gives several indications of that kind. But in answer to all this, his own letter furnishes a conclusive reply. He tells us that the people of Yucatan could themselves have obtained arms from the Balize, without stating why they were prevented, or why they did not obtain them. Bu the arms were cheap, and there was a large supply of them. Now, the reason why the people of Yucatan did not receive those arms is, I think, a different one from that stated by the Senator from Massachusetts. In my opinion, it was owing to the fact that Yucatan was not considered a neutral power, but a part of Mexico; and that, therefore, it was on account of our own act, rather than that of the British settlement at the Balize, that arms were not received by the people of Yucatan. One of the members at the Balize has sent arms and a military force along the coast of Yucatan, without stating any particulars. I do not find any evidence of that. I do not know whether it is the fact or not; but it is be a fact, it still remains to be shown whether that was intended to relieve the people of Yucatan, or for the purpose of seizing and occupying the territory. The chairman of that committee took higher ground, and, without assigning his proof, said boldly and distinctly, that England meditated occupation of the country, and that we ought to pass this measure in order to prevent it. But the President himself does not put it upon this ground. He does not make this charge. He says, if we do not grant these supplies, England may—for I will speak in the singular number—or, the probability is, that she may grant these supplies; and that after granting these supplies, she may—there is no stronger expression used—may ultimately assert her dominion and sovereignty over Yucatan. This is the utmost charge made by the President.

Now, the question arises—suppose this contingency may possibly happen, would to bring the case within the declaration just quoted? Not at all. England does not interpose as a hostile power. She does not come to oppress Yucatan. She comes only to aid—to rescue the people of Yucatan from extermination and expulsion by the Indians, according to the statement of the President himself. Again suppose England does assert her sovereignty, does that bring the case within the declaration? Not at all; for the declaration is directed against attempts to change the government against the will of the governed. But in this case the tender of sovereignty is voluntarily made on the part of Yucatan. The acceptance of it may be objected to, and it may be contended that we ought not to allow that. But I waive that for the present. I assert, without possibility of contradiction, that the case, even then, does not come within the declaration. The President himself gives strong indications that that is his only fear, although he cites this declaration, he does not say a word in regard to it when he comes to make his recommendation. He calls upon Congress to prevent Yucatan from being what?—A colony to some foreign power. That shows on what basis he locates his recommendation. It is upon the declaration in the same message of Mr. Monroe, on an entirely different subject; the declaration that the continents of America having asserted their freedom and sustained it, will not, hereafter, be considered by us, as the subject of colonization by any European power. It is upon that the President bases his recommendation. Is this case of Yucatan, then, comprehended in the declaration? I expect to show that it does not within as much certainty as it has been established that it does some within the first declaration.

The word "colonization" has a specific meaning. It means the establishment of a settlement by emigrants from the parent country, in a territory either uninhabited, or from which the inhabitants have been partially or wholly expelled. This is not a case of that character. But here, it may be proper in order to understand the force of my argument, to go into a history of the latter declaration of Mr. Monroe. It grew out of circumstances altogether different. At that time there was a question between Great Britain and the United States in one side and Russia on the other. All three claimed settlements on the northwest portion of this continent. Great Britain and ourselves having common interest in keeping Russia as far north as possible, the former applied to the United States for cooperation. That became the subject of deliberation at the [illegible word] session of Congress when the message was communicated containing the declaration in which such frequent reference has been made; and it was in reference to that matter that this additional declaration was made. It was said to be a proper opportunity to make it, and the declaration was made. It had reference especially to that subject of the northwestern settlement and the other portions of the continent were thrown in, because all the rest of it, with the exception of some settlements in Surinam, Maracaibo, and thereabout, had passed into independent hands.

Now, having stated the history of these transactions, I contend that the word "colonization" does not apply to the case of Yucatan. That is the case of surrendered sovereignty over a people already there—or people who have tendered it, and if accepted, freely accepted on the other side. Does that possess any analogy to "colonization"?—No. It is the case of a province, or to use the appropriate term that Great Britain employs, it would become a "possession" of Great Britain—a province, if you please, but not a colony. When the chairman of the committee on Foreign Relations addressed the Senate a few days since, he related a conversation which he had with Mr. Adams, in reference to this declaration, and according to his statement, if I heard him aright, and he be correctly reported, Mr. Adams in applying his observation to the whole of these declarations, stated that it all originated with himself, and was unknown to the other members of the cabinet, until they became the subject of deliberation in cabin council. There certainly must be a mistake either on the part of Mr. Adams, or that of the chairman of the committee on Foreign Relations, as to the first of these declarations. The history of the transaction, the Senator will perceive, if he examine the documents, shows distinctly that the subject came through Mr. Rush, originating in the form of a proposition from England. I recollect, as distinctly as I do any event of my life, that all the papers in connection with this subject were sustained to the members before the cabinet met, and were duly considered. MR. Adams, in speaking of the whole as one, must have regarded the other declaration relative to colonization, and as respects that, his memory does not differ much from mine. My memory goes a little farther than his. He, it appears, seemed to intimate that it became a subject of cabinet deliberation. My impression is, that it never did. I so stated when the Oregon question was before the Senate—I stated it in order that Mr. Adams might have an opportunity of denying it, or asserting the real state of the fact. He remained silent, and I presume that my statement is correct. That declaration was inserted after the cabinet deliberation. It originated, I believe, as had been stated, with Mr. Adams, and it is, in my opinion, owing to the fact, that that declaration is not made with the precision and clearness with which the two former declarations are made. It declares that these continents have asserted and maintained their freedom and independence, and are no longer subject to colonization by any European power. This declaration was not strictly accurate. Taken as a whole, these continents had not asserted and maintained their independence. Great Britain had a larger portion of the continent in her possession than the United States. Russia had a considerable portion of it, and other powers possessed some portions on the southern coast. The declaration was broader than the fact, and exhibits precipitancy and want of due reflection. Besides, there was an impropriety in it when taken in conjunction with the former declarations. I speak not in the language of censure. I do not desire to censure. But I waive that for the present. I assert, without possibility of contradiction, that the case, even then, does not come within the declaration. The President himself gives strong indications that that is his only fear, although he cites this declaration, he does not say a word in regard to it when he comes to make his recommendation. He calls upon Congress to prevent Yucatan from being what?—A colony to some foreign power. That shows on what basis he locates his recommendation. It is upon the declaration in the same message of Mr. Monroe, on an entirely different subject; the declaration that the continents of America having asserted their freedom and sustained it, will not, hereafter, be considered by us, as the subject of colonization by any European power. It is upon that the President bases his recommendation. Is this case of Yucatan, then, comprehended in the declaration? I expect to show that it does not within as much certainty as it has been established that it does some within the first declaration.

In stating the precise character of these declarations, and the manner in which they originate, I have discharged a double duty—a duty to my country, to whom it is important that these declarations should be understood—a duty to the cabinet of which I was a member, and am now the only survivor. I remove a false interpretation, which makes a safe and proper declaration improper and dangerous.

But it is not only in these respects that these famous declarations are misunderstood by the chief magistrate of the country, as well as by others. These were but declarations—nothing more. Declarations announcing in a friendly manner to the powers of the world in one sense, that we should regard certain acts of interposition of the Allied Powers, as dangerous to our peace and safety, interposition of European powers to oppress the republics which had arisen upon this continent, as manifesting an unfriendly disposition. They were declarations that this continent having become free and independent, was no longer the subject of colonization by European powers. Not one word in reference to resistance. There is nothing said of it, and with great propriety was it omitted. Resistance belonged to us, to Congress; it is for us to say whether we shall resist, and to what extent. But such is not the view taken by the present chief magistrate to resist on all occasions. And not only to resist, but to judge of the measure of that resistance. He tells us in this very message that it is not to be permitted. That is language for us to hold, not for the chief magistrate. And in conformity with that, he sends in a message without giving us one particle of evidence as to these great political considerations which influenced the cabinet decisions as stated in this floor, in declaring whether we shall move or not. I speak it not in the way of censure. I state it only as a matter of fact, deducible from the message itself, as undoubtedly a great and dangerous misconception of this celebrated declaration.

Nut that is not all. He tells you in the same message, that it has become the settled policy of the country. What, not the declaration? No. But that it has become the settled policy of this country to resist what this declaration aims at, to resist, if need be, by an appeal to arms to the utmost extent. Is this the fact? Has there been one instance in which this declaration has been carried into effect? If there be, let it be pointed out. Have there not been innumerable instances in which it has not been applied? Certainly; and more than that. The declaration, under this broad interpretation, was disavowed entirely three years afterwards by the vote of the republican party. Read the debates, and you see that it was entirely disavowed by the chief magistrate himself. It never was the declaration of the republican party. And let me say—for it is proper that I should make the declaration on this occasion—that there has been an entire revolution between the two parties in this country in reference to our foreign relations. At the commencement of our government and down to a late period—I will mark it—the commencement of Jackson’s administration, the policy of the republican party was to avoid war as long as war could be avoided, and to resort to every means to avoid the calamity. The opposite party, without being a war party, had not so decided an aversion to war. The thing is now reversed; and hence, I who have endeavored to stand still—to maintain my ground for years on all questions connected with our foreign relations, have been compelled to co-operate with gentlemen on the opposite side, and to resist those in the midst of whom I stand. Now it is not and never has been the established policy of the country. And if it should ever become so, to the wide extent to which this declaration has been interpreted to go, our peace would ever be disturbed—our gates of Janus would ever stand open—wars would never cease.

What the President has asserted in this case, is not a principle belonging to this declaration; it is a principle which, in his misconception of it, he has engrafted upon it, but which has an entirely different meaning and tendency. This new principle is, that when any power on this continent becomes involved in internal warfare, and the weaker side chooses to make application to us for support, we are bound to give them support for fear that the offer of the sovereignty of the country may be made to some other power and accepted. There it is. IS there any such principle as that in this famous declaration? Not at all. It goes infinitely beyond this—dangerously beyond this—it outs it in the power of other powers on the continent to make us a party to all their wars; and hence, I say, if this broad interpretation be given to this declaration, we shall forever be involved in wars. By not disavowing a principle which will compel is to resist every case of interposition on this continent, I would not wish to be understood as defending the opposite, that we are never to interpose. That is a position which would be nearly as dangerous and absurd as the other. But can a general rule be laid down to guide us on such a question? No; every case must speak for itself—every case must be decided on its own merits.—Whether you will resist or not, and the measure of your resistance, whether it shall be by negotiation, remonstrance, or some intermediate measure, or by a resort to arms—all this must be determined and decided on the merits of the question itself. That is the only wise course. We are not to have quoted on as on every occasion this general declaration, to which any and every meaning may be attached. There are cases of interposition where I would resort to the hazard of war with all its calamities. Am I asked for one? I will answer. I may designate the case of Cuba. So long as Cuba remains in the hands of Spain, a friendly power, a power of which we halve no dread, it should continue to be, as it has been connected with the government to let Cuba remain there; but with the fixed determination, which I hope never will be relinquished, that if Cuba pass from her it shall not be into any other hands but ours. This, not from a feeling of ambition, not from a desire for the extension of dominion, but because that island is indispensable to the safety of the United States that this island should not be in certain hands. Were that island in other hands our coasting trade would be interrupted. The command of our commerce in the whole extent of the coast would be given up. Our commerce would be liable to interruption, accompanied by convulsive effects in the event of war.

In the same category I will refer to a case in which we might most legitimately have resisted a foreign power, and that case is Texas. That case has been greatly misunderstood. It sprang up in the midst of party excitement, when a large portion of both parties decided hastily; and when it was difficult, if not impossible to get a fair hearing. I never supposed, as has been stated on this floor, that Great Britain intended to colonize Texas, and reduce her to her power. That was not my dread. What was dreaded was this:—teas being a small power, and Great Britain having a free and large intercourse with her, and we almost none, although “bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh,” she would gradually have been [illegible word] of her affection for us. Kindness for England and aversion for us, would have been the result. I know this is the inevitable [illegible word] of [illegible word] relations between nations. At that very time there was a question with this country and Texas, which had it not been for the most amicable relations which subsisted between us, would have ended in hostilities; and Texas, if alienated from us with more than a thousand miles of boundary of woods and rivers, almost an indefinable line, would in the natural course of things, have subjected us to a war with Great Britain, combined with a Texan and a Mexican war. I saw all this. I saw it clearly. I saw that it was a case in which to act, to resist the interposition, and that there was no there made by which resistance could be made except by annexation, and therefore I was in favor of annexation.

One of the members of the committee on Foreign Relations put this question to me:—Suppose it was certain that Great Britain would accept the sovereignty of Yucatan, and finally take possession of the country, would I resist? I am prepared to answer this question. I would not. And for irresistible reasons. I would not, because the country is, to a great extent, a most worthless one. Nearly one half of the country is destitute of a single stream—rocky and barren throughout the greater part of it and it is only by means of the natural reservoirs of water that they are enabled to live through the dry season. I would not resist, because the possession of Yucatan would contribute nothing to the defence of the passage between Yucatan and Cuba, which is represented to be so important to our commerce. It is not without its importance—it is important to the inward trade, but not as import to the outward trade. There is a constant current of wind and water setting in that direction, of which vessels going to New Orleans, or any other port on the gulf, may avail themselves. But on coming from those ports, they usually make their way between Florida and Cuba, and thus go around Cuba altogether. The passage between Yucatan and Cuba is the [illegible line]. The outlet is entirely, or nearly so, between Cuba and Florida. It is also, to be sure, an inlet, but a most difficult inlet; for they must encounter the current. I speak now of our own coasting vessels. In voyages from Europe they go around the island. Yucatan is not of so much importance if it did not contribute to the defence of the passage, or could be made to contribute to its defence. But I take higher grounds. If it were not an inlet, but an outlet, the occupation of Yucatan by England would add nothing to her power in cutting off our trade. Yucatan is wonderfully destitute of ports—there is not a frigate port connected with the whole Peninsula—there is pretty good anchorage of some depth, but on the sea-coast to the Gulf of Mexico, or on the west, there is not a port even for a sloop until you get to Laguna. But Great Britain possesses an uncontrollable power over the passage whenever she chooses to exact it; and if ever we should be engaged in a war with her there is not a single vessel of ours, even with the possession of Yucatan, that could enter the gulf by that passage. The passage from the Atlantic ocean to the gulf, in and out, is between Yucatan and Cuba through the Caribbean sea, backward and forward. What is the Caribbean sea? It is that immense portion of the Atlantic ocean, having on its north and west sides Yucatan and Cuba; on the east the Windward Islands; on the south all that portion of South America extending from Orinoco to Yucatan. Great Britain has the complete command of that sea, the island of Jamaica being in the middle of it. Jamaica abounds with the finest ports, and the most commodious naval stations. In addition to that, she has the Balize lying to the westward, and nearer the point of Yucatan then any other coast, gives her greater command then any one port in Yucatan. In addition, she possesses the Windward Islands to the east, and hence she has the complete command of the Caribbean sea, and so long as she retains her ascendancy on the ocean, it is locked up effectually against us in time of war; in time of peace we do not need it. I would not take military possession of Yucatan, if I were certain Great Britain would, for another reason—Not only because it is worthless, but because it would impose upon us a very heavy cost, both in men and money; first to take possession, and then to keep possession. The extent to which out expenditures would go, no man can estimate; we have no data on which we can act. The population is five or six hundred thousand. The Indians, originally a very peaceful and quiet people, accustomed to arms, from being frequently called into the contest in which the Mexicans have been engaged, have become somewhat military. They are represented as very active, as being great marchers, and they fly to the mountains to escape their pursuers.—In that climate, the most arid upon earth, when these people fly before us, at what time will this war come to an end? It is nothing for us beat them, to overthrow them at once; but they retire from us, they escape and conceal themselves: it is another Seminole affair. How much money would it take? What number of men? What sacrifice of both? Is any one here prepared to answer? But I am not only averse to incurring the expenditure, but I am in favor of peace, when peace can be maintained. I would never depart from it but for adequate motives. I see no adequate motive here. I am also opposed to it, because of all things I have ever seen, this has the most uncertain future. Events occur with electric rapidity. No man can tell what may come to-morrow, and never was there a time when more caution is counseled, when there has been a stronger motive to husband our resources to avoid all petty quarrels and petty wars, or anything that can involve us in difficulty, in order to stand prepared to meet emergencies as they arise. He who looks abroad—he who looks at the eastern horizon, and does not see the necessity for caution, has bet a slight conception of the future.

I would not take military possession even under the contingency I have stated, for another reason. It would be a breach of good faith. Not long since we agreed upon the terms of a treaty with Mexico. The treaty, before this time, has been acted on or is about to be acted on by the Mexican Government, and until it is acted on we are bound in good faith to observe it. If it is acted on it becomes a paramount obligation. We have considered Yucatan as part of Mexico, as one of the States of the Mexican Republic. It is not comprehended within the line which is proposed to be drawn between us and Mexico. We could not seize upon that state in conformity with good faith, or could we in conformity with the armistice for the same reason. The armistice makes some exceptions, but this is not one of them.

I have not stated my reasons against the measure reported by the committee to carry into effect the message of the President, recommending that we should adopt the measure which we deem most expedient to prevent Yucatan from becoming a colony of a foreign power. I go to the next recommendation of the measures best calculated to prevent the white population from being exterminated or expelled from Yucatan. And here let me express my regret that the President should, in the same message, unite two measures of such different characters—one to appeal to our humanity, which I would, as far as we could with propriety, act upon promptly and at once. The other, involving the highest considerations of policy, which requires much time and much deliberation. It is among the most complicated questions ever presented to this body, and by no means the least important. Why these different questions have been mingled, I am not prepared to say. The emergency for the one seems to have existed long before the other. Danger to the white population has been known to exist since the middle of February; but the message has only recently been communicated to us. During the long intervals, if the case appealing to our humanity had been brought forward, we might long ere this have rendered sufficient aid. But whatever may be the result in reference to these Yucatanese, the result is not chargeable to us. Higher considerations—considerations of policy more important to us—first demand of us deliberation; and that deliberation, I trust, will be given. But I pass on to the question of humanity. If this be a war of races, if the case be in reality, that the race which has been in power, if not so now, the white race which have not been responsible for this war; if they had used all manly exertion, and exhibited due courage in repelling the danger, strong indeed would be the appeal to my sympathies. I have no aversion to any race, red or black, but my sympathies are for the white race.—I have not been so much affected by misguided philosophy or false philanthropy, as to lost the natural feelings which belong to me. If this is a case of war between races—it the Indians have risen and threatened the massacre and extermination of the white race, who have acted so generously towards them, and have raised them from the condition of slaves or serfs to the condition of citizens and freemen—this would present a strong case for my interposition. Considerations belonging to progress, civilization, and liberty, would in that case prompt me to act. It was the Spanish or white race, and in that we include the mixed races who threw off the yoke of Spain—who overthrew the Spanish power, and they continued to evince the greatest attachment to liberty, refusing to yield in any degree according to the well known Spanish character. They have all the wealth, and comprise nearly all the intelligence of the country; and on their ascendency, in my opinion, depends the future progress of Yucatan. It is true, they are not very elevated in this sentiments, nor very well informed on political subjects; but they are far better informed and far more elevated in sentiment, that the Indian race can possibly be. If they can maintain themselves, there is some hope that Yucatan may go forward, that intelligence may increase, and that, at some future day, they may be prepared to look for a higher position than at present. If the white race be overthrown, and Indian authority established, there will be a directly opposite tendency; a despotic government, like that of Hayti, will be established. Perhaps, a capable man may be elevated to power, and may govern tolerably well, but it will undoubtedly follow the course of Hayti. Its direction will be down, down, until it comes down to the very bottom, and end in a savage state of society.

But if there are powerful considerations why we should interfere as far as we could with propriety, there are very powerful ones why we should act with great caution. The case of Yucatan does not stand alone. All the causes of oppression existing there are operating in all portions of this continent south of is, including Mexico, down on the eastern side of the Andes to Buenos Ayres, and on the south side to Chili; all, all, every one, are in great danger of falling into the condition in which Yucatan is now placed. The history of all has been the same. The white and mixed races led in casting of the yoke that made them provinces. They, everywhere, elevated the Indian race to an equality with themselves. It was done most imprudently, and conveys a solemn lesson. The Indians were elevated politically, but the counter error was committed of not elevating them civilly to their own level. While they gave them the power of voting—the highest political power—they imposed a tax upon them exclusively of a most onerous character, so as to throw the whole burden of supporting the government upon them. If the order had been reversed—if they had given them all civil rights, and dealt out to them more sparingly political rights, elevating the more intelligent, and spreading the basis as the intelligence of the Indian population increased, a very different result might have taken place. All those South American States consist of the same population, whites, mixed, and Indians. There is not a numerous African population. All will, I fear, be agitated in turn. The whole of them it is to be feared, will be subjected to one melancholy fate, and be overthrown in spite of all we may do. But I trust that it may be otherwise. The magnitude of this subject, however, should [illegible word] be caution. Whatever we so in this case we set a precedent; we affirm a principle; and every on e knows the force of precedence and asserted principles upon a population like that of our country. Will you have t repeat it in all other cases? Yes. Even now we are engaged in a war every way similar. It is a war between races [illegible word]. How it may end we know not. Guatemala has gone through the process. She is already under Indian authority. A man of remarkable character, it is said, is at the head of the government—who does very well in his time, but how they are to manage afterwards, who can tell? Look at the case. Are we to declare in all these cases that we are to interpose by force of arms if need be? that we shall become invested in the fate of all these countries?—Should we set such a precedent? No. the first duty of every nation is to itself, and that is the case pre-eminently with the United States. They owe a high duty to themselves. To pursue a line of volley that will secure their liberty and the success of their great political system, will be of infinitely more service to [illegible word], than even the securing the ascendancy of the whites [illegible word] in the southern portion of this continent. But if instead of pursing that wise policy, such a course be entered upon as that recommended in the message of the President, I fear that sooner or later the ruins of our government will be added to those which have fallen within the last few months. But while I see the greatest reason for caution, I think that this government, upon all occasions, ought to give encouragement and sustenance, as far as it can with safety, to the ascendancy of the more intelligent—that it ought to be the guardian of the civilization, progress, and liberty of this continent, in those portions of it where they are exposed to the most danger, I will not say that in no case should we ever give them military aid, but if there be a case which will justify that, it must be an extraordinary one, standing upon its intrinsic merits, and not governed by a general rule. [TO BE CONCLUDED.]

RW48v25i42p2c1, May 26, 1848: The Yucatan Treaty.

We gave an outline of this instrument yesterday, from the New York Tribune, but as the war to which it puts an end was very near becoming a serious matter it us, as, in fact, it was on the point of producing a second Presidential war, and as the President alleged, as a pretext, that humanity required our intervention, though this idea never occurred to him until Mr. Sierra offered the sovereignty of the country, it is well to give our readers as much insight as possible into the character of the respective parties to this instrument. We therefore publish it entire:

The General Secretary of the Government:

In the holy name of God the Father, of God the Son and of God the Holy Ghost, Amen. We the undersigned, D. Jose Canuto Vola, curate, and D. Felipe Rosado, superior political chief, commissioned by his Excellency, the Governor D. Miguel Barbachano; and we who are named in the same capacity by the principal chief of the Indians, D. Jacinto Pat, and whose names are likewise undersigned, Pbro. D. Manuel, Mesa Vales and Captains D. Jose Maria Pat, D. Francisco Cob, D. Pantaleon [illegible name], D. Juan Justo Yani, and the sub-lieutenants, D. Jacinto Mangas and D.
Juan Jose Guerro, being met in this town of Tzucacab, on the 19th day of April, of the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, for the important purpose of maturely considering whatever may be adopted to put an end to a war which occasions damage, prejudice and ruin on both sides, here in the peninsula of Yucatan, in which our Lord God desired that we might be born to love each other with equality; and considering all that concern the well-being and profit o four neighbors, the Christians, to the end that they may reposes, retiring to the care of their interests, their firesides and their respective families, as is the command of God. Here, before His Majesty, the above mentioned chief D. Jacinto Pat, being present, and the Captains D. Apolinario Zel, D. Petro Baak, D. Jose Benito Vitorin, D. Juan May, D. Saturnio Rodriguez, D. Franciscos Sanchez, D. Juan Jacinto Pat, and D. Doroteo Poot, of common accord, we have set our names and seals, for perpetual memory, to the true desires or resolutions which follow:

ART. 1. From this day and forever personal taxes shall be abolished both for whites and Indians, it being well understood that the tax here spoken of is that established by law for all Yucatecos from the ages of sixteen to sixty.

ART. 2. In the sense of the preceding article the duty on baptism shall be fixed a three reals, [three shillings, York] and the duty on marriage then reals, for the whites as well as for the Indians, and for every Yucateco.

ART. 3. It is also established that forests may be cleared from sowing, or to form ranches in the plains of the towns, in lands called lands of community and in common, without paying any rent therefor; and that from this time forth no portion of said lands shall be sold. And those which are claimed and laid out, but the deeds of which have not been executed by the Government, shall remain un conveyed, a recourse for subsistence for the people, the Government undertaking to refund the value which it had received on account of the said lands.

ART. 4. There shall be returned to the Indians under command of the chief, D. Jacinto Pat, all the muskets which the Government now ceasing have ordered to be taken from them, it being understood that of the two thousand five hundred taken, those which are now existing shall be promptly returned; and that his excellency, the Governor, D. Miguel Barbachano, shall presently buy as many as are wanting, and shall deliver them into the hands of the said chief, D. Jacinto Pat, that he may distribute them to their owners as is just. All the arms which our beloved neighbors, the Indians, now have, shall remain with them for their use. The moveables and other effects which the troops of the said chief, D. Jacinto Pat, have taken, up to the present time, they shall retain for their own, and no one shall ever have a right to reclaim them.

ART. 5. Considering that his Excellency the Governor, D. Miguel Barbachano, is alone charged with the executions of the articles of this great act, and also that he alone will have as a duty the fulfillment of their spirit; he is to remain invariably established in the high office which he exercises by the will of the people of this state of Yucatan; and he shall retain it for life, because that has been a cause of taking up arms; and the people shall take care that he be not removed from his station.

ART. 6. It is henceforth established under a sacred compromise that the chief, D. Jacinto Pat, shall be the Governor of all the captains of the Indians of the people of Yucatan, and this gentleman will agree with his Excellency the Governor, D. Miguel Barbachano, in the best mode of Government under which internal harmony of the two people may be attained, and as to the manner in which they shall be ruled or governed by their justices for their uniform well-being.

ART. 7. Likewise all debtors to manual service shall be released from their debts, and all those who have assisted in the field with arms in their hands as well as those who have not taken up arms, being included in this provision, since all Yucatecos ought to enjoy this benefit. But those who may desire to contract new debts shall be held to satisfy such debts with their personal labor.

ART. 8. All taxes on the distillation of ardent spirits are abolished in all the towns of Yucatan.

ART. 9. When his Excellency the Governor, D. Miguel Barbachano, shall deposit with his secretary the ratification of the stipulations contained in the present instrument, so that it has the necessary value, all the belligerent forces shall alike retire to their residences, only those troops remaining which are necessary to care for good order in their respective towns, and for the re-establishment of peace and tranquility therein. These agreements are established by the commissioners of his Excellency, D. Miguel Barbachano, and of the chief Jacinto Pat, together with their secretaries, &c. &c.

were at the tenor of this document. It proves, beyond all doubt that they are far from being the sanguinary and ferocious race which they have had the reputation of being. Nay! we do not believe that there is a civilized nation in existence at this moment, which, if placed as the Maya now stand, in the attitude of conquerors, with an immense superiority of numbers to back their pretensions, would have stopped short in the career of victory, and offered terms so full of justice and moderation. The Maya are evidently now, what their forefathers were in the days of Cortez, the most enlightened and refined of all the civilized tribes, and evidently have among them men who would do no discredit to any diplomatic circle in Christendom.

It is well known that discord has prevailed in Yucatan for several years, between different portions of the Spanish population, and that insurrectionary movements have taken place, having for their object the expulsion of Senor Barbachano. From the fact that the insurgents stipulated for his continuance in office during life, it is fair to infer that the Maya have been associated with the faction or party that supported him, and that the war has not been one exclusively of Indians against white people. Indeed, in the fifth article, it is extremely stated that his removal was the cause of taking up arms.

The most remarkable part of the whole affair, is the confidence which the parties seem to repose in each other. Not a pledge is required, not a guarantee is exacted, not a precaution is taken, to ensure the fulfillment of the treaty. The parties seem, each, to be perfectly contented with the bare word of the other. The Maya trusts to the Spaniard, and the Spaniard has implicit faith in the word of the Maya. Is not this enough to discredit the tales which were lately rife, of Maya atrocities and treachery? Barbachano has been said by more than one traveller, to be a man of talents and integrity. Can it be believed, that such a man would place himself at the head of a sanguinary and merciless horde of savages, of a race different from his own, to cut the throats of his kindred and friends?

The truth is, the whole matter has turned out to be what we said it was, no longer ago than last week. The war was a civil war; such an one as they are accustomed to have semi-annually in all the Spanish States of North and South America. Senor Sierra was most probably the emissary of the weaker party, and upon his representations, backed by the offer of the sovereignty of Yucatan, which he had no right to offer, our wise and thoughtful President was about to interfere in the domestic affairs of a foreign nation, without once taking the precaution to enquire whether he was not exceeding the just limits of his legitimate authority.

The State of South Carolina determined to take a commanding position in the approaching contest, seems to have been equally resolved that there should be no mistake, ab initio, with regard to her intentions. Accordingly she has sent to the Baltimore Convention a gentleman whose name sufficiently indicates the relation in which he stands to the rest of the Convention, and whose disposition, as manifested in the proceedings, amply justify his name. The individual to whom we allude is General Commander, who, by virtue of his name, we presume, kindly enough takes upon himself the command-in-chief of all South Carolina. He is "solitary and alone," as Col. Benton would have it; no "captain knight or man at arms" follows in his strain; he is not even accompanied by a staff, as any person, bearing such a formidable name, and wielding such extensive power, undoubtedly should be. As he is supposed to represent the Chivalry, who, in their turn, are thought to hold the balance, his name and his duties are not at all incompatible with "existing circumstances."

But we have not yet set forth the entire claim of the South Carolina Delegate, to the name in which he rejoices. He is the sole delegate from a single state; that is much, but it is not all. He is sent by a single town in that State! The town of Georgetown has the honor of furnishing him with the commission by virtue of which he commands the whole State of South Carolina. It is true that State at large refused to send delegates; but what of that? It is the nature of all commanders to be arbitrary; indeed the very nature of their duties requires that they should be so; and this one we presume is no exception to the general rule. Accordingly, we find him bearing down all opposition. The Cass men could do nothing with him; they were but the representatives of one great Commander, while he who was assailed was the very thing itself. He bore, in his own person, the spirit of all South Carolina; and in defiance of opposition, gave her whole nine votes for the two-thirds rule, amidst an absolute roar of applause. All honor to General Commander, the Commander-in-Chief of South Carolina. Mr. Calhoun must hide his diminished head, for a greater than he is risen. The Cass men may "go pray," as Hamlet says, for they can do nothing with Commander. The Convention, if they know their own interest, will nominate him for the Presidency; for he certainly is the most remarkable man of their body. In order that our readers may have no doubt upon this point, we subjoin the following extract from the Charleston Mercury, heretofore the organ of the Chivalry, but how long destined to continue so, now that Commander has taken upon himself the entire burden of the State, it does not become us to say. The Milledgeville Union had been hard upon South Carolina for not sending delegates. In correcting some error of fact perpetrated by the Union, with regard to the election of a single delegate from Georgetown, the Mercury says:

"The Union is also in error in supposing that Georgetown district has chosen a delegate to the National Convention, if it means the Congressional district, which only has a right to send a delegate. Gen. J. M. Commander derives all his authority from a parish meeting in Georgetown, which is only a portion of Georgetown district, which, with the district of Chesterfield, Marlborough, Darlington, Marion, Horry and Williamsburgh, constitute the Congressional district represented by the Hon. A. D. Sims. The meeting at Georgetown invited the remainder of the district to cooperate with them, but so far the invitation has been unheeded. We make these statements out of no disrespect to General Commander, or those who were present at the meeting which nominated him, but simply from a regard to truth, and a determination that neither out State nor ourselves shall be misrepresented upon this subject."
By the arrival of the schooner Tay, at New Orleans on Thursday, 18th, the Picayune received Vera Cruz dates to the 7th inst., and city of Mexico to the 2d. The Eudora was below.

A quorum was at Queretaro, and was waiting for our commissioners in order to go into session. The latter would set out for Queretaro as soon as officially informed that there was a quorum. A story was in circulation, derived from a letter written in Queretaro, that an insurrection had taken place, and that Almonte, Paredes and Bustamente, were at the head of it. It turned out to be a hoax. Desertions from the American army were becoming very common. Later accounts say that Herera has been nominated President. Otero is said to be in favor of peace. It was at first said that he was opposed to it. Herera is an old pesos man. The general impression was against peace; but upon reading the Picayune farther, however, we are pleased to see that there is no cause for apprehension.

By the arrival of the Yucatan schooner Aparecida, from Campeachy on the 2nd, and Sisal on the 11th, we are pleased to learn from the Picayune, that there had been no continuance of the war in the direction of Campeachy. The dates from the latter place are to the 29th, later than those referred to by us on Wednesday. The impression that hostilities were renewed, arose from the fact, that Pat still kept his force under arms in the neighborhood of Merida, from apprehension possibly, of treachery on the part of the Spaniards.

The people of Elizabethtown and the adjoining country, turned out en masse on Monday, to do the General honor. A deputation was present from New York, to whom the General stated that he felt himself unable to resist their kind importunities, and that he should meet them on Thursday (yesterday.) Gen. Worth having withdrawn his frivolous charges, there is no longer any reason for his withdrawing from public attention. We will publish the proceedings tomorrow.

I have said that if this be a case of war between races—if the white race be not responsible for it—if they have been patriotic and courageous in their own defence, it would present a strong appeal of my sense of humanity.—Is it a war of races? I have examined the case with all the lights before me, and I shall state the conclusion to which I have arrived. It is war, substantially I believe a war of races, but was not so at the beginning. It seems that from the beginning of this government of Yucatan, there have been violent factions. There was a disposition on the part of one of the factions to call in the aid of the Indians; and in order to obtain their aid as voters, certain promises were made to them, which have not been well fulfilled. A promise was made to relieve the Indians from the capitation tax—a great and enormous burden which presses them to the earth. The present conflict originated immediately, it is said in this wise: in the contest for power between Mendez and Barbachino, the partisans of the former, who were principally about Campeachy, made proposals to the Indians to reduce the capitation tax. Mendez in consequence of these overtures obtained the aid of the Indians and was elected governor. But when he got into power he did not fulfill the obligations which had been assumed. Instead of removing the taxes, he enforced their collection rigidly, which produced some disturbance. It seems farther—for this is an inference rather than a statement—that the question of the war between the United States and Mexico entered into the quarrels, and that Barbachino leaned to the side of Mexico, while Mendez took the side of neutrality, which preponderated. It would also seem that the Indian oppositions at first feeble, and in the midst of the conflicts of the contending factions, neglected, grew and became at length so important and threatening, as to occasion alarm and consternation. There was almost no display whatever of courage on the part of the white population; and very little evidence of patriotism throughout the whole affair. All this tends very much to limit my sympathies. Were the case confined to the male population, I should not have a particle of sympathy. But there are helpless women and children, and they alone excite a desire on the score of humanity, to interfere. I may add, that even was there some information inducing the belief, that it is not altogether a war of races, Barbachino is now in power, and such has been the violence of faction, that a large portion of the forces of Mendez had withdrawn from the army, on the change of the government; and I will state in this connexion, what perhaps should have been said before, that the intelligence brought by a late arrival at New Orleans, establishes beyond all controversy, that England has not been implicated in the affair. It appears that even the British settlement at the Balize is threatened by Indians—that the last captured city is no more than one hundred miles distant from that settlement—and that a dispatch had been sent for additional troops from Jamaica. All these apprehensions of an attack had resulted from the British settlement having sent down a few vessels to the coast of Yucatan, to pick up the miserable fugitives. If there had been any suspicion as to the conduct of that settlement, or British subjects in that quarter, these facts ought to put an end to it forever.

How far ought we to go then on the score of humanity? I think that all the naval force which we can spare should be sent to pick up these helpless people. We should furnish an ample supply of food and raiment for these miserable creatures and convey them wheresoever they desire—to Cuba or elsewhere. In a word we should do all that humanity requires. But I cannot agree to carry out the provisions of a bill which authorizes the President to use the army and navy, to take military occupation of the country. No considerations of humanity, or of the ascendancy of the white race in Yucatan, justify, in my opinion, the adoption of such a course of policy. It is now clear that the white population, so inconsiderable as, including the mixed race, to amount to not more than fifty thousand, is broken up, and that the Indians have interposed an effectual barrier against the re-establishment of the power of the whites. We can by force put down these Indians at considerable cost. We may put white men in power then. But the moment that we withdraw the former state of things will recur. We will thus be perpetually engaged in this work. Now, I am not willing to incur the danger and the cost of that. I am not willing to have this incident, which does not belong to it, attached to our government.

I come now to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. Davis.) As between the bill and the amendment, I prefer the bill. They both propose the same thing. It is true the amendment says only that the President shall have the power to do so and so, without prescribing what the President is to do. But the President has told us what he will do. He has told us as clearly as if it was put in the bill. His object is to take military occupation of Yucatan temporary to be sure, but it must end in permanent occupation. Now I would rather do that with our sanction directly, which the President purposes to do, than cover it up by this amendment. Nor am I reconciled to the amendment by the preamble offered by the Senator from Alabama. I think the Senator had not seen all the documents when he offered that preamble. It does not reach the case. It presupposes an obligation on the part of the government of the United States to defend the white race there, because we had to crippled Mexico that she could not afford them protection. I believe I state the substance of the preamble correctly.

Mr. Lewis assented.

Mr. Calhoun—But it is not so. These people in Yucatan are in an awful situation. Alarmed as they are on account of the Indians, they are still more alarmed on account of Mexico. Unfortunately for themselves, they assumed a position of neutrality, as they say of Independence. They thereby became traitors in the eye of Mexico; and no doubt they will be held responsible as traitors. Hence we see Mr. Sierra, the commissioner of Yucatan, makes a strong and powerful remonstrance. Nay, he goes so far as to say that as a matter of good faith, that the United States should not permit Yucatan to be sacrificed. There has been, in my opinion, a good deal of mismanagement in reference to this whole affair. The people of Yucatan are recognized as neutrals or not, just as suited our pleasures. So far as the collection of revenue is concerned, they were not neutral; as far as the importation of arms in the country was concerned, they were neutral; they were treated as belligerents, and the arms were made contraband of war, lest they should be transferred to Mexico. What has been the effect. Among the effects has been this, and they complain of it, that they have been kept destitute of arms whereby to defend themselves in this contest. On reviewing the whole case, however, I think that the white people of Yucatan, have, in a great measure, themselves to blame. The factions conflicts—fierce and maniacal, in which they have been engaged, which have kept them contending to the last, have involved them in these frightful calamities. Not that we are wholly impassable. We know that Mendez had declared neutrality, if not independence. We beheld the progress of those Indians. We witnessed their devastations, and instead of interfering to defend those who had declared themselves to be our friends, we stood by with our arms folded! Thus have we incurred a very heavy responsibility. We ought to have given them no countenance, we ought to have treated them as independent, or taken possession. It has been a mixed policy. While we have been witnesses of the whole progress of events, and have this acted; we are now called on at this last stage when the evil has been done, and mixed up with another, and most complex and difficult question, to interfere on behalf of humanity!

between the Yucatecos and their Indian fellow citizens, and shows that from the very nature of things, a hostile collision of some kind, sooner or later, was literally inevitable. Nor were this cause, and the disasters that sprang from it, confined to Yucatan alone. They embraced all the Spanish Colonies of South America, as far as Buenos Ayres on the East of the Andes, and to the Southern limit of Chili on the coast of the pacific. The aboriginal population having assisted the Creoles in throwing off the Spanish yoke, were of course, prima factae, entitled to, and actually exercised, the same political rights with those to whom they had yielded assistance in time of need, without, however, being able to obtain the privilege of exercising the same civil rights. The consequences, to any but men just emerged from the lowest depths of a despotism, and therefore deaf to all the lessons of political wisdom, would have been apparent. In the mean time the Indians, had the right of voting, the highest political right, and constituting the majority by immense odds, had, in point of fact, the whole political power in their hands. Yet strange as it may appear, the Spanish race continued to load them with taxes, sometimes of a most oppressive character, gradually establishing a system of peonage, and not only devoting the bodies of the Indians, to a species of perpetual slavery, but appropriating to their own use all the lands of the country, wild and cultivated. It were not possible, in the nature of things, that matters could remain in this state forever; and for our own parts, we are only surprised that they should have continued thus long.

We are glad to see Mr. Calhoun rejecting with just scorn, the absurd proposition that no foreign (that is European nation) shall be allowed to plant a colony on this continent; a proposition to sustain which in its legitimate extend, it might one day become necessary to shed more blood than was split in the wars of the first French Revolution; for there is not a great nation upon earth with which it might not bring us into conflict. That the doctrines of Mr. Monroe never contemplated any such result as this, he makes abundantly evident. Indeed from their face it may be learned with unerring certainty. Yet there are a species of politicians who, from the most wholesome doctrines, are accustomed to extract the most pernicious consequences, as a certain class of religious-pretenders are known to distort the words of Holy Writ, to suit their own nefarious purposes. The failure of their plans, in this instance, however, and the complete fallacy upon which all their sophistry is founded, so admirably exposed by Mr. Calhoun, will, we hope, repress the rage for acquisition, for the present at least, as the tiger shrinks, cowed and abashed to his lair, when he has fairly missed his spring.

When the Court of Inquiry met in New Orleans, Mr. Walker, one of the editors of the Delta, declared upon oath that he was the man who interlined the celebrated Leonidas letter. The reader will recollect, that Major Burns had previously sworn, at the trial in the city of Mexico, that it was done by himself. Gen. Scott attempted to impeach the veracity of Maj. Burns, but the Court would not allow him to take the necessary steps in order to do so. At Vicksburg, on his way to Washington, the Vicksburg Whig reports him to have said, that he should receive a pursership in the Navy; that Gen. Pillow had promised him the office. In view of this fact, the reader will not hesitate as to who is most worthy of credit; he or Mr. Walker—for they contradict each other flatly and directly, each claiming to have supplied the interlineations.

Gen. Pillow, the papers state, was much rejoiced at Mr. Walker's statement, supposing that it exonerated him, &c. We cannot see the slightest cause for rejoicing. He interlined, with his own hand, and gave to Mr. Freaner, for publication in the Delta, the letter known as No. 1 on the trial, which is almost identical with the Leonidas Letter.—In order that the reader may note the resemblance we insert them here in parallel columns:

placed at the disposition of Gen'l Twiggs Capt. Magruder’s battery, and Lieutenant Callender’s howitzer battery (both of which belonged to the proper division of Gen’l Pillow.)

Having thus opened the battle, he then advanced Gen. Cadwalader’s brigade to support the brigade of Col. Riley, who had moved to turn the enemy’s left and attack in reverse; and advanced Gen’l Pierce’s brigade to support Gen. Smith, who had advanced to assault the work in front.

The action had now become (with the advancing forces) very severe—and Gen. Pillow, seeing 5 or 6000 men advancing from the city to reinforce the enemy, whom he apprehended would fall upon Gen. Cadwalader’s rear, detached, from Gen. Pierce’s brigade, Col. Morgan’s regiment, (which was yet within reach,) and ordered it instantly to the support of General Cadwalader, who, seeing so large a force approaching his rear, threatening to overwhelm him, halted his forward movements, confronted the enemy in a strong position, and held him completely at bay. The forces under Gen. Smith, Col. Riley and General Pierce were hotly engaged with the enemy’s strong battery and large force of infantry and cavalry, until it was dark. Magruder’s battery and Callender’s howitzer battery were both very much cut to pieces and disabled. Late in the evening General Scott came upon the field, and brought with him Gen. Shield’s brigade of command of Maj.Gen’l Pillow, comprising a force of 3500. The enemy had sixteen thousand, of whom 5000 were cavalry, and twenty-seven pieces of artillery.

Gen. Pillow’s order for the attack was, that Gen. Twiggs should advance with one brigade of his division and assault the enemy’s strong work in front, while the other should turn his left wing and assail the works in reverse. He also placed at the disposition of Gen. Twiggs Capt. Magruder’s battery, and Lieut. Callender’s howitzer’s (both of which belong to the proper division of Gen. Pillow.)—

Having thus opened the battle; he then advanced Gen’l Cadwalader’s brigade to support the brigade of Col. Riley who had moved to turn the enemy’s left and attack in reverse; and advanced General Pierce’s brigade to support General Smith, who had advanced to assault the work in front. The action had now become with the advancing forces very severe; and Gen. Pillow seeing 5 or 6000 men advancing from the city to reinforce the enemy, whom he apprehended would fall upon Gen. Cadwalader’s rear, detached from Gen. Pierce’s brigade Col. Morgan’s regiment (which was yet within reach) and ordered it instantly to the support of Gen. Cadwalader, who seeing so large a force approaching his rear, threatening to overwhelm him, halted his forward movement, confronted the enemy, in a strong position, and held him completely at bay. The forces under Gen. Smith, Col. Riley and Gen’l Pierce were volunteers, who he advanced to the support of the forces now under Gen. Cadwalader; but it was too late—they did not get into position until the night.

The next morning, before daylight the brigade of Pierce advanced, in execution of the original order of battle; renewed the assault in front, while Riley’s brigade, supported by Cadwalader, turned his left, assailed the enemy’s works in reverse, and gallantly carried it; capturing a large force of the enemy, 22 guns, (among them those lost at Buena Vista,) and killing in the engagement between 600 and 800 of the enemy.

Having achieved this signal and brilliant victory, Gen. Pillow immediately resolved to pursue the retreating forces of the enemy, and, while his troops were flushed with victory, give battle to a large force (1) still at Santa Angel, which he did, and drove them before him. He then sent an officer of his staff back to Gen. Scott, to say to him, if he would cause Gen’l Worth to co-operate with him, he would sweep around the valley and assault the strong works of San Antonio in reverse, and carry that place, so as to open the direct route to the capital for the advance of his siege train upon the other battery on that road. Gen. Scott replied that Worth should co-operate with him. Gen. Pillow moved rapidly around the valley at the head of his triumphant forces, until he reached within one mile of San Antonio, where he halted to give his troops hotly engaged with the enemy’s strong battery and Callender’s force of infantry and cavalry, until it was quite dark: Magruder’s battery and Callender’s howitzer battery were both much cut to pieces and disabled. Late in the evening General Scott came upon the field, and brought with him Gen. Shield’s brigade of volunteers, whom he advanced to the support of the forces then under Gen. Cadwalader, but it was so late they did not get into position until in the night.

The next morning before daylight the brigade of Gen’l Pierce advanced in execution of the original order of battle, renewed the assault in front; while Col. Riley’s brigade, supported by Gen. Cadwalader, turned his left, assailed the enemy’s works in reverse and most gallantly carried it; capturing a large force of the enemy, twenty-two guns, (among them those lost at the battle of Buena Vista,) and killing and wounding, in the general engagement, between twenty-six and twenty-eight hundred of the enemy. Having achieved this signal and brilliant victory, Gen. Pillow immediately resolved to pursue the retreating forces of the enemy, and while his troops were flushed with victory, give battle to a large force, said still to be in San Angel, which he did, and drove them before him. He then sent an officer of his staff back to Gen. Scott to say to him, if he would cause Gen. Worth to co-operate with him, he would sweep around the valley and assault the strong a short time to recover their breath and exhausted strength before engaging with the enemy at San Antonio. While waiting for this purpose, Gen. Scott overtook the army. At this moment it was discovered at the distance that the enemy (seeing their main work had been carried, and that they were about to be attacked in the rear) had abandoned the work at San Antonio, and fallen back on a second strong work at Santa Martha. Gen. Scott, who now assumed command, immediately directed Twiggs' division to advance upon the left, and to arrest and cut off all the retreating forces of the enemy, while he ordered Gen. Pillow to lead Cadwalader's brigade to advance and assault the enemy upon the works of San Antonio in the reverse, and carry that place, so as to open the direct route to the capital for the advance of his siege train, upon the other battery on that road. — Gen. Scott replied that Worth should co-operate with him. Gen. Pillow then moved rapidly around the valley at the head of his victorious forces until he reached Cuycus, within one mile of San Antonio, where he halted to allow his troops a short time to revive their breath, and almost exhausted strength, before engaging the enemy at San Antonio. While waiting for this purpose, General Scott overtook the army. At this moment it was discovered in the distance that the enemy (seeing their main work had been carried and right and in front. that they were about to be attacked in the rear) had abandoned the work at San Antonio and fallen back upon a second strong work at Churubusco. Gen'l Scott, who now assumed command for the first time, immediately ordered Gen'l Twiggs' division to advance upon the left and arrest and cut off the retreating forces of the enemy, and assault the strong work at this place on the right, while he ordered Gen. Pillow to lead Cadwalader's brigade and assault the enemy upon the left, and in front of the main work at the bridge or causeway.

It is evident that these two letters were copies of the same paper or of one another; for it is impossible that otherwise they could have been so entirely correspondent in every line and word. The two were certainly written by the same individual; this we are sure every man who has been in the habit either of writing much, or often examining the writings of others, will affirm. [BWP]
The entire Locofoco party, we believe with exception, unite in deprecating the nomination of this distinguished gentleman, by the Philadelphia Convention, out of a new-born, but, we are bound to believe, real zeal for the honor and consistency of the Whig party. Their reasoning is identical with that of a certain portion of the Whig party, who indeed appear to us, to resort habitually to the Union at Washington, and the Enquirer in this city, for arguments to confound the men of their own party. We were at first told, by both of these parties, that the General was no Whig—that he had in fact no politics—and that the Whig party in voting for him were voting blind-fold, as they did in the case of John Tyler, with every prospect of meeting with a similar reward. They did not take into consideration the manly and upright character of the old warrior—his long-tried and unflinching patriotism—his open and candid nature—and his detestation of every thing which is not as honorable and as direct as his own mind. Under the force of facts—facts which cannot be denied, and which no one will attempt to controvert—they have both, most unwillingly, been compelled to resign this position. It is now generally conceded by his bitterest enemies, that Gen. Taylor, is nothing else can be said for him, is at least a Whig; as much so as any other member of the party whatever—far more so, than many, who would gladly have read him out of the Church, had it been in their power. Even Mr. Botts is understood to have expressed a willingness to see him run as Vice President on Mr. Clay’s ticket; a confession, if Mr. Botts himself be a Whig, that he regards Gen. Taylor as one also.

There is one point however, upon which there has been very little dispute, either among the Locofocons, or those Whigs whose train of reasoning seems to be derived from them. It is, that there is about Gen. Taylor a provoking appearance of success if nominated, which keeps his opponents in an everlasting ill-humor. The Locofocon prints do not say so openly; on the contrary, they endeavor to make it appear that he will easily be beaten, by the Nominee of the Baltimore Convention. But they say this with white lips, and chattering teeth, betraying their alarm in every word, tone and gesture. His Whig opponents, on the contrary, have been compelled, by the clear evidence which has already been afforded, and to the volume of which every day is adding, to acknowledge, that if nominated, he will most assuredly succeed. This it must be acknowledged, forms a most powerful recommendation to the Convention, if that body is bent upon securing, by all legitimate means, the triumph of those principles in which we all put our faith. Let us see. Gen. Taylor, it is now admitted by friends and foes, is a Whig; friends and foes, likewise, have confidence in his triumphant success. Can any Whig doubt who ought to be the Whig candidate? In addition to this, there is an abundance of evidence to be found in the history of his life, all of which will show confound in the history of his life, all of which will show conclusively, that he is not the man to cheat or to juggle. Nothing indeed, could be farther from his character—a character perfectly understood by people of all parties for many years—and now known to the whole Union.

The fact that Gen. Taylor is not a hackneyed politician—that he has not spent his life in a series of petty intrigues, the utmost aim of which is to obtain an office, or to secure one already obtained—that he has passed the greater part of it far from the pestilential atmosphere of Washington—is to us a recommendation, rather than otherwise. This very fact affords to the people of the Union, a proof, that he has not, at least, been corrupted by the pernicious influences that surround the palace—that he has preserved his honesty untainted, and his good name unquestioned—and that if entrusted with the direction of the Government, he will administer it with an eye single to the honor, prosperity and glory of the nation. Politicians are formed at Washington—the rank atmosphere of the court can generate them by thousands annually.

The statesman is a creature of a different genius, and does not require to be hatched into life by the intrigues of the palace.

It has been said that Gen. Taylor is no statesman; but we would ask what higher evidences can any man give of statesmanship, than he gave in his campaign on the Rio Grande? He was in the midst of a hostile population, at the head of a feeble army, without any prospect of support from home, devoid of the necessary means to carry on his forces after their most signal victories, and an object of jealousy to the Administration. It was at this time, that his administrative talent burst forth with unclouded lustre.—He conciliated the fierce multitude of foreigners, whose every look betrayed the intensity of a deeply settled hatred towards invaders differing from them in language and religion; he not only rendered them innocuous by mild and gentle means, but even made them friends; he was not content with winning them over so far that they offered no serious obstacle to his operations, but he even made them subservient to his plans. In his own army—composed of raw volunteers, who saw service for the first time—to whom habits of obedience and discipline were strange—who were naturally disposed to rebel against the exercise of an officer’s authority—and who were surrounded by difficulties of a nature well calculated to distress even veterans, that had faced death on an hundred fields—he preserved the most exact order, regulating every thing to suit his own wishes, and directing those energies, which, under another, might have been made the agents of disorder and ruin, to the accomplishment of his country’s glory. To say that such a man is no statesman, and to transfer the (article incomplete).

then in the most approved style of Mexican cowardice. News had arrived, that the Indian Chief Ceciliochi had attacked the town of Bacalar, but had met with desperate resistance. The most significant part of the letter in which this is communicated to La Patria, is one in which the writer says that without foreign aid they must be lost. We look for another Yucatan message, bill and debate.

General orders have been issued from the War Department, containing the President’s review of the finding of the Court of Inquiry in the case familiarly known as that of “gen. Pillow and the two howitzers.” The President decides that there was an unintentional error of a material fact in the finding of the Court. He finds nothing in the case for which Gen. Pillow deserves censure, and concurs with the Court and Gen. Scott that there is nothing in the case which requires further military proceedings. The President acquits the young officer who took the howitzers from their carriage and desired to retain them as trophies, of any criminal or improper motive.

The Union tells us that Thursday “was the proudest day of Mr. Polk’s life,” and that “no one occupies at this moment as proud a place as he does.” This is very kind and very grateful of the organ, no doubt; but alas! if it is designed to compensate Mr. Polk for the loss of that power which he sacrificed every thing that a man of sensibility should hold dear to attain—which he has set so many elements of wrath and destruction in motion to preserve—which was as dear to his heart as the very blood which sustains his existence—we fear it will fail utterly of its intention. There is no “balm in Gilead” for such a wound as he has received. The voice of adulation can have no charms for a disappointed politician.

By way of consolation, the Union reminds its master of the glories of his brief reign, all of which it ascribes with out any division to his wisdom, forecast and firmness. We propose to examine the title of the President to this extraordinary eulogy.

Upon the day of his inauguration, standing upon the Eastern steps of the Capitol, near the statue of Columbus, a seas of umbrellas occupying the space in front, (for he spoke not “under an October sun,” but beneath a March rain,) Jas. K. Polk declared to the assembled multitude, that our title to Oregon as far as 54 40 was “clear and unquestionable.” As the Chief Magistrate of a great nation, bound to see that her unquestionable rights, which she could not resign without dishonor, were protected, he should, after this declaration, have died sword in hand rather than yield the, Did he do this? Far from it. After mush discussion—mush agitation—a desperate attempt to make capital—and a failure in that particular—he meanly threw the responsibility on the Senate, and when that body advised the very measure which he and his had rejected with scorn, he eagerly caught at it, and claimed credit of resettling the affair, without involving the country in war. True he resigned the pretensions so boldly set forth in his inaugural address—true he inflicted upon the country the indelible stain of being either afraid or unable to vindicate its just rights—true he left partisans in the lurch at the very moment when their zeal was warmest, and their hopes were already assuming the semblance of reality. But what of war? He got rid of a dangerous war by truckling, and he acquired the reputation of a pacificator at the expense of the National honor.
His next step was to abolish the Constitution of the United States, and to take upon himself the most important of all the powers of Congress conferred by that instrument.—He made war upon his own responsibility, and called upon Congress to adopt it. Of this fact there existed but little doubt at any time; but since the publication of Mr. Buchanan’s instructions to Mr. Slidell, there can be longer be any. In his message of December, 1845, he assumed that the Rio Grande was the western boundary of Texas, as it was when it was ceded to Spain—that the act of the Texan Congress, in 1836, had recognized it—and that this was the Texas which he had annexed. We say nothing of Judge Ellis’ declaration that the Texan Congress never meant really to insist upon the Rio Grande as the true boundary, but had taken it in order to leave a wide margin for future negotiations, nor of the facts which were palpable to all, that the population between the Nueces and that river were Spaniards whose fathers had settled the country at least one hundred years before, and that the only Texan force which ever entered that region was captured and carried to Mexico. But we wish to call attention to the fact, that not much more than one month before this message saw the light, Mr. Polk’s Secretary of State, acting doubtless by his orders, instructed our Minister to Mexico to offer five millions for the very country in question; a damning proof of guilt against the President; for it places in bad relief one fact too palpable to be overlooked or misunderstood, viz: that Mr. Polk did not believe that the country belonged to us, and that when he commanded Gen. Taylor to enter it, he knew that he was virtually making a war.

The various and contradictory pretexts which have been assigned for this Presidential was, are as disgraceful as they are contradictory. We were told, in the first place, that American blood had been spilt on American soil, and that this was the cause of the war. Of course it was to be inferred from this that Mexico had commenced the war.—Very shortly, however, as men always do who are bent upon a wicked action, they contradicted themselves. They told us that the war was undertaken in order to procure indemnity for the spoliation of our citizens. How, then, could it be commenced by Mexico? In a little time the tune was again changed, and we were assured that the refusal of the Mexican Government to receive an ambassador, was the cause of the march to the Rio Grande. In that view of the case, of course, we must have commenced it.—But he truth is, that Mr. Sidell either had not been rejected when the troops were ordered to the Rio Grande, or his rejection had been so recent that the tidings of it had not reached the United States.

We say nothing of the palpable negligence, which with ample materials at hand, permitted Gen. Taylor to waste so much precious time on the Rio Grande, and finally, with a handful of men, to engage in the apparently desperate conflict of Monterey—of the precaution which previous to each battle the Executive organ took to save the credit of his employers, by representing the position assumed by that General, as contrary to the instructions of the Secretary of War, and the meanness which afterwards claimed for the foresight of that officer the glory of all the victories won in spite of his riders—of the perilous condition in which Gen. Taylor was left at Buena Vista—of the appointment of such a miserable wretch as Pillow to the second rank in the army—of the support yielded to him by the Executive, and the dishonorable employment of means to put him in possession of documents for his defence—of the persecution of our greatest General upon charges so false and frivolous, that he who preferred was ashamed to prosecute them. All these things we leave to the judgment of the country, and that judgment is not equivocal. But we would call attention to the enormous public debt which the insane lust of the President from conquest has already accumulated, and to which his policy is daily adding; a debt already variously estimated at one hundred and one hundred and fifty millions. We would call attention to the assumption by the President of the war-making power—a power the most dangerous in its exercise, the most capable of abuse, and the most carefully guarded of all others by the Constitution of the United States. We would call attention to the assumption by the President of the war-making power—a power the most dangerous in its exercise, the most capable of abuse, and the most carefully guarded of all others by the Constitution of the United States. We would call attention to the fact that he has already asserted, and is prepared to maintain by force the doctrine that a President of the United States has a right, and that it is his duty, to interfere in the domestic affairs of a foreign nation, a doctrine odious in itself, which has produced half the wars which have desolated modern Europe, which was the cohesive power that so long kept together the knot of Despots known as the Holy Alliance, which was openly rejected by Washington, and which every free State in the world has discarded as fatal to liberty, peace, and order.

Such is a picture of Mr. Polk’s Administration, by no means overcharged, but falling, in truth, rather below the reality. If our readers can find any thing to admire in the features of such a likeness, we confess their taste is widely different from ours.

[BWP]
When, therefore, the Union tells us that General Cass is "pure in his private life—amiable in his manners—faithful to his friends—liberal to his enemies," we are willing without any personal knowledge of the man, to subscribe to all it says. But when it informs us that he is "honest in his principles" (meaning, we presume, his political tenets) we beg leave to express our doubts. What has he seen, since he made his speech in favor of the Wilmot Proviso, to produce such a tremendous revolution in his political sentiments, at the advanced age of sixty-seven? What new lights have suddenly burst upon his understanding since Mr. Wilmot first brought forward the Wilmot Proviso? If he be that "strict man of business," that he is represented to be—if he actually possess those "powers of mind," attributed to him, "which grasp, as it were by institution, every subject to which they are applied"—if his acquirements be so "various and extensive" as his admirers assure us they are—how does it happen, that after mature deliberations upon a subject of so much importance, his opinions were so badly made up as to require revision and reversal, in the short space of eighteen months? Surely this does not look like the result, either of business habits, or of intuitive perception, or of various and extensive acquirements. It far more resembles the crude conclusions of a weak judgment, and a vacillating will, directed neither by experience in his own person, nor by an acquaintance with the history of the past.

According to the intellect of general Cass all that the Union is pleased to claim for it, we can see no possible solution of the difficulty in which his sudden change has involved the question of his claims to these attributes, save that to which we have already alluded. It must have been the near prospect of the nomination, that caused his mind to swerve from its true balance, and that has placed him with all the assumed clearness and promptness of thought and action which his friends have claimed for him, in the unenviable position of the most inconsistent Statesman of a time remarkable, above all others, for changes among the great ones of the earth. It afforded us no little astonishment to see that the Delegation of Virginia, some of whom were in the State Convention, supported General Cass throughout, nor are we able to imagine how such persons can possibly reconcile such a course with their own unanimous declaration adopted three months ago, and held up with exultation to an admiring people, as forming a direct contrast to the course of the Whig convention, which adjourned without having made a declaration of principle. We were told by that body, representing, we presume, the opinions and wishes of the democracy of the Old Dominion, that no earthly power—neither Congress, nor the territorial Legislature—save the people of a territory themselves, on the adoption of a State Constitution, had a right to interfere in any manner with the question of slavery within its limits! Gen. Cass, on the contrary, holds a doctrine precisely the reverse of this. He tells us that he is in favor of leaving "to the people of any territory which may hereafter be acquired, the right to regulate it for themselves, under the general principles of the Constitution." The one denies to the people of a territory all power over the subject as long as it is a territory, and only allows them to regulate it, when it becomes a sovereign State. The other accords the same power to the inhabitants from the beginning, thereby opening between himself and the Southern Democracy, a gulf, which to any other than the mercurial spirit of Progressive Democracy would have been absolutely impassable. They have passed it, however, and we wait to see how the passage will be explained to the good Democrats of Virginia, who, we are disposed to think, were not altogether prepared for it.

We concur heartily with our friends of the times in the propriety of extending to the "Great Captain" an invitation to visit this, the capital of his native State, where he has many near connections, many warm personal friends, and an untold number of enthusiastic admirers. We all feel a just pride in his glory, conceiving that it reflects upon his native State and upon every individual, however humble, who drew his first breath upon the soil. Often as our citizens have seen Gen. Scott, familiar as is his majestic figure to them all, they yet feel as great a curiosity to see him as though he were an entire stranger. They wish to see how the man who has rivaled, if he has not surpassed Cortez, bears himself beneath the weight of his laurels. They feel that he has been the victim of a heartless persecution; and the warm feelings of this generous population, (and no where can one more generous be found,) which would be excited even in favor of a stranger suffering under oppression, are roused to a high degree of intensity in this case, where an ancient townsman is the victim. We do not conceive that Gen. Scott either will, or has a right to decline the invitation of his old friends and neighbors, united with thousands of others who admire, at the same time that they do not know him. We wish to remind the world that Winfield Scott, the man who proved himself the first military commander of the age, is one of us; that though a resident of another State, we still claim him as a native of ours; and that Old Virginia is determined not to relinquish one iota of her claim to one of the most valuable of her jewels.
The great Democracy seems to have been under no little excitement upon the last day of the session, and the appeal of Mr. Stevenson to the "gentle sire" was, in the opinion of the Alexandria Gazette, not only well timed, but absolutely necessary on the occasion. Mr. Yancey, Ala. and Mr. Foreman of Geo. From very high words, were very near coming to blows.

Senator Rusk, of Texas, offered a series of resolutions, which occasioned no little merriment among the congregated office-holders of the great Convention. The substance of them was, that, in future, no member of Congress should accept office under the General Government, and that the people be requested to appoint no member of Congress a member of any future Democratic Convention. Now, we hold that Senator Rusk must either be one of the greenest of juveniles, or that he is striving hard to perpetrate a humbug. It will be recollected that General Jackson made this a prominent point of his political creed, in his letter to the Tennessee Legislature, in which he signified his acceptance of their nomination of him to the Presidency. So strongly did the democracy of that day insist upon the observance of this doctrine, that when in 1827, Mr. Adams appointed to office Mr. Taylor, who had been defeated for congress in the Orange District, he was charged by a writer in the Richmond Enquirer with an open attempt to interfere with the people's prerogative of discarding a servant whom they considered no longer worthy of confidence. The writer contended that the freedom of election, and the responsibilities of the representative were entirely destroyed, whenever the constituents, displeased with the conduct of their Congressmen, thought proper to show such displeasure by turning him out, and the Executive should interfere and compensate his losses by an office. There was much truth in this reasoning; and had Gen'l Jackson been guided by his own doctrine, there is little doubt that many most disastrous consequences might have been avoided. But he had scarcely been in office a year when he appointed more members of Congress to office than had been appointed before by all the Presidents from Washington down. To have been defeated by the people was a never-failing passport to office; and to such an extent was this carried, that men were sometimes induced to resign lucrative State offices and run, without any hope, for Congress, under an assurance that in case of defeat a better should reward the disinterested sacrifice. Such at least was the impression of the Whigs, both in his day and that of his successor; and such we doubt not, should have been surprised had the Convention adopted Senator Rusk's proposition; but we should have been hugely so, had any Democratic member, not excepting even the Texas Senator, felt himself bound by it to reject a lucrative office.

Gen. Scott in New York

This distinguished officer arrived in New York on Thursday. The committee met him at Elizabethport (N. J.)—He appeared feeble, and complained of temporary indisposition. He was received by Alderman Franklin, who delivered an address suited to the occasion. The General responded in appropriate terms, and in a feeble voice. The Commercial says, however, that he looks hale, and that his indisposition was merely temporary. The Journal of Commerce says, when he closed, he shook hands with Governor Young, ex-Mayor Harper, Ogden Hoffman, Hon. Mr. Clingman, [M.C., North Carolina,] and others, with great cordiality, and then retired to the Lady's Cabin. Coming up the Bay, the steamboat bells sent forth a merry peal, and a salute was fired from the Battery and Governor's Island. He was welcomed at Castle Garden by the Mayor, after which he reviewed the military under command of Gen. Sanford, on the Battery. After the review, the line of march was taken up as follows:

"Up Broadway to Chatham street, through Chatham street to the Bowery, up the Bowery to Astor Place, thence to Broadway, down Broadway to Chambers street, when the military halted and formed a line, when the Common Council with their guests passed through Chambers street, and the Park by the East gate, to the City Hall, where a marching salute will be paid to their distinguished guest."

The ceremonies being concluded, the Guard of Honor escorted the General to his quarters."

Later from Mexico

The New Orleans papers of the 21st, contain 4 days later intelligence from Mexico. The news is to the 4th from Queretaro, and the 8th from the city of Mexico.

There is still no peace, and opinion is as much divided as ever. The Mexican Congress was to open its regular session on the 8th. The election of President to take place on the 9th, and the treaty then to be considered. It is said that the anti-peace party had determined to withdraw from Congress, and leave it without a quorum, if they found a majority in favor of the treaty. To prevent this, its was intended by the peace party to authorize a less number to constitute a quorum.

We copy from the Picayune.

CITY OF MEXICO, May 8, 1848.
Enclosed is a letter from your Queretaro correspondent of the 4th isn't. The letter is brief, but announces the important fact that Congress will hold its first regular meeting, with a thorough organization, to-day. Here, as there exists a profound calm, nothing is spoken of but the probable fate of the treaty, and no reflecting man will attempt to prophecy whether we shall have war or peace.

It is well ascertained that eighteen or twenty of the Deputies at Queretaro are opposed to the treaty, and that there are men of influence and wealth at the seat of Government exerting themselves against peace, and it is said with positiveness by the opponents of peace, that whenever the question is put upon the ratification of the treaty, these men will withdraw and break the quorum. The peace party, however, are urging upon the Government to decree the number who remain a quorum, and thus, by taking the responsibility of violating the constitution, (not an uncommon act in Mexico) baffle the designs of the anti-peace party.

Almonte seems of late to have been one of the leaders in the anti-peace party, and is now at San Luis, where Paredes and Jarauta are, and which seems to be the headquarters of the disaffected. Almonte is an ambitious and a disappointed man; but with him, as well as those who act with him, it is strongly suspected they will carry their opposition to the treaty no further than voting against it, for the purpose of making political capital by their course, and raising themselves to power when our army leaves the country.

Should the Government find it necessary to declare less than a constitutional number of members of Congress a quorum, it is much doubted if Herrera, who it is confidentially predicted will be elected President, will have the nerve to do so. He has the reputation of being an honest man, with some talent, but entirely wanting in moral courage and energy. With the limited resources he can command, it would not require extraordinary efforts to upset his government. But a truce to speculation. Affairs have now arrived at that crisis which Bonaparte, in speaking of a battle, termed “hinging,” and the weight of a pin may turn the scale. Within the next week we expect to be able to predict with some certainty the action of Congress. D. S.

RW48v25i43p1c2, May 30, 1848: Gen. Butler

We said on yesterday, that we knew little of this gentleman. We have heard, however, that in Kentucky he occupied the rank of about a third rate lawyer. He was one of Mr. Polk’s generals, sent out, it was said at the time, to prepare him for the Presidency. At the storming of Monterey, by converting into a real attack upon an impregnable position, that which was only designed by gen. Taylor as a feint, he was said to have occasioned a very heavy loss of life, and would probably have been destroyed with his whole brigade had not Old Zac in person led the troops off from the scene of carnage. This, if true, speaks but indifferently for his qualification as a commander-in-chief, which responsible position he occupies at present. He is allowed to be very much of a gentleman, and very brave; but we have not been enabled, from the lights before us, to discover any very great qualifications as a general. At any rate, we presume he can hardly be expected to fill the shoes left vacant by Gen. Scott’s recall.

[BWP]

There is but one thought, but one wish here—that is the definitive union of Congress. All opinions, all hopes, and even all interests, are suspected until next week. The hall prepared for the meeting of Congress is finished, and Monday (May 8th) is the day fixed for the opening meeting. I will be ready to transmit to you, with the greatest expedition, the acts and documents published by the Chambers. A complete calm.

RW48v25i43p1c3, May 30, 1848: No title. What was said in Vera Cruz.

We took some pains to learn from passengers who came by the Massachusetts, what was said in Vera Cruz on the subject of the treaty. They represent opinions as divided there as here.

A strong report, however, reached us by the steamer, to the following effect: That Gen. Kearny received at Vera Cruz, by the latest mail, orders to march to Mexico with all his disposable force. We have this from two sources, but attach little credit to it. Were it true, it would be a very significant token of the continuance of hostilities.—But probably the story grew out of the following less alarming paragraph which we find in the Vera Cruz Free American of the 12th instant:

We have learned from good authority, that Gen. Kearny received orders from headquarters at Mexico, to send up to the city of Mexico all troops now encamped at camp Washington.

There is at present at this encampment about 1200 men. They will probably leave this camp for Bergarra on Saturday next, and commence their march on Sunday, the 14th.

RW48v25i43p1c5, May 30, 1848: Taylor in Ohio.

Notwithstanding we have been so often told that Gen. Taylor has no strength whatever in Ohio, the “Cincinnati Atlas,” an anti-Taylor paper, states that eleven Taylor delegates were recently chosen at the Ward Elections in that City. The “Philadelphia Inquirer” says: "Pretty well for Ohio!—the truth is, the old hero’s popularity is confined to no particular section of the Union. His strength with the people is far greater than that of any other candidate. He is, in fact, the only candidate known to be Whig in his sentiments, for whom, nevertheless, thousands of all parties will vote.”

RW48v25i43p1c5, May 30, 1848: Cuernavaca, Mexico, March 20th, 1848.

Sir—It has become my very painful duty to inform you of the loss of your son, Francis P. Hudson. He died from a severe attack of Typhus Fever, in the Hospital, at this place, on yesterday, the 20th of March. He was transferred from Com. M. 4th art'y, to Light Battery G. (formerly Dunn’s), and I can assure you, sir, that though a young soldier, his zeal, activity and intelligence, won for him the esteem and regard of his officers and fellow-soldiers. I had already selected him as gunner to one of the re-captured 6-pounders of Buena Vista, on account of his gre6-pounders of Buena Vista, on account of his gre5-pounders of Buena Vista, on account of his great promise, and should have rapidly promoted him.—The service has lost a fine young soldier; and I do most sincerely sympathise with his affectionate family in their bereavement. Proper care will be taken of his effect, and they will be administered upon, and the balance, if any, of monies in my hands, will be forwarded to the Ad'jt General Washington.

RW48v25i43p2c1, May 30, 1848: Winfield Scott – Public Meeting.

Among the incidents which are now filling the public with excitement, is the return of Major General Scott to his country. Elizabethtown, New Jersey, has been made a scene of rejoicing by his presence, and New York is extending to him every token of honor, and every kind of welcome. It would seem time that Richmond should express the sentiments on this subject which all her citizens doubtless feel. She is the metropolis of the General’s native State. His most intimate connections have been formed amongst her inhabitants, and he himself has been almost one of her citizens. There is but one feeling towards him here, as a man and a soldier, and the desire to render him due honors is as extensive as it is peculiarly becoming to the citizens of Richmond.

It is therefore proposed that the citizens of Richmond assemble in general meeting on Tuesday night, at the City Hall, at 8 o’clock, to consider the proper mode of expressing their feelings toward him. MANY CITIZENS.

RW48v25i43p2c2, May 30, 1848: Mr. Polk – An Outsider.

The following was the only allusion made in the Democratic Convention to Mr. Polk, prior to the reading of his modest epistle. After that, something stemmed to be absolutely necessary. To have been passed by in total silence would have been more reputable than a contemptuous reference. Hence both to prevent his being forgotten, and to seem to decline an honor, which no human being seemed disposed to accord him, he favored the Convention with his letter:

"Morse, of Louisiana, opened with a furious assault upon it, (the two-thirds rule) and denounced it as anti-democratic, and innovation upon party usages and distracting in its effects. He charged that the split among the New York democracy, grew out of the adoption of that rule by the last Convention, and if now adopted, other States would be divided and the ascendancy of the party put in jeopardy. But when he came to speak of the nomination of candidates by that rule, he made a hit that roused the house. He declared that its effects would be to lead now as it did four years ago, to the nomination of an outsider, whom no one had thought of before, and thus the wishes of the Democracy may be defeated.

"This allusion to outsiders, was met with a furious reply from Howden of Alabama, who denounced the term applied to Polk and Dallas, as in the highest degree insulting to the party and their last candidates. They were the successful and faithful representatives of the principles of the party, and five thousand years hence, the young democrats of America would shout, as the ancient champions of their faith, the names of Jefferson, Jackson, Polk!!”—[Tremendous applause.]
From Oregon.

The St. Louis Republican gives the particulars of fresh troubles in this remote territory. The settlers are threatened in this remote territory. The settlers are threatened by the neighboring Indians, and have had four hard-fought battles with them. Dr. Whitman's Missionary establishment has been sacked and destroyed. The Doctor, his wife and nine other persons were massacred. The women and children were taken captive—but by the energetic intercession of Mr. Ogden of the Hudson Bay Company, they were surrendered by the Indians unhurt.

A general war with all the Indian tribes in that quarter is anticipated.

Mr. Meek, who brings this intelligence is on his way to Washington to ask for aid from the Government.

Gen. Taylor in New York.

The Journal of Commerce, a paper which has the reputation of never having its judgment warped by feeling, and has an instinctive proclivity to the strong side, thus discourses on the Presidential nominees:

Democratic Nomination for the Presidency.

The die is cast; LEWIS CASS, of Michigan, is the Democratic nominee for the Presidency. He received 170 votes, being more than two-thirds of the number of Delegates present. The New York Delegation did not vote; the Barnburners having previously withdrawn, and the Hunkers for some reason or other, withholding their tire. The former, we suppose, will come back disaffected, and very probably will nominate GEN. TAYLOR. In that case, Gen. Cass will get but an apology of a vote in the State of New York; and in any case, if Gen. Taylor is the nominee of the Whig Convention, (perhaps even if he is not,) he will have the vote of the State.

We are not sure but Gen. Cass is the strongest man in the Democratic party; yet he is not exactly popular, and can only succeed in case the Whig Convention should nominate Mr. Clay. That Convention meets on the 7th of next month, (a week from next Wednesday.) When its results are announced, we shall know pretty nearly how the cat will jump. If Mr. Clay in nominated, Cass will probably be elected; but possibly there will be no election by the people, in which case Gen. Taylor will be elected by the House. Of this we believe there is little doubt. For although the Whigs will not have strength enough in that body to elect Mr. Clay, nor the democrats to elect Gen. Cass, yet either party can get enough votes from the other to elect Gen. Taylor. If Taylor is nominated by the Whig Convention, he will be elected beyond a peradventure.—Even the rigid discipline of the Democratic party cannot prevent their men from going over to him by regiments.

As to Gen. Cass, he is not the worst man that ever was, and the country would not be ruined if he should be elected,—any more than it has been a dozen times before when ruin was predicted. Yet we own we are not admirers of his political character. He appears to us not to be as safe a man as some others to place at the helm, and especially as Gen. Taylor. While Minister of the U S at Paris, he came near embroiling our country in war, and again in the Senate, on the Oregon question, he showed himself to be rash and impetuous. We more and more feel the necessity of a cool head, as well as uprightness of purpose, in the President of the United States. A proper admixture of the former ingredient in the constitution of President Polk, would have saved the country from the present war with Mexico. Gen. Taylor has it in large measure, and with it a plenty of common sense. As to statesmanship, he can easily surround himself with it to any extent, in the composition of his Cabinet. Mere statesmanship is not half so rare a quality in eminent stations, or wisdom, moderation, firmness without obstinacy, strict integrity, exemption from selfish or ambitious views, a desire to serve the country for its own sake, and not as a means of personal aggrandizement. In all these respects Gen. Taylor stands pre-eminent.

From the New Orleans Bee. Still later and interesting from Mexico – Arrival of the Royal Steamship Tay – Peace Prospects.

The royal mail steamship Tay, Capt. Sharp, arrives at Cat Island on Saturday afternoon, from Vera Cruz, which she left on the 16th instant. The Tay carried out $652,000 in specie, and 482 bales of cochineal. The British Courier arrives at Vera Cruz on the morning of the 16th, from the city of Mexico, and reports that Herrera was elected President by an almost unanimous vote, and that Pena y Pena was appointed Chief Justice of the Republic.

Congress had agreed to take the vote on the treaty on the 25th inst., and it was generally believed that it would be ratified, as there were only fifteen of the members opposed to it, because they fear that anarchy will follow the withdrawal of our troops.

Gen. Kearny left Vera Cruz on the 14th for the city of Mexico, and the next day 1200 men, under Col. Ramsay, took up the line of march for the same destination.

The American Star, of the 11th announces the formal organization of both branches of Congress, at Queretaro, on the evening of the 7th inst. The Senators and Deputies met at Academia, where they were addressed by President Pena y Pena. The President of the Chamber, Eloriga, replied, alluded to his speech to the position of Congress, and declaring that that body would sacrifice, if necessary, their convictions and feeling, to become the organs of the popular war, and that the sentence they would pronounce would be dictated by conscience, and a stern regard for the laws of honor and of duty.

Don Manuel Gomez Pedraz was nominated for President of the Senate, and Senors Latragua and Covarrubias Secretaries, at a preliminary meeting of the members on the 5th instant.

In regard to the treaty, the Star says: “The indications are encouraging that its ratification will be carried by both branches, and will become the law of the land. Unless the disorganizers persist in their opposition, we see not why the treaty, as modified, may not receive the warm approval of Congress. It is certain that if violent measures are attempted by any of the radical press, their originators and abettors will receive severe punishment a the hands of the Supreme Government.”

The news from the interior is generally favorable to peace.

A train, under the command of Maj. Taliaferro, arrived at the city of Mexico on the 7th from Pacheco. It consisted of ten wagons, laden with sixty bars of silver valued at $1200 each. The train was to return on the 12th instant.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from LEWIS CASS, of Michigan, resigning his seat in the U. S. Senate.

A message in writing was received from the PRESIDENT of the United States transmitting a memorial from the Legislature of Oregon, in relation to the incursions of the different hostile bands of Indians in their vicinity.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON was appointed Chairman of the Committee on Military affairs, vice Mr. CASS, resigned.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill providing for the punishment of persons violating the Secret proceedings of Congress. The Bill to amend the act for the transportation of the Mails to foreign countries, was taken up, amended and passed.

The Senate spent the remainder of the day in Private Bills.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A message was received from the PRESIDENT of the United States, in relation to the incursions of the Indians in Oregon. The message recommended the granting prompt assistance to settlers in the Oregon territory.

The message was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A motion being made that the House resolve itself into a committee of the whole, and proceed with the Appropriation Bills, a warm discussion ensued as to the order of business, many members proposing to take up the subject of the Oregon difficulties in preference to the Appropriations Bills. The House finally decided to go into committee of the whole on the Post Office Bill, which was perfected in committee and reported to the House on the rising of the committee.

The House then adjourned.

[BWP]
The National Intelligencer very justly describes this as the most important question ever submitted to the decision of the United States Senate. The Mexican war involved principles, it is true, equally important; but the President, being determined that no bar should be opposed to his wishes, took very good care that the Senate should know nothing, officially, of the events which he was preparing, and which burst upon the country with the suddenness and effect of a clap of thunder in a clear sky. More fortunate in the present instance, it has had an opportunity of discovering Presidential intentions, and of sifting Presidential reasoning and motives to the bottom. The thorough discussion which both have undergone in the Senate, and the complete exposure of the sophistry, by means of which the Executive would have engaged the nation in a war of intervention, before he had concluded that into which his own precipitancy had hurried it, will, it is hoped, be productive of most salutary effects. The abuse of authority manifested in the instructions of the Secretary of the Navy to the commanding officer on the station, by virtue of which he was empowered and even directed to succor one party in a civil contest at the expense of the other, cannot but excite feelings of alarm in the bosom of every man who desires to see the constitution restored to its ancient vigor and effectiveness. And well is it for the country, that, on this occasion, the President condescended to remember that Congress was a co-ordinate branch of the Government; a fact which has been so little regarded of late by those in power, that it had well nigh become "an obsolete idea."

The doctrine set forth by Mr. Polk, and supported with great vehemence, not only by his adherents in the Senate, but by the Press devoted to his service throughout the land, if pushed to its legitimate extent, would be productive of the most serious disasters, and utterly subversive of the entire policy of our Government from its foundation to the present moment. It is, in fact, the very doctrine of the Holy Alliance,—as proclaimed at more than one congress,—which rendered the very name of that Association odious to all the nations of the earth, and finally shook every throne on the Continent of Europe (that of the Czar alone excepted) to its very foundation. It proclaims, as the associated despots did, that we have a right to interfere in the affairs of nations in no manner connected with, or dependant upon us, and to arrange their domestic dissensions upon principles most convenient to ourselves. The Holy alliance went, and could go, no farther than this. It is true, that in more than one instance, they carried out their principles into actual practice; but Mr. Polk was prepared to do the same, and had not Congress been in session a the time, would have undoubtedly have done it. That he condescended to send in a message upon the subject, before he had involved is in a war, we must take as a great and unexpected favor, for which this nation can scarcely be sufficiently grateful. Certain we are, that should he occupy the chair for the next twenty successive years, we may never expect such another act of grace.

The most extraordinary part of this whole business, is the attempt made by the friends of the Executive, to trace this attempt made by the friend of the Executive, to trace this attempt of Mr. Polk to establish the doctrine of intervention, to the celebrated Message of Mr. Monroe, so often alluded to in the course of the discussion. That paper taught principles precisely the reverse of this. It was a well-grounded apprehension that the Holy Alliance meant to carry their doctrine of intervention to the point of interfering between Spain and her Colonies, that induced him to hold the strong language which distinguishes that remarkable document. So far from feeling any apprehension with regard to England, that eternal bug-bear which is always held up to divert the attention of the multitude from any meditated act of more than ordinary atrocity, he was, from the first, acting in concert with her, and we should have found her fighting side by side with us, had the matter ever come to be settled by the arbitrament of blows. The intentions of the Allies, indeed, were first ascertained by our Minister in London, (Mr. Rush,) who in a conference with Mr. Canning agreed, unofficially, upon an alliance to counteract the great power of the allied Monarchs. It certainly was as much to the interest of Great Britain, professing free principles, though a monarchy as it was, to ours, though a Republic, to put an end to this doctrine of intervention, which had wrought the political ruin of half the Continent, and which, if not checked, might extend to the fast-anchored isle itself.

The doctrine of intervention has been repudiated by every nation in Europe. Each, as it shakes off the shackles, and assumes its just position in the world, takes particular care to say, that it will interfere with no other, unless provoked thereto by aggression. The principles of the great Washington, are recognized as the grand political rule of regenerated Europe; a compliment to the memory of our illustrious countryman, which makes the heart of every American swell with pride. Even Russia—half savage, despotic Russia—has been compelled to acknowledge and observe this rule. And America—free and enlightened America, which gave birth to this wise and wholesome doctrine, is called on by our Democratic President, to repudiate it, and to substitute the cast-off principles of humble and powerless despotism.

By the arrival of the steamship Eudora from Vera Cruz, the New Orleans Bee has advices to the 9th. Files had been received from Mexico down to the 4th. The congress had at last met. Herrera was elected President, but it was feared would not accept. The majority seemed to be in favor of peace, but the action of Congress was considerably embarrassed by the question of whether they had a right to part with any State, or portion of a State, without its consent. The Mexican States all go in very strong for State rights. It is said that there will be strong opposition to the treaty. The Government at Queretaro had yielded reveral (sic) points of etiquette with regard to our Commissioners. One of them was the admission of an escort of sixty men. The Commissioners await the announcement that they may come. Rosa, minister of foreign affairs, had sent a note to the deputies of Zacatecas, warning them of the necessity of meeting and throwing the responsibility on them. They have hitherto been recusant. Paredes and Flores had left San Luis for Aguas Calientes, under a guard. The latter endeavored to create a mutiny among the troops of Gen. Romero. Jarauta was at San Luis on the 26th, attending bull fights. The American Government of Mexico had given orders that the Diligence for Vera Cruz should be attended by an escort every morning to the end of its first day's journey. The case of Lieut. Dutton had been decided: that of Laverty, the Canadian, was before the court. Several soldiers who had deserted with Lieut. John Smith, had been flogged on the plaza. He was to be sent to the United States with a discharge. The Eudora brought over the remains of Col. Hamilton (La.) and Lieut. Col. Allen (St. Louis.) Charles Wickham, a discharged soldier, died on the passage, of delirium tremens. Also, Joseph Dogherty, a discharged teamster.

La Patria has received eight days later intelligence from Yucatan than has been published in this city, and the statement presented in that paper shows the aspect of affairs in that distracted country to be even more deplorable than heretofore. It appears that a treaty of peace had been formed, but was violated by the Indians, who, on the 7th inst., entered the town of Mani, seemingly with pacific intentions, but at twelve o’clock the same day raised the “grito,” and commenced as indiscriminate massacre of the inhabitants, during which more than two hundred persons were put to the sword!

The garrison and inhabitants of the town of Iturbide, had abandoned the place; but on their retreat, being exposed to the attacks of a large number of Indians, they lost twenty-three filled and eleven wounded, beside one hundred and six who deserted on the road, leaving the commander with only sixty men. Numerous other towns had also been captured by the insurgents. The commander of the troops stationed at the village of Iturbide, did not abandon that place until after a vigorous combat with the Indians, the Yucatanese forces consisting of only 200 soldiers, while the army of the Indians numbered thousands. The fight was maintained for several hours.

The statement made yesterday, that twenty vessels of all nations were engaged in removing families from the country, is not correct. The only vessels employed in assisting the Yucatecoes, were Spanish vessels of war. The twenty-eight vessels in question, consisted of twenty-four small merchant crafts of Yucatan.

A letter to the Patria, dated Sisal, the 10th May, states that the Indians are in actual possession of an entire extent of country from Cilan to Cape Cotoche, and from there to Bacalar—Chico. The writer adds that the whole peninsula will ultimately fall into their hands, unless foreign nations come to the aid of the suffering inhabitants. In the capital, not less than 100,000 souls are collected, and large numbers of fugitives from the interior are hourly swelling the population. The means of transporting them from the country are totally insufficient.

The British Minister residing in Mexico has replied to the Governor of the State, touching the offer simultaneously made by the latter to the United States, England and Spain, of the dominion and sovereignty of Yucatan, on condition that she should be saved from the ruin and destruction which threatens her existence as a free and civilized nation. An English frigate of war, which arrived at the Island of Carmen, brought the official communication from the Minister, which arrived yesterday in this city, having been sent by the British Vice Consul in that Island. The letter was sent by express to the Governor of the State; but we know that the Minister has determined to lay the facts before his government, explaining the critical position of Yucatan, and the absolute necessity of prompt and effectual assistance. The Minister adds that he does not doubt that the English Cabinet will take into consideration the offer of the possession and government of the Peninsula, at the same time that he will afford the necessary succor to preserve it from the dangers that menace it.

The heads of the government had withdrawn from Tecul, and returned to the capital—all efforts to secure peace and quiet with the Indians having proved fruitless.

A Campeachy paper, El Hijo de la Patria, states that upwards of 2000 inhabitants who had been compelled to fly from the Peninsula, had taken refuge in the Island of Cozumel, and formed a settlement there which is already beginning to prosper.

The same paper has the following:

There are no longer any rancheros remaining in the vicinity of Yalahan, as the Indians have burned and destroyed everything. On holy Thursday, there were some fugitives in a small vessel at the Isle of Jolbos, on the coast; when they were in confusion the Indians appeared, and they had to fly, abandoning the vessel. The Indians took possession of her and burned her.

A vessel of war belonging to Her Catholic Majesty is on that station, rendering important services in the cause of humanity.

US and the French press
Mr. Calhoun to Mr. King

Department of State, Washington, August 12, 1844.

Sir, - I have laid your dispatch No. 1 before the President, who instructs me to make known to you that he has read it with much pleasure, especially the portion which relates to your cordial reception by the King, and his assurance of friendly feelings towards the United States. The President in particular highly appreciates the declaration of the King, that in no event would any steps be taken by his Government in the slightest degree hostile or which would give to the United States just cause of complaint. It was the more gratifying from the fact that our previous information was calculated to make the impression, that the Government of France was prepared to unite with Great Britain in a joint protest against the annexation of Texas, and a joint effort to induce her Government to withdraw the proposition to annex, on condition that Mexico should be made to acknowledge her independence. He is happy to infer from your despatch that the information, as far as it relates to France, is, in all probability, without foundation. You did not go further than you ought in assuring the King that the object of annexation would be pursued with unabated vigor, and in giving your opinion that a decided majority of the American people were in its favour, and that it would certainly be annexed at no distant day. I feel confident that your anticipation will be fully realized at no distant period. Every day will tend to weaken that combination of political causes which led to the opposition to the measure, and to strengthen the conviction that it was not only expedient, but just and necessary.

You were right in making the distinction between the interests of France and England in reference to Texas - or rather, I would say, the apparent interests of the two countries. France cannot possibly have any other than commercial interests in desiring to see her preserve her separate independence; while, it is certain, England looks beyond, to political interests, to which she apparently attaches much importance. But, in our opinion, the interest of both against the measure is more apparent than real; and that neither France, England, nor even Mexico herself, has any in opposition to it, when the subject is fairly viewed and considered in its whole extent and in all its bearings. Thus viewed and considered, and assuming that peace, the extension of commerce, and security are objects of primary policy with them, it may, as it seems to me, be readily shown that the policy on the part of these Powers which would acquiesce in a measure so strongly desired by both the United States and Texas, for their mutual welfare and safety, as the annexation of the latter to the former, would be far more promotive of these great objects than that which would attempt to resist it.

It is impossible to cast a look at the map of the United States and Texas, and to note the long, artificial, and inconvenient line which divides them, and then to take into consideration the extraordinary increase of population and growth of the former, and the source from which the latter must derive its inhabitants, institutions, and laws, without coming to the conclusion that it is their destiny to be united, and, of course, that annexation is merely a question of time and mode. Thus regarded, the question to be decided would seem to be, whether it would not be better to permit it to be done now, with the mutual consent of both parties, and the acquiescence of these Powers, than to attempt to resist and defeat it. If the former course be adopted, the certain fruits would be the preservation of peace, great extension of commerce by the rapid settlement and improvement of Texas, and increased security, especially to Mexico. The last, in reference to Mexico, may be doubted; but I hold it not less clear than the other two.

It would be a great mistake to suppose that thus Government has any hostile feelings towards Mexico, or any disposition to aggrandize herself at her expense - the fact is the very reverse. It wishes her well, and desires to see her settled down in peace and security; and is prepared, in the event of the annexation of Texas, if not forced into conflict with her, to propose to settle with her the question of boundary and all others growing out of the annexation on the most liberal terms. Nature herself has clearly marked the boundary between her and Texas, by natural limits too strong to be mistaken. There are few countries whose limits are so distinctly marked; and it would be our desire, if Texas should be united to us, to see them firmly established, as the most certain means of establishing permanent peace between the two countries, and strengthening and cementing their friendship. Such would be the certain consequence of permitting the annexation to take place now, with the acquiescence of Mexico; but very different would be the case if it should be attempted to resist and defeat it, whether the attempt should be successful for the present or not. Any attempt of the kind would not improbably lead to a conflict between us and Mexico, and involve consequences, in reference to her and the general peace, long to be deplored on all sides and difficult to be repaired. But, should that not be the case, and the interference of another Power defeat the annexation for the present, without the interruption of peace, it would but postpone the conflict, and render it more fierce and bloody whenever it might occur. Its defeat would be attributed to enmity and ambition on the part of the Power by whose interference it was occasioned, and excite deep jealousy and resentment on the part of our people, who would be ready to seize the first favourable opportunity to effect by force what was prevented from being done peaceably by mutual consent. It is not difficult to see how greatly such a conflict, come when it might, would endanger the general peace, and how much Mexico might be the loser by it.

In the meantime, the condition of Texas would be rendered uncertain, her settlement and prosperity in consequence retarded, and her commerce crippled, while the general peace would be rendered much more insecure. It could not but greatly affect us. If the annexation of Texas should be permitted to take place peaceably now (as it would, without the interference of other Powers) the energies of our people would, for a long time to come, be directed to the peaceable pursuits of redeeming and bringing within the pale of cultivation, improvement, and civilization, that large portion of the continent lying between Mexico on one side, and the British possessions on the other, which is now, with little exception, a wilderness, with a spare population, consisting, for the most part, of wandering Indian tribes.

It is our destiny to occupy that vast region; to intersect it with roads and canals; to fill it with cities, towns, villages, and farms; to extend over it our religion, customs, constitution, and laws; and to present it as a peaceful and splendid addition to the domains of commerce and civilization. It is our policy to increase, by growing and spreading out into unoccupied regions, assimilating all we incorporate; in a word, to increase by accretion and not through conquest - by the addition of masses held together by the cohesion of force. No system can be more unsuited to the latter process or better adapted to the former than our admirable federal system. If it should not be resisted in its course, it will, probably, fulfill its destiny without disturbing our neighbours or putting in jeopardy the general peace; but if it be opposed by foreign interference, a new direction would be given to our energy, much less favourable to harmony with our neighbours and to the general peace of the world.

The change would undesirable to us, and much less in accordance with what I have assumed to be primary objects of policy on the part of France, England, and Mexico.

But, to descend to particulars: it is certain that while England, like France, desires the independence of Texas, with the view to commercial connexions, it is not less so, that one of the leading motives for England desiring it is the hope that through her diplomacy and influence negro slavery may be abolished there, and ultimately, by consequence, in the United States, and throughout the whole continent. That its ultimate abolition throughout the entire continent is an object ardently desired by her, we have decisive proof in the declaration of the Earl of Aberdeen, delivered to this department, and in which you will find a copy among the documents transmitted to Congress with the Texan treaty. That she desires its abolition in Texas, and has used her influence and diplomacy to effect it there, the same document, with the correspondence of this department with Mr. Pakenham, also to be found among the documents, furnishes proof not less conclusive. That one of the objects of abolishing it there is to facilitate its abolition in the United States, and throughout the continent, is manifest from the declaration of the abolition party and societies, both in this country and in England. In fact, there is good reason to believe that the scheme of abolishing it in Texas, with the view to its abolition in the United States and over the continent, originated with the prominent members of the party in the United States; and was first broached by them in the (so called) World's Convention, held in London in the year 1840, and through its agency brought to the notice of the British Government.

Now, I hold not only that France can have no interest in the consummation of this grand scheme which England hopes to accomplish through Texas, if she can defeat the annexation; but that her interest, and those of all the continental Powers of Europe, are directly and deeply opposed to it.
It is to late in the day to contend that humanity or philanthropy is the great object of the policy of England in attempting to abolish African slavery on this continent. I do not question but humanity may have been one of her leading motives for the abolition of the African slave trade, and that it may have had a considerable influence in abolishing slavery in her West Indian possessions - aided, indeed, by the fallacious calculation that the labour of the negroes would be at least as profitable, if not more so, in consequence of this measure. She acted on the principle that tropical products can be produced cheaper by free African labour and East Indian labour than by slave labour. She knew full well the value of such products to her commerce, navigation, navy, manufactures, revenue, and power. She was not ignorant that the support of her political preponderance depended on her tropical possessions, and had no intention of diminishing their productiveness, nor any anticipation that such would be the effect when the scheme of abolishing slavery in her colonial possessions was adopted. On the contrary, she calculated to combine philanthropy with profit and power, as is not unusual with fanaticism. Experience has convinced her of the fallacy of her calculations. She has failed in all her objects. The labour of her negroes has proved far less productive, without affording the consolation of having improved their condition.

The experiment has turned out to be a costly one. She expended nearly $1000,000,000 in indemnifying the owners of the emancipated slaves. It is estimated that the increased price paid since, by the people of Great Britain, for sugar and other tropical productions, in consequence of the measure, is equal to half that sum; and that twice that amount has been expended in the suppression of the slave trade; making together $250,000,000 as the cost of the experiment. Instead of realizing her hope, the result has been a sad disappointment. Her tropical products have fallen off to a vast amount. Instead of supplying her own wants and those of nearly all Europe with them, as formerly, she has now, in some of the most important articles, scarcely enough to supply her own. What is worse, her own colonies are actually consuming sugar produced by slave labour, brought direct to England, or refined in bond, and exported and sold in her colonies, as cheap or cheaper than they can be produced there; while the slave trade, instead of diminishing, has been in fact carried on to a greater extent than ever. So disastrous has been the result, that her fixed capital vested in tropical possessions, estimated at nearly $500,000,000, is said to stand on the brink of ruin.

But this is not the worst. While this costly scheme has had such ruinous effects on the tropical productions of Great Britain, it has given a powerful stimulus, followed by a corresponding increase of products, to those countries which have had the good sense to shun her example. There has been vested, it is estimated by them, in the production of tropical products, since 1808, in fixed capital, nearly $4,000,000,000, wholly dependent on slave labour. In the same period the value of their products has been estimated to have risen from about $72,000,000 annually to nearly $220,000,000; while the whole of the fixed capital of Great Britain vested in cultivating tropical products, both in the East and West Indies, is estimated at only about $830,000,000, and the value of the products annually at about $50,000,000. To present a still more striking view of three articles of tropical products (sugar, coffee, and cotton), the British possessions, including the West and East Indies and Mauritius, produced, in 1842, of sugar only 3,993,771 lb., while Cuba, Brazil, and the United States, excluding other countries having tropical possessions, produced 9,600,000 lb.; of coffee the British possessions produced only 27,393,003, while Cuba and Brazil produced 201,590,125 lb.; and of cotton, the British possessions, including shipments to China, only 137,443,446 lb., while the United States alone produced 790,479,275 lb.

The above facts and estimates have all been drawn from a British periodical of high standing and authority, and are believed to be entitled to credit.

This vast increase of the capital and production on the part of those nations who have continued their former policy towards the negro race, compared with that of Great Britain, indicates a corresponding relative increase of the means of commerce, navigation, manufactures, wealth, and power. It is no longer a question of doubt, that the greatest source of the wealth, prosperity, and power of the more civilized nations of the temperate zone (especially Europe, where the arts have made the greatest advance) depends, in a great degree, on the exchange of their products with those of the tropical regions. So great has been the advance made in the arts, both chymical and mechanical, within the last few generations, that all the old civilized nations can, with but a small part of their labour and capital, supply their respective wants, which tends to limit within narrow bounds the amount of the commerce between them, and forces them all to seek for markets in the tropical regions and the more newly settled portions of the globe. Those who can best succeed in commanding those markets have the best prospect of outstripping the others in the career of commerce, navigation, manufactures, wealth, and power.
This is seen and felt by British statesmen, and has opened their eyes to the errors which they have committed. The question now with them is, how shall it be counteracted? What has been done cannot be undone. The question is, by what means can Great Britain regain and keep a superiority in tropical cultivation, commerce, and influence? Or, shall that be abandoned, and other nations be suffered to acquire the supremacy, even to the extent of supplying British markets, to the destruction of the capital already vested in their production? These are the questions which now profoundly occupy the attention of her statesmen, and have the greatest influence over her councils.

In order to regain her superiority she not only seeks to revive and increase her own capacity to produce tropical productions, but to diminish and destroy the capacity of those who have so far outstripped her in consequence of her error. In pursuit of the former, she has cast her eyes to her East India possessions - to central and eastern Africa - with the view of establishing colonies there, and even to restore, substantially, the slave trade itself, under the specious name of transporting free slave labourers from Africa to her West India possessions, in order, if possible, to compete successfully with those who have refused to follow her suicidal policy. But these all afford but uncertain and distant hopes of recovering her lost superiority. Her main reliance is on the other alternative - to cripple or destroy the productions of her successful rivals. There is but one way by which it can be done, and that is by abolishing African slavery throughout this continent; and that she openly avows to be the constant object of her policy and exertions. It matters not how or from what motive it may be done - whether it may be by diplomacy, influence, or force; by secret or open means; and whether the motive be humane or selfish, without regard to manner, means, or motive. The thing itself, should it be accomplished, would put down all rivalry, and give her the undisputed supremacy in supplying her own wants and those of the rest of the world; and thereby more than fully retrieve what she has lost by her own errors. It would give her the monopoly of tropical productions, which I shall next proceed to show.

What would be the consequence if this object of her unceasing solicitude and exertions should be effected by the abolition of negro slavery throughout this continent, some idea may be formed from the immense diminution of productions, as has been shown, which has followed abolition in her West India possessions. But, as great as that has been, it is nothing compared to what would be the effect if she should succeed in abolishing slavery in the United States, Cuba, Brazil, and throughout this continent. The experiment in her own colonies was made under the most favorable circumstances. It was brought about gradually and peaceably, by the steady and firm operation of the parent country, armed with complete power to prevent or crush at once all insurrectionary movements on the part of the negroes, and able and disposed to maintain to the full the political and social ascendancy of the former masters over their former slaves. It is no at all wonderful that the change of the relations of master and slave took place under such circumstances without violence and bloodshed, and that order and peace should have been since preserved. Very different would be the result of abolition, should it be effected by her influence and exertions, in the possessions of other countries on this continent - and especially in the United States, Cuba, and Brazil, the greatest cultivators of the principal tropical products of America.

To form a correct conception of what would be the result with them, we must look, not to Jamaica, but to St. Domingo, for example. The change would be followed by unforgiving hate between the two races, and end in a bloody and deadly struggle between them for superiority. One or the other would have to be subjugated, extirpated, or expelled, and desolation would overspread their territories, as in St. Domingo, from which it would take centuries to recover. The end would be, that the superiority in cultivating the great tropical staples would be transferred from them to the British tropical possessions.

They are of vast extent, and those beyond the Cape of Good Hope possessed of an unlimited amount of labour, standing ready, by the aid of British capital, to supply the deficit which would be occasioned by destroying the tropical productions of the United States, Cuba, Brazil, and other countries cultivated by slave labour on this continent, so soon as the increased price, in consequence, would yield a profit. It is the successful competition of that labour which keeps the prices of the staples so low as to prevent their cultivation with profit in the possessions of Great Britain by what she is pleased to call free labour. If she can destroy its competition she would have a monopoly in those productions. She has all the means of furnishing an unlimited supply; vast and fertile possessions in both Indies, boundless command of capital and labour, and ample power to suppress disturbances, and preserve order throughout her wide domains.

It is unquestionable, that she regards the abolition of slavery in Texas as a most important step to this great object of policy, so much the aim of her solicitude and exertions; and the defeat of the annexation of Texas to our Union as indispensable to the abolition of slavery there. She is too sagacious not to see what a fatal blow it would give to slavery in the United States, and how certainly its abolition with us would abolish it over the whole continent, and thereby give her a monopoly of the productions of the great tropical staples, and the command of the commerce, navigation, and manufactures of the world, with an established naval ascendancy and political preponderance. To this continent the blow would be calamitous beyond description.

It would destroy in a great measure the cultivation and production of the great tropical staples, amounting annually in value nearly $300,000,000, the fund which stimulates and upholds almost every other branch of its industry, commerce, navigation, and manufactures. The whole, by their joint influence, are rapidly spreading population, wealth, improvement, and civilization over the whole continent, and vivifying, by their overflow, the industry of Europe; thereby increasing its population, wealth, and advancement in the arts, in power, and in civilization.

Such must be the result, should Great Britain succeed in accomplishing the constant object of her desire and exertions - the abolition of negro slavery over this continent, and towards the effecting of which she regards the defeat of the annexation of Texas to our Union as so important. Can it be possible that Governments so enlightened and sagacious as those of France and the other great continental Powers can be so blinded by the plea of philanthropy as not to see what must inevitably follow, be her motive what it may, should she succeed in her objects? It is little short of mockery to talk of philanthropy, with the examples before us of the effects of abolishing negro slavery in her own colonies, in St. Domingo, and the northern states of our Union, where statistical facts, not to be shaken, prove that the freed negro, after the experience of 60 years, is in a far worse condition than in the other states, where he has been left in his former condition. No: the effect of what is called abolition, where the number is few, is not to raise the inferior race to the condition of freemen, but to deprive the negro of the guardian care of his owner, subject to all the depression and oppression belonging to his inferior condition. But, on the other hand, where the number is great, and bears a large proportion to the whole population, it would be still worse. It would be to substitute for the existing relation a deadly strife between the two races, to end in the subjection, expulsion, or extirpation of one or the other:
and such would be the case over the greater part of this continent where slavery exists. It would not end there; but in all probability would extend, by its example, the war of races over all South America, including Mexico, and extend to the Indian as well as to the African race, and make the whole one scene of blood and devastation.

Dismissing, then, the stale and unfounded plea of philanthropy, can it be that France and the other great continental Powers - seeing what must be the result of the policy for the accomplishment of which England is constantly exerting herself, and that the defeat of the annexation of Texas is so important towards its consummation - are prepared to back or countenance her in her efforts to effect either? What possible motives can they have to favour her cherished policy? Is it not better for them that they should be supplied with tropical products in exchange for their labour from the United States, Brazil, Cuba, and this continent generally, than to be dependent on one great monopolizing Power for their supply? Is it not better that they receive them at the low price which competition, cheaper means of production, and nearness of market, would furnish them by the former, than to give the high prices which monopoly, dear labour, and great distance from the market would impose? Is it not better that their labour should be exchanged with a new continent, rapidly increasing in population and the capacity for consuming, and which would furnish, in the course of a few generations, a market nearer to them, and of almost unlimited extent, for the products of their industry and arts, than with old and distant regions, brose population has long since reached its growth?

The above contains those enlarged views of policy which, it seems to me, an enlightened European statesman ought to take in making up his opinion on the subject of the annexation of Texas, and the grounds, as it may be inferred, on which England vainly opposes it. They certainly involve considerations of the deepest importance, and demanding the greatest attention. Viewed in connexion with them, the question of annexation becomes one of the first magnitude, not only to Texas and the United States, but to this continent and Europe. They are presented that you may use them on all suitable occasions, where you think they may be with effect in your correspondence, where it can be done with propriety, or otherwise. The President relies with confidence on your sagacity, prudence, and zeal. Your mission is one of the first magnitude at all times, but especially now; and he feels assured nothing will be left undone on your part to do justice to the country and the Government in reference to this great question.
I have said nothing as to our right of treating with Texas without consulting Mexico. You so fully understand the grounds on which we rest our right, and are so familiar with the facts necessary to maintain them, that it was no thought necessary to add anything in reference to it.
I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J.C. CALHOUN
William R. King, Esq., &c.

The following is the bill suitited by Mr. Benton to the Senate, providing for a conditional annexation of Texas to the United States: -

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and advised to open negotiations with Mexico and Texas, for the adjustment of boundaries, and the annexation of the latter to the United States, on the following bases, to wit: -

"1. The boundary of the annexed territory to be in the desert prairie west of the Nueces, and along the highlands and mountain heights which divide the waters of the Mississippi from the waters of the Rio del Norte, and to latitude 42 degrees north.

"2. The people of Texas, by a legislative act, or by any authentic act which shows the will of the majority, to express their assent to said annexation.

"3. A State, to be called 'the State of Texas,' with boundaries fixed by herself, and an extent not exceeding that of the largest State of the Union, be admitted into the Union, by virtue of this act, on an equal footing with the original States.

"4. The remainder of the annexed territory to be held and disposed of by the United States as one of their territories, and to be called 'the South-west Territory.'

"5. The existence of slavery to be for ever prohibited in the northern and north western part of said territory, west of the 10th degree of longitude west from Greenwich, so as to divide, as equally as may be, the whole of the annexed country between slaveholding and non-slaveholding States.

"6. The assent of Mexico to be obtained by treaty to such annexation and boundary, or to be dispensed with when the Congress of the United States may deem such assent to be unnecessary.

"7. Other details of the annexation to be adjusted by treaty, so far as the same may come within the scope of the treaty-making Power."

The bill was read twice, and referred, on motion of Mr. Archer, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

LONDON, THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 1845.

In spite of the prolixity of the message of the President of the UNITED STATES, that document conveys a very imperfect notion of the conduct and policy pursued by the Cabinet of Washington with reference to the annexation of Texas during the last autumn; and, in order to form a just appreciation of Mr. TYLER's and Mr. CALHOUN's real proceedings, we must examine the diplomatic correspondence of the past year, which has been annexed to the message, and communicated to Congress. Our analysis of these very extensive documents must unavoidably be of the briefest kind, but we shall be able to show by what means the two States have been brought to the verge of actual war during the recess of Congress, and we shall find, before we conclude, that the interests and honour of our own country, and one of our most important European relations, are mixed up in this important discussion.

Although the Senate of the United States rejected Mr. TYLER's treaty of annexation, and, consequently, put its constitutional veto on the transaction, the President and his Secretary of State (Mr. Calhoun) appear not to have taken the slightest account of that decision, but to have gone on in all their instructions to their agents abroad to announce the progress of their scheme, and to speak of the question of annexation as one that was still pending before the people of the United States. In every constitutional and legal sense this assertion was false. The question had been negatived by the Senate, principally on the ground of avoiding a rupture with Mexico; and the only matter which was pending at all was the election of a President, which was still so doubtful that it was impossible for Mr. Tyler to have foreseen last August whether his successor would be disposed to promote annexation or refuse it. We now discover, however, that he had in hand a surer and a swifter scheme, and in this he was marvelously seconded by Santa Anna's absurd intention of re-invading Texas, and by General Wool's ferocious intimation of the ruthless manner in which the war was to be carried on.

As early as the 20th of June, 1844, Mr. Shannon, who had recently been appointed United States' Minister at Mexico, received his instructions from Mr. Calhoun. These instructions contain a list of demands for the adjustment of various long-standing claims against the Mexican Government, which the Minister was directed to urge in a tone more suitable to a hostile manifesto than to an amicable communication with a neighbouring State. After a long series of representations of this character, Mr. Shannon was to enter upon the question of annexation. He was to deny in the most formal terms that Mexico could even discuss the right of the United States to make that treaty, and to declare that "the United States could not be deterred by menaces from adopting a measure which, after mature deliberation, they have determined they have a right to do, and which they believe to be essential to their safety and prosperity." Such was the language of the American Executive, immediately after this very measure had been deliberately rejected by the Senate, in whom the ultimate control of the foreign relations of the Union resides! We shall shortly see that the same policy was actively pursued in Europe.

The preparation for further hostilities on the part of Mexico gave a further pretext for continuing this extraordinary demonstration; and President Houston, who was still in office in Texas, hastened to claim (August 6, 1844) the direct assistance of military forces from the Union. This, however, was held to be too great a stretch of constitutional powers even for Mr. Tyler; and in declining to accede to the demand, the Cabinet of Washington acknowledged that the treaty was not in reality any longer pending. A month later, however, Mr. Calhoun wrote to Mr. Shannon, at Mexico, directing him to remonstrate against the renewal of hostilities in stronger language than had been used before.

"There can be but one object (said he) in renewing the war at this time, and that is, to defeat the annexation of Texas to the Union. Mexico knows full well that the rejection of the treaty has but postponed the question of annexation. She knows that Congress adjourned without finally disposing of it; that it is now pending before both houses (!), and actively canvassed throughout the wide extent of the Union; and that it will in all probability be decided in its favour, unless it should be defeated by some movement exterior to the country." . . . "No measure of policy has been more steadily or longer pursued, and that by both of the great parties into which the Union is divided. Many believed that Texas was embraced in the cession of Louisiana, and was improperly, if not unconstitutionally, surrendered by the treaty of Florida in 1819. Under that impression, and the general conviction of its importance to the safety and welfare of the Union, its annexation has been an object of constant pursuit ever since."

We have no space to comment on the shameless effrontery of this avowal, which is made as if the declaration of "this long-cherished and established "policy" sufficed to justify it, and to cancel all the intermediate declarations and treaties of the American Government, by which they have denied and renounced all such claims. As well might Russia boast that her long-cherished policy has been to possess herself of Constantinople, or France to declare that she has for more than a century established her views on the Rhine, and then proceed to act on such a declaration.

Well might the Mexican Minister say in his answer to this note (31st of October, 1844), that "it thoroughly reveals the deceit with which Mexico has so long been treated," before he proceeded to expose the fallacies of legal construction, and the gross violation of all the duties of neighbourhood and of amity, by which alone Texas was wrested from the Mexican Government. This reply led to the angry correspondence to which we on Tuesday alluded; and the result is, that during the recess of Congress, in defiance of a formal vote of the Senate, and by the assertion of claims which that vote had negatived, President Tyler has brought the relations of the two Republics into a state in which a collision appears to be inevitable, and the occupation of Texas itself will probably be the first consequence of a rupture. If this view of the case be correct, the triumph of the annexation party in Mr. POLK's election has alone saved Mr. TYLER from impeachment and the highest punishment known to the law, for he has assuredly been guilty of the highest abuse of the powers confided by the law to his charge.

Meanwhile, and this is not the least important part of the case, the American agents were not inactive in Europe. It appears from a despatch, which we print in another column, addressed (12th of August, 1844) to Mr. KING, the American Minister at the Court of France, that on the arrival of that gentleman at Paris he at once received a personal declaration from the KING, "that in no event would any steps be "taken by his Government in the slightest degree hostile, or which would give the United States just cause "of complaint."

In a subsequent conversation between Mr. KING and M. GUIZOT, that Minister is reported to have declared, that France had not agreed to unite with England in a protest against annexation; and the American Government inferred that France was not disposed, in any event, to take a hostile attitude with reference to annexation. France was, therefore, understood by the Cabinet of Washington to abandon the principle of Texan independence as completely as if she had never recognized it, or had recognized it only for the purpose of abetting the United States in the plunder of the Mexican territory. Mr. KING was, therefore, to inform LOUIS PHILIPPE that the object of annexation would be pursued with unabated vigour, and to give his opinion that a decided majority of American people were in its favour, and that it would certainly be annexed at no distant day. Such a transaction as this at Paris afforded the most powerful encouragement which the scheme could receive from Europe, since it left Great Britain to maintain the independence of Texas single-handed; and we must add, that it places the good faith of the French Government in a very equivocal light. We require to be informed, categorically, whether or not the French Government was not at the same time affecting to join in our endeavours to maintain the status quo in Texas, whilst it was in reality giving these assurances to Mr. KING?

The charge is a serious one, and we await the answer.

Mr. CALHOUN, however, hastened to avail himself of this opening. He at once placed the question on its true basis - the existence and interests of slavery; and he appeals to France with a confidence which we would fain believe to be misplaced, to combine with him in defeating a policy which tends to the abolition of slavery on the American continent. Admitting that one of the main objects of British policy in this question is to check the progress and ascendancy of slave institutions, he contends that "France can "have no interest in the consummation of this grand scheme, but that her interests, and those of all the "continental Powers of Europe, are directly opposed to it." In other words, he argues explicitly that the interest of the European Powers demands that they should not only tolerate, but encourage and promote slavery in America, and therefore assist America in unparalleled acts of spoliation and bad faith, on which the permanence of slavery on that continent avowedly depends. Thus is the question stripped by its own advocate of all disguise; and the odious motives in which this abominable scheme have originated - namely, the aggrandizement of the United States, for the express purpose of perpetuating the servility of the negro race - are laid bare to the wonder and execration of mankind. On these grounds Mr. CALHOUN appeals to civilized France and civilized Europe for encouragement and support. The principal interest (though it is not the only one) we have in deprecating the annexation of Texas, is our hatred and resistance to that violation of human rights and divine justice, which we have eradicated from the colonies of Britain; and it is by a laboured defence of slavery and slave-interests that Mr. CALHOUN courts the sympathy of the French Government.

We leave unnoticed his sarcasms on our philanthropy and fanaticism; we smile at the motives ridiculously imputed to us of acquiring by free labour a monopoly of tropical productions, and the command of commerce, navigation, and manufactures of the world. The policy of England is sacred in the eyes of the people of England because it is the policy of freedom, justice, and civilization. To measure it by the mere rules of temporary interest is a folly and a deceit; although, if we do stand alone in the defence of these great principles, we stand armed with the most terrible power ever placed by Providence in the hands of a great nation. We know not what part may be assigned to us by the course of events in this contention; nor do we forget that the maintenance of peace is the highest duty of enlightened statesmen, and that the crimes and frauds of the western hemisphere do not rest on the conscience of Britain. But there never was an instance in which our policy was more unjustifiably impugned than in this despatch of an American Minister, written for the express purpose of being used against us at the Court of one of our nearest allies; and we are persuaded that this mention of it will suffice to rouse the just indignation of this country, and to show the real nature of these scandalous proceedings to the
MR. POLK AND HIS POLICY

Mr. Polk has delivered the following, his first speech, we believe, since his election to the Presidency of the United States, in reply to the address presented to him by the citizens of Nashville. The only allusion which he makes to the policy which shall guide him for the future will be found in the last paragraph. It is, however, exceedingly vague and indefinite: -

"I return to you, Sir, and to my fellow-citizens whose organ you are, my unfeigned thanks for this manifestation of the popular regard and confidence, and for the congratulations which you have been pleased to express to me upon the termination and result of the late political contest. I am fully sensible that these congratulations are not, and cannot be, personal to myself. It is the eminent success of our common principles which has spread such general joy over the land. The political struggle through which the country has just passed has been deeply exciting. Extraordinary causes have existed to make it so. It has terminated - it is now over - and I sincerely hope and believe has been decided by the sober and settled judgment of the American people.

"In exchanging mutual congratulations with each other upon the result of the late election, the Democratic party should remember, in calmly reviewing the contest, that the portion of the fellow-citizens who have differed with us in opinion have equal rights with ourselves; that minorities as well as majorities are entitled to the full and free exercise of their opinions and judgments; and that the rights of all, whether of minorities or majorities, as such, are entitled to equal respect and regard.

"In rejoicing, therefore, over the success of the Democratic party, and of their principles, in the late election, it should be in no spirit of exultation over the defeat of our opponents; but it should be because, as we honestly believe, our principles and policy are better calculated than theirs to promote the true interests of the country.

"In the position in which I have been placed by the voluntary and unsought suffrages of my fellow-citizens, it will become my duty, as it will be my pleasure, faithfully and truly to represent, in the executive department of the Government, the principles and policy of the great party of the country who have elevated me to it; but, at the same time, it is proper that I should beware that I should not regard myself as the representative of a party only, but of the whole people of the United States: and I trust that the future policy of the Government may be such as to secure the happiness and prosperity of all, without distinction of party."
started the enterprise of a newspaper in the city of New York, which was to regulate the whole affairs of this continent, and overtop the other newspapers by being a sort of organ of both Europe and America. In this grand scheme Wikoff, the chevalier, was his principal aid, being the capitalist - save the mark! Of the concern. Failing in this also, Duff started for Mexico with dispatches, and has created a crisis in that country. Now he is back in Texas, and no doubt before he returns to Washington he will raise a highly respectable dust in that direction. Duff is, indeed, one of the most interesting characters of the present age. He has a singular mixture of tact, bronze, and plausibility, which give him more weight than people are apt to attach to him. We have some notion of writing the history of his negotiations in London, Paris, Texas, and Mexico. It would be as intensely interesting, and vastly more amusing, than the Adventures of Puss in Boots. - New York Herald [GLP]

LT January 14, 1845, 4a

LONDON, TUESDAY, JANUARY 14, 1845.

President TYLER has exceeded himself in the fifth act of his performance. Whenever we have ventured on a prediction as to his future conduct, which if applied to any other ruler of nations would have been fantastical and injurious, he has not only justified all our expectations, but surpassed them. The end of his Presidency is a multum in parvo of diplomatic craft and political violence; and setting out of account the importance of the questions under discussion with reference to Mexico and Texas, we are divided between amazement and sheer diversion at the language and demeanor of this personage, speaking as never man spoke before in the name of the Executive Government of twenty millions of civilized beings.

The scheme for getting up a quarrel with Mexico has been most actively carried on; but in order to avoid the difficulties which might attend an actual declaration of war by the President of the UNITED STATES - that power being in fact vested by the Constitution in Congress - Mr. TYLER has endeavoured by the conduct of his agents in Mexico, and more recently by his own extraordinary Message of the 19th of December, to throw open the Mexicans the odium of this last and most disastrous step. The Congress of the United States might still have sufficient penetration to see through Mr. TYLER's designs and sufficient power to control them. The desire to avoid a war with Mexico was the main ground on which not only Mr. CLAY and his party, but even Mr. VAN BUREN and his friends, opposed the annexation treaty; but if Mexico can be provoked into taking the first step in hostilities, no part in the United States will be more able to recede or to stop the war than Mr. TYLER is himself. It will be remembered that the angry correspondence between Mr. SHANNON, the United States Minister at Mexico, and Senor REJON, the Foreign Secretary of that Republic, was begun by the former gentleman, who communicated under his own name a note which was, in fact, no more than a repetition of Mr. CALHOUN's own despatch to him. An attempt was made to show that because the United States Government has negotiated at various times in the last twenty years for the purchase of the territory of Texas from Mexico for a price varying from one to six millions of dollars - all which negotiations the Mexican Government steadily and uniformly rejected - that therefore Texas being now a free and independent state, she has a perfect right to dispose of herself as she pleases. It is evident that such an argument as addressed to Mexico was utterly worthless and even insulting, since Mexico never had acknowledged that Texas is an independent state at all; and to admit such an argument was to admit more than the independence of Texas - namely, a right to make over her territories to a foreign Power. Mr. SHANNON, however, pressed it for the purpose for which it was intended and our readers have had before the Mexican Minister's able and temperate answer. Of these Mr. SHANNON presumes to say, in an official communication to Mr. CALHOUN, that - "They were written for the purpose and with the view of arousing the jealousies, and exciting the prejudices, of the people against the Government and southern people of the United States, and thereby to make political capital for the party in power. To accomplish this object you will see that Mr. Rejon has not hesitated deliberately and purposely to misrepresent, in the most gross and palpable manner, both of my notes, and to charge the Government and southern people of the United States with acts and motives highly dishonourable."

The acts and motives of the American Government in this and too many other transactions stand in needle of no "deliberate misrepresentation" to incur the censure and the scorn of every other political community in the world. Even their intrigues are as patent and flagrant as other men's crimes. In this instance the whole correspondence is public; and as the matter is really only indirectly connected with the interests of this country, some weight may be attached to our solemn conviction - a conviction shared by every man in Europe who has examined the particulars of this transaction - that from first to last the proceedings of the United States to effect the annexation of Texas are a scandal and a dishonour not only to their country, but to the age we live in.

We proceed, however, with the narrative of the events. No sooner had Mr. SHANNON's despatch announcing his suspension of the intercourse with the United States Government been received at Washington, than it brought down Mr. TYLER's astonishing Message, which had doubtless been prepared in full expectation of the event. The language held by the American Minister at Mexico could have no other result; and the part of the PRESIDENT was to endeavour to kindle as much exasperation at home as he had already occasioned abroad. The Message is a mere rhetorical artifice for this purpose; it is full of fierce epithets and appeals to the passions and sympathies of the American people; and it once mor misstates the case with the most unblushing pertinacity.

In his Message on the opening of the Congress the PRESIDENT had declared that as it was Texas which had sought this union, was the Union to reject her prayer? In this Message, sent down within a fortnight of the last, he says, "Texas had entered into the Treaty of Annexation upon the invitation of the "Executive; and when, for that act, she was threatened with a renewal of the war on the part of Mexico, "she naturally looked to this Government to ward off the threatened blow." The contradiction is direct and in terms, and it is accompanied with a gross inaccuracy. Texas was not threatened with a renewal of war on the part of Mexico for that act, namely, the Treaty of Annexation, but because Mexico had never relinquished her very impracticable design of reconquering her former province.

Mr. TYLER recapitulates, with all the vehemence of a manifesto of war, the grievances complained of by his Government; but having the fear of a hostile Senate before his eyes, he drops his tone as he approaches the close of his effusion, and "contents himself with re-urging upon Congress prompt and "immediate action on the subject of annexation. By adopting that measure the United States will be in the "exercise of an undoubted right; and if Mexico, not regarding that forbearance, shall aggravate the "injustice of her conduct by a declaration of war against them, upon her head will rest all the "responsibility."

The distracted condition of the Mexican Republic itself is now the chief ground for hoping that war may be avoided; but even that hope depends on little more than the apparently entire inability of Mexico to defend her territories. What argument which has ever been deployed to defend the annexation of Texas does not apply with equal forces to the conquest of the whole of the ancient colonies of Spain? Is not one act of rapine and violence invariably the prelude to another? If Mr. TYLER covets Texas, who will set bounds to Mr. TYLER's descendants? These, indeed, are questions of serious moment to all the world; but most of all to such honourable and patriotic citizens of the United States themselves who still respect, though they cannot maintain, the principles of their fathers. This question has already proved fatal to the integrity and prudence of the American Government; it will hereafter prove equally fatal to their national interests; it has blasted their honour, it will hereafter dissolve their power, divide their country, and impose a dreadful burden on their children's children, for it is the first step they will have made in foreign conquest for the gratification of popular ambition. MEXICO

We take the following article from the New York Commercial Advertiser of the 31st ult. It was furnished to that journal by Mr. Cushing, the late American Commissioner in China, who has returned from the scene of his mission by way of Mexico:

"The revolution of Mexico was rapidly approaching a decisive crisis, and the utmost confusion and disorder exist in all parts of the republic. The great object of the revolution is to decide whether SANTA ANNA shall be precipitated from power, or whether, on the other hand, he shall be the permanent dictator and arbitrary master of the Government. In order to understand well the actual state of things it is necessary, in the first place, to give a brief explanation of the previous state of
"At the head of the Government in 1841 was General Anastasio Bustamente, under the constitution which then regulated the Mexican Republic. In August, 1841, General Paredes and the department of Jalisco pronounced against the Government of Bustamente. A civil war of brief duration ensued, which was terminated on the 28th of September, 1841, by an arrangement, in virtue of which the preexisting constitution was abolished, and General Santa Anna was invested with the powers of dictator, for the purpose of re-organizing the constitution and the Government. This temporary arrangement is known by the name of the Bases of Tacubaya and the agreements of La Estenzuela. Under the auspices of Santa Anna a Congress assembled in June, 1842, and proceeded to deliberate on a new constitution. Santa Anna himself retired to Manga de Clavo, leaving General Bravo as President ad interim; and the proceedings of Congress not being agreeable to Santa Anna, it was dissolved by General Bravo in December, 1842, and a National Junta, or Assembly of Notables, was convened in its place. On the 12th of June, 1843, a new constitution was completed and made public, by which (among other things) the supreme power was lodged in the hands of a President, to be elected for five years; of an elective body called the Council of Government, and of a Congress composed of a Senate and Chamber of Deputies, and Santa Anna himself was immediately elected President under the new constitution. During this period the republic had been distracted, not only by the civil war which displaced Bustamente and elevated Santa Anna to power, but also by the insurrection of Yucatan and the long civil war which ensued in that quarter, by an extensive rising of the Indians in the extreme south, by incursions of the Indians in the north, by controversies with foreign powers, by the question of Texas, and above all by incompetency and corruption in all members of the Government.

"By the 6th of the Bases of Tucubaya it was provided that 'The provisional Executive shall answer for his acts before the constitutional Congress;' and this was confirmed by the agreement of La Estenzuela. Nevertheless, by a decree of Santa Anna, issued on the 3d of October, 1843 (before assuming the office of constitutional President), it was declared that, as the power exercised by him under the Bases of Tucubaya was, by its very tenour, without limitation, the responsibility referred to in the 6th of the said Bases of Tucubaya was merely a 'responsibility of opinion;' that all the acts of his dictatorship were of the same permanent force as if performed by a constitutional Government, and must be observed as such by the first constitutional Congress. The new Government was completed and installed in January, 1844, when the first Congress under the new constitution assembled. Its early acts seem to have been in accordance with the views of Santa Anna, for it voted on an extraordinary contribution of four millions with which to prosecute the war against Texas. But on his requiring authority for a loan of ten millions, the Congress hesitated to give its assent, though it was notorious that but a small portion of the extraordinary contribution had been realized, and that the Treasury, so far from being competent to supply the means for carrying on a war against Texas, was in fact incompetent for the ordinary daily necessities of Government. Meanwhile, as affairs proceeded, a heavy opposition to Santa Anna began to manifest itself in Congress and throughout the republic. He had been raised to power, though apparently with great unanimity, yet, as the event has shown, by a military revolution, rather than by the spontaneous choice of the people. For, on his expressing a wish to retire a short time to Manga de Clavo for the care of his private affairs (as he had done in 1842), in which case the new constitution required that the Senate should make choice of a President ad interim, to officiate during his absence from the seat of Government the Ministerial candidate, General Valentin Canalizo, prevailed by one vote over his opponent, General Rincon.

"Such then was the position of things in October, 1844, Santa Anna being President propictario, Canalizo President interino, and the Congress assembled in special session, occupied with the foreign relations and the financial embarrassments of the republic, when the revolution broke out in the large and powerful department of Jalisco.

"On the 1st of November, 1844, the Departmental Assembly of Jalisco adopted and published what is called an Initiative, being an act provided for by the constitution, in virtue of which the Assembly suited the proposition following: -

"'The National Congress will make effective the responsibility of the Provisional Government, to which it was subjected by the 6th of the Bases of Tucubaya, which it swore to, and caused to be sworn to by the nation.

"'2. The law of Aug. 21, 1844, imposing extraordinary contributions, is repealed.

"'3. The Congress will occupy itself by preference in reforming the articles of the constitution, which experience has demonstrated to be contrary to the prosperity of things.
"This act was adopted by all the authorities of the department, civil and military, and made known by public documents issued under the signatures of the civil governor (Escovado), and of the commandant-general (Galindo), with his principal officers; and thus far it was in Mexico a constitutional and not a revolutionary act - for in Mexico the military participate equally with the civil authorities in all political proceedings. But though nominally a constitutional act, it was in reality a revolutionary one, skillfully arranged and combined for the overthrow of Santa Anna.
To this intent General Mariano Paredes, who had commenced the revolution of 1841 in the same department of Jalisco, and who had since that time acted with Santa Anna, was pitched upon to be the agent of his overthrow. The secret movers of the new revolution obtained for General Paredes the command of the department of Sonora, to reach which it is necessary to march through that of Jalisco. On the way to his government Paredes stopped at Guadalajara, the capital of Jalisco, with the troops under his command, and there pronounced openly and directly against Santa Anna, and assumed the functions of military chief of the revolution. The four departments of Zacatecas, Aguascalientes, Sinaloa, and Sonora concurred in the pronunciamiento of Jalisco; and thus the five north-western departments were in arms at once against Santa Anna. Between these and Mexico there intervene the two departments of Guanajuato and Queretaro. Paredes advanced to Lagos, on the frontier of Jalisco, and there established his head-quarters, with an army of 1,400 men, to await the progress of events. In the contiguous department of Guanajuato was General Cortazar with 2,000 men, on whom Paredes depended for support; but the rapid movements of Santa Anna himself prevented Corazar from joining Paredes (if he had the intention), and compelled him, for the present at least, to declare for Santa Anna. For instantly on hearing what had taken place in Guadalajara, Santa Anna, who was then at Manga de Clavo, in the department of Vera Cruz, and in whose neighbourhood was a large body of troops, professedly collected for an expedition against Texas, set out for Mexico, being invested by the President ad interim with the conduct of the war against Paredes. He set out from Jalapa on the 7th of November at the head of 8,500 men, crossed rapidly the department of Puebla, where he received some additional troops, and on the 18th arrived at Guadalupe, a town near Mexico, where he fixed his head-quarters.

"He had left the departments of Vera Cruz and Puebla full of professions of loyalty to his Government; and he found the same professions in that of Mexico, and similar professions came to him there from Queretaro and Guanajuato; and he prepared to march from Guadalupe, and to assemble at Queretaro a force of 13,000 men, with which to overwhelm the little army of Paredes.

"But even at this moment, all powerful as he appeared, at the head of a great army, and with all the departments behind him loyal, symptoms began to appear at the uncertainty of his cause, for though the Congress did not professedly support Paredes, yet it insisted that Santa Anna should proceed constitutionally, which the latter was unable or indisposed to do. The Mexican Constitution provides expressly that the President cannot command in person the military force, either by sea or land, without the previous permission of Congress. Santa Anna had taken the command, without even pretending to ask the consent of Congress; and in so doing had himself performed a revolutionary act quite as positive and serious as that of Paredes. Nevertheless, on the 22d he proceeded on his march to Queretaro, and on the same day the Chamber of Deputies voted the impeachment of the Minister at War (General Reyes), for signing the order under which Santa Anna held the command of his troops. Congress also voted to receive and print the pronunciamientos of the revolutionized department - in all this indicating a disposition, not to be mistaken, of hostility to Santa Anna. On arriving at Queretaro, Santa Anna found that, although the military authorities were professedly in his favor, yet the Junta departmental had pronounced for the initiative of Jalisco.
Therefore, he made known to the members that if they did not repronounce in his favour, he would send them prisoners to Perote.

"They refused; and three of them were immediately arrested by his order, and sent off under a strong guard in the direction of Mexico and Perote. When the report of these proceedings reached Mexico, the Congress immediately summoned before it the Ministers of War and Government, to know whether they had authorized the General Santa Anna to imprison the members of the Junta Departmental of Queretaro.

"This subject occupied the Chambers on the 29th and 30th of November; and their attitude had now become so menacing, that the President ad interim, Canalizo (after consultation with Santa Anna), took the high-handed step of deciding to close the session of Congress by force, and declare Santa Anna Dictator of the Republic.
"Accordingly, on repairing to the Palace on the 1st of December, the members found the doors shut against them and guarded by soldiers; and on the 2d appeared the proclamation of Canalizo, as Presidento interino, declaring the Chamber dissolved indefinitely, and conferring all the powers of Government, legislative as well as executive, on Santa Anna, as Presidento propietario, the same to be exercised by Canalizo as Presidento interino until otherwise ordered by Santa Anna. For some days this forcible demolition of the constitutional Government by the creatures of Santa Anna remained without producing any apparent effect in Mexico. But on the very day when the news reached Puebla, General Inclan, Commandant-General of that department, in concert with the civil authority, pronounced against Santa Anna; and in a few days (on the 6th) the garrison and people of Mexico rose against the Government, imprisoned Canalizo and his Ministers - Congress re-assembled - the President of the Council of Government, General Herrera, assumed the exercise of the functions of President according to the constitution - and new Ministers were appointed the next day, whose authority was immediately acknowledged in Vera Cruz.

"At the latest dates there from Vera Cruz (December 12th) affairs stood thus: -

"The departments of Sonora, Sinalva, Jalisco, Zacatecas, and Aquascalientes were in a state of revolution, and in military possession of General Paredes."General Santa Anna (with Cortazar) had military possession of the departments of Guanajuata and Queretaro.

"Santa Anna's President interino, Canalizo, and his Ministers, were imprisoned in Mexico. Congress had re-assembled, and a temporary constitutional Government was installed there, composed as follows, viz.: -

"General Jose Joaquim de Herrera, President of the Council of Government, charged temporarily with the Supreme Executive authority.

"Don Luis Gonzaga Cueva, Minister of Foreign Relations, State, and Police.

"Don Mariano Riva Palacios, Minister of Justice, Public Instruction, and Industry.

"Don Pedro J. Echeverria, Minister of Finance.

"Don Pedro Garcia Conde, Minister of War.

"And it was already known that the departments of Puebla and of Vera Cruz had declared their adhesion to the Provisional Government; and there is no doubt that most of the other departments will also support the Congress.

"Meanwhile Santa Anna is constitutional President of the republic, but unconstitutionally in command of the troops against Paredes. The new Minister of War has ordered him to give up his command. If he refuses, he becomes undoubtedly a rebel and a traitor; because the new Provisional Government in Mexico is constitutionally constituted. If he consents, he ceases to have any troops for his support; he is placed at the mercy of his enemies. His position is now an extremely critical one therefore. Everything depends on whether his troops adhere to him against the Congress and the constitutional Government. If they do, he becomes the military dictator of the country. Reports were current at Vera Cruz that a part of his troops had already proclaimed him Dictator, and that another part had declared against him; but upon this point no information in an authentic form had reached the public ear.

"If any sufficient portion of troops adhere to him, to enable him to continue the war, still he is surrounded with difficulties, being in the very heart of the republic, with Jalisco and its concurrent departments to the Pacific against him on the one hand, and Mexico with its concurrent departments to the Gulf against him on the other hand.

"He may recover himself by some new turn in the wheel of fortune, and resume his place as the constitutional President propietario of the republic; but this is hardly probable, as the public sentiment is almost unanimous against him in nearly all departments.
"It seems more likely that he will have to yield to the storm; and if not deprived of his life, he may escape to the United States by a sudden march on Tampico, or to South America by way of the Pacific."

Later accounts state as follows:

"The Government paper of the 2d of December contains a proclamation signed by Canalizo, Rejon, Barando, and other Ministers of the Government, suspending the session of Congress, and appointing Santa Anna Dictator, with powers to use any means he may think necessary to restore the integrity of the republic, this power to extend as well to foreign as domestic affairs.

A REVOLUTION IN MEXICO"

"We learn from Captain Biscoe, of the bark Eugenia, arrived on Monday, that the principal towns, and indeed all the country, have pronounced against Santa Anna, who, with a small force was at Queretaro.

"The revolution passed off quietly, no blood having been shed. The former revolution being carried on by one party of military against another, resulted in much loss of life; but this movement coming from the people, as well as from the soldiery, makes the thing general, and hence the little commotion of a disagreeable nature. "Santa Anna has but little chance of overcoming this movement, and it was a matter of conjecture whether he would attempt to escape or deliver himself up. He will very probably endeavour to gain over the opposite General by bribery or similar means, but in this it is thought he will not succeed. In case that he is taken prisoner, the people will probably demand his execution, as they deem his liberty dangerous to the public safety.

"The commandments of Chilmahua, Durango, and New Mexico have notified to the Central Government that large bodies of Camanches and other prairie Indians are hovering about the frontier, evidently with hostile intentions. The commandments have been requested by the Indian Chiefs to liberate certain prisoners of their tribes, with which request they had complied.

"Large bodies of troops were quartered at Jalapa, four regiments of the line, a picket of Sappers, and two regiments of horse. Afterwards follows a proclamation of Canalizo and of Rejon, ordering all the constituted authorities to pay the fullest obedience to Santa Anna.

"Also one similar by each of the other Ministers. Santa Anna has accepted his charge without comment.

"Furthermore, the chiefs of various departments, among them General Ulloa, have assembled juntas of their officers, and pronounced in opposition to the scheme of Paredes.

"This took place at Vera Cruz. At Jalisco and the other cities between Mexico and the seaboard, similar scenes appear to have been transacted, and anta Anna appears master of the whole of that portion of the nation. "The department of Oajaca, or at least the leaders, have pronounced in favor of Santa Anna.

"The markets were in a very bad state, with little prospect of improvement.

"There were at the Island of Sacrificios the British frigates Spartan, just arrived from New Orleans, and Inconstant and two French brigs of war, but no United States vessels.

"The Courrier Francais of December 7 has just reached us, containing in a nut-shell the result of the Mexican news.

"Santa Anna was proclaimed Dictator, and all seemed to go on well, but about mid-day the troops barracked in the Accordada St. Francis and the citadel pronounced against Santa Anna and Canalizo. At the head of the movement was General Don Jose J. Herrera, President of the Council, who addressed a proclamation to the city, calling on it to sustain him.

"The whole Congress immediately threw itself into the arms of Herrera, who immediately took possession of the National Palace without bloodshed.
"The Congress constituted its sessions permanent. The ex-Ministers fled. Canalizo is in arrest in his own house.

"The statue of Santa Anna in the peristyle of the theatre was broken, and a wish exhibited to break the bronze one in the market-place, but this was prevented by the authorities. On the next night, General Herrera had it privately removed.

"The new authorities maintained perfect quiet.

"The Chambers are occupied in devising means to remedy the incalculable injury the country has suffered.

THE AMERICAN BOUNDARY QUESTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES

Sir, - It appears by The Times of the 18th inst., that some of the party of Royal Sappers and Miners lately employed upon the survey of the boundary between British America and the United States, as settled by the Ashburton treaty, have arrived in England. It may fairly be inferred from their arrival that the work upon which they were employed approaches to completion. It is satisfactory to know that this causa beli is removed - that a bone of contention is withdrawn from our grasping and not very conciliatory neighbours. Much praise is due to the present Government for their promptitude in bringing to an amicable adjustment this boundary question which helped to perpetuate national jealousies, retarded the progress of civilization and colonial prosperity, and has more than once threatened to disturb the peace of the mother country. The question of ceding or retaining a few square miles of profitless wilderness must appear in the eyes of reasonable men as dust in the balance, when compared with the incalculable advantage of having established in the minds of our transatlantic fellow-subjects confidence in the existence of a desire and power on the part of the mother country to remove the demoralizing system of barbarian violence, mutual reprisals, and the spreading among our colonists of that system of overreaching cunning peculiar to the squatters and sympathizers of the United States. No dispassionate man acquainted with the interests of the two countries can doubt the importance of a good understanding between Great Britain and the United States. No honest man can wish to see that understanding lightly interrupted. The interests of the civilized world, of mankind at large, are indissolubly mixed up with the preservation of peace - firmly-established peace upon equitable, honourable, and high-minded principles - between two such important countries.

Is it premature to offer suggestions upon another subject which may affect our relations with our jealous and unscrupulous neighbours - a question which appears to present considerable difficulty of arrangement - namely, the joint occupancy or the equitable division of the vast Oregon territory?

It may be said, and with some show of reason, that if Oregon were blotted out of the map of the American continent, there would still be ample room and verge enough for emigration from both parent States for centuries to come. Who can doubt this, when we consider the vast unexplored resources of the north on the one hand, and the unoccupied regions of the Missouri on the other? Still, when we see existing in our republican neighbours an ambition more boundless than their unoccupied wilderness, a spirit of unprincipled encroachment almost unexampled in modern times, with but one exception; and when we know that the spirit of the English nation sympathizes in matters affecting the national honour with that of the haughty Percy, who would "give thrice so much land to a deserving friend," but "would cavil at the ninth part of a hairbreadth" at what appeared an unjust assumption of rights, it must scarcely be ascribed to pusillanimity, or distrust in the resources of our country, to assert and maintain her just claims, when we hear sober-minded men express a wish that the cause of our differences with the United States were permanently removed.

There appear two obstacles to the satisfactory settlement of the Oregon question. The first is the unmistakable desire of two branches of the Government, and the vast majority of the people, of the States to possess the whole territory, and to admit of no counter claims: their right to the whole appears to be a foregone conclusion.
However, as the British Minister at present at Washington for the purposes of negotiating upon the subject may possess discretion and abilities equal or superior to a Pottinger, and as there is still an appearance of some reason and sense of justice existing upon the majority of the Senate, it is to be hoped that this difficulty will be surmounted. The second obstacle to the speedy settlement of this important question is the ignorance which confessedly exists upon everything connected with the vast region in question. Our Envoy may possess all the knowledge possible to be attained from the past and existing treaties, but what can he know of the country itself? He may succeed in obtaining an extension of the present treaty, but is not this only staving off the evil day - a day which must sooner or later, come at last? If he found the American Government perfectly willing to fix a definite boundary, has he sufficient knowledge - has any man sufficient knowledge - of the country, even to suggest a feasible direction for that boundary? Empires and states may have their boundaries fixed by nature, but it is necessary that men should know them before they can negotiate upon them. What, for instance, do we know of the actual existing boundary between our colony and the United States from "the Lake of the Woods" to the Rocky Mountains? And from this point in the Rocky Mountains, if any human being knows it, who can tell how our boundary should proceed? If extended due west to the Pacific, we are cut out of the Oregon altogether. The main artery of the country, the Columbia, in that case comes into the possession of our rivals, and we sacrifice the rights of British subjects already in the country. If it is to proceed south by the chain of the Rocky Mountains, surely it should have some defined specified direction. The Rocky Mountains may be said to divide the two countries by nature; so do the Pyrenees divide France and Spain, but the Pic du Midi must be in either France or Spain. If the Rocky Mountains are to divide our territories from those of the States, one part of these mountains must belong to Britain, and another part to the States.

Who possesses the knowledge to decide which part should in justice, expediency, or sound policy belong to each? Further, if our boundary is to proceed south by the Rocky Mountains, from what point in the chain is it to depart in a westerly direction? It must take a westerly direction from some point in these mountains before it comes to the confines of Mexico, otherwise we monopolize the whole disputed territory to ourselves. Who possesses the knowledge where this point of departure should be, and the subsequent directions of the boundary until it reach the Pacific Ocean? No man living. The crude knowledge of the agents of hunting companies, the journals of travellers who estimate distances by days' journeys, and by the pressure of their privations, together with the painted hunting grounds of American novelists, will scarcely supply authentic data for enlightened men to legislate upon; and yet these are the sources from which the inchoate knowledge of our Government is drawn.

Two questions naturally arise from the above considerations - first, should this state of ignorance, where the national interests and honour may be vitally concerned, be allowed to continue? And, secondly, what available means are there of acquiring more precise information upon the subject?

Our country is foremost among the nations of the earth in fitting out expeditions where the interests of science or humanity can be advanced by them, or even where a slight addition to our geographical knowledge can alone be expected to result from them. Large sums of public money, and many valuable lives, have been sacrificed in endeavouring to penetrate the regions of eternal winter within the Arctic and Antarctic circles, and in exploring the deadly swamps and burning sands of Central Africa. I mean not to disparage these laborious and dangerous operations, nor to impugn the motives of those who originate them; but it not fairly be asked, why are not properly qualified men appointed to explore the countries through which our national boundary runs? And above all others, why should we be left in doubt or ignorance of the country for the possession of which, or even a portion of it, we may at no distant day be menaced with open hostilities?

When it is considered that men eminently qualified for this work are now almost upon the spot where their labours would commence, it will be apparent that the present opportunity of acquiring much, if not all, the necessary information, should not be thrown away. If the present means within the reach of the Government are not made use of, equal means will not readily present themselves again, at least without a sacrifice of much time and expense in preparatory training.

It is a well-known fact that Her Majesty has at present in Canada Boundary Commissioners and scientific officers for marking out and fixing by astronomical observations the Ashburton boundary. If this work is drawing to a close, why should not the same persons, who from their experience in these matters, as well as from their previous characters, must be presumed to be most competent persons - why should they not be employed to extend the knowledge of our Government upon those subjects where ignorance may be most mischievous? Colonel Escott, one of the Commissioners, is nearly related to the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs; but it is not to be supposed that Lord Aberdeen, upon whom the responsibility of the appointments devolve, has selected him on this account. Mr. Featherstoneaugh, another commissioner, is well known to the public as a man of high talent and an intelligent American traveller. The officers for conducting the scientific operations having, according to Professor Airy's statement last year in his address to the "visitors," been trained at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, must be presumed to be highly qualified for their important duties; the Astronomer Royal would not risk his high reputation by sanctioning an improper appointment, when the training was, as he says, in his own hands.

Where could such means be found for removing official and public ignorance on the momentous pending question of determining the international boundaries? Where can such means be collected again, if the whole of the party on the boundary works are permitted to return to England without investigating and ascertaining on the ground, what should be, if not of determining what shall be, our share of the Oregon territories? Better know what we should claim, and then claim it as it becomes our country, than procrastinate until the invaded rights of our fellow-subjects imperatively demand the presence of a British fleet in the North Pacific.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
Jan. 21
W.C.

"annexing," or appropriating, the Texan territory into the American union are now before the House of Representatives. The absolute and plenary "cession" of the territories of Texas to the United States, to be effected by the (of course) purely voluntary act of Texas herself, and, in consideration thereof, the gracious extension to the new republic of the membership and privileges of the Union, - this is one scheme of proceedings - that of Mr. INGERSOLE. Another proposal is simply to "declare" Texas annexed; another to furnish up an old treaty with France, made during the war in 1803, whereby a part only of the present Texan territory was ceded by France to the United States; and upon this title is now proposed to be "extended" to the whole. A fourth is for splitting the difference about slavery, by making half the new State slave-holding and half free, and for disregarding altogether the consent of Mexico; while others again have different nostrums for both of these difficulties; and one illustrious statesman, to crown the whole, "threatens to propose a "bill to satisfy all parties, factions, or sections, who are willing to allow of 'admission.' "All these various proposals proceed upon the comfortable assumption that the prey is secure. Texas is considered to be already "caught," and the question is, how to cut it up.

Nor is the squabbling about Texas either one degree more or one degree less imposing or edifying than the cool quietness which hangs over despatching of the Oregon affair. Resolutions in favour of the immediate "occupation" of the Oregon territory have long since passed both Houses. There was no difference of opinion here. Slavery, Mexico, or the necessity of throwing the seizure into some form of international law, interposed no difficulties here. A bill was introduced, on the resolutions, and is now pending, in the Senate of the United States, for appropriating and occupying the whole line of sea coast on the Pacific, from between the 54th and 55th degrees of north latitude (more than 300 miles north of the most northerly settled part of Canada) downward, and as far inland as the Rocky Mountains.

This valuable acquisition (supposing it is acquired) is to be connected with the Missouri River by a line of stockade forts, "not exceeding 5 in number." And various enactments are further in contemplation for encouraging settlers, and consolidating them when settled. This quiet proposal is now before the Senate.

It is probable that the wiser and more practised portion of American statesmen of all parties, and especially those of them who have the practical management of public affairs, and are conversant with the popular modes of thinking, speaking of, and transacting business, know what all this means, and what it really amounts to, better than we do. Public men in America probably know better how to give their countrymen rope, and how to rely on the usual and ultimate, though not at first apparent, result of such a proceeding, than we do on this side of the water. Debates in the Senate, and quarrels about the mode and manner of any given project, are useful in more ways than one; and in American politics it is premature to jump to a conclusion until all these hitches are settled. It is not to be denied, however, that brother JONATHAN has already, to his own perfect satisfaction, "cast up his accounts" for Texas and the Oregon; however it may be certain that "he has been reckoning without his host." There are as our friends in the United States will probably learn before very long, if they have not learnt it already. Mere unprincipled, profligate, self-aggrandizement is all that the United States have to allege in support of the monstrous breach of all natural justice and positive treaty which would be involved in either of the measures in which they seem so deeply engaged. In neither one nor the other could the States reasonably expect this country to acquiesce; and the annexation of Texas would involve a disturbance of the settled relations of the American continent, in which all the chief European Powers would be more or less interested; yet there seems to be no pause on the part of the States in a headlong adoption of them; and though it would be premature until the measures have passed the Legislature to speculate on them as accomplished, yet they certainly appear to have been already pushed to a point that demands the most serious attention to them.

THE REVOLUTION IN MEXICO.

We find in the New Orleans papers of the 29th and 30th of December very full of particulars of recent intelligence from Mexico, brought by the schooner Ventura, which sailed from Vera Cruz on the 13th day of December, and reached New Orleans on the 28th. The news is but one day later than that brought by Mr. Cushing; but as more copious details of the recent important events which have transpired in Mexico are given than were included in his statement, we present a full and careful abstract, made up from the various New Orleans papers, chiefly the Bee and Picayune:

In the city of Mexico it seems that on the 1st of December a manifesto was issued, protesting against the orders issued by Santa Anna, and denouncing the Government for not having deposed him. This was signed by 55 deputies on the 1st, by 10 others on the 2d, and all the senators except 4. On the 3d Santa Anna's General Canalizo, issued a decree dissolving Congress, Santa Anna being at the head of 8,000 men on his march against the rebels in Jalisco. The decree created intense excitement in Mexico.

Congress made three protests and an address to the people, but before they could be printed General Canalizo closed all the printing offices except Santa Anna's official paper, and forbade all publications. These arbitrary measures increased the excitement, and crowds of the people assembled in the public places. Canalizo shut himself up in the Palace with some 2,000 troops. Baranda, Rejon, and Salas took refuge with him.

In the meantime both the Liberals and clergy in the Capitol united in the revolutionary movement, and began to make preparations against the common enemy. Congress, as well as the Ayuntamiento, succeeded, in spite of Canalizo's decree, in having secret circulars printed, which were actively disseminated among all classes. The Government troops about the Palace, seeing symptoms of the coming storm, began to waver.

During the 4th and 5th the excitement continued, and on the 6th multitudes of the people, armed, assembled at the Convent of San Francisco. Here the members of Congress were assembled, and among them Generals Herrera, Garcia, Conde, and Cespedes. The whole body marched from the convent to the square in front of the Palace, which is near the centre of the city, and summoned Canalizo to surrender, giving him two hours to reflect. Canalizo prepared to attack the citizens, when one of his officers, exclaiming that he was the soldier of no tyrant, but of the people, shouted "Long live the Congress !" The cry was taken up by nearly all the troops, and Canalizo fled in terror to his apartments.

Before leaving the convent General Herrera had prepared a letter, which he now sent to Canalizo, requesting him, in order to spare the effusion of blood, to recognize the government of the Constitution and of Congress, and to allow it to exercise its full powers.

To this Canalizo returned in quick succession the following answers: -"Excelentissimo Senor, - In order to avoid any unfortunate scenes or events in this capital, I am ready immediately to deliver up the command, and to evacuate this place at once, if guarantees are conceded to me.

"God and Liberty !
"National Palace of Mexico, Dec. 6, 1844,
"Half-past 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

"VALENTIN CANALIZO.

"To his Excellency General of Division Don J. Joaquin de Herrera."

In half an hour afterwards, General Canalizo sent another despatch as follows:
"Excelentissimo Senor, - The guarantees of which I spoke in my last despatch, which I have just sent, are, that passports to leave the republic shall be given to myself, to the four Ministers, and to the Commandant-General.

"God and Liberty.
"National Palace of Mexico, Dec. 6, 1844,
3 o'clock in the afternoon.

"VALENTIN CANALIZO.

"To the Senor General of Division Don J. Joaquin de Herrera."

After receiving these notes General Herrera, with his troops, forced their way into the Palace, seized Canalizo, and detained him, with Salas, prisoner in the Palace, the Ministers of War and the Home Department being released on giving security, and Rejon and Baranda making their escape.
General Herrera then issued the following important proclamation:

"JOSE JOAQUIN DE HERRERA, PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL OF GOVERNMENT, TO THE INHABITANTS OF THE CAPITAL.

"Mexicans! - A blind and audacious Government had violated the laws, believing that society was wholly dependent upon its decrees. But I, having been invoked by all classes and by the principal commanders and chiefs of the garrison, have re-established constitutional order, and am proud of having spared to Mexico and her vast population the anarchy and dissensions arising out of merely isolated efforts. I therefore invite every patriot to rally around the legitimate Government which I represent through the constitution; and the national Congress, which has assembled within a few hours, will accomplish everything which the safety of the country requires from it. Thus will this momentous event be rendered worthy of national pride - a hope which is sincerely shared by your fellow-citizen,

"JOSE J. DE HERRERA.
"Mexico, Dec. 6, 1844."

On the 7th of December, the day following this proclamation, a new Government was organized. General Herrera was constituted Provisional President of the Republic. His Cabinet is composed as follows: - Don Pedro Echeverria, Minister of Internal Affairs; Don Luis G. Cuevas, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Don Cariano Rivapalacio, Minister of Justice and Public Instruction; General Pedro Garcia Conde, Minister of War and Marine.

The city of Mexico was immediately filled with the most tumultuous rejoicings.
Messages of congratulation were exchanged between the two Houses of Congress, and the new President was waited upon by thousands of his fellow-citizens. The demonstrations of the mob were still more energetic and emphatic. Portraits of Santa Anna in the public places were torn down and dragged through the streets, and torn into fragments, and every one preserved a piece as a memento of their oppressor's downfall. The statue of Santa Anna in the plaza was tumbled down, broken in pieces, and the head borne in triumph through the city. It is also stated that the crowd, intoxicated with joy and frantic with vengeance, afterwards proceeded to the monument where the embalmed leg of their Dictator had been buried with so much pomp a year or two since, broke it into atoms, and then kicked and dragged the embalmed limb through the plazas and principal thoroughfares of the city.

Thus was achieved without bloodshed in the capital city the overthrow of Santa Anna.
But the movement was by no means confined to the capital. Indeed, not a single department has been heard from which holds out for the Dictator.

In Vera Cruz, always considered his stronghold, the movement was begun a few miles from the city of Colonel Senobio, who, with a few hundred followers, declared in favour of Congress. Soon after, Don Benito Quijano, Governor of Vera Cruz, pronounced against Santa Anna, and in favour of the Congress, and immediately all was excitement and rejoicing. The populace first tore the portrait of the Dictator into tatters, and then burned it in the public square; after which they proceeded in crowds toward the houses of several citizens who were obnoxious from their known friendship for Santa Anna, thirsting for vengeance, and threatening to take their lives. Owing to the efforts of the Commandant-General their lives were spared, he promising the populace that all those who had made themselves inimical to the best interests of the people should be banished from the city. On the following day order was completely restored, the citizens in the meantime forming themselves into military bodies to resist any attempts that might be made by Santa Anna and his friends. On the evening of the 12th of December the tragedy of Brutus: Or, Rome Made Free, was performed at the theatre in honour of the revolutionists.

At Puebla the rising was unanimous. The statue of Santa Anna was tumbled from its pedestal, and his portrait torn into shreds. At Jalapa a few persons were killed, - and this is the only blood shed during the entire revolution, so far as appears.

Santa Anna himself was at Queretaro, where he had about 2,500 men, and even upon these it is most likely he can place but little reliance. His chance of escape seems but small. It is said that Congress has outlawed him unless he surrenders at once. It is further stated, that the new Government offers him no terms short of his paying up the $12,000,000 of the public money he is charged with having uselessly squandered or appropriated to his own private purposes. This condition it can scarcely be possible to execute, and in default of complying with it he is threatened with death. Should he succeed in escaping from the country, it is rumoured that he will proceed to Cuba, where, with his princely revenues, he can still live in his accustomed splendour. His private fortune is estimated at some $4,000,000.

There is no reason to suppose that this event, great and important to Mexico itself as it undoubtedly is, will in any respect change the relations between that Government and foreign Powers, and least of all that it will tend in the remotest degree to promote the peaceful annexation of Texas to the United States. Even Santa Anna, obnoxious as he was, was fully sustained by the popular sentiment in the ground he took with reference to this question. And now that the internal dissensions of Mexico have been quieted by the complete and perfect success of the revolution, we have only to apprehend still more energetic and decided measures with reference to Texas. Mexico, both Government and people, regards Texas as still a revolted province. The domestic difficulties which have just seen their crisis, have greatly embarrassed her attempts at its subjugation. Those are now removed, and the whole power of the nation will undoubtedly be turned to the accomplishment of this object. A nation is never more powerful than immediately after a victory of the popular will. That annexation will still be regarded as a declaration of war on the part of the United States seems absolutely certain, whereas the Government of Mexico is much more able to prosecute such a war with effect than before.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT) SOUTHHAMPTON, Feb. 10

As the present state of Mexico must, no doubt, be a subject full of interest to many of your readers, I would beg, in connexion with it, to communicate to you such general information as I have been able to glean during a recent visit to that country.

To refer to the causes which have given origin to the important events lately enacted there, would only be to enumerate a series of grievances and oppressions perpetrated upon a people too weak and too debased to resist with either energy or effect. The government of Santa Anna, it would appear, has been characterized throughout by a system of fraud, favouritism, and self-aggrandizement; unjust sentences and cruel punishments have been inflicted upon unoffending parties; and the welfare and prosperity of the nation have been made subservient to the gratification of sordid and avaricious motives. This state of things could not fail in disseminating dissatisfaction and discontent; and it required but the slightest spark to kindle the flame of insurrection throughout the country.

An ostensible cause for resistance was soon presented in the refusal of the President to render, for the examination and satisfaction of Congress, an account of the acts and proceedings of his past government - thus trampling under foot the principles upon which the constitution of the country had been established. The first place to proclaim against this assumption of absolute authority was Guadalajara, where, on the 1st of November, a spirited manifesto was issued at the instigation of General D. Mariano Paredes. This example was soon followed by other departments, so that the President found himself compelled to proceed with an army of about 9,000 men for the subjugation of the increasing insurgents.
No long period, however, had elapsed on his leaving the capital ere the smothered symptoms of dissatisfaction began more clearly to manifest themselves, and his fatal decree of the 29th of November, by which he dissolved the National Congress, sounded the tocsin for a general appeal to arms. The Congress reassembled, with Don Jose Joaquin Herrera as their President, published spirited proclamations, and adopted such general measures as were best calculated to resist his return. The city of Mexico was put into an immediate state of defence, the National Guard called out, and General Nicolas Bravo elected Commander-in-Chief. These resolute proceedings did not fail to receive the approbation of the nation, and day after day brought forth to the Congress the most friendly assurances of fealty and support.

Zacatecas and Oajaca pronounced against Santa Anna on the 11th of December, and the announcement from both of these places was couched in the most firm and heart-stirring language. Puebla, Vera Cruz, Perote, and, finally, the department of Santa Anna de Tamaulipas, which had hitherto remained steadfast to the President, have followed in the train of public opinion, as has done every place of note within the limits of the country.

During our sojourn at Vera Cruz the Mexican steamer of war Montezuma, with Commodore Don Francisco de P. Lopez on board, arrived from Havannah, and the officers and crew took the oath of allegiance to the Congress and constitution. The Guadalupe (sister ship), which arrived on the 26th of December from New York, entered into similar protestations.

At the same time that these active preparations are making for the overthrow of Santa Anna, the periodicals teem with articles in which his life, character, and actions are subjected to severe animadversions, and the most enthusiastic appeals are made to the youth of Mexico to stimulate them to a firm defence of their natural rights.

Under such circumstances it soon became evident to Santa Anna that, so far from being able to stem the current of insurrection, it was incumbent upon him to make provisions for his own safety. He, therefore, retracted his steps towards Mexico, and without attempting any attack upon that city, proceeded as far as Guadaloupe, thus securing for himself a communication with the coast in case of ultimate failure. From this place he conveyed to the Congress a proposal to come to terms, but received for answer that nothing short of his offering himself up for trial would satisfy the nation; and in the event of his suitting to this ordeal, they guaranteed to him his personal safety until the verdict of the trial should be formally pronounced. To these terms, however, he has not thought it advisable to accede, and is accordingly adopting every means within his power to secure to his case the attachment of soldiery.

For some time it was thought that he would attack the city of Mexico, but by the last accounts, brought down to Vera Cruz on the evening of the 1st of January by the bearer of the dispatches of the British Minister, it appeared he had advanced within a short distance of Puebla, with the apparent intention of proceeding to Vera Cruz. At some distance in his rear he was followed by General Paredes with an army of considerable strength, whose tactics, however, did not appear to be to bring him to a general engagement, but rather, by inducing desertion amongst his troops, to so reduce his number as to compel him to suit without discretion. Whether this stratagem will be attended with success, is as yet a matter of doubt, for the army of Santa Anna remains undiminished in numbers.

From this previous precaution of Santa Anna it is not likely that any resistance to his progress towards Vera Cruz can be offered by any of the intermediate places; for a correspondent from Puebla writes, Dec. 25 -

"We have had a formal pronunciation here; but judge of our capacity to stand a siege, when I inform you that we had not powder sufficient to fire a salute to the occasion." Not so, however, with Vera Cruz; here all is bustle and preparation; arms and ammunition have been distributed to the inhabitants, the walls have been repaired where deficient, and guns mounted at every embrasure; and should the garrison and inhabitants only remain firm to their trust, they are capable of making a lengthened resistance.

During this state of things the highway robbers, so numerous in Mexico, have been most daring in their depredations, and scarcely a traveller has escaped being divested of every valuable appurtenance.

A large quantity of specie was expected to be ready for shipment by the next packet, but under existing circumstances there is no prospect of a conducta for a
At noon of the 2d ult the general mail from Mexico had not arrived at Vera Cruz, and the appointed time of sailing having elapsed, the Dee was obliged to proceed on her voyage. It was conjectured that the mails might have been intercepted by Santa Anna, but the general impression was, that the detention arose from the difficulty of obtaining relays of horses, in consequence of his having secured every available animal for the use of his cavalry.

Such is a brief sketch of the present position of affairs in Mexico, in reviewing which it cannot but be hoped by every lover of patriotism that the inhabitants of this ill-fated country will strenuously rally together, and, uniting firmly in the common cause of country and home, expel from their shores this tyrant demagogue; for he is universally denounced as having set at defiance all law, all precedent, all right.

The Dee, by which I have returned to England, left Vera Cruz at noon on the 2d of January, and arrived at Havannah on the 7th. Here trade is rather stagnant at present, the tobacco and coffee crop, but particularly the former, having been very much injured by the hurricane of October, aided by the irregular nature of the dry and wet season. Several murders of a very revolting character have been committed of late, and two soldiers were shot during our stay there for the same crime.

We left Havannah at noon on the 10th ult, having met the Tay from Jamaica, left Nassau on the 12th, and arrived at Bermuda on the 17th, where we met the Trent with the mails and passengers from the Windward Islands.

The Dee then proceeded on her voyage to England at noon on the 21st.

On the evening of the 22d the wind began to freshen from the north west, and increased to a severe gale, which continued unabated for three days. During this period our larboard paddle-wheel became much injured, so as to cause some anxiety, but from the severity of the weather nothing could be attempted with it until it moderated, when it was found necessary to disconnect it altogether, and proceed on our voyage with the remaining wheel. The first impression was to make for some of the Western Isles where we might in security repair our damage, but the captain thought it advisable to proceed for England, hoping for the chance of good weather to arrange the wheel at sea. In this expectation he was happily not disappointed, as the weather, after a little time, abated, and continued very fine for about eight days, thus being enabled to complete the repairs by noon of the 6th of February. We had then run for 12 days by the aid of a single paddle-wheel. [GLP] pleasure that we turn to certain documents which have reached us, emanating from a higher source than the clamour of the populace, and conceived in a far higher tone of policy and justice. The people of New England have offered a constant opposition to the project for annexing Texas, for many very obvious reasons. The aggressive and adventurous spirit of that measure is at variance with the austere principles of their original constitutions; the preponderance of the South is already felt in the councils of the Union; and the acquisition of Texas would raise that preponderance into ascendancy, and secure the perpetuity of slavery and all its attendant evils.
These opinions have been very forcibly expressed in the report of a Convention held for the purpose at Faneuil-hall, in the State of Massachusetts. This assembly deliberately resolved, that the scheme of annexing Texas to the United States is a plain violation of the Constitution, and as calculated and designed by the open declarations of its friends to uphold the interests of slavery, extend its influence, and secure its permanent duration; and they protested, that "Texas rebelling against the laws of slavery - Texas wrested from Mexico by citizens of the United States - Texas the support and defence of American slavery, can never be joined to this Union but in "bonds of mutual infamy."

One of the most important parts of the argument of the decided opponents of annexation, in addition to the consideration derived from its inexpediency and immorality, consists in the acknowledged absence of any positive constitutional power to extend the territories of the United States. The resolutions of the House of Representatives for annexing Texas have brought this point directly before the Senate; and a very elaborate report has been drawn up by a committee of that body in support of a decision "that the "joint resolution from the House of Representatives for the annexation of Texas to the United States to be "rejected." The principal ground of this recommendation is the total absence of any power in Congress to proceed to such an exercise of authority. All the powers of Congress are named and defined by the Constitution, and there is no maxim of American public law better established than that Congress possesses no powers not so named. But amongst these powers there is none for extending the territories of the Union, and the partisans of annexation, by act of Congress, have been compelled to resort to every species of distortion and subterfuge to screen the gross unconstitutionality of their proceedings. The annexation party rely, in answer to this, on the fact that the territories of the Union have actually been extended on two several occasions by the purchase Louisiana and of Florida, which was concluded by virtue of the treaty-making power of the Executive Government. But in spite of the manifest importance and unimpeachable motives and equity of the transaction which transferred the mouths of the Mississippi from France to the United States, Mr. JEFFERSON, who concluded it, spoke of the Louisiana treaty in the following terms: -

'This treaty,' said he, referring to the then recent fact of the acquisition, 'must of course be laid before both houses (Congress), because both have important functions to exercise respecting it. They, I presume, will see their duty to their country in ratifying and paying for it, so as to secure a good which would otherwise probably never be again in their power. But I suppose they must then appeal to the nation for an additional article to the Constitution, approving and confirming an act which the nation had not previously authorized. The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive, in seizing the fugitive occurrence which so much advances the good of their country, has done an act beyond the Constitution.'

Subsequent reference is made to an act of indemnity; and, in another place, an amendment to the Constitution is suggested to make provision for the case of Louisiana, and for that of the introduction of Florida, in the contemplation of this last acquisition."

This is the doctrine still professed to its full extent by the anti-annexation party in New England. They deny that any power of extending the Union exists either in Congress, or in the Executive Government, composed of the PRESIDENT and two-thirds of the Senate; for they contend that such an act, for which no provision was made by the Constitution, changes the relative position of all the States belonging to the Union, and subverts the original compact of the existing confederation.

The Committee of the Senate of the United States do not go to this length, nor do they assent to the self-accusing principles of Mr. JEFFERSON. They hold that no such power as is claimed by these resolutions can be said to exist in Congress; but they are of opinion that the treaty-making power, supported as it must be by two-thirds of the votes of the Senate, equally represented in the Senate, does extend to this or any other territorial acquisition, to which the power renouncing or surrendering the territory is a consenting party. The following passage from Mr. ARCHER's report is highly creditable to the committee from which it emanates: -
The mere aspect, then, it may be permitted to observe, of the resolution in question, is of a character to startle and awaken doubt of its propriety and policy! A joint resolution of the two houses of Congress! To what end? To make appropriation of a neighboring foreign political state. Under what circumstances? On any request, or intimation in any form, on the part of the state appropriated of desire to be annexed? If any such have been made, any desire revealed in the only way in which Governments are permitted to know the purposes of other Governments, none have been disclosed through the sole channel which Parliamentary bodies are permitted to recognize as authority for their official action.

The proposition assumed as the basis of the most solemn form of public action is, that a neighboring state has ambition to become extinguished. Supposing the inference just, in the present instance, that Texas, solicitous for the incorporation which is to annul her separate political existence, will show no sensibility to the disregard so remarkable of the courtesy or forms of official respect - even in this supposition, is no tribute of deference due to the reputation of our own Government? Have we no terms to keep, no observances to respect, as regards to the appearance we have to present to other nations, and their opinion of our proceedings? Is acquisition all, reputation nothing, in the conduct of gravest affairs? We are in the practice daily of arraigning the habit, fast obtaining fixed root in the usages of nations (so prompt to become their law), of domiciliary intrusion of strong powers in the concerns of weak powers. Where are the people or government to be found who have been louder in arraignment of the prevalence of this practice than ourselves? Is no precaution due to the influence which our proceeding in the mode proposed to us may exert, in laying a foundation for authority to plead our own example against us, to stifle the accents of remonstrance which we may have occasion but too often to raise? What reply will we have to employ or distinction to make in our own favor? Will ours have been, on the contrary, accompanied by room for such a distinction?

As far as the affairs will stand out to the world, who are to know of no mitigating circumstances withheld from view, if there had been such, our act has been - dispensing with consultation even, not to speak of waiting for application - to assume an authority to annex our neighbor to us, dictate the conditions, and prescribe a time for their unqualified execution. Suppose the case of dissensions in a neighboring feeble state, let it be Texas, the state of a prey to this last of afflictions, what would be the imputation in that case on the strong neighbor, supposing him not to instigate, yet availing himself of the debauching violence of such distractions to spoil the country? How easily do such examples run into the worst extreme, and how important it is, therefore, that no countenance be given to public acts which may tend in any degree to their introduction.

The fact is but too notorious of the general prevalence at this moment of the lust of territorial aggrandizement among nations. The disease spreads everywhere. No island so retired, no people so inoffensive, as not to be threatened with the visitation. Is not ours the duty, whilst we exclaim, not to give colour to accusation against ourselves of the character of that we are so loud to charge? These remarks are deemed not inappropriate to the subject, in a view of the fact that Texas has given no intimation in any known form - certainly in no form which, according to the usages of nations, can give authority for a proceeding so anomalous as that of our Government, not proposing terms of incorporation, but assuming to set on foot the work of incorporation. Not the charge of irregular proceeding only, but of uncompromising pursuit of objects of aggrandizement, will be incited against the reputation of the country, and with no occasion for incurring them, as the opportunities are so obvious of proceeding in concert, if annexation be the real desire of the people in two countries."

In combating this measure no language has ever been employed in Europe more severe, with reference to the object of annexation and the means of effecting it, than that of this report of the highest authority in the Union.

Whatever the result of the vote in the Senate, it cannot overturn the principle which has been so ably laid down by its own Committee: -

Nothing, then, can be more clear than that a foreign State, in its character of political organization as a state - if an engagement, terms, conditions, be requisite to the admission - can find no lawful passage of admission through the power of Congress; that the jurisdiction on the subject, as far as there is any jurisdiction, is an undoubted appurtenance of the treaty-making power, vested in the President and two-thirds of the Senate; that the only mode of effectuation of the admission of Texas lawfully, supposing this to be an event desirable and desired, is by the resolution of the present State of Texas into its component elements of population and territory, which may in those forms pass through the ordeal sieve of the treaty-making power in the President and Senate."

This treaty-making power requires the assent of Texas in the first place, and in the second of the American President and two-thirds of the Senate; to attempt to carry such a measure by bare majorities in the two Houses of Congress, such as are sufficient to sanction the ordinary legislation of the country, is to violate one of the most important principles of the Constitution, and in the true spirit of revolutionary violence to create a power for the sake of gratifying a passion. We still hope that so powerful a protest against so flagrant an evil will not have been made in vain, and that it will put a stop for the present to the easy achievement of legislative majorities who may want to add to their power, or signalize their lust "of power, or illustrate the fleeting fortune of a passing Administration by a trophy of distinction" [GLP]

SANTA ANNA

The ex-president will take his trial before the Mexican House of Congress on six distinct charges - First, that he was guilty of high-treason in attempting to subvert the Constitution and elevate himself as Emperor of Mexico; secondly, in executing powers not constitutionally delegated; thirdly, in malfeasance in office, in applying the funds of the Government to his own use, and sending out of the country, on his own individual authority, several millions of the public money appropriated by Congress for national objects; fourthly, violating the principles of war at Puebla, opening his batteries upon the city, and cruelly butchering the inhabitants while a cessation of hostilities had been granted to him under the sacred guarantee of a flag of truce; fifthly, rifling the national mint, pilfering cities, and appropriating to his own purposes public and private property; and sixthly, disobedience to orders in refusing to give up his command when ordered by Government. In answer to these, Santa Anna contends, that his powers under the Bases, a temporary constitution which ushered in the establishment of the present governmental system, were unlimited and absolute; that he is and was the constitutional president; and that the present Government is unconstitutionally organized, and its officers mere usurpers. LT March 27, 1845, 4a

LONDON, THURSDAY, MARCH 27, 1845

The consent of Congress to the annexation of Texas is an event so long expected, that the question of its justice has gradually merged in the vision of its certainty. There was a time when the most enlightened and thoughtful men of the Union could venture to entertain a strong moral objection against it; and their arguments are on record. It was clear, however, that the mass of the Union, its newest and most active elements, were in favour of the measure. Their eyes were always reverting to Texas. Texas unappropriated, like independent Megara within sight of Athens, was the eyesore of the Union; not but that there are other eyesores to the ambitious gaze of that people. Whatever they see they love, whatever they love they covet, whatever they covet they expect and endeavour to obtain. But Texas was the first thing in their way, and formed the bold foreground of their hopes. Texas adjacent, revolted, independent, still menaced and molested by the weak and impolitic rulers whose yoke it had broken, already peopled and governed by the citizens of the Union, or adventurers of the same language and principles, was an acquisition absolutely necessary, so much to the happiness, as to the very comfort, the ease, the sleep, the digestion, of certainly more than half the republic.

The only part of the business, therefore, on which there could be any surprise, would be the particular time and manner which republican wisdom and taste would select for the acquisition. To an European understanding there is something quite grotesque in the time and manner actually adopted. The Congress comes to this momentous decision in the very point of time between the two presidencies. Mr. TYLER completes his career with a determination which he cannot have the smallest share in carrying out, and Mr. POLK will be engaged throughout his whole term in the arduous execution of a project imposed upon him at the first moment of his official existence.
The former PRESIDENT, as he approaches his end, seems horror-struck at the thought of leaving his four years a blank in his country's annals. He must do something before he dies, though he leaves a legacy of trouble to his successor. Yet why defer it to such an hour? Was it as CONSTANTINE put off his baptism to his death-bed, that he might enjoy the unimpaired benefit, without the arduous responsibility consequent to the rite? Mr. TYLER, a President rather by misadventure than by popular intention, and not reciprocating to his office the dignity it conferred on him, procures admission to the line of American heroes by an act which will entail upon him neither trouble nor risk. Should it even plunge the nation in war, should it rend the Union, should it finally upset that fearful equilibrium of forces by which the federation is now maintained against so great a diversity of separate interests, Mr.
TYLER is clear of all that responsibility. It attaches to those to whom the constitution commits his newborn measure.

The fit of action seems to have seized the whole expiring body. First, the President, as soon as he finds he must needs quit the scene, urges the deed. Then the House of Representatives, about to dissolve, eagerly embraces its last opportunity, and, like the silk-worm, having laid its eggs, immediately dies. The Senate has just time to pronounce. This it does on the 27th of February, and on the 1st of March a new President addresses the whole population on the proceedings of the late Congress.
The interval could be but a few hours, but there was time enough, it seems, for the late PRESIDENT to use the powers given to him by the amended resolution of the Congress, for the liberty of negotiation. Already had he sent off envoys and instructions to Texas. Such is the avidity for grasping a personal share in public actions, which a democracy has always been found to generate. The citizen enjoys no repose in his patriotism. He does not rejoice that great things are done, but that he has a share in them. Such, too, is the invariable result of brief terms of office, of great powers given to the unfettered nominees of popular assemblages, and of governments that undergo frequent and abrupt transmutations. Every politician, i.e., every member of the nation, is devoured with the futile ambition of leaving his own image on the acts of the State.

The new PRESIDENT, however, is far from quarreling with his hereditary task. His only complaint probably is, that he was not allowed to initiate as well as to carry on.
One could almost fear from the tone of his address that he is minded to make up for this wrong by starting a project or two of his own. The tone of a President must needs be lofty. He must assume a dignity which is not conceded, and he would only be misunderstood and despised by his fellow-citizens if he adopted the conventional courtesies and humilities of European Potentates. His office is the most honourable in the earth; his responsibility is the greatest. To disturb the unanimity of the Federal Union, even for an imagined object of morality, is the most stupendous crime of which human nature can be guilty. To extend that union, indefinitely, in all directions is the citizen's first and noblest instinct; to be comprehended in it, the greatest felicity that can happen to any race of men. It is the only security for peace.
All this may mean much or little, but in the old world it is the language of men who are not conducting, but founding an empire.

We in the old world have long since chastised one another's desires to at least the language of modesty and mutual deference. The PRESIDENT is not overawed by the presence of one sovereign power in the length and breadth of his continent. Hence he feels no indecency in expressing, in glorifying every aggressive impulse of the heart. The citizen, he says, must rejoice when a frontier line is removed, when he can communicate freely, commercially and politically, with his neighbours, without the restrictions of trade, or the interference of foreign claims, and foreign politics and morals. When such rejoicings are arguments, then we may reasonably fear for the invidious frontier lines of the St. Lawrence, not to speak of that other on the westward of the Rocky Mountains. But other difficulties will arise before that day.
Neither democracy nor federation can solve the great problem of society.
Government is not so easy a task. The creature of a mob election, addressing his creators, may talk in the same breath of clustering all nations in a constitutional unity, and interdicting moral and religious interference between the inhabitants of adjacent valleys; but human nature has assigned less to system, and more to spiritual influences. She will soon detect the hollowness of union without unity, and of a political combination that aims to embrace the world, while it is afraid to interfere with the grossest social corruptions of its own bosom. [GLP]
The packet-ship Indiana, Captain Bennett, which left New York on the 1st instant, arrived in the Mersey shortly before midnight on Tuesday.

On the 27th ultimo the Senate, by a vote of 27 to 25, passed the joint resolutions from the House of Representatives for the annexation of Texas, having first, however, appended to them, by a similar vote, the provisions of Mr. Benton's bill. We annex the bill as adopted:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that Congress doth consent that the territory properly included within, and rightfully belonging to the republic of Texas, may be erected into a new state, to be called the State of Texas, with a republican form of government, to be adopted by the people of said republic, by deputies in convention assembled, with the consent of the existing Government, in order that the same may be admitted as one of the States of this Union.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved That the foregoing consent of Congress is given upon the following conditions, and with the following guarantees, to wit:

1. Said State to be formed subject to the adjustment by this Government of all questions of boundary that may arise with other Governments, and the constitution thereof, with the proper evidence of its adoption by the people of said Republic of Texas, shall be transmitted to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress for its final action, on or before the 1st day of January, 1846.

2. Said State, when admitted into the Union, after ceding to the United States all mines, minerals, salt lakes, and springs, and also all public edifices, fortifications, barracks, ports and harbours, navy and navy yards, docks, magazines, arms, armaments, and all other property and means pertaining to the public defence, belonging to said republic of Texas, shall retain all the public funds, debts, taxes, and dues of every kind which may belong to, or be due and owing, said republic, and shall also retain all the vacant and unappropriated lands lying within its limits, to be applied to the payments of the debts and liabilities of said republic of Texas; and the residue of said debts and liabilities, to be disposed of as said State may direct; but in no event are said debts and liabilities to become a charge upon the Government of the United States.

3. New States, of convenient size, and having sufficient population, may hereafter, by the consent of said State, be formed out of the territory thereof, which shall be entitled to admission under the provisions of the federal constitution. And such States as may be formed out of that portion of the said territory lying south of 36 deg. 20 minutes north latitude, commonly known as the Missouri compromise line, shall be admitted to the Union, with or without slavery, as the people of each State asking admission may desire.

The following are the provisions of Mr. Benton's Bill, appended on the motion of Mr. Walker:

And be it further resolved, That if the President of the United States shall, in his judgment and discretion, deem it most advisable, instead of proceeding to suit the foregoing resolution to the Republic of Texas as an overture on the part of the United States for admission to negotiate with that Republic; then

"Be it resolved, That a State, to be formed out of the present Republic of Texas, with suitable extent and boundaries, and with two Representatives in Congress, until the next apportionment of representation, shall be admitted into the Union, by virtue of this act, on an equal footing with the existing States, as soon as the terms and conditions of such admission, and the cession of the remaining Texan territory to the United States, shall be agreed upon by the Governments of Texas and the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sum of 100,000 dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to defray the expenses of missions and negotiations, to agree upon the terms of said admission and cession, either by treaty to be suitted to the Senate, or by articles to be suitted to the two Houses of Congress, as the President may direct." From the above it is apparent that if President Polk deems it best to negotiate, then Mr. Benton's bill will have force and validity; but if otherwise, that the resolutions from the House of Representatives will stand unamended.

A narrative of the proceedings on the 27th ult. may perhaps be interesting. The general discussion closed in the morning of that day. On re-assembling, when the whole city seemed to have congregated about the Capitol, a deep anxiety pervading the mass of spectators, Mr. Walker's important amendment having been read, Mr. Foster, of Tennessee, offered an amendment, providing that, in fixing the terms and conditions of admission, it shall be expressly stipulated and declared, that in the part of Texas lying south of the Missouri compromise line, slavery may be permitted or not, according to the wishes of the people of that part of Texas; and that the public debt of Texas should be no charge upon the United States. The first branch of the amendment was lost - ayes, 18; nays, 33. The second was also lost - ayes, 20; nays, 31. The next question in order was the adoption of the amendment which Mr. Archer moved to amend by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting a resolution requesting the President to authorize negotiations to be opened for the acquisition of Texas by treaty, with the assent of the people thereof, which amendment was lost by a tie vote, 26 members voting on either side. Among those who voted against the amendment were Messrs. Henderson and Merrick, quasi Whigs, and Bagby, of the Democratic party, who, on the previous night, had solemnly called God to witness that he believed Congress had no constitutional power to admit a foreign State into the Union, nor to acquire foreign territory, but that the territory must be first acquired through the treaty making power, and then Congress could act upon the subject. The chair then announced the question to be on the adoption of the amendment. Messrs. Crittenden, Berrien, Archer, Morehead, and Woodbridge made most impressive appeals to the gentlemen to forbear to enact the deed of violence to the constitution they seemed determined to perpetuate; but all to no avail.

The question was taken, and the amendment adopted by a vote of 27 to 25, Messrs. Henderson, Johnson, and Merrick voting for it. The resolution, as amended, was then reported to the Senate, when the effort was renewed to get the amendment suited by Mr. Archer adopted, but without success. Mr. Berrien also suited a verbal amendment, by which the alternative left with the President, by the amendment adopted, to acquire Texas either by treaty or in virtue of the joint resolutions, would be stricken out and his action be confined to the negotiation of a treaty, but this proposition also failed. Mr. Miller then moved to amend by striking out all after the word Resolved in the joint resolutions from the house, and insert the bill suited by Mr. Benton at the last session of Congress, but that was voted down. The vote was then taken upon the passage of the bill, as amended, on which the vote was as before 27 to 25, and the bill was passed through all its stages. It would be sent to the House on the following day, where it was expected that it would instantly be adopted. The inaugural address of President Polk will now, therefore, be expected with anxiety. We look for it in the course of a day or two by the packet of the 6th instant.

The final vote in the Senate was as follows:

Mr. Pakenham had attended the Senate nightly, and was present, it is said, when the final vote was taken.

The Committee of Finance, in the Illinois House of Representatives, had reported a bill substantially agreeing to all the conditions required by the subscribers to the Canal loan, as reported by Messrs. Leavitt and Oakley.

Foreign exchange was in active demand for the packets of the first; the markets closed firm, at 109 3/4 to 110. Money was in demand. The rate "on call" was 5 to 6 per cent., and for discounts 5 1/2 to 7 per cent. per annum.

The Congressional session closed on Monday, the 3d inst., and with it the official career of Mr. Tyler. On the following day the new President, Mr. Polk, entered formally on the discharge of his duties.

Previously the Oregon Bill from the House failed in the Senate, and the provisions for paying to the Mexican claimants the two installments said to have been paid by Mexico, but which the claimants have not received was passed.

The inauguration of Mr. Polk seems to have been regarded in Washington as a splendid show, and descriptions of the ceremony are given in the New York prints in the most glowing terms. The following is a copy of the inaugural address:

Fellow-Citizens:
Without solicitation on my part, I have been chosen by the free and voluntary suffrages of my countrymen to the most honorable and most responsible office on earth. I am deeply impressed with gratitude for the confidence reposed in me. Honored with this distinguished consideration at an earlier period of life than any of my predecessors, I can not disguise the diffidence with which I am about to enter on the discharge of my official duties.

If the more aged and experienced men who have filled the office of President of the United States even in the infancy of the Republic distanced their ability to discharge the duties of that exalted station, what ought not to be the apprehensions of one so much younger and less endowed now that our domain extends from ocean to ocean, that our people have so greatly increased in numbers, and at a time when so great diversity of opinion prevails in regard to the principles and policy which should characterize the administration of our Government? Well may the boldest fear and the wisest tremble when incurring responsibilities on which may depend our country's peace and prosperity, and in some degree the hopes and happiness of the whole human family.

In assuming responsibilities so vast I fervently invoke the aid of that Almighty Ruler of the Universe in whose hands are the destinies of nations and of men to guard this Heaven-favored land against the mischiefs which without His guidance might arise from an unwise public policy. With a firm reliance upon the Wisdom of Omnipotence to sustain and direct me in the path of duty which I am appointed to pursue, I stand in the presence of this assembled multitude of my countrymen to take upon myself the solemn obligation "to the best of my ability to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

A concise enumeration of the principles which will guide me in the administrative policy of the Government is not only in accordance with the examples set me by all my predecessors, but is eminently befitting the occasion. The Constitution itself, plainly written as it is, the safeguard of our federative compact, the offspring of concession and compromise, binding together in the bonds of peace and union this great and increasing family of free and independent States, will be the chart by which I shall be directed.

It will be my first care to administer the Government in the true spirit of that instrument, and to assume no powers not expressly granted or clearly implied in its terms. The Government of the United States is one of delegated and limited powers, and it is by a strict adherence to the clearly granted powers and by abstaining from the exercise of doubtful or unauthorized implied powers that we have the only sure guaranty against the recurrence of those unfortunate collisions between the Federal and State authorities which have occasionally so much disturbed the harmony of our system and even threatened the perpetuity of our glorious Union.

"To the States, respectively, or to the people" have been reserved "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States." Each State is a complete sovereignty within the sphere of its reserved powers. The Government of the United States is one of delegated and limited powers, and it is by a strict adherence to the clearly granted powers and by abstaining from the exercise of doubtful or unauthorized implied powers that we have the only sure guaranty against the recurrence of those unfortunate collisions between the Federal and State authorities which have occasionally so much disturbed the harmony of our system and even threatened the perpetuity of our glorious Union.

To the Government of the United States has been intrusted the exclusive management of our foreign affairs. Beyond that it wields a few general enumerated powers. It does not force reform on the States. It leaves individuals, over whom it casts its protecting influence, entirely free to improve their own condition by the legitimate exercise of all their mental and physical powers. It is a common protector
This most admirable and wisest system of well-regulated self-government among men ever devised by human minds has been tested by its successful operation for more than half a century, and if preserved from the usurpations of the Federal Government on the one hand and the exercise by the States of powers not reserved to them on the other, will, I fervently hope and believe, endure for ages to come and dispense the blessings of civil and religious liberty to distant generations. To effect objects so dear to every patriot I shall devote myself with anxious solicitude. It will be my desire to guard against that most fruitful source of danger to the harmonious action of our system which consists in substituting the mere discretion and caprice of the Executive or of majorities in the legislative department of the Government for powers which have been withheld from the Federal Government by the Constitution. By the theory of our Government majorities rule, but this right is not an arbitrary or unlimited one. It is a right to be exercised in subordination to the Constitution and in conformity to it. One great object of the Constitution was to restrain majorities from oppressing minorities or encroaching upon their just rights. Minorities have a right to appeal to the Constitution as a shield against such oppression.

That the blessings of liberty which our Constitution secures may be enjoyed alike by minorities and majorities, the Executive has been wisely invested with a qualified veto upon the acts of the Legislature. It is a negative power, and is conservative in its character. It acts for the time hasty, inconsiderate, or unconstitutional legislation; it invites reconsideration, and transfers questions at issue between the legislative and executive departments to the tribunal of the people. Like all other powers, it is subject to be abused. When judiciously and properly exercised, the Constitution itself may be saved from infraction and the rights of all preserved and protected.

The inestimable value of our Federal Union is felt and acknowledged by all. By this system of united and confederated States our people are permitted collectively and individually to seek their own happiness in their own way, and the consequences have been most auspicious. Since the Union was formed the number of the States has increased from thirteen to twenty-eight; two of these have taken their position as members of the Confederacy within the last week. Our population has increased from three to twenty millions. New communities and States are seeking protection under its aegis, and multitudes from the Old World are flocking to our shores to participate in its blessings. Beneath its benign sway peace and prosperity prevail. Freed from the burdens and miseries of war, our trade and intercourse have extended throughout the world. Mind, no longer tasked in devising means to accomplish or resist schemes of ambition, usurpation, or conquest, is devoting itself to man's true interests in developing his faculties and powers and the capacity of nature to minister to his enjoyments. Genius is free to announce its inventions and discoveries, and the hand is free to accomplish whatever the head conceives not incompatible with the rights of a fellow-being. All distinctions of birth or of rank have been abolished. All citizens, whether native or adopted, are placed upon terms of precise equality. All are entitled to equal rights and equal protection. No union exists between church and state, and perfect freedom of opinion is guaranteed to all sects and creeds.

These are some of the blessings secured to our happy land by our Federal Union. To perpetuate them it is our sacred duty to preserve it. Who shall assign limits to the achievements of free minds and free hands under the protection of this glorious Union? No treason to mankind since the organization of society would be equal in atrocity to that of him who would lift his hand to destroy it. He would overthrow the noblest structure of human wisdom, which protects himself and his fellow-man. He would stop the progress of free government and involve his country either in anarchy or despotism. He would extinguish the fire of liberty, which warms and animates the hearts of happy millions and invites all the nations of the earth to imitate our example. If he say that error and wrong are committed in the administration of the Government, let him remember that nothing human can be perfect, and that under no other system of government revealed by Heaven or devised by man has reason been allowed so free and broad a scope to combat error. Has the sword of despots proved to be a safer or surer instrument of reform in government than enlightened reason? Does he expect to find among the ruins of this Union a happier abode for our swarming millions than they now have under it? Every lover of his country must shudder at the thought of the possibility of its dissolution, and will be ready to adopt the patriotic sentiment, "Our Federal Union—it must be preserved." To preserve it the compromises which alone enabled our fathers to form a common constitution for the government and protection of so many States and distinct communities, of such diversified habits, interests, and domestic institutions, must be sacredly and religiously observed. Any attempt to disturb or destroy these compromises, being terms of the compact of union, can lead to none other than the most ruinous and disastrous consequences.

It is a source of deep regret that in some sections of our country misguided persons have occasionally indulged in schemes and agitations whose object is the destruction of domestic institutions existing in other sections—establishments which existed at the adoption of the Constitution and were recognized and protected by it. All must see that if it were possible for them to be successful in attaining their object the dissolution of the Union and the consequent destruction of our happy form of government must speedily follow.

I am happy to believe that at every period of our existence as a nation there has existed, and continues to exist, among the great mass of our people a devotion to the Union of the States which will shield and protect it against the moral treason of any who would seriously contemplate its destruction. To secure a continuance of that devotion the compromises of the Constitution must not only be preserved, but sectional jealousies and heartburnings must be discountenanced, and all should remember that they are members of the same political family, having a common destiny. To increase the attachment of our people to the Union, our laws should be just. Any policy which shall tend to favor monopolies or the peculiar interests of sections or classes must operate to the prejudice of the interest of their fellow-citizens, and should be avoided. If the compromises of the Constitution be preserved, if sectional jealousies and heartburnings be discountenanced, if our laws be just and the Government be practically administered strictly within the limits of power prescribed to it, we may discard all apprehensions for the safety of the Union.

With these views of the nature, character, and objects of the Government and the value of the Union, I shall steadily oppose the creation of those institutions and systems which in their nature tend to pervert it from its legitimate purposes and make it the instrument of sections, classes, and individuals. We need no national banks or other extraneous institutions planted around the Government to control or strengthen it in opposition to the will of its authors. Experience has taught us how unnecessary they are as auxiliaries of the public authorities—how impotent for good and how powerful for mischief.

Ours was intended to be a plain and frugal government, and I shall regard it to be my duty to recommend to Congress and, as far as the Executive is concerned, to enforce by all the means within my power the strictest economy in the expenditure of the public money which may be compatible with the public interests.

A national debt has become almost an institution of European monarchies. It is viewed in some of them as an essential prop to existing governments. Melancholy is the condition of that people whose government can be sustained only by a system which periodically transfers large amounts from the labor of the many to the coffers of the few. Such a system is incompatible with the ends for which our republican Government was instituted. Under a wise policy the debts contracted in our Revolution and during the War of 1812 have been happily extinguished. By a judicious application of the revenues not required for other necessary purposes, it is not doubted that the debt which has grown out of the circumstances of the last few years may be speedily paid off.

I congratulate my fellow-citizens on the entire restoration of the credit of the General Government of the Union and that of many of the States. Happy would it be for the indebted States if they were freed from their liabilities, many of which were incautiously contracted. Although the Government of the Union is neither in a legal nor a moral sense bound for the debts of the States, and it would be a violation of our compact of union to assume them, yet we can not but feel a deep interest in seeing all the States meet their public liabilities and pay off their just debts at the earliest practicable period. That they will do so as soon as it can be done without imposing too heavy burdens on their citizens there is no reason to doubt. The sound moral and honorable feeling of the people of the indebted States can not be questioned, and we are happy to perceive a settled disposition on their part, as their ability returns after a season of unexampled pecuniary embarrassment, to pay off all just demands and to acquiesce in any reasonable measures to accomplish that object.

One of the difficulties which we have had to encounter in the practical administration of the Government consists in the adjustment of our revenue laws and the levy of the taxes necessary for the support of Government. In the general proposition that no more money shall be collected than the necessities of an economical administration shall require all parties seem to acquiesce. Nor does there seem to be any material difference of opinion as to the absence of right in the Government to tax one section of country, or one class of citizens, or one occupation, for the mere profit of another. "Justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to cherish the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our common country." I have heretofore declared to my fellow-citizens that "in my judgment it is the duty of the Government to extend, as far as it may be practicable to do so, by its revenue laws and all other means within its power, fair and just protection to all of the great interests of the whole Union, embracing agriculture, manufactures, the mechanic arts, commerce, and navigation." I have also declared my opinion to be "in favor of a tariff for revenue," and that "in adjusting the details of such a tariff I have sanctioned such moderate discriminating duties as would produce the amount of revenue needed and at the same time afford reasonable incidental protection to our home industry," and that I was "opposed to a tariff for protection merely, and not for revenue." The power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" was an indispensable one to be conferred on the Federal Government, which without it would possess no means of providing for its own support. In executing this power by levying a tariff of duties for the support of Government, the raising of revenue should be the object and protection the incident. To reverse this principle and make protection the object and revenue the incident would be to inflict manifest injustice upon all other than the protected interests. In levying duties for revenue it is doubtless proper to make such discriminations within the revenue principle as will afford incidental protection to our home interests. Within the revenue limit there is a discretion to discriminate; beyond that limit the rightful exercise of the power is not conceded. The incidental protection afforded to our home interests by discriminations within the revenue range it is believed will be ample. In making discriminations all our home interests should as far as practicable be equally protected. The largest portion of our people are agriculturists. Others are employed in manufactures, commerce, navigation, and the mechanic arts. They are all engaged in their respective pursuits and their joint labors constitute the national or home industry. To tax one branch of this home industry for the benefit of another would be unjust. No one of these interests can rightfully claim an advantage over the others, or to be enriched by impoverishing the others. All are equally entitled to the fostering care and protection of the Government. In exercising a sound discretion in levying discriminating duties within the limit prescribed, care should be taken that it be done in a manner not to benefit the wealthy few at the expense of the toiling millions by taxing lowest the necessaries of life, or articles of superior quality and high price, which can only be consumed by the wealthy, and highest the necessaries of life, or articles of coarse quality and low price, which the poor and great mass of our people must consume. The burdens of government should as far as practicable be distributed justly and equally among all classes of our population. These general views, long entertained on this subject, I have deemed it proper to reiterate. It is a subject upon which conflicting interests of sections and occupations are supposed to exist, and a spirit of mutual concession and compromise in adjusting its details should be cherished by every part of our widespread country as the only means of preserving harmony and a cheerful acquiescence of all in the operation of our revenue laws. Our patriotic citizens in every part of the Union will readily suit to the payment of such taxes as shall be needed for the support of their Government, whether in peace or in war, if they are so levied as to distribute the burdens as equally as possible among them.

The Republic of Texas has made known her desire to come into our Union, to form a part of our Confederacy and enjoy with us the blessings of liberty secured and guaranteed by our Constitution. Texas was once a part of our country--was unwisely ceded away to a foreign power--is now independent, and possesses an undoubted right to dispose of a part or the whole of her territory and to merge her sovereignty as a separate and independent state in ours. I congratulate my country that by an act of the late Congress of the United States the assent of this Government has been given to the reunion, and it only remains for the two countries to agree upon the terms to consummate an object so important to both.

I regard the question of annexation as belonging exclusively to the United States and Texas. They are independent powers competent to contract, and foreign nations have no right to interfere with them or to take exceptions to their reunion. Foreign powers do not seem to appreciate the true character of our Government. Our Union is a confederation of independent States, whose policy is peace with each other and all the world. To enlarge its limits is to extend the dominions of peace over additional territories and increasing millions. The world has nothing to fear from military ambition in our Government. While the Chief Magistrate and the popular branch of Congress are elected for short terms by the suffrages of those millions who must in their own persons bear all the burdens and miseries of war, our Government can not be otherwise than pacific. Foreign powers should therefore look on the annexation of Texas to the United States not as the conquest of a nation seeking to extend her dominions by arms and violence, but as the peaceful acquisition of a territory once and yet no opportunity will be lost to cultivate a favorable understanding with foreign countries. All alliances having a tendency to jeopard the welfare and honor of our country or sacrifice any one of the national interests will be studiously avoided, watchfulness. Equal and exact justice should characterize all our intercourse with respect for the rights of other nations, while our own will be the subject of constant stipulations should be sacredly respected.

Union. In the meantime every obligation imposed by treaty or conventional part of our territory can not be long delayed, within the sphere of our federative facilities of intercourse will easily bring the States, of which the formation in that them in the distant regions which they have selected for their homes. The increasing increasing markets for their products.

To Texas the reunion is important, because the strong protecting arm of our Government would be extended over her, and the vast resources of her fertile soil and genial climate would be speedily developed, while the safety of New Orleans and of our whole southwestern frontier against hostile aggression, as well as the interests of the whole Union, would be promoted by it.

In the earlier stages of our national existence the opinion prevailed with some that our system of confederated States could not operate successfully over an extended territory, and serious objections have at different times been made to the enlargement of our boundaries. These objections were earnestly urged when we acquired Louisiana. Experience has shown that they were not well founded. The title of numerous Indian tribes to vast tracts of country has been extinguished; new States have been admitted into the Union; new Territories have been created and our jurisdiction and laws extended over them. As our population has expanded, the Union has been cemented and strengthened. AS our boundaries have been enlarged and our agricultural population has been spread over a large surface, our federative system has acquired additional strength and security. It may well be doubted whether it would not be in greater danger of overthrow if our present population were confined to the comparatively narrow limits of the original thirteen States than it is now that they are sparsely settled over a more expanded territory. It is confidently believed that our system may be safely extended to the utmost bounds of our territorial limits, and that as it shall be extended the bonds of our Union, so far from being weakened, will become stronger. None can fail to see the danger to our safety and future peace if Texas remains an independent state or becomes an ally or dependency of some foreign nation more powerful than herself. Is there one among our citizens who would not prefer perpetual peace with Texas to occasional wars, which so often occur between bordering independent nations? Is there one who would not prefer free intercourse with her to high duties on all our products and manufactures which enter her ports or cross her frontiers? Is there one who would not prefer an unrestricted communication with her citizens to the frontier obstructions which must occur if she remains out of the Union? Whatever is good or evil in the local institutions of Texas will remain her own whether annexed to the United States or not. None of the present States will be responsible for them any more than they are for the local institutions of each other. They have confederated together for certain specified objects. Upon the same principle that they would refuse to form a perpetual union with Texas because of her local institutions our forefathers would have been prevented from forming our present Union. Perceiving no valid objection to the measure and many reasons for its adoption vitally affecting the peace, the safety, and the prosperity of both countries, I shall on the broad principle which formed the basis and produced the adoption of our Constitution, and not in any narrow spirit of sectional policy, endeavor by all constitutional, honorable, and appropriate means to consummate the expressed will of the people and Government of the United States by the reannexation of Texas to our Union at the earliest practicable period.

Nor will it become in a less degree my duty to assert and maintain by all constitutional means the right of the United States to that portion of our territory which lies beyond the Rocky Mountains. Our title to the country of the Oregon is "clear and unquestionable," and already are our people preparing to perfect that title by occupying it with their wives and children. But eighty years ago our population was confined on the west by the ridge of the Alleghanies. Within that period--within the lifetime, I might say--of some of my hearers--our people, increasing to many millions, have filled the eastern valley of the Mississippi, adventurously ascended the Missouri to its headsprings, and are already engaged in establishing the blessings of self-government in valleys of which the rivers flow to the Pacific. The world beholds the peaceful triumphs of the industry of our emigrants. To us belongs the duty of protecting them adequately wherever they may be upon our soil. The jurisdiction of our laws and the benefits of our republican institutions should be extended over them in the distant regions which they have selected for their homes. The increasing facilities of intercourse will easily bring the States, of which the formation in that part of our territory can not be long delayed, within the sphere of our federative Union. In the meantime every obligation imposed by treaty or conventional stipulations should be sacredly respected.

In the management of our foreign relations it will be my aim to observe a careful respect for the rights of other nations, while our own will be the subject of constant watchfulness. Equal and exact justice should characterize all our intercourse with foreign countries. All alliances having a tendency to jeopard the welfare and honor of our country or sacrifice any one of the national interests will be studiously avoided, and yet no opportunity will be lost to cultivate a favorable understanding with foreign governments by which our navigation and commerce may be extended and the ample products of our fertile soil, as well as the manufactures of our skillful artisans, find a ready market and remunerating prices in foreign countries.

In taking "care that the laws be faithfully executed," a strict performance of duty will be exacted from all public officers. From those officers, especially, who are charged with the collection and disbursement of the public revenue will prompt and rigid accountability be required. Any culpable failure or delay on their part to account for the moneys intrusted to them at the times and in the manner required by law will in every instance terminate the official connection of such defaulting officer with the Government.

Although in our country the Chief Magistrate must almost of necessity be chosen by a party and stand pledged to its principles and measures, yet in his official action he should not be the President of a part only, but of the whole people of the United States. While he executes the laws with an impartial hand, shrinks from no proper responsibility, and faithfully carries out in the executive department of the Government the principles and policy of those who have chosen him, he should not be unmindful that our fellow-citizens who have differed with him in opinion are entitled to the full and free exercise of their opinions and judgments, and that the rights of all are entitled to respect and regard.

Confidently relying upon the aid and assistance of the coordinate departments of the Government in conducting our public affairs, I enter upon the discharge of the high duties which have been assigned me by the people, again humbly supplicating that Divine Being who has watched over and protected our beloved country from its infancy to the present hour to continue His gracious benedictions upon us, that we may continue to be a prosperous and happy people.

The following extracts from the New York Herald give the prevailing rumours as to the formation of the new Cabinet:

Washington, March 1, 1845, 12 o'clock, Saturday.
Texas is triumphant, and Mr. Polk has already determined on at least two of his Cabinet. Mr. Calhoun retires to South Carolina to cultivate cotton and philosophy, having accomplished the work he undertook, that is, finished the Texas question, and put the Oregon in a proper train of settlement. The two Cabinet Ministers thus far determined on are - James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, Secretary of State.
Robert J. Walker, of Mississippi, Secretary of the Treasury.

March 8.
Annotation: Following this segment are several more rumors and corrections of rumors about the new Cabinet done in the style above. Also contained is a description of Polk's inauguration ceremony done in the style of describing the decorations on the street and so on. As such, these sentences are basically media fluff pieces and were left out.

LONDON, FRIDAY, MARCH 28, 1845.

If Mr. TYLER strained every nerve in the singular race which has recently taken place between the late and the present Chief Magistrate of the United States to consummate the work which his administration brought to maturity, and to gratify the passions he had roused, it must be acknowledged that Mr. POLK treads very closely upon his predecessor's heels. In the inaugural address delivered by the new President on the 4th of March, we find faithfully reproduced all the worst characteristics of the American statesmen who have been in power since the withdrawal of Mr. WEBSTER from the Cabinet of Washington. If Mr. POLK was chosen as the thorough representative of the party which makes slavery, repudiation, and foreign aggression its claims to distinction, we are bound to acknowledge that he has not swerved from the intentions of his constituents. His language on all these subjects has the same unblushing impudence which belonged to his predecessors, and which we had fondly imagined that no one else could rival; but in his mouth it has this very serious aggravation, that it convinces us he is prepared to begin where the others leave off. We had carefully guarded ourselves against any preconceptions hostile to Mr. POLK; and we had endeavoured to persuade ourselves that we should find more moderation in his own conduct than in that of his adherents; but the indulgent illusion is completely dispelled by the first words he utters, and the anxiety which was incessantly awakened by Mr. TYLER's strange and incongruous efforts, is rendered indefinitely greater by declarations from the new PRESIDENT of at least equal violence, and, we fear, much more significance.

One of the first sentiments uttered by Mr. POLK, after an exordium, in which "the most admirable "and wisest system of well-regulated self-government among men ever devised by human minds" receives a very ample panegyric, is that of "deep regret at the schemes and agitations of misguided persons, whose "object is the destruction of domestic institutions existing in other sections of the country." Amongst nations the expression "domestic institutions" designates all that is sacred among men; in the United States it expresses that state of bondage which is most abhorred by the free - that system of slavery which other countries have practised, which some have renounced, which all deplore, but which the politicians of America have alone the courage to eulogize and defend.

Mr. POLK reserves his compassion, however, for other objects. "Happy would it be," says he, "for "indebted states if they were freed from their liabilities, many of which were incautiously contracted." That sentiment will, indeed, find an echo in every debtor's gaol all over the world! We who feel for slaves more than for slave-owners, are apt to think unpaid creditors even more to be pitied than profligate debtors; but in the New World these things are reversed. "The sound, moral, and honourable feeling of "the people of the indebted states cannot be questioned," says the PRESIDENT; but whilst sympathies and eulogies are showered upon them, what with one recent exception, is become of their unpaid dividends?

After two such paragraphs as these, our readers will not be surprised at anything that may follow, more especially with reference to the foreign relations of the Union. A lie repeated after it has been contradicted, and scouted by all well-informed and honest men, is a lie raised to a higher power - the square of a lie. Mr. TYLER intimated in a message some time ago that doubts were entertained by some whether Texas had not originally formed part of the territory of the United States, and been improperly alienated from them; but Mr. POLK resolutely affirms, that "Texas was once a part of our country, was "unwisely ceded away to a foreign Power, is now independent, and possesses an undoubted right to merge "her sovereignty in ours." The whole assertion is utterly groundless - first, because Texas formed no part of Louisiana when sold by France; and, secondly, because the boundary treaty which Spain concluded in 1819 definitively wiped out all such equivocal claims forever. But in this discussion no argument is practicable; the wolf is resolved on seizing his prey, and it signifies but little that the lamb stood drinking lower down the brook. Mr. POLK holds somewhat similar, though less precise, language, as to the Oregon territory. He pledges himself at the very outset of his career, and with the full knowledge that negotiations are actually going on between his Cabinet and Great Britain, that the American title to the country of Oregon is clear and unquestionable. But it may spare time likely to be consumed in a very unprofitable discussion, if we express an opinion, at least as decided as his own, that, in spite of his marauders, and what he terms his constitutional rights, the territory of the Oregon will never be wrested from the British Crown, to which it belongs, but by WAR. Mr. POLK avers, that to enlarge the limits of the Union is to extend the dominion of peace over additional territories and increasing millions; but he will find that when they are so far extended as to include the rightful possessions of the British empire, they will encounter the hostility and the resolution of a people not inferior to the populace of the United States in spirit or in resources.

Under all these circumstances, when the fire kindled by Mr. TYLER and Mr. CALHOUN seems likely to blaze up into a conflagration, and when an immediate collision with Mexico is the most probable result of the late vote of the Senate, it is strange that even the Minister by whose activity and hardihood this mischief has been concocted, should be swept away from his post. Such, however, is the fact. Mr. CALHOUN loses his power quite as effectually as Mr. TYLER himself. A new Cabinet is to come into office with the new PRESIDENT and the new Senate; and though the late Ministers would

"Sic vos non vobis sidificatis aves\n"Sic vos non vobis vellera fertis oves
"Sic vos non vobis mellificatis apes." [GLP]
The revolution is over, and perhaps a more moral one has never been effected in any country. Santa Anna, at the head of the whole available military force, after having committed a thousand atrocities in the shape of malversation and Turkish despotism, thought proper to dissolve the Congress, and virtually have himself declared Dictator. A universal burst of indignation hailed this measure, and the country rose en masse to resist it. Every city, town, and village armed itself, and whilst he, full of confidence, was threatening destruction to all those obnoxious to his cause, and by marches and counter-marches vainly thinking to strike terror into the disaffected country, animated every day by a greater abhorrence of his tyranny, found itself in a state to resist him, and bid him defiance. At length he attacked Puebla, and was driven out after having reached the grand place; in the mean time the Provisional Government had collected a respectable force, which, full of enthusiasm, was by extraordinary marches endeavouring to fall upon him, while he no sooner learnt the approach of his enemies than he fled like a coward, abandoning his friends and followers, already harassed by fatigue, long marches, and want of provisions, to their fate. He set off accompanied by four servants, and was captured at Jeco, near Jalapa, by a handful of rural militia, and conveyed to that city, and is now on his way to Mexico, escorted by his own men, to take his trial and await the condign punishment he most justly deserves. Many persons have performed acts of heroism which would not have disgraced the great men of Greece and Rome; in short, the affair has been conducted throughout in a manner that would have reflected honour on the most civilized nations: and I should say that a better state of things may consequently be expected. The foreign merchants here perhaps would have liked the revolution to have lasted somewhat longer, for on all the advances they have been able to make the Custom-house on account of duties, they are allowed a premium of 20 per cent., and this is a very sure operation, as they repay themselves out of the first duties due to the Custom-house from them. A conducta is to leave Mexico on the 1st proximo, which will be eagerly looked for at Vera Cruz, where money is very scarce at this moment."  [GLP]

LT March 31, 1845, 4a Oregon

LONDON, MONDAY, MARCH 31, 1845.

The question arising out of the conflicting claims of this country and the United States to the Oregon territory is essentially different from all the ordinary topics connected with our foreign political relations, and it involves the most serious consequences to both countries and to the world. It is, upon the whole, a fortunate circumstance, and in these days, we must add, an honourable distinction of the people of this country, that we are accustomed to watch the vicissitudes of affairs abroad without passion and without apprehensions, confiding in the vigilance of our own Government for the protection of British interests, but caring very little for the onerous and unprofitable kind of ascendency which is to be acquired by eager meddling in foreign affairs. The first lesson which the plain common sense of England would read to a Minister is to abstain from committing the country by an indiscreet solicitude in managing matters in which success brings with it no reward, and defeat entails humiliation and danger. In all such cases, as we have repeatedly had occasion to remark when such instances have occurred, or when the Opposition has laboured to make them occur, the indirect advantage of a diplomatic triumph or a military flourish is far too dearly purchased by the positive and direct danger of war, and the irritated feelings which such manifestations of power and activity leave behind them.

Will anyone be able to believe a few years hence, that for the sake of restoring to the SULTAN the province of Syria, and humiliating the Pasha of EGYPT, LORD PALMERSTON wasted the blood and treasure of England, and wantonly kindled a strife between ourselves and the French people, which no subsequent prudence or temper has been wholly able to quench? The events of 1840 are a memorable example of what is to be gained, and what is to be lost, by a foreign policy of this impertinent officious kind; and the warning of such success has not been lost on any one but the authors of that notable scheme, who have indeed their reward.

But the more we are disposed to contest the propriety of mixing ourselves up in foreign disputes or revolutions, in which we have no direct interest or concern, except when it can be done under the milder form of mediation and advice, the more we would reserve all the energy and power of this country for those cases which do directly affect us, and in such cases the more resolutely would we have them
In the employment of such resources, the country expects from the Government the greatest forbearance, and the greatest resolution if the case be one in which forbearance is weakness. It needs no argument to prove that a direct aggression on the territorial rights of the British Crown is of all such cases the strongest. Yet if the language of the American President is intended to convey more than an empty threat, such an aggression is contemplated by the Cabinet which has just been formed in Washington. Mr. POLK announces his conviction that the American title to the country of the Oregon is clear and unquestionable, and that his fellow-citizens are already preparing to perfect that title by occupying it with their wives and children. This patriarchal mode of going up into this new land of Goshen is certainly no violation of the existing treaty; but when the President goes on to speak of "the jurisdiction of our laws, the benefits of our republican institutions, and the formation of states in that part "of our territory within the sphere of our Federal Union," he misinterprets the true nature of our agreement on the subject.

This case may be stated in a very few words. When the dispute, which arose in 1789 between Great Britain and Spain, with regard to the possession of Nootka Sound, and the right to make settlements on the north-west coast of America, was amicably terminated by the Treaty of the Escurial, the state of that remote region rendered such an arrangement practicable. The Whigs ridiculed it at the time, and Mr. GREY observed, that "in every place in which we might settle access was left for the Spaniards; where we "might form a settlement on one hill, they might erect a fort upon another, &c."

But, in point of fact, at that time and for half a century afterwards, the recognition of a joint abstract right was sufficient to prevent a collision, since neither state was likely to make an active use of it, and the country was not yet opened practically to the operations of commerce or the authority of a government. It is contended, indeed, on the part of the >United States, that the Treaty of the Escurial was abrogated by the declaration of war between Spain and Great Britain in 1796, and that it was never renewed; inasmuch that when Spain ceded to the United States all her titles to land north of the 42nd parallel of latitude, by the Treaty of Florida signed in 1819, she ceded those titles, not as limited and defined by the treaty of 1790, but as they existed before that treaty. The argument is bad, for the Treaty of the Escurial, being in the nature of a convention declaratory of existing rights, was clearly not liable to be abrogated by a subsequent declaration of war, and it was certainly held to be in force by both Spain and Great Britain after the cessation of their hostilities. But this American argument would rather strengthen than diminish the British claims, for the Treaty of the Escurial was a compromise, and if it be held to have been rescinded, then the British rights become absolute as they were before it existed. The main point, however, in which we would now insist is, that this, and every other arrangement since made with the United States, was essentially temporary in its nature. Joint occupancy is only possible as long as no real sovereignty is exercised. Indeed, in the course of the negotiations between the two Governments in 1827, the British Commissioners proposed that the convention of 1818 should be renewed for a term, with the condition that "neither of the contracting parties should assume or exercise any right of exclusive sovereignty or "dominion over any part of the said country." This suggestion was rejected by Mr. GALLATIN. Each party, then, retains an unquestionable right of making settlements, and even of exercising what is called sovereignty, in the Oregon territory; but it is evident that as soon as both parties proceed to exercise rights, which exclude each other in practice, a collision must ensue. The time is come when such a temporary arrangement has ceased to be possible or secure; but a temporary arrangement can only be terminated in two ways - either by a convention settling the disputed amount of territory and drawing a fixed boundary, or by a recurrence to that state of things in which force alone can between two absolute claimants. If the negotiations undertaken between Mr. HUSKISSON and Mr. GALLATIN in 1826 led to no more satisfactory result than a renewal of the temporary convention of 1818; it is most improbable that any negotiation will now terminate more successfully, unless it turn upon the arbitration of a third Power. This expedient is, however, rejected by the Americans; and the tone of Mr. POLK's address does not lead us to suppose that he would even adhere to the ultimatum of 1826, which was the prolongation of the frontier along the 49th parallel of N. latitude from the point at which it now terminates to the Pacific.
Our position in the matter is a defensive, though not altogether a passive one. England desires an amicable adjustment; but if that be rendered impossible, the untractable policy of her opponent, the aggressive conduct of the American Government, and the unparalleled language of the PRESIDENT, suffice to prepare us for the other alternative. The rights of British subjects in the country of the Oregon must of course be defended; and, indeed, the British positions are sufficiently strong to defend themselves from any sudden attack likely to be made upon them; but if any such attack be made by an American citizen, the American Government must, of course, be held responsible for it, and the people of the United States must take the consequences.

LT April 10, 1845 5f US, Mexican ministers demands his passport and leaves

DEPARTURE OF THE MEXICAN MINISTER.
WASHINGTON, MARCH 9.

General Almonte yesterday demanded his passport, accompanying the demand with a note, in which he set forth the wrong done to Mexico by the course of this Government in the annexation of Texas, and declaring as a necessary consequence thereof the termination of all diplomatic relations between the two countries--leaving it to his own Government to decide upon any ulterior measures. He at the same time addressed a circular to the foreign diplomatic corps here, informing them of the step he had taken, and furnishing them with copies of a protest he had felt himself obliged to present against the course of the Government of the United States.

To all who have attentively followed the question, this step on the part of the Mexican Minister seemed inevitable. He had in advance, and in conformity with instructions from his Government, notified our Secretary of State that they act to annex to the United States a province of Mexico--and so he and his Government consider and describe Texas--would be looked upon as an act of hostility to Mexico.

In utter disregard of this warning, Texas has been annexed, so far as our legislation can effect it; and, consistently with his previous annunciation, General Almonte now proclaims that his mission is terminated. It is quite possible, not to say probable, that this step has been taken, after vain efforts, indirectly, on the part of the other foreign legations, to produce delay. But General Almonte was committed both by his antecedents and by his instructions, and could delay no longer. The public giving out is, that he will embark from New York on the 20th instant, but his health will not, I think, admit of his leaving here so early. He is just recovering from a severe malady, and is by no means in a condition to travel.

A Cabinet Council was, it is understood, held last evening, and another has been held today, in relation to this business. The result, of course, is unknown. The passports will be granted, and the American Minister in Mexico will, as a matter of course, have his sent to him by the Mexican Government, the moment the news reaches there--and thus the two Governments will be without means of Intercommunication in the ordinary form.

The circular addressed by General Almonte to the other foreign legations led to a conference among them, and it is understood as the general result on all hands that moderation was to be enjoined. All deprecated hostilities between the United States and Mexico, and especially were the British legation desirous that any such result should be avoided, and the opinion upon the whole seemed to be that war ought not to ensue, and therefore would not ensue.

In coming to this conclusion, however, much reliance was placed upon the character and composition of the actual Government of Mexico. On all hands it was admitted that if Santa Anna were still in power war would be inevitable. But when he fell, a class of men, moderate, less ambitious, and better instructed, were called to the charge of the government, and the hope was entertained, looking to the distracted state of Mexico, to its feebleness, and its wants, that she might, if proper measures were taken by our Government, be persuaded to consider the whole to honour--if wound there be--and the question of boundaries might be adjusted by that potent resolver of difficulties, individual and national--money.

The facts here stated may be implicitly relied on; the inferences must pass for what they are worth. It is certain that all diplomatic intercourse between the two countries is suspended. It is certain, I presume, that Mexico will not pay another dollar of the indemnities stipulated by treaty; but whether she will go beyond that remains to be
It has been the habit among us of asserting that the British Government was fomenting the difficulties between us and Mexico relative to Texas. It would not very much surprise me, if it should eventually turn out—if we are so fortunate as to avoid war—that is owing to British interposition with Mexico. England knows that a war in the Gulf of Mexico cannot be without injury to her, nor without great risk to the peace of the world. She knows that "the cankers of a long peace and a calm world" are only awaiting the chance of an outbreak somewhere to render it general; and therefore quite as much, we readily admit, from interest as from conscience, she would discountenance Mexico in any hostile purpose. Moreover letters of marque, or commissions to privateers such as Mexico would grant, could not be otherwise than formidable even to neutral commerce, which that of England would be, under the circumstances. Hence we say, without any fear of contradiction, that the policy and the interests of England alike combine in favour of peace.

But, on the other hand, I must in all frankness say, that some of our own most sagacious men express great solicitude about the result. They anticipate that the popular feeling in Mexico against annexation and the antipathy against this country will overpower the Moderados in charge of the government, and that is spite of their prudence they may be driven into hostilities; and for hostilities, even upon the humblest scale, we are wholly unprepared, for this Congress, while provoking war, have actually curtailed all the appropriations for the means of war.

(From a New York Paper.)

The recent action of our National Legislature in regard to the annexation of Texas turns anxious attention to the proceedings of Mexico. That power proclaimed, repeatedly, and in the most emphatic terms, through her accredited agents, that the annexation of Texas to the United States would be regarded by her as a declaration of war. We have nevertheless, indulged the hope that the modified form in which this great act was consummated, and the reported good offices of the foreign Ministers resident at Washington, might prevent hostile action, and that the whole difficulty might be arranged by mutual negotiations.

This expectation was not a little strengthened by the fact that the Mexican Minister, up to Saturday morning, had not demanded his passports. This ground of hope, it will be seen is removed. The following letter, received in this city yesterday, is from a source which entitles, not only its statement of facts, but its slightest conjectures, to the most respectful consideration:

Mr. Almonte, the Mexican Minister, wrote a letter to the Secretary of State yesterday afternoon, announcing that his mission was closed, and demanding his passports. At the same time, he sent round a circular to the Ministers of other Governments here, protesting in strong language against the resolutions of the two houses for the annexation of Texas. He has said that he shall sail from New York on the 20th of this month.

The general opinion prevailing in the circle of the principal foreign Ministers resident here, and especially of those who have been in Mexico, and who are acquainted with the persons now in power in that country, there is reason to know, is, that Mexico will be remonstrate, protest, and denounce the proceeding in an angry manner, but that she will not commit any immediate breach of the peace. It has been reported that she may even go to the length of non-intercourse, but it is not thought by any of them she will resort immediately to war.

It is said that Mr. Pakenham and Mr. Calderon De La Barca, the Spanish Minister here, both of whom have been long in Mexico, speak very well of the persons now in power in Mexico. They say they are among the wisest and best of the public men in that ill-governed and ill-fated country. It is believed their temper will be pacific, so far as such a temper can be indulged in the excited and indignant state of feeling which it is admitted on all hands exists with all the Mexican people.
For one, I entertain serious fears. Mexico is smarting under a sharp sense of injury; and both Government and people may be willing to plunge into war, reckless of consequences, or counting on the sympathy of other states.

(From another private letter)

Yesterday, at 2 o’clock, the Mexican Minister, Almonte, sent a communication to the Department of State demanding his passports. At the same hour Almonte addressed a circular to the foreign Ministers near this Government, protesting against the joint resolutions of Congress in regard to Texas.

Last evening this matter was the subject of conversation in a circle composed of the leading foreign Ministers and members of our Senate. The present opinion seemed to be that Mexico would remonstrate, and manifest in many ways much indignation, but that it would all end in remonstrance and that she will take no hostile step whatever.

Mr. Pakenham has expressed an opinion that the affair with Mexico will not lead to hostilities. The granting of letters of marque by the Mexican Government would be opposed by the British Government. That proceeding would endanger British commerce, and often involve it in difficulty as well as our own.

General Almonte, the Mexican Minister, at 8 o’clock yesterday, p.m. addressed a note to the State department, complaining of the late act of Congress resolving to annex Texas, which he considered an act of hostility to the Mexican Government, and in conclusion demanded his passports. In the course of the day General Almonte send a formal letter, addressed to all the Foreign Ministers near our Government, remonstrating in the name of Mexico against the resolutions of Congress for the admission of Texas. The letter is written with some poignancy, and displays no little shrewdness. It is the intention of General Almonte to sail from New York for his own country in the course of 10 days.

Last evening, at a concourse of the foreign Ministers, this subject was discussed. Though in some respects their opinions varied, in one they all agreed—that the men who now ruled the affairs of the Mexican nation had characters for intelligence and respectability. They were men of discretion and of experience; and though among the people Mexico there would be much exasperation, and no little complaint of the conduct of our Government, still they thought that the Administration would not recommend any hostile measure towards our nation. The most it would insist on would be an indemnification from our Treasury for the loss of Texas. Satisfied with this, it would abandon any belligerent intention towards our Government. It may be taken for certain that the Mexican Government will grant letters of marque by the Mexican Government would be opposed by the British Government. That proceeding would endanger British commerce, and often involved it in difficulty as well as our own.

It may be taken for certain that the Mexican Government will grant no letters of marque—no licenses to affect our commerce. It is impossible that we should be embroiled with her in a naval warfare without implicating England, whose navigation would suffer as much as the American from such a state of things.

Mr. Pakenham is of opinion, as I am informed on good authority, that the only demand Mexico will make with any degree of pertinacity upon our Government will be the indemnification from our Treasury for the loss of her rights to the two Governments. Mexico already is indebted to our citizens, and with the released of that debt, and some additional gratuity, I have no doubt she would be inclined to cede all her rights in Texas to us, without regret.

The first annunciation of General Almonte's course may somewhat affect our funds; they cannot be seriously influenced, however, the true state of things is revealed. I entertain no suspicion of any rupture with Mexico.

(From the National Intelligencer.)

In confirmation of the reports which have been in circulation here, and have already found their way into the eastern papers, we learn that the Minister of Mexico to this country (General Almonte) has signified to this Government the termination of his mission, in consequence of the passage of the act for the annexation to the United States of the province of Texas.

He has addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, entering a solemn protest, in the name of his Government, against that law, which he declares to be an act of aggression the most unjust that modern history records, being, as he alleges, the spoliation of a friendly nation of a considerable part of its territory.

The Minister has further asked for his passports, it being his purpose to leave this city for New York as early as practicable, and there to embark for Mexico.

This step on the part of the Minister is, of course, only what every intelligent person knew would be the necessary consequence of the passage of the act of annexation.

LT April 10, 1845 6a Oregon Territory

THE OREGON TERRITORY

A letter from Multnomah city, Oregon territory, dated the 18th of June, 1844, says the Oregon Legislature convened in that city the day previous. This Legislature is formed by the citizens of the territory, and rests for its authority on a voluntary compact among the people, as in all primitive Governments. Since the General Government of the union has failed hitherto to extend its laws over that region, the emigrants have resorted to their natural rights, and formed a voluntary political association for themselves, as was the case in the early American colonies. Our old friend Judge Burnet is a member of the Oregon Legislature. The crops were very good in June last, especially the wheat crop, surpassing anything known on this side of the mountains. Labourers commanded $1 50c. per day, with board included. The improvements about the falls of Willamette were progressing rapidly. The emigrants were eager for the passage of the Oregon Bill, and insist upon the retention by our Government of every inch of that territory. There is sufficient pasturage for cattle during the whole year, and abundance of timber for building and other purposes. Produce commands a good price, being shipped to the Russian dominions and other points of the Pacific. Groceries, &c., can be purchased at different places in the territory, though at rather high prices at present, the Hudson's Bay Company commanding the market for such articles. In short, the first difficulties of an early settlement in a remote region have been removed, and without the aid or encouragement which our Government ought long ago to have afforded. It must be humiliating to every American that our country deserves, to a considerable extent, the reproach cast upon it by Great Britain with regard to the American colonies, and uttered by Colonel Barre in the House of Commons in 1775, when, in reply to the charge that these colonies has grown up under the protection of England, he declared that, instead of being nurtured and protected, they had increased in wealth, prosperity, and numbers, in spite of the neglect of those who were bound to aid and encourage them. So it has been with Oregon. Emigrants have gone thither, encountered difficulties, opened improvements, made prosperous settlements, introduced the arts and comforts of civilized life, established schools, built churches, founded cities, engaged in commerce, established a colonial legislature, defended themselves against all encroachments--in a word, laid the foundations of a prosperous empire, in advance of any action by our Government. They now demand, as they have been demanding for years, that the protecting and sustaining arm of the Republic shall be extended to them. Although their greatest and best advocate, the lamented Linn, has paused from the stage of action, yet their cause still remains, strengthening yearly, and demanding with increased force the encouragement which the country could always give to its pioneers. LT April 14, 1845 5d Gen. Almonte's protest against the US

LIVERPOOL, SUNDAY.

The British and North American Royal mail steam-ship Cambria arrived in the Mersey at 4 o'clock this morning, bringing advices 13 days later than those received by the Montezuma, and her full complement of passengers. She sailed hence on the 4th ult., arrived out at Boston on the morning of the 18th, sailed from that city on her return on the 1st inst. And Halifax on the 3d, and made the run from the former port, including the usual detention at Halifax, in the remarkably short space of 11 1/2 days.

An attempt to bind President Polk to consummate annexation, through the treaty-making power, had failed in the Senate on the 10th ult.

We annex a copy of General Almonte's protest to the Executive against the annexation of Texas. The Minister, it is now said, intends to remain in New York until he receives fresh instructions from the new Mexican Administration, and he expresses openly his belief that war will ensue. The New York Herald states:--"That it is his intention to issue through the press, and place before the American people, not only the recent diplomatic correspondence between him and our Government, but a number of other views and considerations addressed to the American people against the policy, the justice, and the legality of the recent movements in favour of the annexation of Texas."

The protest of General Almonte is as follows:--

[Translation.]

"The undersigned, &c. has the honour to address the Hon. J. C. Calhoun, &c. for the purpose of making known to him the profound regret with which he has seen that the General Congress of the Union has passed a law consenting to and admitting into the American confederation the Mexican province of Texas.

"The undersigned had flattered himself that in this question the good sense and sound opinions of the citizens meet distinguished and experienced in the management of public affairs in this republic would have prevailed in the deliberations of the legislative body and of the union; but unfortunately this has not been the case, and, contrary to his hopes and most sincere wishes, he sees consummated by the American Government an act of aggression the most unjust which can be recalled in the annals of modern history, such as the spoilation of a friendly nation, like Mexico, of a considerable part of her territory.

"For these reasons the undersigned, in fulfillment of his instructions, finds himself obliged to protest, as he does accordingly protest, in the most solemn manner, in the name of his Government, against the law passed on the 28th of last month by the General Congress of the United States, and sanctioned on the 1st of the present month by the President of the said states, by which the province of Texas, an integral part of the Mexican territory, is allowed to be admitted into the American Union.

"The undersigned, in like manner, declares that the aforesaid law can in no manner invalidate the right which the Mexican nation possesses to recover the aforesaid province of Texas, of which she is now unjustly despoined, and which right she will sustain and enforce at all times by whatever means are in her power.

"The undersigned will say in conclusion to the hon. Secretary of State of the United States, in order that, he may be pleased to inform the President of the said States of the same, that in consequence of the law against which he has just protested, his mission to this Government is terminated from to-day. Consequently, the undersigned requests the hon. Secretary of State to be pleased to send him his passports, as he has arranged to quit this city as soon as possible for New York.

"The undersigned, &c.

"Washington, March 6."

It appears, from the New Orleans Picayune of the 12th ult., that the Mexican consul in that city, Senor Anangoiz, has also closed his relations with the United States.

The New York Herald says, "It is now certain, from the best information, that Mr.
Pakenham, the British Minister, has received instructions to open negotiations for a new commercial treaty with this country, and we really hope our Government may meet him half way." "We hear from Washington that Mr. Mason, of Virginia, is to be reinstituted in the navy department, and that Mr. Bancroft will go to England as the successor of Mr. Everett." Duff Green had returned to Washington.

The members of the diplomatic corps had waited upon the President of the United States in a body and through their senior, the Minister of Russia, made an address to him, on the occasion of his accession to the Presidency, expressive of the friendly sentiments entertained towards the United States by the Sovereigns and Governments whom they represent, and of their earnest desire to continue to maintain the existing friendly and peaceful relations between this country and theirs; to which address the President made a fitting reply, reciprocating these sentiments on his part, as chief magistrate of his own country.

The Senate had closed the extra session. As the time limited for the confirmation of the Zollverein treaty will expire before another session, it is of course permanently lost. It is understood that the cause of the rejection was chiefly that it compelled a reduction in the tariff on some articles, and thus interfered with what might be considered the legislative action of Congress and the privileges of the other house.

Great satisfaction was felt at the recent changes in the British tariff.

The health of General Jackson is represented to be very precarious.

No accounts of the missing packet-ships have been received, and all doubt as to their fate has now died away.

As regard Pennsylvanian affairs, the New York Herald states, that--

"The Appropriate Bill has passed one branch of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and there is no doubt but that it will pass the Senate by a large majority. This bill provides for the payment of the interest on the funded debt, due in August, and the current expenses of the state, after paying which, the interest on certain certificates issued is to be paid. If the funds in the State Treasury on the 1st of August are not sufficient to pay the full amount of interest due then, all demands of $50 and under are to be paid in cash, and the balance to be divided pro rata , and certificates to be given for the balance, to be paid on presentation out of the first monies received into the Treasury. The solvency and credit of Pennsylvania may be considered established upon a firm basis, and after another year the finances of the state will, without doubt, be in a condition to liquidate every liability at maturity.

The Legislature of Michigan was still in session. The Legislatures of all the other delinquent states had adjourned. In Michigan, a spirit to increase and improve the internal works of the state ran very high, and grants of land had been made to complete many now partly finished. The payment of the interest on the public debt had not, and probably would not, be provided for this session.

The money-market was sound, active, and easy, and upon the whole, all looked well and prosperous in the business condition of the country. The transactions in foreign exchanges were extensive, the supply of bills extensive, and the market closed firm at the quotations: on London, 109 5/8 to 109 ½fracs34;
We learn from Canada that the University Bill, granting equal privileges to all evangelical sects in the principal college of Canada West, which has heretofore been entirely under the control of the church of England, was carried on a second reading in the Assembly of the Provincial Parliament by a vote of 45 to 34. In the course of the debate Solicitor-General Sherwood and Inspector-General Robinson stated that they had placed their respective offices at the disposal of the Governor, in consequence of this having been made a Ministerial measure. His Excellency the Governor-General has accepted the Hon. Mr. Robinson's resignation. After it had been decided that the University Bills were not to be proceeded with this session, it was supposed the obstacle to Mr. Robinson's remaining in the Ministry had been removed.

The Customs Bill had passed. In connexion with this measure the Montreal Gazette says:--

"A New York paper says that the bill for allowing British and other goods to pass in bond through the United States has become law. We have considerable doubts that it will work, but if it does, it certainly will produce great changes in the commerce of this continent, and afford an additional reason for 'setting our house in order,' by establishing a railroad communication with the Atlantic.

"No doubt, however, is entertained that the measure will come into operation with the opening of the navigation, and it becomes our statesmen and merchants to direct their immediate attention to a matter which involves, not very remotely, the existence of our commercial cities, the revenues of our public works, the direct British trade, and with that protection and favour in the British markets. And it is a singular contrast, that while the Americans are passing an act for the purpose of securing to themselves the transit trade of the Canadas, the Canadians are doing all that legislation can do to repel the transit trade of the western states, and, not content with thwarting and abusing, as the enemies of the farmer, those who would attempt to secure them the manufacturing of American flour for the New England and West India markets, put an additional duty on that brought through for export to England; an act of folly for which it would be difficult to find a parallel."

The Provincial Parliament was to be prorogued on the 28th ultimo.

The town of Portland (suburb of St. John's, New Brunswick) had been the scene of a fierce riot. Four men were shot, one of whom is beyond recovery. The Royal Artillery, with field-pieces were called out, but before their arrival the ground was in possession of two companies of provincial troops, which restored order. The cause of this riot, for some reason or other, is not explained in the provincial papers. Religious prejudices are hinted at as the primary cause.

W. M'Leod, the Hon. G. Street, and Mr. John Allen had been provisionally appointed members of Her Majesty's Executive Council of New Brunswick.

The Texan advices by this arrival reach to the 8th ultimo. The Texan journalists were then beginning to discuss the annexation question in earnest: --

"The language of the papers generally," says the New York Commercial Advertiser, "indicates that there is either a genuine disposition to prefer the chances of a separate and independent national existence--rendered more favourable now by the strong probability that an amicable arrangement made be made with Mexico, consequent upon the overthrow of Santa Anna and the accession to power of men who are less under the influence of personal objects; or a belief, that the terms of annexation are really unjust and disadvantageous to Texas; or, finally, that a better speculation may be made by holding back and presenting a show of resistance; just as a man who has goods to sell, though willing to accept the price offered, affects indifference or reluctance, in hopes of making a still better bargain. We do not venture at present to offer an opinion on the question by which of these three possibilities the language of the Texan journals is instigated; but it will be admitted, we think, that if the tone of earnest indignation in which they speak is not sincere, it is at least exceedingly well counterfeited."

The following is from the Washington National (Texas), described as the Government organ:--

"If the people of Texas choose to revolutionize their Government and institute some new and different republican organization, they may do so without the leave of a foreign Government 'first had and obtained.' But the United States have acknowledged our title to be recognized as an independent nation, both de facto and de jure. Should we adopt the course designed by their resolutions we at once lose the benefit of that acknowledgment. We pass into a state of imbecile and hopeless dependence upon that power--to be annexed!--certainly never, until their aspiring partisans shall cease to need the material we now furnish them for the manufacture of political capital. Our relations with other Governments dissolved, and our own nationality renounced, the United States may consent to hold--as they shall have consented to place us--in a state of penultimate but unaccomplished annexation!

"But even this consent of the American Congress, meagre and valueless as it is to the people of Texas, but for which we are required to give to the United States a lien upon our country's sovereignty--this worthless consent, as if begrudged to Texas, is eke out to her at a miser's usury, and is shackled with what lawyers call 'conditions precedent.' Passing by the required sacrifice of our right to adjust the boundaries of our territory, the consent of that Congress, even once more to entertain the Texas question, is coupled with the cold assurance, that it we are ever admitted into the Union at all, we must cede to the United States all our mines, minerals, salt lakes, and springs, also all our public edifices, fortifications, barracks, ports, and harbours, navy and navy yards, docks, magazines, arms, armaments, and all other property and means pertaining to the public defence.'

"We must also yield up our revenue and our capacity to raise one; which single item, under the financial regulations of our fostering step-mother, would bring into her treasure at least $300,00 per annum; for which we have her kind permission to retain our public debt and keep our public domain; subject, however, to the payment of the debt, and circumscribed within such limits as she may hereafter be pleased to assign to our territory, in the exercise of her characteristic and far-stretching diplomacy, which once reached even to the western banks in the Sabine! We must, however, truckle to her pet abolitionists, by obligating ourselves to prohibit slavery north of the parallel of 36 degrees 30 minutes, known as the Missouri compromise line.

"We have always been a warm and hearty advocate for the cause of annexation; but never did we dream that the approval of the people of Texas would be required to a proposition so absurd, so degrading, as the one propounded by this resolution. Our space does not now admit of further detail. Suffice it, that we contrast our present elevated position, as a people, secure in the respect and amity of the great, enlightened nations of the earth; secure in the enjoyment of peace, and in the speedy acquisition of acknowledged independence; secure in the wealth which the commerce of Europe is about to pour into our lap, and in the enjoyment of peace, and in the speedy acquisition of acknowledged independence; secure in the wealth which the commerce of Europe is about to pour into our lap, and in the increasing value of our lands, arising from extended occupation, and the investment of foreign capital; secure of becoming 'the most favoured' by those powerful and wealthy sovereignties whom both interest and policy impel to cherish our prosperity and growth, that their markets may be supplied with our staples; and secure that the increase of commerce will speedily render no less consistent than desirable a great diminution of the present tariff--with the alternative presented by this resolution, of Texas divested of all these high privileges and advantages; shorn of her attributes as a nation; crippled in her commerce, in her prosperity, in her domestic resources; depressed by the burdens of public debt and direct taxation; her land, in consequence, depreciated in value, and, in the event of final annexation on the proposed basis, our public domain not only razeed and mortgaged to secure the payment of our debt, but even eviscerated of its mineral wealth, to swell the federal treasury.

"This is indeed but a dim and totally inadequate view of the actual pit and grace of insignificance and infamy into which the House of Representatives of the American Congress have proposed to plunge this nation.

"Since he, miscalled the Morning Star,

"Norman nor fiend hath fall'n so far!"

The National Register remarks:--

"The removal of this duty on cotton will enable the British Government to throw vast commercial, advantages into the hands of the merchants and planters of Texas. We have every reason to believe that if we conclude to remain independent, this duty will be removed from all Texas cotton introduced into English ports, while it will be retained upon that produced in the United States. Under this discrimination in our favour may be also embraced sugar and tobacco. In this way our rivalship with the United States will be almost instantly established. These great advantages could not fail to attract hither the planting capital of the southern states; for under such an arrangement they would gain by the change an increase of profits of not less than 40 per cent, per annum.

REVOLUTION IN MEXICO

The following graphic account of the occurrences in the city of Mexico which attended the overthrow of Santa Anna, is taken from one of the New York papers, and said to have been furnished by an eye-witness:--

"Pueblo, the second city in Mexico, at length 'pronounced.' The capital could no longer resist the contagion. Thousands, yes, tens of thousands, assembled in the Plaza, the great square in front of the Cathedral, and there sealed for ever the destiny of the late despotic President. Shouts of 'vivas' from twice ten thousand voices rent the air; clenched and uplifted hands and gesticulations of the most determined character indicated the deep-seated enthusiasm of the vast multitude. It was indeed a tremendous spectacle. I witnessed many men so impressed and affected at the sight that the tears were streaming down their faces. It was a motley scene; the Mexican gentlemen, the merchant, the lepero in his many-coloured sarape, the officer in his gorgeous regimentals, soldiers, crowds of young men, women, and boys--all combined to furnish a spectacle which those who witnessed it, and the intense enthusiasm which appeared to burn in every one, will never forget. The next day the plot thickened. As soon as it was fairly light multitudes assembled from all quarters; the streets Calle de Plateros and the Calle Monterella, were impassable for the vast crowd, who seemed stimulated to still greater enthusiasm than on the day preceding; they proceeded to destroy every statue, effigy, picture, or memorial of their late chief magistrate, who so long had ruled them with a rod of iron, whose word was law, whose will was inflexible and controllable by no man in Mexico.

"The populace first addressed itself to the beautiful column bearing Santa Anna on the summit, recently erected in the market-place. He was represented in a graceful attitude with outstretched arm, and his forefinger pointing towards Texas, as if to animate his countrymen in the re-conquest of that country. The statue was soon abased from its lofty eminence, and laid prostrate in the dust, amidst shouts, vivas, jeers, execrations, and laughter. I was present at the completion of this monument about three months before. It was a day and night dedicated to rejoicing, and the populace, in honour of the event, were regaled at the expense of the Government with balls, fireworks, and diversions of various descriptions. Little did I imagine that the very people who assembled in crowds round the beautiful column to admire and to read the encomiastic inscription at its base, would in so short a period be among the foremost to aid and exult at its downfall, to obliterate every trace of the letters bearing the now detested name of the Dictator.

"The theatre bearing the despot's name, 'Gran Teatro de Santa Anna,' next became the object of popular fury. This theatre is among the most splendid in the world; it has been but recently finished. It is understood that Santa Anna is one of the principal proprietors. I have seen no theatre either in London or Paris superior to it in luxury, elegance, or comfort. In the spacious porch leading to it there had been recently erected in honour of its patron, the President, a gigantic statue of himself, composed, I believe of bronzed plaster of Paris; this the populace seized, tore from its pedestal, dashed it with fury against the stone pavement, and shattering it into a thousand pieces, threw it upon the dunghill. Santa Anna in his defence of the charges brought against him, justly observes that this transaction was more worthy a nation of savages than of civilized beings.
"The revolution was no at its zenith. Crowds of young men assembled in the church of St. Domingo, and swore to protect the existing Constitution; shouts of 'Viva' and 'Death to the Tyrant!' issued fearlessly from beings who but a few weeks before had better have burnt their tongues than said so. They were supplied with arms and marched down the principal streets, amidst the vivas of beautiful women who crowed the balconies, waving their handkerchiefs, and by their encouragement infusing a still more determined spirit in the defenders of the country. 'If the women are against him,' remarked a gentleman with me, 'Santa Anna's case is indeed hopeless." [JSW]

MEXICO AND TEXAS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIME

Sir, --According to the last advices, the annexation of Texas to the United States may be considered as un fait accomli, at least as regards that Power. By what a series of errors this result has been attained. I shall briefly endeavour to prove to the satisfaction of impartial men on both sides of the Atlantic.

Who are the real authors of this threatened aggrandizement of a nation which, careless of the opinions of a large part of its population, strives to extend the slave system, with its attendant horrors?

The Mexican Republic, in the first place, because it has not used all its exertions to regain the vast territory in question, which is, and always was, an integral part of the state.

France, in the second place, induced probably by the representations of one of her Ministers, who, the day after he had signed a treaty of peace with Mexico, went to fraternize with her declared enemies--the usurpers of Texas,--and recognized the independence of a country which has been unable to retain it, as is clearly shown by the anxiety of the Texans to join the American federation.

Lastly, Great Britain, who, despite her costly sacrifices to extinguish slavery in her own dominions, and to restrain it everywhere, has opened a vast field for its extension by recognizing the independence of a state which can only exist by the slave system, and has, besides, fearfully augmented the power of her most formidable rival.

Thus, the Powers chiefly interested in the abolition of slavery, and in checking the aggrandizement of the United States, have actually assisted powerfully to extend the slave system, and to increase the power of the American federation.

The Cabinet at Washington has skilfully availed itself of the errors committed by its friends and neighbours; but the day is not far distant when two of these Powers will deeply regret the false policy and want of foresight which caused them to abandon Mexico in her struggle against the usurpation of the Anglo-Americans, contrary to their real interests and the dictates of justice and sound policy.

[JSW]

1845-4-15-5d Annexation of Texas

Although the recent vote of the Senate of the United States, and the Legislative act of Mr. Tylerin extremis, have rendered all discussion of the annexation of Texas superfluous, so far as the Americans are concerned; yet there are still obstacles to be surmounted, which may prove more stubborn than the constitutional difficulties or the political scruples which suspended the decision of the United States for a twelvemonth. These obstacles consist in the attitude of the Mexican Government and the resistance of a considerable party in Texas itself.
We shall, doubtless, shortly receive direct intelligence from Mexico as to the effect produced there by the measure of annexation, which was carried in Washington on the 28th of February; and we shall not venture to anticipate the result. Meanwhile General Almonte, the Mexican Minister accredited to the United States, has conducted himself with dignity, decision, and moderation. He has protested against the act of annexation, terminated his mission, demanded his passports, and retired from Washington to New York to await further instructions from his own Government. The new Government of Mexico has not yet had an opportunity of giving to the world any proof of its temper or ability; but we have reason to hope that it will not prove deficient in either of these qualities. It is composed of men sprung from the best families of the old Spanish colonial aristocracy, who are described as persons of far higher character and principle than SANTA ANNA—a mere military adventurer, but without even the merits of his profession, for he was a bully in the Cabinet and a craven in the field. If, then, the present Government of Mexico has any pretensions to discharge with honour the important duties it has assumed since the last revolution, it risks less in encountering the dangers of a foreign war than in tamely suitting to an act of spoliation, which at once established the ascendancy of its powerful neighbour, and demonstrates its own inability to defend its rights and its territory. Notwithstanding the great disparity in population, wealth, and energy between the two republics of North America, there are many considerations that militate in favour of the Mexicans. Such a war would not be a war of the United States, but of a party in that country, which does indeed possess a bare majority, but which has identified itself with everything that is most odious to a large and enlightened minority in the best States of the Union. Can anything exceed the dissatisfaction of the States of New England, or New York, or of Ohio, at having to meet the calls of war for the sake of an atrocious encouragement of slavery, which they have long since expelled from their own soil? The military establishment of the United States is very well adapted to the objects contemplated by its founders; for a militia, animated by patriotic unanimity, might suffice to repel a foreign enemy who should invade the Union. But offensive and defensive war are two different things. The regular army of the United States was reduced in 1842 to 9,012 men, who are employed in the garrisons on the coast, where they must remain. But to undertake field operations at all, even if they were to extend no further than the occupation of the Texan territory, an army of 20,000 or 25,000 would be indispensable; and although such a force might be raised among the loose population of the Southern States, it could only be equipped and maintained at the cost of the whole Union. How would such burdens be borne for the sake of such a cause? By what newly-devised system of credit would the partisans of repudiation extract a loan from the capitalists of Europe? Or by what new taxes is the revenue to be raised to meet a war expenditure? The invasion and conquest of a vast region by a State which is without an army and without credit, is a novelty in the history of nations; and although the United States have several times flung abroad marauders and sympathizers in great profusion, they would find it rather more onerous to support the operations of regular war.

Mexico, on the other hand, would be completely united in repelling such an attack. The unsettled state of the country and the independent habits of the people have left them far behind the United State in all that belongs to the parts of peace; but the Mexicans are perhaps less unprepared than the Anglo-Americans for irregular warfare. Strange as it may appear, such a war would be exceedingly popular throughout the ancient Spanish provinces; the people would engage in it en masse; and with ordinary ability n the part of their Generals, they would oppose a formidable resistance to any American force which could enter the country.

Such a war would indeed be a mere prolongation of a bootless struggle if Texas herself took a decided part in favour of annexation; but nothing can be further from the truth. American Presidents have told us on various occasions that Texas was soliciting a humble place amidst the group of United republics; and that her territory was forthwith to be reunited to that of the Union, which was dismembered by the Treaty of 1819; but it appears to be not improbable that, instead of converting the Texans into Americans, the Americans, who went out to settle and sympathize, are fairly turned into Texans.

"What." They say, "are the advantages offered us by this all-annexing Union? They offer to take all we are worth, except our debt. They promise us a high tariff, but the Custom-house duties which may be levied on our trade, will be carried to the revenue of the United States. Why did we come here at all, if the first event that befalls us is to replace us under all the restrictions existing in the Union, and to deprive us of all the peculiar advantages which led us to speculate on the future prosperity of the Texan republic?" These arguments are unanswerable; and although the American settlers doubtless emigrated to Texas for the purpose of seizing the country and annexing it to their own, they will have no scruple in betraying the one any more than the other, and will probably be guided by their own immediate interests, rather than by an political considerations at all.
We most sincerely believe that those interests, was well as the general interests of the country, will be sacrificed by annexation; and GENERAL JACKSON used an argument which was a least sincere, when he endeavoured to raise the jealousy of the United States by describing the progress of Texas, as an independent community, more highly favoured by climate and by commercial legislation than any part of the Union. Some may wish to win Texas as an ally, but many more would be well pleased to crush an argument which was a least sincere, when he endeavoured to raise the jealousy of the United States by describing the progress of Texas, as an independent community, more highly favoured by climate and by commercial legislation than any part of the Union. Some may wish to win Texas as an ally, but many more would be well pleased to crush her as a future rival.

If, at the present crisis, the affairs of Mexico and of Texas were wisely and vigorously managed, it might still be possible to terminate this discussion without any evil consequences. The recognition of the independence of Texas by Mexico has been too long delayed; let it now be granted on condition that the Texan Government binds itself to maintain that independence inviolate. Texas has no claim to render herself independent on the United States. Her independence is absolute, or it is nothing. An if a compact of this nature could be effected between Mexico and Texas, with or without the mediation and guarantee of the European Powers, it is not easy to see by what means the United States could give effect to their scheme of annexation, except by an open violation of all rights and by a direct appeal to force.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

The following is the protest of the Mexican Minister at Washington, General Almonte, against the annexation of Texas:--

"The undersigned, &c., has the honour to address the Hon. John C. Calhoun, &c., for the purpose of making known to him the profound regret with which he has seen that the General Congress of the Union has passed a law consenting to and admitting into the American Confederation the Mexican province of Texas.

"For these reasons the undersigned, in fulfilment of his instructions, finds himself obliged to protest, as he does accordingly protest, in the most solemn manner, in the name of his Government, against the law passed on the 28th of last month by the General Congress of the United States, and sanctioned on the 1st of the present month by the President of the said States by which the province of Texas, an integral part of the Mexican territory, is allowed to be admitted into the American Union.

"The undersigned, in like manner, declares that the aforesaid law can in no manner invalidate the right which the Mexican nation possesses to recover the aforesaid province of Texas, of which she is now unjustly despoiled, and which right she will sustain and enforce at all times, by whatever means are in her power.

"The undersigned had flattered himself that in this question the good sense and sound opinions of the citizens most distinguished and experienced in the management of public affairs in this republic would have prevailed in the deliberations of the legislative body and of the Union; but unfortunately, this has not been the case, and, contrary to his hopes and most sincere wishes, he sees consummated by the American Government an act of aggression the most unjust which can be recalled in the annals of modern history, such as the spoliation of a friendly nation like Mexico of a considerable part of her territory.

"The undersigned will say in conclusion to the hon. Secretary of State of the United States, in order that he may be pleased to inform the President of the said States of the same, that in consequence of the law against which he has just protested, his mission to this Government is terminated from today. Consequently the undersigned requests the hon. Secretary of State to be pleased to send him his passport, as he has arranged to quit this city as soon as possible for New York.

"The undersigned, &c. "ALMONTE.

"Washington, 6th March, 1845."
THE "WAR CONDITION" OF THE UNITED STATES.--

A commission of British naval and military officers and engineers have recently been employed by the Government in surveying the southern and southeastern coasts of England, with a view to the more complete fortification of those coasts against a possible invasion from France, in the event of another war. They have recommended the formation of several new large harbours, to be formed by breakwaters and moles of great extent and strength, and to be so constructed as to form very effective batteries. These, in addition to those already existing, will afford accommodation for a large fleet of steamers ready for any emergency, and at the same time provide a refuge for British merchantmen in distress. The Royal navy of Great Britain already contains about 200 steamers, many of them of the largest size. Since the 1st of April, 1839, 49 have been built, and others are now in progress which will, when completed, greatly increase the effective steam force of the navy. This is also entirely independent of the very large increase proposed by Sir Robert Peel. Besides these, there is an immense number of steamers, which are now employed as packets, &c., but which, in the event of war, could readily be rendered serviceable. There are 60 belonging to the part of Liverpool along. The Government is also busily employed in repairing all the works at places already fortified, and in fortifying these which are not. Guns are to be kept constantly mounted at Portsmouth, Plymouth, and the mouth of the Thames. These vigorous preparations indicate anything, on the part of the British Government, but a strong confidence is the speedy advent of the millennium. The rapid progress of peace principles, the growing hostility among all the nations of the earth, to war, form admirable topics for declamation; but it must be confessed that at present they are among the things to be desired, rather than expected. Our Government has never more strikingly neglected the excellent and safe maxim, which enjoins, in time of peace, ample preparation for war, than at the present moment. With, to say the least, the imminent hazard of war hanging over us, a war which may be a small one, but which may also place the whole civilized world in arms, our Government and people remain as calm as "a summer's morning." We trust that our peaceful slumbers will suffer no unpleasant disturbance.--New York Courier and Inquirer. [JSW]

ANNEXATION OF TEXAS

The discussions now going on in the republic of Texas between the American party which seeks to be absorbed in the Federal union of the American States, and the national Texan party, which upholds the independent interests of the new state, are matters of the deepest interest not only to the annexation question of the present day, but to the future destinies of the continent of North America. If Texas at once flings away her national existence, and makes herself subservient to the policy of the United States, it is highly improbable that any other new state will attain to independence in the southern regions of North America, and the progress of the dominions of the Cabinet of Washington will be as rapid as the decay of its defenceless and ungoverned southern neighbours. More than 20 years have elapsed since Mexico threw off her allegiance to Spain, and during the whole of that period the decline of the nation has been inconceivably great and rapid. The result is now pitiable. The country is stated by a recent observer to be as defenceless as it was in the days of MONTEZUMA. Another CORTEZ might march with a few hundred men upon the capital; and as for the northern and western provinces, more especially the magnificent territory of California, since the sequestration of the missions and presidios, they are without even the semblance of a Government. The whole white population of California is hardly more than 5,000, scattered over 2,000 square leagues of territory; the Mexican Administration does not even communicate with the province; and to conquer the whole of it would not be more difficult than to take possession of a desert island. In these thinly peopled regions the inhabitants are manifestly unable to defend their territorial rights; and when they have lost the protection of a great power, whose policy is jealous of all encroachments on the future interests of its subjects, they fall an easy prey to a sort of retail invasion, until the sovereignty of the country is filched away before an effort has been made to challenge the assailant.
The eager, gain-seeking, and roving population of the western states of the Union are fitted beyond all the rest of mankind to carry on this kind of surreptitious warfare. They conquer provinces as the cuckoo steals a nest; and if their irregular enterprises be allowed to carry with them all the political consequences of lawful war, it is evident that at no very distant period they will have made themselves masters of all such parts of the North American continent as are not defended by the forces and the resolution of Great Britain. But the conduct of Texas in the present emergency will determine whether these political consequences are to be realized. It depends on the acceptance or rejection of the proposed measure of annexation by the people and Government of Texas, whether every fresh step of the Anglo-American race is to add citizens and lands to the Union; or whether the new states which may be formed in course of time on either shore of that vast continent may not uphold an independent flag, independent interests, and an independent policy.

When we take into consideration the position of Texas, the decline of Mexico, and the future condition of the unappropriated lands, rivers, and regions lying between the coast of Upper California on the Pacific Ocean and the Rio Bravo del Norte, it is impossible to doubt that such a country ought to possess an original character and an independent existence. Its annexation to the United States, if that measure be consummated at the present time, would only lead the more surely to the eventual disruption of that wide and imperfectly-united confederacy, and to a struggle which would prove injurious to the best interests of the whole continent. But Texas independent is peculiarly qualified to interpose, as it were, the keystone of an arch between the United States and Mexico on the one hand, and between the maritime interests of European and of American nations on the other. These views are so clear and evident that they will probably have a decisive influence on the Executive Government of the United States, provided the Mexicans can be brought to recognize in a liberal spirit an arrangement which is the sole guarantee of their national existence. Nor can we believe that this policy will be defeated by the popular emissaries of the United States in Texas, who are avowedly engaged in promoting the work of annexation solely with reference to the interests of their own party in the United States, and to the cause of slavery with which that party is identified.

The part taken by England and France in this question—-for we are happy to find that the most entire concurrence prevails between the two great Powers by which Texas was first recognized in Europe—has been dictated by no such selfish or exclusive objects. To them individually the annexation of Texas offers no very formidable dangers, and her independence promises no very certain or conspicuous advantages. But they are actuated by a sincere desire to uphold in America that respect for territorial rights which is the only sure basis of peace; and in maintaining the independence of Texas they may hope to establish an important element in the distribution of power over North America. There, as well as in Europe, an universal dominion is impracticable.

If, however, the annexation party be successful, and the patriotic intentions of the President are defeated by the foreign party in the commonwealth of Texas, that result only opens the door to fresh difficulties, and to difficulties of the most serious character. The claim of the United States to Texas is a claim studiously undefined, and purposely obscure; but once admitted, it would be found to embrace the distant objects of American ambition even on the shores of the Pacific. Already several attempts have been made by the Ministers and officers of the United States to obtain the cession of the great harbours on the coast of California. In 1835, MR. FORSYTH offered to the Mexican Government five millions of dollars for the port of San Francisco—-one of the finest naval positions in the world; and a few years later an American commodore actually seized, on some pretended rumour of war with Mexico, the town and harbour of Monterey.

The time is now rapidly approaching when the western coast of North America—hitherto the least peopled, the least productive, and the least frequented portion of the globe—will become the scene of great political interests, and will gradually be animated with the stir of nations and the activity of social life. The United States are seeking to subject these future races and states to their dominion, and, without any army or any of the ordinary instruments of conquest, to extend their sovereignty over nations yet unborn. The scheme for the annexation of Texas is the most decided step they have made in this direction; but that is only the prelude to their ulterior designs. The claim to the exclusive possession of the Oregon territory is another indication of the same policy; it will be followed by an attack, either by force or by fraud, on California. On all these points the same unlimited spirit of aggrandizement prevails. For the protection of the British dominions in North America ample means exist; and indeed, the possession of the Oregon territory by the Hudson's Bay Company, under the joint conditions of the convention of 1818, is practically conclusive on the point. But in provinces in which no European power has any direct concern, the only check to the rapacious encroachments of the United States will be found to consist in the establishment of another energetic and independent power to share the dominion of North America, and such a power we still hope Texas may become. [JSW]

MEXICO AND TEXAS

The following official communication and protest against annexation has been addressed by order of the Mexican Government to Mr. Shannon, the United States Minister in Mexico. It will be seen that the Mexican Government is firm in its language, and declares that it will resist the aggrandising policy of the United States by all the means at its disposal:--

"TO HIS EXCELLENCY WILSON SHANNON, ESQ., ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

"The National Palace, Mexico, March 28, 1845.

"The undersigned Minister for Foreign Affairs in addressing, for the last time, his Excellency Wilson Shannon, Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America regrets to inform him that the law of the Congress of the said union for the annexation of Texas 86 their territory having been ? the Minister of Mexico, being retired from his mission at Washington, and the protest against the act of the Congress and Government of the United States having been made, the diplomatic relationship with the two countries cannot be continued.

"What can the undersigned add to what he has already aid for his Government on the serious affront which that of the United States offers to Mexico by usurping a portion of its territory, and violating the treaties of friendship, which the republic has observed on its part as long as its harbour and the desire of avoiding a rupture with the United States have permitted. Nothing is more to be lamented than that free and republican nations, their neighbours, and worthy of its fraternal union, founded on their mutual interest and on their joint observance of noble and upright conduct, should break off their relations for an event with Mexico has endeavoured to avert, which the United States have consummated, and which is an offensive, in the former as it is unworthy of the reputation of the United States.

"The undersigned reproduces to his Excellency W. Shannon, Esq., the protest which he has addressed to him against the annexation, adding, that the Mexican republic will oppose ? all the firmness becoming its honour and sovereignty and that his Government ardently desired that that of the United States may pay more regard to the considerations of honour and justice than to those of an accession of territory at the expense of a friendly republic, which in the midst of its misfortunes, desires to preserve an unsullied reputation, and thereby ? the rank to which it is called by in destiny.

"The undersigned has the honour to offer to his Excellency W. Shannon, Esq., his entire personal respect, reinstating the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

"LUIS G. CUEVAS.

"The undersigned Minister of Foreign Affairs has the honour to address with regret to his Excellency * * *in order to transmit it to his Government, the solemn and formal protest which that of the republic desires to express in this note, on occasion of an event which, offending in the highest degree the rights and the honour of Mexico, violates at the same time the universal principles of justice, the respect to which free and independent nations are entitled, and that good faith which civilization has established as the first basis of international policy. His Excellency * * *will understand that the undersigned speaks of the law passed by the Congress of the United States, and sanctioned by their Government, for the annexation of the department of Texas to the territory of the American union.

"The represent in all its deformity the note of Congress and of the Government of the United States, and the alarming consequences of its conduct towards the republic of Mexico, would be a useless labour, when this note is sent to the representative of a nation equally illustrious and powerful, which nobly sustaining the rank which it holds in the world, respects the laws of good friendship with other nations, and founds its glory on the immutable titles of morality and justice. Neither does the Government of the undersigned find it necessary to state all the reasons on which it relies for not permitting this annexation to be carried into effect; because they are as obvious and well-known as the regret will be profound which will be caused in friendly nations, and even in those which have no relation with Mexico, by a step injurious and offensive to that country, and unworthy of the good name and honour of the United States.

"But the undersigned will permit himself to represent to his Excellency * * * that the American Government having been the first to recognize the independence of the republic, showing itself as a zealous partisan of its liberty, has been the only one that has attempted to despoil it of a portion of its territory; and that this view has been as ancient, as it has lately declared, as the friendship which it sought to confirm since by a treaty, and by another special boundary treaty, which it now completely violates. In assisting Texas to separate itself from the republic the Cabinet of the United States has violates good faith; but in assisting Texas to incorporate itself with the American Union, and in declaring that such has been the policy of its Government for the last 20 years, it has pursued a conduct of which there is no example in the history of civilized nations.

"Mexico, to terminate differences which for the most part were not founded on any principle of justice, has suitted to serious injuries, has forgotten losses and damages, and has maintained an uprightness of conduct which, if possible, gives it a greater right to raise its voice and to protest, as the undersigned hereby protests, against the annexation of Texas to the United States, and against all its consequences. The Mexican republic will employ its power and its resources to prevent it, and, relying on the good right which is on its side, it does not fear to affirm that whatever may be the result. It will preserve the honour, which it must defend, at whatever cost in this very serious question.

"And for this purpose the undersigned requests* * * to forward this protest, accepting the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

"LUIS G. CUEVAS.

"The preceding note is communicated to their Excellencies the Minister's Plenipotentiary of France, England, and Spain."

LT 1845-5-15-5f Protest of Mexico against annexation of Texas

"United States Legation, March 31.

"The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary, &c. of the United States, has the honour of acknowledging the receipt of his Excellency, Senor Cueva's, Minister of Foreign Relations, &c., note of the 28th of March, announcing that the Congress of the United States has sanctioned the annexation of Texas to its territory; that the Mexican Minister at Washington had terminated his official relations, and protested against the said act of the Congress and Government of the United States, and that diplomatic relations between the two countries could not be continued.

"The liberal and honourable sentiments entertained by the actual Government of Mexico had induced the undersigned to hope that the differences which exist between the two Governments could be arranged amicably upon terms just and honourable to both. It would appear, however, from the note of his Excellency Senor Cuevas, that Mexico declines to adjust these differences in this manner, and thus preserve the peace of the two countries.

"The undersigned can assure his Excellency Senior Cuevas that his (Mr. Shannon's) Government entertains the livelies; desire to cultivate amicable relations with that of Mexico, and here he will improve this opportunity to repeat that which he has before communicated to the Government of Mexico, to wit--that the United States has not adopted the measure of annexation in any spirit of hostility towards Mexico, and that the United States are anxious to settle all questions which may grow out of this measure, including that of boundaries, on terms the most just and libera.
"Having offered the olive branch of peace, and manifested a sincere desire to arrange these questions amicably, and upon principles just and honourable to both Governments, the United States have done whatever is in their power to preserve the friendly relations between them; and it now remains for Mexico to decide, whether they shall be continued, or whether the peace of the two countries shall be broken by a conflict equally injurious to both, and which can give satisfaction only to the enemies of civil liberty and republican institutions.

"The undersigned will pass over in silence the charge made against his Government of having violated the treaty of friendship with Mexico. The right of Texas to cede the whole or a part of her territory to the United States, and the right of the United States to accept such occasion, have already been amply vindicated repeatedly.

"The undersigned has received no official communication as to the action of his Government in regard to the annexation of Texas to the Union; nevertheless he cannot doubt, from the tenour of his personal correspondence, that the measure has been passed by Congress and approved by the President. He expects daily despatches from his Government, with special instructions upon this subject; and before taking any further steps, has resolved to await their arrival.

"The undersigned has the honour, &c.,

"WILSON SHANNON, Minister, &c."

In reply to the above the following spirited letter was sent two days after:--

"National Palace, Mexico, April 2.

"The undersigned, Minister of Foreign Relations, has the honour to communicate to his Excellency Mr. Shannon, Minister, &c., in reply to the note of his Excellency of the 31st of March, that the Government of Mexico cannot continue diplomatic relations with the United States upon the presumption that such relations are reconcileable with the law which the President of the Unitd States has approved in regard to the annexation of the department of Texas to the American Union; that this determintion is founded upon the necessity which Mexico is under of maintaining no friendship with a republic which has violated her obligations--usurped a portion of territory which belongs to Mexico by a right which she will maintain at whatever cost; that the relations between the two countries cannot be re-established before a complete reparation of that injury (aggravio), such as is demanded by good faith, justice to Mexico, and the honour of the United States, is made.

"Moreover, the undersigned will take the liberty to say to his Excellency Mr. Shannon, that if the United States Government thinks that it entertained friendly sentiments towards Mexico at the time of giving such offence, and when attacking the integrity of the republic of Mexico, this Government (Mexico) is very far from entertaining the same views, or of acquiescing in the assurances which his Excellency Mr. Shannon has given, whatever may be its sentiments towards his Excellency personally.

"The undersigned, in making this announcement to his Excellency Mr. Shannon, doing so by the order of the President of Mexico--cutting short a new discussion which the interruption of the relations of the two countries will not permit, and because nothing can be added to what this department has already paid--has the honour to renew the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

"LUIS G. CUEVAS."

The New Orleans Picayunesays,--

"On the 3d ult. Senor Cuevas, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, addressed to the Chambers a long and general memorial appertaining to his department. He places strong apparent confidence in the interference of European Powers, which although assenting to Texan independence, may, he trusts, oppose the further enlargement of United States territory. A large portion of the Secretary's voluminous memorial is occupied with the presentation of the affairs of the departments."

The following passage occurs in it:--

"Texas declared as independent would not care to be annexed to the United States, but not so the latter. The recognition of the independence of Texas would not lead us into a war with the United States, but annexation must. As an independent State, European Powers will prevent Texas from forming a part of the American republic.

The papers of the city of Mexico and of Vera Cruz continue to be occupied almost exclusively with the subject of annexation. The official paper, El Diario del Gobierno, of the 3d inst. Announces that it is in possession of certain movements on the part of the Government of a war-like character, which it is constrained to withhold from the public, as secrecy is the soul of military operations; but expresses a hope that the speedy and successful issue of these operations will soon relieve the public curiosity in regard to them.

The New York Journal of Commerce publishes the following important extract of a letter from the city of Mexico, dated the 28th of March:

"The Government has issued orders for the defence of the ports, fortresses, &c., and it is acknowledged that if Texas does not comply with their last request, war will be openly declared."

And the New Orleans Bulletin again says,

"A letter from a respectable source in Vera Cruz, under date of the 2d inst. Says, that an act had passed to a second reading in the Mexican Congress, making it high treason for any person to propose a recognition of the independence of Texas, or the peaceable possession of that country by the United States. A majority of the members, it is further stated, are in favour of active hostilities against Texas, in order to provoke a war and throw the onus of it on the United States."

The British frigate Eurydice arrived at Vera Cruz on the morning of the 12th ult., from Galveston, with despatches, which were immediately forwarded to the capital.

An American squadron, consisting of the frigate Potomac, sloop Falmouth, and brigs Fairfield and Somers, was spoken at sea on the 17th ult., bound to Vera Cruz.

Santa Anna's trail was slowly progressing. His health is represented as very indifferent.

The people of the department of the Chihuahua refuse positively to pay all direct taxes levied by the Government, on the ground that the irruptions of the Aspache Indians have reduced them to extreme want, and that they need succour from the Government instead of being compelled to contribute to its support. General Woll, of the Army of the North, arrived at Mexico on the 23rd ult., having resigned the command of his troops to General Arista.

The city of Mexico had been much damaged by an earthquake, experienced on the 7th ult.

A Galveston letter of the 17th ult. In the Richmond Enquirer, says--

"Mexico has made, through the British Minister, overtures to this Government for the appointment of Commissioners to form a treaty of commerce, &c., on the basis of the acknowledgment of our independence. To these overtures the President gave the British Minister nothing but vague and indefinite answers. This comes directly from Elliott himself, and may be relied upon. He left here to-day in the British man-of-war for Charleston, as it is said--but I do not know to what place he may have gone--I give you only such information as I know to be correct."

Accounts from Buenos Ayres (of an earlier date than those we before published) state, that the Hon. William Brent, jun., United States Charge d'Affaires, had protested against the interference of the French Admiral, on the ground that European nations should not control political parties among the American republics. He alleges further, we learn, that the war in the river La Plata has already been continued seven years by reason of the course pursued by the English and French nations.

They further add the following:

"In the Uruguay Republic there had been several skirmishes between the belligerents, and the department of Maldonado was in the hands of the Rivera party. In other parts of the Republic quietness prevailed. The new French Charge had presented his credentials, and had been received at Buenos Ayres. A new Brazilian Minister Plenipotentiary had been received at Monte Video. There was a report in circulation, one or two days before the Nautius sailed, that the Argentine Minister at Rio de Janeiro, General Gido, had demanded his passports, the Brazilian Government having granted General Paz leave to set out from Rio de Janeiro and pass through their province to Corrientes.

Accounts from Port au Prince to the 14th ultimo state, that ex-President Herard, in the schooner La Granada, had been seen off the southern part of the island, and attacked one of the gun boats. The whole coast was guarded by vessels and men to prevent the ex-President and his adherents from landing. The Government called out all persons able to bear arms. The whole of that part of the island belonging to the Haytien Government was under martial law. Several of the adherents of Herard had been taken and shot. There was great excitement throughout the island; but although numerous arrests were made in different parts of the Republic, judging from the tone of the journals, there was no general sympathy for Herard, nor any very serious apprehensions felt by the partisans of Government that his attempts to revolutionize the country would be successful. It was rumoured at Port Republican that a revolution had taken place at St. Domingo, which had resulted in the expulsion of General Santana from the Presidency, and in the elevation to that office of Regla Mota, a member of the numerous and highly respectable family of the Alvares de Zaguate (Saint Christophe). His accession to the Presidency of the Domican Republic would be the triumph of an enlightened and liberal party over intrigue and demagoguism personified in Santana and Bobadilla.

Vera Cruz papers contain intelligence from Guatemala to a late date. On the 1st of February an officer, named Mariano Mendez, who was on guard at the public square, liberated the prisoners, gave them arms, surprised the President's house, took possession of all the barracks except those of San Francisco, and proclaimed General Monterosa chief of the republic. Colonel Bolano, with the troops which remained faithful to the Government, attacked the square the next day, and a short conflict brought the insurgents to terms. They were to leave the city on the 6th, and cease all hostilities under the promise of pardon.

A revolution was effected in San Salvador early in February, by conflicts between the military, and civil authorities. General Calixto Malispina, the commandant of the troops, had been displaced. [JSW]

MEXICO

HAVANNAH, MAY 9.

I have received important intelligence from Mexico, by the Thames steamer, which left Vera Cruz on the 1st, and brings letters from the capital of the 28th ult. Though an official announcement has not yet been made of the decision of the Government, no doubt is entertained in well-informed quarters that Mexico will immediately consent to recognize the independence of Texas, the Texan Government as an equivalent refusing the proposed incorporation with the United States. In this matter the initiative has been taken by Texas, and Captain Elliot, our Charge d'Affaires and Consul-General, had so far seen the propriety of supporting the proposition, that he left Galveston in Her Majesty's ship Eurydice, and landing at Vera Cruz, reached the Mexican capital on the 14th ult. It appears the negotiation had so well succeeded, that on the 21st thead interim President and the Minister for Foreign Affairs sent down a message to the Congress, informing it of the proposition of Texas, and TEXAS ANNEXED.--"A few days ago," says the Mobile Herald, "Judge Bragg of the Circuit Court, decided that Texas was a part of the United States. The question came up by a juror petitioning to be excused from the performance of his assigned duty, on the plea that he as a citizen of Texas. The Judge ordered him to take his seat in the box with the other 11, giving for his reason, that Texas was a part of the Union, and all her citizens liable to be called upon to do duty as citizens of the United States. [JSW]" demanding permission to treat. Captain Elliot remained till the 24th at Mexico, when he left for Jalappa, one day's journey from Vera Cruz, and it was his intention to await there the official declaration of the Government. The Eurydice remained at Vera Cruz to re-convey the Consul-General to his post.

Letters of the 28th from Mexico leave no doubt on the probability of a compromise being come to, as the Government commanded a large majority in the Lower House, though it was in a small minority in the Senate. It is argued that the mere fact of the ad interim President venturing to send a message to Congress indicates a foregone conclusion; as, in the state of public opinion on Texan matters, no Government would dare to do so without having previously become master of the ground. I subjoin a copy of the message, from which it will be seen that the President takes much pains to disguise the pill which the Congress is to swallow, as he speaks much of war and his determination not to suit to the incorporation of Texas with the United States.

The refusal of Texas to the propositions of the American Government does not appear on the face of the proceedings, but is evidently the mainspring of the whole affair. The British Consul-General has probably availed himself of the natural desire of Texas to gain the recognition of Mexico to drive such a bargain as is the interest of both sides to agree to, as well as to throw back the annexation of Texas to the United States, without making his Government a prominent party in so doing. How long that annexation may be postponed, I cannot at present determine; but it is clear that the present proceedings are expedients to gain time, and in similar circumstances the gaining of time is most desirable. Indeed, we may find at last that Texas, recognized by Mexico, may prefer its existence as an independent state to its incorporation with the United States. There is a Spanish proverb which says, "It is better to be a rat's head than a lion's tail," and probably the Texans may apply it.

Should this negotiation be attended with all the desired success, new questions will arise respecting the precise limits of Mexico and Texas, which may lead to difficulties, and afford the Government of the United States fresh pretexts for interference.

The trial of Santa Anna is proceeding slowly. I understand that the ex-President has still a large party in the country, and the present Government will be glad to make a compromise, if he agrees to voluntary banishment for a period of ten years.

The following is a translation of the Message to the Congress above referred to, signed by Cuevas, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and dated Mexico, April 21, 1845:--

"Excellent Sirs,--The affairs of Texas present so serious an aspect, and call so imperiously for the consideration of Congress and the Executive, that, without contracting a great responsibility, the taking a decided resolution preparatory to their termination in a manner honourable to the Government can no longer be delayed. The Government having placed a considerable number of troops on that frontier, and taken such other measures as you have already approved to sustain the dignity and character of the Republic, feels the less difficulty in coming before you on this important occasion.

"Circumstances have arisen which not only make it convenient but necessary that negotiations should take place in order that the annexation of Texas to the United States may be prevented--an event which Mexico could not suit to, and which would render war with the United States inevitable, whatever might be the result. Texas has made an initiative step, and his Excellency the interim President is penetrated with the necessity of taking it into consideration, though at the same time he does not feel qualified to do so without first receiving from you such powers as the constitutions prescribes for treating on diplomatic affairs. The Government, faithful to its duty, willing to suit all its acts to free discussion, and convinced that national affairs should be treated with pure patriotism, heedless of attack from whatever side it may come, has felt that in the present state of the affair of Texas it would be wrong to refuse the negotiation to which it has been invited; but it does not take any further step without consulting the wisdom of the legislative corps. If an honourable arrangement can be made so as to satisfy the national honour, Government will lose no time in suitting it to the Congress; and if no arrangement can be come to, however desirous the Government may be to maintain the blessings of peace in a manner worthy of the republic, it will have no difficulty of adopting the alternative of war, however, painful it may be, as that war must be just in proportion to the sacrifices made to prevent it.

"The preliminary propositions offered by Texas are honourable in themselves and favourable to the republic, and the Government, without concluding anything, has not hesitated to accept them as a simple initiative of the proposed arrangement. To refuse treating would, in fact, lead to the incorporation of Texas with the United States, and the Chamber, when informed of that refusal, would have a heavy charge to make against the present Administration. To decline listening to propositions of peace which may lead to a satisfactory termination, though not unreasonable on the part of a justly irritated nation, yet would be unwise under existing circumstances, and lead to a war attended with serious consequences to the State.

"The Chambers well know what the conduct of the Government would have been if it acted on its own proper impulse on hearing of the law passed by the United States for the annexation of Texas, satisfied as it was of the support of all true and patriotic Mexicans. The sacrifice is therefore great on the part of his Excellency the interim President and the Ministry when they agree to ask from Congress the authority with which this message concludes. The sacrifice is made from a profound conviction of its necessity, from an ardent desire of the prosperity of the republic, and from the confidence that if, after having done all that was possible to maintain peace, war should become necessary, it will end in a manner honourable to the national arms, and with ample justice to the people who provoked it.

"As a consequence of the foregoing exposition, His Excellency the interim President and the Council of Ministers unanimously suit for the consideration of the Chamber the following resolution:--

"The Government is authorized to give hearing to the propositions which have been made to it respecting Texas, and proceed to an arrangement or celebration of a treaty useful and honourable to the republic, keeping the Congress acquainted with what is done for its examination and approval.'

"To the Secretary of the Chamber of Deputies."

I find that the Mexican Government, to meet its difficulties, has asked leave of Congress to make a loan for 3,000,000 dollars, the interest not to exceed 15 per cent, and I understand it will get about half that amount in cash from persons who have old claims to be recognized.

The slave-trade prospers in this island. The notorious Palmyra landed, within two miles of this city, on the night of the 7th, a cargo consisting of from 300 to 400 slaves.

same order the whole of the documents belonging to the republic will be handed over by the present agents to Messrs. Schneider.

The following letter officially confirms the facts mentioned yesterday with respect to Mexico:--

"Mexico, April 28, 1835

"Sir,--We beg to hand to you herewith duplicate of our letter of the 31st ult.
Together with a copy of one which we addressed to you (in triplicate) on the 5th inst., communicating the resolution which the Mexican Government had come to, of removing its agency in London from Messrs. Lizardi and Co. to Messrs. John Schneider and Co., the official documents relative to which we send forward by this opportunity.

"With much satisfaction we have now to announce that the Mexican Government has been induced to assign to the bondholders, to commence from the 1st proxime, 10 per cent of the whole of the duties collected in the Custom-houses of Vera Cruz and Tampico, until such time as the sum of about $340,000, abstracted from their funds the commencement of the late revolution, shall be refunded, and we enclose a copy of the decree to this effect, dated the 17th inst.

"A measure is now before the Senate, having already passed the Chamber of Deputies, the object of which is to empower the Executive to arrange the public debt of the nation, and place it on a sound and just basis. Should we be able to procure a copy of this project before the departure of the packet, we shall send it enclosed for your information.

    "We remain, &c.,
    "MANNING AND MACKINTOSH.

"To G. R. Robinson, Esq. Chairman of the Committee of Spanish American Bondholders."

As far as can be learned of the plans which Messrs. Schneider intend to adopt in their management of the Mexican debt, they seem of a kind to give the greatest satisfaction to the creditors. Their principle, it is said, will be to court publicity as much as possible, and to keep no secrets from parties who legitimately desire information. After the arrival of each remittance, they will, it is believed, post up the amount where it may be seen by any one entering their office, the former notices not to be removed upon the arrival of a fresh remittance, but to stand as a lasting record of all the sums that come into their hands. A plan like this would prevent every possibility of complaint.

Among the defects of the present arrangement of the Overland Mail pointed out by the Indian papers, and requested to be remedied, is that of an indiscriminate mixing of the boxes, so that mistakes frequently occur in the delivery of the despatches. It is stated that the mails prepared on the 20th and 24th of February last in England for India were in such a confused state, that the captain of the Calcutta steamer, when asked at Point de Galle for the letters and newspapers for Bombay, declared that he had but one box, which he gave to the Bombay steamer, and took the remainder to Madras, whence they were forwarded after several days; delay.

Some remarks in the Bombay papers about the notion prevailing in England relative to that presidency being too unimportant a place to receive the advantage of the half-monthly mail, show the feeling prevailing in that quarter upon the subject. Bombay, these writers assert, is the only port which, under existing arrangements, can have the benefit of two direct mails a month. The other points in India were never meant to have more than one mail direct, and another across the continent of India. It appears they do not ask that any arrangement shall be made with the Oriental Company to bring the mails on from Aden, but they only stand on the right of the Bombay Government having steamers at Aden or Galle to take the mails from the Calcutta steamers. This is an arrangement which, it seems, for the satisfaction of all parties, must at last be suited to, because, taking the average of the Bombay express, which occupies about 15 days, there would be, compared with the ordinary passage of the Oriental Company's steamers, a savings of two or five days, which would give the merchants ample opportunity of answering their letters with certainty and facility. As it is now, the contrary happens to be the case, and the Calcutta steamers commonly pass each other in sight of port. [JSW]

MR. POLK'S OREGON DECLARATION

The official organ, the Washington Globe, thus defends Mr. Polk's Oregon declaration:--

"A communication from a European Sovereign to his subjects is no model for an address from an American President to his fellow-citizens on entering upon the discharge of his arduous and responsible duties; nor is he to be deterred on such occasions, by the rules and observances required in diplomatic discussions, from the frankest and boldest expressions of his sentiments; nor is he restricted from openly using his exertions and influence to carry out the views, on any subject, which he believes to be advantageous to his country, by the circumstance that a negotiation is in progress with another nation on the same subject.

"A British Sovereign possesses himself ample powers to protect his subjects in such a case, without reference to another branch of the Government, much less to the people. He can terminate the existing convention with regard to Oregon by a letter from his Foreign office to his Minister at Washington, and can cause the country to be occupied, and forts to be erected in it, by another letter from his Admiralty to the commander of his naval forces in the Pacific, or from his Colonial Secretary to his Governor-General of Canada. He has, therefore, no need, and certainly no desire, to introduce the subject in a message to Parliament; and when legislative action becomes necessary, his Ministers are in both houses to make the necessary arrangements and procure the requisite number of votes in their own way.

"A President of the United States is in a different position; he can take none of the steps until authorized to do so by Congress, which is itself dependent upon the popular voice. His assertion that 'the claim of the United States to Oregon is unquestionable,' means only that he will exert his influence in maintaining and establishing it. From a British Sovereign, the same assertion would announce to the world his intention to employ his power for that purpose. It is as much the duty of the President to use the influence of his declaration upon the people of the United States, or upon the world, for the advantage of the Republic, as it is of the Sovereign to direct his forces for the benefit of his kingdom.

"The President is neither in an address to his fellow citizens, nor in a message to Congress, bound by the rules or observances of diplomatic discussion. His object on such occasions is to suit the course which he means or wishes to pursue to the judgment of the people, or of the Legislature, that they may, in a proper way, express their sense of it. He does so openly; and if he enlightens other parties as to his views, they have no right to complain of it. Offensive language is of course not to be employed by a public functionary or any occasions, but the President may assert what he conceives to be the rights of his nation in terms of strength proportioned to the importance of the subject and the profundness of his conviction.

"It becomes his duty, at all times, while communicating with the people themselves in his Inaugural address, or in his message to their representatives in Congress, to speak in frank, clear language, in relation to the common rights and interests of a free people. While he takes care in performing this duty to give no unnecessary offence to foreign states, he is bound to speak plainly, and to assert, in the clearest and strongest terms, the rights of his own nation. In his diplomatic intercourse with foreign nations, he will seek to guide his course by his conceptions of the rights of his country, and to carry out, as far as possible, the views which he has formed. It depends upon his own discretion to decide what course he shall pursue in the conduct of foreign negotiations. It will remain for Great Britain to decide how far she will assume the responsibility of defeating a wise and amicable negotiation, by making demands which are extravagant in themselves, and well calculated to prevent a most desirable adjustment of our differences." ...There is no doubt, however, that many persons have undertaken more on their own account than they are fairly entitled to do from their rank as capitalists or their position in society.

By the mercantile letters from America it appears that the dividend on Pennsylvania stock, due next August, will be punctually paid. The statement is the more interesting as serious doubts have been entertained on the subject.

The correspondence below is of such great importance to the Mexican bondholders, comprising as it does the first official declaration of Messrs. Lizardi since the change in the agency, that in spite of its length we have not hesitated for a moment to give it entire. A statement from Messrs. Lizardi has long been expected with the utmost impatience; but we fear that the Mexican creditors will find the one just obtained anything but satisfactory. A meeting is shortly to be held on the subject:

"Gentlemen,—We beg to enclosed to you a letter from his Excellency the Minister of Finance of the Republic of the United States of Mexico.

"Being appointed by the Government of Mexico to act as its agents in this city, we are instructed by the Government to receive from you the funds in your hands which have been remitted to you for the payment of the dividends of the foreign debt of Mexico, together with all papers and documents in your hands relating to this agency.

"We shall be happy to learn at what time it will suit your convenience to carry these instructions into effect.

"Gentlemen,—We have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 4th inst. (enclosing a dispatch from the Mexican Minister of Finance), informing us that you had been appointed agents to Mexican Government, and were instructed by the said Government to receive from us the funds belonging to it in our hands, together with the documents and papers relating to the agency.

"In reply we have to state, that from our predecessors in the agency we received no papers or documents whatever; nor have we any others than the books relating to the conversion of the debt and the payment of dividends, which being required for daily reference we cannot consent to part with.

"The Mexican Government has been regularly furnished with the accounts relating to the affairs of this agency.

"Credit has been given to the said Government for all the monies remitted up to the present date, and there is still a considerable balance due unto us from the Mexican Government, which we hope you are authorized to pay, and in such case we are prepared to furnish you with copies of our account-current with the said Government, made up to this date.

"Gentlemen,--We have just received your letter of yesterday's date.

"Permit us to state to you that the funds which you are directed to hand over to us can have no connexion with any account which may be existing between yourselves and the Mexican Government. They are funds which have been remitted to you for the payment of the dividends of the Mexican foreign debt. They have been appropriated to that purpose by a special contract between the Mexican Government and the bondholders, effected through your agency, and to which you are parties; and, being so remitted, they can have no connexion with any other account or transaction, whatever the nature of the same may be.

"We are therefore under the necessity of repeating our request for the payment of this money to us agreeably to the order in your possession.

With reference thereto, allow us to say that we do not feel ourselves called upon to discuss with you our reasons for refusing to comply with the request made in your letter of the 4th inst., and in that now under reply.

"We have, therefore, simply to refer you to our letter of the 6th inst. for our sentiments on this subject, and remain, &c.

"13, Austinfriars, June 21, 1845.

"Gentlemen,--The Committee of Spanish American bondholders have received from Messrs. J. Schneider and Co. copies of two letters which they had addressed to you on the 4th and 7th inst., and of your replies to the same, dated respectively the 6th and 10th inst.

"From this correspondence it appears that the Mexican Government, having transferred its financial agency in this city to the house of Messrs. John Schneider and Co., had authorized those gentlemen to receive from you the balance of the funds remaining in your hands for the purpose of applying it to the payment of the Mexican dividends; that Messrs. Schneider had applied to you, in pursuance of the authority thus lodged with them; and that you have declined to obey the orders of the Mexican Government for the payment of this money, on the ground that you have claims on that Government to a considerable amount.

"The Committee are under the necessity of calling your attention to the circumstances under which these monies have been from time to time remitted to you. By the agreement dated 14th September, 1837, under which conversion of the original Mexican debt was effected, which agreement was effected through your agency, and bears your signature, together with that of the Mexican Minister at this Court, a certain proportion of the customs' duties at Vera Cruz and Tampico was set apart for the payment of the interest on the foreign debt. Comissioners were appointed to receive the same from time to time, and to remit those funds to you expressly for the purpose in question. They have done so; the dividends have been from time to time paid by you out of those funds; and the sum remaining in your hands is an unappropriated part of the same funds.
"That there may be no possible misunderstanding on the subject I extract from the bonds bearing your signature the following clause:--

"For the better securing the punctual payment of the said interest, the Mexican Government shall appropriate irrevocably thereunto one-sixth part of all the Custom-house duties of the ports of Vera Cruz and Tampico (Santa Anna Tamaulipas). This portion of the duties to be received from the administrators of the Customs by two commissioners to be appointed by the Mexican Government, one of whom to be nominated on the recommendation of the agents of the bondholders in the city of Mexico. These commissioners to transmit by every English packet to the agents of the Mexican Government in London the aforesaid funds; the commission to be paid to the said commissioners for this service by the Mexican Government.'

"The Committee, acting on behalf of the bondholders, are under the necessity of emphatically stating to you, that there is, in their view, no pretence in law, equity, or justice, whereby you can seek to appropriate these monies to any purpose other than that for which they have been specially remitted to you. The bondholders can have no concern with any other dealings between you and the Mexican Government. You have received these monies under a solemn engagement under your own hands, to apply them to the purpose for which they were sent; and the Committee venture to insist that you have no right to deal otherwise with them.

"Under these circumstances, the Committee now call upon you, as you have declined to pay over the funds remaining in your hands to Messrs. Schneider, to proceed at once to pay the same to the bondholders, as a part payment of the dividend due on the 1st of October last.

"I remain, &c.,
"G. R. ROBINSON, Chairman.

"Sir,-- We have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 21st. inst. addressed to us on behalf of the Committee of Mexican Bondholders, wherein you inform us that Messrs. John Schneider and Co. had laid before the Committee copies of their correspondence with us on the subject of the transfer of the Mexican agency. We also learn from your communication that the Committee call upon us to pay over either to the bondholders or to Messrs. Schneider and Co. 'the balance of the funds remaining in your hands.'

"In our letter to Messrs. John Schneider and Co., of the 6th June, we told those gentlemen that, after giving credit in account to the Mexican Government for all the monies remitted us, there was still a considerable balance due to us, and such being the case, we of course can have no funds to pay over to Messrs. Schneider and Co. or to any one else.

"Throughout the whole correspondence which we have had with the Committee, we have constantly and uniformly maintained that the funds remitted us by the Mexican Government were for its sole account; that we were the agents of the said Government, and not of the bondholders; and that we could make no payments either on account of dividends or any other purpose without first receiving instructions from Mexico.

"We are aware that the Committee have asserted that we were only the recipients of these funds on behalf of the bondholders, but this we always have, and now again emphatically deny. We have always received these funds in the character of general agents to the Mexican Government; and nothing can more clearly prove that the said Government entertained a similar idea than the fact of the Mexican Minister of Finance giving the order for transferring any funds in hand to Messrs. Schneider and Co., which we apprehend his Excellency would hardly have done had he entertained any doubt as to the funds being the property of his Government--indeed, on no other understanding could we have ventured to make the heavy advances which we have done.

"We have also to remind the Committee that when we succeeded in obtaining from the Mexican Government the increased assignment of 3 1-3 per cent. Of the customhouse revenues, this fund was charged with the payment to us of a considerable amount; and we imagine that no impartial person will dispute our right to it.

"Since the Committee refer to the year 1837, we think it would be as well that they look still further back, and they will find that from 1832 to 1837 nothing was recovered from the Mexican Government for the bondholders, and that at the latter period the price of the stock, with 23 overdue coupons, was barely half that which it has borne of late years and at present.

"In conclusion, we have to repeat what we have already told Messrs. Schneider and Co., that the entire of the funds remitted us by the Mexican Government have been carried [some missing]

MONEY-MARKET and CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Monday Evening

Excepting in the share-market there has been very little business to-day. The English securities closed as follows:

The only remark of consequence that has been made in the city in favour of Messrs. Lizardi and Co.'s doctrine, that they are not, by the terms of the contract, bound to hand over every dollar received from Mexico on account of the debt is this,—admitting that they were bound so to act by the contract in question, that applied merely to the sixth of the customs originally set apart. The increase of the portion from one-sixth to one-firth has taken place since the date of the contract, and therefore, though the agents may be precluded from retaining any part of the sixth, they are not equally precluded as to an amount equal to the difference between the sixth and the fifth. This argument is not without ingenuity; but we question whether the equity of the case will allow it to be maintained for a moment. The additional portion must have been subject to some conditions, and we may naturally conclude that the conditions were those already expressed in the contract, no new terms being hinted at. Surely, under the circumstances, the terms of the fifth must be looked upon as precisely analogous to those of the sixth.

The Chilian papers contain a copy of a letter from Senor Rosales, the Minister for the Republic in England, relative to the transfer of the agency to Messrs. Baring, Brothers, and to the failure of the former house of agency, Messrs. G. and J. Brown and Co., by which Chili sustained a loss of 37,000l. The Minister is at great pains to explain that the solidity and credit ascribed to the house by the commercial body in England were chiefly instrumental in inducing him to make a selection which afterwards proved so unfortunate. In the same papers is contained the letter of Messrs. Baring and Co., in which they accept the Chilian agency.

This was the last day of converting Portuguese bonds, and the entire number converted amounts to 5,500,000 l. sterling. In consequence of the success of the operation application has been made to Baron de Folgoso to use his influence with the Portuguese Government, so as to obtain an extension of the time for conversion.

Cape of Good Hope papers to the 25th of April have arrived. The accounts from Graham's Town state that a collision had taken place between the Dutch emigrants and the Griqua tribe on the northeastern frontier, in which the latter had the advantage. The Griquas speak confidently of success, and only ask English troops for the protection of their wives and property. A good deal of bloodshed is expected, and should the Dutch within the boundary join their countrymen, the aborigines will speedily be defeated. The want of a proper Government at Natal is said to be detrimental to the general interests of the colony.

...The meeting of Mexican bondholders fixed for tomorrow (Wednesday) will disclose the views of the parties immediately interested as to the conduct of the late house of agency. In the mean time it may be remarked, what has struck many impartial persons on reviewing the subject, that it does not look well in Messrs. Lizardi to attach to the production of any account to the new agency a condition that they shall have been authorized by the Mexican Government to pay the balance due from the latter to Messrs. Lizardi. A merchant of high standing may be in a position to refuse an account altogether, under a denial of the authority which demands it; but he will scarcely attach conditions to the rendering such an account, which are, on the face of them, incapable of fulfilment. Messrs. Lizardi must have known that the Mexican Government could not have given any authority to make payments, because that Government at least believed a balance to be in hand at the agency, and that it would be forthcoming immediately on the verification of the appointment of Messrs. Schneider to the trust. It is natural enough, too, to inquire whether the Mexican Government, whose authority, at all events, to demand an account will not be disputed even by Messrs. Lizardi themselves, have been furnished with one, or with any intimation that they were deeply indebted to their late agents. Proper time for that purpose has certainly not been wanting, as no payment since October last has been made for dividends, and all the items subsequently coming forward must consist of remittances from Mexico, and belong to the credit side of the account. If the agency, therefore, had pursued in this case the common course of mercantile dealing, which they seem anxious to take for their model when it suits them, the Minister of Finance in Mexico would have set the matter right before making any new appointment, and not committed to the absurdity of virtually directing the transfer to Messrs. Schneider of the funds in possession, when none existed, but, on the contrary, a large claim against his Government. It follows almost to a certainty that the late agents have not furnished any such account, and they must have advanced a very large sum indeed in October, if all the remittances since publicity known to have been received have not more than liquidated that advance. The notion of a large balance still against Mexico is rejected on all sides as an utter improbability. Hence there is another reason for the production of an account, beyond what belongs to mercantile usage and character, because Messrs. Lizardi have a strong case against them until they prove the contrary by figures and vouchers. If the real cause of their repugnance should be, as some believe, the having yielded too readily to be the instrument of the late President, Santa Anna, in diverting funds which were held in trust for the bondholders to another purpose, the disclosure now could do him or them no further harm, but would assist the present Government in pursuing that investigation into his conduct which has been begun in Mexico. Any result is better than the refusal of an account to a party properly authorized to receive it, and which is a very rare instance indeed, if not wholly without parallel among respectable English merchants. If we contend, therefore, for justice towards the Mexican creditors, we contend no less for the maintenance of that which has always constituted the most envied distinction of this great city--the perfect good faith and honour of all the members of its trading community . . . [JSW]
...The meeting of Mexican bondholders held at the London Tavern to-day was fully attended, and the series of resolutions passed were strongly condemnatory of the conduct of Messrs. Lizardi and Co., the late agents. Mr. Robinson, the chairman of the committee, was the only speaker on the occasion, but the sentiments he uttered were warmly responded to by the bondholders, who agreed in all that he said respecting the manner in which Messrs. Lizardi had dealt with them and their property. Mr. Robinson contended that Messrs. Lizardi were the joint agents of the bondholders and the Government, and receiving the money for a specific purpose were not justified in using it for any other object. In the course of his address Mr. Robinson alluded to the extraordinary position in which the bondholders were placed--first, from the seizure of dollars at Vera Cruz by Santa Anna; and, secondly, from the refusal of Messrs. Lizardi to pay over the funds in their hands to the new agents, Messrs. Schneider and Co. Messrs. Lizardi's proceedings, he said, were quite consistent with the whole conduct they had pursued in the business; and after the surreptitious issue of 900,000 stock, he must himself confess that he was not surprised at anything they did. The first resolution passed expressed satisfaction at the change of the agency; the second and third resolutions expressed the opinion that the refusal of the late agents to surrender the money in their hands was at variance with all principles of law, equity, and justice; and the fourth resolution suggested the appointment of a special committee for the purpose of consulting on the measures to be adopted for compelling Messrs. Lizardi to apply the funds they retained to the use of the bondholders. A special committee of three of the bondholders with three of the present committee were then elected, and the meeting separated, authority being given to Messrs. Schneider, in the event of law proceedings being taken against Messrs. Lizardi, to deduct the expenses pro rata from the first dividend paid.

SOUTHAMPTON, JULY 4.

The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company's ship Medway, Andrews, arrived at Southampton at 11 o'clock on Thursday night, after a rapid voyage of 13 days from Bermuda. She would have arrived some hours sooner but for heavy fogs off the coast.

She brings 94 passengers and the usual mails, except that from Carthagena. Her mails will be despatched by the 2 o'clock train. Her dates are as follow:--From Tampico, May 28; Vera Cruz, June 1; Havannah, June 10; Nassau, June 13; Honduras, May 20; Jamaica, June 8; Demerara, June 4; Trinidad, June 5; Barbadoes, June 8; Grenada, June 10; St. Thomas, June 14; Laguayra, June 7; Bermuda, June 20; and Antigua, June 11. She also brings on freight--1,238,406 dollars; 3,000 oz. of silver; 1,618 oz. of gold and gold dust; 138 serons of cochineal; 246 dozen of pines; 40 turtles; 20 cases of vanilla; and 25 bales of jalap.

The Medway did not call at Fayal.

She spoke the French brig Bordonais on the 28th of June, in lat. 43 23, long. 30 29; and exchanged colours with the bark Persia on the 1st of July, in lat. 47 35, long. 14.

The Scylla was repairing at Bermuda, having been on shore 18 hours. The Admiral left Bermuda for Halifax on the 25th of May.

Two hundred and fourteen Coolies, five having died, arrived at Trinidad shortly before the Medway left, arrived at Trinidad shortly before the Medway left, in the Fatel Rosack, 98 days from Calcutta. The arrival gave great satisfaction to the agriculturists.

The troops appear to be healthy at all the islands.
The 1st West Indian Regiment and part of the 7th were at Demerara; the 23d Fusiliers at Trinidad; two battalions of the 20th at Bermuda; the 81st at Antigua; the headquarters of the 7th at Barbadoes.

The ex-President, General Santa Anna, embarked on board the Medway, from the River Antigua, 13 miles N.W. of Vera Cruz; he was sent down with an escort of 200 cavalry as a prisoner, and was unattended except by his brother, nephew, and wife, with some others of his family. The lady who accompanied him is his second wife, a young and pretty woman, of about 16. It appears he was sentenced to leave the country, and have his property confiscated; he had very considerable sums of money with him, but a greater part of it was stopped, though he ultimately retained a large sum in his possession. Santa Anna stated he was going to Venezuela, but it was not credited. He left the Medway at Havannah.

We have Jamaica papers to the 7th of June, by which we learn that the island has been favoured with the most propitious season that has occurred for very many years past. The account of the sugar cultivation continue to be highly favourable; the wet weather may possibly impede the manufacture of this year's crop, but will be of vast benefit to that of next year. The few Hill Coolies that had arrived continued to give the highest satisfaction; they work cheerfully, industriously, and indefatigable, and it is considered will be a great boon to the colonists. Some attempt had been already made to create dissatisfaction in the minds of the Hill Coolies in one of the parishes, by representing that their contract might have been more advantageous. It does not appear to have had much effect. Indeed, they seem perfectly content and happy in their change; and their work, both as to time and description, is quite surprising. They do not work with the long-handled hoe, but work stooping, using both their hands at the same time. There appears to be a great and general desire in favour of the importation of these people, and of the African free emigrants.

We learn by the Barbadoes Standard that the Committee of the House of Assembly had recommended the purchase of the area laid waste by the great fire, about ten acres in extent, and value 35,000l., for the purpose of improvement, uniformity of buildings, &c.

The Princess Royal arrived on the 5th of June, with detachments of the Royal Artillery and 3d West India Regiment. She spoke Her Majesty's ship Pique the previous evening, which ship arrived the next morning. The head of her foremast was found to be so much decayed that it was expected she would return to England to be supplied with a new one, there being no spar sufficient in the West Indies. The Roger Stewart arrived at Berbice on the 20th of May, with 256 African emigrants, all effective. This arrival appeared to give very general satisfaction. The bark Glanmire had arrived in 23 days from Cork at Barbadoes. The subject of steam communication between Port of Spain (Trinidad) and the Naparimas was exciting considerable interest, and had been brought before the Legislative Government. His Excellency the Governor was very favourable to the scheme, and had declared his intention to do his part towards it. There appears to be every prospect of the project being carried out.

The Medway has made a remarkably fine passage, and is up three or four days before due, notwithstanding she has had some bad weather. We understand she had no mail officer on board. Captain Andrews, now her commander, has been out in the West Indies from the establishment of the company engaged in the inter-colonial trade, from which, after very zealous services, he is promoted to the Medway, one of the company's best ships.

By this arrival we have received letters of the 30th of May from our correspondent in the city of Mexico.

The Mexican Senate, by a majority of 30 to 6, and the Deputies, by 41 to 13, have authorized the Government to negotiate and conclude a treaty for the recognition of the independence of Texas.

Mexico was perfectly quiet, and no opposition has been shown by the people to the recognition of Texas.

The existing tariff is to be annulled. The Chamber of Deputies have adopted bases by which the Government will be enabled to establish a new tariff, to come into operation after six months, nearly similar to the tariff of 1842. The assent of the Senate is looked upon as certain.

The Minister of the United States, Mr. Shannon, has at length demanded his
A general amnesty has been proclaimed. Santa Anna submits to exile for life in Venezuela. The late President of Congress, and the only one of the Ministers in prison, refuses to accept the proffered grace.

Proposals have been sent to England connected with a loan of 3,000,000 of dollars, for consolidating one-half Mexican Passive Stock, and securing to it an interest of 5 per cent, on the tobacco duties.

BERMUDA, JUNE 20.

When the Medway left Vera Cruz (June 2) there were five American men-of-war at anchor under Isla Verde--viz., the Potomac, 54 guns, Commodore Connor; two 28-gun corvettes, and two 14-gun brigs. There was a French brig-of-war lying at Sacrificios.

The Eurydice left Vera Cruz for New Orleans on the 17th of May, with despatches for Her Majesty's Government, relative (it was said) to the recognition by Mexico of Texan independence, which had passed both the Mexican Chambers. Captain Charles Elliot, R.N., had returned to Texas from Vera Cruz in a French corvette, to resume his diplomatic duties.

Mr. Shannon, United States Minister at Mexico, having demanded and received his passports, left Vera Cruz for New York, in the New York packet, on the 28th of May; he preferred taking his passage in a merchant vessel to weaken in the American naval forces before Vera Cruz by taking from it a vessel of war. The prevailing opinion at Vera Cruz by taking it a vessel of war. The prevailing opinion at Vera Cruz was, that there would be war between Mexico and the United States. There did not seem to be much active preparation making at Vera Cruz to meet any hostile movement on the part of the Americans; the Mexicans seemed to look towards "Los Inglesca" for succour.

General Santa Anna, ex-President of Mexico, his wife, father-in-law, brother and sister-in-law, nephew, and four servants, were embarked on board the Medway, off Rio Antigua, about 15 miles to the north-west of Vera Cruz, far passage, it was said, to Bermuda; but upon arriving at Havannah, the General declined proceeding further, and went on shore, where he intends to remain for the present, most probably in observation. Santa Anna has still a strong party in Mexico.

By an odd coincidences, General Bustamente arrived at Havannah in the Royal mall steam-packet Dee the same day General Santa Anna reached there in the Medway. The former proceeded to Vera Cruz in the Dee.

His Excellency Vice-Admiral Primo de Rivera had relieved Vice-Admiral Ulloa as naval commander-in-chief at Havannah. Orders had been received for Her Majesty's ship Romney, receiving-ship for liberated Africans at Havannah, to be withdrawn; the Spanish Government were to provide barracks on shore for the Africans to be lodged in.

The Medway left at Nassau on the 13th of June Her Majesty's steamer Hermes, which was to leave on the 15th for Turk's Island, with the Bishop of Jamaica and Mrs. Spenser on board, the former being on a visit of inspection through his diocese.

Her Majesty's ship Vindictive, with the flag of Vice-Admiral Austin, left Bermuda for Halifax on the 11th inst.

Her Majesty's ship Boylla, Commander Sharpe, lying in the basin, having been hove down and her bottom repaired, would proceed to Halifax on or about the 24th inst.

The Medway was met at Bermuda by the Royal mail steam-packet Tay, and the letter was to proceed to Nassau and Havannah. [JSW]
The proceedings of the Mexican Government and the acts of the Mexican Legislature are by no means decisive as to the result of the Texan question; and it is obvious that the course of events and the conduct of the American party in Texas at this juncture are of far more essential importance than the dispositions of the Mexicans. A manifesto has indeed been published by the Mexican republic, in which the Ministers of that country protest against the proposed annexation of Texas, as an insidious and unprecedented act of spoliation. They deny that a Mexican province can be converted, with the melting facility of a dissolving view, into one of the United States of America; and they declare that "the law of the United States proposing the incorporation of Texas in no way restricts the claim which Mexico holds and is determined to sustain over that department." This doctrine professes to emanate from the National Congress of Mexico, and is dated the 14th of May; but we are unable to reconcile the assurance that Mexico is determined to sustain her claim over "the department of Texas" with the language of a decree published only three days later, on the 17th of May, by which it appears that the Mexican Government is empowered to hear the propositions which Texas has made, and to proceed to the arrangement of a treaty; or in plain terms, to the recognition of Texan independence. However, the latter course is in every respect preferable to a declaration of war, and much more likely to conduce to a satisfactory adjustment than a levy en masse of Mexican militia.

It is probable that the question of annexation, upon the terms propounded in the last resolutions of the American Congress, has ere this been decided by the Legislature or Convention of the Texan people. Nor can we pretend to anticipate with any degree of certainty or accuracy what that decision may be; for it will be governed, not by considerations of policy or of national interest on the part of the Texans, but by the number of votes which the American party may have contrived to smuggle into the political assemblies of an independent state, or to suborn amongst the ranks of the Texan patriots. If the vote of annexation be carried, there is little to regret, for that fact will prove more than an argument that the independence of Texas is already extinct, or rather that it never was anything more than the mast of American treachery and encroachment. What could be expected of a people amongst whom a foreign element has acquired such an ascendancy, that within ten years of their declaration of independence that independence is put up to auction, to be bought up by a neighbouring Power? But that purchase of intrigue and ambition is not yet consummated. Amongst the Texans, the leading men have not yet despairs of their position, or abdicated their national character; and, if they are defeated, it will be by the effect of universal suffrage and of civil rights too easily bestowed, which enable a party of adventurers from another land to determine the most important question which can be raised amongst the people. The question will, in fact, be decided rather by the absence of Government, or at least of any effective governing power in the southern portion of North America, than by the deliberate choice of the states, most intimately affected by it; and the Annexationists of the United States owe more to the anarchy of Mexico, and the impotence of Texas, than to their own political vigour or address.

The protection to which all feeble states lay claim, and to which they owe the maintenance of their territorial rights and their independence, consists, first, in the jealousy of other Powers, unwilling to tolerate any further aggrandizement of the strong at the expense of the weak, and, secondly, in the restraint of equity and good faith. But of these guarantees neither can be said to exist on the continent of North America, south of the British possessions. European Powers are no longer sufficiently interested in the fate of those vast regions to include them within the strict limits on which the balance of powers depends. The emancipated Spanish colonies have neither established a political system of their own, nor connected themselves with the political systems of Europe. They have, in particular, not responded to the generous sympathy with which our own country watched and encouraged their emancipation; and it is, perhaps, fortunate for us that we are bound to them by no close engagements. As for the restraint of equity and good faith towards neighbours, that has been dissipated among the Americans, by the will of a Power whose only law is the present will of the greatest number; and the act which has been denounced by the wisest and best of the Americans as the most infamous and lawless attempt in the history of democracy, is already, as far as they are concerned, morally consummated.

Under these circumstances, the next question we are disposed to ask is, where is this march of invasion and this extension of power to stop? We are told that Texas is to be annexed. But what are the limits of Texas? Who has ever determined the boundaries of her territory, or, if they were determined, who is to confine within them the pretensions of their Anglo-American invaders? It is impossible, in the present state of the population of central North America, that the compact forces of disciplined armies or civilized communities should at once overrun and occupy the enormous tracts still almost untrodden by white men. But a species of irregular warfare will probably break out between the two European races in central; and the horrors perpetrated by the Spaniards on the native Indians may be avenged upon their descendants by the incursion of another race even more pitiless and rapacious than they were. In this way it is scarcely possible to doubt that an attempt will ere long be made by adventurers from the United States--the well-known pioneers of the policy of the Cabinet of Washington--to pierce their way across the continent, and to establish themselves upon Mexican or British territory on the shores of the Pacific. The state of California is so imperfectly known, even to the Mexican Government, to which it professes allegiance, that it may be regarded as a detached province. Since the sequestration of the religious establishments, founded by the Jesuits and transferred to the Franciscans, all moral authority is at an end. Military power never existed in the country, even in the time of the Spaniards; and of late years the population and even the head of cattle have dwindled rapidly away.

But the establishment of any fresh Power on the western coast of North America is pre-eminently a maritime question--a question of maritime interest, and to be accomplished and maintained by maritime means. We are, therefore, disinclined to attached importance to the statement which has reached our correspondent in Mexico, to the effect that the Americans have actually taken possession of the Russian settlement on the Bay of Bodega; or that the Russians have evacuated Fort Ross, the Russian fort at that point. The Russian Governor was visited there by M. DUFLOT DE MOFRAS at no very distant period, and the events of the last few years on the Pacific are not calculated to lessen the interest which the Emperor of RUSSIA may take in that settlement, which we sincerely hope he will continue to hold.

Enough, however, has already transpired to show that the questions of Texas and of Oregon touch one another, though at a distant point: that they are, in fact, parts of the same project of aggrandizement, and results of that system of policy first avowed by MR. MONROE, which claims for the United States a territorial monopoly of the continent to which they belong. To act with promptitude in Texas, and to procrastinate for another quarter of a century in Oregon, are the two modes of acquisition best adapted to crush a weak neighbour in Mexico, and to deceive a powerful competitor in Great Britain. For ourselves, without assuming an excessive interest in the concerns of other states, or entertaining the least doubt of the security of all parts of HER MAJESTY'S dominions, we trust that it will not be forgotten that our position is precisely what it was after the convention of 1790 had been signed at Madrid, and the gallant VANCOUVER was directed by Mr. PITT'S Government to explore the north-west coast of America to the north of the 39th degree of latitude. That mission was accomplished. The flag of England was planted along those shores. QUADRA and the Spanish officers acquiesced in VANCOUVER'S proclamation; and it only remains for us to maintain with firmness the rights which were established by our fathers along the coast of the Pacific Ocean. [JSW]

THE ANNEXATION OF TEXAS.--The abolitionists, whose great efforts during the 12 past years have resulted in silencing every practical abolitionist in the slave states, (where there are thousands and thousands, by the way), and who have been the means of adding to the union the elements of five or six new slave states in Texas, with the probability of adding California and other states of Mexico as slave states, can now see another of their great achievements in the additional value they have given to slave property. We copy the following from the River State Review, a paper-published in Marion, Alabama:-- "Negroes sold last sale day at the Court-house rather high it seems to us for the buyers and times, but most assuredly not too high for those compelled to part with them. Fellows brought near $650, average; one brought as high at $692. Women sold for from $500 to $610, one only bringing the latter sum. Girls about 14 years' old sold from $375 to $400. Some families sold in proportion much less." The annexation of Texas has raised the price of slaves from 30 to 50 per cent, and the effect of this is a most powerful stimulus to the slave trade, and to the breeding of slaves for sale. The domestic slave trade was never livelier than it is now, in most parts of the south and west. The rush of emigration to Texas is prodigious, and the purchase of slaves for that market is beginning to be prosecuted with astonishing vigour. The roads towards New Orleans, and the routes via the Red River, are thronged with slaves. In the meantime, as the negroes go up the land goes down. When we are told that his will abolish slavery in the border slave states, we will show how the raising of the price of a property creates an indisposition to give it up, and a desire to multiply and to justify it. The progress backwards of the northern reader to note. When he began his monstrous and cruel agitation, the axe was laid at the root of slavery in Virginia, the old colony slave state of the union, but now new Virginia, has a powerful interest in raising slaves for

Friday Evening

The account in the Consol-market was arranged to-day, and presented no other feature than a slight rise in prices, produced by the satisfactory nature of the settlement. The rate of accommodation for short periods was 2 ½ percent., with a tolerable demand from the leading jobbers. Consols left off this afternoon 98 7/8 to 99 for money, and 99 ½ to ¾ for the account. Bank Stock closed 210 1/2 to 211 ½; Three per Cents. Reduced, 99 3/8 to ½; Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, 102 1/8 to ¾; Long Annuities, 11 ¾; Exchequer-bills, 54s. to 56s. premium; and India Bonds, 68s. to 71s. premium.

A rumour was current this afternoon, that Lizardi and Co. intend to pay over the funds they have in hand to the new agents; but as not a bargain was done all day in Mexican stock, it does not appear to have been received with much credit. The Actives were quoted nominally the same as yesterday, 36 7/8 to 37 1/8; and the Deferred, 20 ½ to 21. Spanish was steady; the Five per Cents; closed 26 ⅘ to 26; and the Three per Cents, 37 to ¼; Portuguese, 63 to 65; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 62 to ¼; ditto Four per Cents., 99 1/8 to 3/8; Danish, 89 to 91; Colombian, 17 7/8 to 18 1/8; Chilian, 100 to 102; Buenos Ayres, 45 ½ to 46 ½; Brazilian, 90 ½ to 91 ½; Belgian, 99 to 100.

The Railway share-market has been quiet, with a limited amount of business. Generally speaking, quotations continue pretty well supported.

The supply of bills upon foreign places generally was not equal to the demand, and the rates of exchange upon the principal continental places were, consequently, again lower.

The recent fluctuations in Spanish stock have lately been the object of the greatest interest to the speculators in foreign securities; and though there has been the general feeling that the insurrectionary movements in Catalonia had much to do with the downward movements, reasons have not been given in detail. It appears that the concession some time ago by the Spanish Ministry to the Church of part of the national property first operated in producing an unfavourable effect upon the stock, for the Actives always had a value in being the means by which national lands might be purchased, such value existing when all payment of dividends was suspended. This advantage being lost to the creditors, it was no wonder that the securities declined; and although Senior Mon, when making the concession, probably believed... that the resources of Spain would be so much developed as to furnish an equivalent for the sacrifice, his hopes have been in a great measure frustrated by the clergy expecting more, instead of remaining satisfied with the grants already made to them. The insurrection in Catalonia doubtless had its influence in furthering the decline, but this influence is likely to be of a transient nature, if we may, trust the accounts stating that no political cause, properly so called, is at the bottom of the insurrectionary movements, but merely the dislike on the part of the northern provinces to participate in those general burdens of Spain from which they have been exempted by their special fueros. From these accounts, according to some, proceeds the change for the better which has occurred within the last day or two in the value of the stock.

ANNEXATION OF TEXAS

The British and North American Royal mail steam-ship Acadia, Captain Harrison, arrived at Liverpool yesterday, bringing the Hon. L. M'Lane, United States Minister to St. James's, several members of his family, and a large number of passengers.

The annexation of Texas to the United States, it will be seen, has been agreed to by the Texan Congress. The question as to the course Mexico will adopt is yet problematical. The annexation was announced by President Jones in the following terms:--

"Executive Department, Washington, June 16."

"Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives,

"I am happy to greet you, on this interesting occasion, as the representatives of the people, again assembled in the discharge of your high and important duties. The call of an extraordinary session of Congress at this early day, by the Executive, was not made without the most mature deliberation, and a due reference to the great crisis which has arisen since your late adjournment in the affairs of Texas, as well as the almost unanimous expression of public will which took place throughout the country in regard to the same.

"The Executive has now the pleasure to transmit to the hon. Congress, for such action as they may deem suitable, the propositions which have been made on the part of the United States to this Government for the annexation of Texas, and its incorporation, as a state, into that great and kindred confederacy, together with the correspondence between the two Governments which has arisen out of the same. The correspondence, entering, as it does, very fully into the views and sentiments of the Governments in question, renders it unnecessary for the Executive to add (for the information or consideration of Congress) but little thereto in reference to the proposed measure.

"The Executive has much satisfaction in observing, what, no doubt, will forcibly arrest the attention of Congress, that although the terms embraced in the resolutions of the United States Congress may at first have appeared less favourable than was desirable for Texas, the very liberal and magnanimous views entertained by the President of the United States towards Texas, and the promises made through the representation of that country in regard to the future advantages to be extended to her if she consent to the proposed union, render those terms much more acceptable than they would otherwise have been.

"The state of public opinion, and the great anxiety of the people to act definitively upon the subject of annexation, by a convention of deputies, as prescribed in the resolutions of the United States Congress, induced the Executive to issue his proclamation, on the 5th of May ultimo, recommending an election for 61 deputies, to be held in the several counties throughout the republic, on the 4th of the present month, and to assemble in convention, at the city of Austin, on the 4th of July next. The recommendation has met the sanction of the citizens of Texas generally, and the deputies in the several counties, so far as heard from, having been elected upon the basis proposed, it is confidently expected the convention will assemble at the time and place fixed upon. To this convention the question of annexation and the adoption of a state constitution will properly belong; and they will determine the great question of the nationality of Texas, as to them shall seem most conducive to the interests, happiness, and prosperity of the people whom they will represent. It is important that the 'consent of the existing Government' should be given to their exercising the powers which have been delegated to them, in order to comply with a requirement to that effect in the resolutions on the subject of annexation passed by the American Congress. For this purpose the present extraordinary session of the Congress of the Republic of Texas has been convoked; and to its wisdom, as a co-ordinate department, the Executive now submits the determination of the matter.

"The services to be performed by the convention will be arduous, and will probably engage it for a considerable period of time; and the Executive would respectfully recommend to Congress the propriety of making a suitable appropriation for the payment of its members, as well as the officers it may find occasion to employ.

"The Executive has the pleasure, in addition to presenting to Congress the propositions concerning annexation, to inform them that certain conditions, preliminary to a treaty of peace, upon the basis of a recognition of the independence of Texas by Mexico, were signed on the part of the latter, at the city of Mexico, on the 19th of May last, and were transmitted to this Government on the 21 inst., by the Baron Alleye de Cyprey, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the King of the French at that Court, by the hands of Captain Elliott, Her Britannic Majesty's Charge d'Affaires near this Government. In consequence of this signing of these preliminaries, the Executive believed it to be his duty, in the recess of Congress, to make the fact known to the people of Texas, and to declare and proclaim a cessation of hostilities between Texas and Mexico, until the same could be communicated to, and acted upon by, Congress and the convention about to assemble. A proclamation for this purpose was consequently issued on the 4th inst., a copy of which is herewith transmitted. The preliminaries being in the nature of a treaty, will with all the correspondence in relation thereto be forthwith communicated to the hon-Senate for its constitutional advice, and such action as, in its wisdom, the same shall seem to require.

"The alternative of annexation or independence will thus be placed before the people of Texas, and their free, sovereign, and unbiassed voice will determine the all-important issue; and, so far as it shall depend upon the Executive to act, he will give immediate and full effect to the expressions of their will.

"His situation in regard to the important subjects now communicated to Congress has, since their late adjournment, been one of great delicacy and embarrassment. Questions of much difficulty have been presented for his determination, upon which the fate and welfare of the country depended; and without precedent or constitutional guide for his governance, he has been obliged to assume, in consequence, great and severe responsibilities. He trusts, however, that Congress will approve the course he has adopted, and, by their enlightened counsels, relieve and direct him in the course hereafter to be pursued in relation to those questions.

"The Executive is happy to announce to Congress that Texas is at peace with the world; that with all foreign Powers with whom we have had intercourse friendly relations are maintained. The different tribes of Indians on our borders, with whom treaties exist, have continued to observe the same with good faith, and within the last few days information has been received that the only band of Camanches within our limits, who had maintained until then a hostile attitude towards Texas, have sued for peace, and expressed a wish to be permitted to come to Bexar to celebrate a treaty of friendship, which, on the part of this Government, has been complied with.

"The arrangements made at your regular session for additional companies of rangers to be mustered into service have been carried into full effect, and have afforded adequate and very efficient protection to our frontiers. The receipts into the Treasury have been sufficient to meet the various expenditures of the Government. A specie currency has been maintained without difficulty; and all the Exchequer-bills which were in circulation at the period of your late adjournment have been redeemed and withdrawn from circulation; and the Executive is happy to congratulate the Congress and the country upon a state of peace, happiness, and prosperity never before experienced by Texas, and rarely, if ever, equaled by so young a nation.

"It only remains for the Executive to express an assured confidence in your individual wishes to sustain the best interests of Texas, and the fervent hope that He who holds the destinies of men and nations in His hand may crown your deliberations.

"ANSON JONES."

On the 18th the Senate passed resolutions of annexation and sent them to the house. The house laid them on the table, and, passing their own, sent them to the Senate on the 19th. A strife arose as to which body should have the honour of originating the successful resolutions, and finally the following, which originated with the Senate, were unanimously adopted in both branches:--

"Whereas the Government of the United States hath proposed the following terms, guarantees, and conditions on which the people and territory of the republic of Texas may be erected into a new state, to be called the state of Texas, and admitted as one of the states of the American Union to wit:

"[Here follow the resolutions of the United States Congress.]

"And whereas, by said terms, the consent of the existing Government of Texas is required: therefore--

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the republic of Texas in Congress assembled,--That the Government of Texas doth consent that the people and territory of the republic of Texas may be erected into a new state, to be called 'the state of Texas,' with a republican form of government, to be adopted by the people of said republic, by deputies in convention assembled, in order that the same may be admitted as one of the states of the American Union; and said consent is given on the terms, guarantees, and conditions set forth in the preamble to this joint resolution.

"2. Be it further resolved,--That the proclamation of the President of the republic of Texas bearing date May 5th, 1845, and the election of deputies to sit in convention at Austin on the 4th day of July next, for the adoption of a constitution for the state of Texas, had in accordance therewith, hereby receive the consent of the existing Government of Texas.

"3. Be it further resolved,--That the President of Texas is hereby requested immediately to furnish the Government of the United States, through their accredited Minister near this Government, with a copy of this joint resolution; also to furnish the convention to assemble at Austin on the 4th of July next with a copy of the same; and the same shall take effect from and after its passage."

On the 19th, in the Senate, Mr. Geer introduced a joint resolution, relative to the introduction of United States troops into Texas, which was read the first time.

Mr. Kaufman's bill, "setting apart land for the payment of the public debt," &c., was taken up, read the third time, and passed.

It is stated that an American agent, immediately after the passage of the annexation resolutions, proceeded to select military posts for the United States troops.

The following memoranda we copy from the Union, a Texas newspaper, to which they were communicated:--

"Memoranda of the Conditions preliminary to a Treaty of Peace, as agreed upon by Ashbel Smith, on the part of Texas, and M. Cuevas, on the part of Mexico, and the accompanying Papers, as submitted to the Senate by President Jones.

"I. Message of President Jones, transmitting the treaty and papers to the Senate.

"II. Letter from Baron Alleye de Cyprey, transmitting to the Executive of Texas the conditions signed by Ashbel Smith, and the agreement on the part of Mexico to accede to them as the basis of a formal treaty.

"III. Conditions preliminary to a treaty of peace:"
"1. Mexico consents to acknowledge the independence of Texas.

"2. Texas engages that she will stipulate in the treaty not to annex herself, or become subject, to any country whatever.

"3. Limits and other arrangements to be matters of agreement in the final treaty.

"4. Texas to be willing to refer the disputed points with regard to territory, and other matters, to the arbitration of umpires.

"Done at Washington (on the Brazos), on the 27th of March, 1845
"ASHBEL SMITH, Secretary of State.

"BANKHEAD.
"Mexico, May 20.

"IV. Acknowledgment by Cuevas of the receipt of these preliminaries, through the intervention of Baron Alleye de Cyprey; and declares that the national Congress having consented, Mexico will accede to the preliminaries proposed by Texas, as the basis of a formal treaty.--May 19, 1845.

"V. Additional declaration of Cuevas.--If this negotiation is not realized on account of circumstances, or because Texas, influenced by the law of the United States on annexation, consents thereto, either directly or indirectly, then the answer which is given under this date to Texas shall be considered null and void.--May 19th.

"VI. Letter from President Jones to Baron Alleye de Cyprey, acknowledging his kind offices in bringing about the negotiations, &c."

To these was appended the proclamation of President Jones, of June 4th, declaring a cessation of hostilities.

This treaty was considered by the Senate in secret session, on the 21st of June, and rejected by a unanimous vote, and the injunction of secrecy removed.

On the passage of the annexation resolution, an express was despatched by President Jones to the Commander of the United States’ troops at Fort Jessup, requesting that two regiments of the United States’ troops should be sent to the frontier of Texas. Simultaneous with the receipt of this requisition, General Taylor is said to have received orders from the War Department to put his troops in motion. Immediate preparations were made for a start, and the 3d and 4th Regiments of Infantry embarked on board the steamboats Yazoo, Cote Joyeuse, Rodolph, and De Soto, for New Orleans; there, according to one account, to await the action of the Texas Convention, which met on the 4th instant at Austin, when they would move by water to Corpus Christi; or, as is more probable, thence to embark as soon as transports could be procured for the mouth of the Rio Grande. The 2d Regiment of Mounted Dragoons, under the command of Colonel Twiggs, at the same time took up their line of march, to strike across to the Rio Grande through Texas.

These movements are made in fulfillment of the assurances contained in Major Donelson’s letter to Mr. Allen, Acting Secretary of State at Texas, dated June 11, 1845, from which we extract the following passage:--

"In answer to the application thus made for the employment of the troops of the United States on the frontier of Texas, the undersigned is authorized to say that, as soon as the existing Government and the convention of Texas shall have accepted the terms of annexation new under their consideration, the President of the United States will then conceive it to be both his right and his duty to employ the army in defending this state against the attacks of any foreign Power; and, that this defence may be promptly and efficiently given, should the anticipated emergency arise rendering it necessary, the undersigned is also unauthorized to say that a force consisting of 3,000 men, placed upon the border adjacent to Texas, will be prepared to act without a moment’s delay, within the territory of Texas, as circumstances may require, so as best to repel invasion."

The Government of Texas has received information from Captain Hays, contradicting the rumour that the Mexican forces on the Rio Grande had been increased to 7,000 men. The forces in the eastern provinces are as weak, if not weaker, than they have been during the last five years.

The Galveston Civilian says the Nueces has overflowed its banks, and is impassible; while the whole country beyond is a continuous bog, rendering any attempt to travel in large numbers impracticable. This very much weakens the chance of an invasion from Mexico at this time, as the waters in Western Texas are apt to keep up from the middle of July, at least, until the middle of October, and then the deserts between the Nueces and the Rio Grande are once overflowed they rarely become passable, even to single wayfarers, under two months, and are so much the more difficult of travel to large bodies of men.

The Washington Union gives the following:--

"LATEST AND INTERESTING FROM TEXAS.

"The Executive has been polite enough to place in our hands the following correspondence between Major Donelson and the Government of Texas, along with a printed document, communicated to the Congress of Texas, and comprising some of the mysteries of the treaty with Mexico. It implicates Mr. President Jones in these extraordinary transactions. We hasten to lay them before our readers. This ridiculous negotiations, at which the Courts of England and France will have some cause to blush--every way ridiculous, as well on account of the scheme itself, as of the conduct of its agents (Elliott and Saligny), and of its unqualified and unanimous rejection by the Senate of Texas, will reflect some light on the absurd and new fangled doctrine of M. Guizot about the balance of power on the American continent.
How ridiculous, that after all this "scenery, machinery, and decorations," after all this elaboration of machinery--all this working of the wires--all these trips of the Eurydice backwards and forwards, the Mexican treaty should have been unanimously rejected! The whole drama, indeed, is more ridiculous than an farce which was ever played upon the French or English stage.

"The Congress of Texas was to adjourn, by resolution, on the 28th of June."

The adoption of the measure of annexation was thus announced by the Texan Government to the Legation of the United States:--

Department of State, Washington, June 23.

The undersigned, Attorney-General of the republic of Texas, charged ad interim with the direction of the Department of State, by order of his Excellency the President, has the honour of transmitting to the Hon. Mr. Donelson, Charge d'Affaires of the United States near this Government, the enclosed copy of a joint resolution, adopted by both houses of the Congress of Texas, on the 21st instant, and this day received and approved by the President, declaring the consent of the existing Government of this republic to the terms of the proposition for annexation, tendered by the United States, through the Hon. Mr. Donelson, on the 31st of March ultimo, to the Government and people of Texas.

To all true friends of the great cause of annexation, and especially to the Hon. Mr.
Donelson, whose energies and talents have been so ably and faithfully devoted to the success of that cause through the several stages of its recently triumphant progress, it must be peculiarly gratifying to observe the harmony and unanimity with which this resolution has passed the two houses of Congress, and received the executive approval.

LT 1845-7-30-6d Mexican bonds

The result of the last meeting of Mexican bondholders is well-known. They decided upon taking legal steps to compel Messrs. Lizardi and Co. to transfer to the new agents, Messrs. Schneider, the funds which they so unaccountably detained. That, according to every principle of equity, as understood by merchants, the late agents were bound to appropriate to the bondholders only the money they received on account of the dividends, nobody seemed to entertain the slightest doubt; and we do not believe that a single impartial person was to be found who agreed to the doctrine that debts due from Mexico to Messrs. Lizardi could be justly set off against this specific fund. Still there has been great anxiety to see some legal opinion of Mr.
James Russell, the Chancery barrister, which has been taken by the Committee of Bondholders preliminary to their proceedings, will be read with great eagerness. It will be seen that public and legal opinion are precisely in harmony with each other:--

"By the agreement of 1837, one-sixth of the Customhouse duties of Vera Cruz and Tampico is appropriated to the payment of the interest on the bonds; and, in order to secure its due application, it is paid by the administrators of the Customs into the hands of two Commissioners, one of whom is nominated by the bondholders. In the hands of the Commissioners this one-sixth is served from the general funds of the Mexican Government, and it is thenceforth clothed with a trust for the bondholders.

"By a subsequent arrangement the share of the Customs thus appropriated has been increased from one-sixth to one-fifth. Though the Mexican Government could not, without violating good faith, have lessened the fund, it was quite competent to them to increase it; and the one-fifth when received by the Commissioner is equally clothed with a trust, and for the same purposes as the one-sixth would have been.

"The funds are transmitted by the Commissioner to Lizardi and Co., the agents of the Mexican Government but the transmission is merely for the purpose of distribution among the bondholders. The transmission is made for the purpose, not of destroying the trust, but of carrying it into effect. Lizardi and Co. receive the funds subject to a specific appropriation. Of that appropriation--of the trust to which the funds are thus subject--Lizardi and Co., have complete notice: they are themselves trustees of the fund as soon as the moneys come into their hands, and they cannot apply them to any purpose other than the payment of the interest on the bonds, without violating obligations and duties too plain to be mistaken.

"If Lizardi and Co. have made advances for the general purposes of the Mexican Government, and if on this separate account a debt is due to them, they, must seek payment of that debt from the Mexican Government; and they may justly retain any moneys in their hands on the general account of the Mexican Government. But the funds in question were funds which even that Government had no right to divert from the bondholders. If the Mexican Government had directed Lizardi and Co., to apply the one-fifth of the Customs remitted by the Commissioners to the discharge of a private debt due from Mexico to Lizardi and Co. that direction would not have entitled them to retain the money for their own use, and to attempt to do so without the sanction, and in opposition to the orders of the Government, is as unjustifiable in law as it is in morality."

The opinions of Mr. Turner and Mr. Malins have also been taken, and, as the committee state, entirely concur in Mr. Russell's view. It may be worth while to remind some of our readers that the reasoning above as to the change from the one-sixth to the one-fifth is nearly the same as that put forward under this head, when the point was first started. There seems little doubt that the law will now take its course, without any technical impediment. [JSW]

The annexation of Texas, after maintaining for nearly 10 years an almost undue prominence among the political questions of the age, is announced at length as an historical fact. When the equipoise of probabilities had been so long preserved, no rational person could have been surprised at either result. The only real wonder is, that the decision has been so long deferred. If it seems now to take the most indifferent spectators rather aback, it is simply because, when people have long been accustomed to one political mood and tense, it requires a mental effort to realize another. Thus it is, that the most likely or possible changes may come at last to be the least expected. The more unaccountable the delay may be, the more mysterious is the obstacle it seems to denote. There must be some secret bar between the lovers who have courted half their lives. The man who is always contemplating an act of importance is viewed by the public in that inceptive position, even after he has exchanged it for fulfillment. Though in the early part of the month we spoke of annexation as already morally consummated, as a mere question of time dependent on the numerical growth of a State's majority in Texas, and as very possible determined at the time we wrote, yet with the rest of the world we feel the suddenness of the act. We are puzzled at it as we should be at the fall of a leaning tower, which till the moment that it fell had puzzled us much more by its standing.

The event is already proclaimed by a party in the States as a triumph over European interference. They who so speak are evidently unacquainted with that kind of mediation which is sufficiently rewarded if it makes enemies placable and disputants considerate; if it secures freedom of choice to those who are exposed to overwhelming influences and inspires calmness into those who were excited by fierce animosities, and perplexed by the gravest embarrassments. It certainly is the habitual, the immemorial policy of Europe, to suggest counsels of independence to the weak, and to be jealous of a powerful neighbour. A century or two might possibly have proved that Texas ought to have been an independent empire. It may possibly still turn out that the singular mixture of government and anarchy, of responsibility and irresponsibility, miscalled. Federalism, is not the safest political absorbent. The boasted vortex may possibly not be found in the end the smoothest current or the plainest sailing. The internal dissensions of the States, as well as their external aggressions, undoubtedly suggest the thought that an independent, and even a powerful empire, midway between the States and Mexico and the West Indies, might be the best for all parties. Such may or may not be the discoveries or the conclusions of a future age. It is the part of wisdom, however, to provide for the barest contingencies. Historians and statesmen, and nations also, might some day deplore that the humane and provident Powers of Europe, so familiar as they are with the virtues of independence and the vices of dominion, should have overlooked the weakness of an infant state, and not made one effort to procure it the leisure and the liberty to choose its part. Many a grave judgment is recorded and accredited by all mankind for a neglect of less opportunities.

It may therefore be the future glory of the two leading European policies that they combined to render the annexation of Texas at least a free act. Good or bad, wise or foolish, it has at least been the act of Texas, not the dictation of circumstances. The two alternatives of independence and annexation were jointly laid before q convention assembled to decide that particular issue. Never before had independence been fairly and explicitly offered to the people. It was so offered on the word of Mexico, and the guarantee of the European mediators. It can no longer be said that annexation was the only safe choice--that Texas was driven into the arms of its powerful neighbour. The deliberation was not biased by a desire for peace. On the contrary, the actual choice is the signal, though it may be at present only the signal, of war. Texas, independent and protected, might have been as a wall of brass between the ambitious encroachments of the north and the feverish disorders of central America. It may now be the battle-field of two nations, two characters. It may be the scene of a piratical and predatory warfare between one nation most unprincipled in its aims, and another most reckless in its revenge. The cupidty and license of all nations, sick of peace and order, may gather under the two hostile flags, and make Texas the point of their horrible collision. Should such be the lamentable result, it will prove the wilfulness of the Texan decision, as well as the wisdom of the European mediators.

The question, doubtless, admits of being viewed with great simplicity. Texas, as an independent state, independent in fact and by general recognition, may unite itself to whom it pleases. It is chiefly people by immigrants from the United States and others of the same race. There are many obvious advantages in union, and many encouraging precedents. So far the case is clear. But, if this were all, how is it that annexation has so long struggled in vain to survive the early and now inveterate prejudice of its immorality? How is it that the most impartial writers and the most righteous men in the States have thought it worthy of their most unqualified condemnation? The question cannot be viewed thus simply. It cannot be separated from its history. Admit that annexation is a natural finale of the drama, then the plot has been most unprincipled. The United States allowed a large emigration of the most unscrupulous adventurers into Texas, under contract with the Mexican Government. If it is alleged that the latter did not or could not fulfil its contracts, it cannot be pretended that the former exhibited better faith. The circumstances of fraud and outrage connected with that immigration excited the disgust and remonstrance of every good man in the union. The federal Government allowed it,--encouraged it; saw all the while that the new population of Texas would not bear the Mexican Government and laws;--saw immigration and rebellion, colonization and independence of Mexico, proceeding passibus equis. The declaration of independence was notoriously only the conclusion of a scheme openly concocted within the limits of the union. We are now told the only possible end and aim of that scheme was annexation. Is it possible to forget these dark items in the account? Is the destiny of federalism so inevitable a fact, so bright an idea, as to hide these spots? The fatalism of power and ambition never can efface the lines of morality. Even that which must be, need not be done by detestable means. It is the moral repugnance not only of rival nations, but of America itself,--of the nation most interested and most compromised,--which has struggled all this time against an act, the object of which might be useful and inevitable, but which in itself, in its means, in its actors, was dangerous to the mutual confidence of nations, and to the cause of public morality.

The half-yearly meeting of the United Mexican Mining Association was held to-day, and the resolutions passed at the previous meeting, for altering the deed of settlement so as to enable the directors to declare a dividend without having so large a surplus as 60,000l., were confirmed. Before putting the resolution declaring a dividend of 5s. per share, as previously announced, the chairman stated that further remittances had been received since the last meeting, and that therefore the directors were enabled to declare a dividend of 7s. 6d. This statement was, of course, heard with great satisfaction by the proprietors, and the resolution with embodied it was passed unanimously. They were so much the more pleased as the company has been struggling through difficulties for upwards of 20 years, and this is the first dividend that has been paid since its commencement.

From the circulars of the brokers connected with the wool trade, and from other sources, it may be collected that the trade in colonial wool is in a progressive state. The series of sales commenced on the 3d and ended on the 26th instant, the attendance of buyers having been very numerous throughout. The quantity of colonial wool offered for sale being greater than ever was sold at any one preceding period, might have operated injuriously on prices had the market been in a less healthy condition. To the advance which took place at the late German wool fairs this beneficial result is partly attributed; and it is also observed, that the importation is much improved, especially from Port Philip. Out of 31, 312 bags of colonial wool there were 10,022 Australian, 7,272 Van Diemen's Land, 8,673 Port Philip, 1,762 South Australian, and 3,148 Cape of Good Hope; the quantities from New Zealand and the East Indies being very trifling.

THE ANNEXATION OF TEXAS.--While this paper has uniformly advocated the annexation of Texas to the United States, from 1837 to this time, it has as uniformly denounced the manner in which annexation was sought to be achieved by the late Congress. For annexation by treaty, we were every an advocate; but we protested most solemnly against the violation of the constitution by trampling upon the treaty-making Power. With us, then, the question has not been whether it was wise, and prudent, and patriotic, to annex Texas. To all this the Courier and Enquirer has ever been committed; and, from recent events, we are more than ever confirmed in the policy of that great measure. Our only objection, heretofore, has been to the manner of annexation, not to annexation itself; and as we remarked some weeks since, the interference of the Governments of England and France has not only reconciled nearly the whole country to annexation, but even to the manner of accomplishing it. We think we may, therefore, with great safety congratulate our readers that this great measure has been brought to a close, and that Texas is at this time virtually an integral part of the American Union. The mode in which it has been accomplished is altogether objectionable; but the very strenuous exertions of England and France to prevent the measure prove its immense importance to us, while their interference roused an American feeling which prompted nine-tenths of our people to desire annexation, even under the resolutions of the last Congress. The nation was committed on the subject; and rather than see the result which we this day announce. Our firm belief is, that the whole country will be greatly benefitted by the annexation of Texas; but more especially will the commercial and the manufacturing sections of it be directly benefitted by that event, while, instead of weakening, it will add greatly to the strength of the union. Such we know were not the opinions of most of the northern people some months since; but time and reflection have opened their eyes measurably to the true merits of the question. In regard to the question of slavery in this connexion, we have ever denounced it as a bugbear not worthy of a moment's serious consideration. Suppose a slaveholder were working 100 negroes on 200 acres of land, would any sane person think it cruelty to the slaves if he were to extend the size of his farm? Certainly not. And if by so extending h is farm he increases his ability to clothe and feed, and in time of sickness to care for the slaves, the philanthropist must rejoice at the measure. And precisely so it is with regard to Texas. From this time forward our laws extend to every square foot of land in Texas; and henceforth the introduction of a slave from any quarter save our own slave states, in piracy, and punishable with hanging. From this time forward, then, the slave trade is extinguished in Texas. This is a great measure gained--one in which every honest man in the land should rejoice; and henceforth, instead of the slaves being required to toil upon the comparatively barren soils of Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, and Missouri, where the produce of their labour barely enable their masters to clothe and feed them, they will be transported to the more congenial regions of Texas, where a virgin soil and more genial climate will render their labour far more productive, where their value to their owners will be three-fold what it now is, and where, consequently, they will be better fed, better clothed, and better cared for in the hour of sickness. It follows of course, that the northern slave states will ultimately get rid of the great curse under which they now labour, and thus add to the political weight and influence of the free states. With regard to what Mexico may do, in consequence of annexation, we need not have any apprehension. She has offered to acknowledge the independence of Texas if she would not unite with us. By this act she has virtually admitted her inability to conquer her, and given to all the world a quiet claim of her title. We care not much what she does; but if she declares war her capital will soon be in our possession, never to be surrendered, as we have heretofore said, until the Californias are ceded to the United States.--New York Courier and Enquirer. [JSW]

LT 1845-8-2-8f US and annexing principle

The following highly interesting article we copy from the New York Courier and Enquirer of July 15:--

"It is an old saying in reference to undertakings of questionable morality or expediency that it is 'the first step which costs.' This is true; but, unluckily, costly as that first step may be, it is not with it that the cost of evil, or the propensity to accomplish it, terminates.

"The success of Texas annexation, prepared from long back by emigration from this country, is acting already with wonderful efficiency, in stimulating to other like enterprises--Oregon being considered as already part ours, all peradventure, eager eyes are turned to California, and accordingly we find that a meeting was held at the court-house in St. Louis on the 30th ult., the object of which, according to the new era, was 'to project a plan to form an independent settlement in California.' Speeches were made, and the wind-work of a very flourishing settlement was completed, which leads the democratic organ in St. Louis to think 'that Mexico will find it for her interest to establish there a separate republic, or leave it entirely to the control of the adventurous spirits already preparing to settle it.'

"Thus commenced the settlement of Texas; and as the Californian emigration swells, the necessity will become more and more transparent of annexing that region also to our Anglo-Saxon inheritance.

"Now, on the subject of California, we have already said that the acquisition of that country by honourable means we do consider desirable--of that portion of Upper California at least which includes the Bay of St. Francisco, and the St. Sacravent river running into it; and to our view, the acquisition of that territory, by negotiation and purchase, would be a master stroke of policy.

"Whether now or at any near present time the Government of Mexico, whatsoever it may be, would consent to negotiate with this Government for the cession of this part of this country by honourable means we do consider desirable--of that portion of Upper California at least which includes the Bay of St. Francisco, and the St. Sacravent river running into it; and to our view, the acquisition of that territory, by negotiation and purchase, would be a master stroke of policy.

"For instance, we might consent that England should come down to the Columbia River, and have its navigation in common with us--thus renouncing some six or seven degrees of barren territory in Oregon north of that river, but which, though comparatively valueless to us, would be valuable to Great Britain, as connecting with her Hudson's Bay settlements; provided that England would yield to us the free navigation of the St. Lawrence, with the necessary depot at or near the mouth, and would interpose no obstacle or objection to our purchasing of Mexico some five or six degrees of latitude adjoining our southern boundary of Oregon, which would just enclose the Bay of Francisco and its tributary waters.

"This, with good faith and fair play all round, seems to us alike desirable and feasible; and on such a footing as this, or any analogous footing, we are for Upper California--but not by rapine--not by revolution prepared in advance in our own country, to be effected by emigrants, sent from here with the preconceived purpose of robbing and spoiling those of whom they go to ask hospitality and a home.

"With the tone, therefore, of the St. Louis paper in speaking of the preparation for emigrating to California, we are little pleased--but for California, as of more value to us--a few dozen leagues of its seaboard, thence running back into the interior--than all Oregon, we go strongly whenever we can go honestly."

Our accounts from Madrid are of the 26th ult. According to the letters from Malaga inserted in the Heraldo, the Progresista conspiracy discovered in that city had ramifications in the Ronda, Granada, and different other parts of Andalusia. Among the persons arrested were Lieutenant-Colonel Lara, several other officers, a great number of sergeants of the regiment of Jaen, a merchant named Hervas, the lawyer Cardero, Messrs. Canadillas, Saborio, and other individuals known to profess Progresista principles. The Heraldo states, that Madrid was also to have been the theatre of a revolutionary movement, and that the police had seized copies of an incendiary proclamation, printed in the vicinity of the capital on the 23d, and which purported to be the manifesto of the "Liberal Union." Extraordinary precautions were taken for the maintenance of tranquility in Madrid, and the night before the entire garrison had been suddenly placed under arms. The authorities of Malaga had informed the Government that good order had not been an instant disturbed in that city. The political chief of Cuidad Real having seized a treasonable correspondence carried on between the Carlists of that province, had thought proper to banish three of the principal chiefs of that party. A large force was being concentrated in the neighborhood of Vittoria. Some changes were contemplated in the military department. General Aspiroz, the director of the Artillery, was to be replaced by General Loigorry, and General Soria, Inspector of the Infantry, by General Cordova.

The Three per Cents. Closed at 28 11-16 for cash, and 20 at 60 days; the Five per Cents. At 21 1/8 for cash, and 21 ½ at 60 days; and the Debt without Interest at 7 for cash.

------

We have received the Madrid journals and correspondence of the 28th ult. It would appear that the speculations put forward of a dissolution of the existing Cabinet were, at the least, premature. With the exception of General Narvaez and M. Martinez de la Rosa, the whole of the Ministers had returned to Madrid from Saragossa.

The Gazette publishes dispatches from Saragossa of the 25th. The Queen was to have left that city on the 28th for Tudela by the canal of Aragon, on the 29th to arrive at Tafalla, and on the 30th at Pampeluna. The dispatch states that she is in the most perfect health.

Petitions have been presented to the Commandant-General of Malaga by Moderados and Progresistas in favour of those compromised in the conspiracy discovered there; and the Captain-General of Grenada has been prayed to stay the execution of the sentences until Her Majesty's pleasure be known.

Large bodies of troops are assembling in Vitoria, and measures are taken to prevent an insurrection of the Carlists.

The Three per Cents. were rather firmer than at the last quotation. They were done at 28 ¾ for cash, and 29 1/8 at 60 days. Amount, 26,200,000. Fives at 21 1/8 cash; 400,000 done. Passives, 7 1/8 from the 15th of August. Amount, 4,000,000.

TEXAS.--It is very mortifying to perceive that those races in America which upheld slavery and the old aristocracy of colour should be thriving and increasing in numbers, wealth, peace, and power, whilst that race which has proclaimed the great principle of human equality, and acted upon it, should remain poor and divided, its industry paralyzed, its efforts at political organization utter failures, and its very existence threatened by the encroachments of its neighbours. The Anglo-Americans and the Portuguese-Brazilians thrive; the Spanish race, even in the most favoured position, dwindles. Within 20 years the Anglo-Americans have swollen from 10,000,000 to 18,000,000; within the same time, being about the period of their freedom, the Mexicans have increased from 6,000,000 to 7,000,000, that, too being most Indian increase. There are 1,000,000 of whites in Mexico 2,000,000 of mixed race, 4,000,000 of Indians. How can such a population withstand or compete with the expansive power of the Anglo-American? And yet the philanthropist could not hesitate which to prefer. In Mexico the Indian walks armed by the side of the white man, his best support, his free labourer, and friend. The American drives his slave gang before him to the cultivation of a new soil. The worst features of humanity are prominent in the one, the best features in the other; but the bad prevails, and, as we cannot take upon us to set straight by the strong hand what we think unfitting in the ways of Providence, we must deplore and abide. There does indeed seem to be a powerful demon employed counteracting and undoing all that we have done or can do against slavery and the slave trade. Nowhere has it more completely baffled our efforts than on this very land of Texas. But the struggle was from the first a vain one. Has we, indeed, on first recognizing the independence of Texas procured a recognition of it from Mexico, and poured European capital and population into it, we might have reared an independent state; but capital refused to repair thither, the American along migrated to Texas. In such circumstances to hope that Texas would not declare itself politically Anglo-American, as it was left to become in population and commercial connexion, was idle. How strong the national current ran in that direction we see from the unanimity of the Texan assemblies. They are all American to a man. If they ever affected to desire independence, it was to force Jonathan to grant them fair terms.

This they seem to have got, though not with terrifying President Polk, by shaking hands with Captain Elliot. The conditions of the United States were churlish; the grudging Senate of Washington passed them in order that the Texans might demur, that fresh negotiations might take place, that thus the matter should again come before Congress, and allow time and European interference to defeat annexation, and acted thereon promptly by the dispatch of ships and regiments to the Rio Grande. Polk has shown himself in this a worthy son of Jackson; indeed, an improvement upon old Hickory, since he has avoided the violence and bloodshed which accompanied the General's seizure of the Floridas. The question now is, whether the British Government and that of France, having failed, will be content to refrain from all further interference. Will they give up their treaties with Texas? Will Englishmen give up their claim upon Texas, as portion of Mexico to them? Will these European Powers remain strangers to the settlement of a new frontier between Mexico and the 80th state of the union, or will attempts be made, by negotiation at Washington, to settle these in conjunction with the Oregon frontier? Mr. M'Lane is on his way to England to negotiate the latter affair. The very mission shows a desire on the part of the President to come to some amicable arrangement, and the sooner this is done the better, for the American zeal for territory having been satisfied in the direction of Texas, will now throw itself into the Oregon question with the usual fury of appeals to popular desires. It remains to be seen what attitude will be taken by the American Whigs, by those who stigmatized annexation. If Mexico remain quiet, they will have but weak arguments to bring forward. President Polk's success will add to his popularity, as well as that of the Democrats, and there seems little doubt that these are determined to follow up their victory by reducing the protecting tariff down to a tariff requisite for revenue alone. It seems to be confidently asserted that Mr. Walker will propose this measure at the opening of Congress. Should it take place, it will in some measure reconcile England to the loss of free trade with Texas.--Examiner.

STATE OF THE MEXICAN NAVY.--It will not be uninteresting to our readers, in the present state of the affairs in the western hemisphere, when the decision of the question of peace or war rests with the Government, or rather the citizens of Mexico, to be informed of the present condition of the Mexican navy. The effective force consists of the steamer Guadaloupe, 778 tons, two 68 shell-guns, four of 12, and a machine for rockets; steamer Montezuma, 1,100 tons, one 68 shell gun, two long 32's, two 32-pound gunnades, two 32-pound caronades, and a machine for rockets; brig Mexican, one shell-gun of 12, and 14 zonnades of 18; brig Vera Cruzana Libre, one shll gun of 32, six gunnades of 18, and 12-pound caronades; brig Tempoalteca, six caronades of 12; schooner Eagle, one shell gun of 32, and six 18-pound caronades, schooner Liberty, one shell gun of 12; schooner Morelos, one shell gun of 12; and four gun-boats, each mounting a long 24-pounder on a pivot. All these vessels are stated to be deficient in men; and, with the exception of the two steamers and gun-boats; require repairs before they would be able to put to sea.--Liverpool albion.

MEXICO, JUNE 29, 1845.

Since the abortive attempt at revolution, made on the 7th of this month, of which I have already sent you the particulars, Mexico has remained in a state of perfect tranquility. Rumours of plots and intended risings have circulated daily, but no disturbance has taken place, either in the capital or the provinces, and for the moment the Federalist movement is a failure. According to the general opinion, that quiet is not destined to have a long continuance, as the Federalists are numerous and powerful, and the present Government is too apathetic to resist them when they seriously begin to act. Mexico will suffer much if such a change takes place, as the actual Ministers are honest well-meaning men, who do all they can to maintain Conservative principles, and govern according to the strict letter of the Constitution. Unfortunately they want firmness and moral courage, and they seem to encourage future sedition by the very lenient manner in which they have treated the leaders of the last revolt. Rangel, for instance, through whose folly 40 lives were sacrificed, has been sentenced to ten years' imprisonment; and when you inquire, why a man stained with so much crime, and taken with arms in his hands, has not been treated with more severity, they will tell you that the Mexican Government on principle is averse to shedding blood, and that as the President holds his office only ad interim, he as reluctant to proceed to extremities. The enemies of the Government hint at the same time that the Ministers acted from poltroonery, and that they spared the lives of Rangel and his fellow conspirators to secure their own when a reverse of fortune takes place. I have no doubt the latter motive had much influence, and that any other unsuccessful agitator who perils the life of citizens, and the existence of the state, will be treated with the same leniency. Santa Anna was the only man who knew how to govern the Mexicans, but he was morally incapable of filling a great destiny, and his vices and sordid avarice reduced him to the lowest level. Latterly, though dreaded, he was universally despised, and he has not left a single friend of good character in the whole country. I have not doubt he was the prompter of Rangel's enterprise, and that he stopped at the Havannah to be at hand in case it succeeded.
The Congress is to assemble on the 1st of July, an extraordinary session having been called for the purpose of advancing the various reforms which the republic demands. I am sorry to say the alteration in the tariff, of which I gave you an outline in my last, remains over to that period. The Senate, whose sittings have not been interrupted, have discussed it more than once; but thought the two Chambers are agreed in returning to the standard of 1842, nothing official has been done, and we must wait another month for the publication of the new tariff. The bill had a narrow escape in the Senate, as one of the popular members proposed, by way of encouraging native industry, that all articles manufactured in the republic should be prohibited altogether. This appeared quite natural to several, but, fortunately, the Ministers were able to demonstrate its absurdity, and the principle of the tariff of 1842 was generally adopted. This mania of forcing manufactures has bitten the people here, as well as in Spain and Portugal. Imagine a country five times as large as France, with only 7,000,000 to 8,000,000 of inhabitants, two-thirds of whom are miserable Indians, undertaking to manufacture while four-fifths of its soil are uncultivated--a country without roads, cut up into districts which scarcely communicate with each other, but full of natural wealth, if there were only hands enough to cultivate it. The manufacturing experiments have not hitherto succeeded, though the most ample protection had been given them. Few have ventured beyond making a common calico, worn by all classes, called manta, retailed as ls. per vara, or yard; but even that article could be delivered cheaper by the British manufacturer, if its introduction were not severely prohibited. Others have attempted common cloth and ordinary prints; but I do not hear that any factory has succeeded so as to compensate for capital and risk. The amount of protection given to native fabrics can be judged by the fact, that a bale of Manchester prints which stand on board at Vera Cruz at $130, cost, with import and inland duties, carriage, commission, charges on remittance, &c., $412 before delivery to the shopkeeper who is to retail them in the interior. And yet with this protection--so true are first principles--manufacturers do not prosper in Mexico, nor will they until the soil be fully cultivated, and there is a superabundance of labour.

The election of a President will soon be made. Herrera, the presiding interim President, will probably be chosen though it is said Gomez Farias, the head of the Federalist party, has secured several votes. It is fortunate for the country that the person last named is not over-burdened with riches, for Federalist to the core as he is, and enthusiast as he ever will be, no Government could stand against him if he had the means of bribing the army, through whose agency all revolutions are made. Gomez Farias is for the moment labouring under suspicion of having been connected with the Rangel movement, and he is keeping out of the way; but he is a Mexico "waiting on Providence," and as persuaded of the truth of his theory, as if he had been a successful, and not a beaten, man. Some persons expected that Bustamente, who has just arrived from France, would have mustered votes for the Presidency, but his appearance has not caused the least sensation, and his name is seldom mentioned. In fact no event can make a sensation here; and I fancy that the apathetic, almost stagnant, Indian blood has become so infused into the Mexican people, that nothing can arouse them.

We are anxiously expecting news from Texas. The Congress was to meet on the 17th of this month; but the decision on the United States proposal of annexation has been referred to a national convention, to be held on the 4th of July. The result of that meeting you will learn through the States much sooner than I can send it through Vera Cruz and the Southampton steamer; and the train of reasoning consequent on it will be understood in England before my correspondence appears. Annexation will be a fatal blow to Mexico, and prejudice all European interests in the new world. It is clear that the American Government does not limit its views to the incorporation of a state so unproductive as Texas in reality is; but that the vicinity of Texas to the chief mining district of Mexico is the great source of attraction. The United States cove the possession of Chihuahua, San Louis Potosi, Durango, Zacatecas, and Santa Fé, all of which are more or less in its vicinity; and they are determined to have them, without forgetting the more extended plan of incorporating the territory lying between Texas and the Bay of California and the Pacific. I ask if it will suit British interests to see all the country, from which silver in such large quantities is produced, under the dominion of the United States; or will it suit the great European Powers to find, I may say, the monetary circulation dependent on the caprice of the President of the United States? These are remote consequences, you may think, but I reply, in politics our views must not be limited to 50 or 100 years, and we must foresee what may be the result of any given proposition. The United States will of course deny that they have such ambitious tendencies; but I defy them, if Texas be incorporated, not to look with a longing eye on all those treasures of neighbouring province of Mexico contain--treasures which would become tenfold if explored with that zeal and industry that distinguish the Anglo-Saxon race.

As to California, and the western coast of the Pacific, the views of the United States cannot for a moment be doubted, and gladly do we see that our Government has determined not to give way on the Oregon question. But we must not forget that the States are peopling Upper California as they did Texas, and that a regular plan of emigration is going on through the recently discovered passages in the Rocky Mountains. Numerous settlers are already hanging on the skirts of the Bay of San Francisco, one of the finest harbours in the world, whence a large steamer can go to Canton in from 30 to 40 days; and even the fort of the Bodega lately abandoned by Russia a short distance from that bay, has not escaped them. The Mexican Government is well aware of these designs, and it is holding out encouragement to emigrants from this quarter to settle in Upper California, but there is no surplus population here, and the United States must be checked by immigration into California from some other quarter. I understand that an Irish Roman Catholic clergyman who is residing in Mexico at present, but submitted a plan to this Government for establishing an Irish colony on the farther coast of the Bay of San Francisco. The Mexican Government favours the proposal. A large grant of productive land is to be assigned, him, peculiar privileges are promised, and I understand the gentleman alluded to calculated on locating 5,000 of his countrymen in that district. The treaty is nearly complete, and if the plan succeeds, a strong body of Irish peasantry will be no inefficient aid in helping out British policy in that quarter.

The late President Canalizo and the Minister Bassadre have refused to avail themselves of the amnesty under which Santa Anna submitted to voluntary exile.
The trail of both is to go on, and in the mean time one is confined in the Castle or Perote, and the other in St. John d'Ulloa.

The regiment of Grenadiers who "pronounced" on the 7th have been dissolved, and the men who refused to join the movement have been draughted into other corps.

You will find annexed the parting address of Santa Ana, as well as the speech of the President on closing the first session of Congress, on the 31st of May.

The dispute between the French Minister and the Mexican Government has not yet been arranged, though the former has been induced by the good offices of the British and Spanish legation to accept for the present a promise of satisfaction. I send you full particulars, with the interesting part of the correspondence, in a separate article; so that I need only say here, that the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs appears to have misunderstood from the beginning the practice of diplomacy, and imagined that a violation of the "droit des gens" required no reparation but that administered by the tardy forms of a court of law. The Baron de Cypress has shown much forbearance in not insisting on the delivery of his passports, as certainly his arrest and detention by an alcalde del barrio and a sub-lieutenant was a flagrant violation of his rights, and an insult in his person to the King his master. At one moment it was generally understood that the French Minister had ceased to communicate with the Mexican Government, but I am glad to say matters have not proceeded to that extremity, though it is still possible they may do so. There are various causes of complaint arising between this Government and French residents here or in the ports on the Pacific, so that it requires but a little drop more of ill-will to make the cup overflow. Before closing this topic, I may add that the best understanding prevails between Mr. Bankhead and the Baron de Cypress, and that the latter gave his most cordial assistance in the late negotiations for the recognition of Texas. The entente cordiale is in full operation here.

Since writing thus far, I find that the Federalists are again in movement. A part of the corporation of Mexico wished to "pronounce" this morning, and it required some exertion on the part of the more prudent to dissuade them from doing so. We also learn that General Martinez has "pronounced" in Tobacco, a small province to the southwest, adjoining Vera Cruz, and a report is likewise in circulation that Tampico has declared. No importance is attached to the movement in Tobacco, but it shows that the provinces are open to seduction, and that the Federalists are determined not to abandon their hopes of governing the country.

I am sorry to find by letters from Galveston, that the affairs of Texas are taking an unpleasant aspect. Annexation is absolutely certain, though President Jones is doing all in his power to prevent it. He has declared a suspension of hostilities between Texas by the States' agents, and if, as is reported, our Chargé d'Affaires is again about to quit his post, the field will be totally abandoned. I cannot help attaching great importance to the Texan question, and I fear that annexation will be the signal for the gradual dissolution of the Mexican republic. I find a strong coincidence between the actual state of the Ottoman empire and the Mexican republic, and the aggressive spirit of Russia in the old world and the United States in this, with this difference only—that, in the one case, the great European Powers have interfered to prolong the existence of Turkey, while, in the other, not a hand is held out to save Mexico from ruin. England alone has a strong interest in so doing; but I fear she is coming into the lists too late, and that the occupation of Texas will render that extremely difficult which a few years since was comparatively easy. It is with pain I add, that there is not a single man in Mexico who has as yet appeared on the public scene capable of saving his country's honour, and that her fate is sealed.

H.

I send you the proclamation of General Martinez and the officers of the garrison at Tobacco, in favour of Federalism, which I have just received.

The following is the speech of the President on closing the first session of the Mexican Chamber for 1845:--

"Gentlemen,--We close the first period of your sessions with the satisfaction of having established order and peace in all the republic, restored liberty and the representative system, and assured the benefits arising from the memorable 6th of December of last year. The changes which have been made--glorious in their origin as in their results--are felt in the difference branches of public administration, in the several departments, and in the additional security given to the rights and privileges of citizens. Six months have passed, and that short period, which has conferred so many benefits on our country, is still more remarkable from the hopes it engenders of the future being worthy of the rank we should hold in the civilized world.

"Our ideas are confounded in thinking on the transition we have made from a state of violence, in which laws and the constitutional system were disregarded, to one where, on every side, are met examples of love and veneration for republican institutions. The Government, nearly ruined by disorders which were foretold, is now recovering itself. The departments have met and, by their patriotic proceedings, the constitutional organization in daily acquiring additional force. The army has been inspected, discipline has been established, actions which degraded the military character have been put an end to, and character and merit are now the only grounds of promotion. In fact, all public employments are disposed of without favour or odious distinctions, and to those persons only who render good service to the nation.

"Our diplomatic relations have been satisfactorily re-established, with the exception of those regarding the United States, interrupted for more than a year, and by the official declaration recently made by the Congress and Government, in which a great aggression on the republic is openly proclaimed. Our Minister at Washington and the United States Minister in Mexico have both withdrawn, and it is not easy to determine what will be the end of those differences which neither the Government nor the republic have directly or indirectly promoted.

"The Congress, whose attention was fixed on the line of conduct to be observed with regard to Texas, has felt the necessity of putting an end to a question so prejudicial in its nature, and it has allowed the Executive to hear the propositions which Texas has made, and to celebrate a treaty useful and honourable to the republic. The necessity of appealing to a peaceful negotiation, instead of resorting to arms, for the purpose of opposing the unjust policy of the United States, has completely justified the conduct of the Government and the Chamber--in this instance actuated solely by motives of prudence and feelings of the purest and highest patriotism. The propositions of Texas having been received, and the supreme Government having shown that it was not ill-disposed to the negotiation, it now remains to be seen how the matter can be terminated in a manner useful and honorable to the nation. If Texas, in contradiction to the initiative which it has made, should determine to join the United States, the Congress may be assured the Government is prepared to take such measures as the rights and dignity of the republic may demand. The Government has hitherto done all in its power to prevent collision with the United States, as well as to impede the annexation of Texas, and it will pursue the same course as long as it is consistent with its national honour and interests; but, if we should fail in these endeavors, we shall not hesitate to act as justice and reason point out.

"A remarkable complication of circumstances, and an urgent necessity which could not be overlooked, compelled the Congress and Government to direct their special attention to the influence which the political trials consequent on the events of last December had on the state of the country. Both saw that through the events which gave rise to those prosecutions were of the gravest nature, yet that society at large had claims which could not be neglected by the Chambers or the Executive. The agitation naturally produced by political offences, prolonged by causes not easily overcome, is an evil of such magnitude that all Governments have been obliged to resort to measures of clemency, as the surest means of ensuring peace and of depriving the persons compromised in those offences of all temptations to renew them. It was not possible during the continuance of the trials to proceed in the election of a constitutional President. The law of amnesty has removed the difficulty, and we now see that the events of the 6th of December have neither deprived the Government of its clemency, nor exposed to danger liberty and its institutions. The election of a constitutional President will soon crown the good work, and place the Government of the Republic on its true constitutional footing.

"It is no longer possible for those to whom power was intrusted by the confidence of the people to abuse that trust, and turn against the nation the authority they had been invested with.

"Much remains to be done by Congress to meet the public exigencies, and the Government will not hesitate to call an extraordinary session for the purpose of discussing matters worthy of the zeal and wisdom of the legislative body. Let us labour, therefore, gentlemen, without repose, in the noble work of doing good to our country, and of removing the difficulties which naturally accompany the present state of affairs. Let us sacrifice ourselves, if it be necessary, for the public good-- satisfied that Providence will bless our exertions, that the nation will approve of our proceedings, and that justice and the laws will be from henceforth the best foundation for the peace and progress of the Mexican Republic."

Santa Anna has published the following address to the nation:--

"Mexicans,--In quitting the country for ever, my heart tells me that I ought to say a few words of farewell to you. I do so with pleasure, because, under all circumstances, your cause has been mine, and my interests have on every occasion been identified with yours. I have been often honoured with your confidence and favour; and, as I never can forget your kindness, eternal will be my gratitude.

"Fellow-citizens, when far distant from you, and time has calmed our passions, examine my public conduct with impartiality, think over all I have said and done, and become acquainted with the whole truth, which now you cannot discover. The period of my dictatorship, so acrimoniously reviled, will not be found stained by cruelty or vengeance. Thanks to Heaven! I can repeat before you with a sound conscience the following declaration:--'When all was in my power, I did not avenge political offences. No citizen has been sent by me to eat his bitter bread in a foreign land, and to weep over his exile. I deprived no one of his property, or arbitrarily condemned or oppressed. Generosity and clemency were my programme.' In my conduct for many years, whether as a soldier or magistrate, I might have committed some errors, but no unworthy actions--no crimes against the country.--which I ever served with loyalty and truth. Slight errors, or the want of knowledge in the great affairs of state, may call for reprehension, but not for execration.

"The last movement which succeeded in the republic was directed solely against my person and power. A revolutionary attempt was made in Jalisco, but it was abandoned as soon as a better pretext was found out. They said, I was author or accomplice in the fatal decree of the 29th of November of the preceding year, which had for its object the control of such elections as did not suit me. I have been deprived of the first magisterial office, which the nation by its will and in constitutional form had bestowed on me. I have been declared a traitor, and driven to acts of desperation, and even at the moment when I found myself at the head of a force brave, loyal, and enthusiastic.

"Countrymen, to no one do I impute blame. I only mention these facts in order that you shall think of them at a future period, and recollect that I sacrificed myself to avoid a civil war, and a triumph gained over the dead bodies and the blood of Mexicans. Country and power, glory and self-interest, I have sacrificed from conscientious motives. My rights to the presidency of the republic were unquestionable. One or two battles, the taking of one or two towns, were sufficient to recover all, but I preferred to make the sacrifice--the immense sacrifice for me-- which you cannot appreciate at this moment, to separate myself from a country which I so much love, from a soil where I first saw the light, and on which I have shed my blood in defence of your rights.

"Mexicans, in advanced age, with a body mutilated in your service, surrounded by my wife and innocent children, I submit to exile and seek a home in foreign lands.
Forgive the errors I have committed involuntarily, and believe me, in God's holy name, that I laboured sincerely to make you free and independent, and that if I did not come up to all your wishes, it was no fault of mine. In whatever foreign land I may end my days, I will raise my humble voice to the Creator, praying for your prosperity and happiness, and wishing that you may be elevated to your proper
Although the negotiations conducted by the English and French Ministers in Mexico, for the purpose of establishing the independence of Texas, have been rendered abortive by the unanimous declaration of the Texan Convention, and although Mexico was not brought to acknowledge the political existence of her former province until that existence was on the point of disappearing for ever in the bosom of the Anglo-American Union, we see no reason to regret the course which has been pursued by France and England this occasion. The mediation of these Powers between the rapacity of the United States and the debility of Mexico was ineffectual, from the moment that the leaning of Texas herself was peremptorily declared. But that mediation was the only dignified and consistent course which could be pursued by the great European Powers. The fact that it was jointly tendered sufficiently demonstrated that neither France nor England had in view any exclusive interests of their own upon that part of the continent of North America. It was highly becoming to the honour of the French Government to give this decisive proof of the falsehood of the assertions of Mr. CALHOUN AND MR. KING, from which it could only be inferred that the King of the FRENCH and M. GUIZOT were holding a totally different language on the subject of Texas to the Americans and to ourselves. We believe that Mr. KING’S reports and MR. CALHOUN’S remarks upon them were utterly groundless; and, although France was not prepared, any more than England, to make annexation a casus belli, her agents have undoubtedly laboured as strenuously as our own to avert the annihilation of the Texas republic.

The policy of France and England upon this question has not been guided by their interests along, for it can hardly be said that either Power had any great or direct interest in the solution of the question either one way or the other. No one can venture to predict with certainty whether the addition of the Texan territory to the United States will ultimately strengthen the Union or dissolve it. No one can know whether the extension of a slave population over these vast regions and new states will not rather accelerate than prevent the downfall of institutions based upon a violation of the rights of mankind. In a military, naval, and commercial point of view the acquisition of Texas is not to be compared in importance to that of Louisiana and the Floridas. The United States has already ample means of maintaining a becoming maritime position in the Gulf of Mexico; and the Texan province extends her line of coast, without the slightest increase of her national defences. The Americans, who are still full of the absurd idea that some European Power, and especially England, would establish itself in Texas, and might attack their southern frontier by land, affect to regard the annexation of the country as the only safeguard against such an invasion; but the argument is as worthless as the wild theory in which it originated. It is not, therefore, by such remote and uncertain considerations as these that the views entertained by the statesmen of Europe have been governed. The motives which have influenced the opinion of the public, and the conduct of the French and English Cabinets, were of a loftier kind. The world views the annexation of Texas, if the whole history of the transaction, from first to last, be dispassionately surveyed, as one of the basest frauds and most unwarrantable acts of spoilation ever perpetuated by any nation. In the present state of public opinion in Europe such an aggression on the territories of a weak state by a powerful neighbour would be impracticable. It can only be compared to the policy of Russia towards the Turkish empire—a policy of Russia towards the Turkish empire—a policy which Russia herself is not bold or bad enough to avow, and which she has allowed the other Powers of Europe to arrest by their interference and co-operation in the affairs of the East. As far as public opinion in Europe is concerned, annexation has done for the political character of the Cabinet of Washington what repudiation has already done for the financial credit of the United States; and, indeed, with far more strict justice, since the infamy of repudiation rests upon some of the states only, and that of annexation is the result of the deliberate and determined policy of the American people and their rulers. Whatever the political results of the measure may be, it became the Governments of Europe and the organs of public opinion in Europe to show that the universal laws of public morality and justice cannot be violated, even on the other side of the Atlantic, with absolute impunity. As far as the actual consummation of the
The act of spoliation is concerned, the United States had no direct antagonist to encounter but the feeble Government of a distracted republic in Mexico, a specimen of whose weakness, in the shape of a declaration of war, we give in another column; but for the justification of this extraordinary specimen of democratic diplomacy America stands alone against the whole civilized world. Not for Texas alone, but for the principles which she has basely violated, an indignant protest is sent forth by Europe; and we only re-echo the stern rebuke of the wisest and best of her own citizens, if, indeed, men are still willing to be called American citizens, when they must in that capacity sustain the burden of a transaction which they have themselves denounced as shameful and fatal to the true principles of their country. What says New England to these things? What is thought of them in the cultivated and intellectual society of Boston, which lately possessed in CHANNING an eloquent defender of Christian morality, and still boasts in STORY an unrivalled expositor of law and justice? The pride of the American people used to consist in the traditions bequeathed to them by the purity of WASHINGTON and the integrity of his illustrious companions; it is now stimulated by the artifices of MR. CALHOUN, and the aggressions of MR. POLK. They used to boast of a superiority to Europe in their exemption from those political errors and crimes which have so often deluged the ancient world with blood; but whilst civilization among us daily consolidates and general peace by a firm observance of public duties and international rights, the American continent seems destined to witness the fatal consequences of an eruption of those passions and follies which a wise Government and a virtuous people do must studiously repress.

The mere fact of the annexation of Texas is, we repeat, of small account in our eyes; but the spirit which it indicates on the part of the American people, and the consequences which will inevitably follow it, at no very distant period, are matters of the deepest concern for the future. Henceforward, the passion which has been roused, principally for the purposes of an unprincipled party, must at all hazards be satisfied. Men like Mr. CALHOUN or Mr. POLK, who subsist by stimulating and serving that passion, are the successful rivals of men like Mr. WEBSTER or Mr. CLAY, who aspire to the nobler task of controlling it. The same spirit is not altogether wanting in other free countries; in England it has one representative, in France it has many; but these are men thrown into opposition by the loss of the confidence of their Sovereigns and their countrymen, whilst the Government steadily pursues an opposite course. In the United States, on the contrary, the ascendancy of the restless, unscrupulous party of the democracy is complete, and with such men in power, directly the passions of the people to aggression on foreign states, no limits can be assigned to the wanton excesses which may be anticipated from such a Government. It is vain to conceal, it is impossible to overlook the fact, that the possessions of the Crown of England, and the relations of this country with the United States, are constantly and especially menaced by this detestable party. The fear of the arm of Britain is the only protection of the British possessions in North America from invasion. The possession of such a harbour as Halifax, the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and the command of the lakes, are objects of infinitely greater importance to an ambitious people than the acquisition of the wilds of Texas and of Oregon. At present, indeed, even the democratic leaders are unprepared to rush into a conflict with the forces of England; but no one can doubt that if these possessions were held by any weaker hand, they would be immediately and unscrupulously assailed. They are now defended, not by any respect for our rights, but by the conviction of our power. A man who has just committed one theft is only restrained from attempting another by the dread of resistance or of punishment; and in our dealings with the American Government we are compelled by experience to treat them as a state which respects no adverse rights of others and no engagements of its own. Under such circumstances, and at the very time when the worst part of the people, the reckless majority of a democracy, is flushed by its recent triumph over its opponents at home and its adversaries abroad by the annexation of Texas, we augur little good from the Oregon negotiation; but that subject must be reserved for future consideration. The Minister of Foreign Affairs has communicated to me the following decree:--

"Jose Joaquin de Herrera, General of Division and President ad interim of the Mexican Republic, to the citizens thereof.

"Be it known, that the General Congress has decreed, and the Executive sanctioned the following:--

"The National Congress of the Mexican Republic, considering,-- "That the Congress of the United States of the North has, by a decree, which its Executive has sanctioned, resolved to incorporate the territory of Texas with the American Union:

"That this manner of appropriating to itself territories upon with other nations have rights introduces a monstrous novelty, endangering the peace of the world, and violation the sovereignty of nations:

"That this usurpation, now consummated to the prejudice of Mexico, has been in insidious preparation for a long time; at the same time that the most cordial friendship was proclaimed, and that, on the part of this Republic, the existing treaties between it and those States were respected scrupulously and legally:

"That the said annexation of Texas to the United States tramples on the conservative principles of society, attacks all the rights that Mexico has to that territory, is an insult to her dignity as a sovereign nation, and threatens her independence and political existence:

"That the law of the United States, in reference to the annexation of Texas to the United States, does in no wise destroy the rights that Mexico has, and will enforce, upon that department:

"That the United States having trampled on the principles which served as a basis to the treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation, and more especially to those of boundaries fixed with precision, even previous to 1832, they are considered as violated by that nation:

"And, finally, that the unjust spoilation of which they wish to make the Mexican nation the victim, gives her the clear right to use all her resources and power to resist, to the last moment, said annexation:

"It is decreed,--

"1. The Mexican nation calls upon all her children to the defence of her national independence, threatened by the usurpation of Texas, which is intended to be realized by the decree of annexation passed by the Congress, and sanctioned by the President of the United States of the North.

"2. In consequence, the Government will call to arms all the forces of the army, according to the authority granted it by the existing laws; and, for the preservation of public order, for the support of her institutions, and, in case of necessity, to serve as a reserve to the army, the Government, according to the powers given to it on the 9th of December, 1844, will raise the corps specified by said decree, under the name of 'Defenders of the Independence and of the Laws.'

General Bustamente arrived at Vera Cruz on the 17th ult., and offered his services to sustain the integrity of the Mexican territory and the dignity of the republic. He was rather coolly received by the Government, and it is reported that he refused the military honours tendered him on his arrival. It was believed that his return was not invited by any party, and that he had no desire to meddle in public affairs.

The people generally were quiet, and not at all alarmed, notwithstanding the war cries made by the Federalists and the partisans of Santa Anna, who are loud in denouncing the Government for want of energy. The state of the public treasury was presumed to be pretty low, as the officers in the employ of the Government found great difficulty in obtaining one-fourth of their salaries.

The acting President, General Canalizo, and ex-Minister of War, General Basadre, not accepting the propositions made them by Government, to be expatriated for ten years, have been imprisoned for the same term, the former in the castle of Perote, and the latter in that of San Juan de Ulloa.

Sir,--The unblushing effrontery of the United States, which has just received a fresh impetus by the late carrying our of what was generally considered as merely a Yankee threat--namely, the annexation of Texas to the Union--is not likely to stop short at this simple act of "tremendous larceny," and as long as the British possessions of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick hold out a temptation for a further acquisition of territory, the inhabitants of those colonies, exposed and unprotected as they are, can never divest themselves of that feeling of insecurity, which goes no little way to paralyze their commercial enterprise and attempts to improve the state of their colonies.

And there is no doubt but that this feeling does exist both in the Canadas and New Brunswick.

One important arm of defence has been unaccountably overlooked in all late reviews of the available capabilities of these colonies--viz., the native Indians, large bodies of whom are located in the western parts of Canada, dependent and a very heavy burden upon the British Government, but who could be converted into a most formidable and efficient force to defend our North American colonies, not only from the attacks of their greedy neighbours, but also from internal commotions and outbreaks to which the Canadas are, and always will be, subject, until the two races which form its populations are throughly amalgamated.

If I mistake not 160,000l. is the sum yearly expended by the British Government in supporting the Indians. A portion of this sum, judiciously expended, would organize a body of several thousand warriors, forming the most efficient and economical force which could be employed in that country. Indeed, in all military operations in the Canadas the co-operation of Indians has always been found indispensable, as our regular troops are perfectly unable to cope with the cunning backwoodsmen, who form the greater part of an American invading force.

Nothing could be objected to, on the score of humanity, in making use of the Indians. They are now much more "humanized" than in the old wars, and quite capable of being moulded into a most respectable state of discipline.

In the hope that the subject may be taken up by some one capable of doing it justice,

I remain, &c.,

THE TIMES-OFFICE, Saturday Morning.

[The following appeared in part of our impression of Saturday:]
The British and North American Royal mail steam-ship, Britannia, Captain Howitt, arrived in the Mersey shortly before the departure of the quarter-past 8 p.m. train least evening, after a rather prolonged voyage owing to head winds. She brings 25 passengers.

The Texan Convention had consummated the merging of their country into the American Union.

The Canadian advices communicate no intelligence of moment.

On Saturday, the 19th, at about 3 o'clock in the morning, one of the most terrible fires that has ever occurred in that city, visited New York. It originated in New-street, and then communicated to the rear of a building in Broad-street, which contained a large quantity of saltpetre. The explosion that took place when this ignited was heard in every part of the city, the flames that issue firing the houses on the other side, at 100 feet distant. At half-past 7 o'clock a.m., the whole area between Broad-street, Exchange-place, Beaver-street, and Broadway, and up Broadway to the Waverley-house, was one vast amphitheatre of flame, sweeping along like a hurricane, and bearing before it immense masses of smoke, cinders and flakes of fire falling in all directions. At 10 minutes to 8 the fire had swept down Broad-street to Stone-street, and thence to the ferry, down Beaver-street, to within three doors of William-street; on Broadway from Waverly-house to No. 4, opposite the Bowling-green, and thence down Whitehall-street, nearly to the Battery. At about 1 o'clock the fire yielded to the almost superhuman exertions of the firemen, who are described as having acted in a most heroic manner. It is impossible for us to enumerate, as is done in the Extra of the Tribune, the whole of the buildings destroyed; suffice it to say that 302 houses, and property estimated at nearly $10,000,000, have been utterly destroyed. One of the gallant firemen perished, and several others were more or less seriously injured. Engine No. 22 could not be withdrawn in consequence of being attached to the hose when the explosion took place, and was consequently destroyed. It was said that some persons, who could not escape in time, had fallen victims to the flames, and that at least one half the capital of the largest insurance offices in the States has been swamped by this disastrous fire.

By the proclamation of the Mayor the military turned out to protect the property of the citizens, and their aid in preserving order, as well as that of the new police, had been most efficacious.

We annex the following extracts from the papers relative to the Annexation of Texas:--

"The people of Texas, in Convention assembled, on the 4th of July, with but a single dissenting voice, gave their unqualified assent to the re-union of that fair country to the parent stem."

"Hon. A. J. Donelson, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, &c.,

"Sir,--The undersigned, President of the Convention assembled at this place for the purpose of forming a State Constitution for the State of Texas, preparatory to hear admission as one of the states of the United States of American, by order of said Convention, has the honour herewith to transmit to you a properly certified copy of an ordinance adopted by the Convention on yesterday, July 4th, 1845.

"I have the honour to be, with the highest respect,

"AN ORDINANCE.

"Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has passed resolutions providing for the annexation of Texas to the union, which resolutions were approved by the President of the United States has submitted to Texas the first and second sections of the said resolutions, as the basis upon which Texas may be admitted as one of the states of the said union; and whereas the existing Government of the republic of Texas has assented to the proposals thus made, the terms and conditions JOINT RESOLUTION FOR ANNEXING TEXAS TO THE UNITED STATES.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that Congress doth consent that the territory properly included within, and rightly belonging to, the Republic of Texas, may be erected into a new state, to be called the State of Texas, with a republican form of Government, to be adopted by the people of said Republic, by deputies in Convention assembled with the consent of the existing Government, in order that the same may be admitted as one of the states of this union.

2. And be it further resolved,--That the foregoing consent of Congress is given upon the following conditions, and with the following guarantees, to wit:--

1. Said state to be formed, subject to the adjustment by this Government of all questions of boundary that may arise with other Governments; and the constitution thereof, with the proper evidence of its adoption by the people of said republic of Texas, shall be transmitted to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress, for its final action, on or before the 1st day of January, 1846.

2. Said State, when admitted into the union, after ceding to the United States all public edifices, fortifications, barracks, ports, and harbours, and navy yards, docks, mazagines, arms and armaments, and all other property and means pertaining to the public defence belonging to the said Republic of Texas, shall retain all the public funds, debts, taxes, and dues of every kind, which may belong to, or be due and owing to, the said Republic; and shall also retain all the vacant and unimproved lands lying within its limits, to be applied to the payment of the debts and liabilities of said Republic of Texas; and the residue of said lands, after discharging said debts and liabilities, to be disposed of as said State may direct; but in no event are said debts and liabilities to become a charge upon the Government of the United States.

3. New States of convenient size, not exceeding four in number, in addition to the State of Texas, and having sufficient population, may hereafter, by the consent of said State, be formed out of the territory thereof, which shall be entitled to admission under the provisions of the Federal Constitution.--And such states as may be formed out of that portion of said territory lying to the south thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, commonly known as the Missouri compromise line, shall be admitted into the union with or without slavery, as the people of each state asking admission may desire. And in such state or states as shall be formed out of said territory north of said Missouri compromise line, slavery or involuntary servitude (except for crime) shall be prohibited.'

Now, in order to manifest the assent of the people of this Republic, as required in the above-recited portions of the said resolutions,--

We, the Deputies of the people of Texas, in Convention assembled, in their name and by their authority, do ordain and declare that we assent to and accept the proposals, conditions, and guarantees, contained in the first and second section of the resolution of the Congress of the United States aforesaid.

The Great Western, Captain Matthew, arrived at New York, from Liverpool, on the 22nd of July, and sailed for Liverpool on the 31st at 2 p.m., and up to 8 p.m. had not arrived here.

The Cambria, Captain Judkins, arrived at Boston, from Liverpool, on the 30th of July, in 11 days 9 hours, being the shortest passage to that city on record.

We copy the following from the Courier and Enquirer of the 31st ult.:--

Wednesday Evening, July 30.

The great event since the departure of the last steamer is the disastrous fire which swept so large and valuable a portion of the business part of this city on the morning of the 19th.
It was a most destructive conflagration--annihilating probably not less than five missions of property. Yet strange to say, it seems likely to pass over without serious consequences. The insurance, generally covered, or nearly covered the losses--and these insurances will be paid--in several instances, indeed, to the extinction of the funds of the insurance companies--and in other to their great diminution--but still the great proportion of the lessees will be paid.

The money market continues very easy and tranquil, with more demand on the part of capital for investment, than of urgent applications for capital. Of the fall trade, every one we have talked with augurs well, and upon the whole, except for the mass of blackening ruins that stare us in the face there, where commerce so recently had its richest treasures and most spacious magazines, one might almost feel that no great scourge had fallen upon us.

The Stock market continues very buoyant, and within a few days Pennsylvania's have advanced. It is now known that the interest due on Friday (1st August) will be paid, and hence the rise in the good stocks. All good stocks maintain their value.

The late news from Texas, communicating the acceptance by the Convention of the terms of annexation, excites little sensation, as that result was foreseen. It is satisfactory to add, that, at the latest dates, no Mexican troops were known or believed to be advancing towards the frontier of Texas,--and, therefore, there is little danger of collision between any such force and the troops which the President of the United States has ordered to the western boundary of Texas. We adhere to the belief that Mexico herself is not likely to resort to open hostilities.

Our crops of wheat will turn out abundant. Already some new wheat is at market from the south--and in Michigan and other producing regions of the west, the accounts are, both as to quantity and quality, most promising.

A very long continued and widely extending drought inspires apprehensions as to the yield of the corn crop, and of that of potatoes--both of first necessity; they are yet, however, within reach by timely rains, if any such should fall.

The following sentimental correspondence on the subject of General Jackson's share in promoting annexation had taken place:--

GENERAL JACKSON AND ANNEXATION

MR. ALLEN TO MR. DONELSON.

"Department of State, Washington, 23rd June, 1845.

"The undersigned, Attorney-General of the republic of Texas, charged ad interim with the direction of the department, has the pleasing satisfaction of transmitting to the Hon. A. J. Donelson, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States near this Government, in accordance with the instructions of the Executive, the enclosed copy of a joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Texian Congress, on the 21st inst., 'tendering to General Andrew Jackson, the tribute of a nation's gratitude,' together with the corresponding letter of his "Excellency the President, addressed to General Jackson, in conformity to the requirements of that resolution.

"To share with the Hon. Mr. Donelson in the honour of conveying this testimony of respect and gratitude to the distinguished personage for whom it is designed is to the undersigned a source of gratification.

"Trusting that it may reach its destination before the progress of disease or infirmities shall, in the order of Providence, have terminated the earthly career of this renowned chieftain, and that it may be received by him as one among the many evidences of regard and veneration, whereof, in declining life but increasing honours, he has so often been the meritorious recipient, the undersigned has the honour of expressing for him a lasting sense of his virtues and his worth, and again conveying to Mr. Donelson renewed assurances of the distinguished consideration with which he remains

"His most obedient servant,

"EBEN, ALLEN."

PRESIDENT JONES TO GENERAL ANDREW JACKSON.
"Executive Department, Washington, June 23, 1845.

"Sir, -- The Congress of Texas has delegated to me the performance of the grateful office of transmitting to you a copy of their joint resolution, adopted on the 21st instant, tendering to you the gratitude of the nation. In offering to you this tribute of love and admiration, the representatives of the people have concurred without a dissenting voice; and could the expression have sprung from the hearts of the people themselves, without the intervention of their agents, it would, beyond a doubt, have been equally cordial and unanimous.

"The sincerity of feeling, the utter absence of adulation or flattery, the warmth of sensibility, and the purity of heartfelt friendship, in which this testimonial of the 'unfeigned gratitude of a nation' to the exalted merits of an individual are conceived and dictated, will, it is hoped, add value to the offering, and secure for it the merit of your acceptance.

"Could the people, whose sentiments are faintly depicted in this token of their grateful love, or could he, who is made the honoured medium through which it is communicated, be assured that its reception would contribute aught to the gratification or happiness of the illustrious individual to whom it is presented, that assurance would re-act with cheering influence upon them and him.

"Having tendered this offering of gratitude to your acceptance, with fervent wishes for your happiness and usefulness in a continued length of days, I have only to add, that I am your faithful friend and most obedient humble servant,

"MR. DONELSON TO MR. ALLEN.
"Legation of the United States, Washington, TEXAS, June 23, 1845

"The undersigned Chargé d'Affairs of the United States has received the note of the Hon. Mr. Allen, enclosing the joint resolution adopted by the two houses of the Texian Congress, tendering to General Andrew Jackson the tribute of a nation's gratitude; and also, the letter of his Excellency the President of the Republic, transmitting and approving the same.

"Should General Jackson be alive, when this tribute from Texas reaches his residence, he will receive it with the emotions which are natural to a heart that has been faithful through a long life to patriotism; and he will value it as one of the highest honours ever conferred upon him. Should he have descended to the tomb before it reaches him, his country will bless it to his memory, and embalm it in its gratitude.

"In a letter just received from him by the undersigned, he concludes an account of his increasing infirmities by an allusion to the subject of annexation, in which he says--'I rejoice that the lone star will be added to our union, and that your mission has been successful.'

"General Jackson saw, at an early day, that the struggle for Texas independence was the working of a young and free spirit, which was to take shelter under the flag of the stars and stripes, as certain as that flag continued to wave over a united people.

"With this spirit, he defied in his boyhood the despotism of a foreign power, and he learned in its school that freedom could only be maintained by the union of her votaries. He could, therefore, no more oppose the progress of those general causes that have brought Texas into the family of republican states than he could abandon the hope that the pledge of those states to preserve and defend the equal rights of man will be successful. It is not that he would injure Mexico, or aggrandize his own country by the extension of its territory. Far above such selfish motives was his patriotism. He looked at government as but the creation of the superior will and rights of the people; and that these people, if identical in interest, as bound to act together, or fall a victim to foreign powers. It was territory, not as an extension of empire, but as a means of preserving and defending those who inhabit it, and who are destined to the same fate, that he desired for his country.

"On these principles, General Jackson seconded and sustained the exertions of President Tyler in aid of annexation, and it would long ago have been consummated, if his wishes could have been realized. But delay produced in his bosom neither change of hope, nor loss of confidence; because his faith was in the intelligence and virtue of the people of both Texas and the United States.

"That none of his fond anticipations respecting the fruits of the measure will be disappointed, and unanimity of its adoption by the people and Government of Texas is a high guarantee.

"In conveying this tribute to General Jackson, the undersigned will be happy to bear testimony to the sincerity of the concurrence of his Excellency the President and the Hon. Mr. Allen in the sentiments and feelings which prompted it; and the undersigned begs leave to repeat, on an occasion so agreeable to himself, the assurance of high regard with which he continues to be

"Mr. Allen's most obedient servant,
"A. J. DONELSON."

There is a peculiar language which in England it is one of the first signs of adolescence to understand and despise. It has various names, more or less honourable, more or less within the range of polite lexicography. It may be described, however, as the language of profession. All men have sufficient moral sense, or sufficient of something which for this purpose is equivalent to moral sense, to know there are such beings as heroes and martyrs, such things as generosity and sacrifice, and such objects as the public, the universal, or the eternal good. But there is a class, in England only a class, which looks on these ideas rather as taking than desirable, as furnishing baits for others rather than motives for themselves.
Such persons employ the melting tones of love and the glowing titles of virtue, when a much more pedestrian expression would better suit the undiluted cupidity or baseness of their ends. They talk on stilts, and act like reptiles. They soar in word, and grovel in deed. In England society is armed with almost too habitual a preparation against this common foe. It is become a second nature to discern it.
With us the human subject gets its teeth at one year old, changes them at seven, hates a hambug at ten, and attains to the remaining use of its understanding at fourteen. At four it knows its right hand from its left, at ten a true man from a talker. Unquestionably, therefore, hypocrites with us are reduced to a minority. They are compelled to prey upon the feeblest portions of humanity. They attack old women and agriculturists, love-sick maidens and people with a small independence, valetudinarians and young gentlemen in search of the greatest happiness of the greatest number. They establish an interest here and there, in religion and politics, in medicine or philosophy, as occasion may offer. But they act under great discouragement in the public arena. Profession is banished from good society. It is not in favour at Court. It experiences rough usage in Parliament. It finds little place in the great acts and documents of the State, in its proclamation and speeches, its correspondence and its annals. In these regions an unbroken calmness and neutrality of language conceal the unknown depths of national feeling.

It is not so, however, in the great republic established by our Transatlantic progeny.
Among its rivers and its forests, its unappropriated continent and prolific people, there deserves to be reckoned its inexhaustible power of profession. The language of integrity and benevolence, in the absence of other capital, is the great stock in trade of the Federal Union. The credulity or the shamelessness of the citizen is taxed for the sustentation of a public hypocrisy. The fund is enormous, though, as usually happens, the people have been impoverished to produce it; for while the collective state is the greatest hero, and saint, and philanthropist among the nations of the
The individual American has ceased to blush. That natural act and stamp of virtue, for which the Anglo-Saxon race is so honourably distinguished, is almost extinct in the Anglo-American. The republic may safely profess, when its citizens cannot blush for its impudence.

The annexation of Texas is an act not without precedent. It is not peculiar to the United States to wrest a province from a weaker neighbour by force or fraud, or both together. Such acts are frequent in European story. But it is peculiar to the States to make it a virtue. Our humbler, if not more virtuous, European transgressors have generally thought the less said the better. They have either maintained a prudent silence, or justified the act on the modest grounds of imperial necessity, of inevitable progress, or excusable retaliation. America alone can exalt its aggressions into the arduous and gratuitous achievements of virtue. "The reunion of that fair country "with its parent stem," the name given to the conquest of Texas by an army of Anglo-American adventurers, is an event perhaps inevitable, perhaps ultimately beneficial, but certainly not heroic. Certainly the ways and means were among the basest on human record. An American, a citizen of the Union, and a New Englander, shall describe it for us. We quote from Dr. CHANNING, addressing his countrymen "on the annexation of Texas" eight years since:--

"By whom has Texas been conquered? By the colonists? By the hands which raised the standard of revolt? By foreign Governments espousing their cause? No; it has been conquered by your and my countrymen, by citizens of the United States, in violation of our laws, and the laws of nations. We have filled the ranks which have wrested Texas from Mexico. In the army of eight hundred men who won the victory which scattered the Mexican force, and made its chief a prisoner, 'not more than fifty were citizens of Texas, having grievances of their own to seek relief from on that field.' The Texans, in this warfare, are little more than a name, a cover under which selfish adventurers from another country have prosecuted their work of plunder.

"Some crimes, by their magnitude, have a touch of the sublime, and to this dignity the seizure of Texas by our citizens is entitled. Modern times furnish no example of individual rapine on so large a scale. It is nothing less than the robbery of a realm. The pirate seizes a ship. The colonists and their coadjutors can satisfy themselves with nothing short of an empire. They have left their Anglo-Saxon ancestors behind them. Those barbarians conformed to the maxims of their age, to the rude code of nations in time of thickest heathen darkness. They invaded England under their Sovereigns, and with the sanction of the gloomy religion of the north. But it is in a civilized age, and amidst refinements of manners--it is amidst the lights of science, and the teachings of Christianity--amidst expositions of the law of nations, and enforcements of the law of universal love--amidst institutions of religion, learning, and humanity, that the robbery of Texas has found its instruments. It is from a free, well-ordered, enlightened, Christian country, that hordes have gone forth, in open day, to perpetrate this mighty wrong.

"Let me know ask, are the United States prepared to receive from these hands the gifts of Texas? In annexing it to this country, shall we not appropriate to ourselves the fruits of a rapine which we ought to have suppressed. We certainly should shrink from a proposition to receive a piratical state into our confederacy. And of whom does Texas consist? Very much of our own citizens, who have won a country by waging war against a foreign nation, to whom we owed protection against such assaults. Does it consist with national honour, with national virtue, to receive to our embrace men who have prospered by crimes which we were bound to reprobate and repress?

"Had this country visited with its whole power the lawlessness of its citizens; had these, notwithstanding such opposition, succeeded in extorting from Mexico a recognition of independence; and were their sovereignty acknowledged by other nations; we should stand acquitted in the sight of the civilized world of participating in their crime, were considerations of policy to determine us to admit them into our union. Unhappily the United States have not discharged the obligations of a neutral state. They have suffered, by a culpable negligence, the violation of the Mexican territory by their citizens; and if now, in the midst of the conflict, whilst Mexico yet threatens to enforce her claims, they should proceed to incorporate Texas with themselves, they would involve themselves before all nations in the infamy of the revolt. The United States have not been just to Mexico. Our citizens did not steal single, silently, in disguise, into that land. Their purpose of dismembering Mexico and attaching her distant province to this country was not wrapt in mystery. It was proclaimed in our public prints. Expeditions were openly fitted out within our borders for the Texan war. Troops were organized, equipped, and marched for the scene of action. Advertisements for volunteers to be enrolled and conducted to Texas at the expense of that territory, were inserted in our newspapers. The Government, indeed, issued its proclamation forbidding these hostile preparations, but this was a dead letter. Military companies, with officers and standards, in a defiance of proclamation, and in the face of day, directed their steps to the revolted province. We had, indeed, an army near the frontiers of Mexico. Did it turn back these invaders of a land with which we were at peace? On the contrary, did not its presence give confidence to the revolters? After this, what construction of our conduct shall we force on the world, if we proceed, especially at this moment, to receive into our union the territory, which, through our neglect, has fallen a prey to lawless invasion? Are we willing to take our place among robber states? As a people have we no self-respect? Have we no reverence for national morality? Have we no feeling of responsibility to other nations, and to Him by whom the fates of nations are disposed?"

Thus does a most impartial authority, "one of their own nation," describe an act which public functionaries, not only of Texas, but also of the States, now adorn with all the colours of patriotism. General JACKSON is the hero on whom they accumulate the honours of this villainous transaction. At the very threshold of another world, if indeed he lived long enough to hear these death-bed consolations, he received, through the Chargé d'Affaires of nation's gratitude. This "tribute of love" and "admiration," solemnly agreed to at the Texan convention, was not simply for his general "virtues and "worth," not simply for his sympathy with the Texan spoliators, but for his actual share in the work from its very beginning. The illustrious "chieftain" and "patriot" receives it from Texans--Texans by conquest and possession, Anglo-Americans in birth, connexions, and cause--from a band of marauders who issued from the heart of the republic, with is connivance, to annex the territory of a peaceful neighbour.

But the testimonial of "unfeigned" Texan gratitude, their "sincerity of feeling, utter absence of "adulation or flattery, warmth of sensibility, and "purity of heartfelt friendship," and all the other unctuous stuff with which President ANSON JONES improves the occasion, are scarcely worth a remark. They are too intelligible. It is the language of the States' functionary which authenticates and seals this unique document, and proclaims it to be genuine Anglo-American. Mr. DONELSON is pleased to remind the Texans that it had been the object of the General's life, and for this purpose quotes his Nunc dimittis. "I rejoice that the Lone Star will be added "to our Union, and that your mission has been successful." "GENERAL JACKSON," the Chargé d'Affaires continues--

"Sawat an early day that the struggle for Texan independence was the working of a young and free spirit, which was to take shelter under the flag of the stars and stripes, as certain as that flag continued to wave over a united people."

"With this spirit, he defied in his boyhood the despotism of a foreign power, and he learned in its school that freedom could only be maintained by the union of her votaries. He could, therefore, no more oppose the progress of those general causes that have brought Texas into the family of republican states, than he could abandon the hope that the pledge of these states to preserve and defend the equal rights of man will be successful. It is not that he would injure Mexico, or aggrandize his own country by the extension of its territory. Far above such selfish motives was his patriotism. He looked at government as but the creation of the superior will and rights of the people; and at those people, if identical in interest, as bound to act together, or fall a victim to foreign powers. It was territory, not as an extension of empire, but as a means of preserving and defending those who inhabit it, and who are destined to the same fate, that he desired for his country. On these principles, General Jackson seconded and sustained the exertions of President Tyler in aid of annexation, and it would long ago have been consummated, if his wishes could have been realized. But delay produced in his bosom neither change of hope, nor loss of confidence; because his faith was in the intelligence and virtue of the people of both Texas and the United States."

In these two quotations, we have the honest American moralist describing the act, and the American functionary commenting upon it. Europe, as we have said above, may supply too many parallels to the act; but the glib effrontery of the comment we might in vain try to match in Europe, or any other continent. [JSW]

The British and North American Royal mail steam-ship Cambria, Captain Judkins, arrived in the Mersey at an early hour this morning, after a fine run from Boston, inclusive of the usual detention at Halifax, of 11 days and a few hours. She brought a large number of passengers.
The advices by the arrival are unimportant, with the exception of those from Mexico, which we subjoin:—

"OFFICE OF WAR AND MARINE.

"SECTION OF OPERATIONS.

"CIRCULAR.—The United States have consummated the perfidy against Mexico, by sanctioning the decree which declares the annexation of the department of Texas to that Republic.

"The injustice of that usurpation is apparent, and Mexico cannot tolerate such a grave injury without making an effort to prove to the United States the possibility of her ability to cause her rights to be respected.

"With this object the Supreme Government has resolved upon a declaration of war against that power, seeing that our forbearance, instead of being received as a proof of our friendly disposition, has been interpreted into an acknowledged impossibility on our part to carry on a successful war.

"Such an error on the part of the United States will be advantageous to Mexico, because, suddenly abandoning its pacific attitude, it will to-morrow communicate to Congress the declaration of war, and excite the patriotism of its citizens to sustain the dignity of the nation and the integrity of its territory, now treacherously attacked, in utter disregard of all guarantees recognized in this enlightened age.

"You will readily appreciate the importance of this subject, and the necessity of preparing the troops under your command to march towards any point which may require protection against these most unjust aggressions.

"I am directed by the Provincial President to enjoin upon you, as General-in-Chief of your division, and as a citizen of this republic, to hold yourself in readiness to repel those who seek the ruin of Mexico.

"The Government is occupied in covering the different points on the frontiers, and in collecting the necessary means, so that nothing may be wanting to those whose glory it will be to defend the sacred rights of their country.

"I have the honour to communicate for your intelligence, and to direct your conduct.

"This circular to the authorities subordinate to this office."

"Most excellent Senor,—As my notes of the 80th of March and the 7th of April of this year, concerning the deserters and recruits for the army, have not produced the effects which his Excellency the President ad interim desired, as the governors have not been able to gather a number of men by any means adequate to the wants of the army, his Excellency has ordered your Excellency to provide the materiel, to enable the different departments to furnish their quota and complete the contingent of troops required by the decrees of the 29th of December, 1843, and the 2d of July, 1844; for, although the supreme Government has not exacted with punctuality the complement from these departments, she now sees herself under the necessity of doing so, for the war which she wages against the United States, the perfidy and treachery of which Power has put her in possession of a part of this republic.

"His Excellency the President ad interim requires that your Excellency inform the Governors of the necessity which exists of detailing the number of men, so highly necessary to fill the ranks of the army, and to excite the zeal and patriotism of the authorities, that their preparations shall be so effectual as to fulfil the desires of the Government, and prevent the dignity of the nation from being in any manner compromised.

"I have the hour to communicate to your Excellency the following, to be used as occasion may require:—

"God and Liberty.—July 16, 1845.
"GARCIA CONDE.
"Most Excellent Senor, Minister of Foreign Relations and of Police.

"Transmit to the authorities depending upon your department."

"Most Excellent Senor,—It being necessary that the troops of the line should cover the frontiers of the Republic and march toward Texas to conquer that department now usurped by the United States, his Excellency the President ad interim has commanded me to transmit to you this note to excite the zeal and patriotism of the Governors that they place under arms in their respective districts all the force which can be collected in defence of the laws, to be ready to serve as a safeguard of their respective departments, according to the decree of the 4th of June of this year, and the regulation of the 7th inst.

"Your Excellency will communicate to the Governor this supreme resolution, and will inform them of the obligations under which the citizens are to contribute to the defence of their country, and to sustain rights, violated by a nation which refuses to acknowledge them, and obliges Mexico to maintain them by force, which it most undoubtedly will, or fall in the struggle.

"She will not consent to give up one-half of her territory from the base fear of losing the other. Hoping that your Excellency will furnish me with information as to the number of men which can be devoted to this important object, your Excellency will please to accept my most high consideration.

"God and Liberty.—Mexico, July 16, 1845.

The whole of the Mexican vessels at New Orleans, with one exception, destined to convey away the Mexican Consul at that city (who is stated to have closed his official relations), had obtained their clearances; and the aspect of affairs was viewed as extremely threatening.

On the 18th of July, there was a counter revolution in favour of the Government in the department of Tobasco, headed by Commodore Thomas Marin, who, with only 80 troops, succeeded in deposing General Ignacio Martinez, who was in command of the insurgents.

The ports of Tobasco, which has been closed by the Mexican Government during the time the province was in the hands of the insurgents, had been since declared open.

The Canadian advices are uninteresting. Those from Texas merely report that the Convention was actively forming a state constitution, and that the President had issued a proclamation for the election on the first Monday of September of senators and representatives to the United States Congress.

(From the New York Courier and Enquirer.)

New York, Thursday Evening, 14th.

The punctuality of Pennsylvania in meeting the interest due on the 1st inst. is a source of gratification here, as it will doubtless be in Europe. The good influences of such a course will not be confined to that state along, but will stimulate other states hitherto in default to renewed exertions to redeem their credit. Already, it is stated in the Baltimore American, that "the revenue laws are now in progress of execution in every county in the state," "thus leaving no doubt," says the writer, "with the means already accruing under the existing financial system, of the ability of the state to resume payment of her debt at an early day after the next session of the Legislature." This is not very definite to be sure, but it shows good will, and especially that the example of Pennsylvania is operative.

If the country should be so fortunate as to escape war, there is, in its present unrivalled prosperity and progress, the surest guarantee that the defaulting states will eventually make good all their engagements.

Whether or not we are to escape war, is not yet decided. More uneasiness has been felt within the last few days, owing to the march of troops in increased numbers for Texas, and the certainty that their orders are to occupy a portion of the territory on the seaboard of that country westerly of the Nueces river, heretofore occupied by Mexico, though claimed by Texas. The apprehension is, that this forward movement may appear to the Government and people of Mexico as an invasion of their territory, rather than as a precautionary movement against the invasion of Texas by Mexican troops. A week or two will enlighten us as to the view which Mexico may take of this proceeding, and meantime we content ourselves with alluding to it here, as occasioning disquietude and uncertainty.

The inland trade, indeed the trade generally of the country, is prosperous. The canal trade in this state up to the 1st insts. amounts to $1,107,269, which is within $30,000 of the unprecedentedly large receipts of last year. The trade through the Welland Canal in American produce has fallen off very considerably, owing, it is presumed, to the tariff enacted by the last Canadian Parliament.

In money matters there is no change. The banks are quite at ease, and would willingly increase their lines of discount, but have no call. The disastrous fire of the 19th ult. has not produced any perceptible effect either upon the rate of interest or the demand for money, while already new edifices are fast rising amid the ruins; and the burnt district, although still smoking with unextinguished but smothered fires, is alive with workmen preparing to renew what was destroyed.

P. S. The indications of the latest accounts from Mexico, as well as the more extensive preparations making by the United States to strengthen its forces in Texas, and enlarge its supply of munitions, certainly look very warlike.

A declaration of War by Mexico would seem a mere formality; for the state of her Treasury and the general disorganization of the Government, forbid any efficient hostilities. Our naval force in the Gulf of Mexico is sufficient to the complete blockade of the Mexican ports there. We are not, so sure that mischief may not be done among our whalers in the Pacific by Mexican cruisers from San Blas, Monterey, and other ports in that sea.

But the mere fact of the existence of war in the Gulf of Mexico, and the questions to which a blockade may give rise with powerful neutral nations, excite no small solicitude.

The operations in foreign exchange for the packets of the 16th have been to a fair extent, closing firmly at quotations.

Stocks are heavy, and prices continue to have a downward tendency.

Cotton.--The accounts from the south relative to the forthcoming crops are encouraging; and as there is every prospect of an early and bountiful supply, speculators are not anxious to operate at present prices—viz, Uplands, very ordinary to middling, 6 to 7 ½ cents; fair and good, 8 ¼ to 8 ¾ and 9 ¼ cents; Tennessee and Alabama, 6 to 7 ½ Cents; Mobile, Louisiana.

NEW YORK, AUG. 15.

About one month since (July 15), I gave you a short account of the movement of a detachment of United States Dragoons, under the command of Colonel Kearney. It was generally understood, at the time of writing, that these Dragoons were intended as a kind of escort for the American emigrants to Oregon, and that, after proceedings on the trail of the emigrants to the South Pass in the mountains, they would return to their cantonment at Fort Leavenworth. Recently, however, the subject has excited attention, and it is now asserted by some intelligent men, that other objects than the protection of emigrants caused the movement. Whether there is any foundation for such opinions is matter of conjecture.

It is probable that the expedition of Captain Freemont (as it is said) to the Drake River, and thence to the Bay of San Francisco, has tended to increase curiosity respecting the object of Colonel Kearney, with the Dragoons (about 300) under his command. This is the third expedition which Captain Freemont has led into this almost unexplored region.

In times, however, like the present, when the talk of war is fashionable chit-chat, it is not surprising that an unexpected military movement should excite speculative opinions, and particularly so when the object is concealed, and a veil of mystery enshrouds the transaction. While I am uninformed as to the object of these movements, I cannot permit myself to believe that there is anything connected with them calculated or designed to give cause of complaint to any European Power with whom the United States is at peace. A few weeks must lay open the whole affair, and disarm unnecessary secrecy and officious curiosity of the power of doing
There are those in the United States who consider the annexation of Texas to this country as completed so soon as Texas shall adopt a republican constitution. This is a mistake. There is something yet to be done by the American Congress. It is not improbable, however, that the same erroneous opinion may prevail in England and that based may be projected. On this subject a warning voice may not be disadvantageous.

It is apprehended by this Government that attempts will be made by bold and speculative men to import into Texas large amounts of manufactured and other goods, on paying a mere nominal duty, and that by such means they will, with the adoption of the new state, be introduced into the United States, without paying any other, or greater duty. Allow me to warn every such adventurer that the project must prove disastrous. The Secretary of the Treasury, with the aid of the different revenue officers, is at this moment engaged in preparing the necessary precautionary measures to defeat all such projects. It must be recollected that no dutiable goods can be transported without hazard of seizure from one state to another, and the parties compelled to show that the duties have actually been paid, in default of which the goods coastwise, they must come from a part of entry, and such port must be authorized by act of Congress. After Texas is admitted into the Union as a state, a port of entry and clearance may be made. In such an event, rest assured all the necessary safeguards to meet this case, and secure to the United States the full amount of their duties, will be provided. Besides, Congress may or may not, for 12 months to come, create a port of entry in Texas. It is unnecessary to pursue this subject, and I will only add that this warning is not given on light grounds.

The war fever has not yet subsided; far from it. Whether intentionally or not, the movements of the Government are well calculated to keep it up. Other detachments of troops, and among the Flying Artillery, have received orders to hold themselves in readiness to move at a moment's warning. It is very probable, however, that the apprehended danger is from an attack of the Indians; while, on the other hand, there are those who believe that this Government has been too hasty in ordering (if such orders have been given) General Taylor and Colonel Twiggs to take possession of that region of country which lies between the rivers Nueces and Rio del Norte, a territory never under the jurisdiction or within the control of Texas.

The advances from Mexico are as late as the 23d of July, and have, if they are to be depended upon, rather a hostile appearance; but, as you will find them in the public journals, I omit to repeat them. I am, however, as yet, and unbeliever in a Mexican war. It is possible there may be some skirmishing and a majority of the community seem to incline to the opinion that the present state of affairs must terminate in war.

The most thorough Locofoco state in the American Union is New Hampshire. The House of Representatives is that state have recently passed sundry resolutions claiming the Oregon territory to the 54th degree of north latitude. The vote on the main question was,—Ayes, 129; Noes, 5. [JSW]

LT 1845-9-1-4a

The valour of the Mexican Government continues to decrepitate in proclamations, but we have yet to learn when the final explosion is to take place. Mexico, it is said in a strangely cumbrous form of language, cannot tolerate such an injury as the annexation of Texas "without an effort to prove to the "United States the possibility of her ability to cause "her rights to be respected;" and the circular from which we are quoting goes on to exhort the Generals commanding in the provinces "to hold themselves "in readiness to repel those who seek the ruin of "Mexico." All this, however, falls short of actual hostilities; and a week after this circular had appeared the "possibility of the ability" of Mexico to cause her rights to be respected by force of arms was under discussion in the Senate. We can only wonder that such a question was held to be debatable. For if on the one hand the aggression and encroachment committed by the United States on the former Mexican territory of Texas is an event which would justify an appeal to arms, and even demands a vigorous repression in order to provide for the future security of the frontier, as well as to punish a system of fraud and hostility calculated to rob Mexico of her provinces and her independence, it is equally certain on the other hand that Mexico is powerless for all offensive or defensive purposes, and that any serious attempt to resist or avenge this injury will inevitably lead to a more direct attack and more extensive losses.
As a question of military strength and sound policy there can be no doubt that Mexico had better submit to this loss and this affront than expose herself to bear the brunt of that military and adventurous spirit which is now literally raging in many parts of the Anglo-American union. But although the new Republics are very unequally matched in point of strength, there is no such disparity between their respective shares of wisdom. The impetuosity of the United States in the annexation of Texas is a reality almost as great a sign of political weakness as the vain expostulations and ineffectual demonstrations of Mexico; for the Government is in both countries alike subservient to the impulses of the people. The democracy of Mexico is probably quite as untractable a body as that of the United States; and, although their social and political habits have nothing in common with the Anglo-Americans, they are by no means unwilling to try their fortune in war. Between the nations which have sprung from the colonies of England and of Spain, the ancient and imperishable antipathies of religion and of race still exist. To these may be added a territorial dispute, and a sense of injuries which cannot be effaced in Mexico, and which is turned to scorn and defiance amongst the people of the United States. Odisse quem laseris is an old maxim and a true one; and these communities of the New World seem destined to re-enact, under the specious forms of popular government, the most odious political crimes of Europe in past ages. The state of most of the South American republics, ever since their emancipation from the mother country, has resembled the sanguinary and unsettled condition of the Old World during the middle ages. Habitual warfare has become the rule--peace the exception; and we may yet have to witness contests as incessant in the northern part of the other hemisphere, before ever the Anglo-American union can extend its authority over that vast region, and reckon subjects of another race as well as citizens of its own.

The incidents and achievements of such a war must be utterly uninteresting and inglorious, for on neither side are there any of the elements of decisive success of splendid victories. In this respect we are not more affected by the prospect, of hostilities between Mexico and the United States than by the disgusting details of the Indian war in Florida. But, as we observed some time ago, although the events of such a war are very contemptible, the state of war is in itself an event an event and a calamity of the greatest magnitude. To quote a parallel instance nothing certainly can be more uninteresting than the battles and sieges which are going on in the provinces of the Plata--battles in which nothing is ever decided, and sieges which remind one in point of duration, though in no other respect, of the siege of Troy. Yet these miserable contests upon the shores of the Plata have probably cost the merchants of this country hundreds of thousands of pounds of actual loss--we might say millions if the probable profits of the interrupted trade be taken into the account. How then will it be if war be declared between Mexico and the United States--countries with both of which we are carrying on a far more considerable traffic than with the States of South America? The American cruisers in the Gulf of Mexico and the American Court of Admiralty will, of course, apply to neutrals the general principles of maritime law, except in those instances in which the United States have by express stipulations with certain powers adopted the contrary rule of free ships free goods. "During the war which commenced between the United States and Great Britain in treatise on international law, "the prize Courts of the former uniformly enforced the generally acknowledged rule of international law, that enemy's goods in neutral vessels are liable to capture and confiscation, except as to such 'Powers with whom the American Government had stipulated by subsisting treaties the contrary rule, "that free ships should make free goods." In the treaties subsisting between the United States and France, Holland, and Prussia, and some of the states of South America, the principle of free ships free goods has been established. With Great Britain, Spain Portugal, Austria, and Russia, no such stipulation has been made, and these common law of neutrals. It is obvious, therefore, that in the event of a war in which the United States should be engaged, and all the European Powers be neutral, the former states would enjoy advantages in continuing to trade in the produce of the other belligerent state, to which the latter states, and especially this country, could not pretend, without modifying the doctrines of our Admiralty Courts on the rights of neutral Powers. The United States whilst they acknowledge the force of the established principle of maritime law, as laid down by all the authorities on the law of nations, from the earliest period, and as applied by Lord STOWELL during the late war in our own courts, have nevertheless laboured by negotiation and conventions to introduce and establish the contrary principle. Their relations with foreign Powers, considered in the light of neutrals, are therefore of too distinct and even opposite classes, if, indeed, distinctions of this kind can be maintained between countries which have bound themselves by treaty to give to each other all the privileges of the most favoured nation.

These considerations are happily still to be regarded as speculations on the future rather than as arguments on the actual state of affairs. But it is scarcely too much to assume that a rupture between Mexico and the United States is imminent; and if it take place, the first indication of hostilities may be a blow struck at the trade of one or other of the belligerent parties. The interests of our own mercantile classes are so closely connected with the commercial relations of the two states, that it is scarcely possible for such a rupture to take place without materially affecting ourselves; and it may not be premature for those who are more especially connected with that branch of trade, to take into consideration the position in which they may be placed if an American squadron appears in the Gulf of Mexico with hostile intentions, or if an embargo be laid on Mexican property in American harbours. LT September 9, 1845, p6 e/f: Affairs of Mexico

Message to the Mexican Congress, Presented by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, on receiving Notice of the Annexation of Texas to the United States.

The resolution just taken by the department of Texas, the violent measures of the Government of the United States to increase the American territory, the events which each day give to this affair a character of vital importance to the republic, and the publications that have been made in Texas, in America, and probably in Europe, induce the Supreme Government to communicate to Congress to measure it has pursued in the interests of an honourable peace and the rights and dignity of the nation. Though secrecy be useful in a variety of cases, frankness is not the less necessary when prudence requires a disclosure of what has taken place. The principles that have guided the Government, and the sentiments it has avowed on this subject, give it no reason to fear that when the whole truth is before the chambers its conduct will be disapproved of. The language of truth enlightens public opinion, and that heartless opposition which makes no allowance for the difficult circumstances in which a Government may be placed, but persists in poisoning the public mind, is alone to be confounded by a plain statement of facts, and a candid exposition of the course which, in its duty to the nation, the Cabinet has pursued. Government was in the first instance obliged to conquer the natural repugnance it felt at keeping secret the affairs of Texas, and in maintaining for a certain period the reserve indispensable in the negotiation of a treaty only just commenced. It, however, disclosed all that was needful to be said to place beyond doubt its pacific intentions, and to show that it had no other object but that of securing to the republic an honourable peace. On its side, Texas was equally obliged to take a decision; the functionary charged by the government of that department had already known the position which he held; he had spoken of the engagement since proposed to the republic, the motives which had induced him, by means of peace, to secure the independence of that country, and the alternative which was to be submitted to a meeting called on the determine whether Texas was to continue with Mexico, or incorporate itself with the United States. These simple indications (without speaking of the official news received last night) will explain the conduct we have followed in this thorny affair since the 6th of December last.

On coming into power the actual Government examined all antecedents, and became convinced of the impossibility of longer deferring the resolution which all Governments are obliged to take under similar circumstances. Neither the urgent and important affairs that then pressed on the Government, nor the popularity which attended all its acts, nor the excitement of its friends, could prevent it from deciding on, and avowing its conviction of the course which was necessary for the country to pursue in circumstances admitting of no delay nor dissimulation. The Governments of England and France had constantly made known to our Ministers accredited to them the propriety of recognizing the independence of Texas. These declarations were made in the most formal and explicit manner, in the interest of the republic, and for he purpose of preventing serious injury to it.

The representatives of both Courts near this Government gave us similar advice. At this period the law of annexation, rejected by the Senate of he United States, was brought forward in another form by the Chamber of Representatives, and it was easy to foresee that it would in that shape be accepted by the Senate. In fact, the Senate, by a majority of two votes, passed the bill, and thus all hope was destroyed of seeing that violent and scandalous act repudiated by the American Chambers; and the United States duly solemnized a law which will remain for ever a memorial of their bad faith, equally scandalous to the Congress, and to the Administration that had subsequently to give it effect. Our Minister at Washington instantly retired from his mission, the Government of the republic announced the cessation of diplomatic relations with the United States, and the Minister of he States likewise demanded his passports. These several acts proved on the part of Mexico its determination to oppose the incorporation, and on the part of the United States a resolution to enforce it. The protests then made by the minister of Foreign Affairs were all that could be done in the shape of diplomatic communication. As long as Nevertheless, though the Government was anxious to prevent or retard a rupture, it was onto forgetful of its duty to the nation and to itself. A desire to make honourable arrangements has become so natural to civilized Governments, that in the present day even the most powerful does not feel itself compromised in taking a step of that nature, when the proposal comes from those who ask, and not from those who are to give. Government took care to do nothing that could offend the national honour or precipitate a foreign war, while it admitted that under existing circumstances it preferred a negotiation based on our rights, worthy of the republic, and consistent with the relations Mexico should preserve towards the United States. Texas, on its side, having received the law of incorporation, could not avoid reflecting on the alternative presented to it. It was the necessity of taking a final step; on the one hand there was certain war, and on the other the suicidal act of destroying by its own hands that independence which would be speedily recognized by all nations. It was natural to believe that Texas would prefer the situation such an arrangement must place it in, to being incorporated as a simple state of the Union, merely to serve the ulterior purposes of the American Cabinet. Offended by the law of annexation, its independence supported by the policy of Great Britain and France. Texas at last decided on proposing to the Government certain preliminary articles that were to facilitate a negotiation, and save it from the embarrassments that pressed round it.

Having taken this step, Texas cold no longer doubt that the Government would give every assistance to hasten an arrangement, and prevent its annexation to the United States. The moral responsibility of the Government became most serious, because it foresaw all the evils which the annexation of Texas would give rise to. Still, to commence a negotiation was in many respects objectionable, as while on the one hand it appeared to be the most simple manner of settling the question, by establishing as a primary condition the non-incorporation of Texas, on the other it compromised the Government with respect to Texas, and favoured in a great measure the ambitious designs of the Cabinet of the United States. Government became convinced that any step taken in advance by it would not lead to a favourable result, but it felt at the same time obliged to take every precaution to prevent a termination to the affair unfavourable to the interests of the republic. It is not difficult to decide how great would have been the consternation of he Government if it had determined not to listen to Texas-or if, because we refused to do so, the annexation had taken place. The Government acted in these difficult circumstances in the most cautious manner, and every lover of his country must give it credit for the patriotism it displayed, and the prudence with which it acted for the advantage of the republic under difficulties of he most distressing nature.

Convinced that the Chambers would examine everything with care and circumspection, as its conduct has proved that it did, and persuaded at the same time that the Executive was bound to ask permission to listen to the propositions of Texas, and celebrate a convention honourable to republic, the Government addressed itself to Congress for that purpose, satisfied that it would meet the support ever given when national interests are at stake. The Congress, resolute in that conduct which it never fails to manifest in critical circumstances, disregarded to outcry of some discontented persons who pretended to see in the Texan question the germ of destruction to the established system; and, as the authority demanded did not extend beyond the permission to make a suitable arrangement, on which the Congress would afterwards pronounce, the Chambers and public opinion, both in the capital and departments, decided in favour of a policy, generous in itself and truly patriotic, which on the one hand secured peace, and on the other put a stop to the ambitious plans of the United States on the Texan territory.

The Government, being authorized to treat, and penetrated with the fresh marks of confidence given by the national representation, proceeded to prepare a negotiation in the manner most suitable to the name and dignity of he nation. The preliminaries presented by Texas were drawn up with such care and with so much respect for Mexico, that we could not find in any article a thought offensive or injurious to the state. We had, therefore, merely to acknowledge the receipt of those preliminaries we had no other idea than that of accepting them as the opening of a negotiation which would be duly followed up by commissioners appointed by both parties. I would not give these explanations if this note was merely addressed to the Chambers; but, as there are many persons who have thrown a false colour on these transactions, I wish to show the true character of the preliminary bases, in order that no Mexican citizen shall be ignorant of the steps taken by his Ministers in
The preliminaries, a copy of which I have the honour to subjoin, should fix the attention of the Chambers, in order that they may be well known and understood. The first presupposes the sovereign right and integrity of the nation, and the term consiente [sic, consents] is as honourable to it as it is to the justice and good faith of the Government then established in Texas. The second article undertakes the formal and solemn engagement of Texas not to incorporate itself with any other nation whatsoever. This condition, imposed on Texas by itself, excludes its annexation to the United States; and it was the more readily adopted by us, as we were determined to concede nothing that might hereafter lead to the accomplishment of he policy of the United States. The third article, more general in its nature, alludes to other matters which should be settled by the proposed treaty, including the necessary indemnities. The fourth article expresses the willingness of Texas to submit to arbitration the question of frontiers. In these preliminaries we took care that nothing should be found admitting that the independence of Texas was "a fact accomplished," and from that circumstance I am justified in again saying that the transaction was honourable to the republic. Such is the truth, and, whatever discussion and difficulties any of these articles examined strictly might produce, we took care that in their open and evident sense no term should be found unworthy of the respect and consideration to which the Government and the nation are entitled.

The answer given by the Ministry, of which a copy is annexed, is drawn up in a style suitable to the superior position occupied by the republic with respect to Texas. It contains also the authorization made by Congress, as well as the obligation under which we stood of giving due notice of all ulterior proceedings to the Chambers. The Government, without adding a single thought, or extending in the least the preliminaries alluded to, declared that it received them only as preliminaries, and that it was ready to commence a negotiation, and to receive the commissioner or commissioners named by Texas for the same purpose.

Though this step offered no difficulty, though the initiative made by Texas was in all respects worthy of Mexico, how was it possible for this Government to imagine that Texas would yield to the measures taken by the Unite States to enforce the annexion? Who could suppose that Texas, after having opened a negotiation and gone the length of signing a convention, would succumb beneath the violence and ambition of the American Cabinet? Fortunately the Government took care, as the documents will show, to state in the most decided terms, that if the negotiation, through any circumstance whatever, should fail, or if Texas consented directly or indirectly to incorporate with the United States, all that had been done should be considered null and void. With that additional explanation the rights of the republic were fully respected, and we were left at liberty to treat in the manner most conformable to the ideas manifested by the legislative body.

We do not seek to make reflections on the conduct of any person in this affair; but the question of Texas is so essentially national, and deserves so much to be examined by all Mexicans, that we cannot do otherwise than defend our policy, and submit it without fear to the judgment of the whole republic. When events and time shall have calmed political passions, the patriotism which has influenced the Administration will be duly appreciated. Obliged to adopt a fixed plan, we sought not to act in any other manner; we sought, as every honourable Government should do, to secure an honourable peace, and our policy in that respect renders the less excusable the conduct of the United States.

With this statement of the antecedents in this affair, the Government is not afraid to declare before the Chambers, that it did not offend the national dignity in accepting through this department the propositions of Texas, and that the answer given by this Ministry neither compromised the honour or territory of the republic, nor exceeded the authority given to it by Congress. The conduct of Texas is in contradiction with itself, but we are proud to say that throughout this affair we have acted on fixed principles, and that we have preserved, even on the smallest points, the honour and dignity of the republic.

Texas degraded-losing all consideration even among those nations who, by a policy not happily inspired, hastily recognized her independence, has yielded with shame and opprobrium to the usurpation and perfidy of the American Union. The republic, on the other hand, has shown itself worthy of the sympathy of he whole world, and it has proved that it had no object in view beyond the preservation of peace and the triumph of civilization and humanity. In the course of time the United States will find in this usurpation a costly inconvenience.

They will be despised by all honourable nations, and they will be responsible for all the evils of a war they have wantonly provoked.

With this note shall be presented all the documents relative to this important question; and notice will also be given of the measures taken by Government to defend the rights, integrity, and honour of the nation. Supported by justice having done all that was possible to prevent a rupture having acted with loyalty and good faith—war, however painful the result, with be a new principle of glory. It will unite the Mexican people, and, all party feelings being suppressed, we shall act together, proclaiming with one voice the necessity of uniting in defence of the rights and the independence of the republic.

March 29.

Ashbel Smith.

Note By Senor Cuevas

The Minister of Foreign Affairs and of Government of the Mexican Republic has received from Texas the above propositions preliminary to the arrangement of a definitive treaty between Mexico and Texas.

The Government of the republic has asked and received from the National Congress an authority to treat, drawn in the following terms:-

"The Government is authorized to hear the propositions made by Texas, and to proceed to the arrangement or celebration of a treaty suitable and honourable to the republic, giving notice to the Congress for its examination and approval."

In virtue of the preceding authority given by the Mexican Congress, the undersigned Minister of Foreign Affairs and of Government declares that the Supreme Government receive the aforesaid four articles as preliminary to a formal and definitive treaty; and, moreover, that he is ready to commence the negotiation desired by Texas, and to receive a commissioner or commissioners named for that purpose.

Mexico, May 19.

Cuevas.

----------

Official Declaration.

It is understood that, besides the four preliminary articles proposed by Texas, there are other essential and important points which should be the subject of negotiation, and, if this should fail, from any cause whatever, or if Texas, with reference to the law of incorporation passed by the United States, consents to it, directly or indirectly, the answer of this date given to Texas by the undersigned Minister of Foreign Affairs shall be considered null and of no value.

;Mexico, May 19.
The position of the Mexican Government is now precisely that which we have long foreseen it would arrive at. They refused to negotiate with Texas until it was too late even to obtain the terms which were essential to the honour and security of the Mexican republic, or to rescue the Texan provinces from the rapacity of the United States. Texas could then neither be relinquished with advantage, nor defended with the slightest chance of success. The party in Texas which continued to advocate the independent interests of their country seems not to have commanded a single vote in the Congress; and the proposals which had been carried as far as the Mexican Government by Mr. Ashbel Smith, under the mediation of the agents of England and France, were virtually negatived and annulled by the unanimous and immediate resolution of those American intruders who have assumed the name of the Texan people, and the power of disposing by their sovereign will of territories unlawfully wrested from the states of Mexico.

This mode of settling the question having proved abortive (though, if the assurances of the Texan Government had been worthy of credit, it did at one time offer a reasonable prospect of success), Mexico finds herself reduced to the formidable alternative of war. War is the cry of the people, and war is so clearly the duty of the state, that as Senor Cuevas observes in one of his state papers, the republic will resign its political existence if the pecuniary means required by the Government for carrying it on be for many days delayed. But by what means can these pecuniary means be raised? A loan which will bring into the Treasury an effective sum of 15,000,000 dollars must create more than 45,000,000 dollars of stock, even at the present price of the active Mexican debt; but such a loan would be brought forward under circumstances of peculiar disadvantage. In a financial point of view, the disposal revenues of Mexico are already pledged to pay interest on former loans to an amount which leaves a surplus insufficient to cover the most pressing wants of the public service; in a political point of view a state which is without a Government, without a dollar in the Treasury, and without military means of covering its frontier, occupying its own provinces, or resenting the grossest aggressions from a neighbouring Power, is really in a state of dissolution. The events to be anticipated in a country sunk into this deplorable condition are the excesses of anarchy or the accidents of revolution. The projectors of the annexation of Texas, like the crowned robbers who effected the partition of Poland, were well aware that the success of their scheme was insured by the decrepitude of the Power they attacked; and Mexico would not have been thus audaciously assailed and insulted if the Cabinet of Washington had not relied on the supreme impotence of its victim. The politicians who have inoculated their country with territorial ambition and the vainglorious passion for military enterprise, are not displeased to find that such powerful causes are operating in favour of their designs; and, however brilliant the prizes of a war between Mexico and the United States might be, even Mr. Polk would probably be glad to avoid precipitating his country into so vast a career of uncertain events.

These considerations tend to render actual war between the two republics extremely improbable; and if Mexico was unable to put down Texas in rebellion, still less can she reconquer Texas annexed to one of the most powerful states in the world. But if the termination of this affair be pacific, it establishes in the most patent and indubitable manner the superiority of the Anglo-American race and of the United States Government over their neighbours. These advantages the Americans will as infallibly assert. It is now proved that no consideration of prudence, justice, or good faith can restrain them from seizing or acquiring the possessions of contiguous states. Thus much may be foreseen,—that these excesses and encroachments will only be limited by opportunity and public caprice, until it become the interest of some great European Power to oppose them. But what is not foreseen either by the Americans or by ourselves is the effect of these acts of violence or fraud, leading to immense extension of territory, upon their own political social condition. Thus much only we do venture confidently to predict—that these changes involve the creation of such conflicting interests, the existence of such opposite characters and designs, the prevalence of such formidable passions, and the growth of such an enormous and incongruous people, that the feeble Federal Government of America will eventually forfeit its precarious authority, and the contests which the neighbouring states to the south of the Union are too weak to wage will at last break out in its own bosom. We, of our time, have seen the gigantic growth of the American democracy, as rapid and enormous in its internal corruption and its external crimes as in the progress of its population and its productive powers; but, unless the eternal laws of public morality and of history be suspended, these same phenomena announce the certain approach of a period of anarchy and retribution. It is not more possible that such a system should be carried on without leading to disastrous consequences, than that society should continue to subsist without government or law; and the reaction of the same principles which have now been allowed to assail Mexico and appropriate Texas will one day be felt in the heart of the Union.

In these great events, extending over a whole continent and embracing the destinies of millions of men, time is a most important element. Even this enterprise against Texas has extended over a period of 20 years, and its consequences, than that society should continue to subsist without government or law; and the reaction of the same principles which have now been allowed to assail Mexico and appropriate Texas will one day be felt in the heart of the Union.

In these great events, extending over a whole continent and embracing the destinies of millions of men, time is a most important element. Even this enterprise against Texas has extended over a period of 20 years, and its consequences will reach to a still more distant day. It may therefore be questioned, in spite of the impatience of a democratic people, and their increasing taste for what they term "immediate action," whether any further demonstration will be hastily or suddenly undertaken. For the present the boundary of Texas is in itself a sufficient morsel; for, not content with absorbing the province which had shaken off its allegiance to Mexico, there can be little doubt that the United States Government will extend its claim from the Nueces to the Rio Bravo, and follow the course of that stream northward to Santa Fe and the mountains of Anahuac. As no frontier line has ever been drawn between Mexico and Texas, and as the frontier of Mexico and the United States was determined by the treaty of 1819, confirmed in 1824, there is in reality no rule to go by but the greediness of one party and the feebleness of the other. Under such circumstances it is not easy to set bounds to the concessions which may be required.

We do not doubt that the American Government would willingly include Upper California, and especially the port of San Francisco, in these acquisitions; but we must not underrate the physical difficulties of such an enterprise. California is, fact divided even from Mexico by vast tracts of uninhabited country; and the difficulties which a detachment of troops would have to encounter in crossing the deserts and prairies that intervene between the Mississippi and the Pacific Ocean will probably be insurmountable for the next half-century.

With reference to California, we adhere to the opinion we have had occasion to express with reference to the Oregon territory. Little is to be apprehended from invasion by land, as long as the coast is open and the country protected by sea. The interests which may hereafter extend colonial enterprise to the shores of the Pacific are inseparable from the commerce of the east and the navigation of that ocean. Great Britain is for all practical purposes nearer to those coasts than the Atlantic states; and we have no apprehension that the American Government will commit itself to acts of violence, which must lead to the total destruction of its fisheries and commerce in the South Seas. They will observe a certain discretion, even in their invasion of all rights; and, however we may lament the deplorable state to which Mexico is found to be reduced in this emergency, we cannot but rejoice that the peace of the world is likely to be preserved. LT September 19, 1845, page 7f: The Annexation of Texas.

To the Editor of the Times.

Sir,—"An American Citizen," in his letter published by you this day, states that the question of the annexation of Texas is "one of honour and good faith," and then argues it as a measure in which Mexico has no interest.

Let the question be tried as one of honour and good faith.

By the Florida, made between the Government of the United States and Spain February 22, 1819, the river Sabine was fixed as part of the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, and in the last clause of that treaty it is solemnly declared, "that the United States thereby cede to his Catholic Majesty, and renounce for ever all their claims, rights, and pretensions to, the territory lying west of the described line."
This treaty was subsequently declared to be binding on Mexico and the United States, and the Governments of these countries carried on negotiations to give effect to its provisions.

Now, is it in accordance with any sentiment of honour for the late President Tyler, or for President Polk, to advocate the annexation of Texas on the expressed ground that it is thought by some persons, who have not taken the trouble to inquire into the truth of the statement, that Texas once formed part of Louisiana, and ought, therefore, notwithstanding the express terms of this treaty to the contrary, to be taken possession of by the Government of the United States? Is it consistent with honour or good faith that the United States should violate this treaty, and by so doing endanger the security of the Mexican Government itself?

The proposal for the annexation of Texas proceeded from the United States, and not from Texas. It was not the act of the weaker power, but of the stronger, and has been the result of intrigues set on foot for the dismemberment of Mexico. You comparison of it to the partition of Poland fails in this, that the distractions of that country and its continued anarchy invited partition to secure the peace of the adjacent states. For the seizure of Texas there is no excuse similar to this, or any except the clamour of dishonest men to perpetrate a gross act of injustice.

2. Mexico had a right to expect, even if Texas became independent, that the treaty of 1819 should be respected. It had the same claim to this that the Governments of Holland and of Prussia have that the limits of France should not be extended, even if the people of the Netherlands were asked to abandon their independence.

3. Is it not the intention of the Government of the United States to take the whole territory on the east side of the Rio Grande? Has the consent of the people living on this river been given to the subjugation of themselves to new laws and new institutions, and to the domination of a people speaking another language? They are as numerous as the American citizen in Texas, and have had no voice in the change about to be imposed on them.

4. By the constitution of Texas, not merely the descendants of blacks, but of Indian blood, are excluded from the privileges of citizens. Most of the people on the Rio Grande, settled and civilized Mexican citizens, are of Indian descent. The state constitution of Texas will be unaltered when annexation is accomplished, and thus the Union will be responsible for a most grievous and crying injustice. The Christian people of the Rio Grande will be reduced to a condition of inferiority and of virtual slavery as galling as any the most despotic monarchs have sanctioned. How can Americans say that this will be consistent with any principle of honour?

5. The "American Citizen" says that the United States have no designs on California. The statement is absurd. California must pass under the dominion of America when it shall seize on the eastern bank of the Rio Grande. On the west side there are few Mexicans even of a mixed race, and none of pure Spanish descent. Will the Indian tribes be respected, or a policy be pursued towards them which Mexico itself cannot even in the observance of treaties made with it?

6. Not merely has the United States violated the treaty of 1819 in this proceeding, but the constitution of the States has been violated in order to effect it. Texas is a foreign state. Agreements or treaties made with foreign states must, according to the federal constitution, receive the assent of two-thirds of the members of the Senate. This assent has not been given, and annexation has been carried by a series of illegal and unconstitutional resolutions of the two houses of Congress. What American, looking to the future, can doubt the effect this precedent will have, or how vain will be the obligations of the law when the people, opposing it, can set it aside?

"And what the people but a herd confus’d,
A miscellaneous rabble, who extol
Things vulgar—and well weighed scarce worth the praise?
They praise and they admire they know not what,
And know not whom, but as one leads the other.”
Let the followers of Polk answer these words of Milton.

Lastly, the "American Citizen," with the flippancy and bad morality which characterise too strongly the public acts of his country, says, that "nations do not observe the severe and narrow rules which govern private morality," and he adds "that his countrymen have probably inherited our vices." When he shall have studied morality he will find that its rules are not narrow, and that the most contracted principles are thoroughly vicious; and when he shall know more of European politics he will find their morality better than that which he defends. The degeneracy of our true and modern republican citizens from those republicans who were bred and educated under the English monarch—from those who thought they had founded a republic which would teach and defend virtue—hardly needed the flippancy of this criticism on us to exhibit its grossness after the many acts that we have seen of the repudiation of public obligations on the part of several of the states of America.

It is no pleasure to criticise Americans. They may be irritated at it, but they may be assured that every man who respects honourable dealings regrets the acts which have excited the censure of the whole of Europe.

LT October 1, 1845, page 5e: The Oregon Question

London, Wednesday, October 1, 1845.

Some recent accounts from the far west indicate very clearly that the Union is about to apply its usual expedient to the Gordian knot of the Oregon question. The game of Texas is to be played over again with the whole of that land of hope to the west of the Rocky Mountains. It is first to be overrun, then declared independent, and in due time to be overrun, then declared independent, and in due time to be formally annexed. Oregon and California are already half absorbed. How much further north and south the successive processes of assimilation and union are to extend is only a question of time; that is, unless something occurs to interrupt the known laws of American progress. Texas is now a matter of history. The beginning and the end are before us, and constitute a perfect specimen of what we must call, for want of a more dignified term, the American dodge. It is neither an act of conquest, nor a triumph of diplomacy, but an annexation. On the shores of the Pacific, as yet, we see but the first steps of the operation. But they are unmistakable. Who can doubt the family resemblance of the two schemes, after perusing the following paragraph in our city article the other day?

"Private letters from America state the curious fact that the emigrants from the more eastern states to the Oregon territory have organized themselves into a sort of separate Government, totally independent of Congress. The slip of land between the mountainous chain and the Pacific Ocean is said to be sought with the greatest eagerness, persons constantly flocking thither by thousands. There is even a notion that independent Governments may thus arise in the west, powerful enough to prove formidable to the United States. Such a condition of things was predicted by President Jefferson, and more recently by Colonel Benton."

Really, it is almost tedious to describe in the way of an Oregon prophecy what has already occurred in Texas. The monotony is, however, in the facts. There is the sameness of a deep and determined policy. There are vast territories over some of which "we have rights," as the Premier said; while Mexico retains, and is at present admitted to have, still more absolute rights over other more southern and more desirable regions. The Union condescends to dispute and negotiate with the more powerful of the two possessors; but that is all. The negotiation lengthens and lengthens, as if, to use the sailor’s expression, its end had been cut off. The boundary line perpetually recedes. The pleas are continually amended. While the diplomats are at work, crowds of settlers are encouraged, escorted, protected, and even deluded and entrapped into the debateable land. Instinct with the indigenous policy of the Union, they form independent organizations. Of course, they know they are safe enough. As soon as they are many enough and strong enough to reduce the original inhabitants, the Mexican natives, or their British fellow-colonists to a minority of numbers and physical force, they will forth with give vent to their noble aspiration for a union with the States; and it will not be long before their spontaneous advances are gratefully acknowledged. Were it a walled town, and not half a continent, which was in question, there would be no dispute as to the character of the stratagem. The classical reader is acquainted with many such instances on a small scale. While the besiegers were parleying, or perhaps in a time of profound peace, a group of peasants would straggle up to the city gate with faggots, or fruit, or wine. They casually muster, throw off their rustic guise, draw swords, disarm the guard, and admit an approaching body of their comrades. This was once a stale trick. Magnitude will now give it the appearance of novelty. The colonists of Oregon and California will muster and form, and eventually draw their swords, to open a way for the main body of the Union.

It will be said that such is nothing more than the universal and unavoidable mode of organization in the outskirts of a spreading empire. There must be the rude elements of order and justice before they can be formed into a whole. A few straggling settlers must be a law to themselves. In fact, Lynch law is seriously defended, as being the only law of which some portions of the Union are capable. Where the forms of justice are wanting, we must be content with the naked thing. Be it so. This is an unfortunate accident. It cannot be prevented. The necessity of the case, the protection of property, the prevention of outrage, and even he cry of vengeance, bars all discussion. But it is a wholly different thing to adopt so great and fearful and irregularity as part of the national ways and means—as portion alike of its code and its policy. The fact of such disorders may admit of an adequate apology, but cannot be praised and nationalized. It is at once the destruction of all government to build a territorial title on the acts of those who are not and will not be governed.

Independence, as the concerted preliminary of annexation, is not that novel ideal which the self complacency of republican statesmen may possibly imagine. It is a universal necessity in this class of transactions. The marauder first insulates his plunder and then carries it off. The gentleman who gets through your windows or your tiles at midnight, first puts the plate into a sack, and then, if he is not disturbed, takes it away. The more youthful offender first shakes the tree to detach its burden, which he throws into his hat or his pocket. To cut the proper tie, and to make a new one-to deprive and to appropriate at exactly the same instant of time, is a mere jumbling of processes. Nothing would have been more injudicious than to attempt, in the first instance, the appropriation of Texas, or he immediate appropriation of Oregon and California. For sheer credit's sake the rightful owners would fight for their troublesome conflict over a booty not yet ripe for use, or ready for transfer. Even in peace we manipulate and collect before we remove. We do not send the cart into the wheat field close at the heels of the reapers. The Union has been ten years reaping Texas, and putting it in rucks. It has just now carted the crop, and added on more stack to the six and twenty which already adorned the thriving farm.

At present the shores of the Pacific are not worth fighting for. Their distance, their vastness, and their comparative solitude render them almost incapable of military conquest of occupation. Marches of two or three thousand miles over mountains and sandy deserts, agree rather with the airy temperaments of Khans and Czars than with the sobriety of Yankee calculations. Nor, again, is it possible to occupy the whole side of a continent, stretching from the frigid to the torrid zone, with half a dozen scanty posts. There must be not only the soil, but a people, before it is wise or possible to fight for it. While diplomacy is going through its visionary mazes, a surer process is neutralizing and mocking its labours. While it claims the land, the States create the people. It asserts the ownership of the soil, and they proclaim the affinity of the cultivator. One says, "The land belongs to us;" the other, "But the people are of ourselves."

The universal law of nations recognises a right in mere soil. It declares that certain circumstances create a possession in a naked territory. Unless it is antiquated or mistaken, the process of annexation cannot be lawful. Plausible as every step of the process may seem;—natural, convenient, inevitable, and so forth, as the union of two sympathizing, and all but identical, populations may be, still dishonesty and treason vitiate the whole transaction from first to last. Thus, the treaty, whatever its exact meaning or value, on which the rival claims of Britain and the States are founded, recognises only the subjects of the two empires. It allows no independent class. But such organizations as that referred to in our city article constitute a third party, who is a mere interloper. The colonist is bound to allegiance either to one co-ordinate owner or the other; and either one Government or the other must be answerable for his conduct.

Nor can any length of time or succession of processes change the morality of the affair. Honesty is the best policy. What is wrong at first is wrong at last, and if the consummation is bad, so also are the necessary means. It is mere jugglery to distribute an affair of only ten or twenty years to different parties, and thus to repudiate moral as well as pecuniary responsibilities. The Union which allowed a conquering army to be enlisted from its own citizens against the authorities of Texas, is as much one and the same with the Union under Presidents Tyler and Polk, as the Pennsylavania which endorsed the bonds of its railway companies is one and the same with the Pennsylvania which still offers only a few shillings in the pound. To say the Union of 1835 did not annex Texas, and the Union of 1845 had nothing to do with the rebellion, is only the quibble of the two thieves in the fable, one of whom had not stolen the meat, while the other had not got it. Arrival of the Great Western

Liverpool, Saturday Morning.

The steam ship Great Western, Captain Mathews, arrived in the Mersey at a late hour last night, with New York advices to the 18th ult. inclusive, and bringing 48 passengers.

Accounts from Tampico and Vera Cruz to the 30th of August respectively had been received. The French Minister, Baron Alleyne de Cyprey had closed diplomatic communications with the Republic on the 25th, and had intrusted the protection of the French residents in Mexico to the Spanish Minister, Senor de Castro.

The accounts to relative to the movements of the military towards Texas are still vague and contradictory, while an account states that Paredes had induced a large body of insubordinates, who declared that they would not continue their march upon Texas unless they should receive, besides their full pay, all the equipments, perquisites, and provisions of an army of campaign, to fulfil their duties. A second states, that the disaffected portion of the army had incorporated itself with the forces under General Paredes; that the latter refused to obey the Government; that the third division of the army which was under his command was disposed for a pronunciamiento hostile to the Government; and its is added in a third that the objects of the revolutionary movement would be to abolish the central system of government, and re-establish the federal institutions of 1824.

The paper says-

"Letters have been received at Tampico from San Luis Potosi, which announce that a revolution is near at hand. There appears to be a strong demand for the re-establishment of the Federal Constitution of 1824, and, if this be not granted by the Government, it is likely to be carried by force. In the Departmental Assembly of Tamaulipas a proposition to second the initiative of Zacatecas (for the restoration of this Constitution) has already been introduced.

"To induce the belief that disaffection does not prevail through the army, the President on the 21st of August addressed a circular through the new Secretary of War, recalling to the minds of the military his circular of March last; reiterating his reliance upon the army to bring to a victorious issue the Texan campaign, and upon the militia to preserve order at home; denying the intentions imputed to him of destroying the army and breaking down its influence; and particularly applauding the heroism with which the fourth division, under the worthy Arista, had endured privations which the Executive had in vain sought to relieve, and was still anxious to reward, ‘that their example might excite their companions in arms to honour and glory.’

"The appointment of General Bustamente as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of Texas is announced in El Monitor of August 22.

"Efforts were making to organize a militia, but they were merely abortive. In the city of Mexico, which contains 200,000 inhabitants, only 11 recruits were found enlisted.

"The department of Tamaulipas had made, through its Assembly, a pompous tender of the services and resources of the Department to the Central Government for the purposes of the war, but some of the papers of the same department are quite as clamorous in calling upon the Government for protection against foreign invasion.

"Don Valentin Rios, commanding the companies of the First Brigade, had written a communication to the Minister of War, in which he states that the different officers under his command were ready to defend their country against the perfidious aggressions of the United States, and to Chastise the ingratitude of the Texans.

"Arista, Woll, and the other leaders were quarrelling amongst themselves."

The Herald states, on the alleged authority of private letters, that the American settlers on the Oregon were about to send a delegate to the United States Congress at Washington, and adds-

"Furthermore, we have it, from a undoubted source, that that delegate will be received and recognized as a member of the house."

Government Sixes had sold at 112, an advance of 1 ½ per cent, closing at a higher price than for some months. The advance had been caused by the peaceful news from Mexico, which rendered a war more doubtful than ever. The quotation of exchange on London was 109 ½ to 110.

Advices to the 11th of August had been received at Mexico from Guatemala. An effort was making to re-establish the bonds of federation between the states of San Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras. For this purpose the two former states had appointed Commissioners to meet at Zonzonate, to deliberate upon conditions. Guatemala had also named a Commissioner to ratify a treaty of peace with Honduras, and another of commerce with San Salvador. The Constituent Congress of Guatemala had also passed two decrees, one introducing some very strict measures of economy, and regulating the order in which the public creditors shall be paid; the other, providing that the products of Mexico introduced into that state should pay the same duties as if they proceeded from any other foreign country.

The screw-auxiliary packet ship Massachusetts arrived from New York this afternoon.

The Great Western spoke the Great Britain on the 1st instant, at 6:40 a.m., in lat. 51º 29’ N, Lon. 17º west; all well on board.

The public display the greatest apathy in political affairs.

The state of credit of the Treasury is at the lowest ebb, and there is not prospect of a loan being made.

The army of the north is in a state of absolute destitution. General Paredes if not in open revolt is acting independently of the Central Government, and Filisola has arrived I Mecizo from Potosi to explain the cruel position of the troops.

Upper California has petitioned Congress in favour of federation.

The New Tariff.

"Jose Joaquin de Herrera, General of Division and President of the Mexican Republic, to its inhabitants greeting, and informs them that the General Congress has sanctioned the following decree:-

"Art. 1.-The Government within 40 days of the publication of this decree will form a new tariff, maritime and frontier, combining all the improvements which experience has shown to be necessary to conciliate the interests of the Treasury of Commerce and Manufacture.

"Art. 2. The tariff shall be formed on the following bases:-

"1. The ports already open to foreign and coasting trade, shall continue to be so.

"2. The prohibition of foreign goods, the introduction of which was not allowed at the period of the original bases, or which has been sanctioned by the present Congress, shall continue in force.

"3. No variation shall take place with regard to those goods which enter free of all duty, and the rules respecting them, which are found in the 5th, 6th, and 7th articles of the tariff of the 25th September, 1843, still continue in force.

"4. With respect to the duties to be levied in future-no increase shall take place on the amount fixed by the said tariff of 1843, nor shall the duties be diminished below the standard of the tariff of 1842. Nor can the time allowed for the payment of duties be shortened; nor the duties now payable on foreign goods similar to those manufactured in the republic be diminished, always with the understanding that, in the opinion of Government, or the Council of Ministers, the said manufacturers are produced in sufficient quantity to meet the actual consumption.

"5. The payment of duties shall take place in the maritime and inland custom-houses in Vera Cruz and Tampico, and in the general treasury of Mexico, with the exception of such portion of said duties as are applicable to the maintenance of the garrisons of those places, and to the interest on the foreign and home debt, all which dispositions shall remain exactly as they are at present.

"6. The new tariff shall come into effect not sooner than six months from this date for goods coming from Europe by the Atlantic. With regard to those arriving from the Antillas, from Asia, and the United States, or which come from Europe by the Pacific, an reasonable period shall hereafter be fixed.

"7. No alteration shall be made in the law of the 19th February last which allots one per cent. Of all duties to the public hospitals.

"Art. 8.-The tariff that maybe formed according to the preceding bases shall not be altered without the concurrence of Congress, which, according to its Constitutional faculties, has alone the power to do so.

Mexico, August 29

My last despatch, at the close of the month of July, left this city and public opinion generally in the republic in a state of great excitement, in the consequence of the annexation of Texas, and of he avowed and apparent determination of this Government to declare war against the United States. That agitation lasted but for a very few days, and in the course of a week, after the most solemn declarations on the part of the Ministry and of anti-American denunciations of the part of the press, the subject was forgotten, and the Government and newspapers resumed heir usual apathetic course of existence. This change may be attributed first to the influence of wise counsels on the President Herrera, which showed him that a declaration of war would entitle the United States to conquer and retain any part of he Mexican territory, and, secondly, to the profound indifference which reigns here on everything connected with the love of country. Perhaps the impending election of a President, and the contingent resignation of the Cabinet had some influence on the case, as well as the terrific void which existed in the treasury. The result was, as I have stated, perfect forgetfulness of Texas and the United States; and neither in the Senate nor Chamber of Deputies was one word said indicative of hostile intentions.

The election for a President took place on the 15th inst. in all the departments. The only candidates were General Herrera and General Almonte, late Minister at Washington A very few votes were given to the latter, and the former was elected by a great majority in all the departments. As soon as the election of the President was made known, the Cabinet resigned en masse. This step was taken, not from any difference existing between the Cabinet and Herrera, but from an arrangement entered into between all parties after the revolution of he 7th of December last, and the formation of a provisional Government. It was imagined that the Cabinet would have been re-elected, but the several members were too glad to escape from so difficult a position, and nothing could induce any one of them to retain office. A Ministerial crisis was the consequence. The chief offices of a state were begging in the streets, and it was not until all influential persons were tried, and had refused, that a Cabinet was composed as follows;–Foreign Affairs, Senor Pena y Pena; Finacne, Senor Ferdinand del Castillo; War, General Araya; Grace and Justice, Senor Cuoto.

The first of these gentlemen is the friend of Senor Cuevas, at and his entreaty alone he was persuaded to take office. He is an intelligent man, somewhat distinguished by a publication on national law, but he has no diplomatic experience, and is but little known to the foreign representatives here. The Finance Minister is equally without experience, and the banking classes generally are not pleased with the appointment. General Arraya is a good officer, but he is unequal to the talk of cleansing the Mexican army of its impurities. Senor Cuoto is universally admitted to be a man of talent, but it is not in his department that the great evil of the country lies, or where a sufficient remedy can be found. This Ministry, since its coming into power, has remained perfectly passive, and I do not know of a single record it has made, with the exception of its foolish proceedings against the French Minister, of which I shall presently have to treat.

The fact is, the Treasury and the army are in such a deplorable condition that it is almost impossible for a Minister to act. There is literally not a shilling in the Treasury; the Minister of Finance has to borrow money from day to day with the greatest difficulty, for the ordinary expenses of Government, and he sees no prospect of doing better, as the Congress has attached conditions to the initiative of the loan for 15 millions of dollars (such as the no offer can be accepted for less than 1,000,000 or at an interest of more than 6 per cent.), which render its being contracted for impossible, even if the general credit were more healthy than it is. As for the army, its miserable destitution is so great, that except in the city of Mexico the soldiers are without rations. A detachment lately despatched towards California are dying of hunger on the road, and even the division of Paredes, the best in the country, has neither food nor clothing. With such desolation, what can the Government do? And Herrera and the Ministers compelled to remain passive by the very nature of things. The mischief will not, however, stop here, and already, it is said, numerous conspiracies are on foot to overturn the present system. It is even rumoured that Paredes has pronounced, and that he who has been the main agent in all late revolution has determined on now appointing a triumvirate, in lieu of a president, to be composed of himself and Generals Bravo and Valencia. Paredes is at San Luis de Potosi, about 200 leagues hence, so that we cannot get very accurate accounts of his proceedings, but no doubt exists as to his bad understanding with the Government. His troops, and those of Genera Felisola, were marching to cover the line of the Rio Grande, but the men refused to move without a supply of rations being provided, and Paredes, to keep his command, took part with the men, and not with the Government, and commissioners sent by him are trying to settle matters with the Minister in Mexico.

The menaces of this Government on hearing the annexation of Texas have, I find, set the United States in Movement, and a squadron of 10 ships is in the Gulf of Mexico, with orders to make reprisals should Mexico declare hostilities, and about 2,000 men have been landed in Texas. The United States does not desire war; their plan is to steal in parcels the Mexican territory, and in the meantime to make every show of moderation. They are trying to open negotiations with this country, by treaty, to secure their present footing in the republic, and gain, if possible, the frontier of the Rio Bravo, leaving the future open to further aggression, and to its insensible progress to the mining districts, the great object of American ambition. As yet this Government has refused to listen to any overtures, but its poverty is so great the plans of the United States are so insidious, that I should not be surprised if the Mexican Cabinet consented to negotiate. The march of the United States is progressive, and nothing will content them but the possession of the mining districts and the chief ports of Upper California. We can understand what is going on in Texas, but the proceedings in California are not equally clear. A party composed of American settlers and some natives is at work to declare in the first place independence, and in the next annexation. That party has been in operation for many years, and, though defeated in 1836 and 1840, it is still as busy as ever, and it will ere long declare, "La Estudo Libre y Soberana de la Alta California." The Americans comprise the great majority of strangers in that department. They have actually possession of San Francisco, the Rio Sacramento, and Monterey, and when the proper moment arrives they will be ready to vote for annexation, and put the parent country in possession of that magnificent province.

I would anxiously impress on the British public, that in my opinion, unless a miracle takes place, in half a century Mexico must become a portion of the American Union. It is already breaking up at the extremities. Tobasco and Yucatan furnish no supplies to the central Government; Texas has gone, California is meditating revolt, and New Mexico and other northern states are speaking also of annexation. Is it possible for 7,000,000 of inhabitants, 4,000,000 of whom are Indians, to resist the encroachment of the Anglo-Saxon? Must not the red skin give way before the white? Has not the north in all cases overrun the south? And what means has he central Government of maintaining 150,000,000 of people, and having only 7,000,000, as I have already stated? The American President Jefferson asserted 60 years ago that in the natural course of events the American Union must extend to the Isthmus of Panama. The union is daily occupied in working out that prophecy, and I see no means of preventing its accomplishment; England must therefore think of her own interests, and secure the Bay of Francisco and Monterey, on the Pacific, to prevent those noble ports from being ports of expedition for brother Jonathan for the Chinese market. As I lately said, a passage has been found through the Rocky Mountains, and settlers are daily finding their way into Upper California, Americans compose the great majority of strangers in that department, and, energetic and patriotic as they are, they will at a suitable moment secure its independence or annexation. We are totally ignorant of the state of things in California, and even the Government cannot procure substantial information.

Santa Anna remains at the Havannah, notwithstanding the engagement made with this Government to fix his residence in Venezuela. Representations have been made to him on the subject, but he replies that he is too poor to travel, and that he does not wish, out of consideration for his country to exhibit a Mexican President reduced to destitution in a foreign land. The fact is, Santa Anna is waiting at the Havannah in the hope of being recalled by a pronunciamento, and certainly, seeing the incapacity of all his successors, and knowing that he was the only man capable of action, I do not know whether Mexico could do better than to recall him. It is hard alternative, no doubt as Santa Anna was a public plunderer; but he has capacity, and is the only man capable of playing a distinguished part. He had a certain prestige, and his appeals to the country were generally answered by men and money, whereas, under the present system, not a shilling has been subscribed to the proposed national loan, and only 22 volunteers have answered out of the whole city of Mexico to the call made by the Chambers for a levec en masse.
The tariff appears at last to be in a fair way of arrangement. The difference between the two Chambers has been arranged. A new initiative has been presented. The commission has been enlarged, and in another fortnight we hope to see the thing closed. The tariff of 1842 will be pretty nearly the standard. I understand that there are four vessels on demurrage at the Havannah, with English goods, bound for Vera Cruz, whose cargoes are worth 1,000,000 of dollars duty. This sum will be a godsend to the Government as well as to the bondholders, and probably it is the hope of speedily receiving it which induces the Ministers to press the tariff question in the Chambers.

I find that General Felisola, who was to command the vanguard of the army destined for Texas, has arrived here this morning. His object is to represent the true state of things to the Government and to show the danger the system runs from the proceedings of General Paredes.

The affair of the French Minister, the Baron de Cyprey, and the Mexican Government, has ended in an unpleasant manner, the Baron having found it necessary after a long negotiation "to demand his passports, and to declare that all relations between the French and Mexican Governments were suspended." This determination was communicated on the 25th, the day fixed by the Baron for either the reparation required being allowed or the demand of his passports, and it appears not to have altered the intentions of the Mexican Ministers, who I understand propose to submit the whole question to the Foreign office at Paris, and there to make the reparation which M. Guizot may insist on. The Baron demanded in the first instance the dismissal of the Alcalde who insulted and the officer who arrested and took him prisoner to the citadel. From that reparation he has never departed, though the Mexican Government declared that, without a judicial inquiry, it could not disturb the officers in question. The Baron more than once explained that the droit des gens was superior to all judicial proceedings, and that, as representing the person of the King, he could not submit to the delay of Mexican tribunals. In short, he notified that, unless the reparation was made on the 15th, he would proceed to extremities. It took place between Senor Cuevas undertook, if M. de Cyprey granted a short delay, to give him full and complete satisfaction. A note to that effect was drawn up, which met the approbation of the four assembled Ministers. In the meantime M. Cuevas resigned, and, as if the complicate the matter more, the court-martial sitting on the officer Olier acquitted him, declaring that the officer did not know the person of the French Minister, and that if he acted erroneously the imprisonment he had already suffered was sufficient. To the renewed demands of Baron Cyprey for the fulfilment of Senor Cuevas's promise, the new Minister of Foreign Affairs declared that the engagement of Senor Cuevas only referred to the trying by court-martial the officer in question, and as an acquittal had taken place, no further satisfaction could be given. This statement enraged the Baron de Cyprey, and after the delivery of a note, in which he showed the true sense of M. Cuevas's engagement, and proved the absurdity of the meaning attached to it by M. Pena y Pena, he ended by declaring that if previous to the 25th inst. full reparation were not afforded, his passports must be delivered.

On the evening of the 24th the Baron addressed the note of which I subjoin a copy, and on the following day M. Goury de Roslan, Secretary of Legation, notified that, as all relations were broken of between the French and Mexican Governments, French subjects resident in the republic were placed under the care of M. Bermudes de Castro, who, as Ministre de Famille, was necessarily charged with that duty. Thus has ended, at a moment when Mexico wants the advice and friendship of such a nation as France, this ridiculous affair, owing to the unwillingness of the Mexican Government to distinguish between the law of the country and the laws of the nations, and between the persons of ordinary individuals and the representatives of Kings. The origins of the dispute was most absurd, and it has only acquired importance from the pertinacity of the Mexican Minister in refusing to give the proper reparation, and from the irregular interpretation given to the promise of Senor Cuevas. Mr. Bankhead would have had the care of the French subjects in Mexico, but etiquette requires that, in such cases, the Ministre de Famille should undertake the duty. The chief retail trade of the city of Mexico is in the hands of French subjects, and, if the Government choose to put the existing law relative to foreign retailers into force, the position of those persons will be most uncomfortable.

Messrs. Lizardi, of London, have published here a long letter addressed to the Mexican Government, intended to show the great advantages its agency had created for this country, and the many obligations which they conferred on Mexico during an administration of 10 years. The letter does not mention the proceedings of the bondholders, or allude in any way to the claims made by that body for sunis remitted to pay dividends. It is merely an answer to paragraphs which appeared in the papers to the prejudice of Messrs. Lizardi, and it possesses no interest for the owners of Mexican bonds.
I find at the moment of closing my despatch that the troops are consigned to quarters, and that a pronunciamento is expected. I do not believe that matters are yet ripe for the movement, though in all probability it cannot be long deferred.

The Mexican Government has not yet delivered passports to the French Minister, and I hear that the Baron de Cyprey has determined to constitute himself a prisoner in case the passports are not sent in.

I subjoin the decree relative to the new tariff which appears in the Government Gazette of this morning.

P.S.-I have just received the following petition, which has been addressed to the Congress by the departmental Junta of Upper California, in favour of federation. This may be considered as the beginning of the end in that province;

"We petition the Congress to adopt the form of federal government, abandoning the influence exercised by the central power in the internal matters of such state, which has been one of the principal causes of the decline of the country, making at the same time such reforms as may be necessary to guarantee individual liberty, in order that the different classes of society may be held in even balance, without any one being able to prejudice the other.

"Note from the Minister of France ot Senor Cuevas.

"Mexico, July 30.

The notes and memoranda which I had the honour to address to your Excellency on the 21st and 27th of this month should not, it appears to me, have caused either surprise or regret. These acts were the necessary consequence of the promises you made to the Minister of the King, in the name of the Mexican Government, in writing, or in presence of their Excellencies the Ministers of England and Spain.

"In the answer made by your Excellency to my note of yesterday you appear to doubt that I have properly received the friendly sentiments of the Government of the Republic, and the principles by which it has been guided. To that I must observe, that the sentiments of a nation are better shown by acts than by words which have been attended by no result.

"As to principles, I must avow that I cannot understand any that are opposed to those consecrated by the laws of nations. When Mexico sought to be admitted into the family of nations, the great Powers acceded to her request on the condition that she, like them, became subject to the 'droit des gens.' This law, superior to all international legislation, decided that reparation for outrage must be made by one nation to another. Mexico, therefore, is bound to give France satisfaction for the attempt made against the inviolability of the Minister of the King by two Mexican functionaries. That right cannot be set aside by secondary considerations drawn from the internal legislation of the country. A Government which says (I am far from applying this remark to Mexico) that it is unable to repair the outrages committed by its subjects is no longer a Government. For two months I have displayed, by the most exemplary patience, the spirit of conciliation by which I am animated; I have even lately asked your Excellency to name the period when it would be convenient to you to fulfil the promise so distinctly made. Not only has your Excellency avoided the fulfilment of that promise, but I find by your news of yesterday that it is indefinitely adjourned.

"The digit of France compels me now to say, that I cannot extend the delay required by your Excellency beyond the 15th of next month. I hope that then your Excellency will be prepared to give me the satisfaction required, otherwise the Minister of France will be compelled to break off all diplomatic relations with the republic."

"The Minister of France to Senor Pena y Pena.
Mexico, August 24.

----------

"In acceding to the wish expressed by his Excellency the Minister Pena y Pena, to obtain a further delay, for the purpose of coming to a resolution on the reparation due to France for the insult offered to the King on the 25th of May last, in the person of his Minister Plepnipotentiary, the undersigned informed his Excellency the Minister for Foreign Affairs that he would wait eight days longer, for either the deprivation of the two guilty officers of the delivery of his passports.

"The feeble hope that the undersigned preserved of seeing the reciprocal rights and duties of nations towards each other admitted and acted on by the Mexican Government has vanished, on reading the note which his Excellency Senor Pena y Pena did me the honour to communicate this morning.

"That note contains:-

1. Insinuations which show that no regard has been paid to the declarations of the Minister of he King, of the Secretary of Legation, and of the several respectable persons who accompanied the Minister, but that, on the contrary, an unjust partiality has been shown to false reports and to false evidence, collected with that precaution against strangers which has been exhibited in the whole of this affair.

2. Quotations which, however historically correct, are without application to a case in which the Minister of he King has demanded a just and well-due satisfaction.

3. A voluntary confusion between a sudden insult offered to a Minister whose quality is unknown at the moment of its perpetration, and the continued outrages exercised on a Minister after his condition was made known, and the guilty person had called him by his title.

4. A repeated determination to appear ignorant of the facts of the case in their successive order, for the purpose of creating doubts on the origin of the affair, though it is well known that the affair arose from the violent treatment inflicted on the servants of the French Minister, who had been wounded with the evident intention of getting hold of the property of the Minister.

5. An avowal of the incapability of Government of give the desired satisfaction.

6. An inadmissible interpretation of the laws of nations, tending to show that the promises made by his predecessor in the office are not binding on Senor Pena y Pena, though the promises had been given without reserve by Senor Cuevas, in the presence of he Ministers of Great Britain and of Spain, with extracts of passages from Vatel, affecting to justify that doctrine. The undersigned, far from disregarding the authority of Vatel, insists that that great authority excludes from all negotiations subterfuge and absurdity. For the purpose of elucidating the quotation made from Vatel, the undersigned calls attention to pages 232 and 233 of chapter 15 of the second book, and to the 17th chapter of the same, in which this doctrine is laid down, that an interpretation manifestly false is contrary to good faith; that the true meaning of a promise is that which was openly declared, and that it is only by so understanding the nature of a promise that attempts to elude engagements can be counteracted.

"Certainly the engagement made by the predecessor of Senor Pena y Pena is sufficiently explicit; and, according to Vatel, book the 2d, page 283, it cannot be construed to be null and void. To do so would, in fact, push the absurd to the last limit.

"The undersigned thinks it superfluous to enter further into the discussion. He sees in the note of his Excellency Senor Pena y Pena a positive refusal to fulfil the
That principle of the abhorrence of a vacuum which the elder philosophers regarded as one of the fundamental laws of the natural world, is far more strictly and certainly true of the world of politics. Wherever a community of men exists—wherever society with all its various natural and artificial wants has once been constituted, the power of protecting and regulating its common interests must exist also. The territory must be defended, life and property preserved from outrage, justice administered, and the resources of the commonwealth applied to their present objects and provided for future occasions. How ill or imperfectly soever these duties be performed, an actual and avowed suspension of them would in fact imply the total dissolution of the body politic. In the midst of the wildest anarchy these functions of Government are assumed by the ephemeral and intemperate sovereigns of the hour; and out of the ruins of every state in the crisis of every revolution, something must at least survive which men dignify by their obedience, and which serves to perpetuate the tradition of national existence. Personal ambition conspires with the exigency of the times to fill the vacant throne and to provide servants for the commonwealth; and though power has often fallen into most unworthy hands, there is no example in history of a total failure of men ready to assume its dignity and responsibility.

The present condition of the Mexican republic would, however, seem to be an exception to this universal rule. We seek in vain for any other instance of total collapse in the powers of Government, without any external or internal cause of destruction, except the absence of men competent to govern. In more ancient and settled countries institutions frequently do the work of men, and screed the folly or incapacity of one generation under the traditions of prejudice or of habit. But the labour of founding and improving a new state requires the exercise of a more constant energy. The United States may boast of a series of statesmen, from the declaration of independence to a very recent period, who were eminently qualified to develop the natural resources and the political destiny of their country. The Spanish colonies, on the contrary, have not produced a single individual of political or military eminence since their emancipation; and in cutting off the branch from the parent tree the same disease hangs about it which has blighted the energy and destroyed the power of Spain. We have then before us this most extraordinary spectacle—a people of seven millions of men, of whom half are of the European race, inhabiting the finest portion of the whole American continent, commanding the Gulf of Mexico on the east, and the best ports of the Pacific on the west, equidistant from the shores of China and from those of Europe, a country five times as large as France, and abounding with all the richest productions of the earth—and, in short, every conceivable element of maritime and commercial greatness and of internal prosperity; but all this so dead to improvement, so unconscious of its own resources, so depraved by indolence and ignorance, that the feather-cinctured guards of Montezuma were not more powerless, and the ancient Kings of the aboriginal Mexican people certainly deserve more respect, than the miserable chiefs of the modern Mexican republic. The insurrection which severed the territory of New Spain from the mother-country destroyed monarchical Government in the only form in which it could exist there, and deprived the country of the benefits which it might have deprived from the enlightened administration of European statesmen, and of the protection secured to it by European arms. But what had been done by education, by experience, or by nature to qualify this people or its local leaders for the arduous duties of self-governance? The colonial aristocracy consisted of the degenerate descendants of Spanish adventurers, eager to pawn their estates to English speculators' and utterly unable to direct the affairs of the country. The people were utterly devoid of that spirit which imparts vitality to democratic institutions. From collective indolence and inaptitude for governing, what Government could be erected? In a nation of blind men, who was to have eyesight for the dull untractable multitude? The army along afforded candidates for political; and these were, for the most part, men of contemptible talents and of still more contemptible personal motives. At length, after a series of changes, which were successive steps in the degradation of the country, an event occurred—the annexation of Texas by the United States—which the Mexican Ministers themselves declared to be the test of their existence as a nation. That test has decided against them, for no resistance has been or can be offered to the act of spoliation; and the territory of Mexico will lose or preserve its independence, according to the cupidity or the forbearance of the rest of the world.

In spite of the pride of the Spanish race, and the love of independence of all communities, even under the worst of Governments, the truth is gradually making its way among some of the most influential classes of the Mexicans, and they are becoming sensible that their Government is contemptible and fatal to the private as well as the public interests of every member of the community. They have in fact before them no other prospect than that of passing under a foreign yoke, and being conquered by the people whose manners, religion, and race are most odious and opposite to their own.

If Spain herself had made any progress in the art of government, and if the revolutions she has undergone had reformed and reinvigorated her powers instead of shaking them to the foundation, she might without much difficulty reconquer her ancient colonies in North America. Such an expedition might be conducted from Cuba at no very great cost; its success after landing on the coast would be certain; and it is not improbable that the same population which threw off the yoke of Ferdinand might be re-united without much opposition to the throne of a constitutional Queen with an assurance that the country would be governed not as a mere colony, depending on the pleasure of the Council of the Indies, but as an integral portion of an empire possessing representative institutions. In the present condition of the Cabinet of Madrid such a project may be deemed visionary and impracticable, but we cannot regard it as impossible. If the Government of Narvaez dared to undertake it, such an enterprise would powerfully strengthen its hold upon the country; and we see no reason to suppose that the re-establishment of the Spanish power in Mexico would be viewed with jealousy by any other European State. It would be infinitely preferable to progressive annexation by the grasping democrats of the Northern American States; and the country itself would probably find in such a revolution the mode of government best suited to its real wants.

Arrival of the Britannia.

The British and North American Royal mail steam-ship Britannia, Captain Hewitt, arrived in the Mersey with the usual mails from Canada and the United States at noon to-day, bringing 73 passengers.

The advices are of the usual meagre and unsatisfactory character. The question of war had been universally decided in the negative. It was rumoured that official relations would shortly be resumed with Mexico. The domestic affairs of the United States are relieved from absolute sterility only by the accounts of the Mormon disturbances.

The Texan intelligence is detailed below.

The New Orleans Picayune says:-

"The Texan papers have given to the public, for the first time, the secret treaty between Santa Anna and Texas, by which the former obtained his release when a prisoner. Originally the treaty was enclosed in a letter written by Santa Anna to General Jackson, then President of the United States, and the whole accompanied by another letter, written by General Austin, at Santa Anna's request, to the same distinguished man, soliciting his mediation and influence for the settlement of difficulties between Mexico and Texas. General Austin's letter explains fully the grounds upon which Santa Anna obtained his release—all of them having reference to the solemn pledges made by the latter to use all his exertions to obtain the acknowledgment of Texan independence to the Rio Grande. The Mexican Government never sanctioned this treaty, although they regained their army by it."

Another outbreak amongst the Mormonites had taken place. A letter in the St. Louis Republican from the editor of that paper, dated at Warsaw, September 17, represents the state of things among the Mormons, or rather among the bands of lawless men who had assumed the title of Anti-Mormons, as most deplorable. They were carrying fire and faggot into the Mormon settlements in all directions, and did not confine themselves to the Mormons only, but laid waste the dwellings of all those suspected of favouring those fanatics. Down to the night of Sunday, the 14th, it is stated that 60 houses had been burnt down in Adams and Hancock counties. The Anti-Mormons had entered into an extended combination, and announced their determination not to stop short of the expulsion of every Mormon from Hancock county, in which is Nauvoo; and it was apprehended that a conflict would result between the two parties.

Our dates from New Orleans are to the 22d, and Mobile to the 23d ultimo. Those cities were perfectly free from the yellow fever, and were remarkably healthy. The South has not, this year, been visited by any epidemic.

There had been hostilities amongst the Indians.

The New York Courier and Inquirer says:-

"The Arkansas Intelligencer of the 30th ultimo states that the Indians on the frontier are quiet and peaceable, with the exception of the Kickapoos and Camanchees, who are arrayed in arms against each other. The Comanchees have said that the Kickapoos should not hunt upon the prairie, and the latter tribe, assisted by volunteers from several small and scattered tribes, have proceeded to the hunt fully prepared to meet the Camanchees in battle, if they are molested. The Comanchees lately took a 'little king' of the Kickapoos prisoner, and detained him some time, intending to put him to death, but finally released him. He is very popular with his tribe, and has gone out with the hunting party to revenge himself upon the Camanchees. The Intelligencer further states that the Mexicans have lately had a hard battle with the Camanchees, killing 100 of them, and taking prisoner the wife of the principal war chief."

The Union publishes a letter from Mr. Pakenham, the British Minister, transmitting an extract of a despatch lately received by Her Majesty's Government from the Governor of New Zealand, containing information of the friendly and generous assistance afforded by an officer of the United States navy-Captain M'Keever, of the St. Louis-to the local authorities and the European inhabitants of that settlement, in a case of great emergency; and expressing to the Government of the United States the high sense which Her Majesty entertains of the services rendered by Captain M'keever on the occasion referred to.

The first volume of Ingersoll's Historical Sketch of the Second War between the United States and Great Britain had been published.

Mr. Everett, immediately after his arrival at Boston in the Britannia, received an invitation to a public dinner from the citizens, but replied begging to be excused, n the ground that he should be expected to make an address, and, in the wish to preserve inviolate the confidence of his late official position, he would be forced to speak of uninteresting generalities.

It is stated by the New Orleans Tropic that a steam-packet line was about to be established to Jamaica from that city.

Mr. And Mrs. Charles Kean, after a brilliant reception at Philadelphia, had gone to Baltimore.

The Hon. J. White, ex-Speaker of the House of Representatives, had committed suicide.

The Courier and Inquirer supplies us with the usual summary:-

New York, Monday Evening, Sept. 29.

There is little change to note in political or commercial affairs. The war fever has passed off, and now it seems on all hands agreed that between the United States and Mexico there are to be no hostilities; though in what shape the displeasure of he latter is to be manifested, or how she is to be conciliated, is yet to be ascertained. The accounts by the Britannia gave an impulse to cotton which, is still kept up; the new crop is coming in rapidly, of good quality, and with the appearance of a full crop. The demand for money is regular, but at ordinary rates. Foreign exchange is at about the same quotations as our last (109 ¾ to 110), with some little more demand occasioned by the remittance of he quarter’s interest on the debt of this state, and by the partial payments in anticipation of the New York Five per Cents. Redeemable on the 1st of January next. The quotations will be found in the subjoined list of prices. The subscription to the Erie Railroad stock, three millions of dollars, is all but filled, lacking only about 200,000 dollars, which will, of course, be taken, and thus the early construction of that new and important thoroughfare to the west will be secured. Our fall trade is sound and active, and generally business is secure and prosperous. Cotton.—The market is firm at the advance noticed upon the arrival of the Britannia. The sales on Saturday and to-day reach 3,500 bales, part for shipment and part on speculation. The new crop comes forward freely, 41,318 bales having already been received, and there is every prospect of a bountiful supply. We quote Uplands, very ordinary to middling, 6 ¾ to 7 ¾ cents; fair, to good fair and good, 8 ¼ to 8 ¾ and 9 1/3 cents per pound. Tennesses and Alabamas, 6 ¾ to 7 ¼ cents Mobiles, Louisianas, &c., ordinary to middling, 7 to 7 ¼ cents; fair to good fair, 9 to 10 cents; good and fine, 11 to 12 and 12 ½ cents per pound. The sales since the 13th inst. are estimated at 16,000 bales. The rates of freight are to Liverpool, for cotton, 1/4d. per pound in square bales, and 5-16d. in round; naval stores and flour, 2s. to 2s. 3d. per barrel. To London: naval stores and flour, 2s. 6d. to 3s. per barrel. To Havre: cotton, 5/8d. and 7/8d. per pound; ashes, $8 to $10 per ton; rice, $10 per ton.”

There had been some slight improvement in most of the state stocks, both dividend paying and delinquent. The Herald reports relative to Pennsylvania, that “the amount of tolls received on the Pennsylvania canals and railroads up to the 1st of September this year was $807,192, being an increase of $4,750 over the corresponding period of last year, and $136,680 over that of 1843.

As to the other delinquent states, it reports:—

“The financial condition of Maryland is rapidly improving, and we have not the slightest doubt but that the Legislature will, at its next session, agree upon some day on which to resume payment. Collectors of state taxes have been procured in all the counties, and so far they have been very successful in their collections. Payments in the first three quarters of the year, on account of the interest on the public debt, have exceeded the interest which accrued in those quarters, and it is anticipated that the collections for the last quarter will be attested with corresponding results. The efforts of the present Executive of the state of redeem its credit having been untiring, and during his administration we expect to see Maryland take rank with Pennsylvania as a solvent state. There is very little change to note in the progress made by the other delinquent states of the Union towards the redemption of their credit, and very little can be said in relation to their financial condition until the meeting of the Legislatures. The prosperity of every class of citizens, in every section of the country, is so great, and there has been such a rapid increase in the resources of the states generally, that we feel very confident that something more will be done this year towards extricating some of the states from their financial difficulties than in any previous single season. We cannot look for an immediate resumption by Indiana, Illinois, or Arkansas, but we expect to see a more favourable report of their finances than has yet been given and some statements from their legislatures giving more encouragement to their bondholders than has yet been given.”

The Canadian accounts, which extend to the usual date, are unimportant. The Earl of Cathcart had made an official tour through the western portion of the province. The arrival of M. Papineau at Boston had excited considerable speculation as to his future political course. It was thought he would support the present Administration. There has been an increase of 175 arrivals from sea this year over last. Up to September 25 there had arrived, by the St. Lawrence, 184 general cargoes, of which about 125 were for Montreal. The total number of vessels arrived this year was 1,294, and the total number cleared from the port of Quebec, including 35 form Montreal, was 1,138.

Vera Cruz advises to the 16th ult. report that the aspect of affairs had undergone no change. The French Minister had received his passports, and, it is stated, was expected daily at Vera Cruz en route to France. A more authentic rumour, however, stated that the differences had been arranged.

The intelligence from General Taylor’s camp, Corpus Christi, are unimportant. Arista had been at Mier, but not accompanied by a military force, nor was there any indication of the concentration of a Mexican force on the Rio Grande. Spies are said to have been captured by a scouting party. It was reported that 200 Lappans and as many Camanchees had been seen by a party of traders within two days’ march from the camp. The Indians were said to be on their way to Mantamoras (by invitation form Mexico) to join the forces against General Taylor. The report was little credited.

A letter from Pensacola, dated September 8, reports the arrival from Washington of a bearer of despatches, who, it is stated, “from a most authentic source,” would go out on the following day accompanied by three men-of-war, destination unknown.

Accounts from Monterey, California, to June 17, state that the Mexican Government was about to send a Governor and 2,800 men to California, to prevent that part of the Republic from being dismembered.

The Britannia spoke the steam-ship Great Britain, Hoskins, hence for New York, on the 7th inst., in lat. 48 27. Long. 42 56. The Cambria Judkins, arrived at Halifax on the 1st, in 11 ½ days.

A Pensacola letter mentions an unauthenticated rumour to the effect, that Monterey had been taken by the United States squadron in the Pacific.

The Union publishes a proclamation, transmitted by Commander Parker, of the United States frigate Brandywine, issued by Bruat, the French governor of Oceania, decreeing, for various alleged insults and injuries received form Queen Pomare, that “the island of Raiatea is declared to be in a state of blockade, and that the laws and regulations applicable to such a state will be applied to every ship or vessel which shall attempt to violate this blockade.”

Commander Parker, in reference to this proclamation says:-

"Mr. Chapman, United States Acting Consul, informed me that the blockade would not prevent our Whale ships going into the port for supplies; and in a conversation with Governor Bruat, previous to the promulgation of the proclamation, he assured me that, in the absence of our cruisers, our commerce to these islands should be protected by the French.

"Raiatea is a small island to the northward and westward of Papeete, distant 120 miles, where Queen Pomare now resides.

"At Papeete there are no restrictions on commerce, except such as are necessary to prevent munitions of war being distributed among the natives. There are no duties or any charges except for pilotage."

The following account of the success of the English demand for satisfaction from the Peruvian Government is taken from the New York Herald:-

"The demand of the English Government for the cashiering of General Iguin, Prefect of Moquegua, and absolute inability to hold any office, civil or military, in Peru; the removal of Colonel Arancivia, Governor of the Literal of Arica; and the Apology to be written by some subalter, to the commander of an English corvette, had been fully complied with, but not until a strong English force had assembled at Callao, and the merchants had, by order of their Minister, taken an inventory of their property; and he had sent an ultimatum allowing the Executive only 24 hours for a positive and unconditional compliance or refusal, the orders being positive from his Government on these points, and must be complied with before he could treat upon any other subjects. The Executive had been shuffling for a week or two, as Iguin was a favorite of theirs.

"Iguin, on receiving the news from his successor, Colonel Mendaburn, who was immediately sent to take command of the Prefecture, refused to give up, but finding that he would not be supported by any one, as he has no friend except the Executive, and would be compelled to yield to force, surrendered the command. Iguin is an inveterate enemy of all foreigners, and has done more to establish the present unpopular Executive, General Castillo, than any other man."
"Unless the United States take some decisive measures with this Republic, all her demands will be laughed at. The treaty for the settlement of some claims, and the payment of $300,000, ratified by some two or three Executives, and refused to be ratified by the present authorities of Peru, has been submitted to the present Congress, but no payment will be made until force is used by our Government.

"One of the Peruvian men-of-war which had been notified by the English Admiral not to leave the port of Islay at the time the difficulty occurred with Iguin, and after said notifications all were abandoned by their officers and crew, has sunk, and the remaining four vessels will soon follow. The Peruvians claim of the English payment for the squadron, although they never set foot on board of them."

LT October 17, 1845, page 7d: Mexico and California

-We understand from very good authority that a number of enterprising young adventurers, full of youth and enthusiasm, are preparing to start on an expedition to some of the northern states of Mexico or California, with similar views to those which animated the early settlers of Texas, who brought about the revolution and conflict in that state, which have ultimately produced the annexation of that territory to the United States. It is generally well known that the movement in Texas which has led to its present annexation originated in the city of New York, probably 10 or 12 years ago, with some of the same persons who are now the leading men in that country. The success of the revolution and annexation of Texas seems to point out the new way—the novel method by which stable and efficient republican Governments can be extended over this continent,—proceeding as it does from the central republic of the world, the United States. The annexation of Texas to the United States is as much a blessing to the people of that region as life itself. European journalists and reviewers may talk til they are hoarse about national robbery and plunder, but the people of Texas, the independent people of all classes in Mexico, California, and elsewhere, have, according to our notions, an inalienable right to annex themselves to that country under whose laws and institutions they can live peaceably and prosperously, without its being considered robbery or plunder on their part. If Louisiana, or South Carolina, or any other border state, were to choose, in their sovereign capacity, to separate from the Union, and unite themselves to republican Mexico with the same purpose Texas had, they would possess a perfect and indefeasible right to do so. We conceive this right to be an original principle of our nature, which cannot be explained away by abuse and denunciation, such as the European journals use. Heretofore the republic of Mexico has shown herself incapable of self government. Since the first moment of her independence from the military dominion of old Spain, she was during her whole career been but the grave of old soldiers and miserable politicians. The people of the different states of that republic, seeing that Texas has now one expectation of a steady government through its union with the United States, will want to come into the confederacy for the same purpose. An expedition, therefore, starting from New York, collecting materials all over the country, to go into the northern states of Mexico or California, for the purpose of annexing them to this country, of establishing a republican government, and securing peace, will meet with the sanction, we have no doubt, of all good citizens. The expedition to which we now allude will take some time for preparation, but we have no doubt that in less than one year we shall see crowds crossing the Rio Grande to the northern states of Mexico, and passing through the great gap of the Rocky Mountains towards California; and that we shall have a second, third, and fourth edition of the Texan revolution all over again, and at each turn a new extension of the borders of the Union. —New York Herald.

LT October 29, 1845, page 6b: The Affairs of Mexico.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Mexico, Sept. 2.

I have little to add to my despatch of the 29th, which went by the regular packet. The city has remained perfectly quiet, notwithstanding the daily reports of approaching pronunciamientos and the evident alarm of the Government, whose fears are seen by the doubling of the guards and the excess of military precautions that we hourly witness. It is said also that Paredes is on better terms with the Ministry; and I subjoin a proclamation of his to the troops destined for Texas under his command, which appears in this day's Diorio. This proclamation gives great satisfaction to the Ministry, as it was generally believed that Paredes had determined to pronounce against them.

The Treasury is still in the same unprovided state. The war initiative has not gone through the forms of the Chambers; and I understand that relative to the Texan war has not yet been looked at by the Deputies.

Negotiations have been going on relative to the affairs of the French Minister, the Baron de Cyrey, and this Government, which, I am told, ended in disappointment. Mr. Bank-head has been endeavouring to reconcile the angry parties, but, up to the present hour, his efforts have been unsuccessful. M. Pena y Pena has not yet sent in the passports demanded by the Baron, in the hope of a reconciliation taking place; but the diplomatic intercourse has ceased, and the French Minister is determined not to yield.

"Soldiers,-The supreme Government has determined that the 1st and 3d divisions should form an army of reserve, and has done me the honour to appoint me to its command. This new proof of high confidence calls on me again to consecrate my whole life to the service of so generous a country.

"Companions,-The same country now raises its august presence to resist the usurpations of a neighbouring Power, which fancied that your valour was asleep, and that you are not the sons of those heroes who in a hundred battles proved their loyalty and valour. A rapacious and grasping race has advanced into our territory, persuaded that you would not defend that patrimony which our fathers conquered with their blood. They deceive themselves. Let us fly to arrest the course of these usurpers, and teach them that they are no longer dealing with the Indian undisciplined tribes, whose lands they have robbed and devastated, but with Mexicans, who burn to meet in the field a people that sanction by their laws the most disgusting slavery.

"Comrades,-When the Supreme Government commands, let us march to avenge so many injuries—to sustain the integrity of our native soil, our religion, and the worship of our fathers—the laws which they have transmitted, and the nationality which is ours by right.

"Friends,—your mission is, moreover, one of peace—that of maintaining order, and securing obedience to the laws. We are not only sons of the country, but its defenders and protectors. Honour will keep us for ever in its ranks; let moderation be our guide, and let all our ardour be reserved for the day of battle when the enemy is in our front.

"Soldiers,—To command you is my greatest glory, and to lead you to the field where immortality is to be found. We will share the dangers as well as the laurels, and my best reward will be, to have our names united in the annals of Mexico—Viva the Nation—Viva the Supreme Government."

Mariano Paredes Y Arrilaga.
"Head Quarters of San Luis Potosi, Aug. 27, 1845."

September 5.

It will sometimes happen that the lookers-on are better judges of a game than the actual players, and while the foreign Ministers have been writing home that the affair of the Baron de Cyrey and the Mexican Government was on the point of arrangement, The Times correspondent alone was well informed in stating that the negotiations were broken off, and all diplomatic intercourse between both countries suspended. The delivery of the French Minister's passports to-day by M. Pena y Pena confirms my intelligence, and at this hour there is no representative of France in Mexico.

This is a sad affair, and may lead to very unpleasant consequences, and it is much to be deplored that so serious an event should have arisen from so ridiculous a circumstance, and that the peace of the New World is to be risked for a trifling dispute between the Minister of France and the master of a horse bath. Various attempts have been made to conciliate matters. Senor Cuevas, at one period, entered into a written engagement to give ample satisfaction; but his successor put an end to the affair by giving to that promise a sense which fell short of the reparation demanded by the Baron. Even at the last moment a verbal communication was passed from M. Pena y Pena, through one of the Foreign Ministers, offering a sufficient apology, which the Baron expressed his readiness to receive; but when the terms were reduced to writing, the Baron declared that they did not contain the reparation he expected, and the matter was again at sea.

Some friends of the Legation wondered that the French Minister, who for so many weeks repeated that he would accept no reparation short of the dismissal of the officer and the Alcalde, could have made up his mind to accept a mere apology; but the Baron de Cyprey is best judge of his own affairs, and if he were content, the public would have been pleased with the transaction. Probably the Mexican Government, having seen the wavering of the Baron, tried to take advantage of his apparent indecision, and imposed hard conditions on him. The result is, however, as I have stated; the game of finesse is at an end, the Baron de Cyprey has receive passports for all persons attached to the Legation, and if the Government at home choose to take advantage of it a casus belli exists.

The Mexican newspapers have treated this occurrence in a manner very unpalatable to the Baron de Cyprey, alleging that the dispute arose from his refusal to pay a few pence for the washing of his horses at the bath, and that he commenced the row by applying his whip to the Alcalde's face. The Baron, of course, has disproved these assertions; but so much ridicule has been thrown on the origin and progress of the affair, that every one regrets that the circumstance took place. The principal paper here (the Siglo) has surpassed all others in the violence of its attacks. I will not reproduce them, but I give from that paper of to-day its account of the closing of the dispute:-

"We know that the Minister of Foreign Affairs has sustained with energy and intelligence the right of the Republic in this remarkable affair. We cannot believe that he has taken any step which might deprive the Mexican Government of the advantageous position it holds. If any negotiations did take place, and a hope of a friendly termination was entertained, we are convinced that the Minister acted in a manner not in any way to lower the dignity of the Republic. Moreover, if the imprudence and levity of the French Minister have brought matters to their actual position, we have no reason the resort to underhand intrigues to secure a favourable termination to us. The civilized world will judge of he conduct of the Baron de Cyprey in the proper light, but the Mexican republic cannot yield an iota of its rights."

The committee on the new tariff are working hard; they have rejected the square yard or vara duty, but they have admitted the propriety of entering goods of a lesser width on a graduated scale of duty.

The city is perfectly quiet, notwithstanding all the daily rumours we hear of an approaching pronunciamiento.

Mexico, September 29.

I informed you on the 5th instant that the differences between the Mexican Government and the French Minister not having been arranged, the former had sent passports to the Baron de Cyprey, for himself, family, and all persons composing the legation. Baron de Cyprey is therefore making preparations for departure. He has left the house in which he resided since his arrival in this city, announced a sale of horses and furniture, and means by the November packet to go to Havannah, where he expects to receive instructions from M. Guizot relative to future movements. He will be accompanied by the Baroness, his daughter; the Secretary of Legation, M. Gowry de Rosla; and the Second Secretary, the Baron de Neufflies. The Mexican authorities have, to justify the old adage, nearly exhausted themselves at the same time with the British and Spanish legation. Fortunately there was smoke and no fire, otherwise it would have been amusing to see the republic at this moment of distress in offensive contact with the representatives of the United States, of France, of England, and of Spain.

The Spanish coldness arose out of the too great susceptibility of the young gentleman who represents Queen Isabel in Mexico. He took offence at the celebration of "the independence," which is annually repeated on the 15th of September; and at the speeches delivered on the last occasion, in which Mexico triumphs over their Spanish masters, was landed with the exaggeration common to the Lingua Castellana. He had the bad or good taste to close his doors and shutters on the 15th, as if his Government had not recognized the independence of Mexico; and it is said bitterly complained of the sorry compliments paid in one of the speeches above noticed to Spanish valour during the war of independence. The Mexican Government has met these remonstra...(illegible) with its usual apathy, and M. Bermudez de Castro who apparently gained very little by his notion.

The case of the British Government was on the point of becoming serious; but happily for all parties the address of M. Pena, of Pena, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, prevented an explosion. As I mentioned some time since, the violent portion of the Mexican Congress had resolved on terminating the contracts made by Santa Anna with the Anglo-Mexican Mint Company, for the carriage of the mints of Zecaticas and Guana juato, under the pretext that all acts of Santa Anna’s Government not ratified by Congress were illegal. Lord Aberdeen, however, whom the parties represented the hardship of the case entertained an opinion totally opposed to the Mexican deputies, and inasmuch as the presidency of Santa Anna was a de facto government, his Lordship holds, that the contracts were good, and he has intimated by notes, which Mr. Bankhead delivered on two occasions, his determination to uphold them. The last of these notes was laid the day before yesterday by the Government before the Congress met in secret session, for the annual purpose of supporting the dictamen of a commission, which quashed the contracts, and advised the mints to be put up to public sale. The anger of the deputies, it appears, knew no bounds, and in their rage, they determined on advising the Minister to send back Mr. Bankhead’s note. At this moment M. Pena, of Pena, interfered, and having explained that the British Government would not be trifled with, and that the sending back the note would instantly be met by a demand for passports, plainly told the Chamber that if Mexico now quarrelled with England, as well as with France, it had no other resource than to place itself at once under the protection of the United States. This hint had the desired effect. The deputies agreed to wait for further information, and the case stands open for another day. I send you the dictamen of the commision, and shall only quote here the resolution it recommends for adoption to the Chamber:-

“The contract made by the Provisional Government with the house of Manning and Manhill, for the mint of Guanajuato, on December 23, 1847, shall not be ratified.

Consequently, the said mint of Guanajuato, as well as that of Zacatecas, with the privilege of coining, shall be put up to public sale, and sold to the highest bidder, in accordance with the general interests.

“It is distinctly to be understood that the corporation, company, or person who may become the purchaser, shall be obliged to make good the sums which Government may have to repay to the contractors for the unexpired term of the contract.”

War with America is not yet declared and everything, so far as hostile preparations are concerned, remain in statu quo. The Government is completely bewildered between its desire of revenge, the taunts of the Opposition, and its utter incapacity to make a single forward step. There is not a shilling in the treasury. English capitalists have apparently determined to avoid Mexican negocios. The army is in an utter state of evamement, and there is no disposition on the part of the people to furnish either men or money. This position of affairs may be very convenient to the apathetic character of the Mexican Government, but I am much deceived if the United States will long suffer it to enjoy that indifferent existence. The States are now about taking the offensive—that is to say, they are bringing again forward their pecuniary claims against the republic, and if Mexico will not agree to negotiate for a settlement of those claims, and likewise of boundaries, the States will take possession of some part of its territory to hold as security, such as Matamoros on the Rio Grande, near the Texican frontier, or Monterez, or San Francisco, on the Pacific. The fact is, the United States will not let go their grasp of Mexico; they are illustrating the fable of the wolf and the lamb, and whether by war or negotiation, they are determined to work out their ends.

The question of boundaries will be fatal to the republic, as, in consequence of the department of Coahuila and Texas having been some years since combined in one, it is difficult to say whether the Texan frontier should not extend the that of ht Coahuila. The pint, if not valid in law and equity, affords an excellent pretext for the aggression of the United States, and of offering, as a middle term, to accept the Rio Bravo, which divides Coahuila into equal parts, and, as I explained in a former letter, if followed from its mouth to its source in Nawa Mexico, cuts off slices from four departments of the republic larger in extent than the whole province of Texas. The question of frontier will also be embarrassing on the Pacific coast, and interfere with ht negotiation, now going on between the British and Mexican Governments for the adoption of a frontier parallel necessary to British interests. No one can be mistaken as to the views of the United States on these points; and I find by an authority now before me-

"That on the 6th of August, 1835, Mr. Forsyth, Minister of Foreign Affairs at Washington, wrote to Mr. Butler, Charged’ Affairs at Washington, wrote to Mr. Butler, Charged’ Affairs at Mexico, ordered to arrange the affairs to Texas, to make all sacrifices to get possession of the bay of San Francisco, by insisting on a frontier line drawn form the Gulf of Mexico, following the Rio Bravo the 37th degree north latitude, and from that parallel to the Pacific; and they will have them, unless England interferes for the protection of the mining districts of Mexico and the ports of the Pacific.

In the opinion of many, the existence, as a nation, of Mexico, is hastening to its termination, as far as I can see, no great man appears who is equal to the regeneration of the republic. The Government is powerless even in the capital; the departments barely hold on the central State; there is no population to till the finest soil in the world, and riches above and below ground remain unexplored for want of intelligence and hands to work them. If England will not interfere the doom of Mexico is sealed, and in the course of a few years it must be incorporated with the United States. The Government and people of the United States entertain no doubt on this subject. They say that they do not interfere in the affairs of Europe, and that they are determined to European Power shall interfere with them in the affairs of the new world. By aggression, annexation, or conquest, they are resolved on enticing all Mexico down to the Isthmus, within the union, and, come what may, that end must sooner or later be accomplished. I am fully aware of the danger to which the monetary circulation of Europe will be exposed when the silver districts of Mexico are under the control of the American Congress, and of the imprudence of our permitting a naval power, like that of the United States, to become the richest nation in the world; but I cannot help admitting, at the same time, that if Great Britain will not interfere, the general good of humanity must be advanced by the annexation of this country to the American Union. The tide of emigration will, instead of flowing directly take the current of the United States, and even millions of English, Scotch, and Irish emigrants can pass through American ports to fix us settlers in this land of milk and honey. The wretched Indian race must give way before the influx of a white population, and myriads of acre now untitled will team with wealth and abundance. The climate is magnificent, except on the coast, and in particular districts fever does not appear. Every European production can be raised; and I may say there is room for all the emigration that can be poured in a quarter of a century from the British Isles. The next good to the British occupation of Mexico is its incorporation with the United States. We shall find when it takes place immediate employment of our poor, a consumption of British manufactures spread over this great continent, the dispensation of the English language and English feelings over an almost boundless territory. We must, in short, make up our minds to this result, and happy will it be for the common interest of humanity, unless Great Britain should take the matter directly into her own hands, alarmed at the growing power of the United States, and their dominion over the mining districts from which our monetary circulation in furnished-when it is accomplished.

The election of General Herrera as President has been confirmed by the Congress. The new President is an honourable and excellent man, but he is too good for troubled times, and his health is not satisfactory. He made a fine speech on the occasion, promising wonders; but as these discourses are mere sound, and mean nothing, I do not trouble you with them.

The anniversary of Mexican independence was celebrated on the 10th instant, with some degree of pomp and little enthusiasm.

The Cortes, after several weeks’ discussion, empowered, as will be seen by the annexed law, the Government to contract a loan for 15,000,000 dollars—that is to say, if they can find any bewildered capitalist disposed to lend that sum. The several restrictions proposed in the first instance, relative to a maximum of interest of 6 per cent., and the limitation to a fixed amount of each tender, have been withdrawn, but from all that I hear the change will bring no bidder into the market, and the Mexican loan is likely to remain open for many months. Indeed, in the face of unsettled transactions, it is impossible that any capitalist can venture money on such an experiment; and I believe that their hearts the members of the Government are content, as its want of means is the best answer the Opposition deputies, who are constantly urging a declaration of war against the United States. Indeed the Ministerial papers are obliged to court public opinion by adopting somewhat of the same tone; and I find the Diario of to-day saying, that as now the Government has got permission to raise a loan of 15,000,000, troops have been marched towards the Texian frontier. This is, of course, a vain boast, as Paredes will not move, though he has been furnished with as much money as may keep his troops from starving. March troops, indeed, against the United States! Why, the expedition of California, which was organized eight months since, and on whose arrival probably the safety of the Upper California depends, has not yet set out, because Iniestra, who commands it, declares he will not move until he is assured of pay and subsistence for his men! Tobasco sets the Central Government at defiance. California is all but independent; and Sonora has, it is said, again made its pronunciamento. The Government cannot even protect the road from Vera Cruz to the capital from the bands that infest it, and how can it send troops to the extremities of the Republic. The troops in the capital are tolerably well paid, and some of the regiments have a fair military appearance. The division of Paredes is also said to be in an efficient state, but as to the rest of the army is condition maybe judged from the fact that a general order was lately published from the War-office calling on the officers to check the daily practice of the soldiers selling their muskets and accoutrements.

The stocks of the cotton factories are reduced so low, that unless Government grants licenses for the importation of the raw material several of them will be obliged to stop. No less than five factories at Puebla have closed operation for want of cotton, and I believe the stock of the most provident mill does not exceed three months' consumption. The Government might replenish its exhausted treasury by granting licenses for the importation of a certain amount; but so fatal is the influence of false principles, and so much difficulty exists in conciliating the interests of the manufacturers and agriculturists, that Government is unable to decide. Poverty will force Ministers to grant the desired licenses; but probably they will only do so when a great calamity has befallen the various factories they have so improvidently encouraged. The manufacturing experiment, though attended with some benefits to the persons engaged in it, has hitherto caused a great national loss, and it is now to be dreaded that the speculators themselves will suffer considerably. How absurd is a system which compels the working Mexican to pay 1s. or 1s. 6d. per yard for an article that could be imported at a fair duty, and sold 6d.

The new tariff has at length been accomplished. The following is the publication respecting it which appears in this morning's Diario:

Circular of the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

"His Excellency requests you to forward to all consuls and foreign agents of the Republic the supplement to the Diario of this morning, which contains an extract from the principal bases of the new tariff. You will please to recommend to said agents and consult to give the greatest publicity to this document, in order that merchants and consignees may frame their operations accordingly.

"Ferdinand Del Castillo."

London, Monday, November 24, 1845.

The Washington Union of the 31st of October publishes a declaration on the subject of the Oregon territory, which is regarded in the United States as a precursor of the President’s message, and a distinct intimation of the course which the American Cabinet are prepared to follow. We shall not, however, deal with this reckless and injurious productions as if it were a state paper. The pen from which it emanates is evidently alike unconscious of the restraint of public duty and the decorum of political life, and Mr. Polk will soon answer for himself, without being made to share the disgrace of such anonymous incendiaries as these. We perceive, however, with satisfaction, that the language of the most influential journals of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia continues to be quite as temperate, and quite as averse to war for so miserable an object, as the sincerest friends of peace can desire.

In spite of the efforts which have been made in the United States to disseminate and accredit an exaggerated and one-sided view of the American claims beyond the Rocky Mountains, the pretensions of the Government are not unanimously upheld by the convictions of the most enlightened classes, especially of the Whig party; and the politicians of New York are not so infatuated as to overlook the disastrous consequences of a war with Great Britain, for the purpose of making acquisitions upon the coast of the Pacific which must at least be indifferent or injurious to themselves. They argue that the value of the whole Oregon territory is infinitesimally small compared with the interest, that would be sacrificed by a war, and that a question which has admitted of half a century of discussion cannot be of vital interest to the honour of the United States. In these views, it is needless to say, we cordially concur, and we only wish they were as general as they are sound and sensible.

It cannot be too often repeated that the question has been brought into its present embarrassing and threatening condition by the United States Government, and not by Great Britain. It would have been easy for the negotiators and Ministers of this country at former periods to have put forward a case for the establishment of the exclusive sovereignty of England over the whole country, founded on discovery and occupation, and at least equal to any claim which American statesmen could maintain. But nothing of the kind has been done by us. Throwing aside all the superior and earlier grounds of sovereignty which we might have asserted, we have taken our stand upon the treaty of 1799, and from first to last we have demanded and exercised no more than the right of joint occupancy between England and Spain; and the first use they make of this juggle of rights is to contend for our absolute expulsion from a country we have held, with one exception, for fifty years, and which we only seek to continue to hold on the same terms. Such attempts, especially when they are encouraged by vehement declarations on the part of the President of the Republic, amount to a positive invasion of our existing territorial right. Their object is to deprive us of something we actually possess and have long possessed; and thus farther whole character of the transaction is offensive on the part of the United States, and defensive on that of England. We can scarcely regret the extreme moderation of the conduct of former British Governments in this negotiation (though we hold it to have been below what the facts of the case would have justified), when we perceive the strength it must give our position in the eyes of the world. If we are driven to war itself, the world will comprehend and acknowledge that we are not sacrificing the peace of the globe to the acquisition of a sterile territory—that we are not even denying the right of the Americans to form settlements in that territory, since we admit their joint occupancy, but that we are defending the great and fundamental right of occupation by British subjects under the faith of a treaty and the protection of the Crown; and that such a right is in every part of the globe equally inviolable. The American case is in every respect the opposite of our own: it is a pure aggression; it acknowledges no concurrent right in its rival; it seeks only to drive out the men who have held the country for half a century; and, as if an arrogant presumption could supply the place of real confidence, it refuses to submit these claims to the test of arbitration. We are not much surprised at the pertinacity with which this last proposal has been rejected, for a slight degree of investigation would satisfy any impartial judge that in the course of the last 30 years the whole question has been shifted, until it has assumed a shape never dreamed of in 1814. At Ghent in that year, and in the subsequent negotiations of 1818, 1824, and 1826, the northern boundary of the United States was considered by the American plenipotentiaries to run along the 49º parallel of latitude. The question then pending between Great Britain the United States, as is repeatedly stated on both sides in the course of those transactions, related to the territory south of that parallel, that is, between latitude 49º and latitude 42º; the Americans claimed the whole of it, the English proposed to divide it. But as to the northern tract of he same region, extending from latitude 49º to latitude 54º40’, no discussion whatever took place; and until very recently no one called in question the exclusive right to Great Britain to that region, to which certainly no Spanish settlers of navigators laid any claim whatever. This claim, therefore, extending form the frontier of Mexico the that of Russia, and excluding us from the coast of the Pacific altogether and from the Straits of Fuca, is a novelty. It was probably originally put forward to facilitate the acquisition of he portion which the Cabinet of Washington did claim; but recent publications have confounded the whole tract together, and we are now gravely told by the organ of the American Government that Mr. Polk is prepared to declare in the most unequivocal terms the absolute right of the United States to the whole Oregon territory down to the Russian line.

It is natural that these exorbitant pretension should meet with little encouragement in New England and New York; but the moderate party which utterly failed in preventing the annexation of Texas, will have still less chance of success in arresting the policy of the President on this occasion. On the contrary, Texas herself will immediately send representatives to the Lower House and to the Senate, who will promote the cause of he party by which they have been themselves absorbed. The rapid and enormous increase of population to the South and West must warn and American statesman ambitious of democratic support, that the real elements of power in such a community are in growth there, and are comparatively stationary in the older parts of he country. The new England states will ere long be to the Union no more than the Welch counties are to Great Britain. They are already quite outnumbered in the House of Representatives; and the party of which they are the nucleus will now be outvoted in the Senate. To form therefore a correct estimate of the policy of such a politician as Mr. Polk we must look not to the reason and experience of her Eastern states, but to the turbulence and numerical strength of the West. There the country runs no risk of invasion. The adventurous habits of anew people are ever disposed to warfare. Even the burden of taxation would fall on the mercantile class; and in the West there is a vague presentiment that another generation will cross the Rocky Mountains, and launch its fleets on the Pacific. Such motives and tendencies as these a wise and firm Government would seek only to correct and to restrain. But we question whether Mr. Polk has the intention or the power to do either one or the other; and we are fully prepared to learn that he is exciting what he dares not attempt to control.

Meanwhile it must be assumed, form the language of he American official papers, that the negotiation is virtually at an end,—that is to say, not that it has been violently broken off, but that the proposals made on both sides have been respectively rejected and that no further proposal is now pending between the two Governments, unless the plan of arbitration be resumed. Such we believe to be the true state of the case. The assertion of some of our contemporaries, that Mr. Pakenham had proposed that the question should remain in abeyance for 20 years, and that the inhabitants of Oregon should then determine their own political relation to Great Britain or to the union, is, we are convinced, wholly unfounded, for it would amount to a disguised surrender of all the rights of the Hudson’s Bay Company. The probability is, that Congress will give notice that the provisional treaty now in force shall expire in twelve months; and we shall then discover whether the American Government is prepared to act upon the views it profess to entertain. As for ourselves, the effectual defence of our own position in the country and on the Columbia is all we have at present to provide for; but if the provisional treaty be terminated by either party, the principle of joint occupation will cease, and our original rights to the country will be revived to their full extent.

[ANP]
The practical question arising out of the termination of the last attempt at an adjustment of the dispute, and out of the threatening intimations of the semi-official journal of Washington, is simply this—What do Mr. Polk and his Cabinet propose to do next? What are the Americans prepared to undertake by way of giving effect to these claims to a remote and almost inaccessible region? We have recently shown that if all these pretensions and declarations are more than empty wind, it rests with the American people and their Government to terminate a state of things which is incompatible with the nature of their claims, though not with that of ours. They must, in short, either do nothing and leave the Oregon territory to the Chapter of accident; or they must discover some means not only of establishing their power in that district, but, what is far more difficult, of expelling our own. They have a right to send emigrants in any numbers across the Rocky Mountains, and to possess themselves of any lands not previously occupied. They have a right to let these emigrants take with them their own laws, usages, and even the jurisdiction of their country; for we have done the same thing, and the rights of both parties are equal and concurrent. But they have no right to infringe upon any existing privilege of any British subject, nor to encroach, in any manner, on our power, which is till north of the Columbia, de facto, undivided and uncontested. This brings us to the point at which these anomalous and imperfectly defined rights may come into direct collision.

The coast was visited by British naval officers at various periods, from Drake to Vancouver; whilst he alleged discoveries of the Americans were merely the expeditions of private merchantmen. But mere discovery, or taking possession by proclamation, is of little avail, unless it be followed by occupation. The Americans have never held any position on the Columbia, save the fort of Astoria, which they long ago abandoned; whilst, on our side, to repeat the position we laid down some months ago in dealing with this subject, the occupation by the North-West Company, and subsequently by the Hudson's Bay Company, recognized by the Legislative and Executive power of Great Britain, is a full and sufficient occupation of the territory according to the law of nations, and therefore absolute as against the adverse claim of any other nation, save and except the concurrent right admitted by the treaty of 1790 with Spain, and now transferred to the United States. To these arguments might be added others derived from the French claim to the country extending from the Lake of Woods to the Pacific Ocean, which is admitted to have been ceded to us in 1763, together with the province of Canada; whilst, on the contrary, the American attempt to stretch the limits of the French province of Louisiana beyond the Rocky Mountains has been utterly confuted.

An uninhabited and uncultivated country, two thousand miles west of the frontier of the state of Missouri, situated on the coast of an unfrequented ocean, cannot by possibility become a theatre of regular war. No army could be conveyed
A very unpleasant circumstance took place here on Tuesday evening last, in which the French Minister, the Baron de Cyprey, who figured in the affair of the Bano de las Delicias, played the principal part. You are aware, that in consequence of the Government having refuse to grant the reparation demanded by the Baron for the insults offered to him at the Bano, M. de Cyprey had asked for and received his passports. The Baron and his family were engaged in making preparations for departure, arranged of the 13th inst., and it was hoped that he and his suite would leave the republic without any further scandal being given. These hopes have not been realized, and a scene occurred at the Italian Opera on Tuesday night, which, whether the Baron be right or wrong, has raised a storm of public anger against him, and renders his authority of Mr. Calhoun himself, backed by the opinions of the Army and Navy Departments in the United States, for the assertion, that "the attempt to assert and maintain an exclusive right to the Oregon territory against the adverse and conflicting claim of Great Britain must prove unsuccessful." The reasons by which he supported this opinion are unanswerable, and cannot have been forgotten by any one who read them when they appeared in these columns.

Are we, then, to suppose that since Mr. Calhoun delivered the memorable speech to which we allude, the progress of the American Democracy in its passion for territorial acquisitions has been so rapid that President Polk will actually attempt in 1846 or 1847 what the ablest and most unscrupulous statesman of the Democratic party pronounced to be a hopeless undertaking in 1845? If we are to believe the Washington Union, such is the case; and to be consistent with this announcement, the first step of the American Cabinet must be to declare that the treaty of 1827 is in twelve months to expire. Such a measure might lead eventually to hostilities, but it would not amount in itself to a casus belli. Perfectly confident of his justice of the cause of England, and no less secure of the superiority of her forces on the northwest coast of America, we should then await the result with composure—still most reluctant to endanger the peace of the world, but most ready and resolved to punish those who may presume to break it. scandalous scene. M. Otero retired, the Baron exclaiming as he went away, M. Otero retired, the Baron exclaiming as he went away, that his residence was known, and that he was ready to give satisfaction in any form. To render that matter more characteristic, I must add that the Baron is double the age and one-half the size of M. Otero, and that if the latter had exercised his apparent strength, the Baron must have had the worst of a personal struggle. This disparity of age and force gives the friends of the Baron, who are hard pushed to find an excuse for his intemperate conduct, the opportunity of saying, that whatever his faults may be, he is a man of undoubted courage, and that as he offered the best satisfaction to his adversary, no reproach for want of spirit can be advanced.

This occurrence made a great sensation in the theatre, crowds collected in the corridors, and rather a formidable group was formed in the patio, or outward square. At one moment it was apprehended that the people would resort to acts of violence, but nothing of the kind took place, and the Baron de Cyprey, the Baroness, and his daughter retired from the theatre without a single word being uttered against them. There is no doubt the public were much excited; but the Alcalde in his report says that he took means to calm their irritation, and otherwise the Mexicans are amiable and well-bred, and, however angry they might be with the Baron de Cyprey, they were incapable, I am certain, of insulting of him or his family. To add pugnacity to this rencontre, I believe the Baron had no means of determining that M. Otero was the author of the article in question, and I am given to understand, and I am certain the fact is so, that M. Otero, though one of the principal editors of the Siglo, was not the person who wrote the answer to the Journal des Debats. It was expected on the day following the event, that M. Otero would have sent a message to the Baron, and curiosity was alive to ascertain whether the Government would connive at the duel, and not put the dreadfully severe laws against affairs of honour into execution. Wednesday and Thursday, however, passed over without a challenge being delivered, and we all had reason to believe that editorial honour would be satisfied by a pen and ink vengeance. Certainly this species of satisfaction was not spared and the Siglo, the Amigo del Pueblo, and Monitor Constitucional were filled with the most violent articles against the Baron, and, indeed, against all Frenchmen. These papers alleged that M. de Cyprey was attended on the night of the rencontre by a band of young Parisians, who, on M. Otero being assaulted, laid hold of that gentleman’s arms, and prevented his defence. The statement is untrue; but it served the purpose of the hour; and the feeling towards La Jeune France was so violent, that a kind of crusade was preached against it, and something like Sicilian Vespers hinted at. The editor of the Monitor Constitucional took a forward place in these attacks; and to show that he was not afraid, he has published a general challenge to La Jeune France, or rather he professed his readiness to accept all challenges that might be sent here as he says, parole d’honneur. Pugnaciousness is a catching malady; and no sooner did the editor of the Monitor challenge the wide world than a certain colonel in the army thought proper to present himself as the Baron’s new residence, offering to fight, in the Irish fashion, for the honour of the thing or for love’ but it appears, however, that M. de Cyprey, though rather fond of sport, had no fancy to stand target for Mexican amateurs, and he declared that his affair was with M. Otero alone, and that he had no satisfaction to give to any other person. This answer satisfied the Colonel, and he retired to reap laurels in the all the coffee-houses of the Portales.

The fracas of Tuesday night caused great anxiety at the Palace, and the President and Ministers became much alarmed lest their unpleasant relations with France should be further deranged by any public outrage befalling the French Minister and his family. They accordingly sent a guard of honour at night to protect the house where the Baron is now residing; and they addressed him on Thursday a note pointing out that his presence was no longer necessary in Mexico, and entreating him to withdraw with the least possible delay, as they could no longer be answerable for his safety. The Baron refused to receive this note, but its contents were afterwards explained to him at the request of the Government by the Spanish Minister. It was stated at the Lonja and elsewhere that the note contained a peremptory order to leave Mexico within three days. But I know that the Government had no intention of writing in that sense, and their communication was framed in the Baron’s own interests, and with consideration for his personal safety. This anxiety was increased by a knowledge of the fact that M. Otero had at last, namely, on the Friday, about 60 hours after the insult, made up his mind to challenge the Baron, and that a certain count, a member of one of the first families here, had undertaken to deliver the message. Of course the town was eager to ascertain the result of this defiance, but up to the hour I write we have nothing definitive on the subject. A duel spoken of in this country is a duel prevented, as the laws without remorse confiscate all the property of the actors and seconds; and, of course, in this instance precaution would be doubly enforced, as the position of the Government would be uncomfortable were the Baron killed, and there would be an uprising against all Frenchmen if M. Otero fell under his fire. A postscript to my letter will explain the result of the episode.
The Congress has acted, as the initiative knew it would, in the affair of the mints of Zacatecas and Guanaxuato, and the Anglo-Mexican Mint Company. They have referred back to the Commission the dictaments of the majority and minority; or, in other words, they virtually confirm the contracts. The company may thank Lord Aberdeen’s interference for this result, for certainly had not Mr. Bankhead delivered the not alluded to in my last, the contracts would have been annulled. How far this interference may lead to annoyance to the Foreign-office by other claims being pressed on the same ground remains to be seen. But the fact is undoubted, that if Lord Aberdeen had not exacted the performance of Santa Anna’s engagements, the highly-profitable lease of the Anglo-Mexican Mint Company would have been abruptly closed.

I am sorry to hear that the President Herrera’s health is so bad that he seriously contemplates retiring from the high station in which he has just been confirmed by a large majority of the Chamber and the Congress. I am assured that this event, though not generally anticipated, must soon take place, and that the only difficulty at present is the choice of the person whom Herrera will recommend as his successor. General Almonte, late Minister at Washington, is the person secretly designed, and as he is a man of activity, probably the present President cannot make a better choice.

We have very bad accounts from Sonora, that large department to the south-east of California Civil war has recommenced, headed by the two rival families who have long struggled for mastery in that province. Th one with a mixture of Indian blood in it has called in the Indian savages to its aid, and deplorable accounts are received of their ravages. The Government is incapable of action in this emergency, as it is well known that its hold of California and Sonora, or, indeed, of any other distant province, is merely nominal.

Tobasco has returned to its verbal allegiance to the Central Government.

Mr. Bankhead on Friday last congratulated, in the name of the diplomatic corps, the President Herrera on the confirmation of his election by the Congress. He did so in the following terms:—

"Excellent Senor,—The diplomatic corps has the honour to felicitate your Excellency on your elevation to the constitutional Presidency of the republic. In offering the sincerest wishes for the prosperity of this country I convey the sentiments which animate the Sovereigns we represent; and I hope with confidence that the election of your Excellency to the supreme magistrature will be and additional motive for drawing closer the bonds of friendship which unite them to the Mexican nation."

To this address the President made the following reply:—

"My administration shall bear the stamp of impartiality and justice towards all nations, but especially towards those which are in friendly intercourse with Mexico, and with particular benevolence I regard those on behalf of whom your Excellency has now spoken, for with one we are bound by the most sacred ties, and for the other we entertain the greatest gratitude, inasmuch as that country was the first in Europe to recognize our existence as one of the great family of nations; and I promise that in all our relations there shall be good faith, truth, and sincerity, which I regard as the most efficacious means of cementing our lasting friendship."

The French paper published in Mexico gives an account of the Baron de Cyprey and M. Otero’s adventure, which is much liked for its impartiality. As the closing remarks represent the feelings of the French residents of Mexico in this affair, I do not think an extract from them will be misplaced. The Courier says—

"If we are now called on to appreciate the conduct of M. de Cyprey as a public man, we are sorry to say that we do not think it irreproachable. He was wrong in giving way to a just resentment. The high functions which he had just laid down required more circumspection. He ought to have more regard for the customs of a country in which he lived so long; he should have foreseen that this imprudent step would render his former conduct suspicious; he out, above all, to recollect that he laboured, against his will to foment that hatred which people like M. Otero so constantly labour to excite against France in the hearts of the Mexicans. Such is, with regard to M. de Cyprey, our frank opinion; but when we look at the other side, what a sad exhibition does it present! Look at those public journals panting like hounds after their prey, tearing with rancorous bite the innocent as well as the guilty. They make of a matter purely personal with the editor of a paper an affair of party, and go almost the length of menacing us with Sicilian Vespers. One would think from the row made in the streets that an enemy was at the gates of the city. Their provocations are empty boasts, which the nation itself regrets, and we trust that our countrypeople resident in Mexico will not be induced to reply.”

On closing my despatch I find that no duel is likely to take place, as M. Otero is confined by the authorities as a prisoner in his own house, not to be released until the departure of the Baron’s family, which takes place on Tuesday next, the 7th. I understand that the Conde de Cortina was to act as the friend of M. Otero, and M. Bermudes de Castro on behalf of the Baron.

Mexico is perfectly quiet. Much talk of war; but it is all talk.

October 11.

At the close of my letter of the 4th inst., giving an account of the discreditable squabble which had occurred between the Baron de Cyprey, French Minister, and M. Otero, editor of the Siglo; I stated that M. Otero had sent a message to the Baron, and that the Count de Cortina was to act as a second to the former, and M. Bermudez de Castro, Spanish Minister, to M. de Cyprey. It appears that though M. de Castro was applied to, he declined acting, form diplomatic reasons, approved by the Baron, and that > Adrien Lestapis, a French gentleman of fortune, resident here, was appointed to replace him. An interview took place, on the 4th between the Count de Cortina and M. Lestapis, in which the latter stated, that though the time which had elapsed between the insult given and the message sent exonerated the Baron from any responsibility, he was inclined to waive that advantage, as well as the choice of weapons, he having, as the challenged person, a right to name them, and in which the Count de Cortina positively declared that M. Otero would only fight on condition that one pistol should be loaded, the possession of that pistol should be decided by lot. Matters not having been arranged at that interview, a correspondence in Spanish and French, of which the following is a translation, took place:-

“The Count de Cortina to M. Lestapis.”
“Mexico, Oct. 4

“Muy Senor Mio,-As you are the person named by the Senor Baron de Cyprey to treat with me in the affair of Senor Otero, I will thank you to state, if the said Baron accepts the proposition which I made to you yesterday-namely, that the duel offered by M. Otero shall be made with pistols, one charged, the other blank, as such is the firm and unalterable determination of that gentleman.

“I have the honour to offer you my friendship and best service, and to kiss your hand.

“J.G. de Cortina.”

“M. Lestapis to the Count de Cortina.
“Mexico, Oct. 5.

“I have received the letter which you did me the honour to write relative to the meting proposed to take place between the Baron Alley de Cyprey and M. Otero. That letter is of such a nature as compels me to repeat the facts which were stated in the interviews I had the pleasure of holding with you.

The question of the number of friends was then first discussed. You were of opinion that there should be one only at each side I thought it preferable to have two. Still, as you appeared anxious on the subject, I was willing to make a concession, though the reason you assigned—that of secrecy—no longer existed. From the first steps taken in the affair that reason lost its value. The secret was divulged, though on our part we have not to reproach ourselves of any indiscretion.

“With regard to the choice of arms our right was at least debateable, according to the usages of countries where duels are most frequent. You rejected our right—yes refused to submit the choice of arms to chance. We gave way again, agreeing with you that pistols only should be used. Note this well! Strict justice requires in similar cases chances should be equal. I was strong in right, though in my quality as representative of the aggressor, I thought proper to remove all obstacles of to a rencontre.

"Unfortunately the series of your demands was inexhaustible. In proposing that the affair should be settled with two pistols, one charged, you wished to change a duel into a game of hazard. I could not agree with yo so far. The letter to which I now answer is but the renewal of that proposition. I have communicated it to M. Le Baron de Cyprey; his opinion agrees with mine. Though I have conceded to you the number of friends and the choice of arms, the Baron de Cyprey desires me to add, that he yields to you the distance, the manner of firing, whether together, by signal, or in succession, chance deciding which of the two is to fire first; but the barbarous mode which you insist on appears to us to approach too near an assassination not to be repulsed as unworthy a gentleman.

"Such, M. le Comte, is the determination we have to transmit to you. The motive which dictates it is too elevated not to induce us to believe that you will conform to it. You would not, no doubt, accept the responsibility of having such a monstrosity in an affair of honour, in which you are made the sole arbiter.

"With assurances of high consideration,

"I have the honour to be,

"The Count de Cortina to M. Lestapis.

"Mexico, October 5.

"Muy Apreciable Senor Mio,-I have just received the answer you have sent to my letter of yesterday, but as that answer does not completely satisfy me, inasmuch as you do not give a categorical answer, I request you to state specifically if the Baron de Cyprey accepts or not the duel as proposed by Senor Otero through me. I trust you will have no difficulty in giving me, under your signature, the negative answer which you gave me yesterday verbally, as the second of he said Baron.

"When you honour me with an answer to this letter, which ought simply be reduced to a yes or a no, I will try to reply to the charges brought against me in your letter of this morning, which otherwise have no weight, under the circumstances that we are treating of a duel to the death, as has been proposed, and will ever be proposed by > Otero. All that does not refer to the above important point is a loss of time, and has nothing to do with the question.

"I am most happy that fate has placed me in an affair of this gravity in communication with a person like you, gifted with noble qualities, and possessing sentiments so worthy of a gentleman. With confidence I trust you will, without loss of time, give me the categorical answer to this letter, which I demand.

"Repeating with the greatest satisfaction the expression of my regard and esteem, I have the honour to kiss your hand.

"J.G. de le Cortina."

"M. Le Lestapis to the Count de Cortina.
"October 5.

"M. Le Comte,-I have tried everything to keep the affair with which we are charged in the road of honour. I have conceded all that could legally be granted. I repeat that M. Le Baron de Cyprey is at your orders for a regular duel in whatever manner you please; but I reject a proposition of assassination.

"Renewing assurances of my consideration, I am,

"Adrian Lestapis.’

We have received from our correspondent in the city of Mexico letters of the 30 of October.

The Mexican Government had agreed to receive a Minister of the United States, and to negotiate of frontiers and the settlement of claims. The American fleet had left Vera Cruz, that being the first step of the arrangement.

The city of Mexico was tranquil, though reports of Federalist conspiracies were frequent.

The Indians called Camanches had ravaged the departments of Durango and Zacatecas, and one body was within seven days of the city of Mexico.

The financial state of Mexico was deplorable.

The one-third of the new Congress to be renewed on the 1st of January was composed of Radicals and friends to Federation.

The Minister of Justice had resigned; he was succeeded by Senor Montes de Oca.

We learn that the French Minister had left Mexico, in consequence of the disturbances that occurred four or five months ago. He came passenger from Vera Cruz in the Medway, and landed at Havannah to await the instructions of his Government. Santa Anna was still at Havannah.

The Affairs of Mexico

(From our own Correspondent.)

Mexico, Oct. 30.

The Government of the United States has at length succeeded in forcing the Mexican Ministry into the renewal of diplomatic intercourse, the reception of a Minister from Washington, and an agreement to negotiate. I informed you of the fact by the messenger who left this with despatches from the American Consul, as well as from the Mexican Government, on the 18th inst., and I now repeat it in the hope that it will make a due impression on the British public, and convince you and them of the successful perseverance with which the Cabinet of Washington follows up its views on this bewildered country. The policy of the United States has been guided by the most perfect knowledge of the weakness of this Government and the unfortunately apathetic character of the people. It has been most insidiously conducted—by threats one day, offers of friendship the next, and chiefly by insinuations of the bad faith of the only Power whose assistance the Republic could claim in the last emergency. That Power of course is Great Britain, as England and Spain are the sole nations now in diplomatic communication with Mexico; and it appears to be one of the expedients of Brother Jonathan to persuade this Government that our friendship is of a selfish nature, guided merely by the anti-slavery system and our present views on California.

The note delivered by the American Consul to the Mexican Government, either in the text, or in the extract given of the instructions addressed to him by the Minister of foreign Affairs at Washington, speaks of England as the common enemy of the United States and Mexico. I hope before this letter is closed to have a copy of the note in question, but if I should not succeed in obtaining it, you may depend on the accuracy of my statement, and hat in the opening communication from Washington to Mexico England has been mentioned as the common enemy. How far the British Government or the British people may be disposed to bear an uncalled for epithet like this, is not for me to say, but I feel that, important as it may be to our manufacturing interests to maintain a good understanding with the United States, the American President, or the Minister of Foreign Affairs, should not be permitted to apply such language to the British Government. I have no doubt that ere this Mr. Pakenham has demanded an explanation, as the tenour of the note alluded to was known here a few hours after its delivery, and it is probable that competent persons did not allow the opportunity on the 18th of communicating with Mr. Pakenham.
Pacific. I am told that the United States no claim, instead of the 37th, the 36th important bay of San Francisco, the avowed object of American aggression in the Texan side, a territory greater in extent than Texas itself, and it would take in the a line from thence straight to the Atlantic. These frontiers would cut off, on the which, mind you, she must do, to place herself under their protection. For this the Government will not be indifferent to their intrigues, as the United States are Republic, and Commissioners named to adjudicate the claims. I think our and in a few weeks we expect to see an American Minister accredited to the States Minister, and into an agreement for negotiation. All its plans have succeeded, pervasiveness, and not a single energetic step, offensive or defensive, was attempted; and happy would Mexico have been to continue that passive existence;
but such an (illegible) of things did not suit the United States; and a large float was sent to menace Vera Cruz; and the Northern Indians, the Camanches, were sent to ravage the upper departments of the Republic. Moreover, threats, as I explained in a former letter, were made of seizing on a port of the Pacific, to be held until the American claims were settled; and every sort of (illegible) dodge“ if I can use so undignified an expression, resorted to, to force this Cabinet to receive an United States Cabinet will get out of the difficulty by asserting that the offensive expression was used by irresponsible individual, and that the American consul exceeded his authority in applying it; but if my information be correct, the Consul did not originate the phrase, and I am assured it appeared in his original instructions. This reading is strengthened by the great pains taken to secure secrecy by the American agents, and by their anger when the result of their conference and communication became public. The note otherwise was very common-place, dwelling mainly on the reciprocal advantages which a good understanding conference on Mexico and the United States, explaining the friendship which the States must ever entertain towards a neighbor whose form of government was based on the same principles, pointing out that the opposition of Great Britain to the annexation of Texas arose solely from its antislavery policy, and urging the necessity, to prevent future disagreement, of having all pecuniary claims, as well as the frontiers of California and Texas, definitely arranged.

The Cabinet of Washington has displayed its usual tact in all its operations towards this assault. We knew that Mexico could not declare war, and that if it suffered the popular excitement (illegible) from the annexation of Texas subside, the weakness of the central Government, and the apathy of the people would leave it master of he field. This system did, in fact, redeem Mexico to absolute pervasiveness, and not a single energetic step, offensive or defensive, was attempted; and happy would Mexico have been to continue that passive existence;
but such an (illegible) of things did not suit the United States; and a large float was sent to menace Vera Cruz; and the Northern Indians, the Camanches, were sent to
