In this skirmish the enemy succeeded in capturing several horses and a large quantity of baggage, among which, I have to regret the loss of all my clothing and papers. Half an hour afterwards the rear of the train was attacked, and before the rear guard, who were unfortunately too far behind, could come up to its defence, the Mexicans captured a large number of pack mules, and robbed several wagons of a portion of their contents. With their booty they retired.
into the dense chaparral, where it was impossible to pursue them. One of the rascals actually dragged from a wagon the wife of an hospital steward and throwing her across his horse, was making his escape, when he was fortunately shot by one of the infantry, and the terrified lady delivered in safety into the arms of her husband. After the train, which reached several miles, had come into order, the whole body moved forward, the two companies of mounted dragoons forming the rear guard.

At sunset, when passing along a low portion of the road, with an open chaparral, and commanded at the further end by a hill, on the size of which is a small line fort, our whole advanced guard, consisting of 25 mounted dragoons, about 250 infantry, and our company (Duperu's) of dismounted dragoons, was assailed by a heavy discharge of musketry, from the fort, the hill in its rear; and the chaparral beyond, and the cleared field. Our boys received their fire steadily and unflinchingly, and returned it briskly for a few minutes. We then charged on the chaparral at the rear of the open space, silenced the fire of the enemy and drove them entirely off. At the same time the mounted dragoons charged on the hill, routed the Mexicans out of the fort and drove them over the hills. The whole action lasted about half an hour and our troops, who were principally raw recruits behaved in the most gallant manner.

The castle of Perote is a splendid fortification; but this place (Puebla) is certainly the finest city that I have as yet seen in Mexico. The country is beautiful all around, and all kinds of vegetable are abundant, and of the best quality, and fruit in great profusion and very cheap, such as apples, pears, peaches, melons, &c. There are two snow-mountains to the West of us in full view, and a fine fort on a hill about a quarter of a mile North of the city, whence

The Louisiana boys acquitted themselves admirably and were the first to reach the chaparral. The friends of Capt.
Duperu and his company, New Orleans, will be gratified to learn that we have sustained their highest anticipations.
The loss in our company on this occasion was three wounded, viz: Samuel Lankin, in the thigh, severely; Wallace, in the thigh and hand, severely; William Hassel, in the thigh, slightly. They are all doing well. We suffered greatly for want of water, but about nine o'clock, came to a small muddy brook, where we bivousack the night, sleeping in the middle of the road. The next morning early we were put in motion, and about ten o'clock our van guard was again attacked by the enemy, who, upon being charged by the dragoons, were repulsed, and forced to retreat into the chapparal.

An hour afterwards we entered the town of Paso de Obejas, (Passage of the Sheep,) where we were quartered, to await the arrival of reinforcements of artillery from Vera Cruz, with which to pass the National Bridge, six miles from the place, and the heights of Cerro Gordo, where, it is supposed, the enemy will show opposition. About nine o'clock yesterday morning a small train or four or five wagons came to direct from Puebla. They contained the baggage, and were escorted by some two hundred discharged sick soldiers and a few teamsters, whose term of service had expired. They were attacked from the heights, while in the act of crossing the National Bridge. Not being able to return their fire, the Mexicans being concealed, they simultaneously raised a shout and run towards them, whereupon the yellow-skinned cowards vamoosed. One wagon master was killed.

I had forgotten to mention in the proper place, that our whole loss in the two day's fighting was 40 killed, wounded and missing. The news brought from Puebla is somewhat contradictory to the last advices. Santa Anna has not yet resigned the Presidential chair, and is now in the city of Mexico. Vice President Bravo is at the head of the Mexican army, which is said to be on the increase. A force of 10, 00 men are under his command. The Pass, nine miles this die of the city, is being strongly fortified, as is also the city itself. Present appearances indicate a strong resistance, and we will, no doubt, have some hard fighting to do ere we "revel in the Halls of the Montezumas."

The forces at Jalapa have received marching orders, and will join us on our route to "headquarters. " Gen. Scott and his whole army, with the exception of the Jalapa force, are occupying Puebla. He will remain there, until sufficiently reinforced to march on the capital, which will not be, it is anticipated, until fall. Late yesterday afternoon reinforcements arrived here from Vera Cruz, under the command of Brig. Gen. Cadwallader. The number near 500 strong; two twelve pound howitzers; the Kentucky company of mounted dragoons, under Captain Gaithfers, and four or five companies of infantry. We will probably leave here tomorrow; and should the Rancheros give us a fight we will demolish them.

Yours, The Dragoon.

REv44i18p4c6 July 2, 1847 From Gen Scott's Army

We have been favored with perusal of a letter received by a gentleman in this city from his relative attached to Gen.
Scott's army, from which we make the following extracts:

"Puebla, Mexico, May 31, 1847.

"I left Perote with Gen. Twiggs' division on the 26th, and we had as large a train as ever Uncle Sam started. Gen.
Twiggs had between 3 and 4000 troops, and we had between 4 and 500 wagons, forges, battery wagons, &c., loaded with stores for the army. We made quite a respectable show, reaching over 3 miles when closed up; and I can assure you that it made the Mexicans stare to see us make our entrée into the city.

The castle of Perote is a splendid fortification; but this place (Puebla) is certainly the finest city that I have as yet seen in Mexico. The country is beautiful all around, and all kinds of vegetable are abundant, and of the best quality, and fruit in great profusion and very cheap, such as apples, pears, peaches, melons, &c. There are two snow-mountains to the West of us in full view, and a fine fort on a hill about a quarter of a mile North of the city, whence you can have a full view of the whole country around, which is splendid indeed.

"The city of Puebla numbers over 80,000 inhabitants, and is a well-built city in every respect, and handsomely laid off. All the buildings and streets are kept clean and neat, and, as near as I can judge from what I have seen since I have been here, (only two days,) I should think that there are nearly 100 churches, and they certainly surpass anything in splendor that I ever beheld. The Cathedral, I am told, can scarcely be excelled in the world. The churches were all open yesterday, (Sunday,) and I looked into some of them: my eyes were dazzled with so much gilt work, gold images and rich jewels.

"Our whole force at this place is between 7 and 8000. Gen. Scott and staff are here, as well as Gens. Worth, Twiggs and Quitman. We are busily engaged in getting everything ready for a start for the city of Mexico. If we go on to Mexico, we will have about 50 wagons loaded with ammunition, beside our battery, consisting of two 24 pound guns, two 8 inch howitzers, one 10 inch mortar, and one Cocham mortar, also three battery wagons and three forges—constituting altogether quite a respectable train.

"Gen. Worth had a little fight at a small town 9 miles from here, when he was coming up, and killed about 80 of the Mexicans; and before our division arrived, the authorities told Gen. Worth that Santa Anna was coming to retake this city his men wanted money, and he should turn them loose on the city and let them help themselves. The Mexicans in all the towns near the city of Mexico are divided into two parties—the peace and war parties; and they even in this city, are frequently stabbing each other. "All communication between this place and the city of Mexico is cut off, and what will be done is hard to tell; but I hardly think that they will make more than one stand more against us on our march to that city. I expect that we will remain here a month or so yet; but we may leave sooner, as we are now within about 80 miles of the famed city of Mexico.

"June 1st—Since I commenced this letter, I have had an opportunity of going around in the city on business, and I must say that it far surpasses anything I ever say in grandeur. The fountains, public walks, gardens and churches are most magnificent. I wish you could be here to see the fair senoritas swinging on a large wheel with seats fixed in the felves."

Despatches from the Army. Despatches (says the Union) were received on Saturday night by the War Office from General Scott's camp. Several of the soldiers were sick n the hospitals of Vera Cruz, Jalap, Perote, and Puebla; but, with the reinforcements that were en route from Vera Cruz, he would probably have troops sufficient by the 22d to match to the capital, perhaps without any serious opposition. He had ordered all our troops to evacuate Jalap, in order to strengthen his active army.

The last accounts by the steamer James L. Day are from Vera Cruz to the evening of the 16th inst., which state that General Scott had advanced to Rio Frio, and not forthwith march to the capital, but, according to the intimation in his own dispatches, wait till about the 22d, both to give himself the opportunity of receiving reinforcements, and to allow the Mexicans more time to negotiate with the better grace.

Among the papers that were received on Saturday from General Scott is the following interesting letter from Gen. Worth, which we lay before our readers:

Headquarters,
Puebla,
May 15, 1847.

Sir: I have the honor to report, for information of the general-in-chief, that the forces under my command, including the brigade of Major General Quitman, took military possession of this city at 10 o'clock to day. Halting yesterday at Amosoque, to await the junction of General Quitman, (for which purpose I had shortened the marches of the leading brigades the two previous days,) I found my position suddenly menaced, at 8 o'clock, a.m., by a large body of cavalry. This force approached somewhat stealthily by a road on our right unknown to us. A rapid examination, as it unmasked itself, exhibited, as was supposed, some 2,000, but, from accurate information obtained here, 3000 cavalry of the line, unsupported either by infantry or artillery, and moving a mile on our right and toward the rear, let to the conclusion that it was a ruse to attract attention in that quarter, while the real attack was to be looked for on the high road in front, or a movement on Gen. Quitman, who might have been supposed the usual day's march in the rear.

It was presently reported that a heavy column was actually approaching on the main road. Thus it became necessary while directing a portion of the force against the visible enemy; to guard one large train, reserve ammunition, &c., packed in the square, against the invisible. The 2d artillery, with a section of Duncan's battery, under the brigade commander, Col. Garland, the 6th infantry under Major Bonneville with Steptoe's battery, was promptly moved, and so directed as to take the enemy in flank. The head of his column having now reached a point opposite the centre of the town, and distant about half a mile, the batteries soon opened a rapid and effective fire. After some twenty five rounds, the entire column broke, without attempting a charge or firing a shot, and hastily fled up the sides of the convenient hills. Only one company of infantry (of the 6th) was enable, from distance, to deliver its fire. The broken column was seen to reunite and resume its march in the direction of Gen. Quitman's approach.

The 2d artillery and 8th infantry, with two sections of the light batteries, was put in its track, when, the enemy again swerved to the left, and disappeared in the hills. Two mile distant, Gen. Quitman was met by the last named detachment. He had already discovered the enemy of whose proximity the firing had admonished him, and promptly taken his order of battle. The discomfited enemy reached Puebla late at night, and evacuated the place at four in the morning. We took some prisoners, and found a few dead. The enemy acknowledge a loss of eight-nine killed and wounded. General Santa Anna conducted the enterprise.

Enclosed, marked A, a copy of a communication addressed, on the 12th, to the civil authorities of Puebla. Again, marked C, on the 14th, with reply to the latter, marked D; also copy circular, dated 9th, addressed to commanders of corps, to regulate their conduct in certain contingencies on the march. It is understood the force which retired from this city the day before yesterday, and today, is to take post at Puente del Tesmaluca, distant 12 leagues on the road to the capital, where it is proposed to fortify. Our reception was respectfully and coldly courteous, but without the slightest cordiality. Incessant occupation has not allowed me a moment to look into the resources in way of supply; but Mr. --says, breadstuff will be had in abundance, less of beef, and perhaps a liberal quantity of small rations.

Very respectfully, your obd't serv't.
W.J. Worth.

General Scott,
A.A.A.G. Headqueaters of the Army, Jalapa.

The papers referred to by General Worth were not communicated with his dispatch. We have very little doubt that General Scott is by this time in the Capital, unless some definitive propositions for peace have been made by the Mexican Government.

REV44i19p1c3-4 July 5, 1847 The Whig Party Disorganized

Two days ago we published a remarkable letter from Gen. Taylor to the editor of the Cincinnati Signal—a paper which we have never seen, but which we presume to be like the N.Y. Mirror, for Gen. Taylor as a "no party" candidate. We were curious to observe the effect which this letter would produce in the Whig camp here—and our curiosity was yesterday morning gratified. The Whig publishes the letter, but touches it very gingerly. It is evident that that paper would have preferred that the document had not seen the light.

Here is all that the Whig says: "We imagine it was not designed by the writer for the public eye, but the editor of the Signal professes to think that the circumstances under which he received it warrant its publication. He says he left it to be his duty, when the first demonstrations were made in favor of Gen. Taylor for the Presidency, to dwell upon the subject at considerable length.

"We were desirous (he continues) that some of the suggestions contained in our article should meet the eye of Gen. Taylor, and therefore enclosed it to his address, with a few words of reference to our position as a journalist. In rely to that communication we have received the admirable and significant letter, which we take pleasure in laying before our readers."

"We publish this letter, without, for the present, and comment."

The Republican, which was the first paper in the State to fly the name of General Taylor for President, subject not to the decision of the Whig party, or any convention or organization, but "to the decision of the American people," re-publishes the letter under the head of "General Taylor and the Presidency—a letter defining his position," with no other comments but "the explanatory introduction" of the Cincinnati Signal, above quoted by the Whig.

But the Times boldly takes the bull by the horns, and distinctly marks out which itself and the Whig party mean to follow. We give the whole article as it appears to the Times. As coming from so respectable an organ of the Whig party, it has an important bearing, and will be read with interest:

"Gen. Taylor’s Position. —The letter of General Taylor to the editor of the Cincinnati Signal, which we published yesterday, seems to be intended by the writer as a more formal declaration, than any that has yet appeared, of his views in regard to the Presidency. He states, without equivocation, that in no case can he prevent himself to be the candidate of our party. If Gen. Taylor adheres to this resolution, we are constrained to express an opinion, that the Whig party cannot be expected to surrender their organization and their principles for the purpose of elevating him to the Presidency. They have rendered him the homage of enthusiastic admiration, not merely for his distinguished services as a soldier, but for his noble moderation, his conspicuous good sense, and his calm dignity in receiving the slights of an alienated administration. They have rallied, as one man, in Congress and in the country to defend his reputation from ungenerous assaults. Almost unanimously, they have looked forward with pleasing anticipations of the period when they could reward him with the highest station the civil Government. But if Gen. Taylor deliberately chooses to decline that honorable testimonial of their gratitude, because they would offer it as Whigs, we cannot perceive that they have any recourse but to accompany him to the retirement he covets, at the close of the war, with their profoundest regrets and unabated affection. There are others who descry nothing to revolt at in receiving the concerted support of the great Whig party of the Union.

"We regard the late letter of Gen. Taylor with the more regret, because we cannot dismiss the impression that the unfortunate position he has assumed in it is inducted by the inconsiderate haste of some of his admirers, in too early bringing forward his name in connection with the Presidency. We did not join in that movement, because we apprehended that it might impel General Taylor to the very course he has now adopted. In this paper of April 17th, we took occasion to express the belief that the nomination of Gen. Taylor at public meetings and by the press was "premature, " and in support of this opinion, remarked—"We fear the effect of these hasty movements upon the mind of the gallant General himself, now actually in the service of the Government, of which they would make him the most formidable opponent."

We lament that the unhappy influence thus referred to has probably been effectual in steeling the obdurate inclination of General Taylor against all organized approaches from the Whig party, with which his own affinities are well understood to lie. But since his resolution has been take, it only remains to us, as a party, to look with more prudence to a candidate who will not rudely reject our embraces, and who is willing to commit himself to our policy."

We pass over its sly but cutting rebuke of the "inconsiderate haste of some of his (General Taylor's) admirers, "in placing him in the "unfortunate position he has assumed"—and we come to the gist of the article, the positive declaration, that "if General Taylor adhere to this resolution, " in no case to permit himself to be the candidate of any party, (and who ever knew Old "Rough and Ready" to retreat from his position?) the Whigs have no "recourse but to accompany him to the retirement he covets, at the close of the war, with their profoundest regrets and unabated affection."

The concluding passage is so plain and unequivocal, that it cannot be misunderstood. "But, since his resolution has been take, it only remains for us, as a party, to look with more prudence to a candidate who will not rudely reject our embraces, and who is willing to commit himself to our policy. " No comments are necessary to interpret such language. A leading organ of the Whigs of Virginia thus plainly repudiates Gen. Taylor as a candidate for presidency!

Look at the Republican, on the other hand. It has nailed the Taylor flag to the mast and avows its determination to support him "without a shy or wherefore, " regardless of Whig "organization" or Conventions. But, above all, it published to the world in exulting tones, not many days since, that out of some twenty eight Whig papers in Virginia seventeen were in favor of Taylor, unconditionally, The Times in vain screams out, that to support General Taylor under the circumstances would be a "surrender" of Whig "organization and principles. " It is too late—the fatal pledge has been taken by these seventeen Whig papers to "sink or swim" with Gen. Taylor; and if they are at all imbued with the spirit of their great leader, who "never surrenders, " they must continue to fight for him "to the death."

In the mean time, the Richmond Whig looks sullenly on and does not say a word. It cautiously looks ahead to the struggle which it is sagacious enough to see will be sure to come off between the different factions of the Whig party, and takes time to put on its thinking cap. Have we not above furnished elements enough to prove the proposition we set out with, that in Virginia, at least, the Whig party is in an utter state of disorganization-a chaos of conflicting views and "principles?"

How is it in the neighboring State of North Carolina? A meeting "of all parties" is called for today, to assemble in Raleigh; and the Register, the Whig organ, warmly endorses it. But even there, this proposition does not meet with the universal acquiescence of the Whigs, for a communication in the Register holds the following language. Let it be remembered that the writer had not seen the letter of Gen. Taylor: "in conclusion, I must be allowed to say, that as a Whig, I am opposed to this Convention "without distinction of party, " called to meet on the 31 of July next, to nominate Gen. Taylor for the Presidency. If the Democrats as a party, or any portion of them, have seen the error of their way, the folly and imbecility of their leaders in conducting national affairs, and if they have repented of their ingratitude and injustice to Gen. Taylor, we certainly can have no objection to their co-operating with us in elevating him to the Presidential Chair; but let us make no compromises, have no partnerships in the matter—for Taylor is a Whig, must be nominated as a Whig, and will be triumphantly elected as a Whig."

How stand the affairs of the Whig party in Georgia, will be seen from the following brilliant article in the last Athens (Ga. ) Banner, which will speak for itself: "The Georgia This are a stiff-necked race—so thoroughly convinced that the only hope of reaching that political Heaven to which they aspire, is by clinging to the skirts of "Old Zack, " that they are resolved not to trust him to their allies in Convention. We have noted from the beginning of the trance into which they fell upon the subject, that it opened to their vision fields too Elysian—bliss too exquisite—from the fiery gulph in which they lay 'confounded though immortal,' to be hazarded. The uprising of the masses in the last Presidential campaign, with a power that astounded whiggery in her strongest castle, a fancied superiority over, and a complacent scorn for the progressive democracy—the overthrow of their system of monopoly and plunder, by which agriculture, commerce, and navigation were rendered 'hewers of wood and drawers of water' to the pampered and lordly manufacturer—the shrinking of that once gigantic money power, slept a Bank of the United States, into the dreamy and shadowy image of an 'obsolete idea'—the separation of the treasure of the Union from the banks, working like a charm, to check the wild growth of that paper currency, by which Whiggery expected to be clothed in purple and fine linen, at the expense of the plundered ploughmen and beggared yeomanry—the prosperity, which in every department of human industry through the length and breadth of the land, lights upon the brow of labor with a purple and fine linen, at the expense of the plundered ploughmen and beggared yeomanry—the prosperity, which in
That we may not be thought to misrepresent the modern dynasty of Georgia This, which has thus arisen from the lost estate of Whiggery in general, and defied 'law and order,' we copy the following from the Southern Recorder: "Will the Democratic leaders help us to do it? If they will, they will be entitled to the thanks of the country, for their patriotic magnanimity in overlooking mere partisan views, in elevating to the chief magistracy a true patriot, 'who has filled the measure of his country's glory."

But if they consent to do so, let it be no support of the old hero, subject o the Baltimore Convention's adjudication. Such a nomination would be just tantamount to the shuffling off old Rough and Ready, and the re-nomination of another Mr. Polk, or some body as prominent and as suitable. Take it up in good faith as the Whigs take it up, and nominate the old hero for the chief magistracy. Baltimore Convention or no Baltimore Convention—let us all go together fairly and honestly and above board, for the hero of the Rio Grand."

"This is clear, from the declaration of the Recorder, as well as from the fact that the Whig papers in Georgia have raised the Taylor flag without the usual words of submission to party drill, "subject to the decision of a National Convention," that the party in this State intend fighting the Taylor battle on their "own hook," thereby giving a little presumptive evidence, to say the least, that they do not expect Taylor to be nominated or elected by acclamation. Oh, not gentlemen, the forces of acclamation always fight in a body—and never take each man his tree, fight on his own hook, and stalk in the face of authority. In Alabama, we have shown how at least one Whig candidate has avowed himself opposed to a Bank and high Tariff and goes it "blind" for Gen. Taylor—and how another who cast the solitary Whig vote for the Tariff of 1846, has been renominated by his party without opposition. The Whigs of New England have vowed their uncompromising opposition to Gen. Taylor—and many of the Western Whig papers have covered his name with vituperation and insult. From those quarters he cannot, we are sure, receive the smallest support.

In New York, we understand from a gentleman who has just passed through the State, public feeling is beginning to develop itself on the part of the Whigs in favor of the hero of Vera Cruz and Cerro Gordo. The signs in every direction indicate a complete confusion in the Whig ranks; and this last letter of Gen. Taylor, (the spirit of which, in some particulars, meets with our cordial approbation, we are free to admit,) has fallen like a bombshell into the Whig camp, to produce a tremendous explosion. The duty of the Democrats is plain enough. Let them stand by their principles and bide their time. The country is most prosperous under Democratic measures. We cannot believe that, under any circumstances, the people will be willing to give up what they know to be wise and beneficial, merely for the sake of a "change" which may lead, as heretofore, to injustice and oppression to the masses of the nation. We have thus present to our readers a series of facts, but of an interesting character. Few comments were necessary to explain their bearing upon the political fortunes of at least one party. They will, doubtless, give rise to many "rich" developments in the Whig press, of which we promise to keep our readers advised.

We close these remarks, by saying that we heard some the Whigs yesterday coincide entirely with the views of the Times, and declare that they would vote for no man who would not commit himself to Whig principles. Thus we go!

P.S. Since writing the above, we have received the Union, which contains the letter of General Taylor, Esq. Editor of the Cincinnati Signal. We shall on Monday republish it, with the comments of the Union. In the mean time we copy the remarks of the Union, written after its article was penned. It unfolds a new scene in this singular drama:

"(From the Union.) The above is the view which we take of the letter attributed to Gen. Taylor, on the supposition that it be a genuine production; but there is a paper published in this city, under the name "of the National Whig," which flies Gen. Taylor's name at its masthead for the next President of the United States: this paper, in its number of this morning, republishes the letter and article from the "Signal," and pronounces it to be "A forged letter from Gen. Taylor—Locofoco trickery exposed;" and says: 'Some years since, there came a little man by the name of James W. Taylor to Cincinnati from West New York. He opened a law office, but not meeting with any success, took to writing for the press. The Cincinnati Herald and the Cincinnati Enquirer were recipients of his labors in this way for a short time, when he set up, on his own account, the Signal about a year ago. The Signal is a sort of independent democratic paper, not recognized at all by the Democratic party, and not distinguished for any remarkable ability in its editorial conduct."

The "National Whig" then copies the article from the "Signal" and the letter, and makes the following remarks: "By this time, we have no doubt, the reader has come to the conclusion we have arrived at namely, that the above letter, with the printed signature of Gen. Taylor to it, is a forgery.

"For ourselves, we do not hesitate to pronounce it a forgery—a base, contemptible forgery. Not that James W. Taylor is the forger. We do not say that, though he is a vain man. He is the victim of a wicked deception, if he is not the deceiver himself. He is a person of no influence in Cincinnati, and utterly unknown to Gen. Taylor.

"There is nothing like Gen. Taylor in this silly letter. The whole world will pronounce it a counterfeit at once, because the whole world knows the style of the hero of Buena Vista."
"Compare it with the following genuine letter of the old thunderer from the New Orleans Bulletin. That letter was written to Col. William Taylor of Point Coupee, Louisiana. It breathes the genuine sentiments of an out and out Whig writing to a brother Whig. Is there anything in it like the twaddle of the "Signal" forgery? Nothing."

Here follows the letter to Col. W. Taylor, which we have already published; and the "National Whig" concludes as follows: "In the mean time, we demand, as a matter of justice to the old hero, that every paper that shall publish this vile forgery from the Signal to copy this article. Gen. Taylor himself will nail it to the counter so soon as it can reach him. The scoundrels who have been instrumental in this infamous act of forgery will be ferreted out. A gallows as high as Haman's is already prepared for them."

Whether the letter attributed to General Taylor be genuine, or a forgery, will soon be decided by subsequent developments from Cincinnati, or from General Taylor. We learn from two citizens of Cincinnati, now in Washington, that the "National Whig" does injustice to the talents of Mr. Taylor. Postscript. Is it a forgery? Or is it authentic? The mail of tonight, just received, brings us several papers from Cincinnati of Monday last. Not one of them breathes single doubt of the authenticity of the General's letter. Most unfortunately for the "National Whig," and all others who think with it, yesterday's Southern mail brings us decisive proof that this so called "base, contemptible forgery," must be a genuine production.

The New Orleans Delta has the following article, fully confirmatory of the genuineness of the letter addressed to the Editor of the Cincinnati Signal. "A gentleman in this city received, a few days ago a letter from General Taylor, in which, referring to the attempts of certain papers, to make him a party candidate for the Presidency, the General says that he is very reluctant to be a candidate at all, but if he is, it will only be as the candidate of all parties—as the spontaneous choice of the people of parties—that he would not have the office unless it was untrammeled by party politics or obligations. The letter is written to a prominent Democrat of this city. What have our worthy contemporaries of the Bulletin to say to this? What will the "National Whig" now say of the "Locofoco forgery?" Will it now recant its insulting charge of "twaddle" in regard to the letter in the Signal? Truly, the confusion in the Whig ranks rapidly increase, and we do not envy the "political hucksters" who, for the sake of personal advantage and the trappings of power, have dragged into the political area the name of the gallant old hero, whom all must admire for his bravery and skill on the field, and his unflinching support of the just and righteous cause of his country against an "insolent foe."

A gentleman, long a resident of the city of Mexico, in which country his opportunities for observation have been most numerous, assures the Editor of the Pennsylvanian that "the influence most potent in the encouragement of the Mexicans during the present war, was the course of the Federal newspapers and Federal leaders in this country. Their anti-war opinion were repeatedly and exultingly copied into the Mexican papers. This fact did not astonish us, mortifying as it was to hear it in so authentic a shape."

The New Orleans Delta gives an amusing sketch of the examination before the Recorder of a discharge volunteer, upon a complaint of being found of being found drunk in the street. He obtains leave to "talk to this Court Martial," and enters into a long rigmarole of his services as a private in Marshall's cavalry, and of the strange habits of his horse, which would "throw out his hind feet as if he wanted to kick the whole Mexican nation into futurity."

The Recorder had a tedious job to keep the soldier's voluble tongue to the point—but he finally took the right track, and exposed the merits of his case, as follows. It was a running, or rather a fighting, epitome of the great scenes of the campaign: "Why, you see, Colonel, 'bout a week ago, old Col. Larned, the paymaster, give me my dimes, and I asked one of my mess, Bill Jones, if he wouldn't take a drink. We took a couple of horns and got a talking about politics. Bill said the Whigs was goin to run Gen. Taylor for President, and I said the old man wouldn' run no how. He then said that Gen. Scott was the man who had planned out all our battles, and I told him if old Zach had been let alone he'd had his old crooked nose smellin the perfumes of the halls of the Montezumers months ago. Bill got mad at this, for he's an all-fired strong Scott man, and we took another horn. Comin out of the doggery, Bill told me I was a fool, and I told him he was a liar. He gave me a Palo Alto lick in the head, and I returned the compliment by a regular Monterey sockdoleger in his bread-basket. He then come the Cerro Gordo tetch on my nose, which I repaid with a Buena Vista ping in his mouth. This last lick settled him, after which I went to take a horn, and I guess I fiddled 'em up until I was wuss than the beast with seven horns spoken of in the Revelations."

The Recorder read Will a lecture, and told him that it would be well for him to draw out by means of an emetic the horns that he had taken, and never again meddle with military politicians.

[MSM]
In spite of the heavy Paixhan gun from the Times, the Republican stands firmly by the standard of Gen. Taylor. Its article is as follows, and though no names are called, it attempts to specially parry the blows of the Times, and intimates that that and other Whig papers have recognized and encouraged the popular preferences for Gen. Taylor.

"The National Whig stoutly denies that Gen. Taylor ever wrote the letter recently published by the Cincinnati Signal. It boldly pronounces that letter as forgery. It places it side by side with the letter of Gen. Taylor to Col. Taylor of Louisiana and calls upon the reader to observe the difference.

"Whether this letter be genuine or not, the desire of Gen. Taylor not to seek the Government as the head of a party, nor receive it’s honors and administer its trusts as a partisan politician, were as well understood before the appearance of this document as since it’s publication. Supposing him to be the writer, he does not appear, as some think, to renounce Whig principles. Its is only "party schemes" with which he refuses to defile his hands, and we honor him the more for his manly independence. The letter does not express or imply any renunciation of the political preferences which we suppose him to entertain. It merely defers, till the close of war, a declaration of his views, when his usefulness as a military chief shall no longer be compromised by their discussion. What the principles of Gen. Taylor are, we have no more doubt than we have of his existence. Long before our own humble sheet, in response to the universal popular sentiment, nailed his flag to the mast, we were satisfied he was a Whig, on evidence which we regard as good as that he fought the battle of Buena Vista. When he disclaims those principles, we shall lower his standard; though never, were he baptized in the deepest waves of Democracy, never would we cease to honor and reverence his glorious name, nor admire a character who more nearly resembles the Father of his Country, than any patriot-hero who has ever graced the annals of the age.

"But we can multiply proofs, we can pile mountain of testimony on mountain, to demonstrate that Taylor is a Whig. And thus believing, we shall not forsake him, because, like Washington again, he prefers private life to the Executive station, and does not wish to leave his loved retirement, except at the call of his country. We know that his nomination has been repeatedly stigmatized as premature. If it be premature, the fault must be laid to the people, who have dared to indicate that their preference for Taylor, without the intervention of any political clique. If it be premature, it is because the people have acted before a Convention. What effect these premature movements have had upon his mind, we do not know, except that they have sometime since drawn from him a declaration that he will not refuse to accept the proffered honor, thus deciding a question which was at one period supposed to admit of great doubt. We have hoisted his flag, subject to the decree of the American public; and, in so doing, have appealed to the same tribunal which this letter acknowledges as supreme and final. It cannot be denied that even those who have not formally proclaimed his name, have recognized and encouraged the popular preferences for Gen. Taylor. It cannot be doubted that he is the favorite, for the highest station in the Government, of a vast majority of the American people; and thus believing, we see nothing premature in a "visible sign" of the "inward feeling" nothing premature in declining to wait till a Convention has given permission to the country to elect the Presidency the man of its choice.

"The nation waits with anxiety for the advent of a President, whose patriotism soars above party schemes, and who with moral courage only equaled by that physical valor which has covered with resplendent glory the American name, boldly resolves that he must be taken as a President of the people, or permitted to retire to his farm, and preserve there the independence which he deems to valuable, to barter for the highest office on earth."

The Republican is satisfied beyond doubt that Gen. Taylor is a Whig, and does not in this letter, "renOUNCE Whig principles." We shall let the following items in yesterday’s Times speak for themselves on this point:

"Important—the ‘Whig Central Committee of the State of Ohio’, in a late address to the Whigs of that State, use the following language:

“A word on the subject of the Presidential candidates: Far be it from us to debar any man, even if we had the power, from aspiring to the highest office within the gift of the people. Neither would we make military successes, however brilliant, a test a qualification. And while we condemn and reject no man, so neither do we propose any man in connexion with the Presidency. We are pledged to no one—we are committed to no one. We do not think the present a proper time to select a candidate. Let us re-assert our principles, and declare the policy on which we intend to act."

"The Knoxville Standard, (Democratic,) states that at the recent Taylor meeting in that place, Whigs and Democrats participated, and that one on the speakers—Gen. Anderson—a leading Democrat, ‘knows enough of Gen. Taylor to satisfy him that he is not of the protective tariff Whigs.”

The Times also clinches its article of Friday. Referring to the letter of Gen. T. to a Democrat quoted by the N. O. Delta, which says that he "can only be a candidate as the candidate of all parties—as the spontaneous choice of the people of all parties—and that he would not have the office unless it was untrammelled by party politics or obligations"—the Times remark: "This is very decided. But in a free country, where the people are understood to be the source of authority, where parties do exist, and where political principles are discussed and entertained by the people, we, hardly suppose it possible that they will be satisfied to go to the polls and vote for a man whose political principles have not been openly declared, and who, in his administration of affairs, is pledges to no particular policy—however great may be the national regard for him personally."

The Whig N.O.Bulletin, quoting the same letter, goes it blind, and says: "We are perfectly willing to support him on these terms—willing that he should be voted for by both Whigs and Democrats—willing to take him just as he is,
'and no questions asked. " Who can compare the conflicting positions and make even a fair guess of what will be the ultimate course of the Whig party?

To show how the letter is regarded in the West we quote the following from the Columbus (Ohio) Statesman: "Sore rebuke to the Whig party. —The true state of the case at last. —General Taylor has at last been drawn out fairly on the subject of the Presidency, in a letter to our friend Taylor, of the Cincinnati Signal, and which we copy below.

It is a most terrible damper to that portion of the Whig party who have been holding him up as a leader of their party schemes. 'In no case, ' says General Taylor to the Whigs, who have been bellowing for him with so much ardor—'In no case can I permit myself to be the candidate of any party or yield myself to party schemes. ' Our Whig State Central Committee were wise in repudiating him—in effect, if nut in words—as he declares he will have none of their party drill, and obey none of their party schemes! After this, we presume, we shall hear no more of Zachary's being 'a good Whig' 'a Whig sound in all the principles of the party, ' a 'Clay Whig' a 'Whig of the right stamp, ' &c, &c.

We shall now look with anxiety for the next move on the political chess-board of federalism and anti-warism, since he who fought so well his country's battles refuses to be a candidate of the party that leagued with our enemies while he was fighting them. This singular anomaly, conceived by the Whigs, is thus repudiated by the only man that could have consummated so great an absurdity. But to General Taylor's letter which will speak for itself. Here it is, read it, every Whig in the land. " [MSM]

A public dinner was tendered at New Orleans to Col. Doniphan, who was compelled to decline it. The Western and South-western papers are filled with the proceedings of the people, to give a warm and cordial reception to the brave volunteers just "returned from the wars. " [MSM]

A few days ago the Whig referred to the Taylor "current in which public sentiment in the South is running, " and gives as evidence that apprehension was felt by "some of the leaders lest the Democratic State Convention of Georgia might nominate General Taylor for President—but that Convention has met and adjourned, having resolved to support the nominee of a National Convention.

The course of the Richmond Times, a leading organ of the Virginia Whigs, and the action of the Whigs of Columbia county, Georgia, who we learn from the Whig, "in public meeting assembled, have expressed a decided preference for Mr. Clay as the Whig candidate for the next Presidency, " show that the "current" is not now quite so strong. The Government steamers, Secretary Mason and Secretary Buchanan, with the schooner Col. Yell, went to sea on Saturday from Philadelphia. The destination of these vessels is for Vera Cruz direct, via Key West. They are laden with stores for the army. [MSM]

The general impression seems to be that Gen. Scott is now in the Mexican capitol. What curious thoughts are suggested by the following brief words of the N. O. Courier!

"We trust Scott and his gallant troops will spend the Fourth of July in the enemy's capitol and that some eloquent and able man among his chaplains may be called upon to deliver a real, true-blue American discourse respecting that glorious and ever to-be-celebrated anniversary, and on the brilliant prospects which recent events have opened to the view of the Mexican people. "

The New Orleans National says:

"We presume that Gen. Scott is now in Mexico; he was to leave Puebla on the 16th June. Giving him four days for delay, he still has time, up to his date, to have reached the city. The distance from Puebla to Mexico is less than ninety miles—the road is through a plain except at Rio Frio, but this pass, of which much has been said, is not as..."
formidable as has been represented. There is no chapparal to conceal the enemy, the forest assuming a character suited to a temperate climate, and we are assured by a gentleman familiar with the pass, that it presents very little obstacle to our advance. Once on the top of the mountain, twenty miles distant, the city extends out as it were on a map. Lake and village, house and castle, are all distinctly marked, while the gorgeous mountains that surround it, give it the air of an enchanted city; it is so beautiful in its repose. It was from this mountain pass that Cortez and his followers surveyed the ancient Mexico—and, in their wonder and delight at the prospect, fell on their faces with joy. We can readily imagine that our brave troops, like those of Cortez, a mere handful, when they behold the Halls of the Montezumas for the first time, will at least raise a shout, the echoes of which will linger as a funeral knell on the departed sovereignty of the present degenerate inhabitants. REv44i19p2c5 July 5, 1847 General Taylor’s Letter (From the Washington Union)

The following article, to which reference is made by the letter of General Taylor, was published in the Cincinnati Signal of April 13th, and is as follows:

"General Taylor and the Presidency.

We perceive in various quarters, the nomination of General Zachary Taylor for the Presidency. So far as such a demonstration is the mere transport of military enthusiasm, or the trick of political faction, it would be unworthy of notice; but we think it evident that his movement of the public mind has a much higher character, and grows out of a conviction, that General Taylor has displayed an energy and wisdom of conduct, and a modesty of demeanor, which are as requisite to the deliberations of cabinet as the plan of a campaign. It is a great mistake to suppose that the people are blinded in their political preferences by the bare fact of military achievement. It was the popular impulses and the stern honesty of Andrew Jackson, which aroused the sympathy and trust of the nation; and we predict that, whatever skill or success may attend the march of General Scott to Mexico, he will never excite the attachment or confidence which follows the hero of Buena Vista. We are not surprised, therefore, that ardent spirits are calling for the sword of General Taylor to cut the Gordian knot of political intrigues. But it is a far different question whether his name and fame shall be made an instrument of mere partisan warfare. In this respect, there is a distinction, which we are confident General Taylor will be among the first to perceive and act upon, which we hope to illustrate in the few remarks that we feel constrained to make in reference to existing and future agitation of this subject.

"What an enviable rank in the eyes of the world, and the harts of his countrymen, General Taylor now holds. Should he return form the fields of the Rio Grande and the heights of the Sierra Madre, with what affection and respect would he be greeted by men of all parties. Himself never a politician—content in the quiet discharge of duty and the enjoyments of domestic life—and while prompt to meet the Indian for, in the prairies or everglade, and to stand by the flag of the country, when advance to a foreign frontier, yet devoted, as all accounts represent him, to that home and family, in the bosom of which the intervals of his life, thus far, have passed peacefully and happily—" we confess that our impressions of General Taylor are such that we should not be surprised if he firmly disregarded every acclamation which connected his name with the Presidency. Should he do so, he jeopards nothing of the present spring tide of popular favor—" no, more, he takes instant rank with Washington, as an unconscious but eloquent preacher of the highest political morale. How much more enviable such a destiny for the evening of his days, then to cast the mantle of his military fame and private virtues over the excesses and corruptions which disfigure the party politics of the day. He is no friend to the reputation of General Taylor who would thus seek to restrict the applause of the whole country to the interested clamor of a party.

"Still, as a citizen of a free republic, General Taylor is to the hands of the American people; and we can readily imagine a contingency in which it would become his duty to assent to demand of the country, and assume the responsibilities of political life. But it must be the regulation of the country, not of this or that set of office-seekers, which will call him either front his rank or his fireside. It must be such a call as compelled Washington to forego the retirement of Mount Vernon—"unanimous, disinterest, the voice of the people, not the flatteries of politicians. We believe that it is in General Taylor's power, at this juncture of the national politics, to take independent ground, and become the President of the People. Our support of him, or of any other man, shall never be pledged in advance of a full knowledge of the principles and views with which he would assume that responsible station; but we may be allowed as an independent journal to indicate some of the signs of the times which point to the result just mentioned.

"1. The presidential canvass of 1848 is in utter confusion. Among the Whigs, a Pittsburg meeting nominates Judge McLean, who is also understood to be a general favorite of his party in the North western States; the anti-war spirit of New England and the Western Reserve indicates its preference for Senator Corwin; the Southern and Middle States cherish a fancy for Scott, which only requires a victory at Perote to manifest itself; while, as an undercurrent, deeper and perhaps stronger than all, is the chivalric feeling in behalf of Henry Clay, now intensified by the death of his gallant son, which may yet determine the shape of the conflicting elements. The Democrats are in a condition equally chaotic. In the West, Gen. Cass has many and warm friends; Mr. Calhoun, with his compact and disciplined body guard, stand ready to make his presidential fortune, or mar that of other aspirants in the Democratic ranks; Silas Wright, if the New York reverse had not occurred, would have been prominent in the field, and is still the favorite of many; while quietly in Lindenwald sits the statesman of the party, who will probably never again join the political melee, but might prove more available in a strict party trial than many men whose names are frequently heard in the present connexion. In the general confusion, an apprehension prevails that the election will revert to the House of Representatives—a result greatly to be deplored; and hence the popular impulse, which chooses to adjourn the strifes of parties and the struggles of their leaders, while the country takes breath under the administration of an
"2. A circumstance that may lead to the election of Gen. Taylor, by a sort of acclamation, is the fact that the pride of the respective parties would thus be saved—never authorized to claim a triumph, and neither suffering the ignomy of defeat. A long intimacy between Mr. Clay and Gen. Taylor reconciles the Whigs to the political orthodoxy of the latter, although Gen. Taylor is said not to have voted for many years; while Mr. Polk, who is, and has bee, as we are authoritatively informed, entirely free from any intention or wish for a second term of service, may still be gratified to yield his seat to the successful General of the Mexican war—closely identified as that war is with the success of his administration.

"3. The above considerations are subordinate, however, to the principles which are involved in ever presidential canvass. The country has been divided for fifteen years upon most exciting topics; and if General Taylor, immediately upon his inauguration as President, was constrained to adopt either extreme, the consequences might be fatal to the success of his administration. It so happens, however, that the results of Mexican hostilities will remove many of those points of collision—at least for a few years. A debt of one hundred millions induces the necessity of a tariff, sufficiently advanced in its rates to satisfy New England and Pennsylvania, and at the same time will prevent any distribution of proceeds of the public lands. We cannot suppose that the Whigs will again urge a Bank of the United States, and Congress will insist upon a fair trial of the Independent treasury, removing some of these impractical restrictions which have embarrassed the fiscal action of the government, and are an annoyance to individuals. So far, therefore, as the past contests of the respective parties are concerned, and administration composed of the leading minds of all parties, and supported by the whole people, is not only practicable, but may redound to the highest interest of the whole country.

"Only on one condition, however. The Executive must no longer insist upon legislative influence. There are questions approaching, which the people must be allowed to settle in their own way, without the interference of Executive patronage or prerogative. The old political issues may be postponed under the pressure of circumstances, and as for the new—those coming events which cast their shadows before—let it be understood; that the only path of safety for those who may hereafter till the Presidential office, is to rest in discharge of Executive, functions, and let the legislative will of the people find utterance and enactment. The American people are about to assume the responsibility of framing the institutions of the Pacific States. We have no fears for the issue, if the arena of the high debate is the assemblies of the people and their representative halls. The extension over the continent beyond the Rio Grande of the ordinance of 1787, is an object too high and permanent to be baged by Presidential vetoes. All that we ask of the incumbent of the highest under the Constitution, it us hold his hand, to bow to the will of the people, as promulgated in legislative forms, and restrain the Executive action in its appropriate channels. Give us an honest administration of the Government, and an end to all cabals of a cabinet—all interference from the White House—designed to sway or thwart the action of the American people. If such simplicity and integrity should guide the administration of General Taylor, the North and West would yield to it a warm support and hearty approval.

"We have said all on this subject which the present developments of public opinion require. As other scenes unfold, we shall seek to chronicle them with fair and independent comment. Meanwhile we hide the movement of the waters, holding our columns and our ballot to be disposed of, according to our sense of duty, as emergencies of this day. The reasons which he assigns for this delay on his part, are both palpable and cogent; and his conclusion on the subject cannot but be regarded as a pointed rebuke of those Federal office seekers who have sought to thrust him, prematurely and in the midst of his important military duties, before the people as a party candidate—and that, too, not only without any avowal of his political opinion, but, in fact, in deprecation of any such avowal. Under such circumstances, it is, moreover, quite manifest that any commitment, at this time, on the part of an section of the Democratic party in favor of the election of Gen. Taylor, is not only unsafe and ill judged in itself, but is, at the same time, as we may premise from his language, at variance with the wishes of Gen'l Taylor himself. We are glad to perceive, also, from General Taylor’s expressions upon this subject, that he fully recognizes the necessity of an avowal of his "personal views" in reference to the great questions of the day, before becoming a candidate for the suffrages of the people, though he considers that the time for such an avowal has not yet arrived. In this conclusion every man—and especially every Democrat, who acts upon principle, in his political course and preferences—must concur. Of course, therefore, such men will wait until such an avowal of his opinions has been made by Gen. Taylor, and has received their approval, before making up their minds to give him their support as a candidate for the President. Especially is such delay proper, in view of the strong party demonstrations in favor of Gen. Taylor, which have been made by some of the hangers on of the federal party, evidently from the most selfish and sordid motives. In addition to this, it must be remembered that Gen. Taylor is still a military chieftain at the head of his army on the battle field. The country will feel deeply the hazard involved in the precedent of selecting a man so circumstanced to fill the highest civil office in our republic; and this objection can be removed, if at all, certainly only be the most full and frank disclosure of his political opinions, and by the most ample popular approval of them. We have no hesitation in believing that this distinguished general will, with all the frankness of a soldier, express his opinions freely before the election. Certain it is that a free and enlightened people owe it to themselves to form no definite opinion about supporting him, until they have ascertained his own opinions in relation to the great fundamental principles of the government. Gen. Taylor’s explicit declaration, that he can "in no case permit himself to be the candidate of any party, or yield himself to party schemes," will attract the attention of the country. Doubtless it will cool the ardor of those office seeking politicians who have heretofore put themselves forward to support him, in furtherance of their own selfish purposes. Nor will the people, we think, hear from a man who may be a candidate for the Presidency so strong a disclaimer of all party connection, without serious consideration. The country is divided into two great parties, whose origin is coeval with the constitution itself, and whose differences of opinion are based upon opposite constructions of that instrument, and opposite views of the proper functions and rightful sphere of our federal government. The party plants itself upon a strict construction of the Constitution, and seeks to restrict the action of the government to the exercise of its specified power and of such other incidental power only as may be necessary to carry those specified powers into effect. The other party adopts a latitudinarian construction of the Constitution, and, under the pretence of implied powers, would plunge the general government into vast schemes of internal improvement, conflicting with State jurisdiction—would give us a high tariff for protection, a bank to concentrate the money power of the country, and a scheme for the distribution among the States of the proceeds of the public lands. Between two such parties and their principles, can there be entire harmony and cooperation in the administration of the government? Is the fusion of two such parties, under any administration, practical? On the contrary, must not any man who presents himself before the people as a candidate for the highest office in their girt, make his election between these two opposing political platforms?

We will not analyze all the positions taken by the editor of the "Morning Signal" of Cincinnati, in April last. All of them are strongly and powerfully stated. Some of them may be correctly assumed, though we must express our fears that, in the Federal school, none of the great parts of their system can be considered as "obsolete. " Give them the power again, and we may look out for the resurrection of a National Bank and a high Protective Tariff. We pass over these matters, however, for the present. But there is one position of the "Signal" against which we must protest. The article to which Gen. Taylor has replied, alludes to the exercise of the veto power by the Executive, and protests against such "legislative influence" in the Chief Magistrate. We cannot take it positively for granted that Gen. Taylor adopts this bold declaration of the "Signal, " tho' he would appear to approve, in a high degree, "the sentiments and views embraced" in this editorial of the "Signal. "

Let it not be forgotten that this veto power—this same "legislative influence" in the Executive—is a part, and an important part of our Constitution—necessary, indeed, to the symmetry and perfection of that instrument as an organization of the public authority of the public authority in to different departments of government. It is the constitutional duty of the President to veto a law which he deems a violation of the Constitution, or is in itself a flagrant act of inequality and injustice. The people are not yet prepared to surrender this feature which they have incorporated into their government. Certainly it preservation is not less important now than in time past. We do not believe that the people can with safety, or that they will, elevate to the presidency any man who is pledged or committed in any way, directly or indirectly, against the exercise, on a fitting occasion, of this branch of their delegated authority. We certainly will not believe that General Taylor is prepared to strike out this important part of the Executive power—thus, in fact, changing the Constitution of his country—until we have an explicitly avowal of the sentiment from his own pen.

REv44i19p3c3 July 5, 1847 Defence of the City of Mexico

On the 1st of June, all the natives of the U.States were ordered to leave the City of Mexico, for the States of Jalisco or Morelia, or they would be dealt with according to the law of nations. Troops are concentrating from the adjoining States for the protection of the city. A defence, or at least a show of defence, is certainly to be made. We are still without advices of Gen. Scott's march upon the city of Mexico.

REv44i19p4c1 July 5, 1847 Treasures of Mexico

W.J. Day, an American prisoner in Mexico, describes, in a letter in the Louisville Democrat, some of the curiosities in the Mexican metropolis. Among them he refers to the bronze statue of Charles the Fifth; it is solid brass and weighs 30 tons. The horse is ten feet high and made in perfect proportion and symmetry. Chasis about eleven feet in altitude and represents well the character of the original. It is the work of an Indian artist, and is valued at $1, 500, 000 which was offered for it by a Museum in London and declined by the Mexican authorities. The Cathedral is more magnificent than description can represent it. The architecture and the paintings are all the artist could make them.
The Palace and Grand Square, or Plaza, are great works. The Indian Calendar is a huge old rock, bearing on its face rude symbols or inscriptions of events, before and after the conquest by Cortez. On this rock the poor superstitious Indians sacrificed their victims to appease their gods; when dangers impended, and periodically, according to the rites of their church. The old church built by Cortez, the first church of the Catholics in Mexico, still stands, venerable and time worn, and looks like a relic of olden times.

REv44i19p4c2 July 5, 1847 Important from Mexico

(From the Picayune); Gen. Scott's Departure from Puebla- No Negotiations for peace—Withdrawal of Troops from Jalapa—Gen Pillow's Departure from Vera Cruz—Santa Ann still President—Almonds in Prison—Confusion of Parties in Mexico—Cabinet Changes—Intercepted dispatches, &c.
The steamship Palmetto, Capt. Smith, arrived last evening from Vera Cruz, having sailed thence on the 18th inst. She touched at Tampico on the 20th and Brazos Santiago on the 21st inst. Although we are not in possession of letters from Mr. Kendall, we shall advise upon which we place every relative to the movements of Gen. Scott.

An express from Puebla, by the route of Cordova, had arrived at Vera Cruz, announcing that Gen. Scott commenced his march upon the city of Mexico on the 16th inst. We hear not a word more in regard to the overtures for peace said to have been made to Gen. Scott. Then he marched on the 16th we have no doubt. Another express had arrived at Vera Cruz from Jalapa, which announces that all the sick had left there on the 15th inst. for Perote under a small escort. Col. Childs was to leave the following day with all the garrison. Gen. Shields would accompany him. The road between Jalap and Puebla is represented as free from guerrilla parties of any kind. About one thousand troops left Vera Cruz on the 17th inst., under the command of Maj. Gen. Pillow, to join the army of Gen. Scott. The Spanish renegade named La Vega, who lately repaired to Vera Cruz in company with the veracious Col. Mata from this city, is represented to us as yet being in command of a strong guerrilla party. By the express from Jalapa we have no intelligence from Gen. Cadwalader, as the rider came by a circuitous route to avoid the predatory parties on the road.

By this arrival we have received papers from the city of Mexico on the 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th of June. Our previous files came down to the 29 of May. The intermediate dates we have not yet received, and presume they have been forwarded by same sailing vessel. We have only had time to glance hastily at the papers before us, from which we glean the following: Santa Anna still remains in power. His resignation we presume was withdrawn; for it is intimated that a majority of Congress was anxious to accept it. His administration, in consequence of this feeling Congress, has entirely changed its policy and thrown itself into the arms of the puros. One great section of the puros, however, is not conciliated by this movement, the adherents of Gomez Farias and Gen. Aimonie still continue their opposition to the Administration. Senor Rejon, the former friend of Farias, is said to be the main support of Santa Anna’s Administration, although he holds no public office. He is denounced as a man without principle, a trucaller, &c.

It is represented that opinions were more divided in the capital than at present. No party seems to have decided upon what course to take. At one time the puros and the moderados appear inclined to unite upon a dissolution of Congress, and leave everything in the hands of Santa Anna, and then again the puros talk of recalling eh absent members of their party, and of having a working majority to carry their measures. In working majority to carry their measures. In the mean time, a quorum of Congress cannot often be collected. If we can give no intelligible account of the designs of parties and the Government, it is because such confusion and anarchy never before existed in the city of Mexico, by the admission of all. A important financial measure of Anaya’s administration has been summarily abrogated by Santa Anna, in deference, as he says to public opinion. This has led to the resignation of Senor Barand, who was not consulted as to the repeal of the measure. Senor Lafragua was then nominated in his place as head of the State Department, but this appointment gave dissatisfaction to the puros, who renominated against it. The result in not known. General Almonte was still in prison, nor are we able to learn anything more definite as to the nature of his offence, his trial not having yet come on. The state of Chihuahua voted unanimously for General Santa Anna for President. This is the only addition State, the vote of which is given in the papers before us. The votes were to be opened on the 15th of the present month. Our impression is, that Congress will have to make choice between the two highest candidates, as no one will probably receive a majority of all the votes. On various occasions Congress has displayed great respect for General Herrera, which leads to the opinion that he will be chosen. We find no mention made of the measures taken for the defence of the capital.

The papers say, that General Scott pretended to his troops that they would march into Mexico on the 15th July but that this was a mere boast, in order to keep up the spirits of his men—that he was in no condition to move, lacking reinforcements. Letters from Puebla to the capital, represent Generals Scott and Worth as saying, that if Santa Ann has charge of the decision of the matters of Mexico, they will be able to take it with the loss of two or three hundred men only; but that if Bravo or Valencia command, it will cost them more dear. The Republicano derides this gossip, though it sounds very natural to us. The Government is urged by letters from Puebla and its vicinity to fall upon Scott, now he is weak, and crush him. They say he has really but a little over 5000 men, thought he pretends to have 7000. They seem to dread lest Gen. Taylor should proceed to join Gen. Scott.

The propositions which Mr. Trist is authorized to make are said by the Mexicans to be that each Republic shall name three commissioners to discuss the claims of the United States, and that if Mexico will not consent to this, then the war is to be prosecuted.

We find in the Republicano of the 7th instant, along dispatch from the Secretary of War to Gen. Scott, dated the 30th of April. It informs him that by the end of June the President supposes Gen. Scott will have twenty, and Gen. Taylor ten thousand men under their respective command. It asks for the views of Gen. Scott on various questions suggested, and gives him directions how to operate with disaffected Mexican States. The Republicano regards this latter portion as very important, but pronounces the Secretary’s representation as to the number of troops to be in the field utterly false. How his letter was intercepted we are not informed.

The Mexicans appear to have intercept a good number of private letters. Several to Col. Childs are particularly referred to. One is from Mrs. Childs and contains much pleasant gossip as to the state of parties in the United States. Other letters of an entirely private nature are commented upon.

The successes of some of the guerrilla parties near Vera Cruz are duly chronicled and commended in the paper. The afternoon of the 6th inst., Santa Anna reviewed at Tealpam the troops from the South of Mexico under Alvarez. This general’s command had not all arrived, but it was expected to reach 8000 men in a few days. Senor Pedro del Castillo has been removed from the command of the regiment of Hidalgo in the National Guard. The act is strongly Censured. Gen. J. Gomez de la Cortina has resigned the command of the battalion of Victoria, of which he was colonel. Three hundred troops from Morelia arrived in the capital on the 7th inst. Diligences have been established between these two cities. One of them has already been robbed. The Vice Governor of Oajaca has resigned his office and his resignation has bee accepted.

Gen. Scott appears to preserve perfect discipline among his troops at Puebla. The Mexicans admit this indirectly, though letters are published complaining of our excesses in general terms. The case of a New York volunteer is mentioned, who was tried by a court martial for assaulting a woman with a view of robbing her of a silver crucifix.

The casting of a piece of cannon at Toluca on the 2d inst. is formally mentioned. We have thus glanced at the papers before us, but will recur to them again, and should they contain anything of importance, lay it before our readers.

From Tampico, we learn litter news by this arrival. The only thing which give animation to the town appears to be the false alarms which frequently occur. We are informed by an office of dragoons that he went out with a party on a scout on the 18th inst., and proceeded some forty miles from the city in the direction of Altamira, but saw no armed Mexicans. The country people appeared friendly, and like the rest of the inhabitants of Tamaelipas did not seem ill affected towards our Government.

The Louisiana regiment stationed at Tampico has suffered severely from sickness. Many have died and there are yet men sick—not less than 150, accounts say. Not more than 180 men are reported fit for service, and yet this is the only regiment doing duty. Reinforcements have been expected, but in vain.

(From the New Orleans Delta.) Lieut. De Groote, of the Dragoons, who arrived on the Palmetto, has been ordered hither to recruit men to fill up his complement. It consist now of only fifty-four men. This is the company with which it is intended to open the road from Tampic to San Luis Potosi.

Notwithstanding the privations to which the troops of Col. Doniphan were subjected in their prolonged march and perilous campaign, they enjoyed excellent health during the whole time. One instance as an illustration:—in Capt. Weightman's company of light artillery, numbering 120 men, not a man was lost by sickness, nor indeed otherwise, during the twelve months they have been out.

From the Brazos. —The steamer Jas. L. Day, Capt. Wood, started last evening for Brazo St. Jazo. She took down 66 horses and two companies of the 13th infantry, under the command of Lt. Col. Withers. Col. J. M. Withers is from Alabama, our sister State, and he will, we venture to say, do honor to his appointment. He is a gallant gentleman, and thoroughly understand the profession in which he has embarked.

From Vera Cruz. —The steamer Galveston, Captain Haviland, started last evening for Vera Cruz with 110 horses, a number of teamsters and some passengers.

Troops. —The barque Convoy, arrived yesterday from Key West on the 15th inst., off Doble Headed Shot Keys, spoke the barque H. Harbuck, twenty days out from New York, with U.S. troops, bound for Vera Cruz.

The following letter from our attentive Monterey correspondent, received yesterday, give the latest intelligence from that section: Five companies of the Virginia Regiment have been ordered to join General Wool—the balance of the regiment will go up as soon as the Massachusetts Regiment reaches here. One company of the North Carolina Regiment has moved forward to Saltillo. The 1st and 2d Regiments of Illinois Volunteers, and the Arkansas Cavalry, will leave here to day for Camargo, where they will be discharged from the service and paid. Paymasters Dix and Partridge will go down with them to make the payment. The advance on San Luis will be deferred for some time, probably until September, in consequence of the inadequacy of the force at present in this section. I was in Camp this morning, but could learn no news. All is quiet. The rainy season, I think, has fairly set in. Yours, T.

REv44i19p4c3 July 5, 1847 Capt. Lincoln

The fine milk white charger rode by this gallant office of Buena Vista, (says the N. Orleans Delta) is now here in charge of the 2d Kentucky Volunteers, who, with a delicacy and sensibility worthy of the bright fame of this distinguished regiment, have made arrangements to send this favorite horse of the lamented deceased to his distinguished and patriotic father in Boston. We are told that when Capt. Lincoln fell he was in the rear of the Kentucky Volunteers, of whose gallantry he had just expressed his desire to be a witness. After delivering an order to the Illinois regiment, he wheeled his charger, and halting for a moment, cried out to the 2d Kentuckians, "I must see how these Kentuckys boys fight." The words had scarcely escaped his lips, when he fell from his horse pierced by a half-dozen balls. His horse was uninjured, and is a noble charger as ever "snuffed the battle." He was purchased at the sale of Capt. Lincoln's effects by that heroic woman, whose sobriquet, "Great Western," is so familiar to our readers, and who, with characteristic liberality and magnanimity readily yielded him to the solicitation of the Kentuckians, who desired to have him sent to Gov. Lincoln.

The night of the 23d of February last was one of most intense anxiety to the participator in the bloody fight of Buena Vista. After twelve hours of obstinate fighting, with the final result yet unknown, nothing but water having passed the lips of those gallant men, for the last twelve hours, the flower of their respective corps dead or wounded, and the certainty of a renewal of the onslaught the next day, it is hard to imagine a period more calculated to "try men's souls" that night. After the cessation of the fight, came the lassitude super induced by the extraordinary excitement of the day; men fell exhausted, and bivouacked in the line—"the weary to rest and the wounded to die."

—The depression of physical energy was so great, that neither hunger nor danger could incite them: that bloody field was at 8 o'clock as silent as the grave. It can only be surmised what were he feeling of that "great old man" upon contemplating the results of that day's work. No officer sought repose, and the camp fires, which on other occasions had been the scene of just and merriment, were now still, and deep anxiety depicted on the faces of the various officers, impressed you with a solemnity, a foreboding of ill, that was truly painful. All eyes were turned ever and anon to the tent of one upon whom all their hopes were placed, but not a light, not a movement could be discerned. The occasion made that single tent an object of intense solicitude. Some wondered if he was alone, others would have given their earthly wealth to have known the thoughts, the hopes, the wishes, the intentions of the old hero; but all was dark and silent as the tomb. Capt. L., of the Topographical Engineers, had visited the battle ground at night. He had made some discoveries he thought important to be communicated immediately to the commander-in-chief. On approaching the general's quarters, he overtook his servant, who had been attending to his master's cavalry, and inquired if the "old man" was alone and awake. "I spec he fast asleep, Captin, for he eat a monstrous hearty supper, and when he a big supper he sleep berry hard and sound, and I reckon you won't see de 'hold hos' for 4' o clock in the mornin'. Listen, you hear him snore clean out here. " When the captain made a report of this last reconnaissance, joy and satisfaction were diffused through the camp. They knew that all was safe. R.P.W[MSM]

The following graphic account of the Texas "Flying Artillery" used at the battle of San Jacinto, we find in an exchange paper. It beats Ringgold's all hollow:

"Sam Houston's Flying Artillery used at the battle of San Jacinto, was one four pounder, lashed with a piece of raw hide to the back of a Jackass. When the piece was discharged, it would throw him forward on his face with such force as to detain him in that position until the piece was re-loaded, and as he rose and brought it within range of the Mexicans, the match was applied, away went the animal on his face knees, and away went thunder and flame and death staling balls, and away went the Mexicans, helter skelter. " [MSM]

The Norfolk Beacon of Tuesday says: We understand that the barque Margaret Hugg will sail from Hampton Roads, today, for the Gulf of Mexico, with Capt. Caldwell's company of Voltigeurs, and 103 Voltigeur recruits, under command of Lt. Marriot, on board. The following is a list of officers of Captain Calwell's company: Jas. H. Calwell, captain, John W. Leigh, 1st Lieutenant; G.W. Carr, 2d tlo; Isaac Smith, 3d do. Officers of the recruits from Baltimore —J.C. Marriot, 1st Lieutenant, J.C. Wynder. 2d do. [MSM]

—The New York Post compares Colonel Doniphan's expedition from Missouri, through New Mexico to the mouth of the Rio Grande, with the famous expedition of the five hundred Greeks under the renowned leader of nearly similar name, Colonel Xenophon. The last has become classic, because it was told in so charming a manner by Xenophon, and all Doniphan has to do is to write as perfect a history his expedition to make it be read with admiration two thousand years hence. The Greeks were led from near Babylon through Armenia to the Black Sea, and thence to Chrysopolis, three thousand four hundred and sixty five English miles. It was accomplished in fifteen months, and a large part o it through an unknown, mountainous and hostile country, and in an inclement season, the Greeks losing every thing except their lives and arms. Doniphan and the Missourians traveled over six thousand miles in twelve months, neither receiving supplies nor money, but living exclusively on the country through which they passed, and supplying themselves with powder and balls by capturing them from the enemy. They fought three battles, in each of which they were victorious, over greatly superior numbers. These are the two most remarkable expeditions that have ever occurred. [MSM]
We are glad to perceive that the Baltimore _American_, Baltimore _Patriot_, Philadelphia _Inquirer_, New York _Courier_, and other leading Whig papers, advocate General Taylor even more earnestly since the appearance of the letter to the Editor of the _Signal._

(Richmond _Republican_) What says that "leading Whig paper, " the National Whig, established at Washington, expressly to sustain the election of General Taylor? It denounces the letter as a "base Locofoco forgery," "silly twaddle," &c.

And what says that "leading Whig paper," the Richmond _Times_ of yesterday? In re-publishing yesterday the celebrated editorial of the _Signal_, (which the _Republican_ and the _Whig_ have not yet quoted,) the _Times_ conveys the severest rebuke that we yet seen of the "premature" "no party men." It says: "we are not surprised that Mr. J.W. Taylor (the Editor of the _Signal_) should have written to General T., on the contrary, we conjecture, that he is only one of many of those who instead of hoisting General Taylor's flag at their mast head, have made themselves fat to General Taylor, hoping to be drawn up thus into the grateful confines of papdom.

We are only surprised that he did not answer in the language of the following, which the New York _Commercial_ has well suggested as a more appropriate response from that great commander whom the Taylor 'Flag-bearers' are so prone to style 'Old Rough and Ready.'

Sir:—I have had the honor to receive your letter and the paper sent with it; and will read both, some time or other, when the war is over, and I am quite at leisure. I have the honor, &c., &c. "it is to the indiscretion of the "premature" portion of the press, which have by embarrassing General Taylor brought him apparently to repel the Whig party, that we desired to direct attention. The tack which they now pursue, is to repudiate party—as if parties were not necessary in a free government, and inseparable from the exercise of a freedom of opinion among a free people. Some of these very anti-party men, too, are those who in times past, have been intolerant partisans. But break up parties separated by difference as to principles, and what must succeed? Parties fighting for place and patronage."

We ask the _Republican's_ attention to the following graphic sketch by the Washington correspondent of the _Pennsylvaniaian_: "If a bomb shell had been thrown amongst our Federal neighbors, more consternation, could not have been manifested, than was seen after the publication of Gen. Taylor's last letter. No. 6., of the Thompsonian system of medicine, celebrated for its teaming and sweating process, would be but child's play compared with the effect this letter has upon our Federal opponents. They wriggle like an eel upon a sharp hook while undergoing the hiding process. Man of them begin to think "old Tough and Ready" is not the kind of a man they took him for. The ghost of Tylerism stares them in the face, and no wonder they exhibit so much perturbation. The last paragraph has created a nausea which renders even a hasty plat of soup unpalatable. Poor, deluded victims of Federal folly and madness! The cup of their sorrows, vexations, and disappointments, is almost full. The future, to them, is as dark and hopeless, as the past and the present. A momentary transport is quickly followed by a depression, as mournful to witness, as it is agonizing to endure. Whither to flee they know not—where to find succor from their perils is an interrogation often put but never answered. They dig a pit and fall therein: set a snare and are first caught therein. In attempting to hood-wink others, they have been awfully bamboozled themselves. "The biter's bit," and their fate is in the fire. Poor fellows! Misfortunes and disasters are their inheritance."

When our eyes met this startling announcement in Saturday's Petersburg Intelligencer, we could not imagine what new "gorgon and chimaera dire" the Whigs had been able to evoke. For a moment we supposed that it was to record the fact of Gen. T. being "superceded" as the Whig Presidential candidate by the article in the Times. On looking into the body of the piece, however, we found that it was his military and not his civil command which was referred to.

We shall let the N.O. _National_ which first started this ridiculous story, tell it in its own language: "We have what we conceive to be undoubted authority for stating that Gen. Taylor has been superseded in his command. An express passed through Matamoras some few weeks since, with the credit of bearing such news to Gen. Taylor; in due course of time, the rumor comes from Monterey that such is the fact, and that Gen. Taylor is hereafter, as a subordinate, to report to Gen. Scott, and through him to the War Department at Washington. This last account of an unhappy administration will seal its fate with the American people. Its conduct towards Gen. Taylor from the commencement of actual hostilities, has been characterized by neglect, and not an opportunity has been permitted to pass, that could be taken advantage of, to annoy and harass him. The intention has been to force Gen. Taylor into some act of indiscretion that would render him unpopular before the people, and compel him to resign.

"So far, the enemies of the old hero have been disappointed in their expectations, as they will ever be, but Mr. Polk has lost his judgment, and pursued precisely the course of conduct he should to elevate the man he wished to destroy. We cannot imagine a more total ignorance of the feelings that govern the people of this country, than has been shown in the treatment Gen. Taylor has received from the administration."

This silly humbug is generally copied into the Whig papers, with a swelling torrent of affected indignation. To "This being the case, the making Gen. Taylor subordinate to Gen. Scott is surely more proper than would be the opposite arrangement—Gen. Scott being the senior officer of the grade would not make him the subordinate of his junior would be an insult and a wrong, but there is neither wrong nor insult in requesting Gen. Taylor to receive orders from his senior, Gen. Scott. "But as we have said, these are only our ideas and may be all wrong. We have no military knowledge or experience. " [MSM]

REv44i20p1c2 July 9, 1847 Affairs in Mexico

The Mexican nation is made up of such strange elements, moved by such contradictory influences, that we have long since ceased to speculate upon the probable issue of events at an early date. Certain it is, that the aspect of affairs is much less pacific than we had recently been led to expect. All accounts now seem to agree that General Scott will have one more grand battle at least, before he enters the Mexican Capital. How it will eventuate, we have no fears.

REv44i20p2c2 July 9, 1847 Gen. Taylor's Rebuke of the Anti-War Whigs Text. "We are opposed to the War, as unconstitutional—(N.Y.Express. )

Comment. —"No one can support me who opposes the war—he's worse than a Mexican. "—(Gen. Taylor. )

Thus it is, (says the N.Y.Globe, ) that "these Whig demagogues get snubbed on all sides, for their impertinent assurance in claiming to be in favor of Gen. Taylor, the hero of the war, while they are denouncing the war itself as wicked and unconstitutional. But there are no tricks that the Whigs will not resort to—no principles that they will not sacrifice—no inconsistency too glaring for them to adopt—if they fancy that thereby they can succeed in getting into power and place. "

In connexion with the above we quote a significant remark made to the editor of the Cincinnati Enquirer by a "brave and discriminating officer, " who is direct from the seat of war: "Sir, ' said he, 'tell the presses and politicians who are denouncing the war and the cause of the country, that if they are so fixed in their opinions that they cannot abandon them, they had better at once take up arms and go into the ranks of the enemy. They will do the country less injury by that course, than by continuing in their present position. "

This observation, enforced by the facts within the knowledge of the speaker, is another proof that the factious, mischievous course of the Whig press and politicians in assailing the justice of the war and the conduct of their own Government, and thereby virtually encouraging the public enemy to persevere in their mad resistance to negotiation. The great body of the people of both nations, says the Cincinnati Enquirer, "desire peace, and it would long since have been accomplished, had not the military leaders in Mexico based their hopes upon our discussions, and actually found, not only sympathy, but encouragement, from the leaders of a great political party among us. The men, who control the affairs of Mexico have long since found that they could not successfully contend with our troops in the field;--but they have seen that army, whilst covering itself with honors abroad, most bitterly denounced at home;--and at the same time the leaders of a great political party pledging themselves, upon their accession to power, to recall that army, or to cut off its supplies, and thereby compel an abandonment of the war. Not only have our troops been compelled to submit to this denunciation from home politicians, but, as our friend says, to be taunted with it in Mexico; to hear this state of things openly assigned as a reason why offers for negotiation have been, and will continue to be reject, --why the war has been changed from the open field to the guerrilla system, --that being the only means left by which the struggle can be procrastinated, --our troops harassed, and cut to pieces, --and hostilities kept alive, until a political revolution in this country shall enable Mexico to 'Dictate a Peace. ' The remark of our friend conveys the sentiments of the great mass of our troops who are returning from the field, where they have felt and experienced these things. With the, we say to the Federal leaders, go over at once to the enemy, --shoulder your muskets, and step into their ranks, '—and our army will not be long in conquering a peace with Mexico and her allies combined. " [MSM]
When several of our papers, last winter, were filled with the most gloomy forebodings, and the most utter despair, on account of Santa Anna's advance, with a large army, against Gen. Taylor's little Spartan band, and our conquests on the Rio Grande were given up as lost, we held firmly and confidently to the hope and belief that American courage would prove superior to the crisis. And are we now to be frightened at such old women's stories as those detailed, respecting the ardor and enthusiasm of a people who, with a population of 200,000, are compelled to send do off hundreds of miles for naked Indians, to fight their battles? And, forsooth, they are casting cannon and making balls—they are throwing up entrenchments and digging ditches—but what of all that? These preparations will give spice and incentive to the valor of our men.

Mexican prowess is no more to be dreaded in the defense of the Capital, than it was on the field of Buena Vista, and on the heights of Cerro Gordo. Indeed, the men who fought those battles, were far better material than those which can be rallied in their effeminate Capital. They fought, too, under the most favorable circumstances—in the one case with greatly superior numbers, and in the other with great advantages of position. But now they have to defend a city which lies on a level and exposed plateau—a city embracing a large area—and which could not be successfully defended with less than two hundred cannon. Where are the cannon? We hear of the melting of church bells into cannon, but we believe this is all Mexican gasconade. If the Church has made this sacrifice—in Mexico a very serious one—it is certainly the first they have made for this war. But if the cannon are there, where are the soldiers to man them? Where are their artillerists—their experienced officers? They are nearly all exiled from the Capital, or under arrest. The patriotic and honest Bravo has been sent northward; the chivalrous and able Almonte is in prison; the cunning and capable Ampudia has been sent, under guard, to Cuernavaca; Pinzon is on parole. Lembarin is nursing his wounds and his ire against Santa Anna, at San Luis Potosi; Minon moves within prison bounds; Valencia lives in quiet at his hacienda, cultivating the arts of peace; Canalizo satisfies his valor by writing magnanimous and high-swelling letters and orders. Nearly all the prominent military men of Mexico. They have lost all confidence in the generalship of Santa Anna. He was never considered by the professional soldiers of the county, as a very capable officer in the field. His late operations have given such strong confirmation to these opinions, that they openly and publicly declare their contempt for his military qualifications. Reduced to a few inexperienced officers, and a rabble army of militia and wild Indians, he expects to prevent the entrance of Gen. Scott into the Capital; and some of our own people think that there is ground for apprehension and fear on account of our army, in marching against a city thus defended. Never were fears more baseless. Scott will leave Puebla with 12,000 of the best troops that ever went forth to battle; he will have veteran, experienced officers, complete and effective artillery, abundant supplies, and, what is more than all, he will have men "in whose vocabulary there is no such word as fail."

The Mexicans will, no doubt, make a stand before they yield up their Capital, but it will be a weak one. Their dreaded Pintos, with their wild looks, long knives and bows and arrows, will carry no terror to the souls of our men. Their barbarous arms and warfare will prove of little avail against the big guns of our artillery, the long bayonets of our Pintos, with their wild looks, long knives and bows and arrows, will carry no terror to the souls of our men. Their barbarous arms and warfare will prove of little avail against the big guns of our artillery, the long bayonets of our soldiers; they are throwing up entrenchments and digging ditches—but what of all that? These preparations will give spice and incentive to the valor of our men.

The schooner Iona, Capt. Stevens, arrived yesterday morning from Vera Cruz, and in a few hours afterwards the steamship New Orleans, Capt. Auld, came in. The latter left Vera Cruz on the 25th inst., and brings us letters of the 25th and papers of the 24th. One hundred and fifty six discharged soldiers and teamsters came over on the New Orleans. Our dates from the army of Gen. Scott, at Puebla, are to the 14th inst. The immediate advance of our army upon the city of Mexico had been postponed until the arrival of reinforcements. The rumor which has been so generally circulated through the city that he had arrived within twenty-five miles of the city of Mexico, is without foundation. A rumor reached Vera Cruz on the night of the 24th inst. that Gen. Cadwallader's command had fallen in with a guerrilla party a few miles beyond Jalapa, and by a movement unperceived by the guerilleros, succeeded in surprising them and killing about thirty of them, without losing a man.

Other letters have been received in town as to this affair of Gen. Cadwallader, which represents it to have occurred near La Hoya, about eleven miles beyond Jalapa. The surprise of the Mexicans was complete, and one letter says that fifty of them were killed. Gen. C. suffered no loss, all agree.

By another letter, dated the 24th inst., from our Vera Cruz correspondent, we learn that the train which went up under command of General Pillow was attacked at Calera, said to be nine miles beyond the Puente Nacional. The guerilleros were dispersed with the loss of thirty men. Verbal accounts say we had some eight or ten wounded, but none killed.

The force under the command of Gen. Pillow left Vera Cruz on the 18th, escorting a train of about 125 wagons. The force amounted to nearly 1,800 men, and consisted of the 14th infantry, and a portion of the 15th, three companies of the 3d and 6th Infantry, six companies of the Voltigeurs, a detachment of the 3d dragoons and six howitzers. That such a train would meet with serious resistance from guerilla parties was not to be expected; but we regret that our accounts induce the belief that it suffered excessively in the first and second day's march from the heat of the weather. The march on the second day is represented as having been particularly severe, the time chosen for it being during the heat of the day, through heavy sand and when eleven miles were to be made without water. There are a great many guerrilla parties upon the road, a small body of our troops left San Juan on the 21st hoping the overtake Gen. Pillow, but after proceeding two or three miles they encountered some guerilleros. These they charge upon and dispersed, but they saw so many others on the road in small parties that it was thought prudent to relinquish the design of coming up with Gen. Pillow.

We regret to learn by this arrival of the death of Mr. Thos. G. Banks. He died at Vera Cruz of the vomito. Mr. Banks was connected, we believe, with the Quartermaster’s department.

The course pursued by Capt. Walker towards those desperadoes who fell into his hands is said to have been highly approved by Gen. Scott. We have been asked if Gen. Cadwalader adopted Walker’s plan and shot those who fell into his hands. The Eagle says that an enterprise is on foot for running an express between Vera Cruz and the towns of Alavarado and Tiacataipan. The execution of such a plan would greatly facilitate the commerce of Vera Cruz. Capt. Duperu’s company of dragoons have at last received horses and they paraded though the streets of Vera Cruz on the 23d inst.

The news by this arrival from the city of Mexico is important. We have received our accounts of it though an express dispatched by Mr. Kendall from Puebla expressly for this office. His letters come down to the 14th June, being the latest from the interior of Mexico.

In the House of Commons on the 11th of June, in reply to a question from Dr. Bowring, Lord Palmerston said that an offer of mediation on the part of Great Britain between Mexico and the United States had been made by the former as well as the present Government, but that as yet it had not been accepted by either of the belligerents.

Rev44i20p3c1 July 9, 1847 Later from the Army of Gen. Taylor

The steamship James L. Day, Captain Wood, arrived last evening (says the N.O. Picayune, ) from Brazos Santiago, whence she sailed on the 8th ult.

By this arrival we have our correspondence to the 16th June from Monterey, but the news is of so great importance. Nothing has occurred to change the disposition of Gen. Taylor’s forces in any material point, and there is no hope of an advance upon San Luis. Capt. Bankhead, commanding a company in the Virginia Regiment, arrived at Monterey on the 14th ult. from China. He reported that after the departure of the main body of the battalion for Monterey, he dispatched a Mexican for Camargo with a communication for Col. Relknap. A few days after he learned that the messenger had been captured by a body of armed Mexicans near Pazo Zacata and sentenced to be shot. News had reached Monterey from China, of the death of Lieut. Mahan, who was hot in the recent duel with Lieut. Munford—both of the Virginia regiment. Three companies of Texas Rangers had recently come in to Monterey after having been out scouring the roads in the direction of Camargo. They failed to fall in with Urrea or any of his men, although rumor frequently had him in thinks he is still the other side of the mountains. The rangers captured one or two "robbers," and it is said, shot one of them. Upon their return they were at once ordered up to Saltillo.

The Mexicans are said to be organizing small guerrilla parties, and the roads are somewhat beset with robbers, but we do not learn of any harm done by them. A train from below arrived at Monterey on the 15th, escorted by several companies of the North Carolina regiment. The health of the troops at Monterey was improving, and only one man had recently died. He was attached to the Virginia Regiment.

The Mexicans are beginning to return to their residences in Monterey in considerable numbers. A man named James Mays, a Virginian by birth, but a long resident of Texas, was shot recently at Monterey by the guard, while attempting to escape from the guard house. A Texan Ranger had also been shot on the plaza by a fellow soldier and died. Not withstanding these untoward events, Monterey is now much more quiet than it had been. The troops are under severe discipline and reserve admirable order. The Massachusetts regiment had not reached Monterey at last accounts, but a rumor had been received that it was ordered to Vera Cruz. The rumor was probably unfounded, but it would excite no surprise were it true.

(From the N.O. Commercial Times)

The steamer New Orleans has just arrived from Vera Cruz. We hasten to transmit a portion of our correspondence from Mexico, by this morning’s mail.

Vera Cruz, June 24, 1847.

Gentlemen—you will gather a fair notion of the dating and audacity of the guerrillas, from their repeated atrocities under the walls of this city. Within the past thirty-six hours, another man has been hanged by them almost within gun shot of our batteries. The victim was one of the most active police officers, a Dane, named Miller—lie and a Frenchman were out riding, when they were "lassoed" and carried into the woods. The Frenchman was released, but Miller is said to have been put to death as stated. Parties were out most of the day and night of yesterday, in search of the perpetrators of the outrage, and seven Mexicans were seized on the roads and bought in. Five of these proved to be gentlemen bound to Medelin, but the others are suspicious characters, and the Governor has imprisoned them to await further examination. —One of them was taken on the horse which Miller was riding when attacked. We are yet without authentic intelligence from Mexico of a later date than the 12th inst., and nothing of especial interest up to that time.

There seems to be no doubt of Santa Anna’s intention to make a stand against Gen. Scott at some point between Puebla and the Capitol; and our next arrival from our little army may tell us another Cerro Gordo affair. Of the result, of course, I can entertain no apprehension even in the event of Alvarez’ arrival and participation. —I believe the suspicions long entertained of British vessels supplying arms and ammunition to the Pacific ports, are not entirely unfounded. I am assured that considerable quantities of both have come in from Acapulco, and I have to ask why that port is not now occupied by our forces, naval or military? Or, if it be so occupied, how these things have been permitted to enter.

I suppose the cause lies in the meager force of men-of-war in that sea, a matter which requires remedy. The movement of sending the marines out here is a good one, unless as some think, their destination has connection with that Quixotic expedition to the interior, of which I spoke some time since. The Marine Corps is one of the finest bodies of troops in the world, or, it was so, some eight or ten years ago, and I suppose it has not fallen off since that time, badly as it has always been treated by Congress. Give it a chance in Mexico, and I will warrant a good
The murderers of Miller are now supposed not to belong to the regular guerrillas but to be private enemies, which he has made in this city by his harsh treatment of the people, who occasionally came under his charge. He hated a Mexican from his soul, and sometimes treated the poor wretches, who committed trivial offences, shamefully. Some of the worst of these have taken the occasion of a professional visit to Madelin to waylay him on his return, and revenge themselves in this manner. One larger negro, well known in the city, is supposed to be the chief of the party. I presume most of those concerned are by this time regular members of the guerrilla band. It is yet, however, not absolutely certain that the man has been murdered.

The vomito is yet picking out poor fellows off, one or two at a time, in the city. Colonel Banks, well known in New Orleans and here as one of the finest fellows and enterprising men in the country, is one of the last victims of which I am informed. He died yesterday morning after 48 hours' illness. The disease cannot be said to be raging, nor do I think it is nearly so fatal in its operation as it has been in other years; but it is really a serious matter, and it is impossible to feel any degree of comfort in its neighborhood.

Business is still, of course, at a stand. Another vessel, the Spanish brig Amistad Campeacheana, has arrived with a cargo of the goods stored in Havana, nearly the last, I think, of that stock. A vessel was expected soon from Campeachy, where one cargo was stored during the blockade, and that I fancy will pretty much close the foreign trade with Vera Cruz, from some months at least. I am informed that the head of one firm, and one of the very first in the city, has replied to a demand for duties, from the Collector, that he has no money and cannot pay. His thirty days are out, and it remains to be seen what will be the result. His goods will not be sold, as nobody can buy them, for the same reason that prevents the payment of his duties. The brig Petersburg, from New York, is now here discharging a small, but rather valuable cargo—chiefly silks and drugs to owners, Hargrows & Co.

June 25.—We received letters from Mexico last night, as late as the 15th, but they do not satisfy me on the subject, of the greatest interest—the election. One of them declares that Santa Anna has been chosen, with extraordinary powers, to use in the prosecution of the war, but is expressly forbidden to enter into negotiations for peace. It is also said that there are twenty thousand troops in the city of Mexico, and reinforcements are constantly arriving. Alvarez' force is now augmented (by report) to eight thousand, well armed and equipped. Taking everything into consideration, I have no doubt that a bloody battle will precede Gen. Scott's entry into the capitol.

Gen. Scott had not left Puebla of the 16th instant, that is certain. He is waiting for reinforcements from the eastward. Gen. Cadwalader left Jalapa on the 19th to join him, with some two thousand troops under his command. I think the army will move forward as soon as it receives this reinforcement, and the money and supplies which accompany it—the same which found so difficult a road to Jalapa. Alvarez is said to have taken his station with six thousand of his Sonora troops, between Puebla and Jalapa, for the purpose of cutting off Cadwalader's train, and would probably be reinforced.

The editor of El Arco Iris says he has information that the election did not come off at the time appointed, but is postponed until the 21st of September. He says the general impression is, that Herrera will be elected, and that negotiations for peace will immediately follow his installation. If his paper comes out before the New Orleans starts, I will send it to you.

Our dragoons have had quite a brush with the guerrillas near Perote. Three hundred of them encountered four hundred guerrillas in a ravine, and routed them, the Mexicans losing some thirty killed. Our fellows were guided by the Alcalde of Perote. Senor Atocha is here cruising about the streets with no apparent mission, or business of any kind. He is most cordially hated by the Mexicans, and, I believe, disliked by everyone in Vera Cruz, who knows anything of him. The New Orleans will soon be off, and I must close.

Yours, very respectfully, Indicator.

REv44i20p4c1 July 9, 1847 Later from Mexico

(From the N.O.Delta)

The Mexican Generals—the defense of the capitol—guerrillas—the American Army—Santa Anna—withdrawal of his resignation—the Clergy.

We have received our Mexican papers from the 30th of May to the 5th of June, inclusive. They contain little of moment, but as almost everything from that country is at present read with interest, we shall give a brief synopsis of their contents.
The Mexican Generals. —General Arista was apprehended on the evening of the 29th of May, and was immediately sent, under escort, towards Acapulco. The reason for this arrest is unknown. General Almonte was still in prison, and had been removed from St. Jago Tiateloco to the city of Guadalupe. He was at first accused of conspiring against the person of Santa Anna, and afterwards accused, in some of the public journals of treason—but a correspondent of the Republicano suggests that the sole motive for his imprisonment is, that he is too great a friend in his country to suit the purposes of those in power. General Ampudia having refused to proceed to Cuernavaca, as ordered, was sent thither under escort.

The defense of the capital. —On the 1st of June, all the natives of the United States were ordered to leave the capital city of Mexico, for the States of Jalisco or Morelia, or they would be dealt with according to the law of nations. Generals Gutierrez, Goana, Martinez, and Palamino are entrusted with the command of the lines of defense of the city. Bodies of the National Guard are said to be on their way, and constantly arriving for the adjoining States, and it is believed that from seventeen to twenty thousand troops will be concentrated for the protection of the city.

Guerrillas. —Accounts are published, from all quarters of the formation of guerrilla bands; but little is said of their performances, and we are lead to suspect that the records of the newspapers are rather an evidence of what the editors hope than of what their countrymen do. In San Luis Potosi they have published a sort of guerrilla code, providing for the raising of the forces and their operations—all deserters from the army, fugitives from justice, convicts or offenders not capital, and vagabonds, and criminals un-apprehended, of all kinds, are invited to join and make war, as to them may seem good, against the invaders, capturing property, taking prisoners, or killing, as "circumstances may require," all who come in their way. The only well authenticated feat of guerrilla prowess, published in the papers before us, is the attack on Col. Sour, which is thus described in a letter from Orizava: "They write me from Hustusco that a guerrilla assaulted the diligence from Vera Cruz, coming to Jalapa, with nine Americans, whom, having put to the knife, they relieved of some interesting communications, which were sent to the government. " There it is, it is true, another story of the guerrillas under Jarauta having, on the 30th of May, captured 80 wagons, 80 horses, and killed 200 hundred Yankees, between Vera Cruz and Antigua, but this we suppose to be the Mexican history of the attack on Col. McIntosh.

The American Army. —The Mexicans have "certain information" that Gen. Scott cannot expect reinforcements to a greater extent than 2000 men, and money to the amount of $200,000, and "nothing more;" they therefore think it doubtful whether he will march to the Capital, and talk loudly in that city of marching out to meet him. "There are but 6, 000 men," say they, "from Vera Cruz to Puebla, who lord it over a population of a million of inhabitants which the two States contain. It can be believed only because it is seen. " Among the intercepted dispatches was a letter from Col. Hunt to Capt. Hetzold, from which the enemy draws great consolation. The Colonel gives the Capt. Some information relative to the moneys in his hands, from which it appears that our worthy Quartermaster was under a temporary embarrassment; this is construed by the enlightened editors of Mexico, into an evidence of the want of means, on our part, any longer to carry on the war, and they, therefore, exhort their fellow-citizens to renewed exertions and continued constancy, assured that in the end they must triumph.

Santa Anna. —We have noticed, heretofore, the resignation of Gen. Santa Anna, and the fact that he was still at the head of the Government; the matter is cleared up by the following withdrawal of this resignation:

Mexico, June 2, 1847.

To their Excellencies, the Secretaries of the Sovereign Congress:

Excellent Sirs:

When I resolved to offer my formal resignation of the supreme command of the Republic, my mind was strongly actuated by the reasons which I laid before the august Congress, and by others not less powerful, which it appeared to me prudent to conceal. Every moment confirms me in the solidity and propriety of all of them, and I have waited several days the decision of the legislative authority, sustaining not only the evils consequent upon a position immeasurable complicated, but those which flow from the state of expectation and anxiety into which the public is thrown, and which produces at each moment, new changes in the political scene. I asked that my resignation might be taken into immediate consideration, and that even in permanent session, the person might be designated who should succeed me, and this request was not suggested by the desire to leave speedily the difficult situation in which I found myself, but because it could not be concealed that any delay whatever would maintain the public agitation, and draw after it occurrences which would alter the condition of things. I anxiously wished, that whoever might succeed me, might soon take my place, because I knew that the invading army could not immediately move upon the Capital, and that the new head of the State would have the time and opportunity to devise his measures, and prepare himself in the manner which should seem to him most suitable.

Now, it is known that the forces of the enemy are about to move, and that they may do so at any moment, and we may suffer at the same time an invasion of the Capital and a change of government—as state of affairs certainly dangerous, and which may, perhaps, decide the fate of war. The news of my separation from the supreme command has been, as I know, the cause which induced this resolution. This is an important occurrence, and one which requires from me a resolution prompt and efficient, to contribute to the salvation to the Capitol.

During the time since I gave in my resignation, I have received singular tokens of the confidence of all classes, and of persons the most influential in society—all have besought me not to persist in my intention. I see in them a determined purpose to force me to remain, founded on the necessity of preserving the present state of things without innovation, in order not to endanger the fate of this populous city and of the nation.
The excitement has been very general, and even the troops of the garrison, and the most numerous portion of the people, have been constant in their insinuations and their prayers. I know certainly, that the occasion of my resignation has caused great excitement in all minds; enemies who cease not to spy out the moments for producing discord and making revolutionary movements, avail themselves of everything, and endeavor, by their machinations, to force an outbreak; men of good faith, who have seen the disbanded partisans of peace spreading their seductions to propagate the persuasion that I ought not to continue in power, are excited and active; and I behold on all sides, the terrible symptoms of a revolutionary movement.

All this is the necessary effect of the delay which this matter has met with, and which has involved me in grave and complicated responsibilities. I see, then, the enemy profiting by these circumstances, ready to fall upon us. I see, in addition, the agitation increasing on all sides, and I do not desire that any one should inculcate me in case of an unfortunate event, attributing the persistence in my determination to a criminal egotism.

Never shall it be said, that for a point of honor, or of pride, ill understood, I preferred my personal welfare to my country. I am about then, to make a new sacrifice, exceedingly costly, that of my pride, and I have resolved to withdraw, and do effectively withdraw, my resignation of the 28th of last month, and I desire that from this moment it shall be held as having never been presented.

The hour of difficulty will pass, and I, firm, in my determination to abandon power, will do it without hesitation or change, in conformity to the constitutional law. And perhaps I may be able, in withdrawing from this post, to offer a new service to my country, or my design may be useless, as by that time I may have given my life as a last holocaust to my fellow citizens.

Will your Excellencies have the goodness to present this note to the Sovereign Congress, receiving the protestation of my high consideration.

God and Liberty!

REv44i21p1c2 July 13, 1847 Another Letter

The Troy (N.Y.) July 13, 1847 Post, publishes the following letter from Gen. Taylor, eleven days later than the one to the editor of the Cincinnati Signal.

—Those Whig papers which have denounce the Signal letter as a "forgery," will soon be convinced by unmistakeable evidence, that it is a genuine production. We envy not the feelings of the National Whig and those Whigs here and elsewhere, who fiercely denounced the Signal letter as "silly twaddle," as a "base Locofoco forgery," &c. We make no comment upon this letter, except by saying that it contains in stronger tones, if possible, than the Signal letter a virtual rebuke upon the Whig "schemes" or "cliques," who have sought to further their "party schemes" by the old hero’s name and reputation.

It the Whigs can find any "aid and comfort" in this letter, let them "make the most of it." It is addressed to a most respectable citizen of Lansinburg, and the Troy Post says--: "His communication to us, and the original letter from Gen. Taylor, which are now before us, bespeak an intimacy between them, which accounts for the frankness and freedom of expression, which characterize the latter."

Headquarters, Army of Occupation,
Camp near Monterey,
May 29, 1847.

Dear Sir: It is with much pleasure that I acknowledge the receipt of your most interesting letter of the 1st instant, and to which I desire to reply in terms more expressive of my thanks to you for your kind consideration for myself, and yet more so of my high appreciation of the up right and patriotic sentiments which are the principal tenor of your letter; but I am burdened with official duties, and at this moment, with many letters from distant sources, which require attention, and will necessarily oblige me to reply to you in a few lines: The Presidential office presents no inducements to me to seek its honors or responsibilities; the tranquility of private life, on the contrary, is the great object of my aspirations on the conclusion of the War—but I am not insensible to the persuasions that my services are yet due to the country, as the country shall see fit to command them; if still as a soldier, I am satisfied if in higher and more responsible duties, I desire not to oppose the manifest wish of the people—but I will not be the candidate of any party or party clique; and should the Nation at large seek to place me in the chair of chief magistracy, the good of all parties and National good would by my great and absorbing aim. Sentiments such as these have been the burden of my replies to all who have addressed me on this subject, expressing he assurance that by the spontaneous and unanimous voice of the people alone, and from no agency of my own, can I be withdrawn from the cherished hopes of private retirement and tranquility when peace shall return. Please accept, with this, my brief reply, the warm appreciation and high consideration of

Yours, most sincerely,
Z. Taylor,
Maj. Gen. U.S.A

REv44i21p1c3 July 13, 1847 Gigantic Scheme

The New Orleans Delta publishes a letter from Gen. Gaines to Col. Wm. Preston, of Louisville, Ky., which is eminently characteristic of its author. We have room but for a short extract—a specimen of the whole. If the war with Mexico be not concluded until his magnificent scheme be accomplished, the present generation will not see the end of hostilities. Under the powers to "declare war" and to form a more perfect union, to provide for the common defence and to promote the general welfare," he contends that Congress has the authority and should exercise it, of making railroads for the transportation of troops through an enemy’s country; and he says that is the most fit and proper time for us to extend our railroads:

"First—From Memphis, Tenn., to the principal North-Eastern seaport of the Bay of California. Second—From Louisville, Ky., via Independence, Mo., to Santa Fe, and thence to the Pacific. "On the return of peace, all these expensive structures like the nation domain, the forts, arsenals, &c., in the possession or power of the victor, become fit subject for negotiation.

"From the same clauses of the Constitution he adduces the power, "above all, finally, to complete and perfect the civilization of the people of America and Africa, and all other people who are willing to profit by our example and friendship, and secure to them the blessings of independence and self-government, as we understand it,""Our readers will be startled at these bold doctrines, and also at the following remarkable suggestions, with which his
"I am under the impression that the best possible measures we can now adopt for terminating this war, would be to call into service fifty thousand volunteers, principally mechanics and laborers, and construct a railroad from Memphis to Monterey; and, moreover to construct at Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville and Memphis, 11 to 14 war steamers, such as I, in 1839, recommended as floating batteries, 300 feet long and 60 feet wide, each furnished with an engine of the greatest power—such war steamers as will cost not more than one hundred and forty thousand dollars ($140,000) each.

"We may thus terminate the war at less than one-half the expense of time, and blood, and treasure, than there is reason to apprehend it may otherwise cost us; and, above all, we shall be ten times as strong upon our own border, by land and water, as were when this commenced; provided that the proposed additional force of mechanics, and laborers, after aiding with their axes, their adzes, and their arms, (rifles and bayonets,) in bringing the present war to an honorable termination, be transferred to our principal seaports, to aid in the completion of the works necessary for the protection of our great commercial emporiums, by locking up, and thus enabling us to control the navigation of our deep inlets against fleets against fleets propelled by steam power." REv44i21p2c1 July 13, 1847 The Letters, Once More

The National Whig speaks in the following gentle strains of Gen. Taylor's letter:

"The Signal letter is the offspring of some miserable, mean, lying fellow, who would steal your purse, or stab you in the back, if an opportunity only offered of doing either without detection.

"We close for the present with the declaration, that we know Gen. Taylor to be a Whig of this strictest sect, and hence our prompt denunciation of this forger, by which it is sought to injure the fair fame of the old hero. In the mean time we call upon every Whig paper in the Union to republish this article. And to assist in dragging to the light the perpetrators of this wicked and damnable fraud."

The Cincinnati Enquirer, however, settles the point by the following: "We have the original letter before us, in the hand-writing, as we are assured, of Major Bliss, with the bold signature of the old General attached, which we have compared with the one appended to the letter furnished Mr. Atwood, the painter, --and if one is genuine, both are so. But beyond this, we have the statement of a distinguished officer direct from Monterey, that he was present when the letter was written, and was requested by Gen. Taylor himself to say to the editor of the Signal, lest he should consider it a private letter, that it was intended for publication." (The Whig thought that it was not intended for the public eye!)

A Cincinnati correspondent of the W. Union confirms this statement. The N.Y. Mirror, the first paper that raised the flag of Gen. Taylor, says that the Signal letter was exactly what it ought to be, and that had T. written a different letter, it would strike a flag. We yesterday published another letter of the old hero (from the Troy Post, ) breathing the same sentiments. This the N.Y. Mirror stigmatizes as a "hoax" in such insulting language as the following: "The Troy Post published a letter purporting to have been written by General Taylor, which is in all respects, so utterly dissimilar to any of his authentic dispatches, that we strongly suspect that is a hoax. If General Taylor wrote it, we can truly say, with regret, that he has written himself out, which we do not believe, or that his friends have done what his enemies have never been able to do, vanquished him. We sincerely pity the old hero, bothered to death as he must be, by letter-writers; harassed and annoyed as he is, if he would chance to forget himself, and write a hum drum letter between sleeping and waking, we would not think the worse of him for it; but he is not the man to be caught in that way.

REv44i21p2c3 July 13, 1847 Soldiers for Gen. Taylor

The 4th Regiment Indiana troops is now in this city (says the N. Orleans *National;) it is one thousand strong, destined for Gen. Taylor's division. They are a fine looking body of men, and we hope destined to visit the "halls of Montezuma" via San Luis Potosi.

REv44i21p2c6 July 13, 1847 Important if True

Just as our paper war going to press, (says the N. Orleans *National;) we were informed by a gentleman in whom we have every confidence, that a report from a respectable source, reached this city from the city of Mexico, last night, that a dysentery of a malignant character had broken out among our troops at Puebla, and that is it believed the Mexican vendors of milk, pulque, liquors, etc., poisoned these articles with a certain poisonous vegetable, which grows in the neighborhood. We believe the rumor entitled to credit, and hope Gen. Scott will of it in time to prevent an extension of the diabolical plot.

REv44i21p4c3 July 13, 1847 From Tampico

The schooner Sarah Elizabeth, Captain Webb, arrived at New Orleans on the 1st of July from Tampico, having left there on the 24th of June. The Picayune learns from Mr. Mitchell that the English steamer Avon was lying off the bar, landing quicksilver. She would shortly proceed on her return voyage, touching at her several appointed ports, but she would take little or no specie with her, as in consequence of the guerrilla parties it is deemed unsafe to transport even merchandise in the interior without a large escort of troops.

Tampico feels sensibly this state of things. The accounts of the health of the city are at variance. While Capt. Webb represents that the Louisiana regiment is suffering dreadfully from the fever—less than one-fourth fit for duty—the Sentinel, of the 20th ult., says the health of the town continues good, with the exception of some cases of intermittent fever. The U.S. bomb brig Hecia, Lieut. Com'g. Fairfax, is blockading the port of Soto la Marina.

Another Requisition. —The Secretary of War has made another requisition on Louisiana. The present one, just received by Gov. Johnson, is for two companies of mounted gunmen. The scene of their duty is to be Vera Cruz and its environs.

The New Orleans Delta of the 2d July says: We yesterday received files of Mexican papers from the Capital, to and of the 12th ultimo, dates three days later than any previously received. We make from them a series of extracts which are given below. We find in them no evidences of that formidable, fearful opposition of which for the last day or two so alarmed the nerves of some of the more sensitive of our contemporaries.

The same unsettled, indecisive, neutralizing policy seems to prevail at the Capital, which has so long been characteristic of Mexican policy. We hear nothing of those thirty thousand of an army, which with a valor equaled only by the valor evinced by the troops of a celebrated King of France, who marched up and down an eminence—were marching out in attack and annihilate Gen. Scott in his quarters at Puebla. Santa Anna, it seem, however ambitious he may be to play the dictator, is rather shy in proclaiming his references, he appears to think that as he can get along, though minus half his “understanding:” he can keep the Government moving though resting on a fraction of a Ministry.

The War. —The files before us contain full reviews of the opinions of the different newspapers throughout the country, which number about twenty, and with but one single exception (in Durango) they are all fully in favor of the war.

The Dictatorship. —El Monito Republicano of the 12th ult., contains a lengthy article on the subject of the Dictatorship. Up to that date Santa Anna was not proclaimed, nor had he proclaimed himself Dictator. Indeed, the Monitor ridiculed the idea that he designed to become one. The rumor to that effect which prevailed in the capital, is alleged to have originated with and been propagated by his enemies and the enemies of the country.

No Change of Policy. —The Monitor asserts that the new cabinet is not to be entirely form of Puros, (Democrats,) as stated in some of the journals, and that the new Ministers will carry out the policy of their predecessors. Santa Anna thinks that without a full Ministry—with the Ministers of War and Finance, together with the clerks in the Bureau of Foreign Relations—he will be able, for the time being to carry on the government. In an article published in the same paper of the 10th, we find the following paragraph:---"There is no doubt but that the majority of the nation is in favor of carrying on the war, and we are, consequently, convinced that it is impossible to enter into any arrangement for peace, were it be concluded, it would prove fatal to the nationality of Mexico. The defenders of the nation are therefore, encouraged with brilliant hopes of final success, as it is undoubtedly that the position in which the United States finds itself must, in the end, secure us triumphant success, notwithstanding our former disasters. All of us who sincerely wish the continuation of the war, look upon an equivocal policy as dangerous, and all overtures of peace a perilous means to secure it; for this reason we are opposed to any change in the politics which may give it a pacific appearance."

Congress. —Congress met at the Capital at last on the 10th, and the proposition of declaring a recess, was lost by one vote. El Republicano, of the 12th, in a leader of great length, recommends that the forces which are intended to defend the capital, should be well and properly instructed and drilled, as they have plenty of time before the American army arrives there. Being chiefly recruits, the General commanding them, he says, should take great pains in their drill. The editor says that chieftains should bear in mind that this is to be their last effort, and consequently no exertion to have it successful should be spared.

The Peace Party. —El Razonador, the peace paper, says that it has recommended peace only because it is convinced that the government would not or could not carry on the war; but at the same time it approves Santa Anna’s withdrawal of his resignation, and praises him very much, saying that his is the only man in the country who can keep alive the war spirit.

The Presidency. —The Legislature of Agua calientes had given its vote to Gen. Almonte. A letter from Oajaca says that Santa Anna has been unanimously nominated President by the Legislature of the State.

Gen. Valencia. -Gen. Valencia is reported having arrived at San Luis Potosi on the 5th of June, where he took immediate command of the army. Gen. Salas had also arrived there, and taken charge of his post.

Gen. Bustamente. —Gen. Bustamente was at Irapuato on the 5th, where he was to begin immediately to raise forces from the State of Ouanajuato. It was thought that Gen. Alcorta had issued an order by which Bustamente would be obliged to go as far as Sinaloa, in order to take command of the forces there—which, according to El Monitor, are none.

Canalizo Pardoned. —It seems from what we see in the Monitor of the 11th that Santa Anna and Canalizo had "made friends" once more and consequently the examination of the latter for his conduct at Cerro Gordo was dropped. Although it was reported that he had been appointed Governor of the State of Vera Cruz, he was to be employed in the defence of the capital.

More Guerrillas. —El Estandarte de los Chanacastes, published at San Luis Potosi, says that a large body of guerrillas has been organized at Bocas, about twelve leagues from San Luis, and that they were all well armed and equipped.

Mexican Correspondence Intercepted. Gen. Alvarez sent an express from Ameca, on the 11th, with correspondence intercepted in the possession of a courier going from the Capital to Puebla. The Government had called on the different persons sending letters, in order that they should be opened and read, to show whether or not they contained any information of which the Americans could avail themselves. A letter addressed to El Monitor, from Puebla, says that Gen. Worth, who began by kissing his hands to all the young ladies at Puebla, has concluded by breaking the doors of Senor Haro’s house, lodging himself in it. (Whatever truth there may be in the former part of this statement the latter part we believe to be a lie.)

Gen. Scott’s March to the Capital. —El Republicano of the 11th, has accounts from Puebla, in which it is stated that the American forces would not move towards the capital before six weeks, (from the 10th June) as they were awaiting reinforcements and heavy artillery from Vera Cruz. El Monitor of the same date, publishes a letter in which the writer states that he has been informed that the whole forces will move towards the capital, in all from the 15th to the 20th, as they had resolved and were determined to spend and celebrate the 4th of July at the capital.

Movements of American Troops. —A letter from Puebla, addressed to El Monitor, states that Gen. Worth went as far as Cholula with 200 men, and had returned alone with his staff, without being troubled by any of the guerrillas.

Assistance Solicited from Gen. Scott. —A letter received at the Capital of the 10th, from Tlaxcala, says that the inhabitants of that place addressed a petition to Gen. Scott, asking protection of him; as a chief of guerrillas, Portillo, was constantly annoying them. The Monitor says, that it seems the Tlaxcaltecos wish to imitate their predecessors during the time when the Spaniards went to conquer them.

Attack on Gen. Scott. —A correspondent from Puebla, writes on the 7th to a friend in the capital, that the American forces are scarcely 6,000 men, and as Gen. Scott could not leave that lave for some time, it would be good policy to have the Mexican forces marched to Puebla and there attack the Americans who were not prepared for an effective defence. A letter from Texpan, of 31st May, says that the inhabitants are so much frightened there, that as soon as they say a vessel approaching the port, they packed up their beds and ran to the woods, where they remained until they were assured that there was no danger in the town.

[MSM]
For the satisfaction of the Whig and our own defence, we will state that so far from culling "apart" of Colonel Doniphan's speech for a particular purpose, we re-published the whole sketch as furnished by the St. Louis Union. The entire speech we did not see till Tuesday night in the Washington Union, re-published from the St. Louis Republican. We shall now quote not only the passages cited by the Whig, but other passages of an important bearing, which, with the full speech before it, "seem not to have attracted the (Whig's) attention."

"Many persons (and among them Mr. Botts, the representative elect from the Richmond District) give the letter the construction attached to it in the Times so Friday inst. understanding Gen. Taylor to declare distinctly, that in no case, no matter how he may be nominated, will he consent to become the candidate of any party, or, in other words, of the Whig party; that is, that the refuses to be elected as a Whig, or to seek the support of the Whigs upon the ground of his approving their principles. Those who view the letter in this light say that if Gen. Taylor do not abandon the position which they thus understand him to have assumed, the Whig party cannot look to him as their candidate for the Presidency. I have met with no Whig who, assuming this construction of the letter to be correct, does not unite in the same conclusion."

This more than make out what we represented as the effect for the letter in this quarter. The impressions produced in other sections of the Union we have already sketched, as present by distant journals. Admit the letter to be genuine, (and who can reasonably doubt it?) and will not the Republican's "respected friend of the National Whig" be compelled to repudiate Gen. Taylor? How can that Metropolitan Whig organ sustain a man who has written so "silly a letter," filled with "twaddle," and worthy only of the coinage and forgery of Locofoco deception? But the Whig papers of yesterday morning themselves furnish intrinsic evidence of the utter confusion in which Gen. Taylor's "unfortunate position" (as the times called it) has involved the Whig party. The Republican quotes the following extract of a letter addressed to its editors, "from a perfectly reliable source in Mexico."

"You are authorized by the highest authority to say, that Gen. Taylor looks for nothing, and asks for nothing, beyond this war, but that, if the people of the United States choose to elect him their President, he will feel bound to serve them. He will not, however, be a party candidate, nor accept the nomination of a Convention or Caucus of either party. If the people, irrespective of party, choose, in their primary meetings, to nominate him, and then elect him, he will accept the responsible office with grateful feelings—though, if he consulted his own wishes, he would prefer to retire within the quiet bosom of his family, at the conclusion of the war."

REv44i22p1c2 July 16, 1847 Col. Doniphan's Speech

For the satisfaction of the Whig and our own defence, we will state that so far from culling "apart" of Colonel Doniphan's speech for a particular purpose, we re-published the whole sketch as furnished by the St. Louis Union. The entire speech we did not see till Tuesday night in the Washington Union, re-published from the St. Louis Republican. We shall now quote not only the passages cited by the Whig, but other passages of an important bearing, which, with the full speech before it, "seem not to have attracted the (Whig's) attention."

"Upon returning from our arduous campaign, and when entering upon the bosom of that noble stream that washes the borders of your city; when, in passing the magnificent country seats, bright eyes and smiling faces greeted us, and white handkerchiefs were waved in honor of the returning volunteers, we felt that we were sufficiently rewarded for all our toils. When we arrived at the great city of New Orleans, we were all unknown. That city is the thoroughfare through which have passed the heroes of Paio Alto, Resaca de la Palma; Monterey, Buena Vista and Cerro Gordo—indeed, the heroes of all the brilliant victories achieved in Mexico—and it was to be supposed that they would have been worn out long ago. Yet their patriotism, their regard for their country, is unceasing. There was not a volunteer in this corps who was not proffered a welcome hand. The hospitality of the city was extended to all. Men who arrived there in rags, were clothed; the wealthiest merchants, who never had seen them, proffered them everything they wished for their comfort, and on credit.

"Fellow-citizens: It has been said of republics which have existed heretofore, that they have been ungrateful. However true the charge may be with regard to former republics, it is not true of our own. Patriotism, talent and virtue, have ever been remembered in this government, and they ever will be. "It is not for me, fellow citizens, to discuss the merits of this war. But it is natural that I, for one, should say something in relation to it. It is a strange war; when first commenced, it was denounced by a large party in our country—the party to which I belong—as a war for political purposes. But, when soldiers were to be raised for the prosecution, you find that men of all parties—the opposers and the advocates, the accuser and the accused—were ready to engage in the war, to rally under the same standard, to fight in the same tented field. What a spectacle for the people of the Old World to gaze upon?"

"Men who were engrossed in the strife of political prejudices were willing, like Roderick Dhu and Fitz James, to lay aside those prejudices for the time, when a common enemy was to be engaged—to renew their dissensions, if ever, when peace should be restored. Fellow-citizens, I wish that the same patriotic feeling had existed in the councils of this nation. I wish that Mexico could have seen the same unanimity in our people, in the prosecution of this war, that they have seen in our forces in the field. I recollect well the impression made on my mind, on one occasion, when an express, sent by me to General Wool, brought me such stray papers as had found their way to the General's camp—the latest dates were of the 29th November—consequently, we had seen nothing of the proceedings of the last session of Congress, or of the President's message. The first thing I cast my eye upon was a speech of Mr. Corwin, Senator from Ohio, denouncing the war, and those engaged in it, as little better than a band of robbers. Gentlemen, a Winter shower bath would have been pleasant compared with my sensation on reading it! Freezing—chilling! Such speeches might have been deemed patriotic in the United States; but place yourselves where we have been; and endure what we have undergone, and then imagine our sensations. We were in a city numbering in population at least twenty times our force, and surrounded by enemies on all sides. We had crossed the Sierra Madre, and found, when we had arrived at Chihuahua, that we were looked upon as little better than a band of robbers! Fellow citizens, the speeches which are made in opposition to this war, are said to emanate from the peace party; but I say that they are made by those who are postponing the peace eternally!

"If the honorable Senator's (turning to Mr. Benton) plans had been adopted, the war would have terminated long ago. If our government had placed at the disposal of Gens. Scott and Taylor each 20,000 men, they would, ere this, have subdued the whole Mexican power. To talk about guerrilla warfare is nonsense, against such forces as this. If Gen. Taylor, with 4, 500 men, , whipped Santa Anna at Buena Vista, with 20,000 he would have hunted him down and crushed him! If Gen. Scott had had a sufficient force on his march from Vera Cruz to Mexico to establish a line of communication between his army and Vera Cruz, he would, long ere this, have marched in the city of Mexico, and there dictated the terms of peace.

"Fellow-citizens! What have we gained by this war? Of Gen. Taylor I can safely speak, having been through all his lines of operation. He has gained four distinguished victories—perhaps the most brilliant victories that have ever been gained on the continent; and yet he has gained nothing. Why, sir, (turning to Mr. Benton, ) is it the efforts of our army are like the efforts of a fevered patient, who spends all his strength in spasms, and as soon as they are over are prostrated? After the brilliant victories which they have achieved, they have been forced, for want of men, ammunition, money and conveyances, to lie idle until the enemy have been able to gain strength anew, and then the battles have to be fought over again. In our victories nothing has been gained. Suppose Ben. Taylor remains where he is, will we have gained anything? He has been there ever since last September, and unless some better means are offered him, he will remain there until next October. The expense of this was is enormous. I have been told that $1,000,000 a week has been paid to sustain the war, and yet Gen. Taylor lies in the very position where he was eight months, and there he must lie.

"Although I have not been over Gen. Scott's line of operations, yet it is clear that he cannot sustain himself from his want of means. He may take the city of Mexico, but, he cannot sustain himself there—take he may, but it is impossible for him to keep it. For Santa Ann, although he was stoned when he went to the to the city of Mexico, from some cause he gained new strength, (some have thought that it arose from Gen. Scott's proclamation, ) and he will soon have an army sufficient to cope with Gen. Scott.

"It is true, fellow-citizens, that this war has not been without its effect. It has had a great moral effect upon Europe. We now present to the world a spectacle such as we have never before presented. It has been said that the United States could not wage a war of invasion. We have shown to the astonishment of the world, that volunteer troops can be depended upon—that private citizens can be transformed into good soldiers by a proper discipline. We have shown it at the battle of Buena Vista, where the whole force was composed of volunteers; and I defy the world to produce a parallel to that battle. The whole left wing was turned, and the myriads of Santa Anna's army came pouring down on that handful of volunteers, almost surrounding them on all sides; yet they were sufficient to drive this superior force, and victory perched on their standards. This, fellow-citizens, was done by volunteers alone; it was done by volunteers, disciplined in the school of Taylor, and of that scientific officer and accomplished gentleman, Gen. Wool. "

We ask attention to the passage italicized, which the Whig has not even referred to. Do they not prove what the Democratic press has consistently contended, that the speeches made in opposition to the war have given "aid and comfort" to the public enemy, and, in the strong language of the Whig, he shall "refuse credence to the testimony of Col Doniphan, Whig as he is. And, in support of our position, we commend to the Whig its own language, simply changing a few words: "This, be it remembered, is not a mere flying rumor from the camp, uttered by a partisan in a spirit of hostility to the Whig party, but by an officer of rank, fresh from the scenes of which he speaks, intimately acquainted with all the facts, and entitled, by the evidence he has given both of his patriotism and sagacity, to pronounce judgment upon those facts: In regard to the want of reinforcements which has been felt both by Generals Taylor and Scott, to which Colonel D. refers, we have always argued, that if the recommendations of the President for new troops had been promptly carried out by Congress, without the obstruction and delay, which the people saw with deep regret, the evils complained of would not now exist—and Colonel Doniphan presents this view in full. Had Congress done its duty, we are satisfied, as the Union says, that "both these Generals would now be in a position to follow up their victories more decisively, and to reap the fruits of them with less delay. " We think Colonel D. is mistaken in saying that we have gained nothing by our victories. Have we not completely broken up the military power of Mexico, and seized her vast provinces, and occupied her ports and principal cities, and all in a remarkably short period, considering the magnitude of our operations by land and sea, and the necessary complexity of arrangements, at a time, too, when, after a long peace, we were not prepared for war? Is the moral effect of our great military achievements upon the old and the new world to be regarded as nothing? Is it nothing, that the Union have proved to the world that, without a large standing army, and with her brave volunteers, he is ready not only to follow up their victories more decisively, and to reap the fruits of them with less delay. " We think Colonel D. is mistaken in saying that we have gained nothing by our victories. Have we not completely broken up the military power of Mexico, and seized her vast provinces, and occupied her ports and principal cities, and all in a remarkably short period, considering the magnitude of our operations by land and sea, and the necessary complexity of arrangements, at a time, too, when, after a long peace, we were not prepared for war? Is the moral effect of our great military achievements upon the old and the new world to be regarded as nothing? Is it nothing, that the Union have proved to the world that, without a large standing army, and with her brave volunteers, he is ready not only to defend herself, but to carry on triumphantly the most extended military operations, and compel the respect and peaceful regard of European powers? Taking all things into consideration, and comparing the events and results of the present with those of the last war, the world will concede, that the existing campaign could not have been conducted with more vigor and success. There is a further point touched upon by the Union, whose arguments and facts are interesting—as follows:

"In fact, our army in Mexico has already (not-withstanding the dilatory action of Congress) been largely reinforced. It is ascertained by the latest accounts from Vera Cruz, that several thousand additional troops have been already reported there, to strengthen Gen. Scott’s command. Beside these, a corps of six hundred marines must have ere this time arrived at Vera Cruz, for the same purpose. The battalion from this District, under the command of Colonel Hughes, will start immediately of the same destination. Additional regiments are also now mustering for the scene of action from Illinois, Ohio, Louisiana, and Georgia. Indeed, almost every mail from New Orleans brings intelligence of the embarkation of new troops for Vera Cruz. In a word, instead of giving Gen. Scott 20,000 troops on the principal theatre of operation, (which Col. Doniphan call for, and which the intercepted letter of the Secretary shows were intended to be assigned to General Scott,) the design now is to give him more than 20,000.

"The administration has done all that the action of Congress permitted it to do, in furnishing its generals with the amount and description of force which they required. And the feats which our arms have already accomplished—the armed occupation, both of the Pacific and the Atlantic seaboard of Mexico—the subjugation of vast regions of Mexican territory—the prostration of the Mexican capital—attest the power and success with which the efforts of the administration have been put forth. In these efforts there will be no relaxation, until the objects of the war are secured in a just and honorable treaty of peace."

But this article is already too much extended. The Whig papers are welcome to make the most of the evidence of Colonel Doniphan. Le them lay all his testimony before their readers, and we fear not the result. He fully justifies the position advanced by the Democrats, that peace has been postponed by the mischievous and factious course of those partisans who have written and spoken in opposition to the war. And his language goes very far to confirm the remark attributed to Gen. Taylor, that "he who oppose the war, cannot support me—he's worse than a Mexican."

REv44i22p1c4 July 16, 1847 The Anabasis of Xenophon

With English Notes, &c. by Charles Asthon, The expedition of the Greeks under Xenophon, the great achievement of antiquity, has been, in our own time and history, greatly surpassed in romance, peril and self-sacrifice, by the glorious exploits of the Missouri volunteers, under Colonel Doniphan, who has just been received, with open arms, by the people of Missouri. Xenophon’s expedition has become classic, because it was told in so charming a manner, and Colonel Benton’s speech (as Colonel Doniphan intimates) is so good a history of the Missouri expedition, as will make it read with admiration two thousand years hence. The Greeks were led from Babylon through Armenia to the Black Sea, and thence to Chesopolis, three thousand four hundred and sixty-five English miles. It was accomplished in fifteen months, and a large part of it though an unknown, mountainous and hostile country, and in an inclement season, losing every thing except their lives and arms. Doniphan and the Missourians traveled over six thousand miles in twelve months, neither receiving supplies nor money, but living exclusively on the country through which they passed, and supplying themselves with powder and balls by capturing them from the enemy. They fought, and were victorious in three battles, over greatly superior numbers, and have returned (many poor fellows being left behind, a melancholy sacrifice in their country’s cause!) to receive the cordial thanks of a grateful country. The young student, therefore, will have a new stimulus to turn over the pages of the Greek General, and compare his adventures with those of our own countrymen.

REv44i22p1c3 July 16, 1847 Peculiar Sources of Enjoyment

The editor of the Vera Cruz Eagle says: "We had the pleasure of enjoying an invitation to be present on the occasion of an amputation of two legs, above the knee, on Saturday last."

The proprietors of the Christian Cemetery in this have somewhat similar taste. They say in their advertisement, "that this burial ground is on 45th street, and that they would be very happy to attend to any one who may wish a place for burial." —N.Y. Mirror. This brings to mind a very kind offer of a similar hospitality made to us by a friend, one of the proprietors of the beautiful Cemetery about to be established at Clarke's Spring, near this city. We positively, but respectfully, declined the invitation, but especially because of a very inappropriate name, "Mount Vernon," which has been ascribed to it. We were glad to hear from him, however, that there was no design to christen the new Cemetery with a name which should be sacrely appropriated to the resting place of the ashes of Washington, and to none other.

Latest from Gen. Scott’s Army. The steamship Alabama arrived at an early hour yesterday from Vera Cruz, touching at the Brazos. She left the former port on the 2d of July, and the latter on the 4th. The following passengers came over on the Alabama, from Vera Cruz. Capt. A.R. Hetzel, assistant quartermaster; Dr. A.H. Saunders, later bearer of dispatches from the Government to Gen. Scott. The following passengers are from the Brazos: Capt. Carrington, Lieuts. Kinney and Ashby; and Messrs. J.T. Weislger and Wm. C. Hogg, of the Virginia Regiment. By this arrival we have direct advices from Mexico to the morning of the 29th of June, and from Puebla to the 30th.
Gen. Scott had not then been able to leave Puebla. He was awaiting the reinforcements under Gen. Cadwallader and Gen. Pillow, who had not then arrived. (Some of the papers mention that Gen. Cadwallader arrived at Puebla on the 30th. Letters from Mr. Kendall of that date make no mention of it, thought he was constantly expected. He was at Perote about the 29th, awaiting Gen. Pillow).

The news from the city of Mexico is very indefinite. Gen. Scott is said to have communicated to the Government that Mr. Trist was with him, and authorized to negotiate for a peace. Santa Anna had been in vain endeavoring to procure a quorum of Congress to lay General Scott's communication before it. Mr. Kendall's letters rather encourage the prospects of an early peace; but we have had access to letters from a very responsible source in the city of Mexico which take a very different view of the subject. The writer thinks Gen. Scott will have to march into Mexico to secure a peace.

The censorship of the press existing in Mexico prevents us from knowing what measure to defend the city will be taken. Santa Anna was to leave the capital on the 30th ult., intending to pass three days in the country for the benefit of his health. It is said that every avenue of entrance into the city is fortified, but the writer in Mexico, upon whom we very much rely, thinks the American army will easily overcome all such obstacles—that the defence of their fortifications will only embarrass the Mexicans.

We are unable to throw much light upon the movements of Gen. Cadwallader and Gen. Pillow. The latter is said to have been compelled to contest the road with the guerrilla parties, till he was beyond Cerro Gordo. Guerrilleros took advantage of every defile to resist his progress. His loss is said to have been severe.

We have by this arrival a file of the "American Star, No. 2," published twice a week at Puebla, by Messrs Peoples, Barnard & Callahan. The file extends from the 12th to the 27th June, and we glean from its columns sever items of intelligence. The government of the city Puebla has been entrusted to Lieut. Col. Belton, of the 3d Artillery. Gen. Alvarez was at Atilizco on the 14th June, with 300 Mexican cavalry. The Star thinks his forces have been greatly overrated.

A Correspondent of El Monitor Republicano, writing from Puebla, says: Gen. Scott, with all of his engineer corps and a number of other officers, proceeded to Cholula the other day, and, after ascending the pyramid, agreed at once to fortify the place." He thinks it is only throwing salt to the fishes to fortify so out of the way a place. The truth of the business is, says the Star, that Gen. Scott never went there at all, but that Gen. Quitman, Twiggs, Col. Harney and a party of officers, hearing of the pyramid and wishing to see the spot rendered so notorious by the massacre of the Cholulans by Cortez, did go, but the idea of fortifying was farthest from the thought.

The Star tells a good story of a party of guerrilleros who stopped some Mexicans who were driving hogs into Puebla. They first compelled the drivers to pay the usual city tax on their swine for entering the city, and then drove the swine off in another direction. The Star says there is three months' provisions in the city for the army, and that the fields around the city supply all the forage necessary.

A Mexican named Heredia has been detected by his countrymen on his way from the capital to Puebla with drawings of the different fortifications around the capital. He was tried and condemned as a spy and a traitor, and was condemned to be shot on the 21st ult. The fellow made his escape the morning of the 21st.

The Mexicans are using every inducement to make our men desert, and with some success, but those who have deserted find little comfort from their new friends. The Star tells of two dragoons who ran off from us, but had not gone three leagues before some Mexicans came across them, took their horses and stripped them of everything but their shirts. A German and a Mexican have been tried by a court martial for tampering with our soldiers and persuading them to desert. The Mexican was acquitted—the German found guilty and condemned to be shot. Being recommended to mercy his sentence was remitted.

The following narrative is from the Star of the 24th ult. "On Sunday morning last, the 20th, a party of Americans, not connected with the army, left here for a hacienda on the road to Mexico—say about eighteen miles distant. The object in view by the party, eight in number, was the purchasing of mules for the Government; and after they had bargained for a number, to be brought in the next day to Puebla, they prepared to leave, but were prevailed on to defer their departure until after dinner. The repast was arrived on in good style, and after it was partaken of, the host refusing to receive any pay whatever, the horses were brought out and the party mounted. They were warned not to go too near a village on their left, as some five or six hundred soldiers were quartered there, and it we mistake not, a Mexican was preparing a horse to accompany them along a bye path in the mountains, when a party of lancers were discovered riding up to the hacienda. The little party of Americans started off in a slow gallop; their leader telling them to save the horses until it would be necessary to run. In this way they proceeded some distance, the soldiers continuing to decrease the distance between them, when it was proposed to go a little faster. A half a minute had not elapsed with the increase gait, before they came upon another party of the enemy, formed across the road. To attempt to pass them would have been foolishness; so they halted, and through their interpreter, informed the captain that they were Americans, but not connected with the army. The pursuing lancers were now...
All the talk now is of peace, immediate peace, with great Mexican nation, and those who talked but a short week since of reveling in the halls of the Montezumas, now appear to think they are just about as near the aforesaid halls as they ever will be. I hardly know what to think of the matter. The arrival of the heavy reinforcements known to be on the way for Gen. Scott, combined with the loss of confidence the Mexican leaders have in themselves and their followers, have turned their feelings to a degree, and the most belligerent among them may now really be in favor of coming to terms. Santa Anna himself, although he will be very far from starting the ball, will doubtless help to keep it in motion when it is once under way. His very salvation depends upon it. He knows that he will be defeated and lose all if he makes another stand by making cat’s paws of some of the members of Congress, and getting them to look with an eye of favor upon propositions for peace, he thinks that he may be able to second their movements if every thing looks favorable, and finally himself reap all the benefits that may grow out of it.

What the propositions are that have been made to the Mexican Government few here know; but what with British interference, and the timidity of the Mexican leaders, they have evidently been listened to. Three days since and hardly a man in Gen. Scott’s army thought there was a hope of coming to terms with the enemy, now, the time has changed, and many of the officers are even talking of the chances of avoiding and escaping the vomito on their way home. With all the cry of peace, I am not one of those who think that our affairs with Mexico are yet settled. A great deal depends upon circumstances. Should the upper train, containing as it is supposed a large sum of money, meet with a reverse, the Mexicans would be emboldened to offer fresh resistance; should Santa Anna find, on counting noses, that a majority are against him in any committee appointed by Congress, he will be found among the first to scoff at any idea of terms with the perfidious Yankees; should, in fact, anything turn up out of which the Dictator may make capital for himself, no matter whether for, or against the best interest of his dearly beloved country, he will embrace it for his own aggrandizement. He wants time, he wants to procrastinate, he wants to delay the approach of Gen. Scott upon the capital—in short, he wants to do anything which may aid and further his own ambitious schemes. Santa Anna, tired of fighting the Americans, is anxious to make peace with them, although tearful of openly avowing it.

The peace party in the capital—the capitalists and property holders—are also anxious, unwilling to support the war longer and taxed already beyond what they consider their means. The military are anxious to see the war continued, as the only means by which they can support themselves; the leperos, the ragamuffins of the country, care but little, one way or the other, how affairs go, so that they can steal enough to supply themselves with blankets, chinguite and trijotes and tortillas sufficient to support life. The Indians care for nothing, and they are the most numerous class, so that they can sell their produce for silver in which they have sufficient confidence to bury, and many of the other inhabitants of the country will follow their example. Their priests—perhaps I should have placed them at the top of the list—are anxious to preserve their position and their riches, although they may look upon us as dogs and heretics; and thus you have a mere inking of the feeling of the different parties. All these feelings and interests—after taking into consideration that all hate and despise us—you may mix up and then make out the chances for a peace. I do no know that nay one has reflected much upon this subject, but to me it seems that this thing of making peace is to be a more difficult matter than making war upon the Mexicans, and will be surrounded with greater perplexities. Texas has to be brought into question, other boundaries taken into consideration, California is to be a bone of contention, indemnifications and costs of war are to be called into account, and a thousand other matters will be found in the catalogue of stumbling blocks in the way of an amicable arrangement of difficulties. The "three millions," after Santa Anna has helped himself—for he must be thought of first—will not go far, in way of salve or cordial for the many wounds under which poor Mexico is suffering, and there will be other provisos than Wilmot’s for increasing the sum.

Let me conclude this hasty scrawl. The talk as I said at the outset, is now peace; but it will all end in Santa Anna’s advancement or his utter downfall. In all his diplomatic arrangements—whenever he has been allowed to argue his point—he has been invariable a winner; at this game, some how or other, he always turns everything to his own advantage, or at least always has so far. How he will succeed in his present scheme remains to be seen, but he should and probably will, be closely watched. A few days will bring us out of the doubt and uncertainty in which every thing is at present enveloped, and I shall make opportunities to keep you informed of every thing that transpires. G.W.K [MSM]

Rev44i22p2c4 July 16, 1847 Departure of Troops

We have papers form the city of Mexico to the 22d of June, but not a perfect file, (says the New Orleans Picayune.)

Santa Anna has again been tampering with the freedom of the press. One of his first acts upon resuming the reins of Government on the 20th of May, was to abrogate the decree of Anaya shackling the press. The press enjoyed their freedom thus obtained nearly one month. On the 18th of June, Sr. Vincente G. Torres, the proprietor of El Monitor Republicano, was summoned to the presence of General Gutierrez, and informed that President Santa Anna had ordered that he should be sent of at once to Acapulco if he continued the publication of such articles as had hitherto appeared in the Monitor in opposition to the Government. He was expressly forbidden to speak of the generals, to say any thing disrespectful of the army. Or to discourage the war. Senor Torres replied in a very spirited manner to the Governor, and his paper has not ceased its opposition to Santa Anna and his measures. The editors affect to believe that the verbal threat was merely intended to frighten the proprietor. A like message was communicated to the Republicano. Thereupon Senor Otero, who has been acting as editor of that able paper in the absence of Senor Cumplido, at once withdrew from the paper. He refuses to write under the restrictions imposed upon him. The editor of the Calavera, a satirical paper, was sent off by an order of the President to San Luis Potosi, and the paper discontinued by the proprietors. The editor of the Boletin de la Democracia, Senor Sogo, has been sent off to Acapulco. His paper was considered the organ of Gomez Farias. While such measure are taken to keep the press in subjection, our readers will not expect to derive much information from such papers as have reached us. To test how far the laws will protect the citizens against the arbitrary edicts of the Government, Senor Torres had determined to bring the acts of General Gutierrez before the Supreme Cuort, and demand punishment upon him for his infractions of the constitutional right of the citizens. This will probably lead to some yet more arbitrary act of the Government, and we shall perhaps hear that Torres has been packed off to some remote prison. He is accustomed to these things.

The papers contain accounts of the assaults of the guerrilla parties upon the trains from Vera Cruz. It was supposed that General Alvarez would join Father Jarauta and continue to harrass the trains. Several communications are published from Governor Soto, in which he assures the Government that he will take the promptest measures to cut off all communication between Vera Cruz and Jalapa. He says that guerrilla parties were rapidly collecting upon the route, and he contemplated taking possession of Jalapa. He announces in one of his letters that the American sick and wounded at Jalapa were all to be left there, "entrusted to the generosity and humanity of the Mexicans." We believe, on the contrary, that all our sick and wounded were removed early to Perote. The impression is, that the command of Gen. Cadwalader awaited at Perote the arrival of Gen. Pillow, but in regard to the movements of these General we are left almost entirely in the dark.

An official statement is given in the Mexican papers of the forces under the orders of General Taylor on the 20th of May, with a minute account of the strength of each position from the mouth of the Rio Grande to Saltillo. The volunteers which have lately returned are included in this enumeration. The Mexicans were aware that they were to be disbanded, and their places supplied by fresh troops. The Monitor of the 22d ult., says that our army at Puebla had lost from 250 to 300 men by sickness, death and desertion. It mentions, too, that four of five months' pay was due to our troops, and that in consequence of this the 6th Infantry had refused on the 18th ult., to turn out when ordered for drill. This is all common, of course. The American army is twitted with having boasted that they would spend the 4th of July in the capital, while the truth is, say the Mexicans, that their reinforcements, instead of reaching Puebla, have got stuck in the mud upon the route.

An opposition paper says that when the Americans learned that Canalizo had been appointed to the command in the State of Puebla, General Scott was highly delighted, and that Worth and old Twiggs (thus irreverently are they named,) declared that if these 8000 cavalry were under his command they were safer than in their own houses.

An official letter is published date the 14th June from San Juan de los Llanos, announcing that an American train had been attacked above Cerro Gordo, and forty wagons were taken. This probably refers to the attack upon the train under Col. McIntosh, which is often alluded to.

In Mr. Kendall’s letter allusion is made to a loan called for by Santa Anna. The decree referred to is dated the 17th of June, and imposes a contribution of one million of dollars upon the Federal district, and the States and Territories not occupied by the enemy. The apportionment of the amount among the different states would not interest our readers. The contribution is to be enforced by the authorities of the different States, &c., respectively—no one to be compelled to pay over $2000, or less than $25. Ten days are allowed to apportion the contributions among individuals in the most equitable manner. Individuals are allowed just three days to pay their respective quotas; if they make default, they are compelled to pay twice the amount.

The entrance of D. Vicente Romero into the ministry as head of the Department of Justice and Religious Affairs is scoffed at by the Mexican papers. The Monitor Republicano pronounces it equivalent to another defeat by the enemy.

REc44i22p3c6 July 16, 1847 From the Army

Knowing the anxiety of our readers to hear from Mexico, we make very copious extracts from the Picayune, which contains the fullest account. The intelligence, though not of a very definite character, is interesting. As to the prospects of peace, opinions are very contradictory.

Gen. Scott was still at Puebla, waiting to be reinforced by Gen’s Cadwalader and Pillow. The latter officer is represented as moving on, fighting with the guerrillas every step. (There is a report that he was captured, but it was discredited in New Orleans) These reinforcements must have reached Gen. Scott some time since.

The New Orleans Bulletin learns from a passenger by the Alabama that General Pierce with a large train and a column, said to be 2,000 strong, would leave Vera Cruz probably about the 6th July, to join Gen. Scott. These troops had arrived since the departure of the last column, under Gen. Pillow, and, with the troops of Generals Cadwalader and Pillow, would make an addition to Gen. Scott’s army of between 5 and 6,000 men, swelling it to about 14,000 men. We think it probable, however, that General Scott would not wait for Gen. Pierce’s command- but when reinforced by Pillow and Cadwalader would with his army, amounting to at least 12,000 men, push on the capital, where the most probable accounts seem to intimate he would meet with a very serious resistance.

But on all these points, we refer to the Picayune’s correspondence. In regard to the capture of Tabasco by Com. Perry, a letter from an "intelligent" correspondent of the N.O. Delta shows the great importance of the operations of our gallant tars in that quarter. We shall tomorrow publish from the Delta a graphic sketch of the expedition by one of the actors.

REv44i22p2c6 July 16, 1847 Vera Cruz

If I have understood the character of Bruno and the people of that province alright, Com. Perry has achieved a more difficult and important undertaking than they seem to think. The people of the province of Tabasco since the first landing of Cortes have ever been esteemed the bravest and most obstinate of all the Mexican race, and Gen. Bruno, who commands there, is considered one of the bravest and most cunning partisan leaders of the day. Ever since the first expedition of Com. Perry against that place, with a force inadequate to the attempt, Bruno has been drilling all of the citizens capable of bearing arms, and fortifying the approaches to the city. These facts reached us through the correspondent of an English house in Tabasco. His force could not have been less than 2,500 men when the expedition landed, though my young correspondent estimates them at 2,000. Now when you think of a thousand sailors landing and marching over such a country, dragging through swamps and thickets 10 pieces of artillery, the heat oppressive beyond conception, and driving before them 2,500 men, commanded by a man like Bruno the feat reflect the highest credit on our navy, and but proves what I’ve always said, that our navy to equal to any undertaking; They want but the opportunity. Com. Perry should have had command down her twelve months ago.

REv44i22p3c2 July 16, 1847 From California

(We understand says the Union)-the last letters received in Washington from this distant country are to the 1st of May from Mazatlan. Commodore Shubrick was then at that port, in Independence enforcing the blockade as established by Commodore Biddle. From Mazatlan the Commodore would probably proceed to the Sandwich Islands to refresh his crews, who had had scarcely had any vegetables since he left Valparaiso in December last. From the Islands Com. Shubrick would return to Monterey. Our squadron had been able to enforce a rigid blockade without giving any offense to any natural power.

Com. Biddle was at Monterey on the 19th of April. The Preble had not arrived. The Congress was at San Diego, but was expected soon at Monterey. The Portsmouth was off San Jose on the 27th—all well. The Warren was employed transporting volunteers from San Pedro to San Frisco. The store-ships Xylon and Mount Vernon both at Monterey and the squadron is well supplied with provisions. The Portsmouth had been employed in taking possession of the towers in Lower California, on the gulf; but at no place was there the means of making resistance to our flag.

The U.S. steamer Fashion, Capt. Ivy, arrived yesterday from Brazos Santiago, with about fifty discharged soldiers and teamsters. By this arrival we have our correspondence from Monterey to the 29th ult., and the Matamoras Flag of the 30th.

From the Flag we learn that Brig. Gen. Hopping, then at Matamoras, was to proceed immediately to Mier to superintend the formation of a Camp of Instruction for the troops now on the Rio Grande and to arrive. The Flag gives the following account of the troops to go into camp:

The 16th (Col. Tibbat’s) regiment, entire, is now at Camargo and will be the first at the camp. Two companies of the 13th (Col. Echols’s) regiment passed up the river on Monday, one company is in Fort Paredes, where it will remain for the present and two more are at the Brazos. (Unreadable). The battalion of 3d Dragoons now here, are under order to remove to the camp, but their march is delayed in consequence of he non-arrival of horses. In addition to the troops above mentioned, the following forces, raised and to be raised, under the recent call for volunteers and assigned to General Taylor, will enter Gen. Hopping’s school at Mier as fast as they arrive: One regiment of infantry from Indiana and one from Ohio; one battalion (five companies) from New Jersey; one battalion (five do) from Delaware and Maryland; one battalion from Alabama; one company of foot from Florida; four companies of horse from Illinois, Arkansas, Ohio and Alabama; two companies of foot from Virginia, and one company from North Carolina. The troops will be exercised in their studies at this school under Col. Belknap, and when they shall have passed though a course of instruction under him, they will be fully prepared to fight under Gen. Taylor’s invincible banner.

The troops quartered at Matamoras, about 1400 in number, were to have been received on the 1st inst., by Col. Davenport, the commandant. Major Ben. McCulloch and his men had been for some days quartered at Matamoras. The men were enlisted for six months, and the major is in bad health.

The Flag has a report communicated by letter—in which, by the way, it puts no faith—that a scouting party of General Wool had been cut off near Encarnacion, and all but one man killed, or made prisoners. The letter further said, “that General Wool was expecting an attack. The letter is dated June 10th. Had there been any truth in its reports, they would have been noticed by our correspondent, writing ten days later from Monterey.

We understand (says the New Orleans Bulletin) that a requisition was yesterday made on the Governor, by the War Department, for 1000 mounted men, for service in Mexico.

The New Orleans National (a special Whig Taylor paper) has the following: The Washington National Whig asserts and asserts that the letter purporting to be from Gen. Taylor, published in the Cincinnati Signal, is a forgery. In arguments to prove it such are certainly cogent. Time will show. " The New Orleans Bee, another Whig Taylor paper, reviews the article in the National Whig, regarding some of its reasons to establish the forgery as "frivolous and straw-splitting," and other as "plausible and well-founded."

It concludes as follows: Strange that the self boasting organs of the Old Hero should not be able to agree as to the identity of his writings! They show themselves to be very ignorant of his views, and very "premature" in thrusting his name into the political arena. Certain it is, this letter has taken them all by surprise, and utterly confused their "party schemes." "We have given this outline of the opinions of the National Whig, in view particularly of the Anti-slavery question, which General Taylor is made, in general terms, to sanction. That there is error or deception some where, there can be no doubt. No one will, for a moment, believe that Gen. Taylor is willing to extend the ordinance of 1787 over all the continent beyond the Rio Grande, and consequently, no one will believe that he has ever avowed such a sentiment? Yet the article General Taylor, distinctly states as one of the grounds of non-interference by the Executive with the decrees of Congress, that the extensions of the ordinance of 1787 must not be baffled by Presidential vetoes; and this opinion we are told, meets the "high approval" of Gen. Taylor. We must suspend our belief in the genuineness of this letter, until further evidence is obtained. " [MSM]

The Norfolk papers state that the commandant of the Navy Yard there, (Com L. Kearny) received orders on Thursday morning for building a war steamer of the first class. She will be of the following dimensions. Length between perpendiculars at load water line, 250 feet; extreme length over 278 feet 6 inches; moulded breadth of beam 40 feet; extreme breather over paddle boxes 72 feet; depth of hold 27 feet. She will be propelled with vertical wheels, by a bouble engine of 500 horse power each. [MSM]

Through the nimbleness of our ponies, we yesterday received intelligence from New Orleans of Monday last, being (on account of the failure of the mail) forty eight hours later than has reached us in regular course. The failure of the mail was doubtless caused by the recent freshets that have prevailed at the West. An endorsement on one of our papers mailed at Montgomery on the 14th inst., says: 'The Express Rider reports the roads flooded. The mail due this morning cannot get in, as he passed it 20 miles out. " On the outer envelope of the Express package, it is stated that "the Alabama River is rising rapidly. " We have great fears that the recent heavy rains will prove very destructive to the crops, brides, &c. a the West, and look with much anxiety for further advice. Our express letter brings us the New Orleans Commercial Times of Monday, and a slip from the office of the Picayune up to 10 o'clock, a.m. of that day. The news from Mexico will found interesting, inasmuch as the heads of a correspondence that has taken place between Mr. Buchanan, Secretary of State, and the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs are published. Mr. Trist, it will be seen, is invested with full powers to conclude a Treaty of Peace, but we find little indication that the Mexican government are disposed at the present time to enter into negotiations. [MSM]

REv44i23p2c6 July 20, 1847 Later from Vera Cruz

The steamship M'Kim arrived at this port on Sunday afternoon in charge of her first officer, Capt. Pillsbury having died on the passage of yellow fever. The M'Kim left Vera Cruz on the 3d inst. There had been nothing later received from the city of Mexico then was brought down the night of the 1st inst., but fuller accounts had transpired at Vera Cruz than were received by the Alabama. We have no further information of the march of Gen. Pillow. Had any disaster occurred to him; the news of it could scarcely have failed to reach Vera Cruz promptly. Our letters make no mention whatever of him or his command.

By this arrival we have files of papers from the city of Mexico to the 29th ult, inclusive. In the Diario del Gobierno of the 26th June appeared an important diplomatic correspondence. The first note is from the Mexucan Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Secretaries of Congress, referring to that body a communication from Mr. Buchanan, which announces Mr. Trist's appointment. We learn that this letter was communicated to Santa Anna by or through the British Minister at Mexico, Mr. Bankhead, who has exerted himself to bring about a negotiation for peace between the two nations.

Mr. Buchanan's letter is dated April 15th. It acknowledges the receipt of the Mexican Minister's letter of the 22d February, declining to accede to our proposition to send commissioners to Jalapa, Havana, or other point before the blockade of the Mexican ports should be raised and the Mexican territory evacuated by our troops. Mr. Buchanan writes that the President holds such a condition absolutely inadmissible neither demanded by national honor nor sanctioned by the practice of nations. He urges that such a preliminary condition would render wars interminable, especially between contiguous nations, unless by the complete submission of one of the belligerents. He shows how puerile a course it would be for a nation which had sacrificed men and money to gain a foot hold in an enemi's country, to abandon all the advantages it had won and withdraw its forces in order to induce negotiations, without any certainty or security that peace would ensue from such negotiations. He then cites the case of our last war with Great Britain, to show that we never considered for a moment that our nation required us to insist upon the withdrawal of British troops before consenting to treat for peace. We sent commissioners to Ghent when portions of our territory in the possession of British troops; and it was notorious that while negotiations were going one at Ghent, hostilities were carried on upon both sides with unwonted vigor; the most memorable actions of the war taking place after negotiations had been concluded. Such a preliminary condition to negotiation cannot be cited in modern times; at least, Mr. Buchanan knows none. He then expose the unusual conduct of Mexico under another
The President, in his desire to avoid the war, had sent a Minister to negotiate a peace. Even after the war was commenced by the attack of the Mexican troops upon Gen. Taylor, the President had reiterated propositions with a view of opening negotiations which should put an end to hostilities. He had declared to the world that he would exact no conditions that were not honorable to both parties, and yet the Mexican Government had refused to receive the Minister sent to her, and after refusing to accede to the opening of negotiations, Mexico had never made known what basis she would consent to a settlement of the differences between the two Republics. There will never be a termination of hostilities, Mr. Buchanan proceeds, if Mexico continues to refused to listen to the overtures which have been proffered, and which tend to the establishment of peace. The President will not, therefore, make further overtures for the opening of negotiations until he has reason to believe that such will be accepted by the Mexican Government; but, nevertheless, such is his desire for peace, that the evils of the war shall not be prolonged one day longer than the Mexican Government makes it absolutely necessary. Accordingly, to carry his determination into effect, he had sent, in the quality of commissioner to the headquarters of the army in Mexico, Mr. N.P. Trist, First Clerk in the State Department, with full powers to conclude a definite treaty of peace with the United Mexican States. Mr. Trist is recommended as possessing the full confidence of the President, and worthy of that of the Mexican Government. In conclusion, Mr. Buchanan forbears from commenting upon the closing passage of the last letter from the Mexican Minister, lest it should give to his present note a less conciliatory character than he desires for it. He recurs with pleasure to another passage in the same letter wherein is express the pain with which the Mexican Government, has seen altered the cordial friendship which it had cultivated with this Republic, the continued advancement of which it had always admired, and whose institutions had served as a model of its own. Such sentiments, continues Mr. Buchanan, the President deeply feels his strongest desires are that the United Mexican States, under such institutions as prevail with us, may protect and secure the liberty of their citizens, and maintain an elevated position among the nations of the earth. Such is an outline of Mr. Buchanan’s letter of April 15th. We have not translated it, as the original will no doubt at once be made public. There is no indication in it of the basis upon which Mr. Trist is authorized to conclude a treaty. This letter the Mexican Minister acknowledges on the 22d of April, saying that the President had instructed him to reply that the whole subject matter of it had been expressly reserved by the Sovereign Congress of the nation for its own control, and that the letter would be at once transmitted to it for translation.

We learn by the Mexican papers that Congress was at once convened to take the matter for consideration, but up to the 29th of June no quorum had been procured. By a letter from a source entitled to great respect, we further learn that General Scott gave the Mexican Government till the 30th ult, to act upon the letter, when, if nothing should be done, he would march in. The best opinion in Mexico, in our judgment, we have had an opportunity of learning by this arrival. That opinion gives but poor encouragement for peace, but does not entirely despair. Other gentlemen, with very ample opportunities for judging, write from the city of Mexico. None of the letters we have seen mention any thing about the number or position of the Mexican troops.

REv44i23p2c7 July 20, 1847 Later from Brazos

The steamer James L. Day, Capt. Wood, arrived this morning from Brazos Santiago. By her we have received the Matamoras Flag of the 7th inst. The news is without importance, The steamboat Enterprise has been sunk in the Rio Grande, 15 miles above Reynosa. Beat 1 loss. Capt. Dunlap’s company of mounted men from Illinois had arrived at Matamoras, the men in fine health and the horses in tolerable condition. McCulloch’s company has returned form Camargo to Matamoras.

We copy the following from the Matamoras Flag: "From the Interior of the State. —Mr. Holliday, a gentleman well known in this city, returned on Tuesday evening last from a journey into the interior, sixty miles beyond San Fernando. The object of his journey was to purchase mules for Government, which was frustrated on account of an irregular competition in the same business by the band of Carabajal, who were spread over the country, taking forcible possession of all the mules and horses fit for service. The (unreadable) of several different villages beyond San Fernando advised Mr. Holliday not to prosecute his journey further, assuring him that it would be impossible to obtain mules, and he was running a great risk of being either killed or made prisoner. He was informed that a part of Urrea’s forces was in Victoria, and that the mules and horses which were being collected by the Mexicans were intended for a force which was raising and was to rendezvous at Victoria for the purpose of making a descent upon Tampico. This he learned from many different sources, and he believes that an attack on that post is intended, the weakness of the garrison there strongly favoring such a design. " [MSM]

Port Walthall, July 17—Cld, brig Moxley and schr.J.W. Calwell, for Philadelphia; schr.Lady Suffolk, for Fall River. [MSM]
The following characteristic letter from one of our gallant tars, who took a conspicuous part in the late brilliant affair at Tabasco, is well deserving of a reading from all persons who admire Yankee valor and sailor frankness and humor, (says the N. Orleans Delta.) The letter was not intended for publication, and is, therefore, written in the free and easy style of friendly correspondence; but there is nothing in it that will not excite the admiration, sympathy and deep interest of all our readers. The pathetic and heart-rending complaint which concludes the letter, respecting the stubborn non-combativeness of the "bloody Bruno," who will not stand with his 1400 men long enough to be tickled by our jolly tars, is decidedly the richest thing we have read.

If Mr. Polk does not promote our friend in his very next orders, he shall certainly hear from us: Sailors turned Soldiers, or Boiled Lobsters Ashore—Our Fleet passing up the Tabasco River—Bruno in Ambush—Fire opened upon our Fleet—Sharp Shooters Aloft—Formidable Defences—Lieut. May Wounded in Reconnoitering—Fine Order preserved by our Sailors—Capts. Buchanan, McKinney and Adams—Com. Perry—Sailors Hitched to Cannon—Order of March—Encounter the Enemy and Drive Him Before Them—Difficult March—Great Excitement among the Frogs and Tadpoles—Lieut. Maynard's Gallant Charge—The Enemy Routed—Tall Walking—The Fort opens upon our steamers, which is Briskly and Effectively Returned—Lieut. Porter Lands and Carries the Enemy's Pattery, and Hoists the Stars and Stripes—Capts. Lee and Bigelow—The "Camels"—Our Troops March into the Town and Occupy the Plaza—Songs of the Sailors—Damage Done by the Enemy's Cannon. Frigate Raritan, 27th June, 1847.

Editors of Delta—You asked me to keep minutes of our Tabasco Expedition. I can't go the minutes; but if the hours will suit you, here they are. It was a novel picture, the like of which you may never hear; tell of again, and well worth the expenditure of a sheet of foolscap—so I will begin in due form and give you every item, from the battle with Bruno down to the stealing of a chicken. Just think of an army of salts suddenly transferred from the ship to the shore. The idea alone is enough to fix one's attention and excite the risible organs. One thousand tars transmogrified into soldiers. Shouldering muskets, forming into platoons, marching by word of command. "Eyes right, and face Corporal—the word order is only a caution, " &c.

They went through the exercise beautiful. Dragging artillery through swamps, chaparral, on ditches and in ditches, where horses would have foundered. Oh it was a beautiful sight, and this is the picture I design presenting to you, and is pronounced to be the most novel and interesting of the war. Tabasco, you must know, is a fine city, situated on a high bluff, on the right bank of the river, 80 miles from its mouth. The river is narrow, the banks high and steep, and covered with trees, and flags, interwoven with hanging vines and the densest foliage I have ever seen. Fifty determined men could have swept every one of us from the decks as we passed up without our ever seeing an enemy. The channel runs close to the right bank of the river, which looked immediately down on our decks, packed with men. The vessels frequently become entangled among the branches of the trees, and in this way, about midnight, several men were swept out of the boats and from the decks of the vessels.

Then with the burning of the blue lights (the preconcerted signal for any accident) and the rowing about the boats, in this sepulchral glare of the light to pick up the lost, rendered the whole scene strikingly picturesque and intensely exciting from the beginning to the ending of the expedition. On the 12th the squadron anchored off the river Tabasco, and on the 14th, all things being ready, we made sail. The steamer Scorpion, bearing the Commodore's broad pendant having in tow the Washington and Vesuvius, followed by the steamers Spitfire, Vixen and Scourge, towing the Etna, Stomboli, Bonita and Capt. Taylor's little vessel, the Spitfire, with the patent India rubber Cameal, for lifting our vessels over the shoals and obstructions thrown across the river—the boats of the squadron, about 50 in number, towing astern of all, presented a beautiful sight.

About sundown we left Frontera, and with an occasional interruption from the overhanging branches sweeping our men overboard, we passed on very genteely until 3 o'clock next day, when we captured a canoe with two Indians, from whom we learned that Bruno lay in ambush, with a larger force, 20 miles further up. The tops were at once filled with sharp-shooters, and officers were kept aloft on the look out. The place designated as the first point of attack being passed without interruption, we were beginning to feel secure, when a heavy volley opened on us from the banks. In an instant the fire was returned from the heavy guns of the Scorpion, Washington and Vesuvius, and from the small arms on deck and aloft. Lieuts. Blunt and Gansevoort, commanding field pieces mounted in launches towing astern of the Vesuvius and Washington sung out, "Go it boots, " and let drive, and the way those little pieces danced about those launches decks as these gallant fellows fired volley after volley, is nothing to yon.

The firing lasted about ten minutes; the big escopeta balls whizzed through the rigging of the old Vesuvius in the most mournful strains. It was a melancholy feeling, too, (music always makes one sad,) to be standing still and be shot at like a dog and not see an enemy, and have no place behind which to dodge your devoted body. I thought of getting behind the mainmast; but, wot! wot! Was me—there I found a bug buck negro occupying the place. You know that I cared nothing about my own life, but it would have distressed my Sally sorely to have been hit in the head. Strange to say, but one of our men was wounded, the balls nearly all passing over us. The awning of the Scorpion, I was told, was cut up pretty badly. The Vesuvius's dies were pretty well peppered, but for the foresight of the commodore, to stationing sharp-shooters aloft, we must have suffered severely—but they had heard of our being armed with the revolving rifle, and had a most awful horror of exposing themselves to its effects. They were afraid of raising their heads to take aim, for fear of showing themselves to the men aloft, and being shot. This nice little brush was monopolized by the three vessels named; all the rest being some miles astern.
We learned in Tabasco that Bruno commanded here in person. We kept on up the river, and anchored at sundown at a place called the Devil’s Bend. About two hours after, the rest of our forces came up and anchored in line astern. At this place we expected the most formidable opposition. Here is a long reach of a mile and a quarter in length. The river narrows, and an obstructing throws across the bar, with a strong breastwork commanding it, made my hear go “pit pat, patti pat, ” as I thought of the morrow, and the distress of my Sally, should a Mexican pill enter my stomach. As the shades of evening stole over us, we were fired upon again from the bushes, the discharge breaking a man’s leg on board of the Vesuvius. We opened the big guns on them again, cleared the woods of the mosquitoes, and went to bed. At daylight, Lieuts. May and Alden were sent ahead some 100 yards or so, to sound on the bar and examine the obstructions, which could be seen projecting out of the water. This was a perilous undertaking, but they went boldly to work, when a shower of balls were poured down upon them from the breastwork and bushes.

Lieut. May’s boat being in advance, received the fire, severely wounding him and several of his crew, compelling the boats to return to the vessel. The order was then given for he forces to embark in the boats and form into line, three deep, in the middle of the river. This was done with great dispatch, and beautiful order. Capt. Buchanan was particularly noted for the beautiful style and celerity with which he brought his division into line; his men were the best equipped in the expedition. Whatever Buch does, he does well—whether in the fighting line, or horsing a midshipman—this last he does beautiful, and nothin’ else. Capts. McCloney and Adams were likewise remarked for the coolness and decision with which they gave their orders, in the confusion that must necessarily occur in bringing fifty or sixty twelve oared boats into line, in a narrow river, and under the fire of the enemy. This is no small merit I think.

In advance of all, was the "old hoss" heself, sitting quietly in his barge, with his broad pendant flying, forming the most conspicuous mark for Mexican shot, and his mouth puckering out as if he did not care a damn for all the Mexican bullets in Tabasco. While forming into line, a heavy cannonading was kept up from the vessels. At a signal given from the Commodore, the steamers ceased firing—the men gave an awful shout—700 oars dipped their blades into the water, and a thousand Yankee tank stood on the banks of the Tabasco. Good! I was thar: and my Sally sustained no loss.

The forces were now drawn up in the order of march—the pioneers and scouting party, commanded by Lieutenant Maynard, in advance then the marines, in command of Captain Edson—then the "old hoss" and suite, with his broad pendant in front—the artillery, by Captain Mackenzie, and infantry, in two division, by Captain Forest and Breese—the ambulance party following after, to pick up the killed and wounded. And now you should have been here with your note book, to gather a few scraps as they fell from Jack, when hitching him up in the artillery. I have often been called a Jackass says one, but little did I think that my mother’s son would ever be called upon to fill the place of one!

Marching about 300 yards brought us out of the woods into an open space; the grass and flags up to our armpits, and an occasional marsh to wade though, rendered our advancing exceedingly painful and laborious. We had ten field pieces dragging after us. With twenty rounds of grape and canister, yet our tars never flinched, but dragged them though much and mire, until we planted them in the Plaza in Tabasco. As we neared a dense chaparral skirting the woods the Mexicans opened on us again. Captain Mackenzie and Buchanan immediately brought forward the artillery, and opened on the thicket, the marines and infantry advancing and returning the fire at the same time. About this time, the word ran along the line that he enemy was advancing on the right—the field pieces were trained on them, and in the act of firing, when discovered to be Lieutenant Maynard, with his pioneers, returning from a scouting expedition; five seconds later, and they had been dead men. The Mexicans retreated before us as we advanced, keeping up a running fire, but rarely showing themselves. It was impossible to charge them for the marshes and chaparral; there was no means of forcing our way through the woods, the undergrowth of briars, vines, snakes, scorpions and other vegetables, rendering it perfectly impregnable. We now struck into a footpath, which we kept until we got in sight of Tabasco. It was with the greatest difficulty that the artillery could be got along, and but for the indomitable energy and perseverance of the officer command them, the must have been left on the road. But before such fellows as Mackenzie, Buchanan, Perry, Gansevoort and Blunt, it was no use—the chaparral fell back, the high flags bowed their devoted heads, the bull-frogs said "bloody hound" (not nouns) and hopped away, and the tad poles having no legs, wagged their tails and exclaimed, "we are dead tad-poles, " and the artillery passed along.

Our march now for two or three miles was uninterrupted by the appearance of a Mexican, but the roadside was strewn with cartridges, beds, haversacks, and other indications of people moving in a hurry. Scouting some distance in advance of the main body, the pioneers suddenly came upon a large party of the enemy waiting in a close chaparral to give us a volley as we approached. Maynard charged in upon them in gallant style, and routed them out. And now you should have been here to have seen what a Texan would call a specimen of "tall walking"—the Mexicans running and the pioneers after them. The yellow varmints seemed to think that they were losing too much time in their feet touching the ground so often, so they picked them up, and we soon saw nothing but a cloud of white specks in the distance, like coat-tails shivering in the wind. Maynard’s runners are of no contemptible dimensions, and he soon left his own men far aster, --but he was a snail alongside of the Mexicans. There were enough of them to them to have eaten up his little force numbering but thirty men, and half of them armed with axes. This was our last brush, and towards evening the advance guard came in sight of the fort commanding the approach to the city by land and water.

I have never seen a more commanding position—constructed on a bluff, taking in a line of the river one mile and a half long, exposing our vessels to a raking fire the whole distance. In the fort they mounted three long 32s, three heavy field pieces and 24 pound carronade, and as the Scorpion and Spitfire came around the bend of the river, they opened on them from the fort with grape and round shot. The two little steamers came steadily along, paying more attention to steering clear of the shoals than of the shot. The Scorpion coming up first opened her fire as she got abreast, the Spitfire returned most gallantly, again driving them from their guns. The Scorpion at this time landing a party of men to take possession of the town, and thinking in the fort that they were about to be attacked in the rear, prepared to limber up their field pieces, when Lieut. Porter landed with a force from the Spitfire and Scorpion acquitted themselves most creditably. These were the only vessels the shoalness of the water would admit of coming up at the time. The wheel houses of the Scorpion and Spitfire were driven in by the shot of the fort, paddles shattered, wheel shot away, and several men and an officer wounded. With the assistance of Capt. Taylor’s camels, the Etna and Scourge were subsequently brought over the bar. We now formed into line, and with flags flying marched into the city to the tune of "OH! Git along Jack."

On reaching the public plaza, the men and officers were quartered in the public buildings around the square, the commander and suite occupying the government house. Every Mexican had left they city. Not an officer of the Government, civil or military, could be found in the place. We were in the city nine days, during which time not an outrage was committed by a man, and private property respected most rigidly. At night, our jolly tars would assemble together in squads of a hundred in the plaza, and sing their sea songs. Such music had never before been heard in Tabasco. The ladies always assembled in the balcony of the Spanish Consul’s house regularly every evening, and never left until the last note was sounded. There are few concerts in the world equal in my opinion to the music of a hundred sailors’ voices.

The guns were all put on board of the steamers, and the magazine razed to the ground. On the 26th we left Tabasco. Capt. Van Brunt left as governor. The Etna, Spitfire and Scourge remained to hold possession of the place. Bruno is still in the woods in command of 1, 400 men, and will no doubt annoy the vessels from the river banks. And now that I have come to the end of my journey, I will ask a question: Is it our fault that the yellow rascals stand and fight? Is it our fault that more of us could not get killed and wounded? Is it our fault that Bruno with two thousand men, would not stand before one thousand tars and he shot at? And lastly, is it my fault that the President and Secretary have not discrimination enough to discover my merits and promote me. Yours, &c.

Americans and Californians from henceforth are one people. Let us then indulge one desire, one hope; let that be for the peace and tranquility of our country. Let us unite like brothers and actually strive for the improvement and advancement of this our beautiful country, which within a short period cannot fail to be not only beautiful, but also prosperous and happy.

Given at Monterey, Capital of California, the 1st day of March, of the year of our Lord and of the Independence of the United States, the 71st.

S.W. Kearney,
Brig Gen. U.S.A. and Governor of California

the war, the president, actuated by the same pacific spirit, made repeated overtures to the government of Mexico to negotiate for its termination; and although he has, from the beginning, solemnly declared before the world that he desired no terms but such as were just and honorable for both parties, yet the Mexican government, by refusing to receive our minister in the first place, and afterwards by not acceding to our overtures to open negotiations for peace, has never afforded to this government even the opportunity of making known the terms on which we would be willing to settle all questions in dispute between the two republics. The war can never end whilst Mexico refuses to hear the proposals which we have always been ready to make for peace.

The president will not again renew the offer to negotiate—at least until he shall have reason to believe that it would be accepted by the Mexican government. Devoted, however, to honorable peace he is determined that the evils of the war shall not be protracted one day longer than shall be rendered absolutely necessary by the Mexican republic. For the purpose of carrying this determination into effects with the least possible delay, he will forthwith send to the headquarters of the army, in Mexico, Nicholas P. Trist, Esq., the officer next in rank to the undersigned in our department of foreign affairs, at a commissioner, invested with full powers to conclude a definitive treaty of peace with the United Mexican States. This gentleman possesses the entire confidence of the president, and is eminently worthy of that of the Mexican government.

The undersigned refrains from all comment upon the concluding paragraph, as well as some other portions, of your excellence's note; because the strong sense which he entertains of their injustice toward the United States could not be uttered in the friendly tone which he desires to preserve in the present communication. He turns from these, therefore, Caldwell—as he does with unfeigned pleasure—upon the sentiment contained in an early part of the same note, where the Mexican government expresses how painful it is "to see disturbed the sincere friendship which it cultivated with your [our] republic, whose continued progress it has always admired, and whose institutions have served it as a model."

This feeling is most cordially reciprocated by the president, whose earnest desire it is that the United Mexican States, under institutions similar to our own, may protect and secure the liberties of their people, and maintain an elevated standing among the nations of the earth.

The undersigned embraces this occasions to offer to your excellency the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

JAS. BUCHANAN.

REV44i24p1c4 July 23, 1847 The New Orleans National

The New Orleans National, Whig, publishes the following interesting extract from a manuscript work upon Upper California, from the pen of "a very scientific man, eminently capable of giving information of value to those who contemplate moving to California."

The National says, that these sketches "will be found of interest, more particularly as they relate to that part of Mexico, which all parties in this country agree must become a part of the United States." But the Whig and Mr. Botts say, that the Whig party are opposed to the acquisition of a single foot of this worthless, or more than worthless, territory. Which speaks the true Whig doctrine:

San Francisco Bay, California.

An opportunity occurring, I embarked on board of a small trading schooner, to pay a visit to the Bay of San Francisco, the most splendid one in California. A pleasant run of two days from Monterey brought the vessel in which I journied to the mouth of the bay which is peculiar, and will always attract attention for the facilities it present to be strongly defended at little cost, and for this very picturesque appearance. The entrance to the bay is excellent, it being fully a half mile wide. On the south rises a high rocky point, on the top of which are the ruins of an old Spanish fort. On the north side is a high, bold coast, at the foot of which are some perforated sand stone rocks, resembling in a remarkable degree remnants of old castles, with ruined porticos and archways. After you pass well into the bay; you meet with various small islands or round bold rocks, one of which is known as Bird’s Island. This island is admirable calculated for a light house or fort, for it perfectly command the entrance of the harbor, and could not have been better situated for the purposes named, if it had been located by a skillful engineer.

Such is the entrance of San Francisco Bay, the best on the Pacific coast, and not surpassed for beauty of surrounding country, or safety for ships at anchor, by any in the world. The Port of San Francisco Bay has a bold shore, and high hills for a background. The narrow entrance of the bay looking out towards the sea, is beautiful, bounded as it is on both sides, by bold rocks, while the high precipices on which you stand, brings the waves of the ocean at your very feet. At he head of San Francisco is the small bay of San Puebla, which much resembles a lake. Vessels entering it, pass close to the western shore, through a narrow strait made by small islands; continuing on, you come in the vicinity of Sonoma, the residence of the Mexican commander of the California frontier.
The town is situated three miles from the bay, on the banks of a handsome creek. In the vicinity are several settlement. Sonoma was originally laid off with great taste, and had the enterprise of the people built it up according the original intention, it would have been the handsomest place in California. The military barracks are extensive, and front a magnificent plaza. This station has a garrison, nominally consisting of one hundred and fifty-five men rank and file, but never musters more than thirty or forty. The business of the soldiers is to scour the country, and, under the pretense of keeping the Indians in subjection, rob them of the little property they may from time to accumulate.

Enough of agricultural enterprise is exhibited at Sonoma, to enable one to judge of the capacity of the soil in the hands of an industrious population. The stock looked fine and the houses were better than any seen elsewhere on the bay. In the vicinity of Sonoma are hot springs, remarkably effective in the cure of rheumatic complaints. Near by them was a water mill intended for grinding corn and wheat, but the machinery, although exceedingly simple, was too complex for the simple Californians to manage, so it stood still, the people being satisfied to spend more time preparing tortillas for one day's consumption than would have been necessary to expend in fixing the mill, to have enabled it to grind enough in one day to last a month.

Yerbabuena, is a small and growing to the southwest side of San Francisco Bay. The harbor offers great facilities for unloading vessels of all descriptions, but the place suffers from the want of good water; vessels, therefore, are obliged to cross the bay to supply themselves. As the country become more thickly settled, a fort will be opened further South that Yerbabuena, which must become of great importance as a place of business.

The country between Monterey and San Francisco present a great variety of level land, well drained when suffering from the rainy season, and kept moist in the dry one by the waters that come from the mountains and lose themselves in the low lands. In the forests is oak timber of the best quality for ship building, and all the interior woods used for framing houses and domestic purposes. Places of several acres in extent are to be found, occupied by the palmetto and lotus plants—spot of ground easily cleared, and possessing the richest possible soil . Traveling towards Francisco Bay from any direction, it is observable that, as you approach the country constantly improves in fertility. The shores are everywhere lined with mission stations, and private farms, the produce of which, with the most rude cultivation, is almost beyond belief to those who till the soil in less hospitable climates. The yield of wheat is often a hundred fold, and corn is still more prolific.

REv44i24p1c7 July 23, 1847 Troops in Gen. Scott’s Army

We learn at the Adjutant General’s office (says the Union) that more than 7, 000 troops (new regiments and reorganized companies of the old) have been sent to reinforce the army under Maj. Gen. Scott; and that official reports have been received, which show that nearly 5, 000 have arrived at Vera Cruz between the 24th of May and 26th of June, and which, we understand, have been pushed forward to join the advancing column of the army with all practicable expedition. The entire force in advance of Vera Cruz, operating in the interior, and moving in the direction of the capital, exceed 15, 000. These are, of course, exclusive of the garrisons at Tampico and Vera Cruz.

It is impossible to determine what deduction should be made on account of the sick; but, according the best judgment of military men, it should be put down at not less than 2, 600; which would make the efficient force in the heart of Mexico about 13, 000, exclusive of staff corps. The army under Gen. Scott must soon be further increased, since more than 2, 500 are known to be en route for Vera Cruz; among which are six companies of the U.S. infantry, and several companies of marines, &c.

In addition to these, a respectable number of troops, of an effective character are now raising, and will be promptly en route for Gen. Scott’s army. We take the present as a fit occasion to say to our readers, that we shall henceforth forbear to make any corrections of the errors and oft repeated misstatements of our forces in the field, which appear in certain prints. But we will say, once for all, that the pay rolls—that infallible test of numbers—will show that the forces in Mexico, under Major General Scott and Major General Taylor, in the month of July, will exceed 30, 000. REv44i24p2c1 July 23, 1847 The Important Intelligence from Mexico

The important intelligence from Mexico, of which our duty to our readers, at this interesting crisis, forces us to give copious extracts, leaves us no room for remarks this morning. What may be the result of the extraordinary state of affairs in the Mexican capital, our readers can judge as well as ourselves, from a perusal of the extracts which embrace all that we can see of an important bearing in the New Orleans papers.

The New Orleans Times is the only paper which refers to the positive rejection, by the Mexican Congress, of our offer of negotiation. None of he other papers having alluded to it, we are encouraged to hope that the information may be incorrect. At all events, we have no doubt that Gen. Scott is now in the city of Mexico. What may be the issue of his movements, a few days will certainly unravel. We shall be astonished at no conduct of the Mexicans, however infatuated it may be; but whatever they may do, we have no fear for the triumphant progress of Gen. Scott and our brave army. We have practiced toward Mexico a generosity and forbearance which we would not extend to a more powerful nation. We have over and over again tendered to her the most liberal offers. If she madly rejects the olive branch, the responsibilities be on her own head. Peace we hope for but not at the sacrifice of our national honor and rights. The conduct of our Government has been in accordance with the laws of the nations and the practices of the civilized world. If Mexico plays the mule and rejects all overtures, she alone must be responsible to the grand council of nations, for a continued rupture of peace between two republics that ought to be cordially united against the monarchicals of the Old World.

REv44i24p2c2 July 23, 1847 Troops for Mexico;

A detachment of one hundred recruits sailed from New York on Monday, for the Brazos, Mexico, in the ship Elisha Denison. These troops were recruited by Lieut. R. A. Bouton, of the 10th Regiment 250 strong. They are ordered to report to General Taylor.

Again a rejection of the olive branch.

Mexico Declines Treating.

At the moment when the Galveston was leaving Vera Cruz, a courier, with the mail from the Capital, entered the city, bringing dates to the 5th July. The principal item of intelligence, brought from the city of Mexico, is of a momentous character, viz: The Mexican Congress, with some difficulty, had been brought together, and Mr. Buchanan's communication, containing the President's overtures for peace, were laid before them. Their decision was immediate, and to the effect, that Mexico would listen to no terms for peace. General Scott left Puebla, at the head of his army, for the Capital, on the 30th June. We received this news from a passenger, and have every reason to believe that it is authentic.

[MSM]

REv44i24p2c6 July 23, 1847 Late & Important from Mexico;

By way of Tampico (says the N. Orleans Picayune) we yesterday received a copy of El Republicano, from the city of Mexico, of the 30th June, also the number of the 28th, which was missing from our previous file. Both papers contain matter of great interest.

The council of war spoken of was held on the 24th. It is not alluded to in the Star of Puebla of the 26th, nor in Mr. Kendall's letters, which come down to the 30th. Yet the facts are said to be derived from a responsible source, and they look plausible—Gen. Worth's opinions particularly so. The Republicano of the 29th says nothing about the subject, but in that paper of the 30th is another postscript, to which is prefixed in large letter, "Very Important." This postscript mentions the receipt of letters announcing the debarkation of 18—men at Vera Cruz from Tampico, who had marched immediately for Puebla. (This is probably Gen. Cadwalader's detachment.) The letters further said that Gen. Scott had already ordered the march of the first brigade, consisting of 1500 troops, with ten guns and a mortar, towards the city of Mexico, when he learned that the train was detained at Nopalucan (forty two miles this side of Puebla, and fifty one beyond Perote) that he thereupon countermanded the march upon Mexico, and dispatched a force to the assistance of the rain coming up. The letters then speak of the review of the troops, which took place on the 26th. The number of troops is again set down at 8, 500 men, without including those who occupy the fortifications of San Juan, Loreto, &c. But the most important paragraph is, that Gen. Scott, would probably postpone his march upon the city until the 10th July, to allow these reinforcements to come up. We give those various pieces of news as we find them; but the reader will constantly bear in mind, that our advices direct from Puebla are later than those by the city of Mexico. The Republicano, in this same postscript, thinks it very probable that General Taylor will abandon Saltillo, Matamoros, and other towns in the North of Mexico, and shortly proceed to Vera Cruz, to assist in the taking of the Capital. Which now, it adds, the object of the aspirations of the Americans. It is very anxious that the Government should direct General Valencia and Salsas, now at San Luis, that they harass the retreat of General Taylor.

Our files of papers from the city of Mexico, by the way of Vera Cruz, come down to the 29th of June. By the way of Tampico, to, we have files from the capital, but not later than the 16th. Our attention was first given to discover something about the American prisoners in Mexico. The following paragraph is the only thing upon the subject we can find. It is sufficiently indefinite, but shows that the prisoners had left the capital. It is from El Republicano of the 27th ult.

The 180 Yankee prisoners of war whom the Government sent by this route have been detained at the above named town, and we learn that General Garay has not the necessary means for supplying them with food.

We have looked in vain into proceeding numbers of the same paper for a notice of their departure from the capital, but the above scanty paragraph is all that we can find upon the subject.

A summons for Congress to assemble we find in almost every paper we open. We presume it is summoned to take into consideration Mr. Buchanan’s letter announcing Mr. Trist’s appointment. It is certain that no quorum had been assembled up the 29th ult. The Republicano published daily the list of members present and absent. They have several times come very near a quorum, and there its, doubtless, a sufficient number of members in the city to form one. Seventy one are required—sixty six were present on the 25th.

The papers of the city appeared to expect that the American army would move from Puebla by the end of June. They say not a word in their later numbers of their own means of defence, or, indeed, of their own army. In this particular they show perfect acquiescence in the wishes of Santa Anna.

We see no allusion in the papers to the fact which we have stated elsewhere upon different authority that General Scott had given the Government to the 30th ult., to consider of Mr. Buchanan’s letter before pushing on to the capital. The Republicano says our army is too insignificant to advance, but hopes it is true that General Scott intends doing so, as it will afford a good test of the fidelity of those Mexicans who have pledged themselves to defend the capital till death. This reads much like a sneer at the Mexican officers—a thing the Republicano is very capable of doing.

The persecutions against the press are continued. D. Francisco Lazo Estrada, editor of the Boletion de la Democracia, having secreted himself to escape a prosecution, has been found and arrested. This is the second individual connected with this paper proceeded against.

On the 26th ult., rumors which the Republicano calls "very alarming" were in circulation in the capital. It was said that the Mexican Government had acceded to the mediation of England; that the English Secretary of Legation had been down to Puebla and returned on the 24th; that the object of his visit was negotiate with Gen. Scott a treaty of peace; that the terms agreed upon between them would be the surrender of the Californias to the Americans, the recognition of the independence of Texas, and the acknowledgement of the line of 36 degrees as the northern boundary between the United States and Mexico. (This line would give Santa Fe and over a third of New Mexico to the United States. ) The Republicano has no faith in these rumors. It denounces them as false, but at the same time in such a manner as to betray its fears least the rumors confirms the information we derived from a distinct source in Vera Cruz that Mr. Buchanan’s letter was transmitted thought the English embassy. The same considerations may lead the reader to attach some faith to the terms of treaty which are enumerated above. The English Secretary returned to the city of Mexico n the 24th and Mr. Buchanan’s letter was published on the 26th, and at the same time these rumors obtained general currency.

We have been favored with the following extract from a letter, dated Tabasco, June 30, 1847.

We have been far more tranquil ever since the departure of Commodore Perry, small parties of men having entered the town at night and fired upon the sentries. This has led to the burning, the day before yesterday, of about two hundred houses, at the back and south end of the city, by order of our government and military commander. Yesterday reinforcements of about 110 marines and sailors were sent up by Commodore Perry from the bar, and this morning about 250 men have gone out to try and meet some of the Mexican forces that are in this neighborhood, and drive them away. The city remains deserted, and no business at all doing, not a single shop in the place being opened, and all our usual supplies from the neighborhood suspended. We understand Commodore Perry has declared his intention to retain possession of this city, unless he receives orders to the contrary from the government in Washington.

July 1. —The result of the expedition yesterday appears to have been in favor of the Americans, but with a loss of two men killed in ambush, and four wounded. The Mexican force waited for them in ambush at Tamulte, but after about twenty minutes firing retired—it is not yet known with what loss.

REv44i25p4c1 July 27, 1847 By the Southern Mail

The steamship Palmetto, Captain Smith, arrived last night from Vera Cruz, by way of Tampico and Brazos Santiago. She left Vera Cruz on the 9th, Tampico on the 10th, and the Brazos on the 12th. By this arrival we have letters and papers from Vera Cruz to the 9th July. So far as we can learn by them, or by the verbal report of the officers of the Palmetto, there have been no arrivals from the army of General Scott since the night of the 1st July. We are, therefore, confirmed in our opinion, that the story brought here by some one on the Galveston, about a courier from Mexico with "momentous" news to the 5th July, was "all my eye."

We can learn nothing whatever the army or the capital. The Sun of Anahuac of the 9th July, gives the following account of the issue of Captain Mayo’s expedition against Father Jarauta:

"Captain Mayo, United States Naval Governor of Alvarado, as we have said in a previous number, ascended the Alvarado river with the steamer Petrita a few days ago in pursuit of a renowned priest chief of the guerrillas. Padre Jarauta, Captain M. went up the river about 70 miles to a town called Cosamaloapoapan, where the padre had captured an American trader's boat with two men, and robbing 200 dollars from them; but when he arrived the Mexican had fled, after selling the boat. "No resistance was made to the Governor—he hoisted the American flag, made the alcaldie pay the two hundred dollars, and return the boat to its owner".

"The padre, before leaving Cosamaloapan on Friday last, told the people that his intention was to go to Tsechoacan, and Hacienda of Nopalapam, for the purpose of collecting 500 horses, to mount his men, at this time stationed in the town of Cotasta, Hacienda of Naranjo, and Boca Costol, in number about 600 effective men; from these places he was to join a guerrilla chief from Jalapa, Juan Chimaco Robledo, who is now in the pass of the Hava, nine miles from Jalapa, with 150 men, and collecting as many more as possible from the neighboring country, for the purpose of attacking our train on their way up. He has positive orders to take no prisoners but to put to death not only all Americans, but even every Mexican he can catch, that has in any way rendered services to our countrymen."

The Sun also reports a fight between a Frenchman named Simon Lamadée and a Mexican named Ramon Bustamente. The Mexican stabbed the Frenchman dangerously and made his escape. A reward of $100 was offered for Bustamente forthwith. Gen. Pierce had not left Vera Cruz when the Palmetto sailed, but was expected to leave that day or Saturday, the 10th, with 3, 000 men. From Tampico and the Brazos we have no news whatever. The Palmetto brought mails from each point at which she touched, but they were not distributed last night.
The schooner Home, Captain Kinney, arrived here yesterday morning (says the New Orleans Picayune) from Tampico, bringing over eight of the American prisoners who have been so long and so unjustly detained in Mexico. The names of these men are A.W. Holeman, W.P. DeNormandie, William Funk, Josh Thomas, John A. Scott, Robert S. Cockrill, John Swigert and William Russell. The last named belonged to the Arkansas cavalry, the others to the two regiments from Kentucky. They left the city of Mexico on the 5th of June, with the other prisoners, it being understood that their destination was Tampico. They marched with a small escort in charge of a Colonel and two or three officers. On the 17 they reached Juejria, where they were turned over as prisoners to Gen. Garay, in command of that town, where several hundred troops were stationed. The prisoners were treated with some consideration by Gen. Garay, and much more kindness than they had before met with. They were informed by him that he had no orders to dispose of them, and that although he presumed it was the purpose of the Government to send them on to Tampico he had no instructions to that effect. The prisoners were here furnished with twenty five cents each daily for their expenses. This money Gen. Garay appears to have raised by contributions among the town’s people. After waiting here some days, seeing no prospect of release, and fearing lest events at the capital might induce the Government to charge its intention of forwarding them to Tampico, they determined to effect their escape. They attempted this in small parties of five at one time, two at another, and five at another. Seven in all left on the 27th. The first five were all retaken and carried back to Huejutla, but one of them again escaped and with the other seven reached Tampico. They marched principally by night and were from four to six or seven days on the route! After their arrival at Tampico, news reached there by a Mexican that about thirty of the men had also attempted to escape; that twenty five of them had been retaken, and three others shot in the pursuit.

These were the reports in Tampico, but our informant does not place implicit confidence in them. He has little expectation that Col. De Russy’s expedition will prove of any avail in procuring the release of the other prisoners. He thinks it certainly will fail, if the intention be to rescue the men by force. The movement of the colonel will inevitably be reported to Gen. Garay in advance; and if he does not feel himself strong enough to receive an attack, he can very readily send off the prisoners further into the interior. The fate of those men is greatly to be deplored, and we must consider them lost. The movement of the colonel will inevitably escape; that twenty five of them had been retaken, and three others shot in the pursuit.

The arrival of the steamship Vixen with a reinforcement, and your very liberal and judicious instruction, enabled me to increase the land party to 240, with two pieces of artillery; and I also directed the Vixen to ascend the river in company with the Scourge to assist one another in case of grounding. In conformity with these arrangements, I started at 7 o’clock on the morning of the 30th, (yesterday) and at the same time the steamers got under way to ascend the river. At nine o’clock, when within about a quarter of a mile of the village the enemy opened a fire of musketry from the bushed on both sides of the road, where he had posted himself in ambush. This was promptly returned by the marines and small arm men, till the artillery was brought into position; when, after a few discharges, the enemy broke and fled to the woods, pursued by our men; but not being acquainted with the by paths, we were not able to overtake them, and consequently made no prisoners, except a few stragglers found in the village. A small quantity of ammunition, and some muskets, were found in the church and destroyed.

At 1 o’clock P.M. after having refreshed my men, seeing nothing of the steamers, I took up the line of march and returned to the city. The steamers after getting aground several times for the want of pilors, which were not to be obtained, reached the village about half an hour after we had left, and returned here this morning. I forward herewith the report of Lieutenant Commandant Lockwood, of the Scourge, who was in command.

The party we encountered at the village of Tamultay consisted of about 500 men, under the command of Gen.
Echegaray, being the whole force of the enemy in this vicinity. They had received information of our movement, and were posted in the most judicious manner to receive us. During the action we lost two men killed, and had, two wounded—one severely and the other slightly. Lieut. Kintzing was also slightly wounded by a spent ball, and two men were badly burned by the accidental explosion of powder in a building. The loss of the enemy was not ascertained, but two killed were found in the bushes near the road. The officers and men behaved in a manner creditable to the service and their country. The following comprise the names of the killed and wounded: Killed—Dangerously, Wm. Treat, ordinary seaman, Potomac. Severely—Jas. Hoy, ordinary seaman, Mississippi; Brosby, Etna, from explosion of gunpowder; George Brown, ordinary seaman, Etna, from explosion of gunpowder. Slightly—George Johnson, Potomac, from explosion and gunpowder.

REv44i26p1c7 July 30, 1847 Later from Matamoros

Probable Advance from Gen. Taylor on San Luis Potosi, and Junction of the American Forces under Gens. Scott and Taylor.

By the steamship Jas. L. Day, Captain Wood, from Brazos St. Jago, late last night, we have received Matamoros papers to the 18th instant—from which we extract the following intelligence, combining all we can hear at present:
(From the Matamoras Flag.)

Col. S. R. Curtis, acting Inspector General under General Wool, reached our city on Monday, directly from the camp of General Wool at Buena Vista, having left there on the 28th ult. We believe that he is undetermined, whether to proceed from here to the United States, or to the headquarters of Gen. Scott. In brief conversation with him, we gather the following particulars, with regard to affairs on this line. Up to the time of his departure from Buena Vista, everything had remained quiet camp.

The Mexican forces at San Luis were variously reported at from four to fourteen thousand. —They are commanded by General Valencia. A march against General Wool had been determined upon, but appears to have fallen through.
General Wool received timely notice of it on the 26th ult. and made arrangements for a hearty welcome. It was afterwards ascertained, that the brigade of General Minon, (commanded now by another officer, ) forming the advance, had approached within sixty or eighty miles Saltillo. Here the soldiers began to desert, and dissensions arose, which induced a countermarch, and rumor said, that General Valencia was en route from San Luis to join General Santa Anna, at the City of Mexico.

(We can contradict this rumor upon the authority of San Luis papers, received in this city within the last few days. —
These papers state Gen. Valencia to be still at San Luis, making preparations for the reception of General Taylor.
They mention that dispatches, ordering General Taylor to form a junction with General Scott, by the way of San Luis, had been captured, and they feel certain that General Taylor will march upon that place. The regular troops under Valencia are stated at 9, 000, and strenuous appeals are made to the people assist in the defense of the city. )

The troops at Buena Vista (2, 900) are in good health, and under general Wool’s command, progressing rapidly in the "school of a soldier. "

Gen’l Taylor is still at Walnut Springs, quietly awaiting the arrival of those reinforcements so often promised and always delayed. He desires to go toward or back. Thinks he has a prospect of getting more reinforcements than necessary for mere garrison duty in this country; but not long enough to prosecute hostile movements. He has 120, 000 rations, 800 wagons and 2000 mules waiting, ready to move forward.

The camp near Mier, is designed as the headquarters of General Hopping and the "School of Instruction, " has been located at the Sulphur Springs, about three miles from Mier, at the junction of the Alama river with the Rio Grande.
—It is said to be a delightful place, and some 1, 500 troops are already collected there.

Col. Belknap and Major Crossman started from Camargo on the 8th inst., on the Rough and Ready steamboat, designed to try the navigation to the new camp—The river is still low, and but few boats ascend above Reynosa. A large quantity of public stores have accumulated at Reynosa, and at San Francisco. These stores, designed for the army above, will be forwarded as fast as circumstances will allow.

It was rumored along the road that Urrea was on the side of the mountains, but it was not generally believed in Camargo, or above there on the line; the country wore the appearance of perfect quiet, and there was no interest either in present or perspective operations. At this place, Mexican reports assume a more concise form, and we are forced to give credit to some of them. It is beyond doubt, that Urrea is now on this side of the mountain. We have positive information of his being in Victoria, five days ago, and of his having arrested the Governor of his state, and sent him under guard, to the city of Mexico, charged with hatching treason against the Mexican government.

left Victoria with the design of attacking Tampico, in conjunction with troops from San Luis, but this rumor we cannot trace to any reliable source.

Carabajal is reported moving about all over the country—here one day, there the next—letting few traders escape him—fleeing them even to their shirts.

From San Luis. —San Luis papers to the 6th instant have been received in town, but they are in the hands of Mexicans, who refuse us permission to see them. They contain some important information, looked upon by Mexicans as very favorable to their cause, the purport of which we arrive at from hearsay.

The most important intelligence regards General Scott. The papers state, so we are told, that our army marched from Puebla for the city of Mexico, but after ascertaining the force they would have to contend with, countermarched again to Puebla, without coming to an engagement with the Mexicans, although battle was offered at a point distant twenty-five miles from the city. This is too improbable for beliefs; General Scott will never turn back when once on the march, even though the opposing force be "forty thousand valiant Mexicans," as stated.

The second item of importance announces the dissolution of the Ayuntamiento of Puebla, and retirement from the city of all the members, save one, who was arrested by order of General Worth. The good feeling which at first existed between our troops and the Pueblanos has given place to the direct enmity.

REv44i26p1c5 July 30, 1847 From Chihuahua

Letters were received in this city, yesterday, from Chihuahua, dated some ten days after the departure of Col. Doniphan's command from that city. They were bought by Mr. Webb, who returned by way of El Passo and Santa Fe. —All along the route, between Chihuahua and Santa Fe, he was suffered to pass without molestation from the citizens.

The letters represent everything as quiet at Chihuahua—the citizens, who fled at the entrance of our army, had returned to their homes—and trade was commencing, under an arrangement made by the merchants with the State authorities, after Col. Doniphan left. By this treaty, the American merchants agreed to pay such custom house duties as were paid by the Mexicans, and the authorities, on their part, guaranteed the safety of the persons and property of the merchants. The Mexicans are said to treat the Americans with great deference and civility, and it was hoped that sales of all the goods—amounting to a million dollars worth, when the army left Chihuahua—would be soon effected. The letters complain of the exceeding haste with which the departure of the American troops was effected, and of the dangers to which this conduct left them exposed.

REv44i26p2c5 July 30, 1847 General Lane to General Wool

Buena Vista, Mexico, May 20, 1847.

Dear General: In a few days we are to take up the line of march homeward, and, from my understanding of the law, I am soon to be discharged, and I greatly hope that the cause which gave rise to my appointment may soon cease to exist. A speedy and honorable peace with this country is much desired by every American citizen.

But, my dear General, I cannot think of parting with you without expressing my high opinion of your great worth as a military man. —During the time that I have been under your command, I have found you prompt, faithful, and vigilant, in the discharge of your duty, looking alone to the good of the service and honor and glory of our country. A strict disciplinarian, you have discharged your duty with ability, and impartiality worthy a great man.

Your exertions as second in command at the great and glorious battle of Buena Vista, moving to and from in every part of the field, watching the movements of the enemy, exposed to danger almost every moment of the day, ordering and disposing of our forces in the best manner to meet and repulse the enemy—and by your exertions, coolness and courage in gaining this victory, you have won laurels and a fame that will endure as long as the traces of American history shall exist. —Hoping that you may live long to enjoy the thanks of a grateful people, I remain, sir, your most obedient and humble servant, Joseph Lane, Brigadier General.

Brig. Gen. Wool,
Commanding forces at Buena Vista, Mexico

[MSM]
We insert below the warm tribute of respect paid by the chief officers of the first Illinois Regiment, and the brave Gen. Lane, of the Indiana Brigade, to Gen Wool, on taking leave of his command at Buena Vista.

It is a triumphant vindication of the sound military policy which this brave and accomplished officer adopted and vigorously pursued is his extraordinary management of the volunteer forces of his army. He has proved, by the result of his own example in the enforcement of discipline and the establishment of a strict but just military police, that volunteers, when properly officered, become the most powerful army that can be brought into the field. They are then taught to acquire the ordinary efficiency of regular soldiers, while they appealed to as citizens, and retain in full vigor that spirit-rousing stimulant of State and National pride, which worked so magically on the battle-ground of Buena Vista.

There is another fact developed, not merely by the immediate tribute of respect to which we call attention, in the general language of the volunteers since the great battle, which we regard as highly auspicious for the service. It is very evident that most of them have changed their views entirely as to the necessity of discipline. —They experienced its benefits in that terrible conflict, and now they appreciate its importance. —What would have been their fate if discipline had been previously disregarded? Their force on the battle field was but 4, 610 of which more than 4, 000 were volunteers, who in the preceding summer, had been organized into the service by General Wool in the respective States of which they were private citizens. They were now surrounded by an army of twenty-four thousand of the best disciplined, the most numerous officered, and the most veteran army ever raised in Mexico. Ten thousand of them with Ampudia had been under fire at Monterey, and there were officers and men who had fought against old Spain, and made civil war their pastime for twenty-five years.

What, we repeat the question, would have been the fate of our brave and devoted little army, if discipline had been neglected? Probably in one house they would have been thrown into confusion, and then, if the sanguinary design of the Suwarrow of Mexico had been carried out, seconded by his licensed assassins, the infuriated lancers—and his Cossacks, the rancheros—who were placed as additional outposts to cut off every straggler, and were all thirsting for blood and plunder, not one man of our heroic band would have survived to tell the tale of horror. It is not surprising, therefore, that we find not only a change of opinion as to the absolute necessity of discipline, but an out-pouring of grateful admiration towards General Wool for his steady determination in enforcing it, and his admirable example in directing it to the best advantage on the field of battle.

But the volunteers, with the exception of one regiment, had never been under fire. He knew that his sole dependence in the hour of trial would be from that self-confiding bravery which discipline alone inspires. Accordingly he had - the moment the army was concentrated at San Antonio in the latter part of August, until (after accomplishing a march of nine hundred miles) he presented them in front of Saltillo on the alarm of General Worth in the latter part of December, and thence up to the very day of battle, directed the whole energies of a long military life to make his column not only the proudest model of an army in all its appointments, equipments and supplies, but the best in its discipline and military deportment. In this he did succeed, but it cost him his popularity with many of the volunteers.

They had dreamed not of the hardships of drill and subordination, of ordered discipline, but of the romances of military marches and encampments; and consequently, as the Saltillo Picket Guard in his plain style says, "No General ever had so many curses for so few offenses." But now how changed is the language of the volunteers: "I take back," says one of them in an Arkansas paper, "all I have said against Gen. Wool." "Little as his column liked him before the battle," says another, "they all now admit that he is a splendid General." [MSM]

Having been ordered to this station on recruiting service, to fill up the companies of the Virginia Regiment of Volunteers to the full standard of one hundred men each, I am ready to receive all able-bodied men who desire to join the service. The inducements now offered for volunteering are greater than any that have heretofore been offered. The Regiment is now posted at Buena Vista, in one of the most delightful and healthy countries in the world, where the disorders that have afflicted it for some time are rapidly yielding to the salutary influences of the climate. I am expressly authorized by Colonel Hamtramck to say, that General Taylor's column—the Virginia Regiment being in the van—will move upon San Luis Potosi as soon as a sufficient additional force shall arrive from the States. The utmost alacrity and energy are therefore enjoined upon the undersigned, and he cannot urge too much promptness and dispatch upon those who desire to join the Regiment of their State. As squads of from ten to fifteen in number are formed here, they will be dispatched to Fortress Monroe, from which place they will be forwarded to the Regiment as rapidly as detachments of about one hundred are there made up.

In proceeding to the Regiment, they will not be subjected to any delay at intermediate posts in the unhealthy country on the Rio Grande. If the volunteer defrays his own expenses to Petersburg, he will receive a communication of seventy-two cents for pay and subsistence, and fifty cents for traveling expenses for every twenty miles of the distance from his residence to his station. His regular pay and allowances will commence from the day he reaches this station, after which time the most ample provisions are made by Government for his comfort and well-being.
Volunteers are advised not to encumber themselves with clothing, as they will be abundantly furnished with the same as soon as they reach Fortress Monroe.

The undersigned will visit as many of the countries South of James River as possible, so soon as he can leave this station with propriety. Ample provisions will be made for the transportation, &c., of those who shall join him in these countries. The provisions made by Government for the soldier are so ample that he is not under the least necessity of expending any part of his regular monthly pay of $7.

By the 9th section of the act of Congress of the 11th February, 1847, "each non-commissioned officer, musician or private - - - regularly mustered in any volunteer company, for a period of not less that 12 months, who has served or may serve during the present war with Mexico, and who shall receive an honorable discharge, " &c., will be entitled to a warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land; or he may, at his option, receive Treasury scrip to the amount of one hundred dollars in lieu thereof. By due economy, he may also save $100 of the traveling expenses allowed on his return from Mexico. So that, supposing the war lasts but a year longer, he may, at his discharge, with reasonable economy, have cleared from $200 to $300.

The risk of loss of health in the new _____ of service in which the Virginia Regiment will be engaged the undersigned regards as being less than in this country. The undersigned was ordered to this service without solicitation on his part, and was told on receiving his order, that the utmost zeal and energy would be expected of him. He is required to break up this station on the 1st of October next and report himself forthwith to his regimen; and he calls upon all young men who feel the passion for military distinction to come forward and avail themselves of the opportunity now offered. He promises them that there is every probability they will soon be in the presence of the enemy; and invites all who love glory and their country—all that have the spirit of enterprise and adventure—all who scorn to be rushing in the inglorious inactivity while Taylor and Scott and the brave officers and soldiers under their command ask their aid, to come forward and enlist under the banners of their country.

If he knows the Virginia youth, they will not be satisfied to stay at home and read in their gazettes the glorious performances of others and not feel irresistibly prompted to share their tales, their fortunes, and their honors. [MSM]
In the Spring of ’45, through the interference of friends, without his own application, he received the appointment of military store-keeper at the Washington Arsenal. This, although a lucrative and comparatively an easy post, yet a illy suited with his aspiring and ambitious news, he resigned, after having held it for the space of one year. The bill for raising a regiment & mounted riflemen having, about this time, passed Congress, he procured from the President of the United States the appointment of Captain in that newly raised regiment.

Immediately of receiving his commission, he applied himself energetically to recruiting his company, and was the first Captain in that whole regiment who reported his company ready for service. Instead of Oregon, which was the original destination of the mounted riflemen, he was ordered to join the army in Mexico, where he arrived soon after the battle of Monterey. He remained with General Taylor until the bombardment of Vera Cruz was determined on by the Administration, when, together with most of the regular army, he was ordered to join Major General Scott. His first engagement was before Vera Cruz, where a skirmish took place between the rifles and a body of Mexican lancers, in which the Mexicans, though far superior in umbers, were repulsed with considerable loss.

His cool courage and daring intrepidity on this occasion was for him the admiration of his commanding officer. His next engagement was in the hard fought and warmly contested fight of Cerro Gordo, where, while gallantly leading on his men, his left leg was carried off by a cannon ball, and he was obliged to be borne from the scene of action. The conduct of Captain Mason on this occasion indulged the hope, that it would not prove fatal, and, indeed, until a few days previous to his death there was every prospect of a speedy recovery; but, in consequence of absorption of matter by the lungs, his case assumed a more dangerous aspect, and justly excited the fears and apprehensions of his friends for the worst.

When apprised of his situation, the same tranquility and fortitude which had characterized him through life, attended him in his trying hour. He spoke with composure of his approaching end, and after having made a disposition of some articles to his particular friends, he met the King of Terrors with calmness and resignation. Thus died, on the 15th of May, 1847, this high toned, chivalric and brace officer, at the early age of 29—not until, however, he had established a character for courage, honor and integrity and had endeared himself to a large number of admiring and devoted friends.

The public and unfeigned manifestation of feeling and sympathy, and their unanimous vote of a sword to him, so soon as they heard of his misfortune at the battle of Cerro Gordo, proved much more forcibly than words can express the high estimation in which he was held by the citizens of his native county. And, subsequently, when his death was made known, the universal regret which pervaded the community in which he had lived, and the prompt and active measure taken to bring to the land of his birth his remains, show that he will long live enshrined in their memories, and his name will ever be associated with what is good, brave and honorable. It is designed, we learn, as soon as practicable, to bring his remains in his native country and have them interred in the cemeteries of the Episcopal Church, at Leesburg, in the same vault and by the side of his beloved wife and distinguished father.

REv44i26p4c5 July 30, 1847 The Wilmot Proviso and Colonel Benton

Messrs. Editors: Your semi-weekly paper of 22d June contains long extracts from a speech of Colonel Benton of Missouri, recently delivered at Jefferson city. The readers of the Enquirer will regret that the speech in full, with some voucher for its authenticity, is not laid before them. The topics touched upon, of "continental American" interest—Colonel Benton being the speaker will excite a lively curiosity to see every thing he has said, particularly when it is ascertained that, contrary to his wont, he is defining his position of the chief questions of the day, and with regard to the most delicate and important of them, taking a stand, in opposition to what was supposed to be the undivided sentiment of the South. I allude, of course, to the Wilmot Proviso business, and have taken up the pen rather with the hope of drawing public attention to this great subject, than with any intention of splintering a lance against he great Missourian.

The Colonel says: "A new slavery question has sprung up; one which discarding the old ground of defence and compromise, goes for propagandism in its most unqualified form, and to the most remote and Northern territories of the Union. It is a test which our Northern friends—all the citizens of the North who are willing to let things remain as they are—cannot stand. Those citizens have done well; they have greatly quieted and softened down the abolition agitation; they have helped us (us indeed!) through the Texas annexation, although that question was pushed at them by the Tyler cabinet in a way to revolt them, purely and simply as a slavery extension question, to give the Slave States mastery over the Free ones; they have just assisted in admitting Florida into the Union, without a struggle and without the agitation of a Missouri question; and they are now assisting with men and money to carry to successful conclusion the Mexican war; although taunted with question as repugnant to the feelings as they are unnecessary, gratuitous and premature."

Now, sires, if, as I believe, you told us truly that Mr. Botts is unsafe on the Wilmot Proviso, what say you to Col. Benton? God only reads the heart, and we cannot know what motive He sees for this willful blindness to, or perversion of the truth. Is there in the resolutions offered by Mr. Calhoun in the U.S. Senate, or in those passed by the Legislature of Virginia, or in Mr. Seddon’s speech on this subject, one drop of the spirit of propagandism?

On the contrary, were not the circumstances (which Mr. Benton wholly misrepresents) such as to show clearly that they were designed solely to repel the propagandist, who presented himself in the H. of Representatives in the form of a resolution, passed by our Northern friends, (Mr. Wilmot and Mr. Winthrop, I suppose,) declaring in effect that the citizens of the slave States are not entitled to equal rights with those of the free; and that in any territory there after acquired they should not enjoy such rights? Did not Mr. Seddon (I use his name because it comes first to mind) spring indignantly to his feet because he felt that a blow had been aimed at him? And, yet, Col. Benton coolly tells the people of Missouri that "our Northern friends" have "greatly quieted and softened down the abolition agitation."

And that the warm anti-Wilmot men are propagandists. Growing still more gross in his misstatements, he next tells his people that the Tyler cabinet pushed annexation at these Northern friends, purely as a sectional question, "to give the slave States mastery over the free ones!" Childlike simplicity! The Tyler cabinet asked the North to furnish a stick, explaining that the use to be made of it was to break the said North’s head!

Not a line was ever penned by that cabinet which did not, whilst urging annexation as essential to the South, demonstrate its high importance to the North. All the Southern press took that ground. Look to the files the Enquirer, and see with what vigor the measure was sustained, as calculated still further to promote the manufactures and commerce which have given to the North her power, and queenly beauty clothed in purple and fine linen. So far as the question assumed a sectional cast we were forced into that position by the wicked schemes and arguments of those who are now proclaimed by Col. Benton to be famously fine fellows; because the did not raise a Missouri question on the admission of Florida, and because they have not gotten up another Hartford Convention about the Mexican war, notwithstanding their inability, so far, to secure more than their share of "the spoils" all of which they endeavored to snatch beforehand.

There are other opinions and views expressed by the Colonel, beside those thus briefly alluded to, that he wishes "our friends" to regard him as a Southern man with Northern feelings. "He tells us, for instance, notwithstanding much talk about he impolicy of introducing a party organization, founded upon geographical lines, that the presentation of the next Presidential candidate of the party does belong to a particular section. After the U.S. Frigate Raritan dropped down to the bite of Craney Island on the 24th inst., her crew was immediately transferred to the Vandalia, which had preceded her to that anchorage. We are happy to say, that since the sick were sent to the U.S. Naval Hospital, there has been no sickness on board. We understand that orders were received here on Saturday for the immediate equipment of the frigate Brandywine, destined for the coast of Brazil, as the flag ship of Com. Storer. Such portion of the crews of the Raritan and of the Potomac, as have further time to serve, are to be transferred to the Brandywine, which is expected to sail during the month of August. A correspondent of the Steubenville (Ohio) Union, writing from Buena Vista, holds the following language:

"It grieves us to the hear to see so many of the American Press giving "aid and comfort" the enemy, but it gratifies us to see that they do not belong to the Democracy.

"I tell you, it stirs the blood of those who have sacrificed every comfort, endured every hardship, and are now in the field of battle for their country's honor and to see its citizens justified, when the publications of their fellow-citizens justified, when the publications of their fellow-citizens denounce them as banditti in the worst sense of the term, and deny that the war is either justified by the laws of God or man—they are of the Tories of old; a second edition of the Blue Light Feds. Our term of service will soon have expired, and then we will return home to battle with those men at the ballot box. To maintain our liberty. " [MSM]

Interesting Scene

We devote much of our space this morning to striking incidents at the celebration of Independence Day at Monterey. To hear the glorious sentiments of the Declaration re-echoed through the splendid palaces of debased and infatuated Mexico, would, under any circumstances, be an extraordinary scene- but this spectacle at Monterey, must have been eminently impressive. The orator was one who had shone in the civil councils of his country, and had left behind him the comforts and luxuries of home, to share the perils and hardships of battle, in support of the noble principles which he so eloquently depicted and enforced. His auditory was truly one worthy of such an orator and such a theme. Around the venerable hero of the war, whose praises are on every one’s lips, were collected

Fourth of July at Monterey

The celebration is over, and without any accident, a rare thing for a Fourth of July, and everything went off pleasantly and agreeably to all concerned. The morning of the 5th was cloudy and portended rain, but the bright sun soon dispelled the heavy mist that clung to the mountain’s side, and ere noon the heavens were as clear and bright as a lovely woman’s smile. Early in the forenoon the American ensign was displayed from the Governor’s quarters and the Spanish flag from the residence of the Spanish consul nearly opposite. The live companies of Massachusetts volunteers were assembled, all but the guard, with the colors of the regiment presented them by the Governor of their State, and a little after 9 o’clock they formed and marched out towards Camp Taylor. An American flag borne by a citizen was carried near the regimental colors. Col. Wright and the members of the regimental staff, and others, preceded the regiment, and on the road received the marching salute. At Camp Taylor all was ready; under the wide-spread awning in front of Gen. Taylor’s tent were the brave old hero and the members of his staff and the officers attached to the forces stationed at camp. On the right of the awning the soldiers of Maj. Bragg’s Light Artillery were drawn up in line, on the left the 2d Dragoons, and in front the Massachusetts regiment. As soon as the latter had formed into line, Gen. Cushing made his appearance, and Gen. Taylor and his officers all rose. Gen. Cushing then proceeded to address him as follows:

“General- The veteran officers and soldiers whom you have so many times led on to victory and to tame-those yet untired in the field, who ardently long for the day when your voice shall bid them also tread triumphantly in the same noble path of honor and of duty- and others your fellow citizens present, who, though not called to fight the battles of their country, are not the less animated with the same devoted love towards her which we feel- have desired on this anniversary of our separate existence as a sovereign people, to present their respectful salutations to you, as the official representative here of the power and authority of the United States.

“We come to rejoice with you on this day of glorious memories; in the prosperity and greatness of our country, and to rekindle in our hearts the sacred fire of patriotism by remembering together the virtues and the sacrifices of our wise and brave forefathers, who have transmitted to us the splendid heritage of the land hallowed by their blood, of the institutions they founded, of their own immortal names.

“It is, indeed, a day never forgotten by an American; for whether in the home of our affections and interests, surrounded by all that is dearest to the human heart, or on the broad expanse of the fathomless ocean, or wandering over some far distant land, on this anniversary, wherever we may be, our thoughts are turned spontaneously to the same point, as truly as the needle to the pole, as devoutly as the Muslem to his holy Mecca.

“And well it is for us that it is so, since no warmth of gratitude is intense enough to be commensurate with the debt of thankfulness we owe to our patriot sires, no language of eloquence is powerful enough to express adequately the emotions of pride which our country’s career awakens- no homage of the soul is profound enough render due adoration to that gracious Providence which has continued to guide and to guard the destinies of the Union.

“Men who have but superficially studied the history of the United States are accustomed to speak of this day as the anniversary of our emancipation from bondage, and vague ideas of that vaguest of all things, called liberty are attached to the very name of our national independence. But the people of the United States were never in a state of bondage. The war of the revolution was not a war for liberty. On the contrary, it was but a struggle in arms to determine whether the two free subdivisions of the British race, one inhabiting Europe, and the other inhabiting America, and both equally free, should continue to constitute a single empire, or whether they should be reconstituted separately into two independent empires. The God of Battles decided that we, the American Colonies, were as competent for independent self-government as the mother country; and England with that practical good sense which distinguished her from other nations, manfully acquiesced in the decision which split her power asunder, and gave to us separate dominion in America.

subdivision of the original empire, for, of that high-minded, bold-hearted and strong-handed British race, which, wheresoever it appears, appears but to command, the more numerous part will ere long be found in America; and the British Isles have already reached that fatal term in the history of nations when their native land can no longer feed its sons; while the people of the United States are still expanding with a rapidity and strength of possession which defies calculation, over the rich virgin soils of the New World.

“This reflection acquires new force from the circumstances under which we this day meet- a conquering American army, here, in the heart of the Mexican Republic, in sight of the captured redoubts and heights of Monterey, amid the venerable trees, and by the side of these living waters of the wood of San Domingo, which, occupied by you, general, and your victorious troops, has acquired a place in history as enduring as poetry ever gave to the fountain of Vaucluse, or eloquence to the grove of Academus.

“Yes, millions of men will have assembled today within the broad limits of the United States, to do honor to the traditions of the Revolution, to ponder on the excellent beauty of the Federal Constitution, to congratulate one another on the happy condition of our country, and to look forward with inquisitive eye into the sublime future of the American Republic. They will call to mind the names of the stricken fields of that first war of independence, which vindicated our national rights on the land- of that second war of independence which vindicated our national rights on the sea, and of the heroes who illustrated each but while Bunker Hill, and Saratoga, and Yorktown, and New Orleans will not be forgotten. Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, Monterey, Buena Vista, Vera Cruz, and Cerro Gordo will yet more.

“Be in their flowing cups freely remembered,” and earth and sky will re-echo with shouts of enthusiasm at the mention of the names of Scott and Taylor, and of the brave men who, under their lead, have borne the banner of the Union in triumph over the wild plains and through the mountain passes of Mexico.

“But we, assembled in this grander than all human temples, the outspread sky of the bright firmament of heaven, treading with our own feet that conquered savannahs of New Leon, surrounded by that lofty Sierras, which rises on either hand, as though placed by Nature to be the boundaries of empires, we, I say, can best appreciate, with the sober but strong conviction of the palpable reality, how vast are the strides which the United States have made in greatness, since the day, not yet remote, when we were humble colonies; scattered in a narrow line along the shores of the Atlantic, until now, when we have swarmed across the great central valley of the continent, have struck over to the shores of the Pacific, and, unembarrassed by the burden of a foreign war, which has already given to us the possession of two-thirds of Mexico, are yet able, from the superabundance of our overflowing prosperity, to nourish at will the starving nations of the Old World.

“Honor then to the bold hearts, who, on the great day whose anniversary we celebrate, dared to comprehend their country’s capabilities, and to proclaim it independent! Honor to the heroes and the sages who have conducted it so gloriously on to our times! Honor to the statesmen whose vigorous hands at this time so ably and successfully administer to Government! Honor to the generous-minded people of our county, who feely send forth their sons to fight her battles in this foreign land! Honor to the brave soldiers who live to enjoy the renown they have so nobly earned in the battle-field! Honor above all to the gallant men of her who fell in the hour of their country’s triumph, whose blood was the sacrificial incense of victory, and who, though dead, yet live immortal in the affectionate memory of their countrymen!

“We trust and believe that our brethren in arms, whom Scott has been leading in triumph from Vera Cruz to Puebla, will celebrate this day in the capital of the Mexican Republic, and on the side of the great teocalli of the Aztecs. - And if Mexico shall then continue in the blind obstinacy of her fatal infatuation, and still refuse the proffers of peace which the President of the United States, with honorable solicitude to terminate the evils of war, has at all times been ready to conclude, - then we look to you, sir, in the undoubting confidence of perfect faith in your generalship, your wisdom, your courage, and your fortune, to conduct us in similar triumph along that lofty table and before our eyes, and to complete, on the plains of the Bajio, that which you so gloriously commenced on those of the Rio Grande, namely, the total subjugation of New Spain.

“Once more, general, in the name and as the humble instrument of your fellow soldiers and fellow citizens, whom you see before you, I tender to you their felicitations on the occasion of this auspicious anniversary, with sentiments of admiration for the high achievements which have marked your life, of deep respect for you personally, and of the sincerest aspirations for your future happiness and honor in whatever else of danger or duty you may hereafter be called to by the providence of an all-wise God. “

Gen. Taylor, who had listened with great attention to the remarks of General C., and evidently powerfully affected by the mention of his name, briefly but feelingly responded as follows:

“General- In reply to you eloquent and complimentary allusions to the services of that army under my command, I can only briefly express my thanks and those of the brave men of my command, to whose exertions and gallantry alone our successes are due. For myself, I can claim no merit beyond that of sharing and encountering danger with them. You have traced up and depicted in most faithful colors the rapid progress of our country form the commencement to its present condition of greatness and prosperity- occupying the front rank in the nations of the world. The existing war may show the world that in great national enterprises and interests we are firm and untied- and that the flower of our country, without distinction of party, is always ready to vindicate the national honor on the battle field. Should it be our lot to resume offensive operations on this line, I shall move with ever confidence in the gallantry and success of the forces. I have but little doubt that those who have but recently come into the field, and have not been able to participate in active service as yet, will distinguish themselves as greatly as those who have gone before. That thousands of volunteers who have, may of them, been brought up in affluence, have left their pursuits and comfortable homes, to encounter the hardships of an active campaign, is a sufficient guaranty that the rights and honor of our country will always be maintained.

A general shaking of heads and congratulations here took place for some moments, after which Col. Wright, of the Massachusetts volunteers, by invitation, read the declaration of Independence. The company then partook of a substantial lunch, provided by the hospitable commander, who had a smile and a pleasant word for all and seemed happy in being able to make others so. He was dressed in undress uniform, and looked a little more like the brave old hero that he is, and a little less like the plain unaffected country gentleman—very little—than I have [. . . illegible . . .]

... and before the sound of the last gun had died away, the booming of cannon from the black fort seemed to echo back the salute.

About 3 o'clock Gen. Taylor and staff with an escort of dragoons came into town, and with General Cushing and the officers of the Massachusetts Regiment proceeded to Arista's garden or Arista's house I should say, where a table was spread in the broad corridor opening in to the garden with its bright green shrubs, its crimson rose bushes covered with fragrant flowers, its well kept walks, and the gurgling stream that meanders through it. The smell of the bright gems of nature's handwork were not more pleasing than the odor which arose form the savory viands prepared for immediate consumption. Every one was surprised at the profusion of good things and the variety that was placed upon the table, all owing to the exertions of Capt. Glover, a merchant residing here for some years, one of the committee of arrangements, whose peculiar province it was to see that nothing should be waiting. He performed his duty to perfection. Claret, Madeira, and Champagne in abundance served to give zest to the repast and aid in the sentimental expressions of feeling.

When the substantials had been discussed and removed, Gen. Cushing, who presided at the head of the table, with Gen. Taylor on his right, arose, and after some remarks complimentary to the committee of arrangements for the faithful manner in which they had cared for their guests, proceeded to announce the following regular toasts, which I think you will admit are better than regular set toasts generally are:

1. The Day we Celebrate: As dear to us in a strange clime and in the midst of war as when welcomed at our peaceful homes.

2. The President of the United States.

3. The Memory of Washington: Brightening with time, all nations will at last behold and admire its lustre.

4. The Army and the Volunteers of the United States: They have conquered all but peace.

5. The Navy of the United States: With amphibious facility, finding no enemy on the waters, it has constantly sought and successfully encountered him on the land.

6. The Constitution: May it ever be administered in the spirit which controlled its first formation.

7. The surviving Heroes of the Revolution: Length of days has been vouchsafed to them that they might behold the marvelous results of their youthful toils. All honor to their venerable names!

8. Our Brethren in Arms at the South: The have lighted their paths with a blaze of victories.

9. Mexico: Blessed with a genial clime and the physical elements of greatness and power, she is a prey to civil strife and bad government; may the influence of wise rulers and free institutions restore her to her proper rank among the nations of the earth.

10. "The Spirit of '76: It burns as brightly among the mountains of Mexico as of old at Trenton. 'Skies, not souls, they change who cross the sea!'

11. The Mexican War: Waged to secure an honorable and a lasting peace, may such be its early consummation.

12. The Illustrious Dead: From Palo Alto to Cerro Gordo every field is consecrated by the sacrifice of gallant spirits; a sympathizing country yields spontaneous and grateful homage to their memory.

13. The American Fair: Worthy descendants of the women of the Revolution; their hearts and prayers are with those who uphold their country’s cause in a foreign land.

These sentiments were all drunk with the strongest testimonials of admiration, and all was harmony. About seventy persons, including a number of citizens, partook of the repast.
Volunteer toast being called for, Lieutenant Crowningshield of the Massachusetts Regiment gave:

Andrew Jackson: Sacred be his memory. (Drink standing, in silence.)

Lieutenant Fuller, of the Massachusetts Volunteers, gave:

"General Taylor: We hail him as the next President. May his civil be as brilliant as his military career. “ (This sentiment was drunk with three times three.)

General Taylor rose to respond to his sentiment and said:

"Mr. President and Gentlemen: I have never had the vanity to aspire to, or look for that elevated situation which has just been alluded to, but if my fellow countrymen think proper to elevate me to so distinguished and honorable a position, I certainly shall do my best to discharge the duties of that responsible position faithfully. But if any other candidate is preferred and offered who may be more competent than myself, I need not to say that I shall acquiesce most cheerfully in their decision, and shall rejoice that there is one more worthy to represent them in the highest office in their gift. “

He then gave as a toast:

"The State of Massachusetts and the City of Boston: The place where our liberties were cradled; whose sons have borne so conspicuous a part in the establishment and maintenance of the principles of our independence and the constitution, and have gallantly maintained the same by sea and land. “

Col. Wright responded:

"Massachusetts and the city of Boston; it is my native State and my native city, and the State where many of us who have been complimented this day were born. We have just received a compliment, and a great one, form the commanding general. Massachusetts has heretofore done her part; her name reads well; her star shines brightly in the national galaxy. In former times she was known well and did well. She then held, [JM]

The Battle of Huajutla

Gentlemen: Considerable excitement has existed in this city for the past two weeks, is relation to the detention by General Garay, at the town of Guautla (pronounce Wahootla) 140 miles from here, of one hundred and eighty Americans, who were recently liberated in the City of Mexico and sent towards this city with a small escort. They are those who were taken last February at Encarnacion. The renowned General Garay, in true Mexican style, pretended that their passports were not correct, and that he would be under the necessity of detaining them at Guautla, until he could hear from his Government.

Six of them made their escape, and arrived in safety in this city, and immediately communicated the above facts to our Governor, Gates.

An expedition was fitted out on the 8th instant by order of Colonel Gates, and the command of it given to Colonel De Russy, of the Louisiana regiment. The expedition consisted of one hundred and twenty men, and one six-pound field piece- forty men third artillery, commanded by Captain Wyse- forty dragoons, mounted on trained mustang horses, and commanded by Captain Boyd and Lieutenant Tannehill, late of the Baltimore battalion- and forty mounted more from the Louisiana regiment, commanded by Captains Mace and Seguine- Lieutenants Lindenburger, Campbell and Heimberger, of the Louisiana regiment, accomanied the expedition to act in such capacities as might be required.

Their march for four days was uninterrupted, passing through the towns of Pueblo Viejo, Tampico-Alto, Ozuania [sic] and Taantcycca [sic], in all of which the people made professions of friendship and had got within seven miles of Guautla, eight miles beyond the last mentioned town, and one mile from Rio Calabasa. Here the colonel met an Indian, who informed him that a large force of Mexicans, under the command of Garay, had heard of his approach, and was in ambush on both sides of the river. Col. De Russy immediately dispatched Lieut. Lindenburger, acting Adjutant, with an order to halt the column (advanced guard) under command of Capt. Boyd. The Captain had halted at the river for the purpose of watering his horses, and while in that act, he received a destructive fire from an unseen enemy. As I said before, the horses were all mustangs, and at the report of the musketry they became unmanageable, threw most of the riders and created great confusion. Capt. Boyd dashed across the river, followed by his Lieutenant and six men. In crossing the Captain was shot in the head, and of course died on reaching the opposite shore. Three of the men were also killed. All this took place before Lieut. Lindenburg reached him. The remainder succeeded in re-crossing the river, and joined the main body. - Thus fell one of the bravest and finest men that ever lived.

News from the South

We publish in another column all relating to our military operations in Mexico which we can glean from our exchanges. Our readers will know as well as we do what importance to attach to the rumor that the Mexican Government has appointed commissioners to meet Mr. Trist of Texmeluca, in order to . . . for peace between the two republics. No one can tell with any degree of certainty the influence exercised by the city of Mexico over the people of that nation, and consequently cannot foresee the effect which the danger that capital it is, from the armies of the United State, may exert in producing a speedy peace. Reinforcements are pouring in to General Scott. Generals Cadwallader and Pillow, it seems, from last accounts, had already joined him, and Gen. Pierre had started from Vera Cruz with the same object. When our forces are united, even the Mexican rulers must see that their capital is at our mercy. The certainty that they could possibly assemble may have induced them to appoint commissioners to treat with Mr. Trist. On the other hand, the selfish councils which have heretofore swayed Mexican politicians and Mexican Generals, may lead them madly to hold on to the last and oppose the march of Gen. Scott, although they have no idea of success. They may be willing to see their great city stormed, their soldiers slaughtered, and the horrors of war brought home to them, in order that their hopeless and hypocritical efforts may in the future tend to their advancement, and place in their hands the power to oppress and ruin the Mexican people.

The same arrival which brings the rumor above-mentioned, informs us of another brilliant exploit of our troops- an exploit which reflects high credit on the American arms, although no battery was taken or fortress stormed. Nothing can try the best qualities of a soldier- his courage, discipline and endurance—more than a retreat before overwhelming numbers through a hostile country. The exploit of Colonel De Russey, in cutting his way out of the pass... (illegible) [JM]

Discussion in Brunswick

Mr. Editor, - It was our pleasure, yesterday, to hear the discussion at this place, between Meade and Bolling.

Mr. Bolling opened with a . . . upon the virtues and ability of the late Gen. Dromgoole. Of course this was intended for "Bunkum. ” He then passed to the Mexican War, and the next Presidency- declaring his preference for Gen. Taylor, whether he be Whig or Democrat.

Mr. Meade commenced his reply by alluding to the Eulogy upon Gen. Dromgoole. After making a tribute to the exalted worth and public services of that great and lamented man, which, for beauty and touching pathos, has rarely been equaled, - he said, that he would dismiss the subject- that he did no think it a fit occasion, in the mele of a political discussion, to mingle the recollections of the dead with the strifes of the living.

Mr. Meade then asked why his opponent had changed his mode of warfare? Why had he abandoned the ground which he took in every other county in the district? Why was he (Mr. M. ) not charged with inconsistencies here, as he had been elsewhere? Why was not every letter which he wrote, and every toast which he gave when acting with the Whigs, paraded before the people of Brunswick? Was it because he was in the county in which he was born and reared? Was it because he was among those who had[... illegible . . .]

Gen. Taylor’s Pleasure Trip

I have just learned that a party is to start for below early to-morrow morning, of which opportunity I shall avail myself and will endeavor to give you an account of Gen. Taylor’s trip to Mamalequi, the plantation of Gen. Arista. I apprised you in my last that he was to make an excursion, and of my intention of making one of the party.

It was quite refreshing to see the old General mounted on his horse on Wednesday morning, the 7th inst., surrounded by the members of his staff, about to leave the monotony of his camp, to enjoy himself for a few days- a gratification he has denied himself till now. Gen. Cushing and his aid-de-camp accompanied the expedition, escorted by a dozen dragoons. We took the road to Salinas, which lies in a direction a little north of east, about twenty miles from Monterey, and passed through the village of San Nicholas de las Casas, a flourishing little place for Mexico, of some considerable extent, six miles from Monterey. At this town they raise considerable corn and vegetables for the Monterey market. We left camp at noon and arrived at Salinas about 5 o’clock in the afternoon, where the alcalde received the general and party with every demonstration of respect, invited him into his courtroom, and treated him to figs and unripe watermelons. I do not mean to speak slightingly of this treat, because it was evidently “the best he had at the shop.”

Salinas, once a flourishing town, but now going fast to decay, is situated upon the northern bank of the Rio Salinas, a pretty formidable stream that rises near Parras and empties into the San Juan. It is very brackish and hardly drinkable, but it is all the inhabitants have to depend upon, as they have no wells in the city- carrying out the national trait of the country to “leave well alone.” The town contains about 700 inhabitants and a very well conditioned alcalde. Sugar is the principal source of revenue; but owing to the saline qualities of the water, the sugar is of an inferior quality. A small amount of rice is also raised, but no more corn than to suffice for the consumption of the inhabitants. - There are several very thriving little rancheadores on this stream at different points. I beg you will not attempt to look on the map for this stream, for it has a dozen different names, and probably is not noted, the Mexican custom being to give streams a fresh name for every town they pass.

We encamped upon the southern bank of the river for the night, and in the evening some of the party attended a fandango get up for their amusement in the town. It was the first I ever attended, and rather a dull affair, very few senoritas being present. On the 8th, by sunrise, we struck our tents, crossed the salt river and arrived at Mamalequi about noon.

Arista’s hacienda is situated upon or near the Rio Pecacho, and at the foot of a spur of the Sierra, in a northeasterly direction form Monterey, about twelve miles from Salinas, and from a distance has quite the appearance of a baronial estate. His plantation is a very extensive one comprising fourteen square leagues; but miles of it are useless, low chaparral, only relieved by the tall Spanish bayonet plant, which bristles up in every direction. Arista purchased the place about four years ago from a lady residing in the city of Mexico for $35,000, and has since expended about 40,000 dollars in improving it. There is a very fine sugar and saw mill upon it; the motive power of which, is water of course. The dam across the river, forming the hill pond, is a very solid piece of mason work, and was estimated in the bill of sale at 14,000 dollars. The estate is managed by an administrator, who has under him an overseer. There are about ninety men and boys, peons, upon the place, and as many women and girls, all of whom are [ . . . illegible . . . ] for life, as are all peons in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, and quite as bad off as slaves, in your section of the country- worse even, as when they become past work, their landlord is not compelled to support them, and this duty devolving upon their relative, serves to bind them the firmer.

I am afraid Arista does not find agriculture quite as profitable as the profession of [ . . . illegible . . . ]; for, according to the account we received from the overseer, the profits of the estate are little or nothing. The nominal wages of the peons is from two to ten dollars per month, but as they are compelled to purchase every article they consume, and all their clothing, from the proprietor of the estate, every month falls them deeper in debt. Two crops of corn are raised, and twenty-four fanegas of seed is the usual amount planted. The yield is generally one hundred fold, which would make the annual crop of 2400 fanegas or 5600 bushels. Of this but little is sold off the estate, as it is the principle article of food. The crop of beans, which is also one of the “standbys” is estimated at 800 fanegas-2200 bushels. There are about a thousand head of cattle on the estate, and a few sheep and goats- but as one [ . . . illegible . . . ] is generally killed nearly every day, the sale off the estate is very small- not more than twenty-five a year. The cane crop is as yet small, but more land is dedicated to its cultivation every year, and it must soon yield a handsome profit. At present not more than 40 arrobas (1000 pounds) of sugar are made in the year, but of a good quality. A small amount of rice of a fair quality is also raised. By far the greatest source of profit is the lumber, some portions of this extensive domain being heavily timbered with pine. The growth of cotton has been attempted, but without any decided success.

The administrator and overseer came out to meet Gen. Taylor and offer him the hospitalities of the place, and we encamped about half a mile from the main building, under the shade of some pecan trees. The residence of Arista is spacious and very strongly built with walls three feet thick hoop-holed for musketry. It is constructed of the large sun-dried brick, succeed and whitewashed and better adapted for comfort than almost any house I have been in. These brick, which are about a foot square and four or five inches thick, are made by the peons for a bit and a half (... y media) a hundred- by those of the place for three-bits a hundred.

I have said that we encamped near the main-building, and under the cool shade of the pecato we remained tranquil during the rest of the day. The statistical information which I have given was imparted to Gen. Taylor- who takes the liveliest interest in every thing pertaining to agriculture, and is anxious to obtain all the information relative to the produce of the country- by the administrator. In the evening this functionary, who is a young man born on the estate, invited the General and party to a fandango, and much to his satisfaction evidently it was accepted. As soon as it was quite dark, Gen. Taylor and gen. Cushing and the rest of the [...] repaired to the fandango. In the open air, in front of the house, three rows of benches were arranged, forming three sides of a square, leaving a large space between, and upon these were seated the male and female tanantry, the dancing ground being lighted by two torches of split pine wood. When the affair got well under way there were about sixty females peasants present, all of them as brown as berries and very ugly, notwithstanding which they found plenty of partners. The music consisted of two violins and a couple of guitars, and the musicians played some very pretty tunes, too.

After one or two national dances, consisting of alternate dancing and discordant, wild singing- the dancing resembling very much that peculiar to the negroes in the States, and the singing as [...] [J.M]

A Strange Story

Under the head of "A Strange Story, " the Times publishes the particulars of a statement, that an emissary had been sent from Havana in Mexico, with despatches providing for the employment of the $3,000,000 entrusted to Mr. Polk by Congress, for the purpose of corrupting the most influential men in Mexico - viz: Atima, Ampudia, Almonte, Canalizo and Rejon, in order to obtain peace. Through the New Orleans Times and Bee ridicule this story as "a tarragon of improbabilities, and unwholly worthy of confidence, " and though the Times is "not prepared to give eredence, upon the flimsy evidence produced in its support, " yet the later paper goes into an argument to show that the polity imputed to the President is not one "which he may not be suspected of [...] " Any man may be suspected of any crime, however revolting- but no man ought to be judged harshly, unless upon the clearest evidence. Another Humbug

A most wicked and ridiculous story is circulating through the Whig parties, that the President is appointing Fathers Rey and McElroy, two Catholic priests, Chaplains to the Army in Mexico, acknowledged that he had no right to make any such appointments, but had appointed thee Chaplains nominally, that they might become spies. “ This fable is based upon a letter of the Rev. W. L. McCalla, in reply to three interrogatories addressed to him by the "Hon. Peter A. Browne of Philadelphia, a leader of the proscrip tive Nativists. Mr. McC’s whole letter is not published, but simply his laconic answers to the interrogatories. The correspondent of the National Intelligencer who furnishes the momentous information, by his own admission suppresses the greater portion of the "long letter, reflecting severely on the Catholic Church, which has nothing to do with the particular point under consideration. "

This attempt to degrade two distinguished and respectable clergymen of the Catholic Church, is in strange conflict with the recent pretended affection for the Catholics on the part of the Whig press which endeavored to demonstrate that the administration was opposed to the Catholics. But, this is a matter of trifling consideration in the eyes of the Whigs. They care little how they contradict themselves, provided they can get up a party-cry against the administration, even for a few days. The Pennsylvanian pricks the bubble in the following authoritative article.

"The Rev. Mr. McCalla " is known as a somewhat sanguineous clergyman- a person as fond of battle as of books- in a word, a sort of bigoted knight errant, always on some half-brained enterprise intent. The New York Commercial with a great deal of archness, says he “hears a name not unknown to the citizens generally, or now heard for the first time. " A very questionable construction might be placed upon terms so equivocal.

Of the two Catholic clergymen sent by the President to Mexico, one, Mr. Rey, sacrificed his life to his God and his country, and the other, Mr. McElroy has recently returned to his home. Mr. McElroy is a patient and exemplary person, and will no doubt take an early opportunity to defend himself against the aspersions of his slanderers.

In the meanwhile we beg to say that the whole accusation, as quoted from the National Intelligencer, is a fabrication manufactured out of the whole cloth. It has not even a suspicion upon which to rely. Upon the highest and the best authority, we pronounce it unfounded and untrue. - The President is too cautious to make a confidant of a leaky and erratic clergyman like Mr. McCalla, and he has too high a sense of his own duties and appreciates too keenly the rights and feelings of others, to indulge a design so base and degrading as that alluded to in Mr. McCalla's letter, and by him alleged to be entertained by the Executive in regard to the Catholic Chaplains.

It is the province of the Chief Magistrate of this great country to submit to abuse without the opportunity to reply. But, in the present instance, the charge is one that demands the answer we have given to it, if only as an act of justice to the intrepid men who accepted the appointment conferred upon them by the President, and discharged its duties in so noble and Christian a spirit.

Tardy Justice

We find the following opinions on the war with Mexico expressed by two of the leading Whig papers in the city of New York. Perhaps the keen lashes of Col. Doniphan's indignant rebuke, acting upon public opinion, may have extorted this late concession to the justice of the war and the patriotic impulses of the American people:

The Courier says

"We have proclaimed, on all occasions, that we had abundant cause of war with Mexico; and that therefore the war is just, although it might have been deferred, and possibly avoided altogether, if the administration had so desired.

"We hold that with half the provocation form either England or France, the whole nation would have demanded war; but Mexico being a weaker power, we could with honor have made another effort to avoid the collision, by abstaining from the Rio Grande, although, in our opinion, we had a perfect right to go there whenever we pleased."

And the commercial:

"As to Mexico herself, we do not agree that, so far as she alone has any right to speak in the matter, the war is unjust. A long course of insults and injuries committed by her against the United States as a nation, and against citizens of the U. States as individuals, sufficient to justify, according to the theory and practice or other nations, a sever measure of punishment, was demonstrated, we think, by Mr. Ingersoll's report as Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

France had not a tithe of the same good ground for her war against Algeria, or England for hers against the Afghans. Even against China. England had not so much valid cause of complaint and resentment, or anything like it. - With reference to the justice or injustice of the war, then, we are of opinion that Mexico has not a word to say."

Important Rumor from Mexico

A good deal of excitement was created in the city yesterday afternoon (says the New Orleans Picayune of the first of August) between two and three o'clock by the issue from the office of the National of an extra announcing General Scott's entrance into the City of Mexico. We will not forestall the opinions of our readers, but give the National's extra in full.

"General Scott in the City of Mexico- Quarrel between Santa Anna and Canalizo.

"There is news in the city, form the city of Mexico, as late as July 17th. It came through by a Mexican courier, who came by the way of Orizaba and Alvarado to Vera Cruz. General Scott entered Mexico on the 17th of July. He met with no opposition on his way from Puebla until he arrived at Penon, about eight miles from the city. Here a slight skirmish ensued between his advance and the Mexicans, when the latter fell back. The civil authorities then came out to meet General Scott. Stipulations were entered into, by which the persons and property of the citizens of Mexico were to be respected; this accomplished, our army marched quietly into the city of the Montezumas.

"This important news reached here in the Massachusetts, but has been withheld for purposes that we do not understand. The authority upon which we publish it, seems to us undoubted. The courier that brought this news could come from the city of Mexico via Orizaba to Vera Cruz in five days, if the weather is good, seven under any circumstances. The Massachusetts left Vera Cruz on the 23rd. It will be perceived that this allows seven days for the news to reach Vera Cruz by the route we have sailed.

"We know, upon the highest authority, that there is a letter now in this city, of the 17th July, from the city of Mexico. This gentleman, who gave us this information, has a letter of the 15th, in which is mentioned the preparations of families about leaving, from the approach of the Yankees.

"Santa Anna and Canalizo had quarreled about the defence of the city. Canalizo did not want the city injured, as there was no hope of successful resistance. He preferred to meet our troops in the plain, an there decide the contest. Santa Anna would not agree to this, so no opposition was made.

"The entrance of Gen. Scott into Mexico is a rumor. From the letter of the 15ht we know positively of the preparation of the families in the city to move on the approach of Gen. Scott, and of the quarrel between Santa Anna and Canalizo as to the defence of the city, and we know that there is a letter in the city of the 17th from Mexico.

"The courier that brought through the letter of the 17th brought news of Gen. Scott’s entering the city. We have no doubt of the truth of the report."

We have not a doubt (says the New Orleans [ . . . illegible . . . ])

View from General Scott

The Anesville (Ohio) Courier, of the 3d inst, contains the following letter, which it states is from a commissioned officer of the 5th Regimental U.S. Infantry. The Courier publishes it with the following remark:

"There is no longer a doubt of Scott’s advance, for here are the particulars, which may be relied upon. The letter was commenced on the 10th of July, and added to, on each evening, giving the . . . of that day, from the writer’s journal."

Letter from Mexico

M. Y. Beach- Dear Sir: You will be surprised to hear that peace is at last probable. - It ahs been rumored for a week that Mr. Trist had offered the basis of a treaty, and now I have to announce that a quasi set of Commissioners are on their way to meet Trist at Puebla. They go on their own hook, for there has been no quorum of Congress to legally appoint them, and should they accept the Treaty, which is rumored as more than probable, the Mexican nation will not feel itself bound by its beyond momentary interest. There are three of the Commissioners, Tornel, Gorostiza and Beranda, by one of whom I am permitted to send this letter to the Bishop of Puebla, for Gen. Scott is to send an express to Tampico. The treaty as it has leaked out astonishes every one, and form its liberality may induce the Commissioners to show a little obstinacy in order to get more favorable terms still. This is substantially the basis of the treaty- Mexico is to yield Upper and Lower California and New Mexico to the United States, in consideration of the sum of ten million dollars, three millions to be paid down and the balance secured by national bonds- the United States at once withdrawing all her forces, giving up her old claim or nine millions against Mexico, and paying her own cost and losses in the war.

General Scott

It has been a matter of considerable astonishment, not only in this country, but in Europe, and even in Mexico itself, that this officer did not take advantage of the panic occasioned by his overwhelming success in Cerro Gordo, and advanced immediately upon the Capital, before it had had time to recover from the blow-such an advance, it is said, would not only have been consistent with the rules of war, but with the well known character of General Scott, always terrible to attack, and seldom taking into consideration the necessity of retreat. It would have been highly gratifying to his army, flushed as they were with victory, confident in the talents of their leader, examining their wild ascertained superiority, and firmly pressed with the belief that no force of the enemy were any obstacle [. . . illegible . . . ] The eyes of the whole world were turned towards the American General; the utmost . . . Miscellaneous

It is our pleasure yesterday (says the New Orleans Delta of August 3) to converse with Lieutenant Niles, of the late second regiment of Illinois Volunteers. After the disbanding of the regiment, lieutenant Niles took command of a company of Texan Rangers, whose term of service has just expired, which for the present, relieves him from further military duty. He left the camp of General Taylor at Walnut Springs near Monterey, on the 17th ult., and brings the latest advices from that point.

The health of all the troops is good at Saltillo, Monterey, Cerravlo, Mier and Matatmoros. Thus remark applies to those recently arrived, as well as the more acclimated. General Taylor's whole command at the present time is about 7, 000 men- not more. Of these, General Wool has with him at Buena Vista 2, 900 or thereabout; there are immediately under General Taylor, at Monterey, 800; and at Mier, Cerravlo and Matamoros, there are about 3300. This statement may be relied on. General Wool is impatient for the word-march! Forward to San Luis! So is General Taylor; but before he gives that word he demands that a force of 10, 000 men, all equal in active service, be placed under his command, say 8, 000 men to advance with him and 2, 000 men to man his garrisons. Some time ago he believed a larger force necessary and, believing so, he wrote in the Department, stating that if he was not to be sent forward, he could spare General Scott 2, 000 men; but that if he were to be, he would require an aggregate force of 14, 000 men. He now rules the necessary number at 4, 000 less, for it is now known that the difficulty of Marching to San Luis Potosi, is no more than such as in ordinary cases is encountered.

The road from Camargo to Monterey it is perfectly clear, as indeed is the whole company this side of the mountains, of any organized guerilla force. Canales and Urrea are by... (unreadable) ...Luis Potosi, or the district of country between there and Tampico.

From Texas

The Steamship Yacht, Captain Crane, arrived yesterday from Galveston. We received by the papers to the 31st ult. (says the N. Orleans Delta, Aug. 3d.).

Loss of the U.S. Steamer Gov. Yell—The U.S. steamer Gov. Yell, which touched Galveston some two weeks since, on her way from New Orleans to Brazos was wrecked on Aransas Bar on the night of the 13th ult. The day was fine, but a heavy sea was rolling, to such a degree as to cause the vessel to labor and leak badly. In the evening it was impossible to keep up steam; but making Aransas bar at sunset, the Captain attempted to run in, the breakers ran high and extended entirely across the channel, so that she missed the pass, struck in three feet water, where the sea broke over her all night, with ropes in hand, ready to lash themselves to parts of the wreck in case she should go to pieces. She, however held mostly together until daylight, when the people threw overboard their baggage most of which was driven ashore by the waves, and had gained the beach in one way or another—The boat is a total wreck.

From The Army

The following is an extract of a letter turned in this city (says the Union) from an officer of the Government at Vera Cruz.

"Vera Cruz, July 23, 1847.

I was in hopes, by this time, there would be something definitive, or that we had arrived neared to peace; but as yet no commissions have been appointed, and the government has moved to a place further South. They will be a show of defence at Mexico, but Gen. Scott will march in. Our last dates from him were at the 10th inst. He was then to move on, if he did, he must be now in the city. General Pillow and Cadwallder, and all the (unreadable) reached him and his number was 12,000.

I see no other way or prospect for a peace treaty to form an anti-Santa Anna non-monarchial party, under the auspices of the American Army, and by this new Government is well and (unreadable)...The guerrillas have augmented to the left. The south and the north have threatened us that they will be coming in.

Gen. Scott Still at Puebla

The U.S. steamer Fashion, Cap. Ivy, arrived late last evening from Vera Cruz, bringing us dates from that city to the 2d inst. Her news is most important. She brings a large mail. Gen. Scott was still at Puebla on the 30th of July. The news of the National’s extra was totally unfounded, as we believed and have contended from the first.

The courier of the British legation arrived at Vera Cruz on the 31st ult., with correspondence from Mexico to the 29th of July, and from Puebla to the 30th.
Our letters from Vera Cruz differ somewhat from Mr. Kendall’s in regard to the probable movements of General Scott. They represent the chances of peace in a more favorable light than Mr. K, and think the resistance to our advance will be almost nominal. Mr. Kendall thinks differently, and gives his reasons. We can only find room this morning for his latest letters.

In Mexico every thing was at sixes and sevens. Congress has referred Mr. Buchanan’s letter back to the executive, and thrown upon him all the responsibilities of the war. About 26,000 men are collected for the defence of the city, but the peace party in the town is yet strong and increasing, and they have no faith in their Generals.

Gen. Pierce, with his train and convoy, had arrived safely at Perote. Gen. Scott, it will be seen, dispatched Gen. Smith’s brigade from Puebla to meet him. It will be seen that Mr. Kendall believes Gen. Scott would advance the first week in August upon Mexico, and that there would be the severest battle of the war. The Mexicans are fully prepared to receive him.

The Sun of Anahuc gives the following account of an encounter between General Pierce’s train and the guerrillas. It must be regarded as a rumor says our correspondent, and so to says the Sun;

‘A respectable person of the city has informed us that a letter has been received yesterday morning by a citizen of this place, from a guerrilla chief, stating that the guerrilleros, about 600 in number, attacked the train commanded by Gen. Pierce, near the National Bridge. The letter says the Americans approached under the fire of the Mexicans until they arrived within a hundred yards of them, when the American infantry open fire. The Sun tells of various exploits of Mexican robbers near Vera Cruz, but they are hardly worth repeating, stealing horses being the greatest feat. The following paragraph quotes the Sun of the 23rd ult. touches Father Jarauta.

This priest and his band of robbers having robbed some of the property belonging to the U.S. government, from General Cadwalder’s train, delivered it over to the Governor of Orizaba, who sold it and pocketed the proceeds. It is said the priest is not at all satisfied with this and has abandoned his command.

We have letters from the American officers, prisoners in Mexico, which we can not find any room for this morning. The latest date is the 15th of July. The health of the party is good, but they see no prospect of release. They long for the arrival on their behalf, but we do not yet know the result.

Gen. Alvarez was in the capital the middle of July and had several long interviews with Santa Anna.

Mr. Trist must have been indisposed. A private letter, written on the 29th, says his health has improved.

We have a copy of El Nacional of the 24th. This paper is published at Atlisco, the present capital of the state of Puebla. From that we learned that Gen. Garay has reported to the government that he had defeated 150 American riflemen at the river Calabozo. He sets down our loss at one captain and fifteen soldiers killed, five drowned and fifteen made prisoners. His side, he says only took forty horses and some mules and arms. His own loss in not mentioned.’

Arrival of the Fashion

Prospects of peace—This arrival brings us confirmation of rumors which have lately been published here, relative to the failure of the efforts of our Government, in the mission of Mr. Trist, to bring the Mexicans to listen to results. All prospects of peace are now dissipated at the moment, and the sword will once more appealed to, as an arbiter of the future destinies of that Republic, through the obstinacy of personal rulers who now preside over her government.

Editorial

What will the Whigs do?

Nothing that the Administration may do in the management of the war with Mexico, can give satisfaction to the fault finding Whigs. Every movement, every order, very demonstration is denounced. If success follow the measures adopted—if victory crown our advancing, they unite for the moment in shouts and hurras for the national glory achieved by our armies. Cannon roar—flags are flaunted to the town and joy and gratitude are on every lip. But when the blood has had time to cool, some disagree. The indiscriminate slaughter of a defenceless and unoffending group of semi-babrbrians. If after gaining a victory, an attempt must be made to improve it, by taking part of a session of the place where the battle was held or of the country we have conquered, and by holding it against the enemy until he will concede to terms of peace, then the Government can announce acquiring territory under the gains of indemnity, and indulging a merited conquest.

The News From Mexico

Monday, August 16, 1847 REi31p4c1 215 words

By The Southern Mail

Later from the Army of General Taylor

The steamer Ohio, Capt. J. Swiler Jr., arrived yesterday morning from Brazos Santiago, touching at Galveston. She left the Brazos on Saturday, the 31st instl. And Galveston on the 21st.

By the arrival we have the Matamorras Flag of the 28th ult. We give the first of all the Flag’s account of the “rumors” in circulation there in regard to General Scott:

It has been rumored here for a week past that Gen. Scott had arrived in the city of Mexico, with a loss of three hundred men, and we have learned from good authority that positive intelligence has been received here to that effect, but where [. . . illegible . . . ] fight at Rio Frio or in the city itself or as to the time arrived there with other troops remains uncertain. Gens. Pillow and Cadwalder joined the Commander-in-Chief at Puebla, his force numbered upwards of 12, 000 men with which he could have easily overcome all opponents. It is also asserted here that General Valencia by all accounts, had left San Luis for the city of Mexico with a large force.

According to the Flag, it is rumored that for a week past, General Scott has entered Monterey on the 13th ult, four days before he pretended that he entered the city.

Latest From Brazos

The Telegraph, which touched at Brazos, brought us the Matamorras Flag of the 4th inst., from which we extracted the following:

Advance upon San Luis—From Major Arthur, formerly quartermaster at Cerralvo, we learn that General Woel has received orders to proceed with the advance of General Taylor’s column on the 20th inst, in the direction of some 20 leagues from Buena Vista, where he will establish a depot, into which three months rations will be thrown. The army will advance upon San Luis, and communication be opened with Tampico.

Barbarians—A Mexican force, we have learned, was recently dispatched to the neighborhood of Parras, to destroy the crops of corn in the region. The resident Mexicans after applying to General Taylor for assistance, collected in force and themselves drove off the destroyers. There can be no doubt that the people of Tamaulipas would gladly erect theirs into an independent state. Their miserable, ever changing Government, not only taxes them exorbitantly, but refuses them protection from robbers within, and from aggressions of the Indians from without their limits. They have more than once attempted to cut loose from the central government, but found they Important Mexican Documents

It has already been mentioned that Senor Pacheco was appointed Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs early in July. The name of this gentlemen has long been connected with the politics of the country, and Mexican papers before us declare him to be a man of ability and of unquestioned patriotism. The American Star, published at Puebla, seems to admit his capacity and patriotism, but insinuates that he is a man of gallantry, and distinctly attributes the rupture between France and Mexico, to a guilty intrigue of Pacheco with the French Minister's wife. Be this as it may, considerable importance must attach to the views now entertained by Pacheco, as he is the organ of Santa Anna's government with foreign nations. Upon entering office, he addressed in the Governors of the States a circular expressive of his views of public affairs. The document does not appear to us to be written in the best taste, being extremely egotistical, nor to evince great ability; and we should not translate it but for the fact that it may safely be deemed the latest and best exponent of Santa Anna's views which we have. It abounds with fulsome panegyric of President, but we must presume, in the absence of positive evidence to the contrary, that it speaks the sentiments of Santa Anna and his administration.

By the circular it appears that the Administration in Mexico, like our own, is bound to prosecution of the war until glorious peace shall be obtained—hasta obtener una paz gloriosa.

From the Army of Gen. Taylor

The U.S. transport schr. Belle, Capt. Morgan, arrived yesterday from Brazos Santiago, having sailed thence on the 6th Aug. The papers from Matamoras are no later than have been before received, but we have a mail through from the army of General Taylor. The Belle brought over the remains of Lieut. Charles Hoskins, 4th infantry, who fell gallantly at Monterey, and of the following members of two Kentucky regiments: Henry Edwards, John J Thorea, Abraham Goodpaster, Enoch Broton, Sergt. Henry WOld, WM. Blackwell, Lemuel Bartlett, James Seston, John Sanders, and John Ellenwood. These remains are in charge of Maj. Milam and Mr. L.C. Jefferies.

From the Union

The city has been excited today by rumors that Scott had taken the capital with the loss of 1, 100 of his men, and with the capture of many thousands of the Mexicans.

It was given as telegraphic news from Richmond. There is nothing in the N.O papers of this evening to confirm it. In fact no accounts from General Scott’s camp.

Telegraphic bulletins from Richmond are frequently so incorrect, that scarcely any one places confidence in them. They are passing into a sort of proverb. But as Mr. Kendall shows, this is not the fault of the telegraph, but of some of those who use it, or rather abuse it, at Richmond. The telegraph is but the unconscious instrument of those who employ it; and we might as well blame the mail for the incorrect and hastily intelligence it sometimes communicates, as the telegraph.

From Mexico

The Southern mail of yesterday morning brings us dates from Monterey of the 27th July. A correspondent of the New Orleans Delta states that a move to San Louis Potosi has finally been decided on, and all the departments connected with Gen. Taylor’s columns are actively engaged in preparing for the march.

The 1st September is the time fixed upon for the forward movement. The forces under Gen. Taylor would seem, in my opinion, to be totally inadequate for such an undertaking, but the old Hero has, to use his favorite classic quotation, determined on the matter nolus volus.

Dates to the 30th July have been received from the city of Mexico. Gen. Scott had not then moved. Santa Anna and the Mexican Congress are at variance. Santa Anna desires an expression of the will of the nation as to listening to the American propositions for adjustment of expressing differences. But Congress is silent: no quorum appears, and for this official journal, the Diario del Gobierro lashes the delinquent members.

In this connection (says the N.Orleans Picayune) we may have mention that Congress and Santa Anna are at variance upon another point. The papers represent that Congress is strongly in favor of the removal of the seat of government; Santa Anna is violently opposed to it. From Santa Anna’s obstinacy upon this point, some think that he is scheming to make the fate of the capital the crises of the war. Should it fall, they believe he will insist upon peace. Should he make a successful defence, Gen. Scott’s army would be overwhelmed in all probability.

The Wilmont Proviso

The Philadelphia North American charges the Democrats of the North with having defeated the Wilmont Proviso, and says the papers in that latest have taken ground in advance, against its principles. We are glad to have this evidence from the pen of an opponent of the loyalty of our party in the Northern States to right and justice. We are rejoiced to see that they stand by the South and the Union on this great question. But the same paper which gives us this pleasing intelligence also gives us some of the opposite character. It tells us that the Whig party, though “deprecating the necessity of such a Proviso, will, it circumstances require, support it and the principles it involves with all the vigor which comes from the conspicuousness of right and persecution of duty.” We hope that the N. American is not authorized to speak for the Whig party in this matter- that it has not been truly represented. If not a majority of the Whigs we trust that the Southern Whigs will not make a party question of such a momentous subject, but will be found by the side of the Democrats doing battle for the rights of the South and the safety of the Union. On the Bank, Tariff and Annexation questions, they went with their party against Southern interests. Southern rights are now as sailed, and we hope they will pause before they go further.

The Course of the Next Congress

Some days since, in criticizing the position of Messrs. Bolt, Crowin, and Haskell, in favor of an instant withdrawal of our troops from Mexico, and the refusal of an acre of Mexican territory by way of indemnity for our heavy expenses and losses through her wrongful conduct, we took occasion to avow the opinion, that the Whig party, if in power, would not dare to change the policy already pursued by the Administration, but would be compelled to carry on exactly what the much abused Democratic Executive has been called on, by its high constitutional obligations, to put in force. We contended that, under the circumstances, to withdraw our troops to the boundary line of Texas would be fatal to peace, would encourage the infatuated hopes of Mexico, and would make us laughing-stock and contempt of the world, to be insulted and struck at by the powerful nations of Europe. The majority of Whigs in the next House of Representatives, thrilling though it be, which he late elections indicate, has naturally elicited attention to the probable course of the majority upon the great question of the war.

Seven Days Later From Puebla

The steamship Galveston, Capt. Hayliard arrived yesterday from Vera Cruz, having touched at Tampico, Brazos and Galveston. She left Vera Cruz on the 12th inst.

By this arrival we are in possession of advices from Puebla to the 6th of August—just one week later than we had before received. Our letters were brought through from Puebala to Vera Cruz by a courier dispatched exclusively for this office. The news is important.

Gen. Scott was still at Puebla on the 5th inst. But the army was to take up the lines of the next day for the city of Mexico. General Twiggs’ division leaving on the 7th.

Gen. Pierce arrived at Puebla on the 6th inst. Not on the 2d inst. As some of our correspondent cararies stated. He lost not a single men on the march, notwithstanding “another severe battle with the guerrillas.”

The most agreeable news by this arrival is the escape of Major Gaines from the city of Mexico and the arrival of Major Scott.

Mr. Brownson and the War

We have read carefully the reply of the Whig to our article of Monday, commenced on Wednesday and concluded yesterday. After doing so, we see no reason to alter a word we have written. Indeed, the Whig fails to meet the point we were discussing. Mr. Brownson had drawn a distinction between a state of the war and mere hostilities, and accused the President of uttering a deliberate falsehood in his message to Congress, stating that war existed by the act of Mexico, and asserted that he thereby trampled on the rights of Congress, violated the Constitution, and made the United States responsible for the war. In our reply, we admitted the distinction between war and hostilities; but contended by the Mexican army, were such as to justify the President in believing that war did exist by the act of Mexico. That the course he pursued did not interfere with the rights of Congress, or violate the Constitution, and that the United States were not thereby made responsible for the war. [JM]

RE47v44n35p1c7, September 3, 1847: ANOTHER LETTER FROM GENERAL TAYLOR

Gen. Taylor has replied to a letter addressed to him by a Democratic meeting held at Clarksville in this State. It differs but little from the one to Dr. Delony, which we published a few days since. The Clarksville Jeffersonian says that the letter to which Gen. Taylor’s is a reply, contained a series of resolutions embodying the principles, upon which the meeting wished to know the General’s opinions. The first resolution expressed a settled hostility to a National bank, and a belief that such an institution is not only unconstitutional, but highly expedient. The second referred to the same subject. The third resolution declared in favor of the Independent Treasury and the separation of Bank and State. The fourth declared against a Tariff for Protection; the fifth against the distribution of the proceeds of sales of the public lands, and the sixth against the policy of internal improvements by the General Government. The seventh expressed the belief in the right of Texas, as an independent sovereignty, to annex itself to the United States, and the obligation imposed upon us after the act of annexation to protect her territory. --Then came a preamble which alluded to the movement which had been made by the Whig party in favor of Gen. Taylor, and took the ground without qualification that the Democratic party could not support any man whose principles were not well defined and wholly and entirely Democratic. The followed the resolution instructing the officers of the committee to address a letter to Gen. Taylor touching his opinions upon several matters referred to in the resolutions. Another resolution fully endorsed the course of the present administration, and congratulated the people upon the prosperity of the country under the Democratic rule. It will be seen that Gen. Taylor declines replying to any of these questions. He declares that he is no politician, and has not time to devote to an investigation of the subjects embraced in the resolutions, so as to be able to reply to them in a way that would be satisfactory to himself or his interrogators.
HEAD QUARTERS, ARMY OF OCCUPATION,
Camp near Monterey, Mexico,
July 20, 1847

Dear Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your esteemed letter of the 16th, which has just reached me, accompanied by certain resolutions entered into by a Democratic meeting of my fellow citizens of Clarksville, Tennessee, on the 7th of June last, in relation to certain important matters and principles connected with the management of our national affairs, desiring to know my views and opinions in regard to the same, as they might have an important bearing on their course, should my name be before the country as a candidate for the Presidency at the coming election; which I must beg leave to decline doing, for even if disposed to do so, I can spare the time from my official duties to devote to the investigation of those subjects which their importance seem to require, to enable me to reply to them in a way that would be satisfactory to myself, much less so to your honorable committee. I must therefore say in this instance what I have stated to others on like occasions, which is, that I am no politician, near forty years of my life having been passed in the military service of the Republic, most of which in the field, the camp, on our western frontier, or in the Indian territory, and I may say with great propriety for the most part constantly on duty, the last two in Mexico, or on its immediate borders, during which time I have not passed on night under the roof of a house; you may therefore readily suppose under such circumstances, I have had but little time to devote to the consideration or investigation of important political matters, or to their discussion, nor have I attempted to do so, or been mixed up with political men or matters in any way, not even having voted for one of our chief magistrates or any one else since I have been in the public service, having been stationed or serving for the most part beyond the limits of the States.

I can say in all sincerity I have aspirations for the Presidency; and if I am a candidate, or to be one, it must be recollected I am or will be made so by others, and by no agency of mine in the matter. Under this state of things, should a majority of the good people of our country think proper to elevate me to the first office in their gift, or I may say the first in the world, I will feel bound to serve them, and will be so honestly and faithfully, to the best of my abilities, strictly in conformity to the provisions of the Constitution, as near as possible in the way it was acted on and construed by our Presidents, two of whom at least participated in creating and putting in operation that glorious instrument. But many important changes in our affairs at home and abroad may take place between this and the time for holding the election for filling said office, so much so, as to make it desirable for the general good that some individual other than myself should be selected as a candidate for that station--and could be elected, I will not say that I would yield my pretensions to that distinguished position--for I have not the vanity to believe I have any--but I would not only acquiesce with pleasure in such an arrangement, but would rejoice that the Republic had one citizen more worthy and better qualified than I am, and no doubt there are thousands, to discharge the arduous and important duties appertaining to the high office. --Be this as it may, should I ever occupy the White House, it must be by the spontaneous move of the people, and by no act of mine, so that I could enter on the duties appertaining to the Chief Magistrate of the country untrammeled and unpledged beyond what I have previously stated as regards to the Constitution, so that I could and would be President of the nation, and not of a party.

For the interest you and other kind friends of the committee, and those you and the represent, take in my continued success against the enemy while this war continues, which I sincerely hope will some be brought to an honorable close, as well as I fear for the too flattering manner you have been please to connect my name with the distinguished office in question, and especially for the handsome and complimentary terms in which they have been communicated, are duly appreciated, and for which I beg leave to tender to you and through you to the gentlemen of the committee, collectively and individually, my most cordial thanks for the same. With considerations of highest respect and esteem, I remain, gentlemen, Your ob't, and devoted serv't.,

Z. TAYLOR.
Major General, U.S. Army,

RE47v44n35p1c7, September 3, 1847: THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

The mail of last month apprized us that the victorious and apparently unimpeded career of General Scott to the capital had been brought to a full stop at Puebla though rather by his own weakness than the enemy’s strength. It was intimated also that some new base would be taken for the line of operations on the city of Mexico, and the arrival of fresh reinforcements, their organization at Vera Cruz, and their junction with the main body, must all precede any future movements. --While war was thus cared for, peace was no neglected, and with the usual ambidexterous attitude of an American army, the Commander-in-Chief and the “peace commissioner” were to advance together.

The terms of peace as most recently reported, are interesting and characteristic. America is to have the line of the Bravo up to the Pass, or as some say, even to Santa Fe, together with the Province of Upper California. It is even asserted in the private correspondence of some the trains Atlantic journals, that Lower California, also, together with a right of way across the central isthmus, will be comprised in the demands of Mr. Trist. Each party is to pay its own expenses, and Mexico is to be reimbursed for her cessions of territory, in which category, however, the original bone of contention, the Doab, between Del Norte and Nueces, is not to be included. A suggestion, which we suspect must have come from the Americans, proposes that part of the payment for these lands should be made in responsibility... rather than cash, and that after "three millions" have been paid down handomely, the remaining accounts between the high contracting parties should be balanced by the U. States taking a certain portion of the foreign debt of Mexican on their own shoulders—a very pretty example of "conversion," which the creditors, however, will probably hardly think it worth their while to quarrel about. Between certain securities, as between certain insects, there is no settling the precedence.

The truth cannot be denied, if the market had but been opened a little more fairly, New California is of no more use to Mexico than Louisiana was to France. Not only is the population of Mexico almost stationary, while that of the United States increases at a rate greater than that of our won islands, but the country at the head of the California Gulf is such an irreplaceable waste that all ordinary intercourse by the route between Mexico and the upper provinces would be impossible, while the coast is of such character as to render any regular communication by sea but a little more practicable. California could never be settled by the Mexicans, whereas the tide setting westward from the U.S. shows what must almost necessarily result in that quarter. In the present day, the sovereignty of this barren and half explored province may seem of small amount, but its capabilities and promise have not escaped the eyes of the prudent. The bay of San Francisco is the finest in the world, and described by Captain Wilkes as amply capacious enough to receive the united naives of America and Europe.

From so favorable a harbor, the course lies straight and obvious to Polynesia, the Phillipines, New Holland and China, and it is not extravagant to suppose that the merchants of this future emporium may open the commerce of Japan. So grandly, indeed, are the destinies of this province prefigured by intelligent American writers, that it was been represented as unlikely long to be subordinate to the powers of Atlantic seaboard, but as promising to rise into an independent power, which should ride over the waters of the Pacific. Such is the region which an ambitious and aggressive state is not endeavoring to extort from an imbecile but obstinate neighbor—an attempt, in which it is indeed, probable that she will ultimately succeed, but of which the realization appears thrown too a greater distance by every successive mail.

RE47v44n35p1c7, September 3, 1847: CENTRAL AMERICA

Address of the President of Honduras, calling on the States of Central American to Aid

The Mexicans, in their Contest with the United States.

We are indebted to our obliging contemporary of La Patria, for a copy of this important document, which we translate for the benefit of our readers:

PROCLAMATION.

The President of the States of Honduras to the Central Americans.

Compatriots! Fortune now rules the destinies of Mexico, and menaces her sons with desolation and extermination. The North Americans have destroyed the interesting population of Vera Cruz—have possessed themselves of their effects, and are now marching upon the Capital. We [illegible] what other calamities will afflict [illegible]. They are our [illegible] and their fate awaits us. We should not maintain neutrality, if we can in any manner aid them in their honorable struggle.

The entire would should know that the Hondurenos are ready to fulfill their duties, of whatever nature they may be.

I will sustain in the State an honorable peace, at all hazards; but I will not do it with the sacrifice of Hondurian honor, for a disgraced people arc fit but to bear chains, and to suffer with humility the threats and the injuries which the stronger impose.

I address myself to-day to the Government of the Republic; making these observations in order that it shall be deemed expedient, we may, if it is possibly, afford aid, or at least manifest our favorable disposition to their cause and to liberty.

Divisions and internal feuds have ruined our Mexican brothers. Eight millions of inhabitants of whom that nation is composed, have been unable to defend themselves against a handful of men, who have seized upon their territory and their property, and annulled their rights. What may be the fate of the Central Americans if we continue divide?

The Hondurenians always appear extraordinarily great; they adopted the most effectual means to secure their independence; but nothing has been sufficient to estrange them; respect to the Government, and submission to law, they consider as their power, their glory, and their honor.

What happiness does he experience, who rules the destinies of a people adorned by the virtues!!!
Comayaga, June 1st, 1847.

The Undersigned, Generals of Division, to the Army of Honduras.

Companions! Notorious is the anguish of Mexico, and evident is our obligation to co-operate in the defence of that country. Her sons are our brothers, and the cause which they sustain is also ours, that of liberty against conquest.

In compliance with a sacred duty, the proclamation addressed by the President to the Central Americans was yesterday published, and we wish to express our deference and our desire to co-operate at any time that he may call upon us to aid our neighbor.

Forgotten forever are all those ideas which could divide us. Our interests and our passions are second to our country. Her triumph is our glory and our honor. She demands our union, and that suffices to cause us to cordially offer it. Union and liberty is our motto! Eternally opprobrium to him who would promote and assist dissensions and conquests.

RE47v44n35p3c5, September 3, 1847: LATER FROM THE RIO GRANDE

Since our last there have been several arrivals from the Brazos, by which we have the Matamoras Flag of the 11th, 14th, and 18th inst.

Much the most important intelligence by this arrival is contained in the following, from the Flag of the 18th:

ANOTHER MASSACRE. --Intelligence was received on Saturday last, confirmed since by letters from Cerralvo to the 9th inst. that a scouting party of twenty-seven Texans, commanded by Capt. Baylor, ordered out by the Col. Abbott, commandant at Cerralvo, to scour the country between that post and Monterey, had fallen in with a large body of Mexicans, and all had been killed out three.

Our letters inform us that Captain Baylor left Cerralvo on the 6th., and following out his instructions, visited several ranchos in the neighborhood of where the recent attacks had been made upon the trains. At two of these ranchos goods and property captured from the trains were found secreted in the houses, and the guilt of a participation in these robberies being clearly proven against the Mexican residents, the property was retaken, the dwellings of the guilty burned, and several known desperate characters killed. With three prisoners which he had captured, Capt. Baylor was returning to the main road, when he found himself surrounded by a large force of Mexicans, stated at three hundred, undoubtedly the same force which had attacked the trains previously. He was completely hemmed in, and the Mexicans charged upon his small band, killing many of them the first discharge of fire arms. Three of the party effected their escape by crawling into the chaparral, and got into Cerralvo dreadfully lacerated with thorns. When they last say Captain Baylor he was wounded and unhorsed, but still fighting, and only three of his men were in their saddles. They think it impossible that any more could have escaped, and do not believe that the Mexicans made any prisoners. Two days had elapsed since they got back to Cerralvo, and nothing had been heard of any of the rest of the party. In the dwelling of one of the Mexicans made prisoner by Capt. Baylor, (so the men who escaped report, ) were found two letters from the chief alcalde of Cerralvo to Canales, informing him in whose possession he had placed certain goods captured from the trains, which he (canales) had empowered him to dispose of in Cerralvo, and also giving him to understand that if he stood in need of arms, horses or men, he had but to make his wishes known and they would be attended to. These letters were in Capt. B’s possession when attacked, and have been recovered by the Mexicans. IN consequence of the report made to Col. Abbot, he has had the alcalde and several other influential Mexicans arrested.

After confirming the above, an officer in the Massachusetts regiment writes from Cerralvo to a friend in this city, under date of the 8th of August:

"The two last trains up were attacked, and thirty of forty pack mules cut off from each. ---A train left here yesterday from Monterey and we have positive information that some 400 Mexicans are lying on the road to cut them off. I do not know when we shall move on, but, if at all, I think somewhere about the 1st of September.

The Flag has become satisfied that all intentions of an advance towards San Luis by the column of Gen. Taylor have been abandoned. --The Flag condemns this course; considering it an essential step on our part to occupy San Luis Potosi, and open communications from that city to Mexico."
The following extracts are made from the Flag of the 11th:

FROM MONTEREY. --TRAINS ATTACKED. Mr. Coolridge, of the Massachusetts regiment, and several other gentlemen, direct from Monterey, who left there on the 1st of August, and arrived here on Monday last, furnish us with the following particulars of the operations of the guerillas on the Monterey road:

On the 39th July, an express mail wagon for Monterey, with an escort of seven men, under Lieutenant Reynolds, was attacked ten miles from Marin, by about sixty Mexicans. The mail driver succeeded in passing the ambuscade, and putting his horses to their speed, reached in safety the encampment of a train which was coming down from Monterey. The escort were scattered by the assault, and two of the number are missing, supposed to have been killed.

The next day after this attack, a merchant's train, composed of sixty mules and several wagons, under a small escort of citizens, was attacked at Punta Aguda, by a large force of Mexicans. And the entire train captured. The assault was so sudden and overpowering, that no resistance could be offered. The first intimation of an attack was given by a discharge of firearms from the thickets on each side of the road, and an immediate charge of cavalry on the train. The number of attacking party could not be correctly ascertained, but it was supposed to be from 100 to 150. Immediate flight was the only chance of escape, and all who could sought safety in the thickets, and afterwards to reach the rancho of Papagallas, where, fortunately, a train from Monterey, escorted by 30 dragoons, had just arrived and encamped for the night. Those who had escaped from the attack on the train, gained the side of the mountain during the night, from whence they discerned the American encampment at Papagallas, and all but one of the escort go into the encampment before morning. The Mexican muleteers, and all the merchandize, amounting in value to some twelve or fifteen thousand dollars, fell into the hands of the Mexicans. Only one American was known to be killed, though several were missing. The downward train broke up their encampment at Papagallas in the morning, and came on to Cerralvo without molestation. In passing the spot were the attack had been made the evening previous, no vestige of the property had been left. The body of the wagoner was found a short distance from the road, and buried. Canales commands the robbers who have proved so successful in their forays of late.

THE TRAIN UNDER MAJOR LALLY. --One of the Patria's Vera Cruz correspondents writes that the train under Major Lally has been a second time attacked by the guerrillas, and sustained a severe check, losing two hundred and fifty men. But for an accident, their defeat would have been entire. The letter further says, in conclusion that "the Yankees have capitulated." We shall not believe one word of this till we have other authority for it. We have no doubt, however, that this train will be more harassed than any which has yet gone up. We shall be relieved when we hear of its safe arrival at Perote.

FROM YUCATAN. --By the arrival of the schooner Primera Campechana, at New Orleans, the editors of La Patria have dates from Yucatan. The advices are of unusual importance. It appears that a conspiracy had been entered among the Indians of various villages for an insurrection. One of them, who was entrusted with the secret, traitorously divulged it to the Governor of Valladolid. Through his management, the principals implicated in the affair were arrested and executed, the cacique Antoni Ay being the first. As soon as this became known, the Indians rose in some of the villages and massacred all the whites and those of missed race, save the women, and not excepting those women might be enciente. The details of their excesses are horrible. The white race at once united in self-defence. The Government has appealed to the people to forget their party animosities and join for common protection. Seventeen Indian villages are involved in the insurrection. Government has forbidden the sale of arms and take other measures for the public security. We do not enter into the details of this affair, as they possess little interest, save the people of the Yucatan themselves. [Picayune.

DEPARTURE OF TROOPS. --The following Government transports left yesterday for the seat of war, ( says the New Orleans Picayune, August 24. ) the prompt departure of such a number of troops indicates energy in the quartermaster's department.

FOR TAMPIO. --The United States steamer New Orleans, E. Auld, commander, with five companies second Regiment Illinois Volunteers, under command of Lieutenant Colonel Hicks. Passengers:--Dr. Remes and Dr. Whitesides.

FOR VERA CRUZ. --The United States steamship Massachusetts, with four companies second Regiment Illinois Volunteers, under command of Colonel Collins.

The chartered steamer Mary Kingsland, with one company 2d Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and Capt. Connolly's company Louisiana Mounted Volunteers, together with 70 teamsters for service in the Quartermaster's department of the army of Gen. Scott.

The Telegraph will leave this day for the Brazos' with a detachment of 12th Infantry, under Capt. Clinck. [BRM]
The more we think of this event, (say the New Orleans Picayune) the more unfortunate do we regard it for the cause of peace, faint as our hopes were before of the speedy termination of the war. --Grave censure will fall on official heads for the failure to arrest Paredes, and yet we do not permit ourselves to doubt that the Secretary of War and the diplomatic agents of the Government in Europe will be found to have discharged their duty in the premises in good time. It is not necessary to prejudice the case and designate more particularly those on whom the weight of responsibility those on whom the weigh of responsibility rests: public opinion has already declared itself with fatal distinctness.

From Vera Cruz we learn that Senor Atocha met Gen. Paredes after the latter landed and recognized him. Paredes is understood to have signified him by a sign to "keep dark," and the handsome Senor did so for the space of an hour or more--at all events, until the distinguished Mexican had passed out of the city's gates. We have seen these facts written from Vera Cruz by a gentleman of sense and discretion. From him we learn, too, that Senor Atocha held a situation in the customs at Vera Cruz, from which he has been promptly dismissed for conniving at the escape of Paredes. Every day is further developing the fitness of Senor Atocha to act as the emissary of our Government!

We learn, too, that Capt. Clark, the port captain at Vera Cruz, has been dismissed from his post for the remissness in this affair of Paredes--We mention this and what we have said above of Atocha on the authority of a private letter from Vera Cruz from a gentleman who would not mislead us and who should be very well informed. It is his opinion that the English have had a more direct agency in the business that the facts yet developed show.

The correspondent of La Patria gives quite a dramatic scene between General Paredes and the Mexican who furnished him with the necessary supplies for his expedition into the interior. According to this, the merchant had been the political opponent of General Paredes in days gone by, but was touched by the appeal of the latter to his patriotism, the General avowing his purpose to be to throw himself into the arms of his countrymen, and procure a position in the army to assist in the salvation of his country. Whether the sketch be fanciful or not, we deem it the true key to the part which Paredes will enact.

The same writer says that among the Mexicans of all parties the arrival of Paredes has excited a general enthusiasm. They argue that Paredes will be able to derive from the clergy the resources necessary to prolong the war for many years. It is conjectured, too, that the six States which have formed the Coalition and declared themselves opposed to any peace, may call upon Paredes to assume leadership. Viewed in whatever light you choose, the return of Paredes is regarded as injurious to the designs of the U. States, and very possibly to those of Santa Anna. There can, we think, be no doubt to this.

"MEXICO. --We made upon her; we invaded her territory; we took possessions of her soil, we laid waster her towns and cities, and we are unable to discover what are the benefits these acts have conferred on her, that we should demand from her indemnification. No soldier of Mexico has set his foot on our soil, or injured us by any act of his, to the value of a farthing. If wars were waged or settled on principles of abstract justice, instead of on the principle that 'might makes right,' we should have to give Mexico indemnification, in place of demanding it of her."

The words are from the Atlas; but the ideas are constantly repeated, in the opposition papers, though they have, again and again, been shown to be false and unfounded. We shall once more, in a few words, plainly demonstrate the contrary truth, and the impossibility of avoiding the unhappy stand which our government was unwillingly compelled to take.

Mexico effected a revolution, and cast off the yoke of Spain. Texas, then a part of Mexico, growing weary of the subsequent factions, the new revolutions, the internal wars, cruelties, and devastations constantly occurring in that unsettled and unhappy country--and, moreover, her soil adjoining ours, and being peopled and owned in a great measure by persons from the United States--it became the interest and the desire of its inhabitants to separate from Mexico, and to become united to this country. Texas first declared and effected her independence, which was recognized by us and the principal powers of Europe. She then, as a sovereign, independent State sought and agreed to become one of the United States, and was received by us as such. This was done by both countries in the manner sanctioned by law and by former precedents. By this union the United States became constitutionally bound to defend the rights and the territories of Texas, as a portion of the Union, from all foreign claims and encroachments.

Texas claimed, and had claimed, a certain boundary to her territory, on the side of Mexico. This boundary had been formally recognized and admitted by the Government of Mexico. We were, therefore, as much bound to defend and maintain the territory of Texas up to that boundary, as we should be if Mexico were to claim and invade any portion of the territory of Massachusetts.

Mexico, notwithstanding a former recognition of this boundary line, subsequently refused to admit it, and asserted her determination to exceed it by force of arms. It then became necessary for us to place an armed force near that line, in order to defend our rights and to prevent invasion. That force was attacked by the forces of Mexico, by the express order of its Government, and she thus commenced hostilities against this country. We were obliged to repel them—and thus a war instituted between the two countries. Congress subsequently sanctioned the course and adopted by our executive government, voted men and supplies, and declared war as existing between the two nations “by the act of Mexico.” A great majority of the people, of all parties, has since approved and supported the measures, adopted by government. We must therefore pursue this war, however, unwillingly, till our rights are respected, and justice—nothing more than justice—its accorded to us. We cannot recede. Our obligations to Texas and to ourselves forbid us to flinch. Honor, patriotism, justice, duty, all command us to preserve, and unite against the foe, till our rights are acknowledged and our just claims satisfied.

It is true—and pity’t is true—there is a certain portion of our citizens—or, rather, our inhabitants or residents, (we will not call them citizens)—who have long lived happily and prosperously under the paternal guardianship of this government, many of whom have acquired princely fortunes while sustained by its protection arm—there is a portion of such people; we say, who have ever been found not only mimical to this government, and at war with its measures, but absolutely encouraging, aiding and abetting the enemy in times of war—who are now thus willfully protracting the existing struggle, merely for the selfish and suicidal purpose of rendering, if possible, the Democratic party unpopular, removing it from power, and placing themselves in the chair of state. All patriotic feelings are renounced—all regard for weeping humanity and for suffering millions is extinguished—all pride for their country’s honor is thrown to the winds—every high and noble principle is sacrificed—and for what?—for the basest and most ignorable ambition. A ruinous and bloody war, by their shameful opposition at home, and assistance abroad, is purposely continued and protracted, solely with the vain hope of disgracing, in the eyes of the people, our own government and our own country, and, by this traitorous means, of attaining power themselves, and of accomplishing their own selfish and pernicious designs. {Boston Post.

[BRM]
Ayotla on Friday, the 13th inst., and up to that date had not fired a gun. This news reached Vera Cruz by a gentleman who left Ayotla on the 13th, coming down by way of Orizaba. Ayotla is buy 21 miles from the city of Mexico, being 20 miles beyond the pass of Rio Frio. We now turn for a moment to other subjects of great interest.

The expedition which left Vera Cruz about the 13 instant to re-inforce Major Lally’s command was composed of Capt. Wells’s company of the 12th infantry, Capt. Halle’s company of Louisiana Rangers, all under command of Captain Wells. They returned to Vera Cruz on the 17th, after having proceeded as far as National Bridge, where they expected to overtake Major Lally’s command. Major Lally, however. Had gone on, and by subsequent advices at Vera Cruz it is known that he had carried up his train in safety beyond Jalapa.

The command of Capt. Wells was compelled to fight their way to the Bridge; and they made the attempt to pass it, but found all the heights occupied by the guerrillas, who opened a heavy fire upon them, killing nearly all the mules and forcing the whole party to retire. They left the whole of their wagons, save only one, in the possession of the enemy. All the baggage of the officers and knapsacks of the men, which were in the wagons, fell into the hands of the Mexicans, and little else besides the mail was saved. The loss of men in this affair has been five or six killed and two or three wounded, and several men have subsequently died from fatigue and exposure on the march.

About eight miles this side of the Bridge, Capt. Wells, on his advance, detached twelve dragoons, accompanied by Dr. Cooper, with directions to go forward cautiously, and, if they encountered any obstacles, to return and report the fact at once. Nothing has since been heard of this party, and it is supposed the whole have fallen into the hand for the Mexicans. These twelve dragoons we suppose to be a portion of Fairchild’s company. Dr. Cooper was the surgeon who went up with the train.

Capt. Wells had five successive engagements with the enemy before the final affair at the Bridge. In this the Mexicans had one piece of artillery engaged, from which they fired grape, and were thus able to make their stand against the command of Capt. Wells.

Maj. Lally on going up with the train is said to have had a sharp skirmish with the guerrillas at Cerro Gordo, and to have expected another brush with them at La Hoya. No accounts of these affairs have been received, but our latest letters say there where is no doubt of the safety of the train. No news had been heard at Vera Cruz of Capt. Besançon’s company for a fortnight. It was out on a scout when news reached there that Major Lally required reinforcements, and it is by many supposed that the company fell in with the train, and, crossing the National Bridge, continued up with it. Others again think differently, and suppose the whole company has been cut off by the Mexicans. Such is the tenor of our latest letters.

In regard to Gen. Scott’s march, there were rumors at Vera Cruz that he had met the enemy and repulsed them after a sharp engagement, in which he lost 800 men. This the Mexicans regarded as a victory on their part, at their loss was insignificant. Notwithstanding these details, our correspondent writes that there is no truth in them whatever. He also considers the announcement of the Sun of Anahuac that Gen. Scott arrived at Ayotla on the 11th as a statement hazarded upon mere rumor. He has confidence in the veracity of a man who arrived on the 21st, and declares the vanguard of Scott’s army to have been in Ayotla on the 13th, having met no resistance so far. Both the Vera Cruz papers and our correspondent believed that Gen. Scott was in possession of Mexico by the 20th inst, but they had no information to this effect.

We have more minute accounts on board the ship Agnes of the various engagements with the guerrillas mentioned above. The Mississippi, being a fast sailer, has anticipated those accounts, but without supplying all the details.

We have no letter direct from the army. The Boletín de las Noticias, of Jalapa, says that more correspondence from the army has been intercepted by the guerrillas. --This paper appears to have advices from Puebla to the 10th inst., but only states that the last divisions of the American army left on that day 4000 strong.

the destructive of that instrument and the usurpation of Santa Anna rendered them independent without any further act of their own. This was the sum and substance of the Texas declaration of independence as it is termed. That the people of Texas was right in taking this course, will be apparent, if we apply their reasoning to our own Government. We presume that no one would contend that the people of Virginia, or of any State in the Union, would owe obedience to any but their State government if the Constitution would be the overthrow of the government established under it. That would sever the only tie which united the different States, and would, of course, leave them separate and unconnected republics, free to enter into a new and different confederacy or not, as they might think fit. If this be true of us, it must have been true of Texas after Santa Anna’s usurpation. For the Mexican Republics, both in their State and Federal institutions, were modeled after our own. They had the same State sovereignty and the same Federal compact that we have—and usurpation there would necessarily confer the same absolute independence that it would here.

Texas was thus made entirely independent of the central Government by the destruction of the central Constitution, and was at once at liberty to do all those acts which sovereign States have a right to do. Our own Government acknowledged this, and entered into treaties with her. Santa Anna endeavored to force the people of Texas to obey the new and despotic Government which he had created, and to whose creation the people of Texas had never consented. Had he succeeded in his undertaking, new questions might have been presented. But so far from this his fortune did not have even the semblance of success. He was not only thwarted in his plans of conquest, but he was defeated. His army was completely put to out and he taken prisoner. He had no just claim to Texas, and nothing but victory and conquest could give him any claim. But instead of victory he found defeat, and instead of being a conqueror he was taken captive. The Mexican Government could not claim the right of the strongest, for on the battle-field she had been proved to be the weakest. Six years clapsed without any further change. Texas, being of right independent, had on the battle-field asserted her right successfully. Years elapsed, and no effort worth the name was made to subdue her. In this state of the case, the treaty of annexation was brought forward—the Mexican minister at Washington, General Almonte, notified our Government that if the measure of annexation was consummated, his Government would regard it as a war. If we mistake not, he said Mexico would look upon it as a declaration of war. Months elapsed; and he did not retract that message. His Government was thus made responsible for it—Annexation was consummated; and in accordance with his notification, Gen. Almonte demanded his passports and left the country; in obedience, as all will admit, to the wishes of his country.

Here we contend that the whole world, except his political opponents, would have justified the President had he informed Congress of these circumstances, and asked of Congress men and means to carry on the war in which Texas was engaged, Mexico having declared that she should consider us a party to it. Nothing but the sufficiency of our peace establishment, to prevent any Immediate danger from the arms of Mexico, can excuse him for not taking that course. It was thought that Mexico would contend herself with the bold language of General Ampudia, and no steps were taken to do more than protect Texas. Had our Government thought proper to consider war existing after the threat of Mexican Minister, and the consummation of annexation, it clearly had a right to do so. It had a right to take that Republic at its word, and to have gone to blows at once. This would doubtless have been done, had our Government thought that Mexico would make her words good, or that she had the strength to injure us in the event that we delayed our operations. Had Mexico been any thing like a match for the United States—even if her navy had been sufficiently strong to annoy our seaports, or cripple our commerce—we think it would have been the plain duty of the President to have said to Congress that war existed, and to have asked for men and means to drive the Mexican navy from the seas. Had he failed to do so, we hazard nothing in saying that the first descent made upon our coast—would have been the signal to the Whig opposition for such denunciation of the Government as was never heard in this country. The very men who are now so loud in their complaints of the President for his message in May, 1846, would have heaped curses as strong as language could afford, for not having sent that message long before. It would have been in vain for him to draw distinctions between hostilities and war. He would have been told that the Mexican Minister had said that the Mexican Government would consider annexation as equivalent to war; that this declaration, authorized by Mexico and followed up by the withdrawal of Gen. Almonte, constituted war—a war which it was his duty, as President of the U. States, to prosecute with all the strength of the nation. --They would have said [illegible] he had been false to his high trust and regardless of his plain duty—that he had tamely permitted the national enemy to ravage our coasts, destroy our commerce, and shed the blood of our people, without resistance. And in saying this they would have been much more consistent that they have been in declaring, if we annexed Texas, we annexed war along with it—and then affirming that the President made the war in defiance of Congress and the Constitution.

After Gen. Almonte had left the U. States, the action of his Government was, as far its condition would allow, prompt and consistent with the attitude that Minister had assumed. The United States made every effort at reconciliation which could be made. It offered to settle by negotiation the boundaries of the new State. Mexico persisted in claiming that State as a rebellious province, with which she was at war, and which she intended to subjugate. The President was thus forced to protect Texas. He had no choice in the matter. By the action of Congress during Mr. Tyler’s administration, this was made his plain duty, no matter what he might have thought of annexation. The measure had been consummated before he came into power, and he had, from his official position, to provide for the consequences. Gen. Taylor, as a measure of precaution, was stationed at Corpus Christi; and subsequently, after a suggestion from him to that effect, he was ordered to the Rio Grande. It has not yet been contended, that we know, that this march was considered at all inconsistent with the relations then existing between the two countries. The Mexican army, under Gen. Apudia and Aristu, was concentrated at Matamoros. And while Gen. Taylor lost no opportunity of making known the pacific intentions with which he had come to the Rio Grande, the Mexican forces acted in conformity with Gen. Almonte’s declaration. They acted as if war existed, and cut off every straggler from the American army who fell in their way. At length their forces were sufficient, they thought, to destroy our army; and they made the attempt.

Now, we contend that the circumstances which we have related justified the president in saying that war existed by the act of Mexico. --Others, at the time, thought differently, and they had a right to think differently. They thought that Mexico should have an opportunity to disclaim the conduct of her Generals. We do not blame them for this idea. Subsequent events prove that Mexico wished no such opportunity. She had authorized the attack on our troops, and could not disclaim it. She hoped not only to clear Texas of our forces; but her Generals were framing plans of invading the United States. That they would have invaded the United States, had they been able, no one can question. If it was proper for the United States to declare war before the attack upon Lieutenant Thornton. The whole history of the war, however, shows that she considered the annexation of Texas as amounting to war: and, having notified us of that, thought it unnecessary to do more. If it was unnecessary for her to do more, it surely was for us. That our Constitution was violated, or the rights of Congress assailed, we confess our inability to understand. The war was commenced by Mexico, because of the annexation of Texas. If we had a right to treat with Texas as an independent power, it justifies us for taking up arms. If the war has been improperly or informally declared, Mexico is responsible for that, and not the United States.

RE47v44n37p3c3, September 7, 1847: MR. BROWNSON AND THE WAR

Since commencing our article to-day, we have seen the editorial of the Whig relative to the remarks we made about Mr. Brownson's position. We are sorry that we have failed to make ourselves understood. The faults must be in our powers of expression, or the Whig's powers of perception. The old adage "that none are so blind as they who will not see" may throw some light upon the question as to who is to fault. When we called attention to the absurdity of Mr. Brownson's argument, we stated the reason we did not publish it entire. That reason we still think sufficient. We did, however, state the substance of it: and that, too, without saying anything having the appearance of making a Whig of Mr. Brownson; except that he took Whig ground relative to the war. As to the offer of the Whig to give us the information we have so earnestly desired on certain conditions, we must think it was not made to acceded to. We would, however, gladly embrace this proposition of the Whig, and we already said so much on the question at issue. To commence, de novo by publishing Mr. Brownson's article, would be a useless task to our readers. But notwithstanding that, If the Whig will give us the information, or the argument we have called for, in reasonable compass, and proper terms, we will publish it, and such remarks as may be necessary.

RE47v44n37p3c3, September 7, 1847: LANDING OF PAREDES

A N. Orleans paper makes some complaint of the want of vigilance in our agents in Europe, and of the commanding officer at Vera Cruz, in relation to Gen. Paredes. It might be imprudent at this time (says the Union) to divulge all the facts connected with this subject, but they would clear our agents abroad of any shadow of complaint. Col. Wilson, at Vera Cruz has not been asleep upon his post. It is difficult to detect every spy who may land on the coast; but we have lately been informed by the New Orleans papers, that very lately he has been forbidden a suspicious character to land, and sent him off. As to the landing of Paredes, the following extracts of Col. Wilson's letter to the Secretary of War, (the last which has been received from him, ) relieve him from any imputation of remissness, and lay the censure upon others:

Extract of a letter from Colonel Wilson to the Secretary of War.

"HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF VERA CRUZ,
August 15.

:I have the honor to report, that on the 14th August the British steamer Teviot, Captain May, arrived here from England and Havana, having General Paredes on board, under the assumed name of M. Martinez; who, in consequence of the tardiness of the boarding officer, (Captain Clark, ) landed at between 6 and 7, a.m., incognito, from a four-oared boat, apparently prepared for the occasion. In his transit through the gate of the mole, he was recognized by an inspector, who took no notice of him. Therefore, I immediately ordered the discharge of both him and Captain Clark--the former for having lost sight of the main object, notwithstanding my office is but a few yards from the mole.

"The General, having arrived at the house of Mr. Jose G. Zamora, a native merchant, he presented a letter of introduction from Paris, and requested that horses might be directly furnished for himself and servant--a request immediately complied with; and but ten minutes after his landing he passed through one of the gates of the city on his way to the interior, without myself or any of my officers being able to avoid it, from the circumstance of his arrival and presence here being unknown, and the letters from the United States consul at the Havana, giving notice of his having left, not being delivered to me until after the General's departure, owing to their being in possession of a lady passenger on board."

[BRM]
The very brief letter under my signature, which was evoked by a paragraph in the National Intelligencer, and kindly given a place in the columns of your paper some two months ago, has, to my no little astonishment, called forth a public letter from the pen of Senator Houston of Texas, on matters not put in issue by the article which, because of the great respectability of the paper in which it appeared, I deemed it proper to notice. Nothing certainly was farther from my intention, than to have involved the ex President, now the Senator from Texas, in the necessity of any exposition upon the subject. Whatever doubt existed as to his real desire for the annexation of Texas to the United States, had, by a previous publication, either in the form of a speech or letter, I forget which, nor is it material to remember, been sufficiently cleared up by the declaration, that he only coquetted with England in all that he had done, with a view, as we are now told, to produce an impression with the over credulous people of the United States, as well as those entrusted with the administration of their public affairs, that the “golden moment” for annexation had arrived, and, if permitted to pass, could never be recalled.

Aided by the silence of the Texas press, and for aught I know by other and still more impressing Gen. Jackson—to whom, in the exubrance of his devotion, he ascribes the whole honor of the measure—with the belief, that the coquette would, unless prevented by prompt action, very soon fall into the arms of another, and thus be forever lost to the United States. That time-honored patriot has descended to the grave, under the full conviction, that what he avouched to the American people was true in every word, and in every letter. He was incapable of giving utterance to what he felt to be untruly; and I may safely add, that he looked too deeply into the deeds of men, and understood too thoroughly their motives, to be easily deceived. He saw, as readily as others, the great stake at issue in the question of annexation—a stake which the leading States of Europe would be quite as eager to gain as the United States—and he possessed as full a knowledge of the necessity which would compel Texas to resort to expedients to rescue herself from the unhappy condition in which Mr. Houston describes her to have been in 1841, as the President of Texas himself.

Those expedients are how for the first time promulged to the world by Mr. Houston, as having been deliberately weighed, considered, and adopted by himself. The first was to obtain from Mexico the recognition of the independence of Texas; and failing in both these, the third was to form a defensive alliance with some foreign power against Mexico. In order to accomplish the last of these objects, the President of Texas had spread before him as broad a field for diplomacy as could well have been desired. His first expedient, annexation to the United States was very soon exhausted, since Mr. Reilly, who had been instructed to propose annexation at an early day of my administration, so utterly failed as not only to withdraw the proposition, but to accompany the withdrawal with the declaration that Texas would never renew it. After Mr. Reilly’s failure, the question naturally arises, what course did the President of Texas then pursue? Did he fold his arms in apathy, or did he press on to the accomplishment of his second and third-expedients? Did he seek to interest other governments in the affairs of Texas, so far as to induce their interposition with Mexico, in order to obtain an acknowledgement of Texas independence by Mexico no wider than it had before stood. After the failure of his first expedient, did Mr. Houston stand with his arms folded, and fall into an apoplectic slumber? It was not until his Presidential term had run the greater part of its course, that the U.S. Executive, startled by intelligence received from London, and confirmed by the representative of Texas at the court, deemed it necessary to institute inquiries, through its accredited organs, for the purpose of ascertaining accredited organs, for the purpose of ascertaining the true condition of things. Those inquiries developed the active efforts made by associated individuals to ensure the fulfillment of their intrigues, and the extent of the countenance which had been bestowed upon them by the Ministry of Great Britain, which was more publicly and openly avowed on the floor of the British Parliament, in a debate in which Lord Brougham, whose sentiments were fully re echoed by the British Minister, bore a conspicuous part. In that debate, the Texan was declared to be the all important question—and this not so much on its own account in the abstract, as in its bearing and effect on the condition of the U. States.

There was no longer any room to doubt but that the eyes of foreign powers, as well as of associated companies, were strained in that direction; and I repeat, in this place, what I said in my former letter, that I resolved upon the proposition for annexation as the readiest, if not the only mode, “to scatter the web of their intrigues,” either actual or contemplated. Notwithstanding, however, the authentic information received by the U.S. Executive, all of which has been heretofore in official documents communicated to the public—and notwithstanding the great interest with which Texas was regarded by the distinguished statesmen of England, Mr. Houston, who is not content to speak for himself alone, but also for the whole world, would feign induce the country to believe that the British Ministry folded their arms in inaction, and that the Abolition Society of Great Britain reposed in undisturbed slumber. He seems also most strangely to forget that the city of Mexico was as important a place for concocting and carrying on intrigues, as the city of Austin itself.

In taking the initiative, I not in the least controlled by the feelings of the Texan Executive; nor did anything which had proceeded from it stimulate me to action. Texas was surrounded by well-known embarrassments, exhausted by a long war, her industry paralyzed, and her resources almost annihilated; and as she had been repeatedly repelled in her advances to the Government of the United States, it was naturally concluded that she would look elsewhere for succor and aid. The Executive of Texas had tried annexation, and failed; it had not obtained a recognition of independence by Mexico. What other expedient remained, but to make the best terms it could with either France or England, or both, which, giving it breathing time, would enable it to repair the energies of the country, and recover it from the state of deep depression in which it was placed? The American Minister (Mr. Murphy) was therefore directed to urge annexation on the Executive of Texas. This was accordingly done, and Mr. Houston, in his letter, sets forth the terms which, as a condition precedent, he thought it proper to exact from an over zealous, but devoted friend to the measure. It must be permitted to say, that it would have better concluded Mr. Houston’s account of the matter, if he had seen cause to have informed the public, that the terms thus exacted were promptly disavowed by the Executive, it being firmly fixed in its devotion to the Constitution of the United States, and that Constitution nowhere conferring the power on the President to transfer his authority over the army or navy, or any portion of either, to a foreign potentate, or to enter into any alliance, defensive or otherwise, without the previous sanction of the Senate. This was as well known to Mr. Houston as to myself. He had filled important stations in the United States prior to his emigration to Texas, and was believed to be well acquainted with the limitations and restrictions imposed by the Constitution on all its functionaries. Mr. Houston will pardon me for frankly saying, that this arrangement, thus made with Mr. Murphy, did at the time excite a suspicion on my part, that he wanted but a plausible pretext to defeat annexation altogether. He will find in that act, independently of their own personal merits, the secret motive for the appointment of Gen. Howard, who had belonged to Mr. Houston’s military family when Governor of Tennessee, in place of Mr. Murphy; and, after the death of Gen. Howard, of Major Donaldson, from the household of Gen. Jackson’s who was regarded as the idol of Mr. Houston’s political worship. Both these gentlemen were well worthy of their appointments, and acquitted themselves of their high duties with ability and zeal; but yet, could I have been satisfied at the time that the President of Texas was playing the coquette, and merely indulging in a course of innocent flirtation, in order to awaken the jealousy of the people of the United States, it is quite probable I should have selected for the mission of others, who stood more closely allied to my administration. The flirtation with Mr. Murphy was very soon quieted, by a disavowal of what he had inconsiderately, but from the best motives, been led to do; but, when the coquetry with England was afterwards actually carried, through the active agency of the British Minister, into an acknowledgement by Mexico of the independence of Texas, upon the sole condition that she would renounce annexation to the Unites Sates, it was as near becoming serious as any love affair in the calendar. What if the United States had presented at the time no definitive proposition for annexation, is any one prepared to say that the Mexican proposition would not have been accepted? Will any one venture to say that Gen. Jackson was so far deceived, or the American people so far misled by their jealousy, as to have been mistaken in supposing that “the golden moment” had in fact arrived? Or, can it be said that I was very far mistaken in the declaration, that the proposition for annexation scattered to the winds all the webs of intrigue wherever woven? Alas for annexation, if the American Executive had been driven to the alternative of presenting a new basis of negotiation, in place of definitive terms!

In declaring the opinion that the death of Mr. Upshur, and the appointment of an adjunct commissioner to Mr. Van Zandt, alone prevented the completion of a treaty at an earlier day, I neither designed to utter complain against an All-wise Providence for removing from my side my friend and able counselor, nor against the Executive of Texas for appointing an adjunct commissioner. It was a solemn occasion, that of merging the absolute sovereignty of one State into that of others; and Texas could not well have used too much caution in its performance. Certain it is that no adjunct could have been more acceptable to the U. States than Governor Henderson. --I did but urge that view to show that so secret had been, and so expeditious would have been the course of the U. States Executive on the subject, that the treaty, but for the two circumstances alluded to, would have been consummated before the speculation in Texan stocks, or holders of Texas lands would ever have heard of it. I think the remark admits in fairness no other construction.

As to the ascription made by Mr. Houston to Gen. Jackson of the success of the measure, I have nothing more than this to say, that I took the initiative without any previous consultation with that distinguished man. He gave to the action of the Executive his zealous and cordial support, and I would be the last to deny him the full measure of honor which his patriotic advocacy implied. His name was undoubtedly a tower of strength to any cause which he espoused; but there were other auxiliaries, who deserve to be noticed in connection with the matter. I omit the names of Mr. Upshur, Mr. Nelson and Mr. Calhoun, who successively filled the chair of the State Department, and after them of my entire cabinet. They were a part of my own identity, and that each was worthy of my confidence and that of the country, is sufficiently demonstrated by the fruits of their labors. I choose to mention others, not members of my political family, among the most prominent of whom was Mr. Walker, the present Secretary of the Treasury, whose writings unveiled the true merits of the question and, aided by the expositions of many editors of the newspaper press, brought the public mind to a just and sound decision.

I was myself sustained and encouraged by the opinions of other distinguished citizens, among whom I take pleasure in mentioning the name of one who once would have commanded the respect, if not the confidence, of thousands; but who, at the time, rested under a cloud, and spoke to me from the shades of Andalusia: I mean the late Nicholas Biddle, with whom I differed so widely on the subject of the Banks of the United States. His bright and accomplished mind did not fail to embrace in its full extent the value of the virtual monopoly of the cotton plan, secured to the United States by the acquisition of Texas—a monopoly more potential in the affairs of the world than millions of armed men.

I have only to say, in conclusion, that I shall content myself in all else that relates to the annexation of Texas, by referring to the public and official documents already spread before the country.

JOHN TYLER

New York, Sept. 1, 1847

[BRM]

A few days ago we penned an article showing that Texan had a right to treat with the United States as an independent power. It is not for us to say how well we succeeded in our effort. But if we did succeed, the conclusion seems inevitable to our mind, that the war in which we are engaged is a just and rightful war; and all good citizens should unite in bringing it to an honorable and successful termination. If, on the other hand, we did not succeed, and it is admitted that Texas had no right to treat as an independent nation, we contend that the wrong done was in annexing Texas to the United States, and that Executive was bound by every consideration of honor and duty to defend her. By the act of annexation, she became a State of this Union, and had a right to demand protection from the Government. If any thing more than a quasi state of war existed between Mexico and Texas at the time of annexation--and something more must have existed to give any validity to the Mexican claim----then it seems that the refusal of Mexico to treat with the United States, after Texas was admitted, made the United States, after Texas was admitted, made the United States a party to the war. The hostile attitude in which Mexico and Texas stood with regard to each other, could never be altered but by a treaty of peace with the United States. Texas had given up all control over the matter. Her power to treat had been made over to the President and Senate of the United States. She then had no control whatever over the subject. And, in the hypothesis we are considering, war existed, a war which could be made to cease only by a treaty between Mexico and the United States Government. --Mexico refused to treat with the United States' Government, which refusal was tantamount to a refusal to terminate the war in which she was engaged with one of our States. This course which Mexico pursued, made us a party to the war--Texas having been annexed--in despite of ourselves. Mexico so considered it, and took action accordingly--not for one moment dreaming it necessary to make a declaration of war before she resumed hostilities, by endeavoring to enforce her claim to Texas.

If we have succeeded in making ourselves understood, it is clear that whether Texas did or did not have a right to become a State in this Union, the complaints urged by the Whig party against the war are entirely unfounded. Mexico takes the only consistent ground. She contends that Texas was a revolted province belonging to her, which she was actively engaged in endeavoring to subdue by force of arms; and that, by the act of annexation, the United States made themselves a party to the war, and inflicted a wrong upon her by adding to the Union a portion of her territory. She has never, to our knowledge, taken any other view of the subject than this. --But this will not satisfy the Whig leaders. They cannot take this ground; for if they could succeed in convincing the people, that that was the true ground to take, their party would not be benefited. Annexation was popular; and besides, the people would see that the mischief had been done, and could never be atoned for--that the U. States would be dishonored in the eyes of the world if she did not meet the consequences of annexation after that measure was completed. The Whigs, then, must take up other positions--positions which Mexico has never assumed--if they would [illegible] party.

This they have shown a willingness to do, on all occasions. Their devotion to party is so much greater than their love of country, that they are ready to embrace an inconsistency if they can weaken their political adversaries. They show the cause of their conduct in their eagerness to seize on any trifling circumstances, founded on any trifling evidence, to lessen the credit and underrate the resources of the government; they show it in their constant forebodings of disaster, and the readiness with which they magnify every obstacle to be encountered. Some of the antiwar presses have even gone so far as to proclaim openly and loudly that they desire that our armies may be overthrown by the enemy, and that we may find defeat and disgrace where we seek victory and honor. This is not treason as defined in the Constitution; but it is not treason, only because they who entertain and express such desires, use the press instead of other weapons to give aid and comfort to enemy. We always like to put the most charitable construction on the words and actions of every man, but when we see a party contending that annexation would make the United States a party to the war which existed between Texas and Mexico, and now that we are actually engaged in hostilities endeavoring to make the war odious by denouncing it as a President's war, as a war commenced by violating the Constitution and trampling on the rights of Congress, we must confess that our charitable feelings are weakened. If the Whig party would come out openly and declare that we had no right to annex Texas to the United States, and that justice required us to undo the act and the deed, then, however untenable their position, it would have the merit of consistency. They hold on to the conclusion that the war is unjust--but they manifest no desire to adhere to the premises on which that conclusion is founded. If they come out against annexation now, they take ground against an ascertained majority of the people. That they have no desire to do. If they contend that we wronged Mexico in annexing Texas to the United States, the logical deduction is plain, that we can put the country right only by giving up Texas. This the people will never consent to do. Yet the Whig party opposes the war, not only as unnecessary, but as unjust. Whether it is right or wrong in this singular course, we leave the people to decide, believing thoroughly that when they coolly consider the matter, they will uphold those who uphold the cause of the country.

RE47v44n38p3c1, September 10, 1847: BY THE SOUTHERN MAIL

[From the New Orleans Delta, August 31.]

LATEST NEWS FROM VERA CRUZ

We have been anxiously expecting the steamer Fashion, from Vera Cruz, for the last three days. On Saturday evening we were confident that, as on all previous occasions of important news from Mexico, so on this we should be enabled to supply our readers on Sunday with the glorious news of Gen. Scott's triumphant entry into the city of Mexico. But we were disappointed, and in absence of the last steamer, we have to rest content with such items as the schr. Mississippi, Capt. Black, brought yesterday.

The Mississippi, left Vera Cruz on the 21st August, and the Fashion had not then arrived. --By the Mississippi we have El Sol den Anahuac to the 21st inst. The late numbers of this paper are very dry and barren. Indeed, we have almost ceased to look to Vera Cruz for anything full or authentic in relation to Gen. Scott’s army. We are not so confident as some of our contemporaries seem to be, of the truth of the statement made by El Sol, that Gen. Scott had arrived at Ayutla on the 11th August. Ayutla is said to be eight Mexican leagues from the city of Mexico, which is about twenty English miles. Now, if General Scott’s advance only left Puebla on the 7th of August. We do not think it probable that General Scott could move with his long trains and heavy guns at the rate of fifteen miles a day, over an ascending, precipitous, and, in many places, difficult road. We know that he himself did not expect to reach the capital in less that fifteen days after the departure of his rear division, which left on the 10th August. The transportation of the large cannon which Gen. Scott takes with him, over the rugged road which passes for a considerable distance around the mountain for a considerable distance around the mountain Cordova to Rio Frio, will be very slow and laborious. Nor is it probable that Gen. Scott, would hurry or fatigue his men, on the march, which I might be so necessary to keep them in good condition for the great battle, which he expects to fight near the capital. But, of course we may be mistaken, and we only give our opinion for what it is worth.

The guerrillas are still disturbing our trains.

Major Lally’s command made their way over the National Bridge, routing the guerrillas on all sides, and without waiting for the reinforcements which had been sent to their relief. These consisted of Captains Wells’, Haile’s and Fairchild’s companies, which were attacked and pretty severely handled by the guerrillas, and having no artillery returned in Vera Cruz. Their loss was five killed and two wounded, together with the loss of good number of mules and wagons.

LATEST FROM GENERAL SCOTT.

Our army within eight leagues of Mexico--Gen. Scott’s position on the 11th inst. --Village of Ayutla.

The schooner Douglas came in last evening, bringing us Vera Cruz papers up to the 10th instant.

The Sun of Anahua of the above date, says that a gentleman arrived at Vera Cruz on that day from the interior, bringing the intelligence that Gen. Scott and command were at Ayotla, eight leagues from the city of Mexico.

The village of Ayotla is about midway between the Rio Frio and the Capital; it is a small halting place for travelers. On the Rio Frio mountain our troops saw the city of the Montezumas almost at their very feet, and descending into the valley and losing sight of it for a short time, must have had the pleasing effect to heighten the charm of its final possession. Just beyond Atoyla there is a slight rise in the road that conceals the city; it passed, and for twenty miles ahead, Mexico is visible, presenting a singularly beautiful aspect. The next news, we trust, will bring us intelligence that the Capital of Mexico is on our possession.

VERA CRUZ

In addition to the Mexican intelligence which we laid before our readers yesterday (says the N. Orleans Times, ) we have since received by the arrival of the ship Agnes, Capt. Kelly, a letter of a later date, from our correspondent at Vera Cruz, in which he communicates the unpleasant rumor that General Scott encountered a large Mexican force at Rio Frio, and had been compelled to retreat. We place no reliance in the report. The rumor in regard to Major Lally’s position may be true, but we prefer to withhold our belief until later intelligence comes to hand.

VERA CRUZ, August 21, 1847.

Gentlemen--Some very unpleasant reports have reached us this morning which I sincerely trust may prove to be unfounded; but such as they are, you have them.

General Scott, it is said, encountered an overwhelming force on his march to Mexico, and had to fall back from Rio Frio. Major Lally is reported to be hemmed in between Puente National and Jalapa, not able to advance nore retreat. - Captain Fairchild lost all of his train and some men, and made good his retreat to this place.

Captain Elliot, acting Quartermaster, has made quite a revolution in his department. He has sent cargoes of coal dust back to Baltimore, and cargoes of provisions to your city, and Tampico and Brazos; he has discharged about 250 laboreres and teamsters, and sent them away; he has cut down the clerk hire and suckers of his office; and, in fact, he is some pumpkins.

The Mexicans have now about 50,000 men in the field, of all classes, guerrillas and soldiers.

TAR BUCKET.
FROM MATAMORAS. —By the U.S. propeller Secretary Buchanan, we received yesterday the Matamoras Flag of the 21st inst. The Secretary Buchanan left the mouth of the river on the 24th.

Maj. G. H. Crossman, Quartermaster, arrived at Matamoras on the evening of the 10th, from Gen. Taylor's camp, yet the flag gives not a word of news from that quarter.

Some vessels had been engaged in carrying goods up theRio Grande, with the pretext of landing them on the Texas side of the river. The commander of the district issued orders that duties on goods should be paid at the mouth of the river, before passing up, declaring the Texas boundary to be the left bank. The Matamoras Flag insist upon it, that the Texan boundary according to the laws of Texas, is the "principal stream" of said river, and that vessels have a right to pass up the principal stream for the purpose of unloading on the Texan side. The question will be settled by superior authority.

By a letter from Captain Hicks, of the U.S. steamboat Tom Kirkman, we learn that the route between Matamoras and Monterey is infested with banditti. The loss of most of Capt. Baylor's company, is in a manner confirmed by the letter of our correspondent, as he states that up to the time of his writing, only five members of the company had come in—two at Marin and three at Cerralvo.

The mail, it is said, had been attacked, and Capt. Reed's lieutenant killed. Canales was seen on the 16th inst., about seven miles from Camargo, and it was presumed that his force was somewhere in the neighborhood, or in the vicinity of China.

VOLUNTEERS FOR MEXICO. —Capt. Scott, nor organizing an independent Company of Volunteers for the Mexican War, rendezvousing at Richmond, will be at Chesterfield Court on Monday next, in Brunswick, on the 16th inst., (due notice of which will be given) and at Morgansville (Jones') on Saturday the 18th; at which times and places addresses will be delivered and gallant sons of gallant sires will have an opportunity, perhaps the last, of enrolling themselves under the Stars of Liberty. RICHMOND, Sept. 9th, 1847.

The letter of this distinguished warrior, addressed to Mr. Delony, seems to have had wonderful effect on the Whig party throughout the Union. The Whig presses seem to be utterly unable to reconcile the position he takes with the necessary qualification which they demand form their leaders. Gen. Taylor's position presents no prominent points either for attack or defence. His ignorance of the important principles which have heretofore divided parties—and his alleged inability "to express suitably" the opinions which he really entertains on these questions, have made even the Whigs doubts about his steps. They pretend to be the advocates of principles--of positive principles, and can but illy put up with a negative candidate. No impassioned man could have thought them sincere when they were advocating a "no-party" candidate. They have shown that they were not sincere in that course. They cannot stand without a man who is willing to stand as their representative; consequently we find them growing "small by degrees and beautifully less" in advocating Gen. T.'s pretensions to the presidency. They were willing to avail themselves of the popularity of any man to get into power, but the position of Gen. Taylor is such, that they cannot take even him for this purpose. Now we find our Whig friends showing themselves in their true colors. They discard the hero of the Rio Grande, of Monterey and Buena Vista, when he cannot be made to subserve their purposes. We hope the people will understand this. If so, they will learn that the Whigs go for POWER and not PRINCIPLE, and are willing to take power without any regard to principle. In fact the great essential difference between the two parties may be summed up in this, that the Whigs are willing to take power, without regard to principle, and the Democrats are willing to see their principles triumphant, not matter in whose hands the power of the Government may be lodged. —Can the people hesitate in choosing their friends?—Four ourselves we cannot appreciate any inducement to embrace Whig doctrines, while we can see much, both of present safety and future prosperity, which identifies Democratic principles with the true well-being of the people. We commit ourselves to no man. We have heretofore thoroughly committed ourselves to principles. And when the day comes no one can be ignorant of our position, for no one can be ignorant of our principles.

We have received nothing later from Mexico. On Saturday the following singular notice was hung out at the Whig office. It is, probable, a letter from one of the editors of the Picayune. —We confess that we cannot understand what it means, but give it for what it is worth. Can it mean that General Scott has declared himself Military Governor of Mexico? This we might believe—but that the Mexican Congress has declared him President, we are utterly incredulous:
"I have only time to say, that, by steamboat just arrived, news is received that Gen. Scott is declared President of Mexico until the 15th January, 1848.

J. LUMSDEN."

RE47v44n39p2c3, September 14, 1847: FROM THE VIRGINIA REGIMENT

The mail of yesterday morning brought two letters from Captain Robert G. Smith, to his father. The one dated at Buena Vista, August 8th, and continued on the 9th; and the other from the same place, commenced on the 14th of August, and closed on the 15th of the same month. This last letter brings the intelligence of the death of Captain Fairfax expressed in the following terms:

"Sunday morning, August 15th. --Capt. Fairfax, who has been sick for three or four weeks, dies in Saltillo last night at 8 1/2 o'clock. He was a most excellent man and a good officer. We shall feel his loss most sensibly. Just before his attack, he boasted to me, that nothing could hurt him in this country, that he had not been sick for twenty years, and apprehended no danger from the climate. My company enjoy good health. I have only two or three in the hospital, and they not seriously unwell. The routine of Camp duty becomes so monotonous, that men and officers complain a good deal -- yet an attentive and industrious officer will find enough to employ and engage him. Since coming here I have not visited Saltillo, nor indeed been much from the camp. The drill of my company commands now my undivided attention. The North Carolina Regiment has suffered much from sickness, and the effect has been to dispirit the men. Our regiment has but little sickness in it, and its condition for active service is at least respectable. When we shall move forward, I am unable to inform you, nor do I believe General Taylor himself is informed on the subject; when we do, the Virginia Regiment will be in the advance, and I fain hope will not disgrace the Old Dominion."

RE47v44n39p2c4, September 14, 1847: LATER FROM THE ARMY OF GENERAL TAYLOR

The steamship Telegraph, Capt Wilson, arrived here Sunday forenoon from Brazos Santiago, whence she sailed on the 1st inst.

The intelligence by this arrival is interesting and important. We have at last the execution of the design of the Government to withdraw from the column of Gen. Taylor all the troops which can be spared by the General with due consideration for the safety of the line of the Rio Grande and thence to Buena Vista. The General was also directed to detach to brigadier generals; by the following general orders it will be seen how he has directed the views of the Government to be carried out:

ORDER No. 96.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF OCCUPATION

Camp near Monterey, August 16, 1847.

1. Five companies of the 10th Infantry, under the colonel will proceed to Matamoros and relieve the Ohio regiment of volunteers now in garrison there. The Ohio regiment will then proceed to Brazos Island and be held ready to embark fro Vera Cruz. The remaining companies of the 10th, under lieutenant colonel, with Capt Hunt’s company of artillery and Capt Reed’s company of Texas cavalry, will form the garrison of Camargo and its dependencies, relieving the other troops now on that duty.

2. The Indiana regiment of volunteers will proceed to Brazos Island and will then, with the Ohio regiment embark for Vera Cruz. Brigadier General Lane will take the command of these regiments at the Brazos and conduct them to their destination.

3. Six companies of the 16th Regiment, under the colonel, will take up the line of march for Monterey, when they will relieve the present garrison, composed of six companies of Massachusetts regiment. The remaining four companies, under the lieutenant colonel, will in the like manner relieve the battalion of the Massachusetts regiment at Cerralvo. The troops thus relieved will proceed to the Brazos and be there concentrated under the command of Col. Wright.

4. The 13th Regiment will proceed to the Brazos as soon as practicable after the companies of Massachusetts regiment, now at Cerralvo, shall have passed down the river.
5. Brig. Gen. Cushing will take up the line of march, no latter than 23d inst., with Capt. Deas’ light battery, (company B, 4th Artillery.) He will proceed to the Brazos, when he will bring under his orders the 13th Regiment and Massachusetts regiment, and thence conduct his entire command (one battery and two regiments) to Vera Cruz.

6. Brig. Gen Hopping will remain in command of the district of the Upper Rio Grande, and will establish his headquarters where he may select. Should it be found necessary to retain the general hospital at Mier, a sufficient guard will be furnished for its protection, and also sufficient force of medical officers and attendants must be detailed from the regiments which leave their sick. Great care will be taken to furnish descriptive rolls of all attendants and patients thus detached. Col. Belknap is specially charged with the rigid enforcement of this order.

7. Col. Hays, with his command of Texas horse, will march for the Brazos, and there embark for Vera Cruz, in conformity with the instructions issued to him by the War Department.

8. The above movements will be executed with the least possible delay. The quartermasters and other staff departments will furnish the necessary transportation and other facilities for this purpose.

By order of Maj. General TAYLOR:
W. W. S. BLISS, Ass’t Adj’t Gen.

The Ohio and Indiana regiments under Gen. Lane, and the 13th Infantry and Massachusetts regiment, with Deas’s (late Washington’s) battery, under Gen Cushing, being ordered to Vera Cruz, and Hay’s regiment being sent to the same point, let us see what troops are left on the Rio Grande line.

Gen Wool’s command at Buena Vista and Saltillo will consist of the Virginia, North Carolina, and 2d Mississippi regiments of volunteers and Maj Chevalle’s three companies of Texas Rangers.

Gen Taylor at Valnut Springs will have only Lieut Col Fauntleroy’s squadron of dragoons and Maj Bragg’s battery.

The 16th Infantry, Col Tibbatts, and the 10th Infantry, Col Temple, will garrison the Monterey, Cerralvo, Camargo, Reynosa and Matamoros.

The squadron of the 3d Dragoons, Col Butler, and two companies of volunteer cavalry from Alabama and Illinois remain unassigned. A portion of the dragoons are at Mier, and it is conjectured that they will remain on the line for escort of trains and like duties. [A correspondent of the National thus sums up the troops who remain between Brazos Island and Buena Vista.]

Distribution of forces on the line of the Rio Grande, after the departure of the force now under marching orders for Vera Cruz:

- Brazos Island, 1 Company 1st Artillery, 111
- Point Isabel, 1 Company 4th Artillery, 109
- Fort Brown, 1 Company 2d Artillery 93
- Matamoros, 6 companies, 5 of 10th Infantry, 1 of Mounted, Volunteers, 511
- Camargo, &c. 12 companies, 5 of 10th Infantry, 5 of 3d, Dragoons, 1 of 4th Artillery, 1 of Mounted, Volunteers 1133
- Cerralvo, 4 companies of 16th Infantry 403
- Monterey, 6 companies 16th Infantry 604
- Camp near Monterey, 5 companies 3d Artillery, 2 2d, Dragoons, 1 Mounted Volunteers 413
- Buena Vista, Saltillo, &c., 42 companies, 2191
- Total number of troops 5568

A few weeks since it was supposed that Capt. Raylor and his command had been cut off. The Flag gives the following letter from its correspondent, which assures us of Capt. B.’s safety:

Editors Flag---My letter to you of a recent date gave information of an attack by a large body of Mexicans upon a detachment of twenty-seven Texas rangers, commanded by Capt. Baylor, and the probable destruction of the whole part save three, who had effected their escape and got back to this place. So positive were they in their statements that no more could have escaped, that I did not hesitate to express to you my belief that all the rest had been killed.

Such was the opinion of ever on here until this morning. Greatly to our relief and much to our astonishment, composing part of an escort to a train which arrived this morning from Monterey, there came Capt. Baylor and all but four of his reported dead companions. There escape was truly miraculous, and knowing that you would like to have a history of it, I have obtained from Capt. B and Lieut. Lee the full particulars.

After visiting and searching several ranchos without finding anything in them which would convict the inhabitants of being concerned in the late robberies of the trains, Capt. B. left them unmolested and proceeded on to a rancho, called Las Tablos, situated on the river Salinas. Here a large quantity of good were found, and $500 in American money. The goods and money were taken and packed upon the mules, the rancho was burnt, and several Mexicans made prisoners. With the booty and prisoners, Capt. B started for the Monterey road, and had proceeded about a mile and a half from the burnt rancho, when he found himself in the presence of 300 Mexicans, who were ambushed in the chaparral skirting a plain over which the road ran. Between the road and the river was another chaparral thicket extending to the river. The lancers charged before Capt. B could gain the thicket next to the river, and in this charge four of his men were killed. The thicket gains, the rangers dismounted, and protected by the bushes twice repulsed the lancers, killing fifteen, and forced them to retire beyond the reach of their rifles. Taking advantage of this, the rangers left their horses, boot and prisoners, and descending an almost perpendicular bluff, fifty feet high, they crossed the river. Marching by circuitous routes and avoiding ranchos, the party at length reached Monterey, where they were again remounted for service and arrived here this morning as I have mentioned above. The three who made their way to this place and gave the account which I sent you, were separated from the main part by the first charge, and judged that they were all killed, by the firing having ceased, and seeing the enemy in possession of their horses.

Capt. Baylor leaves to day with the train for Camargo and on his return, if I am not misinformed, the Mexicans will hear from him again. Maj. Graham commands the escort going down with the train, and has with him upwards of one hundred dragoons and rangers. With this force he will return and go in search of the robbers who have been so bold of late.

Retaken.--The report which was noticed in last Wednesday’s paper of the taking of some thirty or forty pack mules beyond Cerralvo, by a party of Mexicans, is confirmed. The attack was made between Ramos and Marine, and we regret to learn that a clerk of Mr. Taniver, of this city, by the name of Merchant, was killed. Gen. Lane, who was proceeding to headquarters, in company with the escort immediately collected ten men--his son among the number--who volunteered their services and made after the robbers. The general, being an old back woodsman, soon ascertained their whereabouts, and his party no sooner appeared to the Mexicans, than the latter "vamoosed," leaving the pack mules and all the booty which they had taken, in the hands of the Americans, who delivered the property safely to Monterey. The goods belonged to Mr. Taniver.

Some ten or a dozen cases of yellow fever are reported at Brazos, and several persons have died. The fever originated on board vessels from New Orleans, and is as yet, confined to the crews of those vessels. There is no hospital on Brazos Island, and we understand objection has been made to yellow fever patients entering the hospital at Point Isabel.

Ex-President and General M.B. Lamar, [now Captain Lamar, commanding a company of Texan Rangers, ] was in Mier a few days ago, with a detachment of his command, on his way from Laredo to General Taylor’s camp. Captain Lamar, we understand, is anxious to be relieved from his post at Laredo, and will apply to General Taylor for this purpose. We are happy to hear that he is in excellent health.

From GEN. WOOL’s COMMAND.--We have a series of very interesting letters from our correspondent at Gen. Wool’s headquarters coming down to the 16th of August. We are unable to give any portion before our next regular issue. We must, however, mention the death, of Capt. Fairfax, of the Virginia regiment. He dies at Saltillo on the 14th ult., of fever.

from Monroe county; and a train of sixty five United States wagons, under the charge of Mr. King.

Through Mr. Barnum, Mr. Aubry has news from Chihuahua to the 3d of July. On the 23d of June, Mr. James Aull, the partner of the late Col. S.C. Owens, in an extensive mercantile business, was killed by four Mexicans. They entered his store at Chihuahua, killed him, and took away $5000. Three of the murderers were arrested, and put in prison, to await their trial.

The persons and property of American citizens generally were respected at Chihuahua, though none were-permitted to leave the city, except neutrals, who could bring away their means by paying a duty of six per cent. Mr. Barnum obtained his passport by pretending to be an Irishman.

Gov. Armijo, on his way to Albuquerque, to visit his family, was arrested at Chihuahua, and kept within the limits of that city.

No merchandise of any description was suffered to come into New Mexico by the Southern route.

In New Mexico the territorial election was to have taken place on the 1st and 2d Monday in August. Consul Alvarez, Capt. Angney, and Mr. Kirkland, of St. Louis, were candidates for the Legislature.

The murderers of Brown and others were on trial, and seven of them would certainly be convicted.

Col. Willock's battalion of volunteers, their time having expired, were ordered to leave Taos and return to Santa Fe. Twenty-five citizens remained, and were determined to erect fortifications for their defence. A large number of the women of Taos had determined to follow our army, and not to return to their homes until their husbands would consent to become friendly with the United States.

An insurrection had, a short time previous, commenced, but it was nipped in the bud, and the leaders, terrified at the numbers sent out in opposition to them, fled precipitately to the mountains.

Mr. Aubry met, at different points, nearly all the numerous companies of troops, government trains, and traders, on their way out, going on without difficulty.

RE47v44n39p4c1, September 14, 1847: AMERICAN ARMS VICTORIOUS

THE MEXICANS DEFEATED BY GENERAL SCOTT IN TWO DISTINCT ENGAGEMENTS.

THE CITY OF MEXICO IS AT OUR MERCY.

New Orleans Picayune, Sept. 3rd.

The steamship Fashion, Capt. O’Brady, arrived yesterday evening from Vera Cruz, by the way of Tampico. She left Vera Cruz on the 27th of August, and Tampico on the 29th.

The News of this arrival is the most important we have received in many months from Mexico. Our army has not only advanced to the city of Mexico, but it has had two engagements with the enemy close under the walls of the city and defeated them. The Mexicans have been brought to supplicate a suspension of arms, and General Scott has granted it. The Mexican Congress has been convoked to take into consideration Mr. Trist’s propositions.

The news was received in Vera Cruz on the evening of the 26th ult. By an express courier from Orizaba, who brought down the following letter to Mr. Dimond, the collector at Vera Cruz, to whose courtesy we are indebted for the use of the letter, which we proceed to give:

Orizaba, August 25 th, 1847.

My dear friend—The Mexican mail, which has at last come in, brings the following intelligence, which the copy from the Diario Official del Gobierno. Being of so great importance, I send you this express, courier, who will be with you to morrow about 12 o’clock.

On the 20 th two brigades commanded by General Valencia and Santa Anna, went out to attack the Americans near San Angel. Valencia’s division has been completely defeated, and Santa Anna after the first rencontre, fell back also in disorder to the city.
They immediately after this asked for a suppression of hostilities, and offered to hear the propositions of peace from Mr. Trist.

The next day the minister of foreign relations invited the congress, through the newspapers to meet for that purpose.

These are the great facts which no doubt will bring after them peace. Your, truly.

F.M. Dimond, Eq.

*Another letter say Los Llales de San Angel.

Another express arrived in Vera Cruz on the 26th with letters containing the same news in substance and the following:

[Translated from the Diario Official del Gobierno]

On the 20th August Scott’s troops, who intended marching on Penon, turned away from it and arrived near Tacubaya. As soon as the news was known at Mexico Valencia’s division went out to attack the Americans at Los Llanos de San Angel, and was completely routed. Next came Santa Anna with another division, which shared the same fate after some fighting. The Mexicans retreated to the capital in great disorder, and such was the panic created by their defeat that the minister of foreign relations immediately convoked the congress to take into consideration Mr. Trist’s proposition. A suspension of arms was demanded by the Mexicans and granted. The Americans are around Mexico, but had not entered the city on the 21st.

Such are the meager details which we have of these important events. No couriers from Gen. Scott’s army direct have been able to get through, so far as we can learn. --But from the foregoing statements it is manifest that Gen Scott holds the city of Mexico at his command. That Gen. Scott did not choose to enter the city is manifest. He was doubtless deterred from entering it by a desire to save the pride of the Mexicans when upon the even of important negotiations. It is now supposed that the extraordinary courier which left Vera Cruz for Mexico on the 12th ult, a day in advance of the regular English courier, was the bearer of instructions to the British minister to offer again his mediation; and we think we may safely say that he was instructed to do so if possible before Gen Scott entered the capital. We believe the instructions were positive, and no doubt they were obeyed. Having absolute confidence in this representation of the acts of the English Government we think it reasonable to suppose that Gen Scott was influenced by a knowledge of this mediation to trust again to the efforts of Mr Trist to negotiate a peace, and so spared the Mexicans the humiliation of the armed occupation of their capital. His characteristic humanity may also be presumed to have strongly influenced him to save Mexico from the violence of a hostile occupation. We may recur to this point and to the prospects of peace which some may now entertain.

We have given some of the rumors current in Vera Cruz as to the fall of Mexico. They are evidently founded on imperfect rumors of the real state of facts. The rumors circulated here that Santa Anna and Valencia were taken prisoners we believe are totally unfounded.

In regard to the train under Maj. Lally, the intelligence is favorable. We are informed from a very responsible source that he is known to have passed Perot and been on his way in safety to Puebla. He made some delay in Jalapa. Our readers may be interested in what is said of the movements of the train prior to its leaving Jalapa in the Sun on Anahuac.

The Boletin of Jalapa, says that the train, after having been attacked at Cerro Gordo, retired to the Plan, at the same time the guerrillas also retired. On the following day the train commenced marching for Jalapa, and on Thursday evening, had not yet entered that place. On the 19th it was reported at Jalapa that the Guerrillas would attack our troops near that place, and all the evening the road for a mile was covered with men, women and children, whom curiosity had attracted there. This have rise to a firing of cannon and musketry from our troops, and the citizens succeeded in reaching their home without receiving any injury.

At 11 o’clock on the 19th Major Lally inquired of the alcaldes whether the citizens of Jalapa would commit hostilities against the Americans if the entered, or not. To which the alcaldes answered, that the population was unarmed; but that a number of guerrillas being in the neighborhood he could not take the responsibility of their actions. On the morning of the 20th the train of wagons and the troops entered the city. The Boletin says that the wagons are filled were sick and wounded.

Yesterday [the 24th, ult.] it was rumored in Vera Cruz that Father Jarauta had attacked the train a short distance the other side of Jalapa, but that he had been driven back by our troops, with loss on both sides.

In addition to the foregoing we have been favored with the two notes following, the first of which is a translation from the Spanish:

JALAPA, August 20, 1847.
The American army, after much suffering on the road, has been again attacked at Dos Rios by 700 guerillas, and badly enough treated. Even before the entrance into Jalapa there was some firing. Last night, at 9 o'clock, the Americans entered the city firing and retreated on minus. He was lassoed by one of the guerillas. This morning they sent a flag of truce to the Ayunta Miento (City Council) to ascertain whether they should enter as friends or foes, but without awaiting an answer they began to enter and continued up to 1, P.M., when all got in. There are 76 wagons and 895 men, among whom 317 are wounded and sick. --Major Lally is sick--the horses are worn out--for which reason it is supposed they will remain here some time. --It is said that Father Jarauta will attack them to-night but nothing positive.

The other note is as follows:

JALAPA, August 23, 1847.

Major Lally, with his command, is still here, and will probably remain here some time. The guerillas have all disappeared from this neighborhood, but to where they have gone I am unable to say. Aburto, the guerilla chief, died in Jalapa a few days since, some say of a wound received in one of the attacks on Major Lally's command, and others by fever.

We do not entertain any doubt that the train, as mentioned above, has passed Perote and gone on in safety to Puebla.

Intelligence reached Col. Wilson on the morning of the 17th ult., that Lieut. David Henderson, of Capt. Fairchild's company of dragoons, and his party, who were sent out by Capt. Wells, on the 15th of August, to apprise Major Lally of the approach of reinforcements, were all shot by the guerillas. There is little or no doubt of the correctness of this sad intelligence. Lieut. Henderson was a resident of New Orleans, and but recently embarked as a volunteer in his country's service. He was a printer by profession, a man of courage and enterprise, and his fate will be sincerely lamented by his numerous friends.

It is now very generally believed that Capt. Besacon's company went up with the train under Major Lally.

The following letter gives some facts that we have not before seen, though news promptly reached here of the insurrection on in Yucatan.

Gentlemen--On Sunday last the city was startled with the intelligence from Yucatan that the whole Indian population of that State had risen against the whites, and in some districts massacred entirely the whole population with the exception of the women, whom they only spared for a fate still worse than death. The news was received here by the French Consul in a communication from the French Consul at Campeachy, and the massacre he says was universal, no distinction being made except between Indians and whites. In some of the districts the whites have succeeded in reaching the cities and were there waiting succor. There is good reason to hope they will be able to defend themselves until they are reinforced. At Campeachy they were in expectation of an immediate attack.

The French brigs of war La Peyrouse and La Pilate have, it is understood, but been ordered to Campeachy, and there is a report that Com. Perry is about ordering down one of the vessels of our squadron. There is, perhaps, some exaggeration in the accounts of the extent of the massacre, but of the main facts there is not a doubt. The Indians in Yucatan have been more oppressed than in any other part of Mexico, because the landholders are generally absentees residing in Spain, and entrust the management of their estates to stewards, who to subserve their own interest, grind the unfortunate Peon to the dust.

An express arrived here on Tuesday from Alvarado to Com. Perry, with information that the guerrillas had attacked that place the night before and killed a surgeon and two marines in that town. The steamers Petrita and Scorpion were immediately dispatched to reinforce those in possession of the place.

D.S.

In the Sun of Anahuac, of the 25th ult., we find the following note from Mr. Hayes:

Mr. Editor will you do me the favor to correct an error into which you have inadvertently fallen in the account of the march of the small train under the command of Capt. Wells. In the article you give me the command of the detachment--it was under the command of Corporal Meredith. I accompanied the train on the invitation of Capt. Fairchild, and was of course, temporarily attached to his command; but am entitled to no credit, as I merely performed the usual routine of duty.

I regret the necessity of troubling you, but my silence might be construed into a desire to take credit for acts performed by others.
Respectfully yours,
A.H. HAYES.

The same paper also contains the following orders, no doubt suggested by the escape of Paredes from Vera Cruz:

GENERAL ORDERS, No.10.

U.S. Flag Ship Germantown,
Anton Lizardo, Aug. 18, 1847.

The senior U.S. naval officer, next in rank to the commander-in-chief, who may be stationed at or near Vera Cruz, is hereby instructed to act in conjunction with the senior officer of the U.S. Quartermaster’s Department at Vera Cruz, and the collector of the port, as a commissioner to make the necessary appointment of pilots, officers connected with the duties of the port, light-house keepers, superintendent of signals, &c., to establish regulations for their government, and to have cognizance of all matters connected with the departments above mentioned, being careful not to interfere with the military authorities of the city and castle.

M.C. PERRY
Commanding Home Squadron,

To the senior U.S.N. officer stationed at Vera Cruz.

GENERAL ORDERS, No.11

Anton Lizardo, Aug. 18, 1847.

All vessels, excepting army steamers and transports, arriving at ports in Mexico held by the United States forcers, are to be visited by a boat from the general ship of the day, or any single vessel of the squadron, that may be in port for the purpose of tendering the usual compliment of services to foreign vessels of war, and detecting any irregularities in foreign mail steamers or merchant vessels, whether foreign or American.

It is desirable when it be practicable, that the boarding officer should be a lieutenant.

M.C.PERRY,
Commanding Home Squadron.

The following notice from the collector or Vera Cruz is important to travelers:

NOTICE. --Passengers arriving at this port without passports from the American Consul, resident at the port they embark from, will not be allowed to leave the vessel, and the master of any vessel permitting such passengers to land will be fined $500 for the each and every passenger landed and the vessel held responsible for the same.

F.M. DIMOND, Collector.

Collector’s Office, Vera Cruz, Aug. 25, 1847.

From the N.O. Delta, 3d inst.

Extract of a letter from an officer at Vera Cruz under date of the 27th August, 1847

"Your correspondents have doubtless informed you that Gen Scott reached the city of Mexico on the (I have not the date at hand. ) Worth went around behind the city, and cut off the water. Valencia, with a larger force sallied out of the city, met Gen Scott, fought a little while, and then vamosed into the city. Santa Anna then brought out a force and fought some time, but retreated into the city in great disorder--convoked the Congress, and sent out for a cessation of hostilities, expressing himself willing to treat with Mr. Trist. Hostilities ceased--Scott surrounding the city. There is no doubt of the correctness of this information. Some think piece will soon be established, but nobody thinks so in Vera Cruz. Maj Lally was heard from beyond Perote, on his way to Puebla, not molested."
The following from our regular Vera Cruz correspondent, was scribbled off very hastily, just at the Fashion was about to leave:

August 27, 1847:

EDITORS DELTA--Every conceivable variety of rumor relative to the movements of the Great General and his generals, have been afloat for several days past, but none having the color of authenticity about them. I omit sending them to you. This morning, however, a rumor found its way from the interior, which leads to the belief that Scott has had two most decisive battles, in both of which the American arms were successful. The first of these was with Valencia who hid his shard of the amusement with the advance guard; and the other was between the General himself and Santa Anna. The best and most authentic information I have received is, that the armies of both Valencia and Santa Anna have been dispersed; that the city is in the state of confusion and panic, and Congress has been summoned together, to take into consideration the propositions of Mr. Trist. That these rumors are better founded than any that have been received for some time I have no doubt. But in a day or two more, when the regular news comes here from Mexico, we shall either confirm it, or other wise.

P.S. --I have just time to inform you that the prisoners taken from Well's train, (Lieut. Henderson an 13 men,) have been, according to a Mexican who arrived here this morning, SHOT. He says he saw them shot.

D. Harden, of the Louisiana Battalion, died this morning, after a protracted illness. He will be buried this afternoon. Capt. White's company is still at Tampico.

Official Report of Capt. Wells

CAMP BAGARA, Aug. 19, 1847.

Sir--I have the honor to report for the information of the Colonel Commanding, that on the morning of the 13th inst., in obedience to his orders, I proceeded, with my command, composed of Captain Haile's company 14th Infantry, E company of the 12th Infantry, commanded by Lieut. Wyche, and Captain Fairchild's company of Louisiana Rangers, in all seven officers and two hundred and one rank and file. The train was composed of two ambulances, each drawn by four good horses, fit for the service in which they were employed, and nice wagons drawn by half broken down but still unbroken Mexican mules, with which it would have been difficult for me to have fulfilled my orders even I there had been no enemy to contend with. The commanding officer was not mounted and was under the mortifying necessity of dismounting a dragon and taking a horse when circumstances were such that he could not possible perform his duty on foot. Such was the command with which my orders required me to traverse a country and pass a bridge and fortification which no less than eight hundred men, supported by artillery, had heretofore attempted. I had not proceeded four miles from camp when it became necessary to throw out a part of my provisions; and it was then only with the aid of my infantry, and the extraordinary exertions of the active and efficient wagon master (Mr. Booley) who accompanied the train that the wagons could be forced up the sand hill. I reached Santa Fe and encamped for the night. The next morning I pursued the march, the enemy appearing on the flank, but evidently with no intention of attacking us. A few shots were exchanged between them and Captain Fairchild's company, who had left the road to give chase. I arrived at Juento del Rio about nine o'clock at night and encamped. Here I judged myself to be within six miles of Major Lally's camp. The next morning I directed Captain Fairchild to detach an officer (Lieutenant Henderson) and thirteen men with the orders to proceed to Major Lally's camp, and report my advance, provided he could prudently do so and the distance did not exceed six miles, but by no means to go beyond that distance, but to return and report the condition of the road to me. This command was accompanied by Dr. Cooper of the army and two of the Georgia Volunteers. I regret to inform you that I have not since heard of this detachment, and I am ignorant of its fate. I pursued the march until about ten o'clock, with difficulty getting the mules along, and at Pass La Beja, whilst the train was on the bridge, and the troops were getting water, the enemy appeared in force in front, on the hill, and commenced a fire upon us; some of the shots were also fired from the rear. --After the necessary preparations were made, I detached Capt. Haile with his company through the chaparral to gain the flank, and if possible the rear. This service was promptly and gallantly performed, whilst the command was ascending the hill. He gave them a fire which put them into immediate flight. I ordered Lieut. Morrelle, of Capt. Fairchild's company, with twenty men mounted to hold the horses near the bridge until the train had ascended the hill. The rear, however, was not attacked at this place. We continued our march, dispersing the enemy before us, until dark; when, as the train was passing a bridge within three miles of Puerto Nacional, the enemy opened his fire from the hills, within two hundred yards of the command, the balls generally ranging too high; the fire was so promptly returned that they were soon driven from their position, and, I think, with considerable loss. --Here, as I had previously intended, I ordered the troops to encamp. The wagons were placed in a safe position, the white covers taken off, the horses placed under shelter, and everything disposed for a quiet night's rest, which my men so much required. At three o'clock next morning I had the men under arms, and detached Lieut. Wyche with a part of his company through the chaparral, to gain a position on the hill side to be ready when the enemy should advance to attack. Just at daybreak they appeared on the hill with a drum beating and firing into our camp. I did not return the fire, but ordered Capt. Haile with his company to pass up the hill to the left of the road and again their flank. They continued their music for about twenty minutes, when Capt. Haile suddenly fired upon them and was after them with the bayonet, much to the amusement of our troops, who could see them from the opposite side of the bridge. Lieut.
Wyche had gained his position and was lying in wait, but they did not approach sufficiently near. I held the hill with my infantry until the train was ready to move. I was now within about three miles of Puento Nacional. The enemy had attacked us three times in force, and was always routed, with the loss, on our part of a man. The only loss sustained was on horse wounded and three muskets rendered unserviceable by musket balls. It was so reported to me this morning by the wagon master that one of the mule teams could proceed no farther; I was compelled in consequence to destroy my tents and leave one wagon. The other mules I had no hope of getting much beyond Puento Nacional, and had determined that if I did not find Maj. Lally near there, to destroy all the wagons and property, and with four days provisions in the haversacks, and the mail and ammunition, and some light baggage in the ambulances, to join him by forced march. Everything being in readiness I commenced the march about half-past nine in the morning. Before this time I was fully satisfied that the enemy occupied Puento Nacional in force. The tracks of unshod horses in the road left no doubt of that. My orders were positive; no direction was allowed me, and according to my ideas of military service, I felt bound to proceed in the execution of my order, until it was probed without the possibility of a doubt that it could not be carried out. My force was too small to detach any part of it to endeavor to turn the position. I accordingly made my disposition so as to sacrifice the least possible number of my troops. With thirty picked men under the command of Lt. Cheney, 14th Infantry, extended to six paces, I descended towards the bridge. This detachment was ordered to keep at least one hundred yards in front of the mounted men. After the mounted men with some interval, marched Lieut. Wyche's company; next came the train followed by Capt. Haile's company, who were ordered to close on and protect it, in case it should be charged. The rear guard, commanded by Lieut. Morrelle, of Captain Fairchild's company, followed after Capt. Haile's company. I halted the command on the slope of the hill, continuing to [illegible] myself, with Lieut. Cheney's command, hoping to draw the enemy's fire, without further ex[illegible] my troops. All was, however still--nothing could be seen. I directed the advance to move upon the bridge, ordered up the main body, and took my position in person near the bridge, where I could direct the advance, or order a retreat as one might prove practicable, or the other necessary. The rear of the command had scarcely got in motion, when the enemy opened their fire from the forts and heights with muskets, escopets, and artillery, and shoved themselves in such numbers and position, that I perceived at once that in passing the bridge, they must necessarily inflict upon me such a loss in killed and wounded, that it would be impracticable for me to advance or retire. I therefore directed the fire to be returned, and the retreat commenced; and withdrew my troops from under the fire of this strong place, with the loss of only four men killed, and one man and two horses wounded. One of the ambulances was quickly turned and gained the top of the hill--the other, in the act of turning, had one of his horses killed, and could not be brought off. The mules were of course more unmanageable than ever, and as soon as the enemy perceived that we were retiring the concentrated their whole fire upon the train. Half the mules were almost instantly shot down and the teamsters compelled to abandon their wagons. The enemy now displayed a strong force outside the fort, and was moving to gain our rear. I now moved off my command, which had been halted at the top of the hill, just beyond the effective range of the enemy's guns, and abandoned the train, which I could not possibly have brought off, nearly all the mules having been either killed or wounded; and to have blown up the ammunitions or saved anything from the wagons would have been to sacrifice men, which it was not evident I had not to spare, and would have compelled to leave my wounded, as I had not the means of transporting them. All the property, as well the personal baggage of the officers, was lost, and some despatches

The enemy's force occupying the forts I could not estimate with any degree of accuracy; it was certainly several times my own, and there was also a considerable force outside. Nothing was left now for me to do but force my way through the enemy in the rear and return by rapid marches to this place. The enemy appeared on every side during the day, and I was compelled to proceed with the greatest caution, always holding one hill until my infantry gained possession of the next in front, by a fatiguing march through the chaparral. This laborious duty fell principally upon Capt. Haile. I continued my march at night, but after dark I met with no further opposition from the enemy, and arrived the next morning at Santa Fe.

The next day I arrived and encamped at this place. In conclusion, I must be permitted speak of the officers who so ably sustained me on this trying march; Capt. Haile, of the 14th Infantry, I had frequently to detach on laborious and dangerous service, and it was universally performed in a manner that called forth my warmest admiration. Lieutenant Wyche, 12th Infantry, though sick, was with his company, and rendered important service. Lt. Cheney, 14th Infantry, who commanded the advance on the 16th, I was compelled to glance in a most dangerous position at the bridge, and his coolness and bravery were conspicuous. To Lieut Morrelle of Capt Fairchild's company, and the twenty brave volunteers who composed his command, my thanks are also particularly due. I had assigned him the duty of holding heights and protecting the rear. He selected his positions with judgment, and I frequently saw from the front his men charging and firing upon the guerrillas who were annoying the rear. Mr Hayes, of N. Orleans, accompanied the command as an amateur, and was always a volunteer whenever dangerous or difficult service was to be performed.

I am, sir, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,

J.M. Wells,
Capt. 12th Infantry, Com'dg Detachment.

LIEUT. ARTHUR,
A.A. Adjutant General, Vera Cruz
The following is the report of Capt. Wells, 12th infantry, who commanded the detachment that was sent out on the 13th August, from Vera Cruz, to reinforce Major Lally's command, which was attacked by a large force of guerrillas near the National Bridge; we find it in the N. Orleans Delta:

Sir--I have the honor to report for the information of the Colonel Commanding, that on the morning of the 13th inst., in obedience to his orders, I proceeded, with my command, composed of Captain Haile's company 14th Infantry, E company of the 12th Infantry, commanded by Lieut. He gave them a fire which put them into immediate flight. I ordered Lieut. Morrelle, of Capt. Fairchild's company, with twenty men mounted to hold the horses near the bridge until the train had ascended the hill. The rear, however, was not attacked at this place. We continued our march, dispersing the enemy before us, until dark; when, as the train was passing a bridge within three miles of Puerto Nacional, the enemy opened his fire from the hills, within two hundred yards of the command, the balls generally ranging too high; the fire was so promptly returned that they were soon driven from their position, and, I think, with considerable loss. --Here, as I had previously intended, I ordered the troops to encamp. The wagons were placed in a safe position, the white covers taken off, the horses placed under shelter, and everything disposed for a quiet night's rest, which my men so much required. At three o'clock next morning I had the men under arms, and detached Lieut. Wyche with a part of his company through the chaparral, to gain a position on the hill side to be ready when the enemy should advance to attack. Just at daybreak they appeared on the hill with a drum beating and firing into our camp. I did not returen the fire, but ordered Capt. Haile with his company to pass up the hill to the left of the road and again their flank. They continued their music for about twenty minutes, when Capt. Haile suddenly fired upon them and was after them with the bayonet, much to the amusement of our troops, who could see them from the opposite side of the bridge. Lieut. Wyche had gained his position and was lying in wait, but they did not approach sufficiently near. I held the hill with my infantry until the train was ready to move. I was now within about three miles of Puerto Nacional. The enemy had attacked us three times in force, and was always routed, with the loss, on our part of a man. The loss sustained was on horse wounded and three muskets rendered unserviceable by musket balls. It was so reported to me this morning by the wagon master that one of the mule teams could proceed no farther; I was compelled in consequence to destroy my tents and leave one wagon. The other mules I had no hope of getting much beyond Puerto Nacional, and had determined that if I did not find Maj. Lally near there, to destroy all the wagons and property, and with four days provisions in the haversacks, and the mail and ammunition, and some light baggage in the ambulances, to join him by forced march. Everything being in readiness I commenced the march about half-past nine in the morning. Before this time I was fully satisfied that the enemy occupied Puerto Nacional in force. The tracks of unshod horses in the road left no doubt of that. My orders were positive; no direction was allowed me, and according to my ideas of military service, I felt bound to proceed in the execution of my order, until it was probed without the possibility of a doubt that it could not be carried out. My force was too small to detach any part of it to endeavor to turn the position. I accordingly made my disposition so as to sacrifice the least possible number of my troops. With thirty picked men under the command of Lt. Cheney, 14th Infantry, extended to six paces, I descended towards the bridge. This detachment was ordered to keep at least one hundred yards in front of the mounted men. After the mounted men with some interval, marched Lieut. Wyche's company; next came the train followed by Capt. Haile's company, who were ordered to close on and protect it, in case it should be charged. The rear guard, commanded by Lieut. Morrelle, of Captain Fairchild's company, followed after Capt. Haile's company. I halted the command on the slope of the hill, continuing to myself, with Lieut. Cheney's command, hoping to draw the enemy's fire, without further [illegible] my troops. All was, however still--nothing could be seen. I directed the advance to move upon the bridge, ordered up the main body, and took my position in person near the bridge, where I could direct the advance, or order a retreat as one might prove practicable, or the other necessary. The rear of the command had scarcely got in motion, when the enemy opened their fire from the forts and heights with muskets, escopets, and artillery, and showed themselves in such numbers and position, that I perceived at once that in passing the bridge, they must necessarily inflict upon me such a loss in killed and wounded, that it would be impracticable for me to advance or retire. I therefore directed the fire to be returned, and the retreat commenced; and withdrew my troops from under the fire of this strong place, with the loss of only four men killed, and one man and two horses wounded. One of the ambulances was quickly turned and gained the top of the hill—the other, in the act of turning, had one of his horses killed, and could not be brought off. The mules were of course more unmanageable than ever, and as soon as the enemy perceived that we were retiring the concentrated their whole fire upon the train. Half the mules were almost instantly shot down and the teamsters compelled to abandon their wagons. The enemy now displayed a strong force outside the fort, and was moving to gain our rear. I now moved off my command, which had been halted at the top of the hill, just beyond the effective range of the enemy's guns, and abandoned the train, which I could not possibly have brought off, nearly all the mules having been either killed or wounded; and to have blown up the ammunitions or saved anything from the wagons would have been to sacrifice men, which it was not evident I had not to spare, and would have compelled to leave my wounded, as I had not the means of transporting them. All the property, as well the personal baggage of the officers, was lost, and some despatches

Which I ordered Capt Haile to keep in his trunk as the safest place, were also lost. The mail intended for the army was, however, saved, and the only wounded man brought from the field.

The enemy's force occupying the forts I could not estimate with any degree of accuracy; it was certainly several times my own, and there was also a considerable force outside. Nothing was left now for me to do but force my way through the enemy in the rear and return by rapid marches to this place. The enemy appeared on every side during the day, and I was compelled to proceed with the greatest caution, always holding one hill until my infantry gained possession of the next in front, by a fatiguing march through the chaparral. This laborious duty fell principally upon Capt. Haile. I continued my march at night, but after dark I met with no further opposition from the enemy, and arrived the next morning at Santa Fe.

The next day I arrived and encamped at this place. In conclusion, I must be permitted speak of the officers who so ably sustained me on this trying march; Capt Haile, of the 14th Infantry, I had frequently to detach on laborious and dangerous service, and it was universally performed in a manner that called forth my warmest admiration. Lieutenant Wyche, 12th Infantry, though sick, was with his company, and rendered important service. Lt. Cheney, 14th Infantry, who commanded the advance on the 16th, I was compelled to glance in a most dangerous position at the bridge, and his coolness and bravery were conspicuous. To Lieut Morrelle of Capt Fairchild's company, and the twenty brave volunteers who composed his command, my thanks are also particularly due. I had assigned him the duty of holding heights and protecting the rear. He selected his positions with judgment, and I frequently saw from the front his men charging and firing upon the guerrillas who were annoying the rear. Mr Hayes, of N. Orleans, accompanied the command as an amateur, and was always a volunteer whenever dangerous or difficult service was to be performed.

I am, sir, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
J.M. Wells,
Capt. 12th Infantry, Com'dg Detachment.

LIEUT. ARTHUR,
A.A. Adjutant General, Vera Cruz

*These troops were entirely undrilled.

- Intelligence reached Col. Winston, on the 27th ult., the correctness of which he did not doubt, that the whole party were taken prisoners and shot.

- Capt. Wells lost from his company 1 killed and 1 wounded/ Capt. Haile lost 2 killed and one man disabled for life by a fall. 1 teamster was killed, the ball that killed him passing through the body of a mule and then entirely through his own. The names of the two men killed in Capt. Haile's company were Begaur, of St. Louis, and Sojourney, of Shreveport, La.

!!The force in, and immediately around the fort on the left hand height, was estimated by the officers present at not less than 1000. There were several hundred on the other hills.

Mr. Hayes, formerly of the Delta. He is spoken of in the warmest terms by the officers of the detachment, for his coolness, gallantry and cheerfulness in the hour of peril.

battles of Couterras and Churubusco. With Disturnell's enlarged map of the Valle of the City of Mexico before us, we traced Gen. Scott's victorious march from Ayotla to the scenes of his late victories, and rose from Kendall's vivid sketch with the new admiration for the generalship of Scott, and increased wonder and respect for the invincibility of the American arms and energy of character—Kendall's masterly narrative, together with all the details which we find in all the New Orleans papers, we lay before our readers this morning. --We give it preference over everything else, satisfied that all speculations of our own would be thrown away, when matter of such stirring interest fills the thoughts of the whole community.

Nor shall we attempt to "fight the battles over again," nor to fill up the gaps in the narrative which are yet left open. The official accounts will soon present all the facts, and, for the present, the sketches before us present abundant materials for thought. Once more the dark myrtle is rightly entwined with the glittering laurel. The country, while rejoicing over the triumphs of our arms, the bright precursor (as we hope and believe) of peace, will deeply deplore the havoc made in the ranks of our gallant army. The memories of Thornton and Johnson of Virginia, Butler of South Carolina, and the other noble spirits who died for their country, will be enshrined with immortal honor in the national heart.

We turn from the gloomy picture to the glorious achievements of our arms. These two last victories of Scott will rank favorably with the other deeds of the campaign—and they point, unerringly, we think, to the cheering rain-bow of Peace. Mexico must be now satisfied, that all resistance to our arms must be desperate indeed—and the very terms of the armistice clearly indicate that negotiation and peace are the objects heartily desired by the rulers of Mexico. But our readers can draw their own conclusions from the facts before them.

Many persons seem to imagine that General Scott did not have more than 6,000 or 7,000 troops in the field, arrayed against 30,000 Mexicans. --While it is stated that, in one of the engagements only 6,000 Americans routed from 15,000 to 20,000 Mexicans, it is naturally inferred, from what we know of the strength of Scott's army, and the current of events, that this number represents only a portion of his forces, and that another division was posted in a different quarter. --We are satisfied that Gen. Scott must have had with him at least 12,000 men.

The Mexican loss, in killed and wounded, is immense; said to be about five thousand. Our loss, in killed and wounded, is supposed to be about 1,100. The number of officers reported killed, viz: 12 Regulars and 4 volunteers, is small, compared with other actions. The American officers wounded, as reported, are 45 Regulars, and 21 Volunteers, viz: New York regiment 10, South Carolina regiment 11.

But all doubt on this and other points will soon be cleared up by the official accounts—and we forbear all speculations. The victories have been glorious and astounding—and some of the incidents romantic and highly honorable to the American character.

We but express the general feeling, we are satisfied, when we declare that Persifer F. Smith, of New Orleans, Colonel of the Mounted Regiment and Brigader General by brevet, won his full share of glory on the 20th August. He fought bravely under Gen. Taylor in Florida—was recommended by Gen. Taylor as commander of the Louisiana Volunteers, when they were called for on the first breaking out of the war—and received the honorable office of Colonel of the Mounted Regiment, at the hands of the President. He is spoken of in the highest terms, for his military knowledge and noble qualities. But all, we doubt not, did their whole duty on this grand occasion.

By order of the Executive, a salute of one hundred guns was fired at 3 o'clock yesterday, by Capt. Nimmo's Fayette Artillery. We have never seen our city more excited.

On Tuesday night the Secretaries of State of War received by Express the interesting letters, to be found below, confirming the glorious news. There were no despatches from General Scott. It will be seen that the commission to negotiate has been appointed, and at its head Herrara, supposed to be a friend of peace. Mr. Trist writes that they had already had two meetings, and were to have a third, perhaps a last interview, on the 30th August. The Union looks upon the City of Mexico as at the mercy of our army, and thinks that they late rout has induced the enemy to enter into negotiations for peace.

Santa Anna has published a manifesto, in which he acknowledged the defeat, but makes a wretched attempt to throw the blame on an offending general, believed to be Gen. Valencia, who, he says, disobeyed his order in advancing, instead of taking a safe position at Coyoacan, and, afterwards, in not retreating to San Angel. He says that Gen. Scott might have reached the capital but for his (Santa Anna's) resistance to the advanced corps; and that on Gen. Scott's proposing an armistice, he concluded to accede to it. --[This we cannot yet believe.] He talks of the "national honor!"

But we have only time to insert the very interesting letters from the Union:

VERA CRUZ, August 31, 1847.

"SIR: I have the honor and satisfaction to inform you that our army has again been crowned with victory; 31,000 Mexicans engaged, with Gen. Santa Anna at their head, our little army, who, with the bayonet, drove them, in two hours, to the gates of the city."
Commissioners were immediately appointed, and negotiations are going on. The protocol appears on the face of it to be dictated by our commissioners. I had an English copy of it to send to you, but Colonel Wilson, for some cause best known to himself, begged it to send to the President.

"I send despatches which I received from Mr. Trist, to the hon. James Buchana. I cannot conclude without congratulating you, sir, on the mighty conquest, for I feel assured it will result in peace. Paredes will, in my opinion, hurry the conclusion of it. He ought never to have got out, after he got into the city; nevertheless, I firmly believe it will hasten a peace. Valencia made his escape with only two companions to Toluca, where he pronounced against Santa Anna and peace.

"I enclose a copy of a letter which I have received (from a very distinguished officer of the army. )

"With great respect, your obedient servant.
Hon. WILLIAM L. MARCY,
Secretary of War, Washington City.

"I am pleased to add, that the following named persons are the commissioners on the part of Mexico; and more so, because they are considered most friendly disposed for peace, viz;

General Herrera,

Sor. Cuoto, Lawyer.

General Mora y Villamil,

Sor. Atristain, Lawyer,

Sor. Arroya, Secretary (formerly secretary of legation the United States.

"I have just seen a letter from one of the most respectable English houses to their house here; they say that the Mexicans are so out generalled and so cornered, that they must make peace; but that Gen. Scott says if they do not at once, he will occupy the city with a territorial government--place 5000 troops to open the roads, &c. They speak of the Americans with admiration.

"The country people were already commencing to supply the army with every thing."

The following letter is from a highly distinguished officer in our army, who had a principal part in the battle:

TACUBAYA, Aug. 26, 1847

My dear sir:--I owe it to your many acts of kindness to inform you that our arms are crowned with a glorious victory. After many minor combats, but always against very superior numbers, with about 7000 we encountered the enemy’s army, headed by Santa Anna, at Churubusco, 3 or 4 miles from the gates of the capital, strongly entrenched. To this position we could only get two light batteries, 8 pieces. The enemy had much artillery and 32,000 men. After two hours of bloody conflict, mainly with the bayonet, we carried every thing. The rout was complete, and the pursuit carried to the gates of the city.--Our loss is short of 1,000--the enemy’s 5,000 including many distinguished men, generals and civilians.

In haste, your friend.

The following is an extract of a private letter from a Captain in the army, (who witnessed the battle, ) addressed to his correspondent at Vera Cruz, and enclosed to the Secretary of War:

TACUBAYA, Aug. 28

"You have no doubt been made aware, that, during our stay in Puebla, the General-in-chief and Mr. Trist received several visits from the British Secretary of Legation in the city of Mexico, relative to peace with this country, so that some of the Americans actually believed we were going to have a treat of peace signed at once, but all this vanished as soon as Santa Anna got the people a little united, and a large force collected in the capital to resist the enemy; and General Scott, in the meantime, having received reinforcements, continued his march on the capital on the 7th inst. On reconnoitering the hill of Penon, three leagues from the city, which was fortified, the General-in-chief concluded not to attack it, and the troops were marched round the south side of Lake Chalco to Talpam, or San Augustin, where the last arrived on the 19th inst. One the afternoon of that day an action was commenced by the troops under Gens. Twiggs and Pillow, about four miles from Talpam, on the road to San Angel, where the Mexicans held a strong position, with about twenty pieces of canon and six thousand men, under Gen. Valencia, at a placed called Cautreros, and on some heights called the Lomas of Magdalena.

"The fire was kept up until night with great vivacity by the Mexicans; as they were at a considerable distance from their adversaries, who fired but little during the afternoon, and of course suffered much from the fire of the Mexican artillery; but at break of day on the 20th, Gen. Smith surrounded one flank of the enemy, got in their rear, made over 3,000 prisoners, took all their artillery, and killed 600 or 700 of them. The Americans under Twiggs and Pillow continued their march to San Angel and Coyoacan, so as to get in rear of San Antonio, on the Tlalpam road to Mexico, where the Mexicans were also fortified, while Gen. Worth advanced on San Antonio, which the enemy hastily abandoned and retreated to a bridge over a stream of water that crossed the road, where they had a large fortification; and on the left of the road, a few hundred yards, another fortification with a large convent well garrisoned and fortified also. Here the American forces all neared each other, and were fired on with great vivacity by the Mexicans for about an hour. The troops of Gen. Worth drove the enemy out of the works about the bridge, and pursued them along the main road; and Gen. Shields attacked a hacienda a little further on, and routed them from there; and after about two hours, the battle of Churubusco was ended—in which the enemy had about 20,000 men, and commanded by Santa Anna in person, who retreated through Mexico to Guadalupe, as he thought, of course, the Americans would enter the city. Gen. Worth slept in advance that night, about a league and a half from the city; and the next day came to this place, where the General-in-chief arrived also."

TACUBARA, Aug. 23, 1847.

Considered, approved, and ratified, with the express understanding that the word “supplies,” as used the second time, without qualification in the seventh article of this military convention—American copy—shall be take to mean (as in both the British and American armies) arms munitions, clothing, equipments, subsistence (for men,) forage, money, and in general all the wants of an army. That word “supplies” in the Mexican copy, is erroneously translated “viveres” instead of “recursos.”

WINFIELD SCOTT
General-in-chief of the U.S.A.

[Translation]

Ratified, suppressing the 9th article, and explaining the 4th, to the effect that the temporary peace of this armistice shall be observed in the capital and 28 leagues around it; and agreeing that the word SUPPLIES shall be translated RECURSOS; and that it comprehends everything which the army may have need, except arms and munitions.

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY U.S. OF AMERICA

Tacubaya, August 24, 1847.

I accept and ratify the foregoing qualification added by the President General of the Mexican Republic.

WINFIELD SCOTT.

RE47v44n40p1c3, September 17, 1847: A LEAF FROM THE PAST

The N.O. Delta contains an interesting anecdote in regard to a prediction made by General Scott:

"Which Gen. Scott was in this city, on his way to the seat of war, he was frequently interrogated by curious persons as to his plans and designs. --But the old General generally as close as an oyster. There as, however, on purpose of his which made no effort ot conceal, and that was, his determination to be in the Capital by the 1st of September. "I shall dictate peace to them in their Capital, on the 1st September, 1847."--The old General is certainly shaving it very close, but we believe he will redeem his promise."

[BRM]
A correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune writes as follows from Buena Vista, under date of Aug. 16. The touching tribute to Captain Fairfax is in fine taste. We deeply regret to see that any portion of the Virginia volunteers were concerned in the “emeute” with Col. Paine of the North Carolina Regiment:

In camp here matters go on much the same as usual, and the health of the troops continues about the same. It gives me pan to announce that the Virginia regiment has lost one of its most accomplished Captains, Virginia one of her most worthy and respected sons, in the person of Capt. Henry Fairfax, of Fairfax county, Virginia, who died in Saltillo evening before last, of fever, at the age of forty-three years. He commanded the 13th company, and came out after the regiment had been some time in the country. He had received a military education at West Point, but did not remain in the army after he graduated. A brave, chivalrous spirit, and an ardent desire to give his country the benefit of his services in the field, induced him to sever the ties that bound him to the domestic hearth, around which gathered an affectionate wife and smiling children, and led on his neighbors to a distant country; and now in the prime of life, with the prospect so gratifying to a soldier, of marching on to meet the enemy and wielding the good right arm for victory, he has met that enemy against whom none can combat—Death! Who has taken him prisoner and borne him to the grave, where legions have been borne before. --Although it has been denied him to die upon the field of battle, his death is not the less glorious that it was a peaceful one. Friends watched over his sick bed, cared for his wants and wept over his demise. His remains will be conveyed to the States to-day by two of his late companions in arms, Lieuts. Fry and Donnan, who had resigned their commissioners and were about returning home. Two of the Virginia companies stationed in town, and the staff and company officers of the regiment, all who can leave camp, will escort the remains to the edge of the town. --Gen. Wool has also signified his intention being present with his staff upon the occasion, as a token of respect for the deceased.

Yours, &c.,
J.E.D.

BUENA VISTA, August 16, 1847.

An occurrence took place last evening which I had not purposed relating, learning that something more distressing might grow out of it, but as everything seems quiet now, I will briefly relate the circumstance. Col. Paine, of the North Carolina regiment, from the rigid system of discipline which he has pursued, has become very unpopular in his own regiment and in the Mississippi and Virginia regiments, with which he has been throw in connection as officer of the day. Many insults have been offered him by members of the two latter, and this feeling had gradually been ripening till it came to a head last night. A crowd assembled about different tents of about thirty men, some his own and some privates of the Virginia regiment, and subsequently stone assembled in front of his lieutenant colonel’s tent, who was sick and vomiting, and indulged in brutal laughter at his illness. These crowds were dispersed and two men ordered to be taken to the provost guard. The men of one company ordered to perform the duty refused, but were compelled to obedience by the colonel. -- One of them, however, refused to take his arms until the colonel held his sword over him and threatened to cut him down if he refused. -- That company having evinced a determination not to obey, were ordered to the rear of the colonel’s tent and obeyed contrary to his expectations, and were dismissed after answering to their names. Subsequently, quite late in the evening, another posse assembled in front of the colonel’s tent, but as he came in sight they began to disperse in different directions. He ordered them to halt, but they refused. The colonel then cried out that he would fire if they did not halt, and ordered them again, and upon their refusing discharged his pistol into the crowd, bringing down two men, wounding one of them mortally. This prompt and decisive step quelled the mutiny, and the colonel reported Gen. Cushing and Gen. Wool, who approved of his conduct. -- They both repaired to the camp, but everything was quiet. I regret to say that the colonel did not receive any very unanimous support from his officers on the occasion. The man who was so badly shot died last night. I have no time to write more, for the mail is on the point of closing.

J.E.D.

I have spent not a little time in endeavoring to collect a list of the killed and wounded officers in the great battles of the 20th, not a difficult matter, inasmuch as the different divisions are quartered in villages several miles apart. The entire loss in the division of Gen. Twiggs was 266, in that of Gen. Worth 339, in that of Gen. Quitman (Shield’s brigade), 240, in that of Gen. Pillow 212.

The New York Volunteers suffered severely, but not in proportion to the regiment from South Carolina. Col. Butler, who commanded the latter, behaved in the most gallant manner. In advancing upon the hacienda attacked by Gen. Shields, at the head of his regiment, his horse was shot dead. He then advanced on foot until he received a severe wound in the leg, which caused him to fall. -- In a fainting condition he was carried to the rear, but soon rallying he again advanced to the head of his regiment, when a musket ball struck him in the head and he died almost instantly. South Carolina lost on of her bravest and most generous spirits when Col. Butler fell.
I have not had time to obtain a full list of all the killed and wounded in the different divisions of the army, but shall endeavor to do it at the earliest opportunity. A great proportion of our loss—perhaps nineteenth—was in the attack upon the strong works at Churubusco—Santa Anna’s second line as he called it. As I have previously stated, no reconnaissance whatever of this strong position had been made. The brilliant success of the morning had inspired both officers and men with the highest enthusiasm, and they rushed pell mell into the position the post exposed, and where they were mowed down by hundreds.

It will be seen that our own loss falls short of eleven hundred—about 6,000 men were actively engaged. —When the works of the enemy are examined, one naturally wonders that Gen. Scott’s entire force was not swept away. Put his army in the same position and since the days of the viceroys there have not been Mexicans enough to born to drive them out.

White flags are now constantly passing and repassing between the Palace here and the Palace in Mexico. At this game the Mexicans can beat us. Yours, &c.

G.W.K.

TACUBAYA, August 25, 1847.

The armistice has finally been settled and signed, and I do not tell half the story when I say that it had produced universal dissatisfaction in the army—in the entire army. In the first place let me give you, from recollection, its main provisions, and then I will give you an idea as to the mode by which it was brought about.

The articles of the armistice first go on to say, that hostilities between the two armies are at once to cease., in order that the peace propositions of the United States may be listened to, and that they, the hostilities, are not to be renewed until either commander shall give the other forty eight hours’ notice; that in the meantime all work or fortifications on both sides shall cease, and that no further reinforcements or either party shall be allowed to approach nearer than twenty-eight leagues of the capital; that no persons other than citizens shall be allowed to either the city, and they only with passports from the Mexican authorities; that certain persons of the American army shall be allowed to either the city to borrow money and purchase supplies, but no officers are allowed to pass in except upon special business and under a flag. Such are about the amount of the different articles of the armistice, signed on our part by Gens. Quitman, Smith and Pierce, and on the part of the Mexicans by Gens Mors and Gujano.

Let me now give my speculations as to the mode by which this armistice was brought about. On the night of the 10th inst. After the great Mexican army was thoroughly beaten, broken to pieces and routed, Mr Thornton, or the English legation, accompanied by the British Consul, Mr Mackintosh— a man who regards Santa Anna, hates the Yankees and never moves unless his own ends are to be gained—came out to the city post haste on a visit to Gen. Scott. The next morning Gen Mors, accompanied by Mr Arrangoiz, who was formerly Mexican consul in New Orleans, came out, also on a visit to Gen Scott, and on the same day the latter wrote a letter to the Mexican authorities, hinting an armistice between the two armies with a view of opening negotiations for a peace. This proposition was eagerly jumped at by the Mexican Minister of War, at the instigation of Santa Anna of course, and the result has been a treaty of armistice in which, according to rumor nearly every thing the Mexicans asked for was conceded. I know nothing of the proceedings of this commission except from hearsay. There are many who believe that Gen. Scott has been compelled to adopt this policy, at the threshold of the Mexican capital by Mr Trist and his instructions, but there are few, and I must acknowledge myself among the number, who think that a peace honorable and satisfactory to the U.S. is to grow out of this matter. The whole affair, on the face of it, looks like on of Santa Anna’s old tricks to gain time to plan some new scheme of trickery and dissimulation, and as he has British influence to back him he will be likely to carry out what he undertakes. I have always said and always believed that Santa Anna was favorable to peace—to peace from policy only—and still believe he may endeavor to bring it about; but great as is his power, like a sail vessel he can only go with the wind and current, and has too many and too powerful enemies to carry out his present schemes, at least without strong assistance from the United States.

Santa Anna accuses Valencia of having lost the capital by not obeying his orders to abandon Coutreras on the 19th, and has ordered him to be shot wherever found; on the other hand, Valencia accuses Santa Anna of having lost every thing by not coming to his assistance, and it is now said that he has pronounced against him and peace with the Yankees at Toluca. Thus matters stand between these great Mexican leaders. Again, it is reported that Paredes is advancing from Oriziba, which place he successfully reached from Vera Cruz, breathing nothing but death and utter annihilation to the infamous North Americans, while it is further stated that Bustamente is at or near the capital with 6000 men, breathing the same amiable sentiments—The papers of the capital are almost silent about every thing—they do not even give an account of their terrible defeat.

The number of deserters and other foreigners found fighting against us the other day, and who are now prisoners, is 72. A court martial, with Col. Garland as president, is now in session here, for the trial of a portion of this precious set of scoundrels, and it is to be hoped they may have full justice done them. Riley, the Irishman who commanded the battalion of San Patricio, as it is called, openly makes his brags of what he has done, and says he expects no mercy.

Gen. Scott was himself wounded on the 20th inst. By a grape shot. It struck him on the outside of the leg below the knee, and gave so little a pain at the time that he said nothing about it, but it has since caused him more uneasiness.

Our own loss, in killed, wounded and missing, is put down in the numbers at 1000--it may possibly range a little under. The Mexican loss in killed alone amounted to nearly that number, their prisoners to about 3000, while their wounded we have no means of computing. Among the officers taken prisoners were three member of Congress, and I believe they are to be liberated to take part in the proceedings of that body in relation to peace.

Yours, &c.
G.W.K.

TACUBAYA, August 26, 1847.

We now have certain intelligence that Valencia arrived at Toluca with only two men, his aid-de-camps, and they were thankful for their good horses, or else they could not have kept up. It is asserted positively that he was drunk on the night of the 19th inst and promoted all his officers for their extraordinary gallantry in standing firmly to their guns during the afternoon when no one was returning their fire. The account that he has pronounce against Santa Anna has denounced him in a public decree, and accuses him of all blame in bringing about the recent disasters to the country. He must accuse somebody, and Valencia, by his disobedience of a cowardly order, has made himself amenable--offers a target for his master's wrath.

The policy of Gen Scott or of Mr. Trist--I do not know which is responsible for the measure--in effecting an armistice and consequently an opportunity to negotiate--this policy, I say, although not very flattering to the pride of those who fought the sanguinary battles of Coutreras and Churubusco, may still have a tendency to soften that of the Mexicans, and lead to some kind of a peace. So perfect was the panic among the sons of Iturbide on the 20th that one of our weaker regiments could have entered the Grand Plaza with but little opposition--in fact, could have driven every soldier either out of the city or to some hiding place within its walls. Santa Anna and the miserable semblance of a Government would also have fled, and there would have been no power with which to open negotiations, with which to treat. Perhaps it is better, then, that the army did not at once enter and occupy the capital, a least in view of a peace--this is the question yet to be solved, I must acknowledge, however, even as matters now look, that I am one of a large majority who feel anything but rejoiced that the army did not enter the city at first, and that peace negotiations are to be entertained at the National Palace.

Yours, &c. &c.
G.W.K.

P.S. --Since the above was written, we have received a thousand and one rumors from the city. The report that Bustamente is approaching with some 6000 troops is renewed, as well as the account of the advance of Paredes upon the capital. All the shops in the city are closed, and consternation reigns. Many will have it the evidence being their own proper eyes, that the Mexican are throwing up breast works and constructing batteries at different points, and they say too, that Santa Anna either is desirous of gaining time, or else to make one of the main conditions of peace that he is to be supported by American Arms against any faction that may rise against him. In this they are probably more than half right. A train of wagons, which was going in this morning headed by Capt. Wayne and an escort of dragoons, were turned back by Mexicans on the pretence that there were regular soldiers with the envoy. I don't know how the matter will be settled, but Santa Anna will probably have his own way. Our own officers are many of them outrageous at the occurrence.

TACUBAYA, August 27, 1847.

The official report of Gen. Salas, who was second in command at Coutreras, and who is now a prisoner, has been published in Mexico. He admits that his defeat was total, but as usual lays the blame on some of his brother officers. He says that on the afternoon of the 19th--(this was while no one was returning their fire)--The Mexicans fought with uncommon valor and enthusias, but that early on the morning of the 20th August they were suddenly surrounded and at once thrown into confusion, and in the end utterly routed. Salas says that at the outset of the disorder he shouted "Victory for Mexico," ordered the trumpets to sound, and directed Gen. Torrejon to charge with his lancers; but according to the same account that officer fled in the most cowardly manner, the infantry got mixed up with the cavalry and also fled, and the rout of all was complete and most disastrous. Salas says that Gen. Valencia ran off at the commencement of the fight, that he does not know what has become of him, and for this reason has felt himself called upon to make the report. Sch is the account given by his Excellency Gen. R. Don. I. Mariano de Salas, of the defeat at Coutreras--one of the most brilliant victories achieved by our arms since the commencement of the war--brilliant and most important for the great results produced with so little loss on our side, and for which Gen. Smith, as well as Col. Riley and the other officers engaged in it, are receiving the unqualified approbation of the entire army.

Gen. Salas himself acknowledges that in this battle Gen. Fronters was killed, that besides himself Gen. Mendoza, Bianco and Garcia were wounded and taken prisoners, in addition to a list of over 100 others--Colonels, Captains, &c. who were either killed, wounded or are now in our hands. And here let me mention one fact in relation to the after battle of Churubusco, which will show how near Gen. Scott was to capturing the entire Mexican army. At the time Gen. Worth was pressing upon the tete de pont, Gen. Twiggs upon the church, and Gen. Shields and Pierce upon the hacienda farther on, the commander-in-chief ordered Major Sumner to take command of the Rifles, and by a circuitous march to reach the road between the enemy and the city. Nothing but the daring impetuosity of our own men in front prevented this plan from succeeding--had the Mexican held out or our own soldiers held off ten minutes longer, the enemy would have been in a bag as it were, and killed or captured to a man. Santa Anna might perhaps escaped, as he has a peculiar way of his own; but he would not have taken even the remnant of an army with him.

The trial of the deserters--the celebrated battalion of St. Patrick--is still going on, but how the affair will terminate, no one but those on the court martial can say. A strong influence is at work in favor of the prisoners. In the first place, all the Mexican ladies in this town, La Senora Cayetano Rubio among the number, have signed a warm petition in their favor, which has been sent to Gen. Scott. The lady whose name I have given, is the wife of the rich Rubio, who has a country house here in Tacubaya. The English, and perhaps some of the other foreign ministers, have also interested themselves in behalf of the scoundrels. I might here state that the celebrated flag of the foreign battalion was captured by the 14th Infantry, attached to Gen. Pillow's division.

Two o'clock, afternoon. -----New has just come in from the capital which has caused great excitement. At an early hour a train of wagons, under charge of Captain Wayne, dressed in citizens' cloths, started for the city. Scarcely had they reached the Plaza before the wagons were surrounded by an immense concourse of leperos, who at first commenced cursing at jeering the wagon-masters and wagoners. Soon, however, they began to pelt the poor fellows with stones and other missiles, and notwithstanding the pretended exertions of a squad of Mexican soldiers, who acted a guard, the entire train was driven out of the city. Several of the wagoners received bruises and contusions from the showers of stones thrown at them, and foremost in the mob were said to be the women of the town. One Mexican was shot by the wagon masters, and another by a Mexican officer, but not until they had half killed an American. In the crowd of loafers or leperos were soon [illegible] apparently of the better class from their dress, who excited the mob to acts of violence, while in the balconies were ladies looking on and evidently enjoying the sport.
Even the Mexican cavalry guard, or many of them, sat upon their horses--not indifferent spectators, for they fairly laughed to see the unfortunate and unarmed teamsters beset in a manner so cowardly. I suppose that Santa Anna will apologize for the outrage, and that thus the matter will be settled; but this done not prevent many from thinking that the tyrant instigated the whole affair. He is up to all sorts of trickery. There are others who think, and probably with good show of reason, that the mob was set on by the enemies of Santa Anna and peace, with the intention of involving the whole party and breaking off all negotiations. Be this as it may, the Mexicans have won a great battle in driving our wagons from the city, and will not fail to exult over it. I know not what measures Gen. Scott will no resort to in order to obtain his money and supplies from the city.

Yours, &c.

TACUBAYA, August 28, 1847.

The accounts this morning from the city would go to show that Mexicans are chuckling over the defeat of the wagon train yesterday, and its expulsion without the walls--they absolutely term it a victory! The authorities pretend they did everything in their power to suppress the row, but no one who understands the Mexican character believes them.
If anything in this world can be driven easier than Mexicans with arms in their hands, (vide Churubusco and Coutreras, ) it is Meixcans without arms. A Mexican mod can be likened to nothing save a flock of sheep--as easily routed and dispersed --and now the authorities pretend that they did everything in their power to suppress the one which was raised yesterday. A single squadron of our dragoons could have ridden over the rioters as easily as they could over a lawn. I suppose now that the wagons will not be allowed to enter the city--another point gained by the enemy. They certainly have not been in to-day.

The Diario del Gobierno of yesterday is almost entirely filled with documents and letters, all undertaking to prove that Valencia was the sole cause of the defeat of the Mexican army. Santa Anna's friends are at the bottom of all this of course. Several of Valencia's letters are lugged into the document, in one of which, dated at 8 o'clock on the evening of the 19th, at Coutreras, he speaks of having routed the entire American army at all points, and that the liberty and honour of his country had been saved by the glorious victory. He further discloses the fact that General Frontera was killed while leading on a charge of cavalry, and that Gen. Farrad was wounded. This is news; we shall get all the truth out of them after a time. The last we hear of Valencia he was at Toluca, whither he had gone, according to his own published statement, to collect forces to vindicate the honor of his county.

The same number of the Diario contains an account of the attack upon the wagon train. It makes light of the whole affair, says that a few persons were slightly injured, that Gena. Tornel, Herrar and Quijano soon dispersed the rioters, and that the fact of the wagons going as far as the Plaza Principal was an error or overnight. Among these who received a shower of stones on the occasion was Mr. Harous, the gentleman, who has mainly fed and clooted the army since it marched from Jalapa. He was in the city after supplies at the time.

I believe that up to this time I have neglected to mention that Major Gaines, who recently escaped from Mexico, was on the staff of Gen. Scott during the recent battles, and that Midshipman Rogers was on that of Gen. Pillow. After the route at Coutreras, and while our troops were on the way to Churubusco, a house where Capt. Danley and Major Borland were secreted was passed. The former was quite unwell at the time, but the latter came out, shouldered a musket, and was in the defeat of Churubusco. I hear that Clay and all the other prisoners will now soon be released.

Yours, &c.
The peace commissioners met again yesterday, and at a point near this place. Nothing positive in relation to the proceedings of this second meeting has transpired—some say that everything went on smoothly, others say not, which is tolerably strong proof that but little is known one way or the other in relation to the deliberations. The new commissioner, Barnardo Couto, was present, as was also Atristain. The latter is represented as a tool of Mackintosh's; but if he can do anything towards bringing about a peace this makes no difference. They say that in the city they indulge the hope that the commissioners will agree upon the Neusces as a boundary. This is carrying the stakes and stones a little too far. "Give them an inch and they'll take and ell" is applied to many people in the world—give a Mexican an inch and he'll take at least seven miles and a half.

I must close this letter haste, as a messenger has just come in to say that the express man is about to start. You shall be kept informed of everything.

Yours, &c.

RE47v44n40p2c4, September 17, 1847: IMPORTANT PUBLIC DOCUMENTS

The Armistice—Official Correspondence

To the proper elucidation of the spirit with which the recent Armistice was entered into between Gen. Scott and Santa Anna, we annex several important documents.

The following was the letter addressed by General Scott to Santa Anna tendering an armistice:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY U.S. AMERICA.
Coyoacan, August 21, 1847.

To his Excellency the President and General in Chief of the Republic of Mexico.

Sir—Too much blood has already been shed in this unnatural war between the two great Republics of this continent. It is time that the differences between them should be amicably and honorably settled, and it is known to your Excellency that a commissioner of the part of the U. States, clothed with full powers to that end, is with this army. To enable the two Republics to enter on negotiations, I am willing to sign, on any reasonable terms, a short armistice.

I shall wait with impatience until to-morrow morning for a direct answer to this communication; but shall in the meantime seize and occupy such positions outside of the capital as I may deem necessary to shelter and comfort this army.

I have the honor to remain, with high consideration and respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant.

WINFIELD SCOTT.

To this letter a reply was returned by the Mexican Secretary of War, of which the following is a hasty version:

Ministry of War and Marine,
Mexico, August 21, 1847.

Sir—The undersigned, Minister of War and marine of the Government of the United States of Mexico, is instructed by his Excellency the President, commander-in-chief, to reply to your communication in which you propose to enter into an armistice, with a view to avoid the further shedding of blood between the two great Republics of this continent, for the purpose of hearing the propositions which may be made for this purpose by the commissioner of his Excellency the President of the United States of America, who is at the headquarters of the American army.

It is certainly lamentable, that in consequence of the disregard of the rights of the Mexican Republic, the shedding of blood has become inevitable between the first republics of the American continent; your Excellency with great propriety qualifies this war as unnatural, as well on account of its origin as the antecedents of two people identified by their relations and their interests. The proposition of an armistice to terminate this scandal has been received with pleasure by his Excellency the President, commander-in-chief, as it will enable the propositions to be entertained which that commissioner of the President of the United States may make for the honorable termination of the war.

Accordingly, the President, commander-in-chief, directs me to say to your Excellency that he accepts the proposition to enter into an armistice, and for this object he has appointed the brigadier generals D. Ignacio Mora y Villamil and D. Benito Quijano; who will be present at the time and place which may be designated.

His Excellency also instructs me to communicate his satisfaction that the army of the United States should occupy convenient and fitting quarters, trusting and hoping that they will be out of reach of the fire of the Mexican fortifications.

I have the honor to be with high consideration and respect, your Excellency’s most obedient servant, ALCORTA.

The same day Senor Pacheco, the Secretary of State, issued the following summon for the assembling of Congress:

MINISTRY OF INTERNAL AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Mexico, August 21, 1847.

Most Excellent Sir--All Mexicans, but especially the inhabitants of this capital, have been witnesses to the extraordinary exertions which have been made by his Excellency the Provisional President to collect an army capable of meeting that of the United States, and restoring the luster of the arms of the Republic. They are witnesses also that he has fought with intrepidity, exposing his own life, until the moment which the victory was lost and the enemy was at the gates of the capital.

In these circumstances, and when the numerous inhabitants of Mexico have made ever kind of sacrifice to carry on the war, it is one of the most imperious duties of the First Magistrate to prevent the calamities inseparable from an assault, and to avoid all consequences of a violent occupation of the city. To this end, and in the exercise of his constitutional powers, and in conformity with the wishes of Congress communicated to him on the 16th July last, he has determined to hear the propositions which Mr. Nicholas Trist has to make on the part of the United States, and to consent that in the meantime there shall be a suspension of hostilities.

At this question is of the utmost interest to the Republic, his Excellency desires that the national Congress should take their appropriate part, and accordingly directs me to notify your Excellency that you may take measures diligently to summon the Deputies to assemble at 12 o’clock to-day.

I reiterate the assurance of my distinguished consideration. God and Liberty.

JOSE RAMON PACHECO.

RE47v44n40p2c5, September 17, 1847: FURTHER PARTICULARS

We devote all of our dispensable space (sacrificing our own privileges to the important news and to our advertising friends, ) to the continuation of Kendall’s interesting narrative of events. We commenced with his account and think it proper to give his consecutive letters—especially as the interest does not flag at all.

The New Orleans Delta and Times are also filled with copious and graphic sketches of the varied incidents of the two well fought and glorious fields. The Delta’s picture of the battles of Contreras (and not Couterreras, the Picayune says, ) and Churubusco is among the most attractive narratives of the kind we have ever read. We shall hereafter draw on it liberally. It describes our army on its arrival at El Penon, which position it turned, and where Gen. Alvarez at the head of the Pintos (painted or naturally spotted Indians, ) and of 10,000 regular Mexican troops attempts a feeble effort to defeat the movement, but is scattered to the winds by Captain Taylor’s artillery—refers to General Worth’s arrival at San Augustin—to the death of Captain Taylor’s—refers to General Worth’s arrival at San Augustin—to the death of Captain Thornton on a reconnaissance—to the occupation of San Juan de Dios by Gen. Worth; who was fired upon by the enemy’s—the defeat of a detached Mexican force by Major Graham—the appearance of Generals Pillow and Twiggs’ division in front of the enemy—the hot engagement of General Smith’s brigade with the enemy’s infantry—Captain Magruder’s battery sustaining the fire of the whole Mexican artillery, 22 pieces—the movement of Pierce’s brigade to the support of Smith—the movement of Pierce’s brigade to the support of Smith—the approach of Santa Anna with 12,000 men—the masterly manoeuvres of General P.F. Smith—the magnanimity of General Shields, who totally routed and dispersed the enemy, who, in their retreat, were cut to pieces by General Shields—the hot fire of the Chivalry Regiment—and the utter defeat of the enemy at Contreras and Churubusco. These are but a few of the heads, which are dwelt upon with great effect.

The Delta gives a long and mournful list of the killed and wounded Americans in the late battles, 1017 in all. The proportion of killed to the wounded is smaller than in the previous battles, but many are severely wounded.

In the 1st division, (Gen. Worth's,) killed: Commissioned officers none; non-commissioned 5; privates 32. Wounded, commissioned officers, 13; non-commissioned 41; privates 235; missing, privates, 10. Aggregate, 336.

In the 1st brigade, 2d division, (Gen. Twiggs',) killed: Rifles, 4; 1st artillery, 10; 3d infantry, 5-19. Wounded--Rifles, 10; 1st artillery, 16; 3d infantry, 28-54. Missing--Rifles, 3; 1st artillery, 1; 3d infantry, 8-12. Total 85.

In the 2d Brigade--killed 23; wounded 126; missing 4. Engineer Company, wounded 4; missing 1. --Total 158.

In the 3d division, Gen. Pillow's--in 1st brigade commanded by Gen. Pierce: commissioned officers killed 1; wounded 11; missing 1: non-commissioned officers and privates, killed 11; wounded 124; missing 10. --Total 158. In the 2d Brigade, (including Voltigeurs and South Carolina Regiment,) killed and wounded, 137.

In the 4th Division, Gen. Quitman's--Killed: Commissioned officers 4; privates 11. Wounded: Commissioned officers 9, non-commissioned 9, privates 68, missing 1 private. --Total 103.

We await the official account to give the killed and wounded. In addition to the officers already published, we regret to see the name of Col. G. W. Morgan of Ohio, wounded severely.

RE47v44n40p2c5, September 17, 1847: AFFAIRS IN MEXICO

We confess that we felt some disappointment, when we first heard that Gen. Scott had proposed an armistice to the Mexican-Commander-in-Chief. We had seen so much perfidy in Mexican conduct, so barbarous a system of warfare employed by them, so shameful a rejection of our generous offers of peace, and the plighted word of its government so wantonly broken or disregarded--that we felt as if they were not entitled to such forbearance at our hands. We were inclined to the opinion, from the unhappy results of our former leniency, that Mexico might again play us false--and that the occupation of her capital and the utter prostration of her moral as well as physical power might be necessary to force her seriously to negotiate.

But reflection upon all the facts has almost convinced us that, in proposing the armistice, Gen. Scott has shown sound wisdom and good policy. He probably foresaw, that by entering the city, the Government would have been disbanded, and none left to make peace with. HE must have felt satisfied, that the city was at his mercy, and that if Mexico obstinately rejected peace, the alternative of seizing the capital was still secured to him. It was natural, too, that the Mexican Government would be more disposed to negotiate, than if the national pride had been mortified by a seizure of the capital. Above all, Gen. Scott knew that the great object of our Government and people is to make peace--and felt justified in doing what he also did after the battle of Cerro Gordo. The proposition was simply to suspend hostilities, to ascertain if it be practicable to conclude a peace without further shedding of blood. Similar overtures were made to the enemy and foolishly rejected, soon after the overthrow of the Mexican forces at Cerro Gordo. We trust, and, from all we see are inclined to believe, that the present negotiation will result favorably; though bold must be that prophet who can make any positive predictions, based upon the ever shifting and heterogeneous elements of Mexican character.

We are indebted to a kind friend for the following very interesting extracts of a letter received in this city yesterday from an officer, fully enabled by his position to furnish reliable information. His statements are important, and his view of the armistice, we are induced to believe, is the sound one--though, in ignorance of all the circumstances, we cannot, express a very confident opinion:

We have had another brilliant but bloody victory, which brought us triumphantly up to the very gates of the city. We should now be in the Capital but for an armistice, which was agreed upon to enable Mr. Trist to treat. As it was supposed the prospects of peace would be greatly lessened if we occupied the Capital, the army has made this sacrifice upon the altar of patriotism. It seems to be a bitter one, but excellent hopes are entertained of its resulting well.

Our loss has been severe, but that of the enemy utterly ruinous, so as not to leave him any power of resistance. General Scott has outdone all his former achievements, and the army has done with the bayonet alone probably as much as was ever accomplished by any troops without artillery. You are aware that we have had no opportunity of sending letters for some months past: I am not even sure that I shall be able to slip this in with despatches. From where I write, I overlook the city [but two miles distant] and the whole valley of Mexico--a view scarcely less charming from association than in itself.
So many officers have been killed and wounded, that I fear will be great distress and anxiety on account of many who are safe. No one from Richmond was hurt. Captain Craig, who is know there, received a smart flesh wound, but not at all serious. Our loss is about on thousand killed and wounded. The Mexican loss about five thousand killed and wounded, and about ten thousand more prisoners and dispersed--fifteen thousand in all. We had about nine thousand to thirty odd thousand.

The Spanish Minister had arrived at Vera Cruz from the capital, on his return home. According to the Picayune, he is understood to have been recalled "in consequence of his intrigues to establish a monarchy in Mexico, and place the Duc de Montpensier on the throne. It is said that the Governments of both France and England disavow having ever entertained his scheme. Had he been successful, they would not have been so anxious to disclaim his acts."

The Times publishes a letter from Col Hamtramck to Adj't General Richardson, it which he pays a proper tribute to the virtues in the highest terms of the officers and men of the Virginia regiment, and adds.

"We are much pleased with out Brigadier General, (Cushing. ) he is a gentleman--a man of great information and intelligence--industrious, energetic, and possesses more military information and knowledge than the world gives him credit for."

We cannot but regret that the Virginia troops have unfortunately had no opportunity of showing their mettle (or metal, as Coleridge writes it, ) on the glorious battle fields of Mexico.

Gen. Scott's wound at Churubusco was but slight. We are happy to hear from the Delta, that the gallant old General was so little troubled by his wound, that he would not eve acknowledge it until the battle was decided."

A letter in the Picayune, from an English commercial house, dated Mexico, Aug. 29, says:

"There are about 15, 000 or 20, 000 Mexican troops in the city, and, unless an honorable peace is entered into, they will have another brush. --But my opinion is all will be settled, if it was not previously understood. The business houses continue closed. The American troops are now in Tacubaya, San Angel, San Augustin, &c. --The opinion of the better classes, and our countrymen among them, is that a peace will be concluded."

"PEACE- The N. O. Delta is informed that its contemporaries of the Patria, have late news from the city of Mexico, to the effect that articles of peace had been signed by Mr. Trist and the Mexican Commissioners."
By the U.S. steamer Mary Kingland, which arrived this morning, we have Vera Cruz papers containing intelligence of the Important Victory gained by Gen. Scott over the concentrated forces of Mexico, within three miles of the capital.

Gen. Scott moved on to the village of St. Augustine, a few miles from the city, on the 18th, from which time to the 20th, the day of victory, the Mexicans were seen busily preparing their defences and batteries, having previously destroyed the roads and ditches, to prevent the cavalry and artillery from advancing.

The Van of the army, commanded by General Twiggs, first met with resistance at Chalco, a small village situated at the end of the lake.

On the 18th General Worth advanced on the city, and quartered near San Antonio, which place was strongly fortified by the enemy, who, on the morning of the 19th, opened a brisk fire on General W., which continued until night.

On the morning of the 10th General Scott moved towards the strong batteries of Coutreras, accompanied by General Worth, when the joyful intelligence, that that battery was silenced, and the Mexicans in full flight, leaving fifteen pieces of cannon, and some fifteen hundred prisoners, among them four general officers, in the hands of General P. Smith, who thus routed General Valencia, after tremendous conflict. It is supposed seven hundred of the enemy fell at this battery.

General Worth then turned on San Antonio, whilst the main army, under Generals Twiggs, Pillow, Smith and Cadwallader, moved on the Capital. The former place was abandoned by the enemy, with the cannon, ammunition, &c.

The divisions of General Twiggs and Worth then engaged the other strong batter, Churubusco, which was said to be commanded by Santa Anna in person--this conflict was fierce, and ended in routing the Mexicans, who fled for the city.

The fancy troops--the Hidalgoes--Independencias and Polkas, fled without firing a shot.

Gen. Twiggs took about 2000 prisoners, among which were a number of generals and the entire foreign battalion, (deserters from the American army, ) under the noted Riley.

The South Carolina and New York volunteers have suffered severely, the former losing 137 out of 272 men; the 1st Artillery, also, suffered severely.

Among the prisoners are three ex-Presidents. --About 45 pieces of cannon have fallen into the hands of the conquerors.

Col. Harney's dragoons could not be brought into action on account of the ground, which consists of sharp pointed lava strewn in every direction for miles, and which indeed impeded the infantry in their operations.

Thus, once more has the American army covered itself with glory, and at last forced the Mexicans to believe it invincible. They having 30,000 fresh troops to oppose only 6000 Americans, jaded with marching and exposed to the rain the night previous to the battle, without shelter, and having barely any artillery in comparison with themselves.

Gen. Scott has, as will be seen by an extract from a Vera Cruz paper, granted an armistice for 48 hours, at the intercession, we understand, of the British Consul.

The city is still untouched, and we trust will remain so, as doubtless the commanders of the Mexican army must see the utter hopelessness of attempting to oppose Gen. Scott in entering the city.

[From the Sun of Anahuac. ]

THE ARMISTICE.

The undersigned appointed respectively-the three first by Maj. General Winfield Scott, commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States; and the two last by his excellency D. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, president of the Mexican republic and commander-in-chief of its armies, met with full powers, which were duly verified in the village of Tacubaya, on the 22nd day of August, 1847, to enter into an armistice, for the purpose of giving the Mexican government an opportunity to receiving propositions for peace from the commissioners appointed by the president of the United States, and now with the American army; when the following articles were agreed upon:

ART. 1. Hostilities shall instantly and absolutely cease between the armies of the United States of America and the United Mexican States, within 30 leagues of the capital of the latter states, to allow time to the commissioners appointed by the Mexican republic, to negotiate.
2. This armistice shall continue as long as the commissioners of the two governments may be engaged on negotiations, or until the commander of either of the said armies shall give formal notice to the other of the cessation of the armistice, and for 48 hours after such notice.

3. In the mean time, neither army shall, within thirty leagues of the city of Mexico, commence any new fortification, or military work of offence or defence, or do anything to enlarge or strengthen any existing work or fortification of that character, within the said limits.

4. Neither army shall be reinforced within the same. Any reinforcements in troops or munitions of war, other than subsistence now approaching either army, shall be stopped at the distance of twenty-eight leagues from the city of Mexico.

5. Neither army, nor any detachment from it, shall advance beyond the line it at present occupies.

6. Neither army, nor any detachment or individual of either, shall pass the neutral limits established by the last article, except under flags of truce bearing the correspondence between the two armies, or on the business authorized by the next article; and individuals of either army who may chance to straggle within the neutral limits, shall by the opposite party be kindly warned off or sent back to their own armies under flags of truce.

7. The American army shall not by violence obstruct the passage form the open country into the city of Mexico, of the ordinary supplies of food necessary to the consumption of its inhabitants, or the Mexican army within the city; nor shall the Mexican authorities, civil or military, do any act to obstruct the passage of supplies from the city, or the country needed by the American army.

8. All American prisoners of war remaining in the hands of the Mexican army, and not to heretofore exchanged, shall immediately, or as soon as practicable, be restored to the American army against a like number, having regard to rank, of Mexican prisoners captured by the American army.

9. All American citizens who were established in the city of Mexico prior to the existing war, and who have since been expelled from that city, shall be allowed to return to their respective business or families therein, without delay or molestation.

10. The better to enable the belligerent armies to execute these articles, and to favor the great object of peace, it is further agreed between the parties that any courier with dispatches that either army shall desire to send along the line from the city of Mexico or its vicinity, to and from Vera Cruz, shall receive a safe conduct from the commander of the opposing army.

11. The administration of justice between Mexicans, according to the general and state constitutions and laws, by the local authorities of the towns and places occupied by the American forces, shall not be obstructed in any manner.

12. Persons and property shall be respected in the towns and places occupied by the American forces. No person shall be molested in the exercise of his profession; nor the services of any one be required without his consent. In all cases where services are voluntarily rendered, a just price shall be paid, and trade remain unmolested.

13. Those wounded prisoners who may desire to remove to some more convenient place for the purpose of being cured of their wounds shall be allowed to do so without molestation, they still remaining prisoners.

14. Those Mexican medical officers who may wish to attend the wounded shall have the privilege of doing so, if their services be required.

15. For the more perfect execution of this agreement two commissioners shall be appointed, one by each party; who in case of disagreement shall appoint a third.

16. This is convention shall have no force or effect unless approved by their excellencies the commanders respectively of the two armies within 24 hours, reckoning from the sixth hour of the 23rd day of August, 1847.

A. Quitman,
Major Gen. U.S.A.

Brigadier Gen. U.S.A.

IGNACIO DE MORA Y VILLAMIL,
We learn that a manifesto has been published by Santa Anna, but have not heard the tenor of it.

RE47v44n40p3c2, September 17, 1847: BRILLIANT VICTORIES! IMPORTANT FROM SCOTT’S ARMY

From the New Orleans Picayune, Sept. 5.

Important from Gen. Scott’s Army

BATTLES OF COUTRERAS AND CHURUBUSCO.

Total Defeat of the Mexicans—-General Scott encamped within two and a half miles of the City of Mexico—-Armistice between the two Armies—-Negotiations with Mr. Trist for a Peace commenced.

The U. States steamship Mary Kingland, Capt. John Davis, arrived at an early hour this morning. -By her we have received our letters from Mr. Kendall from the 22nd to the 28th of August, all dated from Tacubaua. A courier dispatched by him on the 29th with the first account of the battle fought on that day, was cut off.

From a map and plan of the battle fields before us, we note that they are called the battles of Contreras and Churubusco—so called from field works of the enemy of those names. The victories were decisive, but as far as we can judge from a hasty perusal of a portion of our letters, the proposition for an armistice was made by Gen. Scott—probably at the suggestion of the British Embassy. The report we have hitherto given that the city of Mexico was at our mercy, appears to have been unfounded.

Should peace not follow form the negotiations now pending, another battle must ensue, the enemy having a force of from fifteen to twenty thousand men yet left. But the road appears to be completely open to us, and the city is only two and a miles form our encampment.

Our victories have been purchased at a vast loss of valuable life, as will be seen by the following list. We see names of men at the loss of whom we weep; but all have their friends, and we make no distinctions.

OFFICERS WOUNDED—-Regulars—-Colonel Clark, 6th Infantry slightly, Col. Morgan, 15th Inft. severely, Maj. Wade, 3d Art. severely, Maj. Bonneville, 6th Inft. slightly, Capts. Wessells, 2d Inft. severely, Phil. Kearney, 1st Dragoons, left arm shot off, McReynolds, 3d Dragoons, severely, Craig, 2d Inft. severely, Ross, 7th Inft. severely, J. R. Smith, 2d Inft. severely, Chapan, 5th Inft. slightly, Johnson, 9th Inft. slightly, Lieuts. Schuyler Hamilton, 1st Inft. But attached to Gen Scott’s staff, severely, Halloway, 8th Infantry but attached to Smith’s Light Battalion, severely, Bacon, 6th Inft. severely, Callender, of the Ordinance, but commanding howitzer batter, severely, Arnold, 2d Artillery, severely, Herman Thorn, 3d Dragoons, attached to Col. Garland’s staff, slightly, Hendrickson, 6th Inft. severely, Humber, 7th Inft. severely, Boynton, 1st Artillery, but attaced to Taylor’s battery, slightly, Lorimer Graham, acting with 1st Dragoons, severely, Van Buren, of the Rifles, slightly, Martin, 1st Artillery, right arm shot off. Goodloe, 15th Inft. Mortally, Farrelly, 5th Inft. but attached to Smith’s Light Battalion, severely. Lugenbell, adjutant 5th Inft. slightly, Bee, 3d Inft. slightly, Collings 4th Artillery, slightly, Tilden. 2d Inft. severely, Newman, 6th Inft. severely, Gardner, 2d Inft. severely, Hayden 2d Inft. slightly, Sprague, adjutant 9th Inft. slightly, Palmer, 9th Inft. severely, Buckner, 6th Inft. slightly, Cram, 9th Inft. slightly, Simpkins, 12th Inft. slightly, Peternell, 15th Inft. slightly, Bennet, 15th Inft.

On the 16th of August Gen. Worth marched as far as the hacienda of San Gregorio, beyond which it was found that labor, were completely turned.

By this move a new line of operations was taken up on the southern and northwestern side of the city of Mexico, and Pillow followed the next morning; at the same hour Gen. Quitman broke up his encampment at Buena Vista, a small road could be made which would enable the army to reach San Angel, and thus turn the strong batteries of San Antonio. This latter party had a squadron and a body of the 11th Infantry under Col Graham, to ascertain the practicability of finding a road by which the village of San Angel could be reached, and thus turn the strong hold of San Antonio. This latter party had a sharp encounter with the advance of this enemy, the main body being found posted at a strong point not far from the factory of Coulter's. In the skirmish some six or eight Mexicans were killed, and as many more taken prisoners—our troops had quiet possession of San Augustin. Our only loss during the day was one man, a soldier of Smith's light battalion, who was wounded from a cornfield near Xochimilco.

As the division neared the hacienda of La Noqui the advance was again fired upon, but again the enemy's pickets were driven in, without loss. A turn of the road beyond La Novia brought the pleasant village of San Augustin in sight, and after two or three light skirmishes, in which the Mexicans had two or three lancers killed and wounded, were driven in, without loss. A turn of the road beyond La Noqui brought the pleasant village of San Augustin in sight, and after two or three light skirmishes, in which the Mexicans had two or three lancers killed and wounded, were driven in, without loss. A turn of the road beyond La Novia brought the pleasant village of San Augustin in sight, and after two or three light skirmishes, in which the Mexicans had two or three lancers killed and wounded, were driven in, without loss.

On the 16th of August Gen. Worth marched as far as the hacienda of San Gregorio, beyond which it was found that the enemy had cut up and ditched the miserable trail among which the artillery and wagons were obliged to pass. He would have gone to Santa Cruz, another hacienda a league further on, had not an order came up from Gen. Scott for a halt. It seemed that Gen. Twiggs had met a large force of the enemy drawn up in front of him near Chalco, as if with the intention of disputing his advance, cutting him off from the main body of the army, and perhaps bringing on a general action. Gen. Twiggs promptly ordered some of his heavier guns to be unlimbered, and after a few discharges the enemy was dispersed, with the loss of five or six killed, but the demonstration made by the Mexicans, as I have before said, caused a halt of General Worth's division before half a day's march was made.

At 6 o'clock on the morning of the 17th, Gen. Worth resumed his march, his route running through corn-fields and narrow and rocky lanes, along which carriages had never passed before. The filling up of the ditches caused some little delay, but by 8 o'clock the advance was in sight of Santa Cruz, and the spires and domes of the noted capital of Mexico could be discerned in the distance. The obstructions in the road, of which I have spoken, were obviously of recent construction—evidence that the enemy had but just wind of our approach, and that Gen Scott had completely stolen a march upon Santa Anna.

Other than the ditches and rocks which had been rolled down from the precipitous hill-side, no opposition was made to the advance of Gen. Worth until he had reached a point in the road not far from Santa Cruz—-but now a scattering fire was opened upon the head of his column by a force stationed at advantageous positions above the road to the left. The enemy was quickly dispersed, however, by Col. C F Smith's light battalion and 2d Artillery, under Maj. Galt. As the division neared the hacienda of La Noqui the advance was again fired upon, but again the enemy's pickets were driven in, without loss. A turn of the road beyond La Novia brought the pleasant village of San Augustin in sight, and after two or three light skirmishes, in which the Mexicans had two or three lancers killed and wounded, our troops had quiet possession of San Augustin. Our only loss during the day was one man, a soldier of Smith's light battalion, who was wounded from a cornfield near Xochimilco.

AT 7 o'clock on the morning of the 18th, Gen. Scott arrived at San Augustin, and at 10 o'clock Gen. Worth was in full march for the city of Mexico by the main road. --Majors Smith and Turnbull, Capt. Masori and other engineer officers, were sent in advance, supported by Captain Blake's squadron of dragoons, to reconnoiter, as it was known the enemy was in force at or near San Antonio. --The party, when withing a thousand yards, was fired upon from a battery, which was masked by trees, and the first ball from a 12-pounder instantly killed Capt. Thornton of the 2d Dragoons, besides severely wounding a guide, Janathan Fitzwillers. Col. Garland's brigade was now ordered to occupy the hacienda of Carrera, within plain sight and range of the enemy's batteries at San Antonio, while Col. Clarke's brigade and the battery under Col. Duncan took a station in the rear close by. The engineer officers were at once sent out to reconnoiter by Gen. Worth, to ascertain the practicability of turning the strong works of the enemy, and in the mean time Gen Scott had despatched Capt Lee with a supporting party, composed Gen'l Kearney's squadron and a body of the 11th Infantry under Col Graham, to ascertain the practicability of finding a road by which the village of San Angel could be reached, and thus turn the strong hold of San Antonio. This latter party had a sharp encounter with the advance of this enemy, the main body being found posted at a strong point not far from the factory of Courtrers. In the skirmish some six or eight Mexicans were killed, and as many more taken prisoners—on our side not a man was touched. The result of the reconnoissance proved favorable. It was ascertained that a road could be made which would enable the army to reach San Angel, and thus turn the strong batteries of San Antonio and perhaps others the enemy might have upon the road between the and the city of Mexico. The Mexicans were plainly seen in force at a commanding position near Courtrers, and it was evident that they had a number of cannon in position; but at a council held at night, it was determined upon to attack them the following day.
In the meantime, while the reconnaissance was in progress, Gen. Worth had established his headquarters at the hacienda of Curera, while from the windows countless numbers of the enemy could be seen at work upon the batteries of San Antonio. About noon they opened upon the hacienda with both round shot and shell, nearly every one of which took, effect, but without doing other injury than to the building. Late in the evening of the batteries again opened, but with no other result than showing the position of the different guns. For a marvelous the batteries were silent during the night. Had the fire been kept up, the hacienda might have been torn in places and the entire command compelled to retire. Before going farther it may be well to state that the city of Mexico lies about nine miles nearly north of San Augustin, that San Antonio is about 3 miles in the same direction, while the point occupied by Gen. Valenica, near Coutesras, for he had command at that place, is at least three miles in a straight line and in a direction nearly west. It was ten miles the way of our troops had to march, for you cannot imagine a more rough, uneven and jagged surface.

At 8 o'clock on the morning of the 19th the batteries again opened on Gen. Worth’s position at the hacienda near San Antonio, the balls crashing through the way and filling the rooms with fragments of plaster and broken furniture. Shells also burst in the air over the building and the pieces dropped among the men stationed in the rear. --So hot was the fire that the troops were obliged to gain shelter behind the building, but still did not give up the position. About 9 o'clock the divisions of Gen. Pillow and Twiggs were ordered to advance in the direction of Coutreras and by one in the afternoon were in plain sight of the enemy’s batteries, and within range of his heavier guns. The brigade of Gen. P. F. Smith was ordered to advance directly towards the enemy’s works, while that of Col. Riley moved towards a small village to the right, with orders to gain the main road and thus be enabled to cut off any reinforcements which might be sent to Valencia from the city. An incessant firing of cannon was opened upon the advance of Gen. Smith, and soon the Rifles were engaged in skirmishing with the pickets of the enemy and driving them in. The 12-pounder battery of Capt. Maguder, was pressed forward with all speed, as was also the rocket and mountain howitzer battery, now commanded by Lt. Callender of the Ordnance Department. As soon as the could gain a position they opened upon the enemy, but were so much exposed to the fire from heavier guns that they were soon silenced. Lt. Johnson, of the 1st Artillery, but attached to Magruder’s battery, was mortally wounded, while Lt. Callender was severely wounded in both legs.

At 3 o’clock the brigade of Gen. Cadwalader was ordered out to support Col. Riley, heavy reinforcements being soon on their way out from the city, while Gen. Pierce’s brigade was sent to sustain Gen. Smith. The firing from the batteries of the enemy continued incessant, while from a hill just outside of the range of their guns, the spectacle was most grand and imposing. At about 4 o’clock Gen. Scott arrived, and seeing the immense strength of the Mexicans, at once ordered Gen. Shield’s brigade from San Augustin—a part of Gen. Quitman’s command—to the right support Riley and Cadwalader, and prevent, if possible, a juncture of the forces coming out from the city with those of Valencia. But few of the movements of our own troops could be seen from the hill where we were posted, owing to the dense chaparral, sharp rocks and ravines, but not a motion of the enemy but was plainly visible. The order of battle of Valencia was certainly most imposing—infantry were seen drawn up to support the batteries, while long lines of the enemy’s cavalry were stationed in the rear, as if awaiting the shock of battle. Two separate charges of the latter were distinctly seen repulsed by Col. Riley, who had moved his brigade at one time to a position partially in the rear of the enemy’s work. Col. Harney was excessively anxious to march his cavalry to the sense of actions, but it was deemed utterly impracticable. The nature of the ground was such that the infantry even had great difficulty in finding the way across the pedregal, as the Mexicans term it—ground covered with sharp, jagged rocks.

Until the night had fairly closed in the fire from the enemy’s batteries did not slacken—it had been a continuous roar for nearly six hours. Gen. Scott retired to San Augustin about 8 o’clock, an in the midst of a hard rain which had just commenced falling. Gens. Twiggs and Pillow came in about 11 o’clock, wet and completely exhausted. It was impossible to use horses on the rough and exceedingly broken ground on which they had been operating for nearly twelve hours. Not anticipating the immense strength of the works of the enemy, or the almost insurmountable difficulties of reaching them, it had been at first thought that the batteries would be taken at a dash, and that the troops would be all comfortably quartered in San Angel for the night; instead of the a large portion of them were compelled to bivouac without blankets in the midst of a pitiless rain, and on ground where they could not even stretch themselves out. Add to this, the prospects of the morrow were far from flattering—were enough to dismay any but the stoutest hearts—that the enemy would doubtless reinforce and strengthen his works during the night, having every superiority in knowledge of the ground—add again to this that the men were weakened by long exertions, want of food, and chilled by the continuous night rain, and it is not saying too much assert that the bivouac of the 19th August was gloomy in the extreme.

Early on the morning of the 20th, Gen. Worth was ordered to move with a part of his division—Garland’s brigade—towards the scene of action at Coutreras, to aid in the attack upon Valencia, for to force this position was deemed indispensable. A few discharges of cannon were heard about 7 o’clock, and a heavy rattling of musketry, and some even said that in the distance they had seen large masses of Mexicans in full flight towards the city; yet few dreamed that the batteries at Coutreras had been stormed and carried. Yet so it was. Gen. Scott himself accompanied by Gen. Worth, started for the scene of action, when they were met by Capt. Mason, with the joyful intelligence that Valencia had been completely routed, after a short but terrible struggle. The attack upon his works was planned by Gen. Smith, and resulted in the capture of fifteen pieced of artillery, some fifteen hundred prisoners—among them, Gens. Blanco, Garcia, Mendoza, and the notorious Salas; all the ammunition and camp equipage, while the road along which those who escaped fled was strewn with muskets. No less than 700 of the enemy, among them many officers, were left dead on the field—the number of wounded was undoubtedly far greater. I have no time now to enlarge or comment upon this well planned and brilliant achievement, but reserving a more full description for some other time, must pass on to other exciting events. The works at Coutreras completely in the power of the American army, Gen. Scott at once ordered Gen. Worth to fall back upon San Antonio, to turn and capture that work and then to push on towards the capital by the main road, while the main body of the army under Gens. Twiggs, Smith, Pillow, Smith, Pierce and Cadwalader, moved on towards San Angel and Cohoyean. --Scarcely had the advacne of Gen. Twiggs got half a mile beyond the latter village, before a rattling fire of musketry announced that it was actively engaged with the outposts of the enemy, and the heavy booming of cannon now gave token that noted 2d division had fallen upon another strong work. But a few minutes more and tremendous firing from the right, and immediately in the main road from San Augustine to the capital, made it evident that General Worth's division was actively engaged. He had completely turned the strong works of San Antonio, but while doing so the enemy had abandoned the place with the loss of their heavy guns, and had fallen back upon his second and stronger line of works. It was now at the commencement of the battle, about 1 o'clock in the afternoon, and sure such a rattling of firearms has seldom or never been heard on the continent of America, accompanied with such booming of artillery; and this was continued over two hours and until the enemy was fully routed from every point, and until those who were not killed or taken prisoners were in full flight for the city. Let me endeavor in words to give the reader an idea of the position and works of the enemy. As you come along the road leading from San Augustine to the capital, and immediately this side the Pueblo del Rosenea, the Mexicans had thrown up a strong and exceedingly well-built battery, commanding the road completely. On the right as you faced the city, stretching for a long distance was a continuous ditch, behind the bank of which an immense number of Mexican infantry were posted. On the left of the tete de pont, or work at the bridge, and about three hundred yards distant, was the church of Churubusco, or San Pablo, strongly fortified with works for infantry, and also having a well constructed battery containing a number of guns of heavy caliber. This work was a little advanced from the tete de pont, and nearly in a line between it and the village of Cohoycan---Further on, on the other side of the work at the bridge, and about three hundred yards from the road, was a large building, well adapted for the protection of infantry, an in which the enemy had also posted an immense body. --The ground in the vicinity of all these points was completely covered with corn, and other fields, cut up in every direction by wide and deep ditches, presented obstacles innumerable to the advance of our troops. No reconnaissance of the position of the enemy had been made, and consequently its strength could only be ascertained by hard blows and knocks.

The divisions of Gens. Twiggs and Worth were at once engaged, the former with the church and strong-hold of Churubusco, and the latter with the batteries at the bridge; and in the meantime Gen. Shields's brigades--the New York and South Carolina volunteers--together with the 9th, 19th, and 15th regiments of Infantry under General Pierce, were hurrying onward from Cohoycan to attack the hacienda. Soon they were engaged, and the battle now became general. The enemy had over twenty pieces of cannon, all in admirable position, and served with more than ordinary skill, while but few of our guns could be brought to bear. The battery of Capt. Frank Taylor, it is true, opened a well directed fire upon Churubusco, but so exposed was its situation that it suffered most terribly, both in officers and men.

To describe the fierce conflict, even now that two days have elapsed, or to give an account of the part taken by the different regiments, were impossible. From the opening of the strife up to the time the Mexicans were entirely routed and in full flight for the city, was one continuous roar of cannon and musketry, accompanied by the loud shouts of the Victoria as some new vantage ground was gained; and high above the din rose a dense column of smoke, at time completely shrouding the combatants. --The strength of the enemy at this battle is known to have been 15, 000 at least, many say 20, 000, all fresh troops in a position of uncommon strength. Opposed to them were about 6000 Americans, jaded and broken down by marches and countermarches, and by incessant toil before the stronghold of Coutreras and San Antonio. At Churubusco, the Mexicans themselves say, Santa Anna commanded in person, but that he left early. The noted battalions of Hidalgo and Victoria, and of Independencia--the Polkas, or young men of the capital, from whom so much was expected--nearly all fled without firing a gun.

In the different works (but mostly in the church) taken by Gen. Twiggs, near 2000 troops were captured. Among them were Gen. Rincon, who commanded in person, Gen. Anaya, lately President Substitute, and Gen. Arevalon, as also Col. Goretega, formerly Minister at Washington. --Gen. Garay was captured near San Antonio by General Worth, and several influential officers, among them Col. Miramon, by Gen. Shields at the hacienda; but the most important capture of all was the entire Foreign Battalion, mostly made up of deserters from our own army, with their commander, notorious Riley himself. They are all now under close guard, and I trust will be strictly dealt with.

The loss on our side has fallen most heavily upon the South Carolina and New York volunteers, the 6th Infantry and Smith's light battalion, attached to Worth's division, and the batteries of Capts. Magruder and Taylor. The S. Carolina regiment was nearly cut to pieces losing 137 out of 272 men, with which it went into action. The 1st Artillery has suffered severely in officers.

The Mexican accounts acknowledge the loss, in killed, wounded and prisoners, or no less than thirteen Generals, (among them three Ex. Presidents, ) and forty-five pieces of cannon. One of our officers says that we have captured more ammunition than Gen. Scott has used since he has been in the country. Yours, &c. G. W. K.

Smith's brigade engaged for more than one hour sustained the fire of 22 pieces of artillery, mostly of heavy calibers. They were finally compelled to retire, after sustaining a severe loss in killed and wounded. Gen Pillow had ordered Gen. Pierce's brigade to the support of Col. Riley. At this stage of the proceedings, while the battle was raging, the enemy appeared on the left of the fort of Couttreras, and in rear of the village of Ensaldo, with a force of 12,000 men, under the immediate command of Santa Anna.

The 15th Infantry, under Col. Morgan, was then ordered by Gen. Pillow to support of Smith's and Riley's Brigades. About this time Gen Scott came upon the ground, bringing with him Gen. Shield's brigade of volunteers, which was immediately ordered to the support of the forces under Gen. Cadwalader. Gen. Twiggs, as night approached, finding it impossible, from the nature of the ground, to reach his command, fell back to the position occupied by Gen. Scott, and passed the night exposed to the inclemency of the weather. McGruder's and the howitzer battery being disabled. And our left advancing on a road previously prepared by the enemy, thereby exposing our infantry to a destructive fire as the approached. McGruder's and the howitzer batteries were ordered by Gen. Smith to open, to attract the attention of the enemy, while he made a movement to the right, to try one of the enemy's flanks. After passing over the broken irregular surface of ground, and crossing the deep ravines, he succeeded in reaching the village of Ensaldo. Gen. Smith being the ranking officer, Gen. Cadwalader reported to him with four regiments of Gen. Pillow's division. Col. Riley's brigade had crossed the ravine, and passed towards Couttreras, after a strong body of the enemy, which he drove off. The enemy was now drawn up into line, above the village, on the right of the fort. This was a strong position of the enemy.

Gen. Smith now ordered Gen. Cadwalader's force to be drawn up on the outer edge of the village facing the enemy's heavy force on the left of the fort. After making the proper disposition of his forces, Gen. Smith now determined to attack the enemy's right, with Col. Riley on the left. --Gen. Cadwalader on the right of the former, returned in echelon, but before the movement could be completed night approached--the enemy's line could not be seen--therefore the order was countermanded, Gen. Cadwalader resuming his position on the outer side of the village. Col. Riley's Brigade was formed in a long lane inside and parallel to the village, the Rifles on his left, and the 3d Infantry on the churchyard. But now, says our correspondent, I imagine the position of this portion of the army, numbering 3500, at the outside, without artillery or cavalry, while the enemy in front and on the left had 19,000 troops. (those in the fort sail to be the best in Mexico,) with 22 pieces of artillery, and among his troops about 7000 cavalry. It was evident that some decisive action had to be taken; that some great effort had to be made; and Gen. Smith and Col. Riley, seconded as they were, were just the men competent to the task, and an attack on the enemy's front was determined upon, and the movement to take place at 3 o'clock of the following morning.

The force of Gen. Smith was not strong enough to carry the enemy's works, and at the same time to hold possession of the village: but fortune favors the brave; for, while he was preparing for the attack, Gen. Shields reported his near approach with the South Carolina and New York Volunteers. Gen. Shields, though outranking Gen. Smith, had too much magnanimity to assume the command, or to pluck the bright laurels about to be gathered by a brother soldier in carrying one of the enemy's strongholds, and accordingly he moved subject to the command of Gen. Smith. Gen. Shields' brigade was then placed in the village of Ensaldo, to cut off the enemy's retreat from Couttreras, or to take the reserve of the enemy in flank, if he should change his front.

At 3 o'clock on the morning of the 20th, the movement commenced, which was so slow that daybreak appeared before the head of Cadwalader's Brigade commenced ascending the ravine at the village. As soon as Col. Riley ascended the hill, and came in full view of the enemy, they opened a severe fire on Riley's forces.

Our correspondent then continues--"Col. Riley threw out his two advance divisions skirmishers and said, "Now, boys, give them hell--close in with them, and let the bayonet do its work," and his command rushed down the slope with a yell and enthusiasm enough to strike terror to the heart of the boldest, while the rear of his command moved steadily forward as if they were all made of one piece. The Sappers and Miners and Rifle regiment, which had been thrown across a ravine intervening between the one they passed up, and under the brow of the slope which Col. Riley came down, from that position poured in a fire which swept in front of Col. Riley's column, then inclining towards their left joined in the attack of the troops outside of the left flank of the fort. Gen. Cadwalader followed the route taken by Col. Riley, and as soon as his troops were formed mobbed on to his support. The first brigade, which was bringing up the rear, had been ordered to follow the same route--but while it was on its march by the right flank up the ravine and nearly opposite the fort, Gen. Smith ordered the brigade to face to the left and advance in line to attack the enemy's forces in flank--this movement was executed in less time than it takes me to write it--they met the enemy's position at the front as Col. Riley's brigade rushed into it--the enemy was completely routed and commenced a precipitate retreat--their cavalry and had been formed to receive the charge but were compelled to give way to the baronet--the rout was most complete, and the victory most decided; but while Riley's brigade took possession of the work, and planted their colors upon it, the other force continued the pursuit down the road. The retreating force had to pass near where Gen. Shield's brigade was placed to intercept them. They, however, were not aware of it until they received the well-directed fire of the South Carolina regiment, which mowed them down like grass before the scythe."

The rout and dispersion were now complete. In the fort were captured 22 pieces of artillery, an immense amount of munitions of war, and upwards of 1,500 prisoners, among whom were several officers of high rank. The enemy left dead upon the field upwards of 700, which we buried; but his loss, says our correspondent, was much larger, as the Mexicans were still burying dead two days after the battle. The troops in the fort were commanded by Valencia, and those outside by Santa Anna. The two 6-pounders of Washington's battery, taken on the field of Buena Vista by the Mexicans, were recaptured in this fort.

The enemy were pursued to San Angel, he endeavored to make a stand at every point--they were finally compelled to take refuge in Churubusco. At San Angel General Pillow assumed the command, and when the troops arrived at Culican, shortly after, General Scott assumed the command of the whole. The position now occupied by the enemy (Churubusco) was a very strong one, and it being the last stand the enemy could make in defence of the Capital, he fought with desperation for more than two hours, before the works were carried. Our loss at this point was over 1,000 men. Seven pieces of artillery, and two stand of colors, were captured; General Rincon, with 104 officers, and upwards of 1,100 non commissioned officers and privates, surrendered as prisoners of war. The Mexican loss in this engagement is said to be 5,000 in killed and wounded, and out of a force of 30,000 men, there were about 6,000 men left, the balance being killed, wounded, prisoners, or totally dispersed.

[From the N. Orleans National, Sept. 8]

We have received the Sun of Anahuac of the 30th ult., from which we extract the following. --We give the extract verbatim--but under the impression that Paredes and Peres are the same.

Two letters were received this morning dated Mexico, Aug. 23, 1847. These letters are from the best source and cannot be doubted. They are from Mexicans of high respectability at the Capital and addressed to commercial houses here. They say that General Scott attacked El Pinon—took it, went around through Guadaloupe, where Valencia was in command of 6,000 men, (this was on the 21st) attacked him and took a great number of prisoners, but the night coming the fire ceased on both sides and Gen. Scott surrounded by Valencia’s troops. The next morning they were again vigorously attacked and completely routed, leaving 4,000, between dead, wounded prisoners.

Valencia had received the order on the 21st to retreat on the capital, but he would not obey it, and fought until his command was nearly all cut down as we have already said.

While he was retreating in disorder, say the letters, Gen. Peres was on his march with 8000 men to reinforce him; but on seeing the disorder in which Valencia’s forces were retreating, they themselves retreated in great confusion, leaving a great number of dead, wounded and prisoners.

A proposition was then made to General Scott to grant an armistice of 34 hours, which he refused. Gen. Moray Villamil was then sent out to make a new proposition, the result of which was not known.

It is reported also that Santa Anna was opposed to the plan of operations which were put in practice by the Mexican troops, but that the plan had been opposed by Paredes who was with Valencia during the engagement.

The letters agree in saying that all was confusion in the Capital.

The letters to which we refer say that some persons elevated the loss of the Mexicans to FOURTEEN THOUSAND, but that it was very difficult to say exactly the number. These letters are from Mexicans and therefore we can be certain that they would not say anything to their disadvantage, if they were not certain of their being true.

It is reported that the loss of Gen. Scott is very small in comparison to that of the enemy.

The New Orleans Times copies the following from the Sun of Anahuac, of the 1st September.

HUZZAH! HUZZAH!! HUZZAH!!!

GREAT VICTORY.

THIRTY-TWO THOUSAND MEXICANS DEFEATED BY SEVEN THOUSAND AMERICANS.

Our army has again covered itself with glory.

The English Courier had just arrived and the news, NEWS we say, are that Gen. Santa Anna and thirty thousand men have been defeated whipped!! And completely routed!!

Our troops engaged those of the enemy about three miles from the capital of Mexico, where they were strongly entrenched. After a combat of TWO HOURS they (the enemy) were put to fight!!

The enemy’s forces amounted to THIRTY-TWO THOUSAND MEN ! and our forces to SEVEN THOUSAND!!

Three more cheers for the American army--Huzzah! Huzzah!! Huzzah!!

The enemy’s thirty-two thousand men were driven to the gates of the city of Mexico, by our seven thousand men at the point of the bayonet.

Four commissioners were sent to Gen. Scott from the city of Mexico.

This news came by the English Courier, and therefore we suppose that no one will doubt it. --We will say further that we have seen a letter which no one would dare to contradict, which says all we have said. This letter is dated Tacubaya, 3 miles from Mexico, August 26.

N.B. --We have just seen in Diario del Gobierno than an armistice of 48 hours was granted by Gen. Scott. [BRM]

RE47v44n41p3c1, September 21, 1847: CONTRERAS AND CHURUBUSCO!

Two Great Battles and Glorious Victories

BY THE AMERICANS.

NEAR THE CITY OF MEXICO

---------

THE BATTLE OF CONTRERAS.

[Correspondence of the New Orleans Delta. ]

TACUBAYA, August 26, 1847.

Eds. Delta: The late brilliant achievement of the arms of the United States over the superior numbers of the enemy, and in front of the capital of the country, cannot but excite the admiration and pride of our people, from one end of the land to the other; but those who were not here to witness and participate in the desperation of the conflict--the great and apparently insurmountable obstacles--the privations appreciate the brilliancy of the victory, the gallantry and good conduct, and the scientific attainments of our noble little army. Our comparative loss, of those engaged, exceeds that of any practicable route we could take that would so effectually turn their position, and in order to delay our movement, sent out General Alvarez, the great champion of the South, with his Pintos (a tribe of Indians spotted by nature) together with a portion of the regular army, amounting in all to about 10,000 men, to attack the rear column, under the command of Gen. Twiggs; but it turned out to be a feeble attempt. Gen. Twiggs had scarcely formed his line of battle and opened his artillery, under the command of Capt. Taylor, before they fled with great precipitancy. A few well-directed shots from this battery made a forcible impression upon their columns, and they retreated, leaving a portion of their dead and wounded to take care of themselves. The whole affair did not detain Gen. Twiggs more than an hour, and he was again on his march. By this time the enemy had discovered the route by which we were moving, and endeavored to obstruct the road; but the sappers and miners, aided by the head of Gen. Worth's column arrived at San --the enemy's skirmishes firing from every hill-top and point which favored them on the route, and their cavalry presenting themselves in force several times during the day, but never daring to attack.
On the 18th, General Worth’s column moved down the road in the direction of San Antonio, from which place the enemy fired upon a squadron of dragoons (killing Captain Thornton and wounding the guide Jonathan Fitzwater) advance of the fortifications of San Antonio. Capt. Thornton had been very unwell for some time, and went out in command of his squadron against the advice of his physician and his senior officers; but his energy and gallantry would not allow him to remain inactive when there was the least possibility of meeting the foe. As soon as the dragoons were withdrawn, Col. Duncan’s battery and the sappers and miners moved down the road, and took a position that would enable them to operate in any direction, in case of emergency. Col. Smith’s light battalion was thrown out on the left front to watch the movements of the enemy, and to hold him in check in case of his advancing his flank. Immediately after, Col. Garland’s brigade made a diversion to the right, and took position in line, resting his right at the hacienda of San Juan de Dios, about 400 yards to the right of the road. As soon as this movement was completed, the 2d brigade, under Col. Clarke, moved down the road until the head of his column rested on the left wing of Col. Garland. One section of the mountain howitzers was brought forward, and thus they remained until sundown, when the brigade of cavalry withdrew, leaving the infantry and artillery on the ground. About two o’clock a heavy rain came on, which completely drenched the troops, and they were also exposed during blankets. Gen. Worth, with a part of the first brigade, occupied the hacienda of San Juan de Dios during the night, and the enemy amused themselves by firing a few random shot at it about sundown, from San Antonio, but without any other effect than to riddle the house completely with balls, and to besprinkle the officers with the mortar and dust of the old hacienda. During the day, Maj. Graham was sent out from San Augustin (Gen. Scott’s headquarters) towards Contreras, to protect the engineers in a reconnaissance of the route in that direction, where, during the forenoon, he engaged a force of the enemy’s cavalry and infantry, which he drove back, with a loss of 8 killed, 2 wounded, and 5 prisoners—Maj. Graham’s command sustaining no loss.

On the 19th, the enemy fired from the works at San Antonio on the hacienda of San Juan de Dios, supposing a part of our forces were still there. About 10 o’clock the suppers and miners, under Lieut. Smith, and the section of mountain howitzers, under Lieut. Calander, returned to San Augustin and joined Gen. Pillow’s division, which was then taking up its march in the direction of Contreras. Gen. Pillow continued his march, opening the road as he went, until he reached a high point, from whence we had the enemy and his fortifications in full view. Between 1 and 2 o’clock the division of Gen. Twiggs came up with the advance and moved forward—Gen. Smith’s brigade advancing to the left, and Col. Riley’s to the right. Gen. Pillow placed at the disposal of Gen. Twiggs Capt. McGruder’s battery and Lieut. Cadalader’s howitzers—both of which belonged to the proper division of Gen. Pillow.

With great difficulty the two batteries moved forward having to travel half a mile over a broken and confused mass of lava, apparently impassable even for footmen. The enemy opened his heavy batteries from Contreras, and the advancing troops of Gen. Smith’s brigade hotly engaged the enemy’s infantry, which he had throw out across a deep ravine and creek in front of his fortifications. He appeared determined to maintain his position in front of his fortifications, using his artillery for a time against the rear brigades of our army as the came up; but he was not able to stand the severity of the conflict, and was compelled to retire with heavy loss. --He then concentrated his fire upon the howitzers and Capt. Mcgruder’s battery. These two batteries sustained, for more than an hour, the fire of twenty-five pieces of artillery, mostly of large caliber, when they were ordered by Gen. Smith to retire from so unequal a conflict. Their loss is very severe, and among others, we have to lament the death of Lieut. Johnson; Lieut. Calander was also severely wounded.

General Pillow had ordered General Pierce’s brigade to the support of General Smith, and General Cadwalader’s to support of Colonel Riley. At this state of the battle, while it was raging with extreme severity, the enemy appeared on the left of the fort at Contreras, and in rear of the village of Ensalso, where Colonel Riley had arrived, with a force of 12,000 men, (which we afterwards learned was under the command of Santa Anna himself,) apparently threatening the safety of Colonel Riley and General Cadwalader. General Pillow ordered the 15th Infantry, under Colonel Morgan, to support of General Cadwalader. General Scott came upon the ground about this time, bringing with him General Pillow’s battery of brave volunteers (South Carolina and New York) whom he advanced to the support of the forces under General Cadwalader.

General Twiggs finding his command so separated, and that it was utterly impossible, from the nature of the ground, for him to reach the point intended to occupy, as night approached, fell back with a portion of his staff to the place where General Scott was passing the night, exposed to a severe rain, without shelter, or anything more than his usual uniform, to protect him from the inclemency of the weather.

McGruder’s and the howitzer battery being disabled, and it being evident that our left was advancing on a route prepared for us by the enemy—he having cleared away all the brush and other obstacles that obstructed his view—thither exposing our infantry to a destructive fire as the approached, and it being doubtful whether they could cross the ravine after they reached it, Gen. Smith directed Capt. McGruder and the howitzer battery to open, in order to attract the attention of the enemy, while the made a movement to the right, which he had determined on, in order to try on of the enemy’s flanks. Leaving three companies of the 3d infantry to support the battery, and about 20 men of Maj. Dimick’s command to reinforce the loss sustained by the battery. Gen. Smith moved off with the sappers and miners, Lt. Smith, 1st artillery, Maj. Dimick, and 3d artillery, Capt. Alexander—and as many of the rifle men of Maj. Dimick’s command to reinforce the loss sustained by the battery. Gen. Smith moved off with the to try on of the enemy’s flanks. Leaving three companies of the 3d infantry to support the battery, and about 20 and craggy rocks—some to the ravines—while others depended upon their heels, and made most excellent time in a line approach and the enemy’s line could not be seen; therefore, the order was countermanded, and Gen. Cadwalader's position was taken to the edge of the village; Col. Riley’s brigade was formed in a long line inside parallel to it—the rifles on his left and the 3d infantry in the churchyard. Thus they remained exposed to a severe rain all night without fire or shelter—the officers from generals down sharing the severity of the weather; but perhaps it only whetted their appetite for a more glorious and determined engagement in the morning. —But now imagine the position of this portion of the army, numbering 3500 at the outside, without artillery or cavalry, while the enemy in front and on the left had 10,000 troops—those in the fort said to be the best of Mexico—with 22 pieces of artillery, and among his troops about 7000 cavalry. Ti was evident that some decisive action had to be taken, that some great effort had to be made, and Gen. Smith and Col. Riley, seconded to the task they were, were just the men competent to the task. An attack on the main work was determined on, and the movement to take place at 3 o’clock of the following morning. However, here another obstacle presented itself—the force of Gen. Smith was not strong enough to attack the main work and hold the village at the same time, and it was of the utmost importance he should do so—for if he drove the enemy from this main work, and in his retreat he secured possession of the village, he could hold it long enough to allow his troops to get away, and in all probability seriously embarrass any further movements of our army until he was safely fixed somewhere else. It is said that fortune favors the brave—and in this instance it most truly did—for while Gen. Smith was preparing for his attack. Gen. Shields reported his near approach with his brigade of South Carolina and New York Volunteers—and here was an exhibition of magnanimity on the part of a high-minded soldier to a brother officer. When Gen. Shields arrived he was the ranking officer and could have assumed the command, but he was not the man to pluck the bright laurels about to be gathered by a brother soldier in carrying one of the strong works of the enemy—accordingly he moved subject to the command for Gen. Smith, and his brigade was placed in the village of Ensaldé, as circumstances might require, either to cut off the retreat of the troops from Contreras or to take the reserve of the enemy in flank, if it should change its front and attempt to attack our force towards Contreras.

At 3 o’clock, on the morning of the 10th, our troops commenced their movements towards the front of attack—the night was so dark that the men could not go out of reach of one another for fear of losing their way. This caused the movement to be so slow that day break approached before the head of Gen. Cadwalader's brigade commenced descending into the ravine at the village. As soon as Col. Riley got out of the deep ravine, and at a point where it was thought the rear of the work could be approached, the head of the column halted and closed—at the same time drawing the loads out of the guns supposed to be wet. Col. Riley then formed his brigade in column by divisions—and thus the column stood formed, Col. Riley’s brigade on the advance, next Gen. Cadwalader’s and Gen. Smith’s brigades, together with the sappers and miners, under the command of Maj Dimick, closed up the rear—leaving Gen. Shields at the village. Col. Riley continued up the ravine hearing a little to his left, and as he raised over the bank he stood facing the rear of the enemy’s work—but he was protected from the severity of its fire by the favorable position of the ground. As soon as Col. Riley ascended the hills and came in full view of the enemy, they immediately opened a warm fire upon him. Col. Riley threw out his two advanced divisions as skirmishes, and said forward—"Now boys give them hell—close in with them and let the bayonet do its work"—and his command rushed down the slope with a desperation and enthusiasm enough to strike terror to the heart [illegible] of his command moved steadily forward in solid block with the most mechanical precision. The sappers and miners and the rifle regiment, which had been thrown across a ravine intervening between the one they had passed up and under the brow of the slope which Col. Riley came down, from that position poured in a fire which swept in front of Col. Riley’s column—and thus inclining towards their left, joined in the attack on the troops outside of the flank of the Fort. Gen. Cadwalader followed the route taken by Col. Riley, and as soon as his troops were formed, moved on to his support. The first brigade, which was bringing up the rear, had been ordered to follow the same route, but while it was on his march by the right flank up the ravine and nearly opposite the Fort, General Smith ordered the brigade to face to the left and advance in line to attack the enemy’s force in flank—this movement was executed in less time than it takes me to write it—they met the enemy outside o the Fort, just as Col. Riley’s brigade rushed into it—the enemy was completely routed and commenced a precipitate retreat—their cavalry and infantry had been formed to receive the charge but both were compelled to give way to the bayonet—the rout was most complete and the victory most decided—but while Riley’s brigade took possession of the works and planted their colors upon it the other force continued the pursuit down the road. The retreating force had to pass near where General Shields’ brigade was placed to intercept them. They, however, were not aware of it until they received the well directed fire of South Carolina regiment which mowed them down like grass before the scythe.

The enemy had been completely deceived in reference to the position of Gen. Shields’ brigade and the balance of the force, by the sagacity of the General. After Gen. Smith moved off to attack the work, Gen. Shields cause his men to build fires over the ground occupied by the troops during the night as if the men were preparing their breakfast which led the enemy to believe our troops were still in force in the village; this also led him to believe we were going to carry into execution the attack we were mediating the night before—accordingly the night before he placed batteries along his line, and in the morning moved detachments forward to take in the flank the attack he supposed we would make at daylight, and how great his surprise must have been when the first thing he saw in the morning was Col. Riley moving down the slope, having already turned his stronghold—but, all doubts were soon dispelled by the capture of his works and the dispersion of his army—they were met at every point by the skilful management and energy of Gen. Shield’s, whose command compelled them to fly in every direction—some taking to the broken and craggy rocks—some to the ravines—while others depended upon their heels, and made most excellent time in a race across the fields--One of the most sagacious movements made by a Mexican officer was made at this place. After a large portion of the Mexican army had passed through a very narrow pass and our troops after them, he formed a squadron of lancers in the pass, laid down their arms and surrendered, thus effecting the escape of those who had already--those of our troops who were nearest having to take possession of the prisoners and guard them back, and before another force could go in pursuit they were out of reach.

In this fort there were captured 22 pieces of artillery, mostly large size, a great number of pack mules, a large quantity of ammunition and munitions of war, and upwards of 1,500 prisoners, among them were several officers of high rank. The enemy left dead upon the field, which we have buried, upwards of 700--but his loss was certainly much heavier--as the Mexicans were still burying their friends when I passed over the battle-ground two days ago--there were many more killed, when the Rifles engaged on the 19th, than we had any idea--their unerring aim told with powerful effect. The troops in the fort were commanded by Valencia, those outside by Santa Anna.

Among the highest achievements of the morning's engagement was the recapture of the two Buena Vista, six-pounders, belonging to Capital Washington's battery, by one of the light companies of the same regiment. They now stand before the door of General Twiggs, and I hope when he shall meet his old friend, General Taylor, he will have present these beautiful trophiess to claim the congratulations. All the small arms taken were immediately destroyed.

The arms were secured and a detachment left to protect the ordnance, ammunition and prisoners--the column formed for the purpose of pursuing the enemy, who had been met by a force from San Angel, when Gen. Twiggs arrived and ordered a speedy and most vigorous pursuit of the enemy, which was immediately done--Gen. Shields' brigade in advance, next Gen. Twiggs, division, and the rear by Gen. Pillow's division--the rifles and sappers and miners in advance as skirmishers. There now ensued a sort of running fight all the way to San Angel--the enemy endeavoring to make a stand at every point on the road--but the unerring fire of the rifle made every place too hot for them, and they were compelled to take refuge in Churubusco.

At San Angel Gen. Pillow arrived and took the command, when the whole column moved down to Culican, when Gen. Scott came up and immediately took the command of the whole.

The Battle of Churubusco.

As soon as the enemy's forces perceived that Contreras was carried, and that we could be able to turn his position and attack him in reverse, he evacuated the fortification and fell back on Churubusco with his artillery and whole force. This was also reinforced by the troops from Contreras, and some from the city. They apparently determined to make their final stand at this point.

The work and position was exceedingly strong and completely masked by a high growth of corn, and an orchard, which very much precluded our officers getting a proper view of the position and strength of the work, which proved to be a regular fortification, and had been erected in the incredibly short time of 38 hours. The church buildings formed a large square--the lower front, at the North end, was chiefly a wall, scaffolded for infantry; behind it was a higher building, also covered with infantry; and in rear of this, the church itself was also covered with infantry, and a high steeple on its right flank was filled with infantry; in front of the first wall was a curtain connecting two salient angles, which flanked it, and were continued back to the side walls of the church, garrisoned heavily with infantry, and mounting 7 pieces of artillery. This was the point at which General Smith's brigade opened the action, and soon followed, a little further to the left, by Col. Riley's brigade--these two composing the Cerro Gordo Division, General Twiggs'. Capt. Taylor's battery of light artillery also took near this work, on the right of Gen. Smith's brigade--it soon drew upon it a heavy fire from the fort, which he sustained for an hour and a half, losing 23 of his company, among whom were Lieuts. Martin, Boynton and Sims, and 3 Sergeants; he also lost, during this time, 15 horses. The conduct of Capt. Taylor and his company throughout, was such as to excite the admiration of all who witnessed it, as well as his superior officers.

At the opposite side of the work, the breastwork extended across the road from the church, presenting a similar front, excepting the buildings of the church--the work on the road was also strengthened by a bridge over a creek, behind which was a body of infantry, and the work itself mounting three or four guns. General Pillow, with a part of his division, was sent round by General Scott, to assault this part of the work, but as he, with his command, emerged from the mud mire of the corn fields, (having waded, some of them, waist deep) into the road, he met General Worth coming up from San Antonio with his division--they had a hearty welcome, and one of them proposed that their commands should go hand in hand in carrying the work, which was readily agreed to.

At the same time that the other commands were despatched, General Scott ordered General Shields to attack the enemy's extreme left, where he was heavily entrenched; at the same time reinforcing his command with the 9th, part of the 12th and 15th infantry, under General Pierce. This movement was executed as soon as the nature of the ground would admit--the whole command having to pass through corn fields of high growth, intercepted by ditches running through them in every direction.

The action now became general, and the severity of the conflict never equaled within the recollection of our oldest soldiers--the enemy was more than three times our number, besides his advantage of artillery and position--added to this, he was stimulated by the fact that it was the last effort of resistance he could make, before we could enter the capital--his troops knew that they were fighting for the last remnant of the Republic. And they stood their ground with as much firmness and resolution as any troops cold stand, before the army we at present have here. The roar of the musketry was so great, that it was almost impossible for the soldiers to hear the orders of their officers. There was no point at which the action did not rage with severity for more than two hours, which is proven by the fact that our loss at this point was nearly 1,000 men.

After the contest had lasted about two hours, our troops had got into such position as to be able to class with them at the point of the bayonet, which decided the affair in our favor—Gen. Pillow and Gen. Worth carrying the work on the road, by an officer of Gen. Pillow’s division taking down one flag, and one of Gen. Worth’s taking down the other, and the 8th infantry planting their colors instead. Gen. Twiggs’ division carrying the work it attacked at the church, Capt. J.M. Smith, of the 3d infantry, received the surrender of the work, with seven pieces of artillery, two stand of colors, Gen. Rincon, together with 104 officers and upwards of 1,100 non-commissioned officers and privates, surrendered as prisoners of war. Gen. Shields had his work more to himself, and he fully sustained that high reputation hitherto acquired on the field of battle. When the contest raged highest, and his men falling around him in every direction, he preserved that even temperament of mind for which he is characteristics his [illegible] wearing that bland and affable appearance throughout the whole engagement. His volunteers stood and moved under the fire with the regularity of veteran troops. South Carolina has sustained a heavy loss. Col. Butler was wounded twice before he received the fatal shot. The color-bearers were successively shot down, when Lieut. Col. Dickinson took the colors, and was bearing the Palmetto proudly amidst the storm, when he also received a severe wound. About the same time that the three divisions at the forts were enabled to close, Gen. Shields succeeded in driving from their position the large force with which he was contending.

The dragoons were now brought forward, and drove the enemy to the gates of the capital, thus closing, for the present, the most brilliant victory achieved by our arms during the war, and one which will vie with any achievement of our arms in times past.

For more fully detailed particulars, I must refer you to the reports of the several commands. I find that if I were to attempt to record the entire details of the achievements of the 20th, I would not be able to conclude it in time enough to be of any interest to your readers.

Louisiana had two brilliant representatives, who participated largely throughout the whole affair, viz: Gen. P. F. Smith, of the 1st brigade, 2d division, and Lieut. Beauregard, of the engineers—both of which gentlemen signally distinguished themselves, both of which gentlemen signally distinguished themselves, both by their superior military knowledge and their personal courage. The engineer corps throughout has borne a large share of the labors and exposure of the battle.

From intercepted letters which we have in our possession, written on the evening of the battle, we learn the Mexican loss to be 5000 killed and wounded, and by them we also learn, that out of 30,000 men, they had but between 6000 or 8000 men left, and they in confusion without leaders—the balance killed, wounded, prisoners, or totally dispersed.

I send you a list of the killed and wounded, as near as they can be got at present.

I also send you the master roll of a company of volunteers, who organized themselves for the occasion, under Capt. McKinstry. They were composed of men who were not attached to any particular command, but mostly belonging to some of the departments. They had five wounded, but I have not been able to get their names. On several occasions they rendered highly important service, and exhibited the metal all Americans possess.

We also had many persons who bore a conspicuous part in the actions of both days, who were not attached to any particular command—among them I noticed conspicuously Maj. Bryant and Lieut. Dickinson, formerly of the Alabama regiment of volunteers.

Manifesto of the president ad interim of the republic, and general in chief of its army, to the nations:

In moments so critical and solemn, it is a duty, on the part of him who presides over the republic, to give publicity to events; and I discharge this duty with pleasure, because frankness has at all times been the characteristic of my administration. The occurrences of the 19th and 20th are too well known, for they were unfortunate; but it is proper for me to review them, in order that they may not be misrepresented, as well from a spirit of detraction and malevolence, as from errors resulting from a want of analysis in subjects of grave and transcendent importance.

The nation has witnessed the great—the extraordinary efforts with which, during the space of three months, I have labored for the defence of the capital, which was about to be surrendered defenceless to the enemy. I have organized, armed, and equipped an army of more than 20,000 men; I have collected an immense material for this army; I have fortified various lines in order to keep at distance from Mexico the ravages of war; I have created resources in the midst of the state of abandonment in which the government was left; and no fatigue, no labor, have I omitted, in order that my country might present herself with dignity and firmness in the struggle to which she has been so unjustly provoked.
In war, an accident—a circumstance apparently the most insignificant—may frustrate the most skilfully devised combinations. A glance at the defences which I caused to be constructed around the city is sufficient to discover the plan which I had proposed to myself.

The troops which I had advanced, by one of the flanks, supported by others posted en echelon at convenient distances, were to have made a concerted retrograde movement, which I commanded at the proper moment. A general who commanded a strong division of 5,000 men and 24 pieces of artillery, whose headquarters were at the town of San Angel, was ordered by me on the 18th, and 11 o’clock in the morning, to fall back on the village of Coyoacan, in order to effect the concentration of forces, in consequence of demonstration already made by the enemy, and for the purpose of exactly carrying out my plan of operations. But this general, forgetting that there cannot be two commanders on the field of battle, and that the execution of a plan will not admit of comments which annul or retard it, suffered himself to himself to object to the orders which he had received; and obedience and discipline, so indispensable in military movements, having been banished from among us, thus rendering it necessary, in order to avoid greater and imminent evils, to tolerate what it would be absurd to approve of, I suffered him, in spite of myself, to persevere in his purpose, and charge himself with the whole responsibility of the consequences. They were not less disastrous than they had been obvious. He advanced, motu proprio, [of his own accord, J more than a league to choose a position from which to meet the enemy, without acquainting me either with his movement or his intentions. His refusal to obey the order sent him was the first notice which I had of this temerity; and soon afterwards the report of cannon enabled me to ascertain the position he had taken, and apprized me that an action had commenced.

Although weighed down with the presentiment of what was to follow, I instantly placed myself at the head of a splendid brigade of four thousand men and five pieces of artillery. I arrived at the moment when the enemy had cut off the rear of the position of the ill-fated general by a considerable force, whose operations I was then hardly able to check, for it was now nearly night.

But I observed, with the greatest grief, that the position in question was isolated—that a large ravine intervened, and a neighboring wood was occupied by the enemy; the troops under my immediate command could not advance by the only road which existed, without being exposed to the same fate as the others; and a single battery, which arrived late, was my only means of attack. The firing having ceased, our brigade took up their quarters in the town of San Angel; for the rain fell in torrents, and to keep the troops in the field would have been equivalent to their being routed.

Previous to this, I ordered that my aid-de camp, Col. Ramiro, should, taking as a guide the deputy, Don Jose Maria del Rio, who was acquainted with the ground, proceed to the head of the terrible ravine in front of us, and along the skirt of a distant hill, and, making all haste to the camp of the general referred to, order him to retire that night, without fail, with his infantry and cavalry, to San Angel, by the only road which was left him, firing spiking his cannon, if it already impossible to save them. This my aid accomplished, and communicated my order between 10 and 11 at night; but instead of punctually obeying the order, the general hardly suffered my aid to speak, interrupting him by saying that what he wanted was 6,000 men and munitions, and sent him off, after giving him two official letters, which he had signed and sealed, one of them containing a report of the action of the evening, in which he stated that he had beaten the enemy, and put him to shameful flight, and that he had, in consequence, granted promotions of the generals, field officers, and others.

The following day, at dawn, I repaired again to the same field, reinforced by the brigade which I had ordered to be brought from the capital, and determined to effect the enemy made his attack, which lasted about ten minutes, and I witnessed, in the midst of despair, the rout of those troops, worthy of a better fate, and unfortunately commanded by a general who was himself the cause of their being cut off.

The consequences of this affair were, in my view, terrible. The enemy could, by a rapid movement, reach the capital before it would be possible for me to succor it; he could, by a flank movement, cut off my detached forces; he could, by a flank movement, cut off my despatched forces; he had obtained, as the result of his victory, the power of falling with the main body of his troops upon a part of mine; the enemy, in fine, through the unskilfulness and insubordination of a general, converted to his own benefit all the advantages of my situation.

The advanced fort of San Antonio could not sustain itself; for our time had been intersected, and I ordered its garrison to retire, while I covered the fort and tete de port of Churubusco. The enemy advanced, cutting off a portion of the troops as they were retiring, and presented himself in front of our nearest defences. I there placed myself again in front of our soldiers, and my efforts cost the enemy not a little bloodshed. The losses ensued, although lamentable, were the natural result of the retreat, which was sudden, unexpected; and embarrased by the trains, marching along a narrow causeway flanked throughout its whole extent. The defence was from line to line, until the third was reached, where I personally opposed the enemy, and saved the capital, which was suddenly placed in danger. While I was engaged, on the 22d, in reorganizing the forces and covering the batteries, and again in person at the head of a column, which would have continued the defence to the last extremity, I received a communication from the enemy’s general-in-chief, proposing to me to conclude an armistice, which would afford time to consider the propositions which may be made by the commissioners of the United States, for ending the struggle between the two nations. I consented to the armistice; and, after consulting the ministers in cabinet, I determined that the propositions referred to shall be taken into consideration.

The suspension of hostilities is always a good thing, because war is always an evil; and much more so, after great combinations have been frustrated. To save the capital from the horrors of war, or at least defer them, was a consideration which I could not overlook, more particularly when viewed as a means of arriving at an honorable
When two nations find themselves in a state of war, they have the reciprocal right to make propositions. A perpetual war is an absurdity, because it is a calamity; and the instinct of self-preservation, which is even stronger and more powerful in nations than in individuals, counsels that no means shall be disregarded which may lead to an advantageous adjustment. The constitution gives me full authority to adopt this course.

Devoted to interests so great and of such pre-eminent importance, I must maintain at all risks the respect and consideration due to the supreme authority which I exercise—now especially, when, if factions beset and harass the government, they will deprive it of the power of deliberating, and it will become contemptible in the presence of the enemies of the nation, I will be still more explicit—commotion and sedition shall be exemplarily punished.

I have preserved a considerable body of troops, and the nation will support me in maintaining its honor and vindicating its reputation. I consider myself as free as if I had just obtained a signal victory, and there is no fear that I shall be imposed on by the enemy’s negotiators, when his troops and a cannon have failed to alarm me. We shall adjust our differences, provided honor, above all, is saved; and we shall renew the combat, if the sword is thrust between our justice and acknowledgment of the rights of the nation.

RE47v44n42p1c5, September 24, 1847: THE CAPTURED DRAGOONS

A New York letter, of Monday, in the Philadelphia Inquirer, has the following, which, if true, is highly gratifying.

"It has been supposed that Dr. Cooper and the ten dragoons, who left Vera Cruz to inform May. Lally of the approach of reinforcements, fell into the hands of the Mexicans, and were butchered in cold blood. The report, I am happy to say, is unfounded, and, farther, Dr. Cooper and the whole of the dragoons are safe and sound. This pleasant intelligence was received here in a letter written by Lieut. Sears, of the 2d Artillery, to a friend, stating that Dr. Cooper and his small party joined the train at Cerro Gordo, on the twenty-third of August last, all well. No mention has been made of the Doctor in any other way than through this letter."

RE47v44n42p1c7, September 24, 1847: FROM TEXAS

The steamship, Yacht, Capt. Crane, arrived yesterday from Galveston, bringing us to the close of the past week.

The Galveston News says that the house of Wm. Hendley & Co., Galveston, have now under contract five large packet ships to constitute a regular line between that city and New York. They are in the progress of construction in Portland, Me. The first will be launched and towed to New York, about the 20th inst., the second in April next, and two more during the next summer, so that by next fall there will be four of them completed and in the trade. --Their capacity will be about 1000 bales of cotton each.

The Galveston papers mention the death of Dr. Thos. P. Anderson of that city, and make the most honorable mention of the deceased. Three or four of the earliest inhabitants of Galveston have recently been called home."

The canvass for Governor of the State is carried on with considerable spirit. Gen. Wood, who distinguished himself at Monterey, is a candidate; so is Mr. Van Zandt, whose name is inseparably connected with the negotiations for the annexations of Texas. There are other candidates in the field.

The Texas editors are daily expecting to hear of Col Hays’ regiment at Mier. He left San Antonio de Bexar on the 13th ult.

The Houston Star of the 7th inst has the following paragraph about the crops of Texas:

"DROUGHT AND THE CROPS. --We were not apprised until within a few days that the drought that has prevailed in the undulating region had been so extensive and disastrous. We have been informed that it has seriously injured the upland cotton through the whole tier of counties from San Antonio to the Trinity. On the San Antonio, many of the settlers have been compelled to cut up their corn as it was withering in the fields. The settlers near Bexar have raised so little corn that the crop is insufficient for the consumption of the citizens, and large quantities have been transported from Guadalupe to that town. It is selling at Bexar for a dollar a bushel. We are informed that the cotton has suffered more upon the uplands than the corn. In many places but little or half a crop will be made. In the bottom lands, however, the crop is immense; some of the planters are already complaining that they cannot procure hands to pick it out as fast as it matures."

The Houston Star says a large number of Mexican families have removed from the Rio Grande to that town, and others are expected to follow them this season. These families, however, possess little property, and appear to have removed from Mexico to avoid the oppressive exactions of the numerous guerilla parties that now infest all the Eastern States of Mexico. According to their representations, the people in the valley of the Rio Grande are in a deplorable condition. Unprotected in any manner by their own Government, almost without laws or officers who are empowered to restrain marauding hands of their own countrymen, or to check the incursions of the savages, they are unable to enjoy the least security of person or property.

The Star learns that Bexar is not the only town that has been benefited by the emigration from Mexico. Laredo, which has enjoyed comparative security since the ranging company of Gen. Lamar has been stationed there, seems to be slowly recovering its former prosperity.

RE47v44n42p2c3, September 24, 1847: NO NEWS FROM MEXICO

We had confidently hoped to lay before our readers this morning some definite intelligence from the city of Mexico--but we are again doomed to disappointment. While we cannot indulge any anxiety for the safety of Scott and the army--the Mexican authorities themselves admitting that their capital was at the mercy of our troops--the Mexican authorities themselves admitting that their capital was at the mercy of our troops--it is natural that the public mind should be filled with eager curiosity as to the result of the crisis in Mexico, whether peace or continued hostilities. It is a little strange that no despatches have been received from General Scott. --We can account for it only on the ground that he wants confidence in the Mexican pledges to allow a safe conduct to our couriers, and fears to risk such valuable documents with a small force. He may probably wait till something definite is done by the Commissioners, before he sends a sufficient escort to protect his courier from the guerillas. The wily Mexicans may attempt, for ulterior objects, to prolong the negotiations--but Gen. Scott and Mr. Trist, we are satisfied, know the Mexican character too well to be deceived by such a trick. We therefore look for news every day.

We have said that there was no news--but if we are to rely upon the inventive genius of the Spanish paper in New Orleans, La Patria there is news of vast importance. We give it for what it is worth, putting no sort of reliance upon its accuracy. The Patria has on several occasions published Mexican intelligence, which always turned out to be humbug. Aware of the public curiosity at the present moment, it has, no doubt, fabricated this new budget of items, to make the paper sell. This in itself is sufficient to throw discredit upon its "facts," but the very terms of the reported treaty utterly falsify the statements. --Who can believe that Mr. Trist has consented to the surrender of the Californias and the whole territory to the Rio Grande; thereby placing us in as bad a condition as when the war was commenced by Mexico? Many if the Whig presses and politicians would rejoice, could they believe in this reported arrangement, which surrenders all our just claims; but the large majority of the nation would spurn such a conclusion.

The New Orleans papers all express a want of confidence in the Patria's letter, which, it says, was received by the schooner Charon, that arrived at New Orleans on the 15th of September, from Tampico. The Bulletin states that its reporter had a conversation with the Captain of the Charon and, also, with an intelligent passenger, both of whom stated that there was no news of any kind, when they left Tampico. It must be further remembered, that the letter is of no later date (August 29) than we have already had from the capital by way of Vera Cruz. Letters written on that day (Sunday) informed us, that the commissioners had two meetings, and would have a third and final one on the next day, Aug. 30. but the Patria's astounding letter:

TAMPICO, Sept. 5th, 1847.

My friends: I have just received a letter from Mexico, which arrived here by special express via Huejutla; and I take advantage of the departure, almost at this very moment, of a vessel bound to your port to transmit you a copy of it. --It is to this effect:

MEXICO, August 29th, 1847.

Esteemed Friend: I have already informed you that General Scott proposed a suspension of arms on the 21st, and that it was followed by an armistice agreed to on the 22nd inst. A negotiation was forthwith opened with Mr. Trist, and I have just been assured that up to yesterday it had progressed very satisfactorily. Very shortly, a treaty of peace, it is expected will be concluded. The principal articles are the following:

"THE UNITED STATES shall for ever retain the State of Texas whose limits shall extend to the left bank of the Rio Bravo del Norte, comprising Matamoras by means of a canal which shall be cut, for that purpose." In respect to this latter point, it appears that nothing definitive has been agreed on.

It has been found impossible to assemble Congress, consequently a junta of "notable" will be found, for the express purpose of revising the treaty. There are other article, but as they are of secondary importance, they are not given.
GEN VALENCIA marched to Toluco, where he publicly declared that he would not recognize Santa Ann as President of the Republic, nor as Commander-in-Chief; and he proposed to assemble troops for the purpose of attacking the Capital. Subsequently, however, it appears, he surrendered himself to the Government, by whom he has been sent to prisoner to Guadaloupe, where he is to be brought before a court martial.

GEN. ALVAREZ is announced as intending to re-assemble his troops, for the purpose of attacking the Americans on the first available opportunity.

GEN. PAREDES, it is stated, is marching on the Capital with a respectable force, which he has succeeded in bringing together, with a view to assist his countrymen. This he persists in doing, notwithstanding the order that has been transmitted to him from Santa Anna to quit the country—to return again to the place of his exile.

GENERAL SALAS. --I have just seen a communication from General Salas, dated from Coayacan, where he remained a prisoner. In this, he declares that it was by the unskillfulness of Valencia, and the cowardice of Torrejon that the battle of Contreras was lost. Torrejon, instead of obeying the orders of Salas, which directed him to charge the Americans with his cavalry, pucillanimously fled, and in this manner brough run and destruction on our infantry.

N.N. *

This is positively the latest news from the Capital, but I expect at every movement the receipt of more, of still greater interest, which will enter more into detail.

The above news which we have given to the public, the moment it came to hand, is really of a character which is calculated to produce strangely conflicting feelings among Americans. The abandonment of California, after all that has been said, is a great sacrifice to be made to the Genius of Peace; peace for which we are all anxious.

RE47v44n42p2c3, September 24, 1847: OPINION OF THE ENGLISH NEWS

A New York letter, of Tuesday evening, says: "The commercial and monetary news by the Britannia is considered favorable. It is considered here that the lowest point of depression in breadstuffs had been reached, and that a better state of things is at hand."—[Balt. Sun.

The Whig press are endeavoring to produce the impression, that "the organs of the Administration" have censured General Scott for entering into an armistice with the Mexicans. We have seen nothing of the kind. It is true, the New Orleans Delta, neutral, found great fault with the armistice—but it intimated, at the same time, that General Scott might not be exclusively responsible for it. The Baltimore American, Whig, takes General Scott to takes for his correspondence with the Mexican Minister of War—ininsuates that General Scott might well have dispensed with the epithet "unnatural," applied to the war, and should not have allowed the Mexican to have employed, unanswered, the insolent terms of his note, in which he assents to the armistice. The Democratic press have not censured General Scott, and will do full justice to the armistice when the facts are fully known.

We are glad to see it stated in the beautiful and thrilling letter published to-day from the Union, that Santa Anna made the first proposition for a suspension of hostilities.

In explanation of this letter, the following statements of the Union are important:

"We lay before our readers a very interesting letter from an able officer upon the great battle. --We subjoin to it a short extract from another letter, which advises that there should be no relaxation of our exertions, but that, on the contrary, the army of Gen. Scott should be reinforced, so as to bear with more tremendous force upon the Mexicans. We concur fully in these views, and we have already stated that such is the purpose of the administration. With this design, they have recently called out six new regiments—one from Ohio, (which is en route for Vera Cruz,) two from Kentucky, two from Tennessee, and one from Indiana.

"We are gratified to learn to-day, from an officer in Indiana, that although the requisition had only been received on the last days of the month August, five companies had already been accepted, and fifteen more had offered their services.

"A similar spirit is displaying itself in Kentucky. The Lexington Observer, of Wednesday last, states that 'twelve companies had been reported to the adjutant general Frankfort, under the recent proclamation of the governor, up to Monday morning last. Thus one regiment is filled, and two companies reported for the next is filled, and two companies reported for the next. --But one company had then been reported from this congressional district; and that from the county of Scott. Not a doubt is entertained that the requisition will be filled by Monday next--the time fixed by the governor from arranging the regiments.'
We perceive from the Nashville Union that Tennessee is also in motion. To-night's western mail brings us the 'Memphis Eagle' of Friday last, which states that a company of volunteers 'is rapidly being organized in Somerville, and that another is forming at Germantown, under Messrs. A. L. Yancy and W. Ledbetter, under this last requisition from the War Department;'

"There cannot be a doubt that Gen. Scott will be strongly reinforced, and will be able to control the Mexicans, to coerce a peace; or, if a treaty be already made, to secure its execution."

Very interesting letter from a distinguished officer to his correspondent in Washington.

TACUBAYA, August 22, 1847.

We are now located in one wing of the Archbishop's palace, Chapultepec, with its significant grove, is before us, and we overlook the great city, surrounded by its [illegible] and embosomed in its mountains. I never recalled the beauty of the valley of Mexico until I reached this spot. To see it now, lighted by the soft, bright moon with every village, spire, hut, and mountain reflected in its silver lakes, you would think it even surpasses the descriptions we read of it. There are also some stupendous works of art around us. I can tell you nothing, for I have not been in the city, of something more interesting, I shall have to tell you of the operations of the army.

On the 7th inst. Gen. Twiggs's division left Puebla. --It was followed on the 8th by Gen. Quitman's on the 9th by Gen. Worth's, and overtook Gen. Twiggs that night at San Martin. Our march over the mountains was undisturbed, except by rumors of guerillas and resistance. Both disappeared as we approached, and we left their abandoned works as we found them. On the 11th Gen. Twiggs encamped at Ayotla, 15 miles from Mexico, 15 miles from Mexico, on the direct road. The other divisions, on each succeeding day, came up in order, and took positions in the rear--Gen. Worth occupying Chalco. The reconnaissance of the 12th and 13th satisfied us of the strength of the enemy's defences in our front. Their principal defence was at El Penon, commanding the causeway between the lakes of Tezecaco and Chalco. The hill of El Penon is about 300 feet high, having three plateaus of different elevations. It stands in the waters of Lake Tazeuco. It haze is surrounded by a dry trench, and its sides arranged with breast works from its base to its crest. It was armed with thirty pieces of cannon, and defended by 7,000 men, under Santa Anna in person. The causeway passed directly by its base--the waters of the lake washing each side of the causeway for two miles in front, and the whole distance seven miles to the city. There was a battery on the causeway about four hundred yards in advance of the Penon, another by its side, a third about a mile in front of the entrance to the city, and a fourth at the entrance. About two miles in front of the Penon a road branched off to the left, and crossed the outlet of Lake Hochimilico, a the village of Mexicalingo, six miles from the main road. This village surrounded by a marsh, was enveloped in batteries, and only approached over a paced causeway a mile in length. Beyond, the causeway continued through the marsh for two miles farther, and opened upon terra firma at the village of Churubusco, which was also fortified, and which we shall see more presently. The reconnaissance of the 14th satisfied us that the route south of Lake Chalco was practicable for our wagons, or could be made so. That day Gen. Pillow's division closed upon the village of Chalco, and the next morning (15th) Worth led off south of the lake. The divisions took up the line of march in succession, Gen. Twiggs bringing up the rear, and we turned our backs upon the fortifications of the Penon and Mexicalingo. General Valencia, with 6000 men, made an attempt to annoy our rear as it turned Lake Chalco; but General Twiggs having his train in front, and his division well in hand, wheeled into line to the left, and, with one discharge of Taylor's battery, tumbled over some men and horses, and sent the rest flying over the hills like the wild ducks from the lakes. He then broke again into column, and resumed his march. The racheros and guerilleros hovering about our front gave us little trouble, and the working parties filled up the trenches, and rolled away the rocks that had been placed there to retard us, without stopping our march.

On the 17th Gen. Worth encamped at San Augustin, on the Acapulco road, and moved down on the 18th two and a half miles, in front of San Antonio, or make room for the other division to close upon him. The 18th was devoted to reconnaissances. San Antonio was situated similarly to Mexicalingo. Batteries commanded the causeway in front, and swept over the marches to the left as far as the lake. The pedregal, or volcanic rocks, rendered the right impassable for everything but infantry, and difficult for them. one and a half mile in the rear were situated the defences of Churubusco, commanding the approach over the pedregal, and by the way of Mexicalingo. A route was discovered west from San Augustin over the spurs of the mountain, to the San Angel road, by which these positions could be turned. Gen. Twiggs's division coming up the morning of the 19th, was thrown forward on this route, to cover the working parties formed from Pillow's division. By 1, p.m., we had surmounted the hills and approached the two divisions of the army, with their field batteries, &c., within cannon range of Valencia's entrenchments, situated on the San Angel road, and commanding the only approach through the pedregal, or volcanic rocks. The working parties were returned to their regiments, the tools repacked, and preparations made to dislodge the enemy, before continuing the road further. On approaching his front within canister range, and driving in his advanced parties, posted behind breastworks across the road, with Magruder's and the howitzer batteries, it was found that the ground on his left offered the greatest advantages for the attack. He lay entrenched on rising ground, behind a deep ravine about midway between us, to which the ground gently descended from both directions. His front was defended by four 8-inch howitzers, and three long 16-pounders, one 18-pounder, and some smaller caliber. His right was almost equally strong; and, after crossing the ravine, approached over smooth ground in form of a natural glacis, and taken in reverse by a body of rancheros and lancers. The heads of the different divisions were accordingly changed to the right; and, each leaving their horses and batteries behind, slowly weeded their way, among the volcanic rocks, to the ravine, which they passed in front of the small village of San Raymond, out of gunshot of Valencia's batteries. They were now on the firm San Angel road, between Valencia and relief; but Santa Anna coming out to his support with seven thousand infantry and cavalry, drew up in battle array on the hill of Contreros, to our right. Col. Riley's brigade, that had been moved to the right earlier in the day, to co-operate with a front attack, and had passed beyond the San Angel Road, now falling back upon the village which we had take possession of, General Smith at
At 3 a.m., Col. Riley’s brigade was in motion, followed by Gen. Smith’s and Gen. Cadwallader’s; Gen. Shields holding the village. During the night, the 9th and 12th regiments, with a company of rifled and some detachments that had been thrown out the previous day, were moved to the ravine in front of the enemy’s position, and, after driving in their picquets in the gray of the morning, filed off to the right, an took sheltered position on their left, ready to co-operate with the attacking force in rear. This force moving around the base of the hill on which the battery was placed, covered from their view and fire, began about sunrise to show themselves over its crest. Col. Riley’s brigade, sweeping around their rear and right, moved down with great impetuosity, while Gen. Smith attacked their left from the rear. In the meantime Col. Ransom, pushing across the ravine the force in front, opened his fire upon their front and left. The enemy fiding himself thus attacked, and apprehending the main attack from the direction in which we approached the previous day, opened his heavy battery on his front. But Riley’s brigade carrying everything before them, on that of Shields. They broke at all points, abandoning artillery, pack train, ammunition, &c. We took 800 prisoners—4 generals: Salas, Mendoza, Blanco, and Garcia; 4 colonels; 2 commanders of brigades and squadrons, and other officers in proportion. Among the twenty-two pieces of artillery taken, were the two belonging to Washington’s battery, taken at Buena Vista. They were retaken by the 4th artillery, the regiment to which they originally belonged. We buried 600 of their dead found on the field. Our loss did not exceed 60. After allowing the troops a little time for refreshment, they were put in march down the San Angel road, to take in reverse the positions of San Antonio and Churubusco. The enemy, finding himself turned, immediately commenced to evacuate his lines at San Antonio; but we moved upon him so rapidly that he had to abandon his guns. Gen. Worth’s division, that had masked him in front, followed so close upon his heels as to drive his rear into the defences of Churubusco. In the meantime Gen. Twiggs had taken his position in the front on the battery surrounding the convent, while Gen. Worth seized upon that defending the bridge, and blocking the main road to Mexico. The battle opened fiercely on that side. Generals Shields and Pierce’s brigades were sent to attack in rear. Advancing towards the city of Mexico until they had passed the stream in rear of Churubusco, they crossed a cornfield on their right, and made for the causeway leading from Churubusco to the capital. This causeway was defended by a large body of infantry and cavalry, the latter extending apparently to the gates of Mexico. The number of infantry was said to be 5000, and of cavalry 4000. Gen. Shields forming his line obliquely to that of the enemy, resting either flank upon some buildings on his right and left, and gaining as much to their right flank as possible, brought his men promptly into action. General Pierce, following quickly up, took position to his left, and the howitzer battery opened on his right. The Mexicans made a stout resistance, and the reverse under Major Sumner, composed of the rifle regiment and a squadron of dragoons, was brought to their support. By the time they broke into the cornfield, the enemy began to give way. Worth and Twiggs had forced their front, and they were being driven upon the capital. As soon as the way was clear for the dragoons, they swept over the causeway, charging up to the very gates. Many a fine saddle was emptied by the discharge from their last battery. Capt. Kearney, whose troop was leading, lost his left arm, and the rest of his officers were wounded. Our men had done their work well faithfully. Their exhaustion required rest. The recall was sounded and we returned to the care of the killed and wounded. Of these we have a goodly number. I fear they will reach nearly 1000. Many gallant officers are at rest. Col. Butler, of the South Carolina regiment, bringing his regiment into action, had his horse shot under him; continuing the charge on foot, he was wounded in the leg, and finally shot through the head. Of the regulars, Capt. Thornton, of the dragoons, Capt. Burke, 1st artillery, Hanson, Lieut. Irons, Easly, Hoffman, and Johnston. About 40 are wounded more or less severely. All the engineers are safe. We cannot be sufficiently thankful, nor repay the interest or prayers of our friends in our behalf. The greeting of General Scott, by the troops after the action, on seeing the success of all his plane, was loud and vociferous. It must have shaken the “Halls of the Motezumas.” Their enthusiasm seemed to cheer the Mexican officers in their captivity. The army has implicit confidence in him, and apprehend nothing where he commands. He sees everything, and calculates the costs of every measure; and they know and feel that their lives and labor will not be uselessly commanded. During the day, we too, 9, 700 prisoners, 6 generals, 37 pieces of artillery, and ammunition enough for a whole campaign, their defences were completely turned and their plans upset. We could have entered Mexico that evening, or the next morning, at our pleasure, so complete was the disorganization of their army of 38,000 men. We learn that 27, 000 men were opposed to us at all points on the 29th, and they acknowledge is killed and wounded 5000 men. On the 21st, as the army met by a proposition for a cessation of hostilities, for the purpose of taking case of the killed and wounded. This he refused, but in the evening agreed to an armistice, or enable commissioners to meet Mr. Trist, and to treat for peace. —The armistice has been officially ratified. It is difficult to foresee the result; though I can very well see that it is for Santa Anna’s advantage to make peace. So far I can trust him.

The Lieutenant Johnson killed, was the nephew of Lt. Col. Johnson, of the voltigeurs. I was standing by him when his leg was carried off above the knee by a cannon ball. He was gallant little fellow, and an merry over his work all the morning as a boy at play. He fell by the side of the gun he had been effectively serving, and died that night, 19th instant. The Colonel did not hear of his death until next morning. He was standing in Valencia’s captured entrenchments, flushed with the recent victory; his frame shrunk and shivered with agony, and I wept to witness his grief. It is the living for whom we should mourn, and not the dead. The engineers did good service on both days, nor was the engineer company behind in any under taking.

We have been favored with another letter from Tacubaya, dated Aug. 22d, which covers ground very similar to the above. We take form it the following closing extract:
"We took altogether 2,500 prisoners, 8 generals, 37 pieces of cannon, ammunition enough for a whole campaign, and completely disorganized their army. The following day, (21st,) on taking our proposition from Santa Anna, which the General declined, except so far as to say that if undisturbed he would not attack. That night we had formal propositions for an armistice, commissioners were appointed, and an armistice entered into for the purpose of allowing commissioners to meet Mr. Trist for the purpose of treating of peace. What the result will be I do not know. I have but little confidence in the, It is reasonable to suppose that Santa Anna wishes peace, but whether he will be able to accomplish it I know not. There are various rumors of pronunciamientos, factions, &c. It is said that Bustamente and Paredes have formed on one side; Valencia and Almonte on the other, &c. I fear there is more work for the bayonet. After each of the battles, when the troops saw the complete success of Gen. Scott’s plans, he was received with the most vociferous cheers through out the whole army. The shouts must have reached Mexico. Even the captive Mexican officers seemed cheered in their distress; to witness their enthusiasm. The army have the greatest confidence in him justly. They know his care for them. They know his worth. He weighs his plans well, calculates the cost of every measure, and attempts nothing without a reasonable prospect of success. I hope our government will not think the war at an end, and stop our reinforcements. Now is the time to urge them on, and show that the country is not only ours, but that we will hold it until our demands are acceded to. It is this temporizing policy which has protracted the war. The march of Gen. Scott with his little army upon the capital has been the boldest move in the mclearn warfare. --It is ascertained that the Mexican army was thirty-two thousand strong. Twenty-seven thousand men, from their own account, met us on the 20th. They are in the midst of their resources; we are a great distance from ours.”

Excerpts from a letter, in the National Intelligencer, from a member or the 13th company, Virginia Regiment, dated August 22.

"We had an election for Captain, and Lieutenant James Thrift was elected; our second Lieutenant as elected first Lieutenant; and----Neale second Lieutenant; Sergeant Young third Lieutenant.

"Besides our late Captain, we have lost two more of our Company, both privates. --One named Trott, son of a Baptist Preacher in Virginia--the other was Mahlon Mills, also, of Virginia."

Letters have been received from the camp of General Taylor, who was then near Monterey. The General had made the necessary arrangements for carrying out his late general order for sending the troops lie could spare to Vera Cruz, to join the column of General Scott. In addition to the troops which he kept upon his line of defence, he had detained the light battery of Capt. Deas, to strengthen his line. A mixed force of dragoons and Texans was employed in clearing the country between Camargo and Monterrey of the roving guerillas.

Reports are renewed of the General’s intention to visit the United States; but he does not yet mention such an intention in his recent despatches. --Union.

RE47v44n42p3c3, September 24, 1847: FROM THE ARMY OF GENERAL TAYLOR

The New Orleans Picayune of the 13th inst., publishes the following extracts from the Matamoras Flag:

Capt. Clarke, of the 2d Mississippi Rifles, was at Matamoras on the 3d inst., with a detachment of recruits, on the way to his regiment at Buena Vista.

Capt. Clinch was at the mouth of the river on the 6th inst., with a detachment of recruits, on the way to his regiment at Buena Vista.

Gen. Lane’s brigade was at the mouth of the river, expecting to embark about the 8th instant. The first transport which reached there would proceed to take the troops on board.

Col. R.E. Temple arrived at Matamoras on the 1st inst., with four companies of his regiment, the 10th infantry.
Col. Hays’ regiment of Rangers has been ordered to Vera Cruz.

The Flag publishes the following letter from Urrea, designed to encourage desertion among our troops:

> Gen. Joseph Urrea, of the Mexican Army, Comandant General, Inspector of the Interior Eastern States, and in chief of the Division of Observation, to the American Invaders:

Soldiers and Volunteers of the American Army! The war that you carry on against Mexico is the most unjust and barbarous that can be conceived. Civilized nations detest it—they do not see in you the defenders of the rights of an injured country, but merely the tools of a man without foresight, without calculation, who, to obtain an unfortunate celebrity, had not feared seriously to compromise a great people. Do not doubt it. Every sensible American will consider this war one of the most atrocious nature—sent by Polk to Mexico, and essentially iniquitous, because it is vandalic, and belies the severe Republican principles that you all profess, because it serves to convert the children of Washington and Franklin into robbers and assassins.

Sons of America! Let the world see you in a better light than in a miserable and odious character you now represent. Do not serve any longer the caprice of a man destitute of virtue or good feeling. Abandon his lines, because they are not those of honorable men—throw yourselves into the arms of the Mexican nation, who, magnanimous and forgiving, will forget the injuries you have committed. Here you will find the sympathies of a generous people, and the tranquility of conscience otherwise not to be obtained; because the man who attacks and destroys the principle of Universal Moral, which brings together nations as it does individuals, cannot obtain it.

Soldiers and Volunteers! Come to us and abandon the cause of crime—I wait your appearance, and will receive you as brothers.

                JOSEPH URREA.

RE47v44n42p3c4, September 24, 1847: THE "INIQUITIOUS" WAR

That the campaign with Mexico, to whomever the credit may justly be due, has conferred glory on our arms, and invested our nation with a moral power that will shield us from foreign interference for many long years to come, none but the most bigoted fanatic or the loomy tenant of an insane asylum will be found to deny. No country, no age, can exhibit more noble fruits of individual and national self-sacrifice and devotion, more brilliant and glorious triumphs over natural obstacles and embarrassments. The achievements of the present war are written in letters of fire on the history of the world, and are worthy to rank with the brightest events in our own archives.

But brilliant as it has been, promising to extend by its influence the blessings of civilization over a large section of country; if the Whig party is to be believed, our national escutcheon is stained by the dark plague-spot of injustice and crime. They contend that the war is atrocious and God-abhorred; that it was made by on man (the President) in defiance of the wishes of the people and the sacred requisitions of the Constitution; that, so far from being justified, it was commenced by an aggression upon an inoffensive neighbor, and that every step taken by our gallant and victorious army has marked the progress of injustice and oppression. It has been denounced as the fruit of a "meretricious lust of conquest," robbing our neighbors of their property, and casting the blight of disgrace upon the neighbors of their property, and casting the blight of disgrace upon the national honor and reputation. Indeed, the New York Express, in publishing the list of killed and wounded at the two late battles, sacrifices all decency and fairness upon the shrine of party, and puts forward the following infamous argument:

“For all this bloody record, the administration of the government of this country with JAMES K. POLK and all who aid and abet him, is responsible. They it was who got up the unnecessary war, against the will and the wishes of the people of this country--and they it is who must be held responsible for all its terrible consequences--of the murdered and the slain.”

We shall not dwell upon the taste or justice of such an appeal, which, while it attempts to make party capital out of the bloody results of the war, really insults the memory of the gallant dead, by classing them with "murderers" and violators of all law, human and divine. If, as the Whigs contend, their country is engaged in a wanton and atrocious war, commenced for the basest of motives, by what philosophy can its actors be shielded from the disgrace which covers the nation in whose cause they fight?

We believe the war to be not only brilliant and glorious, but to be in every respect righteous and just. Our Government in vain attempted to ward it off--its voice was for peace--its conduct was conciliatory and generous. But Mexican madness and insolence took the extreme step, and craven would have been the Executive of our nation, had he not resisted the arm inflicted injury and insult upon our fellow citizens. We shall not now repeat the arguments and facts which show beyond the shadow of a doubt, that, as soon as the annexation of Texas was declared, Mexico resolved upon war, and put her resolution into practice by marching an armed force across the Rio Grande, and murdering American citizens on American soil. In addition to the evidence already before the country, we find the New Orleans Delta the following important statements from Mexican authorities. No comments are necessary:

OUR MEXICAN BOUNDARY. --In common with many others, we have always maintained that the annexation of Texas, and not the advance of General Taylor to the Rio Grande, was the cause of this war; that Mexico always intended to resist with arms any attempt of the U.S. to extend its boundaries west of the Sabine.

In confirmation of this position, which by-the-by has already been satisfactorily maintained by other facts and arguments, our Mexican correspondent has hold of some extracts from Mexican documents, which, as relating to an interesting historical question, we lay before our readers.

The Monitor Republicano, commenting Mr. Buchanan’s note, says--“We have read with the proper attention the communications which have passed between our government and that of the U.S., relative to that most grave question, the war, which at this moment absorbs the attention of the entire Republic. * * * * The Mexican troops attacked those of Gen. Taylor when the latter having invaded a territory which, even according to the acknowledgement of the Americans, was disputed territory, planted his flag opposite Matamoras, and threatened our port with his artillery. We say, even according to their acknowledgments, because the Mexican Government does not recognize, and never has recognized any other boundary but the Sabine.* * * *

Mr. Buchanan says the Mexico, in the act of repelling Taylor, began the war. No Sir! It was the United States who declared war, in the act of annexing Texas; an assault which was energetically protested against by our Executive directly to the cabinet—by Gen. Almonte our Minister there—and through their agents in Mexico; through all these channels declaring that the annexation would be equivalent to a declaration of war. by whom, then, was it commenced?”

Our correspondent says he has now before him the Calendario de Cutivero, an almanac for 1847, published at the city of Mexico. In the preface to this little book the publisher says:

“The campaign of Texas being now fairly opened, I consider that I have rendered a positive service to our military class by inserting a detailed itinerary from San Luis Potosi to the river Sabine, both by the coast and by the way of Saltillo, “ &c., &c.

Our correspondent adds:

Yes sirs! “no other boundary but the Sabine,” and “the campaign of Texas”--This is the way they talked in Mexico as late as the 22d of June of the present year. What then becomes of Mr. Webster’s and Mr. Calhoun’s theory, “that the war was created by our troops crossing the Nueces?”

In connection with this point, and in vindication of the honor and justice of our own country, as regards the war with Mexico, we think proper to republish the following remarks Wm. C. Preston, Esq., of South Carolina, made in the United States Senate in 1838. When the measure of annexation, was near its completion, the Whigs contended that it would inevitably bring on war—this, in the very teeth of the fact, that John Quincy Adams and the most violent of the Whig party had years before advocated this very measure of annexation. The measure was completed—Mexico did declare and being the war—and the Whigs at once shifted their ground, and attributed it to the march of General Taylor to the Rio Grande exclusively. How our title to the Rio Grande was regarded by the Whig party a few years ago, and what zealous efforts they made to secure annexation up to that line, will be made clear by the statements of Mr. Preston—then, as now, a thorough Whig, high in the confidence of his party:

“it is STRANGE that a measure WHICH HAS BEEN URGED FOR TWELVE YERS PAST should now, for the first time be met by a tempest of opposition; and it is VERY strange that HE should be found riding upon and directing the storm, WHO WAS THE VERY FIRST MAN TO PROPOSE THE ANNEXATION OF TEXAS, as one of the very earliest measures of his Administration, after he was made President. Yes, Mr. President, Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS had hardly ascended the Presidential chair before he assiduously addressed himself to the task of repairing the injury inflicted upon the country by the treaty of 1819, in the making of which, it has been since understood, he was the RELUCTANT agent. As Secretary of State, in 1819, he negotiated the treaty of transfer; as President of the United States, in 1824, HE INSTITUTED A NEGOTIATION FOR THE RE-ANNEXATION. --Through his Secretary of State, Mr. Clay, (whose name heretofore has always been connected with opposition to the cession, and with ADVOCACY OF THE RE-ANNEXATION OF TEXAS, AND WHOM I SHOULD BE GLAD TO FIND STANDING ON THE SAME GROUND NOW THAT HE OCCUPIED FROM 1819 to 1829, ) the President instructed Mr. Poinsett, then Minister to Mexico, to open at once and vigorously urge a negotiation for the reacquisition of Texas, AND THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SOUT WEST LINE OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE RIO GRANDE DEL NORTE. The Secretary UGED it upon the Envoy, as a matter of THE DEEPEST INTEREST to the country, and the highest POLICY of the Government. The advantages are elaborately and zealously set forth; and although the country at the time labored under A LARGE DEBT, the envoy was authorized to offer FIVE MILLIONS for the acquisition. It is greatly to be lamented that the joint efforts of Mr. Adams, Mr. Clay and Mr. Poinsett FAILED upon his occasion, as the joint efforts of General Jackson, Mr. Van Buren and Mr. Poinsett DID, UPON A SUBSEQUENT OCCASION, when the proposition was renewed, or rather CONTINUED, under a new Administration. From the beginning to the end of his Administration, Mr. ADAMS KEPT IN VIEW THIS IMPORTANT MEASURE; and when his successor came in, as it was supposed, with opinions differing on all points, and with promises and pledges of all sorts of changes, amidst the general disregard of all that had been doing or attempted, THIS MEASURE ALONE WSA HELD SACRED; it was adopted as it stood upon the record, and urged with the characteristic energy of the men who felt, and truly felt, that he was not so much the functionary of a Constitutional Government, as the representative of the Democracy of this country, as Napoleon had been of that France.
JACKSON, VAN BUREN and POINSETT, took the place of ADAMS< CLAY AND POINSETT, but pushed on the negotiation. How, or why it failed, it were useless now to inquire. Whether it was lost sight of amongst the vulgar and paltry controversies of Scotoins and Yorkinos, or postponed by the massacres and plundering of the succado, or suspended BY THE CEASELESS REVOLUTIONS OF THE FATED COUNTRY, is now of no consequence. This is certain, that President Jackson NEVER LOST SIGHT OF IT, and continued to look to its accomplishment as one of THE GREATEST EVENTS of his Administration, to the moment WHEN THE TITLE OF MEXICO WAS EXTINGUISHED FOREVER BY THE BATTLE OF SAN JACINTO."

RE47v44n42p3c5, September 24, 1847: (no title)

We are indebted to a friend for the following General Order of Brigadier General Cushing, who pays a beautiful and touching tribute to the memory of a gallant Virginian.

We are pleased to learn that General Cushing holds the officers of the Virginia Regiment in high esteem, and speaks in approving terms of the maderel and fine military bearing of the whole regiment. How Gen. C. is regarded by his brother officers, we have already shown is an extract of a letter from Col. Hamtramck to Adj. Gen. Richardson. Gen. Cushing has been ordered, with his brigade, to join the wing of the army under Gen. Scott. We wish him success and plenty of laurels, it indeed a treaty of peace do not nip them all in the bud:

ORDERS—No. 8

HEADQUARTERS BRIG OF INFANTRY,

Buena Vista, Aug. 17th, 1847.

The General commanding the Brigade has with deep regret received information of the death of Captain HENRY FAIRFAX, of the Virginia Regiment.

In him the Brigade has lost a faithful and gallant officer, the State of Virginia a patriotic son, and the Union a brave soldier, who, if opportunity in the field had offered, would have done signal honor to his eminent ancestry, to the service, and to his country.

Whilst lamenting his premature decease, his friends at home, and his fellow officers here, can reflect with pride on his brief but already honorable career in the service, and draw some alleviation of their sorry from the consideration, that, though he has not fallen, as a soldier would most desire to fall, amid the smoke of the battlefield, and with the shout of victory to animate his dying moments, yet, that he has not the less departed in the discharge of the highest of all duties to his country and to his native Commonwealth.

Signed,

W.W.H. DAVIS, A.A.A.G.

RE47v44n42p1c6, September 28, 1847: LETTER FROM GENERAL PIERCE

We have been favored with the perusal of a private letter written by this gallant officer to a relative, and have taken the liberty to publish some extracts from it. The responsibility of the publication must rest entirely with us, as the author had no idea of its being seen by any one save his relatives and immediate friends, and hence the reason that it contains so minute a history of his personal movements:

Headquarters 1st Brigade, 3d Div. U.S.A., Mexsoque, Mexico, Aug. 27, 1847.

Since I left Vera Cruz to this hour I have had no means of communicating with the States. Although but a few months in the service, I know what are fatigue, anxiety and exposure. Contrary to expectations, and contrary to my orders from the Department at Washington, I was compelled, for the want of the requisite provisions for transportation, to remain for more than three weeks at Vera Cruz, and for more than four in Terra Caliente, (the vomito- region, as it is called) I left the dreaded city on the 10th of July with 2500 men of all arms, and a train of wagons which, when closed up, extended more than two miles.

On the 6th of August I reached Puebla, without the loss of a single wagon, with my command in fine condition. --My regiments of my brigade (the 13th) lost in killed and wounded one third of its entire force. In killed and wounded we

The Mexican loss in killed and wounded must have been immense. Our troops buried 500 Mexicans upon the field of thirty-five pieces of artillery—an immense quantity of ammunition—eight hundred mules and horses, and more than two thousand prisoners—among the eight generals and any number of colonels.

The Mexican force, as they said afterwards, consisted of 500 men. Had the possessed courage and skill in the use of arms our loss must have been very great. You can hardly conceive the strength of the natural defences over which we passed. Rumors came to me almost every night that we would be attacked by large forces the next day, but they made no where anything like a brave and stern resistance. The official reports of the great battle of Mexico will probably reach you as soon as this letter, and I shall therefore not attempt to give the minute details. It was fierce and bloody beyond anything that has occurred in this war. The battle differed in many respects from that of Buena Vista. There Gen. Taylor received the enemy in a strong position selected by himself. Our force on the 20th consisted of less than nine thousand men; the Mexican force, within supporting distance and engaged, undoubtedly exceeding thirty thousand. We attacked him in position upon ground of his own selection, admirably fortified. You will distinguish, so far as numbers are concerned, between the battle of the morning and that of the afternoon, although spoken of in official reports as one engagement under designation of "the battle of Mexico." We took, during the day, thirty-five pieces of artillery—an immense quantity of ammunition—eight hundred mules and horses, and more than two thousand prisoners—among the eight generals and any number of colonels.

The Mexican loss in killed and wounded must have been immense. Our troops buried 500 Mexicans upon the field of battle commenced in the morning at Contreros, and the loss in the afternoon was much greater. Our loss has been heavy. With this small army we could not afford to purchase many such victories at such a price; one of the regiments of my brigade (the 13th) lost in killed and wounded one third of its entire force. In killed and wounded we number not less than 1000, and among them I lament to say an unusual proportion of valuable officers. The New England regiment suffered severely, and behaved throughout in the most gallant manner. My horse, at full seed on the evening of the 19th, when leading my regiment through a perfect shower of round shot and shells, fell under me upon a ledge of rocks, by which I sustained a severe injury by the shock and bruises, but especially by a severe sprain in my left knee, which came under him. --At first I was no conscious of any serious injury, but soon became exceedingly faint, when Dr. Ritchie, surgeon of the 12th, [a portion of my command], who was following the advancing columns closely, administered to me as well as he could under the circumstances. In a few moments I was able to walk with difficulty, and pressed forward to Capt McGruder’s battery, where I found the horse of poor gallant Lt. Johnson, who had just received a mortal wound, of which he died that evening. I was permitted to take him [my own having been totally disabled ] was helped into the saddle, and continued in it until 11 o’clock that night.

It was exceedingly dark, the rain poured in torrents, and being separated from my servants and baggage, I was without tent or covering; add to this, that during the afternoon of the 19th we had gained no advantages over the enemy, who remained firmly entrenched with 7000 men opposed to about 4000 on our side, without the possibility of bringing our artillery to bear, and you will readily conceive that our situation was not the most agreeable. The morning of the 20th was, however, as brilliant as the night of the 19th was dark and gloomy. Soon after daylight the enemy’s works were carried with the bayonet, and of their 7000 men, regular troops, under the command of Valencia, probably 4000 cannot be found to-day. As we passed this field in pursuit of the fugitives, the scene was awful, the road and adjacent fields every where strewn with mangled bodies of the dead and dying. We continued the pursuit until 1 o’clock, when our front came up with the enemy’s strong works at Churubusco and San Antonio, where the great conflict of the afternoon commenced.

At San Angel, dispositions having been made to attack in reverse the enemy’s works on the San Augustin road. Gen.
Scott ordered me to march my brigade in concert with that of the intrepid Gen. Shields, across the open country between Santa Acterina and the above named road, in order to cut off the enemy’s retreat. We gained the position sought, and although the enemy’s line was perfectly formed, and extended as far as the eye could reach in either direction, they were attacked vigorously and successfully. Arriving at a ditch which it was impossible for my horse to leap, I dismounted and hurried forward without thinking of my injury, at the head of my brigade, for 200 or 300 yards, when turning suddenly upon my knee, the cartilage of which had been seriously injured, I fainted and fell upon the bank in the direct range and within perfect reach of the enemy’s fire. That I escaped seems to me now providential. The rout and overthrow of the whole Mexican force soon became complete, and we could easily have taken the city; but Gen. Scott was met with a proposition for an armistice, (after demanding the surrender of the city, ) with a view to open negotiations for peace.

In my judgment the army, full of ardor and confidence, was humanely and wisely restrained. Major Gen. Quitman, Gen. Persifor F. Smith and myself were appointed [illegible line] to the terms of the armistice. I had not taken off my spurs of slept an hour for two nights, in consequence of my engagements and the pain of my knee. I obeyed the summons, was helped into my saddle, and rode two and a half miles to Tacubaya, where the commission assembled at the house of Mr. McIntosh, the British consul general. Our conference commenced late in the afternoon, and at four o’clock the next morning, the articles were signed.

That I was thoroughly exhausted you will readily imagine. I slept an hour or two that morning at Gen. Worth’s quarters, and my sprained knee, which was by far my most serious injury, has been daily improving and to-day I
We have intended for some time to say a few words on this new and singular issue, which has been brought forward by the Whig party; but the news already received from our army in Mexico, and the anxiety to hear further accounts from Gen. Scott have caused us to delay doing so longer than we intended. We call this issue a new one, because it has but lately been brought forward by the Whig party, and singular, because we think the history of nations will hardly find a parallel to it. We are in the midst of a war with Mexico without any acknowledged boundary between her territories and our own, and nothing but a treaty of peace, made as the Constitution prescribes, can restore friendly relations or fix a boundary line between us. If, then, we are to have no Mexican territory, to what point shall we withdraw our forces? The Whigs say that Texas extends no further than the Nueces. We must then give up all for which we have been contending. Fort Brown, Resaca de la Palma, Palo Alto--even Corpus Christi--are beyond the line which we are to insist on, if the advocates of No Mexican Territory are to be followed. But this is not all. If the Mexican war be unjust, and our foes have the right in their present hostilities, it is because the annexation of Texas to the United States was wrong, and inflicted an injury, a wanton and unlawful injury on Mexico. To be consistent, then, we must desert Texas--give her up to Mexican, tyranny and oppression; and withdraw our forces this side of the Sabine. --We must repeal the joint resolution--dismiss the Texan Senators from the Senate and her Congressmen from the House of Representatives, and present a spectacle from which even our Whig friends must turn with horror. If the Whig doctrines do not lead to this, it is because we must stand by Texas at all hazards. But, should we stand by Texas, if we had no right to annex her Assuredly not, even a Mexican casuist would answer. It, then, we must claim as far at the Nueces, it is because the annexation of Texas was a measure which the United States had a right to do this--the present war is a just and rightful war, and Mexico is WRONG in pursuing the course which she has pursued--wrong in breaking off friendly relations between us--wrong in refusing to settle the boundary of Texas--wrong in refusing to receive our Minister, and wrong in attacking our troops this side of the Rio Grande. If this be so--if we had a right to receive Texas into the Union, the present war is a just war, and according to every principle of international law, we have a right to exact indemnity from Mexico for the expenses of the war. This is an established rule--one to which we know of no exception. The only indemnity which Mexico can offer is a portion of her territory of--of the territory acknowledged to belong to her. This indemnity--the only indemnity which can be obtained--the Whig party says we must not touch; that we must cast it from us and have none of it.

This is indeed singular advice, coming as it does from men aspiring to the control of our foreign and domestic relations. But the reasons urged in justification of such a course are more singular still. When it was first authoritatively [illegible] expected that the person who brought it forward would at least attempt to show that if it was right and just in itself, and consistent with national honor and the high character of the people of the United States. But no--these were matter which the Whig leader did not condescend to discuss. Right and justice, the national honor and the character of our people, were matters too insignificant to merit the attention of the Whig leader. His eyes were turned in a different direction. His end and aim were different. Success--the success of the Whig party--was all that occupied his thoughts. He left out of view all but policy; and convinced himself, and endeavored to convince other, that the most public move which the Whigs could make, would be to rally under the banner of no Mexican territory. Having come to this conclusion, nothing more was regarded by him, and he seemed to have thought that nothing more was necessary to command the support of his political friend. --Power was what he wanted, and he addressed them as desiring nothing else. The interest of the people, the honor of the nation, were nothing. Policy and the triumph of party were all. In addressing such arguments to the Whig leaders, the "patriotic Whig statesmen" of the N. Intelligencer may not have made a mistake. His arguments may be the most potent with them: but hope and believe that the rank and file of the Whig party look to something higher. We feel confident that the people of the country will demand some better reason than party expediency before they give their adherence to the no territory principle. They will consider that the ridiculous position of the Mexican government and the heavy expenses of a rightful war--to say nothing of the hardships and sufferings of our gallant troops--require that Mexico shall give us some indemnity for the existing hostilities. They will see that justice to ourselves in the eyes of the world requires that this shall be done; and will decide the question in their own minds on different principles than party expediency. They will look--if the Whig leaders do not--to the honor of the nation and the interests of the people, and say, "Let this question be decided by the constituted authorities of the Government. Let a treaty be made, and if there is anything wrong, we will hold the wrong doers to heavy account." They will be right in [illegible] -bility of peace--of peace on the best terms it can obtain, and then if it has been satisfied with too little, the people have the remedy in their own hands.

RE47v44n42p2c1, September 28, 1847: "NO MEXICAN TERRITORY"
There is another feature in this matter which we cannot forbear to mention. The "truly patriotic Whig statesman" of the Intelligencer gravel considers the propriety of making the WILMOT PROVISO the test question of the Whig Party, and we beg the people to remember how that matter is disposed of. By opposing the Proviso? No. By showing it wrong and unjust? No. By opposing the Proviso? No. By showing it to be unconstitutional? No. By showing it injurious to the South? No. By asserting that it is inconsistent with Whig principles? No--none of these. It would be impolitic in the Whig party to take this ground, say the "truly patriotic Whig statesman" of the Intelligencer. The Whigs of the North, he says, are ready for it, but the Democrats will beat us on that issue. This is the motive, and the only motive which is assigned, why the Whig party should not come out in favor of the Wilmot Proviso. The Democrats will beat them, is the only reason that they shove it aside for the present, and take up for the time the new cry of "No Mexican territory," AS THE NEAREST APPROXIMATION TO IT. This we will show at our leisure. The no-Mexican territory issue is made us, and advanced by Whig leaders AS A COMPROMISE WITH ABOLITIONISM. The Whig leaders are afraid to say that they are opposed to the South on the great question of slavery; but they can say to the North, "we are ready to see that your tender feelings shall not be hurt by a farther extension of the peculiar institution." We say to the people of the South, beware of these men. Keep an eye on them, and watch their movements. Party expediency is all they recognize as worth of their consideration. They have left the safe anchorage, PRINCIPLE, and no man can safely trust them, or with safety trust to their guidance. Their leading papers recognize the right of Congress to impose conditions on new States coming into the Union. Every where at the North their organs are arrayed in favor of the Wilmot Proviso. If the Proviso is omitted by them as a test question, it is because they fear their ability to carry it through: and trust more to kindred idea of "no Mexican territory." For ourselves, we believe that the country is engaged in a just war; and think it best to leave the matter where the Constitution has placed it. If a peace is concluded which is injurious to the people, or which inflicts an injury on the National honor, then we will go with the foremost to demand that they who have been thus untrue to country should feel the weight of popular indignation. Having said thus much, we leave this subject for the present with a promise to again take it up at an early date.

RE47v44n42p2c2, September 28, 1847: NO NEWS YET

We have again to inform our readers that there is no later intelligence from the capital of Mexico. The Southern mail for the last week arrived regularly, with the exception of yesterday, when it brought nothing beyond Mobile, still there is not a word from the army later than the 29th, our last dates. We cannot account for the delay, unless the despatches have been cut off by the guerrillas. The United States transport ship Massachusetts has arrived at New York from Vera Cruz. It left that place on the 5th, at which time the steamer Ann McKim for New Orleans was waiting for the despatches of General Scott, with her steam up. The Sun of Anahauac announces the death of the gallant Colonel Burnett of New York, as having been killed at the last day's battle at Churubusco. This, we feel assured, must be an error.

In the absence of later news, we ask attention to the interesting letter of a Virginian, in to-day's paper. We may publish to-morrow the official report of Brigadier General Shields, which was transmitted to the Governor of South Carolina, and by him furnished for publication. The Palmetto State should feel pride in having her chivalrous sons lauded by one, whom all represent as one of the bravest among the brave.

RE47v44n42p2c3, September 28, 1847: MORE OF THE HOAX

The N.O. Delta this replies to assertions of the enemies of Gen. Pillow:

"Seeing the statement in a Mobile paper, that we had never denied that the letter of Leonidas was written by Gen. Pillow, we hereby state that the letter came to us signed and written by a respectable officer in the army, not by Gen. Pillow, nor having any signs of his knowledge or cognisance.

"We are sorry to see the Bulletin and Picayune lose their tempers about that Leonidas hoax. It is not our business to get mad, so we will leave hard words to them.

"In answer to their inquiry whether these extracts are genuine or not, we reply that most unequivocally and undeniably they are --they are purely the figments of some imaginative brain. As to the suppressed extracts they have no sort of similarity to those furnished to the Bulletin and Picayune. We usually determine for our ourselves what shall go into our paper, and we question the gentility of other papers prying into our private correspondence. "As to our connection with the hoax, we have only to say that though we should have been justified in hoaxing editors who were willing to avail themselves of such an unfair means of getting at our private correspondence, yet neither the Picayune nor Bulletin editors can with any truth say that they ever heard or saw anything from us countenancing the authenticity of these alleged quotations.

"The Picayune and Bulletin both say that one of the editors of this paper gave color to the authenticity of these extracts, by describing in public an encounter of Gen. Pillow's. This is perhaps true, but the whole story should be Told. --The Mexican killed by Gen. Pillow, was killed by the identical ball which he received at Cerro Gordo--whether we did not add that the ball glanced off and passed through sixteen other Mexicans, who were all standing in a line with the said bullet, we do not just now remember.

"Gentlemen, you were hoaxed--awfully and overwhelmingly, hoaxed--and we would advise you to take it good humoredly, and you may have your joke at our expense some of these days."

We take great pleasure in publishing the following graphic picture of the thrilling scenes of the war, by a gallant and distinguished Virginian. It will be observed, that he, like many other officers of the army on the spot, does not relish the armistice. We can appreciate the natural feeling of disappointment at seeing the brave soldiers checked in their ardor, at the very moment when the fruit of their toils and blood was in their grasp. But, with the lights before us, we cannot but regard the armistice as a judicious measure tending to bring about a peace which all so much desire. But our views on this point have already been fully expressed, and a few days must solve the mystery.

For the Enquirer.

THE LATE MEXICAN BATTLES.

The following account of the late battles of Contreras and Churubusco is take from a letter from an officer of the U.S. Army, a Virginian, who participated in the deadly conflict. The letter is addressed to a friend at home. It is dated:

"MIXCOAC, 3 miles from the City of Mexico, August 25, 1847.

"My Dear------We have met the enemy and he is ours. Santa Anna has been completely outgeneraled and though his men fought like Devils, our fought like----Angels! With an army of less than 10, 000 men and 27 pieces of artillery, we have beaten Santa Anna with about 35, 000 men and 100 pieces of artillery behind well constructed fortifications. Each knowing that victory or death would be his fate, the flaming cannon's mouth had no terrors for any. Our men charged batteries, shot down cannoniers, routed infantry and turned the enemy's own cannon upon them with a rapidly and impetuosity that nothing could resist; in all cases led by their officers. Of 15 officers in our regiment, eight have fallen; 5 killed and severely wounded. We have lost at least 1, 000 men, but we have taken near 50 pieces of artillery which makes us stronger than before our loss. The city is at our feet suing for mercy; but what the soldier has so well done, the diplomatist may spoil.

An armistice has been concluded, the terms of which are, in substance, that hostilities shall cease, to be renewed at the option of either party at 48 hours' notice; that free trade shall be allowed with the city to supply the army with necessaries; that no officer or soldier other than those connected with the quarter master's or commissary Department is to enter the city with or without arms; that our expresss can pass through the city with safe guard to the coast, that no new fortifications are to be erected by either party and no re-inforcements to be received either; that this armistice is agreed to, to give the U. States, and opportunity of proposing terms of peace!! I am a soldier, and make no comments. It is but just to state, however, that the reasons given for this armistice are "that if Santa Anna and his army are entirely destroyed or dispersed, there will be no body to make peace with, that we shall be compelled to assume the government and become entangled in Mexican politics, and that such a state of things would be the worst that could happen to our country." We are therefore to treat with Santa Anna, and strengthen him as far as it is proper, to enable him to make peace; but when we go, he must fall, as he knows. Hence, when he is sufficiently strengthened, he may turn upon us again, and fortune cannot always be with us. He is treacherous and unprincipled in the extreme, with great talents both as a general and an intriguer; and, though he is said to be without personal courage, his firmness of purpose and confidence in himself are absolutely marvelous.

Whilst all this is going on, much of course to the dissatisfaction of the army, our troops are quartered in the little villages around the city, and are anything but comfortable. I myself, however, with my company, occupy a beautiful country church--the good padre having kindly given up his library to me as a sleeping apartment. At the head of my bed stands a waxen image of the Virgin Mary, and opposite its foot two figures as large as life, each having a hand of the infant Saviour, all covered with glass cases; the books are all theological, and on every side there are images of saints--leaving nothing earthly in the room except your humble servant, and a Daguerreotype of Bocanegru, who, I believe, is a relative of the Padre.

My battery has been much injured in this fight. I was ordered to attack with 6 light pieces a Fort furnished with 23 guns, among them 18 pounders and three 8-inch howitzers--the latter being the same caliber as 68 lb Paixhan guns. I was obliged to go within their grape to be felt by them with my light guns, and to open on them from the road without any cover for my battery. However, it was necessary to hold the position at all hazards, in order to give time to the storming parties to turn uninterruptedly the enemy's left. I held it from 2 o'clock, P.M. until I was relieved by a brigade of infantry, at 10 o'clock at night--having in the meantime been repeatedly urged by the Engineers, and ordered by others, to retire; which I did not think myself justified, however, in doing, being better acquainted with the state of affairs in that part of the field that others whose orders I received, but who ere engaged elsewhere. I have the satisfaction of knowing that my conduct met with the entire approbation of my commanding officers. I had three pieces dismounted--the 1st Lieut. Of my battery, J. P. Johnston, 1st Artillery of Virginia, killed by my side, (one of the brightest and most valuable officers of the army,) several privates killed and wounded; and I lost ten horses killed or so badly wounded as to be unfit for service. Poor Irons is dreadfully wounded, with a grape-shot through his neck; he may recover--God grant he may. Martin of the 1st, I deeply regret to say, has lost his arm. I hope he is doing well.
In the Fort of San Angel, we captured the pieces lost at Buena Vista; 'tis said they were captured by the 4th Artillery, the same regiment which lost them.

I hope we now shall have a peace—but I distrust diplomacy. The Mexicans ought, in my opinion, to have been made to treat during a fight. Nothing makes them so much disposed to peace as the roar of our artillery and the cheers of our men. They will beat us to death at diplomacy carried on in tranquility. I hope for the best, and am not disposed to condemn what I may not fully understand. One thing is certain, that the Army has the most unbounded confidence in Gen. Scott—he has proved himself great in all things. Mr. Trist is the negotiator on the part of the Government, and I am told, with the fullest powers. Quitman, Persifer Smith and Pierce (Generals) were the Commissioners to arrange the terms of the armistice on our side—all fighting men and all Administration men.

I am naturally most anxious to return home—I am glad there is a prospect of peace. Having participate in five great battles, the last the greatest in numbers, and perhaps in consequences, yet fought during this war, and been engaged in several skirmishes, I am not so ferociously ambitious as to desire a continuance of the war, when I cannot see that any good end is to be attained other than the advancement of our own profession.

I cannot give you an intelligible account of the battles without describing our operations in detail, which would fill a small volume. From the reports which will soon be published, you will gain a tolerably good idea of this short campaign. It is sufficient at this moment to say, that the City of Mexico was not so well fortified in rear as in front, though strong on both sides; that Gen. Scott amused Santa Anna in front, whilst he turned the city by the left; taking a road 30 miles in length, supposed by the Mexicans to be totally impracticable for artillery and wagons, we thus were enabled to fight him with better chances of success. —As Santa Anna said, "the enormous rocks we rolled into the road to stop the Americans, they kicked out of the way with their feet; deep ditches we cut to impede their progress, they filled up in a moment, without halt in their march."

RE47v44n42p3c6, September 28, 1847: GEN. PIERCE

The Union, in copying our remarks in vindication of this gallant officer, makes the following emphatic remarks:

We understand that there is in preparation, and will soon, appear, a full and complete refutation of the gross and unfounded libel upon the character of Brigadier General Pierce, which originated in the Philadelphia Saturday Courier, and has been copied from that paper into the Richmond Whig, and other federal journals, charging General P., among other things, with having demanded and received his pay and rations six months in advance, before he would accept his commission. We deem it necessary now only to say, that the article in the Philadelphia paper will be proved to be a most wanton and aggravated libel, disgraceful alike to the paper in which it appeared, and to the writer who originated and penned it. We use strong and plain language, but it suits the case.

We have seen official documents, which clear the character of Gen. Pierce from every imputation; and can assure the Richmond Enquirer that in due season and place they will be forthcoming, to confirm all that it says.

RE47v44n42p3c7, September 28, 1847: THE ARMISTICE

The Journal of Commerce publishes a letter from a field officer of the army in Mexico to a friend in New York city of the very latest date from General Scott’s head quarters, (August 28th.) In the course of the letter, he says:

"You will be better able to appreciate this forbearance, (of Gen. Scott,) when you understand that it was known in our camp that the route and panic-stricken remains of the Mexican army could oppose only a feeble and ineffectual resistance to the entrance of our troops into the capital but Mr. Commissioner Trist, who is charged by the administration at Washington with the negotiation on our part, announced as his deliberate conviction, that if the army were to follow up the victory and enter the Capital, all hope of a speed peace would be destroyed; while, on the other hand, forbearance promised that happy result.

"On the morning after the battle, Santa Anna sent out a flag, and asked for a truce preliminatory to negotiations for peace—the General-in-chief, desirous to carry out the views of his government, and acting in concert with the commissioner, Mr. Trist, assented to the armistice to afford opportunity for negotiation, under the most favorable auspices."

[BRM]
The New York Courier (Whig) employs the following strong language in regard to Mexican affairs:

“If the Mexicans are still so besotted as to refuse the proffers of peace, and chose again to plunge into the horrors and the chances of war, no one can foresee the probably issue of such renewed contest. If the war is now renewed- after Gen. Scott has asked for an armistice after negotiations had been commenced at his solicitation, and after the fair promise held out by the Mexican authorities, there will be small opposition in this country to the prosecution of hostilities to any extent, and with any degree, of vigor that may be required. No treaty stipulations, that so favorable to Mexico as those offered, can ever again be made.” [JKM]

Scenes Upon the La Plata

To the Editor of the Union

Buenos Ayres, Aug. 2, 1847

I have just heard of the opportunity to send to Montevideo, and from thence to the United States, and have but a moment to write you. I seize that moment, however, brief as it is, to say a few words by way of posting you up on the condition of things in this quarter.

The negotiations, under the auspices of the English and French ministers, have totally failed. They had agreed upon many articles of the convention looking to an adjustment of the difficulties here, until finally they came to the question touching the navigation of the interior rivers of the confederation, upon which the negotiations were broken off and ended. Gov. Rosas planted himself immovably upon the sovereign rights of the confederation over its interior waters, and adhered inflexibly to his determination not to yield in any manner the smallest portion of these rights. As the minister seemed determined also to acquire some sort of right, modified or exclusive, to navigate these waters, the negotiations necessarily closed on that point, leaving Gov. Rosas in the strongest position possible, for he had the right and justice of the question on his side, as well as the strength of the argument. [JKM]

In our paper on Tuesday, we stated our objections to the manner in which the new issue has been brought forward by the Whigs. We then remarked that the controlling reason, which prompted them to avoid the Wilmot Proviso and substitute this new questions in its stead, was a conviction that it would be inexpedient for them to take ground on the Proviso, while they might succeed in gaining the reins of government if they declare their fixed purpose of refusing to take any territory as an indemnity from Mexico. In making this assertion we think the communication in the National Intelligencer which we referred to, fully justifies us. In that communication the fear of losing the Southern vote, if the principles contained in the Wilmot Proviso are adhered to and made the text of political orthodoxy by the Whigs, is states as the reason it should not be adopted as an article of the Federal creed; and the probability that the Whig church can satisfy its northern communicants without driving off its friends in the South, is states as the reason that the new doctrine should be adopted. Here we beg our readers to remember that the fear of driving off the Whigs of the South is the prime cause of the desertion of the principles of the proviso by the Whigs, and not as antipathy to the proviso itself. Indeed the very person who brings forward the new issue- one who is endorsed by the National Intelligencer as an able and patriotic Whig of the North could be united against the South on the vital question. It is also worthy of notice, that it is urged that the Federalists, both in the North and South, can be united on the proposition to avoid the necessity of taking any action on Mr. Wilmot’s proposition or the principles it contains, by concluding a peace with Mexico without requiring any indemnity for the expense of the war. This proposition requires the nation to give up its claim to indemnity because the Northern and Southern Whigs can thereby be united, and the spread of slavery be prevented. Any course which will not have this effect of preventing the spread of slavery to new territory, the Northern Whigs, in this state of the case, consent to make up the issue which they seem about to make, it is nothing more nor less than a compromise with abolitionism, no matter how it is disguised. They who are willing to make such a compromise have no excuse for their conduct. The friends and supporters of the Missouri Compromise, by which the rights of the Southern States were given up without equivalent, pleaded in their jurisdictions that danger to which the Union was subjected, and alleged, in extenuation of their conduct, that they actuated by the high desire to bring about quiet and harmony, and to prevent domestic feud and strife if not civil war.

We thank the New Hampshire Patriot for sending us a second copy of their conclusive vindication of Gen. Pierce from the libel no less upon the Government than upon himself, first published in the Philadelphia Saturday Courier, viz: that Gen. Pierce refused to accept his commission until he should receive six months’ pay and rations, and that this extraordinary demand was complied with. The Patriot publishes the following interesting facts, which do Gen. P. great honor. We publish them with the single remark, that, since the Patriot’s article was written, Gen. Pierce’s valor and military skill in the late battles have won for him the respect of all patriots, and the gratitude of the whole country:

It will be recollected that the “Ten Regiment Bill” passed just before the close of the last session of Congress. As soon as it passed, the President, without solicitation and without the knowledge of Gen. Pierce, nominated him to the Senate as Colonel of the first of the Ten Regiments- the 9th infantry. A friend at Washington immediately wrote to Gen. P. informing him of what had been done, and expressing the hope that he would accept the Colonel’s commission. Upon receiving that letter, Gen. P. immediately showed it to us. Knowing the very great sacrifice, both pecuniary and social, which it would require of him to accept the commission as well as the difficulties in the way of declining it, we confess we were in doubt both as to his duty and what he would do; and therefore after perusing the letter, we asked - “Well, what will you do?” - He instantly replied - “Do? There is no alternative. I shall accept the course.” And then he went on to remark that for many years past he has enjoyed the honors and rewards of the most desirable stations in the gift for his people, where no sacrifice or risks or exposure were required of him, and that it would be positively disgraceful for him now to hesitate when called upon to submit to sacrifices in the service of his country. He then sat to our table and there wrote a reply to the letter, saying without condition or hesitation, that he should accept the appointment of colonel. And from that day he commence his preparations for joining the army. But the bill providing for the appointment of Generals having passed before the close of the season, the President immediately tendered him the appointment of Brigadier General, which was as promptly accepted, we have no doubt.

Now are not these facts alone sufficient to disprove the charge of the “Sat. Courier?” If he thus unconditionally and without the least hesitation, accepted the Colonel’s commission, is there any sane man who will believe that he refused to accept a higher grade with nearly double the salary, “unless he received with his commission, six months full pay and rations for man and horse in advance?” No, it is too preposterous to think of.

As to the talk about ‘inexperienced” “ignorant” “inefficient” General’s, and the fatal consequences so often predicted from their appointment, we need only remark, as concerns General Pierce, that he marched his column of 3500 men or more, with a valuable train, from Vera Cruz to Puebla, a distance of some 175 miles, and repelled repeated attacks of large bodies of guerrillas- all without the loss of a single man. Could the most experienced General have done more? [JKM]

Some weeks since the Republican quoted the following extract from the correspondence of the New York Spirit of the Times, in its effort to array Col., now Senator Davis, against the Administration:

“He denounced in no measure terms the conduct of the Government in withdrawing from Gen. Taylor his troops.”

The New Orleans Southerner refuses the whole story in the following emphatic manner:

“We take the liberty of positively and unequivocally denying every word of this extract. We were within three feet of Col. Davis during the whole of his speech and know that he did not use any remarks reflecting upon the administration for their conduct towards Gen. Taylor. The following remark he did make, but it was made without reference to the administration: “He (Col. D.) declared that if he had known to what extent the capitulation at Monterey had been used in the United States to injure General Taylor, his defense of it would have been more complete- that he had means in his possession.” [JKM]

The Insurrectionists under their Leaders- General Gonsalles and Outlaw Cortes surprised and dispersed, and the Re-capture of a great number of American Horses by our troops.

Messrs. Editors: At the destruction of the town of Los Pias, on the 6th of July last, by the troops under the command of Maj. Edmonson, we found upon the prisoners then taken letters written by one Illarw Gonsolles and others, leaders of the late projected insurrection, giving a plan of their intended operations, and asking the citizens to be in readiness for action at a moment’s warning stating, also, that the Americans were already weakened by the departure of the States of a number of troops; that others were to start in a few days, and amongst them the company Capt. Fisher’s; and the spies would be kept constantly on the road to give information of their (the
The prisoners also stated that many of their men, with their arms, had gone to the town of Loquesta, to join their leader, Gen. Gonsalles.

Loquesta is a town of considerable size, and admirably located for defense, being situated on the San Magil River, surrounded by the mountains of an almost inaccessible character. The prisoners stated that Cortes and his party were at, or near, Anton Checo, a frontier town situate on the San Magil river, some fifteen or twenty miles below Loquesta. Having disposed of the prisoners taken at the storming of Los Pías, by sending them to Santa Fe for trial, Maj. Edmonson, with the companies of Capt. Horine and Holloway, and two pieces of artillery, started on the 15th of July to the town of Anton Checo, a distance of about forty-five miles.

Upon our arrival at the latter place, at daylight the following morning, we found the town deserted, except by a few old men, women and children, from whom we extracted the information that their men, with their arms, had likewise gone to the town of Loquesta. Pursuing our march, and when within about five miles of the latter town, a Mexican, supposed to be a spy, was captured by out scouting party, who informed us that four to six hundred armed Mexicans, under their leaders, Gonsalles and Cortes, were then in the town of Loquesta. Upon our arrival on the heights commanding a view of the town, we discovered the enemy dispersing in every direction to the mountains. We, however, succeeded in capturing about fifty prisoners, the mule, saddle, bridle and saber of General Cortes, and a great number of American horses, and Comanche and Apache Indian horses, obtained from those Indians in exchange for horses stolen by the Mexicans from the American troops.

The enemy had evidently made great preparation for defense, as their hoses were generally barricaded and fortified, and their goods and valuables either hid in the mountains or buried. Our prisoners informed us that the great panic amongst the Mexican troops was produced by our sudden and unexpected approach, together with the fact that we had with us artillery, which I think they never intended to face again if they can avoid it.

It is but justice to the troops, being part infantry, and having with them artillery drawn by oxen, to state that the march from Los Vegos, by Anton Checo to Loquesta, a distance of between fifty-five and sixty miles, was performed in less then twenty-four hours, over a rough and mountainous country, and a great portion of the distance without even a road to guide them- to which extraordinary march may be attributed their success on the occasion.

We are endeavoring, here in Santa Fe, to raise a new regiment. Three companies have already been mustered in, and two others reported ready for being mustered. They are composed principally of discharged volunteers and wagoners.

Six of the prisoners charged with the murder of Lieut. Brown and his party were executed of the 3rd, in Santa Fe, by sentence of a drumhead court martial. The balance, it is supposed, will be released for want of sufficient testimony.

Yours respectfully J.H. Brown

Colonel Dickinson’s Report
San Augustine, August 23rd, 1847

General- Early on the morning of the 20th instant, Colonel Butler, in pursuance of your orders, marched his command from the road running to the South of his quarters, by which it was reported many Mexicans were retreating from the field of Contreras to the City of Mexico. Owing to the thick patches of maguey and a rugged ravine, he could not reach his position until several hundred of the enemy had passed. As the Regiment emerged from the ravine into a field, extending to the road, we discovered large masses of the enemy in the road before us; and, although they perceived us as the same time, they were unable to escape beyond our reach until every gun in the Battalion had been brought to bear upon them; most however had broken into an open field opposite, which only the more exposed them to our fire. Through this field in full musket range of our position, mingled groups of their cavalry and infantry continued to pass. Shortly, however, we perceived large masses forming in line of battle, under cover of the stone wall, already mentioned- and that a large body was advancing from the orchard, on our right flank and rear. Col. Butler immediately changed front to the right by a flank movement, and brought the enemy, in both their positions, as they advanced from cover, under his fire; this they returned for a short time, and then retreated. Col. Butler perceiving that others of the enemy were passing through the field, in our front, left a few miles to guard our rear- formed again on the road, and maintained a steady fire upon the enemy, who continued to pass for about 20 minutes- large bodies of Mexicans then came forward and surrendered themselves to Col. Butler, who, seeing other bodies still coming remained upon the road with three companies, while the rest of the Regiment, in pursuance of an order from the General, retired beyond the ravine to oppose a very large body of the cavalry, appearing in our rear. Of the enemy, one hundred and twenty seven were killed and wounded and two hundred and seventeen taken prisoner. Among the latter were one general, two colonels, four commandants and a lieutenant. Our own loss in the action, from the random fire of the enemy was one Sergeant severely wounded, and on private Capt. Marshal with his Company (E) was left as a guard over the prisoners, who were placed in a church, and the Regiment, soon after, took up its line of march on the road to Mexico. About noon the Regiment was ordered to make a detour to the left, and strike upon the same road a short distance beyond the enemy’s works at Cheraposa, to cut off their retreat, as it was reported that the works had been carried by our troops. On arriving on the field after the subsequent action, we found that the New York Regiment, in consequence on numbers of horseman and a small corps of the Howitzer battery having intruded themselves betwixt use, were some three hundred yards in advance of use, and the 9th infantry at the same distance.

[Illegible]

Capt. Marshall, who rejoined the Regiment with his command at this place, reports to me, that soon after the battalion had left the church where the prisoners were placed under his charge, finding himself destitute of provisions, he sent a detachment of his company to forage for fruit and green corn; this detachment surprised a party of Mexican soldiers engaged in the same pursuit. They killed one and captured 43, whom they brought back and delivered to their Captain. This makes the total number taken at this place 260, which, with the 127 killed and wounded, makes the total of 387.

Friday, October 1, 1847   RE47v44n44p4c5   Mexican Affairs: Paredes and Santa Anna  words: 539

Mexican Affairs- Paredes and Santa Anna

We learn that one of the Mexican prisoners now in our city received, via Tampico, by the last arrival, a letter from a friend in the city of Mexico, dated on the afternoon of the 28th, in which it is stated that Gen. Paredes had entered the city of Mexico with a large force, and arrested Santa Anna and imprisoned him in the carcel San Jago. We give the report for what it is worth, neither denying nor endorsing its truth. It is by no means improbable, as Paredes at the last accounts was at the town of Toluca, near the capital, ready to take advantage of any misstep of his old enemy, or any confusion in the capital, to regain his former position and influence in Mexico. The temper of the mob is admirably suited to such a movement. At our last accounts they were much incensed again the American and Santa Anna, and were ripe for a revolutionary demonstration. Paredes is just the man to snatch the golden opportunity and profit from it. He would no doubt rally all parties around him, and around warmth of zeal and enthusiasm which it is vain for Santa Anna to endeavor to excite. He is a man of gallant and dashing commanding address, and will no doubt attract the general confidence of the multitude. He comes, too, under circumstances which demonstrate his sincerity and patriotism.

In the continued unpleasant dearth of news, we give the above rumor in the last New Orleans Delta. We attach no importance to it- for our last dates from the Capital are one day later, and they make no mention of it. We have already confessed our fear, that any peace made with Santa Anna may not be sanctioned by the leaders of the factions of inimical to Santa Anna, such as Paredes, Valencia, etc., and that they may endeavor to arouse the people to renewed resistance. But we feel satisfied, that with an amicable arrangement entered into with Santa Anna, General Scott will be enabled to put down the factionists, and secure all the benefits of the Treaty- or, should the Treaty be entered into and sanctioned by the action government of Mexico, we might take possession of and maintain the ground embraced in the Treaty, leaving the Mexican factions to fight it out among themselves. But it is needless to speculate farther upon past or future events. A few hours may bring us intelligence that will give a clear view of the whole field.

While on the subject of rumors, we will briefly refer to an absurdly extravagant one which was circulated yesterday morning, viz: that the peace negotiations had been broken off, Gen. Scott beaten and forced to retreat.

In the course of yesterday, we also heard of “rumors of war” in another and yet more distant quarter. It was said that the Telegraph from Washington had announced that a difficulty had broken out with Brazil, and that no flour should be sent from our port to Rio. On calling at the Telegraph office, we found it mute on this or any subject of warlike news. There are hoaxes here as well as in New Orleans.  [JKM]

Friday, October 1, 1847   RE47v44n44p4c5   Major Lally’s Command  words: 233

The Lynchburg Virginian refers to a letter in its possession from an officer in the U.S. Army, dated Jalapa, “The train was more harassed than any other, in consequence of the belief that it had a large amount of specie. It met the enemy on the 10th, 12th, 15th, and 19th of August, and cut its way through in every instance, with a loss, in the aggregate, of more than eighty men. Twelve were killed and several of the wounded afterwards died. Major Lally received a ball on the 10th, when near Jalapa, through the neck. Capt. Calwell, of the Voltigeurs, and Capt. Cummings, of the 11th infantry, both from Virginia, and Captain Clark, of North Carolina, were severely wounded, and first in the head, and the second in the leg. Lieutenants Adams, and the Marine Corp, Winder and Cramer, of the new Regiments, were also very badly wounded. Little hopes were entertained of the recovery of Lts. Adams and Winder. With these exceptions all the wounded were doing well and considered out of danger. Capt. G.C. Hunter, who, as we mentioned some time ago, on the strength of an article in the Union, highly distinguished himself, was in command of all the troops above 1200 at Jalapa.” [JKM]

Tuesday October 5, 1847 RE47v44n45p1c6 As We Expected words: 609

When the news reached us that an armistice had been entered into between Gen. Scott and Santa Anna, it received the commendation of all the Whig papers, as a wise and judicious measure, calculated to facilitate the arrangement of peace. Then they supposed, that Gen. Scott himself originated it and many of them even went so far as most unjustly to assail the Democratic papers for what was improperly regarded as a censure upon the acts of Gen. Scott. We give a few passages from the article of the Whig and the 17th in justification of the armistice.

“It is unquestionably highly unjust to condemn the measure without a full knowledge of all the circumstances, which, in the opinion of the Commanding General rendered it judicious, particularly in reference to its probable influence upon the termination of hostilities between the two Republics upon terms acceptable to his Government. But the great end contemplated by the Administration, in the invasion of Mexico, as we have been repeatedly assured, is not the wanton and unnecessary destruction of the life and property, but to “conquer a peace.” And if Gen. Scott believed as he might very naturally have done, that this result would be more likely to ensure from the tender of an armistice, remaining meanwhile without its walls, while his victorious army commanding all the entrances to the city, and thereby saving it from the horrors of a bombardment or an assault, he was unquestionably warranted by sound policy as well as by considerations of humanity, scarcely less obligatory in their nature, in adopting the course he has pursued.

“We have too much confidence in Gen. Scott’s sagacity, for which he is not less remarkable than for his courage and skill, to suppose, for an instant, that he could have been induced to propose the temporary cessation of hostilities, with the city of Mexico completely, as it appears to have been, in his power, had he not been possessed of facts justifying the conviction that by that proposition, made under circumstances that left no doubt of the magnanimity and generosity from which it sprung, the prostrate and humbled enemy might be the more readily induced to turn a favorable ear to the often before rejected advances, made by our Government, for the renewal of negotiations. We shall, therefore, until the contrary shall be indubitably shown— as we are confident it never will be—by something more conclusive than surmises and inferences, take it for granted that the proposal for an armistice was dictated by the highest considerations of expediency as well as by the noblest impulse of humanity.

On Friday, the “unfavorable news” reached this city, and at once the views of the Whig are completely changed. It now denounces this same armistice, which it assumes to have been the work of the Democratic Administration, through Mr. Trist. It says:

“There seems to be a general impression upon the public mind, that the armistice into which General Scott entered, and which was certainly not beneficial to the American arms, was owing to the agency of Mr. Trist.”

It then goes on to attack Mr. Trist and his mission, and likens him to “some agent of the Jacobin Club in the armies of Revolutionary France, who acted in the double capacity of commissioner and spy” – sneers at Mr. Trist as “having married the grand-daughter of Mr. Jefferson,” denounces his mission as “a nuisance of the most formidable character” – and in the following language assails the very armistice, which, two weeks ago, it lauded as “dictated by the highest considerations of expediency, as well as by the noblest impulse of humanity.” [JKM]

Tuesday October 5, 1847 RE47v44n45p2c1 Important from Mexico words: 572

The steamship James L. Day, Captain O’Grady, arrived yesterday from Vera Cruz, which place she left on the evening of the 21rst, bringing intelligence of the greatest importance. Immediately on the receipt of our papers and dispatches, we issues an extra containing the news—brief, but sufficient to satisfy public curiosity, and allay the anxiety for the fate of the army, caused by the length of time which had transpired without news, and the probability that hostilities had been resumed.

As we anticipated in our papers of yesterday, the negotiations resulted in nothing. The last letter from Mr. Kendall is dated the 5th, and our file of the Diario del Gobierno does not come down later than the 4th, but the Arco
Iris of Vera Cruz has a letter from the city of Mexico dated the 10th, together with extracts from the Diario, and the Boletin of Atlisco, to the 12th, which together with the letter we publish, and the manner in which the armistice was terminated, will be learned from the extracts we copy. A perusal of Mr. Kendall’s letters, however, will at once show that a feeling of hostility was growing with the people of the capital as early even as the 13th of last month, and the Congress of the State of Mexico, in session at Toluca, had declared against peace. Notwithstanding repeated belligerent demonstrations by the enemy, and a positive violation of the armistice in our wagons not being permitted by the mob to enter the city for provisions, negotiations were still pending to as late a date as the 6th. The Arco Iris received letters from Mexico under date of the 9th, stating that, on the 7th, the Mexican Commissioners declared that the propositions made by Mr. Trist were inadmissible, in consequence of which General Santa Anna convoked a council of General s, who decided that notice should be given immediately to Gen. Scott that the armistice was at an end, and appointed the 9th for the commencement of hostilities.

On the 6th Gen. Scott addressed from Tacubaya the following note to Santa Anna

Headquarters Army of United States

Sept. 6, 1847

To his excellency the President and General-in-Chief of the Republic of Mexico

The 7th and the 12th articles of the armistice on military convention which I had the honor of ratifying and exchanging with your Excellency on the 24th, stipulate that the army under my command shall have the privilege of obtaining supplies from the city of Mexico. There were repeated violations of these articles soon after the armistice was signed, and I have now good reason for believing that within the last twenty-four hours, if not before, the third article of the same convention was also violated by the same parties. These direct breaches of good faith give to this army a full right to commence hostilities against Mexico without giving any notice. However, I will give the necessary time for an explanation, satisfaction, or reparation. If these are not given, I hereby formally notify you that if I do not receive the most complete satisfaction of all these points before 12 o’clock tomorrow, I shall consider the armistice as terminated from that hour.

I have the honor to be your Excellency’s obedient servant

WINFEILD SCOTT

To this Santa Anna made the following reply

Headquarters Army of Mexican Republic

Mexico, Sept. 6, 1847

To his Excellency General Winfield Scott, Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States

Sir: By the note of your Excellency under this date I learn, without surprise, that you consider that the civil and military authorities of Mexico have violated articles 7, 12, and 3 of the armistice which I concluded with your excellency on the 24th of last month.

The civil and military authorities of Mexico have not obstructed the passage of provisions for the American army; and if at time their transmissions has been retarded, it has been owing to the imprudence of the American agents, who, without having a previous understanding with the proper authorities, gave occasion for popular outbreaks, which it has cost the Mexican Government much trouble to repress. Last night and the night before the escorts for the provision trains were ready to start, and were only detained because Mr. Hargous, the agent, desired it. The orders give to suspend the intercourse between the two armies were addressed to private individuals, not the agents of the army of the United States, and were intended purposely to expedite the transmission of provisions to the army, and to confine the intercourse to that object exclusively. In return for this conduct you excellency has prevented the owners or managers of the grain mills in the vicinity of the city from furnishing any flour to the city, which is a true breach of the good faith your Excellency had pledged me.

It is false that any new work or fortification has been undertaken, because one or two repairs have only served to place them in the same situation they were in on the day of the armistice was entered into, accident or the convenience of the moment having caused the destruction of the existing works. You have had early notice of the establishment of the battery covered with the mud walls of the house of Garry in this city, and did not remonstrate, because the peace of two great republics could not be made to depend upon things grave in themselves, but of little value compared to the result in which all the friends of humanity and the prosperity of the American continent take so great an interest.

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA
We yesterday saw one of the party detached by Captain Wells, under command of Lieut. Henderson, and which our readers will recollect was sent forward for the purpose of informing Major Lally of the advance of his reinforcements. From him we learn that this small party (already reported to have been all shot by order of the Chief Aburto, commanding guerrillas at the National Bridge) had lost but one man in all and some four or five horses. After passing the National Bridge, and from thence the whole line of their march until they reached Maj. Lally, they had continued skirmishing, were frequently surprised by parties greatly outnumbering them, and subject to much suffering from want of provision. They succeeded ultimately, however, in reaching the train, and when there found that Besancon's company was along with it. In the frequent skirmishing which ensured during the period which elapsed between the departure of Henderson's party and their rejoining Maj. Lally, our men suffered severely at times. The whole loss however, was, it appears, but trifling— one man is reported killed, whose name has not transpired. The detachment left Jalapa, accompanied by some of Besancon's men, on Saturday morning last, and arrived here yesterday. They numbered in all twenty-eight men, they reported Maj. Lally at the former place when they left. [Sun of the 13th]

We presume that there will be few in the nation who will not concede the liberally of our offers to Mexico, and the insolent demands of Mexico. She talks as a victor, and not as a suppliant. Is there an American patriot who will for a moment listen to the insulting demands of Mexico, that we should confine our boundary to the Nueces? The whole country, we trust, will now see the importance of the most vigorous and active measures to beat down Mexican pride, shy and insolent, and , punishing he long practiced treachery, force her to do us justice, and make peace on proper grounds. But we have only room to call special attention to the terms of the two propositions: The justice and duration of our own, and the impudence of the enemy's.

Extract of a letter in Picayune, dated September 4, at Tacubaya

The headquarters of General Scott are here in Tacubaya, where General Worth’s division is also quartered. General Pillow is at Mixcoae, two miles South; General Twiggs at San Angel, about four miles further South; and General Quitman at San Augustine. Some sickness prevails in the army, but the health of the troops may be put down as generally good.

The wounded officers are all doing well. A day or two since, both Lieutenants Hamilton and Holloway were reported as in a dangerous condition, but I believe that all danger is now considered over.

{From the National Intelligencer, Oct. 4}

We were favored, late last evening, with the following extract of a letter from an officer of rank at Puebla to his wife in Washington, dated the 10th of September, and received by last evening’s mail.

We entertained a strong hope that the reinforcement of Gen. Lane, which marched from Vera Cruz on the 19th, reached both Jalapa and Puebla in time to arrest any disaster from the commands of Major Lally and Col. Childs, which, according to this letter, appeared to be in great jeopardy.

Puebla, September 10

“All the expresses sent by General Scott to Puebla have been cut off; but one has escaped, being the only official intelligence I have received since General Scott left here. An express came to me yesterday, and reported that he left Mexico on the 8th, and was robbed of his dispatches.

I am, and have been, hemmed in by 4,000 Mexicans for the last three weeks. The Mexicans represent Major Lally, with 1,000 men, as surrounded and hemmed in at Jalapa, and cannot venture out. Major Lally ought to have been here fifteen days since. The whole country swarms with guerrillas.”
Hostilities Recommenced!

After a long interval, and that, too, when the peculiar situation of affairs before the walls of Mexico, caused every one to desire further news, we have later intelligence from our Army, received by our Pony Express, in advance of the mail.

It appears that the attempt of Mr. Trist to negotiate a peace has proved abortive, and that hostilities have been resumed between the opposing armies— that another battle has been fought, but no other peculiars given than that the Mexicans have again been defeated.

The news comes to us in such a form as while it bears every evidence of truthfulness, still leaves us doubly anxious to learn more.

The statement of the revolt of Puebla, and of the loss of the Americans there and at Mexico, amounting to "at least two thousand men," comes in such a "questionable shape," as to induce us to place no confidence in it. The "two thousand" report probably originated from the loss of killed and wounded in the two battles fought on the 20th.

It will be seen that according to the Vera Cruz Sun of the latest date, from two or three thousand would shortly be on the way to reinforce General Scott, which, with the additional force detached from the army of General Taylor, will be amply sufficient not only to subdue the City of Mexico, but to hold in check, and disperse any body of troops that the Mexicans can probably get together.

We proceed to give all the intelligence received by the Express, leaving our readers to draw their own conclusions as to the existing state of affairs in that quarter, and awaiting (as will our readers) further advices with great anxiety.

We are favored with the following account of the battles of Mexico, in the form of an extra from the Pittsburgh Post of Saturday last. We understand it is compiled from letters written by two of the most talented and distinguished officers in the army. We give place to it at once in the Union, with great pleasure. Every account we continue to receive of these achievements, whether from our own officers or the Mexican writers, adds new strength to the column of fame which our gallant countrymen have erected:

Tacubaya, Mexico, August 27, 1847

The whole force which moved from Puebla amounted to ten thousand men, more or less marching in four columns on successive days, in the following order: Twiggs, Quitman, Worth, and Pillow. In approaching the city of Mexico by the main highway, you go directly on to the height of El Penon, which is a strong position and excessively fortified. Before leaving Puebla it had been considered whether the main road could not be avoided, and El Penon turned, by passing round to the south and left of lakes Chalco and Jochimilco. The engineer officers serving immediately at general headquarters, had questioned a large number of persons (especially spies and agents sent especially to examine the route) and the mass of testimony was entire as to the boggy mucky, and perfectly impractical character for wagons and artillery of the road leading in that direction. It was therefore in contemplation to turn El Penon by forcing the enemy's lines at Mexicalzingo although the ground was difficult, and the batteries known to be numerous. This route, you will observe, is to the north and right of those lakes. The reconnaissance of the engineers were consequently directed to this end. In the mean time General Worth, whose division had been left at Chalco, (while General Scott, with Twiggs's division had gone on to Ayotla) sent Colonel Duncan, with a strong party, to examine the denounced route. Colonel Duncan found it just the reverse of what it had been pronounced to be; it was firm, rocky, and quite practical, requiring, to be sure, a little labor here and there. General Worth instantly sent Colonel Duncan with this information to General Scott, and urged the movement of the whole army to the left of Lake Chalco. This recommendation instantly prevailed. The direct attack was abandoned, and the next morning the whole army was in motion. Worth's division on in the rear (now by the change of the line of operations became the front) took the lead, and the whole mass filed to the left of the lakes to San Augustin, which is on the great Acapulco highway to the city of Mexico, and about nine miles from it. This is the history of the strategy of the business.

We arrived at San Augustin on the evening of the 17th. The first position of the enemy was at San Antonio, 2 ½ miles off in advance. Gen. Worth sent an engineer officer the next morning to check it out. Capt. Thompson of the dragoons escorting him. He went to about 1000 yards of the enemy's battery, leaving the company some hundred yards to the rear. When the engineer officer began to examine the battery with his spyglass, a gun was fired at him. The ball, passing over him, struck Capt. Thornton from his horse, tearing away his whole breast and ribs. Poor fellow! He had not ten days to live; he was so feeble that he could scarcely sit in his saddle. Physicians and friends had remonstrated against his going out; but he had, I doubt, not, made up his mind that nothing but death itself
The news, however, taken in connection with the very long delay in hearing from the army is far from agreeable. We had some faint expectation that Mexican madness and infatuation would have been convinced of the invincibility of American arms, and would have consented to an equitable arrangement of difficulties. We indulged in hope that the magnanimity and forbearance exhibited by General Scott, in not crowning his late victories and a capture of the Mexican Capital, and in thereby saving in nation from a feeling of degradation, might have induced them to make a peace upon just and honorable terms. But American generosity and humanity have been thrown away– the olive branch has been against madly rejected– and Mexico has assumed upon herself the awful responsibility of farther hostilities and bloodshed. We trust that the late intelligence will unite our whole people in favor of a prosecution of the war with sweeping energy and vigor. A people so treacherous, so insolent and infatuated as the Mexicans have shown themselves to be, must be made to feel the pressure of war. We have done all that reason, justice and humanity, and the voice of the civilized world, can demand. We have, in the moment of victory, tendered over and over again as offer of peace, and, as far as we can judge, of a reasonable character. Our advances have been rejected, and Mexico has preferred war. Let her have it then in all its force and terrors. Let her victory, tendered over and over again as offer of peace, and, as far as we can judge, of a reasonable character. Our advances have been rejected, and Mexico has preferred war. Let her have it then in all its force and terrors. Let her feel that while peace is our policy and choice, the American nation will never shrink from war when its honor and its rights are involved.

We have hoped that a treaty of peace would have been made, securing to us a reasonable portion of territory and a permanent boundary line, which we might have defended against the assaults of all the factions in Mexico. But our moderate demands have been treated with scorn – and the only alternative that is now left to us is to conquer and hold the whole country, levying contributions upon her provinces and towns, until she comes to her senses and voluntarily steps forward to do us justice. Retreat under the present circumstances we cannot. Our honor, our national self-respect, our permanent safety and welfare, require that we should not leave our task of self-vindication unfinished. And this, we feel convinced, will be the spirit evinced by the whole nation, as the late intelligence shall sweep over the land. [JKM]
But if the Mexicans are still mad enough to claim to the Nueces, then we say we presume there is not a patriot in this land who will not indignantly repel the demand, and call aloud from the most vigorous prosecution of this war. There is not a man of honest fame who will dare to advocate it. Mexico might as well pretend to demand a slice of Virginia or Pennsylvania. [JKM]

Mr. Trist’s summary retrocession of all the territory of the Californias lying south of the 37 degrees, discloses a singular feature in the policy of the President, by which, of course, Mr. Trist was governed. The line of 37 degrees is just half a degree North of the 36 degree 30 min. of the celebrated line of the Missouri Compromise, and if Mr. Buchanan’s project of applying that compromise to the territory is obtained from Mexico, be adopted, the whole of our acquisitions, except a small piece of southern New Mexico (which lies, as Mr. Polk contends, entirely west of the Rio Grande) will be subject to a restriction against the existence of slavery. We shall be much gratified to see how our Southern Democratic friends will argue in behalf of the policy of the Executive as thus developed.

The very article from which we clip the above states that Mr. Trist “persisted in claiming the whole of New Mexico,” and this fact is stated in the concluding letter of the Mexican commissioners to the Minister of Internal and Foreign Relations, from whence alone we derive any information on the subject. Now in referring to the map, we find that the territory of New Mexico runs from the latitude of 32 deg. 15 min. to the 40th degree. This would give us upwards of four degrees South of the Missouri Compromise line.

But the question cannot be argued intelligently, until we have Mr. Trist’s own representations. Even the few notes from him, referred to in the Mexican documents, have not come to light- and we are forced to resort to Mexican statements for all the glimmerings we of the progress and result of the negotiations. The Union has positively expressed its disbelief in the statement of the Mexican commissioners, that Mr. Trist had asked for forty days to consult our Government, in the hope of a favorable result, upon the question of surrendering the territory between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, and also a portion of Upper California. Such a course would have been “a violation of his instructions.” It is evident, therefore, that whether the Mexican commissioners have spoken correctly or not, the report of the negotiation does not properly present “the policy of the Executive.” We must yet wait some time before we even know the true state of the case. [JKM]

The Union publishes an authentic copy of the draught of the treaty carried out by Mr. Trist. In is the same which we have already published, with the exception of a few passages which are interpolated in the copy of the treaty published in Mexico, as having been submitted by Mr. Trist. The interpolations are as follows: In the 2nd article, the words “Besides, it is agreed, that if any Mexican citizen should be prisoners of the Commanches, or of any tribes of Indians, within the limits of the United States, the Government of the United States will endeavor to obtain their return to their homes, according to the treaties existing with those Indians.”

Again, in article 5th, the words “and by the stipulations which will appear in article No. 8, the United States abandon, forever, all claims against the United States of Mexico, on account of the expenses of the war.” [JKM]

The New Orleans Picayune corrects the painful error into which it was led, that the whole of Capt. Besancon’s company had been killed by the guerillas, and that Lieut. Henderson’s command had been captured at the National Bridge. Private letters from members of the companies state positively that both companies had arrived safely (with the loss of one killed and one wounded) at the headquarters of Maj. Lally, at Jalapa, on the 8th of September. [JKM]

The news about the movements of our army is obtained from two sources (says the Union) – 1rst, from the Mexican papers, and 2ndly. from the letters received by the departments at Washington from their correspondents at Vera Cruz, or in the squadron. Most of what we have copied from the New Orleans papers is divided from Mexican channels. It is suspicious, extravagant- in a word, not to be trusted. We attach little credit to the rumors about the loss of our gallant generals and of the great numbers of our troops. Accordingly to the Mexican version, a single bombshell, fired from the palace of Chapultepec, destroyed 300 Americans and General Worth- as if so much powder, so many men, and a distinguished general had been collected in one place. We cannot repress our fears that some valuable lives were lost from the 8th to the 16th, that day when our troops entered the capital; but we cannot believe that anything very serious has happened to Worth, or Smith, or Pillow; for the letters which have reached Washington directly know who are their authors. We know that they emanate from officers, whose character for truth, intelligence and caution, is thoroughly established. They say nothing about the wounds of Worth, or the deaths of the other generals. And yet is it to believed that, if they reposed any confidence in these reports, they would not have noticed them? On the contrary, they warn us against believing the fables of the Vera Cruz Iris, or the rumors afloat. One of the best-informed officers in Vera Cruz says, that “no credence whatever can be given to one in a hundred of these reports.” We think therefore, we are safe in advising our friends everywhere against indulging too much anxiety about their friends in the camp.

Vera Cruz, Sept. 19th

“On the 9th Lieut. Col. Hughes’ Maryland volunteers took possession of the National Bridge and its works, without the slightest difficulty or resistance from the enemy. His description of its advantageous position has determined us to make it a depot at once, and to throw in all the supplies we can, at such times as the trains at not otherwise employed. About halfway (at San Juan) we have established a resting place, which is held by Col. Collin’s battalion of 2nd Illinois volunteers.

“Brigadier Gen. Lane, with two regiments of Ohioans, arrived from the Brazos within the few last days. He seems much occupied in getting ready in march. He will take with him all the several detachments of recruits, and others that have arrived here lately.

“Maj. Lally, we learn unofficially, was to have left Jalapa on Saturday, the 18th September, to join the army. General Rea, it is reported by Mexicans, is on the road near Puebla with 3,000 troops, for the purpose of intercepting and cutting off trains and reinforcements destined for our army; and also of General Paredes being expected there with 6,000 more. There are no means of ascertaining the truth of the stories. There are thousands of tales circulating daily, without the slightest foundation. No credence whatever can be given to one in a hundred of these reports.

“The sickness in this city has, as far as regards yellow fever, entirely ceased. The cases amongst the troops are now mostly intermittent fever and scurvy.”

“Gen. Bravo has been killed, and Santa Anna retired, with the remaining part of his troops to Guadalupe, after suffering a heavy loss. Santa Anna was wounded in the arm. The news is up to and included the 14th of September at Mexico, and I am assured can be relied on.”

We are happy to learn that there are ample means in the treasury (thanks to the operation of the tariff of 1846) for the most vigorous prosecution of the war, including the organization, equipment, transportation, etc., of all the new troops required, until some time after the meeting of Congress.

Mexico would never have offered terms so preposterous, if she had not been encouraged by the "no territory party", by the Nueces party and Mexican party at home, by the party which has denounced this as aggressive, unholy and unjust on our part. Let us hope, however, that her recent treacherous and vindictive course will rouse and unite the nation in the prosecution of the war, and, it exacting from her, by military contributions, as far as practicable, its future expenses. Friday October 8, 1847  RE47v44n46p1c5  Letter from Gen. Taylor  words: 404

Sir: Your letter of the 17th last, requesting of me an exposition of my views on the question of national policy now at issue between the two political parties of the United States, has duly reached me.

I must take occasion to say that many of my letters, addressed to gentlemen in the United States in answer to similar inquiries, have already been made public, and I have greatly hoped that all persons interested had, by this time, obtained from them a sufficiently accurate knowledge of my views and desires in relation to this subject. As it happens, however, that such is not the case, I deem it proper, in reply to your letter, distinctly to repeat that I am not before the People of the United States as a candidate for the Presidency. It is my great desire to return at the close of this war to the discharge of those professional duties and to the enjoyment of those domestic pursuits from which I was called at its commencement, and for which my tastes and education best fit me.

I deem it but due to condor to state, at the same time, that if I were called to the Presidential Chair by the general voice of the people, without regard to the political differences, I should deem it to be my duty to accept the office. But while I freely avow my attachment to the administration policy of our early Presidents, I desire it to be understood that I cannot submit, even in thus accepting it, to the exaction of any other pledge as to the course I should pursue than that of discharging its function to the best of my ability, and strictly in accordance with the requirements of the constitution.

I have thus given you the circumstances under which only can I be induced to accept the high and responsible office of President of the United States. I need hardly add that I cannot in any case permit myself to be brought before people exclusively by any of the Political parties that now so unordinary divide our country, as their candidate for this office.

It affords me great pleasure, in conclusion, fully to concur with you in high and just estimate of the virtues, both of head and heart, of the distinguished citizens mentioned in your letter.

I am Sir, respectfully, your obedient servant

Z. Taylor

The Whig press are assailing the administration for sending Mr. Trist, or even any Minister along with General Scott, to offer terms to Mexico. With what face can they do so, when it is remembered that this policy was first suggested by Mr. Crittenden, a leading member of the Whig party? On the 12th of May 1846, Mr. Crittenden, while speaking on the war in the Senate, employed the following language.

"Great consequences might be involved in this war. We would therefore, make it as compendious as possible. He would, even if he had his way, send a Minister Plenipotentiary with our General, and between every blow hold out the offer of peace." [JKM]

The N.O. Courier, on the request of gentlemen of highest respectability, publishes a call for a public meeting on the 30th.
“To take into consideration the refusal of the enemy to treat of peace, and to assure our Government that the people of New Orleans are ready, as they always have been, to prosecute the war with their persons, and, if necessary, with their money. We are persuaded that a public meeting held for this purpose, and animated with the true American spirit, would have the happiest effects, showing that the Government, have the cordial support of the public in pursuing an honorable peace through a war vigorously conducted, and convincing the enemy that he labors under a mistake in supporting that party spirit has any power to divide the American people from their Government in a question of national rights and honor.”

The N.O. Picayune warmly endorses the propositions and pays a just tribute to the patriotism of New Orleans:

“This call will be gladly, cordially responded to by all classes of our citizens. Our country has embarked in a war with a foreign power, and there will be a union of hearts to facilitate the Government, by the advocacy of all wise and proper measures to prosecute it with the greatest energy. There is among our people but one mind, but one heart upon this subject. All are willing and even anxious to exert their influence, and aid by the use of their means, and risk their persons, if necessary, to aid in chasing the infuriated enemy with whom we are contending.” [JKM]

THE VICTORY- Salutes of 100 guns were fired yesterday (says the N.O. Courier of 27th Sept.) on the Plac d’Armes at noon and sunset in commemoration of the late victories achieved by the American troops, under General Scott, near the city of Mexico, and the subsequent capture of that capital.

It is worthy of notice, that the attack upon Chapultepec was made on the 8th September, the fete of Mexico’s patron saint- but he afforded them no very efficient assistance, as it was the most fatal to them that has yet been fought. [JKM]

Col. James Reily, who was the Texas Minister to the Government of the United States in 1842, publishes in the Houston Telegraph a letter, in which he controverts the position taken by ex-President Tyler, that he (Reily) withdrew the application for the annexation of Texas to the United States. He says he never had any instructions from the Government of Texas to withdraw the proposition for annexation, and assuredly would not have done so on his own responsibility. [JKM]

Tuesday October 12, 1847  RE47v44n47p1c6  Maj. Lally’s Command  words: 547

The following letter, (says the New Orleans Picayune,) from an intelligent and most reliable correspondent, with the accompanying list of killed, wounded and missing of Maj. Lally’s command, will be read with interest by all. It will be seen that the gallant party encountered constant danger, hardship and toil. But the unyielding and indomitable spirit of Americans bore down all opposition, and in the face of death itself they forced their way onward toward their destination.

Messrs. Editor- Accompanying I sent you a list of the killed, wounded and missing in the command which left Vera Cruz on the 7th., under command of Maj. Lally, on the 9th infantry. The train arrived without the loss of a wagon, on the 20th, but as you will see, from the accompanying list, we have had hard work. Since leaving the San Juan river, we have been attacked from behind every bush, and from every hill-side death has been sent among us. We have fought four hard battles meantime- at Pas del Ovijas, the 19th; the National Bridge, the 12th, from 1 till past 6; at Cerro Gordo; the 15th. at none of these places, nothing less than 1500 to 2500 men, according to their own accounts. Their loss has been very great. At Lasanimas the last dying attempt to seize us was made, but as before, without success. It was foolishly reported in Vera Cruz that our train was to take up a million in specie. The hopes of booty and promise of fifty dollars to each man in the event of success, from El Padre Jarauta, brought out “los guerrilleros” in vast numbers.

Everything remains quiet here- no alarms of any kind. I have never seen a more orderly Mexican city. The health of the command is improving fast. The wounded officers are doing very well, and will soon be able to be moved. Lieut. Winder, of the Voltiguets, serving in Forno’s battery, who was wounded at the National Bridge, was buried yesterday with the honors of war. He was shot on the bridge, almost at the first fire, an esopeta ball passing through his body, carrying away his left lung. He was a gallant and gentlemanly officer, whose loss will be severely felt. Lieut. George D. Twiggs, serving in the same battery, after the fall of Lieut. Winder, was shot dead on the hill, while engaged in charging the position of a piece of artillery. He was on his way to join Gen. Twiggs as aid-de-camp. A more high-souled or chivalric fellow never lived. Capt. Clarke, of the 12th, was also wounded while assisting to

The following letter from Major Lally was addressed to Colonel Wilson at Vera Cruz, and by him forwarded to Adjutant General R. Jones at Washington.

Headquarters, Jalapa, Aug. 26, 1847

To Gov. Wilson, Vera Cruz:

My command reached this place on the morning of the 20th. We have fought our way triumphantly every-inch of the route, but have had severe contests-nay, battles- with the guerillas: on the 10th at Paso Ovejas, (as before reported) on the 12th August at the National Bridge; on the 15th of August at Cerro Gordo; and on the 19th at Las Animas, only a mile and a half from the city. Not a wagon has fallen into the hands of the enemy. We have been opposed by at least 1,200 to 1,500 guerillas on these occasions- perhaps at the last, for they were badly whipped at Cerro Gordo, where their loss was so large that they could not reorganize. Father Jarauta, commanded them. Our loss is great. During the entire march- 7 officers wounded, 12 of rank and file killed; 5 mortally wounded, 66 wounded. Of this number, 4 killed and 4 wounded were at places elsewhere than the four actions named above. I regret to say that at the National Bridge Mr. George D. Twiggs (expecting a commission and to be a D.C. to Gen. T.) was killed while gallantly serving in my staff; Capt. J.H. Calwell, of voltigeurs, and Capt. A.C. Cummings, 11th infantry, were wounded on the 10th, ( as before reported) but are doing well now. At National Bridge, Lieut. James A. Winder, of voltigeurs, and Lieut. George A. Adams, of marine corps, were dangerously wounded; also, on the same day, Capt. W. J. Clark 12th infantry, in the thigh; 2nd Lieut. Charles M. Crearor, 12th Infantry, not severely in the leg. At Las Animas, on the 19th, Major F.T. Lally, 9th infantry, commanding officer, was wounded in the neck, not severely but has for a few days rested. Besides our wounded; as we shall be compelled to remain here many days to recruit. I cannot much praise the gallantry of the officers- the men, raw and uninstructed, have gradually acquired confidence.

Dr. Cooper and 12 dragoons reached us. I cannot too earnestly recommend that you assume the authority to order the re-occupation of this city. Even if General Scott was not before the city of Mexico, and beyond the teach of reinforcements, you perceive that trains are constantly endangered by guerillas, and I am satisfied that this city has been their headquarters, and that their chief supplies have been forwarded from here. Their spirits have been raised by absence of the troops. I am certain that General Scott, on the spot, would order its reoccupation. Colonel Wynkoop concurs in the important. [JKM]

Tuesday October 12, 1847  RE47v44n47p2c1  Later from Mexico  words: 759

The steamship Alabama, Capt. Windle, arrived here at an early hour this morning, from Vera Cruz and Tampico, having left the former place on the 26th, and the latter on the 30th.

By his arrival we receive the first number of "The Genius of Liberty," a new paper published in Vera Cruz, by Messrs. Mathewson and Quinn, from which we gather the following information.

There had been no communication between Vera Cruz and the City of Mexico since the news brought by the Mary Kingsland, already laid before our readers. The capture of the Capital, and the flight of the government to Guadalupe, are, however, placed beyond a doubt by letters received at Vera Cruz via Orizaba and Tampico.

The following circular to commandant generals of departments, dated at Guadalupe, September 14th, which we copy from the Genius of Liberty, describes the attack of the American forces on the defenses of Chapultepec, and the subsequent entry into the city. Chapultepec was carried at the point of the bayonet, at daybreak of the 13th, after a desperate resistance of six hours. The fortification situated between the centry boxes of Belen and St. Thomas, St. Como and the citadel, was next attacked by our forces. The resistance of the Mexicans at this place was truly desperate, and the heroism displayed by them worthy of the best days of the Republic. Santa Anna led his troops in person. After nine hours hard fighting, according to the Mexican circular now before us, Gen. Scott retired, drawing off his forces. The Mexicans, it appears, after repulsing the forces under Gen. Scott, dreading a MOST EXCELLENT SIR:- After the important and great events that have yesterday taken place there remains no other alternative to the Government of the Union than that of its abandoning the Capital in order that other means be adopted and pursued for the harassing of the enemy. Accordingly, His Excellency of the integral Republic orders me to inform you in order that through you, the honorable Congress of the State over which you preside, may know it that his Excellency is firmly resolved to prosecute military operations against the invader. And that whatever be the consequences resulting from the war, yet his Excellency is determined to wage it in every possibly manner, and by every attainable means. A heroic resistance was made in the Capital for the space of six days, but at length the enemy established himself in places and positions, from which his missiles and projectiles could reach the peaceful thousands of the city, then the Supreme Government seeing the state of affairs to be such as warranted their departure, changed their abode; and very soon I will have the pleasure of announcing to you Excellency the site upon which it will fix, which, at present, is impossible for me to do, as it accompanies the army, and, as yet, is not agreed upon the residence of the Supreme Power of the Nation. But as soon as the latter is known, I will give your Excellency as detailed account of everything that has occurred; bit now I shall confine myself to the single following statement:

The American army charged yesterday and daylight; with all its force, upon Chapultapec, which, after a spirited defense of six hours, yielded at last to the attacks of the enemy, who immediately marched to take possession of a fortification situated between the sentry box of Belen and St. Thomas, St. Como and the Citadel. The first advance was checked by the troops his excellency, the President, led up, disputing the ground inch by inch, till finally the invader was routed from the Citadel, after nine hours hard fighting. The Capital being in this situation, his Excellency was anxious to avoid a bombardment, and to spare the tumult and confusion attendant upon an assault, which would have given room for a thousand calamities, and a repetition of those acts in which the foe has manifested so instinctive a spirit of extermination.

His Excellency, the President of the Republic, hopes that your Excellency will endeavor to preserve and reanimate the public spirit, in order that the war may be carried on with the vigor and energy which the national honor and rights of the Republic so imperiously demand recognized by Santa Anna, the President of Mexico, by solemn treaty and by the order of his generals—such was received by us, and our jurisdiction extended by special acts to the Rio Grande—and such was acknowledged by European powers? Whatever opinion Mr. Benton or any other individuals may have entertained, it cannot be denied that the United States have in the most solemn form recognized Texas to the Rio Grande, and that to surrender it now, would be a violation of national honor and that sacred rights of each member of our blessed Confederacy. We ask attention to the following condensed summary in the Union of “facts from the records,” which cannot be answered.

“It has been often shown by extracts from the letters and speeches of Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, John Quincy Adams, and Henry Clay, that they repeatedly declared the Rio Grande to be the true boundary of Texas, and our title up to that river to be as clear as to New Orleans itself. Mr. Clay not only affirmed this in 1820, but reaffirmed it in his letter of April, 1844. We say further, in the controversy between Mr. Adams and Don Onis in 1818, the former insisted that Texas to the Rio Grande was our as part of Louisiana—it was so delivered

To show the extraordinary course of the Whig at the present time, in vindicating the Mexican title to the Nueces, we would refresh the memory of that paper, by referring to scenes a few months ago in our State Legislature. On the 12th February, 1847, when the war resolutions were under discussion in the House of Delegates, Mr. Chastain Cocke, the Whig delegate from Powhatan, move the following amendment:

“Resolved, That this General Assembly, persuaded that the honor and interest of this country will be best promoted by withdrawing the armies of the United States to the Eastern side of the Nueces, and defending the territory to which we are justly entitled, does hereby advise such position to be taken.” [JKM]

We republish all the news we find in the New Orleans Delta and Picayune from the Mexican capital. Its most important feature is the confirmation on the intelligence that Gen. Scott was in quiet possession of the city. While indicating a heavy loss of brave officers and men, its silence as to the deaths or severe wounds of Generals Worth, Smith, and Pillow, goes to disprove the painful rumors we have had. It is also calculated to remove anxiety for the army, as everything looked quiet at the last accounts. The avowed intentions of the Mexican government will be read with interest, though they do not throw much light upon the future.

Maj. Lally, it will be seen, is snugly ensconced in Jalapa. We observe from the Union, that, as early as August 12th, the War Department anticipated the views of Maj. Lally in regard to the reoccupancy of Jalapa, and on the day instructions were dispatched by the Adjutant General of Col. Wilson, at Vera Cruz, to organize

[Illegible]

The instructions also suggested the holding of the National Bridge and Cerro Gordo, so as to open the communication from the end of the line. As has been already stated, a letter has been received from Lieut. Col. Hughes, stating that he has occupied the National Bridge. Col. Wilson reports that a sufficient force left Vera Cruz, September 6, to take possession of San Juan and the National Bridge, and that other force would soon follow to open the remainder of the line to Jalapa. The taking and holding these points are the first steps necessary to keep open the communication with our army in Mexico. [JKM]

Tuesday October 12, 1847   RE47v44n47p4c2   Description of Chapultepec   words: 359

Chapultepec having been captured by the Americans, after the most desperate resistance ever made by the Mexican army, the following account of the place cannot fail to prove interesting:

Chapultepec is the Aztec for “Grasshopper’s Hill.” It is a porphyritic rock, rising near the former margin of the lake that surrounded the city of Mexico, and is one of the places designated by the Aztecs where they carried on their emigration from the north, in search of a final resting place. Their oracles had foretold that such resting place would be denoted by their seeing an eagle devouring a serpent on a rock, and at Chapultepec this prediction was verified. From it they beheld the eagle on one of the rocks in the lake, devouring a serpent. The event was at once symbolized in their records, and subsequently represented on the flag and coin of the nation. The hill is surrounded by a belt of noble cypress, from having been planted before or during the reign of that Prince, measures fifty-one feet in circumference.

Chapultepec was the favorite country residence of Montezuma and his courtiers. It contains remains of garden groves, tanks and grottoes, which bear evidence of its past magnificence. Here Montezuma retired from the heat and dust of the city, to enjoy all the luxuries that wealth and power could procure, or art devise. It was selected by the Spanish Viceroy as the most beautiful place in the valley of Mexico for a royal residence, and the modern palace (lately a military school) was built by the Viceroy Galvez.

From this place one has a charming view of the whole valley, the capital, the lakes and the volcanic mountains which rise in the distance like a great wall surrounding the enchanting picture. In Anglo Saxon hands this valley may be made as impregnable as Gibraltar.

Bombs and cannon planted on the hill of Chapultepec command the city, the principle roads and aqueduct. Hence the attack and capture of that point by General Scott, before making any demonstration upon the city. Once on the hill, the taking of the city could be effected without serious loss of life. Tuesday October 12, 1847  RE47v44n47p4c2  Lieut. Adde  words: 267

We felt the greatest reluctance (says the N.O. Times) in giving credence to the reports unfavorable to the character of this young officer, wherein it was stated that he had behaved in a cowardly manner, in an affair which took place, about the end of last month, between a party of Mexican lancers and a detachment of 20 men of the 3rd, and 12 men of the 1st Dragoons, under his command. We have now the satisfaction of contradicting, under the authority of Capt. Duperu, Lieut. Adde’s immediate commanding officer, the whole story. Lieut. Adde, in the conflict in question, behaved with the utmost intrepidity.

We can state, with much pleasure, that we have seen a letter from Captain Duperu, in which the gentleman says the Lieutenant Adde had been attacked 8 miles from camp, by a body of 160 lancers, when he retreated with the twenty men of his own company, of the 3rd Dragoons, to a post near a cornfield, where he valiantly fought the Mexicans, and succeeded in putting them to flight. Lieutenant Graham, who commanded the 12 men of the first Dragoons, stood his ground, and, after the encounter, denounced Adde to Gen. Scott as a coward. Lieut. Hamilton, however, bearer of dispatches, who the command was escorting, and who was severely wounded in the fray, bore testimony to Adde’s courage and conduct and that he had covered himself with glory. Lieutenant Graham has offered an apology, and the whole seems to have been a misunderstanding on his part, as he mistook a judicious retreat to a good position, as a shameful flight. [JKM]

Friday October 15, 1847  RE47v44n48p2c3  Further Mexican News  words: 1050

We yesterday (says the N.O. Picayune) found an opportunity to look through a file of Mexican papers from the 5th to the 10th of September, both inclusive. We find very little of interest in them to extract, but can gather from them a very clear idea of the spirit of hostility with which the people are animated towards us. A very determined effort is made to excite prejudice against us for the execution of the Irish deserters. We find this execution made the object of an entire supplementary number of the Diario del Gobierno of the 10th. It is in the form of an address to the Mexican people, without any signature, but evidently partaking in some measure of an official character. We give a translation of the whole document, though we have not a doubt that the circumstances of the execution are grossly exaggerated. It gives us the exact number hung and otherwise punished:

"Mexicans! Among the European volunteers whom the American army has hired to kill us, there are many unfortunate men who are convinced of the injustice of this war, who profess the same Roman Catholic religion which we profess, which prevails in Europe from the want of employment and failure of crops, having consented to enlist. Some of these men, abjuring their errors and following the noble impulses of their hearts, have passed over to our army to defend our just cause. From these, his Excellency, the President, formed the Foreign Legion, known under the name of the Company of St. Patrick. At La Augostura and at Churubusco, they bore themselves with the highest intrepidity, and after the enemy had gained possession of his last point, which was only after its defenders had exhausted their last cartridges, they were made prisoners.

"The Generals of the American army, who cannot count upon their soldiers in a war so iniquitous, save through the influence of acts of ferocity, were determined to shoot these Irishmen. Scarcely was this known in this city, before every breast was filled with horror and indignation. His Excellency, the Minister of Relations, in a touching letter to the English Consul, the estimable lady of her Britannic Majesty’s Minister, various private individuals, both Mexicans and foreigners, we ourselves, and even the ladies of families residing in Tacubaya, interceded for these brave men; and we expected that if they could not be pardoned, they would, at least, be spared capital punishment.

"It would have been deemed base and repugnant to the laws of civilization, as practiced in modern wars, to offer the bloody spectacle of the execution of these men; and yet it could have been palliated to a certain extent by the part which these men took in the defense of Churubusco; but they had no share whatever in the slaughter which was made the day before yesterday upon the heights of Kings Mill. Well, then, will you believe it, my countrymen? This day, in cold blood, these Caribs, from an impulse of superstition, and after the manner of savages, and as practiced in the days of Homer, have hung up these men as a holocaust- they have themselves said it- to the manes of the General or Generals who there fell! And in what manner did they hang them? Noosing them by the neck as they stood upon the ground, and so suspending them, that they died "by inches” strangled by their own weight; the mode adopted being such, that their horrible agony lasted more than one hour. A spectacle worthy of such men, or

But if we are thus relieved from all apprehension in regard to General Scott’s army from this source - and we have not thought the alarm felt from him in some quarters well founded - we have to deplore the calamities which have overtaken the city of Mexico from another source, and which are much more formidable than could have resulted from our occupation; nor do they fail to excite alarm lest our army has suffered from the same cause.

According to the Arco Iris of Vera Cruz of the 26th, received here by La Patria, letters from Jalapa and Orizaba announce that immediately after Santa Anna abandoned the capital and as soon as the populace felt themselves relieved from the restraint of his bayonets, the leperos commences the work of sacking the city, plundering the houses of citizens as well as foreigners, and committing all species of excesses. During this pillaging, the accounts say that a division of the American Army entered the city to restore order; verbal accounts say that their aid had been solicited by the magistrates. A conflict ensued between these troops and the rabble, in which some accounts say that the whole division was cut off, while others say that one portion was driven back to the gates of the citadel, and yet another took refuge in the convent of San Francisco, abandoning two pieces of artillery.

A conflict ensued between these troops and the rabble, in which some accounts say that the whole division was cut off, while others say that one portion was driven back to the gates of the citadel, and yet another took refuge in the convent of San Francisco, abandoning two pieces of artillery to the leperos. Scott was then compelled to bombard the city from the citadel gates of the citadel, and yet another took refuge in the convent of San Francisco, abandoning two pieces of artillery to the leperos.

The accounts go on to say, that Gen. Scott was then compelled to bombard the city from the citadel gates of the citadel, and yet another took refuge in the convent of San Francisco, abandoning two pieces of artillery to the leperos. They numbered in all ninety-two men, and Uncle Sam gave the "boys" nearly $17,000 for their services. Too much praise cannot be given to Col. Larned and his clerks, for their zeal that they manifested in the performance of their duties on the above occasion. [JKM]

The same paper pays the following just compliment to the American character:

"The very fact that the mob began the sack of the city, after it was abandoned by the Mexican army, has given another occasion for a new display of the noble and generous character of our army. The civil authorities of the city begged the intercession of our troops to protect them from the outrages of their countrymen, and their prayer was granted. What a contrast is here presented, to the conduct of the other armies of the world! The history of the same century will record the taking of Saragussa, Badajos, and Mexico, and will furnish to future times the means of comparing French, English and American armies in the hour of victory." [JKM]
Tuesday October 19, 1847  RE47v44n49p1c4  The Origin of the War  words: 945

We believe that it is now generally admitted that the war in which we are engaged with Mexico grew out of the annexation of Texas to the United States. We have contended from the beginning that if Texas was in fact a sovereign and independent nation, Mexico had no right to object to its annexation to our confederacy: and when she took such a course she became responsible for the consequences which might result there from. The whole history of the subject shows conclusively that she bases the justness of her cause entirely on the claim to Texas, and the wrong done her by the United States, in despoiling her on a portion of her territory. The limits of that territory she has, never, until the recent negotiations, condescended to mention, that we know of. The country between the Nueces and the Rio Grande was not distinguished from the rest of Texas. For Mexico claimed, and still does claim, the whole of what is now a State of the Union. In the negotiations with Mr. Trist, the Mexican commissioners, in fact, were willing to sell Texas to the United States, on the payment of an adequate price. The very first article of the instructions under which they acted mean nothing but that; for it expressly says that the independence of Texas will be acknowledged on the payment of a suitable indemnity; and it is no forced interpretation to that article to say, that the Mexican Government still prefers to claim to all the country beyond the Sabine as well as that beyond the Nueces- a claim which it is not willing to relinquish without a price. If this be so, it seems a useless task for the Whigs to go in search of motives for the war. The origin of the war stands out plain and distinct. Mexico claims a state of this Union as he own property. That State, when it was admitted into the Union, was at war with Mexico. On the validity of that claim Mexico justifies her course, and that war she has always contended was transferred to the United States by the mere act of annexation. She has been entirely consistent in this. We do no know that she has ever complained of the march of Gen. Taylor from Corpus Christi to Fort Brown. She has disregarded that matter entirely, and based her action on the question of annexation.

Although Mexico has, by plain implication, admitted that the cause of the United States is right and just, if the measure of annexation was right and just, her allies in the United States have gone farther. They do not dare to take the ground which Mexico takes; they do not dare to come forward and say that Texas should be surrendered to the enemy, or that we are to pay a price for a sovereign state of the confederacy. They must take other grounds, and endeavor to assign false motives for hostilities. They have commenced, as if that was a matter in which Mexico had any concern; and have gone so far as to justify that cause of the public enemy, upon the frivolous pretext, that the President, and not Congress, had commenced hostilities. Admit, for a sake of argument, that the fact is so, and we ask in all sincerity, how does that affect the justice of the injustice of the war? Has Mexico anything to do with the distribution of powers in the United States? Has Mexico any concern in the provisions of our Constitution? And does that depend upon anything but the cause of the war? Awe think the answer to these questions is, to use an elegant expression of Mr. Webster’s, as plain as a turnpike: and , being thus plain, it really appears to us, that they who base their hostility to the war, on the manner in which it was declared, and allow themselves to denounce the war as unjust for that reason, are not actuated by the proper feelings. We are confirmed in this belief when we see who they are that oppose the war. Nearly all, if not all of them, are those who oppose the annexation of Texas- those who contended that we had no right to annex Texas, and those who oppose the further spread of slavery. There are they who oppose the war; and we believe that they oppose it because of their hostility to the “Texas bomb”. That, we believe, is the true reason that we see so many who side with the enemy. They bring forward other matters in justification of their conduct- but we cannot help believing that they are mere pretexts; for, almost with one voice, they said in 1844 that the annexation of Texas would be the annexation of the war in which Texas was then engaged; and now they say that the President, and not annexation, made the war. This strikes us as being pre-emminently absurd- and we are pained to see the many side with public enemy, and have no better justification for their conduct. The Whigs of the North come out plainly in the matter. They say that their opposition to slavery is at the bottom of their opposition to the war. The Northern Whigs rule the Whig camp, for they have the strength to rule it. The Southern Whigs have to follow them, making such excuses for their conduct as they can. Those excuses have in times past been singular enough. When the annexation and Tariff questions were before the people, they were eminently so; but now they are more so, and no courteous term can convey our idea to them.  [JKM]

Every eye was fixed on the hill with exception of an approaching column, which should drive us back into a Mexican prison, which we stepped off with the speed and

We left Puebla on the morning of the 7th, and entered upon a beautiful rolling country of great fertility, supplying with its gardens the inhabitants of Puebla with food, and surrounded by lofty mountains, some of which were covered with snow. Our road was gradually ascending and so good that on looking back from the head of the columns, our train could be seen for miles in rear, dotting with its snow-white tops the maguey-covered plain. On our left were Popcatapetl and Iscatatel, the snow on their not distant tops rendering the air quite chilly. General Scott did not leave with us, but came on the next day with Capt. Kearney's dragoons.

The second day's march was like the first, gradually ascending, passing through defiles, narrow passes, and over deep chasms, where a more determined enemy might have seriously annoyed us by merely making use of the obstacles nature everywhere presented. Thick woods of the finest forest trees were abundant, and the rugged nature of the country would readily carry one back to the Northern parts of New England, or the passes of the "Notch". Here and there beautiful little lakes were interspersed in the deep valleys, and the clearness and coldness of their waters were almost incredible.

The third day we were to encounter the much vaunted pass of "Rio Frio," and along the passage of the mountain which was to lead us to the El Dorado of our hopes, the great plain of Mexico. Our march was to be long and difficult, and 3 o'clock saw us under way with heart and hopes full of the prospect before us. The much dreaded pass is reached and passed. The mountains which skirt the road on the left, here close upon it for about a mile, overhanging and enfilading it completely, and affording with their crests most excellent coverings for the enemy's marksmen. The newly cut trees and long range of breast works thrown up on the crest, showed preparation was made, while numerous parapets, with embrasures in the logs, taught us what might have been done. But no men were there, the muskets and cannon were gone. Valencia, with 6,000 Mexicans were full a day's march ahead, making for Mexico, with a speed which, betrayed homesickness. Rio Frio was found to be a little stream pouring down from the Snow Mountain, of icy coldness and crystal purity. After a slight pause for refreshments, we commenced our ascent of the ridge, which separates the plains of Puebla and Mexico, the former of which it had hitherto skirted. For several long miles we toiled up the hill, only recompensed for our labor by what we hoped to attain at last. When all were pretty nearly work on, a sudden turn in the road brought the top of the ridge. The whole vast plain of Mexico was before us. The coldness of the air, which was most sensibly felt at this great height, our fatigue and danger were forgotten, and our eyes were the only sense that thought of enjoyment. Mexico, with its lofty steeples and its checkered domes, its bright reality, and its former fame, its modern slender, and its ancient magnificence, was before us, while around, on every side, its thousand lakes seemed like silver stars on a velvet mantle.

We encamped that night at the base of the mountain, with the enemy's scouts on every side of us. The next day we reached Ayolta, only fifteen miles from Mexico by the National Road, which we had hitherto been following. Here we halted until Generals Quitman, Pillow and Worth, with their divisions, should come up. We were separated from the city by the marshes which surround Lake Tezcuco, and by the Lake itself. The road is a causeway running through the marsh and is commanded by a steep and lofty hill called El Pinnol. This hill completely enfilades and commands the National Road, and had been fortified and repaired with the greatest care by Santa Anna. One side was inaccessible by nature; the best had been made so by art. Batteries, in all mounting 50 guns of different caliber, had been placed on its side, and a deep ditch, 24 feet wide and 10 feet deep, filled with water, had been cut connecting the parts already surrounded by marshes. On this side Santa Anna had 25,000 men, against a force of a little over 9,000 all told.

On the 22nd, we made a reconnaissance of the work, which was pronounced impractical, as the lives of 5,000 men would be lost before the ditch could be crossed. We continued our search and found another road which went round on the left but when within five miles of the city, were halted by coming suddenly upon five strong batteries on the hill which commanded this road at a place called Mexicalcingo. "Capt. J.S. Sutton is also authorized to raise a company, to be stationed between the Nueces and Rio Grande, to supply the place of that recently commanded by Capt. Gray. Capt. Sutton was in Corpus Christi a few days ago recruiting. [JKM]
By means of his scouts, Gen. Worth had found a path round the left of Lake Chalco, which led us to the Western gate of the city, and which, up to that time, had not been fortified. On the 14th, the other divisions commenced their march, while we brought up the train in the rear. In the morning, the train was sent in advance, while Smith’s brigade acted as rearguard. It was composed of the Rifles, 1rst Artillery, and the 3rd Infantry, with Taylor’s battery. As the rear guard, marching slowly along, came up with the train, word came to Gen. Twiggs that a force of about, five thousand men were trying to cross the road between them and the train in order to cut it off. We were then passing through a small village which by a curious confidence was called Buena Vista. On our left were large fields of half grown barely, through which was seen advancing in splendid order, the enemy’s column. It was the most splendid sight I had even seen. The yellow cloaks, red caps, and jackets of the lancers, and the bright blue and white uniforms of the infantry, were almost beautifully contrasted with the green on the barely field. One line of battle was soon formed, and we deployed through the grain to turn their left and cut them off from the mountains. A few shots, however, from the battery, soon showed them that they were observed, and countermarching in haste, they left their dead on the field, Thus ended our fight of Buena Vista. The night we stayed at Chalco.

The next day we made a long and toilsome march over a horrible road, through which with the utmost difficulty, we dragged our wagons by the assistance of both men and mules. The next was nearly the same, except that the road was, if possible, worse than before, as the Mexicans had blocked it up with large stones, rolled down the neighboring hills. This night we encamped at a most beautiful olive grove, of immense size and accompanying at once both divisions. In the town, as well as in Chalco, there are still standing the churches of Indians where the fire worshippers assembled before Cortez had introduced a new religion. They are large and somber edifices, differing but little from the churches of this country, and being near the city, are said to have been formerly resorted to by the ancient kings.

The next day we arrived in sight of the rest of the army, and heard the guns with which Worth was bleeding the walls of San Antonio. That night the news of the death of Capt. Thornon, of the second dragoons, reached us. He was a brave officer, and a thorough gentleman, but was always unfortunate in his military career.

On the morning of the 19th, we left the little village where we had heard this sad news, and took the road to San Juan, about seven miles to the west and only about ten miles from the city. When we arrived here, we heard the sound of Gen. Worth’s guns, who was said to have attacked San Augustine, a village three miles nearer the Capital, where Santa Anna was said to be 20,000 men. When we arrived at San Juan, the men were told to sling their blankets across their shoulders, put their knapsacks into their wagons, and to put two days bread and beef in their haversacks. When this order came, all knew that the time had come. The officers arranged their effects, put on their old coats, and filled their haversacks and flasks. Soon we were all ready for anything but a thrashing. We here heard the position of the enemy, which was nearly as follows: Santa Anna with 20,000 men was at San Augustine; Valencia with 10,000 men was at a hill called Contreras, which commanded another road parallel with San Augustine road, but which led into it between the city and Santa Anna. Now, but cutting a road across, if we could whip Valencia, we could then follow the road up and this get it between Santa Anna and Mexico and whip him too. General Worth supported by General Quitman was to keep Santa Anna in check, while Twiggs, backed by Pillow, was to try to astonish Valencia, which, you will see, he did very effectually. Pillow with some of the ten regiments was to cut the road. We left San Juan about 1 o’clock, not particularly desiring a flight so late in the day, but still not shunning it in case we could have a respectable chance.

About 2 P.M., as we had crawled to the top of a hill, whether we had been ourselves pulling Magruder’s battery and a Mountain howitzers, we suddenly espied Valencia fortified on a hill about 200 yards off, and strongly reinforced by a column which had just come out of the city. We lay down close, to avoid drawing their fire while the battery moved past at a full gallop. Just then General Smith’s manly voice rung out, “Forward the Rifles, to support the battery!” On they went, till they got about 800 yards from the work, when the enemy opened upon them with his long guns, which were afterward found to be sixteen to eight inch howitzers. The ground was the worst possible for artillery, covered with rocks large and small, and prickly pear and cactus, intersected by ditches filled with water and lined with maguey plant, itself imperviable to cavalry, and with patches of corn with concealed the enemy’s skirmishers thrown forward to lose their relative position, as well as the column. About four the battery got in position under a most murderous fire of grape canister and round shot. Here the superiority of the enemy’s pieces rendered our fire nugatory.

We could get but three pieces in battery, while they twenty-seven, all of them three times the caliber of ours. For two hours our troops stood the storm of iron and lead they hailed upon them, unmoved. At every discharge they lay flat down to avoid the storm and then sprang up to serve the guns. At the end of that time, tow of the guns were dismounted and we badly hurt; thirteen of the horses were killed and disabled; and fifteen of the cannoneers killed and wounded. The regiment was then recalled. The lancers had been repelled in three successive charges. The 3rd Infantry and 1rst Infantry had also engaged and successfully repelled the enemy’s skirmishers without loss of either officer or men. The greatest loss had been at the batteries. Officers looked gloomy for the first days fight, but the brigade was formed and Gen. Smith in person took command. All felt revived and followed him with a yell as, creeping low to avoid the grape, which was coming very fast, we made a circuit in rear of the batteries and passing off to the right we came soon lost to view in the chaparral and cactus.
Passing over the path that we scrambled through behold us at almost 6 o'clock in the evening tired, hungry and sorrowful, emerging from the chaparral and crossing the road between it and Valencia. Here we found Cadwallader and his brigade already formed, and discovered Riley's brigade skirmishing in rear of the enemy's works. Valencia was ignorant of our approach, and we were as yet safe. In front of us was Valencia strongly entrenched on a hillside and surrounded by a regular field work concealed from us by an orchard in our rear. Mendoza with a column of 6000 was in the road, but thinking us to be friends. On our right was a large range of hills whose continued crest was parallel to the road, and in which we formed in line of battle 5000 of the best Mexican cavalry. On our left we were separated from our own forces by an almost impassable wilderness and it was now almost twilight. Even Smith looked round for help.

Suddenly a thousand vivas came across the hillside like the yells of prairie wolves in the dead of night, and the squadrons on our right formed the rear! “Wait till you see the red caps and give it to them!” Fearfully they came on a few yards, then changed their minds, and, disgusted at our cool reception, retired to their couches. On the edge of the road between us and Valencia, a Mexican hamlet spread out with its mud huts, large orchards, deep cut roads, and a strong church, and through the center of this hamlet ran a path parallel to the main road, but concealed from it: it is nearly a mile long. In this road Smith's and Riley's brigade spent the night. Shields who came up in the night, lay in the orchard, while Cadwallader was nearest the enemy's works. As we were within range of their batteries, which could enfilade the road in which we lay, we built a stone breastwork at either end to conceal ourselves from their view and grape. There we were completely surrounded by the enemy and cut off from our communications, ignorant of the ground, without artillery, weary, dispirited and dejected we were a disheartened set.

With Santa Anna and Salas' promise of "no quarter," a force of four to one against us, and one half defeated already, no succor from Puebla, and no news from General Scott, all seemed dark. Suddenly the words came whispering along, "we storm at midnight." Now we are ourselves again. But what a horrible night. There we lay—too tired to eat, too wet to sleep, men side by side, with a heavy rain pouring down upon us, the officers without blankets or overcoats, (they had lost them in coming across,) and the rain was so heavy that the streams in the road flooded us, and there we stood crowded together, drenched and benumbed, waiting till daylight. At half-past three the welcome word "fall in" was passed down, and we commenced our march. The enemy's works were on a hillside, behind which rose other and slightly higher hills separated by deep ravines and gullies, and intersected by streams. The while face of the country was a stiff clay, which rendered it almost impossible to advance. We formed our line about a quarter of a mile from the enemy's works, Riley's brigade on our right.

At about four we started winding through a thick orchard, which effectually concealed us, even had it not been dark, debouching it to a deep ravine, which ran within about 500 yards of the work, and, which carried us directly in rear and out of sight of their batteries. At dawn of day we reached our place after incredible exertions, and got ready for our charge. The men threw off their wet blankets and looked to their pieces, while the officers got ready for a rush, and the first smile that lit upon our faces for twelve hours boded but little good for the Mexicans. On the right, and opposite the right of their work, was Riley's brigade of the 2nd and 1rst Infantry and 4th artillery, next the rifles, then the 1rst Artillery and 3rd Infantry. In rear of our left was Cadwallader's brigade, as a reserve, the whole division under command of General Smith in the absence of General Twiggs. They had a smooth place to rush down on the enemy work, with the brow of the hill to keep under until the word was given.

At last just at daylight, General Smith slowly walking up asked it all was ready. A look answered him. "Men forward!" And we did "forward". Springing up at once, Riley's brigade opened, when the crack of a hundred rifles started the Mexicans from their astonishment, and they opened their fire. Useless fire, for we were so close that they overshot us, and before they could turn their pieces on us, we were on them. Then such cheers arose as you never heard. The men rushed forward like demons, yelling and firing the while. The carnage was frightful, and through they fired sharply, it was on no use. The earthen parapet was cleared in an instant, and the blows of the stocks could be plainly heard, mingled with the yells and groans around. Just before the charge was made, a large body of lancers came winding up the road looking most splendidly in their brilliant uniforms. They never got to the work, but turned and fled. In an instant all was one mass of confusion, each trying to be foremost in the flight. The road was literally blocked up; and while many perished by their own guns, it was almost impossible to fire on the mass, from the danger of killing our own men. Some fled up the ravine on the left or on the right, and many of these were slain by turning their own guns on them. Toward the city the Rifles and 2nd Infantry led off the pursuit. Seeing that a large crowd of the fugitives were jammed up in a pass in the road, some of our men ran through the cornfield, and by thus heading them off and firing down upon them, about 30 men took over 500 prisoners, nearly a hundred of them officers.

After disarming the prisoners, as the pursuit had ceased, we went back to the fort, where we found our troops in full possession, and the rout complete.

We found that the enemy's position was much stronger than we had supposed, and their artillery much larger and more abundant. Our own loss was small, which may be accounted for by their perfect surprise at our charge, as to them we appeared as if rising out of the earth, so unperceived was our approach. Our loss was one officer killed, Capt. Hanson of the 7th Infantry, and Lieut. Van Buren of the Rifles, shot through the leg; and about 50 men killed and wounded. Their force consisted of 8,000 men under Valencia, while a reserve, which had not yet arrived under Santa Anna. Their loss, as since, ascertained, was as follows: Killed and buried since the fight, 750-wounded 1,000, and 1,500 prisoners, exclusive of officers, including four Generals, Salas, Mendoza, Garcia and Guadalupe, in addition to dozens of Colonels, Majors, Captains. We captured in all on the hill 23 pieces of cannon, including five 8 inch howitzers, two long 18, three long 16 and several 12 and 8 inches, and also the two identical 6 pounders captured by the Mexican at Buena Vista, taken from Capt. Washington's battery of the 4th artillery.
The first officer who saw them happened to be the officer of the 4th selected by Gen. Scott to command the new battery of the regiment. Capt. Drum. In addition were taken immense quantities of ammunition and muskets, in fact the way was screwed with muskets, escopets, lances and flags for miles. Large quantities of horses and mules were also captured, though large numbers were killed.

Thus ended the glorious battle of Contreras; in which 2000 men, under Gen. P.F. Smith, completely routed and destroyed an army of 8000 men under Gen. Valencia, with Santa Anna and a force of 20,000 men within five miles. Their army was so completely routed that not 1500 men rejoined Santa Anna and participated in the second battle. Most people would have thought that a pretty day's work. Not so. We had only saved ourselves, not conquered Mexico, and men's work was before us yet.

At 8 a.m. we formed again, and Gen. Twiggs, having taken command, we started on the road to Mexico. We had already marched a mile before we were sharply fired upon from both sides of the road, and our right was deployed to drive the enemy in.

We soon found out that we had caught up with the retreating party, from the very brisk firing in front, and we drove them through the little town of San Angelo, where they had been halting in force. About half a mile from this town we entered the suburbs of another called San Katherina, when a large party in the churchyard fired on the head of the column, and the balls came right among us. Our men kept rushing on their rear and cutting them down, until a discharge of grape shot from a large piece in front drove them back to the column. In this short space of time, five men were killed, ten taken prisoners, and a small color captured, which was carried the rest of the day.

Meanwhile, General Worth had made a demonstration on San Antonio, where the enemy was fortified in a strong hacienda; but they retired on his approach to Churubusco, where the works were deemed impregnable. They consisted of a fortified hacienda which was surrounded by a high wall on all sides. Inside the wall was a stone building, the roof of which was flat and higher than the walls; above all this was a stone church, still higher than the rest, and having a large steeple. The was pierced with loop holes, and so arranged that there were two tiers of men firing at the same time. They thus had four different ranges of men firing at once, and four ranks were formed on each range, and placed at such a height, that they could not only overlook all the surrounding country, but at the same time they had a plunging fire upon us. Outside the hacienda, and completely commanding the avenues of approach was a field work extending around two sides of the work, and protected by a deep, wet ditch, and armed with seven large pieces. This hacienda is at the commencement of the causeway leading to the Western gate of the city, and had to be passed before getting on the road. About 300 yards in rear of this cross road meets the causeway, at a point where it crosses a river, thus forming a bridgehead, or lete de pont.

This was also very strong and armed with three very large pieces of cannon. The works were surrounded on every side by large corn fields, which were filled with the enemy's skirmishers, so that it was difficult to make the attack immediately, as they were full of men and extended for nearly a mile on the road to the city, completely covering the causeway. The attack commenced about 1 p.m. Gen. Twiggs' division attacked on the side towards which they approached the fort, i.e. opposite the city; Gen. Worth's division attacked the bridge head which he took in about an hour and a half; while Generals Pillow and Quitman were on the extreme left, between the causeway and Twiggs' division.

The Rifles were on the left and in the read of the work, entrusted by Gen. Scott with the task of charging the work in case Gen. Pierce gave way. The firing was most tremendous- in fact one continued roll while the combat lasted. The enemy, from their elevated position, could readily see our men, who were unable to get a clear view from their position. Three of the pieces were manned by "The Deserters", a body of about 100 men, who had deserted from the ranks of our army.

These men fought most desperately, and our said not only to have shot down several of our officers, whom they knew, but to have pulled down the white flag of surrender, not less than three times.

The battles raged most furiously for about three hours, when both sides having lost a great many, the enemy began to give way. As soon as they commenced retreating Kearny's squadron passed through the tele de pont, and charging through the retreating column, pursued them to the very gate of the city. As our troops got within about 500 yards of the gate, they were opened upon with grape, and canister, and several officers wounded. Amongst the number was Capt. Kearney, 1st Dragoons, who lost his left arm above the elbow. Lieut. Graham, of New York, received a severe flesh wound in his left arm. Capt. McReynolds ditto. Our loss in this second battle was large. We lost in killed seven officers: Capt. Capron Burke, 1st Artillery, Lieuts. Irons, Johnson, Hoffman; Capt. Anderson. Col. Butler, of S. Carolina, and about 30 officers wounded exclusive of the volunteers. The official return give our loss in killed and wounded at 1150 besides officers.

The Mexican loss is 500 killed in the second battle, 1,000 wounded and 1,1100 prisoners exclusive of officers. Three more generals were taken, among them Gen. Rincon and Anaya, the provisional President, and 10 pieces of cannon, and an immense amount of ammunition and in killed, wounded and missing at 12,000. He has only 18,000 left out of 30,000, which he gives as his force on the 20th in both actions.

Thus ended the battle of Churubusco, one of the most furious and deadly for its length of any of the war. For Major Lally, on coming up, ordered a charge, which was executed in a most gallant and efficiently style, under the lead of Capt. Alvord, of the 4th Infantry, who was acting as adjutant. The enemy’s position was carried after a determined resistance. In this charge, two as brave and excellent officers as ever wore a uniform- Capt. Caldwell, of the voltigeurs, and Capt. Cummings, of the 11th infantry- were shot down, both severely wounded. Two field pieces, under the direction of Lieut. Sears, were skillfully managed and did good execution. Our loss was one killed and nine wounded. Having so large a train to guard, we were unable to bring into action over 400 men.

On the 11th we rested (if it may be so called) while a heavy volley of musket was constantly being poured in upon us. On the 12th, we resumed our march and were incessantly annoyed by attacks upon different parts of the line until noon, when we arrived at the National Bridge. This is one of the strongest passes upon the road to Mexico.
The bridge crosses the river just above the junction of two rapid streams, and curved around a high hill on the left, which is crowned with a castle, that commands the bridge. On the right, on the opposite side of the river, there is a perpendicular bluff, along the edge of which they had breast works. It certainly appeared to us a formidable fortress to capture with new recruits. Major Lally, with his staff and a strong body of voltigeurs advanced upon the bridge to reconnoiter but could not discover a man of the enemy. But, on the farthest end of the bridge appeared as if the enemy intended to defend at that point, and to reserve their fire until they could decoy our whole train on to the bridge and the valley leading to it.

One company was ordered ahead as an advance guard and storming party followed by two pieces of artillery and three companies of infantry. On reaching the center of the bridge a most deadly fire was opened upon us; and our advance guard, being thrown into some disorder, faltered, not withstanding the exertion of the artillery to open upon the barricade (from which the fire principally proceeded) with round shot, while the men covered themselves as well as they could. But, on perceiving that this did not produce the desired effect, he ordered that whole body (with the exception of one company of infantry, which was partially sheltered) to retire; which was done in good order.

Finding the enemy is so large force, Major Lally determined to attempt the capture of the castle before crossing the bridge. For this purpose, he selected tow strong companies, and placing them under the command of the brave Lieut. Ridgely, of the 4th, directed him to pass down and ford the first stream, ascend the height in the rear of the castle, and storm it. He then attached ropes to a six pounder cannon, and, with a hundred men, he raised it to the top of a high hill on the right of the road, and on one side of the bridge. This somewhat astonished the Mexicans as they had supposed this height inaccessible. The gun being planted and carefully directed, a fire was opened upon the castle with great effect, and the Mexicans soon began to leave it; and when they discovered Ridgely’s storming party, they rushed out in double quick time. The castle being thus taken, the remaining two companies of infantry and one of cavalry charged across the bridge, carrying the barricade, and routing the enemy in every direction.

The time occupied in this affair was six hours. Our loss was considerable. Mr. Twiggs, acting in the staff of Maj. Lally, a noble and gallant young man, was killed; and Captain Clark and Lieuts. Winder, Adams, and Creanon, all officers of great worth, were severely wounded. Eleven men were killed or mortally wounded, and upwards of molestation, to give them proper care and attention. We moved on again on the 14th, and as usual were fired upon.

After this, up to the 19th, we had no regular fight. Although continually annoyed by their cowardly shots, we took and spiked three pieces of artillery.

Pass, if nothing more; but, to their surprise, none came up until we were in possession of the heights. In this affair from the right announced that Captain H. had not been less successful, and the Mexicans were seen flying in all directions. Had our force been greater, we could have captured them all, by cutting them off on Twiggs' road. In this affair 9-pounders had time to discharge but on of them. Almost simultaneously with the taking of this work, the cheers formed in line, gave three cheers, and carried it at a dash. This was done so quickly, that the Mexicans, who had two

Fortunately for all parties, they sent us messengers of peace in the morning, and we marched in without opposition, while their forces retired on the other side.

We are glad to see that the recent conduct of Gen. Pillow has exhorted from the Whig some atonement for its former abuse and ridicule of that gallant officer. The two other Whig city papers do not seem to be yet satisfied, and we feel it to be our duty to enlighten them with an extract of a letter published in the N.O. Courier "from a high source of military information, and every word of it may be implicitly relied on." It is dated, Sept. 19, City of Mexico, and, referring to the battle of Contreras on the 20th August, says that “at a signal one rush was made, the works carried, twenty-two guns [some 18-pounders and O'Brien's guns taken at Buena Vista] captured, and also 1,100 prisoners, sixty wagon loads of ammunition, 300 pack mules and $18,000 money, besides killing more than 700 men; and all this was done in seventeen minutes by the watch, with a loss on our part of only forty seven men killed and wounded.”
In regard to the armistice, the writer states a fact, showing that the propositions came from the enemy:

“General Scott wisely recalled the troops, as, by entering the city, (which could most readily have been done,) the authorities would have been dispersed and all chances of peace dispelled forever. On the 21st, Gen. Mora, Chief Engineer of Mexico, came out, and meeting Gen. Scott at Cayoacon, made propositions for a truce.”

At the storming of Chapultepec, “a Mexican was killed in the act of setting fire to three mines, with the intention of blowing up the Castle and killed every soul in it.”

The conclusion of his letter renders a handsome tribute to the American officers and men, and among them the much-abused Gen. Pillow:

“Oh, on the morning of the 14th September, General Scott and staff entered the city and after viewing the troops, were escorted to the palace. As the troops were about to move to their quarters, a large body of leperos commenced firing on our men from the house tops, and a general street fight ensued, which was kept up for two days and nights, when the priests and authorities, finding the leperos worsted, called on General Scott, who stopped the further effusion of blood by recalling the troops, and everything is now as quiet as if no hostilities existed. We killed nearly 1000 leperos, and lost in killed and wounded about 100 men. History cannot point to more brilliant actions nor to a more successful campaign. Every effort of our arms has been crowned with success and every officer and soldier has rendered himself worthy of his country’s everlasting gratitude.

“This is a magnificent city in every respect, combing splendor, beauty and wealth, of which the Mexicans’ may well be proud. Our friends Pillow and Sheilds greatly distinguished themselves, and were both wounded- Pillow in the left ankle, Shields in the arm. I am glad to say they are doing very well. They were both wounded in storming the castle of Chapultepec, at the head of their columns. They have the confidence of their officers and men, as is shown by the brilliant results of the 14th September, in which both acted conspicuous parts.

“September 26th- Nothing of importance has transpired since I finished the above, except the shock of an earthquake which was felt on the 20th, and the detection of a plot of some 2,000 men to assassinate our officers and men. We are not to be caught clapping. There is proof that a portion of Pillow’s division entered the castle before the regular storming party, which shows well for him and his troops. Santa Anna has renounced the Presidency. If we don’t have peace in 30 days, we never shall. Herrera will doubtless be President.”

The Union of Friday night says nothing of Gen. Scott’s official dispatches. Of course, therefore, they had not then arrived. It understands “that when General Scott chances to receive a mail, it is freighted with numbers of letters to him, private and public; but more than half the mails- both ways- are intercepted. This may account to the government, as well as his friends, for not hearing from him. “Indeed,” write a friend, “the General has, for a long time, had only rare moments for private correspondence or indulgence of any sort.”

In relation to the arrival of troops at Vera Cruz, the same paper says:

“Reports received at the Adjutant General’s office last evening, from the commanding officer at Vera Cruz, state the arrival there, from the 2nd to the 6th of October, of fresh troops to the number of 2,000 and upwards, including a portion of Brigadier General Cushing’s brigade from the Rio Grande, besides two companies of the 11th Infantry, over one hundred strong, which had been for some time detained by Col. Gates at Tampico. In addition to the above, Col. Hay’s companies of Texan mounted volunteers, of which the strength is not known, were just arriving from the Brazos.

“Since the Brigadier Gen. Pierce’s departure with his brigade from Vera Cruz for Maj. Gen. Scott’s headquarters, July 14th, six thousand troops and upwards are officially reported to have arrived at the former place inclusive of October 6th; since which date, other and numerous reinforcements have been rapidly concentrating there, and moving forward on the route to the city of Mexico.”

The Union publishes the following extracts of a letter from Mr. John R. Henly, of the army of the United States, dated at the National Bridge, 30th September, to Major L. Thomas, U.S. Army [Adjutant General’s Office.]

Washington:

“I have to inform you that at midnight of the 27th an express reached this post from Brigadier Lane, who was at the Plan Del Rio, fifteen miles from here, bringing an order for Major McCoy, of the Indian Regiment, to move forward immediately, with all the troops here, with the exception of our battalion, as Maj. Lally, then at Jalapa, had received an order from Col. Childs to move to his support, by reason of the approach of Santa Anna of Puebla. Major McCoy left forthwith, and I know that he joined General Lane on the morning of the 28th, and that the whole brigade is now at Jalapa; thus, if General Lane moves to the support of Colonel Childs, of which I have no doubt, he will carry with him nearly 3,000 men. On the morning of the 28th, a young Mexican officer reached here from Jalapa, [he had a passport from General Lane,] from whom I obtained the following information- corroborated entirely by what I have since learned from the British courier- that after the armistice was broken, and our troops had entered the city, a large portion of the Mexican infantry, which had escaped, took the road to San Luis, under Herrera; whilst some three thousand cavalry, under Santa Anna, took the road to Puebla; the citizens [or rather the lower classes] of which place, anterior to his arrival, had risen on our troops and killed some of them, which forced Col. Childs to bombard the town, causing considerable destruction to life and property, and reducing the town to submission. The British courier from the city of Mexico arrived today, and we are informed he saw Santa Anna in Puebla; that Col. Childs had possession of the surrounding heights, and, if provisioned, could hold his own, as he had plenty of water. He- the courier- was loath to speak on the subject, and I cannot give you any further particulars of the state of our force at Puebla.

"From the courier we are also informed that he had seen Paredes in the city of Mexico, (whilst our troops were in possession,) but who, finding that nothing could be done there, owing to the vigilance of Gen. Scott, had left the city, and retired to his estate, some fifty miles distant; that the Mexican Congress would meet on the 5th of October at Queretaro; and that he thought it probable Santa Anna had come this way in order to escape from the country. He also seemed to think that the prospects of peace were more flattering, whilst the young Mexican officer (in my opinion, a type of his countrymen) ridiculed the idea of surrendering any portion of their territory.

“Our force is small here, but we are actively engaged in strengthening our, position, and, of course, will defend it to the last extremity, if attacked.”  [JKM]

By a communication in the American Star we perceive that Gen. Bravo and staff were taken prisoners by a portion of the New York Regiment in Gen. Quitman’s division. Circumstances prevented their being delivered to Gen. Quitman, and they were taken to Chapultepec by Capt. Davis, aid to Gen. Q. On reaching there, finding the general-in-chief still at the castle, he reported to Gen. Scott that he had Gen. Bravo and staff prisoners of war. The general ordered Capt. Davis to bring the prisoners forward where he was when the general-in-chief addressed Gen. Bravo as follows:

"I deeply regret meeting the valiant Gen. Bravo in misfortune. I have long and favorably known him by fame. I trust we may soon be friends. I honor and respect him as an enemy."

Gen. Bravo expressing his thanks for the courtesy extended towards him by the general-in-chief the latter directed that the former be taken into the citadel and furnished with a comfortable quarters as the convenience of the building would admit of.  [JKM]

The President of the Integral Republic of Mexico to his fellow countrymen

With the most poignant and profound grief do I announce to you, that it was after repeated and extraordinary efforts, and after fifteen hours incessant fighting, I saw myself under the necessity of abandoning the capital, with my ranks remarkably thinning by the projectiles of the enemy who penetrated our nearest lines, strewing the way with their bodies, and with those of the noble Mexicans, who so gloriously defended, inch by inch, the rights and honor of their country. You have been witnesses that I have created resources, at a time when there were none; that I labored day and night; that I erected fortifications around Mexico; that I organized and assembled a powerful army, in order that I might wrest some favor from fortune, which has been so averse to us. The insubordination of one General subverted my entire plan of operations- a thing which you already know. In the Convent and Bridge of Churubusco, the enemy received some very severe lessons, which were thrice repeated afterwards in the fort of Chapultapec, the suburbs of Bolen and St. Carlos, and finally the citadel. But the value of many of our soldiers of the guard and of the army, was not always supported, yet was it only by fire and sword that the enemy, in a day most fatal to the nation, made himself master of the capital. I have anxiously sought death in all parts, because a loss so great has occasioned me the most profound despair. In Chapultapec I received a contusion, in Belen my clothes were pierced by the balls of the enemy, and around me disappeared the best soldiers of the Republic. What remains to me, then, in the minds of this woe and anguish which assail me, the unprofitable conscientiousness that I have personally sustained the combat to the very last extremity, and that I have sold dearly to the enemy his astonishing victory. He has seen me in the front at Augostura, Cerro Gordo, Churubusco, Chapultepec, Belen, St. Commo, and the citadel, and he shall find me, I swear to you, wherever it shall be useful and glorious for me to combat.

I ought also to announce to you that I have spontaneously resigned the Presidency of the Republic, calling to assume it, according to the Constitution, the President of the Superior Court of Justice, with the associates, who will be the depositories of power, until the National Congress can decide who is he to whose guidance shall be entrusted its future destinies.

When power was entrusted to me under the most trying circumstances, I accepted it, in order that I might combine the element of resistance existing in the country; and open the enemy’s advance towards the capital, I resumed military command, that I might oppose to him a force of considerable strength and concentrate all our resources for its defense. But after the fall of the capital, circumstances have been altered, and now a division of the commands is requisite to promote the same objects, to attack the enemy in his line of communication from Vera Cruz to the capital is imperiously urgent, and I alone must take upon me the responsibility, because I feel it incumbent upon me, ever to place myself in the quarter in which there is the most peril. The supreme magistracy cannot be exposed to the hazard of war, and it is necessary to locate it amid population and wealth in order that I be not given over to anarchy and in order that it may again arise with power and with glory.

For this reason, have I surrendered an authority, to me so laborious and so bitter, and in whose reception and laying down, I have aspired to nothing more than the welfare of my beloved country. I may have committed some errors in the discharge of my civil obligations, but be assured that my desires, and my hopes have known no other stimulus, that the noble one of sustaining the rank of the nation in which I first saw the light, and which has laden me with honors and with favors.

I have said it before, and here repeat it, that I never despair of the fate of my country. If faction be silent, and will listen to the sovereign voice, if we be unanimous in our desire, an in our yearnings, there is yet time to hurl the enemy from the soil which he pollutes by his presence. It is known to you that I rejected a peace which would reduce the Republic to a nullity, the most absurd and complete. The nation has desired, and still desires, let us continue it; then, with the greatest intrepidity, and my example shall be a most ardent one.

Factions cannot now dispute with me concerning the power; which with pleasure I abandon; if they would dispute with me, let them come to the field of battle, there they will find me serene, and firmly consecrates, as ever, to the most of the 8th. This indicated likewise the necessity on our part of attending to the defense of the wood, as on the preservation of that depended that of the fortress, for without it the garrison would have been deprived of all assistance, and would even have been in need of water, which was obtained from there.

The forces which I had under my command on the morning of the 12th, amounted, according to the enclosed account, to 832 men, distributed in the manner therein stated, and ten pieces of artillery, three of heavy caliber, five smaller, and two mountain howitzers, all supplied with full ammunition and artillermen. Of the said forces there were 367 men to keep the lower points and road of the hill, and the rest kept the heights. The fortifications of the building had hardly commenced, and the fort protected by wood work was too feeble to resist the artillery of the enemy. In this state of affairs the enemy commenced firing on us at half past six on the morning of the 12th, from three batteries, situated one at the hacienda de la Condesa, another near the arsobespacco de artillery of the enemy. In this state of affairs the enemy commenced firing on us at half past six on the morning of

[Illegible]

During this day tow aids-de-camp from his excellency the President and one from your excellency, were sent to me to know and to ascertain if I needed any assistance in defending the fortress. My only answer to his excellency was, that one or two battalions should be sent to me to be stationed in the wood, to support the small force scattered about in it.

The active battalion of San Blas, under command of its colonel xecontencall, was sent, but was recalled in the evening by his excellency the President, without giving me or the chief, who had charge of the position any notice whatever. Between 6 and 7 p.m., another message from the President was received, which induced me to go down to the gate of Rastillo and see him in person. He then told me that he had already recalled the battalion of San Blas, and gave me orders to withdraw the small force they had supported, as his excellency was determined to abandon that position and defend the height alone.

Your excellency is aware of the observations I made opposite to that resolution, and that the effect they had induced the President to concur with me that it was necessary to keep the woods at every risk. He then offered to send me another battalion that very night, in order to maintain the position in the woods, and reinforce the garrison should they need it. I insisted on the necessity of its being promptly done, stating to his excellency that with the troops then there, it was impossible to pass it, as the battalion from Toluca had nearly all deserted, and that the small force remaining had lost all moral courage, from the effect of the fighting on that day. But the President concluded by saying, that he would not send them immediately, as he did not wish to concentrate too large a force in the fortress, and thus present a greater body to the power of the enemy's projectiles- assuring me, however, that we would be secured in time. The battalion offered was not sent, and this obliged me to dismember the force I had guarding the heights, to augment with 100 men that which was sustaining the point below, and with 162 men the outer works of the fortress, with orders to return to the fortress in case of an attack by a superior force. By this means the force that was stationed in the woods was comprised of 215 men, 374 kept the advance of outer works and 343 the fortress. During the night the desertion continued, though in less numbers; the garrison of the outwork likewise diminished, and of all the battalion from Golney, which, when I reviewed it, amounted to 450 men, there only remained 27 men and the officers. D. lean Cardenas, D. julian molua, D. Manuel irmenez, D. Jose Maria Cores, and D. Angel Colina; therefore, at daylight on the 18th I only counted a little over 200 men in the principal part of the fortress, to resist the assault of those of the enemy's columns, 350 to 400 strong and even many of these few were so demoralized by the fatal example of their companions and that of some of their officers, that they attempted flight in such a degree as to make it necessary to fire upon several of them, who were seen letting themselves down from the top of the battery. In view of the difficult position, and knowing that the enemy would commence the assault immediately, and judging by the activity of their fire in the morning I directed you an hour after my note of the 13th in which I stated the desertion of the troop, and the absolute necessity of my being reinforced by a different kind of soldier, or otherwise it would be impossible to defend the fortress, and that my responsibility would leave at the moment.

The aid-de-camp, who took this note, returned to the fortress, and told me that he had delivered the note into your hands, having found you with his excellency the president, who also read the note at the house of Alfarro.
Seeing that the time was passing off, that the enemy had commenced moving his columns, and the help required did not arrive in spite of my fourth note of the morning, and the repeated offers of the President to send two thousand men to the fortress in time of need, and knowing that general razgel's brigade was near the fort, I sent two aids to request his assistance then, which, in a short time, would be of no avail. The general razgel and pina barragon answered me by the last of my aids, that they could not come to my assistance without the orders of the President.
At nine in the morning, the columns of the enemy, protected by an active fire from their artillery, commenced entering the woods on the side of melino del rey, and advancing by the tacubayo road. The weakness of the forces that covered abundant trenches towards the wood- forces that had been diminished by desertions the night before-let the enemy advance with slight obstacles, and take possession of the outer works- it being proper to observe here, that the troops who had been beaten at these points did not fall back on the fortress, as ordered.

The hill being completely surrounded by the enemy, they charged their greatest force on the west side, which is the easiest of access, and for which reason we had prepared some mines, the train of which was possessed by the engineer, D. Manuel aleman, who had been instructed to blow them up when ordered; but this officer, Although he had been particularly charged not to leave the place where he was to receive my orders, on any account whatever, did not comply and when he was sought at the critical moment, could not be found, and hence the prepared mines were of no avail, and the enemy had this great obstacle out of the way. This circumstance on the one hand, and the large number of the enemy on the other, and the want of all help, and the falling back of the troops that defended the outer works, spread horror among the artillery men, who had not been wounded, and they flew from their ground and confusion shortly communicated to the few soldiers who remained, so that no earthly effort could contain them, and make the enemy's triumph dear to him.

The enemy, however, sustained a proportionate loss to the resistance that was made, and through it, and the remembrance without doubt, of that they experienced in the action of the 8th, the result of which had considerably disheartened his troops, he was seen to vacillate in the assault, notwithstanding our fires, and the advantages he had gained. Therefore, it can be assured, that with a little more help in the way of reinforcements, with which we could have prolonged the defense for some time, the enemy beaten, would have returned to his camp at Tacubaya, to put in execution the retreat which a few days before it was reported had been determined upon. It is impossible for me to give you Excellency an accurate account of our loss, because, in my position, as a prisoner, I am in want of all the necessary documents. I can only assure you that all those who remained in the fort up to the last moment, those who were not killed, were either wounded or taken prisoners. Among the former, I have to mention, he being one of those, I have been able to find out, Gen. Don Juan Nepomaceno Pene, killed by a cannonball, (which glancing, stuck my aid Lic D. Francisco Losa Estrado.) The Col. D. Juan Cano, and my Adjutant, D. Lercin Calro, whose family I particularly recommend to the protection of the Supreme Government. The greater part of those who accompanied me, compiled with their duty, and their behavior corresponded with what the honor and sanity of the cause we are engaged demanded. All of which I have the honor of informing your Excellency in order that you may inform his Excellency the President, and offering you the consideration of my great esteem.

quantity of ammunition, small arms; and about 600 prisoners. As soon as they were driven from the buildings, Capt. Drum and Col. Duncan advanced their light batteries, and Lieut. Stone brought forward one of the 24 pounders, the whole of which opened a most destructive fire upon them, as they retreated across a low plain to the rear of the position they at first occupied. Our loss was very heavy, and I regret to say, that some of the very best officers of our army fell killed and wounded, while the Mexican loss was very slight until they commenced their retreat. While the cavalry were passing in front of the enemy, in order to charge the column of lancers, they were not under the fire more than ten seconds, and during that time they sustained a loss of six officers wounded, thirty two privates killed and wounded, and a loss of 105 horses. There were

We were deceived in reference to the character of the buildings, as there was no foundry, or even a semblance of one- and after blowing up some of the buildings, and bringing off our killed and wounded, we evacuated the place, as the occupation of it would give us no advantage. Our loss was 800 killed, wounded, and missing.

The result of this engagement taught us one lesson, which was, that the Mexicans use their arms well and fight well, when they are in position; and although the superiority of our arms and the valor of the troops will eventually triumph, yet still we must call into requisition all our military science and skill, or we purchase our victories at too dear a price. A list of the killed and wounded, you will find in the general recapitulation which I sent you. Many a tear will be shed on its perusal, and many a heart will bleed for the noble souls, and the old and firm veterans who fell in the assault.

Col. Riley was not advanced from San Angel (his former camp) to El Piedad, in order to make a diversion, and hold the entrance to the Piedad and San Antonio to road. Gen. Pillow's division moved up to within supporting distance, and thus rested our army until the 11th, without anything of moment occurring. The engineer corps were busily employed night and day in their reconnaissance, ascertaining and examining the position of the enemy, and the different entrances to the city. The engineers, throughout all our operations, have performed a most dangerous and laborious duty. There was a little incident, which occurred to Captain Mason in one of his reconnaissances, which is worthy of record. It became necessary, on one occasion, for him to go very close to the enemy's breastwork, in order to ascertain its true position. As the approached, a Mexican officer rode out with two of his escorts, and came up within a very short distance when Captain Mason drew his revolver. The Mexican then in Spanish saluted "Good Morning." The Captain responded. The Mexican then said "You seem to be very curious; suppose you come a little closer." "No, I thank you, sir; I can see very well from where I am." "Walk inside, sir- we will endeavor to treat you as well as the accommodations of the camp enable us." "I am much obliged to you, sir, for your kindness, but prefer partaking of your hospitalities on some future occasion." And holding his spy glass to his eye, he continued, "I only want at the present to see how you are situated. I can see two guns in embrasure a little further to the left. That gun I see you men loading. I do think you will be able to bring to bear on me, as I will keep you between it and myself;" and moving round a little to the right, he continued his observation. One of the escorts then spoke in English and said, "You damn rascal, you know better that to come in here. If I was to get a hold of you, I'd cut your throat." Capt. Mason then said to the officer, "He makes a very bad use of it, and his scurrility is in striking contrast with you own respectable language. If we had him in our camp, we would teach him to be more respectful." The Mexican officer then rode off to one side. Capt. Mason who had been making his observations during the whole time of the conversation, said to the officer, "I have no desire at present to be brought within the range of your guns, and having learned all I want to know about your position, I will bid you good morning, sir," and then returned to where he had left his escort, which until then had been unseen by the Mexican, who rode back to the fort, apparently much mortified and disappointed that he had not been able to Decoy the captain into the trap that had been set for him.

On the 11th, a column of cavalry sallied out from the fort on the San Antonio road, either for the purpose of threatening our position or taking Capt. Magruder's battery, which was stationed with the picket within about 800 yards of their fort, though in a great measure covered from the range of their guns. As soon as they got their column moves out into a place free from all obstructions, Capt. Magruder opened two pieces upon them with shot and shell, which passed through them with great destruction, and they took to their heels and got back to the fort as quick as possible. The fort opened two guns on the battery, but without further effect than killing one man of the 15th Infantry. An officer shortly after rode up and inquired of Capt. Magruder if the fort replied, that he had the gentleman's card, and he expected the cavalry would carry back him compliments to the fort.

About sundown Gen. Twiggs, with the balance of his division, arrived at Piedad, and Gen. Pillow move with his division to the South of Tacubaya, and took a position on the West side of Chapultepec, and Gen. Quitman, with his division, occupied the road from Tacubaya to the city of Mexico, Gen. Worth's division remaining in Tacubaya.

In the course of the night three heavy batteries were planted in front of the Castle of Chapultepec: No. 1 commanded by Capt. Drum; No. 2 commanded by Lieut. Hagner; No. 3 by Lieut. Stone- all under the general command of superintendence of Capt. Auger, Chief of the Ordinance. Also, during the night Gen. Twiggs' division planted Capt. Steptoe's in front of the fortifications on the San Antonio road, it being intended that General Twiggs should make a feint for the purpose of drawing out the enemy in that direction.

At daylight on the morning of the 12th, all the batteries opened- the fire made by Gen. Twiggs' division succeeded admirably. As soon as Capt. Steptoe opened his guns the enemy marched out several heavy columns, and in reaching the fort passed within range of Steptoe's guns, when he turned a heavy and destructive fire upon them. As soon as they reached the work he tuned his attention to the fort, and in the course of an hour's cannoning drove them out of it, and silenced all the guns. Capt. Steptoe's fire throughout was one of the most effective and
It was determined on the morning of the 13th to storm the Castle of Chapultepec and the works connected with it. The General-in-Chief, knowing the strength of the fortifications and the strong force with which it was garrisoned, concluded to assault it with old and well trained troops- not that he did not possess confidence in the divisions of General Pillow and Quitman- but in carrying a point of which was the key to all our future operations, it would not do to make a mistake or omit to take every advantage. Therefore the storming parties from the divisions of General Worth and General Twiggs, which had so frequently been under severe fire, were selected. The heavy batteries continued their fire upon the fort, and about 7 o’clock, when the brigade of Gen. Smith arrived as a supporting force to the division of Gen. Quitman- as soon as General’s Smith’s brigade reached its position- the division of Gen. Pillow passed Molino del Rey and ascended the hill on the west side, the Voltigeur Regiment, which had been advanced into the timber to clear it of the enemy’s skirmishers, became the assaulting force, supported by the balance of the division. Gen. Worth was situated to the north and on the left of Gen. Pillow. A part of Gen. Quitman’s force ascended the hill on the South and to the right of Gen. Pillow. As the division of Gen. Pillow and a portion of Gen. Quitman’s ascended and carried the Castle in most gallant style, the balance of Gen. Quitman’s force and the brigade of Gen. Smith’s swept the works on the road, the whole of the command moving harmoniously and simultaneously together, much to the honor and credit of their respective, commanders struck the enemy in their different positions, at one and the same time, a fatal blow. The hill where General Pillow’s command ascended had been mined for the purpose of blowing up our troops when they arrived at this point, but the rapid movements of the Voltigeur Regiment, and the dead effect of the fire of their rifles, as they followed up the enemy from the first position, prevented their carrying out their views and intentions. Just as the command of Gen. Pillow rose the hill, and while in the act of assaulting the work, he fell, and wounded, and Col. Ransom was killed, but so luckily had Gen. Pillow explained his objects and intentions in carrying the work, and aided by an active and efficient staff, that his command moved on and carried the work without even being brought to a stand. As Gen. Quitman’s division was charging on the work in the road, Brig. Gen. Shields received a severe wound in the arm, and as soon as the works were carried he returned and had it dressed, and again mounted his horse, which was shortly afterwards killed under him, but he continued to command his brigade, which was actively engaged throughout the day, and the name of Shield’s will long be remembered in connection with the laurels won by the Palmetto of the South and Empire of the North.

Gen. Pillow being disabled by his wound, Gen. Worth took the command of both his own division and that of Gen. Pillow, and advanced along the aqueduct leading to the gates of San Cosme. Gen. Quitman, with his own command and Gen. Smith’s brigade, also advanced towards the city by the aqueduct leading into the city at the gate of Piedad, which is commanded by the Citadel. On each of the routes the two columns met with a decided and stubborn resistance, and after the advance of Gen. Worth’s command had reached the gate of San Cosme the fire was so hot that they were compelled to temporarily abandoned it- and did not make a permanent lodging until towards evening, when a portion of the siege train battery was brought into action, as also a piece or two of the mountain howitzers, which hurled the shot and shell about the ears of the enemy a little hotter than they desired. General Quitman’s column, with the Rifles at their head, continued steadily and cautiously on, taking position and breastwork, as the came in contact with them, until they arrived near the gate of the city. Here the firing was so heavy both from small arms and artillery, that it was deemed prudent to carefully reconnoiter it before attacking. Accordingly Lieutenants Beauregard, of the engineers; Lovell, of General Quitman’s staff, and Van Doren, of General Smith’s staff, went forward to ascertain the position of the affairs; they returned, and upon their report the Rifles, supported by a small force of infantry, was advanced forward for the purpose of picking off the artillerists, which they did- being particularly covered by the aqueduct- with the same success and accuracy as one of our Southern or Western men would shoot squirrels. This rendered the situation of the Mexican artillerists so uncomfortable, they were unable to stand to their guns long enough to load them, and they commenced moving their guns, which was perceived by General Quitman, and he ordered a charge, which was carried into execution as soon as commanded-Lt. Stuart, of the Rifles, leading the way. It captured the main work, with two pieces of artillery, which Captain Dunn turned on the retreating enemy. General Quitman was himself among the first to mount the breastwork, and plant the standard thereon; at 1 o’clock; the enemy then formed, and three times attempted to charge us, and make the position, but the withering and deadly fire of the Rifles, together with a volley of grape from Captain Dunn, so cut them to pieces that they would not approach nearer than rifle shot. The third time they tried to advance under the cover of the arches of the aqueduct, but if ever a Mexican poked his head out for the purpose of slipping one arch to the other, some riflemen would be sure to put a ball through it. During the whole of the afternoon, the Citadel and a fort on our right, continued a concentrated fire upon the gate, where our troops were, in the hopes of driving them out, but in this they were much mistaken, although we had but little over. Here it was that the lamented Captain Dunn fell mortally wounded; the death of no man in our army has been more sincerely regretted that his. Throughout the bombardment of Chapultepec he stood by his guns, and when the works of the enemy were stormed, he continued to advance his battery under the heaviest fire, himself possessing and infusing into his men a cool and deliberate bravery and self-possession surpassed by none. You will recollect it was he who recaptured the Buena Vista guns, still covered with the blood of those who fell over them at the time they were lost, and afterwards used them with such decisive effect at the battle of Molina del Rey on the 8th. Under cover of the night Gen. Quitman’s column erected a breastwork, and put into position a battery of two 18, one 68-pounder howitzer, and a 24-pounder howitzer intending to warm up the citadel in the morning. Gen. Worth’s column got his guns in a position to rake everything in his vicinity, and after night Lieut. Hagner threw a few shot and shell into the city, which no doubt intimidated the enemy very much, as they had a taste of this at Vera Cruz.
After the results and successes of the day, General Scott intended, on the morning of the 14th, to make a lodgment of the "New Pasea," (entering by the San Cosme gage) and bombard the city, and for this purpose the balance of Gen. Twiggs' division was ordered from El Piedad to the support of Gen. Worth.

On the night on the 13th, Santa Anna evacuated all his positions and retreated from the city, having had more that one-half of his army killed and wounded or taken prisoners- among the latter, Gen. Bravo, with his staff, at Chapultepec- Santa Anna found that if he fought us on the 14th, he would hardly have a bodyguard left to cover his retreat.

Early in the morning the two columns took up their march. Gens. Quitman and Smith, at the head of their commands, entered the Grand National Plaza, at 7 o'clock. The column was formed in the Plaza, and, by order of General Quitman, the National Standard of the Cerro Gordo Division, while the command came to a present, was flung to the breeze over the National Palace, and it now triumphantly waves over the Halls of Montezumas, and, with on of our national poets, we may say-

"Our flag is there, our flag is there
Behold its glorious stripes and stars!
Our flag is there, our flag is there
We hail it with three loud hazzus!"

Gen. Worth's command halted four or fives squares from the Plaza, where Col. Garland was wounded.

About 8 o'clock, Gen. Scott and staff, in full feather, escorted by the cavalry entered the city, amidst the huzzas of the soldiers on all sides. As he entered, the band of the 2nd dragoons, mounted, interested the starting crowds with Hail Columbia. As the escort entered the Grand Plaza, the band moved the patriotism of the whole of us to a little higher pitch, by the good, old-fashioned national air of Yankee Doodle.

One of the first acts of Gen. Scott was to appoint Gen. Quitman Civil and Military Governor of Mexico, and Col. F.S. Belton, Lieut. Governor of Mexico. Gen. Quitman's department embraces the following officers. Capt. F.N. Page, Assistant Adj't General; and Lieuts. M. Lovell, M. Wilcox and R. Davis, Secretary, and Mr. Levi, interpreter.

Throughout the 14th, and on the morning of the 15th, the Mexicans continued to fire from the corners and on the houses, killing some and wounding many.

Camp near Monterey, Aug. 2, 1847

Dear Sir- Your letter, enclosing to me a copy of the proceedings of the Democratic meeting held at Harrisburg, Pa., in which I find myself nominated with so much honor for the Presidency, has been received. This evidence of the high and flattering regard of so many of my friends of the Keystone State, is, I assure you, most feelingly appreciated. I beg you, as President of the meeting to convey to the people of Harrisonburg, as opportunity may offer, my sense of their kindness, and the assurance that, though sincerely distrustful of my ability to fill with efficiency so exalted a important an office, it will by my strong and zealous endeavor, should the people decide to bestow it upon me, to serve them for the good of the country and as shall be required by a strict respect for the constitution and the manifest wishes of the whole nation.

I return you my thanks for the handsome and acceptable manner in which, as President of the meeting, you have made known their proceedings to me.

With many wishes for your prosperity in life I remain, with high respect,

Your obedient servant

Z. TAYLOR, Maj. Gen. U.S.A.

Friday October 29, 1847  RE47v44n51p1c5  Soldier Killed  words: 78
Among the killed at the city of Mexico was Lieut. Sidney Smith of the 4th Infantry. The Fredericksburg Herald says he was the son of the late Austin Smith of King George. He entered the army some years since, and was engaged in several of the most important battles fought in the progress of the war. He was brave, generous and exceedingly popular. "His ambition was to gain a soldier's fame- his fate to fill a soldier's grave."

Friday October 29, 1847 RE47v44n51p2c2 Letter from Soldier in Mexico words: 510

A letter in the New York Commercial Advertiser, from an American officer in the City of Mexico, communicates some interesting facts:

The General (Scott) with his staff, escorted by the dragoons, entered the National Palace at about 9 o'clock, and in a few moments issued his congratulatory order to the army. On the 15th and 16th, small bodies of our troops were still engaged with the rabble, who fired from the tops of the houses. Since then the shops are all opened, the streets crowded by people on foot and in carriages, the churches open, bells ringing, and everything as orderly as in the good city of Philadelphia or New York. Indeed, here we are in quiet possession of a city with 900,000 inhabitants. The Government has fled- the Mexican army dispersed- and, strange as it may seem, we are as far from a peace as when we landed at Vera Cruz. So say the foreigners resident here, and such is the impression of the principal men of the country who are in favor of a peace.

The country is divided into factions, and there is positively no Government to treat with. Some of the States-seven whose representatives are in session at L'Argos- have denounced Santa Anna as a traitor, and proclaimed any person a traitor who dares to entertain propositions with us for peace. Others, by the decrees of their representatives, have authorized each State to raise and equip a force of 3,000 men for the purpose of carrying on the war. And thus they go- all is anarchy. Santa Anna was last at Puebla, with a few hundred men; as usual, plundering the inhabitants by levying contributions. Bustamante has been named by some of the refractory States as Commander-in-Chief of the army. Pena y Pena Chief Justice of Mexico, is the constitutional President of the country but it is reported that, having appeared before one of the State Legislatures the other day to be sworn into office, they refused to administer the oath.

I will now mention some objected of interest in this magnificent capital. First, the Cathedral. It is larger but not more tasteful than that of Puebla. In the exterior wall standing out in relief, is the famous astronomical chart of the ancient Mexican. This stone was removed from the rock of Chapultepec, of which is formed part. Its mass is huge, and somewhat resembles a mammoth cheese, with curious figures carved upon it. It has four concentric circles upon its disc, intersected by radii, the intermediate sections filled up with symbolic figures. The cardinal points are distinctly marked.

In the museum, is a sublime equestrian statue of one of the Spanish Charlesses, done in bronze and in one piece, the work of a native artist. The same court contains the famous sacrificial stone of the Aztecs. This also is a huge mass, wrought over with all sorts of incomprehensible figures. There are besides many mythological individuals, seeming entirely independent of each other, and every one apparently trying to outdo his neighbor in excessive ugliness.

Friday October 29, 1847 RE47v44n51p4c1 Punishment of the deserters words: 626

The New Orleans Picayune, of the 15th, says: We have not room for the orders in full, in which the trail and sentences of the different deserters are given, but give the substance.

By a general order, dated the 8th September it appears that a court martial, of which Colonel Riley, of the 2nd Infantry, was President, tried twenty-nine men for desertion to the enemy. Their fate may be read in the following sentences of Gen. Scott:

SENTENCES: The court found the above named prisoners, (the names are given again below,) severely guilty as charged, and sentence each (two-thirds of the members of the court in every case concurring in the sentence) "to be hanged by the neck until he is dead."

2. The general-in-chief approved the foregoing proceedings and sentences, with the following exceptions: the cases of Thos Riley, company 1, 3rd Infantry; James Mills, company H, same division, and John Reily, company K, 5th Infantry.

These three prisoners severally committed the crime of desertion as charged, in the early part of April 1846. At this date the United States were at peace with Mexico and all the world; for the present war did not break out in fact, till a latter date, and was not recognized to exist, by the Congress of the United States till the 13th of the following month.
No higher punishment can, therefore, be legally inflicted upon these atrocious offenders. T. Riley, J. Mills and J. Reily, than that prescribed for a state of peace. Fifty lashes with a raw hide whip, well laid on the bare back of each, and their punishments is commuted accordingly- with the addition, that each be branded with the letter D, kept a close prisoner as long as the army remains in Mexico, and then be drummed out of service.

So much for the punishment, in the case of Henry Newer, company D, 4th artillery, as related to hanging, is on the recommendation of many members of the court, remitted; and a like remission is made in the case of Edward McHerron, company G, same regiment, out of consideration for a son, a private in the same company, who has remained faithful to his colors.

There being some slight circumstances of mitigation in the several cases of Hezekiah Akles, John Bartley, Alex McKee, and John Bowers, all of company H, 3rd artillery, their sentences are commuted as in the cases of T. Riley, J. Mills and S. Reilly, above.

The remainder of the prisoners tried by the same court, and for the same crime: Henry Venator, company 1, 2nd Dragoons; F. Rhode, company 1, 2nd Dragoons; W.A. Wallace, company C, 3rd Inf.; Lawrence Macky, company K, 3rd Inf.; Patrick Dalton, company B, 2nd Inf., John Sheehan, company G, 5th inf., John A. Myers, company G, 5th inf., Henry Whisler, company E, 4th art., Elizeir S. Lusk, company C, 3rd inf., James Spears, company D, 7th inf., Dennis Conahan, company I, 7th inf., James McDowell, company K, 7th inf., Martin Lydon company D, 7th inf., W.H. Keck, company F, 4th art., W. Oathouse company I, 2nd art., Henry Ocker, company D, 4th art., W. O'Conner, company K, 1st art., Andrew Nolan, company G, 4th art., Herman Schmidth, company D; 3rd inf., R.W. Garretson, company H, 3rd art., will be hung accordingly to their several sentences, between the hours of 6 and 11 o'clock in the afternoon next, after the receipt of this order, as may be arranged by the commander of the post or camp where he said prisoner may be respectively be found. (The above named men, excepting H. Venator, F. Rhode, J.A. Myers, and J. Sheehan, were executed at San Angel September 10, 1847.)

By command of Maj. Gen. Scott

Friday October 29, 1847  RE47v44n51p4c3  From the Army  words: 261

The following (says the Union) is an extract of a letter from a member of the Voltigeur corps, to his friend in Washington, dated:

“City of Mexico, Sept. 28, 1847.”

“The Voltigeur Regiment was first inside the works and castle of Chapultepec, in the great battle of the 13th October, and their little flag [completely riddled by balls] was planted on the inside battlement at least ten minutes before any other. This is a fact acknowledged by nineteen-twentith’s of the army, although another regiment now claims it; but it will not do. This regiment behaved well in former battles, but had not the front in either; notwithstanding they had 99 men hit in the battle of the 8th, and only between 50 and 60 killed and wounded [few of the former] in the last, in which this regiment was in front, and did the hardest fighting of any. The fact is, the Mexicans shoot too high, and those nearest to them frequently, if not oftenest, escape with less loss. Their artillery, however, they fight well.

“Tell - - that his friend Gen. Pillow has very much elevated himself lately. He is our major general. He is wounded, but will get well of it. His wound was from a spent grape shot, in front of the instep, smashing the bone.”

Major General Butler writes to his friend in Washington, from Louisville on the 15th, that he should on that evening set out for Nashville- for the purpose, we presume, of making some arrangements about the Tennessee Volunteers en route to Vera Cruz.  [JKM]

Friday October 29, 1847  RE47v44n51p4c4  Gen. Pillow  words: 719

The Whig says, that while it said on Saturday that “the conduct of Gen. Pillow in the late engagements is highly creditable to him as a man of gallantry,” it by no means meant to “retract anything we (it) heretofore said in regard to the inordinate vanity of the man, by the exhibition of which he has on more that one occasion rendered himself ridiculous, or in relation to the offensive anxiety of his eulogists to bring him into notice as the greatest General of modern times!”

The Whig asks, “Why is it that Gen. Pillow alone requires a trumpeter?” – and it cites this fact as proof of “a
New Orleans by the 16th and Washington by the 25th, a flowing time for mail failures, and, if the War Department otherwise, Gen. Scott must want them sadly. The news of the rupture of the armistice ought to have reached here already.

Every officer here is loud in expressing his hope that this line will be abandoned and our troops sent to the other column. The same writer says, on the 27th:

"We are all filled with speculation here as to what is to be done with this column, but the general impression is that whether Gen. Scott is successful in taking the city or not, this line will be abandoned to Matamoras and a garrison maintained there, at Fort Brown, and the mouth of the Rio Grande and at Brazos Santiago, and the residue of the troops dispatched round to Vera Cruz. They might be much better employed there than here- there they can be of service, here of none whatever. No one supposes for a single instant that the Mexican army or any portion of it will advance in this direction, and if they do they have nothing to gain. As we lay no claim to any part of the country this side of the Rio Grande, why should 6,000 good troops be kept here in idleness to maintain what we do not want? Either send them through to San Luis, which everyone would prefer, or sound them round. The interior route would be the most expeditious, least expensive and surest, and the "great desert" bugbear, which has to terrify the good people of the United States, is entirely exploded. All travelers from San Luis to this place represent that would be the most expeditious, least expensive and surest, and the "great desert" bugbear, which has to terrified there would be no difficulty at all, especially by the Zacaracas route, and very little hard marching. The order to march either way would be received with the most unalloyed satisfaction by everyman in the entire column."

The same writer says, on the 27th:

"When any member of the press gang shall be able to show that he has done as much for his country as is recorded in this brief paragraph, we will be one of his audience to head him abuse Gen. Pillow. He is engaged in a distant land fighting for his country; he has fought bravely, and has left to his countrymen here, sitting quietly by their firesides at home, to mete out to him his reward. He has nothing to shield him from calumny but their generosity and justice; and we very much err, if there be not enough of these qualities among them to see that his slanderers do not pursue him to the death."

But, while the Whig is forced to confess the "gallantry" of Gen. P., it utterly destroys the effects of its "exhorted" compliment by its insinuations of the "inordinate and ridiculous vanity," the self "puffing" and the "impudent pretension," of this Democratic General. Is this the language to be held towards a brave soldier, doing his whole duty thousands of miles distant from his assailants? The friends of Gen. P. are not responsible for the opening of the discussion of his merits; but when they saw him unjustly, and for political reason assailed, they stepped forward to protect him with the shield of truth. The recent battles in Mexico have vindicated the fame and character of Gen. P. - and his position is unassailable. We deem it useless to question to quote new authority in defense of Gen.
P. We now repeat what Gen. Scott declared after the storming of Chapultepec. Winfield Scott will scarcely be denounced as endorsing with his high name and military knowledge any many of "impudent pretension or meretricious reputation." His word will stand good with the American people, Whigs as well as Democrats, against the partisan judgment of assailants, thousands of miles distant from the field of operations. Here is the high testimony of Gen. Scott, which the Whig journals most utterly repudiate, or confess that they have done rank injustice to Gen. Pillow.

When General Scott came up to where General Pillow lay upon a wall of the citadel, with his leg badly crushed by a large grape shot, he exclaimed, "My dear General, I thank God for your glorious success. Your country will cover you all over with honor, and will pour out its heart in gratitude for your distinguished gallantry this day." [JKM]

The Whig press having hinted fears lest Gen. Taylor's column on the Rio Grande might be weak enough to invite the attack of the enemy; we think it proper to quote a letter from the Picayune's correspondent, dated Buena Vista, Sept. 24th:

"We are all filled with speculation here as to what is to be done with this column, but the general impression is that whether Gen. Scott is successful in taking the city or not, this line will be abandoned to Matamoras and a other column. Gen. Scott must want them sadly. The news of the rupture of the armistice ought to have reached

New Orleans by the 16th and Washington by the 25th, a flowing time for mail failures, and, if the War Department acted with promptness, orders for the march might be received here by the last of next month. I hope that they will adopt this plan and put it in execution without delay. Yours

J.K.D."

RE48v44n79p2c7, February 4, 1848, COURT OF INQUIRY

We have been politely favored (says the New Orleans Delta) with a manuscript copy of the following General Order of the Secretary of War issued by direction of the President. It explains itself.

The command of the army in Mexico will necessarily devolve on Gen. Butler, of Kentucky, he being the officer next in rank to Gen. Scott whose presence will be required at the Court of Inquiry.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Adj't General's Office

Washington, Jan. 13, 1848.

General Order No. 2 – The following Order received from the Secretary of War, is published for the information and guidance of the officers concerned:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Jan. 13, 1848

By direction of the President of the U. States a Court of Inquiry, to consist of Brevet Brig. Gen. N. Towson, Paymaster General; Brig. Gen. Caleb Cushing, and Col. E.G.W. Butler 3d Dragoons, members, will assemble in Mexico to inquire and examine into the charges and allegation preferred by Major General Winfield Scott, against Maj Gen. Gideon J. Pillow, and Brevet Lieut. Col. James Duncan, Captain of the 2d Regiment of Artillery, and the charges of matters of complaint presented by way of appeal by Brevet Maj. Gen. W.J. Worth, Colonel of the 8th Regiment of Infantry, against Maj Gen. Winfield Scott; and also, into any matters connected with the same, as well as such other transactions as may be submitted to the considerations of the Court; and after investigating the same the Court will report the facts in each case, together with the opinion thereon, for the information of the President.

The Court will convene on the 18th day of February next, or as soon thereafter as practical in the Castle of Perote, in Mexico, where it will continue to hold its sittings, unless the exigence of the public service may require the place to be changed, in which case the Court is authorized to adjourn from place to place, as circumstances may render necessary, in order that no embarrassment to the service may be occasioned by the sessions.

Should any of the members named in the order be prevented from attending, the Court will proceed to and continue the business before it, provided the number of members present be without the limitations prescribed by law.

1st Lieut. Richard P. Hammond, 3d Artillery is appointed to act as Judge Advocate and Recorder of the Court.
In case the Judge Advocate and Recorder should be prevented from attending, or unable to discharge the duties, the Court is authorized to appoint some other proper person, or devolve the duties of Recorder upon the junior member.

W.L. MARCY, Secretary of War

By order: (Signed) R. Jones, Adj Gen

RE48v44n80p1c2-4, February 8, 1848, LATE AND IMPORTANT FROM MEXICO

[From the New Orleans Picayune, Jan. 29.]

LATE AND IMPORTANT NEWS FROM MEXICO.

Two weeks later from the City of Mexico and ten days later from Queretaro.

Safety of Col. Wither’s command – Rumors of Peace – Capture of Gens. Valencia and Torrejon and other Mexican Officers – Attempt at Insurrection in the City of Mexico – Skirmish between the Rangers and Guerrillas – Supposed Death of Padre Jarauta – Pena y Pena again President &c, &c.

The U.S. steamship Edith, Capt. Cuillard, arrived last evening from Vera Cruz, which place she left on the 20th January. By her we have received our letters and files from the city of Mexico to the 13th of January, and from Vera Cruz to the date of the sailing. The most important feature of the intelligence by this arrival relates to the rumors of peace and an attempted insurrection in the city of Mexico.

Col. Wither’s command, about which our last advices left some anxiety on the public mind, arrived in safety at Real de Monte.

A detachment under Col. Wynkoop captured Gen. Valencia and his aid, and Col. Arrista, at the hacienda of the former, Tepijaco, on the 1st inst. Col. Wynkoop was in pursuit of Jaruata and Rea at the time. These escaped him a few hours only. Gen Valencia and Col. Arrista were released on parole.

Cols. Torrejon, Minon and Gaund were shortly afterwards captured at Amaxnca, near Puebla, by Dominguez, Capt. Of the Mexican spy company in the service of the United States.

Gen. Cadwalader’s command, consisting of the 4th Artillery, 6th, 8th and 11th Infantry, left the city of Mexico on the 3d inst. For Toluca. The troops were in fine spirits at the prospect of active service once more. They had reached Lerma at the last accounts, without molestation.

On the 4th inst. Major Talliaferro arrived in Mexico from Real del Monte with a detachment of the 9th Infantry and twenty dragoons, in charge of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars in silver bars – a part of the assessment levied upon the State and Federal District of Mexico.

The rumor prevailed in the city of Mexico that the Mexican Commissioners had offered a plan of peace – based upon Mr. Trist’s propositions at Tacubaya – which had been sent on to Washington city. The departure from the ultimatum offered by Mr. Trist, was supposed to be a demand for $30,000,000 for the territory proposed to be surrendered to the United States.

We regret to learn that the four regiments which accompanied Gen. Butler to Mexico, are suffering much from sickness.

From a hasty glance at our Mexican papers, of which we have a full file, we can find nothing more than is contained in the letters of our correspondents.

We extract the following paragraph from the World, of Guadalaxara, under date of the 17th of December:

In a letter from Teple, dated the 11th December, 1847, it is said that news had reached Manialen that 500 rancheros of California had attacked the Americans who were in possession of La Pax and San Jos, had defeated them and set fire to those places. On the 24 three American vessels had left Maxatian to render assistance, and this occurrence would prolong the blockade of San Blias.”

The following is a list of passengers in the United States steamship Edith, from Vera Cruz:

Lieut. A.S. Way, Georgia Bat.; Lieut. Averson; Joseph Johns, discharged soldier; Robert Smith and Capt J.
Loyall.

The Edith brought over forty sick and discharged soldiers – two of whom died on the passage – and the bodies of the following deceased officers:

These bodies will be conveyed this morning to J.D.G. Quirks, Camp street, where they will be properly bestowed, and prepared for their transportation.

CITY OF MEXICO, Dec. 12, 1847.

You will find in one of the letters of the gentleman who continued his correspondence with you during my indisposition, an account of the capture of Gen. Valencia, the renowned hero of Contreras, and Col. Arresta, at the hacienda of the former, in this valley, by a party of Texan Rangers under command of Col. Wynkoop, of the Pennsylvania Volunteers. From all I can learn, the expedition was managed in the most successful manner, and the party came very near laying hands on Padre Jarauaura himself, who has been busy in this vicinity some weeks.

Yesterday, Dominguez, the captain of the Mexican Spy Company, arrived with a small man, and brought intelligence of his having had a brush with a party of the enemy’s cavalry between Obijo de Agua and Napouca. The cavalry he dispersed, and took prisoners Generals Torrejon, Minon and Gaud, who were with the party, and delivered them over to Col. Childs, at Puebla, together with two American deserters whom he found with the party. I regret that in addition to these captures I cannot add that of Gen. Salazar, who rendered himself infamous by his cruelty to the Santa Fe prisoners. The scoundrel was in the city a few days since, upwards of twenty four hours, with his family, and the authorities, on learning his whereabouts, sent a body of soldiers to arrest him, but unfortunately he had left the city about two hours before it was known he was here. All these prisoners have been liberated on parole.

The policy of liberating these men I think extremely doubtful. On parole they can go where they please, and among their own countrymen can say what they please, which enables them to do us much more injury in exciting the people to acts of hostility than if they were never taken prisoners, and their influence not confined to such parts of the country only as they could muster courage to visit. As an instance in proof of what I say, I am told by a gentleman who came up with Col. Johnson’s train from Vera Cruz, that on entering one of the small towns at this side of Puebla, which was an advantageous position to resist the advance of Col. Johnson, Gen. La Vega (who, together with his brother, Col. La Vega, taken at Huamantila, and Gen. Heren, taken at Cerro Gordo, came up with the train on temporary parole) addressed the first know of his countrymen he met in the town, and asked them why they were not up. It would be much safer to keep these men confined here, or send them to the U. States.

It is impossible to say when there will be a movement towards any of the cities still in the possession of the enemy. The commander-in-chief, confident, perhaps, of a peace resulting from the proposition of which it is said the Mexican Government has made, is not disposed to disturb the deliberations of the Government at Queretaro by sending an expedition in that direction, or to create new causes of animosity, by making additional conquests, until the result of the proposition is known.

A bearer of dispatches from Washington arrived yesterday with Col. Dominguez, and it is possible that an onward movement may be ordered. If it is ordered soon, there is little, if any, probability of resistance being offered to our progress. There is not at any one point that I can learn sufficient men and military supplies to resist one thousand of our soldiers.

I regret to say, there is a great deal of sickness among the four volunteer regiments from Kentucky, Tennessee and Indiana, which Gen. Butler commanded to this city. The measles, the mumps and the diarrhea are the prevailing diseases, and on an average one half the men in the four regiments are unfit for duty.

We have news today from Queretaro: Anaya, who was elected President after Santa Anna’s resignation, has gone out of office, the term having expired, and Pena y Pena, by right of his office as Chief Justice, at present file the vacant chair, or has been elected President – I cannot positively learn which, but I am inclined to believe the former. He has declared that he will pursue the policy of Abaya, who is supposed to be favorable to peace. The letter which brings this news is dated the 8th just, and says the Cabinet has been re-organized by the appointment of Sr. Rosas as Minister of Foreign Relations and temporary Secretary of the Treasury, Riva Salacio as Minister of Justice and Pedro Maria Anaya as Secretary of War. Yours, D.S.
CITY OF MEXICO, Jan. 13, 1848.

On Monday last the Commander-in-chief was informed of a movement designed here to attack the quarters of the officers of the army, and if possible, to take them prisoners, or kill them. – The plan was, that the population, or so much of it as could be induced to take part in the conspiracy, should rise, and assisted by a body of guerillas which were to enter the city at a certain hour, make the attack. During the day, the Commander-in-chief informed all the chief officers of the intended attack, designated rallying points for the different regiments, and made every disposition necessary to defeat the insurrection. At night scarcely a Mexican was to be seen in the streets – showing that the whole population had a knowledge of what was to be attempted. The precaution adopted, it is supposed, prevented an attempt to execute the plan. The projectors of the insurrection were either blind to the effects of their plan, or foreseeing them, must have been utterly reckless as to the consequences which would result to their own countrymen; for if the attempt had been made, there is not an officer in the army, not excepting the Commander-in-chief himself, who could have restrained the troops from sacking the city. During the night Lieut. Baker of the 5th Indiana regiment, commanding a patrol, came in sight of two carts near the Plazza del Torro, in the South Eastern part of the city, one of which containing one hundred stand of arms he captured; the other he was unable to come up with before it was placed in concealment. Whether General Scott has the names of the parties who originated the plot, or not, I do not know; but it is pretty well understood that the chief conspirators are among the soldiers of the Mexican army, who assumed citizen’s dress when our army entered the city, and have remained there since. A few days may reveal more a relation to the matter.

You will, perhaps, learn before this reaches you of a similar attempt at Puebla, which the promptitude and determination of Colonel Childs nipped in the bud. Enclosed you will find Colonel Childs’ proclamation in the Spanish.  D.S.

MEXICO, Jan. 13, 1848.

Yesterday Colonel Hays, and some of his men, had a brush with Padre Jaruota, at a place called San Juan, some twenty or thirty miles from here. Although the guerillas far exceeded the Texans, they did not wait for more than the first charge, but fled in great confusion. Jarauta was seen to fall from his horse, which, together with his lance and cloak, fell into the hands of Colonel Hays. His saddle was bloody; from which it is inferred that the reverend scoundrel was killed. C.C.

THE MEXICAN JOURNALS

The noticioso, of January 12, (says the New Orleans Delta,) contains the proclamation of President Anaya, dated at Queretaro, December 16, relative to the organization of the Mexican army. The several levies amount to 16,000 men, exclusive of the troops already raised, whose ranks are to be filled up. The new levies are to serve for three years, unless sooner discharged. They are not to consist of malefactors or invalids, they must be at least five feet in height and their age not to exceed forty years.

The disaffected population of Juasterca had made a pronunciamento against the Mexican army laws and government, and valorously threatened to march against the city of Mexico in order to wrest it from the Americans.

Col. Gates, commanding at Tampico, has given notice that all gold and silver metals, or specie, must be left at the Customhouse, when designed for exportation, where an exact account will be taken of it. The duty will be deducted there from and the balance returned to the owners for exportation.

A pronunciamento was put down at Queretaro, by President Anaya, on the 19th ult, by a display of military force which overawed the disaffected. They, however, threatened to rise, after Anaya’s term expires, which occurred on the 8th inst.

The small sum allowed the Mexican officers and soldiers had disgusted many of them, according to the Noticioso, and a great many of the officers had petitioned for permission to resign.

The Ameojo, of Durango, hopes that peace will soon be concluded, or the war renewed with vigor.

The Legislature of Durango had joined its vote to that of Jalisco, in favor of authorizing the Mexican Congress to take measures to form a coalition between all the Hispano-American governments on the continent.

The Patriots, of Aguascalientes, says it has received various communications on the existing state of the country. Some of the writers propose to call Santa Anna to the dictatorship, while others suggest a national Convention, to deliberate whether peace shall be made or the war continued.

CITY OF MEXICO, Jan. 13, 1848.
Eds. Delta – The city of Mexico is rife with rumors in reference to peace; some have it that peace is made; others have it that commissioners have gone on to Washington, &c., &c.; and thus we have it up and down every day – peace and war alternately. Believe nothing you hear from this city at the present time on this subject, for I assure you no one, unless it is Gen. Scott or Mr. Trist, knows anything more about it that “the man in the moon.” And these gentlemen are exceedingly cautious in everything relating to the movements of the army, and everything connected with it. The nearest that I can come to the present state of affairs, is from my correspondent at Querétaro, who informs me that there has been no treaty concluded, but he adds: “The whole subject rests with the Government of Mexico is willing to make a treaty, and are prepared and are strong enough to sustain it.” Many of the most influential men in the Republic, who have heretofore been violently opposed to making a treaty, are now advocating it strongly. – Those persons, who formerly belonged to the army and have been discarded by the Government, are perfectly prostrate; their influence is nothing on either side of the scale. The Congress had not yet met at Querétaro at the latest dates, but it was expected there would be a full meeting by the 19th or 20th inst.

The brigade of Col. Riley is still at Tacubayas, and the brigade of Gen. Cushing at San Angel. No movement of troops for San Luis can take place before the 1st of February, even if General Scott most earnestly desired it. The command, before it starts from here, must be fully appointed for five or six months, as it will take that time at least before they would be able to make a road from San Luis to Tampico, by which they would be enabled to bring supplies from the latter place. At present they are without one of the most necessary articles, clothing, for such an expedition. Gen. Scott has sent twice to Vera Cruz for it, and both times has received a very meager supply; therefore he has had to resort to one of the poorest means of procuring it – having it made here. Capt. McKinery, of the Quartermaster’s Department, has now about 10000 men and women engaged in making clothing for the soldiers, and I understand they will be at least until the 1st of February before a sufficient quantity will be ready. It is a very easy matter to move armies on paper, but more difficult in the field.

P.S. – 11 o’clock. – Col. Jack Hays has returned; he routed Padre Jarauta from one of his dens – killing some 10 or 12 of his men, and wounding about 15 others. One of the men shot the Padre; whether they killed him, I am not informed; they brought in his horse, saddle and bridle, and cloak and other trinkets belonging to the Rev. Father.

We have received the intelligence of the attack on Col. Miles’ train, and are sorry to learn that the fine company of Mounted Rifles has been cut up. We suppose it to be Capt. Ruff, as we do not know of any company of mounted rifles down there except his. The gallantry of Capt. Ruff and his company in several of the most important battles in this country has been severely tested, and always highly distinguished themselves. If the Mexicans did, as we are informed “cut him up,” you may rest assured they had a dear bargain of it. No men in the service use all their arms better than this company.

Yesterday the Police Guard discovered about a wagon load of muskets concealed in a Convent in this city.

Mr. Trist does not go home with the train going down-morrow.

The gallant Capt. Walker, of 6th Infantry, so severely wounded at El Molino del Rey, will be sent down; he goes in a litter – still being too weak to travel otherwise.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF PUEBLA

Puebla, January 5, 1848

PROCLAMATION – Whereas, a diabolical and bloody correspondence has been detected between Don Manuel Perez, and other (as yet unknown) citizens of Puebla, with a person called General Rea, a guerilla chief, in which the said Perez and his confederates recommend the assassination of the person who styles himself the Governor of the State of Puebla, as well as many of the peaceably disposed citizens, in order to “strike terror into the whole community,” and then for the said Rea to pronounce against the State and General Government, and declare himself Dictator: this is to give notice to the inhabitants of the city of Puebla that so long as the troops of the United States of North America shall hold military possession of the city, any Mexican, or other person, not owing allegiance to the United States, corresponding with known guerillas or with any organized military body, in arms against the forces of the United States, will be considered in the light of spies, and any attempt to furnish such armed bodies with supplies of any kind, will be deemed as a violation of good faith, and persons thus detected, will be regarded as in open hostility against the forces of the United States, and treated accordingly. Citizens remaining in the city of Puebla during its military occupation by the United States troops, enjoying protection of person and property, tacitly acknowledge such military authority, and any aid of theirs compromising their neutrality, is, by the laws of war, severely punished.

Civil and Military Governor

[SDW]
The New Orleans Picayune of the 30th ultimo contains various matters of interest, form which we select the following:

Among the passengers on the Maria Burr, from the Rio Grande, came Lieut. Franklin, of the Topographical Engineers – a gallant young officer who rendered himself conspicuous at Buena Vista as a member of General Wool’s staff by his gallantry. Lieutenant F. is direct from General Wool’s headquarters at Monterey, which place he left on the 13th instant.

Just before he left an express was received from Saltillo from Col. Hamptramck, in a command of the forces there, stating that a report had reached him from a source entitled to credit, that a force of Mexicans, 10,000 strong, under command of Gen. Bustamente, were marching down upon Saltillo. The report even particularizes the points from whence the troops had been raised, but so frequent are the stampedes upon that line, very little credit was attached to the report. Our forces, there were in good condition, and perfectly willing to be attacked whenever the enemy though best to make the experiment.

Upon the receipt of this news Gen. Wool had appraised the merchants at Monterey, Camergo, Matamoras, and other ports, that he could afford them no protection in the way of escorts. From another source we learn that Colonel Carasco, a Mexican officer who has rendered himself rather conspicuous, is at Monterey, proposing to enter into negotiations with Gen. Wool for a pronunciamento against the existing Government of Mexico and in favor of the Un. States, on the part of the States of Mamaulipas, Nueva Leon, and Coahuila. He also proposes to bring in Gen. Canales, that cowardly chief of guerillas, who has given us so much trouble upon the Rio Grande. Col. Carasco has been for a long time residing in Matamoras with his family, and appears friendly to the Americans. We know not what degree of credit to attach to this report.

Capt. Deas, of the artillery, who was a short time since wounded by a Mexican lancer between Saltillo and Monterey, has recovered from the effects of his wound, which was not so severe as was reported.

The Matamoras Flag, of the 22d, contradicts the report as to the probable death of Capt. G.K. Lewis, from wounds received in a recent fight with the Indians, near Pairs. He was able to move about the streets of Saltillo with slight aid from a crutch. The wound is in the foot, a toe or two having been cut off by an Indian arrow. – Mr. Lewis is a printer.

The steam-propeller Massachusetts, Captain Wood, fourteen days from New York, arrived at the Brazos on the 17th ult. She suffered some damage to her machinery, but being a superior sail vessel, there was not much detention in consequence. Several ladies, wives of officers of the army on the Rio Grande line, and others, were passengers.

FOR THE BRAZOS. – The U.S. steamship Fann, will sail for the brazos this morning. She takes over the following named passengers: James Campbell, bearer of dispatches; Major Early, Virginia Regiment, Dr. H. Stenneke, Capt. Wm. R. Archer, Virginia Regiment, in command of a detachment of recruits for the 3rd Dragoons; Sergt Maj Brown; Mrs. Dr. Treavit and two childred, Mrs. Powers, Messrs Field James Delby, C. Taylor, A.U. McConlin, Gen. Randolph, Charles C. Churchill, James Knowles, Julian Magill, and Paine.

[SDW]

What is termed a rupture, and said to have been long fermenting between Governor Young of New York, and the Clay whigs in the State Legislature, at length is made clearly manifest in the extraordinary report just made by a majority of the committee to whom was referred that portion of the governor’s message relating to the Mexican war. They have brought forward a long protest, with a series of resolutions, dissenting form the stand the Governor had assumed and in favor of the waste between the Nueces and the Rio Grande as the boundary. A minority report, on the same subject, has been submitted also.

[SDW]

Sir – I have had the honor to receive your communication of January 27th enclosing a newspaper slip, and expressing the regret of the Department that the letter copied to that slip, and which was addressed by myself to Major General Gaines, should have been published.
Although your letter does not convert the direct censure of the Department or of the President, yet, when it is taken in connection with the revival of a paragraph in the regulations of 1825, touching the publication of private letters concerning operations in the field, I am not permitted to doubt that I have become the subject of Executive disapprobation. To any expression of it, coming with the authority of the President, I am bound by my duty and by my respect for his high office, patiently to submit; but, lest my silence should be construed into a tacit admission of the grounds and conclusions set forth in your communication, I deem it a duty which I owe to myself to submit a few remarks in reply. I shall be pardoned for speaking plainly.

In the first place, the published letter bears upon its face the most conclusive evidence that it was intended only for private perusal, and not at all for publication. It was published without my knowledge, and contrary to my wishes. Surely, I need not say that I am not in the habit of writing for the newspapers? The letter was a familiar one, written to an old military friend, with whom I have for many years interchange opinions on professional subjects. That he should think proper, under any circumstances, to publish it, could not have been foreseen by me.

In the absence of proof that the publication was made with my authority or knowledge, I may be permitted to say, that the quotation in your letter of the six hundred and fiftieth paragraph of the superceded regulations of 1825, in which the terms “mischievous” and “disgraceful” are employed to characterize certain letters or reports, conveys, though not openly, a measure of rebuke, which, to say the least, is rather harsh, and which many may think not warranted by the premises. – Again: I have carefully examined the letter in question, and I do not admit that it is obnoxious to the objections urged in your communication. I see nothing in it which, under the same circumstances I would not write again. To suppose that it will give the enemy valuable information, is to know very little of the Mexican sources of information, or of their extraordinary sagacity and facilities in keeping constantly apprized of our movements.

As to my particular views in regard to the general policy to be pursued towards Mexico, I perceive by the public journals that they are shared by many distinguished statesmen, and also in part by a conspicuous officer of the navy, the publication of whose opinions is not perhaps obstructed by any regulations of his Department. – It is difficult, then, to imagine that the diffusion of mine can render any peculiar aid to the enemy, or specially disincline him “to enter into negotiations for peace.”

In conclusion, I would say, that it has given me great pain to be brought into the position in which I now find myself with regard to the Department of War and the Government. It has not been of my own seeking. To the extent of my ability, and the means placed at my disposal, I have sought faithfully to serve the country, by carrying out the wishes and instructions of the Executive. But it cannot be concealed, that, since the capitulation of Monterey, the confidence of the Department, and I too much fear of the President, has been gradually withdrawn, and my consideration and usefulness correspondingly diminished. The apparent determination of the Department to place me in an attitude antagonistical to the Government, has an apt illustration in the well known fable of Esop. But I ask no favor, and I shrink from no responsibility. – While entrusted with the command in this quarter, I shall continue to devote all my energies to the public good, looking for my reward to the consciousness of pure motives, and the final verdict of impartial history.

I am, Sir, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

Z. TAYLOR

Hon. W.L. MARCY,
Secretary of War, Washington

RE48v44n84p2c5, February 18, 1848, FROM THE RIO GRANDE

By the arrival of the U.S. schooner Belle, Captain Morgan, which left Brazos Santiago on the 30th ult, we have dates from Matamoras to the 26th ult., says the New Orleans Picayune.

From the Flag of this date we learn, that Gen. Wool has issued an order, dated the 17th ult., at Monterey, requiring all disbursing officers of Government on that line, receiving money from merchants and others for checks on the United States, to charge six percent on the amount of coin so received, the percentage to be credited to the United States. It also requires the Collector for the Districts of upper and lower Rio Grande, to state on the invoices of goods going to the interior, that the duties have been paid, mentioning the amount on each article. We also give below another order of General Wool, regulating, trade with the interior.

We regret to learn from the Flag the particulars of a recent fatal duel. We copy the Flag’s paragraph:

“We understand that a duel was fought at Camargo, a few days past, between Capt. Joshua Collet and Capt. Alexander Wilkins, both of the 10th infantry, now stationed at that place, in which the former was killed. We have not learned the particular causes of difficulty, but have been told the meeting arose out of a dispute between Capt. Wilkins and Capt. Postley of the same regiment, in which Capt. Collet acted as the friend of the latter.”
Dates to the 17th ultimo have been received from Monterey by the Flag. All was tranquil. The Union Gazette of the 15th, speaking of Colonel Hamtramck, commanding at Buena Vista, says that by his energy and prompt action, the guerrilla bands in the neighborhood of Saltillo have been completely broken up and dispersed. Refugio Gonzales, a celebrated guerrilla chief, and his brother, have fled the State. The Vice Governor of Saltillo has likewise fled, fearing lest he might be roughly dealt by, as papers had been captured from the robbers which implicated him in their schemes.

From the Flag we also copy an article touching the “spreading” of our army over Mexico.

Colonel Davenport has ordered Captain Dunlap, with his company of Illinois mounted men, to take permanent post at Santa Teresa, a considerable town, sixty miles distant from here on the route to Victoria. The object in sending troops to Santa Teresa, is to break up the Mexican custom house established there, and to prevent the collection of duties from traders coming to the place, or going to the interior, and to give them protection, as far as circumstances will admit. This is a good beginning, and an augury of what is to follow. Next San Fernando, and then Victoria must be occupied, and so on until our troops are spread over all the country between us and the mountains, giving protection to the people, and security to trade in every quarter. Our troops scattered over the country, the trade of Matamoras will be quadrupled, and the increased duties collected will be more than adequate to defray all expenses incident to the maintenance of troops at posts thus widely separated. Besides, the inhabitants of the country will be brought immediately in connection with our people, and being freed from the conniving spirits who are ever inciting them against us, a spirit of friendship will grow out of our intercourse with them, the same as witnessed in this city, and in nearly every city now occupied by our troops. The good to result from this wide-spread friendship is incalculable.

Monterey, Mexico, Jan. 12, 1848.

1. To prevent as far as possible, the evasion of the orders of the Government in relation to the collection of duties on importations to Mexico, the following regulations will be observed by all concerned, viz:

All persons leaving the Lower Rio Grande with goods, wares, or mercantile for any of the posts in advance of Matamoras, or any one leaving, in like manner, the districts of the Lower or Upper Rio Grande for the interior, will before their departure, present to the collector of the district correct invoices, in duplicate, of the articles to be transported specifying to what place they are to be taken. The collector shall satisfy himself that the required duties have in each case, been paid; and if such be the fact, he will endorse to that effect on the invoices – one of which he will send direct to the collector of the district in which the goods are to be sent, and will return the other to the carriers of the property, who will exhibit it to the commanding officer of each military post through which they may pass, who will countersign it, and afford to the persons presenting it every protection and facility in his power.

The absence of the invoices herein directed, or any frauds detected in any of them, will subject the goods to be confiscated.

2. * * * All persons coming into the interior from the posts or ports below, or passing from one post to another, will, before leaving be required to obtain a passport from the commanding officer of the post, and to have it countersigned by the commander of every post through which he may pass to reach his destination.

All persons arriving at a military post will invariably present themselves to the commanding officer, who is required to see that this order is in each case duly complied with.

* * * *

Commanding officers will be careful to give passports only to those who may deserve to receive them.

By command of Brig. Gen. Wool:

(Signed) IRWIN McDOWELL

[SDW]
From the terrific blustering of the Whig about the return of Santa Anna, one would suppose that that journal had never heard of his return to Mexico until after the call was made by the House of Representatives upon the President to furnish information touching his “free pass.” – We indulged in some speculations a short time ago on this subject, which were characterized, in the graceful language of the Whig, as “fustian and rant.”

We now present some of the speculations of that journal on the same subject, bearing date 1st September, 1846. Comparing the views it presented at that time, with its present uproarious course on the same subjects, we leave it to our readers to determine where the right application of “fustian and rant” belongs. From the Whig of 1st September, 1846, we take the following:

“The last Southern mail brings us intelligence, which may be found in another column, of the arrival of Santa Anna at Vera Cruz, and of the successful pronunciamento in his favor at Metropolis; and what was entirely unexpected, of the downfall and imprisonment of the late dictator, Paredes.

“This news, however, is chiefly interesting to the people of the United States from the influence which it may probably exert upon the relations subsisting between our government and that of Mexico. Will it lead to a more determined, united and vigorous prosecution of the war, or will it tend to a speedy restoration of peace? Santa Anna and Almonte, who have both traveled extensively in the United States, and are more familiar with our resources than most of the public men in Mexico, must be satisfied of the hopelessness of the struggle on the part of Mexico, even under the most favorable circumstances, and equally so, that, the longer it is protracted, the more injurious it will be to that country. Hence, however, keenly they may feel, as Mexicans, the injuries which, in their opinion, Mexico has sustained at the hands of the United States government – and the diplomatic intercourse between the two governments, during his own previous administration, as well as subsequently, will show that they do believe, however erroneously, that they have suffered many and grievous wrongs – they cannot be less painfully convinced that they can never obtain redress by an appeal to arms – and that they have much more to hope, even now, from an appeal to the magnanimity of our people and Government, than by obstinately persisting in their present hostile attitude. And we take it for granted, that Santa Anna would not have been permitted by Com. Conner to enter Vera Cruz, had not that officer received instructions from Washington to interpose no obstacle to his attempt, or had he not been satisfied that his influence would be exerted to put an end to the existing hostilities. The fact, too, that Capt. A Slidell Mackenzie was three months ago sent by President Polk on a secret mission to Havana, where he had several interviews with Santa Anna, gives strong color of plausibility to the rumor that there has existed for some time such an “understanding” between the Mexican President and the authorities at Washington as will reder the pacific adjustment of the controversy mere matter of form – unless, indeed, Santa Anna shall find on his return to Mexico, that those who have recalled him from exile are nevertheless in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war. In that event, it will be a matter of very little consequ3ences what may be the personal wishes of Santa Anna, since the whole history of events in Mexico, shows that the President for the time being must conform to public opinion or cease to rule. The facility with which, by the mere edict of a few influential military commanders, at different points, dynasties are overthrown and restored, is sufficient to satisfy us that the Executive is generally a mere instrument in the hands of these chieftains even though invested with the title of Dictator, and not the supreme power in the State.

“What then is the probably opinion of these Warwicks of Mexico – these putters-up and pullers-down of rulers? Had not the restoration of Santa Anna been accompanied by an exhibition of popular resentment towards his predecessor, our impression would have been that the change of rulers would not lead to a change of policy towards the U. States. If, as our previous accounts had prepared us to expect, the authors of the successful revolution, by which Santa Anna has been restored, had permitted Paredes to remain at the head of the army intended to operate against General Taylor, or had even allowed him to withdraw quietly to his private residence, as did President Herrera, when Paredes deposed him and usurped the executive functions, we should have been inclined to believe that public opinion in Mexico was still averse, under existing circumstances, to a renewal of negotiations with the U. States. But the imprisonment of the Ex-President, who has evinced so determined a spirit of hostility towards us, would seem to justify a belief that the leading feature of the policy of his administration is not in harmony with public sentiment, and that his overthrow has been decreed in consequence of his inflexibility upon this point. If this inference be correct, we may regard the restoration of Santa Anna as the harbinger of a speedy restoration of peace. In that event, it will be a subject for general congratulation – for although the United States is in no danger in such a contest, from the worst consequences of a war – the invasion of our own territory – yet there are strong reasons why even our own people should desire the termination of a conflict in which but little honor is to be gained even by repeated victories, the cost of which, in life and treasure, will scarcely be repaid by their fruits.”

News from Chihuahua–Prospects of another engagement-Capture of a party of Americans-Military Executions at Buena Vista and Saltillo

By the last arrival from the Brazos we have received several private letters, from which we glean a number of items of interest that have reached us from no other source, and which we have not seen elsewhere. Information had been received across the country at Saltillo, which would indicate some little work ahead for the American troops sent from Sante Fe to take possession of Chihuahua. On the 15th of December they were encamped at El Passo, from whence it was understood they would march about the latter part of January. The Mexicans in that part of the country, are making every effort to oppose their march with a strong force. At first they did not intend making any
Mr. Freaner arrived at Vera Cruz on Sunday last, the 6th inst., bearing dispatches from Gen. Scott for Government at Washington. He was only four days from the city of Mexico. – He sailed on Monday, the 7th inst., on board the U.S. steamer Iris for Mobile. The New Orleans was detained for two days to give the Iris time to get in ahead – why is scarcely known. – The New Orleans, however, overtook the Iris and passed her before she reached the Balize. – The dispatches brought by Mr. Freaner are of the utmost importance. The nature of them was not generally known at Vera Cruz, but from a source in which we have abiding confidence we learn that the Mexican Congress has sent interims of peace, which Gen. Scott has taken the responsibility of accepting. One of the articles of this arrangement is that twelve thousand United States troops shall remain in Mexico until certain obligations are fulfilled—the remainder of the troops to be withdrawn.
We learn further that the preliminaries of the treaty of peace were signed on the first day of February by the Mexican Government, and that no doubt was entertained that the Mexican Congress, which was to meet in a few days, would ratify the same by a large majority. By the terms of this treaty we understand that the United States obtain the boundary of the Rio Grande, New Mexico and Upper California. The pecuniary consideration for these concessions is a mere trifle compared with that proposed in the conferences at Tacubaya.

Our dates by this arrival are to the evening of the 2d inst. From the city of Mexico, and the information given above comes to us through so many channels and in such authentic form that we see no reason to question the fact.

We are almost overwhelmed by letters and papers by this arrival, but give below as many of our letters as we can possibly find room for.

Orizaba was captured on the 26th ult. A full account of the expedition is furnished us by one of our special correspondents, who accompanied it. His narrative is intensely interesting, but is so long that we cannot possibly find room for it this morning. One of the purposes of the expedition was to capture Gen. Santa Anna at Tehuacan. The wily Mexican, however, effected his escape through the treachery of one of his countrymen. Our readers will be extremely interested in the narrative, which we will lay before them in our next.

Com. Perry returned on the 8th inst. To Vera Cruz, from an expedition to Tlacatalpam and other towns south. We have a report of it, but are unable to insert it today. Our paper on Tuesday will contain a mass of Mexican news unavoidably laid over today.

Two large trains left Vera Cruz on the 7th instant, one for Orizaba, under Colonel Bankhead, consisting of over 1500 men, and the other for the city of Mexico, under the command of Major Caldwell of the Voltigueras.

The expedition which left Vera Cruz on the 24th ult. against the guerrillas does not appear to have effected much. They had two or three brushes with the enemy, but no great harm was done on either side. In the Free American of the 4th inst., we find an explanatory statement in regard to it, but we have not room for it.

CITY OF MEXICO, Jan. 15, 1848.

From what I have heard I am satisfied of the correctness of the information imparted to me in Jalapa, by an intelligent merchant who has resided there several years, that an attempt would be made to raise a national insurrection, but, as it struck me at the time, and, as has since been verified, the conspirators had not sufficient courage or energy to attempt the execution of their plans. The design appears to have been to rise simultaneously in this city, in Puebla and Jalap, and attack the garrisons, but especially the officers. Circumstances have come to light which serve to convince, that no portion of the respectable inhabitants here were implicated in the affair; on the contrary, they were desirous of the plot being discovered, and it was from them information of the design was obtained. – The Padre Jaruara, it is confidently said, was in the city a day or two before the attack was have been made, and was active in his efforts to excite the people and to perfect the plan. It is probable that he will give no more trouble to us for sometime, if ever, as there is but little doubt he was severely wounded in the brush he had a few nights since with the party of Rangers under Col. Hays. His horse and his saddle, stained with blood, and a cloak with his name on it, also stained, were captured, and a Mexican officer, whose skull has fractured by being thrown by his horse against a stone wall in the fight, before dying, said Jaruata was wounded. I would look upon the capture of Jaranta as the most valuable that can be made, and an expedition will be started from here in a few days, which there is strong hopes will result in his capture and perhaps that of Santa Anna himself. The capture of Jaruta would be valuable, because he is active, energetic, and talented, and is possessed of more courage than any of his brother robbers. There is but little doubt, too, that Salazar was in the city upon an errand similar to that of Jaruta, but he, like his co-laborer, found it prudent to shorten his visit.

The expedition to which I refer will consist of about four hundred mounted men, half Texan rangers, and half dragoons, under the command of Gen. Lane, whose activity in the neighborhood of Puebla, in routing the different bodies of the enemy, with severe losses, from their rendezvous, gives promise that he will not return without achieving something important, if there is a possibility of doing so. The expedition will be absent some ten or twelve days, and after thoroughly scouring this valley, in which it is known there are several guerrilla bands, will strike for high game in the direction of Orizaba.

D.S.

MEXICO, Jan. 21, 1848.

The expedition under the command of General Lane, which left the city on Tuesday last, consisted of a portion of Col. Hays’ Texas Regiment, with the gallant Colonel himself, and two companies of the 3d Dragoons under the command of Major Polk. Mr. Scully, your special correspondent, accompanies the party, and will doubtless keep you fully advised of all its movements.

The Star of Wednesday published an extract from a letter of the Secretary of War, which contains an eloquent and well merited tribute to the high military skill and bravery of Gen. Scott and the army under his command. This as it should be. Such testimonials coming from so distinguished a source, are gratifying to the gallant army whose achievements have so richly deserved them, and are not without their effect on the day of battle.

I inclose you a letter from Gen. Bravo to the editor of Los Debates, a new journal published in Queretaro, some copies of which I sent you by the courier who left on the 13th. It was drawn forth by a late publication of Santa Anna’s in which the "Napoleon of the West" charges Bravo with cowardice in his defence of Chapultepec. The gallant veteran, whose humanity to our prisoners here will not soon be forgotten, writes in an indignant tone, and all who were present at the storming of Chapultepec know the falsity of the charge brought against him by the "hero of a hundred defeats."

The Monitor says that Padre Jarauta is neither dead nor severely wounded – that he escaped with a slight wound in the hand. It adds that he had only twenty men in his late skirmish with the Texans, and that since his success in that affair his force has rapidly increased. This is about as near the truth as the Monitor generally gets. His saddle, which was reeking with blood tells a different tale to his wound and the precipitate flight of his band, does not look very much like success. He has two powerful enemies to contend with the Texans and the native spy command of Col. Dominguez; should he fall into the hands of either his race is run.

Updno the discovery of the intended insurrection, some days ago, many persons supposed to be implicated were arrested, and among them the celebrated Dr. Mariano Otero. Yesterday he was liberated, the Governor being fully satisfied of his innocence. The doctor was formerly the leader of the Moderado party here, and for a number of years edited the "Siglo XIX."

The advance of General Marshall’s train came in this morning, and Colonel Miles, with the rear will be in tomorrow. The mail is in the rear, of course.

MEXICO, Jan. 22, 1848.

The boys in the streets are selling an address to the Mexican people, signed by the notorious Jarauta. He calls upon the people to awake from their lethargy and rally around his standard in defence of his just rights. He concludes that the God of Battles has, for some unaccountable purpose of his own, favored the Yankees heretofore, but that "luck must turn some time," and as the tide of success is now at the flood, he conjures the greasers not to neglect the favorable opportunity.

The Star of this morning publishes the following communication in regard to the San Luis pronunciamento furnished to them by a foreign resident, who says he has correspondents at Guadalajara and San Luis Potosi. He is a strong friend of peace, and his wishes may in this instance give color to his views:

"The basis of the plan proves to have been nothing more than a part of a proposition made by the Vice Governor to the Congress of the State, and as it was not admitted, both the Governor and Vice Governor endeavored to coerce the Congress by threatening to bring up the National Guard and turn out the members, but which threat was not carried into execution, as the Commandante General, Amador, was opposed to the proposition, and also the regular troops under his command. This conduct of the Governor is the more atrocious in endeavoring to employ the customary military tyranny, as only a very short time before, in his opening sessional address to the Congress of the State, he had argued that the system of Commandetes General and Government troops should be abolished, as having had the practice of controlling the legislative and civil power. These propositions were printed in an unofficial paper and sent to this city, where the preface to them, announcing the four States being agreed, is reported to have been added by the partisans here."

We find in the papers from Mexico the following orders of Gen. Scott, one of which is strikingly illustrative of his humanity and soldierly feelings:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Mexico, Jan. 20, 1848.

GENERAL ORDERS-No.26.

For the information and convenience of merchants in the interior, who are importers of foreign goods through the custom house at Vera Cruz, it is ordered that, in future, payments may be made in advance, on account of duties on such goods, to the Chief Paymasters, Major Kirby, at this place, and to the Paymasters at Puebla and Jalapa, respectively, for the benefit of the military chest in this army.

Receipts in triplicate, will be given in the case of each payment, and be attested and registered by the commanding officers at Puebla and Jalapa, respectively, and at this place by the Superintendent (Major Gardner) of Assessments. Two of those receipts will be delivered to the payer, or his agent, to entitle him to a credit at the custom house for the amount expressed therein, and the other receipt, be transmitted, by the attester, to the proper accounting officer at Washington, to be charged against the receiver.

When it happens that the money may be more needed, on account of the public service, by one of the other disbursing officers, (the Chief Quartermaster or Commissary) at the place of such payments, the commanding officer will direct the transfer of the money from the receiving paymaster accordingly.

By command of Major General Scott.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Mexico, Jan. 20, 1848

GENERAL ORDERS-No. 27.

It is represented that some of our gallant men who have recently died in general hospital, have not been buried with due solemnity. The General-in-Chief is certain that no blame can be attached either to the Chaplains of the Army or to the Catholic Priests of the city. On due notice, they, no doubt, would promptly have performed the duties of their holy offices at the graves of the deceased.

It is ordered that the body of no soldier, no matter what his rank, if not executed as a felon, shall be buried in future, without the customary military honors, unless the presence of the enemy may render the ceremony impracticable, and also without giving notice to some clergyman, at hand, according to the religion of the deceased.

Patients who die in general hospital will be promptly reported by the senior surgeon of the hospital, to Brig. Gen. Smith, if the deceased belongs to the regular army, or to the senior officer of the volunteers present if the deceased by a volunteer, who, respectively will take care to make all proper arrangements for the funerals.

By order of Major General Scott:

H.L. SCOTT, A.A.A.G.

[From the American Star of Jan. 20.]

“FROM QUERETARO-We have nothing of importance from the seat of Government. The pronunciamento of the State of San Luis had created some excitement, and the Ministers were about making a reply to what is termed so "rebellious" a document. It is in contemplation to send the response to all the States. There was no quorum of members present although several meetings of those in attendance had been held. When shall we have something of interest from Queretaro? Pena y Pena is in the Presidential chair; but not withstanding the appeal in his recent address, the members do not come together. The bold stand taken by the important State of San Luis appears to have taken the Supreme Government by surprise. As its policy and course in relation to the war are the main grounds of the rebellion, we have some curiosity to see the document which is promised in reply to the San Luis manifesto.”

Now I would enquire, what is the meaning of all this? Is it not simply that, from our geographical position,
New Orleans was essentially necessary to our existence as a nation, and that we were obliged to have it, and would have it. Was such a position contrary to the law of nations? Not so. By that law we were entitled to every thing necessary to our existence—not indeed unjustly. But what would be justice in that case? The answer is, to take it, and pay for it a just equivalent. But suppose the soldier would not agree to sell it? Then it would follow, as a natural necessary consequence, that the nation, whose existence depended upon it, would take it by conquest. Refine as you will upon justice—self-preservation is the first law of nature, and it will be vindicated, even at the expense of an injury to another—such an injury being one of the unavoidable incidents of human existence. It was exactly the deduction of wisdom, "That the day France takes possession of it, fixes the sentence, which is to restrain her within the low-water mark"—a metaphorical expression, indicating that, from that moment, she was to be held as an enemy.
But how happens it that the United States, according to the modern doctrine, cannot make conquests? Are we the only people on earth who may lose and cannot gain? Can other nations conquer of us, and not we of them? If we can acquire at all, is not conquest of the modes of acquisition? But Mr. Jefferson, who was not very bellicose in his disposition, and always a stickler for the Constitution, asserts in express terms, "that we must conquer New Orleans;" and, indeed, he goes far beyond, that "we must marry ourselves to England, and by the union, conquer the whole of North and South America, to be held in sequestration for the common purposes of the United British and American nations."
What nonsense it was for the United States to invade Canada during the last war with England, if we could not and ought not to make conquests!
In the Spring of 1803, Mr. Monroe was sent to France to unite with Mr. Livingston in the negotiation for the purchase of Louisiana; and Mr. Jefferson, in writing to Mr. Dupont Nemours, uses the following language: "The use of the Mississippi is so indispensable to us, that we cannot hesitate a moment to hazard our existence for its maintenance,“ and also, "whatever power than ourselves holds the country East of the Mississippi, becomes our natural enemy." He enquires, how long would it be held by such a power, with such an enemy as the United States situated at its door, added to Great Britain?
In the Summer of 1803, and because Napoleon, then first Consul, had been precipitated into a war with England sooner than he expected, the negotiation ended in his making the sale Mr. Jefferson desired.
On this acquisition there was no little croaking and complaint at that time. It was said, "That extended empire, like expanded gold, exchanged solid strength for feeble splendor." The murmur, so often since repeated, was then strongly urged—that it would lead to the extension of slavery—that it would lead to the dissolution of the Union—and, as is too often the case with partisans, when other reasons fall, that it was a violation of our Constitution; but all these croakings, as evanescent as a morning dream, have passed away, and millions of human beings have been rendered happy by the acquisition, whilst our wisdom which controlled our Government in this great and national transaction, the next in importance to the establishment of our Independence.

Upon the subject of the territory acquired, Mr. Jefferson says: "Our information as to the country is very
On the 1st November, 1803, in writing to M. Dupont, after congratulating him and thanking him for the aid he had rendered in the purchase of Louisiana, he tells him:

"It is true, at this moment a little cloud hovers in the horizon. (It was indeed a cloud which continued to hover in after times.) The Government of Spain has protested against the right of France to transfer, and it is possible she may refuse possession, and this may bring on force.-But against such neighbors as France there and the United States here, what can she expect from so gross a compound of folly and false faith-she is afraid of her enemies in Mexico-but not more than we."

Some difficulties existed with Pichon, the French Minister, about the ratification of the treaty, and Mr. Jefferson tells our Minister, Mr. Livingston, "that he had assured Mr. Pichon that he had more confidence in the word of the first consul, than in all the parchment we would sign." (There was something of soft corn in that.) And he tells him "that the treaty was ratified, Mr. Pichon knowing that Spain had entered with us a protestation against its ratification; grounded first on the assertion that the first consul had not executed the conditions of the treaties of cession, and secondly, that he had broken a solemn promise not to alienate the country to any nation." We answered that these were private questions between France and Spain-and so they were, and Spain had no right to wreak her vengeance on us in after times, on that account.

In writing to Dr. Priestly and speaking of Louisiana, Mr. Jefferson says: "Whether we remain in one confederacy or form into Atlantic and Mississippi confederacies, I believe not very important to the happiness of either part. Those of the Western confederacy will be as much our children and descendants as those of the Eastern; and I feel myself as much identified with that country in future time as with this-and did I now foresee a separation at some future day, yet I should feel the duty and the desire to promote the Western interests as zealously as the Eastern-doing all the good for both portions of our future family which should fall in my power."

In virtue of the treaty with France the United States took possession of Louisiana, in opposition to the remonstrance of Spain. But Spain still continued restive-she was the author of many acts of injustice toward us-she continually refused every reparation, notwithstanding all our efforts at accommodation, backed even by Napoleon’s influence, and we submitted tamely through a long series of years. Is it forgotten that she contumaciously refused to permit Mr. Nelson, our Envoy, to set his foot on her soil? To a charge made at the time against Mr. Jefferson, that he was yielding the boundary of the Rio Bravo, which belonged to us, in a letter to Wm. A.Burwell, he uses this language:

"It is not true that our Ministers in agreeing to establish the Colorades as our Western boundary had been obliged to exceed the authority of their instructions. Although we considered our title good as far as the Rio Bravo, yet, in proportion to what they could obtain East of the Mississippi, they were to relinquish West." But no treaty was made.

The French inhabitants of Louisiana complained of the prohibition of importing slaves, a complaint which Mr. Jefferson says may be removed by the introduction of slaves form the other States, which by dividing that evil would lessen its danger.

And, in 1807, in his letter to Mr. Bowdoin, this strong language is used:

"Never did a nation act towards another with more perfidy and injustice than Spain has constantly practiced against us, and if we have kept our hands off her till now, it has been purely out of respect to France, and from the value we set on the friendship of France: We expect, therefore, from the friendship of the Emperor, that he will either compel Spain to do us justice, or abandon her to us. We ask but one month to be in possession of the City of Mexico."

Aye-aye-we ask but one month to be in the city of Mexico. For what? Upon a fool’s errand? If incompetent to conquer or to hold, why go there? And why did we not do it?-Any relation with Spain to prevent it? Never had a nation acted with more perfidy toward us. The only reason was, that Napoleon prevented it!-and shortly afterwards the power of Spain was completely crippled by France, and so continued until the overthrow of Napoleon, and the meeting of the allied powers in 1815, when Spain was reinstated in power.

SPAIN AND THE UNITED STATES

We have seen how matters stood between France, Spain and the United States-that Mr. Jefferson asked only that the Emperor would stand with hands off, and we would be in Mexico in a month. Why? Because no nation had ever acted toward the United States. Let us see, now, how matters progressed between Spain and the United States after Napoleon's overthrow. Just at that time the United States had come out of the war with England, crippled and weak, and she was, compared with Spain, who had been reinstated by the allies, just what Spain was, compared with France, in the zenith of Napoleon's power. In plain language, she was the superior, and we the inferior power-and, just so soon as she was warmed into life, she returned to the old bone of contention-the acquisition of Louisiana in opposition to her protest;--and it must be fresh in the recollection of every one-the arrogance, and indeed insolence, practiced by the Spanish Minister at Washington during Mr. Monroe’s
The terms dictated were, that we were to pay five millions of dollars for Florida, being ten times as much as it was worth, and to cede to Spain the country between the Sabine and the Rio Grande. But this was not all: The line was to leave the Sabine, and cut in two the Red river, thereby giving to Spain the key to New Orleans because, with an invading army, she could be upon New Orleans in twenty-four hours.

Mr. Rivers, in his speech on the Tyler treaty, says "it is impossible to look upon the map and not see that the possession of Texas was essentially and vitally necessary to the safety of the United States." If so, that settled the question. —If holding any portion of the country east of the Mississippi rendered the holder our natural enemy, surely, holding the key to New Orleans did the same thing. He says; "How it happened that we could have agreed to such a boundary, was an enigma which had never been solved." But see’st thou not an awful form arise from tout the earth? Is it any longer an enigma? Mr. John Quincy Adams can tell us all about it if he would, and Mr. John C. Calhoun could do the same thing. It was simply this: that Spain, looking forward to her retention of her Mexican provinces, determined to hold this key— and Mexico understood that thing in after times as well as Spain did.

Mr. Rives says, "it was sufficient for him that Mr. Jefferson and all the distinguished men of the day considered our title to the Rio Grande as complete as our title to New Orleans." If it was sufficient for him, it is sufficient for me, and it should be sufficient with all men. He adds, moreover, "That when the question came to be understood, it would be met with more unanimity than any question which had ever been presented to the United States.”

But we ceded it away, and ceded American citizens along with it. It is said these citizens protested against it and why do not the Texan Senators, who it is presumed are acquainted with Texian and Mexican history, give us some account of this matter? It is said that these American citizens refused to submit to the jurisdiction of Spain, and that Spain was actually preparing to reduce them to submission when the Mexican revolution broke out. But be this as it may—we ceded to Spain all the country between the Sabine and the Rio Grande, and that territory had never been a part of the Vice Royalty of Mexico before that cession was made. The Revolution in Mexico—Mexico consisting of various departments, amongst which Texas had become one, governed by distinct municipal arrangements and political limits—being successful, the sovereignty of Spain was thrown overboard, and the short lived reign of Iturbide, as Emperor, followed that event. This Government soon perished, and the attempt was made by the several States to unite and form a Federal Constitution upon the plan of the U. States. This Constitution soon yielded, too, to another revolution, and the Central Government was adopted, with Santa Anna as a Dictator. In the struggle between Spain and Mexico, the United States treated each party alike. They were both placed upon the same terms in outposts; and when Mexico had succeeded in the struggle, the United States were the first to acknowledge their independence. The independence of whom? Of the United States of Mexico, of which Texas was one.

Texas, one of these confederate States, refused to submit to the Central Government, and a civil war ensued.

What, then, was the state of things between MEXICO AND TEXAS?

It is laid down by Vattel, "that civil war produces two independent parties; that they are to obseve the common laws of war, and that the maxims of humanity, moderation and probity are to be observed on both sides."

How was it in this civil war? A handful of men, of American origin, had been invited by Mexico to settle in Texas. They had acted well their part under the Constitution of 1824. They refused to submit to the Central Government and to Santa Anna, clothed with his new dignity of Dictator, and for this they were invaded by that Dictator, with the declaration of "no quarter," and no man in the United States can doubt, if he had been successful, he would have put to the sword, or expelled from the country, every man, woman and child of American origin.

Whence, is it that there is so much of Mexican sympathy at the present day? Whence is it that to enlist that sympathy she is spoken of as a "sister Republic?" What sort of Republic with Santa Anna a Dictator? Why no sympathy for Texas, who presents a spectacle of heroic virtue, in resisting this attempt to enslave her, which has no parallel in modern times? We had Greek committees, Greek contributions, Greek bails to aid revolutionary Greece.
England and France combined to destroy the Turkish fleet at Navarino, to prevent Turkish butcheries, and yet we stood by and saw the Texans threatened with a like butchery, without saying a word in their behalf. I speak of the government—and when our citizens, yielding to instinct, flew to their rescue, cold-blooded apathy has been inclined to reproach our government for not preventing it.

Mexico and Texas were equal and how many of our citizens engaged on the side of Santa Anna, we are yet to learn.

Notwithstanding the odds in this desperate struggle, the God of battles was in favor of the few and the oppressed, and Texas succeeded in acquiring and maintaining her independence, and took her stand in the rank of nations—the United States, England, France and Belgium recognized that independence, and with them she stood clothed with all the attributes of perfect sovereignty. What was the extent of her territory? I answer to the Rio Grande, because anterior to the treaty with the United States in 1819 the country between that and the Sabine formed no part of the Vice Royalty of Mexico. It went with the Texans upon it from us as a whole, and stood that same whole when it was conquered by Texas. Texas asserted her right to the Rio Grande—suppose she had made good that assertion in the greatest part, and suppose there had been a strip of country between Corpus Christi and Matamoras which Texas had not, but would reduce to subjection, the moment Texas became annexed to us it was our duty to carry out and do what Texas would have done, had annexation not taken place.

As between Spain and Mexico in their struggle we had treated each party alike, and as between Mexico and Texas we did the same thing. But this would not suffice for Mexico—she arrogantly demanded that we should expel Texan vessels from our ports, and demanded that they should be arrested as pirates; and when Texas had expelled her armies from her limits and there was not a soldier to defend our frontier from the Indians, a thing which Mexico had bound herself to do, and when Gen. Gaines had gone to Nacogdoches to accomplish that object, with the assurance from Gen. Jackson that nothing else was contemplated—the Mexican minister declared it was an invasion of Mexican soil—a capus belli broke up this mission, and the Mexican Government, following his example, dismissed our minister, Mr. Ellis, and closed all diplomatic relations with us. Was this a course to enlist all sympathies in behalf of Mexico?

IN the struggle between Mexico and Texas, it is said the United States ought to have been neutral. I deny it. The law of nature is the same thing with individuals and with nations. Is it right for one man to stand by and see a giant cut a pigmy’s throat? We had, as a nation, the perfect right, fairly to estimate the merits of the dispute and to take the part of the one on whose side justice was found to lie. Accordingly, Vattel writes, "That in vivil war another nation may interpose their good offices for the restoration of peace, and this the law of nature prescribes to them; but if their mediation proves fruitless, they who are not tied by any treaty may, for their own conduct, take the merit of the cause into consideration and assist the party which they shall judge to have right on its side." We had no treaty with Mexico which forbade our interference, nor with Mexico, that was not as much a treaty with Texas, a component part of Mexico when the treaty was formed.

It is true, if I interpose to prevent a strong man from murdering a weak one, he may strike me, and I hazard that when I interpose; but this does not deprive me of the right to interpose—and so the United States ought to have interposed and have left it to Mexico or Santa Anna, its Dictator, to strike if they dare.

When Texas had established her independence, and she had established it so far as those were concerned who had acknowledged that independence, she acceded to the proposition to be annexed to the United States. She had a perfect right to part with her territory and to sink her sovereignty into that of any other nation. She did that by her compact with the United States; and from the happening of the event let us see how Mexico and the United States stand.

Mr. Gallatin says, the annexation of Texas was a declaration of war against Mexico. It was so if Mexico chose so to consider it; but it does not follow that it was right or just for Mexico so to consider it. The true question of right or wrong is to be decided by a reference to the merits of the controversy between Texas and Mexico. If Texas was right, we were right in giving to her all "the aid and comfort" we could; and Mexico could not be right, when she had been foiled in the attempt to cut the Texian throats, to make the attempt to cut ours also.

Upon this question the "Doctors disagree."—Mr. Calhoun, who aspires to the honor of annexing Texas, ascribes the war to the march of Gen. Taylor from Corpus Christi to Matamoras, upon the ground that this was disputed territory. Well, it was disputed territory, and how was the dispute to be settled? Were there any other than two modes of adjusting it? One by negotiation and the other by war? Had not Mexico contumaciously spurned the proposition to settle it by negotiation, and what other mode remained but to settle it by arms, that being the last resort and the only one left my Mexico herself?

It is in vain for those who denounce the war to attempt to conceal the fact, that Mexico had determined upon war, and would have stricken our army as well at Corpus Christi as at Matamoras or any where else, the moment she had the opportunity to do so—and had Gen. Taylor listened to the mandate "if you don’t break up your camp and be off in twenty four hours, I will chastise you with a vengeance," he would have been but little entitled to the liberal honors which his generous country is so willing to lavish upon him.

But suppose I have failed to show that the United States were right in annexing Texas, and let it be admitted that that step was injurious and offensive to Mexico—yet for most injuries there are many things that lie in compensation—and immediately on the annexation of Texas a messenger was dispatched with an offer to Mexico of ten millions of dollars—and the superadded offer to negotiate and settle the difference upon terms both just and
I leave out of view Mexican insults, Mexican debts and spoliations, and I demand, if the foregoing synopsis be right, what reason there is for the pronouncing the war unjust on our part?

The vote in the Senate and in the House of Representatives for the annexation of Texas, and that for the acquisition of Louisiana, may be not unfavorably compared. In the last case the vote in the Senate was 24 to 7, and in the House of Representatives 59 to 23. Upon the question of annexation the vote in the Senate was 27 to 25, and in the House of Representatives, 132 to 76.

If ever there was a question solemnly decided by a nation, it was the question of annexing Texas-annexing it, too, although it might involve us in the war then existing between Texas and Mexico. It is a most serious thing to charge a nation with engaging in an unjust war, and disguise it as they will those who make the charge must desire our defeat. I would fear that this was the inclination of Mr. Gallatin's mind.

It is painful to see how by mingling propositions which have no foundation whatever, he has been the author of a publication calculated to injure the country of his adoption, and that country which has delighted, during his protracted life, to listen to him with respect, and at all times to do him honor. I shall endeavor briefly to expose the fallacies which he has ingeniously intermingled in his production.

He has divided his argument into eight parts, and I wish to give it a passing notice. In his first clause, headed "the law of nations," he describes the Mexicans as a "heterogeneous population of seven millions, with very limited resources, and no credit-as distracted by internal dissensions, and by the ambition of its chiefs-a prey, by turns, to anarchy and military usurpers, and as occupying among the nations of the civilized world, either physically or mentally, whether in political education, social state, or any other respect, a most inferior position"-and yet it is this very people in whose behalf all his sympathies are enlisted whilst in his whole production he has not had one moment's leisure to look at the condition of the people of Texas, against whom these Mexicans were waging a war of indiscriminate extermination, for the only reason that they would not submit to be the slaves of this demi-savage people, distracted by anarchy and military usurpation, and occupying only a half-way position in the civilized world, the degraded position he has so eloquently described. He compliments our valor at the expense of our principle concludes that we must be successful-enuires what are the terms which we have a right to impose on Mexico-takes it for granted that all will agree that it must be an honorable peace, and then enquires, "Will any one dare to assert that a peace can be honorable which does not conform to justice?"

Why does Mr. Gallatin ask this question?-Such a question may be asked by one who takes it for granted that our government has been in the wrong from first to last-that, half savage as the Mexicans are, we are still more savage than they-but it ought hardly to be asked by one who has just before described us as an energetic, intelligent, enlightened and united nation, possessing unlimited resources and credit, and enjoying all the benefits of a regular, strong and free government;-and it would not have been asked, but for the inference which the writer would have to be drawn, that our object was neither just nor honorable.

Why not have addressed his homily of "thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, love your enemies, and as you would that men should do to you, do you also to them likewise," to this demi-savage population of Mexico, and have endeavored to bring them into the civilized ranks?-Why not have told them that they must cease to trespass upon the rights of others, before they were entitled to any sympathy either from God or man? And why present them as a people who are privileged to rob because they are unable to pay? Whose land must not be taken from them because they have agreed among themselves not to part with it, and who are privileged to show no mercy to their brethren in Texas, engaged in civil war; but when the lash is applied to them, the eloquence even of Mr. Gallatin is to be evoked for their apology?

Why not have told them that the marauder does not always go unwhipt of justice; that the day of retribution will come?-and that such may be the destitution of principle, "from him who hath not, even that which he hath shall be taken away?" Why not have told them that their conduct was a reproach to civilized man, and if they were treated as they ought to be treated, they would be left in a condition no longer to be cutting their own throats, and no longer to be annoying a neighboring nation, who had practiced forbearance toward them until forbearance ceased to be a virtue?

Why tell those who were averse to the annexation of Texas, that it would be a shameful dereliction of principle, on their part, to countenance shy attempt to claim an acquisition of territory or other advantage, on account of the success of our arms? Is this the part for a minority to set, in a Republic like ours? A thing being determined on by the voice of the majority, becomes the will of the nation; and shame to those who would paralyze that will, so legitimately manifested. The argument is, that having been robbed by Mexico; having prevented Mexico from burchering the population of Texas; having offered to Mexico all just and honorable terms of adjustment, after being spurned and insulted by Mexico, and driven to war, whether we would or not; after the loss of so many valuable lives, so justly to be deplored; after incurring an enormous expenditure, which we did all we could to avoid, we must claim no advantage on account of the success of our arms; and we are told this under the head of the "law of nations."

Is it satirical irony, or sober earnest, which the writer is addressing to the American people? Does he offer it as a deliberate insult to their understanding?
There are two modes of expressing our feelings in favor of those we side with. One is to weep over their failures, the other is to glory in their success. During the war with England, there were many who much more bemoaned the fate of Tecumseh than they regretted the capture and destruction of the city of Washington; and in the present war it is quite obvious that these are many who look so completely to one side of the question, and with such a jaundiced eye upon the position of their own country, that happen what will, they will have it that we must, and will, and ought to be disgraced and dishonored—if not in a military, at least in a national, moral or political point of view.

Mexico has fallen, and they are found deploring her fate. And yet, but yesterday, Mexico was impregnable; she stood protected by the mighty panoply of mothers, reefs sand banks, cariles, Castillian pride and Sastillian honor. Mr. Poinsett was ready to portray the terrific and tremendous fortifications of the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa, of Vera Cruz, of Perote, of the National Bridge and of the immoral city—the terrific defiles and passes in which our armies were to be cut to pieces.

Mr. Thompson, et id omne genus, joined in this war song over the remains of our fallen army: Mexico believed all this. She believes now that she will repel the barbarians, as she styles us, and that she is in the unqualified enjoyment of the best wishes of this and every other land who beheld her enriched, and encircled by honor and renown, by valor and by patriotism.

What say you, brave soldiers—-you who, where the banner of Washington floated to the wind, presented your dauntless bosoms in defense of your country’s cause? Are you a mercenary crew, creeping forth at the desp’ot’s bid, to murder your fellow man, reckless of the causes which led to the catastrophe? To wage an unjust war against helpless, defenseless, injured and insulted Mexico? Or have you stepped forth voluntarily, to reap the laurels of the field of battle, and to vindicate, at the expense of your lives, the interest and the honor of the beloved country whose flag waves in triumph over your heads? Do you want any crocodile tears shed over your graves? Have you not long since learned that the soldier’s meed is the bays of honor and renown on glory’s grave? How do you like to be told that all you have achieved is nothing compared with the disasters which have followed your army?—Are not the survivors, whom Providence has restored to their beloved country, to the scenes of their earlier days and happier hours, when heart with heart delights to blend, received with an enthusiastic delight sufficient to make the heart dance with joy?

Over the dead who have fallen in distant lands—from kindred friends, how far!—may the eagle forever hover with wide spread pinions—

And the red brezet, oft at evening’s hour,
Still kindly lend its little aid,
With gathered moss and fragrant flower,
To deck the grave where they are laid.
No howling ghosts shall then be seen,
No goblins lead their midnight crew;
But Fairy Fays shall dance the green,
And deck their graves with pearly dew.
Adorned with honors on a distance shore,
Silent they sleep and dream of wars no more.

Time fails me. Seven out of eight of Mr. Gallatin’s positions remain unanswered. They are like sets of exchange. The first not being paid, pay to the remainder. I have endeavored to pay the first. And if necessary, I may at some after-time go to the trouble of showing that the remainder of the sett should be treated as blanks, blanks and nothing more.

My object, Messers. Editors, is to vindicate my country from the charge of having been guilty of the greatest crime imputable to man, the crime of having rushed into an unjust war.

When Congress voted that “the war was the act of Mexico,” they announced to the world the exact truth; and when Mr. Clay, with an audacity which merits the indignation of ever just man, rashly asserts that the Whigs who voted upon that question voted a liz, the charge should be hurled back contemptuously in his teeth.

Mexico had, very promptly over and over again, pronounced that the “casus belli,” existed. She took great care to place herself in an attitude, in which she might strike whenever she please. - She had dismissed her President Herrera, because he advocate peace. She had taken Paredes, because he advocated war. She had collected her armies on the borders of Texas, as to whom she had ended the armistice. She was at open war with Texas, with whom we had become identified. She knew that Gen. Taylor had been instructed that it was “not our design” in our present relations with Mexico, that “you should treat her as an enemy,” but she should assume that character by a declaration of war, or any other act of hostility towards us, “you will not act merely on the defensive, if your relative means enable you to otherwise.” And, knowing all this, she availed herself of the first opportunity to carry out an open act of hostility by attacking the forces of Gen. Taylor, in the unquestionable expectation that success awaited her, and inglorious defeat was to be the fate of the brave Taylor and the comparatively small army he had the honor to command. Thanks to this army, the result was otherwise; and he who can see any thing in this transaction to justify Mexico, and traduce us, can hardly examine the matter with a patriot’s or with an imperial eye.

When Mexico has assumed the lofty attitude she had, when she had ruptured the friendly relations therefore existing between herself and the United States—when she had gone off with the debt she owed our citizens in her pocket (for it is to be remembered that war cancels all debts)—when she has assembled her armies on the frontiers of Texas with the avowed purpose of war, it is in vain to assign the war to Gen. Taylor’s occupation of disputed territory. It is possible, by playing a shifty-shaly game, the game of hide and seek, the game of manoeuvre and prevarication—we might have been able to skulk out of the way of Mexico and thereby have postponed the period when the first blow would actually have been stricken. But, for one, I am not for playing that game and for one, I think with Mr. Polk and Gen. Taylor that if Mexico intended to strike, it was right to give her the opportunity of doing so just as soon as she pleased.

The celebrated Mr. Sterne has characterized plemic divinity by the following satire. A battle was to be fought by Gymnast and Tripest.

"Which words being heard by all the soldiers which were there, diverse for them being inwardly terrified did shrink back and make room for the assailant. All this did Gymnast very well remark and consider; and, therefore, making as if he would have alighted from off his horse, as he was poising himself on the mounting side, he most nimby (with his short word by his thigh) shifting his feet in the stirrup and performing the stirrup leather feat, whereby, after the inclining of his body downwards, he forthwith launched himself aloft into the air and placed both his feet together upon the saddle, standing upright with his back turned towards his horse's head. Now, said he, my case goes forward. Then, suddenly, in the same posture wherein he was, he fetched a gambol upon one foot, and turning to the left hand, failed not to carry his body perfectly round, just into his former position, without missing one jot. Ha! Aid Tribet, I will not do that at this time, and not without cause. Wee, said Gymnast, I have fail: I will undo this leap; then, with marvelous strength and agility, turning towards the right hand, he fetched another frisking gambol as before; which done, he set his right hand thumb upon the bow of the saddle, raised himself up and sprang into the air, poising and upholding his whole weight upon the muscle and nerve of the said thumb, and so turned and whisted himself about three times, at the fourth, reversing his body, and overaiming it upside down and foreside back, without touching anything, he brought himself betwixt the horse’s two ears, and then giving himself a jerking swing, he seated himself upon the crupper.

["This can’t be fighting." Said my uncle Tony. The corporal shook his head at it. "have patience," said Yorick!]

"Then Tripet passed his right leg over his saddle, and placed himself en croup. But, said he, it were better for me to get into the saddle; then putting the thumbs of both hands upon the cruppet before him, and thereupon, leaving himself as upon the only supporters of his body, he incontinently turned heels over head in the air, and straight found himself betwixt the bow and the saddle, in a tolerable seat; then springing into the air with a summerset, he turned him about like a wind-mill, and made about an hundred frisks, turns and demi-pommaders."

"Good God!" cried Trim, losing all patience! "One home thrust of a bayonet is worth it all." "I think s, too," replied Torick. "I am of a contrary opinion," quoth my father.

I would not have had Mr. Polk to play either Gymnast or Tripest.

Those who maintain that the war is unjust, attribute it to the march of our army upon disputed territory—let us test that question by the laws of nations.

Suppose our right to the disputed territory to be doubtful one? And suppose it to have been occupied by Mexico? Vattel says:

"In things doubtful, if one of the parties will not listen either to conference or accommodation, a negotiation or a compromise, the other has only the last resource for the defence of himself and his rights—the means of fore; and his arms are just against so unfractable an adversary. For in a doubtful cause we can only demand all the reasonable methods of elucidating the question, and of deciding or accommodating the dispute."

Now all this was done by the United States, and every overture on our part was rejected—Mr. Gallatin’s wire-drawn distinction between a Commissioner and a Minister is a flimsy hypercriticism, and a ground now taken back by Mexico. ON the contrary every approach on our part was repelled with scorn and contempt.

Vattel proceeds: "It is not permitted to take arms to obtain the possession of a thing to which the person has but an uncertain or doubtful right; but he may oblige the possessor, if it be necessary by force of arms to discuss the question, to accept some reasonable method of decision or accommodation, or, in short, to negotiate upon as equitable footing."

And so having been involved in war with Mexico, the motives of the war have been appropriately styled “to conquer a peace”—in doing which, (see page 393,) the United States have the right, according to the same authority, to superadd to all other charges against Mexico, “the expenses incurred the charges of the war, and the reparations of damages.”

In whatever form it may please the U. States to accommodate this controversy, to what extent they may claim indemnity, and whether they shall receive that indemnity in territory or not, remains to be decided by the wisdom and justice of the counsels which control their destiny; and these should remember that they have the right to compromise or concede the honor, the interests and the rights of their own country, actuated by Quixotic philanthropy for Mexico, or partisan feelings in reference to ourselves—the question of who shall or shall not be President being one which shall have passed away and been forgotten when the effects of the decision now to be made will influence the destiny of a large portion of the human race in all after time.

The Constitution declares “that Congress shall have power to declare war,” and to make “all necessary regulations concerning captures on land or sea.”

The consequences of war are governed by the laws of nations—and by these laws the instant our armies conquer territory from the enemy, it becomes the territory of the United States, and that by the highest law known to the political body—the Constitution which governs them. No laws of annexation are necessary. Es vi iermins such territory stands annexed as completely as if it had belonged to the body politic at the moment of the adoption of the Constitution, and at the moment that Constitution conferred the war making power upon Congress.

Thinking as Mr. Rives did when he uttered the sentiment, “that this question, when understood, would be met with more unanimity than any other ever presented to the American people,” I have ventured, Messers Editors, to forward these sheets to you. Give them what disposition you may think fit.

RE48v44n87p2c6-7, February 29, 1848, LATER FROM MEXICO

ARRIVAL OF THE ROYAL MAIL STEAMER DEE

The royal mail steamer Dee arrived at Ship Island on Sunday, the 20th February, from Vera Cruz. She left Tampico on the 13th, and Vera Cruz on the 16th February. She had on board five passengers for Havana, five for England, and ten for New Orleans. Among the latter were Major Dimick, United States Army, Dr. Wiley, Fleet Surgeon, United States Navy, M’lle Dimier. The Dee had on board 100,000 dollars in specie, and 350 ceroons of cochineal.

The news from Mexico by this arrival is important. The courier of the English delegation has arrived at Vera Cruz having left the capital on the 13th February, four days later than our previous advices.

The American Star of the 11th contains the official announcement of the conclusion of a treaty of peace under the signature of Senor Rosa, the Minister of Foreign Relations.

There was yet no quorum of the Congress at Queretaro, from which city our dates are to the 10th February; but a majority of the Deputies in the city are represented as approving the treaty. The Star of the 11th says, that a meeting of the Deputies on the 7th there were twenty-four present. It requires nearly thrice this number to form a quorum.

Gen. Lane reached Mexico, from Orizaba, on the 10th inst., without further adventure.

Lieut. G.A. Schott, of the 4th Kentucky Volunteers, is dead.

Gen. Smith’s brigade was reviewed on the 10th inst. By Maj. Gen. Butler.

Col. Clarke, with his command, was at Cuernavaca on the 9th inst. Gen. Alvarez was making great efforts to cut off his supplies, and the Col., in turn, was taking every means to thwart the designs of the redoubtable commander of the Piatos.

In the Star of the 13th we find the following article in regard to Santa Anna. It is of much importance:

SANTA ANNA—The Monitor of yesterday gives an extract from a letter written by a person of distinction, which says: “General Santa Anna has asked for a passport, to enable him to leave the Republic, and has recommended his friends to sustain a peace, and the Government of Pena y Pena.” The same paper cites an article in the Constitution prohibiting the President of the Republic from leaving the territory while in the exercise of the supreme command, and one year afterwards. Another Queretaro correspondent of the Monitor intimates that Santa Anna’s official communications in regard to his passport, &c., will be published. We hardly know what to make of this movement of the ex-President and at first were inclined to discredit the statement altogether. If it be true, however, that he recommends his friends to support the Government of Pena y Pena, it evinces a very sudden change of opinion in Santa Anna. We suspect that, if any such recommendation has been made, it is for the purpose of securing a safe egress from the Republic, rather than of giving any sincere support to the pacific policy of Pena y Pena.

We may add, while on this subject, that la Bandera del Pueblo at Guanajuato, brings as a letter from a writer in this city, in regard to the late flight of Santa Anna from his hacienda at Tehuacan. It proceeds from the gentleman escorted by lancers who was met here by General Lane on his way from Santa Anna’s residence. The writer say he gave a man fifty dollars for hurrying across the fields to apprise the ex-President of Gen. Lanes’ approach, assuring the messenger that that distinguished functionary would pay him still more handsomely. The letter continues, I should add, that the Government at Queretaro, in agreement with Scott, has resolved upon the imprisonment of Gen. Santa Anna, in order to remove the only obstacle in the way of concluding a peace. The Government has been guilty of the blackest of treasons. Men who have drawn their blood from the heroes of the Independence, seek to shed that of the illustrious Gen. Santa Anna, to remove him form the scene as the only obstacle to the conclusion of a treaty of peace, and they are right, for Gen. Santa Anna will never consent to the dishonor and infamy of his country. The editor of La Banderaradd that a treaty of peace has been signed, and that nothing is wanting but the imprisonment of Santa Anna. We give these passages for what they are worth, but the reader will observe that they are singularly at variance with the statements of the Monitor’s Queretaro correspondents.

In the same paper we find the following notice of movements at Queretaro:

QUERETARO—We have nothing of interest from Queretaro, though our dates are to Wednesday. Another meeting of the Deputies is to be held tomorrow. There were various agents present from the principle houses in the city offering resources to the Government. The minister of the Treasury, however, had made no arrangement with any of them, though much in need of funds. There is much life and animation in the city, commerce was reviving, and those who abandoned the Government in its misfortunes, were coming from every part to offer their respects and obtain their salaries. It would seem from this, that the general belief that peace would soon come, was creating confidence among the people and bringing about a better state of feeling.

The following paragraph from the same paper gives an indication of the state of the country:

ROBBERY—A gentleman who came down from Toluca yesterday says that about midway between that place and this city, a small party of muleteers were attacked by banditti, and one of them killed. The robbers then took some dry goods and put off. Our informant is an American, who left Toluca in the diligence in the morning. About fifty guerrillos, heading by a priest, stopped the diligence to look for Americans, but finding none as they supposed, allowed it to proceed on.

The following article was prepared by the Star evidently for transmission to this country by the British courier. It appeared in the number of the 13th inst:

FOR THE UNITED STATES—Many of our papers will go to the United States, and perhaps a few words in regard to the present position of the relations between the two Governments may be acceptable to our home readers.

We are of opinion that the prospect for an adjustment of the difficulties between the two Republics was never more favorable than at this moment. It has been officially announced by the Minister of Relations at Queretaro that a treaty of peace was signed on the 2d inst, at Guadalupe, between Nicholas P. Trist, commissioner on the part of the U.S., and Sts. Canto, Cueva and Atristian, commissioners on [illegible] art of the Mexican Government. The document making this announcement is conceived in a most excellent spirit, and evinces a disposition on the part of Perna y Pena to use the influence of his high position, both with the people and the Governors of the States, to unite all opinions in support of the treaty. The response of the Governors to the circular of the Minister, asking their co-operation, will probably be shortly known. It does not appear that they have any more knowledge in regard to the treaty than the mass of the people. The Cabinet at Queretaro very properly preserve a strict silence on the subject, declaring that the conditions will be made known immediately upon the assembling of Congress. The President of the Republic is using all his influence for the union of the members for the performance of their legislative duties. Thus far his means have not been commensurate with his efforts. But twenty-five members have yet appeared at the preliminary meetings, though it is believed that the severe meetings, though it is believed that the severe penalties ordered to be inflicted upon the recusant Deputies will have the effect of securing a quorum at no very distant day.

Probably there is as much known in the United States, in regard to the treaty, as in this city. By the masses, it is generally believed that it was dispatched to Washington, by express, immediately after its ratification by the commissioners here. Several of the Mexican journals affirm, that it yields California, New Mexico and Texas, pays five millions to our citizens in settlement of claims, and guarantees the payment of fifteen millions to Mexico for the territory surrendered by her. It is not worth while to speculate upon the alleged character of the treaty until we have something official before us upon which to form an opinion. The Mexican provinces named are all in possession of our troops at this time, and we hold them by right of occupation.

California and New Mexico are a mine of wealth in themselves, and if the indemnity to the United States provide in the treaty be ample, the general policy in the army of occupation will be in favor of peace. No one desires war for the mere purpose of conquest, and all, we feel confident, will sanction an honorable settlement of existing differences. We have taken some pains recently to ascertain the sentiments of the army on this question, and we believe that two-thirds of it are in favor of an honorable peace; in other words, they are ready to sustain the Administration in its well-directed efforts to secure the attainment of this great object.

We congratulate our readers in the United States upon this favorable aspect of the question, and we trust that nothing may occur to present its consummation to a successful issue. Pena y Pena is the man for the crisis, and it is the ardent hope of all Americans in Mexico that he may be sustained by Congress and by the people. Letters from Queretaro, and intelligent gentlemen who are conversant with the state of affairs in that city, affirm that he will be. But we must await the event.

The disposition of the troops continues nearly the same as the date of our last article for the States. Colonel Clarke’s brigade, however, has since left the city for Cuernavaca. Alvarez, who has a considerable force in the vicinity, is endeavoring to embarrass him by cutting off his supplies. The stringent measures of Colonel Clarke, however, will counteract the efforts of the Mexican general.

The health of our troops is not so good as we wish it were—the typhoid fever prevailing to a considerable extent in some regiments, principally, however, among the new recruits. As they leave the city for the interior, the health of the soldiers will no doubt much improve.

We may add that we learn that the 4th Kentucky Regiment has applied for permission to occupy Pachuca and that Tulancingo, a delightful city, about the size of Jalapa, some forty miles easy of Pachuca, will also shortly be occupied.

We publish the following order of Gen. Smith, less for its importance here than to show how thoroughly Gen. Scott is carrying into effect the orders of our Government to quarter on the enemy:

OFFICER OF CIVIL AND MILITARY GOVERNOR

National Palace, Mexico, Feb. 4, 1848.

To insure tranquility and good order in the neighborhood of the city of Mexico, all that part of the territory commonly known as the valley, the basin of Mexico, including the places hereafter named, as annexed to the "Federal District," and placed under the jurisdiction of the Ayunamiento of the city, for all purposes of police revenue.

The quota of the contribution to be paid by the City and Federal District, including the Valley, is $400,000 per annum, and net $268,332 by the remaining part of the State of Mexico—all to be paid in equal monthly portions—those of December and January being now due.

The following is a list of the subdivisions, towns and villages, included under this decree in the Federal district:

EAST OF MEXICO

Divisions-Municipalities

TEXCOCO-Texcoco, Papalotia, Atango, aeman, Chiautla, Chicholoapam, Tepetiastoc, Calpulalpan.

By the Governor:

R.P. HAMMOND, Secretary.
The following is the latest order we see from Gen. Scott:

General Orders-No. 54.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY
Mexico, Feb. 12, 1848.

The 58th article of war directs that “all public stores taken in the enemy’s camp, towns, forts, or magazines—whether of artillery, ammunitions, &c, “shall be secured for the service of the U. States,” or the orders of Government by treaty or otherwise. Until the receipt of such superior orders, not a piece of captured artillery or ordinance, and no captured ammunition, or other materiel, will be taken from any of the forts or cities held by the American army in the Republic, except for immediate service in the existing war.

By command of Maj. Gen. Scott

RE48v44n87p2c7, February 29, 1848, THE TREATY WITH MEXICO

The following is said to be a synopsis of the treaty article by article, given in the New York Herald.

Senors Cuevas, Conto and Atristan, are appointed Commissioners on the part of the Mexican Government, to adjust with the Commissioner of the United States, Mr. Trist, a lasting treaty of peace.

Article second provides for the present suspension of hostilities between the forces of the two nations.

Article third defines the future boundary between the two Republics. The line is to commence in the Gulf of Mexico, three leagues from land; to run up the middle of the Rio Grande, its intersection with the Southern boundary of New Mexico; thence North, until it intersects at first branch of the Gila; thence down the middle of that branch of the Colorado; thence it follows the division between Upper and Lower California to the Pacific, which it strikes on league South of San Diego.

The next article guarantees to citizens of Mexico, now residing in the territory ceded to the United States, all the rights and immunities of citizens of the latter country, provided they take the oath of allegiance; or in case they desire to continue citizens of Mexico, there is guaranteed to them the right to leave the territory, and to dispose of their property to the best advantage.

The next article of importance provides the grants of lands in the territory ceded, made in Mexico prior to the treaty, shall be respected by the United States.

The next article provides that Catholic residents in the ceded territory are to be protected in the exercise of their religion.

The next article provides that grants of land by Texas, made by Mexico prior to the year 1836 shall be respected by the United States.

The next article provides that this government shall take prompt and effectual measured for the defense of the borders from Indian incursions.

In consideration of the cession of territory or the part of Mexico, the government of the United States binds itself to pay Mexico fifteen millions of dollars. In this sum are to be included by three millions of dollars already appropriated by Congress, for the furtherance of peace, and are subject to the order of Mr. Trist. This sum to be paid immediately on the ratification of the treaty by the Mexican Government.

RE48v44n87p2c7, February 29, 1848, THE UNION AND THE TREATY

The Washington Union, of Saturday, has an article in reference to the rumors in circulation with regard to the treaty which is now before the Senate. It asserts that the treaty, was not, as is alleged made by Mr. Trist by private instructions by Mr. Polk, and that the Cabinet knew nothing of it; that there is no provision in the treaty about the Wilmot Proviso, as has been stated; and that there is a large cession of country made by us, “of a greater extent than any country in Europe except Russia”-that the territory does include the bay of San Francisco in the 37-3
REVXLIV#105p1c2, May 2, 1848, GEN. TAYLOR'S POLITICS

Now that the Virginia Elections are over, this question has lost much of its interest—as signs indicate that, whatever the "nolus-volus," spontaneous no-party friends of Taylor may design doing, the old chief, as the Whig candidate, is carefully to be laid on the shelf. But, as the problem of Gen. T.'s true political attitude has excited as much curiosity and speculation as the question gravely raised in New York some time since, "Will salt-petre explode?" we deem it due to his friends to give them all the benefit of the very latest revelation on the subject—and that is to be found in the Nashville Whig, a zealous advocate of territorial indemnity, and once a "sink or swim" supporter of Old Zac, though it has lately been whipped into the "trap of the veteran political gamblers" of a National Convention.—That paper predicts that, should

General Taylor deem it proper to make an exposition of his views as it thinks he will do to rebut the conversations falsely ascribed to him, he will take his stand upon "the great Republican platform upon which our liberties rest, viz: the careful preservation and scrupulous maintenance of the distribution of the powers of the General Government between the Executive, Legislative and Judicial departments, as provided for in the Constitution." The Nashville Whig continues, in a very authoritative tone: "We venture to PREDICT, that he will delcare it to be his FIXED DETERMINATION to leave to the LEGISLATIVE

>Department of the Government the business of LEGISLATION, without interposing his INDIVIDUAL WISHES, much less his OFFICIAL INFLUENCE, to thwart, shape or control it; and further, that he will never interpose his veto, except in cases of manifest haste and want of due consideration by Congress, or where there has been a CLEAR and PALPABLE violation of the Constitution. This, WE UNDERTAKE TO SAY from UNQUESTIONABLE evidence now in our possession, is the broad CONSERVATIVE, WHIG ground, which Gen. Taylor will occupy, and which he is ready to avow his intention to occupy, it elevated to the Executive chair. And this settles all questions, doubt or difficulty, as to the course he will pursue, if elected in reference to the Tariff, the Bank and other national measures. He will leave such questions to the decision of Congress. If THE PEOPLE OF THE U. STATES, speaking through the legitimate and constitutional channel, the LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT OF THE GOVERNMENT shall demand a Bank, he will not interpose his influence in any way to thwart their wishes, should they not desire a Bank, he will not seek to press one upon them; should they, through their representatives in Congress, signify that they are content with the Tariff of 1846, he will not recommend its repeal; should they, on the other hand, through their representatives, require its repeal or modification, he stands ready to sanction any act which Congress may pass for that purpose; and so with the Sub-Treasury, and other measures of national policy, with the exception of such cases only as involve clear and palpable violations of the constitution, or as are manifestly the result of hasty and inconsiderate legislation—in which category is included neither of the Tariff, Bank or Sub-Treasury measures. This, we have reason to know, is the course which General Taylor has marked out for himself to pursue, in the event of his election. And it is the true course, the patriotic, Republican, Conservative, Whig course. Let it but be pursued by our Executive Magistrates, and our free institutions will be co-extensive with all time."

The Times, while itself professing its firm belief, that Gen. Taylor is a Whig, upon the "amply sufficient" evidence now before the public, yet thinks it "right that the opinions of every individual who is prominently recommended for the high office of President, should be perfectly known." It, therefore, is "perfectly confident" that he "will consider it his duty to make a frank, unequivocal and perfectly satisfactory exposition of his views on the different political questions of the day," and it does not doubt that said exposition "will be in the main what is indicated by the Nashville Whig."

Now we ask any candid man to look at the chart laid down by the Nashville Whig, and answer whether it discloses any political opinion of the old soldier. Does it enlighten us on the question whether General T. is for or against a Bank, Protective Tariff or Sub Treasury? Does it not, on the contrary, positively affirm that he has, and will have, no opinions of his own on these questions; but if Congress enacts either of those measures, he will acquiesce, and if Congress should, on the other hand, let matters stand as they are now, he will be equally passive? These Whigs would make the old soldier a mere automation, an inanimate machine in the hands of Congress. The Constitution requires the President to recommend to the consideration of Congress such measures as he may think necessary and expedient. Still the Whigs would have him a perfect mute, a stock, a stone, having no mind of his own, but implicitly following the dictates of Congress. Is it such a President that the Constitution designed? Is it such a President whom this great and free Republic will content itself with?

But, again; if Gen. Taylor has no opinions of his own, how can the people know for what political principles or measures they are voting and what index will the members of Congress have to guide their own votes? To carry any measure, they must have some "exponent," some "embodiment." But according to the political chart laid down for Gen. Taylor, the whole affair is to be pell-mell, regulated by chance and accident. We had thought that the Whigs were surfeited with "Accidencies." If Gen. Taylor be elected President, with no more "satisfactory" exposition than the above, we shall have the strangest administration that the world ever saw—Congress omnipotent—and the President, headless and bodiless, the "exponent" of nothing but the edicts of Congress.

We have said enough to show that this last revelation places Old Zac in no very creditable position, and is but a poor argument why the American people should vote for him. The Republican, however, quotes "the noble and independent" sentiments of Gen. Harrison against giving any pledges in regard to his course when elected President, as identical with Gen. Taylor's position. Now, the very language of Gen. Harrison quoted by the Republican exhibits a glaring contrast between the two. "Old Tip" is represented as saying—"A better guarantee for the correct conduct of the Chief Magistrate may be found in his character and the course of his former life, than in pledges and opinions given during the pendency of a doubtful contest; and, although recognizing the right of the people to be informed of the leading political opinions of the candidates for offices of trust, yet as it regards the subjects upon which the Legislature may be called to act, the pledges and opinions should be required, if required at all, of the candidates for Congress."

Here Gen. H. expressly recognizes the right of the people to be informed of the leading opinions of candidates for office, such as Bank, Tariff, &c.; and in 1840, the Virginia Whigs paraded his letters to prove that he was anti-Bank, for the Compromise Tariff, &c. Has this plan been pursued in the case of Gen. Taylor? Is not the very question in issue his failure to enlighten the people as to his "leading political opinions?"—and does not the parallel, if it exist at all, break off here? We shall not here allude to the scenes in 1840, save only the remark, that it is strange that Mr. Tyler should have been denounced as a "traitor," if he had made no "pledges or promises." After these hasty remarks, we trust that there will be no one so blind as not thoroughly to understand Gen. Taylor's political sentiments, in all their length and breadth!

REVXLIVi105p1c4, May 2, 1848, GENERAL SCOTT AND THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

We regret that we have not room for the Union's long and scathing article upon the trickery of the Whigs in Congress, and their bold and impudent attempt to suppress the printing of Mr. Marcy's reply to Gen. Scott's most elaborate and violent attack upon the whole course of the Administration in the conduct of the war, from the commencement of the Vera Cruz expedition up to the time of the session of the Court of Enquiry in Mexico.

This extraordinary letter of General Scott, the Union characterizes as "on its face a bill of indictment against the War Department, drawn up and sent forward by General Scott at his leisure, and apparently in order to be used at their discretion by his friends in Congress." The Whigs of Congress, for partizan purposes, designed to let this violent attack on the War Department go forth alone to the world, unaccompanied by Governor Marcy's conclusive reply, which on Democratic motion, was in terms embraced in the call for the correspondence. It was evidently with this unjust view, that they attempted to suppress Gov. Marcy's reply, and thus forestall and prevent, by misrepresentation, the public judgment upon a document, which the Union predicts will, when it is published (as it will be shortly) "be regarded as a most triumphant and irrefutable vindication against Gen. Scott's charges of the whole course of the administration and the War Department in the conduct of the war."

REVXLIVi105p2c1, May 2, 1848, MORE LETTERS FROM GEN. TAYLOR

In yesterday's Republican we find the following information: "We are authorized to say that Gen. Taylor has never made the statements imputed to him, viz: that he was in favor of the Tariff of '46—of the Sub-Treasury—that he originated the war with Mexico—nor that, if elected, he would choose his Cabinet from men of both parties.—Not one of these things has he said. The contradiction of these reports cannot undo the mistaken impressions that have had their influence in the Virginia elections, but they will not be too late for the consideration of the Nation.

Our authority is a letter from Gen. Taylor in reply to one from us. We shall present the contradiction in his own words to-morrow."

At the Taylor meeting in New York, which was addressed by Mr. Toombs, of Ga., and Col. Todd, of Kentucky, the friends of Henry Clay were the most numerous, and had the cheering all their own way. So says the Evening Post. [BWP]

We learn from the New Orleans Delta that Gen. Leslie Coombs, so famous as the signer of the celebrated secret circular issued from Lexington, and for his unfulfilled pledge to climb the ash-pole at Lexington feet-formost, in case Mr. Clay was defeated in 1844, is now in New Orleans, and it is said he is giving the Taylor men “Jesse.” On dit, says the Delta, that the General’s visit has some connection with Gen. Scott’s expected arrival, and the movement of Northern politicians, to bring out Mr. Clay and Gen. Scott on the same ticket for President and Vice President. But the New Orleans Mercury thinks Gen. S. will sail for New York and not visit New Orleans—and, moreover, a Scott organ in Pennsylvania says that Gen. Scott will not consent to play second fiddle for any body—and will take nothing less than the first office—the Presidency! But, perhaps, the Claymen, who now imagine that they have “the world in a sling,” will use “the persuaders” upon the General, and, by threatening him with their displeasure and certain defeat, now and hereafter, if he should dare to aspire to the Presidency in defiance of the Great Harry—by such arguments, alternately addressed to his fears and to his interest, they may induce the General to lower his crest a little, and for the present, put up with the chances for the Vice Presidency. The Clayites are still positively certain that Gen. Taylor is politically dead, and that Mr. Clay will be the nominee for President by a large majority of the Whig Convention. We shall see!

The following is an extract from a letter received by the editors of the Enquirer: “I think the State of Virginia should make a donation of books to our Regiment. For be assured, they deserve it. A more high-minded and chivalrous legion never left their native shore to maintain their country’s honor on a hostile soil. When I left them (on the 10th March, on account of sickness and family misfortunes at home) they were like so many long caged lions—impatient to rush upon the foe,” Detachments from the various volunteer companies escorted yesterday to the Petersburg Depot the remains of the gallant Lieut. Easley, who fell nobly in Mexico. They are to be transported to their last-resting place in his native county Halifax. The procession was very solemn.

We lay before our readers a very interesting message, which was yesterday transmitted to both houses of Congress by the President. It called out some remarks in both houses, but in neither was it fully discussed.

We have no space left us this morning for the documents which accompanied the message, or the measures they recommend. But we have no doubt that, the country will stand by the wise and humane, and moderate policy which the President recommends. (Union.

I submit, for the consideration of Congress, several communications received at the Department of State from Mr. Justo Sierra, commissioner of Yucatan, and also a communication from the governor of that State, representing the condition of extreme suffering to which their country has been reduced by an insurrection of the Inidans within its limits, and asking the aid of the United States. The communications present a case of human suffering and misery which cannot fail to excite the sympathies of all civilized nations. From these and other sources of information, it appears that the Inidans of Yucatan are waging a war of extermination against the white race. In this cruel war, they spare neither age nor sex, but put to death, indiscriminately, all who fall within their power. The inhabitants, panic-stricken and destitute of arms, are flying before their savage pursuers towards the coast; and their expulsion from their country, or their extermination, would seem to be inevitable, unless they can obtain assistance from abroad.
In this condition they have, through their constituted authorities, implored the aid of this government to save them from destruction, offering, in case this should be granted, to transfer the "dominion and sovereignty of the Peninsula" to the United States. Similar appeals for aid and protection have been made to "the Spanish and the English Governments."

Whilst it is not my purpose to recommend the adoption of any measure, with a view to the acquisition of the "dominion and sovereignty" over Yucatan, yet, according to our established policy, we could not consent to a transfer of this "dominion and sovereignty," either to Spain, Great Britain, or any other European power. In the language of President Monroe, in his message of December, 1823, "we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety." In my annual message of December, 1845, I declared that "near a quarter of a century ago, the principle was distinctly announced to the world, in the annual message of one of my predecessors, that the 'American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power." "This principle will apply with greatly increased force, should any European power attempt to establish any new colony in North America. In the existing circumstances of the world, the present is deemed a proper occasion to reiterate and reaffirm the principle avowed by Mr. Monroe, and to state my cordial concurrence in its wisdom and sound policy. The reassertion of this principle, especially in reference to North America, is at this day but the promulgation of a policy which no European power should cherish the disposition to resist.—Existing rights of every European nation should be respected; but it is due alike to our safety and our interests, that the efficient protection of our laws should be extended over our whole territorial limits, and that it should be distinctly announced to the world, as our settled policy, that no future European colony or dominion shall, with our consent, be planted or established on any part of the American continent."

Our own security requires that the established policy thus announced should guide our conduct, and this applies with great force to the Peninsula of Yucatan. It is situated in the Gulf of Mexico, on the North American continent; and from its vicinity to Cuba, to the Capes of Florida, to New Orleans, and indeed to our whole south western coast, it would be dangerous to our peace and security if it should become a colony of any European nation.

We have now, authentic information that, if the aid asked from the United States be not granted, such aid will probably be obtained from some European power, which may heretofore assert a claim to "dominion and sovereignty" over Yucatan.

Our existing relations with Yucatan are of a peculiar character, as will be perceived from the note of the Secretary of State to her commissioner, dated on the 24th of December last; a copy of which is herewith transmitted. Yucatan has never declared her independence, and we treat her as a State of the Mexican republic. For this reason, we have never officially received her commissioner; but whilst this is the case, we have, to a considerable extent, recognized her as a neutral in our war with Mexico. Whilst still considering Yucatan as a portion of Mexico, if we had troops to spare for this purpose, I would deem it proper, during the continuance of the war with Mexico, to occupy and hold military possession of her territory, and to defend the white inhabitants against the incursions of the Indians, in the same way that we have employed our troops in other States of the Mexican republic in our possession. In repelling the attacks of savages upon the inhabitants who have maintained their neutrality in the war. But, unfortunately, we cannot at the present, without serious danger, withdraw our forces from other portions of the Mexican territory now in our occupation, and send them to Yucatan. All that can be done, under existing circumstances, is to employ our naval forces in the Gulf, not required at other points, to afford them relief. But it is not to be expected that any adequate protection can thus be afforded as the operations of such naval forces, must, of necessity, be confined to the coast.

I have considered it proper to communicate the information contained in the accompanying correspondence, and I submit to the wisdom of Congress to adopt such measures as, in their judgment, may be expedient to prevent Yucatan from becoming a colony of any European power which in no event could be permitted by the United States; and at the same time to rescue the white race from extermination or expulsion from their country. [REWXLIVi105p4c1, May 2, 1848, (From the N. Orleans Delta, April 22d.) LATER FROM MEXICO.]
The British West Indian mail steamer Avon arrived off the North Chandeleur Island, on Thursday evening, the 20th inst., from Vera Cruz, having left that place on the 17th inst.—By this arrival we have dates from the city of Mexico to the 14th, with later proceedings of the Court of Inquiry, a portion of which we can only make room for in our columns this morning.—Below we give a summary of the Mexican news, from the ample files of Mexican papers and correspondence now before us. As to the ratification of the Treaty, the news by the arrival is not very promising. At last accounts from Queretaro, a quorum had not been formed in Congress. The Monitor, of the 11th, contains a long article condemning the conduct of the members of Congress in delaying the session. Sixteen members were still wanted in the Chamber, and two in the Senate, to constitute a quorum. A correspondent at Queretaro, of the Monitor, thinks the necessary number will soon be in attendance, and that when Congress once gets together, Herrera will be chosen President, since a majority of the Legislatures have expressed themselves in his favor. The news of the ratification of the Treaty, had been received in Queretaro, and some persons entertained the belief that its modifications would be accepted.—On the other hand, we have before us an extract of a letter dated “Mexico, 13th April,” addressed by an English merchant, long resident in the city of Mexico, to his friend, an officer of the Avon, which says: “There is a dearth of news of any kind. Commissioner Clifford arrived here two days ago.—Amongst the Americans the impression is that a treaty will not be made; some of the Deputies, most inclined for peace, swear they will have nothing to do with it, unless the Americans leave force sufficient to support a Government, and I think the chances are that they will not come together in the stipulated time.”

On the same subject, we make the following extract from an article in the Free American, of the 15th inst: “We had occasion yesterday to converse with a respectable gentleman who had just arrived from the city of Mexico. He is a Mexican and is in favor of peace, but says that the members of Congress will not vote for the treaty as it now stands;—that he has heard many of them express their opinions on the subject, and that they all seem to agree that they have not the power to cede any portion of the territory belonging to the republic. Doing this, they think, would be violating the Federal Constitution of Mexico. They would be willing to pay the expenses of the war.

They are also willing to abandon their pretensions to the ownership of Texas provided the demarcation of the boundary line be left to commissioners to be appointed by each government. “In our opinion, if this statement, be true, and we believe it is,—it shows plainly that the Mexicans have again made an abuse of the good faith of the American government.”

We learn from the Monitor that a battle was fought at Santa Cruz de Rosales, twenty-two leagues from Chihuahua, on the 16th March, in which, as usual, our troops were victorious.—The Monitor says “the firing commenced at 9 o’clock in the morning, and continued until dark at night, when the Americans stormed the place, took eight pieces of heavy artillery, six small pieces of ordnance, and more than one thousand muskets. The number of killed on either side is not yet known; but the loss of life on both sides was very great. Don Angel Trias, Governor and Commander, and the officers under his command, were taken prisoners at the moment the action ceased.” Commissioner Trist and Gen. Cadwalader left the city of Mexico on the 8th inst. We do not hear of their arrival at Vera Cruz.

Commissioner Clifford had arrived in the city of Mexico.

It was supposed that the Court of Inquiry would adjourn about the 20th. A conducta from Guanajuato had arrived at Mexico, escorted by forty Mexican Dragoons.—The amount brought by the conducta is stated to be $400,000. Another conducta, arrived from Puebla, Mineral del Monte and El Chico brought 68 bars of silver.

The funeral obsequies of the late Gen. Valencia were celebrated on the 4th inst. at the Convent of San Francisco. The Monitor of the 7th, contains a letter from San Luis stating that the Indians to the number of 2500, are now in a state of revolution, and that their number is still increasing. Several Haciendas, or plantations, have been robbed of all the cattle and horses. Some of the planters have been murdered. The letter also states that the capital, San Luis, is the only part of the State where one can remain with security. The session of the Legislature of the State adjourned on the 31st ult., and deprive, by a decree, Don Adame, Governor, and Don Avila, Lieut. Governor, of their respective offices. Don Juliano Reyes, their present Governor, received extraordinary powers, to last until the meeting of the next Legislature. The election for a new Governor of the State will take place on the 30th of the present month. A detachment of 800 men, sent to San Luis de la Paez by the Government of Guanajuato, to assist in protecting the State against the Indians, has retired to Dolores Hidalgo without firing a gun. Gen. Bustamente, to whom the people looked for assistance, has written that he would come, but they have lost all hopes of getting succor from him.

The Monitor of the 11th says, that the State of Guanajuato followed the example of San Luis, and the Indians are in a state of revolution. The Monitor says that the revolution which was commenced by about forty individuals has now mustered upwards of two thousand partisans.

Robberies were still frequent on the roads and in the city of Mexico. Numbers of families who have been obliged to abandon their homes on account of the insurrection in Yucatan, had arrived in Vera Cruz—some of them entirely destitute. It was proposed to hold a meeting to adopt measures for their relief.

The court martial for the trial of Lieut. John Smith, 3d battalion Louisiana Volunteers, commenced sitting on the 13th inst., at Vera Cruz.—We find no report of the proceedings. The court consists of Lieut. Col. Fiesca, (President,) Capts. White, Featherstop, Besancon, Forry and Wheat, and Lieuts. Curtis and Young (Judge Advocate.) The charges preferred against Lieut. Smith are, desertion; enticing of soldiers to desert; embezzlement of public
It is stated that the General Hospital is to be removed from Vera Cruz to Jalpa—probably on account of the approaching sickly season.

The French citizens of Vera Cruz were to give a grand banquet on the evening of the 16th, in honor of the French Revolution. We learn from the Free American that a supper was given by some of the French citizens on the 8th in honor of the Revolution. Several Americans were invited. The French consul was present, and, like his countrymen, manifested his sympathy for the liberal principles by which the French people will be governed.

Our Vera Cruz correspondent, "Ulua," says: "It is rumored that Gen. Cushing's brigade is ordered to Jalapa." The regular mail coaches commenced running between Verz Cruz and the city of Mexico on the 15th, and will leave hereafter three times a week.

The career of the notorious Father Jarauta has at last been checked. A letter from Queretaro, dated April 2, states that the Father was arrested at Huejutla, by the Perfect, Don Cristobal Andrade. The arrest is officially announced in the Tampico Noticioso.

Capt. Connolly, of the La., Mounted Battalion, arrived at Vera Cruz escorting the mail from Puebla, on the 12th inst. Capt. C. met with a great many guerrilleros, but they made no opposition to his march. He also met a Mexican train of eight wagons, the conductors of which reported that the guerrilleros had levied a contribution of $300 on their merchandise.

I have, however, strong hopes that neither Mr. Sevier nor Mr. Clifford will permit any trifling on the part of the Mexicans, but will tell them at once, without parley, "Gentlemen, here are our terms—accept them or reject them, as you think proper. We are conquerors, and have and will exercise the right of conquerors in dictating our terms." This is all the negotiation that is necessary, and all that should ever have been used. Mr. Clifford arrived here day before yesterday, with the Secretary of the commission, Mr. Wash, and was very handsomely received, all the troops in the city having, by order of General Cutler, turned out to give him a reception.

The following was the order issued on the occasion:

HEAD QUARTERS, ARMY OF MEXICO,
Mexico, April 10, 1848.

(ORDERS NO. 58)

The Hon. N. Clifford, United States Commissioner, is approaching this capital, and may be expected to arrive this evening or to-morrow.—The troops on duty in the city, will be held in readiness to receive him with appropriate honors. Major Gen. Patterson is assigned to the command of the troops on the occasion and will make proper dispositions accordingly.

By order of Major Gen. BUTLER: L. THOMAS, Ass't Adj't Gen.

We learn that Mr. Sevier left Vera Cruz for this city on the 7th inst., and the commander-in-chief has ordered similar honors to be paid to him. Capts. Fairchild and Kerr, in command of two companies of the Louisiana mounted men, escorted Mr.

Clifford up. They will remain here about a week, and together with Col. Biscoe and Lieuts. Kelly and Hunter, also of the Louisiana Battalion, will then return to Vera Cruz. The prospect is still favorable for a speedy meeting of Congress at Queretaro; and for my own part, notwithstanding the contradictory rumors and reports on the subject, I shall be disappointed if the treaty is not ratified within a month or six weeks. In anticipation of favorable action upon the treaty, all the sick who can bear removal, numbering about one thousand, were yesterday sent to Jalapa, with an escort commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Preston, of the 4th Kentucky Regiment. On Sunday night last, between the hours of 8 and 10, a parole of ten riflemen, commanded by a corporal, was fired upon from the building known Kentucky Regiment, the name of the commander of which I have been unable to learn, and a company of Marines, under Capt. Henderson, were ordered out. These forces having arrived on the ground, forty or fifty armed horsemen were met, who secreting themselves in and about the "bull­pen," kept up a fire upon our troops for nearly an hour. Several shots were also fired from the tips of the houses in the vicinity, and two riflemen were severely wounded. Owing to the darkness of the night and the fear that our troops might accidentally shoot one another, their fire was not effective, but two of the Mexicans were killed. A few were taken prisoners, and houses in the neighborhood were searched and the arms found in them captured.—During the latter part of the fight a firing was heard towards the Alameda, in the opposite quarter of the city, and Lieut. Russell started in the direction, from which it was heard, but on reaching the spot no one was to be found. The horsemen that were seen at the "bull­pen" were regularly armed as guerrillas or cavalry, with lances, escopettes and pistols, and it is supposed the object was to break the armistice. The firing at the Alameda was, it is thought, for the purpose of drawing attention that way, and by weakening our forces at the "bull pen," to enable the Mexicans there to act with more boldness and effect.

The twenty­eight deserters I spoke of in my last letter as being about Chapultepec, are still at large. The party sent in search of them was unsuccessful, and they are probably here this in Queretaro. Two privates of the 3d Dragoons were caught in the act of deserting night before last, with their horses, arms and equipments,—2d Lieut. Thos. H. Bassey, of the 4th Infantry, has been found guilty by a court martial of absenting himself without leave from his command, of disobedience of orders, and of conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman, in charging in a pay account, which he sold, $10 for commanding a company in his regiment, whereas he never commanded a company. The court has sentenced him to dismissal from the service, and the sentence has been approved by the commander­in-chief. We first heard of the late great revolution in France on Sunday last, 9th inst., and the day had not passed before measures were taken to afford the Americans here an opportunity of manifesting their joy at the glorious event, and of expressing their sympathies with republican France. Accordingly, a preliminary meeting was held night before last, the proceedings of which I send you. A more enthusiastic meeting I have never witnessed, and the determination is universal that whatever demonstration the committee of arrangements may agree upon to celebrate the event, it shall be one worthy of the occasion.
pretensions to the highest honor in the power of a free people to contest—pretensions founded not on military deeds alone, but upon the most distinguished civil qualifications.

General Quitman is a Democrat in the true Jeffersonian sense of the world, believing in the constitution placed by the great Apostle of the people’s rights upon the constitution, and is professedly acquainted with the whole science of political economy and Government. The best portion of his life has been devoted to the acquisition of knowledge, and it would be difficult to mention the statesman better acquainted with the diversified interests of the whole country than he is. He is opposed to a United States Bank, and in favor of the Sub-Treasury—opposed to a high Protective Tariff, and prefers the Tariff of 1846, to that of 1842—in a word, he is with the Democratic party upon every great principle for which they contend. His private character is perfectly unexceptionable, and may proudly defy the assaults of his political foes.—He is entirely free from all arrogance and foolish pride, in his intercourse with his fellow Citizens, of much simplicity and cordiality of manners, and treats every honest man, who has the impress of his Maker’s image upon him, with respect—in fact he has every great quality, both of head and heart, to render him one of the most popular men in our country, and I verily believe, if he could receive the nomination of the Democratic Convention and the whole press of our party were to come out in his favor, a flame of enthusiasm would be kindled in the public mind for his election, which would bring him into the Presidential chair by a larger majority over Henry Clay (who will most probably be the nominee of the Whig National Convention) than that obtained by President Polk in 1844.

The editors of Democratic papers in every section of the Union, who are in favor of a fair and impartial examination of the claims of the most distinguished leaders of our party in the coming Convention in Baltimore, are respectfully solicited to give the within nomination the earliest insertion in their columns. Nothing is farther from the wish of Gen. Quitman’s friends than to produce the least split in the Republican ranks. All they ask is that his pretensions may be examined, and if another than himself be the choice of the Convention, they pledge themselves to use every honorable means to ensure his success—provided he be entirely free from the leperous taint of Abolitionism, which is now with fiend-like malice gnawing at the very vitals of the Republic, and if not put down by the good sense and patriotism of the people, must end ere long in a dissolution of the Union and perhaps at last in the entire overthrow and destruction of one of the fairest fabrics ever constructed by the wisdom of man for the happiness of the human race.

Gen. Quitman, as President of the U. S., would be guided in his course by the Constitution of his country and would lend his aid to no encroachments on the rights of the South solemnly guaranteed to her in the sacred instrument because he believes that upon the maintenance of these rights unimpaired, depend both the prosperity and perpetuity of our Union. He warmly sustains the President in his claim of Mexican Territory, not as has been falsely argued because “it will extend the slavery of the African race,” but because he believes his own country to have been in the right from the commencement; that the war was forced upon her by the act of Mexico, and such being the case, we have a perfect right, under the laws of nations, to demand some indemnity for the enormous expenses we have been compelled to incur in its prosecution; that while we allow to Mexico what to her will be ample compensation for the loss of New Mexico, Upper California and the harbor of San Francisco, they will prove in the end of incalculable value to the United States; that by the junction of the two oceans we will have it in our power to make the rest of the world tributary to us, and by the treasures thus obtained our whole country will be made to smile with joy and gladness. The contemplated acquisition of territory would, in many respects, it is true, be highly beneficial to the South, but then it is clear to demonstration that the North, as a commercial and manufacturing people, would be infinitely more benefited by it.—General Quitman, though long a resident of the South, is a native of the North, and no one feels a warmer interest in all that concerns her prosperity than he does. Within the wide limits of our glorious confederacy there breathes not a purer patriot, or one more entitled to the respect, esteem, and affection of his fellow-citizens; and should it be his fortune to obtain the highest honor in their power to confer, the Democracy of every State in the Union might say with pride “This is the President of our choices, and we introduce him to the world as a true Representative of American character,—of its patriotism, its chivalry, and its honor!”

VIRGINIUS.

REVXLIV105p4c5, May 2, 1848, (Reply of Captain Edwards.) NORFOLK, April 7, 1848.

Gentlemen: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your kind invitation to a public dinner to be given me by the citizens of my native county, which I accept with no ordinary pleasure. You have been pleased to approve my conduct in the valley of Mexico, and, next to the consciousness of duty well discharged, nothing can be more gratifying to me than the generous approbation of my fellow-citizens, especially of my native county.

Permit me to express my obligations to yourselves for the very kind manner in which you have thought proper to address me, and to return to my fellow citizens of Surry my heartfelt thanks.

With sentiments of respect and esteem, I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant, O. E. EDWARDS, Capt.

U. S. Voltigeurs.
8th. Our Navy: The debarkation of our troops at Vera Cruz gave earnest of the science that directs and of the skill which performs its operations. To prove its gallantry equal to both, it wants only an “opportunity.”

9th. Our Volunteer Soldiery: By achievements without a parallel, they have immortalized themselves, illustrated the annals of their country, conferred imperishable renown upon its prowess, and in the salutary caveat they thus offer to the world, insured it future security.

[BRP]
The date of this memorandum is December 15, more than three weeks after my requisition and departure from Washington. Of not one of the "ten vessels" in ballast, or with stores, (leaving room for troops) have I heard, up this day. Relying upon them, confidently, the embarcation was delayed, in whole or in part, at the Brazos and Tampico, from the 15th of January to the 9th of March; leaving, it was feared not half the time needed for the reduction of Vera Cruz and its castle before the return of the yellow fever.—But half the surf boats came at all; and of the siege train and ordnance stores, only about one half had arrived when the Mexican flags were replaced by those of the United States on those formidable places. We succeeded, at last, in reading the point of attack, in the midst of frightful northerns, by means, in great part, of trading craft, small and hazardous, picked up accidentally at the Brazos and Tampico; and when the army got ashore, its science and valor had to supply all deficiencies in heavy guns, mortars, and ordnance stores.

The first letter that I received from the department, after entering the captured city, contained an elaborate rebuke, (dated February 22,) for having ordered Col. Harney, 2d dragoons, to remain in the command of the cavalry with Major General Taylor, so as to leave Major Sumner, of the same regiment, the senior of that arm in my expedition. There was no great difference in the number of cavalry companies with the two armies. This rebuke was written with a complacency that argued the highest professional experience in such matters, and could not have been more confident in its tone, if dictated to the greenest general of the recent appointments. Yet without the power of selecting commanders of particular corps, no general-in-chief would venture to take upon himself the conduct of a critical campaign. Such selections were always made by the Father of his country, and the principle generals under him. So in the campaign of 1814, I myself sent away, against their wishes, three senior field-officers of as many regiments, who were infirm, un instructed, and inefficient, in favor of three juniors, and with the subsequent approbation of Major Gen. Brown, on his joining me, and the head of the War Department. Both were well acquainted with the customs of war, in like cases, at home and abroad; and without that energy on my part, it is highly probable that no American citizen would ever have cited the battles of the Niagara without a sigh for his country. I am happy, however, that before a word had been received from the department, and, indeed, before it could have had any knowledge of the question, I had decided to take with me the frank and gallant colonel, and hope soon to learn that he and very many other officers have been rewarded with brevets for their highly distinguished services in the campaign that followed.

It was in reference to the same rebuke, that, in acknowledging your communication, I said, from Vera Cruz, April 5th: "I might very well controvert the military principles so confidently laid down by the department, (in the letter of the 22nd of February)—but believing that the practice of the U. States army in the two wars with Great Britain would have no weight in the particular case, I waive further reply—having, at the moment, no leisure and no inclination for controversy."

Alluding to the heavy disappointments in respect to transports, siege trains, and ordnance stores, then already experienced, I wrote to the department, from Lobos, Feb. 28-- "Perhaps no expedition was ever so unaccountably delayed—by no want of foresight, arrangement, or energy on my part, as I dare affirm--and under circumstances the most critical to this entire army; for everybody relied upon knew, from the first, as well as I knew, it would be fatal to us to attempt military operations, on this coast, after, probably, the first week in April; and here we are at the end of February! Nevertheless this army is in hearts and crippled as I am in the means required and promised, I shall go forward, and expect to take Vera Cruz and its castle in time to escape, by pursuing the enemy, the pestilence of the coast."

The city and castle were captured March 29th, and with about one-fourth of the necessary means for a road train, (no fault of mine,) the retreat, in pursuit of the enemy, was vigorously commenced April 8th. The battle of Cerro Gordo soon followed, and we occupied Jalapa and Perote, where we were obliged to wait for supplies from Vera Cruz. In those positions, I was made to write under another disappointment.

In my four memorials to the department, on the further prosecution of the war against Mexico, written at Washington—and, dated, respectively, October 27, November 12, 16, and 21—[it was only intimated to me in the night of November 18, that I might prepare myself for the field]—papers in which I demonstrated that Vera Cruz was the true base of operations, and that the enemy's capital could not probably be reached from the Rio Grande; I estimated that, after taking that great seaport, "about 20,000 men," or "an army of more that 20,000 men may be needed: 1. To beat in the field and in passes, any accumulated force in the way; 2. To garrison many important points in the rear, to secure a free communication with Vera Cruz; 3. To make distant detachments, in order to gather in, without long halts, necessary subsistence."

And that force, I supposed, including volunteers, and aided by land and money bounties, might be raised in time, by adding ten or twelve new regiments of regulars, and filling up the ranks of the old. A bill was introduced for raising ten additional regular regiments; and I certainly do not mean to charge the department with the whole delay, in passing the bill through Congress. But it was passed February 11, 1847; and under it, by early in April, some few thousand men had been already raised and organized. My distress may be conceived, by any soldier, on learning, at Jalapa, April 27, that the whole of that force had been sent, under Brigadier General Cadwalader, to the Rio Grande frontier!

In my letter to the department, written the day after, I said I had, expected that—"Detachments of the new regiments would, as you had promised me, begin to arrive in this month, and continue to follow perhaps into June."

"How many (volunteers) will re-engage, under the act approved March 3, (only received two days ago,) I know not; probably but few. Hence the greater my disappointment caused by sending the new troops to the Rio Grande; for, besides their keeping the road in our present rear open for many weeks by marches in successive detachments, I had intended, as I advanced, to leave strong garrisons in this place, (Jalapa,) in Perote, and Puebla, and to keep at the head of the movement a force equal to any probable opposition. It may now depend on the number of the old volunteers, who may re-engage, and the number of new troops that may arrive from the Brazos in time, as also in some degree upon the advance of Major General Taylor, whether I shall find this army in strength to leave the garrisons, and to occupy the capital.”

I may add, that only about fifty individuals of the old volunteers re-engaged under the provisions of the act of March 3; that the remainder were discharged May 4; that Maj. Gen. Taylor made no movement in advance of Sultillo; and that the new regulars, including Cadwalader’s brigade, only began to come up with me at Puebla in July, but not in sufficient numbers till August 6. The next day the army commenced its advance upon the Capital, with a little more than 10,000 effective men. It is not extravagant to say that, if Brigadier general Cadwalader’s forces had not been diverted from me to the Rio Grande, where he was mad to lose, without any benefit to Major Gen, Taylor, much precious time, I might easily have taken this city in the month of June, and at one-fifth of the loss sustained in August and September. The enemy availed himself of my forced delay at Puebla to collect, to treble, to organize, and discipline his forces, as also to erect numerous and powerful defences with batteries. Nearly all those extraordinary preparations for our reception were made after the middle of June.—And it is known that the news of the victory of Buena Vista reached Washington in time to countermand Cadwalader’s orders for the Rio Grande, before his departure from New Orleans. Two rifle companies, with him, received the countermand there, and joined me early.

I know that I had the misfortune to give offence to the department, by expressing myself to the same effect from Jalapa, May 6. In a report of that date, I said: “The subject of that order (No. 135, old volunteers) has given me long and deep solicitude. To part with so large and so respectable a portion of this army, in the middle of a hostile country which, though broken in its power, is not yet disposed to sue for peace—to provide for the return home of seven regiments from this interior position, at a time when I find it quite difficult to provide transportation and supplies for the operating forces which remain—and all this without any prospect of succor or reinforcements in, perhaps, the next seven months—beyond some 300 army recruits—present novelties utterly unknown to any invading army before. With the addition of ten of twelve thousand new levies in April or May—asked for, and until very recently expected—or even with the addition of two or three thousand new troops, destined for this army, but suddenly, by the orders of the War Department, diverted to the Rio Grande frontier; I might, notwithstanding the unavoidable discharge of the old volunteers—seven regiments and two independent companies—advance with confidence upon the enemy’s capital. I shall, nevertheless, advance; but whether beyond Puebla, will depend on intervening information and reflection. The general panic given to the enemy at Cerro Gordo still remaining, I think it probable that we shall go to Mexico; or, if the enemy recover from that, we must renew the consternation by another blow.”

Thus, like Cortez, finding myself isolated and abandoned, and again, like him, always afraid that the next ship of messenger might recall or farther cripple me—I resolved no longer to depend on Vera Cruz or home, but to render my little army “a self-sustaining machine” as I informed every body, including the head of the War Department—and advanced to Puebla.

It was in reference to the foregoing serious causes of complaint, and others, to be found in my reports at large—particularly in respect to money for the disbursing staff officers, clothing, and Mr. Trist, commissioner—that I concluded my report from Puebla, June 4, in these words: “Considering the many cruel disappointments and mortifications I have been made to feel since I left Washington, and the total want of support or sympathy on the part of the War Department, which I have so long experienced, I beg to be recalled from this army the moment it may be safe for any person to embark at Vera Cruz—which, I suppose, will be early in November. Probably all field operations will be over long before that time.”

But my next report [July 25] from Puebla has, no doubt, in the end, been deemed more unpardonable by the department. In that paper, after speaking of the happy change in my relations, both official and private, with Mr. Trist,” I continued:

“Since about 26th ultimo [June] our intercourse has been frequent and cordial, and I have found him [Mr. T.] able, discreet, courteous, and amiable. At home it so chanced that we had but the slightest possible acquaintance with each other. Hence more or less of reciprocal prejudice; and of the existence of his feeling towards me, I knew (by private letters) before we met, that at least a part of the cabinet had a full intimation. Still, the pronounced misunderstanding between Mr. Trist and myself could not have occurred but for other circumstances: 1. His being obliged to send forward your letter of April 14, instead of delivering it in person, with the explanatory papers which he desired to communicate; 2. His bad health in May and June, which I am happy to say has now become good; 3. The extreme mistification into which your letter, and particularly an interlineations, unavoidably threw me. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that all I have heretofore written to the department about Mr. Trist should be suppressed. I make this declaration as due to my present esteem for that gentleman; but ask no favor, or desire none, at the hands of the department. Justice to myself, however tardy, I shall take care to have done. * * *

I do not acknowledge the justice of either of your rebukes contained in the letter of May 31, (in relation to Mr. Trist and the prisoners at Cerro Gordo;) and that I do not here triumphantly vindicate myself, is not from the want of will, means, or ability, but time. The first letter (dated February 22) received from you, at Vera Cruz, contained a censure, and I am now rebuked for the unavoidable—nay, wise, if it had not been unavoidable—release on parole, of the prisoners taken at Cerro Gordo—even before one word of commendation from government has reached this army on account of its gallant conduct in the capture of those prisoners. (No such commendation has yet been received—February, 1848.)—So, in regular progression, I may, should the same army gallantly bear me into the city of Mexico, in the next six or seven weeks—which is probable, if we are not arrested by a peace or a truce—look to be dismissed from the service of my country! You will perceive that I am aware (as I have long been) of the dangers which hang over me at home; but I, too, am a citizen of the United States, and well know the obligations imposed under all circumstances by an enlightened patriotism. In respect to money, I beg to report that the chief commissary (Captain Grayson) of this army has not received a dollar from the States since we landed at Vera Cruz, March 9.—He now owes more than $200,000, and is obliged to purchase on credit, at great disadvantages. The chief quartermaster (Captain Irwin) has received perhaps $60,000, and labors under like incumbrances. Both have sold draughts to small amounts, and borrowed largely of the pay department, which has received about half of the money estimated for.—Consequently, the troops have some four months’ pay due them. Our poverty, or the neglect of the disbursing departments at home, has been made known, to our shame, in the papers of the capital here, through a letter from Lieut. Col. Hunt, that was found on the person of the special messenger from Washington. The army is also suffering greatly from the want of necessary clothing—including blankets and great-coats.—The new troops, (those who have last arrived,) as destitute as the others, were first told that they would find abundant supplies at New Orleans; next at Vera Cruz, and finally here; whereas we now have, perhaps, a thousand hands making shoes and (out of bad materials and at high rates,) pantaloons. These articles, about 3,000 pairs each, are absolutely necessary to cover the nakedness of the troops. February 28, off Lobos, I wrote to Brigadier General Brooke to direct the quartermaster at New Orleans to send to me large supplies of clothing. March 10-23, General Brooke replied that the quartermaster at New Orleans had ‘neither clothing nor shoes;’ and that he was ‘fearful that, unless they have been sent out to you direct, you will be much disappointed.’ Some small quantity of clothing, perhaps one-fifth of our wants, came to Vera Cruz from some quarter, and followed us to Jalapa and this place.”

I must here specially remark, that this report, No. 30, though forwarded the night of its date, (July 25,) seems to have miscarried. Perceiving, about November 27, that it was not acknowledged by the department, I caused a duplicate to be made, signed it, and sent it off by the same conveyance with my despatch No. 36, and the charges against Brevet Major General Worth, Major General Pillow, and Brevet Lieut. Col. Duncan, together with the appeal against me of the former. All these are acknowledged by the department in the same letter (Jan. 13) that recalls me.

It was that budget of papers that caused the blow of power, so long suspended, to fall on a devoted head. The three arrested officers, and he who had endeavored to enforce a necessary discipline against them, are all to be placed together before the same court;—the innocent with the guilty, the accuser and the accused, the judge and his prisoners, are dealt with alike. Most impartial justice!—But there is a discrimination!—No with a vengeance! While the parties are on trial—if the appealer is to be tried at all, which seems doubtful—two are restored to their corps—one of them with his brevet rank—and I am deprived of my command! There can be but one step more in the same direction:—throw the rules and articles of war into the fire, and leave all ranks in the army free to engage in denunciations and a general scramble for precedence, authority, and executive favors. The pronunciamento, on the part of my factious jurors, is most triumphant.

My recall—under the circumstances, a severe punishment before trial—but to be followed by a trail here, that may run into the autumn—and on matters I am but partially permitted to know by the department and my accusers—is very ingenuously placed on two grounds: 1. My own request, meaning that of June 4, (quoted above, and there was no other before the department,) which had been previously (July 12) acknowledged and rebukingly declined. 2. The arrest of Brevet Major General Worth, for writing to the department “under the pretext and form of an appeal,” an open letter, to be sent through me, in which I was grossly and falsely accused of “malice” and “conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman, in the matter of the general order No. 349, on the subject of puffing letters for the newspapers at home.

On that second point, the letter from the department of January 13 is more than ingenious; it is elaborate, subtle, and profound—a professional dissertation, with the rare merit of teaching principles until now wholly unknown to military codes and treatises, and of course to all mere soldiers, however great their experience in the field.

I have not in this place time to do more than hint at the fatal consequences of the novel doctrine in question. According to the department, any factious junior may, at his pleasure, in the midst of the enemy—using “the pretext and form of an appeal” against his commander, insult and outrage him to the grossest extent—though he be the general-in-chief, and charged with the conduct of the most critical operations; and that commander may not arrest the incipient mutineer, until he shall have first laid down his own authority, and submitted himself to a trail, or wait at least until a distant period of leisure for a judicial examination of the appeal! And this is precisely the case under consideration. The department, in its eagerness to condemn me, could not take time to learn of the experienced, that the general-in-chief who once submits to an outrage from his junior, must lay his account to suffer the like from all the vicious under him—at least down to a rank that may be supposed without influence, in high quarters, beyond the army. But this would not be the whole mischief to the public service—Even the great mass of the spirited, intelligent and well affected among his brothers in arms, would soon reduce such commander to utter imbecility, by holding him in just scorn and contempt for his recreancy to himself and country.—And are discipline and efficiency of no value in the field? But it was not my request of June 4, nor report No. 30, [of July 25] so largely quoted from above; nor yet the appeal of one pronunciado that has at length brought down upon me this visitation, so clearly predicted. That appeal, no doubt, had its merits—considering it came from an erratic brother—a deserter from the predicted. That appeal, no doubt, had its influence proceeding from the other arrested general—who is quite willing that it should generally be understood [and who shall gainsay his significant acquiescence?]—that all rewards and punishments in this army, were, from the first, to follow his recommendations. This, the more powerful of the pronunciados against No. 349, well knew a the time, as I soon knew, that he was justly obnoxious, not only to the animadversions of that order, but to other censures of yet a much graver character.

In respect to this general, the letter of recall observes, parenthetically, but with an acumen worthy of more than a “hasty” notice, that some of my specifications of his misconduct are hardly consistent with “your [my] official reports and communications.”

Seemingly, this is a most just rebuke. But, waiting for the trials, I will here briefly state, that, unfortunately, I followed that General’s own reports, written and oral; that my confidence, lent him, in advance, had been but very slightly shaken, as early as the first week in October; that, up to that time, from our entrance into the city, I had been at the desk, shut out from personal intercourse with my brother officers, and that it was not till that confinement that facts, conduct and motives began to pour in upon me.

A word as to the 5th article of war. I can truly say that, in this and other communications, I have not designed the slightest disrespect to the commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States. No doubt he, like myself and all others, may fall into mistakes as to particular men; and I cannot, having myself been behind the curtain, admit the legal fiction that ALL acts of a Secretary are the acts of the President. Yet, in my defensive statements, I have offered no wanton discourtesy to the head of the War Department, although that functionary is not in the enumeration of the above-mentioned article.

Closing my correspondence with the department, until after the approaching trial, I have the honor to remain, respectfully,

Your most obedient servant,

WINFIELD SCOTT

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR, Washington D.C.

REv45i1p1c4, May 5, 1848, Sort of Dilemma.

The Editors of the Whig seem to have sprung from their beds at an early hour on Tuesday morning, to enjoy the perusal of Old Zac’s letter in the Republican; for yesterday’s “leader,” of “unreasonable length,” was struck off at a heat, before the arrival of the Allison letter, which reached us by the Southern mail about half past 10<A.M. The Whig’s comments on the Baldwin or Gallaher letter open with the ominous remark, that “letter-writing has been the death of more than one Presidential aspirant, of not occasionally of a nominee for that office.” It then proceeds to show why such are the fatal results of letter-writing, and argues, that Mr. Polk, “an adroit politician,” (the Whig press have generally ridiculed him as an “imbecile”—a nobody!) by writing one single letter, the famous “Kane letter, the model of an electioneering epistle,” succeeded in utterly “confounding those who insisted(ed) on “putting him to the question” by the use of phrases.” It is far different, argues the Whig, with the “ingenuous, unsophisticated, unambitious” General Taylor, and the “open, frank and fearless” Mr. Clay, (the Whig does not say that he is “unambitious!”) who, “if they answer at all, as they are apt to do, will reply in categorical and explicit terms.” Hence, says the Whig, the defeat of Mr. Clay, who “answered all questions, whether from friend or foe, careless of all consequences, and desirous that his views on all questions of public policy might be understood.” And hence, we presume, the expected defeat of Gen. Taylor, who, the Whig informs us, “has written too many letters.” It is true, as that paper says, from General Taylor’s position, “he had necessarily very little to say;” but the “misrepresentations of his opinions” compelled, him to “come out” in his letter to Mr. Baldwin or Mr. Gallaher. But, still, if the Whig means, any thing at all, it clearly means that General Taylor, who “has written too many letters,” has subjected himself to the category of the “open, frank, and fearless” but unfortunate Mr. Clay, and that, like his great prototype in letter-writing, he, too, must, for his multifarious epistles, reap the bitter fruits of “defeat.” And here we would remark, that the Whig in diluting upon Mr. Clay’s fatal cacoteries scribendi does great injustice to Messrs. Polk and Buchanan’s “electioneering,” and gives vastly too much credit to Mr. Clay’s “openness and frankness.” Mr. Polk wrote one single letter, which was read from one end of the Union to the other, and the views of which have been fully realized and carried out, since his elevation to the Presidency. [And, strange to say, the only sentence in the Kane letter upon which any doubt has been expressed, is almost identical, word for word, with a snetnec in one of Mr. Clay’s Georgia anti-Tariff letters!]—Mr. Clay, on the other hand, wrote a number of letters, suited to the Northern and Southern latitudes respectively. Of his many letters on Texas, some were quoted at the North, decidedly against annexation, and others cited at the South, to prove that his election alone would secure the admission of Texas. “Good Cassius” tells us that Mr. Clay on the Native American question wore two faces. On the Tariff, too, Mr. Clay’s letters to Georgia and his letter to Pennsylvania were of an antagonistic aspect. And on this question the Whig does great wrong to Mr. Buchanan. That gentleman did not, as had been fully proved, contend that Mr. Polk was a better Tariff man than Mr. Clay, but that he was as good a Tariff man; and his grounds were, that Mr. Clay, in his Georgia letter, had advocated the Compromise Act, as had done Mr. Polk. When Mr. Buchanan made his speech, Mr. Clay’s letter to Pennsylvania, openly in favor of “protection,” had not appeared. It was from his Georgia letter that Mr. Buchanan drew his parallel. When the later letter to Pennsylvania appeared, the whole aspect of the affair was changed. So much for Mr. Clay’s “openness and frankness” in writing various letters to suit various places. Is it strange that he was so utterly prostrated in 1844?

But to return from a digression, which we could not avoid, to the Whig’s comments upon the Baldwin or Gallaher
Thus far all goes smoothly; but, on looking more closely into the letter, the Whig sees distinctly that Old Zac has flouted the banner of revolt in the face of the Whig party; that, in defiance of all conventions, he means to be a candidate at all hazards, and that he will not quit the field, or “surrender” his independent position, for Mr. Clay or any body else! The Whig has too often lashed the “folly and madness” of those who would set up for themselves, independent of Whig organization, now to submit to any such proposition—and it gives to Old Zac and his “independent” friends a plain talk, which we copy in full.—Its argument is unanswerable. It tells the peculiar nolus volus Taylorites, that the game they would play is “rather too strong”—even for the “veteran political gamblers of the National Convention”—that the members of that body will never submit to the game “Heads I win, Tails you lose,” by which they must lose all and gain nothing—in a word, that as long as old Zac stands on his present independent position, he is in imminent danger of defeat both in the nomination and election. But it is unnecessary for us to make any comment on the Whig’s argument. It cannot be strengthened, as all who read the following will admit. The “independency” of Gen. Taylor means utter “disorganization” of the Whig party and openly defies their National Convention:

"In one word, we have not the shadow of a doubt that he is in all essential points "A WHIG UPON PRINCIPLE;" and, entertaining this undoubting conviction we are prepared to support him cordially and zealously, IF HE BE THE NOMINEE OF THE WHIG PARTY. We regret, therefore—and it is the only thing we much regret to see in the foregoing letter—that Gen. Taylor, while expressing a willingness to receive, under any circumstances, the nomination of the Whig National Convention, should have deemed it necessary to say, in so many words, that, should he fail to do so, he will, so far as it depends upon himself, remain a candidate. Such a declaration is calculated to deprive him of that nomination, if there were otherwise a certainty of his getting it—"Heads I win, Tails you lose," is rather too strong a game, in politics, as in less important matters. The very basis upon which Conventions are organized is a spirit of compromise;—the members, as well as those who are willing to receive the votes of such bodies, consenting, for the sake of a common triumph, to submit to the chances of an individual sacrifice. If this rule is to be violated—if one of the individuals willing to receive its votes, may say "if you nominate me, I will be a candidate in opposition to your nominee," it is manifest that Conventions are themselves solemn farces, or even worse. It can scarcely be expected that some two hundred and fifty gentlemen will consent to meet in Philadelphia, in June next, from the most remote parts of the Union, at great inconvenience and expense to many if not all of them, simply for the purpose of NOMINATING A GENTLEMAN WHO IS ALREADY IN THE FIELD, "NOLENS VOLENS," and intends so to remain, whether a majority of them shall think it advisable or unadvisable. For one, we confess we do not like this part of Gen. Taylor’s letter; and, foreseeing that it will constitute an insuperable objection with some, who would be otherwise in favor of General Taylor’s nomination, we regret that he has been induced to assume an attitude so embarrassing to all of his friends, except the handful who expect to support him as an “independent” candidate, and which may have the effect of defeating his own nomination and election. That the General does not care to be elected, one may readily infer from the language of his letter, but if he be thus indifferent to his own success, he ought to feel some anxiety for the triumph of sound principles and wholesome measures; and we do not very clearly comprehend, therefore, why he has determined so pertinaciously to cling to his position as a candidate for an office that he does not want, in opposition to both the Whig and Democratic nominees, IF BY DOING SO HE SHALL WEAKEN AND DEFEAT THE FORMER, and render the election of the latter inevitable."

Soon after the above positive declarations of the Whig were penned, the Allison letter came intot he hands of the Whig Editor, and in a P.S., he eagerly clutches at a single expression, as affording some little hope of safety. He says:

"We are more pleased with it than we have been with any previous exposition of his views. Indeed, as an enunciation of general principles, it meets our unqualified approbation; and had we received it before our comments had been prepared on his letter to the Editors of the Republican, we should have deemed them unnecessary. But, as they were written, we let them remain. We understand clearly now, that although General Taylor will not withdraw his own name in the event of the nomination of another individual by the Philadelphia Convention, yet his FRIENDS are at liberty to do so whenever THEY may deem it expedient; and that they will unquestionably advise his withdrawal in the event of the nomination of any other Whig, cannot be doubted. The peculiarity of the circumstances under which the General was brought forward as a candidate, AUTHORIZES, and almost COMPELS him to take this ground; and, for one, we are satisfied with it; as, indeed, we are with the admirable sentiments—and especially those relative to EXECUTIVE POWER AND INFLUENCE—embodied in his letter."

Why were the Whig’s comments “unnecessary”? Does the old soldier’s second letter “surrender” the independent ground of the first? Does it indicate that he will leave the field and submit to the Convention? On the contrary, does it not, as the Republican truly says, confirm that position? It is the merest quibble, then, in the Whig to profess to be satisfied, with its former very strong expressions in the same article staring the reader in the face. But last evening’s Republican cuts away even this last plank of the Whig.

The Republican’s editors certainly ought to know what the Old Hero means. As his correspondents, they are his best commentators—and what do they say? They say that they “wish to be clearly understood, for we would not desire a vote, nor seek to retain one for Gen. Taylor upon grounds which are not sanctioned by his real views and position.” They, therefore, argue conclusively, that Gen. Taylor’s position, as emphatically announced in the letter to themselves, is "entirely confirmed in the letter to Captain Alison"—that they wrote to him expressly "in regard to his independent position," for they "wished no concealment"—and that his letter, as published, shows his "true ground in every respect." They continue as follows:

"Gen. Taylor, then, does not desire to withdraw, let who will be the Candidate of the Whig Convention. He cannot withdraw, because he is already the candidate of the people, made so without reference to Conventions, by men of all parties.—His declaration upon this point, in his letter to the Republican, harmonizes with those of every letter he has written, and is confirmed, instead of being modified, by the following manly avowal in his letter to Capt. Alison:

'I have consented to the use of my name as a candidate for the Presidency. I have frankly avowed my own distrust of my fitness for that station; but, having, at the solicitation of many of my countrymen, taken my position as a candidate, I do not feel at liberty to surrender that position, until my friends manifest a wish that I should retire from it. I will then most gladly do so.'

In other words, Gen. Taylor, is in the hands of his "COUNTRYMEN," and, being a candidate by their act, not his own, he will cease to be such when it is their desire that he should retire. And who are the "countrymen" to whom he refers?—Why undoubtedly the people—Whigs, Natives and Democrats—who, through their various Conventions and presses, have called him to the field. It is for them to say whether he shall withdraw; for them, who have never appealed to a National Convention, and many of whom are not, in fact, Whigs at all, say whether he shall retire at the dictation of a caucus. It may be as well understood now as ever, that the people have placed Gen. Zachary Taylor in the field; that he shall not be withdrawn, AND WILL NOT BE WITHDRAWN. We make this declaration, because it is the truth, and we wish no man to support him on any mistaken supposition. We shall be sorry if its effect is to drive any of our Whig friends from his banner, but we console ourselves with the full assurance that those Whigs who will refuse to support him are those who would never, in any event, have given him a support worth having; and that their places will be more than supplied by independent and patriotic millions of the American People.”

Nothing can be stronger than this language.—Indeed the plain words of Gen. Taylor’s two letters can mean nothing else, however the Whig may torture them by quibbles. The old soldier has taken his stand—his "friends" have taken their stand—and "he will not be withdrawn," whether Henry Clay or any other Whig be nominated by the Convention. Here, it strikes us, the road in the Whig ranks must "make a fork."—We shall see whether "independency" or "Whig organization" will "surrender"—whether the "handful" or the other faction will give way. As the day for the Convention approaches, we will have some "rich" developments.

Hereafter we shall have a word to say as to the exposition of Gen. Taylor’s "principles" in the Alison letter.

The steamship Massachusetts has arrived at New Orleans from Vera Cruz, but with no later news. This is the vessel which was, it was said, to convey Gen. Scott to N. York. We presume, therefore, that not the North but New Orleans is his destination. She brought over several officers, with 148 sick soldiers—also the remains of Lieut. Perrin Watson, 14th Infantry; Lieut. M. L. Shackelford, 2d Artillery; Lieut. Calvin Benjamin, 4th Artillery, and Mr. T. T. Tucker, of East Tennessee.

The people of Texas are improving their rivers and opening their roads. A steamer now runs regularly between Galveston and Port Lavaca, in connexion with the line of steam ships to N. Orleans—a reat convenience to Western Texas.

The anniversary of the battle of San Jacinto—the 21st of April—was celebrated "with all the honors " in Galveston.

REV45i1p1c6, May 5, 1848, No title.

The Matamoras Flag of the 8th April has the following painful news from Monterey to the 29th ult. We trust that there may be some mistake as to the alleged murders:

The news of the ratification of the treaty by the U. States Senate reached Gen. Wool on the morning of the 29th, and, it is said, produced quite a stir in camp. It was rumored in Monterey, though not much credit was given to the story, that several American merchants had been recently murdered near the Mazipil.

The Monterey Gazette learns from its agent in Saltillo, that three men of the Virginia regiment had been murdered at Parras a few days ago. The murderers were arrested, and it was supposed would be hung.

Appropriate honors were paid by the garrison at Monterey, on the 23rd ult., to the memory of John Q. Adams.

[BWP]
We publish to-day Gen. Scott’s most extraordinary and unprovoked letter, which wantonly assails the Administration as guilty of the bases crimes and misdemeanors. As the Union says, it is like a bill of indictment, showing on its face that it was entirely uncalled for and baseless in its charges. The defence of Mr. Marcy we shall publish as rapidly as possible. It is one of the most powerful papers we have ever read, and, as a Whig friend observed yesterday, portions of it are worthy of “Junius.” The answer is conclusive, overwhelming, and the accuser is utterly refuted by his own evidence. This remarkable letter of Mr. Marcy will elevate him to a high eminence in public opinion. Even the most thorough Whigs admit the power of the paper and the perfect vindication of the War Department from the unjust and sweeping assault. A highly intelligent member of that party has said that Mr. Marcy has not left General Scott “one inch of ground to stand upon, nor a loop to hang doubt upon.” But our readers will judge for themselves. For Gen. Scott, as a skillful and accomplished officer and soldier, we have great respect. He has many noble qualities as a man—but upon the present occasion, to our deep regret, his evil genius has led him to assume an attitude of attack, from which the Secretary of War could not fail to drive him by the weapon of truth, without surrendering all self-respect as a man, all dignity, and fidelity to duty as a public officer, clothed with high responsibility.

Messrs. Editors: Permit an humble and obscure individual, (but one who feels a deep interest in the welfare of our country,) to make a suggestion through the medium of your paper. It is very desirable that a peace, honorable to both nations, should speedily be concluded between the United States and Mexico; and I would therefore suggest, for the consideration of my countrymen, that we hold a portion of the Mexican territory—say that portion at present demanded by our Government, not absolutely and indefeasibly, but as a security for the payment of the five millions of indemnity due to our merchants from Mexico, and for all other legal and equitable demands this country may have or acquire against Mexico, either under the laws of nations or otherwise. That five years—from the date of the Treaty—shall be allowed to Mexico to pay the said claims; and if within that time she pays them, then the United States shall release every acre of Mexican soil which, in right and justice, belongs to her. But if she does not pay the said claims at or before the expiration of the five years, the said territory shall belong, indefeasibly and absolutely, to the United States.

As to indemnity for the expenses of the war, if, according to the rules and regulations of civilized warfare, it is right and proper that the United States should demand and receive it of Mexico, then we should have it; otherwise we should make no such claim. These are terms which I think Mexico can honorably accept, without the least humiliation, or without the smallest stain on her national reputation; and as this is not a war of conquest on the part of the United States, what is fair and right is all she can reasonably demand.

It would be unfortunate in the extreme if we should lose, or the least impair even, our present high national character for strict impartial justice by any false step we might take in this delicate matter; and I trust that our country will make no demand of Mexico but what is strictly just, and so acknowledged to be by all impartial and civilized nations; and I also trust that our public functionaries in arranging this matter will not forget that grand principle of our holy religion: “Do unto others as we would that they should do unto us.”

I see there is some prospect of peace. Perhaps Mexico is compelled by her present crippled and distressed condition, to accede to almost any terms. But let us show our magnanimity. Let us not absolutely take her territory, and appreciate it in fee to our own use, without indemnity; but let us merely hold it as before stated, as security for our just and legal claims against her. Such a course I think would receive the commendation of all the world; and a peace concluded on such terms would no doubt be lasting, and might beget a stronger feeling of attachment between the two countries than has perhaps ever before existed.

It might be one of the stipulations of such a treaty, that, upon its conclusion, Mexico should at once enter upon negotiations for the settlement of the boundaries of Texas; and that, in case of disagreement between the two republics as to the boundary, the matter should be submitted to some impartial and competent umpire.

These are some the views that present themselves to a plain unlearned man; and I am sure that some such reflections present themselves to every lover of strict justice, who has paid the least attention the this subject, and is not too much under the influence of party discipline. I have been, and still am, a supporter of the present administration; but if I could for a moment believe that this war was waged on Mexico for the purpose of depriving her of a large portion of her acknowledged territory, without a fair equivalent, I should at once withdraw my support; and, in thus saying, I must believe that I speak the sentiments of my countrymen, generally.

WAR DEPARTMENT

Washington, April 21, 1848

SIR: I would not be respectful to you to pass unnoticed your extraordinary letter of the 24th of February, nor just to myself to permit it to remain unanswered in the files of this department.

To attempt to dispel the delusions which you seem to have long pertinaciously cherished, and to correct the errors into which you have fallen, devolves upon me a duty which I must not decline; but, in performing it, I mean to be as cautious, as you profess to have been, to abstain any "wanton discourtesy;" and I hope to be alike successful. Your prudent respect for the "fifth article of war" has induced you to hold me ostensibly responsible for many things which you are aware are not fairly chargeable to me. The device you have adopted to assail the President, by aiming your blows at the Secretary of War, does more credit to your ingenuity as an accuser, than to your character as a soldier. A premeditated contrivance to avoid responsibility does not indicate an intention not to do wrong.

The general aspect of your letter discloses an evident design to create a belief that you were drawn forth from your quiet position, in a bureau of this department, and assigned to the command of our armies in Mexico, for the purpose of being sacrificed; and, that to accomplish this end, "neglects, disappointments, injuries, and rebukes" were inflicted on you, and the necessary means of prosecuting the war with success withheld; or, in other words, the government, after preferring you to any other of the gallant generals within the range of its choice, had labored to frustrate its own plans, to bring defeat upon its own armies, and involve itself in ruin and disgrace, for an object so unimportant in its bearing upon public affairs. A charge so entirely preposterous, so utterly repugnant to all the probabilities of human conduct, calls for no refutation.

For other purposes than to combat this fondly-cherished chimera, it is proper that I should notice some of your specific allegations.

It is true that, after you were designated for the chief command of our armies, the President was desirous that your departure should not be unnecessarily delayed; but you were not restricted, as you allege, to "only four days" to make the necessary preparations at Washington. You were not ordered away until you had reported that these preparations were so far completed that your presence here was no longer required. Then, instead of going directly to Mexico, you were permitted, at your own request, to take a circuitous route through New York, and there to remain a few days. You staid at New York nearly an entire week; and, not until the 19th of December, (twenty-six days after leaving Washington,) did you reach New Orleans, where you would have arrived in seven days, if you had been required to take the direct route. This solicited indulgence, by which your arrival at N. Orleans was delayed nearly three weeks, is incompatible with your allegation that you were allowed "only four days at Washington, where twenty might have been most advantageously employed." This complaint has relation to facts within your own knowledge; error, therefore, is hardly reconcilable with any solicitude to be accurate. As this is your opening charge against the War Department, and may be regarded as indicative of those which follow, I shall make the refutation of it still more complete, for the purpose of showing with what recklessness you have performed the functions of an accuser, and how little reliance, in the present state of your feelings, can be placed on your memory. You are the witness by whom your allegation is to be disproved. On the day of your departure from Washington, you left with me a paper, in your own hand-writing, dated November 23, 1846, with the following heading:

"Notes suggesting topics to be embraced in the Secretary's instructions to general S., drawn up (in haste) at the request of the former."

From that paper I extract the following paragraph:

"I (the Secretary of War) am pleased to learn from you (General Scott) that you have in a very few days already, through the general staff of the army here, laid a sufficient basis for the purposes with which you are charged, and that you now think it best to proceed at once to the southwest in order to organize the largest number of troops that can be obtained in time for that most important expedition" (the expedition against Vera Cruz).

Here is your won most explicit admission that you represented to the Secretary of War, before leaving Washington, that arrangements were so far completed, that you thought it best to proceed at once to the army in Mexico; and yet you make it your opening charge against the department, that you were forced away to Mexico before you had time for necessary preparations.

I present the next charge in your own language:

"I handed to you a written request that one of three of our accomplished captains, therein named, might be appointed assistant adjutant general, with the rank of major, for duty with me in the field, and there was a vacancy, at the time, for one. My request has never been attended to, and this I have had no officer of the Adjutant General's Department with me in the campaign.—Can another instant be cited of denying to a general-in-chief, in the field at the head of a large army—or even a small one—the selection of his chief of the staff—that is, the chief in the department of orders and correspondence?"

Were the case precisely as you have stated it to be you have given too much prominence, as a matter of complaint, to the President's refusal to be controlled, in his exercise of the appointing power, by your wishes. Had there been a vacancy such as you mention for "one of the accomplished captains" you named, no one knows better than you do that your request could not have been acceded to without departing from the uniform rule of selection for staff appointments, without violating the right of several officers to regular promotion, and offering an indignity to all those who held the position of assistant adjutants general, with the rank of captain. The rule of regular promotion in the staff is as inflexible, and has been as uniformly observed, as that in the line. It must appear surprising that you, who were so deeply "shocked and distressed" at the suggestion of appointing, by authority of Congress, a "citizen lieutenant general," or vesting the President with power to devolve the command of the army on a major general without regard to priority in the date of his commission, should, in your first request, after being assigned to command, ask the President to disregard the rights of at least four officers as meritorious as "the three accomplished captains" named by you. The President's views on this subject undoubtedly differ from yours. His regard for the rights of officers is not graduated by their rank. Those of captains and major generals have equal value in his estimation, and an equal claim to his respect and protection. I cannot admit that it is a just ground of censure and rebuke against the "head of the War Department" that the President did not see fit, in order to gratify your feelings of favoritism, to disregard the claims and violate the rights of all the assistant adjutants general of the rank of captain then in commission.

But, so far as it is made a ground of complaint and reproof, this is not the worst aspect of the case. You are entirely mistaken in the assertion, that there was then a vacancy in the adjutant general's staff, with the rank of major, to which either of the captains recommended by you could have been properly appointed. There was no such vacancy. To show the correctness of this statement, and to demonstrate your error, I appeal to the Army Register and the records of the Adjutant General's Office. You mistake as to an obvious fact, lying within range of matter with which you are presumed to be familiar, has excited less surprise than the declaration, that by the non-compliance with your request, you "have had no officer of the Adjutant General's Department with me [you] in the campaign." Every officer of that department—at least eight—was, as you well knew, subject to your command. When you arrived in Mexico, there were with the army at least five assistant adjutants general, all at your service. That you chose to employ none of them at your head quarters, and detached from other appropriate duties an officer to act as an assistant adjutant general, may well be regarded as a slight to the whole of that staff then with you in Mexico, and a cause of complaint; but certainly not a complaint to emanate from you against the War Department. Willing as I am to presume, though unable to conceive, that circumstances justified you in passing over all the assistant adjutants general then with the army, and in selecting an officer of the line to perform the duties of adjutant general at you headquarters, I was much surprised to learn from you that, when General Worth sent to you one of these "accomplished captains," the first on you list, under the belief that you desired his services as an acting assistant adjutant general, you declined to employ him in that capacity; and I am still more surprised to perceive that you have made it a distinct ground of charge in your arraignment of the War Department, that you were not permitted to have him as an assistant adjutant general at your headquarters. Had you selected him instead of another, as you might have done, you would have been bereft of all pretext for complaint. Though there was no vacancy in the Adjutant General's staff of the grade of major, for which only you recommended the "accomplished captains"—and to which only they were properly eligible—there was a vacancy in it of the rank of captain. For this position you recommended an officer in General Wool's staff, then on the Chihuahua expedition. This officer was subsequently appointed assistant adjutant general with the rank of captain, as you desired, and has ever since been at the headquarters of that general. Thus it will be perceived that your request, so far as it was proper and reasonable, was actually complied with.

The next specification in the catalogue of charges preferred against me, is, that a court-martial was not instituted by the President for the trial of Gen. Marshall and Capt. Montgomery on your charges against them. The offenses imputed to them were certainly not of an aggravated character. The one, as was alleged, had been incautious in relation to a despatch under circumstances that might admit of its coming to the knowledge of the enemy, and the other had not carried a despatch with as much expedition as you thought he might have done. As one was a general officer a court to try him must have been composed of officers of high rank. Before the order for assembling it could have reached Mexico, it was foreseen that your command would be at Vera Cruz, and probably engaged in an active siege of that city. Officers could not, therefore, have been then sent from your column to Monterey or the Rio Grande, (where the court must have been held,) without great detriment to the public service. Had you been deprived of several officers of high rank at that critical period by the order of the President, it would have afforded a better pretence of complaint than any one in your extended catalogue. Had the court been composed of officers taken from Gen. Taylor's command, it would have still further weakened his condition, already weak in consequence of the very large force you had withdrawn from him. Subsequent events have proved that it was most fortunate the President did not comply with your request; for, had he done so, some of the officers highest in rank, and most conspicuous at Buena Vista, might, at that critical conjuncture, have been separated from their commands, and engaged in a court at a distance from that glorious scene of action. It is not fanciful to suppose that their absence might have changed the fortune of that eventful day; and that, instead of rejoicing, as we now do, in a triumphant victory—among the most brilliant in the whole course of the war—we might have had to lament a most disastrous defeat, and the almost total loss of the whole force you had left to sustain that frontier. No man has more reason than yourself to rejoice that no order emanated from Washington, though requested by you, which would have further impaired the efficiency of General Taylor's command in the crisis that then awaited him.

My letter of the 22d of February, conveying the President's views in regard to your order depriving Col. Harney of his appropriate command, is severely arraigned by you as offensive, both in manner and matter.
The facts in relation to this case of alleged grievance are now before the public, and a brief allusion to them will place the transaction in its true light. Under your orders Col. Harney had brought seven companies of his regiment—the 2d dragoons—from Monterey to the Brazos, to be under your immediate command; and two others—being all of the regiment in Mexico—were expected to follow within a few days. In the midst of his high hopes and ardent desire for active service, you took from him the command of his own regiment, devolved it on one of his junior officers, and ordered him back to Gen. Taylor’s line to look for what was not inappropriately denominated “an imaginary command.” Outraged in his feelings and injured in his rights, he respectfully remonstrated; his appeal to your sense of justice was unavailing. Neither to this gallant officer nor to the President did you assign any sufficient or even plausible reason for this extraordinary proceeding. The whole army, I believe, and the whole country, when the transaction became known, entertained but one opinion on the subject—and that was, that you had inflicted an injury and an outrage upon a brave and meritorious officer. Such an act—almost the first on your assuming command—boded disastrous consequences to the public service, and devolved upon the President the duty of imposing the protect the injured officer. This interposition you have made a grave matter of accusation against the head of the War Department, and have characterized it as a censure and a rebuke. It may imply both, and still, being merited, may leave you without a pretence for complaint. The President, after alluding to his duty to sustain the rights of the officers under your command, as well as your own rights, informed you that he did not discover in the case, as you had presented it, sufficient cause for such an order; that, in his opinion, Col. Harney had a just cause to complain; and that he hoped the matter had been reconsidered by you, and the colonel restored to his appropriate command. Your own subsequent course in this case demonstrates the unreasonableness of your complaint, and vindicates the correctness of the President’s proceedings.—You had really rebuked and censured your own conduct; for even before you had received the President’s views, you had, as he hoped you would, reconsidered the matter, become convinced of your error, reversed your own order, and restored Col. Harney to his command; thus giving the strongest evidence in favor of the propriety and correctness of all the President had done in the case. I give you too much credit for steadiness of purpose, to suspect that you retraced your steps from mere caprice, or for any other cause than a conviction that you had fallen into error. After the matter had thus terminated, it appears accountable to me that you, who above all others should wish it to pass into oblivion, have again called attention to it by making it an item in your arraignment of the War Department.

You struggle in vain to vindicate your course in this case, by referring to your own acts in the campaign of 1814. You then sent away, as you allege, against their wishes, “three senior field officers of as many regiments who were infirm, uninstructed, and inefficient, in favor of three juniors, and with the subsequent approbation of Major General Brown, and the head of the War Department.” This precedent does not, in my judgment, change the aspect of the present case. Colonel Harney was not “infirm, uninstructed, and inefficient;” you did not assign, and, in deference to the known opinion of the army and country, you did not venture to assign, that reason for deposing him. I do not understand the force of your logical deduction, that because you, on a former occasion, had deprived officers under your own conduct; for even before you had received the President’s views, you had, as he hoped you would, reconsidered the matter, become convinced of your error, reversed your own order, and restored Col. Harney to his command; thus giving the strongest evidence in favor of the propriety and correctness of all the President had done in the case. I give you too much credit for steadiness of purpose, to suspect that you retraced your steps from mere caprice, or for any other cause than a conviction that you had fallen into error. After the matter had thus terminated, it appears accountable to me that you, who above all others should wish it to pass into oblivion, have again called attention to it by making it an item in your arraignment of the War Department.

As your animadversion upon the tone of my letter is probably not a blow aimed at a much more conspicuous object, to be reached through me, I ought, perhaps, to pass it without notice.—On revision of that letter, I cannot perceive that it is not entirely respectful in manner and language. The views of the President are therein confidently expressed, because they were confidently entertained. It seemed to be admitted by you, that “it dictated to the greenest general of the recent appointments,” the letter would not have been exceptionable. I was not aware that it was my duty to modify and graduate my style, so as to meet, according to your fastidious views, the various degrees of greenness and ripeness of the generals to whom I am required to convey the orders of the President, and for any such defect in my official communications I have no apology to offer.

In the same letter, wherein you complain of being censured for your course in relation to Col. Harney, you say: “I am now rebuked for unavoidable—nay, wise, if it had not been unavoidable—release, on parole, of the prisoners taken at Cerro Gordo, even before one word of commendation from government had reached this army on account of its gallant conduct in the capture of those prisoners.” Accident alone—not any oversight or neglect on my part—has given you the apparent advantage of the aggravation which you have artfully thrown into this charge. My letter commending yourself and the gallant army under your command for the glorious achievement at Cerro Gordo, was written and sent to you on the 19th of May—eleven days before that which you are pleased to consider as containing a rebuke.

But I meet the main charge with a positive denial. You never were rebuked for discharging the prisoners taken at Cerro Gordo. This issue can be tried by the record. All that was ever said on the subject is contained in the following extract from my letter of the 31st of May:

“Your course hitherto in relation to prisoners of war, both men and officers, in discharging them on parole, has been liberal and kind; but whether it ought to be still longer continued, or in some respects changed, has been under the consideration of the President, and he has directed me to communicate to you his views on the subject. —He is not unaware of the great embarrassment their detention, or the sending of them to the U. States, would occasion; but, so far as relates to the officers, he thinks they should be detained until duly exchanged. In that case, it will probably be found expedient to send them, or most of them to the United States. You will not, therefore, except for special reasons in particular cases, discharge the officers who may be taken prisoners, but detain them with you, or send them to the United States, as you shall deem most expedient.”

If I understand the force of terms, there is nothing in this language which, by fair interpretation, can be made to express or imply a rebuke. I cannot conceive that any mind, other than one of a diseased sensitiveness, over anxious to discover causes for complaint and accusation, could imagine that anything like a rebuke was contained in Before considering your complaints for not having been supplied with sufficient means of transportation for the expedition against Vera Cruz, I will notice your “four memorials” to the War Department, in which you demonstrated, as you state, that “Vera Cruz was the true basis of operations, and that the enemy’s capital could not probably be reached from the Rio Grande.”

I cannot discover the pertinency of your allusion to these four memorials, except it be to put forth a claim to the merit of originating the expedition against Vera Cruz, and of being the first to discover that the most practicable route to the city of Mexico was from that point on the gulf; but your known abhorrence for a “pruriency of fame not earned,” ought to shield you from the suspicion of such an infirmity.

I am sure you are not ignorant of the fact—but if you are, it is nevertheless true—that the expedition against Vera Cruz had been for some time under consideration; that great pains had been taken to get information as to the defences of that city, the strength of the castle, and the difficulties which would attend the debarcation of troops; that maps had been procured and carefully examined; that persons who had resided there, and officers of the army and navy, had been consulted on the subject, and the enterprise actually resolved on before the date of your first memoir, and before you were thought of to conduct it.

As early as the 9th of July, 1846, within two months after the declaration of war, and before the main body of troops raised for its prosecution had reached the scene of operations, considerate attention had been given to that subject. On that day, a letter from this department to Gen. Taylor thus alluded to a movement from Vera Cruz into the interior of the enemy’s country:

“If, from all the information which you may communicate to the department, as well as that derived from other sources, it should appear that the difficulties and obstacles to the conducting of a campaign from the Rio Grande, the present base of your operations, for any considerable distance into the interior of Mexico, will be very great, the department will consider whether the main invasion should not ultimately take place from some point on the coast—say Tampico, or some other point in the vicinity of Vera. Some suggestion is made with a view to call your attention to it, and to obtain from you such information as you may be able to impart. Should it be determined that the main army should invade Mexico at some other point than the Rio Grande—say the vicinity of Vera—large and sufficient number of transport vessels could be placed at the mouth of the Rio Grande by the time the healthy season sets in—say early in November. The main army with all its munitions could be transported, leaving a sufficient force behind to hold and occupy the Rio Grande, and all the towns and provinces which you may have conquered before that time. In the event of such being the plan of operations, your opinion is desired, what increased force, if any, will be required to carry it out with success. We learn that the army could be disembarked a few miles distant from Vera Cruz, and readily invest the town in its rear, without coming within range of the guns of the fortress of San Juan d’Ulloa. The town could be readily taken by land, while the fortress being invested by land and sea, and all communication cut off, must soon fall. From Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico there is a fine road, upon which the diligences or stagecoaches run daily. The distance from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico is not more than one-third of that from the Rio Grande to the city of Mexico.”

The subject was again brought into view on the 13th of October, in the same year, and more particularly on the 22nd of October, in letters addressed to General Taylor. At the last date, the plan had been so far matured that several officers of the staff and line were indicated for that service. This was nearly a month before it was determined to employ you with the army in any part of Mexico.

It was never contemplated here to strike at the city of Mexico from the line occupied by General Taylor, or through any other except that from Vera Cruz. If the war was to be pushed to that extent, it required no elaborate demonstration—no profound military talents—nothing more than common sagacity and very slight reflection on the subject to see the propriety and the necessity of making Vera Cruz the base of military operations.

An alleged deficiency of means to transport the troops in the expedition to Vera Cruz seems to be most prominently presented, and most confidently relied on to sustain your charge against the War Department for neglecting this branch of its duties.

I issued, it seems to be admitted; the proper order, so far as the means of transportation were to be drawn from the north; but the allegation was that it was issued too late, and was never executed. It was issued at least four days before you arrived at New Orleans on your way to the army. If promptly executed, it was a reasonable calculation that the “ten vessels” alluded to in your letter, would have arrived in season to receive the troops as soon as you could collect them from their remote and scattered positions in the interior of Mexico, bring them to the seacoast, and prepare for their embarkation. Whether an order for ships to be sent out in ballast, issued the 15th of December, was or was not in season for the service they were designed for, depends upon the time when the expedition could be got ready to sail. To determine this, a regard must be paid to what you required to be done preparatory to the expedition, rather than to what you may have said on that subject.

A reference to two or three of your requisitions will show that no rational hope could be entertained that the expedition would set forth before the middle or the last of February. You required as one item of the outfit one hundred and forty surfboats—all to be constructed after you left Washington. Though the department urged a less number, you insisted on all. You estimated the expense of each at $200; and thought, by putting the principal shipyards on the Atlantic coast in requisition, they might be constructed by the 1st of January. To show what reliance was to be placed on your calculation, I refer to the fact that, though due regard to economy was had in procuring these boats, each cost on an average 950 dollars—nearly five-fold your estimate. Conceding that you erred much less as to the time within which they could be constructed—nay more, admitting they could have been ready by the 1st of January—and sooner you did not expect they could be made—by no reasonable calculation could they have reached the coast of Mexico before the 1st of February. The expedition could not go forth without them. In your letter to me dated the 28th February, off Lobos, you state that but a small part of the transports engaged at New Orleans, under your orders of the 28th December, &c., had arrived, and "not one of the ten ordered by your [my] memorandum if the 15th of that month, "and the whole were due at the Brazos on the 15th of January. Having thus shown, by your own opinion, that under my order "the ten vessels” ought to have been at the Brazos at least fifteen days before the expedition could have been ready to sail, I have vindicated myself from your charge of having neglected my duty by not issuing that order at an earlier date. If issued earlier, it would have involved a largely increased expenditure for demurrage, and resulted in no public benefit.

But the graver part of this charge is, that none "of these ten vessels” ever arrived. "Relying (you say in the letter now under consideration) upon them (the ten vessels) confidently, the embarcation was delayed in whole or in part at the Brazos and Tampico, from the 15th of January to the 9th of March, leaving, it was feared, not half the time needed for the reduction of Vera Cruz and its castle before the return of the yellow fever." To whomever the calamitous consequences of the non-arrival of these "ten vessels,” and your "cruel disappointment” in relation to them, are imputable, he has certainly involved himself in a serious responsibility.—I hope to remove the whole of it from "the head of the War Department,” and entertain some apprehensions that it will fall in part upon the commanding general of the expedition.

The execution of the whole of the most difficult branch of duties appertaining to a military expedition—providing for transportation—is, by the distribution of the business in the War Department, allotted to the Quartermaster General. As an expedition against Vera Cruz had been resolved in some time before you were assigned to take command of it, General Jesup had gone to New Orleans to be in the best position to make the necessary preparations for such an enterprise. From his great knowledge and long experience in military affairs, not only in his appropriate department, but as a commander in the field, the government thought it fortunate that you could have the advice and assistance of so able a counsellor.

Your suggestion that it might be necessary to send ships in ballast from the North for transports was not neglected or unheeded by me. Whether it would be necessary or not, depended, according to your statement to me, upon the means of transportation which could be procured at New Orleans &c. My first step was to write to the Quartermaster General, then at that place, for information on that subject. In my letter to him of the 11th of December I said:

"It is expected that most of the vessels in the service of the quartermaster’s department can be used for transports for the expedition. It will be necessary that the department here should know what portion of the transportation can be furnished by the ordinary means which the quartermaster’s department has now under its control for the purposes of its expedition. I have to request that information on this point should be furnished without delay.

Another point on which the department desires information is, what amount of means of transportation for such an expedition can be furnished at New Orleans, Mobile, and in that quarter.

The expense of procuring transports from the Atlantic cities will be exorbitant. Freight is very high, and most of the good vessels are engaged for the ordinary purposes of commerce.”

It is important to bear in mind that you saw this letter on your first arrival at New Orleans. In writing to me from that place, December 21, you observe, "I have seen your letter (in the hands of Lieutenant Colonel Hunt) to the Quartermaster General, dated the 11th." You could not mistake its object, because it was clearly expressed. I asked distinctly, what means of transportation for the expedition can be furnished at New Orleans, &c., and referred to the expense and difficulty of procuring transports from the Atlantic cities. You could not, therefore, but know that my course as to sending ships in ballast from the north would be regulated by the Quartermaster General’s reply. While waiting for this information, and in order to prevent delay, and be sure not to deserve the imputation you now cast upon me, I issued the order of the 15th of December, to which you refer, knowing that it could be modified and conformed to the exigencies of the service, according to the answer which I should receive from General Jesup. His reply is dated the 27th of December, and in it he says:

"Transportation can be provided here for all the troops that may be drawn from the army under the command of Gen. Taylor, and for all the ordnance, ordnance stores, and other supplies, which may be drawn either from this depot (the Brazos) or from New Orleans. The public transports—I mean those owned by the U. States—that can be spared for the contemplated operations, it is estimated, will carry three thousand men with all their supplies. Vessels can be charted on favorable terms for any additional transportation that may be required."

This letter was submitted to and read by you, as appears from your endorsement thereon.

After referring to some other matter sin the letter, you conclude your endorsement as follows:

"I recommend that Brevet Major General Jesup’s suggestions be adopted.” This fact shows that the letter received your particular attention. When this letter (which you knew was forwarded to the department) was here received—showing that your apprehended difficulty in obtaining sufficient transportation at the south was unfounded, and that it could be provided in that quarter in great abundance on favorable terms—my order of the 15th of December, so far, and only so far as it related to sending out vessels in ballast, was countermanded. It is strange, indeed, that, after you were made acquainted with the object of my inquiries and General Jesup’s letter in reply to them, you should have looked for transport vessels in ballast from the Atlantic cities, and still more strange that their non-arrival should be the proof you rely on to convict me of having neglected my duty in this instance. If, in truth, you delayed the expedition nearly two months for these transports, I am blameless. The responsibility is in another quarter. It cannot be said that this statement as to the sufficiency of transports to be obtained at the south had an implied reference to what I ordered from the Atlantic cities, for my order was then unknown to yourself and the Quartermaster General. You first received a copy of it several days after the date of General Jesup’s letter to me, and of your endorsement thereon. [See your letter to me of the 12th January.] Resisted as you were by “head winds,” enveloped in “frightful northerns,” and oppressed with complicated and perplexing duties in arranging and preparing the expedition against Vera Cruz, some temporary bewilderment may be excused; but, to charge the War Department with your own misapprehensions and mistakes, is inexcusable.

[Remainder in to-morrow’s paper.]

The Whig papers of Richmond and elsewhere have expended much sympathy on the “persecuted” Scott—and have as freely poured out their abuse upon the Administration for its (alleged) “efforts to crush him.” Will these Whig papers publish Gen. Scott’s late “indignation” letter containing a list of all his grievances, all the counts of his long bill of indictment against the Administration—and publish, at the same time, Secretary Marcy’s reply thereto, —that their readers may see both sides of the question? We shall see. ONF, Who thinks Gov. Marcy ought to be prosecuted under the law against cruel punishments.

Cassius M. Clay, denies in toto, the story of his having represented himself to the Mexicans to be a relation of Henry Clay’s. He says: “I have never claimed kinship with Mr. Clay! It was he who claimed, in his Greeley letter, ‘relationship’ to me!”

Let Cassius rest now!

We presume that Gen. Taylor had seen Mr. Clay’s letter written on the 11th April (nine days before the Baldwin or Gallaher letter,) for lightning and telegraph dispatches travel quicker than thought, and the steam in the West is hard to beat—we choose, therefore, to consider the old soldier’s first letter not so much an answer to the letter of Messrs. Baldwin and Gallaher, as a response to Mr. Clay’s letter. It comes so apropos, and is so much an answer, that, if it is not, it ought to be. Mr. Clay informed the “Public” at large and Gen. Taylor indirectly in particular, that he (Mr. Clay) would get New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio, and “that no candidate can be elected, without the concurrence of two of these three States and none could be defeated, upon whom all of them should be united.” Gen. Taylor, as plainly as a man can indirectly speak, says in his turn: “My dear Mr. Clay, I am sorry for your great desire to obtain the nomination for the Presidency, destined as you are, I fear, to a terrible disappoint. I regret to perceive your anxiety to frighten me from my propriety, but I must inform you, dear Harry, that ’t has not been my intention, at any moment, to change my position, or to withdraw my name from the canvass, whoever may be the nominee of the National Convention, wither of the Whig or Democratic party.” Mr. Clay assures “the Public,” and thus gives General Taylor delicately to understand “that at no former period did there exist so great a probability of my election, if I would consent to the use of my name,” and then with this great probability before him, he gives his reluctant consent. But oh the hopes, the high hopes of the effect that his letter was to have upon his dear friend Old Zac—upon him who acknowledged, in the face of day, that he would have voted for Mr. Clay at the last election against all others! And why not vote for him now, when the probability of his election is greater than at any former period? Hopes—alas, faded, blighted never to revive! General Taylor, after Mr. Clay's own fashion, writes to Messrs. Baldwin and Gallaher in general, but indirectly to Mr. Clay in particular, and gently says,

"I do not design to withdraw my name if Mr. Clay be the nominee of the Whig National Convention, and in this connexion I beg permission to remark, that the statements which have been so positively made in some of the Northern prints to this effect, 'that should Mr. Clay be the nominee of the Whig National Convention,' I had stated, 'that I would not suffer my name to be used,' are not correct, and have no foundation in any oral or written remark of mine." (Perfectly cool and calm!) "I beg permission to remark to you." My dear Harry, that notwithstanding New York, and Pennsylvania, and Ohio, are certain to vote for you, there are twenty-six other States in this Union that may possibly vote for me. I beg permission also to add, that notwithstanding you have given a reluctant consent to the use of your name, and so invitingly insinuate your desire that I should withdraw, "O shall maintain the position of independence of all parties in which the people and my own sense of duty has placed me." Then, my friend, if you desire to retain the integrity of the Whig party, you can retire; for I am still sitting upon "Old Whitey," surveying the battle-field, and I beg permission to inform you that it is not the first time in my life that I have seen lightning, and heard thunder. Yours to command," &c.

But other views crowd upon us, while reading these last letters from Baton Rouge. Our friends of the Republican have seen fit to publish their new edition of the Whig Catechism, and we desire to see how all the reluctant aspirants of the Whig and "no party" parties will pass through the ordeal. How admirably the Old General stands the drill! We premise in the first place, by way of parenthesis, a single question to the Editors of the Republican; and ask, if they have given to the public the whole of their own letter to which General Taylor's is a reply? We desire to know all the points. Their letter seems to be an extract, without the usual address, date &c., and begins rather abruptly. But thus by the way. Now, attend to the fugleman. "Will you refuse the nomination of a Whig National Convention?" To understand the evolution expected to be performed, we must remember that the Catechumen has repeatedly answered before the world, "yes, and by God's help so I will; whether it be from a Whig Convention, or a Democratic Convention, or a Native Convention, or a spontaneous assemblage of all the people, or an unanimous meeting of every body in all creation." Why ask the same question again? A great deal depends upon the tone of the Catechist—upon the emphasis. "Will you refuse the nomination of a WhIG Convention? [. . . ]-nention, my dear General, imbued with—(said insinuatingly,) with Whig principles; with—(said with a wink of the eye,) with Whig schemes; with—(said with a winning smile,) with a love for Whig men, and an intention to give them snug little fat Whig offices? Now, General, look like a soldier, and speak like a man."

Answer—"If nominated by the Whig National Convention, I shall not refuse acceptance; PROVIDED I am left free of all pledges, and permitted to maintain the position of independence of all parties in which the people and my own sense of duty have placed me: OTHERWISE, I shall refuse the nomination of any Convention or Party." I understand your winks and smiles and nods, and I know you to be "insinivating young gentlemen; but," [said with an emphasis,] "if elected, I would endeavor to act independent of party domination. I should feel bound to administer the government untrammeled by party schemes."

Catechist—My dear General, listen to us; we belong, you know, to the "no-party" party. 'Tis true, we are Whigs, [and one of us was a Secretary of the late Whig Convention, and is now published to the world as a member of the Whig Central Committee of Virginia]—'tis true, we have been as bitter as Whigs, as hot as Whigs, as can be found; but we are now no longer "ultra;" we are now sweet, gentle Whigs, and perhaps we may say, cold Whigs just now; but if we can only succeed in electing you, we will warm up again, and become "every inch a Whig." WE do not desire you to make pledges, except one pledge. We have seen enough to satisfy us that Mr. Clay is to be a candidate, and we are afraid that you will retire—we beg you, then, to answer one other question. WE shall ask you others but they will be of no account. This one, though, we wish you to answer right up and down, outright and downright. "Do you design to withdraw if Henry Clay or any other man shall be the candidate?" Attend to the fugleman. "I do not design to withdraw my name if Mr. Clay be the nominee of the Whig National Convention, or to withdraw my name from the canvass, whoever may be the nominee of the National Convention, wither of the Whig or Democratic party." Answered like a man. That's the position of a soldier. Head erect—eyes to the front—shoulders square, &c., &c.

Catechist.—But, my dear General, there are many principles we have battled for these many years; but we do not desire your opinions upon these at this moment, while at the same time it is desirable to appear to wish you to give them.—For God's sake, however, don't step an inch to the right or left. We will put the questions right—there is no cross-examination. All you are expected to do is answer the questions asked—but be cautious—be wary—"Have you stated that you are in favor of the Tariff of '46, the Sub Treasury; that you originated the war, and should select your Cabinet from both parties?" We do not ask you, if you are in favor of the Tariff of '42. We would not have you suppose, that we ask if you are in favor of any Tariff. For the sake of our party—we beg pardon—we mean of our no-party, do not say what you are in favor of. We ask, "Have you stated that you are" &c. We do not ask if you are in favor or opposed to the Sub-Treasury, or any treasury, or any plan for carrying on the financial operations of the government—whether you have examined whether any scheme for this purpose is in accordance with the Constitution—whether, if this particular scheme be wrong, a better can be devised—but, (again said most insinuatingly with a little nod of the head,) "Have you stated, that you are in favor of the Sub-Treasury?" We do not ask you—and we beg you to attend to this point, my dear General—whether the was is just or unjust—whether it could have been avoided—whether Mexico did not force it upon us—whether you advised the advance of the troops as a precautionary measure against the avowed intention of the Mexicans to reconquer and retake the whole of Texas, and whether that advance was not the cause of the war—whether you would prosecute it; if Mexico still refuses peace—whether we should not obtain some indemnity. But listen now: "Did you ever state that you"—of your own will—moved and instigated by the devil and your desire for blood and carnage, solely "originated the and popular man; but all this could avail nothing against his Taylorism! The facts speak for themselves.

In 1844, this district gave Clay 1125 votes, and now, Dr. Thornton, a Taylor man, receives only 161! Great change!—Rappahannock (his own county) 115; Greene 22; Orange 111; Madison 44. Total—904.

H. Shackleford—Democrat, Culpeper 588; Rappahannock 144, Greene 17; Orange 111; Madison 44. Total 904.

Thomas Davis, Democrat, Greene 260; Orange 167; Rappahannock 32; Culpeper 22; Madison 276. Total—757.

W. Ship, Democrat—Madison 223; Greene 53; Orange 162; Rappahannock 209; Culpeper 88; Total—735.

Dr. P. Thornton, Taylorite—Rappahannock (his own county) 115; Greene 21; Orange (Gen. Taylor's own county!) only 21; Culpeper 28; Madison 14—Total 161!

In 1844, this district gave Clay 1125 votes, and now, Dr. Thornton, a Taylor man, per se, receives only 161! Great is the strength of Taylorism, truly! Even the Whigs (to the number of 964) refused to vote for the candidate exclusively in favor of the nominee of the Whigs of Virginia. “Our friend, the Doctor, is a most agreeable gentleman and popular man; but all this could avail nothing against his Taylorism! The facts speak for themselves.
HEADQUARTERS, SALTILLO, MEXICO. April 2d, 1848.

My dear friend: I have but a moment to say that I have just received an express from Ge. Price’s column, announcing the pleasing intelligence that Gen. Trias, with all his forces, has surrendered to our arms. Gen. Price entered Chihuahua on the 9th of March, and immediately gave pursuit to the enemy, whom he overtook at Santa Cruz de Rosalio, a strongly situated town some sixty miles South of Chihuahua, on the 16th. The place was invested, and after fighting all day, the plaza and church were nearly attained by burrowing through the houses, when the enemy surrendered. Our loss was one Lieutenant, two non-commissioned officers, and 12 privates—the enemy’s loss is 300 and odd killed and 72 wounded, his whole force [800,] all his artillery, [12 pieces,] 2,000 stand of arms, some 800,000 dollars worth of public property, many field officers, and General Trias at their head. Col. Ralls’ command on one side, and Col. Lane’s on the other, acted most heroically, and took the place.

My letter from Col. Ralls is dated March 22d.

I am, in haste, your, &c.,

WASHINGTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 29—P.M.

U. S. SENATE.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, recommending that aid and comfort should be extended to the people of the peninsula of Yucatan, by the Government of the United States.

Mr. Hannegan moved to refer the message to the committee on Foreign Relations. Mr. Calhoun addressed the Senate on the subject of the message and its reference. He regarded the aid proposed to be extended to Yucatan, as a dangerous interference on our part with the internal affairs of neighboring nations.

The sad intelligence having been communicated to the Senate, that Senator Ashley was supposed to be dying, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

[Mr. Ashley has since died, at his lodgings in this city. He had been indisposed for some time.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House has been engaged the entire day in discussing the message of the President, relative to affording succor to Yucatan. The message was finally referred to the committee on Foreign Relations; and the House then adjourned.

Monday, May 1, 1848. SENATE.

As soon as the Senate was called to order, the death of Mr. Ashley, Senator from Arkansas, was announced in eloquent terms by Messrs. Borland and Breese, and after the adoption of the usual resolutions for mourning and attending the funeral, which takes place to­morrow, the Senates adjourned.

In the House nothing of importance was done, except to adopt the resolutions of the Senate in regard to the death of Mr. Ashley, which was feelingly announced by Mr. Johnson, of Arkansas, when the House adjourned.

Tuesday, May 2. SENATE.

The Senate transacted no business to­day—Shortly before 12 o’clock, the Committee of Arrangements and Pall­Bearers, with the coffin containing the body of the deceased Senator Ashley, beautifully decorated with flowers, entered the Chamber, followed by the Senator and Representative of Arkansas, the widow, daughter, and personal friends of the deceased. The President and Private Secretary, with Messrs. Buchanan, Walker, and Marcy, entered immediately afterwards, and were soon followed by the members of the House of Representatives.
There were also present several officers of the army and navy, members of the corps diplomatique, and other distinguished gentlemen; but the number of spectators in the galleries and lobbies, owing to the state of the weather, was not so large as is usual when the last honors are paid at the Capitol to distinguished men of the nation.

The services commenced with an impressive and eloquent prayer by Rev. Mr. Gurley. The funeral discourse was delivered by Rev. Mr. Slicer, 1. Peter, 24th and 25th verses: "For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of the grass: the grass withereth, and the flower of the grass fadeth away; but the Word of the Lord endureth forever."

The Reverend Speaker commenced with an allusion to the fact that within the short period of eighteen months, Death had six times visited that Chamber. Heaven thus demonstrating not only the mortality of public men, but the facility with which that mortality reaches even the most elevated. The only fact stated in the course of the discourse, which has not already been published, was that the last words of Mr. Ashley, to those who surrounded his bed of death, was—"Pray for your country, and prepare to meet me in Heaven."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o’clock, and the journal was read, when the members proceeded to the Senate Chamber to attend the funeral of Mr. Ashley.

[The remains of Mr. Ashley were deposited in the receiving vault at the Congressional Burying Ground. His remains it is understood, will not be removed to Arkansas, and the National Cemetery will be his final resting place.] [BWP] Re45i1p4c4, May 5, 1848, Later from Santa Fe.

[Telegraphed for the Baltimore Sun.] PITTSBURG, MAY 1ST, 1848.

Advices have been received at St. Louis, by an arrival from the far West, which contain accounts from El Paso to the 3d ult., and Santa Fe to a corresponding later date. General Price had finally marched for Chihuahua, with his whole disposable force, in fine order and spirits, and eager to meet the enemy, who were reported to have mustered in strong numbers, to oppose their entry into the capital of the State. At Santa Fe there were indications of another attempt at insurrection, the Mexican population daily becoming more insolent, and appearing disposed to take advantage of the absence of General Price, with his command. Precautionary measures had been taken to suppress any emeute.

Intelligence for Iowa, received at St. Louis, has settled the question of the contested election in that State. It is ascertained from the returns, that Harleu, Whig, has been elected Superintendent of Instruction by 76 majority, over Thomas H. Benton, Jr., the candidate of the opposite party. This sets at rest the rumors that have been floating about in favor of each. [BWP] Re45i1p4c4, May 5, 1848, Pass it Round.

'God knows, that man does not love, never did nor never will, whom we would prefer for the Presidency to Henry Clay, but at the same time we are not willing to put him up again as a target at which boobies may discharge their splatter guns at pleasure, nor are we willing to see him in a position where he can be chatted at, and grinned at, by satyrs and monkeys.’ [Abingdon Virginian, (Taylor Whig.)] [BWP]

Re45i1p4c4, May 5, 1848, No title.

Here is a specimen of Whig "decency" the Democracy would do well to consider.—Against the political course of Mr. Clay these Democratic "boobies," "satyrs" and "monkeys" must not open their mouths, they are not fit to vote against him, but at the same time the editor of the Virginian is endeavoring to cajole these "boobies," and "satyrs" and "monkeys" into the support of Gen. Taylor. We ask the Democrats to lay this paragraph by, and when asked to support Gen. Taylor, show it, to prove how their intelligence is estimated. [BWP] Re45i1p4c5, May 5, 1848, More Taylor Letters.

We regret that our enterprising neighbors of the Republican had not brought out earlier their important missive from General Taylor; for its novelty and freshness did not last long, the Southern mail bringing, in the New Orleans Picayune and Bulletin, another (and we presume the last) letter from Old Zac to his brother-in-law, Captain Allison, two days later. We give them out as "studies" for the ingenuity and speculations of our readers. As we cannot digest in one day two letters from the old soldier, we are induced to defer our comments. The Republican, with an air of triumph, says that the old hero's position is now "above even the cavil of the most suspicious," and that "those who desired General Taylor to 'come out,' will no longer have an opportunity for so much as a quibble."—"Come out!" The Republican might better have said, in the language of a Whig yesterday, General T. "has knocked the Whig party into a cocked hat." Great as was the dismay which Henry Clay's last pronunciamento produced in the Whig camp, this double battery from Baton Rouge has excited even a more volcanic explosion among "the Whigs of Virginia." Even some of his former zealous supporters cannot tolerate his determination to set himself above and beyond the Whig party. If his letters mean anything, they unequivocally declare that he is and will continue a candidate, in defiance of all Conventions, Whig or democratic—and he seems to take particular pains to indicate that even the great name of Henry Clay, should he be nominated, has no terrors for the: "Thunder of Buena vista," who means to stand firmly in the field, regardless of all consequences, in defiance of all parties and politicians. Here's truly "a pretty kettle of fish" for the great Whig party! What will they do now? Will they "disband" at once, scatter all "regular" organization to the winds, "surrender" their much praised and highly cherished Convention at the bidding of old Zac, and, as the Republican intimates, rally as "volunteers" around the independent no-party candidate? To this complexion has it come at last: the Whigs must abandon old Zac or their Convention and party organization! Truly, has he "come out," but in a far different manner from what the Whigs had hoped for. This Taylorism will, as we predicted, prove the death of the Whig party. "Disorganization" has struck deep into its vitals and the malady must spread.

But while this single position is clear, viz—that he will be a candidate at all events, we have looked in vain to these last expositions, to ascertain what are the political sentiments of gen. Taylor. Is he for or against a Bank, Protective Tariff and Sub-Treasury; or does he believe them to be "obsolete"? Does he or not advocate the justice of the war, or territorial indemnity? We challenge any one to point to any passages in his two letters which shed any light on these questions. True, he thinks that they should be left to the omnipotence of Congress; but he does not tell us what his own opinions are, or what policy the interest of the country should pursue. He is willing to be President, and register the edicts of congress, scrupulously taking care to have no opinions of his own, save that he believes in the policy of the "earlier Presidents"—not, however, informing us whether he refers to Adams or Jefferson, whose principles were directly antagonistic.

But we had no idea of saying so much at present, but simply to call attention to the two letters. We shall resume our comments at some length. In the mean time we wish the Whigs joy of their independent, no-party candidate.

[From the Richmond Republican, May 2]

Annexed is the answer of Gen. Taylor to a letter from us, propounding the following inquiries:

"It has been stated in some of the papers in a most positive manner, that you have said, if Henry Clay be the nominee of the Whig National Convention, you will not suffer your name to be used a candidate.

"It has been also stated, lately, that, in recent conversations, you have declared that you are in favor of the Tariff of '46, of the Sub-treasury, of the war—that in fact the responsibility of the war belongs to you—also, that, if elected President, you will choose your Cabinet from both parties.

"W respectfully solicit an answer to the following questions:

"1. Will you refuse the nomination of a Whig National Convention?

"2. Do you design to withdraw if Henry Clay or any other man shall be the candidate?

"3. Have you stated that you are in favor of the Tariff of '46, the Sub-Treasury, that you originated the war, and should select your Cabinet from both parties?"

The following is Gen. Taylor's reply:

BATON ROUGE, LA., April 20, 1848.

Dear Sir: Your letter of the 10th instant, which alludes to certain statements that have recently been made in some of the papers at the North, and which submits several inquiries for my consideration, has been received.

To your inquiries I have respectfully to reply:

First —That if nominated by the Whig National Convention, I shall not refuse acceptance, provided I am left free of all pledges, and permitted to maintain the position of independence of all parties in which the people and my own sense of duty have placed me—otherwise I shall refuse the nomination of any convention or party.
Secondly —I do not design to withdraw my name if Mr. Clay be the nominee of the Whig National Convention—and, in this connexion, I beg permission to remark that the statements which have been so positively made in some of the Northern prints, to the effect "that should Mr. Clay be the nominee of the Whig National Convention, "I had stated" that I would not suffer my name to be used, "are not correct, and have no foundation in any oral or written remark of mine. It has not been my intention, at any moment, to change my position—or to withdraw my name form the canvass, whoever may be the nominee of the National Convention, either of the Whig or Democratic party.

Thirdly —I have never stated to any one that I was in favor of the Tariff of '46—of the Sub-Treasury, nor that I originated the war with Mexico. Nor, finally, that I should (if elected) select my cabinet from both parties. No such admissions or statements were made by me, at any time, to any person.

Permit me, however, to add that should such high distinction be conferred upon me as that of elevation to the Executive Office, the Constitution, in a strict and honest interpretation, and in the spirit and mode in which it was acted upon by our earlier Presidents, would be my chief guide. In this, I conceive to be all that is necessary in the way of pledges.

The election of another candidate would occasion mortification to me, but to such a result, as the will of the people, I should willingly and calmly submit. As I have had no ambition to serve, but in the desire to serve the country, it would bring to me no disappointment. With sentiments of high respect and regard, I remain, Your most ob't servant, Z. TAYLOR.

[To] O. P. Baldwin, Esq., or Ro. H. Gallaher, Esq., Editors of Richmond Republican, Richmond Virginia. [From the New Orleans Picayune.] BATON ROUGE. April 22, 1848.

Dear Sir—My opinions have recently been so often misconceived and misrepresented, that I deem it due to myself, if not to my friends, to make a brief exposition of them upon the topics to which you have called my attention.

I have consented to the use of my name as a candidate for the Presidency. I have frankly avowed my own distrust of my fitness for that high station; but having, at the solicitation of many of my countrymen, taken my position as a candidate, I do not feel at liberty to surrender that position until my friends manifest a wish that I should retire from it. I will then most gladly do so. I have no private purposes to accomplish, no party projects to build up, no enemies to punish—nothing to serve but my country.

I have been very often addressed by letter, and my opinions have been asked upon almost every question that might occur to the writers as affecting the interests of their country or their party.—I have not always responded to these inquiries, for various reasons.

I confess, whilst I have great cardinal principles which will regulate my political life, I am not sufficiently familiar with all the minute details of political legislation, to give solemn pledges to exert my influence, if I were President, to carry out this or defeat that measure. I have no concealment, I hold no opinion which I would not readily proclaim to my assembled countrymen; but crude impressions upon matters of policy, which may be right to-day and wrong to-morrow, are, perhaps, not the best test of fitness for office. One who cannot be trusted without pledges cannot be confided in merely on account of them.

I will proceed, however, now to respond to your inquiries.

First. —I reiterate what I have often said—I am a Whig, but not an ultra Whig. If elected, I would not be the mere President of a party. I would endeavor to act independent of party domination. I should feel bound to administer the Government, untrammeled by party schemes.

Second. —The veto power. The power given by the constitution to the Executive to interpose his veto is a high conservative power; but, in my opinion, should never be except in cases of clear violation of the constitution, or manifest haste and want of consideration by Congress. Indeed, I have thought that, for many years past, the known opinions and wishes of the Executive have exercised undue and injurious influence upon the legislative department of the Government; and for this cause I have thought our system was in danger of undergoing a great change from its true theory. The Personal opinions of the individual, who may happen to occupy the Executive chair, ought not to control the action of Congress upon questions of domestic policy; nor ought his objections to be interposed where questions of constitutional power have been settled by the various departments of Government, and acquiesced by the people.

Third. —Upon the subject of the tariff, the currency, the improvement of our great highways, rivers, lakes and harbors, the will of the people, as expressed through their Representatives in Congress, ought to be respected and carried out by the Executive.

Fourth. —The Mexican war. I sincerely rejoice at the prospect of peace. My life has been devoted to arms, yet I look upon war at all times and under all circumstances as a national calamity, to be avoided if compatible with national honor. The principles of our Government as well as its true policy are opposed to the subjugation of other nations and the dismemberment of other countries by conquest. In the language of the great Washington, "Why should we quit our own to stand on foreign ground?" In the Mexican war our national honor has been vindicated, amply vindicated, and in dictating terms of peace we may well afford to be forbearing and even magnanimous to our fallen foe.
My reply to your accusations forces me to expose some of your misstatements of fact. You allege that the expedition, for the want of the "ten vessels," was delayed from the 15th of January to the 9th of March. You certainly mean to be understood, that, on the 15th of January, your troops were ready to embark, and were delayed for want of these transports. But this was not so; and I am indebted to you for most abundant proof to establish your inaccuracy. The great body of your troops for the expedition was drawn from Gen. Taylor's command at Monterey and in the interior of Mexico; and no part of them had reached either the Brazos or Tampico—the points of embarkation—on the 15th of January. In your letter of the 12th of that month, to General Brooke, at New Orleans, you said: "I have now to state that it is probable the troops I have called for from Gen. Taylor's immediate command to embark here (the Brazos) and at Tampico, will not reach those points till late in the present month, (January,) say about the 25th." In a letter to me of the 26th of January, you remark that Gen. Butler responded to your call for the troops with the utmost promptitude, and that Gen. Worth made an admirable movement.—"The head of his division arrived with him a mouth of the Rio Grande the day before yesterday" (24th January.) When the remainder came up is not stated; yet one of your "naked historical facts" places the whole command at the points of embarkation waiting for the "ten vessels" at least nine days before the actual arrival of any part of them. But if they had been there, why should they have been detained for these vessels? In the same letter—written but two days after the arrival of the head of the first division, and probably before the other troops had come up—you say that "the Quartermaster, (Brevet major General Jesup, at New Orleans,) I find, has taken all proper measures with judgment and promptitude to provide everything depending on his department for the dispatch and success of my expedition." If more was wanted, cumulative proof might be drawn from the same source—your own correspondence—to show not only that this charge against me has no foundation in truth, but that you can have no apology for having preferred it.

After showing how unfortunate you have been in your specific charges, I may with propriety meet those of a general and sweeping character with a less particular detail of proofs to show their groundlessness.

Though the "ten vessels" were not, for the very sufficient reasons I have assigned, sent out in ballast from the Atlantic cities; yet a very large number were sent thence with stores, supplies, and troops, to co-operate in the expedition.

In Genera[l] Jesup's letter to me of the 17th instant, a copy of which is sent herewith, he states that fifty-three ships, barques, brigs, and schooners, were sent from the north, and the department actually furnished at New Orleans, Brazos, and Tampico, for the army, before it took up the line of March into the interior, one hundred and sixty-three vessels.

I have alluded to the large number of surf boats, and the great difficulty of procuring them, as the cause of the delay in their arrival. I have also a similar reason to offer in reply to your complaint for not having seasonable received the siege train and ordnance supplies. The delay is to be ascribed to the enormously large outfit you requested. If it was necessary, and dispatch was used in procuring it, no one is in fault. If too large, you certainly should not regard as a reprehensible delay the time necessarily taken up in preparing it. To show that it was large, and required much time to procure it, I will select from many a single item. You demanded from eighty to one hundred thousand ten-inch shells, and forty or fifty mortars of like caliber. This enormous quantity of shells—about four thousand tons—was mostly to be manufactured after you left Washington. All the furnaces in the country, willing to engage in the business, were set to work; but, with the utmost diligence and dispatch, the supply of this one article, or even two-thirds of it, having to

Be manufactured and transported to the seaboard from the furnaces, (located in most instances in the interior of the country) at a season of the year when water communications were obstructed by ice, could not be ready to be sent forward to you in many months after your departure from Washington. Had your requisitions been moderate—and undoubtedly more moderate ones would have sufficed—they could have been furnished at a much earlier period.

The memorandum which you left "for the siege train and ammunition therefore," was submitted to me by the Ordnance Department, on the 26th of November, with an intimation that it could not be complied with in season for the expedition to go forward as early as you had contemplated. I endorsed upon it, "comply with the above as far as practicable;" and this order, I am satisfied, after full examination, was faithfully executed.

What could be done at Washington, was promptly done. You had with you the Quartermaster General, with all the means at the command of the War Department, and with unrestricted authority to do whatever you might require. He was under your supervision, and subject to your orders, able and willing to execute them. You have never intimated that he, in any respect, failed in his duty; but on the contrary, you have spoken in highly commendatory terms of his efficient services.

I have already quoted your acknowledgment that he had taken all proper measures with judgment and promptitude to provide everything depending on his department for the dispatch and success of your expedition. In an issue of fact between you and the head of the War Department, his testimony, next to your own confession, is the best that can be offered to correct your misstatements and to refute your charges.

In his letter to me of the 2d January, 1847, he says: "Gen. Scott left for the interior on the 29th ult., and I am taking active measures to have everything depending upon me ready for his operations. The quartermaster's department, I find, is called upon to do a great deal that should be done by other branches of the staff. So far as Gen. Scott's operations go, I shall have everything done that is necessary, whether it belongs to my department or to other departments to do it."

You had with you, and subject to your orders, not only the Quartermaster General, but officers of the other staff departments. They did not look to the War Department, but to yourself, for directions; and it was your duty, and not mine, to see that your requirements were complied with. That they were so, to the utmost practicable extent, I have no reason to doubt; but if they were not, the fault, if any, is not with the War Department. You also gave the instructions in relation to providing the means of land transportation, and the officers charged with that duty were under your immediate control; and if there is blame anywhere for any deficiency in this respect, it cannot be imputed to the War Department.—Your whole correspondence with me, and the staff officers with you, shows that you very properly took upon yourself the whole charge of giving directions in this matter. Ina letter to Captain Hetzel, senior quartermaster a the Brazos, speaking on this subject of the land transportation which may be needed after the descent on the enemy's coast near Vera Cruz, you say: "I have already discussed and arranged with you the detail of the early land transportation train; &c. On the 19th of March, you furnished General Jesup with your estimates and directions on this subject. The staff officers being with you, and under your orders, nothing further was, or properly could be, required or expected to emanate form Washington, beyond the supply of funds; and, this being done, if you were disappointed in not realizing your expectations, you have not a colorable pretense for imputing blame to "the head of the War Department."

As a just ground of complaint, and a matter of accusation, you refer to your deficiency of means to make the descent, and to capture the city of Vera Cruz and the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa, and assume that the extent of that deficiency was the difference between what you received and what you required. It would be quite as correct reasoning to say, that what you had having proved sufficient for the purpose, that difference showed the extent of the errors in your estimate. The truth lies, perhaps, between the two extremes,—You had less, probably, then you should have had, and you required much more than was necessary. That you did not have more, and, indeed, all you asked for, I have already shown was not the fault of the war Department.

Gen. Jesup was with you at Vera Cruz, saw your means, and is capable of forming an estimate of their sufficiency. He is, as his letter herewith shows, disposed to be just, and even generous to your fame. To his opinion on the subject, no well-founded exception can be taken. He says, in reference to your complaints on account of a deficient supply of surf-boats, siege train and ordnance stores: "The result shows that he (General Scott) had surf-boats and stores enough!"—And of the delay of which you complain, he fully exonerated the War Department, and ascribes the whole to yourself, and to unavoidable accidents. The imputation that you were designedly crippled in your means, is a charge as preposterous as it is unfounded.

I am aware that the execution of some of the many arrangements for the Vera Cruz expedition was obstructed and delayed by accidents, but they were such as common sagacity could not foresee, or human agency control. They were not, however, more than a considerate mind, bringing into view all the vast difficulties of the case, would have expected. When your complaints on this subject were first received here, evincing, as they did, that you intended to hold the department responsible for every untoward event, the heads of the several bureaus were called on by me to show how they had executed the duties which had been confided to them, particularly in regard to matters referred to by you. The evidence they presented of having done all that was required, or could have been expected, convinced me—and I venture to say that on a full examination, it will satisfy any mind open to conviction—that all your complaints, so far as they imputed blame to the War Department, or any of its branches, are unfounded. It will do much more—it will show that great industry, promptness, uncommon capacity, and extraordinary exertions, in relation to everything connected with the war, have characterized the action of each of these subordinate departments. As a commendation justly merited by these several branches of the department, assailed as they are indirectly by you, I see no good reason for withholding my opinion, that an instance cannot be found where so much has been done, and well done, in so short a time, by any similar body of officers under similar circumstances.

As you have, by implication, laid a heavy hand upon the bureau which is charged with the onerous duties of executing the laws and orders for raising and sending forward the recruits and levies, I feel bound to affirm that you have done to that branch of the public service the greatest in justice. No industry has been spared—no possible omitted—to raise the forces which were authorized, and to send them to their destination within the briefest practicable period.—The numerous orders issued from the Adjutant General's office, and its voluminous
You have pressed with unwonted zeal the charge in relation to diverting the detachments of the new regiments under Gen. Cadwalader's command to the Brazos, and have indulged in the wildest speculations as to the sad consequences which attended this imputed error. Assuming that my orders diverted these troops, or any others,[an assertion which I shall controvert hereafter,] the circumstances justifies the measure. The critical condition of gen. Taylor, according to all received here at that time, is stated in my letter to you of the 22d of March. To show that the department acted properly, though it incurred your reproof, it is necessary to recall the facts as they then appeared here. They are presented in the following extracts from that letter:

"The information which has just reached us in the shape of rumors, as to the situation of gen. Taylor, and the forces under his command, has excited the most painful apprehensions for their safety. It is almost certain that Santa Anna has precipitated the large army he had collected at San Luis de Potosi upon Gen. Taylor; and it may be that the General has not been able to maintain the advanced position he had seen fit to take at Agua Nueva, but had been obliged to fall back on Monterey. It is equally certain that a Mexican force had been interposed between Monterey and the Rio Grande, and that it had interrupted the line of communication between the two places, and seized large supplies which were on the way to Gen. Taylor's army.

"If the hostile force between the Rio Grande and General Taylor's army is as large as report represents it, our troops now on that river may not be able to re-establish the line, nor will it, perhaps, be possible to place a force there sufficient for the purpose, in time to prevent disastrous consequences to our army, unless aid can be afforded from the troops under your immediate command.

"From one to two thousand of the new recruits for the ten regiments, for this quarter, will be on the way to the Brazos, in the course of three or four days. All the other forces will be directed to that point, and every effort made to relieve General Taylor from his critical situation. You will have been fully apprized before this can reach you of the condition of things in the valley of the Rio Grande, and at the Headquarters of General Taylor, and have taken, I trust, such measures as the importance of the subject requires. I need not urge upon you the fatal consequences which would result from any serious disaster which might befall the army under Gen. Taylor, nor do I doubt that you will do what is in your power to avert such a calamity."

The course pursued by the War Department on that occasion, which you convert into a charge, must, on revision, I think, commend itself to general approbation. Had it been indifferent to the alarming condition of General Taylor's army, and forborne to use, a the earliest moment, the most energetic measures, to guard against the fatal consequences of its defeat, then too probable, it would have deserved an arraignment as severe as that which you have made against it for having done its duty in that critical emergency. When you first received the reasons assigned for the course adopted here, they appear to have been satisfactory. In your dispatch on the 28th of April, you say: "Yesterday I learned, by your letter of the 22d, and the Adjutant General's of the 26th ult., that all the recruits of the regiments—some 3,000—raised or likely to be raised in time for this army, have been ordered to the Rio Grande." You did not then intimate the slightest dissatisfaction—not even a premonitory symptom of that deep distress with which, instantly on Mr. Trist's arrival in Mexico, you represent yourself to have been seized. It is a coincidence not unworthy of notice, that the letter containing your first commendatory remark on this subject was written on the day of the date of Mr. Trist's first note to you, and only the day before your captious reply to it; and in both you assail the War Department. Your withering disappointments seem to have slumbered for ten days, and then to have been aroused by the appearance of Mr. Trist in Mexico, and your quarrel with him. If the order from the War Department had in fact "diverted" the forces with general Cadwalader, still it was fully justified by the threatening aspects of affairs on the Rio Grande; but I am quite sure it did not divert them. No previous order form the department had designated any other place of rendezvous than the Brazos for the troops that were to join your column. It was well understood, before you left Washington, that all the troops for both armies were to be sent to that place, and there to fall under your command.

This arrangement was not, nor was it expected that it would be here changed, until you had penetrated so far into the enemy's country as to render your communications with that place of general rendezvous difficult and dilatory.

You also complain that the order was not countermanded. If there had been such an order and it had been countermanded, what would have been the consequences? The troops would have gone forward from the Untied States under the former orders of the department, which would have taken them to the same place.

You allege that "the news of the victory of Buena Vista reached Washington in time to countermand Cadwalader's orders for the Rio Grande before his departure from N. Orleans." I notice this specification of neglect of my duty, to show the extent to which you have carried your fault-finding, and the industry with which you have searched for occasions to indulge it.

Your assumption is, that the news of the victory of Buena Vista should have satisfied the War Department that Cadwalader's forces were not needed on the Rio Grande; and the omission to countermand, as soon as that news was received, the orders to send them there, was a neglect deserving severe animadversion. How did you act under similar circumstances? With better means of information as to the actual condition of the Rio Grande frontier, after the victory of Buena vista, you did not deem it prudent, after being forty-one days in possession of the news of that victory, to issue positive orders to remove a single man from that frontier; yet you venture to censure me for not having sent the troops away the moment the news reached Washington.
You received information of that victory on or before the 14th of March, for on that day you proclaimed it in orders to your army. On the 25th of April, more than forty days thereafter, you issued an order to the commanding officer at the Brazos to embark for Vera Cruz "such detachments of the new regiments as may have been ordered by the War Department to Point Isabel;” but you made it conditional with reference to the safety of the line of the Rio Grande; and said to that officer, that you relied upon his "sound judgment to determine on the spot whether that line would not be too much exposed by the withdrawal of the troops in question.”—Thus it appears that you do not hesitate to impute neglect of duty to me, for not having adopted and acted on the conclusion that the line of the Rio Grande was safe the moment I heard of the victory of Buena Vista; but, when acting on the same subject, you dared not adopt that conclusion, although you had been in possession of the same information forty-one days. Your own conduct in this matter completely refutes this charge of yours against the War department.—It does more: it shows how rash and inconsiderate you have been in selecting topics for attack.

But the most serious consequences are attributed to the long delay of these troops at the Brazos. For your sake, I sincerely hope these consequences are much exaggerated, because I am quite confident it will be shown that you alone are responsible for the delay. The War Department did not—and it was proper that it should not—issue any order in regard to the movement of these troops after their arrival in Mexico.—The order from the department of 30th of April, making a division of the new levies between the two columns, does not contradict this assertion, for these levies were then mostly within the United States; only portions of them had then reached Mexico. Until this order took effect, the troops at the Brazos, and, indeed, on the Rio Grande and with General Taylor, were under your entire and unrestricted command. As to this matter, you were under no misapprehension; for, on the 25th of April, before you were informed what had been done here to secure the Rio Grande line, you issued an order in relation to the troops at the Brazos. This place, you well knew, was the general rendezvous of the new levies from the United States, and before you sailed on your expedition to Vera Cruz you were notified that the Mexican army were advancing upon General Taylor. To have assumed that you had not left at the Brazos, with a view to meet any probable contingency, orders for the proper disposition of the troops which were, or might have been sent there, would have implied an opinion that you wanted suitable qualifications for the high station which had been assigned to you.

These troops were a part of your command, and subject to your orders; and if they remained one day at the Brazos after it was there known that they were not needed on the Rio Grande line, and would be serviceable with your column, the fault was entirely your own, and in no wise imputable to the War Department. If your opinion be not extravagant—and you say it is not—that but for the diversion of General Cadwalader’s forces from you, and the "much precious time" lost at the Brazos, you "might easily have taken this city [Mexico] in the month of June, and at one-fifth of the loss sustained in August and September,” you have indeed a most fearful account to settle with your country.

I cannot, however, regard your speculative opinions on this subject as fanciful and wild.—You greatly overestimate the force which landed at the Brazos and subsequently joined you.—from the best calculation which can be made from data in the Adjutant General’s office, the number was much less than you imagine, and did not probably exceed one thousand. As the refutation of your charge against the department for diverting these troops is in no wise impaired by the number, be it more or less, it is not important to inquire into that matter. But there is a question of serious import, to which I think the country will expect you to answer.

If these new levies, which had just entered the service, would have enabled you to capture the city of Mexico in June, with a comparative small loss, why did you, at the very time you discovered that they were so much needed, and would have been so useful, send away from your army three times as many volunteers, who had been many months in service, and were, as you acknowledge, "respectable in discipline and efficiency,” and who had distinguished themselves at Vera Cruz and Cerro Gordo, and, in the hour of peril, had fought by the side of your veteran troops, and merited an honorable share in the glory of those memorable conflicts? The period of their engagement had not expired. When thus sent away, but one of the seven regiments had less than thirty, and most of them had more than forty-five days to serve. According to your own opinion, concurred in by the department, they could have been legally retained on your line of operations till the last hour of their engagement. If not deemed expedient to take them on towards Mexico with you, their services, at that critical period, would have been of inestimable value in holding the post at . . . [illegible] and so unexpectedly abandoned—and in keeping open the communication between Vera Cruz and your headquarters, whereby supplies, munitions and recruits could be safely and expeditiously forwarded to you. Had this been done, you would have been spared the trouble of inditing many items of grievance and complaints against the War Department for having failed to furnish them. If you had retained the twelve months’ volunteers until the end of their agreement—and no sufficient reason has yet been shown for their premature discharge—you might, for a season at least, have received, without much obstruction, supplies from the main depot on the Gulf; the army might have been strengthened by reinforcements at an earlier period; and many of the revolting scenes of barbarity on the road from Vera Cruz to Jalap, in which so many lives of our fellow-citizens have been sacrificed by the ruthless guerilleros, would not have occurred.

Another and still more lamentable calamity is, I think, fairly to be ascribed to the early obstruction of this important line of communication. The brave and patriotic men who were hurried on to Mexico, in small detachments, in order to reinforce your army, were unexpectedly, but necessarily, detained at Vera Cruz until the numbers there collected there were sufficient to force their way through the strong guerilla bands which held the difficult passes on the Jalapa road.—While thus detained on this inhospitable coast, in the sickly season, they were exposed to the attacks of a wasting pestilence, more formidable, and, as it unfortunately proved, more destructive, than the Mexican army.

When the unwelcome news of the premature discharge of this large body of volunteers was received here, unaccompanied by any explanation to show the necessity of the act, it excited very general surprise and regret. Its consequences were at one foreseen; but the step had been taken, and could not be retracted. It was loudly
As early as June, you begged to be recalled.—You allege that this application was “rebukingly declined.” This is not a persecuted man. It; though in doing this, you may be deprived of much upon which you depend to sustain your claim to be considered denominate your dismissal, I may be obliged to strip it of the embellishments you have ingeniously thrown around. In presenting in its true light the President’s compliance with your own request to be recalled, which you now credit of the fulfillment of your own early prediction.

Your letter of the 25th of July, which was not received at Washington until the 30th of Dec’r last, abounds with recklessly put forth the groundless complaint of “a total want of support and sympathy” from it. This novel conception, so suddenly adopted, was as suddenly carried out; your army was, indeed, converted “into a self sustaining machine;” you discharged the twelve months’ volunteers, and broke up your posts at Jalapa, and on the way to your main depot, “resolved,” as you announced, “no longer to depend on Vera Cruz or home”—you put yourself beyond the reach of the supplies which had been provided by the government, and at Jalapa, and on the way to your main depot, “resolved,” as you announced, “no longer to depend on Vera Cruz or home”—you put yourself beyond the reach of the supplies which had been provided by the government, and rendered yourself, in a great measure, inaccessible to the recruits and levies (except in strong parties) which had been raised to augment your command. In this way, you rendered unavailing, for a time at least, all that had been or could be done by the assiduous and incessant labors of the War Department in all its branches; and then you recklessly put forth the groundless complaint of “a total want of support and sympathy” from it.

Your letter of the 25th of July, which was not received at Washington until the 30th of Dec’r last, abounds with complaints against the department, and refers in strong terms to the wants and sufferings of the army at that time. Before you ventured to make its then destitute condition a ground of charge against the War Department, you ought to have recollected that these afflictions fell upon it in the midst of your experiment of making it “a self sustaining machine”—and were the legitimate fruits of that experiment. These sufferings came upon it before your estimated period of isolation from “Vera Cruz and home” had necessarily abandoned both, and entered upon your self-sustaining position, “cut off from all supplies and reinforcements from home, until perhaps in late November,” by what pretense of justice do you complain of the War Department for the distresses you thus voluntarily inflicted upon yourself and the gallant army under your command? Something very different from censure and reproof is due for the extraordinary efforts which were successfully made to reach you with recruits and supplies in your sequestered situation, and to rescue you from the embarrassments in which your ill judged measures had involved you. I have brought into view this unaccountable movement of yours, with no purpose to make any comment upon it as a military measure, but solely to show that the evils resulting from it are not just grounds of accusation against the War Department, and that the labored attempt to pervert them to such a purpose discloses the manner and spirit with which you have executed the assumed task of its accuser.

As you have indulged in the widest range of speculation in regard to the alleged sinister motives and covert designs of others, I feel less reluctant to present my views as to the main object of your last communication. Throughout the whole of it, and particularly in the concluding part, you manifest the most solicitude to place yourself in the position of an injured and persecuted man. With all the aid you can derive from dextrous strategy, you will be likely to fail in your attempt, unless you can have the full benefit of your high coloring of some facts, and your forgetfulness of others, together with all your fanciful conjectures and surmises. Your recall is, you assert, the long suspended “blow of power,” which you had the sagacity clearly to predict. It is somewhat remarkable that your predictions preceded the events which you imagine provoked that blow. As early as the 25th of July, soon after the “happy change in my (your) relations, both official and private, with Mr. Trist,” you looked, you say, “to be dismissed from the service of my (your) country.” If your recall can be regarded as a dismissal, you are entitled to all the credit of the fulfillment of your own early prediction.

As early as June, you begged to be recalled.—You allege that this application was “rebukingly declined.” This is not
In conclusion, I may be permitted to state, that, as one of the President’s advisers, I had a full share in the immediate gratification of your wishes; but the President promised to act definitely on the question when that obstacle should be removed. Judging from the state of things at the headquarters of the army in January, he concluded that it was removed, and that he ought no longer to require of you reluctant service as commanding general. This certainly cannot be called persecution or punishment. I do not deem it proper to comment on the state of things at the headquarters of the army, to which illusion is made in the letter granting your request; nor to express an opinion as to the share of responsibility therefor, which rests upon yourself or others; that matter is, to a considerable extent, involved in the investigations before the court of inquiry, now sitting in Mexico. Your request to be recalled, thus ultimately granted, was prefaced with imaginary complaints, which could not be passed without notice, nor noticed without exposing their groundlessness. If the exposition has given offence, you can blame only yourself for introducing complaints so entirely unfounded.

The crowning outrage, as you regard it, is the simple fact that you, and “the three arrested officers,” “are all to be placed together before the same court—the innocent and the guilty—the accuser and the accused; the judge and his prisoners are dealt with alike.” “Most impartial justice!” you exclaim. And why is it not impartial justice? On what ground of right can you claim to have your case discriminated from theirs? It is true, you have assumed to be their judge, and have pronounced them guilty; and complain and repine that the laws of the country do not allow you, their accuser, to institute a court to register your decree. But you are not their rightful judge, although they were your prisoners. Before that court you all stand on the same level, and all have equal rights. Though you may have the same self-satisfying conviction that you are innocent and they are guilty, the government could act upon no such presumption. By becoming an accuser, you did not place yourself beyond the reach of being accused; and unless you are clothed with the immunity of despotic power, and can claim the benefit of the maxim “that the King can do no wrong,” I know not why your conduct, when made the subject of charges, may not be investigated by a court of inquiry; nor can I perceive what other or better right you have to complain of and arraign the government, than the other officers whom you have accused, and whose cases, with yours, were referred to the same court. If yours is a hard case, theirs is not less so. If you can rightfully complain of persecution by the government, so can they, with equal justice, and an equal claim to public sympathy.

The charges against you did not emanate from the government, nor did they relate to a matter in which it could feel any peculiar interest. Not believing it impossible for you to do wrong, or that you were exempt from all responsibility for whatever you might have done, the government deemed it proper, when charges were preferred against you, coming from a source entitled to respect, to cause them to be investigated. As the usual and mildest mode of proceeding, they were referred to a court of inquiry. Until you can show that you enjoy the transcendental privilege to have your official conduct exempt from all examination in any form whatever, you have no cause to complain of the course taken in regard to the charges against you.

If your extraordinary pretensions are to derive any support from your distinguished services in the field, you ought to be mindful that the three accused officers put under arrest by you have like claims for distinguished services. In the pages of impartial history, their names and their gallant deeds must appear with yours; and no monopolizing claims, seeking “malignant exclusions” at the expense of the “truth of history,” will be permitted to rob them of their fair share of the glory won by our gallant arm while under your command.

With your assault upon the character of your “erratic brother,” I shall not intermeddle; but I must repel your charge, that he has been favored for being a political deserter “to the true faith”—for signalizing his apostacy by acceptable denunciations of one “to whom he had ‘formerly’ professed [and not without cause] the highest obligations. The reasons for not sending your charges against Brevet Major General Worth to the court of inquiry, are set forth in my letter of the 13th of January. I regret that they are so entirely unsatisfactory to you, but am consoled with the assurance that they are in other quarters more favorably received. The errors of your commentary on my letter have arisen from your misapprehension of the text. The principles there laid down is of vital importance to subordinate officers, and in no respect impairs the rights or the authority of those in chief command. As the principles which you arraign are the creations of your own fancy, and have no countenance or support from my letter, I am in no way implicated by “the fatal consequences” you deduce from them. Whether legitimate or fanciful, they do not disturb the positions laid down in my letter.

I cannot, however, but regard your solicitude for the support of discipline to be more ostentatious than profound. When a general at the head of an army of freemen, who do not lose their rights as citizens by becoming soldiers, sets up pretensions to dictatorial power—when he condemns the authority of his government, and is much more ready to censure than to execute its orders and instructions—when he denounces as an outrage and a punishment the attempt to submit his acts, charged to be an offence against a subordinate officer, to an investigation in the mildest form—when he administers an indignant reproof to his superior, for upholding the sacred right to appeal, upon which the security and protection of all under his command,—such a general sets an example of insubordinate conduct of wide and withering influence upon sound military discipline.

By extending my comments upon your letter, I might multiply proofs to show that your accusations against the head of the War Department are unjust; that your complaints air unfounded; that the designs imputed by you to the government to embarrass your operations, impair your rightful authority as commander, and to offer outrage and insult to your feelings, are all the mere creations of a distempered fancy; but to do more than I have done, would, in my judgment, be a work of supererogation.

In conclusion, I may be permitted to say, that, as one of the President’s advisers, I had a full share in the responsibility of the act which assigned you to the command of our armies in Mexico. I felt interested, even more than naturally appertained to my official position, that success and glory should signalize your operations. It was my duty to bring to your aid the efficient co-operation of the War Department, I never had a feeling that did not harmonize with the full and fair discharge of this duty. I know it has been faithfully performed. There are some men for whom enough cannot be done to make them grateful or even just, unless acts of subserviency and personal devotedness are superadded. From you I expected bare justice, but have been disappointed.—I have found you my accuser. In my vindication, I have endeavored to maintain a defensive line; and if I have gone beyond it at any time, it has been done to repel unprovoked aggression.—To your fame I have endeavored to be just. I have been gratified with the many occasions I have had to bear public testimony to your abilities and signal services as a military commander in the field. It had been, and, under any change in our personal relations, it will continue to be, my purpose to be liberal in my appreciation of your distinguished military merits. In respect to your errors and your faults, though I could not be blind, I regret that you have not permitted me to be silent.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. L. MARCY, Secretary of War.

Major General Winfield Scott,
U.S. army, Mexico
[BWP]

REv45i2p1c5, May 9, 1848, Quartermaster General’s Office, Washington City, February 18, 1848.

SIR: In reply to the complaint of General Scott, in his despatch of the 25th of December, that Lieutenant Colonel Johnson’s train had returned without one blanket, coat, jacket, or pair of pantaloons, the small depot at Vera Cruz having been exhausted by the troops under Generals Patterson, Butler, and Marshall, respectively, all fresh from home—I have the honor to state, that if the facts are as set forth by the General Scott, the responsibility lies at other doors than mine. Understanding fully his...[illegible]...wishes... under his command; those corps, I believe, never...seven thousand men; to supply them, I...eleven thousand forage caps; fourteen thousand wool jackets, and four thousand cotton jackets, fifteen thousand flannel shirts, and seventeen thousand cotton shirts; eighteen thousand pairs of wool overalls, and four thousand pairs of cotton overalls; seventeen thousand pairs of flannel drawers; thirty-seven thousand pairs of booties, (I ordered fifty thousand pairs;) twenty thousand pairs of stockings; two thousand four hundred great coats, and nine thousand two hundred blankets. These supplies were all sent to Vera Cruz previous to the 30th of June.

I made no provision for the volunteers, for you are well aware I had not a single cent that I could legally apply to the purchase of clothing for them. If the generals named by General Scott exhausted the clothing placed in depot at Vera Cruz, by applying it to the use of their respective commands, they acted in violation of the 36th article of war, and the General should hold them accountable.

It is known here that several thousand suits of clothing, sent to New Orleans and Mexico for the old army, have been issued to the new regiments and to volunteers. But Gen. Scott is mistaken in supposing that the depot at Vera Cruz was entirely exhausted by those issues; for I have official information, as late as the 6th of December, some time after Lieut. Col. Johnson’s train left Vera Cruz, there still remained in depot, at that post, eight thousand forage caps; three thousand none hundred wool coats and jackets, and six thousand nine hundred cotton jackets; nineteen hundred wool, and seven thousand seven hundred cotton overalls; twenty-seven hundred flannel, and thirteen thousand seven hundred cotton shirts; fifteen thousand six hundred pairs of drawers; two thousand seven hundred great-coats; seven thousand blankets, and eleven thousand pairs of bootees.

If the volunteers and new regiments went to Mexico without the proper supplies, that was the fault of those who commanded them. Gen. Butler, I understand, was specially directed to superintend the organization, equipment, and movement of the volunteer force. It was his business, not mine, to see that they were properly clothed and supplied; and neither he, Gen. Patterson, nor Gen. Marshall, had any right to take for their commands the supplies I had placed at Vera Cruz for Gen. Scott’s old regiments.

For the new regiments I had made timely arrangements, and would have sent to Vera Cruz, in November, a large supply of clothing; but I received, in October, a report from Capt. Irwin, (acting quartermaster general of Gen. Scott’s army,) dated at the city of Mexico, the 27th of September, of which the following is an extract: "I have now a thousand people engaged in making clothing. The quality of the material is not so good as our own; and the price, on the average, is 50 per cent. Higher; still, supposing the road between this and Vera Cruz to be entirely open, I think the government will lose little; if anything, by purchasing here. I shall be able to fill, in a very short time, every requisition which has been made on me, with clothing, which, though not exactly our uniform, will be comfortable and good.”

This information, sir, was from a man who not only knew how to supply an army, by putting into requisition all the resources of the country around him, but was better qualified to command a large army than most of your generals in the field. The report of Capt. Irwin delayed my action here; but, in December, I ordered from Philadelphia a supply of clothing sufficient for the whole army, regulars and volunteers.

To enable me to do this, I have been obliged to apply, on my own responsibility, three hundred and sixty-eight thousand dollars of the funds of the quartermaster’s department to the purchase of clothing, and to authorize purchases to be made on credit, which have been paid for by bills drawn on me at ninety days, which I have accepted—hoping that Congress, by making an appropriation, will enable me to meet them by the time they become due.

I have the honor to be, sir, your ob’dt serv’t,

TH. H. JESUP, Quartermaster General.

(To The Hon. Wm. L. Marcy, Secretary of War, Washington City.)

REv45i2p1c5, May 9, 1848, Quartermaster General’s Office, Washington City, April 17, 1848.

SIR: I have received the extracts from General Scott’s letter to you, dated the 24th of February, complaining of the want of means of transportation, of supplies, and of funds form the Quartermaster’s Department; in consequence of which, he informs you, he was embarrassed and delayed in his operations, as well in the attack of Vera Cruz as in his movements afterwards, and I have to state, in reply, that delays did occur in the movement upon Vera Cruz which were most vexatious, but which were not occasioned by any neglect or mission on my part, or on that of any other officer of the department, as a detail of the facts will show. The memorandum from the War Department for the Quartermaster General, alluded to by General Scott, fixed the number of transport ships for his expedition at forty-one, viz. twelve for the volunteers, ordnance, an supplies, from the Atlantic, five for surf boats or lighters; ten to go out in ballast for troops on the Gulf of Mexico; and fourteen to be supplied by the officers of the quartermaster’s department at New Orleans and on the Gulf. That number, I take it for granted, was determined upon by Gen. Scott himself, or by the War Department, with his assent; as I have not understood that the at any time objected to the number as insufficient. He complains that the ten in ballast for troops were not sent, and that the embarkation was delayed thereby, "in whole or in part, from the 15th of January to the 9th of March."

Colonel Stanton informs me that the order to charter those ten vessels was countermanded in consequence of a letter from me, dated at Brazos, Santiago, the 27th day of December, which was read by gen. Scott before it was sealed, and to which he added a postscript. The general no doubt relied upon those vessels. I expected them; for I believed they would be chartered and on the way before my letter could be received; but so boisterous was the season, that I thought it unsafe to trust to their arrival, and made my arrangements as if they had actually failed; which fact I reported to Gen. Scott, as well as I now remember, either through Captain Wayne or the late Captain Hetzel.

It will be seen by reference to the memorandum referred to, that twenty-seven vessels were to be sent from the Atlantic with troops, supplies, and in ballast. Not one was sent in ballast; but there were actually fifty-three ships, barques, brigs and schooners, sent with troops and supplies. It was expected that I should furnish fourteen ships.—The department actually furnished at New Orleans, Brazos, and Tampico for the army, before it took up the line of march into the interior, one hundred and sixty-three vessels, some of which made several voyages.

I submit a copy of a report from the late Capt. Hetzel, (marked A,) dated at the Brazos, the 21st of February, 1847, which shows what had been done by the department up to that time. Of the 102 vessels contained in that report, five were from the Atlantic—four only of which had reported there, the other had been wrecked. I also submit paper marked B, which is a list of vessels chartered at Tampico, to transport thence troops, horses and mules.

Under the mist favorable circumstances, much time would have been required to organize so extensive a transport service; but, owing to the drenching rains throughout the month of January, the ships and other vessels chartered at New Orleans could not be prepared and sent to sea as rapidly as was desirable; and the frightful northers described by General Scott in his letter of the 12th of January, 1947, and mentioned in many of his subsequent letters, delayed their arrival at the Brazos and Tampico, as well as the movement from those points. The time lost from these causes alone, may be fairly estimated at from twenty-five to thirty days. But a measure of General Scott, which he seems to have overlooked in summing up his difficulties, produced not only embarrassment and increased expense, but delays more injurious to the service than the want of the ten ships promised from the Atlantic, even had others not been substituted in their place. It was the change in the destination of the Mississippi, Louisiana, North Carolina, Massacusetts, and Virginia regiments. Had the two former been sent direct to Lobos, and a regiment already at Tampico been left there for the defence of the place, and the regiment replaced by the Mississippi regiment been left with General Taylor, double lighterage would have been avoided at a time when lighters were not abundant; delay would have been prevented; and six ships, that were rendered comparatively useless, would have been available for the campaign, the places of which had to be supplied. Had cutters or pilot-boats been dispatched to cruise off Cape San Antonio, with orders for the North Carolina, Massachusetts, and Virginia regiments to proceed direct to Sacrificios, double lighterage, as well as the transports for the troops that replaced them, would have been saved.

General Scott certainly . . . [illegible]...he, not you or I, is responsible . . . increased expense, and delay . . . by that change.

As to the complaint of the want of funds; you are aware that the appropriations were nearly exhausted—the small amount available I was obliged to use so as to preserve the credit of the department; and I made the only arrangement in my power for the supply of funds, by authorizing the officers of the department to draw on me without limit. The service, I know, was carried on with as little embarrassment as ever attended the service of any
The complaint of General Scott in regard to clothing is fully answered in my report of the 18th February last, which will be found in executive document No. 56, page 250, to which I respectfully refer.

General Scott says that not more than half of the surf-boats he required came at all; and of the siege train and ordnance stores, only about one-half had arrived when the Mexican flags were replaced by those of the United States at Vera Cruz. The science and valor of the army, he says, had to supply all deficiencies. The result shows that he had surf-boats and stores enough; and one of his high merits as a commander is, that he never doubted the science and valor of his army, but made the best use of both. He had invaded a country with resources sufficient to support large armies against us; he availed himself, with great ability, of the resources of the enemy. This, I know, you and the President expected him to do; had he failed to do so, or had he doubted the science and valor of his army, he would have proved himself unfit for the high trust confided to him, and those who placed him in command would have had a heavy account to settle with the country. But his complaints are entirely groundless, as he, in his cooler moments, I have no doubt will admit. He is one of the best informed military men now living; but it would puzzle him to show a single instance in the military history of the last two centuries, in which an army, whose personnel and materiel had to be collected from so vast a territory, was as well appointed and supplied as his army had been. The glorious results of his campaign are a sufficient answer are all his complaints—results so astonishing, that the faithful chronicler of the events as they occurred, will probably be considered rather the compiler of fables than the relater of facts. I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant, THOS. S. JESUP, Quartermaster General. [To Hon. Wm. L. MARCY, Secretary of War, Washington City.]

REv45i2p1c6, May 9, 1848, Quartermaster General’s Office, Washington City, April 18, 1848.

Sir: Since my letter of yesterday, I have received a report from the principal quartermaster at the city of Mexico, dated the 20th of March, from which I make and submit for your consideration the following extract:

“I am happy to inform you that this army (the army under Gen. Butler) is well supplied with clothing, camp and garrison equipage. At Vera Cruz there still remains for issue or transportation to the interior a good supply of the above articles.”

This is a fine commentary on the complaints recently made to you of the delinquencies of the department.

I, am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant, TH. S. JESUP, Quartermaster General. [To The Hon. W. L. MARCY, Secretary of War, Washington City.]

[REv45i2p2c1, May 9, 1848, Thunder Without Light.]

Tuesday Morning, May 9, 1848. Gen. Taylor’s two last letters do not contain more thunder than is produced in our theatres by frothing the mustard-bowl on the floor above; “we are certain that the light they give only serves to make their internal “darkness visible.” The Taylor-boys consider them “tall thunder,” and the Whigs, though they groan in spirit while they peruse, will continue to exclaim until after the Convention, “Light, boys, Light!” After the Convention it will be “Fire in the mountains; run, boys, run;” and when Mr. Clay receives the nomination, and the Taylor flag still floats in the breeze, they will tear these letters into tatters.—We will then compose ourselves with a glass of something cool, for it will be very hot, and smile complacently while they fight the fire.

We gave our comment upon the Baldwin and Gallaher correspondence. As we thought, there was something omitted in the letter to which the General’s was a response; but we are assured that it was not of the least importance, and we take it for granted—though people will differ upon what is considered important. We have heard a lady scream because a tiny ant ran over her neck;—a woodman would have thought it of not the least importance. We proceed, now, to review the General’s letter to his brother-in-law, Capt. Allison. We should have been pleased to have had the letter to which it was an answer.—To understand a witness, much depends upon the questions asked, and the manner in which they are propounded.

Gen. Taylor commences: “My opinions have recently been so often misconceived and misrepresented, that I deem it due to myself, if not to my friends, to make a brief exposition of them upon the topics to which you have called my attention.” How could the General expect anything else?—Who knew, or who knows now, what his opinions are? Here we have in our own city the Whig and the Republican, both warm Taylor presses until Mr. Clay’s nomination of himself, and then one hot Taylor man, and one lukewarm sort of a Taylor man, disputing over the meaning of his last two letters. In his first he says, “I do not design to withdraw my name if Mr. Clay be the nominee of the Whig National Convention.” “It has never been my intention at any moment, to change my position, or to withdraw my name from the canvass, whoever may be the nominee of the National Convention, either of the Whig or Democratic party.” And in his second letter he says: “But having, at the solicitation of many of my countrymen, taken my position until my friends manifest a wish that I should retire from it.” Suppose his friends should be divided;--some screaming at the top of their voices, "Hold on, hold on,"—others begging gently, "Let go, let go,"—some affirming, "Henry Clay is most available"—others "You are."—Some swearing, "You will beat the crowd; you will get democratic votes"—others imploring, "The Convention has nominated Mr. Clay, Gen. Scott!" Under such circumstances, how will the General act? Will he take the vote? Will he assemble his friends in one grand Mass Meeting, and then put the question, "All you who are in favor of Gen. Taylor, say aye!" and "As for the noses, I shall not count them."—This will probably be the method adopted; for the General says, "I have no concealment—I hold no opinion which I would not readily proclaim to . . . [illegible] . . . It would be great. . . eight, twenty-five millions of people assembled to hear the General go through his catechism!

Gen. Taylor says, "I have no private purpose . . . [illegible] . . . enemies to punish, nothing to serve but my country." How will the Simon Pure Whigs relish this? "No party projects to build up." No American system, consisting of a high protective Tariff, to fill, as they say, the public coffers to repletion—of internal improvements by the General Government, to waste the public money upon ill-advise and squandering log-rolling schemes; buying up the public with their own money, and demoralizing every branch of society—no bankrupt law, to induce cheating and swindling, and to deprive honest creditors of their just rights, that dishonest debtors may revel and live upon the earnings of others—no Bank, expanding its discounts to-day, scattering its rags broadcast thro’ the land, until money is depreciated and everything else is bloated with a factitious and speculative value, and then to-morrow contracting with the force of a boa-constrictor, causing its incautious customers, who have come within its folds, to be crushed and destroyed, and every thing to be depressed far beyond its intrinsic value. What will they think?

But, we will ask, what does the general mean by "Party Projects?" Governments must be administered upon some principle. Everything must be done in some way. Well, men differ as to the principle—as to the mode; one set of men think this principle right, another think it wrong. This difference of opinion constitutes and gives vitality to parties. The Constitution declares that the President "shall from time to time give Congress information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." Well, as soon as the President is inaugurated, [if he knows nothing before hand of the minutiae of government, as General Taylor confesses,] he begins to turn his attention to such subjects. He finds the Sub-Treasury, for instance, in existence. His Secretary of the Treasury is an out and out Whig. It has so happened, not through design, but the General selected him not to carry out party schemes, it so happens that he has been brought up in the Whig school; his mind is under a bias against the system. He says, "Mr. President, this scheme is wholly wrong—it won't work—we can't get along with it—the country will be ruined unless you recommend some change." The President turns to another Secretary—he happens to be a Democrat. He says it is the best scheme in the world—it is the constitutional mode of managing the finances; "Mr. President, you must either have this mode, or you must have an United States Bank, or you must employ State Banks." Now the President says, I will wait for Congress to act." Congress don't look into the workings of the system—they are engaged in abusing the President and in praising the President. His Cabinet pull and haul this way and that; and finally he recommends to Congress to pull down the Sub-Treasury and to build up a Bank. Is this or is this not a party project? He says, "I will recommend nothing. I think the Sub-Treasury works very well." Is he not taking just as much by failing to recommend, and thereby permitting things to remain as they were? If he lets it alone, is he not playing into the strong hand of the Democrats? Is this no party project? We could take up every other party measure, and show how utterly futile is any such position. If a man is elevated to the Presidential Chair, he is forced, by circumstances beyond his control, to have party projects and party schemes, and he is wholly unfit for the elevated honor, who has not studied all party schemes and party measures, and has not made up his mind to choose between them. If he takes a ground between the two, and others follow him, than he erects a new party, and carries out their plans.

Again, says the General, "I have been very often addressed by letter, and my opinions have been asked upon almost every question that might occur to the writers as affecting the interests of their country of their party. I have not always responded to these enquiries for various reasons. "The Yankee when asked why he did not play, said he had forty reasons for refusing: "First, I have no money." 'My dear, Sir, you need not go farther. One such reason is sufficient." The General in some of his numerous letters assigned as a reason for not answering, that he had formed no opinions upon the great questions of the day—he had been too long in camp—he had not slept in a house for forty years upon years—and if the people took him, they must take him as a man takes his wife, "for better, for worse." Under these circumstances, we will ask for no other reasons.

The General continues: "I confess, whilst I have great cardinal principles which will regulate my political life, I am not sufficiently familiar with all the minute details of political legislation to give solemn pledges to exert my influence, if I were President, to carry out this or defeat that measure."

In some of his numerous letters he says: “I was educated in the Jefferson school.” If these are the great cardinal principles which will regulate his political life, we confess we should think that, if the Whigs succeed in electing him, they will "catch a Tartar." But, then, he says in his Baldwin and Gallaher letter, "Should such high distinction be conferred upon me as that of elevation to the Executive office, the Constitution, in a strict and honest interpretation, and in the spirit and mode in which it was acted upon by our earlier Presidents, would be my chief guide."—Among our earlier Presidents was old John Adams, with his ultra Federal notions. We confess, if the principles which he maintained are the great cardinal principles which will regulate the General's life, then, if he is elected, the Democrats will catch a Tartar, and the country will catch a Tartar too.

He reiterates, "I am a Whig—but not an ultra Whig." Are the principles of the Whigs the great cardinal principles that will regulate his political life? No; for he immediately adds, "If elected, I would not be the mere President of a party—I would endeavor to act independent of party denomination. I should feel bound to administer the government, untrammeled by party scheme!" He has great cardinal principles—these would guide his actions; but he will not be guided by party rule, by party schemes, by party pledges; he must be independent of all parties. Are you in favor of a Bank? No; this is a party scheme. Are you in favor of the Sub-Treasury? No; this is a party
"Second—The Veto power. The power given by the Constitution to the Executive to interpose his veto, is a high conservative power; but, in my opinion, should never be exercised, except in cases of clear violation of the Constitution, or manifest haste and want of consideration by Congress." The Constitution provides that "Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections," &c. According to this cardinal principle laid down by the General, there must be a clear violation of the Constitution, or manifest haste and want of consideration. Who is to decide whether it be a violation or not, or whether it is a clear violation?—One party will swear it is manifestly a violation, the other will prove it entirely constitutional.—What may not be vetoed under the saving clause of want of consideration? How long must Congress consider a subject?
A wrong measure might be passed by a majority of one, after the greatest consideration. As the Union says, with great strength—

"The more protracted the discussion, the more violent the contest, [illegible]...said to be hasty or ill-considered but the more. . . legality. . . be doubled. Men...argue and dispute about propositions of manifest benefit and utility to to all. Where the contest is more protracted and violent, is there the greatest occasion for the President to exercise a sound discretion in determining between two parties. Yet it is precisely in such a case that the principle of gen.
Taylor converts him into an automaton."

The President sees reasons against such a measure; is he to violate his oath to support the constitution and not interpose his objections?—What is the object of requiring him to make his objections? Is the measure necessarily defeated thereby? If Congress thinks his objections valid, a new bill may be introduced without the objectionable features. If they think them invalid, two thirds may pass it. What is manifest haste?

Gen. Taylor says, "The personal opinions of the individual, who may happen to occupy the Executive chair, ought not to control the action of Congress upon questions of domestic policy; nor ought his objections to be interposed, where questions of constitutional power have been settled by various departments of government and acquiesced in by the people." How can the recommendations which the Constitution requires the President to make to Congress of such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient, control the action of Congress? They are free to act as they please, after his recommendation. How can his opinions unexpressed control their action? The personal opinions of the Executive ought not to control their action, says the General, and we hold it to be equally clear that the opinions of Congress, if believed to be wrong by the President, while our Constitution exists, ought not to control his action.—
If he permits it, without interposing his objections, he violates his oath. "Nor," adds he, "ought his objections to be interposed where questions of constitutional power have been settled by the various departments of government and acquiesced in by the people."—"How long must it be acquiesced in? While one party is in power, a measure is passed, which is denounced by their opponents as unconstitutional. It is acquiesced in rather than have recourse to a Revolution; but is the lapse of years the other party come into power, and, believing the measure to be unconstitutional, it is repealed. The repeal is acquiesced in by the party proposing the measure, just as long as they are out of power and no longer. Must the President fail to interpose his objections to the repeal, if he believes the measure constitutional and wholesome? This commentary, we find, is extending our article to too great a length; we will pursue the fruitful theme on some other occasion.[BWP]

REv45i2p2cZ, May 9, 1848, Which Will "Surrender?"

The republican declares that Gen. Taylor will continue in the field as a candidate for the Presidency, no matter who may be nominated by that body—and his authority we acknowledged is very good for this declaration: Gen. Taylor himself, Yet, strange to say, the Republican of Saturday evening adopts as its leading editorial an article from the "new Orleans National" containing a list of the States which it is expected Gen. T. will get in the Convention, and an argument showing the chances and probabilities of his getting the nomination from that body!—"All that is required (says the article in the Republican) to assure the nomination of Gen. Taylor by an expression quite as strong as that indicated, is for his Whig friends to stand fast and firm to the organization of the party. The Whig nomination is necessary to his success; and that nomination will be awarded him without contention or difficulty, if they will only be true to him and themselves. In the present aspect of things, it cannot be otherwise."

What doesthe Republican mean? Doe sit expect the friends of Clay, (towards whom General Taylor has significantly pointed his finger in connexion with this subject,) and the friends of Scott, and the several candidates for the nomination, will allow General Taylor or his friends to have any part or lot in that Convention, with the declaration of General Taylor and his friends staring them in the face that they will not abide its decision—or while there remains even a doubt as to the course General Taylor and his friends will pursue in the event of his not receiving the nomination? Has not the Republican’s neighbor, the Whig, a fellow co-laborer in Taylorism, exposed the absurdity of such a "farce?"—has it not told the republican that: ‘Heads I win, tails you lose,” is rather too strong a game,” &c.? It seems to us, who care not how these Whig difficulties may be settled, that if the Whig Convention has any sense of propriety or self-respect, the door of the Convention will be rudely slammed in the face of the “Independents,” if they shall make their appearance at the Convention, and boldly stand up there and use the following language (found in General Taylor’s late letter: )
"I do not design to withdraw my name if Mr. Clay be the nominee of the Whig National Convention—and, in this connexion, I beg permission to remark, that the statements which have been so positively made in some of the Northern prints, to the effect, 'that should Mr. Clay be the nominee of the Whig National Convention,' I had stated 'that I would not suffer my name to be used,' are not correct, and have no foundation in any oral or written remark of mine. It has not been my intention, at any moment, to change my position, or to withdraw my name from the canvass, whoever may be the nominee of the National Convention, wither of the Whig or Democratic party."

Will not the Convention require from every man who goes there to participate in its proceedings, an introductory oath, somewhat in the following form—(found in Mr. Clay's late letters: )

"I have, therefore, finally decided to leave to the National Convention, which is to assemble next June, the consideration of my name, in connection with such others as may be presented to it, to make a selection of a suitable candidate for President of the United States; and whatever may be the issue of its fair and full deliberations, it will meet with my prompt and cheerful acquiescence."

We are puzzled to know how the republican, which seems to belong to two parties, viz: the Taylor Independent party and the Whig party, can be calculation Gen. T.'s chances in a Convention which he and that paper boldly repudiate—a Convention towards which Gen. T. himself holds this emphatical language:

"It has not been my intention at any moment to change my position, or to withdraw my name from the canvass, whoever may be the nominee of the National Convention, wither of the Whig or Democratic party."

Gen. T., his friends say, "never surrenders."—We shall soon see, when the Convention meets, who will surrender—whether the friends of all the other candidates combined, or the "corporal's guard," the "Independents."

REv45i2p2c4, May 9, 1848, To the Editors of the Enquirer.

JAMES BUCHANAN, ESQ.—THE TARIFFS OF 1842 and 1846

Messrs. Editors—Now that our spring elections are over, and a victory obtained, as we hope and believe, all are looking forward to the Baltimore Convention. Upon whom the nomination is to fall, is an enquiry upon the lips of all. Many great and good men have been spoken of, and I have yet to see the first Democrat who will not support the nominee, be he who he may; provided he is not in favor of the "Wilmot Proviso."—No man who is so forgetful of the rights of the whole country as to support it, can hope to find any favor with the mass of the Democratic party. It is very evident that the only hope or expectation of the Whigs is the dark spot in New York. Can it be that that great State will madly and recklessly throw away her great power? Will she be unmindful of the past? Justice and gratitude forbid it! But it go she will—if her distinguished sons shall so will it—if they will calmly and deliberately decide to take the last fatal leap, we must give her up, and try to do without her; we must give her up, as we once were compelled to do her distinguished son, although it be with a "bleeding heart." Messrs. Editors, we can elect, and triumphantly too, the nominee of our Convention. Who then, is to be the fortunate man?

It is pleasing to see the spirit manifested by the friends of the different candidates—a spirit worthy of the cause, worthy of the Democratic party. No bickering, no attacks upon each other; but a temperate advocacy of the claims of each. All this seems to the writer to be legitimate, indeed necessary, to a proper appreciation of their pretensions.

It is with such feeling I address you this hasty scrawl. It is well known to every reading politician, that the distinguished gentleman whose name heads this article, has received more than "his share" of Whig denunciation—perhaps more than all the rest. Why is this so? Is it not that he is dreaded more than nay other? Certainly this is a fair inference. During last summer and fall, that chaste and ever truthful journal, the Richmond Whig, hunted up and published all kinds of slanders against him,—slanders and gross falsehoods, which had been over and over exposed, and become to be so well known, that the decent papers of Pennsylvania would not touch them. About that time, a writer in the Enquirer, over a signature of "A Republican of the Old School," in a series of numbers, fully and triumphantly exposed them here in Virginia.—He appealed to the records for fifteen or twenty years back, (and could have appealed to Mr. B.'s speeches on "Chilton's" famous resolutions in 18267 and 1828,) and placed Mr. Buchanan upon true Southern, true American ground, from which himself and friends may proudly defy their puny assaults. The Whig was made to behave with some decency, for a time at least; but since then the great State of Pennsylvania, the keystone, has spoken through her State convention, and her trumpet tones majority of eighteen or twenty thousand. Mr. B. seemed to be getting rather too strong to be resisted by Whiggery; and now another desperate game is resorted to. He is charged with the sin of voting for the Tariff of 1842, and being opposed to that of 1846 by the makers and advocates of the tariff of 1842, and the open enemy of the one of 1846. If these charges were true, it is clear they would not constitute any ground of objection, with them. No, no; their hope is to injure Mr. B. with the Democratic party, and thereby get clear of a troublesome adversary.

A few remarks in relation to the Tariff of 1842 and 1846, I think, will satisfy all who are seeking truth, that Mr. B. cannot be objected to by us on account of his opinions respecting them. Every intelligent man knows that a peculiar state of things existed in 1842. For a time, by the action of Mr. Clay and his friends, no duties could be collected; the Compromise Act had ceased to be. Just at this crisis, the vile Tariff of 1842 was brought forward, and the alternative presented, to vote for it or let the whole machinery of Government stop; all efforts to modify and Messrs. Editors:  A somewhat piquant debate took place in the Senate on Thursday, on a motion of Mr. Hannegan to take up the message of the President, communicated on the state of affairs in Yucatan, one of the States of Central American, and nominally one of the States of Mexico. Messrs. Hannegan, Foote and Cass were for immediate action—Mr. Calhoun, aided by Mr. Niles, wished delay. But why for delay, they did not state, in detail, to the Senate. Mr. Foote took the liberty of telling Mr. Calhoun a little piece of his mind, which cut rather close to the skin of this consistent Senator; yes, this Senator that has never changed his political text book, although he has boxed the compass with all kinds of opinions. Mr. Calhoun has a way of assuming Senatorial dignity when he is pressed too hard, and declines to answer “that man,” or this man. This will not suffice. In this country the people know of no superiority in a Senator or Representative but what his talents and his patriotism give to him; certainly Mr. Calhoun cannot for a moment believe that in his person are to be found all the knowledge and patriotism of the land. Why should he? Since the war commenced he has done nothing to aid his country. Where is a vote to be found, or a word to be spoken by him in debate, in aid of the war, or in approbation of the success of our gallant army? No where. From May ’46, to the present time, examine the record, and you will find him arrayed with those who have given “aid and comfort” to the enemy. Even the sons of South Carolina, whose blood of noble daring and of patriotism, stained the heights of Cerro Gordo, and now crimsons the rocks of Contreras, have with him no sympathy in “this rash and precipitate war.” How Mr. Calhoun can call the movements of the Executive “rash and precipitate,” I cannot understand! Years had been wasted in negotiation, our Minister rejected, and our Government insulted, and, finally, our territory being invaded by a Mexican army, we had no remedy but fight or disgrace. The Executive, by the advice of General Taylor, took the proper course, and, from that day to this, Mr. Calhoun has not sustained his country. So well and so distinctly has his public career in the Senate been understood in Mexico, that he has been complimented in general meeting of the Philanthropic Society of Mexico as one of the “illustrious champions of the Mexican cause,” and “justly gained the gratitude of all our good fellow-citizens” by being one of “the defenders of the cause of justice and civilization.”

And let me remark, that Mr. Botts, your Representative in Congress, is named along with Mr. Calhoun and others. Call you this supporting your country? If it is, I should like to know in what that support consists. If withholding supplies and condemning the Executive, and opposing the welfare of the country constitute Mr. Calhoun a republican, then, in fact, am I at a loss to understand his movements. But so we go. Mr. Foote is not to be driven from his duty to his country. He will deal justly, love mercy, and defend his country from Mexican allies, and Mexicans themselves, without fear or favor and his friends throughout the country will applaud and sustain him in his patriotic course.

The question being postponed until yesterday, it was again taken up, and an interesting debate continued. Mr. Hannegan defended the President in a very animated manner and sustained the country with his usual patriotic impulse. He told the Senate how England had already made advances in Yucatan and had an eye in prospective on the island of Cuba. Mr. Clayton opposed the action of the Senate as premature and as being contrary to the armistice regulation now entered into with Mexico. Yes, Mexico, sympathy for Mexico! You understand, Messrs. Editors, how that sympathy is applauded by our Mexican enemies; vide their complimentary resolution of thanks to certain persons. Gol. Jefferson Davis advocated the bill in an energetic speech and did himself and country full and ample justice. Mr. Crittenden took the opposite side. He was opposed to the bill almost on any ground except as a
Mr. Davis of Mississippi rejoined, defending the bill, and Mr. Foote followed, closing the debate for the day, in an animated speech in defence of the bill, and against the opinion of the Whig opposition in the Senate—that opposition, so reckless, so vindictive, that has sympathies for our enemies and none for our country. Mr. Foote played "cut and thrust" and did the sympathizers up in right good earnest.

Gen. Scott has gained ground with the Whigs in proportion as he loses the good will of the administration, or rather, as he provokes from the administration merited and just castigation for the futile imaginations of his brain. He stands an equal chance with Clay or Taylor for the nomination, and rather in advance of Mr. Crittenden and Judge McLean. Many of the patriotic Whigs will not touch Judge McLean since the publication of his Cincinnati letter. I still believe Mr. Clay will be the man, after all the management here to the contrary.

The gallant Col. Harney has been made by the President and Senate a Brigadier General in the regular army. So says Madam Rumor all over the city, and what every body says must be true. He deserves it, as well as some others deserve promotion, particularly our own intrepid and gallant Col. Garland.

Many of the members of the Baltimore Convention are coming in to spend a few days in Congress, before the consummation of the important business of selecting a Presidential candidate. Those I have seen are buoyant in hope of a cordial meeting and speedy and untied nomination. Yours, NED EVANS.

Return of Mr. Trist and Gen. Cadwalader.

The steamships Augusta and Virginia left Vera Cruz on Saturday, the 22d inst. The Augusta came up to town, yesterday afternoon, (says the New Orleans Picayune, April 30,) while the Virginia having got a drift log in one of her wheels, was obliged to come to anchor at Poverty Point, fifteen miles below the city. It is hardly probable that she will come up before our paper goes to press.

Gen. Cadwalader and Mr. Trist came over passengers on the Virginia, and will no doubt come up to town this morning.

The great mail was sent by the Virginia, but we received a package of letters and papers by the Augusta containing Vera Cruz papers to the 22d, and from the city of Mexico to the 15th. In another column we have given the twenty-sixth day’s proceedings of the Court of inquiry. We understand that the impression was that the court would not adjourn for three weeks, and that Gen. Scott would await its adjournment.—The Star of the 15th says that he is in fine health.

The burden of the editorial articles in the Star is that there is yet no quorum of Congress at Queretaro. It is obvious from the Star’s reiterated complaints that there is great fear lest no quorum should meet at all. We have not room to-day for its articles, but this is the burden of them.

Major Stewart of the Pay Department, arrived in the city of Mexico on the 14th.

Paredes as late as the 11th inst. Had not been arrested by the Mexican Government. He was still at San Luis, and, according to a letter in El Eco de Comercio, “taking up his residence with the different lawyers in the place.” We hear nothing more of his designs.

There is no further news from Chihuahua.

The ship American sailed from Vera Cruz for this port on the 19th inst. with ninety-two sick soldiers in charge of Dr. Wright.

We gather some miscellaneous intelligence from the Vera Cruz papers.

[From the True American of the 18th.]

Arrival of Gen. Cadwalader and Mr. Trist.—A train arrived yesterday from the city of Mexico. The escort was commanded as far as Jalapa by Lieut. Col. Emory, and from Jalapa to this place by Major Gardner. The mounted escort was under the command of Lieut. Waters, of the Louisiana Volunteers.

Gen. Cadwalader and Mr. Trist, framer of the treaty, accompanied the train.

On the road, near Passa la Vego, a Mexican reported to the commander of the escort that he had been robbed of some mules, and stated that the robbers were in the chaparral. Lieut. Hawkins dismounted ten of his men and started in search of the ruffians, and shortly afterwards returned with them, having surprised and taken them in in the most admirable manner. They are now in custody.

This train left Mexico on the 7th inst., and on the 10th day after its departure arrived here.

A grand banquet was given in Vera Cruz the evening of the 16th inst. by the French residents and others in honor of the revolution in France. It is quite out of our power to give place to the enthusiastic proceedings. The Americans were to celebrate the same glorious event on the 22nd inst.

The Free American remains of opinion that there is little prospect of peace. On the 19th its language is:

"We announced, a few days ago, that we had conversed with a gentleman from Mexico, who was of opinion that the members of Congress would not vote for the treaty as ratified at Washington. We have since seen two letters from influential men, one at Queretaro and the other at Mexico, who coincide with the opinion of the gentleman in question. Another letter says that should the members of Congress violate the constitution of Mexico by ceding any part of the territory, the same members will have to ask the United States to leave a force of several thousand men to keep order in the Republic. The writer is of opinion that so soon as the American troops will embark for the United States, the Government will be overthrown, and the new causes for war will be given to the United States by the turbulent people of this country."

We regret to learn that Gen. Kearny has been seriously ill at Vera Cruz; at the same time we rejoice that he was pronounced out of danger and convalescent at last accounts.

The State of Mexico gives its voice for Gen. Herrera as President, he receiving 152 out of 166 votes.

There was a caucus of the members of Congress present at Queretaro on the 10th inst., at which resolutions were adopted to prevent members then present from afterwards absenting themselves, and to fill one or two seats made vacant by promotion or otherwise. It appeared that but few members were then wanting to form a quorum—but this is an old story.

The Congress of the State of Vera Cruz assembles this day; that of Puebla met on the 10th. D. Juan Mujica y Osorio was appointed Governor of the latter State.

There are 2000 Mexican troops in Queretaro, and yet on the 12th inst. a diligence was attacked within half a mile of the city by eight men. They fired upon the passengers, but the latter showed fight and killed one of the robbers. The passengers returned to town, however, lest they should again be attacked.

The Monitor Republicano of the 14th inst. says that, on the 10th, Gen. Bustamente was at the village of Dolores with a party of his division, while another portion had gone against the Indians of the village of Xichu, an insurrection of whom had become formidable. They had had the audacity, so confident were they in their numbers, to sack the village of San Diego del Bischocho.

Mr. Clayton presented a memorial in favor of the proposed new railroad from Philadelphia to New York, and took the occasion to remark that the petitioners were prepared to prove the statements therein set forth.

Mr. Hannegan, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill to enable the President to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan—to employ the army and navy of the United States for that purpose, and to repress the incursions of the savages against the white population of that country—to furnish the white population with arms, ammunition, &c., to repel the attacks of the Indians—and to authorize the raising of additional volunteers, equal in number to replace the troops withdrawn from other portions of the service, for this service in Yucatan.

The bill was twice read, and Mr. Hannegan moved that it be made the special order for tomorrow.

Mr. Calhoun thought the day named too early—more time should be given for reflection. He proposed Monday next.

Mr. Hannegan said it was important that this bill should be acted upon without delay. A day or an hour might be
Mr. Calhoun. I did not consider it necessary to contradict what that Senator said.

Mr. Cass. He begged the Senator's pardon, but his expression had been so quoted here this morning, without contradiction, by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. Calhoun. I did not consider it necessary to contradict what that Senator said.
Mr. Foote retorted, but his remark was not distinctly heard.

Mr. Cass proceeded, chiefly on the causes of the war, and insisting that, from all the information before them—from the declaration at the time of Mexico herself—the annexation of Texas was a cause of the war; though he said, as now universally admitted, no just cause of war.

Mr. Calhoun replied to the remarks of Mr. Cass, the question of boundary being introduced, and Mr. Cass rejoined.

Mr. Hannegan said the object of his motion was prompt action, but the debate to-day was the poorest illustration of prompt action which he had ever known. The question of the annexation of Texas, having nothing to do with the subject, had been dragged in, as it always unfortunately was on almost every great measure emanating from the Administration. The motives which had induced him to move the consideration of the bill to-morrow, were better expressed in the concluding portion of Mr. Sierra's letter than they could be by any thing which he could say. He read the extract, showing the condition of the white population of Yucatan, and expressed his wish that the question should at once be taken on his motion.

Mr. Niles followed. He was wholly unpre... principles—principles entirely new—he desired time to examine the documents. It was not merely a bill involving the question of affording temporary relief, but one of far greater and more vital importance connected with the policy of the country. He was not disposed to act under the "whip and spur"—they should not act without giving the subject all the consideration which its importance demands.

The question was then taken, successfully, on motion to postpone until Saturday, and until Monday, and rejected. Mr. Hannegan's motion then prevailed, and the bill was made the special order for to-morrow.

One or two bills, not of public importance were passed, several petitions and memorials presented, a great number of bills from the House read twice and referred, and a resolution offered by Mr. Calhoun, adopted, calling on the President for all the correspondence between Mr. Sierra and the Secretary of State. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Murphy reported a bill to regulate the exchange of certain documents and other publications by Congress. Read twice and referred.

Mr. Grinnell, from the Committee on commerce, reported a bill to admit certain articles, the growth or productions of Canada, free of duty, on condition that similar articles, the growth or production of the united States, shall be also admitted into Canada free of duty. Rea twice and referred.

Mr. Collamer, introduced a resolution, which was adopted, directing the printing for the use of the House of a map of the public lands, showing the amount surveyed and the amount sold.

Mr. Goggin, for the Committee on Post Offices and Postroads, reported a bill to regulate the postage on newspapers and for other purposes. Read twice and referred.

Mr. Jones of Tennessee, from the same Committee, reported back the bill for making permanent arrangement for the transportation for the mails by the steamboats and railroads in the U. States, with a recommendation that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof. Mr. Tompkins of Mississippi moved a reference of the bill to a Select Committee. The subject was one of great importance, and he desired that a report should be made and go forth to the people. The reference to a Select Committee, after some debate, was accordingly ordered.

Mr. Burt, from the Committee of Naval Affairs, reported a bill to establish two National Foundries and a National Armory, the sites to be determined by a Board of Examiners. Read twice and referred.

Mr. King of Georgia, from the same Committee, reported a bill to establish a line of war steamers from Monterey or San Francisco, California, and the Sandwich Islands, and also from Monterey or San Francisco to Shanghai and Canton, China. Read twice and referred.

The bill repealing the section of the act creating an additional number of general officers, which requires that the number of Generals at the close of the war shall be reduced to one Major General and two Brigadier Generals, to be selected by the President without regard to priority of commissions, was taken up and passed.

Several Executive communications on the Speaker's table were read, referred, and ordered to be printed.

The resolution of thanks to Major Gen. Taylor, was taken up, and the amendment of Senate was agreed to.

The bill providing for an additional number of examiners in the Patent office was taken up, the House insisted upon its amendment, and a committee of conference was asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

A great number of the bills from the Senate were read a first and second time and passed.
Adjourned.

FRIDAY May 5, 1848. SENATE.

Bills form the House relative to the number of Major and Brigadier Generals to remain in the service at the close of the war—to extend the time for the erection of certain light-houses—to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and some others, were read and referred.

Mr. Atchinson introduced a bill granting the right of way through the public lands in Missouri, and granting alternative sections of the same, for the construction of a railroad between certain points on the Missouri and Mississippi rivers.

The resolution offered by Mr. Johnson, of Md., inquiring of the President whether any officers, civil or military, were acting under commissions form the President, whose appointments had not been submitted to the Senate for confirmation, and why? Was taken up and adopted, but the vote was subsequently reconsidered, on motion of Mr. Allen and laid over.

On motion of Mr. Hannegan, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to enable the President to take temporary military possession of Yucatan.

Mr. Hannegan addressed the Senate in reply to the remarks of Mr. Calhoun on the day the message of the President on this subject was presented. He was unable to discover the dangers to which the Senator has alluded, but had not stated. He could perceive no hidden rocks upon which we were to suffer shipwreck, if the measure was adopted and the aid required furnished.

The President, he said, does not ask, and the bill expressly prohibits the permanent occupation of Yucatan. Considerations, it is true might arise, which would render it necessary to turn it into something more than a temporary occupation, and he desired now to make this declaration for he wished no disguises.

We have positive information not only that England intends to, but that she has interfered in the affairs of Yucatan. She has taken possession of the Balize, and advanced her troops from Honduras into Southern Yucatan, under the pretence of protecting the interests of her own subjects.

But her desires, he entertained no doubt, were to obtain possession of Yucatan, and he had no more doubt that if she did obtain Yucatan, her efforts would next be directed to the obtainment of Cuba also.

Give her Cuba and she would control the mouth of the Mississippi as easily as she now controls the mouth of the Thames; and her power would be extended to the entire North American coast. Would the Congress of the United States stand by and see this?

It had come out in the correspondence with Mr. Sierra, that the agent of England had actually furnished the Indians with the very arms which they are using against the white population in Yucatan.

"England," says the Senator from South Carolina, "will not more take possession of Yucatan than will he himself." Would the Senator be responsible for the consequences of the acts which England has already committed towards Yucatan? And were we to disregard the interests and honor of the country, because of the fear of getting into a war with England—or of incurring an additional debt?

There was no danger that we should ever be compelled to resort to a system of taxation like that in England and France, to which the Senator had referred. Nor was his allusion to the fact, that the expenses of Mr. Monroe’s Administration, which were put down at 10,000,000 per annum, to show the increased expenditures of the present administration, a correct illustration; for at no period during Mr. Monroe’s administration did the population of the United States exceed 10,000,000.

He represented that it was not the intention of the President, or of the bill, to take permanent possession of Yucatan, unless compelled by unavoidable circumstances, and then the whole matter would be within the control of Congress.

He denied that in regard to the interference of European powers with the affairs of this Continent, the message went “far beyond” the declarations of Mr. Monroe, as had been stated by the Senator from South Carolina.

And why did not the Senator protest against the doctrine of Mr. Monroe, at the time, when he was a member of his Cabinet, instead of denouncing it now, when it had become necessary to carry it into practical operation?

He (Mr. H.) considered it a fundamental doctrine of our policy. It was a doctrine of which Mr. John Quincy Adams, then also a member of Mr. Monroe’s Cabinet, was the father—at whose suggestion the declaration was introduced into the message of Mr. Monroe. This he had learned in a personal interview of two hours, on [th]is subject; with that venerable man. Mr. Monroe certainly meant something, and Mr. Adams meant something, by this declaration and of this he became satisfied during the conversation to which he had referred.
Mr. Clayton gave his reasons which would influence him in voting against the bill. The President says, in his message, that during the continuance of the war with Mexico, if he could spare the troops, he would take possession of Yucatan and offer the aid desired. But the bill provides for an indefinite occupation for Yucatan. It was true the word "temporary" was introduced but that was a very indefinite expression. He desired to know how long it was contemplated by this bill to continue this occupation?

The bill also, he said, was in violation of the treaty of peace with Mexico, and of the terms of the armistice. A Congress was about to assemble at Queretaro, with a fair prospect of ratifying that treaty. And was it not probable that when the intelligence that this bill is before the Senate reached them, this would throw the treaty to the wind—reject it—considering the movement not as intended to repress the incursions of the Indians, but to take permanent possession of one of the States in her confederacy.

He was opposed, too, to taking away the gallant officers who have so bravely fought in Mexico and sending them to a sickly climate. How many would survive, if this were done? And he did not like having too many fights on our hands at the same time.

With the Senator from Connecticut, (Mr. Niles,) he was disposed to act in this with extreme caution. He thought it highly impolite to agitate the country, at this time, with another question of annexation.

The passage of this bill would be a violation of the treaty, unless we obtained from Mexico her consent to send our troops into her territory.

Mr. Jefferson Davis said Yucatan was recognized as a part of Mexico, and, being so a part, we had the right, during the existence of the war, to send our troops into that territory. The President only asked for troops to carry out objects entirely consonant with the prosecution of the war with Mexico.

As to the question of seizing certain points in the gulf, in the exigency to which the Senator from Indiana had referred, he declared that he would not hesitate for one moment. And even if we had no war with Mexico, he would still stand by the people of that country in their present struggle.

But here there was no such difficulty. We are at war with Mexico, and the only event in which we are allowed, during the existence of the armistice, to take possession of any other territory of Mexico, had transpired—it had been rendered necessary by "acts of the Mexicans themselves,"—"there had been a military movement by Mexicans."

He moved certain amendments, in conclusion, not affecting the character of the bill, but designed so to modify its provisions, as to merely establish a "new military post," leaving the right to take possession to the authority given under the act "recognizing the existence of a war with Mexico."

Mr. Crittenden opposed the feature of the bill which provided for raising additional volunteers, to take the place of those withdrawn from other portions of the service in Mexico. Where was the necessity he said, of any such provision, when there is already another bill before the Senate providing for 20,000 additional volunteers? If the exigencies of the war required it, he was ready to vote for any additional number; but no such exigency had yet arisen.

The measure proposed, so far from having war in view as it object, is presented as a measure of charity, of humanity. And he could not perceive that under the terms of the armistice, we could take possession of a province not in our hands at the time the armistice was made. It could not be contended that such would be a fair construction of the armistice.

He was also opposed to the bill, on the ground of inexpediency. It was contrary to sound policy to involve the country in a difficulty of this character. He was opposed to any such intervention by one country in reference to the affairs of another, even, as an act of humanity—to engage in that which might lead to war throughout the world, and thus, by endeavoring to allay one calamity, to create a greater. We should allow every nation, as we would every family, to manage its own affairs.

He would succor the distressed and relieve the needy, but it was impossible to do this by any general system regulating such intercourse between nations, as here proposed.

The Indians whom it was proposed to put down were as much citizens of Yucatan as those whom it was proposed to succor, and entitled to the same privileges. But he would rescue the white population if possible, even though they had, for ages, oppressed and borne down their present oppressors. But he would not do it by withdrawing our troops from other portions of Mexico.

We would only make our interposition effectual by placing an army in Yucatan, and that he had no disposition to do until he understood fully everything connected with this question—until he could reconcile the whole subject with the great principle of non-intervention.

Mr. Jefferson Davis replied to a portion of Mr. Crittenden’s remarks; and was followed by Mr. Foote. The evidence before them, he said, was of such a character that, if they did not act, they would disgrace the country, and justly incur the execration of the whole civilized world. In the course of his remarks he expressed, in strong terms, his opinion that neither Yucatan nor Cuba should be permitted to fall into the hands of any European power, even if we were compelled to go to war to prevent it. And he declared also, if he were President of the United States—a position which he never expected to occupy—he would not hesitate now to apply to the government of Spain to transfer, on just terms, the Island of Cuba, to the United States.

At the conclusion of Mr. Foote’s remarks, the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

After several unsuccessful efforts were made to introduce resolutions, the Speaker laid before the House a communication from W. W. Brent, stating that he had just received, addressed to his care, from Robert Walsh, United States Consul at Paris, a portrait of Major General Baron De Kalb, to be presented to Congress, as an offering from the surviving family of De Kalb, persons of great distinction and worth, and asking the decision of Congress in regard to the reception and disposition to be made of the picture—referring to the library committee.

Mr. Stewart, of Pennsylvania, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following:

Resolved, That “the power given by the constitution to the Executive, to interpose his veto, is a high conservative power, which should never be exercised except in cases of clear violation of the constitution, or manifest haste and want of consideration by Congress.”

Resolved, That “the personal opinions of the individual who may happen to occupy the executive chair, ought not to control the action of Congress upon questions of domestic policy, nor ought his objections to be interposed when questions of constitutional power have been settled by the various departments of the government, and acquiesced in by the people.”

Resolved, That, “upon the subjects of the tariff, the currency, the improvement of our great highways, rivers, lakes, and harbors, the will of the people, as expressed through their representatives in Congress, ought to be respected and carried out by the Executive.”

Resolved, That “war, at all times, and under all circumstances, is a national calamity, to be avoided if compatible with national honor;” that “the principles of our government, as well as its true policy, are opposed to the subjugation of other nations and the dismemberment of other countries by conquest—for, in the language of the great Washington, ‘why should we quit our own soil to stand on foreign ground?’”

Objection being made, the resolutions were not received.

On motion of Mr. Rockwell, the House then resolved itself into committee of the whole, for the consideration of private bills, and after taking up one or two of this character found itself without a quorum, the roll was called, the committee rose and reported the names of the absentees to the House, and they were ordered to be entered in the journal. A quorum having appeared, a number of private bills were subsequently considered in committee of the whole, reported to the House and passed. And then, at 20 minutes past 1 o’clock, the House adjourned until tomorrow.

REv45i2p4c4, May 9, 1848, General Taylor and the Whig.

The Whig, in a column of editorial, attempts to extricate itself by new quibbles from the “dilemma” in which, we still insist, its attempts to entirely explain away one letter of Old Zac by another written only two days afterwards, has involved it, in the common sense view of every reasonable man. Upon one point the Whig and ourselves thoroughly agree: viz: that the Baldwin or Gallaher letter per se admits of no other construction, than that the old soldier utterly repudiates the action of the National Convention, resolved to remain an independent candidate, whoever might be the nominee, and whatever said body might do. And here we quote from yesterday’s long explanatory article in the Whig its renewed assertion of its opinion, after reading the Baldwin letter, and before it had seen the Allison letter:

"When we read the General’s letter to the Editors of the Republican, which seemed to intimate his determination to be a candidate for the Presidency, whether nominated by the Whig Convention or not, we saw that it was impossible, with such an understanding of his purpose, that his name could be presented to the Whig National Convention even for its consideration. The friends of no man have a right to ask that his claims shall be considered, in a body of that kind, who proclaims in advance that he will pay no respect to its decision, unless that decision be favorable to himself. As a member of such a Convention, we would not insult it by asking it to deliberate upon a matter already predetermained—or, in other words, to decide by vote whether a certain individual had forewarned it, that, having been already announced as a candidate, he would remain so, be its decision what it might. Nor would we consent to weigh even the claims of such a man, if presented by another. What business has such an one, indeed, in a Convention at all? Yet the language of General Taylor’s letter to the Editors of the Republican, seemed to us to be susceptible of no other interpretation; and, consequently, pursing the course we have heretofore done in regard to that gentleman, and which we shall adopt towards other aspirants, all of whom, in our estimation, stand upon a level platform and have equal rights, we promptly and explicitly expressed our decided dislike of a position, which, while General Taylor had a perfect right, if he thought fit, to take it, must, of necessity, have been regarded, under the circumstances, as grossly offensive to other aspirants for the Whig nomination, and as a defiance to the Whig party itself. And had it so remained, we, for one, would no longer have considered that General Taylor’s friends had a right to present his name to the Whig Convention.

But the Allison letter which reached the Whig soon after, was “entirely satisfactory” to the Whig, and convinced that paper, that it soon former strong comments were utterly unfounded, and that Old Zac had taken his true position on the platform of a National Convention. What is the saving clause in the Allison letter, on which the Whig relies with so much apparent self complacency and confidence?

“I have consented to the use of my name as a candidate for the Presidency. I have frankly avowed my own distrust of my fitness for that high station; but having, at the solicitation of many of my countrymen, taken my position as a candidate, I do not feel at liberty to surrender that position until my friends manifest a wish that I should retire from it. I will then most gladly do so.”

Here, says the Whig, Gen. T. leaves the matter in the hands of his “friends”—and the Whig “takes it for granted that the General meant what every other candidate who consents that his name shall go before a Convention means, when he uses the same expression, and that is, that his friends in Convention shall, before it proceeds to deliberate, announce their intention to abide by its decision and that announcement will be to Gen. Taylor a sufficient manifestation of their wish that he should not be a candidate, in the event of his failure to obtain its nomination. That the great body of his friends, throughout the country, would concur in the manifestation of this wish, we cannot doubt; because they would clearly perceive not only the impossibility of his election, but the probability of his failure to obtain a single Electoral vote—an attitude in which, as his true friends, they would never consent to place him.”

And in another place, the Whig thinks that the Old General’s course will be controlled by “the embodied sense of his ‘friends’ who may be members of the National Convention, and who, if they go into that body at all, must do so in no such uncompromising spirit as that evinced by the republican. For it cannot be expected that the friends of other gentlemen, in that body, (experienced gamesters too, as they have been dubbed,) will consent to play at ‘Open and Shut’ with those of Gen. Taylor or any other man.”

But this theory is perfectly fallacious, for it really begs the whole question, and makes out General Taylor willing to abide by the action of the Convention, which, in his letter of the 20th, he expressly repudiates. That letter says, that it is not “my intention to withdraw my name from the canvass, whoever may be the nominee.” It is evident, then, that the old soldier, in employing the word ‘friends,’ refers not to such advocates of his conditional nomination as the delegates to the Convention like the editor of the Whig, who declares that he is not “committed” to Gen. Taylor, but to those exclusive friends, who, eschewing all conventions, have put old Rough and Ready on the track as an independent candidate, and have solemnly committed themselves to support him as “the people’s candidate,” against the world. General Taylor says in the Allison letter, “at the solicitation of many of my countrymen, I have taken my position. I do not feel at liberty to surrender that position,” until my friends (i.e., of course those who have placed him in that position, independent of all Conventions,) manifest a wish that I should retire from it.” Who are those exclusive “friends,” to whose arbitrament alone he will submit, and by whom alone he can be induced to abandon his position? Last evening’s Republican furnishes us with the information in the shape of an article from the Philadelphia Inquirer. They are the “independent State Conventions in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Iowa, Kentucky, Georgia, (Louisiana we insert,) and one or two other States,” which have run up Old Zac’s flag of “Independency,” and which, from the decided tone of their resolutions, will never “surrender.” The Maryland Taylor State Convention boldly argued that neither of the nominees of the Whig or Democratic Conventions can be elected, and that Taylor, the independent “people’s candidate,” must sweep the Union. Will such “friends” call upon old Zac to retreat from the position in which they have placed him, and run the chances of his defeat before a Convention? It is such “friends” as the Editors of the Republican, who boldly proclaim that General Taylor “will not be withdrawn.”

But it is useless to press the arguments farther, that the Whig in its most difficult, nay, impossible effort to “ride both sides of the sapling,” (Taylor and the Whig Convention,) has involved itself in a most annoying “dilemma.” It is not the Republican and Enquirer alone, which, following out the rules of common sense and the plain meaning of language, have construed Gen. Taylor’s two letters, together, so differently from the Whig. The same view is taken in the following lamentatory article from the Fredericksburg News, which has been one of the most zealous Taylor organs in the country:

“The reader’s attention will be called to the two letters of General Taylor—one addressed to the Richmond Republican, the other to his relative in New Orleans, Captain J.S. Allison.

“There is scarcely a paper which has issued from the Press for the past six or eight months which did not contain a letter from General Taylor. We said in the early part of our months which did not contain a letter from General Taylor. We said in the early part of our editorial career, we would support no man for the Presidency who would indulge in that greatest of all evils, the cacoec hes scribendi, a disease more to be dreaded in a candidate for the Presidency than the small-pox. We supposed that Gen. Taylor was not imbued with the infection, that as an honest, practical, common-sense man he had formed opinions, and at a suitable time would give them to the public. In this we have been disappointed. He has the same fondness for letter-writing which has before killed off other Whig Candidates for the Presidency. His last, however, he promises, shall be his last; to which we hope he will adhere.

“The N. Orleans letter is unexceptionable in style and sentiment. We agree with him in all the views he there puts forth. Had he written that letter and none others, nothing could have defeated his nomination and his election. “The Richmond letter is highly objectionable. Gen. Taylor certainly advised in one of his numberless letters, the nomination of Mr. Clay. If he did not say so in as many words, he gave us to understand he would abide the decision of a Whig National Convention. To say now he will disregard that Convention, and accept a nomination from any party or any Convention, and under all circumstances (should his friends desire it,) be a candidate, is an act of signal indiscretion, not to say total abandonment of all reliance upon the Whig party for support. Sincerely do we regret this position of Gen. Taylor. We yet hope he may be induced to abandon it."

But yesterdays' Union adds confirmation to the views which we have taken:

"The Richmond letter of Gen. Taylor, as published in the 'Union' of Thursday, has placed the Whig party in a curious position with respect to the nomination to be made in June. Upon the Clay, McLean, and Scott men it came like a thunder-clap. Old 'Rough and Ready' tells them plainly that he does not intend to be shuffled off the track by political jockeys. They must take him, or he is an independent candidate. Dare they refuse? We have been told of another letter written to a distinguished senator, in which the old general says: 'he feels under an obligation not to withdraw his name from the canvass, whoever is nominated by either the Whig or Democratic Conventions,' and he grounds the propriety of his decision on the manner in which he has been brought before the country, 'by the people.' Therefore, if the Whigs should refuse to nominate him, he may be considered the third candidate."

And in this connexion we quote from the Union a curious anecdote which is afloat in Washington:

"It is said that as soon as the letter was published in Richmond, two of the Taylor Whigs were alarmed. They saw it struck at all organization in the Whig party, and that, unless a candidate was named by the Whig Convention, they stood little chance of success. With this impression, a decided Whig leaves Richmond on Tuesday morning, to apply to one of the most distinguished Whigs in Congress to suffer his name to be used, under the belief that neither Clay nor Taylor could be elected. But here, again, is an insuperable difficulty. How could this distinguished Whig suffer his name to be used against Gen. Taylor, when he has been among his most active friends to bring the General into the field, and when Gen. Taylor now declares, as he is in the field, he will not withdraw his name form the canvass, whoever may be the nominee of the National Convention? If this gentleman runs, therefore, he has to run directly against Gen. Taylor. There are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in our philosophy."

As, therefore, it may now be set down as a "fixed fact," that gen. Taylor will be an independent candidate at all events, the Whigs' very summary remedy for such contumacious conduct on the part of Gen. Taylor and his friends, will have to be put in force. "The claims of such a man” will not even be "weighed” in the Convention; for "what business has such an one indeed in a convention at all?” Gen. Taylor's position, by the Whig's rule, will have to be regarded as "grossly offensive to other aspirants for the Whig nomination, and as a defiance to the Whig party itself.” Should "the corporal's guard" of "Independency" make an "arrogant attempt to dictate" to the Whig Convention, "the effect of it may be to prevent a nomination altogether—certainly to prevent the nomination of Gen. Taylor."

But we have grouped together extracts enough to prove the "dilemma" of the Whig. One thing is positively certain (and it is a curious and amusing fact,) viz, that after all the "explicit, satisfactory," and "come out" expositions of the old soldier, two of the Taylor organs at our very door are utterly at points as to the "position" of Gen. Taylor—one of then contending for his "independent" stand, which will carry with him "patrician millions;" the other as stoutly maintaining that this "handful," this "corporal's guard" of Independents, will "render themselves ridiculous," and, what is more "mortifying" still, their candidate will not "receive an electoral vote in the Union". Here's another difficult plot in the play—vindice dignusdeo nodus. Another "exposition," another letter, is necessary. Suppose the editors of the Whig try their hands at questioning old Hero—and, if not then "satisfactory" the Times can have its "finger in the pie!" Oh! These President-killing letters, as sighs forth the Fredericksburg News.

REv45i2p4c6, May 9, 1848, To the Editors of the Enquirer. Washington, May 3, 1848.

Dear Sirs: Those members of Congress who made the call for the correspondence of general Scott with the War Department, have been fully gratified. The reply of Mr. Marcy to the fulminations of gen. Scott against the War Department generally, and the President covertly, are met with positive, direct testimony, mostly gleaned from Gen. Scott himself, that all his charges are the inventions of his own brain, with the aid, perhaps, of his friend, Don Nicholas P. Trist.—the testimony of the Quartermaster General goes to prove that Gen. Scott has himself to blame for the delay in the arrival of the transports, by changing his orders; and, moreover, the whole is an after thought; for what had the transport question to do with the conquest of Mexico after the Castle and Vera Cruz had surrendered to the gallant army under his command? The truth is, Gen. Scott is badly poised in judgment on civil matters, and does not fully understand his position. He is a noble General, and none excel him, but par excellence, there he stops. Whenever he touches civil affairs, he is, as the French say, neant—entirely at fault—for he becomes lost in his labyrinth of preconceived injuries, that have no foundation but in his own disturbed imagination.—The idea entertained by him, that the President and Mr. Marcy wished to cripple him in the campaign, is too ridiculous for serious refutation. The correspondence, Messrs. Editors, you should lay before your readers at an early day.

The gentleman with the scarlet coat, from N. Carolina, that made this call, and fought against the publication of Mr. Marcy's letter, I guess has his fill of Marcy boluses to a t least one month. —If he has not, it will be difficult for truth to reach him during the present session of Congress. It is not our wish to disparage Mr. Clingman; he is a very useful man in his way. Many of the Whigs dislike this last move of his; but they should not—he did it form the best motive in the world, and that was to excite sympathy for Gen. Scott, who has injured himself; and that he has succeeded to the letter, no candid man, who will read Gov. Marcy's reply, can deny. Gen. Scott has used fancy for fact and argument against the Executive. Gov. Marcy returns his compliments to general Scott in solid, substantial, unmitigated truths—in language plain, but explicit, and regrets the necessity for his reply; and the subject rests there for the present.

General Scott was very inimical to Mr. Trist, for a time after his arrival in Mexico, as a messenger of peace. Suddenly he became much enamored of Don Nicholas, and now they are the veriest kind of "cozzen's" the world ever saw wedded together. There is no accounting for these changes, and men have a perfect right to change their views of each other. Indeed, Messrs. Editors, General Scott and Don Nicholas have become so closely allied, that many suspect that the present Court Martial in the City of Mexico has, in some way, emanated from that alliance. They are both very bitter against general Pillow, and appear to take much delight in his persecution. If this is the feast of reconciliation, I pity their reunion, for it will recoil upon them fourfold were they are done with this Court Martial affair. It makes but little difference to the American people, whether General Pillow killed a Mexican in personal combat or not; he helped to do so, and the whole army knew it. He being second in command, or fifth in command, whether he was a "green" or a ripe "general," he did his duty, as all others did, in that gallant army under General Scott. It is therefore a sorry business, because Maj. Burns thought proper to praise Gen. Pillow, that he, Gen. P., must suffer a bitter hatred of Mr. Trist and the ignominy of a court martial, because Gen. Scott was informed by some good, discreet friend, that Gen. P. wrote the "Leonidas" letter. It is a "fixed fact," as gen. Cushing on another occasion once said, that Gen. P. did not write the letter. And when the accusing party get through with their persecution of Gen. Pillow, we will be happy if they escape Maj. Burns. From what we know of him, of his cool, determined character, his sense of republican independence, we have no doubt but that he is fully able to defend himself and where truth and justice predominate, others will step forth boldly to his aid.

Messrs. Editors, this is an unfortunate business for Gen. Scott and Mr. Trist, and, my word for it, "the end is not yet."

Mr. Trist is on the way to the United States, and, as the court martial was about adjourning for the same purpose, I presume Gen. Scott will soon follow for the same destination. It is to be hoped he will cool off a little before he arrives. As to Mr. Trist, he cannot be cool, so irritable is his disposition, and his, feelings so far got the better of his discretion, before the court martial, that Gen. Towson had to request him to moderate his language—a pretty witness, truly.

The Yucatan message of the President, sent to Congress with the best intentions by Mr. Polk, has afforded Mr. Mr. Calhoun another theme for a thrust at the President. Nothing can ever please Mr. Calhoun again. Well, it cannot be helped at this late date. The Foreign Department is in very good keeping and if Mr. C. is satisfied [as he would vain make us believe,] why is it that he does not sustain the Government Executive in upholding the honor of the nation in this trying crisis, both of war and of foreign intervention?—He sustained Mr. Monroe in his declaration against foreign intervention. If Mr. Monroe was correct—and we all thought and believed him so—in his patriotic views, certainly Mr. Polk must be correct, when the occasion is rife for English interference. But Mr. C. has his own views and they are truly his own. They are so unlike any thing else than his own, that he must be allowed the full merit of originality in his conception of right and wrong.

The remains of Senator Ashley were attended to their final resting-place yesterday by an immense assembly of citizens and of both Houses of Congress, all the Cabinet and President. Every one regrets his demise, but none will feel his loss like the State of Arkansas, for his place will be difficult to be supplied with a more useful or talented man in the Senate of the United States. Yours, NED EVANS.

REv45i2p4c5, May 9, 1848, The Question Settled.

The London Times, a Tory organ, steps forward to advise the Whig party of the Union how to extricate themselves from their present difficulties. A brief extract may not be unimpressive. It depicts the President as a very monster and tyrant, upon whom not even a resolution of a decided majority of Congress in favor of "the conclusion of a peace, on any terms," would have the slightest effect; and it expresses its positive conviction, that "the sole effectual means of terminating such a war, is to remove from power the man who commenced it, and who now persists in it. That would be the inevitable fate of a minister in any constitutional country, with an adverse majority on such a question." It goes on to show that the real solution of the difficulty lies in the next Presidential election, and with great self-complacency exhorts the Whigs to rally upon gen. Scott, as the most available man to expel the present "dynasty." The Times adds:

"Probably an old soldier like general Scott, perfectly acquainted with the real nature of the war, the real value of these territorial acquisitions, would be better able than any other man to restore the blessings of peace to the country he has just conquered, and to bring back the policy of the United States within the bounds of peace and reason. That is the most promising aspect in which we can now view the questions which agitate the American people. By some means or other, the passions Mr. Polk has excited for his own purposes must be quelled, or they will embroil the nation in ceaseless wars; and in the present state of men's minds, the government of a cool headed soldier is more likely than any other remedy to cure this malignant fever, which has yet many months to rage before its violence can be interrupted."

Will the Whigs ratify this nomination, made in England? Will they send forth their coin, stamped with this superscription of a British monarchist? Should General Scott, by way of compromise, be selected to lead on the Whig army, he will go into the field with the sympathies of European monarchists. The London Times warmly nominates him—and the author of the compromise (Scott and Botts) in the Whig here, says that "next to Louis Philippe, the position of Gen. Scott is more attractive" than that of any other public man.

REv45i3p1c1, May 12, 1848, Thirtieth Congress—First Session. Washington, Monday May 8.

SENATE.

A number of petitions and memorials were presented.

Mr. Dix presented the resolution of the New York Legislature, in favor of the payment of the claims of our citizens for French spoliations.

Mr. Dickinson presented a petition from New York, in favor of the proposed new railroad between New York and Philadelphia.

Several unimportant reports were made from committees.

Mr. Johnson, of Georgia, offered a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the Judiciary Committee to enquire into the expediency of establishing a Professorship of international law at the Annapolis Naval School, and to extend the number of appointments, so as to allow the administration of two for each member of Congress.

Mr. Breese reported a bill to grant the right of way through the public lands of Indiana, and alternate sections of the same, for a railroad.

The bill to authorize the holding of a special term of the District Court in Tennessee, was passed—also the bill relative to the public archives of Florida.

Several bills from the House were received and referred.

Mr. Borland introduced the bill of which he had given previous notice, to grant unsold overflowed public lands in Arkansas to that State, for purposes of internal improvement. Read twice and referred.

The special order of the day—the Yucatan bill—was then taken up.

When Mr. Foote referred to that portion of the report of Thursday’s debate in the Senate, which attributes to Mr. Calhoun the remark that he “had not considered it necessary to notice what the Senator from Mississippi had said,” in his speech of that day. Mr. Foote said, satisfactorily, that the remark referred to had been entirely misunderstood by the reporter.

Mr. Calhoun also disclaimed having used the expression, or any other disrespectful to the senator from Mississippi. [My reports are necessarily hasty, and I must of course have misunderstood the remarks at that point of the debate, tough others understood it as I did. I certainly had no intention to misrepresent the remarks of any one, and readily make the correction. I do this the more cheerfully because honorable senator from Mississippi has done me the justice to say that he believes the report, in other respects, substantially correct, and his speech of that say forms its prominent feature.]

Mr. Foote made a few remarks, and Mr. Hannegan also again urged the importance of prompt action. It had become a question—Shall we or shall England take possession of Yucatan?

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, followed, and in the course of his remarks referred to the fact that though the message had only been on their table for a week, the subject had been brought to the attention of the Executive more than six months since. He also alluded to the charge which had been made against Texas, of “coqueting with England.” He was opposed to the bill in its present shape, and expressed his views on the subject at considerable length.

Mr. Houston would be glad if the Hon. Senator would point out any instance in which Texas had coquetted with England.

Mr. Johnson said that during the pilgrimage of the Senator to Gen. Jackson, if the papers had correctly quoted him, he had used such an expression.

Mr. Houston thanked the Senator from Maryland for the opportunity to contradict the statement. He had never used such remarks as had been attributed to him.
Mr. Houston then addressed the Senate at great length, in support of the bill, but I have not time before the cars leave to give a sketch of his remarks, which embraced several topics of public importance which now occupy the public attention.

Mr. Hannegan said that the Senator from N. York, some days since, had so clearly laid before the Senate the operations of England on the Yucatan coast, &c., that it was unnecessary for him to refer to the facts. It was well known that the object of England was to seize Yucatan. And Mr. Sierra, in his last communication, said that if the aid asked is not afforded in two short months, Yucatan, as a government, will cease to exist.

Mr. Jefferson Davis said that if this bill was passed over, he hoped the twenty regiment bill would be taken up, that the President might be enabled; in this particular case, to prosecute the war with Mexico in such a manner that a new war might not grow out of it, for he agreed with the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, (Mr. Hannegan,) that if delay was practiced the next question would be whether we shall expel England from Yucatan.

Mr. Calhoun contended that there was not the slightest probability that England would interfere or take possession of Yucatan. He was ready to take the responsibility of this declaration. He had examined the correspondence which had been referred to and there was nothing in it to warrant such a conclusion.

Mr. Crittenden followed. He desired, before agreeing to the movement authorized by the bill, such information as would warrant the taking of military possession for the objects contemplated, or from the considerations stated. He was in favor of the amendment proposed by Mr. Jefferson Davis.

Mr. Westcott addressed the Senate at length, and expressed his conviction that is was the intention of England to take possession of Yucatan, and that once in her possession, she would not relinquish it. And he would vote for any measure necessary to prevent England from taking possession, and to protect the interests of the U. States.

After some further conversation, the bill was passed over informally, and the Senate adjourned, after adopting a resolution calling on the president for further correspondence on the subject.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

After some unimportant business, the House, in committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill granting bounty lands to officers promoted from the ranks, and the several amendments proposed.

The amendments of Messrs. Thompson of Mississippi, and Lumpkin, of Georgia, to which I have already referred, and numerous others offered to-day, were rejected, and the bill was finally reported to the House and passed, with a single amendment, requiring that the officers referred to "shall have been elected or promoted, after reaching the seat of war."

And then the House adjourned. [BWP]
Mr. Allen had no idea, by a condemnation here of the Court of Inquiry now sitting in Mexico, to prejudge the proceedings of that court before they are concluded. When these proceedings were before them, it would be the time to discuss that question.

The Senator had supposed a case in which, by delay, the President might abuse his power, and for which he would be justly censurable; but that would not enlarge the powers of the Senate—that would not give to it powers not conferred by the constitution. The President might with infinitely more propriety call on Congress to know why they had not passed the ten regiment bill, or any other particular measure, and when they expected to pass it.

It was proposed by this resolution to do virtuously towards the President the same thing. It was a call on the Executive to know why he has not sent in certain appointments. He was opposed to establish any such system of mutual inquisition.

Where the constitution had prescribed the duties of the several departments of the government, Congress had no power to interfere, and this was clearly a case of that kind. He was for watching closely all attempts at usurpations was much greater than in the Executive Department of the government.

At the conclusion of Mr. Allen’s remarks, the resolution was passed over at the suggestion of Mr. Hannegan, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the Yucatan bill.

Mr. Lewis addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill in its present shape, and proposed and amendment, in the form of a preamble to Mr. Davis' amendment, which Mr. D. accepted as a modification. It is, substantially, that whereas an exterminating war is now waged by the Indians of Yucatan against white population; and whereas Mexico, of which Yucatan is a State, has been rendered incapable, by reason of the war with the United States, to render the necessary protection to Yucatan; and whereas, in the existing state of things, humanity, and our duty to Mexico, require that protection should be afforded to Yucatan by the United States, until Mexico shall be in a situation to extend that protection herself; therefore the President is authorized, &c., provided that our protection shall not be withdrawn until Congress is satisfied that Mexico is in a condition to afford protection, and provided further, that nothing herein shall be construed to warrant the permanent occupation or annexation of Yucatan to the United States.

Mr. Niles followed. He expressed his surprise at the urgency with which immediate action on this bill was pressed, and commented at some length on the Message of the President, and the proposition of Yucatan to deliver up her sovereignty to the U. States. Whether the humanity of the measures suggested by the Executive was excited by the proffer of sovereignty on the part of Yucatan he would not pretend to say.

Mr. N. then proceeded to discuss the merits of the bill, drawing a distinction between the bill and the message, the former of which, he said, did not cover the whole ground embraced in the latter. The bill was for a particular purpose, but the message went much farther. He contended that neither the declaration of Mr. Monroe, the peculiar position of the people of Yucatan, nor the principle of non-intervention, warranted the interference proposed. He was, for one, unwilling to take the responsibility of exterminating the Indian population of Yucatan, independent of other considerations.

Mr. Niles asserted that there were two parties in Yucatan, between whom a difficulty existed; but as to the causes of that difficulty, or the merits of the controversy, we know nothing. But it had been stated that the chief object of this application from Yucatan was the "extermination" of the Indians. He read from the correspondence to show the character of the people which we are called upon to "exterminate." If, as has been stated, our interference was to involve us in a war with Great Britain—an event which he had not apprehended—the bill assumed a higher character, and their responsibilities were proportionately increased.

At the conclusion of Mr. Niles’ speech, which was of great length, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

On motion of Mr. Burt, the House resumed the consideration of the joint resolution providing for the payment of the regiment of Texas mounted troops called into the service under the requisition of Col. Curtis—the question being on a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House of Thursday ordered the bill to be engrossed.

The question being put, the motion prevailed, and Mr. Burt offered an amendment relating to horses lost in the Gulf of Mexico, and then agreed to. Thus, amended, the resolution was again put upon its passage, when a further amendment, striking out the clause giving bounty lands, was proposed and adopted, and then the resolution thus amended, was again read the third time and passed.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole and took up the bill for the admission of Wisconsin into the Union, but without coming to any conclusion thereon the committee rose, and at 3 o'clock the House adjourned. [BWP]
The Whig was mistaken when, in its hasty article of Wednesday, the 26th of April, it says the Enquirer “professes to have every thing at its fingers’ ends,” relating to “this question” about a “Protective Tariff.” We only professed to have heretofore read the “early history” of the government having reference to this subject, and to possess, as er supposes many well educated school-boys did, “more and better information than the editors of the Whig had exhibited,” not in reference to the whole question, but as to “Gen. Hamilton’s opinions and position in regard to it.”

And we submit that this is not saying much either for ourselves or the school-boys, when it appears that the editors of the Whig, in the same article of Wednesday, seem to admit that they were not before aware of the existence of Gen. Hamilton’s celebrated “Report on Manufactures.” We really were surprised that the editors had apparently overlooked this Report, and are still more so, to infer that they did not know of it; and we cannot doubt that, in this respect, there are school-boys who have the advantage of them. But we assure our neighbors that it was not our intention to impute to them such want of information in regard to this whole subject as they state, much less generally, --and desire now to correct any such impression, if our language warranted it; so that they cannot decline the discussion on that ground. We must, however, in candor add, that, in our opinion, very little reliance should be placed on the conclusions to which the Whig has arrived on the question we are discussing, when, in regard to Gen. Hamilton’s opinions, it has exhibited such a singular defect of information; and especially if we shall show, as we expect to do, that it is almost equally at fault in regard to Mr. Jefferson’s.

While we do profess to have some general knowledge of the “early history” of this subject, we must also candidly admit that, so far from having “everything at our finger’s ends” about it a good deal of labor and of time has been spent in searching up the old “records” referring to it, in order to refresh our memories; which we knew must have grossly betrayed us, if the “inevitable conclusions” of the Whig were at all correct.—These old “records” happened not to be very accessible to us at this time; and we confess our inability to quote them verbatim—or any of them, even Hamilton’s report, much as we have heard of it—without having them before us. This, with the fact that we have been occupied occasionally with other matters (Revolutions in Europe, Old Zac’s “position,” &c.) united to our desire to treat the subject candidly, fairly, and accurately, in our articles upon it, will, we hope, show satisfactorily, to the editors of the Whig and to our readers, why we “require an unusual time in their preparation” and why they appear so “labored” as the Whig states. Surely none of our patients—not even the Whig—can complain because we are thus compelled to administer our medicine in broken doses, given at long intervals, or that it is manufactured with much labor; for we profess to have no patent machine for making it.

Our present article, we regret to say, has been delayed by our inability to procure a copy of M. Smith’s “great free trade speech delivered in 1793.” We are curious to see this speech, because the Whig had repeatedly declared that it was “in favor of free trade,” and now pronounces it “the great free trade speech delivered in 1793,” in its very same article of Wednesday and almost in the very same breath in which it says “the humbug of Free Trade is itself of modern invention.” If the term “modern” is intended to be applied to “that humbug” generally, then we say it is at least as ancient as the science of political economy or as trade itself; and that it has been ably advocated by the earliest as well as the best writers on the subject. Every text book on the science, used in our schools, treat “free trade,” and many of our school-boys, we presume, must know that it is no “modern invention” in this application of the terms, which we suppose, therefore, could not be the application intended by the Whig. But if those terms were intended to mean that “free trade” was “of modern invention” in reference particularly in our own government, then the Whig would seem to contradict itself, for it insists that as early as “1793,” only about four years after the organization of the government under our present constitution, Mr. Smith “delivered a great speech,” “in favor of “free trade;” also that Mr. Hamilton was then in favor of “free trade,” and Mr. Jefferson was then opposed to “free trade.”—“The humbug” must then have been invented almost as soon as the government itself, and cannot be called “modern” in reference to it, with any propriety or without direct contradiction, however mistaken the Whig may be as to the inventors. The Whig itself shows that this “humbug” is nearly as old as the government itself, and that is, at any event, quite a respectable old age, at least for a humbug, being more than half a century. We have taken it for granted that Mr. Smith did not make a great speech in favor of “free trade” before the thing was invented, which he could only have done in the manner Guy Faux is said, in the song of the “Gunpowder Plot,” to have used Locofofo matches, we believe, in setting fire to the Parliament House—that is, that Mr. Smith would have made a great speech in favor of “free trade” in 1793, only “it was not just invented then.” Our readers will understand why we are curious to see this speech, which, according to the Whig’s account of the matter must be a very curious affair, being made about a “humbug” before it was invented. But, seriously, we presume this remark of the Whig to be the mere result of inadvertence and haste, and while it complains of our “labored articles,” we must recommend to it to labor its own a little more, if it wishes to avoid such glaring contradictions, and to try, as we do, even at the cost of some trouble and delay, to inform itself before it undertakes to enlighten others. Just think of some Whig orator, as we may surely expect, pronouncing “free trade” a “modern humbug” in our politics, and in the same breath telling of “the great speech” made in favor of it, on the floor of Congress, in 1793, only fifty-five years ago!

In this connection, the Whig asks, “when, indeed, did the Enquirer itself become an advocate of a non-protecting Tariff?” and challenges us “to show chapter and verse,” as if it thought “free trade” was an “invention” so “modern” that it must have been made long since the Enquirer was established. We may at some convenient time answer this “challenge” of the Whig, and gratify its desire, as far as our files will enable us. But we do not see that what the Enquirer may contain can throw any light on the “early history” of this subject, or can tend to show what opinions Gen. Hamilton or Mr. Jefferson, at that period, may have entertained about it; we must therefore postpone the production of “chapter and verse” for the present. We do not know that we shall be able to find in the Enquirer any “verse” at all about a “non-protecting Tariff.”—All we can recollect to have seen on that subject in “verse” is to be found in the Whig song books where we believe some edifying and entertaining couplets may be discovered. If we find any in our old files, the Whig shall surely have them; but at present, it must excuse us and let us dispose of the question before us.
We think we should be able to do this better, if we could find Mr. Smith's "great free trade speech;" and we are therefore no less anxious than curious to see it. The Whig lays great stress upon this speech; for in its same Wednesday's article it says "in regard to Mr. Hamilton's opinions," the editors confess "they have no other evidence than that of Mr. Jefferson;" and this evidence of Mr. Jefferson consists of his conjecture "that Hamilton had furnished to Mr. Smith of South Carolina the great free trade speech delivered in 1793;" so that "it cannot be doubted that Mr. Jefferson DISAPPROVED OF THE DOCTRINES OF THAT SPEECH;" and of course, "at the time, MR. JEFFERSON WAS IN FAVOR OF" "the protective policy;" and it concludes by asking us "not to lose sight of this fact." If we can once get sight of the fact, we will try not to lose it. But we have not as yet been able to find Mr. Smith's great speech; and the only question at all material about it, is, was it a "free trade" speech in "fact?" If it was not, then the conclusions of the Whig, (founded on the "fact" of Mr. Jefferson's "conjecture") namely, that because Mr. Hamilton furnished the speech, therefore he was in favor of "free trade," and as Mr. Jefferson disapproved it therefore he was opposed to free trade and in favor of the "protective policy," must fail; and if, on the other hand, it was in "fact" a protective tariff speech, then these conclusions should be reversed and Gen. Hamilton's consistency, in favor of protection, will be vindicated, while we shall have taken one step towards showing Mr. Jefferson's disapprobation of that policy. We wish, therefore to see the speech, and hope the Whig will aid us in finding it.—In its article of March 29th, in which an extract from this speech is given verbatim, the Whig represents it to have been made in 1794, while in its late article of April 26th, it several times says it was "delivered in 1793." We doubt not this is another inadvertent, except as it has perplexed us in our efforts to find or identify it: for the Whig, in referring us to "the record," as on other occasions, in its haste, omits to inform its readers in what particular "record" it found this "great speech." We shall be obliged to the Whig now to supply the omission, and to inform us where the speech can be procured. We suspect the assumption of the Whig, (for it appears to us to be no more,) that this speech of Mr. Smith was "a free trade speech," is founded in misapprehension and mistake, as it seems to admit some of its other assumptions to have been; resulting, we doubt not, from the rapidity of composing articles, which it appears to esteem so highly. We suspect the "fact" will turn out to be, that it was not a "free trade speech" at all, but was perhaps rather more of "a protective tariff" speech. Certainly the extract given from it be the Whig, in its former article of March 29th, does not tend to show that it had any reference even to "free trade," while in a long and very full abstract of a speech delivered by Mr. Smith of South Carolina in 1794, on Mr. Madison's resolutions, (no doubt the same speech referred to be the Whig,) which is given by Judge Marshall in his "Life of Washington," volume 5, pages 490 to 498, the terms "free trade" are not to be found at all. This Abstract, if accurate, as we cannot doubt it is, would show that the speech, instead of being "a great free trade speech," or made on that subject, had no direct reference to it; and so far as it has any reference to "a protective tariff," or to the "protection of manufactures," it rather shows that Mr. Smith was, at least, inclined to favor that system. We refer the Whig and our readers to the whole abstract, but [illegible] the following paragraph, as indicating at once the whole subject actually discussed, as well as Mr. Smith's apparent inclination in favor of protection. Judge Marshall, page 496, makes Mr. Smith say:

"If the object of the resolutions were the encouragement of domestic manufactures, there might be some semblance of argum4nt in their favor. But this is not contemplated. Their avowed object is to turn the course of trade form one nation to another, by means which would subject the citizens of the United States to great inconvenience."

It would seem, then, that if the "encouragement of manufactures" had been, in Mr. Smith's view of them, "the object of the resolutions," he might have been found an advocate for them, and of course we may infer, was in favor of "a protective tariff." But this was not even "contemplated." On the contrary, the "avowed object," he says, was "to turn the course of trade form one nation to another," that is, from Great Britain to France; and the ulterior object, as he might have added, and as we shall hereafter show, was to force Great Britain into a commercial treaty with us, and all nations into "free trade" with us, which France then exhibited a strong disposition to favor. This policy of forcing all foreign nations into "free trade" with the United States, by commercial restrictions against those nations who would not adopt "free trade," and commercial advantages in favor of those who would, was Mr. Jefferson's favorite policy, as we shall hereafter show more fully. This policy (set forth at large in Mr. Jefferson's great report on commerce, made, as Secretary of State, December 16th, 1793, which we shall again refer to more particularly, and which we will show was opposed to that of General Hamilton, contained in his celebrated "report on manufactures,") was embodied in Mr. Madison's resolutions, and was opposed be <Mr. Smith's speech. Although Mr. Smith's argument had no direct reference to free trade, the effect of the speech was, in Mr. Jefferson's view, against free trade—and hence, perhaps, his remark, that Smith did not comprehend his own speech. So far, then, from being "a great free trade speech," unless we are convinced of the contrary by the sight of it, we must conclude, as we think every candid reader will, upon the evidence before us, that is was in fact an anti free trade speech, and that Mr. Jefferson so considered it. His conjecture, therefore, that General Hamilton wrote it, is perfectly consistent with his knowledge that General Hamilton was in favor of "a protective tariff," and with his own advocacy of "free trade." So much, then, for this imposing Whig "fact" against Mr. Jefferson's "free trade" opinions—at least at present. In another "chapter" we will adduce some positive evidence of Mr. Jefferson's advocacy of "free trade" and opposition to the "protective policy," and endeavor to show what his opinions and position really were in reference to those questions.

But before we conclude this "chapter," though already too long, it is due to the Whig to acknowledge its candor in admitting in its Wednesday's article, as we anticipated it would, "that the Enquirer has satisfied us" [its editors] "that, in 1791, Mr. Hamilton was in favor of the protective policy." So far, then, we are agreed. "But," adds the Whig, "it has not convinced us that he was not opposed to it in 1793." The only evidence of this supposed opposition of General Hamilton to the protective policy in 1793, as the Whig admits, is Mr. Smith's speech and Mr. Jefferson's conjecture. After what is said above on this "evidence," we are willing to leave it to the Whig itself to estimate its weight, satisfied it will be found a little less than nothing. We cannot find any declaration of Gen. Hamilton's opinions on this subject as late as 1793. Nor is this to be wondered at, since his first great "Report on Manufactures" fell dead in the Halls of Congress; for, although it was referred to the Committee of the whole House on the 23rd of January, 1792, it does not appear afterwards on the journals, nor can we find any subsequent reference or allusion.
to its in Congress. But in his Report of March 16th, 1792, [American State Papers, edition 1832, vol 5, p. 150] is found this passage:

“It is certain, also, that a spirit of manufacturing prevails at this time in a greater degree than it has done at any antecedent period; and as far as an increase of duties shall tend to second and aid this spirit, they will serve to promote essentially the industry, the wealth, the strength, the independence and the substantial prosperity of the country.”

This shows that as late as March 16, 1792, Gen. Hamilton had not changed his opinion—at most, less than two years before Mr. Smith’s speech was made; which really can furnish no evidence of such a change, or that Gen. Hamilton had, as the Whig insinuates, “two sets of opinions on this question, as well as Mr. Jefferson” &c. The Whig had as well abandon this idea. These great men had advocated great systems of governmental policy, which they perfectly understood, and were not apt to vary. Where their detached expressions see, to indicate otherwise, it is only, we believe, because those expressions are isolated and then misunderstood. The protection of manufacturers was a part of General Hamilton’s system of governing by monopolies; and the Whig may be assured that as he was it author and advocate in 1791, so he remained to the day of his lamentable and untimely death.

[REV45I3P1C3, May 12, 1848, Anecdotes in Yucatan.]

The heart bleeds at the following recital of atrocities which have been committed in that distracted country, (says the Union.) It is furnished by Don Justo Sierra, the commissioner of Yucatan now in Washington—a gentleman of education, and a nephew of a distinguished Mexican, who was formerly driven from his country in account of his liberal principles, took refuge in Texas, whose destiny he shared, and whose revolution he promoted:

Horrible Atrocities committed by the Savages in Yucatan

During the siege of Valladolid, the savage Indians proposed that commissioners should be sent out to them to treat for peace. The parish priest of that city, a young ecclesiastic of unblemished conduct and well-known piety, (Dr. Manuel Sierra de O'Reilly, a brother of Don Justo Sierra, the present commissioner of Yucatan at Washington,) was nominated for that purpose, together with the chief police and two other respectable citizens. Dr. Sierra had acquired, by his charity and benevolence, a wide-spread popularity with the Indians of the city and its vicinity, and the most happy results were anticipated form the mission. Two days were passed in pacific conference with the savages; after which they committees the unheard-of brutality of assassinating him and his colleagues in the church. Their lives were feloniously taken in reward for their (perhaps) indiscreet confidence in the integrity and honor of a race, who, alas! are too well known for their perfidy.

After the city of Valladolid fell into the hands of these barbarians, there were found within its suburbs one hundred and seventy-seven women and children who had been left without the means of escape. They were all brought into an enclosure, or fenced lot, where, to the sound of music and obscene songs, the women were publicly violated; and, after prolonged torments, which lasted thirteen hours, they were all murdered.

The venerable curate of Guainia, who had been 53 years among the Indians—during the whole of which period his life had been devoted to their service—was forced from his bed, where he was prostrated by disease, and was dragged to the belfry of the church in which he had for many years ministered to their spiritual wants, where he was ignominiously hung to the bell rope.

More than 30,000 men, women, and children, who were without any means of defence, have been assassinated in the frontier settlements and villages. The most horrid acts of atrocity have been committees by the relentless savages—acts more frightful in their character then those which attracted the wrath of a just and offended God against the accursed cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. Such are the citizens, who, as expressed by some of the public presses, _are vindicating their political rights_ by an insurrectionary movement!!

The Whig Convention in the Mobile District has passed the strongest resolutions _unanimously_ in favor of Mr. Clay for the Presidency, and appointed Clay Delegates (the Editor of the Mobile Advertiser one of them) to the National Convention—all unanimously.

The 4th District (Greene) has compromised between Clay and Taylor, by sending two delegates to the Convention for one, and two for the other.

[Mexico-The Treaty, &c.]

The New Orleans Bulletin learns from Mr. Trist, now in New Orleans, that he thinks there is little or no doubt of the ratification of the treaty by the Mexican Congress—

Such, we learn, is the decided opinion of all the best informed, most intelligent and most influential Mexicans at the Capital. The probability is that there will not even be any opposition—at least none of any moment—to ratifying it, nor any difficulty in forming a quorum for the purpose of taking it into consideration so soon as our commissioners reach the Capital, and are prepared to proceed with their negotiation. All the unfavorable reports as to the prospects of peace, we are glad to hear, are either unfounded or greatly exaggerated, and it is believed that whatever foreign influence may exist in Mexico, official or private, will be exerted to promote the ratification.

"We learn, with pleasure, that the health of the army was much improved, though there was still considerable sickness and mortality. Disease has been more fatal to our army in Mexico, than the battle-field, and the volunteers have suffered more severely than the regulars, arising from greater imprudence in living, both in eating and drinking, neither of which can be practiced with impunity in that climate.

"It was expected that the Court of Inquiry would probably close its labors form the 20th to the 25th April, and adjourn to meet in the United States, when Gen. Scott would immediately leave, on his return home. He is probably, at this moment, in Vera Cruz."

[CITY OF MEXICO, April 17, 1848.

Enclosed you will find a translation of the first letter I have received from the gentleman employed as your correspondent at Queretaro.—You will perceive that he says Senators and Deputies are constantly arriving there from all parts of Queretaro; and yet, he adds that the House of Deputies lacks sixteen or eighteen of a quorum, and the Senate four, showing the number of Congressmen present at the seat of government to be less now then it was a fortnight ago, when the Mexican journals reported that but fourteen were wanting in both houses to make a quorum. This tallies with reports here that members are leaving Queretaro for their homes as fast, if not faster, than new ones arrive. There are few here now that do not despair of the treaty being ratified by the Mexican Government, chiefly in consequence of the tardiness displayed by Pena y Pena, in bringing Congress together, and the nonfulfillment of his promise to have a quorum assembled as soon the treaty was returned ratified by our Government. Reports are current still, too, that Bustamente is opposed to peace, and, you will observe that your Queretaro correspondent, in speaking of him and Minon going to San Luis Potosi with the army, says they have gone under the pretext of suppressing an Indian insurrection in the Sierra Gordo district, which lies between Tampico and San Luis Potosi. Paredes, notwithstanding the fulminations of the Government at Queretaro against him, and the order issued to the Governor of San Luis Potosi to arrest him, was still at liberty at the last advices from San Luis. Now, the object of Bustamente in going to San Luis, without doubt, is either to overawe the partisans of Paredes, and arrest him, or to coalesce with him, and if the latter, farewell to the Government of Pena y Pena and peace. Time alone can reveal the designs of Bustamente, but we shall very soon have a knowledge of them. It is gratifying to know that the men now here will permit no trifling on the part of the Government at Queretaro.

Mr. Sevier arrived here on Saturday. Both he and Mr. Clifford say they can have but few words with the Mexicans, and those are to ratify the treaty quickly, and the general in-chief has within a few days declared that he will be very soon either in Vera Cruz or Queretaro. This is the only way to deal with Mexico, for their strength is entirely in procrastination.

The trail of the officers and men accused of the late murder and attempt of burglary is going on. I would send you a report of the evidence, but the court has only admitted reporters on condition that the evidence shall not be published here or in the United States, until some time shall have elapsed that there will be a certainty of the publication not reaching here before the trial is concluded.

You have doubtless heard that a council of war was held when the army was in Puebla, to debate the propriety of "buying a peace," by advancing a certain sum of money to Santa Ana. It is said that Gen. Scott, although the council of war decided against the plan, entered into negotiations with Santa Anna, through Mackintosh, to bribe him either into a treaty, or not to oppose the advance of the American army upon the capital; that the sum was agreed upon, and that ten thousand dollars were advanced as "earnest. . . [illegible]. . . is guilty of this, but that a charge to the effect I have mentioned, or somewhat similar is to be made, the character and position of my informant leaves me no room to doubt.

There is a part of your Queretaro correspondent’s letter that I do not very clearly understand. It is that stating that several American officers have joined the Mexican army. I can only learn of one American officer who has gone from this line of the army to Queretaro—a Lieut. O’Sullivan—who was promoted form the ranks to a commission in one of the old Infantry regiments for his gallantry at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma. He resigned his commission some time ago, and it is believed went to Queretaro join the Mexican army. It is probable that many of the deserters from the ranks of our army, with the view of obtaining commissions in the Mexican army, represent themselves on arriving at Queretaro as having been officers, and thus your correspondent may have fallen into error. The inhabitants of Zecualtepec, at which place General Lane had the fight with Jarauta, have petitioned General Butler to remunerate them for the losses suffered by them by the fight and the partial sacking of the town. General Polk is collecting evidence to show that their reports of their losses are greatly exaggerated, and which will also show that the town must have been almost exclusively inhabited by guerillas and their accomplices. Nearly every house and store in the town had articles in them which bore evidence of their having been robbed from the trains. American whiskey and American manufactured tobacco—articles never used by Mexicans—were found in the most of them, and in others goods of all descriptions marked to American and other merchants in this city. D. S.

Queretaro, April 13, 1848.

Senators and Deputies are arriving here daily from all parts of the States of the Republic.—Those who are here meet frequently in caucuses (juntas preparatorias.)

It is generally believed that Congress will meet after the Easter holidays, that is from the first to the fifth of next month.

The number of Deputies wanting for a quorum now, is sixteen to eighteen, and the number of Senators wanting is four.

The army of reserve, and the munitions, have left here under General Bustamente and Minon, of San Luis Potosi, under the pretext of preserving order and tranquility, which are threatened by the rising of the Indians at the Sierra Gordo.

All the opinions expressed up to this time by the members of the new Congress are in favor of peace.
Some officious Mexicans have induced several American officers, as it appears, reluctantly, to come to Queretaro, and they have enlisted in the army. Three of them have been sent to Guadalajara, and to the others are waiting here for their appointments. In my next letter I will give you their names. The two battalions of San Patricio consist of from a hundred to an hundred and twenty men.

The stage which left this city for Guanajuato yesterday, was attacked by a band of robbers about five miles from here. The passengers fired and killed one of the robbers, who was carried off immediately by his companions. The passengers returned to town, an asked the Government for an escort, which was refused. They let the stage go on empty, and entered their protest against the refusal of the government to protect them under such circumstances.

City of Mexico, April 19, 1848.

Herewith you will find the second letter of your Queretaro correspondent, dated the 14th inst., and had it not been for the breaking down of the diligencia on the road, I should have had a letter a day later from him. This letter will be found exceedingly interesting at the present moment, in view of the possibility of the treaty not being ratified at Queretaro, and a reopening of the war, in as much as it gives in detail the present military resources of the country and what is deemed necessary by the Government in case a prolongation of the war if determined upon; but if such a determination is thought of, how appalling must these statistics be to any Mexican of sense, who desires to preserve the nationality of his country. Eleven thousand five hundred men is all they can bring into the field. They say if peace cannot by had they want 53,500 men more, and 155 pieces of artillery, of which latter they have, I learn from good authority, at all points, not more than forty pieces, and these generally og an inferior quality. To support the force which they said would be required, would involve a monthly expenditure of over a million dollars, and with all their ports in their possession and a large portion of their richest territory, together with seven or eight of their most wealthy and populous cities, whence, in the absence of all national credit, can they expect to raise so large a sum. So desperate a situation of affairs of the country one should think would bring the members of Congress together at Queretaro in a rush, to ratify the highly favorable treaty that awaits their action; but we have no evidence of such a disposition, and by virtue of the members of Pena y Pena’s Government and the “occupationists,” who are daily growing in strength, the treaty may be rejected, or which would be the same in result, they may prevent the action of congress upon it until the 2d June, when, as is understood, if the treaty be not ratified, warlike operations are to be resumed.

Your correspondent at Queretaro still refers to desertions, and continues to assert that American officers are among the number. I am yet of opinion that he has been deceived in this matter, and that private and non-commissioned officers who have gone to Queretaro have, for the purpose of obtaining respectable positions in the Mexican army, represented themselves as having been commissioned officers (which I take it, your correspondent means they have been) in the American army. You will think by the statement of your correspondent that several of these deserters have been sent into the interior States to organize companies of Americans strange, but I am credibly informed that there are some six or eight hundred teamsters, discharged soldiers and deserters scattered through the country, some idling and others at work in the factories, or engaged in other occupations. The greater part of this number are at Guanajuato and Guadalajara. This attempt on the part of our government to increase military force of the country and the efforts to promote desertion from our army would seem to convey belligerent intentions; but it may be that Pena y Pena is looking to the possibility of being compelled, by his own countrymen to continue the war.

The letter says that several of the States have refused to send their Representatives to Congress, and private letters from Queretaro represent that it is contemplated by the Government, in view of the present position of Yucatan, and the state of the country generally, to decree that fifty or sixty members of Congress shall constitute a quorum, and thus declare a quorum to be present now, and thus baffle the designs of the opponents of peace. It is said our commissioners will not recognize a ratification of the treaty that is not constitutional, but with Mr. Buchanan’s instructions to Mr. Trist, to negotiate with a Dictator, should he find one in power, it would not be prudent to believe that our Government will be over nice as to the constitutional organization of the Government at Queretaro.

There is but little news to communicate from this point. The trial of the officers and men charged with the murder and attempted burglary in the Calle de la Palma is progressing. Lieutenant Hare is the only one of the party that has yet been before the commission. The evidence against him thus far proves, beyond doubt his connection with the affair, and Armstrong, who has become “State’s evidence,” swears that Hare was the leader.

The treaty was sent to Queretaro on the day before yesterday by a Mexican express, and at the same time a dispatch was sent to the Mexican Government by our commissioners. I do not know the purport of their communication; but a reply is anticipated on Friday, when they except to start for Queretaro. Should they go, Major Polk with a hundred, or an hundred and fifty men, will escort them. I shall go with them, as there is but little of interest to write upon from this place, and I can be more useful to you at Queretaro.

Colonel Black, of the 1st Pennsylvania, arrived here on Saturday, the 11th, from Vera Cruz, in command of a military train. He made the shortest march to and from Vera Cruz that has ever been made with infantry. He made the march each way in thirteen days. Colonel Loomis, who is escorting a merchant train from Vera Cruz, will be here tomorrow. We received a very large mail this morning, which brought us New Orleans dates to the 8th instant. D.S.

Queretaro, April 14, 1848.

During the last few days from fifteen to twenty American soldiers, deserters, have arrived here, who enlisted immediately into the Mexican army. Several of them have been attached to the artillery and ordnance department.
Others have been sent to Guanajuato and Guadalajara for the purpose of organizing companies which are to be formed of Americans (deserters.) There is much talk about a desertion of from four to five hundred men that it is said, is to take place in a few days from the American troops quartered about the city of Mexico, and it is further said that several agents have left this place in order to facilitate the desertion.

It is a fact that, in the above named departments, there are not only American soldiers, but also American officers, who have deserted within a short time. Amongst them s an artillery officer, who deserted six days ago, and they have left this place in order to organize in all the interior States.

The insurgents of Xichu, in the State of Guanajuato, have risen to a formidable body. They...[illegible]...and they have partisans even as far as the district of San Felipe. They have given the cry for anarchical principles, and are destroying all towns through which they pass. The forces sent against them have not been sufficient to quell the insurrection.

It appears that the South and some of the other States refuse to send their representatives to Congress, but the number is not sufficient to prevent the opening of Congress.

According to a statement presented to Congress, the Mexican Government require, for the purpose of carrying on the war against the Americans: Sappers and Miners, 531; Foot Artillery, 2640; Mounted do., 536; Infantry of the line, 47,340; Cavalry, 9,440; other disciplined forces, 4,500. A total of 65,077 men, to form 60 battalions and 16 regiments, and added to this a train of 145 pieces of Artillery.

To support this force would involve a monthly expense of $1,172,539, without taking into account the extra pay and extra rations during the war, the cost of the horses for the artillery train, train for bridges, ammunition, clothing, hospital stores, and other necessary expenses.

The forces existing at present are: Infantry, from 6000 to 8000 men; Cavalry, form 2000 to 3000 men; Artillery, 500 men. Total, 8000 to 11,500; which latter will include all the disciplined forces in the service.

Therefore, the Mexicans, in order to continue the war, will have to arm and equip 531 Sappers and Miners, 2140 Foot Artillery, 536 Mounted do., 39,340 Infantry of the Line, 6440 Cavalry, 4590 other disciplined forces—53,577 men in all and 145 pieces of artillery, at an expense of one million and some hundred thousands of dollars per month. REv45i3p2c3, May 12, 1848, Interesting from Chihuahua.

[From the N. Orleans Picayune, May 4.]

The Battle of Santa Cruz de Rosales.

The U.S. steamship Fashion, Captain Morgan, arrived from Brazos Santiago yesterday, whence she sailed on the 30th ult., bringing us several days later intelligence from the Rio Grande, and interesting news from Chihuahua. Among the passengers on the Fashion was J. L. Collins, Esq, bearer of dispatches form General Price and General Wool to headquarters at Washington. Our readers are already familiar with the name of Squire Collins, honorable mention having been repeatedly made of him. He was taken prisoner some months since near Chihuahua, and confined till about the first of February, when he succeeded in making his escape and joining the American troops at El Paso.—He participated in the battle of Santa Cruz de Rosales, with Gen. Price's command, and has kindly furnished us with a succinct statement of the affair and the events which were connected with it. As we have had no accounts of the engagement save form Mexican sources, and American's version of the affair will be read with interest.

Mr. Collins informs us that about the first week in February he succeeded in breaking prison at Chihuahua, then in possession of the Mexican troops under command of Gov. Trias, and after an arduous journey of six days, succeeded in reaching El Paso, 300 miles distant, then under command of Lieut. Col. Ralls, of the Missouri Mounted Volunteers. Previously to his arrival intelligence had been received form various sources that Urrea, with a strong force of lancers, was upon the road to attack them, having made a detour to the westward, and these reports were confirmed by the capture of a small party of Mexicans, under command of a lieutenant, who were surprised and taken at a small town called Carazal, half way between Chihuahua and El Paso. Letters announcing the intended march of Urrea were found in the possession of the commanding officer. Intelligence was thereupon dispatched to Santa Fe to Gen. Price, who immediately started with two companies of the 1st Regiment U. S. Dragoons, commanded by Major Bell, one company of same regiment acting as artillery, commanded by Lieut. Love, and the battalion of St. Louis Infantry, commanded by Lieut. Col. Easton and the Santa Fe Battalion under Major Walker, and arrived about the 20th of February at El Paso, increasing the command to about 1600 men.

It was ascertained that the report of Urrea's advance was entirely false, and Squire Collins furnished Gen. Price with all information of Gov. Trias's position and means of resistance, Gen. P. at once determined to march down and attack him. Accordingly, on the 1st of March, he started with about 400 men and arrived at Chihuahua on the evening of the 7th performing the entire distance in the extraordinary space of seven days. A deputation of the civic authority came out and held an interview with General Price, informing him of the reported conclusion of a treaty of commanded by Captain Greer, and arrived at Gen. Wool's headquarters on the 20th. He proceeds on to Washington about 2000 stand of small arms. On the 18th, General Price started back for Chihuahua, taking with him Gov. Trias amount of arms and ammunition captured. There were fourteen pieces of artillery, some of a heavy caliber, and the Mexican force was from 1500 to 2000.—The officers, some forty in number were taken prisoners, and the whole side of the Mexicans was about 150 killed and as many wounded, while on our side there were but five killed and twenty wounded—two of whom subsequently died.

To this general Price consented, and not only waited the four days, but four days longer, at the expiration of which time, a portion of his force having come up, increasing his strength to about 700, he determined to attack the town. The officers, some forty in number were taken prisoners, and the whole amount of arms and ammunition captured. There were fourteen pieces of artillery, some of a heavy caliber, and about 2000 stand of small arms. On the 18th, General Price started back for Chihuahua, taking with him Gov. Trias and a portion of his prisoners, and leaving Lieut. Col. Ralls in command, to follow as soon as practicable. Mr. Collins informs us that our troops conducted themselves in the coolest manner and distinguished themselves by their bravery, officers and men. The Mexican prisoners were all liberated upon parole soon after they arrived at Chihuahua.

The Lynchburg Virginian, a leading Taylor paper, takes the same view, and speaks in the most decided terms of the Convention. 'We demand, and have a right know whether he and these 'friends' mean to deal fairly by the friends of Mr. Clay and whoever else shall be nominated, and that without this the whole Convention is a farce, and its doings of no force, so far as General Taylor is concerned.'
We place the Virginian's article on record, as evidence, form an influential organ of their own party, that the Whigs, in pushing Gen. Taylor's nomination by the Whig Convention, are showing an utter "want of self-respect." This is not "Locofoco," but good Whig authority. And we ask out readers, has not the once great Whig party reached a strange position of humiliation? Professing to love and reverence great Harry, they cruelly sacrifice him and Whig principles for the sake of an assumed "availability"—and not content with this self conviction and abandonment of their former boasted party schemes, many of them now give up all "self-respect," and solemnly enter upon "the farce" of a Convention, not to deliberate upon the selection of their best man, but, in desperation, to ratify the self-nomination of a man who defies them and their party conventions and measures, and, shaking the rod over their heads, exclaims "take me or defeat." We have heard much of the "one-man-power," but we have never seen it more tyrannically applied then in the present case. The whole Whig party, through their leaders, crouching before "the Thunderer of Buena Vista!" Will not the "Dictator" of Ashland open his eyes with amazement and look unspeakable things when he sees the Whig party, with its broken organization and party measures spurned, namely yielding to the lash of "no-partyism," handsomely "laid on" by a "military chieftain"? Truly, he will think, an event has come about more fatal in every respect than "war, pestilence, and famine!" But to the strong evidence of that good Whig journal, the Lynchburg Virginian, a quondam supporter of Gen. Taylor:

"The terms laid down [by General Taylor] are just those for which Mr. Buchanan, Judge Woodbury, or General Cass might stipulate. Either of these Locofoco aspirants for the Presidency would have no objection whatever to be the nominee of the Whig Convention, provided no pledges were asked of him. In doing so, he would compromise neither principles nor character; nor would General Taylor, were he to accept a nomination from the approaching Baltimore Convention, upon the same condition.

"But can General Taylor, in the face of the declaration, that he will, in any event, be a candidate, receive the nomination of the Philadelphia Convention? We answer, without the least hesitation, NO—unless the members of that body be wanting in respect for themselves and the Whig party. We should really consider it an insult to the Convention, to bring before it, as a candidate for the nomination, the name of one who says, if you choose to nominate me on my own conditions, well!—if you do not, I shall notwithstanding be a candidate. In our view, therefore, General Taylor has virtually placed himself beyond the pale of the Whig party, as such, and the Convention, in our opinion, cannot possibly entertain the question of his nomination. We regret sincerely to use language so decided, but without it we could not do justice to our own convictions. The Convention will have one less to choose from General Taylor having withdrawn his own name, we should not be surprised that, as a compromise, Mr. Clay's be also set aside, and the nomination conferred upon some third person, not heretofore much talked of for the Presidency.

"It may be assumed, therefore, that there will be three candidates in the field—the respective nominees of the Whig and Democratic parties, and General Taylor. What will be the result of this tripartite contest? The mass of both parties will support their respective nominations. General Taylor will be supported by recruits drawn from both the great parties, though not in equal numbers. For one democrat who will vote for him, there will be five Whigs. It will be readily seen that all the evils of running two candidates of the same party will be experienced. As the Whig nominee, General Taylor, we believe, would carry the doubtful States of Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Tennessee, Maryland and Pennsylvania. As an Independent he will carry neither, whilst he will abstract Whig strength enough to render the success of the nominee of the Convention hopeless in the States enumerated. We desire to be explicit as possible, and here deliberately record the opinion which we now entertain, that, running as a third candidate, General Taylor will not receive a single Electoral vote in the United States. The only State which he can hope to secure is Louisiana. Most assuredly he will not receive enough votes to devolve the election upon the House of Representatives, for, in every instance, his defeat will be but the accompaniment, as his running the cause, of the defeat of the Whig candidate. Sincerely deprecating the evils of an election by the House, and knowing that the Whigs would have nothing to hope from such an event, we shall not be sorry to see an election by the people.

"Some have thought that, notwithstanding General Taylor's explicit language, his name would not yet be withdrawn. The Whig, for instance, says: 'We understand clearly, now, that, although General Taylor will not WITHDRAW HIS OWN NAME in the event of the nomination of another individual by the Philadelphia Convention, yet his FRIENDS are at liberty to do so whenever THEY may seem it expedient, and that they will unquestionably advise his withdrawal in the event of the nomination of any other Whig, cannot be denied.' We regret to say that we look in vain in the letter of the Republican for a single sentence which warrants this opinion.

"Were his friends told him frankly that his chance of success was hopeless, and that his continuing to be a candidate would but ensure the defeat of the Whig nominee, and advise him to withdraw, we think that he would readily do so. But, looking merely to the letter before us, we are led to believe he has no more idea of retreating now, than he had at Buena Vista.

"The position of our Delegates to the National Convention is somewhat peculiar. The Convention which appointed them, whilst expressing a determination to support the nominee of the National Convention, adopted a declaratory resolution to the effect, that Gen. Taylor was the choice of the Whigs of Virginia, as the candidate for the Presidency. It has been thought that this would operate as instructions to the delegation to support General Taylor, and no one else. We see no ground for this opinion. The Delegates will take their seats untrammeled by any pledges or instructions.—General Taylor has explicitly withdrawn his name from the list of eminent men presented to
In addition to the intelligence in another column, we learn from the Union that an intelligent gentleman arrived in...

The New York Mirror, and original "no-party" Taylor organ, "insultingly" taunts the Whigs by saying that "General Taylor, it will be understood, is a candidate under all circumstances. It is for the Whigs to determine whether or not they can afford to slight so available a candidate for their party."

Finally, the last Norfolk Argus has the following. Is the once great Whig party really about to "surrender" in humiliation to the "no-party" dictation?:

"It is understood in Washington City that Senator Reverdy Johnson has very recently received a letter from General Taylor, peremptorily declaring that he will not make way for a nominee of the Whig Convention. Senator Johnson is said also to declare that the party 'must' nominate him, or take the consequences. So they go."

REv45i3p2c6, May 12, 1848, No title.

We expressed our surprise on Tuesday that the Republican and its "independent" candidate, General Taylor, should repudiate a National Convention and at the same time be calculating the chances of General Taylor for the nomination by that body—the one dubbing the Convention a set of "political gamblers"—and the other declaring his entire independency of that body—that he "will not withdraw form the canvass whoever may be the nominee."

In reply, the Republican "freely confesses that if some of the sentiments contained in that article were adopted by us (them) in any way, it would show inconsistency of the most glaring kind," and adds:

"We may say, however, that editors do not always adopt all that they copy from other papers, and the writer of this should have said as much in regard to the article in the National, but for the simple fact that it found its way into the Republican without its knowledge. We say this in justice to ourself. We have but one opinion upon the subject referred to, and have spoken it so repeatedly, that we may well be excused from avowing it once more. When we change that opinion, we will com out with an open and explicit recantation in our own words."

This apology for apparently riding both sides of the sapling, we must confess, is conclusive, and forms a complete estoppel to all argument on the subject. The article "found its way into the Republican without the editors' knowledge!" Nor do they hold themselves responsible "for typographical errors, advertisements, and Brandeth's Pills!—nor for the Police reports." A perfectly "independent" journal, according to its own showing. But who wishes to hold them responsible for all that appears in their journal? We did suppose, however, that the prominent political articles in the Republican, first in place under the editorial head, bearing all the marks of "knowledge" and adoption, found their way there with the knowledge of the editors. But it appears otherwise. In the future it would be unkind in us to hold the editors responsible for any thing which may appear in their paper, since the political articles, (some involving them in "inconsistency of the most glaring kind," and adds:)

The Republican intimates that it adheres to its opposition to a Convention—that it has "but one opinion on the subject," &c. Thus far that paper is consistent. Gen. T., himself, its candidate, is on open rebellion against the "political gamblers"—he cares not whom they may nominate—he asks them no favors—he is the statesman more deserving than all beside[!]—the Whig of superior claims "above all others"—in short "the most fittest" man to preside over the political interests of this great nation—and does not intend to yield to the claims of any human being, not even the "great embodiment," the God-like, the "persecuted," &c., &c., will tamely and quietly hang their harps upon the willows for the next four years, or until the superior claims of Gen. T. for services in the Whig cause shall be rewarded.

We understand his opinion is, that the treaty will be ratified if the Mexicans can agree among themselves in the distribution of the funds; but not otherwise. He is also of opinion that the Mexicans will agree, as they were much in want of money. He thinks that some delay may take place in the ratification of the treaty by Mexico, and that it is not probable the exchange of ratifications will or can take place by the 1st or 2d of next month.

On finishing it, he remarked, “That, from Mr. Clay’s movements, he was not altogether unprepared for this determination. As regarded himself,” he continued, “it made no change in his position. REv45i3p3c1, May 12, 1848, Thirtieth Congress—First Session. Washington, Wednesday, May 10, 1848.

SENATE.

Memorials and petitions were presented by Messrs. Greene, Dickinson and Dix.

Mr. Underwood introduced a joint resolution which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed, providing for the collection by the Commissioner of the Patent Office, to be embraced in his report annually, information, 1. As to the value of the agricultural productions of the several states, the amount of labor employed, price of labor in each State, &c. 2. The number and value of the manufacturing establishments in the several States, quantity and value of manufactures, labor employed, price in each State, &c. 3. Authorizing the employment of postmasters in the several States for this object, and requiring them to answer all questions and give all other information which they may be able to communicate.

Several private bills were reported, and several House bills read twice and referred.

The bill for the relief of the bona fide settlers under the act for the armed occupation of Florida, was passed.

The consideration of Mr. Johnson’s resolution calling on the President to state why the nominations of certain officers have not been sent in, was resumed.

Mr. Johnson replied to the remarks yesterday made by Mr. Allen. He had no idea, he said, of censuring in advance, nor had he expected to be compelled to censure at all, the conduct of the Executive. He desired merely to give the President an opportunity to set himself right before the Senate, as to why it had not been in his power to communicate certain appointments to the Senate.

He had heard surprise expressed by friends of the President, that the nominations had not been sent in, and solicitude that the president should relieve himself from any suspicion of unjustifiable motives.

He then proceeded to discuss the constitutional question as to whether the Senate has the right to call for this information, contending that the Senate had the right, and combating the position of Mr. Allen, that the tendency to usurpation of power is greater on the part of the Legislature than the Executive department of the government. If views, such as expressed by the Senator from Ohio were to govern here, it would prove that the will of the Executive might command, whenever his own reputation rendered it necessary to command.

It would prove that the Executive might command, and the Senate be made the instrument to record the will of the Executive.

The records of Congress, he said, were full of vetoes which smell rank of Executive usurpation. The vetoes on bills for internal improvements—the powers of the general government in regard to certain descriptions of which had never been questioned—were cases in point during the administration of the present President.

Without concluding, Mr. Johnson gave way to the suggestion of Mr. Foote, and the consideration of the Yucatan bill was resumed.

Mr. Cass addressed the Senate at length. He referred to a remark made yesterday by the Honorable Senator from Connecticut, (Mr. Niles,) and insisted that it was right for the President to seek information upon this, one of the most important questions which had ever been laid before Congress—one of the most extraordinary cases of humanity ever presented to the world. All the facts had been communicated so soon as they were obtained—there had been no delay on the part of the Executive—and now that they had all the information necessary, he hoped there would be prompt action.

There is a great question of public safety, he said, introduced in the question, based on the doctrine promulgated by Mr. Monroe, re-iterated by Mr. Polk in his message two years ago, and repeated in his present message. The Senator from Ohio foresew, two years ago, the existence of a state of things like the present, and urged consideration of a resolution on the subject, but without success. The foundation of the doctrine is, that we have interests and institutions of our own, opposed to those of European continent, which it is our duty to look after and protect—that we should cut loose entirely from European governments, leaving them to the full enjoyment of their institutions if they prefer them simply desiring that they will not interfere with the policy which we have deemed it necessary to adopt on this continent.

No one, he said, can doubt that the decree has gone forth, that the period is fast approaching, when the last foothold in European domination on this continent must be relinquished. Yet Yucatan is of vast importance to England, and it does not follow, because there may be an entire and fundamental change in the government of England, that England will not remain, that her people will not remain, and that her policy will not remain. She has now a chance to make an acquisition in the same manner all her colonies have been obtained, he believed, with the exception of Scotland. Would she hesitate, when her interest is to be promoted, and her character for humanity elevated? He understood that there were four companies of British troops now actually in the Southern province of Yucatan, thus indicating the intention of England in this matter. If we refuse now to come to the assistance of Yucatan, and England takes possession, we shall have no cause to complain. And when had England, after once obtaining possession of a country, relinquished it? She might do it in the case of Yucatan, but it would be the first time.

The consequences to the United States of allowing England to take possession, were pointed out—the immense power which it would give her, with her feet also planted in Cuba, and in the Bahamas, the control of the Gulf of Mexico would be lost to us. He had no belief that England would now attempt to obtain by force possession of Yucatan—in that he agreed with the Senator from South Carolina—but she might and probably would use the peaceable measures now in her power to obtain possession, unless we afforded the protection required. She would then possess the gate to the great artery which commands one-half our empire.

He then went into an examination of the facts connected with the present condition of Yucatan, and her relations to Mexico. He drew the conclusion form these, that Yucatan is an independent government—as entirely separate from Mexico as she is from China. But if this was otherwise, and we were at peace with Mexico, he would still interfere from motives of humanity. The terms of the armistice required that thins should remain as they were. No armistice would be construed to permit one party to overrun the country and require the other to sit by quietly without interference. It was our duty, under the armistice, even admitting Yucatan to be a part of Mexico, to interfere for her protection.

The argument which had been used for years on all questions of such a character—"the danger of involving the country in war"—had lost perhaps, by its frequent repetition, and its frequent refutation by the course of events, all its terrors. Notwithstanding frequent predictions to the contrary, our country yet remained, with the strongest government on the face of the earth.

At the conclusion of Mr. Cass’ speech, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The only subject of importance before the House to-day, was the bill for the admission of Wisconsin into the Union, which was again debated in committee of the Whole, reported to the House with sundry amendments, some of which were agreed to, when, without final action on the bill, the House adjourned.

REv45i3p3c3, May 12, 1848, Correspondence of the Enquirer. Washington, Thursday, May 11, 1848. U.S. Senate.

U. S. SENATE.
After the transaction of some business of no special importance, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the order of the day, viz: the bill to extend aid to the people of Yucatan.

Mr. Davis of Massachusetts being entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill. Mr. Miller has the floor on this subject for to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The bill providing for the admission of the territory of Wisconsin into the Union as a State, was taken up and passed.

On Mr. Vinton’s motion the House resolved itself into a committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, (Mr. Toombs, of Georgia, in the Chair.)

Mr. Rockwell, of Connecticut, addressed the committee, in continuation of a speech commenced some two months since, in which he undertook to expose what he characterized as gross blunders of the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. R. adduced vouchers to fortify his positions.

After farther discussion, in which several members participated, the committee rose, and the House soon after adjourned.

REv45i3p4c1, May 12, 1848, Congressional. U.S. Senate-April 12, 1848. California Claims.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in committee of the Whole, of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California claims.

Mr. MASON of Virginia.—The bill which is under consideration, although it has the very unassuming title of “a bill for ascertaining and paying the California claims,” will, I think, be found, on examination, to present matter of very deep interest to the character of our Republic, to the history which is to be written hereafter of the existing war with Mexico. It is my purpose, Mr. President, to confine the remarks which I offer to the Senate strictly to this bill, and to the matters necessarily connected with it, as they have been developed in the report of the committee on Military Affairs which accompanies the bill. Sir, we have been told by the public press, and somewhat taunted by the press on the other side of the Atlantic, with the charge that the United States of America exhibited to the world the spectacle of a republic waging a war against a sister republic, a war waged in her part as a war of aggression, waged in the lust of dominion for the purpose of conquest, and for the increase of her territory. The same language, I am sorry to say, has been hold on the floors of legislation; and if it were true it would form a dark page, and I humbly hope the only dark page so far in the unwritten history of our country. Sir, in relation to this war with Mexico, when the passions of the day have subsided, when reason and intellect shall take a fair and unbiased survey of it, of the causes that brought it on, and of its conduct on our part, I am satisfied that the character of the country will stand redeemed in the eyes of posterity.

Mr. President, an honorable Senator who sits on the opposite side of the chamber has declared that the war, so much condemned by his political associates as a war of aggression, was, in fact and in truth, a just, a necessary and an honorable war. I mean the honorable Senator from Maryland—a tribute which the Senator has beautifully paid to the position of an independent statesman, illustrating, as he has done, how difficult a task it is, on some occasions, to bring the broad duty of the patriot within the narrow limits of party obligations. Sir, Mexico began the war. This stands recorded as a fact on your statute book.—And although gentlemen may say that the vote they gave, was given under protest, the fact is nevertheless recorded as that which will present the material for history. If I am capable of arriving at truth in a matter passing before my own eyes and under my own observation, I, for one, could not hesitate to declare to the American people and to the world, not only that the war was a just and necessary war, but that it could not have been avoided without dishonor. It was commenced by Mexico in the invasion of one of the States of this confederacy, an invasion by the hostile forces of that country, made under the authorized declaration of the commander of its army, and of the chief executive officer of the government, that they had sufficient cause of war; that cause being the fact, that by an act of the American Congress we had entered into a compact with a sovereign and independent republic, which resulted in a change of the government of that republic.—I mean the republic of Texas. I do not desire to go at all into the details connected with the general history of the Mexican war, but I will say this, and might appeal to the world for its proof, that just and unavoidable in its inception, the whole conduct and management of the war has spread around our country and its institutions honor in every thing; not only in the unparalleled victories obtained by our arms, but in the dignity and the forbearance uniformly shown by this republic to deluded, infatuated Mexico. Every occasion was embraced to hold out to Mexico the right hand of fellowship. Concessions were made which, if to a country really formidable for her military power, might well have subjected our government to the charge of pusillanimity—concessions which she could afford to make, because conscious of her honor, strength and of the justice of the war, and conscious that Mexico was too weak to admit of such concession being misconstrued.

These California claims, Mr. President, become interesting, in my apprehension, not only because of the circumstances out of which they arose, which were strikingly exhibited on Monday last before the Senate by an honorable member form Missouri, [Mr. Benton] but because of the fact appearing form the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, that they involve expenditures unauthorized "by law, expenditures for military operations, which were conducted without the authority of this government. It becomes important then to the character of our country that these claims which we propose by this bill to recognize and pay, should be properly and distinctly understood, and their proper place assigned them in the legislative history of this country. If this be not done, future history may refer to them also in evidence of the general charge, that the war originating in a spirit of rapine and conquest, an insurrection was covertly fomented in the remote province of California, as part of the general scheme of extended dominion. The report from the committee on Military Affairs has made a very full exposition of this matter. The payment of these claims has been recommended to Congress by the Secretary of War in his annual report communicated to us at this session, to which I shall have occasion to advert. But they are brought immediately under the consideration of the Senate in the very unassuming form of a private memorial asking for their payment. It is the memorial of Lieutenant Colonel Fremont, who, at the time these liabilities and obligations were contracted, was an officer in the military service of the United States. The character of these claims, or rather the character of the military operations out of which they have arisen, is very clearly and succinctly stated in that memorial. It is asserted by Col. Fremont,

"That, in June of the year 1816, being then a brevet captain of topographical engineers in the service of the United States, and employed as such in California, he engaged in military operations with the people of the country for the establishment of the independence of California before the existence of war between the United States and Mexico was known, and was successful in said undertaking; the independence of California being proclaimed at Sonoma on the 5th day of July, and the Mexican forces routed and dispersed. That, immediately on hearing of the war between the United States and Mexico, the flag of independence was pulled down, and that of the United States ran up in its place, and under this flag military service was rendered to the United States until the conquest was complete, and supplies obtained from the people mostly on credit certificates given for them. That, after the conquest, a temporary government was formed; the expenses of which, like those incurred for military operations, are mostly yet unpaid, and should be paid by the United States, to whom all the benefits of the conquest of California has accrued."

Here, Sir, we find the fact distinctly avowed, that a part of these claims which we are called on to pay—and which I am free to admit, form the consideration which I have given to the subject, I feel the necessity and propriety of paying—were incurred in military operations accidentally commencing after war had broken out between the two countries, but before that fact was in any manner known at the scene of operations.

The circumstances attending this war in California I must be permitted to briefly allude to, as they are contained in the report of the committee. In my humble judgment the officer from whose memorial I have read, was fully justified in what he did. But it becomes us the more to ascertain its character, to give to the country the reasons for the judgment which we are about passing on the subject. An officer of the topographical corps of the United States who had been justly distinguished for his scientific explorations in California, and in the adjoining territory of Oregon for some two or three years preceding, found himself in California in the spring of 1846, with an armed party but still a civic one, there by permission of the authorities of California in a pursuit purely pacific for the advancement of general science. He was informed, or rather saw—from the extraordinary jealousy of character which seems to appertain to the whole Mexican people, that sort of suspicion which is incapable of comprehending any broad or elevated purpose of object in life—that his only hope to escape from actual military collision with the authorities of California was to abandon the country and to get beyond its jurisdiction, and this, although he had asked her hospitality, and that hospitality had been promised. And thus we are told, that in the spring of 1846, finding that such was the state of feeling around him with the authorities of California, he deemed it wise, in order to avoid collision, to abandon the country and to pass into the adjoining territory of Oregon.—He did so, and with him his whole party.

Although hostilities had not broken out between this government and Mexico, yet the aspect of affairs was so threatening as to render it expedient in the eyes of the President and of the public functionaries here to determine that no foreign power, especially that of Great Britain, should avail themselves of, or should seize the opportunity afforded by the weakness an the imbecility of Mexico, to posses herself of territory on this continent. Accordingly, an officer was dispatched to California for the purpose of conferring with our consul, who was the only public agent of this country then in California, and with Lieut. Colonel Fremont, if he should be found there, to concert with them such plans as in their judgment would be best calculated to frustrate any attempt on the part of any foreign government, should such attempt be meditated, to acquire dominion by colonization or otherwise, within the limits of Mexico or California. We are told, and I am satisfied of its truth, that it was for the purpose of carrying out this view of the government at Washington, that Lieut. Col. Fremont was induced to return to California after he had abandoned it. Sir, it is important, in my estimation, that the reason for this return should be distinctly known, in vindication of the conduct of the American government in the management of this affair. We have this in the report of the committee, distinctly stated by Col. Fremont himself, who has assumed the whole responsibility, and properly assumed it. He says that a gentleman, [who was an officer, as I understand, of the Marine Corps], brought him a letter of introduction from the Secretary of State, and also one from Col. Benton.

I quote the language of Col. Fremont, from his deposition before the Military Committee:

"He brought me a letter of introduction from the Secretary of State, Mr. Buchanan, and letters and papers form Senator Benton and his family. The letter from the Secretary was directed to my private or citizen capacity, and, although importing nothing beyond the introduction, accredited the bearer to me as coming from the Secretary of State, and, in connection with the circumstances and place of its delivery, indicated a purpose in sending it which was intelligibly explained to me by the accompanying letter from Senator Benton, and by communications from Lieut. Gillespie. This officer informed me that he had been directed by the Secretary of State to find me, and to acquaint me with his instructions, which had for their principal objects to Ascertain the disposition of the California people, to conciliate their feelings in favor of the United States, and to find out, with a design of counteracting, the designs of the British government upon that country."

That such were the instructions, is confirmed by the officer himself, [Mr. Gillespie.] I quote form his deposition before the committee:

"In answer to the first inquiry of the honorable committee, 'Were you charged with any verbal instructions or communications to Colonel Fremont from the government at Washington, or any officer? And if so, please state those instructions or communications, and from whom received?' I have to state, that I was directed by Mr. Buchanan to confer with Colonel Fremont, and to make known to him my own instructions, which, as I have previously stated, were, to watch over the interest of the United States, and counteract the influence of any foreign agents who might be in the country with objects prejudicial to the United States. It was also directed to show to Col. Fremont the duplicate of the dispatch to Mr. Larkin, consul at Monterey.

In answer to the second inquiry, "You have said that you communicated the wishes of the government to Colonel Fremont; state particularly what you did communicate to him as the wishes of the Government?"  I beg leave to state, that the answer above contains, as near as I can recollect, what I communicated to Col. Fremont, telling him, at the same time, that it was the wish of the Government that we should conciliate the feelings of the people of California, and encourage a friendship towards the United States."

Now, sir, it appears manifestly, from the testimony of both of these officers, that they carried with them into California no authority either from the Department of State, or from the Military Department of the Government, to wage any war for any purpose against the people of California, or against their Government; but, on the contrary, their mission was purely a peaceful one. They were instructed to conciliate and gain the good will, and attract the friendship of the people of California, in order as far as they might be able to do so, to frustrate the designs of the British emissaries, and to prevent them from getting possession of the country. That his was a wise policy on the part of the Government, I apprehend there can be no doubt. How was it then when that mission was in reality a peaceful one, that these gentlemen found themselves embarked in military operations soon after their arrival. The report of the committee on Military Affairs sheds abundant light upon this inquiry. The government of California stimulated doubtless, by foreign emissaries, whose presence was notorious, determined that no American should remain upon its soil. I am not familiar with the Spanish language, but I should apprehend as the Mexicans use it, the idea of "stranger" and "enemy" is expressed by the same word, as in ancient Rome. It is manifest from the whole history of the transactions attending our intercourse with Mexico, that to be a stranger there, was to be an enemy. — When these officers returned to California it will be seen, as is fully proved by the documents, that our countrymen who had gone into California and established themselves there, whether with the express permission of the authorities or not, I do not know, but certainly with their acquiescency—were about to suffer from a conspiracy which had been got up against them; measures had been taken to bring down upon them the Indian population and a war was about to commence which would involve not only the massacre of the Americans who were spread through the peaceful valleys of California, but would probably involve also the party which accompanied Lieut. Col. Fremont. In such an emergency these officers assumes a very high responsibility. I confess, sir, that I feel instinctively sensitive to the establishment of a precedent, which would sanction, in any degree, acts of war or acts leading to war, on the part of officers of this government within the limits of a foreign power. I have looked therefore at this matter closely, and I hope, considered it deliberately, and fully concur in the opinion that Col. Fremont and his party, whilst themselves blameless, were thus surrounded by circumstances which left them no alternative between a disgraceful and probably a most unsafe retreat, or uniting with his countrymen who were settled in California, and taking up arms in their own defence. — He assumed the responsibility of the latter course, and he carried it out, as he says, successfully, and thus it was that California was subdued, and the settlers saved from destruction, about the very time, that war broke out with Mexico, although the fact that is existed was then unknown in California.

Sir, my object in the remarks with which I am wearying the Senate is to disconnect the authorities at home from this outbreak in California, and to prove by testimony which cannot be controverted, that the government at home had no part in the insurrection, that the probability of such an occurrence was unknown to the government, and in truth, that it was no party to it either directly or indirectly. This fact is most distinctly stated, also, in this memorial form Lieut. Colonel Fremont, an extract from which I shall presently refer to.

So much for the commencement of the operations in California on land; now for those which commenced at sea. It appears from the documents which are to be found in the report, that Commodore Sloat, who commanded in the Pacific, at that time arrived at Monterey. It is stated by Lieut. Col. Fremont (after having given an account of his military operations thus far) as follows:

"While proceeding against Gen. Castro, authentic information was received that, on the 7th of July, Commodore Sloat had taken possession of Monterey, and hoisted the American flag; upon which the flag of independence was immediately hauled down, and that of the United States ran up; and under the flag of the United States all subsequent operations were carried on."

"I came down to Monterey with my command, upon the request of Commodore Sloat, to co-operate with him; and immediately on my arrival waited upon him, in company with Lieutenant Gillespie, on board the frigate Savannah. Commodore Sloat appeared uneasy at the great responsibility he had assumed. He informed me that he had applied to Lieutenant Gillespie, whom he knew to be an agent of the government, for his authority, but that he had declined to give it. He then inquired to know under what instructions I had acted in taking up arms against the Mexican authorities. I informed him that I had acted solely on my own responsibility, and without any authority from the government to justify hostilities. Com. Sloat appeared greatly disturbed with this information, and gave me distinctly to understand that in raising the flag at Monterey, he had acted upon the faith of our operations in the north. Commodore Sloat soon relinquished the command to Commodore Stockton, who determined to prosecute hostilities to the complete conquest of California.—He proposed that Lieut. Gillespie and myself should serve under him, with all the force we could get; which we agreed to, our men doing the same, as Com. Stockton so fully testified before the court martial; and from that time forward, all my operations were carried on under the orders of Com. Stockton, or by virtue of commissions bestowed by him. I was appointed by him major of the California battalion, afterwards military commandant of California, and afterwards governor and commander in chief in California; and under all these appointments expenses were incurred, which remain to be paid."

ON the 7th of July, then it appears that Commodore Sloat, commanding the marine, hoisted the flag of his country at Monterey, and took possession of that capital. It is manifest from this evidence that Lieut. Col. Fremont was accidentally thrown under the necessity of commencing these hostilities, and that neither he or Commodore Sloat, who came shortly after upon the coast, had any authority whatever from their government to wage war against California. Indeed, it appears Commodore Sloat, in raising the flag the United States at Monterey, did so under the impression that hostilities would not have been commenced on land unless under the authority of the government, or with a knowledge that war had commenced between the United States and Mexico. Now, sir, the Senate and the country may pass its separate judgment upon the acts of Lieut. Col. Fremont in commencing these hostilities. What I desire is to rescue the government of my country from the possible imputation, that it sought by indirectly stirring up insurrection in a remote province of a sister republic to provoke a war for the purpose of seizing and appropriating her territory. I am free to admit, so far as I can form an opinion from the facts, that this young officer was placed under circumstances in which he could not have acted otherwise than he did. He could not see his countrymen exposed to the merciless attack of the savages, their homes and their fields desolated and their women and children fleeing before the tomahawk and scalping knife; he could not have subjected his own men to the dangers which awaited them, without incurring a censure greater than any he could have incurred in taking up arms for their protection. No, sir, I have no censure for this officer for the path he bore in these military operations in California.

Then question, then, arises, does it devolve upon this government to pay these claims? Sir, I believe if not debito justitiae, still in justice and equity we ought to pay them—because these military operations, however unauthorized, were undertaken from necessity and for the protection of our own countrymen thus treacherously assailed, and because the fruits of the victories achieved enure to the United States when its army was sent there in prosecution of the war against Mexico. We must recognize them under this fact and none can complain. Claims that originate against the government under the sanction of law, always find laws providing for their liquidation. Claims that come before us without the sanction of law require special legislation to enable them to be paid. The Secretary of War has recommended the payment of these claims. In his annual report to Congress he says:

"The dispatch of Col. Mason, to which I have before alluded, refers the unsettled claims in that country against the United States, and recommends that immediate measures should be taken to ascertain the amount of such as are well founded, and that provision be made for immediate payment. These claims are principally for property of various descriptions furnished to, or taken by, our forces in the course of the military operations in that country. The delay to pay them has already produced much dissatisfaction, and is prejudicial to the interests of the United States. Some of the officers engaged in this distant service have become personally responsible for debts contracted for the use and in the service of the United States; it is also due to them that provision should be made for paying these debts."

How are they to be paid? The bill appropriates seven hundred thousand dollars, and, in my judgment, so large a sum to be expended in payment of claims which in their character are necessarily, to a great extent, indeterminate and loose, requires that every precaution should be taken to ensure justice as well to the government as to the claimants. It is proposed in the bill reported from the Military committee that they shall be ascertained and paid under the authority of a commission, to be created for that purpose. I agree entirely with the committee in their recommendations on this point. They are claims of peculiar character; many of them doubtless of small amount would be dependent on evidence that it would be difficult to collect—evidence which must be closely scanned and sifted, to separate such as are fair and just from the unfair and unjust. Such scrutiny cannot well be made by any other than a tribunal of judicial character. Claims which have arisen without the sanction of law should have the closer scrutiny of law, and I know of no better mode for their adjustment than to have a board that shall sit and adjudicate them. It is proposed, however, in the bill which has been reported to create this board, and to appoint by law the officers who are to constitute it, one by name and the others by description.

Mr. President, I apprehend, and I say it with great deference to the committee who have reported this bill, that to create the board in such a manner would be a violation of the constitution of the United States. The bill provides that "The President be, and he is authorized, to appoint a board consisting of John Charles Fremont, and two officers of said battalion while in service," &c.

The President shall be authorized to appoint Lt. Col. Fremont and two other officers who were in the service. Now, sir, we ought to look carefully into this matter. It is unbecoming, [I say it with all respect,] it is unbecoming I think in the Senate of the United States, or in either branch of the Legislature of this government to trench, in the slightest degree, on the powers which are assigned by the constitution to the Executive. It would be a dangerous precedent. The constitution, for wise purposes, has lodged the power of appointment with the President giving to the Senate only a negative on that power. Although the terms of the constitution are familiar to every Senator, I will ask leave to refer to them. It provides that the President

I have, sir, with the deference which becomes me, made these objections on the bill as it is reported from the committee, and I have made them with reluctance that I can express opinions different from those of a committee of this body, but it struck me at once, and the more I examined it the more I was confirmed in the opinion, that the appointing power does not reside here, that it would be trenching on the rights of the Executive, and violating the constitution, though not so intended, if we were to make these appointments by law. It becomes us, therefore, if we agree to the creation of any board, to do it in the usual form, and leave the power of appointment to the functionary in whom it has been reposed by the constitution. I know of no other mode of attaining this object than by a proposition to send the bill back to the committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to reform it in this respect. I have drawn the instructions, which I will read to the Senate.

The bill proposes that there shall be three commissioners, I have no particular opinion on this subject. I had thought that one commissioner would be enough, provided he would be associated in some manner with the military commander for the time being in California, but on further consideration it strikes me that it would be as well that there should be two—though the additional expense would be comparatively small—I think it unnecessary. I throw out this proposition of the consideration of the Senate, not being wedded to it in any form a to details, which the committee is more competent than I to determine; but I see no mode by which this object can be accomplished without a recommittal.

In what I have said, I have confined myself as I proposed to do, entirely to this bill. I am friendly to the purposes of this bill. I am in favor of paying these claims. But it is important that their character should be understood, so that at a future day, this government may not be implicated for having covertly, or for improper purposes incited the insurrection in California. I move the recommittal of the bill.[BWP]

REv45i3p4c6, May 12, 1848, Thunder Without Light.

Dean Swift tells us is certain philosophers who attempted to extract sun­beams from cucumbers. OH! That they had lived in our times!—General Taylor's last letters would have afforded them subjects equally good for experimentation. We are confident, however, that there are some such philosophers now, who will make the attempt; but, after peeling and slicing and peppering and vinegaring, they will be apt to put up the oath, "Fleas are not lobsters, d—n their souls," and conclude that, instead of sunbeams, there is nothing so cool as the centre­seed of a cucumber. If light can be extracted from these letters, we confess our optics are not keen enough to see it.
(Hear him, hear!) "I am a Whig—but not an ultra Whig." "I have great cardinal principles which will regulate my political life," "I am not sufficiently familiar with all the minute details of political legislation to give solemn pledges to exert me influence, if I were President, to carry out this or defeat that measure." What is the meaning of this or that measure? It is something like the exposition of now and then----it is all the time. Are you in favor of the Tariff of 1846? "I have great cardinal principles, but am not sufficiently familiar with all its minute details to carry out this measure." For the Bank? "I have principles, but that measure has a great many minute details, and I am not sufficiently familiar with them to defeat it." Will you recommend any thing? "I have great cardinal principles, "but crude impressions upon matters of policy, which may be right to­day and wrong to­morrow, are perhaps not the best test of fitness for office"—"I am not sufficiently familiar with the minute details"—"Excuse me, if you please."

But, General, we don't desire you to give us crude impressions,; we ask you a question—take your time—reflect—hunt up the authorities, bring your cardinal principles to bear, and then, in your own time, tell us your opinion upon this important matter, on which parties have so long divided. "Parties! I have a holy horror of parties"—"I am not sufficiently familiar with all the minute details," "to carry out this or that measure." Well, this is very brilliant! Are you in favor of or against the Alien and Sedition laws? "If you will give me the details," o;all" the details—all the Well, General, what do you think of the Veto power? ("Hear him—Hear.") "The power given by the Constitution to the Executive to interpose his veto, is a high conservative power; but, in my opinion, should never be exercised, except in cases of clear violation of the Constitution, or manifest haste and want of consideration by Congress. Indeed, I have thought, that for many years past, the known opinions and wishes of the Executive have exercised undue and injurious influence upon the legislative department of the government, and for this cause, I have thought our system was in danger of undergoing a great change for its true theory." Well, we would ask any candid reader to answer, what does he understand by this? It is plain that Congress is charged with having been improperly biased in their actions, contrary to the will of their constituents, by the Executive. If not contrary to the will of their constituents, they are but carrying out the great cardinal principle that the representative is bound by the will of his constituents. If contrary to it, is it not a direct chare that Congress are capable of being improperly influenced by the Executives, and have been so unduly influenced; and if so improperly influenced by him, why not by others, and by other causes, and for other reasons; and, if they are, what remedy has the Constitution provided? This very remedy of the Veto. But what says General Taylor in farther answer to the question? "The personal opinions of the individual who may occupy the Executive Chair, ought not to control the action of Congress upon questions of domestic policy." Then what becomes of the "high conservative power?" If his personal opinions ought not, whose opinions but his are recognized by the Constitution? The President is to return the bill with "his objections." But does the President control Congress by interposing his objections? It may as well be said, that every member of either House controls Congress by stating his objections to a bill! In the case of the members, the Constitution requires that a majority shall be necessary to pass a bill. If a member objects, it may yet be carried by a majority; but if it is not so carried, that member may as well be said to control Congress. The Constitution authorizes the President to make his objections, and, in such case, it requires that two thirds shall be necessary to pass the bill. If the President objects, it may yet be carried by two-thirds—if it is defeated, the President only controls by discharging his duty—a duty as much required of him as any other duty, and which, if, he fail to perform, having according to his personal opinion valid objections, he would be guilty of a manifest violation of his oath. The one third vote controls more than the President's objections.

"Nor," continues General Taylor, "ought his objections to be interposed, where questions of constitutional power have been settled by the various departments of government, and acquiesced in by the people."

Now, to test the soundness of this cardinal principle, we will suppose a case. A question has been fairly submitted to Congress as a party measure, believed by one party to be right and proper; by the other to be absolutely, clearly and unequivocally unconstitutional. It is passed as a party measure. A party President sanctions it. It has been carried before the Supreme Court, which decides it to be constitutional. The people—that is, a majority of the people—acquiesce in it for twenty years. All this time, the same party maintain the ascendancy. All this time the minority struggle against and denounce it. Finally, by the power of coonskins and gourds, and elder-barrels and brooms and log-cabins and songs, and all sorts of humbug, the minority become the majority, and gain the ascendancy. Congress is swept by the board. Different cardinal principles prevail—principles of "that same old coon." The measure hitherto acquiesced in is an odious one—the law is repealed. The President thinks the former law is wise and constitutional, has been sanctioned by all the departments of the government, and acquiesced in—and that, if the repeal takes effect, "our system is in danger of undergoing a great change from its true theory." What ought he to do?—Gen. Taylor answers: "Nor ought his objections to be interposed, when great questions of constitutional power have been settled by the various departments of government, and acquiesced in by the people!" "The personal opinions of the individual who may happen to occupy the Executive chair ought not to control the action of Congress upon questions of domestic policy." This is one of the great cardinal principles. If we happen once to have a President who is reckless of Constitutions, and he happens to "have exercised an undue and injurious influence upon the legislative department of government," and an odious measure has been saddled upon the people, and he, being a party President, shall happen to have appointed a majority of the Judiciary of his own way of thinking, and they, too, should have sanctioned his unconstitutional acts—a virtuous President and a Congress reflecting the will of a high-minded and virtuous constituency must be paralyzed forever by this 'cardinal principle!'

Permit me, General, your brother-in-law, to ask you one more question. I do not desire any "crude impressions." I am not able to give you in any thing short of a folio volume "all the minute details"—but you have "great cardinal principles" and you have been educated in "the Jeffersonian school," and you say you are "a Whig," and the Whigs, you know, particularly in the matter of cider barrels and "that same old coon," generally plumb the track. Tell me, I pray you, what are your opinions on the Tariff, the currency, the improvement of our great highways, rivers, lakes, and harbors? Now, when the General read this letter, he happened to be at breakfast and he happened to be eating fried bacon and eggs and sipping a cup of coffee, and the castors were near his plate. He said to himself, in a whisper, "Tariff," then he put his finger on his manly nose and looked sagely. "Currency"—he took the mustard out of the cruet and poured it into his coffee—"Tariff, Harbors"—he took up the cream and poured it over his eggs. The General—looking at the letter as Macbeth did, when he said "Is that a dagger that I see before me?"—sipped his coffee—"Rivers"—"Lakes"—"Harbors." "Bring me some water!" and he spat upon the floor and wiped his tongue with a napkin. And, then, hitting upon a happy expedient, he answered:--("Hear him, hear.") "Upon the subject of the tariff, the currency, the improvement of our great highways, rivers, lakes, and harbors, the will of the people, as expressed through their representatives in Congress, ought to be respected and carried out by the Executive." What a brilliant display of light!
These two little words have been recently invested with a cabalistic meaning, and, from the arguments of the Whigs,...

Now, General, remember—it is not one of the “insinwating Young gentlemen,” who is asking you questions now—but your own brother-in-law. Tell me—no, not me—"the people"—what are your opinions about the Mexican war? Mr. Clay, you know, General, when he went to New Orleans, was very desirous to have it in his power to kill a Mexican with his own hand. But, then, you remember his Lexington platform—"a change came over the spirit of his dream"—he thought the whole concern unholy, unjust, iniquitous and vile. Now, we all know the laurels you have won, and what you have done to sustain your country’s rights and fame and honor and glory. But what do you think of the Mexican War? The General was in his element upon this subject—he had studied it—he had corresponded with the general officers of the enemy—he had corresponded with his own government—he had recommended measures—his impressions were not crude—he was not required to make any pledges. He neither looked a the ceiling, nor on the floor—he scratched not his head nor pulled at his lips or nose—but he ate his breakfast in peace and feeling kind towards all mankind and thankful to kind Heaven for all its blessings, he answered as follows—not in regard to the Mexican War, but the subject of war in general: "I sincerely rejoice at the prospect of peace." And so do we. We only wish the prospect were better. "My life has been devoted to arms, yet I look upon war at all times and under all circumstances as a national calamity, to be avoided if compatible with national honor." Well, but, General, we desire you know if you think the Mexican war could have been avoided compatibly with national honor. All Christian people believe war is a national calamity, but God, for wise purposes, ordains that there should be wars, and He has punished nations in times past for not waging wars as they were required. But we ask you, was this war compatible with national honor? Congress declared that the war was commenced "by the act of Mexico," and "the will of the people as expressed through their representatives in Congress ought to be respected and carried out by the Executive." If so, had you been President and Congress had appropriated millions to raise troops and carry on the war, would you have contented yourself with permitting the enemy to overrun your country and harass your own inhabitants, or would you have carried the war into the Enemy’s country? (Hear him.) "The principles of our government, as well as its true policy, are opposed to the subjugation of other nations, and the dismemberment of other countries by conquest." Why, then, did you, General, after you had driven the Mexicans across the Rio Grande, pass that river and take the town of Matamoras? In the language of the great Washington, "why should we quit our own to stand on foreign ground?" It is true that we ought not to undertake the dismemberment of other countries by conquest, for the sake of conquest alone and without cause; but when assailed by them, the principle of self-defence, the principle of preserving the peace of the world, the principle of justice and right, justifies and authorizes you to cripple them in every open and honorable mode; and if necessary to compel a peace and prevent the repetition of unjustifiable assaults, you have the right to conquer and deprive them of territory, to weaken and render them unable to assail you or disturb the peace in future. If a nation commences the war with you, and after your national honor has been vindicated by overwhelming and overrunning her territory, suppose you dictate terms of peace that are forbearing and magnanimous to a fallen foe, and she should refuse to make peace and persist in destroying your troops, whenever found in an unprotected situation, by her guerilla bands, what would you do then, General?—My dear Sir, have I not told you that "I look upon war at all times, and under all circumstances, as a national calamity, to be avoided, if compatible with national honor?" But here the General lowered his voice, and, in a stage-whisper, said to himself, "then I would mount Old Whitey once more, and give them Buena Vista; and, I tell you more, I would conquer the whole territory, and utterly prostrate them for future mischief." Believing that the old General, or any other General would do this, we say, his answer amounts to nothing, and affords no light whatever.

REv45i3p4c7, May 12, 1848, Senator Mason’s Speech.

We ask attention to the very strong and sensible views of Mr. Mason’s speech on the California bill, which we extract from Houston’s official report. It gives a clear and conclusive explanation of certain points, which partisan presses have attempted to torture into grievous offenses on the part of the Administration. We thoroughly respond to Mr. Mason’s view of the constitutional power of the Executive to appoint the commissioners under the bill.

REv45i4p1c2, May 16, 1848, “My Friends.”

These two little words have been recently invested with a cabalistic meaning, and, from the arguments of the Whigs, it would seem that upon their true signification mainly depends the result of the next Presidential election, and the fall or triumph of Federalism.

The Times mingles in the fray, and construes that "intangible conglomeration" ("my friends") to mean such men as Crittenden, Bell, &c., "the very pillars of the Whig party," who will themselves be governed by the decision of the National convention, and whose support of another candidate than Gen. Taylor would be a sufficient manifestation to the old soldier of their wish that he should withdraw—and he would do so accordingly.

We shall not re-argue so clear a point—but in the Mobile Advertiser we find an extract from the Whig, commenting upon the independent Maryland State Taylor Convention. The Whig says:

"If, indeed, General Taylor shall consent to run as a third candidate, he will be very apt to discover that a comparatively very small portion of the "people" will adopt him as their candidate. And HIS FRIENDS, who are mainly, if not altogether, Whigs, who seek to place him in that attitude, will do him great injustice thereby, as well as inflict a fatal wound upon the Whig party.—They could adopt, indeed, no more effectual means of ensuring the triumph of the Democratic nominee, and, for all practical purposes, they might as well cast their own votes for that nominee as for Gen. Taylor as an independent candidate."

Does not this clearly indicate who are "me friends" referred to? It is not the delegates to the Whig Convention to whom he points, but, as the Lynchburg Virginian, (Whig,) in another conclusive article, contends, to "those friends who, in various parts of the country, by their "solicitations, induced him to become a candidate, and nearly all of whom, in the first instance, reprobated a National Convention, and many of whom even now reprote it, and have refused to be represented therein." But perfectly clear as the meaning of Gen. Taylor is, the construction which the Whig and Times place upon it, would place the old soldier in a very discreditable position of arrant contradiction—it would make him (we again quote the Lynchburg Virginia) "falsify the explicit assertion which he had made but two days before, that he would be a candidate, let who might be the nominee." The Lynchburg Virginia goes on to show that it "would be hazardous for the Taylor delegates to act upon the theory of the Whig" and withdraw Gen. Taylor from the field, upon their own responsibility, without authority from him—nay, in direct opposition to his plain language. On the whole, the Lynchburg Virginia concluded that the "premature" letter to Mr. Baldwin, or Gallaher, has "raised an impassable barrier between him (Gen. T.) and the Whig nomination."

REv45i4p1c2, May 16, 1848, No title.

The Clay Whigs of Virginia, enlightened by the late Taylor defeat, are beginning to peak out for "Old Harry."

The following resolutions were adopted by a Whig meeting in Fauquier:

"That this meeting is fairly persuaded that HENRY CLAY, and not General TAYLOR, is the choice of the Whigs of Fauquier county and of Virginia, and the most available candidate for the Presidency.

"That it is the duty of the Whigs of Virginia, if misrepresented by the late State Convention, to correct the error of their delegates; and we earnestly recommend to our Whig brethren throughout the State to meet in their primary assemblies, and declare their sentiments in regard to the candidate for the Presidency, to the end that the Old Dominion may assume her true attitude in the National Convention."

The Whigs of Jefferson are about to make a similar movement, as will be seen from the following card in the Jefferson papers:

"WHIG MEETING.

"The Whigs of Jefferson, who do not consider the principles of their party to be 'obsolete,' and are favorable to a fair presentation of the name of Mr. CLAY to the National Convention, are requested to meet at the Court House in Charlestown, at 2 o'clock, P. M., on Monday, the 15th instant, (Court day.) Deeming the occasion important, every true friend of Whig principles in the county is earnestly invited to be present.

REv45i4p1c3, May 16, 1848, Another Letter From General Taylor.

The Baltimore American of Saturday last publishes the following letter from Gen. Taylor, addressed to Brantz Mayer, Esq., (one of the Secretaries) acknowledging a copy of the proceedings of a meeting held in Baltimore some time since:
Dear Sir: I have by this day’s mail received a copy [duplicate] of your letter of March 21, with an enclosed copy of the proceedings of a meeting held by the citizens of Baltimore who are friendly to my election to the Presidency.

The political sentiments embraced in the preamble and resolutions adopted at that meeting, I rejoice to say, meet with my cordial approval and assent. No movements in any part of the country, having the object to offer testimonials of honor and respect towards myself, or to advocate my election to the Presidency, have caused in me more lively pleasure, or demand more my gratitude.

You will please do me the favor to make known my acknowledgements to the citizens of Baltimore for the unexpected and unmerited honors they have conferred upon me, in such manner and terms as you may deem most proper.

They are obligations which, should the votes of the country be cast in my favor, it will most surely be my endeavor to redeem to themselves and to all the people of our country.

I must be permitted to add, that, as they have, with so much confidence placed my name in nomination before the country on their own responsibility, free from party action and the exaction of pledges from myself, I shall serve them strictly as a constitutional and not as a party President (in the event already alluded to)—and as my ability will permit.

Please accept my thanks for the kind sentiments you have, in forwarding the proceedings of the meeting, been pleased to express to me.

With sentiments of cordial respect and regard, your most obedient servant,

Z. TAYLOR.

[To] Brantz Mayer, Esq., Secretary of Public Meeting in Baltimore.

We are unable at present to furnish our readers with the "preamble and resolutions" referred to by Gen. Taylor, but we shall endeavor to procure them without delay.

REv45i4p1c3, May 16, 1848, Mr. Clay’s Last—Illustrated.

The Buena Vista, a new Whig paper started in Boston, to aid Gen. Taylor to the Presidency, says:--We find on our table a copy of Mr. Clay’s late letter, illustrated by Straightshank, which we take pleasure in recommending to our friends in the Whig party, who are "dyed in wool." We give an imperfect description of some of the illustrations, from which our friends can, perhaps, judge of the merits of the work, which may be obtained at wholesale and retail from the Whig Central committee.

Plate No. 1 represents Mr. Clay at the moment of his departure from Ashland, for the Supreme Court, to consul his friends upon the propriety of his being a candidate for the Presidency, and his prospects for the nomination. This plate, by an ingenious arrangement, shows the contents of Mr. Clay’s green bag, which consists of his intended speech in the Supreme Court, No.—(a case which will probably be reached in about two years,) ploitalacal statistics, &c. Among the statistics, the vote of New York and Pennsylvania (two free States,) at the last Presidential election, have a prominent position.

Plate No. 2, represents John Minor Botts, Esq., urging upon Mr. Clay the necessity of allowing his name to go before the National Convention, if he wishes to save him (Mr. Botts) from political annihilation. Mr. Botts seems to be endeavoring to convince Mr. Clay that, although the Whigs of Virginia have declared their preference for the hero of Buena Vista, they do not know their own minds, and infinitely prefer Mr. Clay.

Plate No. 3, represents Mr. Clay in the act of saving the Whig party from being drowned in the waves of Gen. Taylor’s popularity. The party are about going down for the second time only, and one would naturally suppose it would rise to the surface without assistance; but it shows such evident marks of suffering from the descent in 1844, that the reader will see, at a glance, that this time is the last.

There are many other plates, showing the rush of "voters of native and foreign birth" for Clay ballots, Mr. Clay shaking hands with, and forgiving such of his old friends as have "patriotically and honestly" declared their preference for others, &c., &c. Our notice of the work has already reached a greater length than we at first intended, and we will conclude by recommending it to the party organizers.

BWP
This war is denounced as the President’s war. It is in this form that party vituperation is dealt out by every anti-war partisan, from the orator who enchains the attention of the Senate, down to the smallest politician who lounges and gossips in a village bar-room. The deprecat (sic) ingenuity of a sinking faction seems almost to have exhausted the sources of attack upon the war, in the single complaint that it is the President’s war. It would be a proud distinction for any man to be able to call this his war. It was worth any man’s ambition to connect his name with the accumulated glories and enduring national advantages of our achievements in this war,—achievements which concurring accounts from all quarters of the civilized world, represent as having carried the American character to a pitch which it had never before attained. The friends of the President will feel no anxiety to rescue him from such a charge. If his opponents will fasten it upon him, he will, no doubt, endure the infliction with commendable cheerfulness. But it is with the design of identifying him with its achievements, that it is denounced as the President’s war. For the purpose of throwing odium upon the war and its supporters, it is represented as having its origin in an infraction of the constitution. Thus expounded, the charge that this is the President’s war, merits the serious consideration of every American freeman.

The order for the march to the Rio Grande is denounced as an infringement of the power of Congress to declare war. It was not unconstitutional to order the army of Corpus Christi, although our title that far was strenuously disputed by Mexico, because she did not resist its execution by force. But to order the army to the Rio Grande, upon territory not more strenuously disputed by Mexico than that from which it had removed, became clearly unconstitutional because Mexico had determined to resist its execution by force! To incur that forcible resistance was to violate the constitution, by taking the war-making power into the hands of the Executive. This argument makes the duty of our Executive to depend, not upon the requirements of our own laws, but upon the determinations of foreign government—not upon the settled terms of our own constitution, but, as in this case, upon the whims and caprices of some burlesque foregiving government. The government of Mexico is to dictate to our President the extent and the limit of his constitutional powers. The authority of the President over our army is to depend upon the determination of Mexico to summits quietly or forcibly to resist the execution of his orders! There is no action of any department of our government which some foreign government may not choose to regard as a cause of war. And if the determination of some foreign nation to make any anticipated action on the Executive or Judiciary a cause of war, is to deprive those departments of all power to act, then we have a government controlled not be ourselves, but by foreign nations. Let us for a moment recall McLeod’s case, which occurred but a few years ago.

The determination of the British Government to make the conviction of McLeod a cause of war was well known. Could the simple annunciation of such a determination deprive the Court of Jurisdiction in that case? Would the jury, who sat in it, by returning a verdict of conviction in the face of such an annunciation, have violated the Constitution, and interfered with the power of Congress over the War subject? Or, if after sentence had been pronounced, England had marched her forces to the Northern frontier, and announced to the officers of the court that the moment that McLeod was swung from the gallows, her army would cross the line and lay waste the American frontier, would the officer, executing the sentence, be usurping the war-making power? Could not such a war be called the hangman’s war, with as much propriety as this is styled the President’s war? Illustrations of this view spring up at every instant. British subjects were deeply interested in the United States Bank, and anticipated serious injury from a refusal to re-charter that institution. We may, for the sake of argument, suppose that the British Government had assumed an attribute of menace, and declared that she would regard such refusal as cause of war. Suppose that the British Minister, after the bill had passed both Houses of Congress, had announced to Old Hickory that if he voted that bill his mission was at an end, as his Government had determined to resist it forcibly; would the veto, in such circumstances, have been a usurpation of the war-making power? If this argument be correct, the country has been permitted to slumber over a violation of the Constitution that has been perpetrated during this very Texas negotiation.

In November, 1843, Gen. Almonte, the Mexican Minister, by express order of his Government, announced to the Executive, that “on sanction being given by the Executive of the Union to the incorporation of Texas into the United States, he will consider his mission ended, seeing that, as the Secretary of State will have learned, the Mexican Government is resolved to declare war as soon as it receives information of such an act.” Regardless of this threat, Mr. Tyler did give his sanction to the incorporation of Texas, and had a treaty negotiated for that purpose. Did he thus violate the Constitution, and usurp the war-making power? Can a simple threat of a foreign government deprive a department of this government of its constitutional vitality? Mr. Madison has stated the duty of the Executive in such circumstances so correctly and so aptly, that we venture to quote his words: “It (the Executive) is bound to the faithful execution of these, as of all other laws, internal and external, by the nature of its trust and the sanction of its oaths, even if turbulent citizens should consider its so doing a cause of war at home, or unfriendly nations should consider its so doing as a cause of war abroad.”—[2d letter of Helvidius.]

The only proper inquiry then recurs—Was it the duty of the President to order the army to the Rio Grande?—was it his duty to put them in a position to protect from invasion the territory lying between the Nueces and the Rio Grande? If the above reasoning be correct, his constitutional powers are the same, whether he was or was not to incur the forcible resistance of the Mexicans.

We think it clear, that, in ordering the march to the Rio Grande, the President acted within the line of strict duty. We do not mean in this connection to argue the question of title. That was not a question for the President. God forbid that a President of the United States should ever be empowered to determine the boundaries of a sovereign State of this Union, and to extend the protection against invasion guaranteed in the Constitution only to such portions of the territory of a State as his judgment or his will might select! The Constitution of the United States makes it obligatory upon the Federal Government, and each department of that government within its sphere of action, to protect each State from invasion. The power to define the boundaries of a State is one of the highest attributes of sovereignty.
This power is nowhere in the Constitution delegated to the General Government, and is consequently reserved. There is something startling in the very enunciation of the adverse proposition—power in the General Government formally to cede, or informally to yield to a foreign nation, a portion of the territory of the State of this Union! We will not stop to refute it until we find some one bold enough to advocate it in open daylight.

As the Federal Government would otherwise have no power over this subject, the following clause was inserted in the . . . [illegible]. . . foregoing consent of Congress is given upon the following conditions, and with the following guarantees: First—the said State to be formed subject to the adjustment by this Government of all questions of boundary that may arise with other governments.” This clause gave to the General Government, and to the treaty-making department of that Government, so much power over the boundaries of Texas as might be necessary for the adjustment of questions of boundary that may arise with other governments. It is an exception out of the general power over the subject, subject to this exception. Texas had the same power to define her boundaries that any other State had. Her power was limited only by the power to be exercised by the General Government in adjusting questions of boundary that may arise with other governments. Except in the contingency of having such questions to adjust, the General Government had no more power to define the boundaries of Texas than to define those of Virginia.

Now, had any question about the boundary of Texas, arisen with the government of Mexico at the time the troops were ordered to the Rio Grande? On the contrary, Mexico had indignantly repelled the repeated attempts of our government to induce her to discuss such a question. She never condescended to it. Her domineering and ridiculous pride could never be brought to regard Texas but as a rebellious province—the whole of it was hers, and she would not for a moment admit a question as to what part she should yield.—She had broken up all diplomatic relations with our government, and when in her outrageous treatment of Mr. Slidell, she closed the door upon the amicable discussion and adjustment of all questions, she removed every pretext of authority over the boundaries of Texas in the Federal government, and the power reverted back to Texas as completely as if that proviso had not been introduced into the annexation resolutions. No question of boundary had arisen—there was no longer the remotest probability that any such question would arise. The Mexican people had indignantly spurned the proposition to listen to such a question and had overturned the government of Herrera for evincing a disposition to tolerate it. The contingency, then, not having occurred, in which the Federal Government was to have power over the boundary question, Texas was exclusively competent to determine her own boundaries.

It is unnecessary to detain the reader by explaining at length what was the determination of Texas upon this subject. She claimed, bona fide, the Rio Grande as her boundary. Mr. Pilsbury, one of her representatives in Congress, declared, last Winter, that she never would have submitted to the reservation in the annexation resolutions, but for her abiding confidence in the justice of the American Government. To maintain that boundary was with the people of Texas a matter of pride and feeling, as well as of right, and to have surrendered it would have wrung with anguish the gallant hearts of many of those men who have toiled and suffered in the cause of Texan independence. It would have been well calculated to check the impulse of affection and gratitude towards the American Government, for us to have taken from Texas a territory which a course of hardy adventure had made familiar to many of her citizens, and give it back to Mexico, in whose estimation it had become so polluted, that every one living upon it was a traitor, and deserved a traitor’s doom. The very last Congress that assembled in the Republic of Texas were disposed to take measures to secure the undisputed possession of the Rio Grande, but appear to have relinquished that design at the instance of the American Minister. Major Donelson, in his dispatch dated “Washington, Texas, July 2d, 1845,” says:

“It seemed to me wiser to look for some advantage from the assailing movement threatened by Mexico, than to risk the passage of such a law as Congress were disposed to pass over the veto of the President, putting the Texan force under the command of the Major General, the effect of which would have been the immediate expulsion of all Mexican soldiers found on the East bank of the Rio Grande.”

Under the date of July 11th, 1845, he says: “The Congress of Texas, which has recently adjourned, would have passed a resolution with as much unanimity as they did the acceptance of our joint resolution, affirming the claim to the Rio Grande; and so it is probable would Convention now sitting, if they had deemed it expedient in this manner to manifest their disapprobation of the treaty proposed by President Jones, or to oppose the inference which might be drawn from his proclamation, that Texas admitted the right of Mexico to keep an armed force this side of the Rio Grande.”

The Texan Secretary of State also requested that our forces should at once be marched to the Rio Grande. In the face of these pretensions, our Minister, sent specially to Texas to plijt the public faith on all subjects connected with annexation, gave them a pledge that their claim should be bona fide maintained. In his dispatch of July 11th, 1845, Major Donelson says: “But while from such views I encouraged no aggressive movement on the part of Texas to take forcible possession of the Rio Grande, I have nevertheless omitted no opportunity of satisfying all parties here, that the United States would, in good faith, maintain the claim, and I had every reason to believe they would do so successfully.”

When the Mexican Government had indignantly closed the door upon negotiation and was marching her invading armies into territory claimed by a sovereign State of this Union, what option had the Federal Government or any or its departments upon the subject? None—none whatever! When Texas appealed to the government for the protection against invasion guaranteed by the Constitution, where was the authority to refuse it? When she pointed to the Mexican hosts, marshaled in hostile array upon her borders, who authorized the President of the United States to stay to enter into a technical quibbling discussion about the extent of her title? The contingency in which, under the annexation resolutions, the Federal Government or any of its departments was to have authority over the subject was gone—Mexico had raised no question of boundary—our government had none to adjust with her. Texas, then, possessed the power to define her own boundaries as substantially and exclusively was the State of Virginia. But, according to Whig doctrine, we should have closed our ears to the voice of Texas, while we listened only to the decision of Mexico.—The President should have shrunk from any farther dispute with Mexico in arms, and conducted it with Texas, who had just been disarmed by compact with us! Having failed to satisfy Mexico that her claim to this territory was unjust, he must hasten in alarm from the roar of the Mexican guns to convince Texas that her title has no foundation!

Having presented our own argument upon this subject, it is due to candor to say that the Whig view is sustained by the authorities of a celebrated commentator on the laws of England,. In Dogberry’s opinion of the power of the constable to stay the Prince if he met him in the night, we find the very distinction which is taken by the Whigs in prescribing the constitutional power of the Executive to keep the Mexican army from Texan soil: “Five shillings to one on ’t, with any man that knows the statutes, he may stay him; marry, not without the Prince be willing; for indeed the watch ought to offend no man, and it is a great offence to stay a man against his will.”

MARCUS.

REv45i4p1c5, May 16, 1848, Correspondence of the Baltimore Sun. Washington, May 8,1848.

There is a very strong party here in favor of the new Indian King of the Yucatecos and his cannibal subjects. The color of their skin especially entitles them, in the eyes of some of our philanthropists, to our sympathy, in any contest with the white race. It is now contended, and even by Senators, that the barbarian Indians have a better right to the peninsula of Yucatan than the descendants of their Spanish conquerors.—They also claim for the Indians a civil right, to establish a government as they please, and to cut the throats of all the whites and of the mixed race, on the principle that the majority ought to rule.

It is claimed that the Indians are citizens, and have a civil right to assume the government and to destroy their opponents. It is pretended, too, that they are advanced in civilization. As a proof of their philanthropy, it is well known that they are man-eaters. They are actually cannibals. They killed and ate several American sailors, who had landed for the purpose of obtaining water in 1813-1814. Another proof of their civilization and refinement is that they spare no age nor sex—that they subject women to the utmost brutality of treatment, and that, after prolonged tortures, they murder all the women and children who fall into their hands.

If these atrocities fill us with horror, the justification of them excites our disgust.

There is no truth in the assertion that the Indians now devastation Yucatan form any part of the government, or have anything more to do with it than the Camanches have with that of Mexico. There were some civilized Indians in the towns. The government had taken great pains to educated and civilize the Indians, but the . . . [illegible]. . . . The insurgents are not the civilized Indians—they are the wild savages, who are even more cruel and relentless towards the half Indian race than towards the whites.

The number of the savages in the Peninsula is 450,000; of the whites, 130,000; and of the half blood and mixed race, 80,000. Those Indians who are committing such horrible excesses, and who threaten to destroy and blot out of existence a people who for three hundred years have held the country, and now hold it with as good a title as the people of Maryland hold their territory, are not the Indians of the old race of the Montezumas, whom Cortez found in Mexico.—Those Indians were far advanced in civilization; and the Indians of Yucatan have not a trace or vestige of that civilization.

The Indians were oppressed, no doubt, by the old Spanish conquerors and by the old Spanish government down to the time of the revolution of 1821; but since that time, the Spanish American States, and especially in Yucatan, have endeavored to improve and elevate the condition of the natives, though without any success. The Indians have no grievances to complain of. They rose and fell upon the Spanish settlements because they knew that they were defenceless—being destitute of arms and provisions, and munitions of war, and of money to buy them—while the Indians were supplied with arms from the great British contraband establishment at the Belize.

There is no longer any hope that Congress will give the President troops in time to enable him to afford any efficient aid to the suffering people of Yucatan. Even should they do it at all, all that can be done must be done by the President, and that is to afford relief as soon as he possibly can, through the naval force of the United States.

[By Express and Telegraph to Baltimore Sun]
The daily pony express for the Sun has arrived, bringing New Orleans papers of the 6th inst., three days in advance of the mail.

The schooner Eleanor arrived at New Orleans on the 5th inst., from Balize, from whence she sailed on the 20th ult.

The Indians continue their depredations on the panic stricken inhabitants of Yucatan. They have destroyed the town of Vacola by fire.

The men, to the number of five hundred, retired for the forts, and the women and children had to take care of themselves, and without money, food, or clothing, . . . [illegible]. . . Balize were also threatened with an attack, and were preparing, with more than ordinary vigor, to meet it.

From the New Orleans Picayune, Extra, May 8.

The U.S. steamship New Orleans, Capt. Edward Auld, arrived on Sunday evening from Vera Cruz, having sailed thence on Wednesday, the 3d inst. The ship made capital passages both going and coming.

Gen. Scott and suite left the city of Mexico on the 22d ult., and arrived at Vera Cruz on Sunday, the 30th. He immediately embarked on the brig St. Petersburg for New York, under a salute from Fort Conception. He was waited upon by the commander of the fleet, and received a salute from the flag ship Cumberland. On Monday, the 1st inst., the St. Petersburg was towed to sea by the propeller Thompson. In passing the store-ship Relief and frigate Cumberland, their rigging was manned and three sheers given the old hero. On the 3d inst., the General exchanged visits with Com. Perry and was saluted by the flag-ship Cumberland.

Gen. Scott said, in substance—"I go ashore at the Narrows below New York, and proceed without entering that city, to my family in Elizabethtown. Laboring under the public displeasure of the Executive, it would be highly improper in me, a soldier, to put myself in the way of provoking shouts and cheers from my warm hearted countrymen."

A quorum has not yet been formed at Queretaro. Pena y pena has however determined to settle matters with as many as may meet, provided the American Congress will accept such a ratification. Parades remains quiet.

The vomito has broken out in Vera Cruz; in the city 30 cases per week. The Commissioners leave for Queretaro 29th April.

Among the passengers on the New Orleans, a list of whom will be found below, were Gen. Pillow and staff, Gen. Towson, Gen. Cushing and staff, Co. Belknap, Col. Childs, Col. Duncan, Col. Withers, and a large number of officers.

So desperate at one time was thought the chance of bringing together a quorum of Congress, that the President had determined to exclude the States of New Mexico, Chihuahua and Yucatan in estimating the representation, so that a smaller number may constitute a quorum. Subsequent events led him to believe that a quorum could be obtained, and the President reconsidered his determination. The letters of our correspondent are to the latest date; we annex them. [below, as "Special Correspondence fo the Picayune"]

In my last letter I stated that Col. Withers, of the 9th Infantry, had gone home on leave. I have learned since that he has tendered his resignation.

The letter of your Queretaro correspondent, of the 23d inst., which I send you, is full of interest, and some of his information is important. The extracts from the message of Rosa to the members of Congress now at Queretaro, show that Pen y Pena, fully realizes the dangerous position of the nationality of the country, should the treaty not be ratified in season—and also shows an energetic determination to spare no effort to bring about peace. The passage in the conclusion of the message quoted by your correspondent, in which Rosa says—'and in order not to incur the terrible responsibility of losing the nationality of the country, the Executive will dictate extraordinary measures, which he never would have adopted if circumstances were not so very difficult and dangerous'—I presume refers to the intention of the President to decree that, in consequence of the condition of Yucatan, and other States, arising from the war, a certain number (less than the constitutional quorum) shall form a quorum. It is probable he will have to resort to this measure, as it is understood here that several Congressmen, who are not willing to oppose though treaty by a direct vote, intend to defeat it by breaking the quorum, whenever the question is put.

The paragraph in the letter relative to the sermon of the Padre Sanchez is at this moment very important. It was supposed, that in consequence of the amendments made by the Senate of the U. States to the clauses of the treaty relating to the recognition of the Mexican church, in the territory proposed to be ceded to us, that the clergy would oppose the ratification of the treaty, or at least require that the clause be reinserted. Not so, however. Your correspondent is right in representing the Padre Sanchez as the organ of the clergy, and a great majority of them favor the ratification of the treaty as it stands. The clergy of this city, fearing the inability of Pena y Pena to raise the forced loan of $150,000 to $200,000 in Queretaro, for the purpose of assembling Congress and supporting the Government, (which, when translated, means for the purpose of bribing the refractory Congressmen,) held meetings in the Cathedral to-day and yesterday, over which the bishop presided, for the propose of discussing the propriety or expediency of advancing the sum required by Pena y Pena, and to-day they resolved upon loaning the money from the funds of the church. I understand the whole sum will be sent to Queretaro to-morrow. These facts, to my mind, settle the question as to whether the treaty will be ratified or not, in the affirmative.

The individual referred to as having been baptized with so much pomp at Queretaro, and who had the honor of having Pena y Pena stand at the baptismal font as his godfather, is, without a doubt, the Lieut. O'Sullivan I have already spoken of as having resigned his commission in the 3d Infantry and gone to Queretaro to join the enemy. He is not a legal deserter, but all the dishonor of moral guilt will ever attach itself to his name.

The Commissioners will not leave for Queretaro until the 29th or 30th inst. In the meantime, the troops which are to form the escort are being inspected daily; and are being prepared to present a fine appearance, in point of clothing and equipments.

A few officers from the train from Orizaba, under command of Capt. Howe, came in advance to-day, and the train is expected to arrive to-morrow or the day after.

It is reported in town to-day that there is a quorum of Congress at Queretaro, but I cannot trace it to an authentic source.

QUERETARO, April 23, 1848. The Secretary of the treasury expresses himself as follows in relation to the forced loan of $150,000 to $200,000, which will be employed exclusively by the Government to pay the necessary expenses in assembling the General Congress, and for its support in this city for tow months:

"You will perceive, according to the last advices published in the papers of the capital, how short a time there remains for us to ratify the treaty of peace, celebrated between our Republic and the United States of America. In order that that treaty should be exchanged at Washington on the 2d of June, it is indispensable that it should be ratified at the latest, on the 15th of May next, and I doubt if it can be done if Congress does not get together immediately. A multitude of unfortunate circumstances have prevented, until now, a reunion of Congress, and the principal one has been the want of money, to give the Senators and Deputies for their necessary wants in this capital. Government has made the greatest efforts to realize this sum, but without success, and having expended all its resources, his Excellency, the President, had, in order to facilitate the meeting of Congress, resolved that all the capitalists, and persons of easy circumstances in this city shall, to assist the Government under the title of a loan, advance a sufficient amount of money to pay for two months the per diem of the Senators and Deputies of the General Congress. Once a quorum has been assembled. Congress will dictate the necessary laws to create such funds and resources as the Government may want to continue its existence."

He concludes thus:

"His Excellency, the President, thinks that the salvation of the Republic imperatively demands the prompt meeting of Congress, and in order not to incur the terrible responsibility of losing the nationality of the country, the Executive will dictate extraordinary measures, which he never would have adopted if circumstances were not so very difficult and dangerous.

"God and Liberty!"

"ROSA"

The priest Sanchez, the clergy’s organ, in one of his sermons, preached on Friday night last, the 21st inst., (Good Friday,) in the Church of Santa Clara, at which the greater part of the members of the Administration, and of the members of Congress that is about to meet, were present, said: “Gentlemen—The only way to save the Republic, and—in pardoning the injuries you have received—to prove yourself Christians, is to make peace.”

Yesterday an American officer, a deserter of the 3d Infantry of the line, was baptized in this city with great pomp. He had for his godfather the President of the Republic, Pena y Pena.

CITY OF MEXICO, April 27, 1848.

I wrote you yesterday, and enclosed a translation of a letter from your Queretaro correspondent, containing highly important information. Lest my communication may miscarry I now send you the original letter. Our commissioners have not yet received an answer to their communication to the Government at Queretaro relative to the escort. Gen. Butler, a day or two since, was requested by the Mexican Government to allow some Mexican troops to enter this city to take possession of a quantity of army clothing left in one of the convents when the Mexican army evacuated the city. Gen. Butler, instead of granting the request, seized the clothing. It would not now be surprising if the Mexican Government were to ask the arms taken in the different actions to be returned. It would be in keeping with the modest request in relation to the clothing. D. S.

MEXICO, April 27—9 ½ P. M.

I have just received a letter from your Queretaro correspondent of the very latest date, and hasten to give you a rough translation:

QUERETARO, April 25, 1848.

The preparatory union of Congress have retaken their usual course, and few of the Deputies are wanting for a quorum. Queretaro, politically speaking, presents a most animated aspect, and nothing is talked of but peace. In every quarter there are warm discussions upon this grand question. The most vehement party for war is, without doubt, the army, but it had fallen so low in public estimation, and is so numerically weak that it is doubtful if they can get up a pronunciamiento, as it was publicly rumored here within the last few days they would.

Attention!—To­morrow there is to be a meeting of the officers of the Artillery. The object of the meeting is not positively known. Some say that it is to deliberate upon the possibility of sending reinforcements to Gen. Landero; others say the meeting is called to pronounce against the Government, who have effected a loan to pay the Deputies and Senators their per diem for the last two months, and who have done nothing for the army.

It was rumored to-day that the American Commissioners would be here this afternoon.

The Charge d’Affaires of France, Monsieur le Marquis de Renepont, is here.

Gen. Landero is, as you are aware, the general who signed the capitulation of Vera Cruz and the castle of San Juan de Ulua.

From the copious files of papers which we have received by the New Orleans, we proceed to make extensive extracts:

(From the American Star of the 24th April)

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.—The case of Lieut. Isaac Hare was disposed of yesterday, but of course the finding is not known.

Lieut. Mathison of the same regiment, one of the arrested whose names we have before given, was cleared of the charges preferred, but a nolle prosequi was entered, and he was again remanded to prison.

Another officer of the army, Lieut. T. B. Tilden of the 2d Infantry, whom the State evidence implicates in the matter, has been also arrested.

The case of Lieut. Dutton will commence, we hear, on Monday next.

Major A.D. Stewart, the senior Paymaster in the field, Col. Randall being ordered to New Orleans, will we understand, assume the duties of that office at once.

[From the American Star of April 25.]

The editors of El Eco del Comercio, one of the deputies who left the city yesterday for Queretaro, says there are sixty-four members in attendance, and that by the last of the week there will be seventy-six. If so, we see not why Congress may not organize by Monday or Tuesday. The same papers says Messrs. Sevier and Clifford will leave to­morrow or the next day, escorted by a small cavalry force, instead of by a division. It pronounces the story that they were going to threaten the Government as false—their only object being to present the treaty to the Mexican Government.

THE TREATY.—El Progreso, at Queretaro, has a long editorial in opposition to the treaty, intended to show the loss which Mexico suffers by it.—It says: “Though the United States offer us $20,000,000, they take about $50,000,000 from us.” It urges various reasons why the treaty should not be ratified, and amongst other things says the Government is check-mated—placed in a position where it can neither make peace (there being no Congress) nor war. El Progreso, as our readers know, is the organ of the revolutionists, or the war party. It is a journal of limited circulation, and has but little influence. Many of its articles are so personal and libelous, that were it not for the great liberty which the press in Mexico has enjoyed since its occupation by the American troops, it would long since have ceased to be published.

[From the American Star of April 26th]
The Official Register of Durango contains a communication from the Minister of War to Trias, late Governor and commandante General of Chihuahua stating that he is at liberty [the reader will remember that he was sent to Chihuahua from Rosales after the battle, by Gen. Price.] He says the Provisional President, the moment it was known the American troops were advancing up [on Chihuahua, determined that reparation should be made in case of disaster. It was therefore agreed with the American commander-in-chief that if any Mexicans should be captured, they should not be held as prisoners, nor warlike stores and munitions be considered as lawful prize. Sen. Trias is therefore set at liberty, the trains, &c., are to the restored, and as the editor of the Register remarks, “there is only the loss that will be felt, that of the brave men who fell at Rosales.”

El Progreso, at Queretaro, of Thursday last, has an elaborate article on the subject of the probable assemblage of Congress. It character will be understood from the last paragraph: “We have seen from various extracts from the doings of their sessions, that, in consequence of some Deputies and Senators having been excused, on different pretences, from attending to their duties, it has been determined to summon—and they have been summoned accordingly—the respective substitutes, in order to obtain a quorum, in install the Chambers and proceed immediately to the consideration of the treaty signed at Guadalupe.” The editor of the El Progreso then goes into a long argument to show that this cannot be done, inasmuch as the Deputies cannot be called upon except by a decree from the chamber to which they belong, and then only in case the excuse of the principal is pronounced sufficient by the same body. We shall not follow the editor, but would direct the attention of our readers to the main fact upon which he animadverts, as evincing a disposition on the part of the Deputies present to secure the attendance of the constitutional number.

GUATEMALA.

Advises from this country to the 13th ult., represent the Indians as committing great excesses on the whites. A deputation of five Friars had been sent out to treat with them, but were unsuccessful.

Two deputies from Tlaxcala have repaired to Queretaro.

LADRONES.—The Americans at Rio Frio took three ladrones the other day, who were shot. It is stated that they disclosed the hiding place of the whole band.

The Hon. Messrs. Sevier and Clifford have been invited within a few days past to various entertainments. They received invitations from Gen. Butler, and Senors Hargous and Emilio Vost. Night before last Messrs. Sevier and Clifford gave a supper to the American generals, at which the Mexican General D. Ignacio Mora y Villamil was present. Senor Haro y Tamariz was also invited to be present, but from motives of delicacy and patriotism, which were appreciated by the American Ministers, he was compelled to decline the invitation.

REv45i4p2c6, May 16, 1848, From the Vera Cruz American of April 30.

A train arrived yesterday from Jalapa, commanded by captain Clendenning, assistant quartermaster, and escorted by a company of Texas Rangers.

We understand that Major Chevallie, bearer of dispatches, arrived yesterday from the city of Mexico.

Private George Ealer, of Captain Fairchild’s Company of Louisiana Mounted Men, in company with two of his comrades, on the Orizaba road, was shot dead by one of a party of Mexicans, said to have been about twenty strong.

REv45i4p3c1, May 16, 1848, The Court of Inquiry.

—The Court of Inquiry met at the St. Charles Hotel in this city this morning, with closed doors, and adjourned until to-morrow morning, when various witnesses now in this city will be examined. We understand that the members of the Court will leave the city on the 10th or 11th by the way of the Coner, to hold a session in Frederick, Maryland, where they will adjourn about the 19th instant, unless something unexpected should turn up in the meantime. [New Orleans Picayune, May 8.]

[New Orleans Crescent, May 8.]

REv45i4p3c1, May 16, 1848, Court of Inquiry.

—We were informed last evening by Gen. Cushing, (says the New Orleans Crescent,) that the Court of Inquiry had not positively decided on its place of meeting in the United States. It would, in all probability, be at Washington, or some place very near there. They have to take the depositions of a number of persons in the United States; and there is no telling when the investigation will end, or how.

REv45i4p3c1, May 16, 1848, Gen. Cushing-the Peace Treaty.

—We had the honor of a passing call from General Cushing last evening, says the N. Orleans Crescent, who informed up that he intended posting [illegible] forthwith to the north. Gen. C. is in the possession of the most perfect health, and seems to have well withstood his residence and operations in Mexico. We learn from the General that there is little doubt of the ratification of the Peace Treaty by the Mexican Congress. If a quorum does not soon convene at Queretaro, the government will have the treaty passed through the forms, without a quorum—that is, if the American Commissioners will accept of it in that way.

REv45i4p3c2, May 16, 1848, Correspondence of the Enquirer. Washington, May 15-P.M. U.S. Senate.

The first business before the Senate this morning was the resolution of Mr. Johnson of Maryland, calling on the president of the United States for his reasons why certain nominations had not been transmitted to the Senate.

Mr. Borland spoke at some length in opposition to the passage of the resolution.

The subject was then informally laid aside, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the order of the day—viz: the bill for military occupation of Yucatan.

Mr. Calhoun addressed the Senate in a speech of some length in opposition to the bill and amendments.

Mr. Bagby has the floor on this subject for to-morrow.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, transmitting correspondence between the Secretary of the Navy and Commodore Perry, relative to affording aid to the people of Yucatan.

On motion, the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A bill refunding to the several States advances made to volunteers in the Mexican war, was taken and passed.

Mr. Stewart submitted a resolution, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a statement of the amount of exports of Cotton and Breadstuffs sent to England from this country, for the first three-quarters of 1847 and 1848.

An interesting debate sprang up on the subject matter of the resolution, which was participated in by Messrs. Ingersoll, Stewart and Bayly.

Mr. Bayly offered an amendment to the resolution, extending the statement to the last twenty years, which was agreed to.

The vote was then taken on the resolution as amended, and it was adopted.

On motion, the House adjourned.

REv45i4p4c3, May 16, 1848, Whig Sentiment in Other States.

"That same old Coon" is not yet quite dead. Indeed, his chances seem to revive a little. Contrary to general expectation, the Whig State Convention of Maryland have declared Mr. Clay their first, and General Taylor their second choice. We extract the proceedings upon the resolutions offered by T. G. Pratt:

"Whereas, it appears by the indications of the present Convention, that the first choice of the Whigs of Maryland is Henry Clay of Kentucky, that their second choice is General Zachary Taylor of Louisiana; therefore,
"Resolved, That the delegates who shall be appointed in this meeting be, and they are hereby, instructed to use their best efforts to secure the nomination of Henry Clay by the National Whig Convention; and if they shall be at any stage of the proceedings of said Convention convinced that the nomination of Henry Clay cannot be effected by them, then that the said delegates be, and they are hereby, instructed to vote in said Convention for their best efforts to secure the same.

"The clause of the resolution, asserting Mr. Clay to be the first choice, had been adopted, and the question was upon the second clause, expressing the second choice to be General Taylor, and instructing the delegates so to vote.

"Mr. Jenifer offered the following as a substitute for the second clause:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this Convention, General Z. Taylor is the second choice of the Whigs of Maryland.

"After discussion, the question on the substitute was taken, by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 31, nays 59.

"The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on the proposition of Mr. Pratt, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 54, nays 49.

The Georgia Whig State Convention has also acted. They have resolved to stand by the National Convention. The following resolution was adopted "almost unanimously":

"Resolved, That the nomination of General Zachary Taylor for the Chief Magistracy of this Union meets the hearty concurrence of a majority of this Convention; but in the spirit of a just and liberal concession, we stand prepared to support Henry Clay of any other Whig who may be the nominee of the Whig party; provided the views of the nominee accord with our own on the subject of the Wilmot Proviso and Southern Rights."

The latter clause is in direct conflict with the letter of Mr. Toombs, declaring that the South could not consistently sustain Mr. Clay. The Convention went farther, and unanimously adopted the following resolution. [In this connection it may be proper to state, that in a Whig Convention in Alabama, a leading Whig, apparently doubting the "soundness" of Mr. Clay on the Wilmot Proviso, offered a resolution calling on Mr. Clay for "an explanation" of his views on the slavery question. It was, however, laid on the table.]

"Resolved, That Henry Clay is entitled to the undiminished confidence of the Whigs of Georgia, both as to ability and integrity—that his great abilities, long experience, and brilliant services in the cause of his country, entitle him to its gratitude and endear him to his countrymen."

We confess we cannot understand the Wytheville Republican. We looked into it for election news—but found nothing of the kind. Its editorial space was devoted to the Address and resolutions of the Maryland Taylor "no-party" State Convention, which it extols to the skies. Of the address it says:

"It breathes the right spirit—the spirit of freedom from old party shackles and the spirit of patriotism which alone can meet the new and terrific issues to which this accursed Mexican War must give rise, and it breathes the name of Taylor!—the man for those issues. No party man can ride the storm which is brewing, and will be let loose at the close of the War; for to rake up, the old issues which have been so potent in arousing the wildest fury of party hate, would be to unsettle the base of our Union, and shiver the temple of Liberty which the hand of God himself planted upon the soil of a solitary Nation of this earth. Heaven, save us from a partisan, and deliver us from a northern man! Give us, at least, such a man as Taylor, who will keep his eye on the Stars of liberty and the Constitution of the Union, and its compromises."

Now we feel satisfied that the editor who plumes himself upon his States Rights constitutional notions, could not have seen the Allison letter when he wrote the above. He cannot, we feel sure, approve of Gen. Taylor's views on the veto—for, on that point the old General runs directly in the teeth of the great speech of Mr. Calhoun, the idol and favorite of the Wytheville Republican.

Again, the Wytheville Republican says, "Heaven, save us from a partisan, and deliver us from a Northern man!" Strange to say, this extraordinary language appears in the same paper, which copies an article from the Enquirer, headed "Noble Example," introducing Mr. Hannegan's admirable speech against the fanatical proposition of the infamous Hale with the following words: "Mr. Hannegan is a Democrat from a non-slaveholding State, but he boldly and eloquently stands by the compromises of the Constitution." We know not what the Wytheville Republican would do—but, for ourselves, we freely say, that we would willingly confide the destinies of the South into the hands of such brave defenders of the Constitution and such sincere patriots, as Mr. Hannegan—and so would the whole South.

Finally, the Wytheville Republican makes a fling at the "accursed" war. Our only reply shall be, to quote the triumphant and thrilling burst of eloquence from Jefferson Davis, a gallant Southron and a far-seeing and enlightened statesman, called forth by the similar word "odious" with which Mr. Calhoun stigmatized the Mexican war:
"The Senator says this war is 'odious.' Odious! Odious for what? Odious on account of the skill and gallantry with which it has been conducted—or is it because of the humanity, the morality, the magnanimous clemency which has larked its execution? Odious! Why in any newspaper which I take up, I find notices of large assemblages of the people gathered together to do honor to the remains of some dead soldier brought back from Mexico; or around the festive board to greet the return of some gallant member of the army. The conductors of the press, without distinction of party, express the highest approbation of the conduct of the army. Where is the odium? What portion of our population is infected with it? From what cause does it arise? It cannot be on account of the origin of the war; the extraordinary unanimity with which it was declared by both Houses of Congress, the eagerness with which our citizens pressed to the service, forbid that conclusion. A long and unbroken succession of victories has satiated the public appetite for military triumph—there may be a surfeit, for more has been offered than needed for a feast—an over anxiety for immediate peace is the natural result: with this I sympathize; beyond this I am not prepared to believe the popular feeling of the country extends.

"We have cause to be proud of the record this war will leave behind it—a monument more lasting than brass. We, the actors of to-day, must soon crumble to dust; the institutions we now maintain and hope will be perpetual, may pass away; the republic may sink in the ocean of time, and the tide of human events roll unbroken over it grave; but the events of this war will live in the history of our country and our race, affording in all ages to come proof of the high state of civilization amongst the people who conducted it—proof of the intelligence which pervaded the rank and file who fought its battles—proof of the resources of such a government as ours, wholly unembarrassed, in the midst of war, conquering one nation and feeding another! Where, sir, are the evidences of the evil brought down upon us by this "odious" war? Where can you point to any inroad upon our prosperity, public, or private, industrial, commercial, or financial, which can be, in any degree, attributed to the prosecution of this war? All that is yet to be shown; and I confidently await the issue."

REv45i4p4c5, May 16, 1848, Truly Said.

The Fredericksburg News, Whig, says with emphasis, that, if elected, General Taylor's election "must be effected by the Whigs." From the Democrats "he can expect nothing."

"His reliance must be altogether upon the Whig party. 'Tis madness for him or his friends to calculate upon support from any other source. If he wishes the nomination, he should look to them as the only party or respectable fragment of a party who will support his pretensions to the office.—We hope, then, he will unconditionally throw himself upon them—resolved to abide their will, and be governed by their determination in Convention assembled. He would under these circumstances have the best chance for the nomination."

But is it not "too late?" Can the old soldier now retreat from his firmly-assumed position?—This President-seeking is full of thorns—and, after all, the aspirant may be defeated.

U.S. SENATE.

The resolution of Mr. Reverdy Johnson was again taken up, but at his suggestion, passed over until tomorrow.

The consideration of the Yucatan bill was then resumed.

Mr. Davis, of Mass., addressed the Senate on the general principles involved in the message of the President.

After three messages had been sent in, furnishing information, it seemed to him that the question, as it now stood, was simply one of expediency. The chief argument of the honorable chairman of the committee on Foreign Relations had been that it was our duty to take possession, not only from motives of humanity, but because it is necessary to command the Gulf of Mexico. Such was the argument, stripped of all extraneous matters, and it was in this view that he intended to discuss it.

He denied that the representations made here, that the controversy in Yucatan is between castes of men, were warranted by the information before them. Of the 520,000 Indians in Yucatan, only 120,000 were engaged in this warfare. The remainder were peaceable, engaging in no way in this controversy. The mixed portion of the population, too, had generally united with the Indians in this warfare. Therefore, it was not true that it is a war of the races—between the white and colored population of Yucatan.

He contended that, from all the information which they had been enabled to obtain, it was apparent that there is just cause for these attacks upon the white population—that, instead of being a contest between the indigenous population and the population of Spanish blood, it is a party contest—a contest between the party in power, and a party which constitutes by far the largest portion of the population of Yucatan.
The latter, he said, were neither savages, nor uncivilized, though many of them were degraded it was true. In regard to a large portion of them, they were as much established in their occupations—in the cultivation of the soil—as any of the Spanish portion of the population. And many of them had, from time to time, held offices of responsibility and trust under the government.

And this, Mr. D. said, was the description of persons whom it was proposed to expel by this "temporary" occupation. But it was not protection really against this population which was sought. It was protection against the Mexican States. And if the government of Yucatan had become alarmed at their rebellion against the Mexican States, and sought this protection form the United States for that reason, when would this protection be likely to cease? No one, he thought, would doubt, from the information, that this was the protection desired. And was it likely, under such circumstances, that the time would ever arrive when we should consider Mexico in a situation to afford protection?

He considered it purely a question of annexation, and whether we shall assume the responsibilities of permanently extending our authority over Yucatan. That was clearly the inference to be drawn from the arguments of the supporters of this measure.

He could not perceive the force of the argument adopted by the Senator from Michigan, (Mr. Cass,) that the importance of Yucatan to the commerce and navigation of the United States justified the measure proposed. The West Indies, Cuba, and the Bahama Islands, would still lie in the way, and it would be equally necessary to obtain them to carry out his magnificent views. But here we would have a stronger than the Yucatanese to deal with. We have the English in lawful possession at the Belize, in Honduras and Mosquito country.

If in annexing Yucatan, then, it was proposed also to annex Belize, to extinguish the title of England to a foothold there, we would scarcely be able to do so without getting into a war with Great Britain. He thought it must be apparent to all that this could not so easily be done.

We may assert our authority in Yucatan, in Cuba, in the West India Islands, but if we do not establish our principles there, we shall have accomplished nothing.

But let us carry out the true policy and principles of our republican form of government, and such aggressions would not be required to bring all these into our system.

He contended that we had no right to extend our authority over any other country, simply because, in our opinion, we are giving to that country a better government. It was the right of every people to judge what constitutes their happiness. Whatever may be our own views, if they find happiness in their institutions, "God speed them."

He condemned the policy of seizing Yucatan, from fear that England or some other may do so if we do not. It had been asserted also that England would take possession of Texas if we did not, and yet we now hear the Senator from Texas (Gen. Houston) declare that that was all "diplomatic humbug." The Senator from Maryland (Mr. Johnson) had alluded to an alleged former remark of the Senator, as "coqueting with England," but that the Senator form Texas had disclaimed—he now called it "diplomatic interchanges," alias diplomatic humbug. And he (Mr. Davis) seemed to suppose that there might be a great deal of "humbug" in the idea that England intends to take possession of Yucatan.

He referred to the inconsistency of supposing that England is furnishing arms to those Indians, and at the same time proposing to afford protection to the other party. From the correspondence he quoted, to show that a declaration of Mr. Sierra that they "could easily obtain arms from the Belize" was the only thing to warrant such a declaration.

After looking at the subject in all its bearings, Mr. Davis could not bring his mind to take the step proposed.

When Mr. Davis had concluded, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the admission of Wisconsin into the Union, and part of the remaining amendments pending when the House adjourned yesterday were adopted, and part rejected. The bill then, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed, and was read the third time and passed.

Under the 114th rule, Mr. Brodhead handed to the Clerk a notice of a motion for leave to introduce a joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Vinton, the House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, and took up the bill making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensions for the year ending 30th June, 1849, and after some time spent therein, rose, without coming to any determination thereon.

Then House proceeded to the consideration of a motion made on the 19th April, to reconsider the vote by which the Senate bill had been passed, entitled “An act in amendment of an act entitled an act to amend the act entitled an act to reduce the rates of postage, to limit the use and avert the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of fraud in the revenues of the Post Office Departments,” passed 3d of March, 1845.
After debate, Mr. Vinton moved the previous question, and Mr. Stephens moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. Mr. Stephens' motion was negatived—40 to 117. Mr. Vinton thereupon withdrew his motion for the previous question, but after further debate it was renewed by Mr. Goggin, and sustained, and the veto on the passage of the bill was reconsidered.

Mr. Cobb moved to lay the bill on the table, but the motion was not agreed to, and it was finally on motion of Mr. Brodhead, re-committed to the Post Office committee. Adjourned.

FRIDAY, May 12. SENATE.

The bill from the House for the admission of Wisconsin into the Union, was read twice and referred to the committee on territories.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of State, in compliance with a resolution to the claims of the owners of the brig Douglass, for indemnity for losses by reason of the wrongful seizing of that brig by a British cruiser.

Mr. Douglass introduced a bill, granting to the State of Iowa the right of way and portions of the public lands, for a railroad to connect the Missouri and Mississippi rivers. Read twice and referred to the committee on Territories.

Mr. Johnson introduced a bill to amend the act, approved June, 1844, “to provide for the adjustment of land claims within the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, and those parts of Mississippi and Alabama south of the 31st degree of north latitude, between the Mississippi and Perdido rivers.” Read twice and referred.

The bill authorizing the payment of interest on loans advanced by the State of Alabama, for the General Government, in suppressing the Creek Indian hostilities in 1836-7; was taken up, the amendment (before noticed) adopted, and the bill passed.

On motion of Mr. Jefferson Davis, the bill explanatory of the act “to raise for a limited time an additional military force and for other purposes,” approved 30th February, 1847, was taken up and passed. [It extends the provision, relative to bounty lands, to the brothers and sisters of deceased soldiers.]

The consideration of Mr. Johnson’s resolution, calling on the President for information in reference to certain military appointments, (Generals Pillow and Cushing,) was then resumed, and Mr. Johnson concluded his remarks in reply to Mr. Allen and on Executive usurpation, as illustrated by the late veto of the President on the river and harbor bill. It would be seen, he said, by consulting the journal of the other House, that the present Executive had actually given, in that body, his vote and his support to bills of a similar character. The constitutional right to construct works, like many of those embraced in that bill, was discussed at some length. Whether they were fresh water or salt water improvements, he said, made no difference. There could be no distinction made for this reason merely. As well might it be contended that a man has not the same right to be drowned in fresh as in salt water.

At the conclusion of Mr. Johnson’s remarks, Mr. Hannegan gave notice that, as he was in favor of Yucatan, he should, after to-day, press immediate action on the Yucatan bill.

Mr. Badger remarked, that for the opposite reason expressed by the Senator for Indiana, he was in favor of executing the order of the Senate and taking up the private Calendar.

Mr. Foote, in a playful manner, expressed his surprise that the Senator from North Carolina should declare that he is opposed to Yucatan. He thought she was at least entitled to our sympathies, in her present calamities, and that the Senator should have an opportunity to explain!

Mr. Badger explained, accordingly, that his opposition was the bill, and not to Yucatan herself. [I hope that I have not placed the gentlemen in a "discourteous" attitude towards each other!]

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

On the motion of Mr. Goggin, the vote by which the House yesterday re-committed the Post-offices bill was reconsidered, and the bill was passed.

A bill for canceling certain illegal entries in the Land Office at Columbus, Mississippi, was read and referred.

The House then, in Committee of the Whole, took up the Private Calendar, and the bill for settling the claim of the legal representatives of Richard W. Meade, was again under consideration, and after a protracted debate, was reported to the House, and, on motion of Mr. McKay, was laid on the table, by yeas and nays, 118 to 38. And then the House adjourned.
REv45iSp1c1, May 19, 1848, General Taylor and Mr. Clay.

It will be remembered that at the late Whig Convention in Virginia, Mr. Botts stated positively that he had seen a letter from General Taylor, in which he declared his determination to sustain the election of Mr. Clay, should he be the nominee of the Whig Convention. This statement was acquiesced in by the Taylor leaders in the Convention, whose selected oratorical organ, Mr. Preston, urged this declaration of Mr. Botts as a strong argument of General Taylor’s Whiggery, which should have precluded all objection on that score on the part of Mr. Botts. The matter passed off, and was regarded by the public as a “fixed fact,” until the appearance of Old Zac’s letter to Mr. Baldwin, wherein the old soldier takes especial pains to refer to the statement, and to deny the smallest foundation for its existence. A direct issue is thus involved, and nothing but the letter can solve the mystery. We understand that Mr. Botts persists in his version, and has written to Mr. Clay for a copy of the letter, which, it seems, was addressed to Mr. Clay by General Taylor. It will, no doubt, be shortly published. In the mean time, we extract the following on the subject from the Baltimore Sun:

“It has been repeatedly announced of late, that a correspondence relative to the Presidency has taken place between General Taylor and Mr. Clay; and the New York Herald, a few days since, attempted to give the substance of it, in which Mr. Clay figured as having lectured General Taylor on the impropriety of allowing his name to go before the National Whig Convention. The New York True Sun, however, gives the following more likely version of this correspondence:

“It now appears that General Taylor wrote to Mr. Clay, assuring the latter that if nominated by the Whig Convention, no man would give him (Mr. C.) more ardent support. This pledge was given in connexion with the protestations of indisposition to be himself a candidate, and thus interfere with Mr. Clay’s election. * * * Ten to one, the letter from the General to Mr. Clay will soon see the light. Indeed, it is even now probably on the way from Ashland to Washington, from whence it is expected to be made public very shortly.”

A correspondent of the N. Y. Herald, writing from Washington on the 11th April, makes the following positive statements, which our readers will take for what they are worth:

“We have some new lights in reference to the late Taylor letters. It is now understood, or believed, upon circumstantial evidence, sufficient to hang a man for murder, that the letter of Old Zac, of the 20th April, was dictated from Richmond, Va., and under the impression, after Mr. Clay’s pronunciamiento, that the great Harry would be the nominee. Hence the declaration of Old Zac that he will be a candidate any how. It is believed, upon equally strong testimony, that the Allison letter was dictated from Washington, under the conjoint deliberation of Messrs. Crittenden and Bell of the Senate, and Messrs. Stevens of Ga., Pendleton, Preston, Flournoy and Fulton of Va., Stewart anf J. R. Ingersoll of Pa., and Hilliard of Ala. Hence, from their better information, the more judicious protocol of Old Zac, and the reservation of leaving his case in the hands of his friends. But the letter to Richmond will require a fuller recantation, and we are authorized to suspect that instructions have gone down to Old Zachary to make it.

In the Richmond letter, General Taylor says he has never declared that he would withdraw form the field in the event of the nomination of Mr. Clay. We are authorized to say, by a friend of Mr. Clay, who knows the fact, that Henry Clay, at the United States Hotel, in this city, last winter, exhibited a letter to several friends, avowing the very concession to Mr. Clay which the Richmond letter denies; and we are further authorized by our informant, to challenge old Zachary to the proof. Mr. Clay exhibited the letter to show the perfect disinterestedness of feeling a that time existing between himself and old Zachary, and that, thus far, the friends of each might consistently be the friends of both.”

REv45iSp1c2, May 19, 1848, General Taylor and the Veto.

Not all the Whig party is satisfied with Gen. Taylor’s practical nullification of that “high conservative power,” the veto, which ought to be deeply cherished by the South. The Frederick (Md.) Examiner sees danger to Whiggery in Gen. T.’s exposition:

“We are to understand then, that if the measures of the Whig party, under their administration for instance, should operate most beneficially to the country, yet, if by some sudden popular outbreak, whether from local causes or otherwise, the majority should be turned against the Whig party, the General would not exercise the veto power, because this change happened, but would remain content and give it his sanction—like a mere vane to be shifted and turned by every political breeze, no matter from what quarter of the compass it may come—without the exercise of a sound judgment, most solemnly enjoined by the constitution upon the Executive.
“That the veto has been most shamefully abused we readily admit, but who desires the President of the United States to be the mere instrument in the hands of Congress, instead of its Constitutional adviser?” [BWP]

REv45i5p1c1, May 19, 1848, No title. Bold statements of the Whig Press—General Taylor’s nomination.

“The Richmond Enquirer of Saturday is filled to the brim with articles about General Taylor—all going to show that the prospect of his nomination has thrown the Editors of that paper into spasms of fear.” [Petersburg Intelligencer]

If the bold statements of the Whig press of the two factions are to be believed, we surely must be in a bad way. The Taylor organ quoted above describes us as suffering “spasms of fear” at the prospect of General Taylor’s nomination—while the Mobile Advertiser (Clay) paints the “intense agony” felt by the Democrats at the “bare mention” of Mr. Clay as a candidate!

We can assure the Petersburg Intelligencer that we do not feel one “spasm”—but are as cool as this warm weather will allow—calmly awaiting the action of both Conventions. If the contingency assigned by the Intelligencer be the only cause of fear, then we should feel perfectly at ease, for we have the empathetic testimony of as strong Whig papers as the Intelligencer itself, that the “spontaneous combustion” produced by our neighbors of the Republican, in publishing Old Zac’s “premature” letter to Mr. Baldwin or Mr. Gallaher, has utterly cut off all “prospect” of Gen. Taylor’s “nomination” by the Whig Convention.

The Lynchburg Virginian has published two long and unanswerable arguments to show that with the plain and direct language of the Baldwin letter staring them in the face, the Whigs cannot, without a sacrifice of “self-respect,” think of nominating General Taylor—that it would be an “insult” to the Convention to bring his name before that body—that the unfortunate note of the 20th, sent off before the astute, and far-seeing, and well-posted Major Bliss reached Baton Rouge, had “virtually replace” General Taylor “beyond the pale of the Whig party, as such, and the Convention cannot possibly entertain the question of his nomination”—and finally, that “the exposition of his principles” came “too late”—for it was “deferred until the letter to the Republican had raised and impassable barrier between him and the Whig nomination.”

The Fredericksburg News, a Taylor organ, asserts roundly, that if General Taylor “perseveres to adhere to his Richmond letter, as interpreted by the public generally, we cannot conceive how he can be brought before the Convention. It would be altogether useless to present his name before it, with a determination not to abide its decision. But we have not a shadow of a doubt that he will do as some have construed his letter to mean. He is a man of sense, of moderate ambition, of discretion, and, as such, his duty is to yield to the behests of his party, and submit to what they advise.”

While, however, the News thinks that, in the present state of the case, Gen. Taylor cannot possibly be brought before the Convention, it is confident that the old man, whose great glory it has been “never to surrender,” may now be induced (of course by the cunning “telegraph politicians” at Washington) to eat up his words, to contradict his own plain language in the grossest manner, to say that white meant black, and that when he positively declared that he would not withdraw his name, whoever might be the nominee, he meant that he would do exactly the reverse and withdraw it, and in every respect would “yield to the behests of his party, and submit to what they advise.” Now, General Taylor has frequently told us in his various letters, that he was entirely independent of all “parties and all party schemes;” and yet his “friends” are so anxious to force him into an humble submission to “the behests of party,” that they would tear a laurel from his brow, and place him before the public utterly devoid of self-respect—a miserable party tool. His “friends” may entertain so humiliating an opinion of Gen. Taylor, but we confess that we are not yet prepared to see him “surrender” his good name, ad sacrifice himself and his pride of character, as they would represent him as being about to do. A short time will remove any doubt, and lift the veil from this last act of the drama. We shall soon know whether his “friends” will extort from him a letter, to “explain away” his Baldwin letter, and stamp his own flagrant inconsistency. After all, the News intimates that, in consequence of "the unpleasant altercation between the friends of Mr. Clay and General Taylor at the North," both may be dropped, and some third man taken up.

Finally, we commend to the Petersburg Intelligencer the following strong language of the Mobile Advertiser, Whig; which had just received the "fatal missive." This Southern organ, also, puts Taylor out of the question. We humbly conceive that these revelations of the Whig press should transfer the "spasms of fear" from ourselves to the Petersburg Intelligencer. Certain it is, that if Gen. T. be not nominated, that paper will tremble like an aspen—for it has been almost conceded by that and other kindred presses, that Gen. Taylor is the only man who can succeed in their view. For ourselves, we "fear" neither Taylor nor Clay. But to the article from the Mobile Advertiser:

"The letter of General Taylor to the editors of the Richmond Republican, which we publish this morning, defines very clearly his position in regard to the Presidency, so that hereafter there need be no mistake about it. He is a Candidate, "hit or miss"—an "independent" candidate—and so he will remain, regardless of the wishes of the Whigs as a party, and in utter defiance of the action of the Whig Convention or any other Convention. If either Convention or any party nominates him, well and good; but if not, he is a candidate any how. He will not decline in the event of nomination of Mr. Clay or anybody else by the Whig Convention. In short, he is a candidate "on his own hook," and bids defiance to both the Whig and Democratic parties. Such being his position, his name will not, of course, go before the Whig Convention, or, if presented, will receive little consideration. IT CERTAINLY WILL BE ENTITLED TO NONE. At all events, we set it down as a "fixed fact," that he will not be nominated. There will be three candidates in the field, to wit: a regular Whig, a regular Democrat, and an "independent," "no party" candidate. Wonder how many states the latter will carry? Nous verrons! We rejoice that General Taylor has thrown off his mask at last. We now understand him fully, and shall feel no embarrassment in speaking of him hereafter in such terms as our feeling and a sense of duty to the Whig party may dictate.”[BWP]

REv45i5p1c7, May 19, 1848, Yucatan.

The Vera Cruz Arco Iris has very late dates from Yucatan. We are compelled to cut short the news, but the principal feature of the intelligence is a treaty which the Government of Yucatan has been constrained to enter into with Pat, the chief of the insurrection. The following are the terms of it: 1st Pat shall be Governor for life of the Indians of Yucatan; 2nd. D. Miguel Barbachano shall be Governor for life of the whites of the State; 3rd Twenty-five hundred muskets taken from the Indians before the war, shall be given up to Pat; 4th All debts due by the Indians to their masters shall be forgiven; 5th Unoccupied lands which have been sold by the Government shall be again held in common; 6th No personal tax shall be paid in Yucatan; 7th [This article provides that the derecho de estola shall be reduced. We do not know the nature of the impost. Possibly . . . [illegible] . . . .

Mr. Sierra, the Commissioner of Yucatan, had just received a letter from Campeachy, by the way of Vera Cruz, of 30th April, of which the following is an extract, translated into English:

"The extermination everywhere in the country is going on with increasing fury and carnage. Poor Governor Barbachano, through the intercession of Bishop Querra, has offered everything to the barbarians to moderate their unheard of rage. His efforts have been unavailing. While Pat, the most powerful among the tribes, is talking about peace, his numerous bands are destroying cities, towns, farms, and all the valuable property around Merida. The inhabitants of the Capital are in the deepest consternation; the families emigrate by hundreds to Cuba, Campeachy and Laguna. Orders have been issued for concentrating all the bodies of national militia within the fortifications of Merida, and abandoning to the Indians all the advanced posts, but every town is resisting the orders, on the ground that the people will defend their homes and their wives and children in the best manner possible, and in the mean time the savages come down and massacre the whole population.—The panic has completely demoralized the people. The public authorities have lost all their influence, and the cry sauve qui peut is spreading over the country. The richest families in the interior, who have escaped with their lives, are now beggars, asking the assistance of their unhappy countrymen, deprived alike of the power of assisting them. Some subscription for their relief have been raised in the Havana, where great sympathy for the poor sufferers prevails.—Cannot you, our dearest friend, do anything in favor of our common home? We have neither arms, nor ammunition, nor money, nothing but our resignation to die at the merciless hands of the Indians! Without speedy and efficacious relief form abroad, the beautiful and rich peninsula of Yucatan will be the tomb of the white race, deprived even of the means of flying. May the Almighty God have mercy on us!"

REv45i5p1c7, May 19, 1848, Election in Oregon.

The Oregon Spectator announces the official returns of the election for Governor as follows:—George Abernathy, 536; A. L. Lovejoy, 520, Scattering, 18. Abernathy’s plurality 16. Rather a close election that.

REv45i5p2c1, May 19, 1848, Remarks of the Hon. Thomas H. Bayly, of Virginia.

In the House of Representatives, April 10th, 1848.

The Joint Resolution from the Senate, tendering the congratulations of the American people to the French people, being under consideration in the House, and Mr. ASHMUN having spoken in reply to Mr. BAYLY, he obtained the floor, and said, when he had spoken one week ago upon this question, he had spoken without one—

Mr. ASHMUN interposed, and desired the gentleman to give way for a moment while he added a few observations on a topic which had escaped him.

Mr. BAYLY assented, and Mr. ASHMUN proceeded with his remarks; after which—

Mr. BAYLY resumed the floor, and proceeded. He said he was about to remark, when he had yielded the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that when he had spoken a week ago on this subject, he had spoken without one moment of preparation, and under the feeling very manifest to the House at the time, and which he did not attempt to suppress. The gentleman from Massachusetts subsequently on the same day, had obtained the floor, and declined then under circumstances similar to those under which he had spoken, to reply. He had taken a week to fortify himself, and all he (Mr. B.) asked now, was, not a week for preparation to rejoin to him, but the attention of the committee. He should follow the gentleman step by step through his remarks.
And, first, as to what the gentleman had said in reference to his (Mr. B.’s) suggestion as to the form in which the resolutions of congratulation to the French people ought to be presented by this country. The gentleman said he had objected to the resolutions of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cummins,] because they had not come from any committee of this House, or even from a gentleman connected with the committee having charge of our foreign relations, and had seemed to intimate that that was ground of objection on his (Mr. B.’s) part to the resolutions themselves. On the contrary, gentlemen knew very well that it was impossible to get this subject before the House in the imposing form he (Mr. B.) had desired, until they had first been submitted by some member.—His (Mr. B.’s) argument had been in favor of referring the resolution, and nowhere had he objected on account of the gentleman from Ohio having introduced them. The gentleman had quite as much right to introduce them as anybody else.—They had come with quite as much propriety from the gentleman from Ohio, as they could have come from anybody else. But he [Mr. B.] had desire to give them an imposing appearance.—He had desired that they should not seem to be the suggestion of a single individual, but rather the deliberate and well-considered action of this House.

He had not understood the resolutions of the gentleman from Ohio, nor had the gentleman from Massachusetts himself understood then as referring to the subject of abolition in the French colonies; because, if we had, why did he move his amendment? The resolutions had created no excitement here, though the gentleman from Massachusetts now maintains that they contain the substance of his amendment. There had been no ill feeling, no indisposition to vote them when they were brought forward in a proper form. Was it that the gentleman found, that although thus containing his amendment, as he now maintained, they were not likely to excite broil and discord here, and hence he deemed it necessary to give additional point to it, to render it obnoxious, as far as their feelings were concerned, and thus raise the storm of which he now complained? The gentleman had one of the two horns of the dilemma; he must either admit that he did not understand the resolutions as he now maintained them to be, or, being everything he desired, yet, as they were going quietly along, his purpose of agitation was not likely to be attained, and, therefore, it was necessary for him to interfere with his amendment. So far from the gentleman’s explanation having relieved him from any odium, which he (Mr. B.) undertook to say his amendment had brought upon him, in the estimation of three fourths of the members of this House, they only served to fix it more indelibly upon him.

The gentleman had expressed surprise that the resolutions of the gentleman from Ohio, which, as he contends, contained a virtual congratulation at this abolition movement in France, should have come from this (the Democratic) side of the House and said that “but for the position” (emphasizing the word) of the gentlemen on this side of the House, he would have been more explicit in its utterance. What did the gentleman mean? Had it come to this? Had a leader of the Whig party in this House been brought to admit that . . . [illegible] . . . of discord here, which did not prevail on that (the Whig) side of the House? They all knew—scarce any man was so inattentive to what was going on here, from day to day, as not to know—that such was the fact; but he had thought that the calculating prudence of the gentleman form Massachusetts, on the eve of a Presidential election, when the vote of Southern States is wanting to elect a Whig, would have restrained him from the open, undisguised avowal of it on this floor.

But the gentleman said that the resolutions were premature; that he was willing, at a proper time, to express sympathy with France, but wished to wait until he saw the result of the movement there. He wished to wait until republicanism was consolidated in France, before he could express a word of sympathy with this movement in the direction of free principles.—He desired that the movement should be consummated before we should open our lips. —He (Mr. B.) wished for no such ill­timed delay. In this contest for free principles, waged in imitation of our own glorious contest of ’76, he did not wish now, any more than France did then, to wait for the movement to be consummated before the cheering voice of sympathy was heard. If the calculating prudence of the gentleman had been practiced at that time by France, perhaps our Revolution would never have been consummated. So far from its being premature, it was in the midst of the strife, when the issue was yet uncertain, when these people were contending for their political rights, that they required the cheering voice of sympathy. It was at such a period as that that he (Mr. B.) wished to speak—whilst the contest waged, not when it was over. Then would be a time for congratulation when they had achieved the glorious object for which they were struggling; now was the time to send over to them the voice of sympathy and encouragement. He had none of that cold, calculating policy which would restrain him from sympathizing with men fighting for their liberties, because perchance they might be stricken down in the struggle. He ardently hoped that France might establish, on a firm basis, her republican principles; and it was precisely because he did not want to produce despondency for lack of the sympathy of this great nation that he did not want to wait. If we were not to rejoice now, because their had been something to be regretted in what had occurred, we never could rejoice at the inception of any movement of this sort. Somewhat of irregularity, confusion, disorder—somewhat (he was sorry to add) of error, must always precede the success of any great revolution. He asked again, was France premature when she not only aided us by her cheering voice of sympathy, but with men and money? It was precisely as premature in France then, as it was in us now. He repeated, he had no sympathy with the gentleman in his ill­timed prudence.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts could not speak to these resolutions—with all his professed anxiety to produce no discord, to discharge his duties merely—he could not speak to these resolutions without recurring to the conduct of our Government in the Mexican war, virtually charging us with hypocrisy—not in terms, but that was the effect of his argument—charging, that at the time we were exulting at the birth of a republic in the Old World, we were exerting the power of our nation to crush a Republic on this continent. What had we done in reference to Mexico that showed dany disposition on our part to put the iron heel of war upon her? Had not our course toward her, from the dawn of her independence to this time, been that of forbearance and friendship; while hers, in turn, had been nothing but outrage and hostility? Has not our forbearance toward her been such, that if it had been practiced towards a strong instead of a weak nation, it would have stamped u with pusillanimity? Was Mexico less likely to be free, less likely to be republican, after the termination of this war, which the gentleman’s course had tended so much to protract, than it wa before?—Was there any man, who had looked attentively at the course of events, who believed that this war would result in injury to Mexico, as far as her civil and political condition was
The gentleman had referred to the remarks of the French minister, and had quoted from his book what he had said on the subject of slavery in the West India Islands. Now, he (Mr. B.) begged leave to say to this House, that he attached precisely the same importance to Lamartine’s description of slavery in the West Indies, that he did to the constant descriptions of slavery in the Southern States by the gentleman and his associates on the floor. He had never lived in those colonies. He knew nothing of their condition. He was precisely as ignorant of it as the gentleman from Massachusetts had those who co-operated with him were of the condition of slavery in the Southern States; and as presumption would never supply the place of knowledge, he attached precisely the same importance to the opinions of Lamartine upon a subject he did not understand, that he did to the opinions so often expressed here by a class exactly in the same category.

But does not the gentleman know that Lamartine was speaking of the condition of slavery in St. Domingo at the time of the insurrection, and not of the condition of slavery at this time in the French Islands?

Besides the reason which he had given for attaching no importance to Lamartine’s description of the condition of the slaves in St. Domingo, there were others. He was not sustained by better informed historians. Most of them represented the Negroes as contented and happy, until they were made to believe, by the interference of foreign fanatics, that they were oppressed and deprived of the natural rights of man. But, although he attached no importance to what Lamartine said of the condition of the slaves in St. Domingo, yet he did attach importance to what he said in the extract which the gentleman had read on another point, about which he was informed. Mr. B. alluded to what Lamartine said about the effect of the insurrection. He referred to the fact that the Constituent Assembly had proclaimed the liberty of the blacks, and said, “St. Domingo, the richest of the French colonies, was swimming in blood. FRANCE WAS PUNISHED FOR HER EGOTISM.” Yes, she was punished for her egotism, in attempting to control an institution which the great mass of her people and statesmen knew nothing about, in the massacre of her white citizens in St. Domingo in the first instance, and in the loss finally of the finest of all of her colonies. And civilization and humanity itself was punished, in the loss of both, of one of the finest and most productive portions of the globe.

And (continued Mr. B.) if it were possible for the gentleman and his associates to succeed in abolishing slavery in the Southern States of this Union, we would not be the only persons who would suffer. They and their constituents would also, though not to the same extent with us, be punished for their egotism.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts had said that he had been in error in what he had said in reference to abolition in St. Domingo. The gentleman seemed to suppose that he had maintained that the emancipation was the action of the French Government which brought about that emancipation, and had undertaken to show that it occurred prior to any action of the Government on that subject. He had never said that abolition in St. Domingo was brought about by the action of the French Government. On the contrary, in as explicit terms as he could employ, he had said it was brought about by the agitation of the subject by English and French fanatics, without the concurrence of the Government of France, and by the operation of societies there of the character of those to which the gentleman belonged.

Mr. ASHMUN (Mr. B. yielding) said he had understood the gentleman to make use of these words precisely as he was reported in the Intelligencer.

Mr. A. here read a passage from the Intelligencer’s report of Mr. B.’s speech.

Mr. BAYLY (resuming) aid, if the gentleman would hand him the report he would show him exactly what he had said. The report, considering the circumstance under which he had spoken, he was free to say, was a very faithful one. But much he had said was omitted. The remarks immediately after what the gentleman quoted showed clearly enough what his understanding. He had said the thing had been effected. How? By the action of the Government? No such thing. This was what he had said; and he read from the Intelligencer’s report as follows:

“Then the thing had been effected by the busy intermeddling of visionary fanatics, just as it was now sought to be done by the gentleman from Ohio and his associates. There was then a band of fanatics in London who met in the Old Jewry, and who passed resolutions very similar to the amendment which it was now sought to foist on the pending resolutions.

“It was then proposed to aid these Negroes with men and money in a struggle for their freedom; and similar resolutions were at the same time adopted in France by an association similar to that to which the gentleman and his abolition friends belonged among us. These fanatical visionaries set the revolt of the blacks in St. Domingo in motion; their machination succeeded in exciting a servile insurrection, in the course of which every white man and woman and child in the island was massacred, with the exception of a small remnant, who fled to the shipping in the harbor and barely escaped with their lives.—Whole hecatombs of dead bodies were piled up in the streets, amid burning, murder and pillage.”

He had made other remarks which were not in this report. The House would recollect—those who had paid attention to his speech—that he had referred expressly to the fact that the Abol-... [illegible]... and money; and of this was by aid, thus furnished by persons belonging to associations precisely similar to those that existed there, that these Negroes had been stirred up to insurrection, and been enabled to succeed, by cutting the throats of every white man, woman, and child in the land, except a few that escaped.

Mr. ASHMUN wished to correct the gentleman on one point. Oge’s mission, he presumed the gentleman would recollect, was to vindicate the right of the mulattoes against the whites. His mission was not emancipation.

Mr. BAYLY knew, as well as a man could expect to know from general reading, the history of that transaction.

Let the gentleman look to the authority he had quoted, or to his own historian, Edwards, and he would find that although Oge, when he left St. Domingo, contemplated nothing more than to assert the rights of the free mulattoes before the Constituent Assembly in France, yet in France he became associated with the Society of the friends of the Blacks, and in England he was made acquainted with the abolitionists there. —The association with these men changed his views. He became intimate in France with Barnave, whose fanatical maxim was, “Perish the colonies rather than a principle;” and he returned to St. Domingo, bent upon a general insurrection, which he contrived very soon to set in motion.

Look to the British Islands. British statesmen had admitted that their attempt at emancipation there had proved a failure. It had taken place under circumstances more favorable than could ever again occur: the masters were in some sort compensated for their slaves by the appropriation of $100,000,000, and there was not that acute sting of wrong which would occur where they were not this emancipated; they underwent a probation of ten years; in England heavy discriminating duties were laid in their favor for their protection; they had British bayonets there to keep them in order and protect the white men against their murder—and yet, with all these safeguards, with all these favorable circumstances, which never did occur before, and which never could occur again, what was the condition of things in those islands? Look to the debates in the British Parliament; look to the admission of her statesmen and of her leading journals, and it was everywhere conceded that the attempt had proved a failure. It had been maintained in the British Parliament, as it was here, that white labor would be more profitable than slave labor; that emancipation would enhance the products of those islands. We of the South (said he) knew otherwise. As young as he was at the time, he reviewed, in one of the periodicals of the day, these positions; he was not wise after the fact; in 1833, in this article which was in print, he had predicted exactly what had since occurred. English statesmen, or such of them as were influenced but his reasoning, as very few of them in fact were, did not understand the fact—which it seemed could not be learned here—that presumption was no substitute for knowledge, and that man cannot wisely regulate a subject they do not understand.

But, to look further: What must inevitably be the ultimate moral effect of extensive emancipation? He said now, whether by the torch of the incendiary and the dagger of the assassin, or by the peaceful action of the Government, emancipation could never take place in any country where there was a large proportion of the blacks, without absolute destruction to the whites or the blacks. There was no man that reflected about the matter who could believe that the two races could ever live together in the same community as equals: they never did anywhere, and never could. Free the blacks in the Southern States, and a strife would inevitably arise between them and the whites which would become a war between the races, the most deadly of all wars, in which it would be necessary “that one should perish that the other might live.”

The gentleman said when he (Mr. B.) pronounced his amendment a libel on one half of the States of this Union, he was virtually saying that the Declaration of Independence was equally a libel. What was the resolution of the gentleman, as modified by his friend from Ohio, [Mr. Schenck?] It was a declaration that slavery, domestic slavery, was a violation of a cardinal republican principle. He said that that declaration was a libel on one-half of the States of this Union, because it affirmed that those States were living in the habitual violation of a cardinal republican principle; and he maintained it still. But had the gentleman’s resolution any analogy to the Declaratio of Independence? —Did the Declaration of Independence speak of anything else then political rights? When the Declaration of Independence declared that all men are created equal, did it mena to assert the untruth that all men were in fact created equal in their social and physical condition? Did it mena to say that the idiot equal in every respect with the man of genius? The dwarf with the giant? In what were they equal? Equal in stature? In intellect? In any gift of God? The Declaration of Independence never meant to assert any such absurdity as that. It mena to assert that men are equal in their native rights, before they were modified by law after they entered into society. That was what it declared; and there was no ingenuity which could torture the Declaration of Independence into having the remotest allusion to the institution of domestic slavery.

The gentleman had read a long list of bright names that represented Virginia at that time in the old Continental Congress—the name of Lee, who introduced the resolution that “these colonies are, and of right ought to the, free and independent States;” of Benjamin Harrison, Carter Braxton, and other eminent men, who participated in that movement. Did he not know that every one of these men at that time were large slaveholders—among the largest in that State? That every one of them continued to be slaveholders till the day of their death? With what purpose, then, did he come in here and assert that these men propounded any such doctrine as he now contends for? I say
But to recur to the subject of the Declaration of Independence. The gentleman had said that every creature that had the form of a man was entitled to the right of citizenship. He asked the gentleman in what State of this Union did any such right obtain? He asked him in what State of this Union, except, perhaps, his own, did free Negroes enjoy any of the fundamental rights of citizenship? Did they vote? Did they serve on juries? Had they the right, which was secured by the Constitution to every citizen, of going to any State they please to reside? Did not the gentleman know, that laothough he talked so much about Negroes being deprived of their rights by the institution of slavery, they were as much deprived of every political right in the other States as they were in Virginia?

Mr. ASHMUN was understood to say, (Mr. B. yielding) that there were other States beside Massachusetts in which the black population were entitled to vote. This was the case, he believed, in Democratic New Hampshire.

Mr. BAYLY. Do the Negroes vote there?

Mr. ASHMUN. Yes, and in New York.

Mr. BAYLY [continuing] undertook to say—he did not presume to be as well acquainted with their State constitutions as their own representatives were—but he undertook to say, that neither in New York nor New Hampshire did the Negroes stand on the same footing with the white voter. There were discriminations against them; and of there were any discriminations, they did not enjoy all the privileges of citizenship. In New York they require the Negroes to possess a large property qualification, not required of the whites, which effectually excludes them from the polls. In New Hampshire there are very few free Negroes, a dh the law, perhaps, may allow them to vote; but are they not kept by public sentiment from the polls?

Mr. TUCK interposed, and [the floor being yielded] begged leave to correct the gentleman in regard to New Hampshire. Free Negroes voted in New Hampshire; and he would inform the gentleman that very many of them were intelligent and respectable men. [A laugh.]

Mr. BAYLY continued. How many of them had the gentlemen ever seen on the jury, at the bar, on the bench of justice? Not one, he would undertake to say. And they could not marry a white man or woman. [A laugh.] And yet gentlemen came here and talked about their being free and equal. It was not the fact anywhere. Look at Connecticut, in the very heart of New England: on a late occasion, by an overwhelming popular vote, she had denied them the right of suffrage. Look at New York, Pennsylvania, to every State in the Union. In none of them were they entitled to the enjoyment of equal rights . . . [illegible] . . . about emancipating their slaves. Go home (said he) and emancipate your free Negroes. When you do that, we will listen to you with more patience. Until you have taken the beam out of your own eye, do not undertake to remove the mote from ours.

The gentleman from Massachusetts asked [continued Mr. B.] if the ordinance of 1789 was a libel on the States of the South. He [Mr. B.] did not choose to anticipate now aht he should have an opportunity on another occasion to say, when he should pay his respects to that ordinance, and show all it ever was or is. It contained no such sentiment as that expressed by the gentleman.

The gentleman had also asked him if the Oregon bill, with the anti-slavery restriction, was a libel on the Southern States. He regretted that the gentleman had made it necessary for him to refer to the circumstances unde which the anti-slavery restriction was put in that bill. It had been in none of the territorial bills that had preceded it, except the Wisconsin bill, and there in so loose and general phraseology that it had escaped the attention of the House. The effort had been abandoned in the case fo the Iowa bill.—When the Oregon bill came into this House in 1845, reported by a gentleman from a non-slave State, and from a committee a majority of whom were form non-slave-holding States, there was no such restriction in it. It was paced there—and he regretted it—on the motion of a gentleman whose elevated personal character, whose elegant accomplishments, whose urbanity, whose ability, whose statesmanship, ought to have made him scorn to participate in any such proceedings—by the gentleman who then, as now, represented the city of Boston, [Mr. Speaker WINTHROP.] It was introduced against all precedent, against all necessity, and for the purpose, he regretted to believe, of keeping up abolition excitement. If it had come from such a source as this amendment, he should have expected nothing better; but he confessed he was disappointed, mortified, to see it come from the source which it did.

But the gentleman had not been content with a legitimate reply to his argument, but had seen fit to come into this Hall, in a manner which every gentleman here must feel to have been offensive, to drag before the nation and to denounce the conduct of the Senate of Virginia for refusing to pass certain resolutions in reference to the death of Mr. Adams. It was not for him to defend that body, composed as it was of patriots and statesmen. They were able to defend themselves, and they had defended themselves before the tribunal to which they were responsible. He should not defend them before this, to which they were not. He plead to their jurisdiction. But why was it that the Senate of Virginia had not passed those resolutions? They were willing to pass such resolutions as were becoming the occasion. They were offered to pass resolutions of regret at the death of the man; but they were unwilling to stamp hypocrisy upon themselves, and to pass general resolutions of approbation of the public conduct of a gentleman whose public conduct, it was well known, had never met the approbation of Virginia. He spoke of his political course. Of his private character as a man, of his ability as a statesman, no man in Virginia had ever undertaken to speak in terms of disparagement. But they were not willing to pass sweeping resolutions of
But the gentlemen, not content with referring to the Legislature of Virginia and her constitution, had undertaken to tell the House about her want of prosperity, and to refer them to the greater growth and prosperity of other States. He [Mr.B.] knew that this was a very common idea; but he undertook to say, with some small knowledge of the fact, that there was not one of the old States which had advanced in prosperity with a more steady, decided step than Virginia. He undertook to say that there was no state in which the progress of improvement had been more certain. He knew some of the new States had outstripped her. The cheapness of their lands, the disposition of our people to seek new homes, and many other circumstances, which he could not now stop to discuss, had stimulated them into rapid prosperity—a prosperity which he had never envied them. But he maintained, that among the old States of this Union, there was no State which had advanced in population and wealth with more steady step than had Virginia. Even Massachusetts herself, with all the protection she had received from the General Government, elevating her and depressing us, had not a larger ration of representation, in comparison with Virginia, on this floor, than she had in the first Congress under the Constitution.

Under these circumstances, their people constantly going out, the new States keeping up a constant drain upon them, they kept on at a steady pace of improvement.

Instead of being misled by declamation, let gentlemen look to the facts of this case. Let them compare the census taken at different times, and they would find that the old slave States had advanced quite as rapidly as the old non-slaveholding States, with the exception of New York and Pennsylvania; and they, in truth, in the connection in which he was speaking, could scarcely be called old States. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution, they possessed a vast, unappropriated western territory, which they have since virtually brought to the seaboard by their internal improvements. In consequence of which, their western counties have been filled up with a dense population, and their towns have grown into large cities. If it be answered, that Virginia also had a large unpeopled territory in the western part of the State, I reply that Virginia had provided no outlet for the produce of the country; and this circumstance, and the existence of slavery—for, in truth, in that part of the State there were few slaves—retarded the growth of the country.

He had been referred to the contrast in the prosperity of Kentucky and Ohio; and this has been attributed to the existence of slavery in the former. But is it so? Have not other causes operated more powerfully?

By the time we had acquired the right of navigating the Mississippi; which gave the strong impulse to western emigration—certainly before the introduction of the steamboat, which gave the great impulse to the western country—nearly all the lands in Kentucky had been appropriated. Most of them were held in very large tracts by private persons, many of them by non-residents, who held them for high prices, which were confidently looked for as the country grew. A large portion of Kentucky was inaccessible to navigation.

But how different was the situation of Ohio! Most of the lands within her borders were held by the Government. They were open to private entry, in small and convenient tracts, at Government prices; and she was surrounded by navigable lake and sand rivers. Besides, there was a great difficulty about land titles in Kentucky—as, indeed, heretofore there has been in Western Virginia—which is always such a terror to emigrants. In Ohio there were none whatever. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that Ohio has outstripped Kentucky. But it remains to be seen that the existence of Negro slavery has been the great cause of retarding the growth of the latter. Has it retarded the growth of Missouri? Which of the new States has advanced with a more rapid or steady stride, or which one of them enjoys more solid prosperity than that State? But he found that he was being beguiled into an extent of remark on this point which he did not desire.

Suppose the institution of slavery is as great a cure as gentlemen would have us believe; yet do . . . [illegible] . . . brought upon ourselves? And do they not also know that we who live among it, and understand it better than they do, are very clearly of opinion that their meddling with it only aggravates it, and that we cannot remove it in the way they propose, without producing evils infinitely greater? Do they not know, that if it be all they say of it, it is our misfortune? And does it become gentlemen from the non-slaveholding States constantly to throw up to them a misfortune which they did not feel, and one which they had not the power to remedy? Did the gentleman from Massachusetts find it consonant either with the feelings of humanity or patriotism?—If they had a deformed limb, in the name of God let it pass the notice of their brethren. If it could not pass their notice, let them not be jeered and ridiculed for it. It was an institution which was upon them: if it was a deformity in their social system, no portion of the people of this globe had done more to inflict it upon them than the people of Massachusetts themselves—as they were doing, at this hour, upon the people of Brazil. Does it lie in their mouths to come here to upbraid us!

There are many other topics to which the gentleman had referred, which he should not take up his time in speaking of now.

But one more remark. He sought altercation with the gentleman as little as the gentleman did with him. He had no fondness for personalities; he had no taste either to indulge in abuse, in the first instance, or to retort it. The retort of abuse was low and vulgar; it was usually rather the recourse of vulgar minds, overflowing with bad passions, than the resort of patriotic indignation. He confessed that some remarks which he had made when he occupied the floor a week ago were pretty pointed: if he had had the language he would have made them more so.—All he could say now, in speaking under different impulses, as far as any abhorrence had been expressed by him of the character of that proceeding; was, that he would have expressed it in his cool moments in quite as stron language.

*Lamartine, in describing the insurrection at St. Domingo, says: "A rivalry of cruelty seemed to arise between the two colors. Of certain noble and faithful slaves placed themselves between their old masters and death, they were sacrificed together. Gratitude and pity are virtues which civil war never recognizes. Color was a sentence of death, without exception of persons; the war was between races, and no longer between men. The one must perish for the other to live. Since justice could not make itself understood by them, there was nothing but death left for them. Every gift of life to a white man was a treason which cost a black man’s life. The Negroes had no longer any pity. They were men no longer; they were no longer a people, but a destroying element, which spread over the land, annihilating everything."—Vol.I, p.317.

REv45i5p2c4, May 19, 1848, From Vera Cruz.

By the arrival of the schr. Athos, Captain Worth, we have news one day later from Vera Cruz, (says the New Orleans Picayune, May 11.) We find in the papers but little more of interest than has already been published by us. From the Free American of the 4th inst., we extract the following:

FROM MEXICO AND QUERETARO.—We received dates from the city of Mexico, last night, two days later than those received by Monday’s mail.

A letter in the Monitor, dated Queretaro, April 25, says that nine Deputies were still wanting to constitute a quorum. The same letter states that Senor Rejon, before resigning his seat in the House, left a written speech against peace, and is it probable it will be published. Gen. Almonte arrived at Queretaro, to take his seat in the Senate. He is opposed to the treaty, and the Government look upon him with suspicion. The two Senators of the district of Mexico have resigned their seats in Congress.

The writer closes his letter, saying that he would not be surprised to see the Government, before ratifying the treaty, dissolved, and each one take the road home.

The Monitor is of opinion that Congress would meet on the 1st inst.

It is reported that Otero is the leader of the war party in the House of Representatives.

El Progreso, of Queretaro, says, on the 27th ult., that Congress will not meet.

REv45i5p2c5, May 19, 1848, No title

The Republican briefly replies to our exposure, on Tuesday, of its double-dealing course. It makes no attempt to controversy of any of our arguments or positions, and gives no reply to any or our questions. It surrenders or evades the whole ground taken by us. "The difficulty with the Enquirer," it says, "Is, that it is unable to see how a man can be a Whig or a Democrat, and yet refuse, as a citizen, to recognize the binding authority of Party upon his conscience and his thoughts, or, as a President, to 'overlook politics altogether' in the distribution of the offices.”

The Republican is mistaken; this is not the difficulty with the Enquirer. We are at a loss to see how any democrat can vote for Gen. Taylor "with perfect consistency," if he be, as the Republican ("in one breath") declares he is, "a good Whig, a Henry Clay Whig"—and, moreover, how a Henry Clay Whig can be a "no-party" man. Nor can we exactly see how a President is to overlook politics altogether in selecting a Cabinet? The Republican concludes its brief reply with the following remark: "We have contended that Gen. Taylor is a Whig, and if the Enquirer wishes to know what Whig principles are, we refer him to the Allison letter, with the remark, especially in regard to those upon the veto and the encroachments of executive power, that they are principles for which Henry Clay has long contended, and which, it seems to us, all good Republicans may consistently support.”

The Allison letter! For an exposition of General Taylor’s principles! Who can tell any more about General Taylor’s principles or opinions upon the various important measures which divide the two great parties of the country, after reading the Allison letter, than they could before? The Tariff—an important subject—what are his opinions about it? A National Bank, and the Currency questions, also important. What are his opinions on these questions? The Sub-Treasury, Distribution, Mexican War, &c., &c.; on all these important questions we are as wise now as we were before the Allison letter made its appearance? True, the Allison letter gives General Taylor's opinions on the Veto. He is in favor of its exercise—and he is opposed to its exercise! And as to "Executive power," he is so fearful of its injurious tendencies, so fearful of "dictation," that he thinks the President should have no opinions of his own—at all events, he should express no opinions, notwithstanding the Constitution requires him as President to recommend such measures as he shall deem expedient. He is to be silent upon all the various matters of interest to the Union—express no opinions upon any of the numerous questions which may arise affecting or endangering the welfare of the country, lest it would be "dictation." He is to be a mere automaton—to nod assent to any and every thing which a bare majority of Congress may choose to sanction. The Allison letter is a no party, every party exposition of principles, and nothing more.

The Republican had a hard task to perform—a difficult road to travel—in its efforts to get the support of "all parties" for General Taylor. In the first place, to get the support of its own friends, it has to prove that General Taylor is a good Whig—a Henry Clay Whig. And in the next place, to get the support of the Democrats, (for it knows there is no hope without their aid,) it has to show that General Taylor is not a good Whig—that "he is as much a Democrat as Whig." Positions about as difficult to reconcile, as it would be to prove that a "chestnut horse is a horse-chesnut." [BWP]

REv45i5p2c7, May 19, 1848, Thirtieth Congress—First Session. Wednesday, May 17, 1848, Senate.

Mr. Dix, from the committee on commerce reported Senate bill extending the privileges of vessels engaged in trading from one port of the U. States to another, with the amendment of the House thereto. The amendment was concurred in, and so the bill stands passed.

Mr. Niles submitted a resolution, which was adopted, calling on the Secretary of the treasury for information as to the mode adopted in reference to the payment of the interest on the public debt, and whether any payments have been made in Philadelphia, New York and Boston, in anything but gold and silver coin.

The bill authorizing the relinquishment of the 16th section in certain cases, and the selection of other lands in lieu thereof, was taken up and passed. Also, a bill allowing $700 to Robert Purkis, an aged citizen of Rhode Island, for services rendered the United States, in his youth.

Mr. Davis of Massachusetts, presented resolutions and a memorial from the legislature of that State on the subject of Postage.

The bill authorizing notaries public to take oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgements in certain cases, was passed; as was also the bill from the House to continue, alter and a mend the charter of the City of Washington.

Several bills form the House were read twice and referred.

The bill to amend the act to raise for a limited time an additional military force, and for other purposes, [continuing their bounty lands to officers promoted form the ranks,] was taken up and the amendments of the House concurred in. So the bill stands passed.

The bill providing for the obtaining of testimony in relation to claims for losses sustained in the Florida war, was taken up, and, a debate ensuing, it was passed over formally.

The consideration of the Yucatan bill was then resumed, the question bring on an amendment offered by Mr. Dix at the close of yesterday's session, authorizing the President to use the army and navy of the U. States for the
Mr. Dix said he had not intended to make any remarks on his substitute, had it been understood that the debate was not to be continued. But so many inquiries had been addressed to him in regard to the character of this substitute, that he felt called upon to make some explanation.

In the present condition of Yucatan, he thought it clear that we had a right to interfere, in some manner. Yucatan had never really been subject to either Old Spain or to Mexico.

The relations in which she had from time to time stood towards these powers, were explained. Since the commencement of the war with Mexico, Yucatan, though by her own act in 1843 an integral part of Mexico, had stood in the position of a neutral, but considering Yucatan as a part of Mexico, as we had done, during the existence of the armistice, he thought it doubtful whether we had the power to take the military occupation proposed—it seemed to him that the consent of the Central Government of Mexico was necessary. He considered it proper, however, to interpose in the manner proposed by his amendment. He only objects to the first section of the bill, as reported by the chairman of the committee on foreign relations—he was ready to vote for the second and third sections.

His substitute, for the first section, proposed to put the army and navy at the disposition of the President, to aid in putting an end to the devastating war in Yucatan, provided this aid shall be so rendered in concurrence with the Government of Yucatan. It was the peculiar relation in which we stand toward Mexico and Yucatan, which constituted the chief objection to the first section of the bill; but we might furnish assistance without violating the treaty, or the conditions of the armistice, and such interference would be considered an act of friendship and humanity.

We had so interfered already, in other cases, on grounds which may be considered applicable to this. The object of the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi, was rather to provide the President with means, than to confer any additional authority to act. But this places the army and navy at his disposal, provided he shall act in concurrence, or rather in subordination to the government of Yucatan, and thereby all pretense that the armistice had been violated would be removed.

Mr. Hannegan, at the close of Mr. Dix's speech, rose and said that since the commencement of the Senator's remarks, he had received information, in addition to that which appeared in the Baltimore Sun of this morning, which, though from a private source, satisfied him that a treaty had been entered into between the white and Indian population of Yucatan, which might render any interference on our part unnecessary. For this reason he felt it to be his duty not to press the vote on the bill to-day, and he would therefore move that it be passed by informally. This treaty, the heads of which were given in the Richmond enquirer, was apparently a very fair one, and he hoped would restore peace and harmony to that distracted country.

Mr. Dix expressed his regret that he had not sooner been apprised of this, as the Senate would do him the justice to say that he was not in the habit of inflicting upon them a speech unnecessarily.

Mr. Hannegan had been unable to do so at first; and another reason for not interrupting the Senator was, that he knew he always made a good speech, and he wanted to hear him.

After some further remarks by Messrs. Underwood, Foote, Hannegan, Niles, and Houston, the bill was informally passed over, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Kaufman introduced a joint resolution, which was read twice and referred, giving to Texas authority to extend her Eastern boundary, as to include Sabine Pass, Sabine Lake, and Sabine River, as far North as the 32d degree.

The bill from the Senate, providing for free communication across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, was referred to the committee of the whole.

The report of the committee of conference, on the bill providing for an additional number of examiners in the Patent Office, was taken up, and after considerable debate the report was finally, under the operation of the previous question, adopted, 62 to 69, and the bill accordingly stands passed.

Mr. Gayle reported a bill to grant portions of public lands to the Mobile and Ohio Railroad.—Read twice and referred.

The consideration of the annual navy pension bill was then resumed in committee of the whole; as was also the annual appropriation bill for the service of the Post Office Department—and, after debate, the first mentioned was reported to the House, without amendment, and passed. On the other, the committee came to no conclusion.

After some further business, not important, the House adjourned.

[BWP]
SENATE.

Mr. Jefferson Davis presented a memorial from Messrs, King and Young of New York, offering their services in raising a regiment of volunteers for Yucatan, and asking the aid of the government for that purpose. The memorialists state that the regiment will be raised, armed and equipped, whether the aid is or is not afforded, as hundreds are now ready to embark and are only awaiting the action of Congress on the bill before them.

Petitions and memorials were also presented by Messrs. Calhoun, Dix, Mason, Douglass and Dickinson.

Mr. Dayton offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling on the Secretary of the treasury to furnish a statement of the amount and value of the iron and manufactures of iron imported into the United States form 1st July, 1847, to 1st May, 1848, and the quality and value of all mineral coal so imported.

Mr. Johnson of Maryland offered a resolution, which was adopted, requesting the Secretary of the Navy to lay before the Senate all the papers connected with the application of Mrs. Causin, widow of Com. Causin, for a pension.

Mr. Hannegan laid on the table of the Senate a resolution of inquiry into the expediency of establishing the consulate of Muscat in the dominions of the Imaum, in the same footing as those at Tangiers, Tripoli and Tunis, in the Barbary States.

Mr. Douglass offered a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the military committee to inquire into the expediency of amending the law approved 23d April, 1808, appropriating annually $200,000, for arming the whole militia of the United States and territories, so as to increase the same to an amount equal to the present wants of the country.

Mr. Dix, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill to admit certain articles, the growth or production of Canada, free of duty, conditionally that similar articles shall also be admitted from this country into Canada free of duty.

The post office bill, with amendments, as it yesterday passed the House, was taken up, and some of the amendments concurred in and others rejected.

Mr. Badger inquired of the chairman of the committee on printing the cause of the delay in the printing of the Senate, and why the report on the pea patch case has not been furnished.

Mr. Cameron replied that he had been sick and absent from the Senate for some days, but he thought it was a mistake that there had been any delay in the printing, or that it had not been as well done as usual.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the temporary military occupation of Yucatan.

Mr. Miller addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill. If he could look upon it as a measure of humanity alone, he should have no hesitation in giving it his support. But the question had been so managed as to strip it of its humane character, and to place it upon the ground of expediency. It is a case in which at the same time that charity and assistance is solicited by Gov. Mendez, he offers to pay us for it, with the sovereignty of his country. And at the time this application was made, Mr. Mendez was not Governor, and has no authority to make the application, or the tender.

The manner in which the application had been presented by the Executive was also objected to, and the course of the Secretary of State on the subject commented upon—the silence which had been so long a time maintained, before these cries of distress had been responded to by the Department. It was not until this offer of sovereignty was made, accompanied by the threat that if aid was not furnished by us, she would go to England or Spain for assistance, that any movement had been made by the Executive.

Here was the consideration accompanying the application for our humanity, and then the President was prepared to send in his message—making the humanity question merely collateral to the question of policy.

This policy had been settled, by the chairman of the committee on fearing relations, to mean, that because there is danger that England will take Yucatan, therefore we must take her—that it is a race between the Lion and the Eagle, watching for their victim, as to which shall seize her first. Instead of alarming the humane feelings or our nature to rush at once to the assistance of the distressed and suffering, they had sat down here discussing questions of policy.

He denied that is we were at peace with Mexico we should have any shadow of pretense for taking possession in the manner proposed—that England would have just as good grounds for taking possession of a State of this Union; and that there is no government in Yucatan which possesses the power to sell the sovereignty of the people of that State to the United States.
It had been said in the public prints that the President is not in favor of this measure, but enough had been seen, in the course of this debate, to show the contrary—that the object is acquisition.

Mr. M. further contended that if, under the armistice we had a right to take possession, we had an equal right to drive out any English troops which might be found in any quarter of the territory, and that such course will inevitably involve us in war with great Britain. He was opposed by seizing upon Yucatan, to doing the very thing of which we accuse England of and intention to do. If it is wrong in her it is wrong in us.

The application of Mr. Monroe's doctrine to this case, he considered a gross perversion of the principle. We propose to do the very thing which Mr. Monroe said England, France and other European nations, should not do—to seize upon a state of this continent. Mr. Monroe intended that the rule should not only apply to European nations but to ourselves. If England has no right to interfere, upon what principle have we the right? And yet the doing this, it is said, will be carrying out the principle of Mr. Monroe, that there shall be no interference.

The evidence of Com. Perry was quoted to shoe that duplicity on the part of Governor Mendez had led to the hostility of the Indians, and even excited the indignation of a portion of the white population.

If we took possession of Yucatan, the next movement, in the present state of Europe, would be a similar application from Cuba. He should not like to see Great Britain take possession of Cuba, but he would not be willing for that reason that we should take possession for ourselves.

The true course, in all such cases, was to say to Great Britain openly and decidedly, that we will not permit her to take possession.

At the conclusion of Mr. Miller's remarks, Mr. Calhoun expressed his intention to address the Senate, and moved an adjournment, but gave way to

Mr. Clarke, who offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling in the President to inform the Senate whether any order has been given to all or any squadron in the Gulf to proceed to Yucatan, for the protection of the white population; and if so, to communicate a copy of such orders, and any other correspondence on the subject. And then the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Brown, of Mississippi, introduced a bill for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad Company. Read twice and referred. Mr. Adams, of Kentucky, presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of that State, which were appropriately referred.

Mr. Conger, from the committee on printing, reported a resolution calling on the treasury Department to state the reasons why certain papers have not been furnished, so as to enable the printers to compete the printing of the report on commerce and navigation. Lies over.

The House, then, in committee of the whole, took up the private calendar, and was occupied for the remainder of the day in discussing the bill to pay the legal representatives of Benj. Hodges, late of Maryland, deceased, $280, for a slave who was conveyed from the United States on board the British fleet, in the year 1814, and not recovered by Hodges or his legal representatives.—The claim is made under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, and the $280 is the estimated average value of slaves, established by the commissioners under that treaty.

The bill, of course, gave rise to a debate on the subject of slavery, in which Messrs. Tuck, Rhett, Chapman, Collamer, Giddings, Woolward, and others, participated.

In the course of the speech of Mr. Giddings, some rather exciting remarks passed between him and Mr. Holmes of South Carolina, as to the cause of the former's expulsion in 1842, which Mr. Holmes alleged was for endeavoring, "surreptitiously," to put in a petition. This Mr. Giddings denied, and Mr. Holmes reiterated, appealing to the journal for the truth of his statement. Mr. Giddings said if the journal proved that, it would prove a falsehood.

This Mr. Gayle seemed to consider personal toward Mr. Holmes, but the latter did not think so, and Mr. Giddings disclaimed any intention to be personal.

Finally the affair passed off very pleasantly.

The committee rose without coming to any conclusion on the bill, and the House adjourned.

WASHINGTON MONDAY May 15, 1848.

U.S. Senate.

Mr. Bagby gave notice that he should call up his resolutions on slavery to-morrow, with a view to pressing a vote.
The consideration of Mr. Johnson's resolution relative to the commissions of Gens. Pillow and Cushing was then resumed.

Mr. Borland addressed the Senate in opposition to the resolution. When he concluded, the consideration of the Yucatan bill was resumed, and Mr. Calhoun addressed the Senate.

He said that the President, in his message, recommends certain measures: 1st. To prevent Yucatan from falling into the hands of an European power; and, 2d. For the protection of the white population from the Indians. On the first proposition he states that Yucatan has declared that unless we furnish the aid, some European power will do so; and that the so taking possession by Great Britain, or any other power, will be in contravention of the doctrines of Mr. Monroe. In pursuance of this, the committee on foreign relations have reported a bill to carry out the views of the Executive.

In the first instance, he then proceeded to show that the case did not come within the declaration of Mr. Monroe, nor for that reason furnish any sufficient ground for the bill from the committee. The declaration of Mr. Monroe, he said, referred to the proceedings of the allied powers in Europe, Russia, Prussia, Austria, and France—to put down republicanism—which in their progress, had finally extended to this continent, in a design to assist Spain in putting down her revolted colonies. At this point England had interfered against these movements, and Mr. Monroe's declaration, after mature deliberation, had also been put forth.

The circumstances then existing, have since, he said, entirely disappeared; and in the present state of Europe, all danger of interference with the affairs of this continent, has disappeared also. No European government had interfered with Yucatan, with a view of oppressing her people, or changing her form of government from a republic to a monarchy, and in this respect also did not come within the character of Mr. Monroe's declarations, as this was the state of things contemplated by him.

It appears from the correspondence, he said, that arms and ammunition might be obtained from the Belize cheap and in abundance; that England had not looked upon Yucatan as an independent government, but as a part of Mexico. And the President himself does not charge England with granting supplies—he merely says that England "may" furnish supplies if we do not.—According to the President himself, the interference of England would be merely for the purpose of preserving the white population from extermination, not with the intention to change the form of government. Therefore, even from the declarations of the President himself, there is nothing to bring the case within the declarations of Mr. Monroe.

In regard to the term "colonization" embraced in these declarations of Mr. Monroe, the circumstances also were different then and now; and the term "colonize" in Mr. Monroe's declaration had no application to the present case. Yucatan, by the alleged intended interference, would become not a "colony" but a "province" of England.

Mr. Monroe's declaration was, that these colonies, having established and maintained their independence, were no longer subject to colonization. The intentions on this subject, of Mr. Monroe and of his cautious cabinet, had been entirely misapprehended. This had been merely to announce to the civilized world in what light we should regard the state of things contemplated by him.

The message of the present Executive—the broad interpretation given to Mr. Monroe's declarations—had been totally disavowed three years after the declarations put forth by Mr. Monroe.—It had been declared that the policy of this country is to avoid war so long as it could possibly be avoided; and it was in this light that he (Mr. C.) had uniformly acted. It had never been the policy of this government to go to war. There was no principle laid down in these declarations that rendered it necessary for us to go to war to prevent any European power from rendering assistance to any other power on this continent.

There are cases of interposition which he would resist at the hazard of war. He would instance Cuba. It had been the policy of all administrations to let Cuba alone—and that she shall not pass from the hands of Spain into the hands of any other European power—because she is necessary to the security of the commerce and navigation of the U. States.

There was another case—Texas—bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. If she had been left to take the natural course of events, it might have involved us not only in a war with Mexico, but with other powers.

It was in this view that he had been in favor of annexation. Though when he had been applied to, to know whether, if England took possession of Yucatan he would resists, he had replied that he would not—because it was of no importance to us in any point of view, and would no way contribute to our control of the Gulf, or for our defence in any way.

Nor would the occupation of Yucatan add anything to the power of England, which England already possesses in that quarter. Not a single vessel, in case of war, would enter the Gulf by the passage which the possession of Yucatan would furnish her. The passage to the Gulf is through another channel, and she now has complete command of the Caribbean sea and of the gulf, without the possession of Yucatan.
He believed that the taking possession of Yucatan would involve us in another "Seminole war"—without any sufficient motive—the expense and the termination of which no one could foresee. There was never a time when there was more reason for us to husband our resources, to meet any contingencies which might arise. Any one who would look to the eastern horizon, would see that such an emergency may very easily arise.

In regard to our relations toward Mexico—to the armistice—he did not consider this a case embraced in the terms of that armistice. It was one of the most complicated cases, in every respect, which had ever arisen for the consideration of Congress, and requiring the greatest caution and deliberation. Under the circumstances, the suffering of the Yucatanese could not justly be charged to them, if they did not interfere, but to the manner in which the subject had been presented by the Executive.

Whether it was a war of the races or not, his sympathies were naturally with the white population. He would go farther,—if this was a war between the races, there would be strong considerations of policy which would induce him to interfere. These were, that the white population had contributed to establish liberty on this continent—they possessed the wealth, and a greater degree of intelligence than the Indian population, and might perhaps be able to take, though not very elevated, a higher position hereafter.

Mr. C. said, though it may be a war of the races, substantially, yet, after looking to all similar cases, he was not prepared to involve the country in their difficulties merely to secure the ascendancy of the white race in the Southern portion of this continent.

He thought that we should extend to them all the aid which we can with propriety—that we might transfer the suffering portion of the population to Cuba, or any where else they may desire—but he was not willing to incur the danger, the cost, the consequences of doing what this bill proposes.

Between the bill and the amendment of Mr. Jefferson Davis, he would prefer the bill. He would rather do that directly, which the President proposes, than to cover it up under any other proposition whatever. Nor was he in favor of the amendment of Mr. Lewis—that did not meet the case. The time would never come when Mexico would be able to hold possession, and we should be compelled to make arrangements for permanent occupation.

At the conclusion of Mr. Calhoun’s remarks—Mr. Cass referred briefly to his allusion to the uselessness of Yucatan for defence, or for the protection of our commerce. There was a map in the Departments, which had been examined at his (Mr. Cass’) request, by Lieutenant Porter, and it had been shown that, on the Eastern point of Yucatan, there is one of the best and safest harbors in the world, with sufficient depth of water over the bars at the entrance. With Yucatan in our possession, we could successfully contend with England for the control of the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf, but without it England would have it completely.

Mr. Calhoun replied, and reiterated, that for purposes of defence, in the event of a war with Great Britain, Yucatan is not worth to us one groat. But, if the object sought by the honorable Senator from Michigan was the command of the seas, then the proper course was to husband our means and foster the Navy, and not to engage in an impoverishing war upon land.

Mr. Cass referred also to the interpretation given by Mr. Calhoun to the term "colonization," as used by Mr. Monroe. Did not the Senator from South Carolina consider Jamaica a Colony of England?

Mr. Calhoun.—No. To "colonize," in the light of Mr. Monroe’s declaration, would be to send out a portion of her population for that purpose. If she had done this, then Jamaica was a colony—not otherwise.

Mr. Cass said Mr. Monroe had distinctly disavowed the right of interference by European powers. There was no new territory, not apportioned, to which any European power could send out their population to colonise, on this Continent. Where then would England colonise here, if not among those portions already partitioned out? If Jamaica were not a "colony" in the light contemplated by Mr. Monroe, he did not know what was.

After some further conversation between Messrs. Calhoun and Cass, and a few remarks from Mr. Foote, the bill was informally passed over, Mr. Bagby having the floor for tomorrow.

The bill providing for the proper ventilation of passenger vessels, was taken up and passed; and then the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

On motion of Mr. Harralson, the rules were suspended, for the purpose of enabling him to move that the committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill "to refund money for expenses incurred, subsistence and transportation furnished for the use of volunteers, during the present war, before being mustered into the service of the United States."

The committee were accordingly so discharged, and the bill taken up, read the third time, and passed, as follows, under the operation of the previous question:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of the joint resolution, approved March 3, 1847, entitled "A resolution to refund money to the States which have supplied volunteers, and furnished them transportation during the present war, before being mustered and received into the service of the United States,” be, and the same are hereby, extended, so as to embrace all cases of expenses heretofore incurred in organizing, subsisting, and transporting volunteers, previous to their being mustered and received into the service of the United States for the present war, whether by States, counties, corporation, or individuals, either acting with or without the authority of any States:
Provided, however, that proof shall be made, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of war, of the amount this expended, and that the same was necessary and proper for the troops aforesaid.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That an amount sufficient to refund said expenses so incurred be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The rules were also, on motion of Mr. Chapman, suspended, and the committee of the Whole discharged from the further consideration of the bill “to continue, alter and amend the charter of the City of Washington.” The bill was then taken up, read, and ordered to be engrossed—95 to 59.

Mr. Meade moved a reconsideration, but the motion laid on the table, 92 to 67, and the bill was then read the third time and passed.—A motion to reconsider the vote on the passage was also laid on the table, 74 to 58. So the bill stands passed.

Mr. Stewart of Penn., offered a resolution, directing the Secretary of the treasury to report to the House the aggregate amount of exports and imports during the three quarter of the year 1847 and 1848, ending the 31st of March; also showing the amount of specie exported and imported, breadstuffs and provisions of all kinds, and cotton exported during said period, showing separately the amount of each exported to and imported from England.

Mr. Bayly proposed to amend by adding, "And that the Secretary of the Treasury be also required to report to this House the whole amount of agricultural products of the forests of this country, from 1824 to the present time, together with the exports and imports of specie for the same period.

Mr. Stewart accepted the modification, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Vinton, a resolution was adopted, to close debate on the Revolutionary Pension Bill in half an hour after again going into Committee of the Whole thereon. Adjourned.

SENATE. TUESDAY, May 10.

Mr. Douglass reported without amendment, House bill for the admission of Wisconsin into the Union, but it was subsequently recommitted to the committee of Territories.

Mr. Bagby’s resolutions declaratory of the powers of the General Government on the subject of slavery, particularly as connected with the admission of new territory, offered some time since, were taken up, and after some discussion, were, on motion of Mr. Badger, laid on the table, 24 to 9. [This is not considered a test vote, as several Senators, who voted in the affirmative, stated explicitly that they so voted to prevent debate, and not on the principles involved.]

The bill to renew certain Naval Pensions for five years, and extend its provisions, was taken up, amended and passed.

Mr. Johnson’s resolution relating to Gens. Pillow and Cushing, was taken up, but Mr. Johnson being absent, its further consideration was postponed to Thursday.

The bill authorizing the Secretaries of War and the Treasury to surrender certain lands held by the United States against the State of Indiana, and receive others, in lieu thereof, was taken up amended and passed.

The bill from the House to refund moneys advanced by States for transportation and subsistence of volunteers, previous to being mustered into the service was read and referred.

House bill, to amend and continue the charter of the city of Washington, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The consideration of the Yucatan bill was then resumed; and Mr. Bagby addressed the Senate.—He did not believe that the government had the power to assume the character of a “great almoner,” and to decide on cases of humanity, as connected with the nations of the earth. But as to the questions of policy involved in this measure, he believed the time had arrived when the Unite States were called upon to assume a substantive and decided position upon the principle involved in the declarations of Mr. Monroe.

He should therefore discuss the question as one of policy solely, and if the objects of humanity were subserved thereby, it would be because they were incidental thereto, and not because they form the basis of the measure itself.

He should take the information communicated by the President, for what it was worth, and no more. He had recommended no precise course of action—he had simply given certain information, leaving it to congress to adopt such measures as in their wisdom they might deem proper and necessary.

Mr. B. reiterated to some extent the views given yesterday by Mr. Calhoun, as to the state of things under which the declarations of Mr. Monroe were made, and that the object of Mr. Canning was to ascertain whether the great commercial interests of Great Britain would be best promoted by the policy of the Allied Powers, or the policy which was finally suggested. It was, after full deliberation by the British Government, that the communication to our Government was made by Mr. Rush.

When Mr. Bagby had concluded, the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. Jefferson Davis, as modified so as to include the preamble of Mr. Lewis, and it was negatived, yeas 5, nays 26.

The bill was then, as the suggestion of Mr. Clayton, passed over until to-morrow, in the consequence of the number of Senators absent, and with the general understanding that the final vote shall then be taken.

Executive session. Adjourned.

Mr. Rockwell, from the committee on Claims, reported a bill to increase the number of clerks in the Treasury Department. Read twice and committed.

A number of bills, not of general interest, were reported from committees, and read twice and referred, and some others before reported, were read the third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate, extending the privileges of American vessels engaged in trade from one part of the U. States to another, was taken up and passed.

Mr. Hunt, from the Committee on Commerce, reposted a bill making appropriations for certain Marine Hospitals. Read twice.

Mr. Moses Hampton, from the same Committee reported a bill making appropriations for certain rivers and harbors. Read twice.

Senate Bill, to require the holders of Military Land Warrants to compensate the Land Officers for locating the same, was passed.

The bill making appropriations for revolutionary and other pensioners, was again under consideration in Committee of the Whole, reported to the House with amendments, the amendments concurred in, and the bill passed.

A number of Senate bills were read the second time and referred to the appropriate committees.

Senate bill explanatory of the act to raise for a limited time an additional military force, and for other purposes, was read the third time and passed, with an amendment, and returned to the Senate.

The House receded from its amendments to Senate bill amendatory of the act relating to the franking privilege, and to reduce the rates of postage; and the bill accordingly stands passed.

The bill to amend an act granting to Alabama the right to use certain funds to construct a railroad from Brandon, Miss., to the line of that State, nearest Montgomery, so as to allow these funds to be used for the purpose of completing the chain of said railroad from Jackson to Brandon, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. Embree submitted a long resolution, relating to a section of land in the State of Indiana, which was agreed to.

The bill making appropriations for Nay Pensions was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, but the committee rose without coming to any conclusion, and the House adjourned.

REv45i5p4c4, May 19, 1848, Mexican News.

On his departure from the city of Mexico, Gen. Scott received the most brilliant and striking testimonials of affection from his companions in arms.

A friend, in a private letter, writes thus to the N. O. Delta: “Just before Gen. Scott’s departure, he held a levee, which was thronged by all grades of officers, and by many of the private soldiers.—So great was the attendance, that the general was unable to greet them individually, but in a voice which was rendered indistinct by the strong emotions which possessed his manly heart, and with a very perceptible tear trickling down his war-worn features, he bade farewell to all his brave brother soldiers, and wished them many years of happiness, and a safe and speedy return to their families.” The scene was a stirring and impressive one. Many a brave heart that had withstood the storms of war, and defied its thousand perils was melted with feelings that sought relief in tears. The veteran who had, in his short but unparalleled campaign, swayed and directed that little army, and led it through so many dangers, and over so much difficulty, to such glorious results, was, for the first time, to sever the tie which bound him to his gallant command.

The crowd of officers and soldiers continued to lounge around Gen. Scott’s quarters, until the time of his departure arrived, and when he entered his carriage and waved his handkerchief, there was a profound and expressive sorrow perceptible in the vast assemblage. His carriage was followed for some distance on the road by officers on horseback, and as he passed along by the quarters of the different regiments, crowds of soldiers ran out to greet him, and wished him God speed.—The Star of the 23d says that the night before his departure the general was serenaded by a splendid band of music, who played among other popular airs, that of “Hail to the Chief.” The general appeared on the balcony and bowed his thanks.—but the most affecting scene of all, says the Star, was when we left his house. The rifle guard was drawn up to receive him, and as he passed, and they presented arms to their beloved commander for the last time, they shed tears like children, and so affected was the old hero, that he could scarce get into the carriage.

In the N.O. Delta we find the following letter copied from the Crescent:

JALAPA, MEXICO, April 28, 1848.

My Dear—:

As I may not have time at Vera Cruz, to put pen to paper, I write now, though much fatigued and halt sick with a cold. I am—being too late in the season—pushing on rapidly to embark from the beach, without entering that city, [Vera Cruz.]

I have written ahead to have ready, if possible a vessel to take me directly to the Narrows, below New York, whence I shall proceed, without entering that city, to my family at Elizabethtown, New Jersey.

I have learned on the road, that some of the spirited and patriotic citizens of New Orleans—including, perhaps, the Municipal Authorities—are thinking of taking public notice of my arrival among them; and possibly there may be a few persons in other places on the route to the North, [inland] who would give the long-absent soldier a passing cheer or two. This, my dear sir, is another reason why I should hasten to my family at its home in the sequestered village, fifteen miles this side of New York; for, laboring as I am under the public displeasure of the Executive, it would be highly improper in me, as a soldier, to put myself in the way of provoking a cheer or shout from my warm-hearted country-men. Should there be any such intention in New Orleans, as I have alluded to, please make all necessary explanations and apologies for me; for I make a great sacrifice of feeling, to a sense of public duty, by avoiding on my return home some hundreds of personal friends whom I should have the chance of greeting by the inland route.

Always my dear--., your friend,
WINFIELD SCOTT.

Peoples, of the Star, thus parts with the old Hero:

“That the winds may waft him quickly to his native shores, and that Heaven may shower its choicest blessings upon him for the remainder of his days, is the prayer of one who has watched his brilliant career from Vera Cruz to the palace of this city.”

[Rev45i5p4c5, May 19, 1848, An Anomaly!]

We have received the first No. of the Democrat(!) published at Fellowsville, Preston county, Va., which flies at its mast-head, Henry Clay for President, and Gen. Scott, for Vice President. It is a strange evidence of Gen. Taylor’s popularity in Virginia, this establishment of a Clay and Scott paper, which goes the whole length of Whiggery, and “emphatically” declares itself “in favor of a Tariff for Protection which beneficial scheme” it regards “as a fundamental principle of the Whig creed!” In another passage, it describes Mr. Clay “as the advocate and champion of our principles—the head and front of which is Protection to American Industry,” and asks, “where is the Whig throughout the length of this Union, who does not wish to see the Executive Department of this Government adorned by his occupancy?” Such a test would rule-off a large number of professing Whigs!

We notice the advent of this Clay Democrat stranger, principally to urge our friends in the North West to sleep not, lest “the enemy sow their pestilent tares by the way side.” We trust that our friend Kidwell of Marion, will soon have his press in battery to check this invasion of the “ultra Whig” politicians, and to put down Whiggery in whatever Protean shapes it may attempt to insinuate itself into the heart of the gallant North West. To win the battle, we must have no drones, no idlers—but every Democrat, officer or private, regular or volunteer, must go forth armed with
The views of our correspondent Mustang, on this subject, are perhaps more reliable than anything we can gather from our files. All our officers concur in the probability—some think, absolute certainty—of a speedy peace with Mexico. Pena y Pena, to make up for the absences which still prevent the action of Congress, has issued a proclamation reducing the number of deputies necessary to form a quorum. This is truly a Mexican device. New Mexico, California, and Yucatan are excluded, by this proclamation, form any right of representation. This is considered a high handed violation of the Constitution; and El Progreso, of Queretaro, a strong war paper, is out against the Government for this arbitrary proceeding.

In the meantime, a ridiculous dispute has arisen respecting the escort of Commissioners Sever and Clifford to Queretaro. The Mexican can profess to be alarmed at the idea of their being escorted by American troops, and Messrs. Sever and Clifford very properly insist upon selecting their own escort. This absurd dispute, however, has been probably determined, as we see those efficient corps, the Rifles and 3d Dragoons, under Major Polk, have been designated as the escort of our Commissioners. The Mexicans were terribly frightened by a rumor, that General Butler and his whole Division was to visit them, and back Messrs. Sever and Clifford.

The opposition to the treaty seems to grow small by degrees, and beautifully less.

Bustamente is sustaining the Government with his influence, which is deservedly great. Some of the papers are still opposing the Treaty. El Progreso is the most influential, as it is published in the capital. It says, that "though the United States offer us two millions, they take fifty from us." It urges various reasons why the treaty should not be ratified, and among other things says the Government is check-mated—places in a position where it can neither make peace (there being no Congress) nor war.

The following, which, we hope, is true, shows that the Mexicans themselves know what is the best mode of managing their own Government.—El Progreso, of the 20th ult., says:

We learn, on the best authority, that an express reached this city yesterday from Mexico, with the alarming intelligence that the two commissioners, Messrs. Sevier and Clifford, would soon arrive in this city, with a view of intimating to our Government, that if, by the 10th of May, the treaty is not ratified by our Congress, as modified by the President and Senate of the United States, hostilities will commence between the two nations."

El Monitor, of the 22d, has the following in reference to the peace question:

"Let the morose and fastidious representatives, who have not thus far made their appearance at Queretaro observe that the rumor current for a few days past, that there are mercenaries who protect the interest of the United States, has already begun to create suspicions that will certainly recoil upon them. Let them also bear in mind that in Monday next the Commissioners of the United States leave this city, with a competent armed force, with a determination, as we are informed on authority, that the question of peace or war shall be immediately decided upon without extending the stipulated time a single moment. That period, which expires on the 2d of June, is too short; and in order that there should be no failure, the treaty must be approved within fifteen days, or implements of war must be immediately got in readiness to repel hostilities, which will immediately commence. The subject is a grave one, and deserves the immediate attention of the Representatives. If they are inefficient, they will be held responsible before God and man. But we hope for the contrary. We are certain there is no one capable of selling himself, and he who fails to resort to his post, must not complain, if he receives the unfavorable judgment of the world."

We find in the Washington Union a note from the Hon. F.W. Bowdon, transmitting the following letter, which he had received from Gen. Worth, in reply to a letter he had addressed him, asking his opinions in regard to the various questions which divided the two great parties of the country:

TACUBAYA, (Mexico,) April 12th, 1848.

My Dear Sir:—Your favor of the 18th ultimo reached me last evening. The return courier leaves in a few hours, and as another opportunity will not probably occur in the next two weeks, I hope you will excuse me for substituting the enclosed copies of replies to two other friends, as answers, in part, to the inquiries you have addressed to me. To many communications on the same subject from citizens of different States, these are the only answers, other than simple acknowledgements of civility, that I have felt at liberty to make. In each case, the writer was already named—or looked to be named—a member of the Democratic Convention, to meet in May. To that extent these replies embody, distinctly and truly, my sentiments and opinions.—

Not much doing on our side of the house—all being united in the success of a good man, it makes but little difference who he is, so that the Republican creed is fairly represented in his past life. We will elect him, and trust to the future for the continuance of the same sanative regulations. Many members of the Baltimore Convention are here, and more coming in daily. All are elated at the prospect of a harmonious meeting of friends of the republican party. One thing, Messrs. Editors; there will be no Mexican allies in the Democratic Convention. That is a glorious reflection. It is an American triumph of free and liberal principles. No affinity of feeling and sympathy for the enemies of our country will be there:—all will be united in the on e great cause of up holding the interest, the honor of the nation.

But, Messrs. Editors, who will compose the Whig Convention? Time will answer that. I have no wish to anticipate them in their hallucinations;—they have, as a party, acted badly enough, and I presume their conduct this session of Congress is a guarantee that not much improvement is expected of them in the coming contest.

I hope to see you at Baltimore, as it is understood you are a delegate, and will attend. Being no delegate, I contemplate looking in upon you, to see that things are managed to insure success. Indeed, our friends in the Convention are not so foolish as to waste their strength against each other, and let their political enemies bear off the palm of victory. I have no doubt but that you will see all united in the Baltimore Convention, with a long and steady pull, for the success of the Republican candidate. The surest way for success, and united success, will be, for delegates to be trammeled. Let them meet for consultation, open, free, and unbiased; let it be spontaneous and united. No danger, then, of defeat for the Democracy. United, we are invincible; divided, we are gone, as sure as two and two make four.

We are, however, Messrs. Editors, sure of this, that, in the division of the Whig Convention, if Gen. Taylor is not the nominee, his friends propose to run him as an independent candidate. I was distinctly informed of this last evening. The information is considered authoritative, you may rest assured.

"Union," in your last number, pleases me very much. He comes to the proper issue, and after the nomination, the subject will be noticed farther.

Mr. Trist and gen. Cadwalader are looked for daily. I am desirous to see Don Nicholas.—He will be somewhat of a "lion" in this city—and we hope, if he is in any better humor than when before the court martial, that he will be an acceptable visitor to more persons than one, on his arrival. Yours, NED EVANS.

REv45i5p4c6, May 19, 1848, To the Editors of the Enquirer: Washington, May 13, 1848.

Messrs. Editors: The Yucatan question still drags slowly on through the Senate. The old Federal scheme of delay and opposition to the Government is being preached, by the day, against humanity, against the Democratic party, and against truth and the light of reason staring the opposition in the Senate full in the face. But what care they, the interest of the country, the feelings of humanity are nothing, so that tirades can be promulgated in their place, for the coming presidential campaign, mixed up with all kinds of willful and malicious assertions? Witness the following paragraph, uttered in the Senate on Thursday by Senator John Davis of Massachusetts. He said:

"He denied that the representations made here, that the controversy in Yucatan is between CASTES of men, were warranted by the information before them. Of the 520,000 Indians in Yucatan, only 120,000 were engaged in this warfare. The remainder were peaceable, engaging in no way in this controversy. The mixed portion of the population, too, had generally united with the Indians in this warfare. Therefore, it was not true that it was a war of the races—between the white and colored population of Yucatan."

The foregoing is the language of one of the Federal Senators from Massachusetts. See with what unblushing hardihood assertions are made, that have no foundation for fact. It is impossible to reason or argue with such a man as John Davis of Massachusetts. He has long been engaged in the same vocation, being an editor of a Tory Sullivan paper during the war of 1812. I remember him well. It is not my purpose to go back to those times, but only to remind you that Senator John Davis is the same man who advocated the traitor principles of the Hartford Convention period; and if he has ever supported any measure since, in which his country has benefited by his vote, it had been more by accident, than with nay good intentions on his part.

Permit me, Messrs. Editors, to quote a short article from the Boston Traveller of Tuesday, as an entire, positive, direct refutation of the assertion of Mr. John Davis in the Senate, in reference to the insurrection in Yucatan. The information is derived from Captain Spates, of brig Otis Norcross, from Laguna, April 10th, which says:

"At the last accounts, the Indians were within one day’s march of Campeachy, in vast numbers and with no abatement of their design of a general massacre of their opponents. Their war cry was 'Death to both black and white—man, woman, and child—all save the red man.' They claim to be 250,000 strong, and say the country rightfully belongs to them, and they will possess it, and ensure possession by the massacre of all their opponents. They will undoubtedly take the town, unless assistance arrives from other quarters."
The above quotation speaks for itself, and is as true as it is just, in refutation of all Senator Jno. Davis has said on the Yucatan question.

Senator Niles, also, has lent a hand to the same subject, and pretty much on the same plan, of affording relief to the suffering people of Yucatan. While he was speaking, in opposition to the Yucatan bill, Col. Jefferson Davis remarked to Gen. Dix, that we might as well send a cargo of spades to the poor Yucatecos at once,—for they would need them to dig graves, in consequence of the delay in sending aid and comfort in another shape. In observation there was more truth than poetry. Yes, Messrs. Editors, this delay is in fact a denial to suffering humanity. But so we go.

In my last there was a wish expressed that the Whigs would at least adhere to Gen. Taylor until after the meeting of the Democratic Convention; but, sirs, I was doomed to a very serious mistake in my expectation. The Whig State Convention of Maryland has lifted Mr. Clay in advance of gen. Taylor as pretty considerable number of feet, and if old "Rough and Ready" does not "gather up" by quick step, the great "Embodiment" will outstride him and win the States at Philadelphia, on the 7th June. He must be up and doing. Perhaps another "letter" will be forthcoming. These "letters" are wonderful machines in building up Presidents.---Sometimes "letters" let them down a peg or two; well, if such is the fact, they must be careful, what they write, or what is written, which is all the same thing in these days of conventions, of fun, frolic, approbation and disappointment. Mr. Clay, up to this evening, had decidedly the advantage of Gen. Taylor, and it is all owing to the decisive preference expressed for him, by the Baltimore Whig Convention of Maryland. And perhaps, as things now are, they may continue, until the Democratic party have made their nomination. But there is no telling how long the present preponderance may continue.

The house has passed the bill for the admission of Wisconsin as a State. This makes thirty States. What a commentary on Federal croakers! The purchase of Louisiana was condemned by them: Florida also. Some of the same party has spasms on the admission of Texas; and as the area of freedom is enlarged, with a few additions from Mexico, I have no doubt but some of the "old blue light stock," will have "fits outright." I hope they may. If a few of them were fed now, like unto Nebuchadnezzar of old, perhaps their returning reason would make better patriots of them than they are at present. It is the impression that the Senate will pass the bill of admission to Wisconsin at an early day next week, as it had been read twice, and now ready for final action in that body.

I must, in closing, en passant, congratulate you on the glorious triumph of Republican principles in the "Old Dominion" at the recent election.—Virginia, to be sure, must be vigilant—not only against the Whigs, but ever watchful of their allies the Mexican advocates in Congress. Your representative in Congress belong to the latter class of politicians, if his votes and the opinions of Mexicans are any index to his position. Those who have acted against three country in, and throughout this war, will be remembered, and duly noticed in after days. Yours, NED EVANS.

REv45i5p4c7, May 19, 1848, City of Mexico, January 10, 1848.

My Dear Sir: In acknowledging your favor of November 12th, it is due to candor to say that I am not aware of ever having entertained a desire for preferment out of my own profession, probably because of conscious want of qualification, and distaste for the means whereby preferment is usually attained.

The subjects you pay me the compliment to present, are of high national concern and interest, in respect to which my humble opinions are equally unimportant and uninfluential; and it is only in courtesy to a generous, although qualification, and distaste for the means whereby preferment is usually attained.

1st. "What are your views of the Mexican war, and do you believe it an unjust one?"

War, ever to be deplored, should be avoided so long as may be consistent with national honor and national rights. In my opinion, there had been no war in our history, (always excepting that for independence, which stands out, and will through all time, as case buy itself,) nor in that of a people, commenced under greater provocation, or waged with higher humanity. Regarding, then, this war as eminently just, I sincerely hope it may be the pleasure of government, sustained by the people to prosecute it with vigor, until ample satisfaction for indignities, and full indemnity for sacrifices be received.

2d. "Are you in favor of, or opposed to, the chartering a United States Bank?"

When the was agitated as a measure of financial and political expediency, I looked no further into the subject than to keep myself informed generally on matters of public interest. During its struggles for a re-charter, and when withering and reeling under the blows of the patriot President Jackson, my judgment was instructed that such an institution, however wisely restricted or cautiously guarded, must, of necessity, have within itself elements dangerous to public and private virtue, of not to the appropriate and healthful action of government. So the people seem to have regarded and decided the question, and it is difficult for them to conceive a state of affairs to tempt any sane, or to excuse any honest man, in the "effort to give it vitality again."

3d. "Are you in favor of the present independent treasury?"
Decidedly in favor of the principle;—of its working in respect to economy convenience, in receipt and disbursement of the public moneys, uniformed;—although under the impression that in those respects, (its machinery,) modifications may be desirable; and if so, that the wisdom of Congress will apply the remedy.

4th. "Do you favor, or oppose, the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the different States?"

Were I in a position to vote, or exercise personal influence, oppose it to the uttermost. However honestly designed, it is difficult to imagine a scheme fraught with greater evil, or more ingeniously devised to corrupt individuals and masses—States and Congress. Besides, will not such a disposition of the proceeds operate a fraudulent stewardship of the great trust confided to government for the general good?

5th. "Are you in favor of, or opposed to, the tariff of 1846?"

Absence, since the passage of that act, has deprived me of the opportunity of informing myself, by observation, or by communion with others, as to its practical operation. As a general principle of political economy, applicable to our institutions and circumstances, I should hope to see a tariff for revenue, critically adjusted to the various interests and rights of every part of the country, limited strictly to the means necessary to an economical administration of the affairs of the country, including every proper and constitutional internal improvement—protection regarded as purely incidental—trusting, nevertheless, to see the day, and that not remote, when trade will be free and unfettered; when no interest of our country will need, or desire, aught of protection against foreign competition.

I have thus, my dear sir, in a plain way, frankly answered your questions, truthfully, if not satisfactorily. Cordially reciprocating your kind expression of personal regard, believe me, very respectfully, your obedient servant, W. J. WORTH. [to Joseph Nill, Esq., Chambersburg, Pa.]

REv45i7p1c1, May 26, 1848, Indian War in Oregon.

Four Battles—The Whites Victorious—Massacre of Missionaries!

In the Pittsburg Gazette, we find the following important telegraphic dispatch, dated Louisville, May 21, 1848,

By the arrival of Major Meek, from the West, we have late and important news from Oregon, where all is confusion and bloodshed between the Whites and Indians. Four powerful tribes have united, and commenced a deadly war. Four battles took place in January, in three of which the Whites were successful in beating their enemy. Five hundred Whites fought a body of two thousand Indians a whole day, when the Indians retreated, after wounding a great number of Whites.

On the 29th of November, a most horrid and brutal massacre was committed by the Cayuse Indians, at the Presbyterian Mission, at the Wallah­Wallah Valley. Dr. White, his man and wife, with eighteen others, were killed, and sixty or seventy taken prisoners. The houses of the missionaries were burned to the ground. The unfortunate prisoners were subsequently ransomed, through the agency of Peter Sken Ogden, chief factor of the Hudson Bay Company.

Major Meek pushed up the river yesterday, on his way to Washington, with dispatches for the government, asking for immediate aid on the part of the Oregon settlers.

REv45i7p1c6, May 26, 1848, The Case of General Pillow.

The Jackson Mississippian, speaking of the trial of General Pillow, says: "We have examined in the most impartial temper, the testimony of general Scott before the court of inquiry in the case of General Pillow, and we can arrive at no other conclusion, than that the proceedings against General Pillow were commenced, and have been continued with a view to destroy the reputation of that officer, and thereby injure the President of the United States. Numerous letters have been written by officers of the army, some laudatory of General Scott—others laudatory of various officers, and yet only the one signed "Leonidas," in laudation of General Pillow, is seized upon as the ground-work on which to raise a court of inquiry and disgrace a gallant officer.

"We do not say that Gen. Scott commenced this heartless prosecution of one who had frequently periled his life under his orders, in a spirit of sheer malignity, but we can have only one opinion as to the instigators of it, be they whom they may. WE believe that Trist was the main instigator—for it appears that his intimacy with General Scott, dated from his falling out with General Pillow; and, further, that his friendship for General Pillow continued until that officer wrote to President Polk remonstrating against the surrender of the territory between the Neuces and the Rio Grande, which Trist was assenting to in his consultation with the Mexican Commissioners."

REv45i7p2c4, May 26, 1848, Gen. Lewis Cass (of Michigan,)

THE NOMINEE OF THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION FOR THE OFFICE OF PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

We learned by Telegraph yesterday evening that the democratic Convention had nominated Gen. Lewis Cass for the office of President of the United States—he receiving 179 votes out of 254—nine more than two-thirds of that body.

We congratulate the country and the Democratic party upon this grand result. The man who has stood in the front rank of our party in the Senate of the United States, sustaining upon all occasions, with signal ability, the prominent measures of the present Administration, and vigorously and successfully meeting its foes—the man whose fame stands recorded in the annals of his country’s history—as the brave and gallant soldier in the late war with Great Britain—as the able representative of his nation at the Court of France, foiling by his skill and diplomacy the European nations in forming the designed quintuple Treaty—this is the man the Democratic Convention presents to the people of the country and to the Democracy to rally upon. Pure and spotless in his character as a man and as a statesman—the field and the cabinet can both lay claim to him—he is emphatically a civil-military man. While he is not unacquainted with military, he is well fitted by education for civil stations. In the thrilling language of one of the orators in the Convention, (Mr. Humphreys,) we present to the people of the United States—

“One standing with one foot on the lakes, and with the other producing an effect in France—whose character is as pure and unsullied as the Alpine flower on the bosom of the eternal snow. [Great applause.] One who, at the darkest period of our history, in the war of 1812, when treason stalked at noonday even in the streets of the capital of the nation. [Applause, in which the remainder of the sentence was lost.] Born of humble parentage in the State of New Hampshire, we him going forth as a pioneer to the West on his own hook; and there, on the very frontiers of civilized life, we witness the display of that self-reliance—that sturdy independence of character—that indomitable perseverance, which afterwards raised him step by step to high offices in the State, and now surrounded him with an overwhelming sentiment of popular favor.”

We have not heard how the matters in reference to the New York delegation have been adjusted, nor anything definite in regard to the Vice Presidency. Rumor speaks of Stevenson, Mason, Butler, King, &c.

In conclusion, we must say we were never in finer spirits. With our flag to the breeze, upon which are inscribed the known and well-defined principles of our party—and with a man every way worth of his country and our cause—respected at home and honored abroad—victory again assuredly awaits us!

REv45i7p2c4, May 26, 1848, Important from Mexico. Rejection of Treaty.

We publish below, from the Charleston Courier, highly important news from Mexico. The intelligence if the rejection of the Treaty was received by express to that paper 24 hours in advance of the mail. The accounts received by this mail confirm those published yesterday.—The news, however, is still contradictory—and we await with some impatience further details, which may be expected this morning.

The reader will also find annexed interesting intelligence from Yucatan. It will be remembered, however, that we have already published later accounts from this distracted State, which represent the treaty as having been broken—the towns of Iturbide, Cibachen and Bacalar had been taken after much bloodshed, and that in every direction the terror-stricken inhabitants were flying towards the sea coast, closely pursued by the ruthless savages.

REv45i7p2c5, May 26, 1848, There is an End to Peace.

The Government of Pena y Pena has finished in a tragical manner. Ever since yesterday morning this news was rumored—those who circulated it referring to an express arrived the night before last from Queretaro, and to respectable houses of the city of Mexico.

Gen. Bustamente, in a well-formed combination with his companions, Cortazar, Almonte, and Paredes, prepared a revolution with such secrecy and success that the blow was successfully struck. Pena y Pena, Rosa, Anaya, Osero, Pedraza, and many other Deputies and Senators, have been obliged to fly and seek a hiding place.

Almonte, in conformity with his wishes, fills the Presidency. The other three generals are the head of 8,000 men, and the head of the new army is Bustamente. The new administration count upon three millions of dollars, which have been furnished by sundry rich Mexican and foreign merchants, who have also bound themselves to pay every month one million and a half of dollars during the duration of the war. The Government also counts upon 80,000 muskets, which have for some time been collected with zeal and secrecy.

Finally, a commission preceded by an extraordinary courier, has started to call back Santa Anna. The nation recovers its life, courage, and conceives great hopes. Was will be carried everywhere.

These are the particulars of the interesting news reported and confirmed yesterday; we, however, know positively that the whole is a fabrication.

REv45i7p2c4, May 26, 1848, By Telegraph. New Orleans, May 18, 8½ P.M.

[From the Mobile Herald and Tribune, May 18.]

The steamship Eudora has arrived below with later news from Vera Cruz. She sailed thence on the 12th inst. She was hailed by a tow boat on the river, which reports that the treaty has been rejected by the Congress of Mexico.

In Yucatan hostilities have been resumed, and another cruel massacre by the Indians is reported.

There have been 4,000 bales of cotton sold today. The market is steadier. Middlings sold at 5c; good 5 5/8 c. Flour lower, Illinois $4 ½ (?) a $45/8 per barrel. No change in other articles.

REv45i7p2c4, May 26, 1848, (From the N. O. Picayune, Extra, May 18, 1 P.M.) Late and Important From Mexico.

A Quorum of the Mexican Congress at last Assembled at Queretaro—Conflicting Opinions upon the Peace Question.

By the arrival of the schooner May, this morning, we have received Vera Cruz dates to the 7th inst., the day of her departure, and our correspondence from the city of Mexico to the 2d.

Shortly after the arrival of the May it was bruited about that all hopes of a peace were at an end. The shortness of the time allowed us to prepare a slip before the mail closes, does not admit of our examining the extensive files which we have received by this arrival. We publish two letters from our special correspondent, which do not present matters in so gloomy a light—though they contain much to keep alive apprehension.

The Eudora is reported below with later advices. If she arrives in season for a postscript we shall add a word to this slip.

[Special Correspondence of the Picayune.]

City of Mexico, April 30, 1848.

The inclosed (sic) letter of your correspondent at Queretaro should have been in my hands last night, but some irregularity in the post office here prevented my receiving it until this morning.

You will see your correspondent announces the important fact that a quorum is at Queretaro at last, and that Congress only awaits the arrival of the American commissioners to commence its deliberations. Why they should wait for the arrival of the commissioners to commence their sittings is more than I know. Their duty, as required by the constitution is to elect a President, and this before entering into a consideration of the treaty. The commissioners are waiting to hear officially that Congress is prepared to sit before they leave for Queretaro. As soon as that fact is announced to them by the Mexican Government they will start. They expect to receive a communication by the mail which arrives form Queretaro on the 2d of next month.

Last night the city was thrown into a state of great excitement by the circulation of a letter purporting to be from Queretaro, of which the following is a translation:

Popular Revolution against the Government at Queretaro. —A respectable gentleman has received by extraordinary express from Queretaro a letter which among other things says:

"Queretaro, April 27, 1848, 11at night.

"Dear Friend—The people have become weary with suffering the oppression and sport of petty tyrants. This at least is the case with the Mexicans; and, by the omnipotent exercise of its will, discarding what is called the General Government of the nation, established at Queretaro, it has prostrated to the earth its treacherous oppressors. At 9 o'clock on the night of this day, without any resistance, it proclaimed the only plan which in the present circumstances can save the country, viz: 'War, and war without truce or quarter, until an honorable peace is conquered!' Such is the programme of this happy revolution, at the head of which are the distinguished Gens. Almonte, Butamente, and Paredes, to whose voice all who are Mexicans, rather than partisans, will respond.

"The tocsin of liberty has sounded at least.—Sons of Hidalgo and Iturbide, awake! The invincible hand of Providence points out to you the road by which every nation on the globe will occupy its true place. Mexicans! Fulfill your destiny!"

The whole story proves to be a fabrication, still I am informed by old residents here that the circulation of such stories in print is the usual precursor of revolutions, and many circumstances render it within the range of possibility that the government of Pena y Pena, without popularity and without resources, may be ousted from power before the treaty can be ratified. The military are demanding pay, which Pena y Pena in the present condition of the treasury can hardly give them. The advices from Queretaro show—if betting can be taken as an index—a division among the members of Congress on the subject of peace. Rubio (whom your correspondent says has made a bet of $5,000 that there will be no peace) is one of the wealthiest and most influential men in Mexico. He is a Spaniard, and for the last ten or twelve years, by means of his wealth and his power of intrigue, which are said to be great, has whenever he pleased controlled the government that has existed in the country. He is, too, the staunch friend of Paredes, and then Paredes was President was his main stay. I have been surprised to learn that a man of Rubio's immense wealth, and with the stake he had in the country, was opposed to peace, as he must know that the nationality of the country is lost if the treaty now at Queretaro is not ratified. However, the owner of some of the largest cotton factories in Mexico and may desire the extension of the American Government over the whole country to give that security to industry which experience has proved never will exist under the Mexican Government. He is a large commercial speculator besides, and like many others of that class, may be opposed to peace at the present time, lest the goods they have ordered from abroad may arrive after the treaty has been ratified, and when the Mexican tariff will come into operation again. This has been suggested to me as one reason for his opposition to peace by an old and intelligent resident of this city, who knows him well. From what I hear of the character and power of Rubio, I attach great importance to the position he takes in regard to the treaty. The Monitor Republicano, published in this city, a strong advocate of peace, although treating the letter to which I have referred as a hoax, at the same time tacitly confesses that the government has reason to beware of its enemies. Enclosed you will find the article of the Monitor on the subject.

There are numerous rumors afloat here in relation to money and munitions coming into the country to prosecute the war. I have very good authority for stating that both arms and ammunitions are being received through Acapulco from South America in considerable quantities.

Queretaro, April 27.

American deserters are continually arriving here; during the last three days twenty soldiers presented themselves to the Mexican Government, and were immediately incorporated in the San Patricio Company.

The garrison of Queretaro is composed of 820 men of all arms. Eight hundred men have deserted, with arms and baggage, from the army of reserve, 2,500 strong, which the Government had sent against the insurgents at Sierra Gordo.

A wager of $10,000 has been made for and against peace; several Deputies are concerned in the bet, and it is said that Mr. Rubio, the principal better, has staked $5,000 against the peace.

The number of Deputies is completed. The arrival of the American Commissioners if looked for in order to open the Congress. The Consuls of the foreign powers are all here. Anxiety is at its highest pitch, and the deliberations of Congress are longed for as is the coming of the Messiah.

It has been transpired form the meeting held by the officers of the artillery that they have made a demand on the Government to receive their pay in the same manner that members of Congress receive it, and that they have made an assessment to furnish supplies to Landero, but the nature of these supplies is not known.

Between twenty and thirty desertions took place from the army here on Saturday night.—You will recollect that your correspondent at Queretaro some time since stated that a plan had been organized the effect a desertion of several hundreds form the army in and about his city, and that the parties who were to effect it were soon to leave. It has been discovered that the head quarters of the schemers are at Guadaloupe. They give each man that deserts as high as a hundred dollars. Measures have been taken to trap the gentlemen. Several faithful men have been allowed to go to them as deserters, and these men are communicating information of their movements. D. S.

REv45i7p2c5, May 26, 1848, From Vera Cruz.

The Maria Burt, Capt. Riddle, arrived last evening, from Vera Cruz the 6th, Tampico the 8th, Brazos the 10th, Port Lavaca the 11th, and Galveston the 14th inst. She brings no later news. Three companies of Texas Rangers, who came from Vera Cruz in the Maria Burt, were landed in Texas, part at Port Lavaca and part at Galveston.

Conclusion of a Treaty of Peace.

By the arrival last evening of the Yucatan schooner Aparecida, Capt. Espinola, we are in possession of late and highly interesting intelligence from Yucatan, which will afford much pleasure to those who have been lamenting the troubles that have occurred on that coast. The Aparecida left Campeachy on the 2nd inst., and Sisal on the 11th, and brings us dates from Merida of the 29th ultimo. The reports contained in the papers and the verbal information furnished our reporter by Capt. Espinola are somewhat at variance, and we are a little at a loss to reconcile them. “La Union,” of Merida, of the 25th April, publishes a treaty of peace concluded on the 19th of April, at Zucacal, by Commissioners appointed by Sr. D. Miguel Barbachano, Governor of Yucatan, and commissioners appointed by D. Jacinto Pat, commander-in-chief of the revolted Indians, and ratified by both parties on the 23d of April, at Tecul.

Captain Espinola reports, however, that on the day he left Sisal, news was received to the effect that Pat, with his forces, were within eight leagues of Merida, from which he judged that tranquility had not been restored, but that hostilities again been renewed. It is quite probable that Pat's forces were remaining in the vicinity of Merida until the terms of the treaty were complied with, in accordance with the 9th article. Captain E. also reports that about twenty-eights vessels form different nations were off the coast, removing the inhabitants of Yucatan to Campeachy. We strongly incline to the belief that the treaty concluded the difficulties, as the insurgents seem to have had every thing that they desired granted them by the commissioners.

We have not room for the whole treaty, but furnish our readers with a synopsis of it, by which it will be perceived that great concessions have been made by the authorities. La Union has a long editorial upon the subject, and rejoices at the establishment of peace, complimenting Governor Barbachano upon his promptness in ratifying it.

ART. 1. Abolishes the personal tax upon whites as well as Indians, from the ages of sixteen to seventy years.

1. Establishes the baptismal fee at three reals and the marriage fee at ten reals for whites as well as Indians.
2. Accords to the Indians the privilege of clearing the mountain lands for agricultural purposes, permits them to establish their ranchos at the edge of the villages on uncultivated lands, rent free, which are never hereafter to be sold.
3. The Indians, to receive, through their chief, Don Jacinto Pat, all the arms which were taken from them by the Government, to the number of 2,500, any deficiency to be supplied by the purchase of new ones—all the arms now in existence to be immediately restored upon the ratification of the treaty. All the arms now in the possession of the Indians to be retained by them, and all moveables and effects captured by them to be retained and considered as their property, subject to no future claim.
4. Considering that his Exmo. Gov. Barbachano is the only one charged with the ratification, fulfillment and faithful maintenance of the terms of this treaty, it is agreed that he shall remain in the existence of his supreme power during the term of his natural life, agreeable to the wishes of the people of Yucatan, and that the troops now under Don Jacinto Pat will be ready to take up arms again to maintain him in power, if necessary.
5. From the moment of the ratification of the treaty, Don Jacinto Pat, chief of the insurgents, to be Governor and Commandant of all the Captains of native Indian troops of Yucatan, and, in conjunction with his Exmo. Governor Barbachano, to decide upon the best method of establishing harmony between the whites and Indians, and of administering justice for the good of the whole.
6. All servants who are in debt to their masters to be relieved from the same, whether engaged in the war or not, but debt hereafter contracted to be liquidated by personal service.
8. As soon as the ratification of the treaty is completed, the belligerent forces shall mutually retire to their homes, leaving merely such forces as are necessary to keep order and establish tranquility and harmony in the several villages.
The Philadelphia papers, announce the arrival, on Sunday morning, of GEN. Scott, in the brig St. Petersburg, from Vera Cruz.—Messrs. Frazier, of the revenue service, met him at quarantine, and proceeded immediately with him to Elizabethtown, N. J.

REv45i8p4c5, May 26, 1848, Important from Mexico.

No Prospects of Peace.—The schr. Velasco arrived last evening from Vera Cruz, which she left on the 8th May. We may learn from Capt. Decker, of the Velasco, that before he left Vera Cruz, it was reported and generally believed there that the Congress at Queretaro had dispersed without acting on the Treaty; and it was universally admitted by all classes, Mexicans and Americans, that there would have either to occupy the whole country, or to retire from it entirely.

Since writing the above, we have received the Vera Cruz Free American of the 5th inst., for which we are indebted to the polite attention of Mr. Boyle, of the firm of Boyle & Maccorry, merchants, of Vera Cruz. It contains no news of importance; but is not the less acceptable.

The Free American speaks indignantly of the conduct of the Mexican authorities, who, it is stated, are doing all they can to humiliate the American citizens in Vera Cruz, and calls on the Governor to investigate the matter, and see that justice is done. It seems that since the commencement of the Armistice, the Mexican authorities have resorted to all sorts of petty annoyances, and, as far as they dare, have done everything they could to gratify their revengeful feelings.

The British man-of-war Electra arrived at Vera Cruz on the 4th inst. from Laguna. [N. Orleans Delta, May 16.]

REv45i8p1c6, May 30, 1848, Alexandria Volunteers.

At an election held by the Alexandria Volunteers, Virginia Regiment, at Saltillo, Mexico, on the 18th of April, John A. Higdon was elected First Lieutenant in place of T. W. Ashby, resigned. The officers and men of the Alexandria volunteers are all well.

REv45i8p1c7, May 30, 1848, (From the Clinton Democrat.) The Voice of a Whig Soldier.

Extract from a letter to the editor of this paper, by John W. Ross, of the Mounted Rifle Regiment, who, in 1844, was the editor and publisher of the Clinton County Whig, a paper at that time published in this place:

CITY OF MEXICO, April 7, 1848.

 I am proud to see the Clinton Democrat still floating above the waves. You are right, "go ahead." The wishes of such men as Mr. Pollock, in Congress, in regard to the withdrawal of this army to a mere defensive line, and the anti-war speeches of Mr. Clay, etc., wont go down here. The men who have supported the Stars and Stripes of the United States even to the enemy's capital, will at least place their foot upon such foul ingratitude.

Respectfully, your friend, JOHN W. ROSS.

This is the voice, says the Democrat, of a brave soldier who had fought every inch of his way from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico. In 1844 he was the editor of a Whig paper in this place, and warmly supported Messrs. Clay and Pollock, whom he now so bitterly condemns.—He was an ardent Whig; like all others of his party, he would have made any sacrifice to place Henry Clay in the Presidential chair in 1844; his time, his labor, his money and his talents were freely devoted to secure the election of the proud Statesman in whom all the hopes of this party were centred—he adored his party, he loved its candidate, and wept bitterly a this defeat. But [to him at least] even Henry Clay has changed!—When his idol turns his back upon his country, with manly voice he denounced him. The noble spirit that led him to the defence of his country, in the front rank of one of the most daring regiments in the army, could not brook the craven.

No man rejoiced more at the several successes of Mr. Pollock, in this Congressional district, than John W.
Ross. Yet now no one more bitterly regrets it. No personal consideration has produced this change—the power of patriotism has wrought it!

This distinguished Mexican General arrived at Kingston on the 5th instant, in the Spanish brig Martinez. The General had taken up his residence at a splendid mansion near the race course at Kingston. The Despatch says: “It is said that the General will spend a few months in this city, and proceed afterwards to Venezuela.”

In the Senate, Mr. Bradbury presented the petition of Clifford S. Worthing, asking a mail route from Augusta to Bangor, Maine.

Mr. Benton presented a petition from J. Quinn Thornton, praying the establishment of a Territorial Government in Oregon; Which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Dix presented a petition from the steam navigation companies of New Jersey, New York, Boston, and Providence, Rhode Island, asking remuneration for maintaining a light boat on the Eel Grass shoal, in Fisher's Island Sound.

Mr. Niles, from the committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill for the relief of Frick & haddock, accompanied by a report. The bill was read a first time.

A resolution submitted by Mr. Niles, some days since, calling upon the Secretary of the treasury to communicate whether there had been any violation of the Sub-treasury Law in the payment of interest, was taken up; and, after a few words from Mr. Niles and Mr. Jefferson Davis, the resolution was agreed to.

The bills form the House of Representatives were severally read a first and second time, and referred.

On motion of Mr. Bill,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with a list of the Creek Indian warriors who were killed or wounded, or who died in the service of the United States, during the late war in Florida, with the dates when they were severally killed or wounded, or when they died; together with a statement of the arrears of pay due to each of them, respectively.

The Senate then adjourned till Monday.

In the House, Mr. Wick introduced a bill to prohibit the importation of slaves into the District of Columbia, with certain exceptions; but, upon a call of the House, it was ascertained that only 120 members were present, and a motion to adjourn was agreed to—yeas 69, nays 56.

The Mexican intelligence which we publish below will be read with great interest. I is highly important, inasmuch as it is understood that peace between Mexico and the United States is now certain. The message of the President of Mexico to the assembled Congress places the position of affairs in such a light as will doubtless bring conviction to the minds of the members of that body, that true policy, nay, sheer necessity, dictates but one course to pursue—the ratification of the treaty—to preserve the nationality of their country.

Arrival of the Steamship Tay.

The Royal Mail steamship Tay, Capt. Sharp, arrived at Cat Island, on Saturday afternoon, at 5 o’clock, P. M. from Vera Cruz, which port she left on the 16th inst.

The Tay carries out $652,000 in specie and 482 bales cochineal.

The British Courier arrived at Vera Cruz on the morning of the 16th inst., from the City of Mexico, and reports that Herrera was elected President by an almost unanimous vote, and that Pena y Pena was appointed Chief Justice of the Republic. Our dates from the City of Mexico are to the 14th.

Congress had fixed on the 25th inst. as the day for the taking of the vote on the treaty—and it was generally supposed that the question would be nearly unanimously adopted, as there were only about fifteen of the members who were against it, and they opposed it merely on account of the withdrawal of our troops from that quarter.

Gen. Kearney left Vera Cruz on Sunday, the 14th inst., for the City of Mexico; and on the following day 1200 men, under the command of Col. Ramsay, for the same destination. We make the following extract from a letter of our valuable correspondent “Chapparal.”

CITY OF MEXICO. May 13.

At last the treaty is before the Mexican congress, and were the members other than Mexicans, one would readily infer that an exchange of ratifications would soon follow; but with the Mexicans as the actors in the scene, no one can safely say what the denouement will be.

The treaty was laid before Congress on Tuesday, the 10th, by Rosa, the Minister of Foreign Relations. He accompanied it presentation with a long address, which is said to have been an able one. The strictest measures have been adopted by the Congress to keep the members in their seats—fines have been imposed, and a deprivation of citizenship for some length of time for the recusant—and in order that the threatened withdrawal of Puro members may not render the Congress null, it had been decreed that the votes of the majority present shall be final. As a said before, with any other people than those Mexicans, an inference might be safely drawn from this that they would make a peace with us, but I have seen so much of their subterfuge and chicanery, that although a peace may be made, I shall take the liberty of withholding any sincere belief until I am assured it has been signed, sealed and delivered.

Queretaro, May 8, 1848.

Everything is tranquil. The officers of the army have received their full monthly pay. Therefore, for the present, there is no idea of a pronunciamiento.

Queretaro, May 11, 1848.

The Chambers assembled at half-past 12 o’clock. The session is secret. The time was consumed, as yesterday, in reading documents relating to the treaty.

At 2 o’clock the doors were opened, and, after reading documents of little importance, a Deputy from Rio addressed the Chamber, and demanded that, before the discussion of the treaty was gone into, the proposition of Deputy Don Manuel Crecencio Rejon should be considered. When he had done, Deputy Prieto spoke, and said that the position and reasoning of Rejon were absurd and fallacious, and, being so, he demanded of the Chamber to reject it. This motion prevailed by a large majority.

The secret session to-day gives the public to understand that the treaty will be discussed with closed doors.

[Special Correspondence of the Picayune.]
On Tuesday last Senor Rosa, Minister of Foreign Relations, laid the treaty of peace, as ratified by the American authorities, before the Mexican Congress. The manifesto accompanying it was long, and the discussion was continued to a great length. There were eighty Deputies present in the House—a considerably larger number than is necessary for a quorum. In the Senate, twelve standing committees were appointed. The most important at this time are those on constitutional questions, relations and war. Oterois, Chairman of the first, Ledo of the second, and Herrera of the third. Senor Rosa is Chairman of the Committee on the Government, or Administration and the Public Cedit. Esparza is at the head of the committee on the treasury.

Several projects were introduced in grand committee, among which, was one fining the recusant Senators and Deputies to the amount of two hundred dollars—another, that those who neglected to report themselves should be without employment, and deprived of the rights of citizenship for a period double that for which they have failed to discharge their legislative duties. Those who were absent, without permission, for two months, shall be subject to the same punishment. Further—in case of the withdrawal of members, the votes of the majority shall be final, and in case of a tie, the question shall be considered as decided in the negative.

After a few other unimportant matters, the committee rose, and the two branches adjourned.

We have, in a previous number of the Star, stated that President Pena y Pena, accompanied by his ministers, delivered his message in presence of the Senators and Deputies, which was responded to on the part of the President of the Chamber of Deputies—an abstract of which response has already appeared in our columns.—The messages of Pen y Pena is rather longer than we expected to find it, but we shall make no apology, from the interest which attaches to the subject, for translating it at its length, as follows: (see next article, Message of the President of the Republic.)

Gentlemen of the Senate and the Chamber of deputies. Can there possibly be an act more august, or a ceremony of more national interest, than the present installation of the Mexican Congress? Nay, could I hope for a more distinguished favor from Providence than that of announcing to you this day that the Republic survives its misfortunes, preserves its unity, and has it yet in its power to receive the proudest titles in the estimation of the world? Was it to be expected seven months since—the capital, the ports, and the principal cities of the republic being lost—the army disorganized and the passions of the people inflamed—that the calamities of a foreign war would cease, and we should have it in our power to nourish the hope of a peaceful and happy future?

You have . . . [illegible]. . . [un]derstood also, the circumstance which surround us. You can therefore, appreciate the value and importance of an event which places us in so advantageous a position. What was regarded as an impossibility is this day realized. Congress has assembled in accordance with the requisitions of the constitution, and the Government is about to entrust the destinies of the Republic to the wisdom of its representatives. How national and elevated is you mission—how great and how glorious is your responsibility!

It will be expected that I should speak to you of the great and interesting point in the internal administration of the Government, and refer briefly to its history during the short period of its existence. Without the slightest exaggeration, I can assure you that in the most difficult crisis which the republic has ever seen, and with no resources to meet its absolute necessities, it has maintained loyal order, resisted with the law more than with an armed force, the violence of factions; preserved the morality of the Government, prevented ruinous losses to the treasury, and above all it has never allowed the bond of the Federal Union to be broken. A sincere regard for our institutions, an ardent desire to prevent shameful insurrections and broils in sight of the foreign enemy, a firm resolution to assemble the chambers and entrust the reins of the administration to a new President—these will be sufficient to explain the few severe measures which the Government has taken, and especially so far as relates to its course—alike constitutional and indispensable—in regard to the events in San Luis Potosi. But, gentlemen, these points would not, whatever your feelings or preferences under ordinary circumstances, draw your attention form the awful responsibility of the present moment—when the question is—EITHER WAR OR PEACE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Being satisfied several years since, that the first of these alternatives was not of any advantage to the republic, I took such measures as were within my power, and such as were compatible with my loyalty or came within the scope of my legal procedure, to put an end to the exciting differences which existed between the two republics, by a pacific negotiation. In forming my opinion, and in sustaining it in 1845, it never occurred to me that such a negotiation was compatible either with the interests or the well known honor of the nation. I have ever been persuaded that every people—the most warlike even in the world, sometime finds itself in circumstances where it has no power to resist the enemy which has invaded its soil. They, like individuals, have their periods of vigor and weakness, and cannot be exempt from the ordinary laws of humanity. A conjunction of Circumstances, to which it is unnecessary here to refer more particularly, but which might be explained very easily by our internal dissensions and failure on the part of the public Administration, has convinced me of the serious difficulties in which the country would be involved by sustaining, with any prospect of a successful issue, a war with the United States.—He, who entertaining this conviction, is disposed to resent an insult to our good name and our honor speaks not like a statesman and politician—much less is he a man of sterling honor and goodness.

Called by the constitution to exercise the Supreme Magistracy, and at a moment when the capital was about to be occupied and our army dispersed, my opinions in regard to a peace were the stronger in proportion to the greatness of our misfortune. Without any merit to assume the reins of government, and with no other title than that of President of the Supreme Court of Justice, I could not, nevertheless, refuse to discharge the duties of the difficult post to which I was called, without subjecting the nation to a frightful state of anarchy; neither could I fail to meet the foreign question under such circumstances, with feelings the most profound and conscientious.—The necessity, then, of making one so decidedly in favor of peace the depository of the Supreme Power, made me believe (and aloe me to say it with frankness) that Providence had summoned me to the work which had been commenced in 1845—a work which would then have been terminated with glory and profit to the nation, and which this day, at however dear a price, at least saves its honor and secures its independence.

But inasmuch as representative governments, and particularly those under a republican form, should be guided by true public opinion, it was my desire to ascertain what that opinion was.—Setting aside my own, it was my object to ascertain in good faith how far the co-operation of the States could be relied upon for the prosecution of the war, if such was the general wish of the Republic. I can assure you, gentlemen, that, since instituting this inquiry, I have had no other conviction than such as was favorable to peace.

The people and their authorities, like the Supreme Government, have foreseen all the evils of a prolonged war. Though disposed to favor any great effort that could restore the brilliancy of our arms, if there were no alternative left, so long as there were means, they will not fail to condemn as unwise the conduct of the Government which dies not put an immediate end to their sufferings. The people have an unquestionable right to demand security that they shall suffer no more than may be incidental to their condition. It is not merely gross injustice, but an act also of gross inhumanity, to compel them to pass through all the horrors of a bloody contest after long years of civil war.

Thus tranquil and satisfied at a time when, by its policy, the Government was counting upon an immense majority of the nation, I immediately acceded to the desire of the Mexican Commissioner, who proposed to resume the negotiations which had been suspended in consequence of the unhappy circumstances of September last, as Congress was well advised. The Interior President who succeeded me after the first term of my administration, appointed commissioners enjoying his confidence, who discharged the duties of their offices with all the fidelity and loyalty which might be supposed to accompany their well merited reputation. But he had determined that no proceedings should be had until early January. His reason was, that, loyal to the Government, and following the system which I had pursued, he was anxious to ascertain the sentiments of the people of the Republic, and such modifications as they might have undergone, guided not only by lessons drawn from our present condition, but from the opinions of the press of both parties, presenting as it did the question under a thousand different aspects.

No one, during all this time, could charge the Government with having attacked the liberty of thought. Neither could any one question its sincerity in obtaining the aid and co-operation of all good citizens in a matter of such transcendent importance. The duties devolving upon it in consequence of the alternative of war not being adopted, you yourselves, gentlemen, can weigh with that calmness and coolness which become the discussion of a subject so nearly concerning the dearest interest of our unfortunate nation. The verdict of impartial history will surely not impeach my motives, in consequence of the great and well-known services which have been rendered since the fatal rupture with the United States.

The instructions given for my guidance at that time, as Minister of Relations, and to the Commissions of the Republic, though much more favorable, as was natural, than could be reasonably expected, never had any definite character.—The Government, also, reserving to itself the right of modifying them, according to the information it might receive, gave the Commissioners full liberty to conclude the negotiations, with the belief that, neither in letter or spirit, any offense was intended to our honor, and that no compromise was effected of which a civilized people need to be ashamed. Though very decided in favor of peace, and disposed to make such sacrifices as circumstances might demand, the Government never had any idea of acceding to any conditions, either humiliating or such as should give to the negotiation a character unworthy of our independence. In the opinion of the Government, war has its limits, and so has peace. Even the extreme misfortune of the nation could not cause to be forgotten that mutual regard and consideration which one nation and one government owes to another—the more important in the ordinary pacific relations of the two, in proportion to the misfortunes which may visit either. And here, gentlemen, I should inform you that the propositions of peace have proceeded directly from the Government of the United States. They have sent Ministers Plenipotentiary to this Republic, who have commenced negotiations, and there had been no single act of the Mexican Government, in the course of them, which can be characterized as either meanness of weakness.

The Minister of Relations will transmit to the two Chambers all the documents which may be necessary for the national interests, as well as the articles of the treaty, signed at Guadalupe on the 2d February last. You, yourselves, will be as convinced as the Government is, that the territorial cession is less than could be expected, or than could have been agreed upon. Neither was there any ground to expect that the United States would, in any respect, modify their pretensions. The limits of Texas, of Upper California and New Mexico, are of such great interest and importance, that the Government of the American Union has announced before its Congress, that without the cession of the said territories, it will continue the war on the plan indicated by the President’s message of the 6th of December of last year. The negotiation, then, cannot be condemned in consequence of its not having diminished the loss of territory, taking into consideration the advantages of peace. Perhaps it will deserve praise for having succeeded in obtaining that no additions have been made to the original claims—the capital being lost, and the army of he 13th of September disbanded.

Had the government been able to indulge any well-founded hope that that of the United States would recede from a demand to which it had no legitimate title, its conduct would have been different, or it would have reserved the treaty for a more opportune season. But a declaration so solemn, and the repeated assurances of the American Minister, leave no room whatever to doubt that any peace was utterly out of the question which did not involve the cession of the territories mentioned. The Government and its plenipotentiaries have, nevertheless, enforced and defended the justice of the nation, and I can declare to you that nothing which they ought to have done has been omitted. Subsequent events which are well known, show in the clearest manner that the Government acted with judgment in designating the time in which negations should commence and be concluded.

The armistice which followed the negotiation of the treaty and the immediate re-establishment of constitutional order in all its branches, the ample guarantees secured to Mexican citizens, who, either holding that character or that of Americans citizens, should reside in the territories ceded—the suppression of the Indian tribes which should make incursions upon our frontier—the indemnity of fifteen millions of dollars, and the payment to be made by the Government of the United States for claims liquidated and pending against the Republic—the solemn promise to assuage, if at any time there shall be occasion, the calamities of war, as well as to respect the well known rights of humanity and of society—and, finally, the closing stipulation, that the dividing line established by the fifth article shall never be changed except by the full consent of both Republics, expressed through their General Governments in conformity with their respective constitutions; all these considerations give to the negotiation all the dignity, as well as all the security, that could be demanded in this class of transactions.

If the Government has found itself compelled to respect acts thus consummated, without insisting upon a compliance with our tariff rates, or treasury laws, when the question of the introduction of goods into our custom houses in the interior of the Republic, was under discussion, it has resulted alone from a well-established principle, that no treaty is to be regarded as possessing any force or value until it had been duly ratified. Such stipulations as have been made on these points of the treaty and commerce will be readily explained on the principle mentioned, and by the practice generally adopted in all countries under similar circumstances.

The treaty, gentlemen, concluded by our plenipotentiaries in the city of Guadaloupe, is submitted to the judgment of the national representatives of public opinion, and to the verdict of foreign nations. The termination of a war such as we have suffered, the change which it has produced, are interesting to the whole world. They merit the examination of the philosopher, as well as the politician, and from their very nature constitute a new period of vital importance to the republic. Justice, humanity, convenience and honor present, under different aspects, treaties celebrated between two nations; and, according to the dominant feeling, they are regarded as advantageous or detrimental. Opinions, in consequence, vary considerably, and it is by no means easy to weigh the disadvantages of the extremes, and make a choice in the scale of cool reason and calm calculation. Nevertheless, the treaty of Guadaloupe, whatever judgment may be passed upon it, either by the present generation, or by that which may succeed, will never be censured as dishonorable or oppressive to the liberty and sovereignty of the nation. It cannot be pronounced unworthy of a noble misfortune and of generous feelings.

The Mexican Republic has treated the United States, and they with it, as independent people. The spirit with which the negotiation has been conducted might be cited to show that we do not deserve all the charges which have been made against us during the war. True, a fertile and beautiful portion of our soil is ceded—a portion of considerable extent and containing the elements of new and flourishing States. I do not wish to conceal the truth at a moment so solemn—much less the profound regret occasioned in my bosom by the separation of Upper California and New Mexico from the National Mexican Union. I desire, further, to leave on record a testimony of the interest with which my administration has regarded the citizens of those States. I can assure you, gentlemen, that their future destiny has presented the greatest difficulty which has thus far been encountered in the negotiations. Nay, had it been possible, the territory ceded would have been extended on the condition that the Mexican population within its limits should be left free. The reflection that a continuance of the war would certainly injure their condition, has brought with it the consolation that whatever evils they may suffer, cannot be chargeable upon my administration. War always renders the most deplorable changes necessary, and a war so unfortunate as ours has been, cannot but be attended by the sacrifices to which all societies and communities are subjected. Costly as they may be, they involve but a single loss, and a loss demanded by the principles of a just and far seeing policy. They not only involve no opposition, but are compatible with the honor and dignity of the most powerful people in the world.

Whoever shall pronounce the treaty of Guadalupe dishonorable on account of the extent of the territory ceded is guilty of bringing the same charges against the first nations in the world, and the question will never be solved: "How can an unfortunate war be avoided?" The dignity of governments and of the people demand other immutable laws, and also a character widely different from that which often springs from the passions, generally spurious and dangerous in their effects. To dam up a torrent which is devastating everything, to avoid a useless effusion of blood, to reinstate the nation in its primitive condition, in order that it may enjoy the advantages of peace and public order, to do all this, though at the same time satisfy the unjust pretensions of a fortunate and victorious enemy, is an act of wisdom recommended by both Christianity and civilization. The territories ceded by the treaty are not lost for the sum of fifteen millions of dollars; but for the recovery of our ports and invaded cities, the final cessation of every class of evils, every kind of horrors, to being consolation to innumerable families, which, abandoning their homes and places of resort, have been suffering the ills of poverty or exposed to beggary—in fine, to improve the occasion which Providence presents for producing a systematic organization among the people, who have not ceased to suffer during the long period of thirty-seven years. Let us be just, gentlemen. Let us remove the veil which has prevented our seeing the true condition of things. We will cherish the hope that peace, that precious boon which we have not learned to estimate properly, may scatter upon us all the benefits which we have desired, and which we shall certainly obtain if we stand firm in offering a resistless opposition anarchy and disorder.

If the treaty could have been submitted to your deliberation precisely as it came from the hands of the Plenipotentiaries, my satisfaction at seeing the war at last brought to an end would not have been lessened, as it is this day, in consequence of the modifications introduced into it by the Senate of the United States, and which have received the sanction of the President. I could have wished that no alteration had been made in a negotiation which was in conformity with the general views of the government of the American Union—not only because I look upon modifications as unfavorable, but to prevent, also, their being the subject of exaggerated comment. You will be circumstantially instructed in regard to the reasons which the Cabinet of the United States has advanced in justification of the modifications. There will be placed also before you, for your direction, all such suitable information on the subject as may enable you to form a correct and impartial judgment. At present it is sufficient for us to say to you, that if, in the opinion of the Government, justice had not been evinced on the part of the Senate and Government of the United States in introducing such modifications, it is presumed, on the other hand, they are not of such importance that they should set aside the treaty. I believe, on the contrary, that it ought to be ratified upon the same terms in which it has already received the sanction of the American Government. My opinion is alone greatly strengthened by the fact, that a new negotiation is neither expected or considered possible—much less could another be brought forward upon a basis more favorable for the Republic.

The character of the address, and the assurances that you will find in such documents as will be laid before you by the Minister of Relations, all necessary data, do not permit me to enlarge further upon the treaty, or to obtrude observations which will doubtless occur to you, in your examination of the subject. But, allow me to assure you, that it is no vain fear, much less an unfavorable estimate of the moral and physical strength of the Mexican people, which compels me to decide in favor of peace. Nothing could be more unfounded. I have lived long enough to witness the heroic efforts which the nation made to sustain an unequal contest of eleven years, and at last achieve its independence. In the same civil war, I was able to observe the resources and elements of that people which acts with valor and energy. In the foreign war we have just witnessed, though in but few engagements, have witnessed the courage and firmness of our soldiers, when commanded by chiefs of honor, and in whom they had confidence, and we have all remarked that the war would have had altogether a different result, had the army and the national Guards been properly organized. I have never believed, neither do I now believe, that the Republic is absolutely incapable of continuing the war and affording an example which might be transmitted with glory to posterity. But, with the same frankness and good faith, I must say that I am convinced that the condition in which we are, with all its attendant circumstances, imperiously calls for peace, because, as statesmen affirm, discussion upon the subject of war, is not a matter which can be submitted to proofs or adventurous attempts—that the desire of the . . . [illegible]. . . count of the distance of the territories ceded, and through want of a national marine, it cannot be reasonably expected that the result of a war would be a fortunate negotiation, that would save our territory entire. I am well persuaded that our loss would be greater, and that there could be no excuse for the conduct of the Government and of Congress, if it did not guard against new and more terrible evils. There is nothing in this opinion which is not in strict conformity with truth, and passion only can designate it as timid and exaggerated. The elements of resistance cannot be created in a moment, neither is it within the power of the most vigorous administration to cause distances to disappear in a territory of such vast extent, and to gather the central population upon points along the shores of the ocean and the neighboring frontiers.

The arguments which are advanced at this day against peace, are of the same character with this put forth in 1845. First, against the acknowledgement of the independence of Texas, and subsequently against the negotiations with the U. States, which the administration of that year sought to establish.

We have occasion this day to lament that the peace policy did not at that time prevail. Those who were opposed to it have been since undeceived, but their enlightenment has not been able to exempt the republic from misfortune. Tardy and barren as the lesson was, we ought never to forget it. And, gentlemen, we will not forget it, but let us make a glorious effort, that our children may not curse our memories.

Contemplate for a moment the confusion and anarchy in which we should behold our country involved, if the foreign war should be continued. All the germs of discord would in the event be aroused, and the flame of the passions everywhere kindled. We are already made to feel too deeply our social disorganization, the insecurity of towns and highways, the paralysis of every branch of public wealth, and the general wretchedness of the people.

The State of Yucatan, presenting such a scene of devastation and barbarity, has been a subject of much pain and regret to the Government, and the more so that in its present situation it could not extend the aid which humanity demanded. The native population has proclaimed the extermination of the white race, committed excesses which I shrink from recounting, and having taken possession of the principal cities, there is scarcely left to the families even the port of Campeche, to place themselves under cover from the savage hordes. I have not ceased to employ my thoughts upon such measures as could be adopted for the safety of that portion of our territory—but what can the Government do under present circumstances?

Whatever fate Providence may have in reserve for our unhappy country, it is left for us, gentlemen, to place her on the road to prosperity. If peace is made and the nation has it in its power to effect a proper organization; if with the extended experience from which we have learned so much, factions, disorder and demoralization prevail, we shall not be held responsible for such scandals. As men, we cannot foresee the future destiny of the people; but if we labor with rectitude and prudence, complying with the august duties imposed upon us by the law and our country,
You may flatter yourselves, gentlemen, with having been summoned to decide upon the greatest question presented since the achievement of our independence—to maintain, with all your decision and wisdom, the dignity and influence which should surround a nation, and to enact such laws as the condition of every class of the people may require. A vigorous and just system of legislation is demanded—one which will banish forever those abuses which are compatible with no form of Government. Obstinate in following the same career, without having recourse to salutary reforms demanded form time to time by the administration of public affairs, would be to our eternal loss, make us unworthy of the gratitude of the nation, and stain the titles acquired in 1821. The Constitutional Government which is about to be established, and the duties of which will be discharged by a citizen distinguished for his virtues, and beloved by his compatriots, will second our efforts, and at the same time give character to the nation. He will suggest such measures as in his opinion should be adopted to inspire general confidence, without which there can exist neither union nor true liberty.

So far as concerns myself, I have but little to say, because the policy of the Government, in the circumstances which it had been obliged to encounter, is known to all. I have respected the institutions of the republic, and sustained them against the revolutionary spirit by which they have more than once been threatened. I have persecuted one no one, and nothing has been farther from the course of my administration than the adoption of measures against political opinion.—I have initiated and concluded a peace, and the Republic, which, upon the occupation of the capital, seemed destined to a complete dissolution and to a prolonged war, has neither lost its unity nor the hope of a lasting and durable reorganization.

If, notwithstanding my ardent wishes and anxiety, it has been impossible to avoid the evils consequent upon the invasion, the misery and wretchedness which the invaded States have suffered, it is not the fault of the existing Government, but results from circumstances and from the nature of the war itself. But with or without this aim, I have accomplished the plan which I proposed to follow on assuming the reigns of Government—to save the nationality of the country, and to preserve, faithfully and scrupulously, the national institutions which invested me with the power I hold. I consider myself fortunate that in the midst of difficulties and dangers, I have been able to summon you together and quietly to commit to your keeping the trust confided to me. If the Government has not been true—if the present crisis demands any other resolution than it had indicated, the fate of the Republic is in your hands and it belongs to you to save it. The pressing importance of the business which you have assembled to consider should address itself to you.

The freedom of your deliberations will be respected and sustained to the last extreme, and the Governor will consider every one as a traitor to the nation who, in any manner, or by whatever means, shall endeavor to excite a spirit of dissolution, or attack the freedom of the legislative body. The words, war and peace, will be listened to by the Government—whatever its opinion—with all that respect to which the worthy representatives of the Republic are entitled. The Government considers the treaty of Guadalupe as a subject of general and transcendent importance. The qualifications which may be made in it, will be the result of that diversity of opinions into which the citizens of every free State are divided. The Government, in adopting it and transmitting it to the Chambers, has looked upon it as a measure truly honorable for the country, after all her misfortunes, but that judgment is submitted by the constitution to the tribunal of the people’s representatives.

Gentlemen: You are chosen and assembled under circumstances in which public opinion cannot be misled. There is no chance for deception among the people, when they labor with the noblest impulses and desires, to solve the great question of their own salvation. If in ordinary cases Congress is the legal and most respectable organ of the nation, it more than ever this day realizes the appropriateness of the title, in consequence of the condition to which things have arrived, and also the unfettered freedom which has prevailed in the elections. The confidence with which you have been honored by your compatriots, deserves unmerited recompense—that is saving the Republic.

And gentlemen, you will save it, because, being citizens of honor and integrity, your labors will be blessed by Providence. I have spoken.

REv45i8p2c2, May 30, 1848, Tamaulipas.

The Governor of Tamaulipas has issued a circular summoning a meeting of the Legislature of that State, to vote for a President of the Republic, and Senators and Deputies of the General Congress.—The 28th inst., is named as the day.
Letters from Queretaro state that the State of Jalisco has taken strong grounds in favor of peace. A popular movement in support of it having been set on foot.

The election of a Governor and Vice Governor was about taking place at our last advices at San Luis, and much excitement was the consequence. The Puros are striving to place another Adame in the Chair of State, that is, another instrument of disorder. The Conservative party in the Legislature were likely to lose two of their number, in consequence of Samano, one of the Deputies, aspiring to be Governor.

The evidence in the case of Lieut. Tilden, 2d Infantry, was closed on the 10th inst. The three remaining prisoners, we understand, will be tried together.

The Bishop of Mexico and Cesarea has gone to Queretaro to take his seat as one of the Senators.

A train under the command of Maj. Taliaferro came in from Pachuca in the 7th. It consisted of ten wagons—two of them laden with about sixty bars of silver, valued at $1200 each. It was accompanied by an escort of twenty dragoons and some forty of the 9th Infantry. The officers who accompanied the train were Capt. Bissell, and Lieut. Simmons, Reg’ Qr. Master and Commissary of the 9th Infantry; Lieuts. Bradford, 4th Artillery; Schonoever, 3d Dragoons; and Dr. Stevens, 1st Surgeon of the 9th. The train will return on the 12th inst.

The health of the troops at Pachuca has much improved of late. About ninety recruits for the 9th, who reached this city by the last train from Orizaba, will repair to Pachuca with the return train.

H. B. Yeager, a corporal in the corps of Sappers and Miners, has received a commission as 2d Lieutenant in the 3d Dragoons.—Lieut. Y. belongs to Philadelphia.

D. Manuel Gomez Pedraza was nominated for President, and Senors Lafragua and Covarrubias at a preliminary meeting of the members of the Senate on the 5th inst.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a communication from Lewis Cass, of Michigan, resigning his seat in the U.
S. Senate.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States transmitting a memorial from the Legislature of Oregon, in relation to the incursions of the different hostile bands of Indians in their vicinity.

The memorial was referred to the committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Benton was appointed chairman of the committee on Military affairs, vice Mr. Cass, resigned.

Mr. Butler, from the committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill providing for the punishment of persons violating the secret proceedings of Congress.

The bill to amend the act for the transportation of the mails to foreign countries, was taken up, amended and passed.

The Senate spent the remainder of the day on Private Bills.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A message was received from the President of the United States in relation to the incursion of the Indians in Oregon. The message recommended the granting prompt assistance to the settlers in the Oregon territory.

The message was referred to the committee on Military Affairs.

A motion being made that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, and proceed with the Appropriation Bills, a warm discussion ensued as to the order of business, many members proposing to take up the subject of the Oregon difficulties in preference to the Appropriation Bills. The House finally decided to go into Committee of the Whole on the Post Office Bill, which was perfected in committee, and reported to the House on the rising of the Committee. The House then adjourned.

REv45i8p4c1, May 30, 1848, Adjournment of the Convention.

We learn by a telegraphic dispatch from Baltimore, received at half-past six o’clock last evening, that the Democratic National Convention adjourned yesterday harmoniously and in the highest spirits. The address of Mr. Stevenson at the close of the session is said to have been most beautiful and much admired. Thus has ended the deliberations of a body whose movements have been watched with the deepest interest from every section of our country; and most nobly and satisfactorily have they discharged the important duties entrusted to them by the Democracy of the Union. We have given extensive reports of the proceedings of the Convention. It will be seen that on every ballot for President the vote of Virginia was cast for Lewis Cass.—In balloting for a candidate for the Vice Presidency, the vote of Virginia was given first for John Y. Mason, and then for Gen. Wm. O. Butler—after which, all the States which had voted against Gen. Butler changed their votes, and he received the unanimous nomination of the Convention. Gen. Butler’s high character, both as a civilian and a military man—formerly a member of Congress from Kentucky, and more recently a brilliant officer in the Mexican war, and now the commander of our army—it known to all. It is another name of power, which adds dignity and force to our ticket. He will receive the most cordial support of the entire Republican party.

So far as we have been able to ascertain, the nominees of the Convention have been most enthusiastically received by the Democracy of this city.

The Richmond Examiner of yesterday morning says:

“"This nomination will be responded to with pleasure by the Democracy of the Union. The public mind has been long prepared for this.—The distinguished services of Gen. Cass have given him a reputation as extensive as that of any living American statesman. Abroad and at home he has alike been honored by men of virtue and intelligence. The distinguished statesman, the intrepid hero, the legislative halls of the nation as well as the well fought battle-fields of 1812, attest his merits and services. No American has ever been more distinguished for great deeds endearing him to the people. Above all this, during the last three years of bitter Federal opposition to the Administration and the nation’s honor, Lewis Cass has been always found in the right place—never swerving in the discharge of his high duties as a Senator, a Democrat, and a patriot. The nomination of a Vice President had not been made a the time of our going to press.”

On the subject of the nominations, that able neutral journal, the Baltimore Sun, has the following:

"In the choice of General Cass, the Convention has no doubt acted wisely and well. From our point of observation, we are inclined to think that he will be generally acceptable throughout the Union. Wherever he is personally known, Gen. Cass never fails to have a host of friends.—His affability, his native kindness of heart, his frank and manly bearing, invest his character with traits irresistibly attractive; while his public services, military and civil, many of which have been of great importance and responsibility, and elicited eminent qualifications of statesmanship, are calculated to secure the implicit confidence of the people.

“The evening session of the convention resulted in the choice of Major Gen. Butler, now at the head of the army at Mexico, for the Vice Presidency. This distinguished officer, whose military career has been a constant testimonial of dauntless courage, a valour indeed insensible to danger, and a resolution always equal to the sense of duty, is not without the recommendations of an exalted capacity for civil service.—Those who know him best are confident in the distinguished ability and suavity of deportment with which he will grace the chair of the Senate, should he be honored with the choice of the people.”

The Old Dominion, we feel assured, will be well satisfied with the nominations, and will roll up her thousands for CASS and BUTLER.

This is perhaps the strongest ticket which could have been selected by the Democratic National Convention. Indeed, some of our friends seem to think that, should Mr. Clay be nominated by the Whigs, there is much doubt whether he will be able to carry "Old Kentucky." And as to "Old Zac," his prospects for the Presidency are now supposed to be just about as good as those of the "calculating" sage of Ashland. The Democracy of the Union have now before them, as standard bearers, men who are worthy of their support—worthy of the great cause we advocate—well calculated to guard all the interests of our beloved country—and, in every respect, qualified to carry out the true, well-tried and glorious principles of the Republican party, upon the preservance of which mainly depend the prosperity and permanent welfare of our country.

REv45i8p4c2, May 30, 1848, The President's letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, MAY 20, 1848.

Dear Sir: From speculations which have appeared in some of the public journals, and from frequent inquiries which have been made of me, by many political friends, some of them delegates to the Democratic National Convention, which will assemble at Baltimore on the 22d instant, I am induced to suppose that it may be the desire of some of my friends to propose my re-nomination, as the candidate of the Democratic party, for the office of President of the United States.—Should you ascertain that such is the intention of any of the delegates, I desire, through you, to communicate to the Convention; that I am not a candidate for the nomination, and that any use of my name with that view, which may be contemplated, us without any agency or desire on my part.

The purpose declared in my letter of the 12th of June, 1844, in accepting the nomination tendered to me by the DEMOCRATIC national Convention of that year, remains unchanged and to relieve the Convention from any possible embarrassment which "the suggestion of my names might produce in making a free selection of a successor who may be best calculated to give effect to their will, and guard all the interests of our beloved country," I deem it proper to reiterate the sentiments contained in that letter. Since my election, I have often expressed the sincere desire, which I still feel, to retire to private life at the close of my present term.

I entertain the confident hope and belief, that my Democratic friends of the convention will unite in the harmonious nomination of some citizen to succeed me, who, if elected, will firmly maintain and carry out the great political principles introduced in the resolutions adopted by the Democratic National Convention in 1844—principles which it has been the earnest endeavor and constant aim of my administration to preserve and pursue—and upon the observance of which, in my opinion, mainly depend the prosperity and permanent welfare of our country.

If on reviewing the history of my administration, and the remarkable events, foreign and domestic, which have attended it, it shall be the judgment of my countrymen, that I have adhered to these principles and faithfully performed my duty, the measure of my ambition is full, and I am deeply compensated for all the labors, cares, and anxieties which are inseparable from the high station which I have been called to fill.

I shall ever cherish sentiments of deep gratitude to my fellow-citizens for the confidence they reposed in me, in elevating me to the most distinguished and responsible public trust, on earth.

It is scarcely necessary that I should add, that it will be no less my duty than it will be my sincere pleasure, as a citizen, to unite with my Democratic friends in support of the nominees of the convention, for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States.

With great respect, I am your obedient servant,

JAMES K. POLK.

[To Dr. J. G. M. Ramsey, of Tennessee.]

The following is the letter of 1844 referred to in his communication to the Convention:

Gentlemen: I have had the honor to receive you letter of the 29th ultimo, informing me that the Democratic National Convention, then assembled at Baltimore, had designated me to be the candidate of the Democratic party for President of the United States, and that I had been unanimously nominated for that office. It has been well observed that the office of President of the United States should neither be sought nor declined. I have never sought it, nor shall I feel at liberty to decline it, if conferred upon me by the voluntary suffrages of my fellow-citizens. In accepting the nomination, I am deeply impressed with the distinguished honor that has been conferred upon me by my Republican friends, and am duly sensible of the great and mighty responsibilities which must ever devolve on any citizen who may be called to fill the high station of President of the United States.

I deem the present to be a proper occasion to declare that, if the nomination made by the Convention shall be confirmed by the people, and result in my election, I shall enter upon the discharge of the high and solemn duties of the office with the settled purpose of not being a candidate for re-election. In the event of my election, it shall be my constant aim, by a strict adherence to the old Republican landmarks, to maintain and preserve the public prosperity, and at the end of four years I am resolved to retire to private life. In assuming this position I feel that I not only impose on myself a salutary restraint, but that I take the most effective means in my power of enabling the Democratic party to make a free selection of a successor who may be best calculated to give the effect to their will,
and guard all the interests of our country.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

JAMES K. POLK

REV45i8p4c5, May 30, 1848, British Bondholders in Mexico.

In the British House of Commons, on the 7th ultimo, Mr. Urquhart asked if her Majesty’s government had taken measures to secure the rights of British bondholders in Mexico, in the event of a cession of territory to the United States on America?

Lord Palmerston.—Her Majesty’s government, as he believed he explained on a former occasion, had not hitherto thought it right to interfere officially, as between government and government, with respect to the claims of the British bondholders in numerous foreign States. Therefore no steps had been taken by the British government upon the point to which the honorable gentleman referred. But, although, perhaps, it was not exactly an answer to the question, it was of course evident that if a State gave to foreign creditors or to domestic creditors a mortgage upon its revenues, the mortgage applied equally to the revenues of whatever portion of that State which might remain; and the government of that State could not, by alienating a part of its territory, in any degree defeat or lessen the claims of strangers upon its revenues.

REV45i8p4c6, May 30, 1848, Yucatan.

The New Orleans Patria has received later advices by the schooner Ampericeda, which sailed from Sisal on the 11th inst. By this arrival the “Patria” has received its correspondence and files of papers o the 9th inst. from Merida, and to the 2nd inst. From Campeachy, being eight days later than previously received.—Not a word is said in these late journals and letters concerning the conclusion of a treaty of peace between the Commissioners appointed by Governor Barbachano and Jacinto Pat, which treaty was published in the “Union,” of Merida, of the 25th April. Hat attempt to consummate a peace failed and hostilities were renewed on the part of the savages.

The Indians still continued their massacres.—On the 7th inst., they entered the village of Mani, professing peace.
Their professions were relied upon, but next morning at daylight the war cry of the savages was heard and two hundred of the inhabitants were inhumanly butchered. They then retired.

The statement that twenty-eight vessels of various nations were off the coast of Yucatan, assisting the whites needs confirmation. The greater portion of these vessels were small coasting boats belonging to the Yucatecos.

The village of Iturbide is stated to have defended itself for eight hours against an overpowering force of savages.
The loss on the part of the whites was 23 killed and 11 wounded. During the retreat of the whites 106 soldiers deserted, thus leaving the commander with a force of only 60 men.

The whole coast from the port of Cilam to Cape Catoche and then to Bacalar is now in possession of Pat and Chi and their blood-thirsty followers.
More than 100,000 persons are now crowded into the capital of Yucatan, and should it unfortunately fall into the hands of the savages, but a portion of these refugees could be saved, owing to the small number of vessels now on the coast.

The "Amigo del Pueblo," published at Campeachy, states that the British Minister in Mexico had received the official communication from the Yucatan Government, offering the sovereignty and dominion of Yucatan to Great Britain in case assistance and protection were offered, and that the Minister had written to his Government earnestly urging the compliance with the offer.

The Yucatan officers had removed the seat of Government from Ticul to Merida.

All hopes of making peace with the crafty and pernicious savages have vanished, and the destiny of the two races only remained to be decided by the arbitrament of arms. The Yucatecos were preparing to make a last struggle against their relentless foes, anxiously awaiting assistance from abroad.

REv45i8p4c6, May 30, 1848, For the Enquirer. Mr. Jefferson and the Tariff.

Messrs. Editors: The readers of the Enquirer will, doubtless, think, after the utter demolition you have visited upon the Whigs, that it is a work of supererogation to draw further upon the "truth of history" to sustain your position and that of the party on the points in controversy. It is, however, so frequently attempted by the Federalists to palm off their impostures upon the great fathers of Democracy, and to acquire a spurious credit for their odious policy, by showing that it has, at some time, received the support of a few prominent men of our party, that nothing which can contribute to expose their deception, or to foil their cunning attempts, ought to be considered uncalled for. The Tariff is one of the prominent features of their oft-repudiated and miserable "system" which they have industriously labored to mystify, in order to confound and mislead the judgment of the people, and, in support of which, they have often forged the great name of Jefferson. I do not myself entertain much respect for that class of politicians who can perceive no other merit (as a reason for supporting them) in a set of measures, than that they were introduced or advocated by this or that eminent statesman. But the opinions of such a wise and experienced man as Thomas Jefferson are entitled to great weight, and it therefore becomes important to ascertain the real "truth of history" respecting them, especially when they are perverted by our Whig friends, to serve an end he never countenanced. True it is, that parties were not for some time after the adoption of the new Constitution, as distinctly defined and separated on the question of the Tariff as on some others; but as far as my acquaintance with Mr. Jefferson's opinions, derived from his own writings goes, he was always consistent on this point, and certainly has left us the most convincing and unquestionable proof of his disapprobation of the doctrine of protection, contended for by modern Whiggery. I shall quote from a number of his letters, to prove—first, that he was a free trade man—and, secondly, that he was decidedly and emphatically opposed to the Whig doctrine of protection.

In July, 1785, Mr. Jefferson wrote a letter to a French or Dutch gentleman on the subject of the financial condition of the States, in which he asserts that Virginia had paid more revenue in the previous year than all the other States together, and he ascribes her ability to do so to the fact, "that she is (was) at liberty to avail herself of her natural resources, and has (had) free markets for them." In a letter of the same month and year, to Mr. Adams, he says, "I think all the world would gain by setting commerce at perfect liberty." And, in August, 1800, in a letter to Gideon Granger, he uses this language, "Let our affairs be disentangled from those of all other nations except as to commerce, which the merchants will manage the better the more they are left to manage for themselves." These expressions, it is true, are very general—and, at the time they were uttered, there can hardly be said to have been a tariff question to which they had reference—but they show conclusively, that, at that early day, Mr. Jefferson was thoroughly imbued with the spirit of free trade. So utterly at variance are they, though, (let the Federalists make as little of them as their known and hereditary hatred of their author can induce them to make,) with the restrictions and prohibitions of the odious Whig—falsely name American—system, that we should be justified in inferring Mr. Jefferson's opposition to its principles, even if he had left us no positive proof of the fact. Fortunately for the country, and for the "truth of history," he has left us, under his own sign manual, the indisputable evidence of his abhorrence of Whig protection. Here it is: "Under the power to regulate commerce, they assume indefinitely that also over commerce, which the merchants will manage the better the more they are left to manage for themselves." These expressions, it is true, are very general—and, at the time they were uttered, there can hardly be said to have been a tariff question to which they had reference—but they show conclusively, that, at that early day, Mr. Jefferson was thoroughly imbued with the spirit of free trade. So utterly at variance are they, though, (let the Federalists make as little of them as their known and hereditary hatred of their author can induce them to make,) with the restrictions and prohibitions of the odious Whig—falsely name American—system, that we should be justified in inferring Mr. Jefferson's opposition to its principles, even if he had left us no positive proof of the fact. Fortunately for the country, and for the "truth of history," he has left us, under his own sign manual, the indisputable evidence of his abhorrence of Whig protection. Here it is: "Under the power to regulate commerce, they assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufactures, and call it regulation to take the earnings of one of these branches of industry, and that, too, the most depressed, and put them into the pockets of the other, the most flourishing of all."

This language is used in his letter to Governor Giles in December, 1825, after the protective, who first came, hat in hand, to ask a temporary bounty of the liberality of Congress, had fattened and grown so strong upon that bounty, that they were bold enough to develop their real policy, and had begun to demand, that what was granted as a favor should be conceded as a right, and that a measure acknowledged to be unjust, or at least unequal in its operation, and designed to be of temporary duration, should be established as a permanent system. He perceived also that this attempt was made under a colour of carrying out certain implied powers conveyed in the Constitution, and which none but a Federal constructionist would or could ever have discovered. Thus, in this single sentence, does Mr. Jefferson repudiate and condemn two Whig principles—their protection and their latitudinous mode of construing the Constitution; and yet they have the audacity to call upon this name to bolster up their despicable measures, and to call their inexcusable errors, or intentional misstatements, a vindication of the "truth of history." Others can, I hope will, collate more fully from the "truth of history" to establish the points set forth in this paper; but the facts already adduced are amply sufficient to show that Thomas Jefferson neither was the father nor ever became the sponsor of the misnamed Protective policy. An if the Whig writers will read history with as earnest a desire to learn "the truth" of it as he shows to palm off rank Federal heresies upon the great Apostle of Democracy, he will find that his party has really out-heroded Herod in carrying the protective policy to a point far beyond that contemplated by the early friends of protection. In consequence of this, many who were not hostile to the principle of protection, repudiated its Whig embodiment; and the Tariff has now become, in a great measure, a simple proposition of high and low taxes. The Whigs go for the first, and the democrats for the latter. ROANE.

REv45i8p4c7, May 30, 1848, British Intervention.

The following is from "el Amigo del Pueblo," published at Campeachy:

"Her Britannic Majesty's Minister in Mexico has addressed a communication to the authorities of this State, respecting the offer which the latter had made simultaneously to the United States, England and Spain, of the dominion and sovereignty of Yucatan, on condition of saving it from the ruin and destruction which threatened its destruction as a free and civilized people. An English frigate, just arrived at Del Carmen, brought the official communication of the above-mentioned Minister, which was yesterday forwarded to this city by the English Vice Consul in that island. It was yesterday dispatched, by special express, to the authorities of the States. We learn that the Minister has intimated his determination to make a representation to the Government of the critical situation of Yucatan, and of the positive necessity which exists of giving prompt and effective aid. He concludes with assuring the Government of Yucatan that Her Britannic Majesty's Cabinet will take into consideration the offer which has been made of the cession of the dominion of the country, in the event of its being saved from the imminent danger which threatens it."

The Union, of Merida, of the 9th inst., states that the Government had returned to the capital from Tical, much affected with the ineffectual attempts which had been made to establish peace. All pacific attempts to restore tranquility having failed, the Yucatanese are significantly told that blood washes away blood, and that they should use the same weapons as their adversaries, in their defense—in the prosecution of the war, viz: unsparing vengeance and terror.

Texas will accept January

RWv22i1p1c2 Jan. 3, 1845 “Texas Debate,”
The debate on Mr. Ingersoll’s, resolutions of annexation, which was expected to commence Monday, has been postponed until to-morrow.

A strong attempt is being made by the Texas party at Washington to reconcile all Democratic dissentients upon the basis of some new plan, like that of Mr. Weller of Ohio, or Mr. Douglas of Illinois. There was a Caucus Saturday, and, as conjectured, chiefly for this purpose. A private letter shown us expresses the opinion that every plan will fail, as public opinion in the northern and middles States was becoming more and more hostile to Texas:– The writer might have added just as truly, and with entire truth, so far as we know, “in the South, too.”

Except the “Chivalry” and a few other, some from one motive some from another, the Southern States taking the masses of both parties, are opposed to annexation, or quite indifferent about it. N. Carolina has openly through her Legislature, expressed her dissent, and Virginia, submitting the question to the Democratic party alone, to say nothing of the Whigs, we hold it to be extremely doubtful if a majority would not be found opposed to “immediate annexation” – that is to annexation without the previous consent of Mexico. Nothing is more certain than that in this affair of Texas our venerable neighbor runs quite ahead of Democratic opinion. There is very little sympathy with his hot haste, out of the circle of those who hold Texas Lands. The Sweat House itself is divided on the matter. If Mr. Gallatin’s letter were published by the Enquirer, the Texas ranks would be reduced to a mere skeleton. The Calhounites and the Land and Scrip holders would be pretty much all.

Here is a view that we think cannot but strike the public with much force: Mr. Polk, the Texas party say, was elected as a friend of immediate Annexation: We deny the fact – but grant it to be so: Why not then wait for Mr. Polk’s administration to annex it! Why defraud him of this glory? Why squeeze Texas through as the shank of an inglorious and universally detested Administration and at the short session of Congress, when there is no time to debate it fully and gather public opinion? Why this unaccountable, this thundering haste, so little in consonance with the gravity of the occasion and with the weight of the subject?

Ah! “thereby hang’s a tale!” The Texas Land and Scripholders are not only impatient to realize and grasp their profits, but they know well, yes, they well know that it is “now or never,” and that even with a Texas President in the person of Mr. Polk, the measure of Annexation cannot be carried if the public opinion of the United States is left to time and calm deliberation. “Immediate Annexation” is odious, and any annexation, is day by day receding in public favor. Could we steer clear of inflicting any wrong to Mexico, and put ourselves right in the   of the world in the acquisition – even then we believe it would be repugnant to the large majority of the American People: But unless that be first done the Whig party are unanimously opposed to “immediate “Annexation” and a large portion besides of the soundest part of the Democratic Party.

“From Texas,”

By the arrival of the steam packet New York, Capt. Wright, we have received our files of Galveston and other papers to the 21st inst. Nearly 400 emigrants from Bremen had arrived at Galveston within a few days.

The Gazette of the 1st says: “The interruption in the navigation between this city and Houston, in consequence of low water in the bay, within the past week has retarded the steamers, and left us without late intelligence from the Seat of Government. The mail due a week ago only came to hand yesterday, and its successor had not arrived when our paper for this morning went to press. WE believe we have not before mentioned the election of Mr. Greer as President pro tem of the Senate. He, as well as the Speaker of the House, is a decided friend of the administration.”

The papers contain President Jones’ Inaugural Address. It is brief and to the purpose and neat in diction. His object, he states, will be the maintenance of public credit; the reduction of the expenses of the Government, the abolishment of paper issues by the Government; a proper [ . . . ] with incidental protection, the establishment of a system of Common Schools; the attainment of speedy peace with Mexico; the encouragement of immigration; friendly and just relations with the Indians on the frontier; the introduction of the [ . . . ]; the encouragement of Internal Improvement.

A Galveston paper says: “The question will soon be laid before the people of Texas [ . . . ] authentic shape, whether they will take an acknowledgement of their independence from Mexico, [ . . . ] of declining annexation by the United States, or await the chance of union with this country.”

The Houston Telegraph [ . . . ] steamer Dayton is hard and fast of Red Fish [ . . . ]. She is heavily laden, with upwards of 60 passengers, and among them, Capt. Elliot, the British Minister.

Business between Houston and Galveston is very brisk. Two steamboats are constantly employed as packets between the two cities.

Ebenezer Allen, Esq. has been appointed Attorney General of Texas. Stephen Hoyle is to be private Secretary to the President.

The Indians about Bastrop have been engaged of late in several acts of depredation, such as horse stealing, &c, &c.

Major Hays has disbanded his company of veterans and indefatigable spies. His reasons are want of means to defray their expenses. Since this even the Mexicans in the neighborhood of San Antonio have become more impudent and insulting that heretofore. The people in that neighborhood call loudly upon Congress for protection.

The Texas National Register (started on the same plan as our Niles Register) appears to be a valuable paper and ably conducted. [N. O. Bee]

Keywords: Mexican debt payments to the United States

"Il Secretario“ in a letter to the Philadelphia North American of Dec. 27, says:

"Of Congress, I have nothing else to tell you, but that Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, took upon himself a sort of engagement to call up the Texas question, on Monday.

On this matter, Mr. Calhoun,—whom I had expected to manage it with some little of the ability of which he has the reputation-has certainly proved himself as great a bungler as was ever seen. He has done little but march from one blunder to anther; and if we escape a nation mischief for which the party in power were really ripe, was shall owe it, after all, to nothing but his incapacity, the folly by which he has disgusted the people with the very ware of wickedness which he meant to recommend and which they were abundantly disposed to receive.

Each new revelation of documents that is made or extorted brings into plain view some new iniquity, or furnishes the strong suspicion of some other suppression or fraud. Among other, the last Message and its appendix afford, I think, strong reasons for believing that the whole allegation of Mexico's failure to pay the last two installments of our indemmites is entirely without proof, and merely to irritate the country against her. A very intelligent claimant, whose heavy interest in the thing has urged him to arrive at the real state of the facts, assures me that all proof of Mexico's non payment is wanting: that neither the Cabinet nor young Mr. Green (who is brought in to furnish the statement which they publish) knows anything positive and official of the matter. Mr. Shannon cannot directly assert it: there is no statement from our agent and receiver for the purpose; master Green has no official relation to it and the Mexican Secretaries, on the contrary-men of high character-directly declare that the money has been paid over. The policy of that government has been to give us no decent pretence of quarrel with them; from this they deviated only when, in the Spring, they had reason to look on themselves as already in a state of war with us. Then, it would have been absurd to be paying us money. But they withheld it no longer after they learned the rejection of the Treaty of Annexation. If it should prove really true that they have now again stopped the indemmites, it can only be in consequence of the hostile position take by the President through Mr. Shannon. The absence of these proofs which would scarcely have failed to be exhibited, if the fact were true, compels me to disbelieve it; but should I even turn out as they say, who can blame Mexico? Whose fault will it be but that of this Administration?

Mr. William Polk, brother to the elect of Gen. Jackson and Mr. Calhoun had just appeared here. His errand is supposed, of course, a political one. Leves are said to be already attending him, and the whole valletaille [as Paul Louis Courrier calls it] the entire lackeydom of office-seekers and fawners is reported to be besieging him at the back door as well as the front. With what he is entrusted may presently appear in this Texas business. What if the Hero and the President to be should have sent him to speak out to the doubting democracy? Mr. Calhoun has certainly involved himself in one of those difficulties which, in tragedy, make the interposition of some supernatural being indispensable. I see, from the givings-out in some of the court organs, that he is, in his consternation, anxious to make a scape-goat of poor Shannon. Such a piece of cowardice and perfidy is only fit to redouble one's scorn of him, already abundant.

"TEXAS,"

The correspondent of the Courier & Enquirer at Washington, gives the following solution of the mad and reckless haste which annexation is pressed by the "Immediatists." He may be right in part; but he may rely upon it that the ruling motive is, not to disembarrass Mr. Polk, but that the large party interested in Texas, know that delay is dangerous to their schemes if not absolutely fatal to them. Mr. Calhoun's negotiations have inflicted a stab upon annexation which it will scarcely ever recover.

The impatience with which Mr. Hammett showed in common with the other zealous friends of annexation has been pushed to this outbreak by promptings from the Hermitage, instigated, without doubt, by the President elect and his friends, who wish to disembarrass the coming administration of this matter, for such is the purport of letters received here yesterday by the hands of Col. Polk, the brother of the President elect. He is the bearer of a letter from Gen. Jackson, pressing action at his session of the question of annexation, and urging, among other, the consideration, that if it is postponed to the next Congress, the composition of the Senate may be such as to give to Dallas the casting vote, a position of embarrassment from which he desires to see him freed; either because he may distrust him, or for the reason that, as the candidate of the party for the succession, his vote, howsoever given, may take from his political strength. The faithful here, are also referred to Col. Polk for further information as to the views and wishes of both the Ex-President and the President elect, the latter of whom, ever since his nomination, has, by a species of cunning purely "Democratic," never been permitted to appear before the public but in a political Siamese connection with the old hero, which argues little for his individual worth and promises badly for the future; it shows him to be a man not self sustained, and liable to be made the dupe of the sinister influences of those who may be around him. Although he may have the best intention, he will in all probability be the slave of a back door influence as baneful as that which, in its control over General JACKSON, was so fruitful of evil to the country. It is rumored that Col. W. H. Polk is to be of the kitchen cabinet, but he is young and his appearance indicated inexperience of the world, and too great a constitutional proclivity to rashness to warrant his occupying the post of chef de cuisine.

You have doubtless seen the resolutions of instruction of the Legislature of Missouri as they have passed the Senate of that State. They bear the impress of having been shaped by the friends of Mr. Benton, so as to leave him free to act as he pleases in attaining annexation, which they resolve the people to that State are in favor of, and which they desire to see annexed as soon as "practicable," and without endangering the "peace and harmony of the Union," all which is perfectly compatible with the fullest discretion on the part of their representatives in Congress as to the time and method of accomplishing this object.

From the New York Sun, Extra:

FROM MEXICO.—By the Eugenia from Vera Cruz we have received our files of papers from Mexico to and including the 7th of December. Since the last news was received, Congress was suspended by a proclamation of several of the principal minister, and Santa Ana appointed dictator with full power to act and do without advice or counsel from others. This was on the 1st of December, but on the 6th Congress met in defiance of the Government, being escorted by the people and soldiery to a man to their chambers, where they received, accepted and published the manifesto of the revolting general (Don J. Herera) and appointed him president of the Republic without more ado.

Herera immediately issued a decree calling upon the inhabitants to sustain themselves and him in their movements against a man who had assured his will to be over and above all, which was received with acclamation.—The National palace was then taken possession of - the ex-ministers, save Canalizo, who was arrested, fled and all was quiet as if my magic.

No blood was shed but it was supposed that the execution of Santa Ana if he should be arrested, would be called. One of his statues in the streets was broken down by the inhabitants, and then removed by the new President in order to prevent riot and disturbance.

WASHINGTON, Jan'y 2, 1845

A press of occupations has for some days denied me the opportunity of writing either to you or to my venerable and cherished friend near you. I am sure that the perfect identity of his style and mine, and our plentiful lack in common of wit must have often led you to suspect that I wrote many of the Enquirer’s “leaders.” Why, then should I deny the “soft impeachment?” But, then, Mr. Ritchie and I systematize and subdivide our joint loving labors. He does the quotations, supplying all those gems of original learning and taste that glisten adown the columns, like orient pearls at random strung. He has mines of that sort of erudition, the astonishing man – no less than six quotations from Dr. Dodd’s “ Beauties of Shakespeare,” three from a book that Mr. Jefferson sent him call “the Bible,” and two from a rare author called Cowper. One of them runs thus: “Oh for a lodge in some vast wilderness,” and refers, I believe, to certain farms of Texas. The other is something about “I am monarch of all I survey,” and is supposed to allude to some floating Land Grants in the same Promised Land. He furnished all the French, too; which, you know, is of a quality that has long kept all Gaul in astonishment. He likewise does the History; for I assure you that the splendid discovery that Colbert was Minister of France to Louis the XVI is his, not mine. The “fine writing” is also his, undoubtedly – though, occasionally, the imaginative powers of the elder junior and the fervid genius of Tommy erect themselves into a sublime that almost rivals the paternal. They, in short, do the fancy (which you know is the richest) the erudition (which is perfectly ponderous) the Abstractions (which are of the very thinnest) and the fictions generally, which for boldness of invention soar a little higher into the empyrian than ever Pegasus winged before except that immortal Subverter of all fact, the great Ferdinand Vendez Pinto, the acknowledged prince of prevaricator. But if you ever see such humbler things in the Enquirer as a little sound argument, an atom of common sense, a touch of manliness, a ray of charity, a bit of sincerity, a momentary gleam of honesty, or a joke that is not fitter to make on cry than laugh – lay your hand upon your heart or crook your arm and swear that I did it! So, now, having made my confessions, let us pass to matters here.

They have not yet taken a very decisive form. The Democracy is a little be-fogged on the great questions, Texas and the Tariff. On which side it will emerge, no eye can yet discover. They have a great longing, in both cases, to keep their promises; for they are religiously observant of their engagements to do ill. Here, however, they pause, apprehensive that they many hurt – not others (for that were a small matter) but themselves. Meanwhile, by way of solacing their love of mischief, they threaten a little from time to time, to break up the Oregon negotiation, or amuse themselves with efforts to worry brave little Rhode Island and pull down her government about her ears. They have been at the latter pastime to day.

As to Texas, they have held, on Saturday, one caucus, and are probably at brawls in another, to-night. In the former, there are said to have been many violent Southern propositions and speeches, met by as many cool Northern moves to make them all abortive. Finally, a postponement and a committee of compromise was resorted to – it is said, with no sincerity on the part of the North. The Report and final decision were to be to-night. You will perceive that they already have before them, openly, near a score of plans: probably as many more are yet to be divulged; for, it being taken for granted that rapine is a thing easily made acceptable to “the greatest land-stealers upon earth,” and that national robbery is a thing at which any knave is expert enough, every blockhead seems to have his Joint Resolution of Annexation. That single word, inasmuch as it avoids saying “Plunder,” dispenses with all other colorings of right or policy or sense or decency. Henceforth, if a man wants his neighbor’s house or wife of purse, let him ‘annex’ the same. If you have sold a thing, put the cash or other consideration into your pocket, button it up tight, and then “re-annex” it. Thus you see that the only difference lies in the Re----: when you impudently say that you will have a thing without a title, that’s Annexation: and when you choose to say that you once had a claim, that’s Re-Annexation.
I have reason to believe, however, that the skilful doubler whom you celebrated the other day, Mr. Dromgoole, thinks that it is he who will bring matters about; and his crafty guesses at what can succeed may be much relied on. He. Thinks that all the positive measures will be defeated, and that a Resolution (to be moved by him) That it is expedient that Texas be annexed, will be the utmost that can be done. That, you see, will involve no action, and only be a declaration of opinion: and as the opinion of such a House is (as he knows) of no sort of weight with any body, the step will not be of the slightest consequence. The Globe, on the other hand, is positive that the thing will pass; but divested of all detail, in the simple and concise form that Texas be and is annexed.

The dynasty that is to be display an unexpected caution, amounting to timidity, as to committing itself to men or measures. Mr. Calhoun’s incredible follies have probably made them afraid of him and forfeited all the vantage he at first held. Never did any one of reputation exhibit such astonishing fatuity. What a rapid havoc he has made of such respect as was left him – that of ability

As I do not write to the Enquirer to-night, please let my loving friends know that when they can either write or fight or speak the truth, "the hero of the Liberty school" may conceive some little apprehension at the wrath or vauntings of “the Heroes of Hobbes’s Hole.” Dogs as they are, they may whine when I lash them: but let them bark at me, if they dare!

“FROM WASHINGTON,”

The Democracy are reported to be in a "Snarl" at Washington – embarrassed by their very majority, and by their having ceased for the present, to be afraid of the Whigs. We heard many rumors from there which it is not worth while to notice in detail. The scope of all is, that nothing will be done at this session of Congress to disturb things as they are, either in our domestic policy or Foreign relations: that is, in other word, that the Tariff will not be disturbed nor Texas annexed.

This is news enough for present. [LLS]

“CONGRESS, PROCEEDINGS OF TODAY,”

The Senate is not in session today, having on Thursday adjourned over until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The proceedings this morning were commenced by an explanation by Mr. CHAPMAN, of Alabama, in relation to some comments in the Nation Intelligency on his speech, delivered a few days ********

MEMORIAL AGAINST ANNEXATION AND SLAVERY.

Mr. PHOENIX, of New York, presented a memorial of the respectable society of Friends, in the State of New York, in opposition to the annexation of Texas, which, on his motion, the Clerk commenced reading. A part of the memorial was devoted to the subject of Slavery, and contained strong Abolition sentiments. When the Clerk arrived at that part of it, Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, rose and objected to the further reading of the paper.
He said that by the courtesy of the House Mr. Phoenix had been permitted to offer the memorial when the ruled would have forbid it. This was done under the supposition that there was nothing offensive in them, which now turned out to be a most violent Abolition petition.

Mr. McClernard then moved to lay the memorial on the table, and on that motion the yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote on laying on the table stood yeas 87, nays 87 – a tie.

The Speaker then voted in the affirmative, and the memorial was therefore laid on the table.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Mr. Bailey, of Virginia, moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole, on which motion ninety-seven gentlemen voted in the affirmative – the noes were not counted.

ANNEXATION OF TEXAS

The House then went into Committee of the Whole and Mr. Hopkins, of Virginia, took the Chair.

The proposition to annex Texas was taken up, and Mr. Bailey being entitled to the floor, said he would yield it to any gentleman in the opposition who desired to address the Committee.

No one showing a disposition to speak, loud calls of “question question question” were heard from the Whig side of the Hall.

The reading of the amendment to the main proposition was then called or, and it was read.

Mr. DOUGLASS then rose and stated that as no one appeared to be desirous of debating the question at the present time, he would move that the Committee rise.

Loud calls were again made for the question, when the reading of Mr. DOUGLASS’ amendment to the amendment was called for, and it was read.

Mr. RHETT rose and requested Mr. DOUGLASS to withdraw the preamble to his resolution and put his first resolution to the vote. That resolution embraced the simple proposition to annex Texas to the United States unconnected with any details. That course would bring the House to a test vote at once and would determine whether a majority were in favor of annexation in the abstract. He wished this point to be decided in the outset, and the details could easily be settled afterwards.

Mr. DOUGLASS agreed to the suggestion of Mr. Rhett and withdrew the preamble to his resolution. The vote was then about to be put on the adoption of the first resolution, when

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL rose and stated that he was unwilling that the House should come to a decision on this question without a word being said in its opposition.

This movement of Mr. J. R. Ingersoll disappointed the Whig members very much, who were anxious that the question should be put. It was, on the other hand, a relief to the dominant party, who were evidently much embarrassed by the position in which they were placed and would have come up to a vote unprepared and with the greatest reluctance.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL then proceeded to address the Committee in opposition to the measure. He was at so remote a point from the reporter as to prevent his remarks from being distinctly heard. It is therefore impossible to give a synopsis of his remarks.

Mr. PAINE succeeded Mr. INGERSOLL, and contended for the general policy of annexing Texas to the Union.- The leading argument advanced by him was that Texas was necessary to us for the purpose of preserving the integrity of the Union, and for its safety of defense in the time of war. He advanced other positions and strenuously urged the expediency of the measure. He was very irritable at the idea which had been advanced by the opponents of this measure, that it was a slave question and was to be resisted on that account. He became somewhat boisterous on this point, and before he got through, his hour expired.

Mr. WINTHROP, of Mass., then got the floor and as there seemed to be disposition to adjourn, he moved that the Committee rise.

The motion was carried, and at 3 o’clock the House adjourned.

Correspondence of the Whig

WASHINGTON, Jan'y 5, 1844

For the last two days, we have had here a strange jumble of Farce and Tragedy – a sorts of heroico-comic of politics, where the ridiculous alone atoned for the atrocious, and knavery was softened down by foolery obviously incapable of performing it. In short, we have had, in happy juxtaposition, Dorrism and Annexation, the one made almost as respectable by all the nonsense of Mr. Burke of New Hampshire, as the other moral by all the ingenuity of Mr. Charles Ingersoll of Philadelphia.

Never, unquestionably, have met, by any grace of those gods who, after dinner, look down for their sport, upon human foolery, so sad a piece of diversion, as these two questions, hobbling along together, must afford. The contemptible and the odious never before so embraced each other, nor the words of Freedom, Law, and all that should at its very sound raise in one’s mind noble and pure ideas, every before were so joined with the senseless, the pusillanimous, and the ruffianly.

Than a freedom which, for the slightest grievance, easy and quick of natural redress, would break down all law and aim for mutual destruction peaceful brothers of the same soil, than a freedom like that of Dorrism which teaches, under airy doctrines about Natural Rights, every thing that is fittest to plunge a land in desolation and blood without end, I can imagine no greater curse The freedom of the bad is the most dreadful of all the scourges that were ever let loose upon any land. I can imagine no sign more woeful to any country than when none are so loud for Liberty as the fools and knaves – when servile fools like Ritchie are pealing that sacred name in an eternal clamor, and every idle echo of ignorance or every mimic cry of fraud voices back the sound.

I believe the Democratic party will pass Resolutions directly, affirming all the principles of the Dorr insurrection, and teaching in effect that mere tumult is the only Government, the only law; that the constituted order of things, even without, oppression, has no sacredness, no reverence, but that a majority, real or pretended, formed of no matter whom or what – aliens; felons, refugees, or anything else – is entitles, al all times, to overturn whatever is pleases and demolish a State, as soon as you can count, or pretend to have counted, a majority of one.

One can conceive that such wild doctrines would be resorted to among nations denied will gifts of freedom, and maddenred, by severe oppression, in the very fury of Liberty. But how in a land where equality is native, accustomed to mild laws shaped all the while by a ready conformity to the public which, such horrid principles of mere confusion should spring up on all sides, it is difficult to imagine. We enjoy already, confessedly, the freest system of government upon the earth: and yet the cruelest despotism in existence or that ever did exist has never displayed so wild, and so restless an impatience to subvert all authority.

It is, too, not a little remarkable to see in how small a degree any thing that ever before commanded among men admiration or its opposite any longer acts upon the public mind. The rapscallion array that assailed the Rhode Island Arsenal or fled at Chepachet were scarcely so seemly as Falstaff's recruits nor their leader an atom more heroical than that doughty Knight himself. Never was there such a burlesque of freedom, such a travesty of valor. Naturally, where all thought was not lost but of the mere buffoonery of whatever was fit to rule men, an attempt so marked with every thing that was pitable and grotesque could only have excited an universal derision: yet this miscreant fugitive, with a heart as white as he meant that his hands should be red with fraternal blood, is by a party who forget his cowardice in his crimes, erected into the hero – the martyr!

Consider, too, the strange contrast presented by the very action which they are obliged to apply to this Rhode Island Case. Just a twelvemonth since, these very men held, as legislators, that it was competent for any State to dissolve, by its contumacy, any law that Congress passed, even upon a subject specially confided to it: and here they take it upon themselves to pronounce upon the validity of the constitution and lawn of a State, in matters as strictly of State authority alone!

As to Texas, after many fluctuations, it begins to look as if that grand iniquity and folly was about to be consummated. The prevailing opinion begins to be what mine originally was, that it will certainly be carried in the House and may probably prevail in the senate also. To bring it about – to stir the flagging zeal of the Northern democracy, the direct rescript of Gen'l Jackson has probably been necessary: but the younger Polk has no doubt intimated to them the hero’s pleasure: and it is now probably that they will go on to cumulate upon the glories of the 8th those of Annexation. Methinks they might have found a yet more appropriate era for the fact – that of the trial of Louallier for his life or the “shopping” of Judge Hall.
FROM MEXICO AND CHINA – The bark Eugenia, Captain Biscoe, arrived yesterday morning at this port from Vera Cruz which she left on the 12th of December, Capt. B. informs us that the principal towns, and indeed all the country, have declared against Santa Ana, who, with a small force was at Yucrefaro. The revolution passed off very quietly, no blood having been shed: the former revolutions being carried on by one party of military against another resulted in much loss of life, but this movement coming from the people was well as the soldiery, makes it general, and hence the commotion was not of a sanguinary character – Santa Ana has but little chance of overcoming this rebellion, and it was a matter of conjecture, whether he would attempt to escape or deliver himself up; he will probably endeavor to win over the opposite General by bribery or other corrupt means, but in this it is thought he will not succeed. IN case that he is take prisoner the people will probably demand his execution, as they deem his liberty dangerous to the public safety.

The markets were in a very bad state, with little prospect of improvement.

There were at the Island of Sacrificio, Br. Frigates Spartan, just arrived from New Orleans, Inconstant, and two French brigs of war, but no U.S. vessels.

The American Minister to China, Mr. Cushing, came passenger from Vera Cruz in the Eugenia, and has furnished us with the following sketch of the events of the revolution as they came to his knowledge while in Mexico. It will be found interesting and instructive:-

The revolution of Mexico is rapidly approaching a decisive crisis, and the utmost confusion and disorder exist in all parts of the Republic.

The great object of the revolution is to decide whether Santa Ana shall be precipitated from power, of whether, on the other hand, he shall be the permanent dictator and arbitrary master of the Government.

In order to understand well the actual state of things, it is necessary, in the first place, to give a brief explanation of the previous things.

At the head of the Government in 1841 was General Anastasio Bustamente under the constitution which then regulated the Mexican Republic. In August, 1841, General Paredes and the Department of Jalisco pronounced against the Government of Bustamente.

A civil war of brief duration ensued, which was terminated on the 28th of September 1841, by an arrangement in virtue if which the pre existing constitution was abolished, and General Santa Ana was invested with the powers of dictator, for the purpose of reorganizing the Constitution and the Government.

This temporary arrangement is known by the name of the Basis of Tacubaya and the agreements of La Estanzuela.

Under the auspices of Santa Ana, a Congress assembled in June 1842, and proceeded to deliberate on a new Constitution. Santa Ana himself retired to Manga de Clavo, leaving General Bravo as President ad interim; and the proceedings of Congress not being agreeable to Santa Ana, it was dissolved by General Bravo in December 1842, and a National Junta, or Assembly of Notables, was convened in its place.

On the 12th of June, 1843, a new constitution was completed and made public, by which (among other things) the supreme power was lodged in the hands of a President, to be elected for five years; of an elective body called the Council of Government, and of a Congress composed of a Senate and Chamber of Deputies; and Santa Ana himself was immediately elected President under the new Constitution.

During this period the republic had been distracted, not only by the civil war which displaced Bustamente and elevated Santa Ana to power, but also by the insurrection of Yucatan and the long civil war which ensued in that quarter, by incursions of the Indians in the North – by controversies with foreign powers – by the question of Texas, and above all by incompetency and corruption in all members of the government.

By the 6th of the Basis of Tacubaya it was provided that 'The provisional Executive shall answer for his acts before the first constitutional Congress,’ and this was confirmed by the agreement of La Estanzuela.

Nevertheless by a decree of Santa Ana issued on the 3d of October, 1843, before assuming the office of constitutional President, it was declared that as the power exercised by him under the Basis Tacubaya was, by its very tenor; without limitation, the responsibility referred to in the 6th of the said Basis, was merely a responsibility of opinions that all the acts of his Dictatorship were of the same permanent force as if performed by a Constitutional government, and much be observed as such by the first Constitutional Congress.

The new government was completed and installed in January 1844, when the first Congress under the new institution assembled. Its early acts seemed to have been in accordance with the views of Santa Ana, for it voted an extraordinary contribution or four millions with which to prosecute the war against Texas.

But, on his requiring authority for a loan of ten millions, the Congress hesitated to give its assent; though it was notorious that but a small portion of the extraordinary contribution had been realized, and the Treasurer, so far from being competent to supply the means for carrying on a war against Texas, was in fact incompetent for the ordinary daily necessities of the government.

Meanwhile, as affairs proceeded, a heavy opposition to Santa Ana began to manifest itself in congress and through out the Republic. He had been raised to power, though apparently with great unanimity, yet, as the event has shown, by a military revolution, rather than by the spontaneous general choice of the people.

For, on his expressing a wish to retire a short time to Manga de Clavo for the care of his private affairs, (as he had done in 1842,) in which case the new Constitution required that the Senate should make choice of a President _ad interim_, to officiate during his absence from the seat of Government, the ministerial candidate, Gen. Valentin Canalizo, prevailed by one vote only over his opponent, General Rincon.

Such, then, was the position of things in October 1844: Santa Ana being Presidente _propietario_; Canalizo Presidente _interino_, and Congress assembled in special session, occupied with the foreign relations and the financial embarrassments of the Republic, when the revolution broke out in the large and powerful Department of Jalisco.

On the first of November, 1844, the Departmental Assembly of Jalisco adopted a published what is called an _Initiative_, being an act provided for by the constitution, in virtue of which the Assembly submitted the proposition following:

The National Congress will make effective the responsibility of the Provincial Government, to which it was subjected by the 6th of the basis of Tacubayba, which it swore to and caused to be sworn to by the nation.

2. The law of August 21, 1844, imposing extraordinary contribution, is repealed.

3. The Congress will occupy itself by preference in reforming the articles of the constitution, which experience has demonstrated to be contrary to the prosperity of departments.

This act was adopted by all the authorities of the Department, civil and military, and made known by public documents issued under the signature of the civil governor Escovado, and of the commandant general Galindo, with his principal officers; and thus far it was in Mexico a constitutional and not a revolutionary act – for in Mexico the military participate equally with the civil authorities in all political proceedings.

But, though nominally a constitutional act, it was in reality a revolutionary one, skillfully arranged and combined for the overthrow of Santa Ana.

To this intent, General Mariano Paredes, who had commenced the revolution in 1841 in the same Department of Jalisco, and who had since that time acted with Santa Ana, was pitched upon to be the agent of his overthrow.

The secret movers of the new revolution obtained for General Paredes the command of the department of Sonora, to reach which it is necessary to march through that of Jalisco.

On the way to his Government, Paredes stopped at Guadalajara, the capital of Jalisco, with the troops under his command, and there pronounced openly and directly against Santa Ana and assumed the functions of military chief of the revolution.

The four departments of Zacatecas, Aguascalientes, Sinalva and Sonora concurred at once in the _pronunciamento_ of Jalisco; and thus the five Northwestern departments were in arms at once against Santa Anna. Between these and Mexico, there intervene the two departments of Guanajuato and Queretaro.

Paredes advanced to Lagos, on the frontier of Jalisco, and there established his head quarters, with an army of 1400 men, to await the progress of events. In the contiguous department of Guanajuato was General Cortazar with 2000 men, on whom Paredes depended for support; but the rapid movements of Santa Ana himself prevented Cortazar from joining Paredes (if he had the intention) and compelled him (for the present at least) to declare for Santa Ana.

For, instantly on hearing what had taken place in Guadalajara, Santa Ana, who was then at Manga de Clavo, in the Department of Vera Cruz, and in whose neighborhood was a large body of troops, _professedly_ collected for an expedition against Texas, set out for Mexico, being invested by the _Presidente _as interin_ with the conduct of the war against Paredes. He set out from Jalapa on the 7th of November at the head of 8500 men, crossed rapidly the Department of Puebla, where he received some additional troops, and on the 18th arrived at Guadeloupe, a town near Mexico, where he fixed his head quarters.

He had left the Departments of Vera Cruz and Puebla full of professions of loyalty to his government; and he found the same professions in that of Mexico, and similar professions came to him there from Queretaro and Guanajuato; and, he prepared to march from Guadaloupe, and to assemble at Queretaro a force of 13,000 with which to overwhelm the little army of Paredes.

But, even at this moment, all powerful as he appeared, at the head of a great army, and with all the departments behind him loyal, symptoms began to appear of the uncertainty of his case; for though the Congress did not professedly support Paredes, yet it insisted that Santa Ana should proceed constitutionally, which the latter was unable or indisposed to do.

The Mexican Constitution provides expressly that the President cannot command in person the military force either by land or by sea without the previous commission of Congress. Santa Ana had taken the command without even pretending to ask the consent of Congress; and in so doing had himself performed a revolutionary act quite as positive and serious and that of Paredes.

Nevertheless, on the 22d he proceeded on his march to Queretaro; and on the same day the Chamber of Deputies voted the impeachment of the Minister of War. General Reyes, for signing the order under which Santa Ana held the command of the troops. Congress also voted to receive and print the pronunciamientos of the revolutionized department, in all this indicating a disposition, not to be mistaken, of hostility to Santa Ana.

On arriving at Queretaro, Santa Ana found that, although the military authorities were professedly in his favor, yet the junto departmental had pronounced for the initiative of Jalisco. Therefore, he made known to the members that if they did not repronounce in his favor, he would send them prisoners to Perote.

They refused; and three of them were immediately arrested by his order, and sent off under a strong guard in the direction of Mexico and Perote. When the report of these proceedings reached Mexico, the Congress immediately summoned before the Ministers of War and Government, to know whether they had authorized General Santa Ana to imprison the members of the junta departmental of Queretaro.

This subject occupied the Chambers on the 29th and 30th of November; and their attitude had now become so menacing, that the President ad interim Canalizo (after consultation with Santa Anna) took the high handed step of deciding to close the session of congress by force, and declare Santa Anna Dictator of the Republic.

Accordingly, on reparing to the Palace on the 1st of December, the members found the doors shut against them and guarded by soldiers; and on the 2d appeared the proclamation of Canalizo as Presidente Interino until otherwise ordered by Santa Ana.

For some days, this forcible demolition of the constitutional government by the creatures of Santa Ana remained without producing any apparent effect in Mexico. But on the very day when the news reached Puebla, General Inclan, commandante general of the department, in concert with the civil authority, pronounced against Santa Anna; and in a few days (on the 6th) the garrison and people of Mexico rose against the government, imprisoned Canalizo and his ministers – Congress re-assembled – the President of the Council of Government, General Herrera, assumed the exercise of the functions of President according to the constitution, and new ministers were appointed the next day, whose authority was immediately acknowledged in Vera Cruz.

At the latest dates there from Vera Cruz [Dec. 12th] affairs stood thus:-

The departments of Sonora, Sinaloa, Jalisco, Zacatecas and Aguascalientes were in a state of revolution, and in military possession of Gen. Paredes.

Gen. Santa Ana [with Cortazar] had military possession of the departments of Guanajuato and Queretaro.

Santa Ana’s President interim, Canalizo, and his Ministers were imprisoned in Mexico. Congress had reassembled, and a temporary constitutional government was installed there, composed as follows viz:

General Jose Joaquim de Herera, President of the Council of Government, charted temporarily with the supreme executive authority.

D. Luis Gonzaga Cuevas, Minister of Foreign Relations, State and Police.
D. Mariano Riva Palacios, Minister of Justice, Public Instruction and Industry.
D. Pedro J. Echeverria, Minister of Finance.
D Pedro Garcia Conde, Minister of War.

And it was already known that the Departments of Puebla and of Vera Cruz, had declared their adhesion to the provisional Government; and there is no doubt that most of the other Departments will also support he congress.
Meanwhile, Santa Anna is constitutional President of the Republic, but unconstitutionally in command of the troops employed against Paredes. The new Minister of War has ordered him to give up his command.

If he refuses he becomes undoubtedly a rebel and a traitor; because the new provisional government in Mexico is constitutionally constituted. If he consents, he ceases to have an troops for his support: he is placed at the mercy of his enemies.

Reports were current at Vera Cruz that a part of his troop had already proclaimed him Dictator; and that another part had declared against him; but upon this point, no information is authentic form had reached the public ear.

If any sufficient portion of troops adheres to him, to enable him to continue the war, still he is surrounded with difficulties, being in the very heart of the Republic, with Jalisco and its concurrent departments to the pacific against him on the one hand, and Mexico, with its concurrent departments to the Gulf, against him on the other hand:

He may recover himself by some new turn in the wheel of Fortune, and resume his place as the constitutional President proprietario of the Republic; but this is hardly probable, as te public sentiment is almost unanimous against him in nearly all the Departments.

It seems more likely that he will have to yield to the storm: and if not deprived of his life, he may escape to the United Stats by a sudden march on Tampico, or to South America by way of the Pacific.

“TEXAS,”

"Il Secretario says that the probability of annexation is increasing, and he said it before the great news from Mexico, which will probably put more weight into the Texan scale.

The “Globe” inclines to the same opinion – the Globe so much opposed to annexation in may and so much in favor of it in January!

That paper of Monday evening says-

"It is well ascertained now, that a majority exists in the House, and probably in the senate also, in favor of re-annexing Texas to the Union. The conditions alone remain to be adjusted. The treaty scheme of last session, as presented in joint resolutions, it is understood will not pass in either branch. The proposition of recognizing our obligations to Texas under the treaty of Mr. Jefferson in 1803, and entitling it to admission as a State at once, or as a Territory, with a view to subdivision for admission in several States, with the principle of the Missouri compromise engrained, seems to met with most favor. It is possible, however, that the act of the present congress may take the shape of that under which Mr. Jefferson secured Louisiana, being an appropriation to enable the President elect to effect at once what he may be instructed to accomplish in come form or other; submitting the alternatives to the discretion, and the confirmation of the next congress. We think the simpler mode will be found the best.

The National Intellegencer of Tuesday did not com, and we know not therefore how to correct "our longitude at sea!" but we still hold it to be impossible that the Texas iniquity can be perpetrated with a Whig Senate: To say nothing of the unconstitutionality of the mode of annexation by joint resolution, which is the popurlar fashion with the "Democracy" and the entire unlawfulness of which Mr. Callatin has so conclusively show, we hope that the Whigs of the Senate, if no others, will never consent to legalize plunder and constitutionalize fraud. The "signs" are more adverse than we imagined they could be, but we have yet the hope and faith that the Texas jobbers will be routed, and public opinion have the time and opportunity for full and fair play allowed it.

[letter]

To the People of the Congressional District of the counties of Albemarle, Nelson, Bedford, Amherst, Orange, Madison, and Greene, in Virginia

FELLOW CITIZENS:

As the term for which I was elected will expire on the 3d of March, next, I deem it proper, having received numerous letters on the subject, to make known to you my purpose to decline being considered again a candidate.
It is known to many of my friends that my private affairs, neglected as they have been by an almost continuous service in Congress and the State Legislature, for about eight years, will demand my constant personal attention, and that a withdrawal from public life can alone accomplish what is required at my hands. With me the highest considerations, and a due regard to the wishes of friends, have induced personal sacrifices heretofore; and now even, gratitude towards those who have given so many evidences of their friendship, would, under other circumstances, require that these sacrifices should again be made on my part; yet there are obligations and duties, apart from such relation as those which I now bear to you, that no man can, with propriety, disregard at all times.

The nature of my engagements and pursuits are such, that, on my return home in the spring, I could not enter actively into a canvass under any circumstances. Living, as I do, in the extreme Southern county of a district two hundred miles in length, I am almost barred the pleasure of personal intercourse with many of my constituents; and the time and the labor required to canvass the district, as now arranged, can only be estimated properly by myself, having devoted to it the last two years; in both of which, It will be recollected, was held a Congressional election, as well as the general election last fall, in which also I participated. Every consideration has been given the subject, and with a desire on my part to comply with the wishes of my friends, I had hoped that some of the obstacles would have been surmounted by arrangement which I had in contemplation; but in this I have been disappointed, and I therefore am not a candidate for your suffrages at the ensuing election. I make this announcement, this early, that some other individual my be selected to be voted for in my stead, who shall have my most hearty support, if he can come recommended by an unflinching attachment to the great principles and measures for which, in the late canvass, I, in common with others, contended. There are in the district many such men, as able as they are patriotic.

Let it not be supposed that my withdrawal has been caused by disappointment, consequent on the defeat sustained by my friends in the late presidential election. - That my disappointment was great is the general result, I admit, yet I am not the less devoted to the policy which we then advocated, not less desirous to see the principles, for which we exerted ourselves, permanently established – than I was previous to the first Monday, in November, nor less confident of their ultimate triumph. I proclaimed myself, as you well know, the friend of a discriminating Tariff, what would afford sufficient protection to American labor, while it primarily supplied the revenue of the country – the advocate of a a regulated U. States Bank, that would give us a sound, safe, and uniform currency, while I should afford every facility for the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public money – a friend of a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, which, while it would withdraw a fund from the general purposes of the Federal government, would, at the same time place it under the control of the States, to be applied to the special benefit of each State, and of the people within the same – and that I was also the friend of Mr. Clay. If these declarations made a Whig, when I had the honor to represent another district; if they constituted me a Whig when you voted for me last spring, as well as the spring preceding; if they were the tests of my apolitical faith in the canvass last fall, they are, now and they constitute me a Whig still.

In regard tot eh annexation of Texas, which, since my election, has been much discussed, in some portions of the District, I feel it to be but due to candor to declare, that, as your Representatives, I consider it my duty to oppose it. Though elected without reference at all to this question, it is my business to consider, and to meet it fairly. When first presented to me I felt inclined, without examination, to favor it – subsequent reflection has tended to fix my opinions against. It. The annexation of a foreign Territory to our own was, I think, never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. If the power, however, was beyond doubt, I deem the project, if carried out, as likely to endanger the Union, itself – as unwise and impolite in the existing state of our own, as well as the relations of Texas with those of Mexico.

We have, too, in Virginia alone, more land than is sufficient to maintain thirty millions of inhabitants. – We are possessed, also, (besides the lands of all the other twenty-five States) of a rich and boundless domain in the west, that must remain unpeopled, great portions of it, for ages to come. Whey, then, it may be asked, shall we covet that which is our neighbors? – Why need we acquire more, (and that, too, by aping many millions of dollars for it) when we have already an abundance, and to spare, even to the foreigner, at one dollar and a quarter per acre? Why, in grasping more, should we diminish the value of that which we already possess? For this must be the effect. Bring into market with our own, the lands of this foreign country; tempt the Virginia slave owner with the prospect of immense profits in the Texas cotton fields, and his Virginia lands will soon be offered for sale; he will be induced to sell at a low price, because he can buy more, where his slave labor will, as he supposes, be better remunerated. But the man with a small farm, and limited means, who has to perform all his labor himself, wishes to remove to the West or Northwest, to some free State, and he, to, offers his land for sale; but he finds his more opulent neighbor competing with him, finally underselling him, and thus reducing the value of his farm, until it is made almost worthless. The man of small means is forced to sell at a low price, because he has not the means to do so, and has already, perhaps, determined to go in another direction. The lands of each and every class of our citizens will thus be lessened in value, whether the wish to remove and to sell, or to remain in the Old Dominion. That it would, in all probability, add a few dollars to the value of each slave in Virginia for at time, I think, may be conceded; yet this advantage is small in comparison with the evils to which I have but adverted.

In these views I may be mistaken, yet they are candidly entertained. Now, as I am no candidate for office, I trust I shall not be suspected of a want of sincerity. I earnestly desire to see this Union preserved – to promote its blessings and to aid in establishing, on a firm basis, the institutions of our own free and favored land. My humble efforts while I have had the honor to be a representative in Congress, have been directed to these objects, and I shall retire from the station, at least with the consciousness of having done nothing to forfeit any claim which I may ever have had, to the good opinion of my fellow citizens.

Whigs of the Fifth Congressional District, I shall ever be grateful for your past and continued kindness; no service of mine can repay your confidence. I sever the relation which has existed between us with many feelings that you will appreciate. To say that I shall always recur with pleasure to the period when I was elected as the representative of such a district, would be but feebly to express myself, in the kind remembrance of a constituency, honored as you have been by the associations of the brightest intellects that Virginia has given to the Union, taken from your own limits, in her Jefferson, her Madison, her Monroe, her Crawford, and her Barbours.

Democrats, neighbours, and friends – to you I return my thanks, also, for your uniform courtesy and politeness; and, I may well say, that in all the heat of party excitement, you have given me abundant cause to believe, that we differed only in our political views. I take leave of you, also, as a portion of my constituents, with no unkind feeling towards any one, but with a sincere desire to see always a continuance of individual friendships and to feel an assurance that political conflicts, however fiercely waged, cannot with us dissolve the ties of the social circle.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"REVOLUTION IN MEXICO AND FALL OF SANTA ANA!"

The news from Mexico to-day, by way of New Orleans, is of the highest importance, and bears the stamp of authenticity. It seems clear that the fall of Santa Ana’s long sustained power is no longer a matter of Doubt, and that he, who for a period of 20 years has been “the arbiter of others’ fate, is now a suppliant for his own”!

What shape the Revolution will assume – whether the interests of Mexico and of Civilization will be promoted by the termination of Gen. Santa Ana’ ascendancy – or whether that event will lead to increased disorder and a darker anarchy – can only be ascertained by time. That the successful party will profess unbounded devotion to Liberty and the People and a determination to effect all that the People wish effected, we have no manner of doubt. That they possess the inclination to perform what they promise, is possible too; but that they can control events, enlighten at once a half civilized People, and make those worthy of Liberty, who are too ignorant to know it’s value or to use it wisely, Mexico will continue the prey of intestine disorder and anarchy, until some chief crises with the adequate energy and vigor to impose his joke upon her population – fitted as they are, to be Slaves, and unqualified to be freemen.

A nearer question – near to this country – remains to be considered: how will this new revolution in Mexico affect the United States? How will it affect the question of Texas annexation, now and for six months past so prominent and absorbing?

We can but express our fears that the revolution is Mexico, will strengthen the Immediatists, and operate unfavorable to the party comprising unquestionably an immense majority of the American People, who regard annexation at all as of doubtful benefit, and the Annexation which the Tylerian Dynasty proposed, as involving and comprehending robber. We understand that the “Immediatists” consider the fall of Santa anna as highly favorable to their iniquitous views.

"ANNEXATION,"

"Il Secretario” writing to the Philidelphia North American on the 3d of Jan’y, says:

"In the debate of to-day on Texas, there was, of course, little in the speeches to command much interest. When, after (as he says) years of thought on the subject, the Chairman of the Committee (foreign Relations) which has had it many months in charge, can give no better reason for it in law than Mr. Ingersoll’s [ . . . ] impotent one of the [ . . . ] of right has been reduced.

I have told you the sort of dilemma to which the party had brought themselves, when the House broke up yesterday. Again, to day they seem to stuck in the caudine forks of a like difficulty; be were, for the time, extricated by a speech, into which Mr. Joseph R. Ingersoll (I think injudiciously) allowed himself to be drawn.

Just yesterday, they offered the floor to the Whigs: Mr. Bayly of Virginia, who had it by right, signified his disinclination to speak, and tendered his opportunity to any one in the opposition. Again the Whigs, anxious to see them brought to vote on their own propositions, declined to speak, and called for the “question”! The vote being about to proceed, Mr. Rhett, of S. C. rose and signified that, to test at once, by the simplest measure, the disposition of the House, and to let it be seen who were and who were not the sincere friends of Annexation, he would move that at once, without any details or encumbrances as to the manner, it be declared that “Texas is annexed.” His proposition was adopted in this form, by the member whose Resolution was before the House, and thus brought in at once to be acted on. He had, also, in propounding it, the morality to signify that large part of the body were ready for the thing in the gross, and were only revolted when they came to examine the details, so that clearly the best way to omit the details, pledge them to the thing, and they would be sure then to reconcile themselves to the particulars that must follow. In a word, he knew that, in frosty weather, men are very averse to wetting their feet: but that, once over shoe-leather they plunge on easily up to their ears.

At this point, when half the democracy shook in their shoes, Mr. Ingersoll rose and went into the discussion.- Of course, he could not avoid touching upon the slave question, and putting gone of his strong objections to the thing of that ground. This was doubly obliging the Democracy – the Southern, by affording matter for resentment in their quarter, and this making the matter more popular – the Northern, by getting the Whigs to fight for them a question on which they dared not (though pledged by their support of Mr. Polk) come boldly up, either pro or con.

You will easily imagine that great fault was found with Mr. Ingersoll. Yet it seems that many of those who blame him are about to repeat the indiscretion. If they do, they stand condemned by their own complaints, for why, if it was wring, copy it?

Of Mr. Payne’s speech, which came next, I need say nothing, but that it a Southern, to a high degree of wrath and violence.

It seems now admitted, by some of the acutest observers that the vote of Annexation will probably carry in the naked form proposed by Mr. Rhett. And the truth no doubt is that the Imperial Mandate to that effect from the Hermitage has been brought by that minor hickory, the younger Mr. Polk. As I do not possess his confidence, I cannot aver the fact; but I do not question that he has brought (as I expected somebody would bring) the Hero’s high behest.

Monday will give us a new discussion, and I fear an unfortunate one, only fit to excite local passions and endanger the issue. Several Massachusetts Whigs seem anxious to speak, among them, I fear, will be Mr. Adams, whose severity will, I fear, act more strongly on the South than any arguments in favor of the thing. If he would be, for once, conciliatory, he might do good.

“TEXAS IN VIRGINIA”

On Wednesday in the senate of Virginia, Mr. WALLACE (of Faquier) from a Select Committee on the appropriation of the Governor’s Message, made to the Senate the following Report:

"Whereas, by the Treaty of Louisiana, it was expressly stipulated by the United States that eh inhabitants of said Territory should be incorporated into the Union, and admitted as soon as possible according the principles of the Federal constitution to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States; and whereas, the people of that part of said Territory known as Texas, have expressed their desire to be received into this Confederacy according to the terms set forth in said Treaty:-

Resolved therefore, That it is the right of the people of Texas to be admitted into the Union, and the duty of the people of the United States to perform in good faith all their obligations assumed by them in the purchase of Louisiana.

Resolved, That Texas should be admitted into this Union as soon as practicable.

Resolved, That the Senators from this Commonwealth in the Senate of the United States be instructed to effect that object."

Than this report, not yet acted upon by the Senate, but which, of course, the faithful in that body will swallow, as they would swallow an other noxious medicament which Demagogism had prescribed – than this report, politically speaking, as reprehensible a document as ever issued from men who were placed under and felt their obligations to Law and Constitution – nothing has ever been offered to the consideration of the country from official sources, so detestable and revolting.

Let the country remember this fact, and with it, the obligations of common honesty.

IF Texas was admitted by Mr. Jefferson’s treaty in 1803, as a part of Louisiana, first to territorial an successively to Sovereign State Rights – Texas was as certainly ceded to Spain by Mr. Monroe’s treaty of 1819! [approved by Monroe, Crawford, Wirt, and last and least, Calhoun!]
IF Jefferson had a right [as he confessed he had not!] to negotiate with France, for the purchase and acquisition of Louisiana, (comprehending Texas,) Mr. Monroe had as unquestionable a right to swap Texas, as he did, [Mr. Calhoun approving!] for Florida.

It was an exchange in the way of business and national convenience – not perhaps strictly regular on either side, but in which the American and the civilized world acquiesced. Nobody was aggrieved, and nobody was interested to raise abstract points and questions of international law, and strict right.

We still retain Florida for which Texas was swapped. Neither Spain, or Mexico who succeeds to the rights of Spain, lays any claim to that Territory! We hold securely and without dispute, the territory of the two Floridas, which by solemn and ratified treaty in 1819, the U. States agreed to accept for Texas. Neither Spain, or Mexico, standing in the shoes of Spain, has pretended to put in any adversary claim to our right to the Floridas, for which in 1819 we exchanged Texas!

Observe now the atrocity of the policy urged by the immediate Annexationists, and gravely recommended to the Senate of Virginia, by a select Committee of that body!

The U. States who have been paid for Texas, by the two Floridas, are urged to receive Texas, claimed by Mexico (standing in the shoes of Spain) as a revolted province, which by the laws of Nations she has an undisputed right to reconquer and repossess if she can – the U. States we say are urged and invited, still holding the Floridas, to seize and appropriate to themselves Texas, for which they exchanged the Floridas!

We will not stop now to debate the Constitutional power to effect this violent iniquity which, if the events of the times did not concur to produce the effect, ought of itself, if consummated, to steep American national character in odium. Without raising that question at all, where is the RIGHT, the right of common honesty, to retain the Floridas for which the U. States exchanged Texas, and then to appropriate Texas too!

Such a proposition is now unblushingly advanced, under the influence of Texas pecuniary interests (not that we mean that Gen. Wallace is any thing more than the cat’s paw!) to the Senate of Virginia itself. We hope that honorable body, without the least regard to party, and in defiance of party influence, will spurn the proposition out of their Hall, never before debased by a proposal so unjust.

SENATE (of Virginia), Session of Excerpt:

Mr. McMullen reported a bill concerning the Price’s Gap and Cumberland Turnpike Company.

Mr. Wallace, from a select committee, made the following Report on so much of the Governor’s Message as related to the Annexation of Texas, and the Resolutions of the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut, and the same subject:

Whereas, by the Treaty of Louisiana, it was expressly stipulated by the United States that the inhabitants of said Territory should be incorporated into the Union, and admitted as soon as possible according to the principles of the Federal Constitution to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States; and whereas, the people of that part of said Territory known as Texas, have expressed their desire to be received into the Confederacy according to the terms set forth in said Treaty:-

Resolved, therefore, That it is the right of the people of Texas to be admitted into the Union, and the duty of the people of the United States to perform in good faith all their obligations assumed by them in the purchase of Louisiana.

Resolved, That Texas should be admitted into this Union as soon as practicable.

Resolved, That the Senators from this Commonwealth in the Senate of the United States be instructed to effect that object.

***

On motion of Mr. Dennis, the Senate adjourned.
"ANNEXATION' AGAIN."

"Lilburne" the correspondent at Washington of the Philadelphia Morning Post (late the "Forum" and a paper most worthy of Whig support) says:

"WASHINGTON, January, 5, 1845.

The nonchalance with which the Locofoco orators speak of "blood an carnage," is a caution to "Old Hickory," – Mr. Payne, in his last "thundergustical" upon the subject of Texas, spurned Mr. C. J. Ingersoll's plan of paying for her; he would annex her, and then fight for her. If the Mexicans, or the English, or anybody else did not like it, and chose to try the fate of war, they would find another New Orleans, &c.

This overflow of Locofoco valor, at a distance is a little ridiculous it appears to me in men who have seen no service. What do Mr. Payne, and such as he, know about war, that they are ready to appeal to the last argument? – Have they ever looked the "grim visaged god in the face, and is his glance so captivating, that they desire a closer acquaintance? Where are the proofs that they are more valiant than their neighbors? Do the means themselves, to shoulder their knapsacks and march to the field of glory, or death, or do they eschew, entirely, such a vulgar position of the "[ . . . ] Military" as the giving and receiving wounds, running bayonets through the bodies of their enemies – or, what is not quite so agreeable, getting them through their own? If they have tried these things, and are fond of them, why, then, I have nothing more to say; if they have not, it would be at least becoming to do first, and to talk afterwards.

It seems to be the opinion of many, that the Annexation is reserved for Mr. Polk, and that the "party" do not intend to allow that honor to the present administration. For my own part, now that the instructions to Col. Benton have turned out to be no more than a direction to him, to use his own pleasure in the business, I begin to incline to the same opinion. I wish, if such turn out to be the fact, that Mr. Pollock's plan for taking the sense of the people directly upon the point would be pursued, or some other, calculated to have the same effect. Let the question be stripped of all extraneous matter, such as Presidential electioneering; and let it come directly before the people. Their vote would then decide, whether or not, we are to be styled, as Mithridates styled the Romans, "Latrones gentium" – that is the "robbers of nations."

My letters have been so filled with this subject, that I have not found room for more than an allusion to the insolent proceedings of the Democracy in Congress, relative to Rhode Island and her constitution. Was there ever any thing like it? The Congress of the United States undertaking to prescribe a constitution to one of the sovereign States of this Union! It will be received, no doubt, in that quarter, with all the contempt due to such insolence; but what say our flaming State Rights men, our McDuffies our Rhetts, &c? They will say no doubt or will think if they do not say, that the Rhode Islanders are Yankees and not entitled to the benefits of their abstractions.

I hear little speculations, worthy of notice, on the subject of the Cabinet appointments under the new Dynasty. Mr. Calhoun, however, it is generally thought, has so effectually done himself up. Since his acceptance of the office of Secretary of State, that he seems to be entirely out of the question. Never did any man in so short a time so completely undeceive the world as to his abilities. He is an example of the fact, that a man who plumes himself upon splitting hairs, and shopping logic, makes the very poorest of Statesmen, and will always fritter away the best cause, by running it out into immaterial points.

LILBURENE."

Correspondence of the Whig. (Il Secretario)

WASHINGTON, January 8th, 1845.

In spite of the Heroites and all their appliances, we have weathered the appointed day of Annexation, and that mighty "consummation, devoutly to be wished" by all who have no piety nor faith in them, is yet unaccomplished. As your neighbor, of as many quotations as principles, might say, "the ides of March have come" – yea, and gone also.

The day began, in the House, with the offer of a Resolution, by Mr. Adams, granting the use of the Hall, for two successive Wednesday, to the elder Owen (him of Lanark, the founder of Socialism, not his son, the M. C. of Indiana,
I presume that Mr. A. – who surely knows better or who perhaps would gladly lecture in reply – thinks Owen’s reveries too idle to do any harm. I cannot say I think so for I have learned to believe that no folly, however monstrous, can be propagated to the good people of this country, without a very strong probability of its spreading like wild fire. It is true that Owenism has not lazed yet up: buy why should it not? If it fail to take, its absurdity is certainly not the hindrance. It is quite as rational as Millerism, as religious as Agrarianism, as practical as Fourierism, as honest as Mormonism, as intelligible as the Emmersonian Transcendentalism. One error, however, my fried the philosopher has made, that will probably more than all else bar his way to a vast proselytism: he proposed no immediate plundering; his system offers no “spoils,” no offices; and the men of new ideas, the Progressive Democracy, will therefore not flock to him. He promises nothing but justice, peace, and universal good-will – though a goodwill without a God. The godlessness they like exceedingly; but then the good-will is by no means to their taste.

Accordingly, one of the Democracy, Mr. Hammett, (descended, perhaps, from the sage in Cervantes, Sid Hammet,) signified his distaste for Owenism. Its object being to uproot Society – which Democracy can do without it – and to pull down Religion, he evidently thought that Loco Focoism needed not the auxiliary. “He was opposed [he said] to granting the use of the Hall to any Lecturer or Theorist, who might wish to give to his speculations the sanction of that House.” As to the degree of authority which any opinion could borrow from the sanction in question, Mr. Hammett is perhaps more alarmed than there was any occasion to be. However, one cannot dissent from his closing proposition – “there were other places more suitable and where information could be imparted more agreeable.” I certainly know few places where information is less to be expected or is less agreeably imparted than in that Valhalla of barbarous and dissonant Democracy.

The Owen resolution was laid on the table. But if the father could not get the floor, the son soon did; and considerably the worse man of the two is he – as much more dangerous as a certain Jacobin editor of seven principles is worse than his Tory father.

It would seem, after all, that the magnetic pole to which change as it may, the needle of Mr. Dromgoole’s opinions [true to the majority] ever points, must have shifted a little again [as it is known often to do] since I told you that he expected to propound a Resolution declaring Annexation expedient. He to-day brought in a bill fro directly introducing Texas as a State. What has changed his steadfastness of notions – whether the prospects of Annexation are taking that aspect when your neighbour cries out “skies bright and brightening” – or whether the Heroic behest from the hermitage has shaken him – or, lastly, whether the hope of a certain Senatorship, dependant somewhat on Calhounite votes, may not have modified him, I undertake not to say.

Next came a new effort to impeach or indict the State of Rhode Island before Congress. It was in the shape of a series of Resolutions by the Legislature of New Hampshire, stigmatizing the conduct of R. I. towards the far renowned Dorr, as illegal, unconstitutional, inhuman and all that. They arraign R. I. as having condemned him by a packed Jury, and as having punished him barbarously, by putting him in the Penitentiary, where, by the by, he stays (as every body knows) only ’till he chooses to swear allegiance to his State. That, I suppose, will seem a very hard condition to your Virginia Democracy, as you too have a like oath in your State constitution: for New Hampshire, that is so outraged, has just the same. She will presently, I suppose, fly out against some State for inflicting disabilities, upon Catholics!

These Resolutions failed to be brought in, the rules standing in the way, and but 113 of the Democracy voting their suspension.

Thus the House returned to the Texas question; and Mr. Caleb Smith, of Indiana, made against that business a very animated and strong speech – the best, certainly, that the debate has yet afforded, except that of Mr. Winthrop, of Massachusetts. Though the range of the one hour rule is utterly disproportionate to such a question – so great and so complex – yet he selected so well the strong topics and enforced them each to so just an extent, that his argument was a highly efficient one. He took, among others, the Slavery question; but while he urged its main points well and boldly, took on it ground so just; so faithful to all the subsisting obligations between the States, that no Southern man could take the slightest exception to either his positions or his language.

To him succeeded his colleague, Robert Dale Owen. – I was glad to hear that citizen of the world, - renegade of country as well as faith – a teacher of Platonic politics and of loves only made platonic by artificial methods of avoiding their consequences (ask not for the detestable explanation: it is in his book, published in his name – "Moral Physiology") take the floor, to explain Right, Morals and all that, such as could sanction this national depravity. I wanted to hear what one of the associates of Socialism would say of laws, what the hater of the land that gave him birth would prate of patriotism, what the Agrarian editor of the "working-man’s Advocate" would tell us of Land-titles, what the author of a series of popular tracts against Christianity would say of the public faith. Honest and gentlemanly in private life, well-informed, acute, he is, with all that, every thing that is only the more dangerous for advantages which leave him but the more pestilent demagogue and subverter. We dislike, we justly fear the gross, the licentious gangs of the worst populace, that Europe casts, from her encumbered lap, upon our shores: but there is one thing yet worse than all their ignorance, all their depravity – the deadly hostility to all society of educated English Radicalism. A Cobbett, a Callender, an Owen, a Fanny Wright, is worse, in his or her single person, than all the scum or dregs of foreign debasement.

I must leave you to find, in his reported speech, how this Optimist, this Perfectibilian proved, from good and noble old Grotius, the rightness of national robbery and perfidy. Texas is probably that Perfect Commonwealth which his philosophic dreams have long sought in vain.
In the Senate, the Smithsonian Institute occupied nearly all the sitting. That you may see in the speech of Mr. Choate, beautiful as well as strong.

I would gladly, had I time, tell you of the sublime self-complacency of the inane with which that martial Judge Bayly yesterday delivered himself of a series of the most triumphant abstractions. Gossamer was solid in comparison with his reasonings; adamant unsubstantial in comparison with his confidence in their solidity. I could give you some pretty specimens: but where's Punch? He should be here to report the General.

The debate is evidently to run on, until the Texans think they can carry their measure – now probably Gen'l Dromgoole's. My news of to-night leads me to think that Santa Anna is really upset: a great misfortune, I fear, to Mexico. He is their ablest and I think their best man, stained as his earlier career was. My compliments of the day to him who said General Jackson would be a curse and a scourge to the country. There is a foreigner here collecting our different grape vines: couldn't' he furnish him with one of a very particular sort?

IL SECRETARIO.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, (United States), Excerpt:

The debate on the Texas question was then resumed.

Mr. Yancy of Alabama, was entitled to the floor, and proceeded to address the committee in favor of annexation. He devoted the first part of his speech to a reply to some of Mr. Clingman's remarks, upon the practices of the "Democratic" party in the late Presidential election. He then argued at length in favor of the right to bring Texas into the Union. He stated that news had this morning arrived in Washington that Santa Anna had been deposed and banished from Mexico. He spoke out his hour.

Mr. Bayly of Virginia, rose next, and after complimenting Mr. Yancy for his forcible speech, supported the same side of the question. His first position was that it was competent in congress to admit Texas by joint resolution. He derived the power from the clause in the Constitution which authorized Congress to conduct a war, and to do those things which are necessary to make the war successful. Texas was necessary to us to make a war on defense successful, and therefore we have a right to bring her into the Union. Texas could also be annexed by virtue of the Constitutional authority to introduce new States. He enlarged on these points, and afterwards argued the question as the right of Texas to agree to become a part of the U. States. He contended that she had.

Mr. Stetson, a "Democrat," of New York, spoke next, and said he had difficulties about the constitutional power to carry out this measure. He was in favor of the expediency of annexing Texas, but would go against a simple joint resolution of a few lines, without settling the details. He seemed to be opposed to all the plans before the House, but at the same time inclined to the opinion that a proposition might be brought in to effect the object constitutionally. There was a great deal of confusion in his arguments, and it was difficult to arrive at a certain knowledge of what his precise opinions were. He was understood to maintain that annexation could not be effected by act or resolution, and that if it could be done at all, it must be done by treaty. He said he was alarmed at the disposition he saw among the advocates of this measure to enlarge the powers of the Congress by constitutional construction. He was alarmed for the fate of that principle of strict construction which the democratic party contended for.

At the same time that it was difficult to get at this precise views, it was manifest that he was more opposed to the measure than in favor of it.

At the conclusion of his remarks Mr. Caleb Smith , of Indiana, got the floor and the Committee rose.

Mr. A. V. Brown reported bills for admission of the States of Iowa and Florida into the Union, read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the While.

Mr. McKay reported a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for the next fiscal year.

The Clerk to the House submitted his report of expenditure, &c. Various executive and other communications were read and properly disposed of.

Mr. Adams moved that the use of the Hall be given to Mr. Dale Owen for four nights for the purpose of delivering lecture. Before the question on the adoption of the resolution was decided the House, at  before 4, adjourned.
Excerpts:

Mr. Dromgoole, by general consent, introduced a bill to form a State out of a portion of the Territory of Texas, and for its admission into the Union on the 4th of July next. The bill was read twice and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Dromgoole again rose and called the attention of the House to two precedents in the history of the United States, favoring the adoption of his bill. He stated that Kentucky and Vermont had been admitted into this Union in the same way he now proposed in reference to Texas. Those States had been created by acts of congress, out of territories not within the limits of the United States, and admitted at the periods specified by those acts.

Texas Question

Mr. C. Smith, of Indiana was entitled to the floor and proceeded to address the committee in opposition to annexation.

He made a very favorable and eloquent speech. He said there were a great many points involved in the question, and he could allude to but few of them.

He maintained that the constitution did not authorize annexation of foreign territory. If Texas could be annexed as a state, England, France or any other foreign nations could with the same propriety.

It was clear that nothing could be done by joint resolution and the only question that would admit of dispute was whether the Treaty making power could be brought into requisition. Besides objection on the score of right, he saw equal objection on the score of expediency. It was said this measure was necessary to extend the area of freedom. If Texas is now a free State, as is alleged by annexationists, she could not be made more free. “The area of freedom” would not therefore be extended by making her a State of this Union.

Our relations with Mexico furnished one of the strongest objections to the measure. Another great objection arose out of our assuming the immense debt of Texas, whose amount no one knew. He contended that there was no right to assume that debt.

His opposition was strengthened by the proposal to postpone the settlement of the Question of slavery until Texas was brought into the Union. It was dangerous to the Union not to settle that question in the outset. A great deal had been said about making this a sectional question. He thought the responsibility of giving such a character to the measure rested with the Southern members.

At the conclusion of Mr. Smith’s speech,

Mr. Owen, of Indiana, got the floor and delivered a constitutional argument in favor of the measure. His considered this a question of vast importance, which rose above all party considerations. One of the gentlemen who had preceded him, on the other side, having deprecated the indulgence of party feeling.

Mr. Hamlin, of Ohio, then got the floor and moved that the committee rise, which motion was carried and the committee arose accordingly.

“From Texas,”

By the arrival of the Steamer Republic we have received our files of Texas papers to the 28th alt. Inclusive. They contain President Jones’ annual Message to Congress.—He remarks that the Republic has arrived at a crisis in its affairs fraught with deep and absorbing interest, but that the capacity of the people for self government, and for the maintenance of their independence have been tested and proved. He observes with pleasure the tide of emigration which has set in towards Texas – the uninterrupted administration of justice; the urgent necessity under which they were first put forth no longer existing. He further urges the utmost economy in the administration of the Government; the imposition of proper revenue duties by a Tariff; the passage of a law for classifying the debt of the country; the establishment of the seat Government at a proper place; the protection of the frontier, a revision of the penal code; the enactment of laws for perfecting the titles of settler, &c, &c. The Message is ably written and will command attention.

The House of Representatives have passed a bill changing the Sear of government to Austin. Its fate in the Senate is doubtful. [N. O. Bee.]

"HIGHLY IMPORTANT FROM MEXICO. OVERTHROW OF SANTA ANA. FORMATION OF A NEW GOVERNMENT."

From the N. O. Bee

On Saturday the schooner Ventura from Vera Cruz arrived in our port bringing dates from that city to the 13th inst., and from Mexico to the 9th. The news is of the highest importance, and is as serious as unexpected, since previous advices had induced every one conversant with Mexican affairs to believe that Santa Ana would succeed in quelling the insurrection headed by General Paredes. – It appears, however, from the tenor of our intelligence, that the outbreak in question was not merely one of periodical seditious movements to which that country seems subject, but was the earliest symptom of deep felt and pervading dissatisfaction at the administration of the Dictator. The revolution which had commenced at Jalisco, spread almost simultaneously throughout every department; the popular feeling sided everywhere with the insurgents and so rapid and overwhelming was its course that in an incredibly short time, nearly all Mexico had joined in the movement, the administration was displaced and Santa Ana hurled from power and transformed from a dictator to a skulking fugitive. A singular and satisfactory feature in this revolution is the comparative peacefulness with which it has been effected. Scarcely any where was the radical change in the Government attended with bloodshed. It seems on the contrary a perfect revolution of public opinion, so universal and overpowering that resistance became at once altogether hopeless and unavailing.

For the following copious details we are in a great measure indebted to the polite attention of a Commercial House from which we have frequently acknowledged similar favors. We have also received several particulars from the Mexican Consul.

In the city of Mexico the disturbances commenced by a formal denunciation of Santa Ana by both branches of the Mexican Congress, whereupon Gen’l Canalizo, who during the absence of the president at Queretero, fulfilled his functions ad interim, issued an order commanding Congress to dissolve, and for the purpose of preventing the publication of the decrees of that body, forcibly closed every printing office in the city, save Santa Ana’s immediate organ, the Diario del Gobierno. The order in question was signed by Canalizo and his ministers, Rejon, Haro, Barande, and Bayadre. As soon as this tyrannical decree was promulgated, great excitement arose; the news was rapidly spread about, and the garrison and people of Puebla, on the 3d inst., declaiming against the Government [. . .] offered an asylum to the members of Congress.

In the meanwhile, both the Liberals and Clergy in the Capital united in the revolutionary movement, and began to make preparations against the common enemy. Congress, as well as the Ayuntamiento, succeeded, in spite of Canalizo’s decree, in having secret circulars printed, which were actively disseminated among all classes. The government troops about the Palace, seeing symptoms of the coming storm, began to waver. After a few days of intense though quiet excitement, Congress and the party attached to the Constitution, assembled at the convent San Francisco, and a large number of young men, belonging to the middle and better classes, armed themselves in defence of the outraged Legislature and violated Constitution. – From the convent of San Francisco they marched to the National Palace, in which are situated not only the Military Barracks, but the halls of Congress, and called on Canalizo to surrender. The Provisional President at first endeavored to offer resistance, but his troops exhibited strong symptoms of irresolution and faithlessness, and Canalizo perceiving that no dependence could be placed in them, fled terrified into the interior of the palace. At 2 o’clock P. M., Gen’l Herrera, leader of the Constitutional party, sent a message to Canalizo requiring him to issue orders recognizing the Constitutional Government and acknowledging the full exercise of its powers. Canalizo consented to deliver up the garrison upon condition that his person and those of the four Ministers should be respected. One of our letters states that Herrera and his troops forced an entry into the Palace, but that Canalizo in the confusion managed to escape. Another account declares that he was captured and detained a prisoner in the palace, together with [. . . ], the Commandante General; Rejon and Haranda fled, while the Ministers of War and of the Home Department were set at liberty upon giving security for the observance of the laws, and their acknowledgment of the Constitution.

General Herrera next issued the following Proclamation:

"Jose Joaquin de Herrera, President of the Council of Government, to the inhabitants of the Capital:

Mexicans: - A blind and audacious Government had violated the laws, believing that society was wholly dependent upon its decree. But I, having been invoked by all classes and by the principal commanders and chief of the Garrison, have re established constitutional order, and am proud of having spared to Mexico and her vast population the anarchy and dissensions arising out of merely isolated efforts. I therefore invite every patriot to rally around the legitimate government which I represent through the Constitution; and the national Congress, which has assembled within a few hours, will accomplish everything which the safety of the country requires from it. Thus will this momentous event be rendered worthy of national pride – a hope which is sincerely shared by your fellow citizen,

JOSE J. DE HERRERA.

Mexico, December 6th, 1844.

On the 7th inst. a new Government was organized. – Gen. Herrera was constituted Provisional President of the Republic. His Cabinet consists as follows: Don Pedro Echeverria, Minister of Internal Affairs; Don Luis G. Cuevas, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Don Marian Rivepalacio, Minister of Justice and Public instruction; Gen Pedro Garcia Conde, Minister of War and Marine. The new ministry, we understand, in composed of the ablest and most honest men in the Republic. Around it are arrayed all the power, wealth and influence of the nation. Echeverria is a member of the firm of Widow Echeverria & Sons, well known in the commercial world for its respectability and influence. He was educated in and England is a man of enlightened and sagacious intellect. Senor Cuevas occupied the post of Minister for Foreign Affairs during the French contest, and acquitted himself with signal agility. He was educated for a diplomatic career, and figured once as Minister to Prussia. Conde is chief of the engineer corps; he is the son of a Spanish General and said to be a clever young man. We have reason to believe that under the new government no alteration will take place in the foreign relations of Mexico, but that on the contrary they will be maintained with increased vigor and energy.

No sooner was the revolution in Mexico completed than the city appeared to be filled with rejoicings and festivities. Every trophy of Santa Ana, his portraits and statues were torn into shreds and shattered to pieces. His amputated leg, which had been embalmed and buried with military honors, was disinterred, broken to pieces and kicked about the town with every mark of indignity and contempt.

The revolution at Vera Cruz is best described in the following letter from a correspondent:

VERA CRUZ, 11th Dec., 1844.

Political affairs in this country have since taken a rather violent turn, but as yet, without blood being shed. The States of Queretaro, Zacatecas, Aguascalientes and Sinaloa had joined already in Parades plans, when Santa Ana, at the head of about 10,000 good troops and 25 pieces of artillery marched on Queretaro on the 22d ult., where he arrived soon after, demanding that the "disponencias," but which, although the authorities were entirely left as Santa Ana's mercy, was not complied with; on the contrary, the Junta Departmental, notwithstanding Santa Ana having threatened to send them in case of a refusal to the Castle of Ulloa, persisted firmly in their resolutions.

In the meantime, on the 29th ult., the deathblow to Government was truck by the latter itself. Gen'l Canalizo, as President as interim with his ministers, issued a decree on that day, by which the sittings of the Congress were put an end to for an uncertain period, the Executive declaring itself invested with unlimited power to decide any question, without consulting the Congress. This bold step created an immense sensation and excitement. First, Puebla rose, declaring against the Government; then Mexico followed, which had in its consequence the immediate overthrow of the government, the restitution of congress, and the formation of a new government, with Gen'l Jose Joaq. de Herrera, Presidente del Conseja de Gobierno, as Provisional President, who constitutionally had to take the chair in case of vacancy, or a temporary absence of the acting President of the Republic. On the new of the pronunciation of Mexico being received here on the 9th, the authorities of this place immediately determined on following the example, acknowledging the new order of things, as established at Mexico, after the pronunciation there.

The removing of Congress, although not openly dispersed by Santa Ana, yet it may be taken for granted has been done at his desire, and with this view of thing; at Mexico, Puebla and here, every thing bearing the name of Santa Ana or relating to him, his statues, portraits, &c., have been completely destroyed by the people, who, it may be said, hardly ever before showed so much interest and enthusiasm for their just cause. I am happy to advise that no excesses have been committed, at least not any of moment; here every thing passes of very quietly.

According to the last information, Santa Ana remains captive at Queretaro. Congress, it is said, has outlawed him in case he should not lay down the command of the troops, which latter it may be expected will gradually abandon him, and then he is doubtless done for. Appearances are quite against him.

Trade is, under such circumstances, not much thought of. Several robberies, to some extent have been committed on the road to Mexico and further in the interior, by which some merchants loose considerably.

We have likewise seen several letters from various parts of Mexico, all of which speak in glowing terms of the pacific accomplishment of the revolution, and of the beneficial results which are likely to flow from the establishment of a firm, vigorous, and above all, honest government, in lieu of the military despotism and grinding exactions, which have been under the dictatorship of Santa Ana crushed the people for the last few years.

The escape of Santa Ana is highly problematical. At the last advices he was at Queretaro with about 2,500 men. His troops were daily thinned by desertions. There is every probability that he will be ultimately left alone and that he may be so hemmed in by is enemies, as to leave him no chance of quitting the country. Should he succeed in escaping, he will proceed, as we are informed, to Cuba, where with his princely revenues he can still live in his accustomed splendor. His private fortune is estimated at some four millions of dollars. For the last twenty-three years, Santa Ana has with very brief intervals wielded the destinies of Mexico, but his career appears now to be really drawing to a close, leaving him the alternative of a disgraceful flight or an ignominious death.

We have been favored with a copy of the various protests and documents connected with the rise and progress of this revolution. We do not publish them in full as they have merely a local interest, and we have given so comprehensive an account of the whole affair, as to render their insertion unnecessary.

“Texas – Rhode Island,”

A reference to the Congressional reports, will exhibit to our readers the two subjects which now engross the attention, and illustrate the character of the “Progressive Democracy” – a most benefitting title! – for they are ever progressing from bad to worse. Mr. Tibbatts introduces a series of resolutions pledging the protection of the United States to Texas against the hostility of any Foreign Power – in other words, Mexico. And Mr. Burke, the gentleman, if we are not mistaken, who voted against the reception of General Washington’s Sword, moves for ten thousand extra copies of the Locofofo Report on the Rhode Island controversy. In this one day’s proceeding we behold a true type of this extraordinary party: Every intent on disorganization, they foster Rebellion and opposition to constituted authority, whether manifested at home or abroad. With a question of Annexation pending before the Nation, these men would violate every principle of international law, by aiding and abetting a rebellious province against its parent Government. Promising neutrality towards Mexico, they would fight the battles of Texas – and in a spirit analogous to that of the old Spanish rule which hung first and tried afterwards, they would to war with Mexico – wrench her possessions from her, and then employ the Diplomatic skill of our Talleyrand and *, J. C. Calhoun and Wilson Shannon, to test the independence of Texas, and exchange ultimatums on the subject of boundaries! How bright will be the glory of our arms. The veteran of the Seminole campaign may gain fresh laurels on the banks of the Rio Bravo. Military fame will again be in the ascendant and some future Democratic candidate for the Presidency will demand our favor in the name of a tawny scalp taken in the marshes of Florida, or some brilliant skirmish in Mexico where the numbers were only two to one in his favor!

Every effort at revolution extols the admiration of this order-loving democracy. The gloom of Dorr’s prison is confirmed by a promise of Legislative reaction! And should he muster courage enough hereafter to stand one round of his own Artillery, he may count upon the aid and comfort of this “fierce Democratic” in establishing that darling maxim of their hearts-

“That they shall take who have the power/And they shall keep who can.”

“Annexation- Mr. Rives,”

The Washington correspondent of the Charleston Mercury, appears to think that the question of Annexation at this session is in the hands of Col Benton: why should that correspondent intimate a doubt as to the course of Mr. Rives? None that we have heard, is felt by Mr. Rives’ friends in this quarter. It is not imagined, we suppose, by any, that he so lightly made up his mind six or eight months ago, as to be prepared to change it already, or that he has been cajoled by those who only forget to abuse and learn to flatter, when they have a point to carry!

The Mercury’s correspondent says:

“The Whigs fear, and with reason, that a large majority of the House are now prepared to go for annexation in the abstract; and, after going thus far, they cannot split upon details.

“Most of the New York Democrats in the House are opposed to the measure, and two of them will speak against it. On the other hand, three or four Southern Whigs go for it, and the great body of the Democratic members.

“The Senate is now already divided on the question. Mr. Foster, of Tennessee, will go for annexation, and so will Mr. Johnson, of Louisiana, if instructed.

“Mr. Atherton, Mr. Fairfield, and the New York Senators go for it. Mr. Hannegan, who was absent when the vote on the treaty was taken, will now add his vote. Mr. Tappan and Mr. Allen will follow the lead of Mr. Benton.
"So, with Mr. Benton's concurrence, I make twenty-eight votes for annexation,- leaving out Mr. Rives."

"The question is, will Mr. Benton take the responsibility of defeating the measure?"

"General Assembly, Senate,"

Excerpt from Jan. 11, 1845

Mr. Thompson of K. offered the following resolution, which he would move to lay on the table, and consider on Wednesday next.

Resolved, by the General Assembly, that the Annexation of Texas should be effected with no further delay than may be necessary for the accomplishment of that object by the constituted authorities of the two countries.

Resolved, that the Governor be requested to communicate a copy of the above resolution to each of the Senators and Representatives of this common wealth in the Congress of the United States.

"Texas,"

The Senate of Maine (largely Democratic) by a vote of 24 to 7 refused to instruct their Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for annexation! An ugly sign for that holy brotherhood.

Gov. Wright, of New York, [Mr. Van Buren's right hand man, and the next "Democratic" attempt to make him a party to it.

RWv22i6p1c3, January 21, 1845

"MR. BRINKERHOFF"

This gentleman is a man of high reputed talents. He is a member of congress from Ohio – a very warm friend of Mr. Van Buren. – Cool, collected, able and sagacious (as report runs).

His speech upon the Annexation of Texas, we understand, is regarded as the most weighty, comprehensive and significant in its views which has been delivered – surpassing each side of the House by its sentiments, and impressing each side very decidedly, in favor of the Statesmanship and ability of the speaker.

We are therefore induced, not being able to publish the entire Speech, to publish the synopsis of it, furnished by "Oliver Oldschool," the Correspondent of the U. States Gazette.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13, 1845.

"The debate proceeded in the House, and was carried on by Mr. Tibbatts, of Kentucky. Mr. Brinkerhoff, of Ohio, and Mr. Chappell of Georgia – the first and last in favor, and the other against it. Mr. Tibbatts, argued the question of Constitutionality somewhat at length, and Mr. Chappell spoke generally upon the subject. Mr. Brinkerhoff's however, was the speech of the day, and told with more effect, perhaps, than any one that has been made, owing to his position, being an ardent of Van Buren, and one of the Ohio delegation who foresaw and proclaimed to their constituents and the country, through the Globe, the intrigue that was on foot to defeat the nomination of Mr. Van Buren.

Mr. B. treated the question as a southern, and a sectional one, as he said it had been proclaimed to be, by the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations. He contended that it was unjust to the North, to add so much slave territory to the United States; it would destroy that equilibrium of power which had ever been preserved in the Senate between the free States and the slave States. – But some gentlemen argued that as many free States as slave States would be formed out of the territory. Then why not provide now that it shall be the case? Why leave it Under some circumstance, he would be in favor of annexing Texas to the Union – he would be in favor of it, because he knew the advantage there was in having a “West,” as a field for the young and enterprising men of the country, who, owing to the influence of old and extensive families, accumulated wealth, associated capital, &c., in the old settled parts of the country, found themselves, unless they occupied, by birth, a certain position, cramped by these influences, and their energies repressed. He was in favor of it, on account of the additional trade and export that it would give to this country; but he was not in favor of annexing it merely for the purpose of extending “the area of freedom” to one race, who were to enjoy the privilege of freedom at the expense of another race being held in bondage. Never, never should it be annexed by his vote in this way. He noticed various reasons that had been urged in favor of annexation, some of which he contended were mere humbugs, while one or two, he admitted, had some plausibility and weight in them. One argument urged by him in favor of declaring, at this time, what portion of Texas should come into the Union, if at all as slave States, and what portion as free States, was, that if these were not determined upon, the freemen of the North would not emigrate to that country – they would not go there to labor beside the slave, and thus in the eye of the slave’s master, put themselves on a equality with them. They would do no such thing. Draw a line between slavery and freedom, and on one side of it would settle the hardy, independent yeoman of the North, and on the other, the planter with his slaves.

Again, if this line were not now drawn, if Texas were annexed unconditionally, how would it be hereafter? One State is admitted as a slave State; another knocks at the door of Congress for admission, and is told she cannot come in as a slave State. But they will reply, why not? Texas was a slave country when you annexed it, you said nothing about prohibiting slavery in any part of it then, and we have settled it with our slaves, which are our own property, and with which we cannot part. What will you say to these men then? Is it not easier to prevent this evil now, than to get over it then? “Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof,” say some men. This is better scripture than statesmanship. Wit statesmen, evil should be foreseen and guarded against, or prevented altogether, not no engendered, as they would be if annexation took place without settling this question.

The administration seemed to be [ . . . ] solicitous on the subject, very anxious to regain what they allege once belonged to us and was unjustly parted with: but there was the territory west of the Rocky Mountains, which nobody doubted our [ . . . ] title to, which [ . . . ] under British jurisdiction and British laws. Why was not the same anxiety felt to obtain possession of [ . . . ]? Why not the same means employed? Why, when [ . . . ] this question, they reply, we are “negotiating.” In reference to Texas, they play the gasco and the bully to Mexico most bravely, because the latter is weak and unable to resent it; but when they come to look the British Lion in the face, why they roar as gently as a [ . . . ] dove! Mr. Chairman, said Mr. B., I can tell you why this hot, this feverish, this impatient hast to get possession Texas, and is cold indifference in regard to Oregon, is because the first is to be settled by planters and the latter by farmers.

Mr. B. noticed the taunt which came from Mr. Yancy, that no Northern man had ever been re elected to the Presidency. It was well that that taunt had come from the quarter it had; it was needed: we needed to be reminded of our vassalage to the South – we needed the stinging last supplied to our backs to remind us of our duty to obey our masters. We needed to be reminded of the defeat of one of the wisest statesmen the country possessed, (Mr. Van Buren,) by those who possessed all the patriotism in the country! We must of course bow our necks and bend our back to our masters!

This strain of irony and sarcasm, in which Mr. B. indulged for some minutes, produced a very strong sensation in the House. He had spoken with great [ . . . ] and vehemence, but when he came to notice the [ . . . ] his manner and emphasis gave peculiar force to his words while he thus rebuked the craven spirit of the North, he made the Southern Locofocos feel the sting of his bitter irony.

We have been told too, said Mr. B., that we are not a generous, warm, patriotic people at the North, - that these qualities belong South; there, and there only, is to be found that “enlarged patriotism” which extends over the broad prairies of Texas, and takes in every country that may tempt the cupidity of man, - that we are selfish. Yes, the North is selfish because she asks for half; while the generous South will be content with nothing less than all. She is extremely disinterested in demanding the whole, while we are taunted with selfishness when we ask our share only!

Mr. B. noticed the aid which his colleague (Mr. Dean) had generously lent the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. Yancy) in berating the North and especially New England. Well, this was a matter of taste in his colleague – if he chose to turn his battery against New England, he did not know any one who had a better right as he believed he was himself a native of that country. (great laughter.)

Mr. Dean desired to explain – he [ . . . ] that he was a Yankee [renewed laughter] and explained what he had said. In done this, he became so earnest and his manner was so vehement, that, taken in connection with his language, the scene was irresistible ludicrous, and the House was convulsed with laughter for some minutes. Mr. B. then went on a short time, in noticing the arguments urged in favor of annexation, and closed. He was followed by Mr. Chappell, and afterward Mr. Holmes, of S. C., obtained the floor, and at four o’clock the committee rose.”
Gen. Jackson is again cracking his whip over the heads of the faithful, and requiring them in a letter to “my dear Mr. Blair” of Jan. 1st., to admit Texas, instantly and without delay!

When will that old man think it becoming in him to retire from the stage and prepare for other scenes? And when will those who have so long degraded Republicanism and debased human nature by their servile submission to his rescripts, conceive that they have a right to dissent from his mandates and to think and act upon their own judgments?

He has again lugged in England, designing by doing so, to make an appeal to ignorance and anti-Anglican prejudice, and to introduce Texas, not through any argument of the value of Texas to the U. States, or of their right to annex, but that by her introduction England may be disappointed and circumvented! This is exactly the argument which Demagogism would address to ignorance and stupidity.

Gen. Jackson’s letter is this:

HERMITAGE, January 1, 1845

MY DEAR Mr. Blair? I cannot forbear, on this first day of the year 1845, to let you know that I am still in the land of the living, although greatly afflicted and debilitated. – My whole family join me in kind salutations to you and yours, wishing you the joys of the season. May you all live to see many happy new years.

I observe that you have before Congress too many joint resolutions for the re-annexation of Texas. This argues want of unanimity in the Democracy upon this great national and most important subject. I have just received from Major Donelson, a letter dated at Washington, in Texas, from which I would infer, that if Congress expect to annex Texas to the United States, they must act speedily, or it will be found to be beyond our grasp. The rejection of the advances of Texas has given offence to some, and a handle to others to press the liberal propositions of England upon the Texans, together with the splendid view of Texas independent, growing into a vast Republic, in time to embrace not only the limits of Texas, but all the domain once Montezuma’s.

This view to ambitious aspirants, added to the guaranties of England of her independence, and the loan of large sums for ten years, based upon a treaty that English manufactures shall be free of duty, is gaining a party in Texas. – General Houston is still the leading star; and his influence can alone be counted upon to resist the present influence of England and its increasing power. How long this influence of England can be successful withstood in Texas, is becoming a very questionable matter. I have taken a view of the whole ground, given to all information its due weight, and I say to you that, unless Congress acts upon this subject promptly, Texas will be beyond our grasp, and lost to the United States forever, unless regained by the sword. What will be the situation of our country, with Britain manufactures introduced duty free into Texas? Comment is unnecessary.

I hazard nothing in saying that, if the present Congress do not act promptly upon the subject, the next will not have the power. The consent of Texas cannot then be obtained. Great Britain will have laid the lion’s paw upon her, and bound her by treaty.

I am exhausted; but, from major Donelson’s letter, and other sources of information, the danger of losing Texas seemed so imminent, that, although feeble, I could not forbear to say this much to you, that you might communicate it to my friend. May God bless you and yours

ANDREW JACKSON”.

Against Gen. Jackson, we quote the authority and opinion of Jno, Minor Botts. Jackson we know will carry the day with the ignorance and prejudice of the time; but Botts will carry it with the reflecting, with posterity, and in the judgment of the future historian.

In publishing Mr. Botts’ letter the other day, some sheets of it were omitted to be sent by him the Press. As it happens, they treat of this same question of English influence, and are a most conclusive reply to Gen. Jackson:

Mr. Botts says:

Another argument has been urged, with some apparent sincerity, particularly in letters signed by and said to have been written by Gen. Jackson, to wit: that we must take Texas into the Union to prevent a connexion being formed between that government and Great Britain – or, in other words, if we do not take Texas, Great Britain will! To which I answer, in the first place, that nothing is more unlikely than that Texas would be disposed to form such an alliance, even if it were desirable to Great Britain; but, in the second place, I answer, that Great Britain does not want it, if respect is to be paid to the most solemn and formal declarations made by the representatives of a powerful and honorable nation. Such a purpose has been disclaimed by the Ministry in Parliament, and formally disavowed by her Minister at Washington, and it rests only in the fertile imaginations of the mischievous, the interested and designing. Let us ask ourselves, what does Great Britain want with Texas? It would be only for the production of cotton, the cultivation of which she knows, as well as we, is adapted only to slave labor, and that she does not tolerate. As for her desiring to hold it for any useful purpose in time of war, it is to my mind all fudge. I pretend to no particular military science, but a knowledge of the geography of the country, satisfies me, that an appropriation of the establishment of a suitable naval depot and fort at Pensacola would give us the command, the lock and key to the gulf of Mexico; and then, with our inexhaustible supplies of timber on the Mississippi, and with the hardy sons of the great valley of the West, we might throw at any time, such a force of armed steamers upon the Gulf, (to say nothing of recent important discoveries in regard to harbour defences, as would entirely exclude Great Britain from all intercourse with Texas – even if she were in actual possession of it – she could, in that case, no more reach Galveston, or communicate with Texas, than she could send her fleet to the base of the Rocky Mountains: but if we were to take Texas, Great Britain could devise no more plausible pretext for grasping at Cuba, which would prove far more advantageous to her, than our possession of Texas could possible prove to us, and far more injurious to us, when her occupation of Texas – this argument, therefore, has o weight with me, and like the rest, is used only to gull the unthinking.

If, then, the question is put to me, whether there is no mode of annexing Texas to the U. States, provided they
People of both countries desire it, I say, that Congress has no such power, under the Constitution, and cannot enlarge its own powers, even by the mighty authoritative and newly ascertained mode of settling grave national and foreign questions by joint resolution. If they desired to amend the Constitution for this purpose, it would first require a vote of two thirds of both Houses to submit the question, and then it would require (until Dorrism is successfully established) three-fourths of the State Legislatures to ratify it: therefore, I say, if the present Congress are anxious for annexation, let them, by a vote of two thirds of both Houses, pass a law submitting the question either to the People or to the State Legislatures – and if such a proportion as would be required to amend the Constitution, (to wit, three-fourths,) should vote in favor of the measure, there would be some reason and plausibility for its adoption, though, in my opinion, no right – because, in a partnership concern, when there is no previous understanding or agreement for the admission of new members into the family, I cannot suppose that the sanction of three-fourths could take in a partner or partners against the will of the other fourth; but, according to the principles of common law and common sense, it would require the assent of the whole. But this would be showing a slight shade of respect for the People, by those who seem to regard the Government now in some degree under their control for the next two months, when their little brief authority will terminate, as actually belong to themselves.

But when they talk about annexing Texas to this government by the adoption of a joint resolution as now proposed, to with: "Resolved, (Texas assenting,) That it be and it hereby is, re-annexed to the United States" – it can only be regarded as the most impudent and ludicrous piece of foolery and jugglery that has ever been practiced or attempted. Pray will those gentlemen tell us what force there is in a joint resolution of such a character – how such a power as Mr. Jefferson thought could not be exercised by the only branch of the government, of whom it was ever claimed – I mean the President and Senate – is now to be carried into full effect in a few hours by a joint resolution!
There is no contract in that joint resolution, and no power to make such a contract if there were one, and of course it is liable to be rescinded or repealed at any time hereafter: Then suppose the next or any future congress were to adopt another joint resolution, as follows: "Resolved, That Texas ought not, and, it is hereby declared, is not annexed to the United States" – what becomes of Texas – is it in or out of the Union? – or is it in to-day and out to-morrow?

Have the people lost all interest in and affection for their Government, or have they surrendered it into the hands of the Destructives and Disorgainzers, to be trifled with as a toy in the hands of children?

"IL SECRETARIO" is no great admirer, it would appear, of General Ventose! No! Not of him who claims the right to annex Texas, under the exercise of the power of making war upon Mexico, and conquering Texas, if we should make war? Not admire the author of that most profound discovery in Abstractionism? Does not the confession argue a great defect of taste in "Il Secretario"?

As to the "Impracticables," respecting whom "Il Secretario" apostrophizes us, we hope we have seen the last of that pernicious sect, who traded in principle, and have proved there, as they have proved before, and ever will prove, Cow Boys! We place, and this community placed, no faith or confidence in men, professedly too honest to act with any party of their countrymen, but not too cringing and designing to sure for office and to accept it from either.

There are no Impracticables now!

"Congress, Proceedings of Today, Senate;"

Excerpt from Mon, Jan. 3, 1845
Mr. Foster of Tennessee rose to present certain resolutions in reference to Texas annexation and prefaced their presentation with remarks of the following tenor, viz:-

That he had long entertained great anxiety upon this subject, regarding it as one that involved the harmony and integrity of the Union. He had not consulted with a single member of this body in the course he was about to pursue; nor had he ever said so much as he would now say, which was, that his social feelings had always been in favor of Texas. Had he no other reason for this?

He was but a man and could not but remember that at least one tenth of the citizens of Texas had been citizens of his own gallant State. He had not concluded upon any form for the annexation of Texas. On this point he had great doubts; but one thing he would say, viz: that he would never consent to the annexation of foreign territory unless it can be done upon the broad basis of our noble Constitution.

Mr. F. then sent his joint resolutions to the Chair, which were read and referred. The resolutions authorizes the preliminary steps to bring about the ultimate annexation of Texas to the United States.

Keyword: Jackson’s 1819 cession of Texas to gain Florida

Texas – Mr. Adams – General Jackson – Mr. M, &c.

It would be superfluous now to say, for what length of time and with what acrimony and virulence Mr. Adams has been assailed by the Jacksonian myrmidons, and the whole tribe of Democratic party back, for having relinquished Texas by the Treaty of 1819, when he was Secretary of State under Mr. Monroe. It has been in vain that the obvious and conclusive defense was made for him, that he acted as an instructed agent and not as a principal – that he obeyed the directions of President Monroe, and did not pursue the inclinations and conviction of his own mind – that the revolutionary, if there was any, did not attach to the subordinate who negotiated the treaty with Spain, but to the superior who dictated his instructions.

In other cases, this defense would have been entirely sufficient and invincible! But not so in that of John Quincy Adams! His was an unpopular name! He was an unpopular man! Party could make capital for itself, by attacking him, however unjustly; and Demagogues were never yet known (and American Demagogues especially, the most odious of their kind) to be restrained in their pursuit of an end, by any consideration of liberality to persons or regard to justice. Mr. Adams was not only hated by the crew of whom we speak, but they identified him with the Whig Party, and proposed (as they have succeeded in doing!) to injure that party through his want of popularity in the South and West.

Equally vain was it for Mr. Adams to declare as he did formally that of Mr. Monroe’s cabinet (himself, Crawford, Calhoun, and Wirt) he alone was opposed to the surrender of Texas! The Democratic prints would never take the least notice of this most singular and important statement! They affected deafness, and pretended not to have heard it at all. It is no doubt so, as Mr. Adams’ veracity has never been questioned, and his wonderful accuracy is proverbial. He has not been tripped up in any statement of fact that we are aware of, from Jonathan Russell down! Mr. Calhoun, the only surviving member of Mr. Monroe’s Cabinet except Mr. Adams, has not, that we are apprised, ever denied his statement. No one has denied it – and yet throughout the late canvass, and for years before and now, Mr. Adams is invidiously held up in the South and South West, as the Traitor who surrendered Texas in 1819, through his enmity to the South, to Southern interests and Southern institutions, and Mr. Calhoun has permitted this gross calumny still to circulate and to injure an innocent man when it was in his power, and as we conceive was his duty to have averted it.

But this is not all, or by any means the darkest part of these transactions: All the abuse of Mr. Adams for the surrender of Texas in 1819 has endured to the benefit of Gen. Jackson, his party in the country, and his two protégés and dictated successors, Mr. Van Burn first, and then Mr. Polk!

What will the country think – what will the world think – what will history think, when after the subsidence of party spirit, it comes to narrate the events of the time in which we live – when they all come to know, that while Mr. Adams was actually opposed to the surrender of Texas, JACKSON was in favor of it, and approved the whole Treaty of 1819, the boundary lines and all! We confess our own astonishment at the discovery of this fact, and how much more ought the Antediluvians to be astonished at it, if perchance they ever hear of it!

We affirm the fact to be so, and as we fully believe, beyond the possibility of a doubt or a cavil.

In May 1836, Mr. Adams, in his place in the House, made the following detailed statement:

"The treaty was signed on the 22d of February, 1819, and he presumed it was in the recollection of many members of the House, the General Jackson was at that time in this city, and that was the celebrated session during which is proceedings in the Seminole war were subjects of deliberation both Houses of congress; and General Jackson was here during the consideration for that subject, and was here at the time of the conclusion of the treaty."
"But to come to the precise point. After the Treaty had been framed, and ready to receive the signatures of the contracting parties, but before there was any obligation upon our part to sign it, by the express direction of Mr. Monroe, he (Mr. A.) took the treaty, drawn up as it was, to General Jackson, not as to the military commander of the army of the United States, but as to a highly distinguished citizen of the United States, whom, being here at the time, the then President of the United States thought proper to consult upon a subject of such great importance. He took the treaty to him at his lodgings, which were in a house at that time kept, he believed, by Mr. Strother. He took and delivered that treaty into the hands of General Jackson, with the particular request from Mr. Monroe, that he would read it over and give his opinion upon it. He would state further that General Jackson kept the treaty some time, possible not more than one day, but he kept it a sufficient time to for a deliberate opinion upon it, and that he (Mr. A.) called upon him after a day or two, and that he returned the treaty, with his approbation of that particular boundary."

Gen. Jackson (then President) authorized the Globe to state, when this revelation was made, that he had no recollection of the circumstances, and that paper attempted to show by circumstantial proof, that Mr. Adams lied!

Mr. Adams, as usual, permitted the matter to rest there, too proud to vindicate his veracity.

Recently Mr. Governor of N. York, son in law of Mr. Monroe, published an article in the national Intelligencer, under the signature of "G," which contains this statement:

"It is eminently due to the memory of Mr. Monroe explicitly to state that, in the execution of the high duties involved in this measure, he did not fail to avail himself of all the lights which patriotism and experience would shed upon it. Its provisions were the subject of friendly consultation with Jefferson and Madison, names identified with no concession unworthy of their country: and the policy dictated, especially as to boundary, has the written approbation of Jackson, well verse in the localities of a territory to which they refer, then lately the scene of military service distinguished by high personal responsibility, which gave him new claims to the grateful recollections of his country."

A few days ago in the Texas Debate, Mr. Kennedy, of Baltimore, thus spoke in the H. of Representatives:

"In this part of his argument, Mr. K said that the treaty of 1819 was approved of by the people of the U. States, and that Gen. Jackson himself gave it his unqualified approbation. He begged the reporters to notice this assertion, that Gen. Jackson approved of the treaty of 1819 in the broadest and most extensive terms; and asserted that, if the friends of Gen. Jackson denied it, there were letters of his extant to prove the truth of what he asserted."

There is no longer any doubt at all, that among the Monroe paper in possession of this son-in-law, Mr. Governor letters from Gen. Jackson, expressly and unqualifiedly approving the Treaty with Spain, and the surrender of Texas in 1819 – that act for which Mr. Adams has been exposed to so much obloquy, and for his assumed opposition to which the "Hero" has been so much glorified!

"Truth crushed to earth, will rise again!" Aye! but when? That is the question! When the evils which might have been averted, are hopelessly fixed upon the country! Truth we know will prevail in the end – at the day of judgment, if not before! But why not let her prevail as soon as possible, and why should Mr. Adams have withheld this curious history and the proof of its reality, and suffered the Whigs to be bestrode and reddened down by this Texas matter and its history, when it was in his power all along, to have unhorsed the hobby riders? What will it avail now, save only to ascertain fact to the future historian. We hope Mr. Adams will now come out with a fell expose!

"Correspondence of the Whig, Jan. 16, 1845,"

Writing, you know, chiefly to keep you well, or at least informed, I must sometimes take up my pen for but as single event, if it seems unlikely to be borne to you by the papers of the morrow.

Such is likely to be the fact as to the passage through the Senate of the Chinese treaty; which is reported to me to have happened to day, in secret session. I do not doubt the information, though derived from no positive source – because there could be little doubt of the confirmation of the treaty.

In my very rapid glance, last night, over the probabilities of failure of the Oregon negotiation, I find that one possibility was not adverted to, which may, at first view, appear of consequence: - that, I mean, of a reference of the disputed rights to some high arbiter abroad – an European Sovereign.

It seems to me unlikely that any such umpirage has been arranged; and though there is not telling what foolery a man of metaphysics, like Mr. Calhoun, may not have committed, I am sure that, if He was assented to such a thing, the public of this country will not. Inflammatory councils on one side, and the certainty of their success on the other, will forbid any toleration of such a resort.
We are, in a word, as it seems to me, about to be made to taste the disastrous consequences of these far-stretched pretensions, difficult to achieve and useless when achieved. They are any thing but a wise or right policy for a system like ours. Of it, there remote possessions, incapable of union, not to be retained except as dependencies, to be as such defended only a great cost, can never be a proper part. To us, for full a century to come, Oregon can be, at best, only a colony, to be reached by the circumnavigation of cape Horn. Can the obtaining it serve to us any purpose of aggrandizement? Can distant and therefore insecure colonies aggrandize us? Can they aggrandize any people that cannot command access to them by the seas? And why would a people with a whole border of fertile wastes, with vast unoccupied tracts in their very midst soliciting population, run thousands of miles off, and plant the remote and insecure in vain and foolish contempt of the contiguous?

I say, therefore, that, in mere national vanity, we have grasped at what we cannot take and yet must no quit. How are we to wrest it from Great Britain? Only by marching forces whither even bands of hunters can hardly pass, over a space and through difficulties to which Bonaparte's invasion of Russia was but a morning's walk. I am firmly persuaded that with but the marines which England can land from her navy already commanding that sea – with but a thousand soldiers – she can repel any force that we can ever march across the rocky Mountains. To talk of our dispatching a thousand me thither, is ridiculous, whatever western vaunts may say of it. Is an army to hunt its way to the Columbia?

I but suggest these ideas, because I am in the habit of saying to the public truth, whether it chooses to relish it of not. The last is its affair, not mine. It strikes me, then, that we have, most prudently, involved ourselves in a contest from which was will not and cannot recede, for that which we have no hope of obtaining, and which would be worse than useless if we could obtain it. In a word, w may take Canada – at least Upper Canada; but Oregon we cannot get. Nevertheless, understand me as only uttering what I generally abhor – a political speculation; for, as I have said, I now that we are involved, by a false policy, and by the mistaken public passions which it has engendered, in a thing from which there is no retreating. I think you may consider it certain, that we are now to have in the next Senate, Webster, John M. Clayton, and Reverdy Johnson. The former will succeed Mr. Choate, the two latter, Bayar and Merrick.

The Globe – either seeing that the demand for General Jackson's Texas Letter of 1819 to Mr. Monroe cannot be evaded, or perhaps unaware of its precise tenor (which the Hero himself perhaps has forgotten – some people you know have proverbially had memories) – has challenged the production of that remarkable epistle. I fancy that the call will not long remain unanswered.

The final development of the McNulty business may be expected tomorrow – that is, if this worthy does not run away or get shot in the meantime, as he was very near doing, last night, in a brawl down at the Steam boat Landing, where he and a gambling companion of his got into an affray with the tavern-keeper, who rid himself of Mr. Banks (the company) with a pistol, wounding him with two buck shot.

We have an intermission of Texas today.

"Mexico,"

The news from this distance country is again important, and will again strengthen the hands of the Piracy meditated in the United States against her rights and the laws of nations.

Little doubt, we presume, can now be entertained, that Gen. Santa Ana is overthrown, and we presume finally, and without the power of rallying.

Santa Ana's personal fate from the effect of the Revolution, is still in obscurity.

We confess our regret at this unexpected Revolution in Mexico, and for two reason; 1st, We how not the remotest idea that the people of Mexico are fit for self-government, and firmly believe that they require a master who will hold a tight rein over them. We are not aware that they possess a citizen more competent to this task than Gen. Santa Ana, whose energy, vigor and talents are unquestionable. 2d, The Revolution in Mexico, it is obvious, strengthens the Texas party in this country. Violently opposed to 'annexation, and transference of the reins of government from the hands of Santa Ana must be regarded as an indirect relaxation of that principle on the part of the Republic or Mexico. The Texas party in this country will not be slow to avail themselves of it.

"From Texas and Mexico,"

By the arrival of the steam packet New York, Capt. Wright in 42 hours from Galveston, we have been put in possession of Texas papers to Tuesday the 7th inst., inclusive. The most important intelligence in these journals is that of the progress of the Mexican Revolution, and retreat and defeat of Santa Ana by General Paredes. It appears that the sloop H. L. Kennedy, Capt. Lewis, arrived at Galveston on the 4th, direct from Corpus Christi, bringing the news which had reached the latter place from Matamoros through letters. These communication state that Gen. Paredes at the head of 8000 men marched against Santa Ana, who at that time had 13000 troops under his command. On the approach of Paredes, Santa Ana immediately retired, great numbers of his soldiers deserting his cause. His retreat extended to the city of Puebla, where he was attacked by Gen'l Paredes and defeated.

Gen'l Santa Ana, who made his escape, was compelled to disguise himself and take conveyance in a common coach of the country. The particulars of this battle are not given, but we presume, says the Galveston civilian, the victory was achieved by Gen'l Paredes at great expense of life, as is usually the case in Mexican warfare. In Northern Mexico, the revolution has been general throughout the country: at the last accounts Gen'l Canales in conjunction with Arista, were marching at the head of a large force against Gen'l Woll, who still held out in favor of centralism.

The revolution broke out in Matamoros on the 19th, ult. On the reception of the news in Matamoros, of the success of the Federal party, the citizens opposed to centralism and in favor of Federalism, assembled at the most public places and immediately denounced the Tyrant, and publicly proclaimed for the Federal cause. Great excitement prevailed in the city during the outbreak. Gen. Cela the commandant of the city was seized and imprisoned – the shout for liberty and down with centralism became general in all quarters; until the revolutionist had proved triumphant.

In Monterey the same scenes were enacted as in other cities, but of a more sanguinary character. The particulars we have not received, further than an account of the death of Gen'l Jose Ortega, Governor of the city of Monterey, who was publicly butchered for his faithful adherence to the cause of Santa Ana.

We give the above intelligence was we find it in the Texas papers, though we do not very well understand how Santa Ana could have had 13000 men under his command when attacked by Paredes, if the accounts be true which stated that his troops had been reduced to a mere handful by desertion.

On the night of the 27th ult, upwards of fifty horses were stolen from Corpus Christi. The Caronkawa Indians are likewise committing depredations upon the property of the inhabitants, surrounding Aransas Bay.

The Gazette gives a rumor that Gen. Duff Green, U. S. consul at Galveston, has been harshly treated by the Executive, but knows nothing of the particulars.

It is stated that the bill to remove the Seat of Government to Austin, has passes both Houses and will become a law. -N. O. Bee

"Gen. Houston of Texas,"

Gen. Jackson in his last letter, ordering the instant annexation of Texas, having re-endorsed the character of his Protégé, Houston, late President of Texas, and a worthy disciple of such an instructor, and alleged in effect, the incredible statement, that it is owing to Houston alone, that England has not acquired Texas – we think it appropriate to counteract the effect of the Hero's letter, by the following charges from a Galveston paper, avouched to be true by Wm. L. Coneau, an officer in the Texan army, represented as a gentleman of character and veracity:

"I charge Sam Houston with a misapplication of $20,000, appropriated for frontier defense, and used by him for dismantling it.

I charge him with willfully neglecting to carry out the law appropriating $15,000 for the relief of our suffering countrymen in the dungeons of Mexico.

I charge him with abstracting from the State Department a law prescribing the manner in which the elections for chief Justice should be held in the counties of Goliad, San Patricio and Refugio.

I charge him with the issuing of a draft on the custom House of par funds to Anson Jones for the purchase of the newspaper Houstonian, now Democrat.

I charge him with corresponding with the national enemy, Seguin and Antonio Perez.
I charge him with a cowardly desertion of the seat of government established by law.

I charge him with ordering out an armed force to effect an illegal object, at the risk of civil war.

I charge him with thwarting and defeating the retaliating campaign against the Rio Grande, from the mean dread that some REAL hero might arise to eclipse himself.

I charge him with submitting to the grossest insults from Mexico, and bringing contempt and disgrace on the national character for the same base reason.

I charge him with having caused the dissemination of the Mier prisoners.

I charge him with abstracting from the mail a letter addressed to Col. Jones, of Travis, from Col. Watson, of this place.

I charge him with having connived at breaking the seal of a private letter, in conjunction with one of his meanest tools in this city – a private letter address by Judge Morris, of Galveston, to Mr. Tankersby, of Houston, with the President himself acknowledged having read.

I charge him with having permitted Dr. Anson Jones to draw 4270 for traveling expenses, from Austin to Burleigh, in visiting his family, and back, at 30 cents per mile, transportation, and $4.50 per day horse hire, and call upon the auditor to deny the charge.

I charge him with paying Captain Read, of steamboat Mustang for the transportation of his furniture, out of the money appropriated by congress for conveying Government Expresses.

I charge him with having attempted, through his Commissioners, a treasonable armistice with Mexico, based upon the surrender of our nationality.

I charge him with having inhumanly denounced the navy of the country as pirates to the world, while gallantly engaged in combat with the enemy's fleet.

I charge him with the unmanly persecution of the commander of the navy for defending his country, conduct which he has the meanness to envy, without the courage to imitate.

I charge him with disgracing the first office in the nation by habitually mendacity.

"Correspondence of the Whig,"

Again, on yesterday, the business of the House of Representatives consisted of little but a very bad attempt at performing the duties of a criminal court. They once more arraigned their defaulting and now deficient clerks for that worthy only appeared "vicariously" (as Mr. Benton hath it) through his agent, Mr. Kershaw, and is now gone, where the public money went before him. Never mind: we shall soon have him: annex away, and we shall recover him, along with quantities of other citizens equally valuable. Who knows? Why, by the time we get Texas in, he may be Secretary of the treasury there! Nothing more likely: for did not Mr. Hollingsworth embezzle the Government funds as U. S. District Attorney for Tennessee? And didn’t he, when discovered, "put out" for the land of the Lone Star, [so called, no doubt, because of the many who travel thither by starlight?] and, as soon as he got there, the fame of the exploit having traveled before him, didn’t they make him Chief Justice of Texas? I cede did they. I have the history from the surest source.

Well, the worthy member from Lexington, in your State, Chairman of the committee on Accounts, rose, after some little progress in the calendar of Private bills, and told his tale. Mr. McNulty, according to his wont, and aided by the discreet measures of the House, had not appeared before him at the hour indicated. He had waited, as they wait who have much faith, and as they must sometimes perforce wait who have none. The latter, I fear, was Mr. Taylor’s predicament; for be is a man of sense, Vain, however, were his expectations! Mac was missing!

"He comes not, ne'er will come again!"

In a word, he found it more convenient to appear in that House, as the people does, by deputy, so he produced himself, by proxy, in the shape of another, perhaps almost as fit to be laid by the heels as himself, that is, his missing and cashless cashier, Mr. Kershaw: who, to save blushes, presented himself in lieu of modest Mac, bearing with him an epistle from his principal. When asked something about the desired object, the chink, this excellent accountant replied, with a most engaging simplicity, that after the very luminous exhibit which his superior had Heaven first sent letters for some wretch's aid," he drew forth another missive from his chief, in which that ingenuous person (who eke n the Ohio Legislature, applauded the mobs that pulled down and rifled Banks, and who now claims to leave deposits in all sorts of Rag-mills) assured the Committee that he had some 20 or 30,000 dollars (no matter which) in the vaults of the Bank of North America in New York.

For my part, I am only puzzled so imagine with what sort of looks Mr. Taylor and his associates received these impudent communications, or how he could help picking up a chair and knocking the fellow on the head. I presume however, that when the committee walked off to communicate the very satisfactory results Mr. Kershaw went after them that impressive salutation which is performed by joining the tip of the left hand thumb to the summit of the right hand little finger and then applying, with sundry graceful flourishes of the unemployed digits, the right hand thumb to the apex o the nose. Possible to he breathed that significant interrogatory which sometimes aids the gesture, “Does your mother know you are out?”

Well: upon the Report, the House, now somewhat indignant at the facility with which their friend had played upon them, proceeded to break them: but not, as you will perceive, 'til he had first broke them. For he has probably left them more bills to pay than money. He has also attained a glory which I had never expected to see any man arrive at in that House - a glory reserved, like so many others, to the Progressive Democracy - the glory of uniting all voices; for the vote to dismiss him was unanimous. Even the metal of Mr. Weller, who yesterday assured the House of his innocence, and pledged himself and his fellow sureties to make good any minus that might appear against the clerk, gave way. He still stuck to his persuasion that nothing would be lost; but avowed that he had been deceived in his expectations of yesterday and placed in a very embarrassing situation. I do not find, however, that he took the trouble to reduce to any available form the guarantee which he before offered.

The other Resolutions brought in by the committee were afterwards adopted; that directing the Secretary of the Treasury to proceed against his sureties; and that directing the President to cause him to be persecuted criminally. In the latter Instruction, they were far less scrupulous than they had shown themselves about punctilios as to arresting and detaining him.

At any event, this strange facility of leaving him at large has rendered their present zeal of persecution somewhat nugatory. He was sought for, by the Police, all last night, but “the place that knew him shall know him no more,” and Texas hath one more patriot.

For my part, I took it upon him as a persecuted individual, the martyr of his principles. Such was his reputation, that the House might just as well have trusted him after the fact as before it. He was the perfection of a Jacobin, and would have made Mr. Ritchie a first-rate head man, if haven had only given him Richmond as his residence. He had some demagogue talent and was, I think, one of the most unabated blackguards I have ever seen. But certainly, upon the principle established by the Democracy, in the famous Mississippi case of the Land Receiver, his removal is a grievous hardship: for was it not then settled that when a man becomes gorged with embezzlement, he is at once safer than all others as a depository of the public cash, inasmuch as he that already has hi skin full cannot devour or guzzle as they would do who are yet empty? Such was the philosophy of Messrs. Woodbury and Van Buren.

But mark! This man, who thought Banks so dishonest that it was right for mobs to plunder and sack them, and who, in half a year, besides other frauds which will yet appear, has made way with probably 50,000 dollars of public money, was last summer detected, at a Congressional mess, in cheating at Brag. He was kicked down stairs; and, almost with the prints of that shoe leather in his flesh, was within a week or ten day, haranguing a democratic assemblage here, about Mr. Clay's fondness for cards! He was again detected, beyond question, in hiding bullets and braggers, during the Christmas holidays! These things were known to many members of congress, and the utter laxity of his principles, his debaucheries and vices of every sort, notorious.

But when, alas! Is the league of those who are esteemed virtuous merely because they always prate of virtue, patriotic because they always have the words of freedom in their mouths, and statesmen because they can theorize, to be broken? The people do not take men to be the most religious, who profane the name of god the most frequently: why, then, should they think those most zealous for the public good, who give no proofs of it but by their incessantly desecrating its divinest words with their foul lips?

We have been shown an intercepted letter written by Santa Ana to Valentin Canalizo, and dated Queretaro, the 6th of December. This letter is a reply to a dispatch addressed to Santa Ana by Canalizo, and dated the 4th. The following is the substance of the letter, which is will be perceived, was written the very day on which the revolution broke out at Mexico.

"However disagreeable may be the defection of Inclan, it is of little consequence, if met with firmness and energy.

"The army is all on the march, and as it was necessary to divide the forces in order to effect a decisive stroke, I am preferring for Paredes, who does not budge from Aransas, on the route to Guadalajara, it is impossible to order a countermarch of the 2,500 men of which you speak, as it would occasion entirely too much confusion.

"I have, however, given orders to dispatch to you the 8th regiment of infantry and the active squadron of Tlaxcala, which I had left in garrison for reinforcements. The two will constitute an effective force of 600 men, you may augment the eighth with the battalion of recruits which may be prepared before hand, as the battalion will arrive in six days and the squadron in four.

"You may likewise assemble the squadron of Tula, which consists of pretty good troops, and a few detachments besides in the vicinity of the capitol.

"I am of the opinion that not a soldier should be allowed to leave his post until the arrival of these forces – you know the petty officers of the army – they cannot be lost sight of with safety.

"I am in hopes that the Commanders Gaona, Mendoza, Ullarte and others will arrest Inclan. Should I be disappointed it will be of little consequence, as without arms and munitions they can accomplish nothing.

"Only preserve the capital with 3000 faithful men well stationed, and the revolution at Puebla will prove of no importance. There may be some few outbreaks which will cease as soon as Paredes is beaten, and this will be done in eight or ten days. I have already informed you that Zacatecas is tranquillized, and the surrounding departments, though filled with agitators, are free from turbulence or commotion.

"General Juvera is well disposed towards the government, and is in command of this place with 600 men and three pieces of artillery.

"Although timorous, General Cortazar is in the right path, and serves the cause of the government.

"It is indispensable to secure Pedraza, as well as the petty chiefs of the revolution, in order to disconcert their plans. The dissolution of the factious assemblies such as the Ayuntamiento and Junta Departmental, is not important, as they will be forced to submit when they behold the denouement of the drama.

"The election of the Command of Puebla appears to me certain, and likewise that of second in commandcMendoza. This will aid the government, and produce a good effect.

"The news from the squadron at Puebla is satisfactory. It is probable that Inclan has been arrested. In one word, comrade, resolution, and exemplary chastisement for all the chiefs of the conspiracy! Do not stop halfway. Nothing is more fatal in critical moments than weakness and indecision."

In a letter to Rejon we find the following passage:

"Energy, no pausing before the means necessary to be employed. In crisis like the present firmness and blows settle every thing." -N. O. Bee.

"From Washington, Fate of the Texas Movement,"

Let us be permitted to caution the country as to the statements which appear in the papers devoted to the immediate annexation of Texas, and which represent that event as certain or next to certain.

Those statements are probably in every case, from the pens of partisans and interested persons, me whose wishes are fathers to their thoughts, and whose purses control their thoughts and wishes both. They are bold speculations intended to bring about the end desired, not faithful representations of fact.

We believe we can assure the Public, that Texas will NOT be annexed, and that whatever the House may order, the Senate, by a great majority, composed of both great political parties, will arrest the movement to annex by Legislation; the most unqualifiedly profligate violation of the Constitution ever yet attempted.

The people, in truth, do not desire annexation now, all at once, in such hot haste and tremendous hurry, if ever. They have got along without Texas, for two hundred and thirty years, and think they can manage to do so still. It is the Texas Land mongers and Scrip-speculators only, who are in this wonderful hast to CLUTCH THE SPOILS.

Jan. 28, 1845, RWv22i8p1c3

"Passage of the Resolutions of Texas Annexation,"

As we thought probable, the resolutions annexing Texas passed the House of Representatives on Saturday, ayes 120, nays 98. Eight Whigs voted for them, viz, Messrs. Peyton, Senator, Ashe, and Milton Brown, of Tennessee; Messrs. Clinch and Stevens of Georgia; Dellet, of Alabama; and Newton, of Virginia. Their votes reversed, would have produced nearly a tie.

Towards the close of the debate, Mr. Rayner, of North Carolina, rose and said: "He called upon the reporters to note it particularly, that no Southern Whig, who was in favor of the annexation of Texas, had been allowed to address the House during the debate. By some system of management, Southern Whigs had been deprived of the floor and thus prevented from explaining their position and giving their reasons for the course they intended to pursue." [Mr. Hopkins, of Virginia, who occupied the Chair, called Mr. Rayner to order, and said he could not permit reflections to be made upon the Presiding office."]

The forms of resolutions adopted, was that offered by Mr. Milton Browne, of Tennessee, and Mr. Foster of Tennessee, in the Senate, (providing for the adoption of one Texas slave state and one Texas free state) providing for the adoption of one Texas slave state now, and four hereafter, if the people prefer slavery.

Mr. Hale's proposition for making two States of Texas received but 16 votes.

By the resolutions, as adopted, slavery in the States to be created out of Texas, is to exist or not, as the people may prefer.

The debts of Texas are not to be assumed by United States, but provided for out of the Texas public land fund.

(This if sustained by the Senate, is a great measure, the consequences of which, foreign and domestic, remote and immediate, commercial political, and religious, can be foreseen not even guessed at by human ken! It may produce a dissolution of the Union as it exists, and new confederacies among the States, war with Mexico and possibly England, and civil war; or it may produce none of these and result in strengthening and enriching the American People, in extending the area of Liberty and civilization, and the Anglo Saxon tongue, religion and civil Institutions. We have always dreaded the consequences more than we hoped from them, because knowing that this great measure sprung from a political intrigue and the cupidity of speculators, we would not feel justified in the expectation that what was born in iniquity could lead to glory and happiness. But Providence chooses its instrument by rules hidden from mortal eyes, and we humbly trust that such may be the case now, and that what appears to us of so doubtless and alarming import, is yet destined to effect final good.)

But the measure has yet to pass the fiery ordeal of the Senate, a body very different in constitution and character from the House. Our information leads us to the firmest assurance that the resolutions cannot pass the Senate. That body will not consent to be goaded on by the system of "overseeing," so successfully practiced against recusants in the other House: they will certainly take time for the widest enquiry and the most mature consideration. Nearly every Senator will desire to address his constituents, and this will very probably bring the 4th March: But there is supposed to be decided majority against annexation, by legislation in any shape, in not by treaty, too.

"Santa Ana and Mexico,"

The news from Mexico is so important as well as so curious and unexpected, bearing too upon the fortune of movements in the U. States that we insert it to the exclusion of a press of other matter of much interest.

(This news is crowded out by Foreign news.)

We shall not speculate upon the circumstances so ably reviewed and lucidly collated by the Picayune, farther than to express the decided conviction that if Santa Ana has really approached the Capital so near as five miles and at the head of so large a force, that the contest has been decided in his favor.

“Texas Vetoed by the Legislature of Louisiana,“

We have omitted to state what we hear is the fact, that the Legislature of Louisiana have rejected resolutions in favor of annexation by a vote of 48 to 46.

The explanation is of more importance than the fact. That we do not doubt is contained in the present ruinously low prices of the great Southern staples of sugar and cotton.

A correspondent of the National Intelligencer writes:

New Orleans, Jan. 11, 1845,

“I find that the very low rates of both sugar and cotton are already beginning to open the eyes of some of he strong advocates for the annexation of Texas, and will no doubt make many pause in their exertions to attain that object. I do not consider that he question of annexation can come into the next Presidential canvass, but that it must and will be settled definitely, on way or the other, at the next session of congress, or, at any rate, within the first two years of Mr. Polk's administration. I ought, therefore, not to be any longer considered as having any party bearing, but should both by Whigs and Locofocos, be taken up on the pure merits of the question; and I most sincerely hope it will be discussed in this spirit at Washington.”

It has ever been a subject of surprise to us that the planting States of S. Caroling, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Alabama and the Floridas should favor a step so fatal to their prosperity if Texas be the Egypt in fertility represented. An ultimate and extensive reaction much take place in popular opinion in those regions, and it was to give time for nation reflection upon a subject of such immense import, that we have ever chiefly opposed Immediate Annexation. If immediately annexed and the measure should prove disastrous, it would also be irreparable.

"Lashing them in,"

From the N. Y. Tribune:

The Richmond Enquirer closes an article on the Annexation of Texas as follows:

"We rejoice that those deserting Democrats, who oppose this vital question, which Mr. Polk so anxiously desires to be settled at this session, will have nothing to expect from his Administration. Those Northern Democrats, who avail themselves of this critical contest with our great Trans-Atlantic rival, to indulge their fanatical hatred of the South, will find themselves mistaken in their calculations – marked by a great national sentiment in their turn – and we dare to say, that if they should defeat us, we shall have at least the consolation of knowing, that they will be hereafter defeated in their own aspirations."

‘Boys, do you hear that?’ ‘No song, no supper.’ You must go Texas, or you get no offices from Polk! They didn’t talk so before Election.

“FROM MEXICO – LATE AND IMPORTANT”

From the N. O. Picayune.

By the arrival yesterday of the ship Hermann, Captain Welch, from Vera Cruz, we have dates from that city up to the 2d inst. To give a full account of all the occurrences in the distracted Republic since our last would occupy our entire space – we must therefore, as briefly as possible, detail the principal events which have transpired.
From all we can gather, by our files of papers, our correspondence, and verbal accounts, it would seem that Santa Ana is still in the field arrayed against the new government, and with a force far from inconsiderable at his disposal.

The report of his being defeated by Paredes, at Puebla, as we anticipated, was entirely without foundation.

A friend at the City of Mexico has sent us a supplement of the Diario del Gobierno, dated on the 27th January, which contains a long correspondence between Santa Ana and the new President, Herrera, the substance of which will be found below. Santa Ana's last letter was written on the 25th at Huehueto, a small village but a few leagues from Mexico. Verbally we learn that the dictator was within five miles of the city on the 28th, that the roads leading to it in every direction had been cut up and barricaded, that the citizens were under arms, and the Gen. Paredes, with a force of 6000 men, had gone out to meet Santa Ana. The force on the latter we have no means of ascertaining. One account places it at 10,000, of which 2000 are said to be splendid cavalry; but other reports make out the entire force of 6000 men, had gone out to meet Santa Ana. The force on the latter we have no means of ascertaining. One account places it at 10,000, of which 2000 are said to be splendid cavalry; but other reports make out the entire force of 6000 men, and was expecting reinforcements from both Zacatecas and San Luis. It may be that Bravo had gone out to meet Santa Ana, as he had arrived at the city a few days before and had taken sides against the tyrant.

But in order more fully to give our readers an idea of the present situation and prospects of Santa Ana, we must take them back to the time when he first hears of the Revolution in the city of Mexico, and the imprisonment of Canalizo. Want of room prevents us giving other than a mere synopsis of a correspondence which occupies pages of the Mexican journals.

On the 18th of December, Santa Ana addressed to Gen. Herera a letter from Celaya, in which he states, that while on his march to put down the rebellion of Paredes, he received at Siloa, the intelligence of the insurrection of the 6th December, by which Canalizo was hurled from power. He had waited for this intelligence to be communicated to him officially, and to be invited to take charge of the Government as the Constitutional President. Upon learning afterwards, that the command of the army had been intrusted to Gen. Cortazar, he determined to address the government to know if it would then commit to him the public authority to be administered according to the Organic Bases, in order that he might accordingly regulate his line of procedure. At the same time, he protests against the imprisonment of Gen. Canalizo, as contrary to the Organic Bases, while acting as President of the Republic. He then declares himself at the head of an army full of spirit and enthusiasm, and determined to march upon the capital to re-establish order.

The Foreign Secretary, Cuevas, replies to this under date of the 21st December. Without deigning to reply directly to Santa Ana's demands, he rebukes him for calling that an insurrection which is in fact a unanimous manifestation of the national will. He justifies the course of conduct pursued by the Government towards Canalizo, and then enters upon an enumeration of the acts of tyranny of Santa Ana in violation of the Organic Bases. He then orders him to give up the command of the army to Gen. Cortazar, to suspend his march upon the capital, and to place himself at the disposition of the government, to be tried for alleged offences by the two chambers. A warm appeal is made to his magnanimity, his sense of the honors showered upon him by the country, and the absolute powers at times entrust to him, to prevent the effusion of blood and yield with dignity. At the same time the safety of his person is guaranteed. This letter is written with ability, but, we think, betrays a natural apprehension of the tyrant's power, and a praiseworthy desire to avoid bloodshed.

The first letter of Santa Ana was accompanied by a private letter to Herrera, written with the utmost apparent cordiality, but in which he expresses views not unlike those of his official communication. At the same time he demands that, upon his approach to the capital, Herrera would grant him an interview, that hey may consult together upon the best means of re-establishing and confirming public order. Gen. Herrera accompanies his secretary's official reply with a private letter, in answer to this, as cordial as Santa Ana's, but he declines the interview.

This letter was preceded by a decree dated the 17th of December, by which it is declared that the Government no longer recognizes Santa Ana's authority as President of the Republic; all his acts, as such, President, are pronounced null and void, and the army under him is required to submit at once to the constitutional authorities.

Santa Ana continued his movement upon the capital until he reached Huehueto, from which place, on the 25th of December, he addressed another long communication to Gen. Herrera. It is written haughtily, and in defending himself he does not hesitate to attack the Government. He states that he was ordered to put himself at the head of the army, to suppress the outbreak at Jalisco. He hastened to do so – it not being his duty to inquire into the legality of the order, but to obey. He was the more ready to obey, in consideration of his elevated position and his influences with the army. He then asserts that he could and should readily have crushed the outbreak, but for the insurrection in the capital and the order given him to transfer the command of the army. He then discusses the acts of the Congress – declares their disposition of Canalizo illegal, as he had neither resigned his command nor been allowed a trial; he refuses therefore, to acknowledge Herrera as President.

He then defends the act of Canalizo suspending the sessions of Congress, and contends that if was, at the least, no more a violation of the Bases than the act of Congress deposing Canalizo. The former, he urges, was an act of necessity – the latter, a seditious movement to wrest power from himself; but whatever was the character of the act, it was that of Canalizo, not of Santa Ana. The latter not being responsible for it, he contends that the decree of the 17th of December, virtually deposing him from the Presidency of the Republic and disavowing his acts, is in itself illegal, beyond the competency of Congress, and revolutionary.
He takes up in detail the several charges made against himself by Cuevas – (for a synopsis of which we cannot find room to-day) – and, one after the other, he pronounces them false and calumnious. He then solemnly declares, that not having failed in this obedience to the laws, that being determined that no one shall overthrow them, and that being resolved to maintain the Organic Bases, he feels bound to protest against, and does protest against, the revolutionary deposition of Canalizo, and the act of accusation against him. He protests against the audacious disavowal of his own authority, as beyond their constitutional powers [ . . . ] an act unknown to the law, and contrary to the [ . . . ] of the government he declares that he has sought to exercise no authority not conferred on him by law; that he has not thought, nor does he think, of dissolving the legislative body, but that he is determined, at every hazard, to maintain the Organic Bases. Finally, he protests against the act of accusation directed against himself, as beyond the pale of the authority of Congress, and the work of personal enemies seeking to bring about a revolution.

He then boldly demands that Herrera should give up to him the power, to the exercise of which he had been called by the nation. He next asserts that he is on his march to the capital, for the purpose of assuming the reins of Government, not for wreaking vengeance on his foes, and that the army is with him in sentiment. He characterizes the indignities with which were treated the remains of the limb he lost in “a day of glory” as brutal and cowardly; says something of his public services, and concludes with some sever reflections upon Cuevas.

This official letter is again accompanied by a private one, in which, in a more bland manner, Santa Ana urges upon Herrera to lay aside his own authority and acknowledge that which he himself claims. He intimates that as he is at the head of troops, it is unnecessary to say, to an old soldier like Herrera, what the consequences must be, if the latter refuse to comply.

The reply of Herrera to this note, which is dated at Mexico on the 27th, two days after, is friendly yet firm and dignified. He stands by the letter of his Secretary of Foreign Relations, and exhorts Santa Anna to submission. – Gen. Bravo, too, who had been called to the command of the army, on the 27th December, addressed Santa Anna, apprising him of his command, and urging him to suspend actual hostilities and spare the effusion of blood. We can not get more at length into this correspondence. Upon reading it, it is somewhat difficult to form an opinion as to the relative positions of the three generals. Santa Ana may have assumed all the audacity which characterizes his portion of it; but his marching upon the capital looks as though he were in earnest. On the other hand, the milder and almost supplicating tone of Herrera's in some passages, may be dictated by real humanity and patriotism, not unmixed with a magnanimous regard for the fortunes of an old fellow soldier, whom he allows to have deserved well of the Republic. We think that Santa Ana's superior craft and dexterity, coupled with his great energy, are more dreaded by both Herrera and Bravo than their physical forces under his command.

The Mexican papers of the 25th December state that for some days previous nothing was to be heard but discharges of artillery and the ringing of bells at the joyful announcement of the progress of the revolution. The surrender of the constitutional Government of the castle of Perote, with twenty thousand stands of arms; the declaration of Tampico against Santa Ana; the adhesion of the garrison of Guanajuata to the government, under the command of General Liceaga – the events, as the new successively arrived, filled the city with joy. This, it should be recollected, was before the news had arrived that Santa Ana had arrived at Huehuetoca, and had sent his bold note to Herera. The papers of the day, after its reception, have not reached us.

The city has been declared in a state of siege, and the inhabitants are obviously afflicted at the near prospect of bloodshed. Their shouts and rejoicings must, therefore be taken with some grains of allowance, and should Santa Ana succeed, they may hurrah as loudly for him.

General Bassedre who it was said at the North was to supersede Santa Ana in his command, has been accused by the unanimous vote of the Congress, and will undergo a trial. He was Santa Ana’s Secretary of War.

Senor Llaca, a distinguished Deputy from Queretaro, and a leader of the opposition against the late government, is dead. His funeral was attended by Congress, and an immense throng of citizens.

On the 25th of December, Senor Cuevas, Secretary of Foreign Relations, addressed a letter to the governors of Departments, congratulating them, among other things, that the vessels of war, just returned from the U. States, had been placed at the disposition of the actual government. He announces Santa Ana's march upon the capital, but says it has been put in a complete state of defence, and he expresses perfect confidence of triumph. Gens. Valencia, Guzman, and Morales, have declared for the Government, and the first named appointed second in command of the army – general Bravo commanding in chief. The citizens of Mexico were rapidly enrolling themselves, and all hands were at work digging trenches and barricading the streets to prevent the advance of the tyrant.

The downfall of Santa Ana, was at one time deemed so certain in Mexico, that the poets plumed their wings, and commenced their lampoons, and affected lamentations over the fortunes of the late President.

It is a strong indication of the dread entertained of him in Mexico, that the roads leading to the capital, had been torn up to retard his march. At the same time, the sisters of charity, in anticipation of a desperate conflict, and with their characteristic piety and humanity, had tendered their services to the War Department, to be employed in the hospitals.

The Commandant general of the Department of Vera Cruz, under date of December 31, addressed the inhabitants, indicating to them the probability that Santa Ana might attempt to establish himself in Vera Cruz, with the view of
They have shown that they can count the House, but they have equally shown that they cannot the Senate.

With all that, the Annexationists are confident and rely upon a majority of 5. They obviously reckon on losing none of their men, and on getting more of ours than they can obtain. In both particulars, they are like to prove mistaken. They have shown that they can count the House, but they have equally shown that they cannot the Senate.

The session of the House of Delegates, Saturday, extending to a late hour in the evening, was entirely devoted to the discussion of Annexation and kindred topics. They Select Committee which had been appointed, in the expectation of bringing in a compromise report, stated that they could not agree, and requested to be discharged. The resolutions from the Senate were then taken up; and the 1st one (although a Democratic proposition), being found more palatable to the Whigs than to the Democrats, was agreed to. The Democrats then proposed a farther amendment – in substance endorsing both the expediency and the constitutionality of the Joint Resolution passed by the House of Representatives. To this the Whigs could not subscribe and they proposed an amendment simply declaring that a majority of the people of Virginia are in favor of Annexation by any constitutional mode; but forbearing, in express terms, to give any opinion of this constitutionality of the mode of joint resolution. This amendment was adopted. The effect of this proceeding is, and was designed to be an as is so declared, to leave our Senators free to act as to them may seem best on the Joint Resolution. A resolution instructing them to vote for the Joint Resolution was subsequently voted down.

The Locos, we rather think, made but little capital by this Texas agitation. When they come to reckon with the People for the time and money wasted in the discussion, they will find that their political speculations are quite as barren and profitless as their Texas scrip is likely to prove. They are like the gentleman who went out in quest of wool and came home shorn!

To the Editors of the Whig:

Messrs. Editors – I read in your daily paper of the 28th ultime, a letter addressed to me, by some one signing himself "B," criticizing my late latter, published in your daily paper, of the 22d, ult. It is made my duty to answer this letter. I very much regret the necessity thus forced on me, again to appear in the   of a newspaper – for in all seriousness, I have a decided distaste for such notoriety.

"B," is entitled to my thanks, for his kind and flattering acknowledgment of the purity and integrity of the motives by which I was actuated in the expression of the views contained in the letter which he so courteously comments on. While I accord to B none other than a patriotic and laudable desire to convince me, by his letter, of the suicidal effect of my position and arguments, as expressed in my letter if the 15th of January, he will, I am sure, pardon me for eth expression, that his arguments and conclusions present an perfect non sequitur.

B, I am well assured, neither designed to involve me in a needless controversy, or to rest his conclusions on a sophism; and yet, such are the scope, tendency and conclusion of his own argument, that both of these undesirable ends have resulted as a consequence from his letter.

B quotes, at some length, from that portion of my letter in which I argue to establish the position that – if it is constitutional to annex Texas by joint resolution, it would be equally as constitutional to cede away as State – by the same mode of legislation – there being no higher exercise of sovereignty required, in cession that there would be in annexation.

But it should not have escaped the astute intellect of B that he (unintentionally, I am sure) over looked the previous position of which this argument was based, as the constitutional proposition, on which the correctness of my conclusion rested. In the quotation which B gives from my letter, he merely confines himself to the secondary proposition resulting as a consequence from the previous position distinctly laid down, and carried out, that so long as Texas was a separate, independent sovereign power, fully invested with all the prerogatives of sovereignty, no internal legislation on the part of the United States, could reach or control either her soil or citizens: That Texas must first part with her sovereignty before her territory or citizens could be rendered amenable to the jurisdiction of the United States: that to accomplish this, a Treaty stipulation between the two high contracting parties was necessary and indispensable, and that any mere internal legislation on the part of the United States, must leave the act of annexation a dead letter on our State books until it was perfected by Texas.

Here then is an essential and radical misconception and misstatement of both my position and argument. I now call the candid attention of B to this unintentional breach of argument manifest in his letter. If he will impartially review it, he will at once perceive the injustice which his conclusions have done my position.

That portion of my letter quoted my him is as follows;

"For one as an American citizen, I will not consent to violate every rule of Constitutional propriety, that Texas may be annexed. I am now, as I have even been, a devoted and sincere friend the measure when it can be fairly,
"There is yet another view of this monstrous and daring infraction of the constitution. If it is constitutional, to annex a State by joint resolution, is it not equally as constitutional, by the same means, to deed away a State? Is there any higher exercise of Sovereign power required in cession, than would be in annexation? I would seem not. If then, by joint resolution, Congress can annex a foreign State to the United States, may it not by the same means cede away a State? Apply this principle – carry it out and what might it not lead to? Congress might then [ . . . ] by joint resolution annex Texas, and at its next session cede away Texas and Louisiana.

"With these views I must be pardoned for declaring, in all seriousness, that, under no circumstances, can I ever agree, so far as my vote is concerned, to see Texas annexed to the United States by joint resolution. I am in favor of annexation – by treaty with Texas – under the provisions of the constitution – when it can be fairly, honorable and peaceably accomplished – taking care, in the Treaty provisions to settle the question, as a National one, above all party or geographical prejudices.

From this language I drown the forced inference that I must dither give up the question or admit the monstrous proposition that by treaty the United States could cede away one or more of the States of this Union.

Here, then, is the manifest unfairness of his position and conclusion. He entirely overlooks the previous position and utterly excludes it form his consideration. Allow me to recall his attention to it.

In my letter of the 15th of January, I distinctly use this language:

"Texas is either in independent, sovereign government, or she is not independent. If she is an independent Republic, then is she a Sovereign Power – and under the international law, regulating the intercourse between sovereign powers, she can be divested of the Territorial possessions, in but one of two ways, either by conquest of by treaty cession. If she is not an independent, Sovereign Power, then she has no territory at her disposal. No secondary dependent government, without the exercise of sovereign powers, can treat with Sovereignty. Treaty stipulations, to be binding, must proceed from a sovereign power – to an equal, in the scale of National independence. Sovereign powers can enter into compacts between each other by Treaty stipulations alone. This is the only means by which Independent nations can ratify a compact entered into between them.

The question here presents itself – "can the mere legislative action of the U. States, bind either the citizens or the soil of Texas?" If so, then Texas is already a part and parcel of our soil – and any act of annexation, whether by treaty, or joint resolution, would be a mere legislative supererogation. There can be no constitutional – extra territorial legislation. No statute, or law, can be obligatory, beyond the ascertained boundaries of the government which passes it. It can only operate on foreign territory, or the citizens of a foreign government, by international comity. To secure this, a compact between the two Sovereignties is necessary. This compact must be entered into, and ratified by a Treaty: no internal legislative provisions can either create or enforce any such reciprocal privileges.

Let us apply these views to the case in point. Texas is certainly a few, Independent, sovereign power. She is endowed with all the prerogatives of sovereignty. This being the fact, she must first part with her sovereignty, before her Territory can be at all subject to our Legislation, or her citizens amenable to our laws. Now, can the United States Legislature Texas out of her Sovereignty? I humbly think not. How, then can the mere Legislative volition of the United States, lend into on e Government, two republics wholly independent of each other?

There is a very spurious argument advanced in and out of Congress, that Congress has the power to admit "new States" into the Union. From this granted power, the strict constructionists imply the devised power, of admitting "foreign States" into the Union. It is indeed melancholy to witness such willful perversion of the Constitution, by men in high places, and who profess to be literal construers, of every specific power vested by the Constitution in Congress.

The 3d section of the 4th article of the Constitution, from which this implied power is thought to be filched, gives and related to "Territory of other property belonging to the United States." How, under this clause, can congress exercise any supervisory control over "Territory" not "belonging to the United States."

To allow of Legislation, the "Territory or property" which forms the subject of legislation must "belong to the United States." Now does Texas "belong" to the United States? If so, annexation is useless. The Territory of Texas, is physically already annexes to the Territory of the United States. What is proposed to eh done, contemplates a social and political incorporation of the people and institutions of Texas, with the Government of the United states – thus merging of the lesser Sovereign power into the greater. If this can be done, by joint resolution in Congress, then can one sovereign power Legislature over and divest the chartered rights of the citizens of another Sovereign power. The thing is impossible.

Suppose that any of the various series of resolutions or bills now pending before Congress, were to pass both Houses unanimously – What would result? Would not this law of political gravitation thus created, be suspended in its operation, until the Government of Texas – per gratia – allowed it to exercise its limited powers of attraction within her Territory? Would it not require the legislative action in some form of Texas before the law of annexation could operate? The very terms and provisions of these resolutions or bills admit the fact. What then is proposed by these joint resolution? They might pass in congress here, and be spurned in the congress of Texas. What a political farce!

“The Texas Senate, Texas,”

The principal topic in the Senate yesterday was the Texas Resolutions, as amended in the House by Mr. Witcher.

Mr. Wallace moved to strike out the latter clause, which waived any expression of opinion on the constitutionality of Annexation by joint resolution. This was agreed to, after debate, ayes 19, noes 9.

Mr. Thompson of K. offered further to amend, by declaring, in substance, approbation of the Joint Resolution, as a lawful and constitutional mode of annexation, and one which would be approved by the People.

In vain was the authority of Mr. Jefferson sited by Messrs. Carter and Gallaher, and delay asked by Messrs. Stanard and Caperton, for the purpose of eliciting light on the latter branch. Messrs. Wallace, McMullen and Thompson of K., considered the constitutional point sufficiently clear, beyond all question, and urged prompt action, in which they were sustained by the Senate; and the Resolutions, in their amended form, were forthwith sent back to the House.

The latter body, being engaged upon the Tex bill, did not consider the amendments of the Senate to their amendment on the Texas resolutions.

The subject will doubtless be taken up in the House today, for probably the Democracy will consider, as Mr. Wilson of Botetourt did in relation the Expunge, that “the people are suffering” for action on the subject.

What becomes of old fashioned State rights, Strict construction notions? Texas is wanted, and the means of getting it are of no moment in the opinion of the dominant party. Mr. Jefferson’s practice is deemed better than his precept – and, as he can be found on both sides, the convenient opinion is always most orthodox.

“Correspondence of the Whig,”

Washington, Feb’y 2, 1845

In the legislation of the last week, as in that of the preceding ones of this winter, one question has stood up, far above all others of the present day, perhaps far above any which the country has witnessed for above a quarter of a century. It is a question not only of the present peace; but of all the future honor of the land, and (we greatly fear) of its very Union. That question has been decided, as far as the action of one of our legislative bodies can decide it. The only hope of rendering void this most portentous decision lies in that great body whose well-organized superiority to the tumultuary movements of the moment, whose calmer temper, whose less rash or partisan counsels, whose higher responsibilities, have, on many other occasions, frustrated the ill that threatened us and saved the nation from measures that could scarcely have been less than disastrous in the extreme.

In a word, the wild measure of Annexation has been carried, in the House of Representatives, not only in defiance of constitutional limitations the most imperative and in the face of whatever precedents and authorities they who perform the thing have professed most to hold sacred, but in utter contempt not merely of all the methods and reasons which they last year held to be the true and valid ones, but of many which they themselves have subsequently advanced, and in total disregard of the many terrible consequences for the peace, the concord and the institutions of the country, which may well attend upon a decision at once so unjust and so imprudent.

I must be pardoned if, upon a matter of such magnitude and such peril, I speak with a large abandonment of reserve. Where the question is one of which the momentousness so totally effaces all ordinary rule, it becomes all, whose part it is to speak, to deliver themselves, certainly with decency, but nevertheless with the utmost freedom.

I look, then, on the measure, now half-consummated:

As in entire derogation of all the rights of the separate members of this confederacy to repel the admission into it of new associates who suit them not:

As totally beyond the competency, at best, of any but the Treaty making power:
As therefore, a direct and subversive usurpation, by one branch of the government, not only upon the coordinate ones, but upon the inherent rights of the individual parties to this league – the separate States that compose it:

As clearly, in this double usurpation, a blow so deadly to whatever has heretofore been of constitutional limitation, that it must be considered as nothing short of a demolition of all our Organic Law:

As warranting, by Congress, the alienation, no less that the incorporation, of what or whom it shall please, near or far:

As thus authorizing a simple legislative vote to divest, transfer or extinguish the sovereignty, or the independence, not only of foreign countries, but of each of these States and even of all together: for whatever of the sort a mere majority of congress can do, as to a country be joined our laws, it may surely do yet more legally where it has a jurisdiction:

As thus trampling on all that is safe or respectable at home or abroad, in order to commit a nation crime to which we have no real temptation, and on which swift vengeance will surely descend with the plagues of fierce domestic dissension, or of foreign war, or the double horrors of both.

Could we, as if by the mere blindness of Fate, escape that bloody atonement which national acts like this entail, usually by their heinousness, and invariably when they are as foolish as they are wrong, what will at best ensue? What but the shame of having plundered an unhappy people who were incapable of resisting us, and of having done this in the mere wantonness of an aimless lust after what was not ours, of what we do not want, of what it would be wiser to avoid, could we even acquire it justly?

But will nations heretofore jealous enough of our legitimate career of greatness, of peace and of justice – will nations, that dreaded the example of our Liberty, endure to see the Freedom whose contagion they have feared, arm itself, in addition, under that potent name, with every thing that is aggressive, every thing that is faithless, wild. During and rapacious? Will not Despotism, compelled by the opposite spectacle of our institutions to learn humanity and justice, rejoice at an outrage so fit to bring Republics into discredit, and seize with eagerness the occasion to punish the past and the present, to tame what was a mischief to them while it was good, and what will become a plague to the earth when it grows bad?

Already the abominable doctrine is preached throughout the land, not merely to popular ears, but in grave Legislatures and even from cabinets, that, all the Continent being destined to be ours, is idle to talk to any adverse right of the present – that from Canada to California, from Oregon to the Isthmus, our eagles, as little to be arrested as those of Rome or of Napoleon, must fly. While, with these daring pretensions, we tread upon the weak, we affront the strong and teach them that, if they too would be safe, they must make common cause with those feebller nations whom we would now oppress. It is

"Nunc in ovilia – mox in reluctantes draconis" -

If the dragons are wise, they will assail at once the young bird of prey, that will presently turn with disdain from the harmless sheep-fold and rend their own scaly strength? But what, on the other hand, would be fit to be said of the prudence of the eagle who should make proclamation that now, while but half fledged, he means only a war upon hen roosts; but that presently, when his claws and beak shall be grown, he will swoop down upon the shepherd and his flocks? Would he not be apt to call up, for his early destruction, all who could send an arrow or point a gun?

He who, intent on plundering the feeble, announces, when he goes about it, that he designs, with those added means of offence, to assail the strong, is certainly like to draw upon himself both the weak and the powerful. The conduct then, which there seems some danger that this nation shall be led to adopt, is surely as impolitic as it is unjust, granting even that the object at which it immediately aims, is worth the injustice. If we mean to trample upon Mexico, is it not the part of prudence, not to tempt British interference, by taking of seizing without ceremony, upon Oregon, and of annexing all her possessions North of us? Why provoke her to take part against us? Will that course render our success easier, or more bloodless? Surely, if we want territory, the less the expense of life and money at which we get it the better; and if, on the other hand, it is, (as many in the madness of the day shockingly suggest,) mere war that we want, it will be better to begin with a small one, get ourselves a little in practice for that humane diversion, after 30 years disuse, and when we have trained and enlarged our armies and our fleets, then help ourselves by due aggressions or insults, to such greater foes as, in our fighting propensities, promise no easy victory, scars enough, ravage in abundance, a plenty of desolation to suffer and inflict, and in a word, blows by the belly-full.

But let us see what quarters of this country are thus interested in a war, and will draw profit or honor (whichever be the object) from it.

Maine seems to be keen for it. Is it then, for the benefit of her foreign lumber trade, almost her only resource? Or is it because, lying next to the enemy, she will taste superior advantages in the way of having desolation spread over her fields?

New Hampshire seems unanimous for it. Is it because she, too, is greatly exposed? Or is it because she has large shipping interests, that must be destroyed in a naval warfare with Britain?

Vermont has less to lose: and therefore seems less bent upon the strife. Imprudent Vermont!

Massachusetts, though likely to gain in her great interests, the Manufacturing, seems quite averse to the contest. But Massachusetts is a very selfish state!

Her case is nearly that of Rhode Island.

Connecticut is martially disposed. What has Connecticut to gain? I know not.

New York will, we suppose, profit in her vast foreign trade, in that of the Lakes; in her upland contiguity to British regiments and the exposures of her great city to bombardment. Having so little at stake, she may well like a war.

New Jersey lies equally exposed, in a long line of coast.

Pennsylvania has a great stream, by which there is access for a force of war-steamers to her great * and into the very heart of her wealthiest region. We see what she may lose: we conceive not what she can gain, except in perhaps, tunes to pay her debts.

Delaware and Maryland can suffer equally, but are less pleased with the prospect.

To Virginia, so agog for the contest, the inducement must lie in the annihilation of her tobacco trade.

As to north and Sough Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee – the cotton-growing states – one easily conceives the present advantage in the market for their staple, and the prospective benefit of raising up the growth of cotton  Egypt, * and Brazil.

Missouri and Illinois, I admit, will be benefited; for there'll be a great demand for lead.

I see, however, no State so safe, so remote from attack, as Kentucky. Her [ . . .] will [ . . . ].

IL SECRETARIO.

"The Course of the Enquirer,"

The course of this paper, is beyond all question, the most uncandid and disingenuous that ever yet conferred a discreditable distinction upon any press. It seems to proceed, and evidently does, upon the postulate, that there is no limit to the gullibility of its peculiar readers, and that they are incapable of detecting the grossest frauds upon their understandings, the most palpable distortions and misrepresentations of facts known to the whole country, and the most obvious suppressions of truth. Never did any man, connected with the public, make such heavy drafts upon its presumed stupidity.

Texas we all know, is and has been for months, the absorbing and almost the exclusive theme of that paper. Aided by Senator Walker, and other speculators in Texas Lands, bonds and scrip, its columns groan under editorials essays, letters and appeals, in favor of the acquisition of Texas, containing, we will venture to say, an amount of perversion, false reasoning, violation of history, suggestion false and suppressio vori, unmatchable in the same bulk in all American Political discussion or polemics. Texas! Texas!! Texas!!! It is Texas first, Texas last, and Texas all the time! Nothing else is regarded as of any consequence in comparison: All other public affairs are thrown into the back ground: And to force Texas upon the Union now, this minute, at this session of Congress, before a new Congress can meet and the true voice of the People be heard – in other words, to suppress and strangle that true voice, which the complotters well know will be ultimately against Texas, North and South, is the simple aim and end. If the Texas faction are not afraid of the People, WHY this unseemly haste and furious hurry? Why this Jehu speed in an affair of infinite moment, the gravest question of the age, involving consequences which the wisest cannot foresee, and craving the profoundest caution and deliberation? Why ram it down the throats of the People now? At this very instant of time? Can it not wait ten months? Is there ay danger that Texas herself will escape from the continent? Will she not be forthcoming next winter, and as anxious then as she is now to come into the Union? Will not her lands, her bonds, her scrip, keep a few months?

Really, a comparison of the present with the past, is calculated to fill one with astonishment at the extraordinary inconsistencies of our neighbors and many of their present allies. In 1837, in the administration of Mr. Van Buren, the question of annexing Texas was formally before the American People. It found favor with no party. It was resisted by Mr. Van Buren and most intemperately opposed by Mr. McDuffie then Governor of S. Carolina, and the proposition fell almost without a struggle or attracting any interest. Yet Texas was then what she is now! She possessed the same fertile fields, the same limits, the same independence, (for the battle of San Jacinto was fought in 1836) and we had precisely the same claims to reannex her as a part of Louisiana, that we have now! Yet then was witnessed none of this furious desire to possess her. None of this frantic haste to adopt her into the Union! None of these extensive combinations to write up a spurious public opinion in favor of the measure, and to make annexation absorb every thing else!

And why? Yes why? Is the reader so soft as to ask the question? There was then no large body of American citizens interested in Texas lands! She had them issued no bonds and scrip which American speculators ad bought up for a song, and which by annexation, they proposed and hoped to realize at par, for the outlay of a few beggarly dollars, to reap a harvest of princely estates! Work the problem as you will, and there is no other solution of the fiery ardor for Texas which prevails now, as contrasted with the utter indifference manifested for the acquisition in 1837. Far be it from me to intimate that the whole body of the friends of annexation are animated by interested motives. On the contrary we are satisfied that the Calhoun Party (and McDuffie himself) have come into the support of the measure on political grounds. They wish a Southern confederacy extending from Carolina, to the shores of California, and they have embraced annexation we verily believe, and are endeavoring to force it down, in order that it may induce the North to dissolve, and thus themselves evade the terrible responsibility of an act, which would damn them to more than Cnarian infamy!

But the country may rely upon it, that there is powerful and organized association of Texas land, bond and scrip holder, who are at head bottom of this whole Texas movement – whose views and ends are not political, much less patriotic, but selfish and mercenary only, and whose purposes are attained, when they get par for their investments, when their fortunes are made, and who do not look beyond that, to the incalculable and momentous consequences which are almost certain to flow from a measure so rashly conceived, and so recklessly urged in defiance of justice, the rights of other powers, and the laws of nations. We accuse not these men of wrong or wickedness: It is natural that they should act as they are acting: but we assert, that so great and vital a public measure, should not have originated in such merely personal and contemptible motives, nor be driven to a rash consummation, merely to put money in their purses.

To return to the Enquirer. That paper yesterday, engaged in the formal attempt to dragoon the Whigs of the General Assembly, into the support of Texas Resolutions! The attempt is bunglingly and confusedly executed, and if the Whigs retain their self-respect, if it have any effect at all, will have the contrary effect to that intended! Is it not enough that the Enquirer bullies its Democrats, and whips them into the traces – but must it come into the Whig camp and threaten and endeavor to intimidate the Whig Representatives of the People! Who has authorized is so confidently to pronounce that the public opinion of Virginia is for Texas, and the joint Resolution form of annexing Texas? Where is the evidence of the fact? Where are the petitions or the single petition? Where the popular meetings? Polk was for Texas and Polk got the vote of Virginia – and that is the whole proof offered to sustain the conclusion! Yet how many hundreds and thousands of Polk men are against Texas, and how many issues besides Texas were involved in the Presidential struggle.

We hope and do not doubt that the Whigs of the House will adhere firmly to their course, and the most firmly from this mingled attempt to coax and bully them! Let them distrust the blarney and despise the driving. In our simple judgment they ought to lay the whole ridiculous subject on the table, address themselves to the real business of the People and bring the session to a close. They know as well as we do, that is perfectly futile an way, and a mere loss of time, and that Texas annexation, at this session, is already a phantom.

“Annexation of Canada and New Brunswick!”

Petitions from New York and Maine were presented in the Senate on Monday, for the Annexation of these British colonies! Why not? We have just as honest a right to them as we have to Texas, for which we swapped with Spain for Florida, in 1819 – Calhoun and Jackson approving the bargain! There is an old adage that it is as well "to be hanged for an old Sheep as for a Lamb"! If the nation turns Rogue and Land Pirate, let it do so on a magnificent scale, and win Gold enough to gild the infamy!

“State Senate – Texas,”

The disagreement of the House of Delegates to the Senate’s amendments of the Texas Resolutions, was the subject of a pithy debate in the Senate yesterday. Mr. Thompson of A., a gentleman entirely too modest for the good of his associates, made a clear and powerful exposition of the constitutional difficulties involved in the wild, latitudinarian proposition of the Democracy; and Mr. Caperton followed up the positions of MR. T. with great vigor.
Messrs. Thompson of K, McMullen and Wallace supported the unlimited power of congress on the subject, as being clear and indisputable – and one of them as least claimed the power to annex China, Great Britain, Cuba, &c.

Mr. Standard, we learn, will reply today – and debate of increased interest will probably yet take place.

Feb. 7, 1845, RWv22i11p1c2

"Mr. Barrow of Louisiana,"

The remarks of this gentleman as reported [from the Baltimore Patriot] appear detached and disconnected; but they are decisive and of the utmost importance. Taken in connection with the revelations of the "Missourian" [Col. Bedton's organ] and the whole current of private opinion from Washington, we think them conclusive of the fate of the lawless and desperado scheme of annexation by Joint Resolution; at this session of congress at least! That atrocity will not succeed.

We at least shall thus gain all we have ever asked for: Time, deliberation, calmness, and the "sober second thought" of the people upon so vast and novel a measure. This opportunity for reflection allowed them, and we have never doubted that annexation would be frowned down as unwise, unconstitutional, unjust, and ruinous to the planning interest! Disgraceful to the character for probity of the American people, and most hazardous to this Union, the bond of Liberty and the ark of safety to the present and future generations, and above all to the South.

We tender in advance, our congratulations for the defeat by the Senate, of the predatory scheme of annexation now before that body, and we appeal to the Whigs of the General Assembly to stand firm! There will shortly be a hurricane of public opinion against the measure!

P. S. Since writing the above, we have looked into the National Intelligencer of yesterday, where we find the remarks of Mr. Barrow more fully quoted, and the occasion of them, stated. The reader's attention is requested, and the whole country may rest satisfied that, thanks to the integrity and patriotism of the Senate, the Rob Roy scheme of annexation, is defeated.

Texas:

"By Mr. Johnson: Certain resolutions from the Legislature of Louisiana, in relation to the annexation of Texas.

Mr. Johnson observed that he had stated before he had received these resolutions, that if the question of annexation could be presented free from constitutional objection he would vote for it, and he said so still. He had great doubts, however, as to the power of congress to provide for the admission of foreign territory into the Union by a joint resolution. He would give the matter the fullest examination and when the question came before the Senate he would vote on it according to the best lights before him.

Mr. Barrow would merely take this occasion to say that he was opposed to annexation in any and in every shape, at all times, and under all circumstances. The resolutions received from the Legislature of Louisiana, left the Senators at perfect liberty to act in the matter as they thought right. He should always act, on this and every other question, as he thought right, whether under instructions or not. If he had been in favor of annexation, he should have opposed it in the shape presented to the Senate by the other House. He should be prepared, when the question came before the Senate, to prove that the annexation of Texas would be ruinous to the whole South, and particularly to the State of Louisiana.

He had not supposed that the people of Louisiana were favorable to annexation before the receipt of these resolutions. He was far from regarding the result of the late Presidential election in that State, as indicative of the people's opinion upon annexation. He was convinced that, if that election had been fairly conducted, the vote of the State would have been given to Henry Clay. He did not undertake to say anything about other States; but this he would say, that, if Mr. Clay had not been cheated, villainously cheated in Louisiana, he would have received the vote of that State. He was glad that the subject of the election in Louisiana was now under investigation by the Legislature, and he hoped that that body would ferret out and expose the imposture and the infamous frauds which were notoriously committed, and by which alone the vote of the State had been given the James K. Polk.

"Texas Again,"

The House yesterday disagreed to the amendments proposed by the Senate to its resolutions. That is the House persists in its refusal to say that he acquisition of foreign territory by joint resolution is constitutional. It leaves that question to the good sense of our Senators.

"Texas Again,"

In the State Senate yesterday, no progress was made on the pending question – which was the motion of Mr. Thompson of Kanawha to insist upon the Senate’s amendment to the amendment of the House. This amendment, it will be recollected, insisted upon the declaration by the assembly that the admission of Texas, by a joint resolution of Congress, was both lawful and constitutional.

Mr. Stanard made a speech of great ability against this assumption of power, and sustained himself by a train of reasoning and authority which seemed irresistible. Mr. Thompson, of K., did attempt an answer, but certainly made but little impression upon the logical fortress of his opponent. Other gentlemen entered briefly into the subject.

Mr. Wallace of Fauquier, with infinitely more of sagacity than his coadjutors, plainly foresaw that an adherence on the part of the senate would defeat the object of the party, and therefore suggested to Mr. Thompson a withdrawal of the motion to insist – admitting, as we understand, that it was the senate that first raised the constitutional question, which now prevented concurrence in the general proposition of favoring the admission of Texas. It will be recollected that in the original action, they had waived any expression on that point.

Thus the matter stands at present; and notwithstanding the rod held over them by the Autocrat who daily gives out his edicts to his liege subjects, we think it not improbable the party will be compelled to “back out ingloriously,” as one of their leaders feared they would.

"Texas – the Two Houses at Issue,"

The Senate yesterday was in a snarl for a while. Mr. Wallace wished to ask a conference between the two houses whilst the motion of Mr. Thompson of K. in insist upon the senate’s amendments to the House’s amendment, was pending.

Mr. McMullen objected to the motion as being out of order, and, in an appeal from the decision of the Chair, was sustained by the Senate, 15 to 9.

After an hour’s talk upon the point of order and other matters of difficulty, the motion to insist was divided, so as to take the question on the amendments separately, and decided in the affirmative.

The Resolutions having been sent back to the House, that body adhered to its disagreement to the Senate’s amendment – and no course now remains but for the Senate to ask a conference.

"From Texas,"

We learn from Capt. Peterson, of the brig Najade, arrived from Vera Cruz, sailed 6th ult, that Santa Ana had attacked, at the head of 4,000 men, 1500 of which were cavalry, the town of Puebla, but was driven back by the Revolutionists. Santa Ana, it is said, would endeavor to make his escape either by the way of Vera Cruz of Tuepan. The day previous to the sailing of the Najade, about 350 volunteers had arrived from Alvarado in the steamer Neptune, and 1500 more were momently expected from Campechy in the steamer Montezuma, which, with those already in the city, would present a formidable front against any force the dictator might march against that city. The revolutionists were in hot pursuit of Santa Ana, and certain death awaited him should he fall into their hands. A National Guard, similar to the French national guards, had been established by the revolutionists throughout all Mexico, and all foreign citizens were called upon to defend themselves, notwithstanding, the revolution was spreading with rapidity throughout the Republic. Santa Ana continued to have around him a number of influential friends.

"Progress of the Texas Question in the Legislature,"

The rampant constitutional doctors if the Assembly, have cooled down a little in their pretensions. They have been compelled to ask a conference; and yesterday, on motion of Mr. Wallace, the Senate passed a resolution, inviting the House to appoint a committee to join its own committee in free and friendly conference on the subject of disagreement between the two Houses.

Accordingly, the House responded in an amicable tone, and the joint committee commenced its session about 2 o'clock yesterday.

The committee on the part of the Senate consists of Messrs. Wallace, Thompson of K., Stanard, Taylor, Carter, McMullen, and Caperton; on the part of the House, Messrs. Witcher, Preston, Edmunds of H., Bowden, Toler, Anderson, and Strother.
